Mr. CHARLTON enquired, What was the net public debt on the 31st December, 1881.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I stated to my hon. friend that the return he asked for could only be an approximate statement, but I have had placed in my hands, by the Deputy Minister of Finance, the following: The net debt on the 1st of July, 1881, was $155,375,780. The net debt on the 1st of July, 1882, will be $154,085,910, or a reduction of $1,309,870. The expenditure during the six months, charged to capital, is stated here at $3,531,139.

REPORT OF GERMAN DELEGATES.

Mr. MERNER enquired, Whether a report has been received from the four delegates from Germany invited by the Government to visit the North-West Territories, during the month of September last, with a view to induce emigration to those Territories, and whether the report submitted to the Government has been written in the German language, and whether it will be printed in that language for distribution?

Mr. POPE (Compton). A report has been received, but no report has been published in this country; it has been published in Germany, and is being distributed there. Two German pamphlets have been published in this country, one written by a German, and the other the Governor General's speech. These, of course, will be distributed in a few days in Germany.

CROSS POINT AND CAMPBELLTON, N.B., FERRY SERVICE.

Mr. HADDOW enquired, Whether the Government intend taking any steps to improve the inter-provincial ferry service between Cross Point and Campbellton, on the Restigouche River; and whether the survey made last season revealed any difficulty in the way of such improvement?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is now under the consideration of the Government.

DREDGING THE RESTIGOUCHE RIVER.

Mr. HADDOW enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to send a dredge, during the coming summer, to operate on that part of the channel of the Restigouche River below Campbellton, of which a survey was made during last year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is perfectly true that a survey was made last year. The estimate is a very large one, and, therefore, I am not in a position, now, to state to the hon. gentleman what the Government may propose to do then.

DREDGING GRAND LAKE, N.B.

Mr. KING enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make a survey of McManus' Cove, Grand Lake, N.B., during the coming summer, with a view to dredging the same?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is not yet decided.

DUTY ON LAND PLASTER.

Mr. WHEELER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to remove the duty on manufactured land plaster, imported for use as a fertilizer?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is not the intention of the Government.

BOUNTIES TO FISHERMEN.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH enquired, Whether the bounty of $150,000 a year to the fishermen is intended to be permanent, or only to continue as long as the Treaty of Washington is in force, and whether fishermen engaged in the salmon, shad and river fisheries are to participate in the benefit of such bounty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The full particulars with reference to the intentions of the Government on this subject will be stated when the vote is brought down for the consideration of the House.

STATISTICAL BUREAU AT WINNIPEG.

Mr. SCOTT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a Statistical Bureau at Winnipeg, as a branch of the Department of Agriculture, for the purpose of collecting the agricultural and industrial statistics of Manitoba and the North-West, to be published annually as a report.

Mr. POPE (Compton). It is the intention of the Government to collect the chief statistics of the North-West, and we are now considering the subject.

IMMIGRANTS ACCOMMODATION AT WINNIPEG.

Mr. SCOTT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make immediate arrangements at the city of Winnipeg for the temporary shelter of the large number of emigrants who are now arriving, and will continue to arrive during the present year, at that place?

Mr. POPE (Compton). We are now making arrangements for the accommodation of these immigrants. It is our intention not only to repair the old sheds but to build new ones.

DREDGE AT THE MOUTH OF RIVIÈRE DU LOUP.

Mr. MASSUE, in the absence of Mr. HOUDE, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to send a dredge next spring to the mouth of Rivière du Loup (en haut)?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Such is the intention of the Government.

DOMINION FRANCHISE.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) moved that the members of this Parliament should be elected under a franchise, the creation of the law of the Dominion, and having no reference to the franchise of any of the Provinces comprised within said Dominion. He said: The proposition embodied in the resolution I am about to submit to the House is one with regard to which, it seems to me, there can scarcely be any difference of opinion. This Parliament is supposed to be the embodiment and the exponent of the popular will, and at least ought to have the right to say by whom and by what franchise its members shall be elected. It may be said that, at the present time, this Parliament controls the franchise, because the elections to this House are conducted on the franchise of the several Provinces of the Dominion. But, Sir, any Province can, if it has a mind, change the franchise, so that it never is in reality determined by this Parliament what the franchise in the elections of its members shall be. I think, in this way, the Parliament of the Dominion, which is the highest authority, is, in some measure, subordinate to, and made dependent upon, the authority of the Provinces. It seems to me that it is not a correct principle that the highest authority should be dependent upon the inferior, and, therefore, I think that this resolution is one which will commend itself to the principles of this House. At present, members sit here who are elected by different franchises. No two Provinces have franchises which are alike. In the Province of Ontario, we have a real estate qualification and an income qualification. In cities, the franchise is real estate to the value of $400; in towns, to the extent of $300; and in municipalities and villages, to the extent of $200; besides which there is an income franchise of $400. In addition to this, we have the farmers' sons, who enjoy the franchise without having any property qualification. In Quebec, the franchise is $300 in cities, or a rental of $30; in other municipalities it is $200, or a rental of $20. In Nova Scotia, the franchise is $150 of real estate, and $300 of personal or real property, or $300 of personal property alone. In New Brunswick, the franchise is $100 real estate; $400 personal property or income, while, in Prince Edward Island, the franchise is, practically, universal, for it almost amounts to manhood suffrage. In the Island, any man between twenty-one and sixty enjoys the franchise, while over the age of sixty a voter must be assessed for property to the value of $6.40 a year. In Manitoba, a residence of a short time is required, with ownership of property to the value of $100. In British Columbia, the franchise amounts to manhood suffrage. Now, Sir, I think that every hon. member of this House must admit that this anomalous condition of things—that hon. members who have an equal right in the legislation of this House, should be affected by different franchises—and it is to remedy this wrong that I propose the resolution. Look how this thing works. A man in one Province is denied the right which is given to his fellow subject in another Province. It has a tendency to create discontent. It is destructive of patriotism, because no man can do otherwise than feel discontent if he is refused rights which are enjoyed by his fellow subjects. He cannot be animated by a feeling of strong patriotism, when he feels that injustice is being done him, and this feeling of discontent makes the government of the country more difficult to carry out, and renders the stability of the country less secure than it otherwise would be. The more intelligent the people are, the more keenly will they feel the wrong thus done them, and the more discontent will such a wrong arouse, because ignorance can be enslaved without feeling that it is being wronged; but the more intelligent a community or a people is, the more will they be alive to their rights and privileges. It is not quite pertinent to the subject upon which I am now speaking to say what the qualifications of a voter should be; but still, I think it is so relevant to it that it may not be out of place for me, at least, to give my own views on that subject. I believe myself that manhood suffrage would, take it altogether, be the best suffrage for this country. The Canadian people as a mass, are intelligent and able to exercise the franchise, and, therefore, I think it is in the interests of the country that they should be entrusted with it; because you cannot withhold a right from a man that he feels he is entitled to without him feeling the wrong, but if you give a man his rights they make him feel more deeply his duties as a subject; they make him a better subject than he otherwise would be. It may be argued, and I dare say it was argued truly, when the franchise was given to the people of older nations where the masses of the people are comparatively ignorant to what they are here, that it is not safe to entrust them with the franchise; but every Canadian possesses or hopes to possess property, and he is intelligent enough to know that the security of his property is in the proper administration of the law, and this makes him a good law-abiding subject. Again, property is widely distributed in this country. Property does not belong to the few, and the many are not homeless, as in many other countries, and, therefore, there is no such danger in giving the franchise to a man who has not property in this country as there is in other countries, where the few, comparatively speaking, are the owners of property, and where the many are, in a measure, homeless. Again, every man requires to submit to the law. What is the law? It is a compact between the various members of society to regulate the conduct of one towards another. Well, it cannot be said that it is just that a man shall be bound by an agreement to which he is no party. If a man is bound to obey the law, he ought to have a voice in the making of the law. Again, it is said that taxation without representation is an injustice. I agree with this proposition, and I think it is also injurious to patriotism, because how can you expect a man to have any patriotic emotions who does not own a foot of the land of the country in which he lives, or who has no voice in the government of his country. I ask, how from such a man can you expect patriotism? If taxation ought to have representation, every man is taxed in this country—that is, he is a consumer—and as this House only deals with taxes which are the result of Excise or Customs, every man who is a consumer pays taxes, and, therefore, ought to be represented. The man who has no property pays the heaviest taxes you can levy on any man. He is the first man, perhaps, who would be called on to perform military duties—to risk his life in the defence of the country—and yet you give him no voice in the government of his country, while you tax him more heavily than it is possible to tax any man with property. Again, if you adopted manhood suffrage, you would be going very little further than the existing state of things, and you would be doing away with many of the evils which arise from the present system. For instance, if we had manhood suffrage we would not have the difficulties we have now in determining who shall vote. A great saving would be effected for the people in doing away, in a great measure, with Courts of Revision, and the Judges Court to decide who shall be electors. And I hold it would tend to good morality, because, now, many men are put on the voters' lists who should not be there, and many are kept off who ought to be on. It is a sort of struggle between the two political parties as to which can get the largest number of voters put off or put on. Another good effect which manhood suffrage would have, in my opinion, would be this: that it would, to a large extent, eliminate politics from the management of our municipal affairs. Then we would have no anxiety for political reasons to strive who should rule the municipalities or corporations in which we live. We could only then have one desire, and that is, to elect men best calculated to do what is right in the interest of the public. Our leading men would not require to tell the electors to look after the voters' lists, or to say to their friends: "See by all means that you get the voters' list right."

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). And if the assessor is a Grit, watch him.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk). Therefore, I move, seconded by Mr. McCallum, the resolution on the Paper.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk).

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS AT THE PORT OF ST. HYACINTHE.

Mr. TELLIER, in moving for a statement of imports and exports at the port of St. Hyacinthe from 1st July, 1881, to 1st February, 1882, a statement of the receipts and expenses at the same port during the same period, said: Mr. Speaker, in making this motion I wish to call the attention of the Government and of the House to the importance of the port of St. Hyacinthe. This port was opened in 1875, and since that date its importance has gone on increasing. The first year of its opening the exports amounted to only $21,930, the imports to $27,401, and the duties to $1,157.06, whilst, according to last year's returns, I see that the exports from this port amounted to $73,233 and imports to $113,569. I noticed also that during the same period the receipts reached $7,549.94. If we refer to the comparative statement of exports and imports, from and in the various ports in the Province of Quebec, for the year ending 30th June, 1881, we find that the port of St. Hyacinthe ranks seventh in the Province of Quebec as to its imports, and tenth as to its receipts. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, this port ranks last, not only in the Province of Quebec, but also in the whole Dominion, as to its expenditure, which was, during the last year, $313.12. I have prepared a statement showing the number of ports in the Dominion. They number 138. Of these 138 ports 55 contributed for the fiscal year 1880-81, less revenue to the Dominion than the port of St. Hyacinthe. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, the salaries paid in each of those 55 ports are considerably higher than those paid in the port of St. Hyacinthe. Thus, in Ontario, we find 17 ports yielding less revenue than the port of St. Hyacinthe; however, in these ports salaries are paid amounting to $17,235.33, giving an average of $1,013.72 for each port. In the Province of Quebec there are 14 ports yielding a less revenue than that of St. Hyacinthe, and in those 14 ports the salaries amount to $14,250, or an average of $1,018 for each port. In New Brunswick we have 9 ports yielding less revenue than that of St. Hyacinthe, and the salaries in those ports amount to $11,961, or an average of $1,329.04 for each port. In Nova Scotia we have 15 ports yielding less revenue than that of St. Hyacinthe, and salaries amounting to $17,660.55, or an average of $1,177.37 for each port. So, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that the average annual salary in all these ports is over $1,000. Notwithstanding this, for the last few years the salary has been $300 only at St. Hyacinthe, which amount has been increased to $400 for the current year. It is with a feeling of satisfaction that I submit these facts to the Government, in order to show the unfair position in which stands the Collector at St. Hyacinthe. I have already raised the question of increasing the salary of that officer, who has ever faithfully and diligently discharged his duties, and I hope that the Government will hear my prayer. But, Mr. Speaker, it is not only the port of St. Hyacinthe that is unfairly treated by the Customs Department. It would seem that there are two sets of weights and measures in that Department. I see the Province of Quebec is one of those which collects the most revenue for the Dominion. It yielded $8,133,664 during the past year, whereas Ontario contributed but $6,401,522 during the same period. There is here shown, Mr. Speaker, in favor of Quebec, a difference of $1,732,141 in the revenue of the two greatest Provinces in the Dominion. Notwithstanding this, the Province of Quebec, which contributed the greater amount of revenue is not the one where the salaries are the highest, for if we look into the year's reports, we see that in Ontario there has been spent in collecting Customs duties the sum of $223,577, whereas Quebec spent but $195,229 for the same purpose, being a difference of $23,338 which the Province of Ontario spent over and above the Province of Quebec. If we compare the salaries paid in the two Provinces we will see that not only are the expenses incurred in collecting duties less in one Province than in the other, but that the present Government has despoiled Quebec to favor Ontario. In 1878, under the Liberal regime, the salaries in Ontario amounted to $188,793, and, in 1881, under the Conservative regime to $193,067, or an increase of $4,274 over 1878. A different system has been followed in the Province of Quebec, for the salaries, instead of being increased in the same ratio as in Ontario, have been reduced. Thus, in 1878, the salaries in Quebec amounted to $148,417, whereas in 1881 they were reduced to $139,694, or a decrease of $8,723. On the other hand, the Province of Ontario, which contributes less revenue than the Province of Quebec, sees its salaries increased, whilst the Province of Quebec, which contributes a larger revenue than the Province of Ontario, has its salaries reduced. It is a fact that they have been reduced to the extent of $8,723, whilst those of Ontario were raised by a sum of $4,274. The salaries of Customs officials in the Province of Quebec are either sufficient or they are not; if they are sufficient, then there is a useless expenditure in Ontario, and if they are not, an injustice is being done to Quebec. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it will be sufficient for me to place these facts before the House in order to have this injustice remedied, useless expenditure curtailed, and to see the Collector at the port of St. Hyacinthe receive a salary more commensurate with the responsible position with which he is entrusted and with the services he is called to render to the country.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN, (in French). Mr. Speaker, I regret that my colleague, the hon. Minister of Customs, is not present to hear what the hon. member has just said.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Speak in English.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I ask to be excused, if I speak my own language. If the hon. member wishes to speak in English, he may do so. I will not fail to call the attention of my colleague, the hon. Minister of Customs, to the figures given to us by the hon. member. It may be, that the officer employed at the port of St. Hyacinthe has been overlooked or unfairly treated, but I am sure that it is not the intention of the hon. Minister of Customs to allow him to suffer, or to do him an injustice, and I will certainly call his attention to-morrow to the remarks just made in the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Mr. Speaker, if the mere question of the salary of this official was under discussion, I would consider, notwithstanding the absence of the hon. Minister of Customs, that the question is not one of great importance, but the facts brought forward by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Tellier) certainly call for the attention of the Government, and for a more satisfactory answer on its part. If it is true, as I doubt not, that the receipts of the Province of Quebec have amounted to $8,000,000, and those of Ontario to $6,000,000 only, and that so great a difference exists in the expenditure for salaries of employés in the two Provinces, I think that the Government should take into consideration the totality of the remarks made by the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe, and remedy matters.

Motion agreed to.

THE TARIFF AND AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS.

Mr. ORTON moved that a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into and report to this House upon the operation of the Tariff upon the agricultural interests of the Dominion; with power to send for persons, papers and records;—and that the said Committee be composed of Messrs. Wallace (Norfolk), Bain, Trow, Coughlin, White (Hastings), Landry, Benoit, Béchard, and the mover. He said: I shall not make any further remarks on the objects of the Committee, beyond those I made on a former occasion. I think there can be very little doubt on the part of hon. members of this House that it is a very important Committee; and, although hon. members on this side may be very positive that the operation of the Tariff is beneficial to the agricultural interests, that is no reason why we should not enquire whether it can be made still more advantageous to those interests. This Committee will also afford an opportunity to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to obtain the facts relating to the effect of the Tariff on this large and important industry, and I have no doubt that the result of the Committee will be highly satisfactory to the country.

Mr. ANGLIN. Hon. members on this side of the House can have no objection to a most careful and thorough enquiry, provided the enquiry be a really honest one, into the operation of the Tariff upon the position of the farmers of this country, and as to their condition; but it strikes me that the hon. gentleman who moved this motion can scarcely be aware of its effect, and the important fact that it is an expression of non-confidence in the Ministry. The hon. the Minister of Finance declared very distinctly and clearly the other day that he had made a thorough enquiry into the operation of the Tariff as affecting the interests of the farmers, that he had ascertained what the effects are, and he stated what those effects are. The hon. Minister stated that the Tariff operated so as to place more money in their pockets, and he told the House, moreover, that the farmers themselves are thoroughly aware of the good effects of the Tariff on their interests. The hon. Minister of Railways subsequently repeated something very much to the same effect. Perhaps I am out of order in referring to a past debate, but I can hardly refrain from directing the attention of the House to the statements made by those two hon. gentlemen in their official capacity. The mover of the resolution declares thereby there is some room for doubt as to the operation of the Tariff on the interests of the farmers. I believe there is more than room for doubt, if the statements made are correct. I have no doubt, if an honest and thorough enquiry should be made, it will prove beyond all question that those statements made by hon. Ministers were made, if not in ignorance, at least in misconception of the facts, and in ignorance of the actual operation of the Tariff in that particular.

Mr. ARKELL. No doubt the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) has brought forward his motion for a very good purpose; but I am inclined to think that hon. members on this side of the House will not agree with a motion of that nature. It tends to throw distrust on the working of the National Policy, and, so far as I am individually concerned, and I can only express my own feelings, I must say that in my part of the Dominion farmers are well satisfied—the Conservative farmers and the moderate Reform farmers are well satisfied with the working of the National Policy. I believe no Committee appointed by this House can obtain information that will throw any more light on the question than is shed upon it at the present time. The time will come, probably in 1883, when the question will be settled at the polls, and I believe it will be settled in a manner satisfactory to the Ministry of the day; and I do not think it is necessary at the present time to appoint a Select Committee to look into the working of the National Policy as far as our agricultural interests are concerned. I shall, therefore, feel it my duty to vote against the motion.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION REGULATION.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all Orders in Council, departmental orders and correspondence relating to the arrangements for the promotion of immigration, including the regulation under which a commission has been lately granted to the agents of steamship companies, with a statement of the number of persons booked under the operation of the said arrangement, and of the total number of immigrants booked (1st) from the United Kingdom, and (2nd) from the continent of Europe for the season of 1881. He said: Some time ago I moved for an address for certain information on the subject of immigration, but that was for the last fiscal year. This address is for a statement of the number of persons booked for the immigration season of 1881, and it embraces also a proposal that we should address His Excellency for copies of Orders in Council, departmental orders and correspondence, including a regulation under which a commission was granted to agents of steamship companies. I am informed a regulation was made under which, I think, $2 per head has been granted to the agents of steamship companies in connection with immigration.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I have no objection to the motion, and the returns will be brought down as far as I am able to do so. I would, however, say to the hon. gentleman, that there is not now any arrangements for such commissions being paid. For two months, August and September of last year, if my memory serves me, we did pay commissions; but there is no such arrangement now in force.

Mr. BLAKE. There was one.

Mr. POPE. Yes, during those two months.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF CATTLE.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex), in moving for a list of quarantine stations authorized under the regulations for the importation of cattle for breeding purposes, said: I see, by the public prints and the Canada Gazette, that a portion of land has been set apart near the town of Sarnia to be used as a quarantine station. Now, I have nothing whatever to say against this selection of Sarnia; but I think, if the Minister of Agriculture had paid any attention to the question as to what was the most eligible position for a quarantine station of that character, he would have placed one in the county of Essex. Of course, they have the Grand Trunk Railway at Sarnia offering facilities for the importation of cattle at that point, and I see no reason why Sarnia should not be on the list; but there are five or six railways opposite to Windsor, running to southern, western and northern points, and if the concession as to the importation of cattle for breeding purposes is to have any practical value, I do not think any hindrance should be placed in the way by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, so as to compel people to take cattle 100 miles out of their way before they can reach the desired destination. I think the hon. Minister of Agriculture ought to make a still further concession, and give us a quarantine station at some other point, either Windsor or Amherstburg, in the county of Essex.

Mr. JONES (South Leeds). I have no doubt that the place selected by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, near Sarnia, is a very good point, and that the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) would like a station opposite his county. Perhaps we all should like to have quarantine stations in our respective counties if the Government could afford it. But I think there should be more than one quarantine station for Canada. For the far West, I should say the place chosen is a very good one if we are only to have one such station; but, I believe, there is a great necessity for more, and that the principal importations of cattle to Canada, for breeding purposes, are from the eastern States and New York. Therefore, I think, we should have, besides a station on the St. Clair River, a quarantine station on the border between New York and Canada, and that no better place for it could be found than some of the islands in the St. Lawrence, where cattle could be kept totally isolated, with no danger of the spread of disease from any infected animals.

Mr. POPE (Compton). The objection of the hon. member for Essex could not have arisen if we could reasonably have obtained a site for a quarantine station at Windsor—not that I think there are not other places quite as good. But we sent an officer to see if we could get any land at Windsor for the purpose of a quarantine station, or at Sarnia either, and his report is entirely in favor of Sarnia, at which we are offered a piece of land at a nominal rent. Everybody knows that it takes a considerable quantity of land, twenty-five or thirty acres, for such a station. I am not so anxious, as the hon. member for South Leeds, that cattle should be brought into Canada from New York and the adjoining States. While the Government is quite ready to allow the introduction of healthy animals from the east, we do not believe there is any disease in the western States, from which we should generally prefer importations. The hon. gentleman says there should be more than one quarantine station for Canada. We have already several, though, I am sorry to say, they cost a good deal. We must maintain such stations at the principal ports, large as the expense is. We shall have one at Sarnia, if the money be voted for it; we have one at Quebec already, and are going to have one at St. Johns. We have a station at Charlottetown, and one at Halifax, or shall have, if the House votes the necessary money. I think we have gone as far at present as it is safe in expenditure for this purpose.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I do not feel satisfied with the explanation of the hon. Minister of Agriculture on this subject. I can tell him that if any official of his Department came to Windsor, or Essex, to enquire about land for a station, neither I nor any of my friends, political or social, ever heard of it. I could easily get him all the land he wants for the purpose. And when he is informed that there is a veterinary surgeon at Windsor and another at Amherstburg, for the inspection of all the cattle brought in, and that these veterinary surgeons, though appointed by the Government, are paid by the railway companies, I think it will appear to the House very remarkable that no stations should be established in that county. With regard to the importations at the point I recommend, there are twenty applications received in that part of the country for permission to bring in cattle for breeding purposes for one made at Sarnia. I do not care five cents whether the station be placed at Windsor or Sarnia, so far as political objects are concerned, so the hon. gentleman for South Leeds is quite mistaken in attributing any such motive to me on this occasion. I think the Minister has made a blunder in this business. If he knew anything of the West, its business and railways, he would understand that the great railway centre in the West is Detroit, and not Port Huron; and if he wishes to consult the convenience of the public, he will have a station at the points I suggest, either Windsor or Amherstburg. I am quite satisfied he can get suitable land for it for nothing, and I believe that if he sent an officer to enquire into the subject, that officer performed his duty in a very inefficient manner.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOR WORKS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. McISAAC moved for copies of all reports of engineers, and petitions respecting Arisaig Pier, Cape George Pier and Bayfield Breakwater, Nova Scotia, and all other papers relating thereto, since 30th September, 1878. He said: For the last three Sessions I have brought the matter referred to in this resolution under the notice of the Minister of Public Works. Petitions have also been sent in from time to time setting forth the condition of those public works. I am sorry to say little has been done either to preserve, or to improve those structures. I am happy, however, to see that the sum of $1,500 is put in the Estimates this year for one of those works, that at Arisaig. I have only to say, as a proof of the importance of this work, that it is one of the oldest, if not the oldest of the kind in Nova Scotia. From the remote date of its completion, till Confederation the Local Legislature had charge of it and improved it, from time to time, and always maintained it properly. Since that time this Parliament has had charge of it, but did not give it sufficient attention. But now, on account of the rapid growth of the fishing business, especially last year, it is not $1,500 but $15,000 that should be expended on this work. There is another work, the pier at Cape George, commenced in 1870 by the Dominion Government. Between the date of its commencement and 1877, from $30,000 to $40,000 had been expended in completing and repairing this structure. Unfortunately in the fall of 1877 the storms or gales of that season injured it to some extent, and swept portions of it away. I brought it to the notice of this Government at the time, and an engineer was sent down, but no provision was made for its proper repair. A small trifle, not exceeding $1,000, if expended then would have prevented the necessity of spending the large sum required now. This Government commenced it in 1870, before the advent of the late Government to power. Something over $20,000 had been expended, and it had been completed by the present Government when in power before. The late Government expended something over $10,000 upon it in repairs. The Government cannot say that the matter was not brought to their notice. I have brought it to the notice of the hon. Minister of Public Works again and again. I will say this for him, that during the first year of the present Administration I wrote to him and spoke to him, and he regretted then that he was not able to do anything for the work, but said the next Session something certainly would be done. But the next Session came and passed, and not one dollar has been appropriated since. The consequence is, that over $30,000 is lost and wasted by this Government, simply because they did not grant a very trifling sum in 1879 to prevent the entire destruction of this work. Besides, a great injury has been done to the fishing trade in that place. These works are altogether in the interests of the fishermen, and to show their importance to the fishing interests, I may say that fishermen resort to these places, not only from different parts of Nova Scotia but also from the neighboring provinces, especially from the Prince Edward Island. As a result, business has increased so rapidly and so extensively that last summer an immense canning establishment was put in operation, in each of these places in spite of the lack of shelter which the present Government failed to afford. Another work in which waste of money has been permitted is that at Bayfield. I may say that Bayfield Harbor is one of the best harbors between the Strait of Canso and Pictou. There is no other harbor on the southern coast of the Straits of Northumberland calculated to give as much shelter as the harbor of Bayfield. To make it as nearly perfect as possible a breakwater connecting the Island with the mainland was started. It had been under the consideration of successive Governments, and at last it was undertaken by the Mackenzie Administration in 1877, and the first instalment of it was completed in 1878. The intention of the Government then was to build it by instalments, and to complete it in three years. That time has elapsed and not a dollar has been expended since. I may say the same of Tracadie. The present Government expended money there and allowed the works constructed by themselves, which cost money, to disappear altogether. Hardly a trace of thousands of dollars which they expended in that part of the country can be seen to-day, simply because they thought far more of the Great West than they did of those who were contributing the money they were so prodigal in expending in the West. I may say that no money can be so profitably expended in Nova Scotia, especially for the fishermen, as money appropriated for the improvements of harbors and piers. It adds to the safety of their lives, and enables them to prosecute their calling at times and in places when and where it would otherwise be impossible. Besides the direct benefit to the fishermen in this respect, expenditure of money in making these improvements is beneficial to other classes of the people. We complain, particularly for the last four years, of the treatment of our fishermen; in fact, we complain of the treatment that the whole Province of Nova Scotia has received at the hands of this Government so far as appropriations for harbor improvements are concerned. The complaints are not confined to the portion of the Province from which I come; they are general. I will present to the House a comparison of the treatment which Nova Scotia has received during the first four years of the late Administration, with the treatment she has received from the present Government since they came into power. While they have increased the expenditure generally, and whilst they have taxed the people enormously, yet they have allowed the fishermen of Nova Scotia to disappear almost altogether from the Estimates. I find that, in 1879, the first year of the present Government, they voted $17,500 for the harbors and breakwaters of Nova Scotia. In 1874, during the first Session of the Mackenzie Administration, $205,200 were appropriated for the same service, or $187,700 more granted by the Mackenzie Administration for the fishermen of Nova Scotia and the improvement of the harbors and piers, than had been granted by the present Government. Can they say they were not able to be so generous to the poor fishermen of Nova Scotia as the Mackenzie Administration? No. What were the receipts then? The revenue of the present Government, in 1879, amounted to $23,307,406, while the revenue at the disposal of the Mackenzie Government in their first year, amounted to $24,648,715, or $1,341,309 more than the present Government received. But what was the expenditure of that year? We find that the present Government, during their first year in office, expended, as ordinary expenditure, $24,850,634, while the Mackenzie Administration expended only $23,713,071, or $1,137,563 less than the present Government expended the first year. Let me compare the second year of the two Administrations in their treatment of Nova Scotia in this respect. I find that the appropriation by the present Government in the second Session, was $40,194; that by the Mackenzie Administration in their second year of office was $242,500, or $202,306 more than the present Government. Is it because the present Government had no revenue, or because they spent their money elsewhere, that they did not treat Nova Scotia as liberally as the late Administration? But I do not say that the late Administration gave us what we were entitled to and, as a proof of that opinion in Nova Scotia, I would cite the fact that the people changed their representatives here in the majority of cases, and sent others in their place. They were led to believe that in this matter, as well as in every other, the Conservative party would deal more generously with the interests of Nova Scotia, but they have found out their mistake. The receipts during the second year of the present Administration amounted to $29,635,297. The revenue of the late Administration during the second year amounted to only $22,587,587, or $7,047,710 in excess, and yet they only gave the fishermen of Nova Scotia $40,194, while the late Government gave them $242,500. What was the expenditure during the second year? The expenditures made by the present Government reached $25,502,524, while the expenditures by the late Government amounted to only $24,488,371, or $1,014,124 less. The third year may be a little better, so far as the appropriations are concerned. In 1881, the appropriations for harbors and piers, by this Government, amounted to $55,900, while in the corresponding year, 1876, the late Government expended only $36,500, or $19,400 less. But let us compare the revenue. From the speech of the hon. the Finance Minister, I find that the revenue, for 1881, is $31,710,000, while the revenue at the disposal of the late Government was only $22,059,274. This was on account of the low Tariff, and the Government, out of sympathy for the fishermen of Nova Scotia who suffered much during the depression which extended over the whole world, decided that was not the time to add to their burdens by imposing more taxation. The excess of taxation in that year was $9,650,726, to which amount I have no doubt the fishermen contributed more than their share. I find that the expenditure, in 1881, was $26,419,670, whilst the expenditure of the late Government in the corresponding year was only $23,519,301, or over $2,000,000 less. From the Estimates brought down for 1882—including the Supplementary Estimates to date—I find that the appropriations to be made for harbors and piers this year will be $58,426, while, in 1877, the corresponding year of the Mackenzie Administration, the appropriations amounted to only $31,500, or $26,926 less than the amount now asked for that purpose. But let us look at the receipts and the general expenditures. It is impossible to say what the revenue for 1882, or the fourth year of the comparison, will be. We have been told by the hon. the Finance Minister that the revenue for 1881 will be $31,710,000, and, allowing $1,710,000 to be cut off, and calling it $30,000,000, we may take that amount as the revenue for the fourth year, while the revenue at the disposal of the Mackenzie Administration for the corresponding year was only $22,037,000. The expenditure in 1882 chargeable to Consolidated Revenue Fund, according to the last Estimates, amounts to $28,797,732, while that at the disposal of the Mackenzie Government, in 1877, was only $23,503,158, or a difference of $5,294,574. Aggregating the amounts for these four years, I find that the present Administration appropriated only $172,020 for the harbors and piers of Nova Scotia since their advent to power, while the Mackenzie Government, during the corresponding period, gave the fishermen of that Province $515,700, or an excess in favor of the late Administration of $343,680, or 300 per cent. as much as the present Administration gave for that purpose, while, at the same time, the present Government have increased the expenditure to the alarming figure of $10,346,689. If we compare the receipts or revenue the two Governments had at their disposal we find that the present Government received $22,982,116 more during their first four years than the late Administration. Yet we find that the late Government gave to the fishermen of Nova Scotia three times as much as the present Government; and these men, as I remarked, in proportion contribute more and suffer more under the operation of the National Policy than perhaps any other class. Hon. gentlemen will say that the present Government, in their beneficence, have granted $150,000 this year to the fishermen of the Dominion. Let us suppose the fishermen of Nova Scotia alone get this $150,000. What do we find? We find that the present Government only granted $172,000 for piers and breakwaters in Nova Scotia, which may be considered as done for the benefit of the fishermen; and adding that to the whole $150,000, we have only $322,020, or $190,680 less than was granted by the previous Government in the interest of the fishermen. But we do not get the whole of that $150,000. The fishermen of the Dominion get it. If we get only the half, the difference would be still more largely in favor of the justice, if not the generosity, of the late Administration—because from comparison we can call it not only justice but generosity. There are many claims on behalf of the fishermen which this $150,000 is supposed to satisfy. But it cannot be made to meet them. The $4,500,000 of the Fishery Award, which has been in the hands of the present Government for the last three years, is the money of the fishermen of Nova Scotia and the Maritime Provinces generally. Some say that this insulting $150,000 is ample liquidation of their claim; but I say it is not. If the fishermen have any rights at all, they are entitled to the interest on the whole amount. The present Government have enjoyed the use of that money for the last three years. If I remember rightly, the hon. the Finance Minister, in his first Budget Speech, said the first money he received after his advent to power was the Fishery Award. It was paid in November, 1878, I believe, and the interest on it at 5 per cent., from that time to the end of next June, would amount to about $805,000. That is what the fishermen of the Dominion are entitled to; and after that they will be entitled annually to $225,000—and this annuity should not be left dependent on the whim or vote of Parliament, it should be secured by Statute. If the present Government recognize and sympathize with the claims of the fishermen, when they ask for nothing but their own, the recognition ought to be payment in full. The fishermen of Nova Scotia have another claim. In October last the hon. Minister of Railways went to Cobourg, in Ontario, to tell the fishermen of Nova Scotia that the people of the Maritime Provinces paid $369,000 of duty on breadstuffs. We in the Maritime Provinces know that the fishermen, more than any other class, pay the duty on breadstuffs. They are almost the only importers of flour and meal; and the reason, which has often been stated in this House, is that the fishermen carry their fish in their own vessels to the United States, and bring back flour as a return cargo. In that way although they pay the duty of 50 cents, they save the difference between it and the freight from Ontario to Nova Scotia. Besides the United States is the market for their fish, and not Ontario or Quebec. I find from the returns of 1880, that the fishermen of the Dominion number 60,617, the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces 41,873, and the fishermen of Nova Scotia 29,276. If we take these figures as the basis for distributing the bounty among the fishermen of the Dominion, we find that each will receive $2.47. On the same basis of distribution we find the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces pay about $8.80 per head of the $369,000 taxation on their breadstuffs according to the recent announcement of the hon. Minister of Railways. I will give an instance of the oppressive effect of the policy of the Government on Nova Scotia, apart from their curtailment of subsidies for navigation improvements. Let me refer to the county of Antigonish, whose population is mainly composed of farmers, fishermen, mechanics and merchants. What do they gain by the so-called protection? According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find entered for home consumption in the county of Antigonish during 1878, the last year of the Mackenzie Free Trade Tariff, goods to the value of $66,115, on which were collected duties amounting to $12,032. In 1831, the last year of the National Policy or Protective Tariff, goods valued at $59,239 were entered for home consumption, while the duties collected on the same reached the astonishing sum of $25,543, more than double the amount of duty paid by the same people in 1878, and that on $6,876 less of goods. In other words, the duty they paid in 1878 was about 18 per cent., while in 1831 it exceeded 44 per cent., or an increase in the rate of percentage of 146 per cent. Where does this enormous taxation go? It certainly does not go to the poor fishermen, as I have shown by the figures quoted a moment ago. The hon. Minister of Railways can answer this question. The far West down to the Pacific which has been, and is the arena of his prodigal expenditures, can tell where the taxation of the people of his native Province goes. Every one knows the great influence the hon. gentleman has with the Government. Every one knows how well that influence is deserved. I would ask him to exercise it in the interest of his own Province. We all remember the support he received in that Province at the last election, in the belief, that if he were returned to office, fuller justice and greater generosity would be shown to Nova Scotia. I hope when the next Supplementary Estimates will be brought down, they will show that he and his colleagues are disposed to make a departure in their continuously unjust treatment of Nova Scotia. I hope these Estimates will show that the present occupants of the Treasury benches are not content merely to do as much for the fishermen and people of Nova Scotia, by way of appropriations, as their predecessors have done. They are expected to increase these appropriations in the ratio in which they have increased the taxation. Nothing less can be just, nothing less should be satisfactory to the people of Nova Scotia.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course, there is no objection to the motion. We will bring down the papers, and the hon. gentleman will then see whether his long speech was exactly the speech to make on this motion. It should have been made last night. At all events, the hon. gentleman must say that, if the late Government had, during the first two Sessions of office, asked Parliament to make larger votes for the Province of Nova Scotia than we have made during our first two years of office, he has not to thank the hon. members of the late Administration, but the previous Government of Sir John A. Macdonald; because, if the hon. gentleman will only remember the speeches of the hon. gentlemen opposite, while they occupied these benches, he will find that the hon. the Minister of Finance of that period, apologized to the House for the large amounts he was obliged to ask Parliament for the purposes of piers and breakwaters, seeing that they had been commenced before the Government took office, and they were obliged to ask Parliament for amounts to complete them. What did hon. gentlemen opposite do? The hon. gentleman told us just now that, in their third year, they did not ask as much money as we are now asking Parliament to expend in that county—that they asked $19,000 less than this Government asks. We propose to expend in that part of Nova Scotia $55,000, while the late Government that year expended but $36,000. And in this, the fourth year, we are proposing $58,400, their demand being $26,000 less, which shows that, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, they did not treat Nova Scotia as well as we did when in office before and are doing now.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. You do not take the receipts into account.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman says we might have given more money to Nova Scotia, though we are giving her 33 per cent. more than did the late Government one year, and 50 per cent. more than it gave another year. He also states that we are receiving more money than the late Government, and should be more liberal towards that Province. But the late Government accumulated deficits to the amount of $7,000,000, which we must pay off before we can enter upon all those new works. Consequently, he must not be surprised if we cannot double or treble our proposed outlay. He must excuse me if I do not follow him in all his remarks upon the Budget, which can be noticed when it comes up at the proper time.

Mr. McISAAC. I wish to observe, in reply to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, that the comparison I made between the expenditure of the late and of the present Government on the harbors and piers of Nova Scotia, is not the result of any partizan spirit. I merely dealt with undeniable facts in the interest of my constituency and Province. If, as the hon. gentleman says, the expenditures of the late Government were rendered necessary by unfinished works, commenced by their predecessors, which is not the case, I would ask how is it that the obligations of their predecessors were binding on the late Administration, and that such obligations cannot be binding on the present Administration. How is it that he is not bound to finish the Bayfield breakwater commenced by the late Government? How is it that he is not bound to preserve from total destruction structures that cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, by the expenditure of trifling sums on timely repairs? He talks of the deficits of the late Government. I assure him, if these deficits did exist, they were much more agreeable to the fishermen and people of Nova Scotia, than the boasted surpluses of the present, when they received three times as much for their needed works out of the Treasury as they did since. They were a sweet yoke, when they arose from larger grants and lower taxation.

Mr. MacDONNELL (Inverness). I cannot allow this discussion to end without some share in it, though I am at a loss to know what course to pursue. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) has gone over considerable ground, not confining himself to the works specified in his motion. He has spoken of the interests of Nova Scotia generally, and in doing so must have had reference to the county I represent. Last year I called the attention of the Minister of Public Works, in rather an emphatic and direct manner, to certain works in my county, and we had a slight passage of arms on the subject. I was answered very curtly, and in a manner which I think did not become the chair which that hon. gentleman occupies; and I was told on my return home on many occasions I had damaged the cause I advocated by exciting the ire of the hon. the Minister of Public Works. Therefore, on this occasion, I am at a loss what course to pursue. I am afraid to repeat the course which I pursued last year, when I drew on my devoted head the indignation of the hon. gentleman, lest the county so humbly and inadequately represented by myself might thereby suffer, and be deprived of its just share of the public moneys. I have considered this thing rather deliberately, and have sometimes come to the conclusion that I would approach the hon. gentleman in the most supplicating and obsequious terms. At other times I thought I should ruffle his feathers again—but really I am at a loss to know what course to pursue. Perhaps I should apologize to the hon. gentleman for charging him, last year, with negligence and want of capacity in the discharge of his duties. Well, I believe I was a little out of the way in charging him with this offence, because I know he is a most efficient, industrious and excellent Minister. It is true, I am coming a little soft soap over him; but anything at all to get justice from him for my poor constituents. To be in earnest, perhaps the Government are ignorant of the facts, for I can scarcely believe they would be guilty of the outrageous neglect of public property in the county so far witnessed. If they had visited the locality and possessed any respect for themselves, they would acknowledge and repair that neglect. The Island of Cape Breton, which the hon. Minister of Railways visited a few years ago, is peculiarly situated. The people of the Island have contributed to the construction of railroads and other public property in all parts of the Dominion, and yet have no railroad themselves, but are entirely dependent for their exports and imports on the facilities of navigation. At the time of Confederation we had a wharf at Port Hood, built in connection with the Pictou Railway from Halifax to Pictou, in order to make it the connecting point between the Island of Cape Breton and the railway system of the mainland. Sir, I represented the county of Inverness when the measure for building that road was before the Nova Scotia Legislature, and I would not then support the Government of my hon. friend who is now Minister of Railways for the Dominion, unless I had a pledge that the wharf should be built in order that the people of Cape Breton might more conveniently and more advantageously enjoy the benefits of that railway. The hon. gentleman passed his word that that should be done, and he redeemed his word and built that wharf. That wharf forms part of the public property of this Dominion, and the Government of this Dominion, since Confederation, contributed from year to year to the maintenance of that property till the last few years, until the county of Inverness became so unhappy as to choose a representative who did not support, and who does not support, the Ministry of the day. Now, Sir, that wharf has gone to destruction. We can sail a ship between the outer end of the wharf and the land. I have asked to be allowed to expend private means upon that wharf, but leave was not given, and last year the structure was almost completely carried away. I wrote and applied to friends of the Government in the county, knowing that any interposition on my part would do more harm than good. I besought the friends of the Government in the county to act in the matter—for the Government have a good many friends in that county who suffer as well as my own friends—and finally the Government granted several pittances of $500 at one time and $500 at another time. But the amounts were not sufficient to secure the wharf from danger, and, therefore, it was eventually almost entirely destroyed. Portions of the money were expended in the stormy season of November. Now, Sir, I think it beneath the dignity of statesmen, governing a country so wide as this boasted Dominion, for the sake of gratifying a petty pique, to neglect a public work in any part of the country simply because the member of that part of the country is opposed to them, and that at a time when they can boast of a majority of one hundred at their back. When the learned Minister of Railways advocated Confederation in that earnest and eloquent manner in which he alone is able to advocate anything, one of his pleas was that the statesmen of the Dominion would become enlarged as well as the country, that parish politics would be cast aside, would be lost sight of, and that our hearts and our souls would become commensurate with the extent of our country. But, Sir, we find that that result has not been realized. We find that the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Public Works—because they put their heads together to consult about the matter of patronage to Nova Scotia—have concluded, simply because my humble self represents the county of Inverness, to deprive that county of necessary public works. We find that the souls of those men do not expand as the hon. Minister of Railways prophesied they would. We know that the powers of legislation are immense; we may legislate a National Policy, we may legislate for the prosperity of the country—it is said the Legislature can do anything but make a man a woman or a woman a man—but I never believed that legislation could make the country prosperous in the manner hon. gentlemen pretended it could. We find that legislation cannot convert small-minded men into wise, just and whole-souled men. Now, Sir, that is only one public work. There is the harbor of Cheticamp, in the county of Inverness. This section of the county is peopled by the French Acadians, who were formerly so ill-treated. They still retain the simplicity of their manners, and are an industrious, intelligent and hard-working people, pursuing an honest livelihood by agriculture and fishing. This is one of the finest fishing districts in the Dominion of Canada, and has one of the most extensive and prosperous branches of the great firm of Messrs. Robin & Co. When my hon. friend from Lambton so ably led this House and the Government of the country, he expended a large sum of money in dredging that harbor—the first money these poor men had ever received at the hands of any Government. The harbor was considerably improved. But the works were discontinued, the dredge was taken away, after it had remained there a part of two summers, and was removed elsewhere to perform some other pressing service. I am sorry to find that never since has one cent been expended upon that harbor, and that the work then done, has been, owing to its incompleteness, deteriorating and going to ruin. I wish to draw the attention, particularly of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, to that harbor and to the necessity of getting a dredge there to clear out its entrance. Never, within the memory of man, was that harbor entered by a vessel before this work was done, but now, or after the dredging, vessels of sixty or seventy tons, laden with goods and fish, could enter and depart from that harbor. This is one of the best fishing stations of the Province of Nova Scotia. Then there is the closing of Port Hood Harbor. During the last Session of the Mackenzie Administration, the present hon. Minister of Railways, in speaking of that harbor, said:

"He would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if the Government had arrived at any conclusion with reference to a work of considerable importance in Nova Scotia, which had been under the consideration of the late Government, and which had been brought to the notice of this Government from time to time—he referred to the closing of Port Hood Harbor, Cape Breton."

Now, Sir, it will be observed—and I would like particularly to impress upon the House, and upon the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways himself, the fact, the very interesting and significant fact, that when this question was put to the then leader of the Government, the present hon. Minister of Railways was not in power. He was most solicitous, however, about this work; he was exceedingly anxious; and he was struck with the importance of it. It was a "work that had been under the consideration of the Government for many years." He did not at first name the work, but he referred to it in the most ominous terms, in order to rivet the attention of the House upon its importance, and he hoped that the Government would, then and there, without further delay, make an appropriation of about a quarter of a million for the purpose of commencing the work. The Government of that day, acting largely, I know, at the instance and suggestion of the hon. the Minister of Railways, granted $10,000 in order to commence the work. Tenders were invited for a certain portion of the work, specified by the engineer, and were received for amounts less than the grant at the disposal of the Government; yet, Sir, notwithstanding the anxiety and solicitude of the hon. the Minister of Railways, who, within a few months thereafter became Minister of Public Works, that sum of $10,000 was erased from the Estimates, and, to this day, not a cent has been expended on the work. I would ask if the hon. gentleman was serious at that time. I would ask himself if he was serious, and I await his reply. If he was not serious, what was he? I will not say, but I think the House can judge.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman wishes I will give him my reply. He stated that I asked a question from the then Minister of Public Works, across the floor of the House, as to whether it was his intention to make an appropriation for a breakwater at Port Hood, and, I think, the hon. gentleman will remember that the answer I received—I am speaking entirely from memory—from the hon. the Minister of Public Works, was that this breakwater would cost a certain sum, which the hon. gentleman has just stated was a quarter of a million, but which, according to my recollection, was estimated, by the hon. the late Minister of Public Works, at a very much larger sum. I believe it has been estimated at half a million.

Mr. MacDONNELL. $360,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER $360,000; and I think the hon. the Minister of Public Works stated that it would be quite useless to make any appropriation for that work unless the Government were prepared to go on and furnish this $360,000, in order to carry it to completion. Certainly, Sir, the hon. gentleman could hardly have been serious in making an appropriation of $10,000 upon a work which would cost $360,000. If the hon. gentleman raises the question of seriousness in dealing with this question, I think the House will come to the conclusion that the interests of my hon. friend, who is just now in so animated a manner addressing the House, induced the appropriation of $10,000 to do a work which, it was stated by the Minister of Public Works of that time could not be entered upon unless the House were prepared to vote an expenditure of $360,000. I presume that the appropriation of that $10,000, however, accomplished the object for which it was intended, that is, to serve the interests of my hon. friend who is presently addressing the House; and, having served the only useful purpose it could serve, in enabling the hon. gentleman to obtain his return again to this House, in order to promote the interests of the important constituency which he represents, I think the hon. gentleman should not complain that an appropriation so ridiculously inadequate for its supposed purpose should have been wasted, seeing that the only object it could possibly subserve had already been accomplished.

Mr. MacDONNELL. My hon. friend has now made the best case he possibly could. I want to tell him, regarding this grant serving the purpose of getting my return, that it had the very reverse effect. I want to tell him that, in many sections of the county, the work is not looked upon with favor, and that I never received so small a vote, even in that locality, as I received at the last election. As regards my object in getting any money granted, or making the address which I now make, I wish to tell these hon. gentlemen that they could not do anything more calculated to the end he mentions than to pursue to the close of the chapter the conduct they are now pursuing. I feel that by giving the rights to my county which it is entitled to, these hon. gentlemen will be jeopardizing my return to this House, but I shall never desire to occupy a seat in Parliament at the cost of the interests and rights of my constituents; and if, to-morrow, I could prevail upon the hon. gentlemen to give such a grant as would make them so popular in the county of Inverness that their candidate would be returned in opposition to myself, there is no person that would be more happy than I. Some reference has been made to the question of bounties to fishermen. I may speak of that on another occasion, but, in the meantime, I have only to say that our fishermen are much more directly interested in getting what is due to them expended on wharves, harbors, &c. than they are in receiving bounties. The hon. Finance Minister says the bounty will be given in order to encourage fishermen to build vessels, but what would be the good of the class of vessels he speaks of at Cheticamp. They cannot bring them into the harbor and along the western coast of Cape Breton where there is good fishing—where there are as good fishing grounds as anywhere in the world—there are no harbors into which such vessels could enter. These hon. gentlemen have no accurate knowledge of the requirements of the fishermen, or they would not propose to have this bounty expended as they propose to expend it. I now wish to raise a flag of truce between myself and these hon. gentlemen, but I want the money. I want to get justice, and I want to have this public wharf reconstructed. I assure the hon.

gentlemen who rule this country with such power and with such determination that they are not punishing my supporters alone in the county by refusing the grant. They are punishing the county of Pictou, and I would ask the attention of the hon. members for that county. The trade between Cape Breton and Pictou is growing rapidly, but it has suffered a disaster in the loss of this harbor. Inverness county is dealing largely with Pictou. The steamer Druid runs weekly or bi-weekly between Pictou and Port Hood, and the amount of freight it carries is something surprising. One day last year there were 400 passengers coming to Port Hood on board that steamer. The amount of freight imported from the wholesale merchants and the manufacturers of Pictou, and from Halifax and other places via Pictou, is very great. This is not a local matter. It is a matter of wide, of universal importance, and I ask hon. gentlemen, who are now luxuriating and basking in a surplus of $4,500,000, to do an instalment of justice, and show that there was some ground for the prediction of the hon. Minister of Railways that the souls of men were capable of expanding with the confines of their country.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. SCOTT, in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Government and squatters on school lands in the Province of Manitoba, said: It will be recollected that, during the month of September last, the Government authorized the sale of certain portions of the school lands in Manitoba, which had been occupied by settlers for a number of years. At the earnest solicitation of those specially interested, as well as the Board of Education of Manitoba, and others, the sale was postponed. But the question will probably come up again, and therefore, I would call the attention of the Government to the fact that, according to sub-section 1 of section 23 of the Dominion Lands Act, the Government can only dispose of those school lands by public competition. At the time that the settlers on the school lands located in the Province, the number of immigrants was very limited, and those who did come preferred to settle in townships already partly settled by Canadians. The result was that a number settled on the school lands, believing that when the time came for the disposal of the lands, the Government would deal somewhat generously with them. It certainly would seem very hard that their improvements should be disposed of by public competition, and I would therefore urge on the Government to take some means this Session to remedy this evil. There are upwards of 8,000 school sections in the Province of Manitoba, and only twenty have been located on by actual settlers. It must also be remembered that the people who settled on the school lands did not take up homesteads or pre-emption claims. They have simply taken up a quarter-section of 160 acres, for which they are willing to pay a reasonable price, but they do not wish to be turned off after having made improvements on their land.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. IVES moved the second reading of Bill (No. 12) further to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1874.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Will the hon. gentleman explain the nature of his Bill?

Mr. IVES. The scope of this Bill is to amend that provision of the Dominion Elections Act which provides for candidates making a deposit with their nomination paper. Under the law as it now stands each candidate is required to make a deposit of $50, which becomes the property of the Dominion, no matter what may be the result of the election. This Bill proposes to amend the law in the sense of making the deposit $200 instead of $50, and of returning it to the candidate in all cases, except where he polls less than half the number of votes polled for the successful candidate. This Bill would make the Dominion law precisely the same as the law of the Province of Quebec with reference to elections therein. It has been found in that Province that this provision operated in the direction in which it was intended to work—namely, in many cases to prevent bad faith candidates presenting themselves—merely for notoriety or purposes not even so creditable; indeed the Bill works admirably in that respect. I cannot understand upon what principle the present Dominion law rests; nor can I find in any other country, possessing institutions like our own, that candidates are made to contribute to the general election expenses.

Mr. MACKENZIE. They are in England, and to a larger extent than here.

Mr. IVES. In England, as well as in the Province of Quebec, candidates are sometimes made to contribute in the way of a penalty.

Mr. MACKENZIE. They have to from the hustings in England.

Mr. IVES. I do not find that principle exists anywhere else than in Canada—the candidate purely and simply being made to contribute to the expenses of the general elections.

Mr. SCOTT.

Of course, it is not a large matter; but, for a House of 210 members, we must suppose there will be quite as many unsuccessful candidates, and over $20,000 will be contributed towards the fund for the expenses of the next general elections, and over $10,000 will be contributed by the elected candidates. I do not find any principle upon which that provision of the law can be defended, or why it should be retained. If the indemnity received by members is larger than it should be, I could understand its reduction; but if it is regarded as an indemnity simply, I do not see why members should be made to contribute towards the expenses of the general elections. But there is a very great advantage in the provision which I propose to make, which may be defended on sound principles, and that is, making the deposit large enough to deter persons from presenting themselves who have no idea or hope of being elected at all. This evil may not be so much felt in Ontario as in Quebec. In Ontario the field is generally occupied by two candidates, one representing the views of one political party, and the other of its rival; but in Quebec we very often have, owing to the diversity of nationalities, a third candidate, who presents himself merely for the purpose of mischief and notoriety.

An hon. MEMBER. To be bought off.

Mr. IVES. And we have found the provisions of the Quebec Act, so far, advantageous to the political parties, to the Province, and the people generally, so I think we should have it enacted for the Dominion. It may be defended on the principle of punishing a candidate who presents himself without any idea or hope or expectation of being elected. We may fine him, as it were, $200; but I do not see on what principle we can make him pay towards the expenses of the election, unless the indemnity is too large, in which case it would be more manly and candid to reduce the indemnity.

In reply to Sir ALBERT J. SMITH,

Mr. IVES. I do not propose to make a defeated candidate pay if he gets half as many votes as the elected candidate, and any sort of a white man—a candidate—should get that number.

Mr. COURSOL. Will the Bill have a retroactive effect?

Mr. IVES. It has been objected in some quarters that the Bill is a step in the wrong direction, a retrogression or going back on the liberality with which the law treats candidates. I think, instead of that, the Bill goes quite the other way: that it, in fact, throws the field open to honest candidates. We have already done away with the property qualification, and now propose to abolish the $50 charge to all candidates who present themselves; and instead of that being a step backward, it is a step forward in the direction of making the field more equal and open to all candidates who present themselves in good faith.

Mr. BLAKE. This is not the first time a measure of this kind has been introduced. There is no doubt there is a good deal to be said in favor of the view that candidates should not be inconvenienced by the detention of the deposit; but much may, on the other hand, be said against the proposition to increase that deposit to $200. I have never favored, much, any deposit at all. I have always thought that we were trenching upon very dangerous ground when we proposed to create impediments in the way of a fair expression of opinion by the people at the polls by bringing forward candidates. I believe the small deposit which is now exacted was proposed as a part of a new system by which the nominations, instead of being publicly made at a hustings, were to be made by written papers. It was suggested, if my memory serves me right, at that time that as a consequence of the absence of that general expression of public opinion, a pressure which might prevent a nomination in the sense of the Bill when a community was opposed to it. I said the absence of that wholesome pressure of public opinion might induce nominations which were wholly and utterly vexatious, done in a corner by a written nomination paper, and it was suggested that a small deposit or payment of $50 might check that. As I said, I never favored it very much; but I should be glad to concur, speaking for myself, in legislation which should provide that at any rate the successful candidate, or both candidates, on conditions something like those which the hon. gentleman mentioned, should receive back whatever deposit he had made. But, I must say that I feel personally hostile to the increase of the deposit. I think that we ought not to increase the difficulties in the way of a presentation of as many candidates as five and twenty electors choose to nominate for the consideration of the people at any election. The hon. gentleman says that this measure is, in the whole, a measure in case of intending candidates. I do not think so. I think that the provision of so substantial a deposit as $200 is a provision which will very often prevent contests, when it would be highly desirable that there should be contests. I may be misinformed, but my information is that the provision in the Province of Quebec is precisely similar to this. I think it is one-third of the votes there, if I have been rightly informed.

Mr. IVES. One-third of the votes would be one-half as many as the successful candidate received—one-third of the total votes, unless there should be three candidates.

Mr. BLAKE. As to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman that in Ontario this Bill is not much wanted, but that in Quebec it is wanted, because in that Province, besides the two legitimate candidates, there is a third person who frequently comes forward and causes a difficulty and trouble, that suggestion is entitled to great weight, because, in the case supposed, there will be a contest anyway. There are two legitimate candidates who are going to the polls, and, in the case supposed, the annoyance and trouble result from the uncertainty which is introduced into the contest by the circumstance that there is a third party who, perhaps, may take away enough votes from one or the other to alter the result of the contest. If this proposal is intended to accomplish anything practical, it is to prevent contests, not to prevent an extra number of candidates. I do not myself oppose the second reading of the Bill, because I should like to see provisions in which the deposit will be returned; and I hope that, if the Bill passes this House, the amount of the deposit will be reduced to the old figure.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No doubt there is a good deal to be said on both sides for and against the law as it now stands, so far as a deposit of $50 is concerned, and also in favor of the position taken by my hon. friend in presenting this Bill. There is no doubt that very often a candidate is brought forward only for the purpose of annoying the real candidate of the people, the man who is known to have the very large majority of the constituency in his favor. Therefore, if a deposit of $200 was exacted, as suggested by the hon. mover of this Bill, it might, in many cases, put a stop to that practice. On the other hand, there is no doubt that this Bill interferes with the freedom of choice of the people. As the hon. member has just said, if we see no other inconvenience it would be better to have perfect freedom in the choice of candidates by the electors. However, Parliament, in its wisdom, has thought proper to put a check on the number of candidates that might be brought forward, and that, instead of having sometimes eight or ten or more candidates, having no deposit to make, being desirous of gaining a little notoriety in their county or in the country—in order to avoid that, Parliament has thought proper to put a check on the indiscriminate nomi-ination of candidates by exacting a certain deposit of money. I know that it may be considered a hardship for the candidate who has a large majority of votes, to lose the $50 deposit he is obliged by law to make when he is nominated. Nevertheless we have had that law for a number of years. As has been said by my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe, we have found, in the Province of Quebec—I was not a member of the Legislature there when the law was made—they have found that a deposit of $200 was not too large an amount to prevent contests, to prevent candidates from coming forward. The fact is, during the late elections in the Province of Quebec, I think in several counties, we saw three candidates coming forward, though they had deposited $200 each, and I think several of them lost their $200. Under these circumstances, I think it would be better to delay the consideration of the measure to another day and give the Government time to consider whether they would favor a change in the law, or whether they would leave the law as it is. Perhaps my hon. friend would not take it as a want of respect to himself if I move that the consideration of this Bill be postponed to another day.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks ere this motion passes. I am in favor of the principle of the Bill of my hon. friend the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives); but he has seen fit to apply a remark to the Province of Quebec, which I feel bound to take up. The Bill, as it stands, is of equal service to all the Provinces. We have constantly opposed—for my part I have done so on every occasion—the Bill which is in force concerning Federal elections, because I considered it an anomaly to impose a tax on candidatures,—for the payment of a sum of $50 demanded of each candidate as a contribution to the electoral fund is really a tax. Now, this tax is not to be countenanced, cannot be reconciled with the coming forth of a candidate for a position such as representative of a county. It would seem to me that one should consider that incumbency as one of public interest and that he who accepts it does so not for his private ends but for the general good of the country. The principle of the Quebec electoral law is totally different. A deposit of $200 is asked for, not as a tax on candidatures, but to avoid candidatures which are brought about in order to cause a useless contest. If it is found that the deposit of $200 is too high—although no one in the Province of Quebec has raised any complaint to that effect—let it be reduced; but, at least, let us wipe out the clause compelling a member to pay a tax in order to be able to come forward, which I consider an anomaly in our legislation. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe has seen fit to say that this system had been adopted in the Province of Quebec owing to the difference of nationality. Now, my experience of elections has not brought under my notice a single case where the question of nationality had any connection with those worthless candidatures which might force themselves on an election; and even in a case where there would be two or three candidates, the objection does not hold good, because the moment there is a contest, the expenses are the same, and there is always the trouble of holding an election. What is sought for by this legislation is to prevent a contest where there is no necessity for one. This is, I believe, the object of the law, and in this sense am I disposed to ask for the adoption of the Bill. For the present, I have no objection to vote in favor of the adjournment of the consideration of this question.

Mr. BECHARD. I would like to make one remark on this subject. As I understand the Bill of my hon. friend, it is based on the Election Law of the Province of Quebec, and I would suggest that that law is somewhat severe in one particular. I refer to the provision which enacts that the candidate shall lose his deposit if he does not poll one-third of the whole of the votes required.

Mr. IVES. Only half the number of the candidates elected. There may be three or four candidates.

Mr. BECHARD. Only half of the votes polled in favor of the victorious candidate. There are some cases in which men have good reasons to believe that they run a good chance of election, and still may be defeated, and I think such a provision is rather too severe upon them. I have witnessed myself cases in which distinguished lawyers have been requested to be candidates, and have lost their money because they did not come up to the number of votes required by law. They were men who, by their position and talents, might have good reason to carry the constituency, and I think it too bad if this severe provision of the law should be put in force against them.

PAWNBROKERS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Orton's proposed motion for the second reading of Bill (No. 24) respecting Pawnbrokers.

Mr. ORTON. I wish to give some further evidence that the Act which is in operation in the Province of Ontario, and I believe in the Province of Quebec, requires to be supplemented by some such legislation as that which the hon. gentlemen now proposed in order to make it effective. The Act which is now in force is a law which forms part of the consolidated statute of the old Province of Canada and was passed at a time when usury laws were in operation. Of course the usury law provided means for preventing pawnbrokers from extorting undue amounts of interest from their customers, but since the repeal of that law it is almost impossible to obtain a conviction under the Act as it now stands. I wish to read some remarks made by Mr. Justice Cameron in a case of that kind brought before his court. It is the case of Regina vs. Adams and is reported in "Practice" reports, volume 8, (unbound) page 462. At page 467 of same report, Mr. Justice Cameron says:

"Though it is not the province of a Judge to suggest what laws should be enacted or abrogated, it may not be out of place, as the Usury Laws were modified in favor of the poorer or needier classes in the enactment of the law relating to pawnbrokers, to call attention to the fact that those classes would seem to require some protection from the exorbitant demands of those who carry on that trade or business by the imposing of restrictions upon pawnbrokers, so as to confine their exactions upon necessity within something like reasonable bounds."

This is the language of Mr. Justice Cameron in a case in which he decided that the prosecution was unable to recover. This matter has also been brought before the public in the columns of one of the leading organs in the city of Toronto. I refer to the Toronto Mail, from which I shall read a portion of an article which appeared on November 3rd, 1880:

"It is time that the pawnbrokers of the city were looked after. They are charging and getting 120 per cent. interest upon loans, notwithstanding that they obtain the best security in the world, and they have been allowed to do this so long without being interfered with that they go so far as to bully people who remonstrate. Hearing complaints of this nature, a Mail reporter started out on a tour of investigation a short time ago, and during his researches took in the majority of the city uncles.

"On the 23rd of October he dropped into the Singer loan office, 115 Queen street west, and raised $10 on a gold watch. Circumstances interfered with his further proceedings for a couple of weeks, but on the 15th of November the watch was released at an expense of $11. A dollar was thus received by the Singer family for their trouble in keeping goods twelve days. As they were liable for the month, however, their charge was only at the rate of 120 per cent. per annum.

"The same afternoon, November 5th, 'Mr. Black' pawned a chain for $2 with D. Lorsch & Son, 6 Queen street east. On the 9th Mr. Black went after his property, and paid $2.20 for it.

"Is 10 per cent. per month your legal charge, my friend?" queried Mr. Black.

"I don't care whether it's legal or not, it's what I charge. I ain't a-going to starve," said Davie. He also had got 120 per cent. pro rata; actually his return was about 700 per cent.

"The same evening Mr. Black dropped into the office of Fleming & Ward, 108 Adelaide street east, and left a watch for which he received $5. Next day he got it out for $5.50; 120 per cent. again, nominally, and really 3,652 per cent.

Mr. BECHARD.

"On November 10th the loan office of G. Adams, 327 Queen street west, came in for attention. Adams was very cheeky. He looked disparagingly at a watch and chain, and remarked that 'They wasn't worth much.' The visitor listened very submissively. 'Mine uncle' trotted out a phial of acid and proceeded to test the articles, keeping up a running commentary on their demerits. They proved to be genuine, and he asked what was wanted.

"'Three dollars,' returned the occupant of the stall, meekly.

"'No, sir—can't do it.'

"'Well, I'll take two; but what are you going to charge me?'

"'Charge you ten per cent. a month.'

"'Is that legal?'

"'Don't care a cent whether it's legal or not, it's what I charge, and if you won't give it you can go without. It's a bad lot anyway,' concluded the man of money, as he looked contemptuously at the goods.

"The reporter donned his time-keeper, and sidled timidly out of the stall.

"Other places were visited, invariably with similar results. Then a trip down to the Provincial Secretary's office was made to get the legal rates allowed, which were believed to be in the neighborhood of 5 per cent. per month, or 60 per cent. per annum. To his surprise the charge allowed turned out to be considerably less than 2 per cent. per month. The following clause, embodied in the Act respecting Pawnbrokers and Pawnbroking in the Revised Statutes of Ontario for 1877, is the legislation covering the matter:—'Every pawnbroker may take the following rates above the principal sum advanced, before he is obliged to re-deliver the goods pawned; that is to say:—For every pledge upon which there has been lent a sum not exceeding fifty cents, the sum of one half-penny (or five-sixths of a cent) for any time not exceeding one month; and the same for every month afterwards * * * and soon progressively and in the same proportion for every sum of fifty cents up to twenty dollars.' That is to say, for any sum beneath twenty dollars, the pawnbroker to charge interest not exceeding one and two-thirds cents per month, or twenty per cent. per annum."

I might go on reading the whole article, but the above will suffice. Now, Sir, it is very evident that some action is required. As I understand, it is very doubtful as to what power this Legislature has to deal with the matter, and at the request of the hon. the Minister of Justice, having drawn the attention of the House to this matter, I will ask leave to withdraw the Bill.

Bill withdrawn.

RATE OF INTEREST ON MORTGAGES.

Mr. ORTON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 49) to amend the Act intituled: An Act relating to interest on moneys secured by mortgage on real estate, said: Mr. Speaker, the Bill which I have introduced proposes to enlarge the effect of the Bill which was passed by this House a couple of years ago. Though that Bill was received very gratefully by the masses of the people of Canada, it was only accepted as a half-loaf; and, although I consented to the passage of the Bill as it was, it was my intention, at some future day, to bring the matter again before the House, with the view of having the scope of that Bill very much enlarged. This Bill provides that the Act shall not only give relief to those who may in the future borrow money, but to those who have been obliged to borrow money in the past, and have been misled by loan societies to borrow money at what they supposed was 6 or 7 per cent., when it was in reality 12 or 15 per cent. Now, the evil which loan societies have done in this country, and the hardship which they have caused to the farming community, cannot be calculated. We all remember the sufferings which our farmers passed through, when owing to the policy by which they were compelled, during seasons of bad harvests, to mortgage their farms and borrow money at high rates of interest. We had a policy in vogue which did not give the farmers their legitimate price for their grain in the markets of Canada, while the farmers of the neighboring Republic, when they had a short crop and there was a large crop in Canada got their home market and got higher prices, so that their short crop amounted to almost as much as their crops in more prosperous years. That was not the case with our farmers. They were obliged, when Providence did not smile upon them and when their harvests were short, to take low prices, because the American farmers had frequently an abundant harvest at the time the Canadian farmers had a short one, and they rushed their produce into our markets, and in that way reduced the profits of our farmers, and obliged them to borrow largely from the loan societies. The result of that was very disastrous to this country. I venture to say that nine-tenths of those who left Canada during the time the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite prevailed, were forced to go through the operations of these loan societies. Many of them borrowed money on their farms, in consequence of the representations of the loan societies published throughout the country that they were willing to lend money at 6 or 7 per cent. on long terms, and people did not suppose they were paying from 10 to 15 per cent. But that is not all. These people could not get relief. The loans were made on long terms of fifteen or twenty years, and when the farmer wished to sell, or to change his interest, high to a low one, these loan societies refused to allow him to give up his mortgage—refused to give up their hold unless they received something like a pawnbroker's rate of interest. The interest imposed on these unfortunate borrowers was in some instances as high as 20 or 30, or even 40, per cent. Many of them found themselves unable to meet the instalments of principal and interest, and they were often obliged to give up the struggle and lose their farms. When they asked relief from the loan societies, they extorted from them the whole interest, calculated to the end of the term, which frequently amounted to as much as the sum originally borrowed, after the borrower had supposed he had been paying both principal and interest for five or six years. This Bill is intended to enable those, who are obliged to borrow under these false representations, to pay off their mortgages at a reasonable rate of interest—at the rate of interest which the loan society would obtain did the loan run on to the end of the term. I think that is very fair towards the loan societies, and it will afford very great relief to a large class of people in this country. Notwithstanding the good times we have had, which have enabled many of our farmers to pay off the heavy mortgages on their farms, there are still a large number in the country struggling under the burdens imposed upon them by the loan societies. There is another clause in the Bill which strikes at another existing evil—that is, where store-keepers and private bankers, in running accounts, charge 10 per cent. every six months, and compound it every six months. Among merchants and store-keepers, as long as a farmer is known to be well off, he is sometimes allowed to go on from year to year buying in goods until his bill, perhaps, becomes so great that he cannot pay it, and then the merchant or business man goes to him and asks him for a mortgage. It may be said that all the real estate owner has to do is to state that he will not pay this illegal rate of interest. It is true he has that choice. The business man tells the farmer that if he did not give him the mortgage he would put him to such costs that it would be much cheaper for him to pay the illegal interest demanded, and the farmer was compelled, not by choice but by necessity, to give a mortgage, and the principal of that mortgage very often consisted of interest compounded for four, five or six years, calculated every six months. The same is the case with private banks, which loan money to farmers. When the note became due, and the rate was very often 12 per cent., and they often allowed it to go on—they are perfectly well aware that they are safe, so long as the security is good—and they compound it in the same way. One clause of the Bill is to remedy that injustice. There is another clause which is for the purpose of those who loan money on real estate, after a mortgage is due, to accept payment, and, although it may be overdue, they are compelled to accept principal and interest when tendered them. We all know that in many cases, when the mortgage is allowed to become past due, perhaps with the consent of the lender and with the belief on the part of the borrower that all he will have to pay will be principal and interest up to the time when he tenders the money, the lender refuses to take principal and interest up to that day and demands six months notice or much larger interest before he will surrender the mortgage. I believe it has been held by the courts that the lender of money need not give up his mortgage, unless he pleases, without receiving notice. There is a clause in the Bill intended to check that evil. No doubt there are other hon. members who have taken an interest in the subject, who will be more able than myself to debate on the evils which this Bill is intended to prevent.

Mr. BLAKE. The House would like to know the views of the Administration on this Bill.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The idea is to allow it to pass the second reading, and to refer it to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. BLAKE. The Bill of last Session, which it is proposed to repeal, was carefully considered by the Government, and was concurred in by the Finance Minister.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). The Bill carried by my hon. friend last Session made no provision for important points dealt with in the present measure. The hon. gentleman from Centre Wellington has given a good deal of attention to this question, and it has done very much good in the country. But why should a farmer, though his mortgage is overdue, not have the right to go and pay the mortgagee except with additional interests. The Chancellor of Ontario held the other day that there was nothing on the Statute book to compel the lender to accept payment of such mortgage except with additional interest. A gentleman in Niagara, borrowing money at 10 per cent. upon his farm, which he subsequently sold subject to such mortgage, but when the man who purchased went to the lender and tendered payment of the balance of the mortgage and interest to date, the lender refused to accept the money except on payment of six months' interest additional, on the ground that the mortgage was past due. The case went to court, and it was held that the mortgagor was entitled to six months' additional interest. If a mortgage overruns eight or ten months, why should the borrower be compelled to pay this additional interest? Was it the duty of Parliament to make laws for the rich against the poor? The existing Act applies to loan societies which loan money to private individuals on good security. And let me here say that there are no corporations which have better security than the loan societies, which always lend at about half margin, and some received at the rate of $154 per year for ten years upon a loan of $1,000. Their rate is certainly 16 or 20 per cent.; while farmers believe they are paying 6½ per cent., they are really paying 15. Is it not, then, the duty of Parliament to pass a law, giving persons, who have been deceived by others better educated and controlling capital, the right to pay off a mortgage, after it becomes past due, without extorting from him over six months' additional interest? A few years ago our farmers suffered, and they were compelled to borrow money, and to-day many of them are paying 15 or 20 per cent., when other men now borrow money at from 5 to 6 per cent. Those men should be relieved by Parliament. I am not going to say that the National Policy has made money plentiful, or that the acts of the late Administration were the cause of the farms being mortgaged. That has nothing to do with the present question. The question resolves itself into this: Are we going to give these men the relief they desire? Let loan companies have the power to charge 6 or 8 per cent., but give borrowers the right to pay off mortgages after they have been running three or five years at 8, 9 or 10 per cent. interest. There are a large number of persons in the country quite willing to give a bonus to get rid of the burdens imposed upon them by long date mortgages drawing heavy interest, but are now prevented by a law which compels them to pay additional and unjust interest. Where will they look for relief if not to this hon. House? On the last Bill the hon. member for West Durham spoke very fairly indeed. He voted against the second reading, for which I was sorry; but when it came before the Committee he gave to it a good deal of attention and assistance. The leader of the House then asked my hon. friend to withdraw his motion, not to press the Bill; but it was pressed, and independent of that hon. members passed the measure. It went through Committee and was passed, and for the past year has given more general satisfaction and done more good to the unfortunate borrower than any other law passed. Nothing injures or breaks up a family more rapidly than a high rate of interest. Interest and taxes have to be paid, and the merchant and the mechanic and others must often do without their money. Then ensues great dissatisfaction among the children; the boys and girls have to leave home and the old man is left alone to paddle his own canoe, a very difficult task for him. Very often the farm is sold and the old people thrown on the road through these high rates of interest. There is no farmer in the country can afford to pay all his bills requisite to the carrying on of his business and over 6 per cent. for money. I hope the hon. leader of the House will allow this Bill to go to Committee, before which the recent decision of the Chancellor, in a certain place where there was no relief, with other things bearing on this subject, can be considered. There is not a man in the House representing an agricultural constituency who will not be held responsible if he fails to give the farmer relief from the unreasonable and unjust law which compels him to pay additional interest. It is their duty to assist the hon. member, who brought this Bill honestly and fairly before the House, to pass it into law. The people of the country, particularly the unfortunate borrowers, ask for it earnestly, and those who now refuse to give them that relief, I hope will be held responsible for such neglect of duty.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I answered the hon. member for West Durham just now as to the course the Government would take, saying they would allow the Bill a second reading, and to be referred, as last year, to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. I think the hon. gentleman will see that the proposed amendments to this Bill run in exactly the same direction as the extension of the law passed last Session. By the first clause of the Bill it is intended to substitute for the figure 5 the figure 3; the only other change is to state what the rate of interest shall be. Of course the attention of the Committee will be called to the fact that this refers to the mortgages made before the passing of this Act. Afterwards the Committee will have to examine how far the change should go. The Bill remains as it stands, with the exception of the last short section, provided that the Act will apply to all moneys secured by mortgages on real estate subsequently to the 1st July, 1880. This is to be replaced by sections 6, 7 and 8—a change exactly in the sense of that of last year. The same principle is to be extended by those three clauses for the purpose of protecting the man who has been obliged to consent to a large rate of interest. If he is able to pay before the end of the period of the mortgage he may do so, by paying the average interest, and, if I am not mistaken, three months beyond, as the notice implies. So I do not think we should object to the second reading, leaving it to the Committee to perfect the measure as was done last year.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the hon. gentleman spoke I thought I understood the Bill, but I confess I do not understand it now.

Mr. SPROULE. I believe that it would be in the interest of a great many persons in the country burdened with debt, to pass such a measure. It is questioned by some whether we have a right to pass a retroactive law to interfere with contracts already made. But, if we remember that many of those contracts were made by the delusion of the borrower, who was thus led into trouble, it would not be considered very unjust to pass a retroactive measure for the relief of the victims. In many cases, at present, the borrower, who has been deceived and entrapped, can be hauled up and harassed before the courts. In many cases in the country it is represented to the man compelled to borrow, that he is getting his money at 6 per cent., payable on the principle of equal instalments. But, after borrowing and commencing to pay it back, he often finds that the interest is more than twice as much. I remember an instance, that of a man in my neighborhood, who bought a property and agreed to pay 6 per cent. interest, calculated according to a plan fixed by a company. After some time he sold the place, stipulating also for 6 per cent. interest to himself; but, when the second party, who had bought the place, paid him the 6 per cent., according to agreement, and he went to pay the original owner, he found out that the 6 per cent. received from the one man, did not at all meet the 6 per cent. charged by the other, and finally came a lot of litigation; and it was ascertained that, instead of paying 6 per cent. as he understood to his creditor, he was actually paying over 13. If, through the nature of the agreement entered into with those societies and their representatives, it is impossible for an ordinary intelligent borrower to correctly understand how much interest he is paying, it is right a remedy for injustice should be afforded, and we are doing a great injustice to such sufferers; in other words, we are really permitting the companies to extort money under false pretences, by allowing the present system to continue. It would be no great injustice, either to those societies or to the country, if a retroactive measure was passed to relieve those parties who inadvertently, and from want of proper information, have been seduced into such agreements. Some years ago the rate of interest was very high; contracts were entered into extending over many years; now, however, when money is cheaper, and farmers and others are able to relieve themselves of their burdens, are they to be deprived of the opportunity of doing so? The farmers especially find these high rates of interest burdensome. The idea of a farmer paying a higher rate of interest than he can make by the rent of his farm is absurd. A farmer will seldom rent his farm at a rate affording him more than 5 per cent. on its price; and if he has to pay more for his money it ruins him, rendering it, under the average circumstances, with average crops, impossible to support himself and family. If the Bill is retroactive, and we have power to pass it, we have a moral right to do so, because we will thus relieve a very large class of people from the tasks they have undertaken, that in the natural order of events they will never be able to fulfil. We will relieve them also from a great deal of misery, and, in a measure, do some justice to them, or give them that justice which they seek for to-day, considering, as we do, that they are entitled to it, from the fact that many of them have entered into these contracts under the misunderstanding that in reality they are not paying anything like the large amount these mortgages compel them to pay to-day.

Bill read the second time; and (at 9:20 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Saskatchewan, Qu'Appelle and Assiniboine Navigation Company.—(Mr. Macmillan.)

Bill (No. 85) to amend the General Inspection Act, 1874.—(Mr. Vallee.)

MILL STREAMS IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 84) to make lawful the erection and maintaining of certain mills, mill dams, wharves, ways, sluices, fishways and works, between high and low water mark, upon and near to certain streams that flow into the Bay of Fundy, in the Province of New Brunswick. He said: This is a very important Bill. It was placed in my hands for me to bring before the House in order to protect certain private rights of mill owners and others on the shores of the Bay of Fundy. It appears that they have mills which somewhat encroach on the low water mark, and that they have been obliged to build dams and booms there to protect their lumber. At certain times people go there and endeavor to force their way maliciously, and threaten the mill owners that if they do not pull down their mill-dams and booms they will bring an action. One gentleman, I believe, had to pay some $1,900 to get rid of these blackmailers. This Bill is intended to correct that state of things, and to prevent mill owners, who have dams and booms on these small streams which are not navigable, from being imposed on by blackmailers.

Mr. KILLAM. Is the Bill introduced with the consent of the Government for the sake of supporting their fishery regulations or of attacking them?

Mr. DOMVILLE. I have not considered that yet.

Mr. BLAKE. What streams is it intended that this Bill shall apply to?

Mr. DOMVILLE. Goose Creek is one of them, and another is called Salmon River, and various little streams running into the Bay of Fundy. I do not know the names of the others.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman is evidently protecting his own class—loose fish.

Mr. DOMVILLE. That is tu quoque.

Mr. BLAKE. From the lucid explanations given of this measure, I have not been able to apprehend whether it is not a local or private Bill; but I suppose it will be best to get the Bill in print, when we can get those explanations which it seems impossible for us to get now.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I try to make the matter clear to the hon. gentleman. There is nobody he can understand on this side of the House, and I am sorry I cannot make him understand.

Mr. KILLAM. I think a measure of this kind, affecting as it does many important interests, is one requiring notice in Committee of the Whole before it is introduced.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, if it proves to be a private Bill, the possibility of which the hon. gentleman opposite suggests, then it must fail for the want of notice and all the other requirements. But, if it be a public Bill, we can judge of it when we have it in print. I have no doubt the Bill is for the purpose of removing some difficulty, but what the difficulty is we cannot tell until we see the Bill.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

UNOCCUPIED SECTIONS OF THE MENNONITE RESERVES.

Mr. MERNER enquired, Whether there are still unoccupied sections of the Mennonite Reserves, which were set apart for them to settle on in Manitoba; has the period for such purpose expired; and, if so, has application been made by them for an extension of time, and to what period has it been extended; and in the event of there being sections to be disposed of, when will they be offered to the public for sale?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are unoccupied sections in the Mennonite Reservation. The period for which the reservation was made expired on the 1st of January, 1882. Application has been made for an extension of time by the Mennonites, and the subject is under consideration. In the event of any unoccupied sections being offered for sale, the public will get full notice.

THE RIVER MASKINONGÉ.

Mr. HOUDE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to send, in the spring, an engineer to examine the mouth of the River Maskinongé, in order to ascertain what would be the cost of the dredging necessary to allow of vessels entering it during the season of low water?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is the intention.

ISLANDS IN THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS enquired, Whether it is true the Government has leased, or is about to lease, any of the islands in the River St. Lawrence, at or above Brockville?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The islands referred to in the question were surrendered many years ago to be disposed of for the benefit of the Indians who surrendered them. They are, therefore, held in trust for that purpose by the Department. Some of these islands were leased last year.

SALE OF RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 5) respecting the sale of railway passenger tickets, said: I must give the House some explanation regarding the trade which the Bill is intended to prevent and destroy. The traffic in railway passenger tickets, which has grown up within the last few years, is extending and increasing in a remarkable degree. This is owing to the great growth of our railway system and the great increase of railway travel. We have incorporated railway companies for the purpose of opening up and developing this country, and we took the duty of allowing the railway companies to carry passengers for charges not exceeding a certain fixed rate per mile. Within that restriction the Legislature in its wisdom saw fit to give the railway companies the right to make contracts for carrying passengers on such terms and conditions as they might see fit; and one of those conditions was that such tickets were not transferable. And yet, by the law of the land as it now exists, people are allowed or assume to deal in these railway tickets—to purchase and sell them again. We do not allow people to buy and sell the goods of other people without some authority; and it seems to me that the same rule should be enforced with regard to the sale of railway tickets, which are the property, and which are under the sole control of the railway corporations over whose lines the people are to travel. The fact that these railway tickets are not transferable is a convenience to the travelling public; because, in acts of this kind, the railway companies compete with one another and carry through passengers at greatly reduced rates. It seems very hard to us that we should have to pay, say $10, for being carried from Toronto to Montreal, while other passengers can be carried from Boston to Chicago for $5. But the railway companies would not get any of that through traffic at all, if they were not allowed to compete, and carry persons at very low rates indeed. If prevented from doing so, they would lose their traffic, either from less accommodation for the through traffic or less railway facilities than are now used in carrying those passengers; and in this way the public would not gain anything by preventing the carriage of those through passengers. Moreover, by preventing this, by allowing those ticket brokers to purchase and re-sell tickets, there would be a tendency thus manifested to prevent all excursion rates. I have been informed, on very good authority, that excursion rates would be much more general and more freely offered to the public, if the railway tickets issued on those occasions could be prevented from being used, and sold by ticket brokers, because a great number of passengers are carried and preparations have to be made for that service; and it is intended that only those who intend to avail themselves of those tickets, as excursionists, should partake of the advantages, so that the whole travel on those tickets should be over in one, two, or three days. But if those tickets are produced, alterations and erasures are made by the ticket broker, and the tickets again are sold to ordinary travellers; the companies being defrauded of a large amount of money in consequence. Since this Bill was introduced I have had put into my hands a very important statement, made by one of these ticket brokers, who is now in New York and has offered to come to Ottawa and give evidence before any Committee of the House as to the practices in vogue at brokers offices in Toronto and Montreal, where they have dies and printing presses and other means for altering the tickets issued by the railway companies. At such places forgery and allied crimes are committed, which we cannot reach, because those people have a right, as they say, to carry on this traffic. If it can be proved they have carried on that nefarious trade, I think it is the duty of the House to endeavor to put a stop to it. If hon. members think that the railway companies should not issue limited tickets, or any issue which they make should be good until travelled upon, that is a different matter, which may be treated by itself; but we should put a stop to people buying and selling tickets which are illegal, worthless and useless, because the people imposed upon by such tickets are those who are least able to defend themselves—the poor, the ignorant, and the unwary. The rich man, the educated man, or the sharp business man never buys a ticket of this kind, unless after taking precautions to find out its value. It is the poor emigrant who buys such tickets, and in using them finds he has been sold. He often finds that he has bought a ticket, either out of date, or one which expires short of his destination, the result being that he is put off the train. Such occurrences happen every day. It is only the other day I read a paragraph in the Montreal Witness, of February 15th, which shows the extensive prevalence of this nefarious practice:

"No less than four passengers, via the Central Vermont Railway, were disappointed last evening owing to their having purchased their tickets from scalpers. Three of them were put off the train at St. Lambert by the conductor, and the fourth paid his fare in hard cash again, as he could not spare the time to return to confront the man who supplied him with a ticket which was not transferable. The tickets, it appears, were purchased in Manitoba, and are punched for a portion of the journey between Winnipeg and Boston. One of the three young men, who returned to the city last evening, made complaint to the Police Magistrate this morning. Detective Richardson was despatched with the stranger to find out the name of the scalper, who sold the ticket for $6, in order that a warrant might be issued.

"The passengers who were so summarily dealt with on the train are naturally very indignant. One of them, very eager to proceed on his way, persisted on boarding his car, but was pushed off.

"The seller of the ticket claims that the company were bound to accept it, as the original purchaser had not signed the form of agreement to the conditions, one of which was that the ticket was non-transferable.

"There is a difference of opinion on the laws regarding tickets, but such a scandal should be terminated, by putting an end to the uncertainty on the subject. Some contend that the railway company receive value for carrying one person a certain distance, and that that person is immaterial to the contract. Others argue that the contract is between the company and the original purchaser, who cannot assign his right under the contract, without the consent of the other party, viz., the company. It is to be hoped that this matter will be decided at once, for there have been a large number of similar cases recently, the parties being unable to stop over to secure their rights by a suit at law."

It most frequently happens that the people imposed upon are the ignorant and unwary men, who have no means of prosecuting an issue, and who are anxious to get to their journey's end with the least delay. To stop at Montreal, Toronto, or elsewhere, to prosecute the offenders, would mean increased expense to them, and they would often rather proceed on their journey and buy a fresh ticket than incur that loss. Again, it happens when a man has bought a bad ticket, and finds himself sold, that he prefers to pass on by the purchase of a good ticket, without wishing to have it thought that he had gone to a ticket scalper's office, because no man of intelligence would like it to be known he did a mean and contemptible thing, and an act contrary to law, because the law declares that the tickets are not assignable or transferable, though "a seller saves a few dollars in disposing of them. It was decided in Ontario that, if a man buys a ticket, subject to certain conditions, they had to be carried out, any failing in that respect making him the loser. We know, as a matter of fact, that there are two classes of tickets issued by those companies, one at a certain rate that is unlimited. They may be issued at any time for one or two years, and are good until used; but the other class is limited to a certain number of days, and is issued at a cheaper rate. It seems to me that the railway companies have some reason, when they say we will issue a certain number for a limited period, and will provide additional accommodation for the people to travel on them. But it is difficult, or impossible, for us to be prepared at all times to meet a great rush of travel which may occur on those cheap tickets, though they are unlimited. Those ticket scalpers, as they are commonly called, are carrying on an illegal trade, or dealing in an illegal commodity; the trade being immoral and corrupting in its tendency. They are practically offices open for the receipt of stolen goods; and instances have come out in the law courts very recently, last summer, where it was shown that these ticket scalpers were in the habit of bribing ticket agents and railway conductors to rob and defraud their employers. A notorious case came to my notice last summer where a ticket agent of the Great Western Railway had been in the habit of transferring a large number of tickets to these ticket scalpers, thereby defrauding his employers. I am informed further, that on an important railway running out of Toronto, one of the oldest and most trusted conductors on that road has told his employers that these men are continually importuning him and others of his class to bring back to them unpunched tickets which had been travelled upon, thus bribing him and others not to punch the tickets so that they might be used over again. Sir, if this is the case it is the duty of this House, as speedily as possible, to put an end to the rascality of a trade such as this. I hold in my hand another document with reference to this matter which has been sent to me since this Bill was brought in, and which I think it is my duty to read to the House. It is a letter from a Judge presiding over a Criminal Court in the city of Montreal, I refer to the Police Magistrate of the city of Montreal. It is dated 16th February, and is as follows:—

"BUREAU DES MAGISTRATS DE POLICE,
"MONTREAL, 16th February, 1882.

"SIR,—I see by this morning's papers that you are presenting a Bill to regulate the sale of railway tickets. Our experience here shows that the present state of things is of a great inconvenience to a large number of poor fellows who, ignorant of the laws or regulations of railway companies, and attracted at the low prices at which scalpers advertise old tickets, are too often put into extreme circumstances on account of the companies refusing, on the trip, to recognize those tickets as valid. Many of them have been turned out of the cars and left in very painful conditions, in places where they were unknown, without means of paying their fare, either to continue their voyage or to return home. As the victims are generally poor, those cases often pass without notice from the public, more particularly as the scalpers prefer generally to come to some understanding with the victimized, who are always too glad to accept any offer of settlement made to them. But those cases are altogether too numerous not to deserve the attention of those in authority, and of our legislators. I am glad, Sir, that you have taken the matter in hand, and as I have felt painful that there was no remedy to prevent those poor people from being made victims, I have thought it advisable to communicate to you our experience here, with the hope that you will succeed in your undertaking.

"Praying to be excused for the liberty I take,

"I remain, Sir, yours truly,

"C. AIME DUGAS,
"Judge of Sessions.

"G. A. KIRKPATRICK, Esq., M. P."

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Does not the Criminal Law provide for the crime?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It does provide for the crime when a party is detected in selling a ticket which is out of date, or useless. There was a case last year, in Montreal, where these ticket scalpers sold, to two young men who had just come out from England, passes from Montreal to Chicago, which they had obtained in an illegal manner; they sold them as valid tickets. The young men were put off the cars. When they went to get their luggage checked, they were told the passes were out of date, and they went and complained to the police, and Mr. Abraham—I think that was the name of the man—was arrested, tried, and found guilty of obtaining money under false pretences. However, owing to a defect in the indictment, it not having been signed by the Attorney-General himself, the indictment was quashed, but the jury found a verdict that the man was guilty of obtaining money under false pretences. That is one case, but how many others are victimized in the same way who will not take the trouble to prosecute these men? Very often they prefer to pay an additional fare, or to pay the fare over again, in order to reach their destination. We ought to devise some means of regulating the sale of these tickets. I am asking this House to pass a law which is in force in many of the States of the Union, in Pennsylvania, Illinois and New York. A very important case was tried lately in Pennsylvania to test the legality of the law, and the Judge there said the law ought to come within the power of the Legislature on the ground that it affected good order, morals, and the peace and safety of society. He held that the Legislature, by this measure, intended to destroy a business detrimental to good morals, and as bad in its effect as gambling itself. That is the opinion of Judge Ludlow in a very important case that was tried before him in Pennsylvania. The only way that this evil can be dealt with, it seems to me, and I have considered it in all its aspects, is to pass a law that only agents authorized by the railway companies shall be allowed to deal in railway tickets, the property of the railway companies themselves; then any one who sells a ticket will be the agent of the company, and bound to carry out the conditions upon which that ticket is sold. Now these scalpers are unauthorized, and are not bound to any party when they sell a ticket to a passenger; but, if only authorized agents are allowed to sell them, the companies will be required to carry out the conditions upon which that agent sells the ticket. It will remove from our large cities those shops and places which are now the receptacles for stolen property, where are to be found printing presses and dies for altering these tickets and committing a crime against the laws of society and against the laws of the country, but which cannot be detected till it is too late to punish the evil doer. It will remove the temptations which these men hold out to the officials of railway companies to commit a fraud and to rob their employers. I believe its effect will be most beneficial, and that it will be for the advantage of the travelling public, because the railway companies will then be able to afford greater facilities for the travelling public, knowing that the tickets will not come back upon their hands through these illegal and unauthorized agents. It will enable them to issue excursion tickets more frequently and at cheaper rates. But if a traveller is prevented by sickness or any other unavoidable cause from using a ticket for which he has paid, he should have some means of reimbursing himself for the money he has paid by disposing of the ticket. I have attempted to provide for that, and copying from the laws of New York and Illinois, I have introduced a clause at the end of this Bill which provides that the railway companies shall redeem all unused tickets for the portions of the journey for which they have not been used. It may be a little difficult to carry this out, but if the House allows this Bill to pass a second reading I shall ask the House to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, where it may undergo a strict scrutiny and be made as practicable as possible. I have no sympathy, and I hope this House will have no sympathy, with the persons who are engaged in this nefarious traffic, which, as Judge Ludlow says, is detrimental to good morals. These people came here last year and petitioned this House not to interfere with them in their endeavors to earn an honest living. But they are not earning an honest living; they are earning their living by trafficking in illegal commodities. They are preying upon the poor by selling worthless tickets to them; they are obtaining money under false pretences. More than that, they have the audacity to come here and petition this House for protection. I hold in my hand a most extraordinary revelation of the amount of money which these people say they spent in this city last year for the purpose of defeating a Bill which never reached its second reading, upon which no vote of this House was ever taken.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read, read

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I do not intend to read it, but I will read it to the Committee if the Bill is read the second time. But I would like to read the latest effusion from these people, who petition the House that they may be protected in their honest calling. This is a circular which has been issued since this Bill was introduced, and it reads as follows:—

"DEAR SIR.—The Grand Trunk Railway Company, with the assistance of the New York Central and the Pennsylvania Central, have again, at this Session of Parliament, last week brought in a Bill to prohibit scalping, adding a redemption clause at this Session, which will take a great deal of labor and money if it can be defeated. Last year a similar Bill was introduced, and defeated by the Canadian brokers at their own expense, because they asked for assistance, but received none—we had then six brokers in Canada, while we only have two now—and I would therefore appeal to you earnestly to send what you can to assist me. Whatever you contribute, send at once. Mr. E. Lichtenhein has the promise of assistance from the American Ticket Brokers' Association, through G. G. Lansing, and, if you will act promptly, we may be able to again defeat the Bill this Session. No matter how small the amount may be, it helps, and I trust you will not overlook it, as you may be placed in the same position at any time, and require our assistance. So remit at once, and oblige,

"Yours truly,

"S. ABRAHAM,
"245 St. James Street, Montreal, Canada."

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It is not addressed to you, is it?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No, Sir, it is not addressed to me, which the hon. gentleman knows very well. It is addressed by this man to some of his conferees on the other side of the line. I say that any person who had the impudence to address such a circular as that, and state such things as he has stated in that circular, deserves no consideration for his "honest and legitimate calling," which he petitioned this House not to interfere with. I hope, Mr. Speaker, this House will take into consideration the acts which I have briefly and inadequately presented to them, and pass this Bill through its second reading, and allow it to go to a Committee, where, if necessary, further information can be given by witnesses of cases in which poor, ignorant people have been defrauded of their money, to the great injury of society and good morals, and as to the necessity which exists of putting an end in some way to this trade. If this Bill does not meet the case, we can improve it; but, for goodness sake, I hope the House will assist me to put a stop to this trade.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If my hon. friend is going to withdraw the Bill, I will not take time in discussing it.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am not going to withdraw it.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). My hon. friend bases his application to Parliament to pass this Bill on two or three grounds. His first ground is that if this Bill does not become law, we will not have excursions as we have had in years past. There must be a great objection to the issue of excursion tickets by the railway companies. This trade of buying and selling tickets has been in existence for a long time, and I do not think that so far the existence of that occupation has in the slightest degree interfered with the excursions on railways. It appears to me that the railway companies give excursions just as often as they find it convenient, and as they think they can make money out of them. On that ground I do not think my hon. friend has made any case. The hon. gentleman also took the ground that the tickets sold by the scalpers were, as a general rule, sold to the poor and ignorant, who were made the victims of this trade. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the evidence given in the Lamm case, in which a gentleman engaged in this industry, I think of the name of Lamm, who had been arrested under the laws of the country, he will find he made a confession and detailed all the intricacies of his trade. He said they were not in the habit of selling to the poor and ignorant at all, but as a general rule they sold the tickets to keen, sharp, calculating fellows, who would pass over a railway on any ticket at all, and sometimes on no ticket. They found that in selling to the poor and ignorant that in ninety-nine cases out of hundred they were caught; but when they sold to the keen, sharp fellows they were not caught. Therefore, I say the poor are not affected by this business. Another ground taken by the hon. gentleman was that the ticket scalper carried on an illegal trade. I am not sure that the mere buying and selling of tickets is illegal, but some things which the hon. gentleman says these men do are illegal, and can be punished by law. He says they are in the habit of getting tickets illegally from the railway companies, and making money by selling them. That may be so, but the hon. gentleman's Bill will not stop that. He may pass a dozen Bills, but if there are dishonest employes on a railway, these dishonest employes can still steal tickets from the company and dispose of them to the public through the agents. The hon. gentleman admits that if the scalpers do anything wrong in selling the tickets, such as erasing or changing the date, the Criminal Law at present will reach them; and there is no doubt the hon. gentleman is correct there. If they sell a ticket now, representing that it is a valuable ticket which will carry the purchaser from a given point to a given point, and it turns out to be a wholly valueless instrument, they can be reached under the law as it now stands. The hon. gentleman admits that they can be reached now when they are caught; how can he make the law reach them without catching them and proving his case? He will do it under the ordinary Criminal Law, just as well as under the Bill he has introduced. Now, I do not know what these men have been doing in attempting, by improper means, to influence gentlemen on the other side of the House. I am quite sure no man on this side has been approached in any such manner. I am quite sure that no attempt, so far as I know, was made on this side of the House to do what has been charged. Hon. gentlemen will know how far that is correct, so far as any person in this House is concerned. We are not concerned about what those men do. We are not legislating for Mr. Lamb, Mr. Lichtenhein, Mr. Abraham, or anybody else in particular; we are asked to legislate in the interest of the railway companies; and, if we defeat the Bill, it will be because we understand that the Bill is not in the interest of the travelling public, but in the interest of those companies. In my judgment, after having read this Bill, both last year and this year, I think it is a bad one, and should not receive the sanction of Parliament. I do not see in it a single redeeming feature. Why should we pass the Bill? Is it in the interest of the travelling public? Is it in the interest of the great mass of the people? No; it is introduced in the interest of the railway companies, and was introduced last year on their instructions; and it is now pressed in their interest, and would result, if it became law, to their advantage. I ask my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), who is a lawyer of standing in Ontario, and who, no doubt, pleads many cases against railway companies, whether he does not think they are sufficiently protected by the law as it stands, both as to freights and passengers? They are so well protected at present that it is almost impossible, either for a man who sends goods, or travels over their lines, if wronged or injured, to reach them by law; there are so many conditions, provisos and stipulations in the bills of lading that it is almost impossible to obtain redress for any violation of the law, or breach of contract on the part of those corporations. It is the same with regard to passengers' tickets; those companies hem and guard themselves round so efficiently that, in ninety-nine cases in one hundred, although the grossest wrong may have been inflicted on the traveller, he finds himself wholly without redress. Let us see what the Bill proposes—let us analyse it a little. If Parliament sanctions one of those extraordinary Bills, it will invest the hon. Minister of Railways with power to appoint ticket agents all over the country for every railway belonging to the Dominion, and to every private company.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes; he will have that power.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No; he will have it only for his own railways.

Mr. CAMERON. The second clause supports my view. It reads thus:

2. The Minister of Railways and Canals, or company hereinbefore described, employing any such agent, shall give him a certificate of his appointment, which shall be under the hand of the said Minister or the corporate seal of the company appointing him, and such agent shall keep the same framed or exhibited in some conspicuous part of his office or place of business, where it can be seen or read by those resorting to the office.

This authorizes the hon. the Minister of Railways to act for the one, and the agents of the railways for the other class of roads; those company agents can sell tickets for their railways, and the hon. the Minister of Railways tickets for the roads belonging to the Dominion. Why should the hon. Minister be appointed for that purpose? What right has Parliament to ask him to appoint agents for the sale of those tickets any more than for the sale of any other commodity in the market, such as railway shares, stocks, or anything belonging to a private individual? Section 5 prohibits the sale of tickets except by such agents, under a penalty of $50. It reads as follows:—

5. No person whosoever, except those authorized as above mentioned, shall sell or offer for sale, any railway passenger ticket, or pass, ticket, certificate or other instrument, enabling any person or persons, or purporting to entitle any person or persons, to travel on any one railway, or more than one railway, or any part of one railway, or parts of several railways to which this Act applies; and any person or persons offending against this Act shall, upon summary conviction thereof before any Justice of the Peace, be subject to a fine of not less than twenty dollars nor more than fifty dollars.

Nobody, under this Bill, is at liberty to sell a railway ticket, unless appointed for that purpose, under a penalty of $50. Now, why should that be so? Why should I be prohibited from selling my railway ticket? I buy and pay for my ticket and the company sells it for a given purpose. I buy it to travel from one to some other given point, and if I do not see fit to travel the whole distance, why should I be prohibited from disposing of it for the unused portion? The hon. gentleman might as well undertake to prevent me from using or selling any other of my commodities. I bought the ticket in the open market, and it becomes my property as much as the clothes I wear or anything else I own—as much as a bank share, bank bill, or voucher. Why then, I repeat, should I be debarred from selling this piece of property? It does appear to me unworthy, unreasonable—outrageous, I was going to say—to so interfere with private rights. Besides, I doubt very much if Parliament has got the power to pass any such law. The hon. gentleman has referred to a case in Pennsylvania where a similar law has been boldly enforced for a year or two—certainly not more—in which the court held it was within the competence of the Legislature. Possibly it may be; but if it is within the competence of that Legislature, it would not be within the competence of the Federal Parliament in the United States, nor within the competence of the Parliament of Canada. The hon. gentleman will find, I think, that the case has been overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States. I ask him if that is not so? I understand it has been overruled, and I recommend my hon. friend to examine the matter. We have, as the hon. gentleman has said, created these vast corporations and given them large powers; quite right, possibly. But we know perfectly well that, in many respects, the corporations abuse their powers. We should not allow them to do that to any greater extent than is practicable at present. We also know well that the travelling public have but few rights they can enforce; and yet my hon. friend proposes to take away one of them. Is it not true that these companies will issue tickets from Chicago to Boston at less than from Chicago to Toronto or Ottawa, and that they will sell tickets from Chicago to Boston for less than from Chicago to Montreal? If that is so, such a policy is inimical to the interests of our local trade. Local passengers now pay from 50 to 75 per cent. more for accommodation over those railways than the through passengers. If I buy a ticket at Boston for Chicago, why should I not, if I see fit, change my mind, and have the right to get off at Toronto, and sell my ticket for the rest of the way? If my business interests require me not to extend my journey to Chicago, if any one of the accidents occurs out of the thousands which beset men during life's journey, I say, why, under such circumstances as these, should I be deprived of the balance of what I paid for that ticket from Boston to Chicago? If I see fit to defer my journey at Toronto, why should I not be at liberty to sell that ticket to some man who is travelling from Toronto to Chicago? The railway company undertake by their contract simply to carry one passenger from Boston to Chicago. They are only bound to carry one, and what difference does it make, as a matter of fact, to the railway company whether that man travels the whole journey, or whether a part of the journey is travelled by one man and part by another? I can see no reason in it and no hardship to the railway company. They undertake to carry one passenger, and the law ought to compel them to carry one passenger through the whole distance. My hon. friend's Bill prevents them from doing that. If I buy a ticket from Boston to Chicago and get off at Toronto, under the hon. gentleman's Bill I cannot dispose of the unused ticket unless I sell it to the company that sold me the ticket. My hon. friend says that in section 9 he has guarded against any loss to the travelling public. If a person is unable to complete a journey from point to point over the route they have to travel, the hon. gentleman says his Bill will compel the company to redeem that ticket for the unused portion of it. Now there might be something in the argument of the hon. member if his Bill did so provide; but the Bill does not provide that remedy at all. According to the 9th clause the only company who is bound to redeem this ticket is the company who sells it, and no other company. Now, Sir, I buy a ticket at the city of Boston for Chicago; I travel up to Port Sarnia, and I am prevented, by circumstances over which I have no control, from pursuing my journey to Chicago. I want to dispose of my ticket, but I cannot do so unless I go down to the city of Boston where I bought it and sell that ticket to the railway company from whom I bought it. The Bill of my hon. friend contains a delusion and a snare. It is a delusion to say that the Bill provides for the redemption of that ticket when there is no provision to that effect, except by the company who sold that ticket. If I buy a ticket in Florida or California for the city of Boston, and get off at the city of Montreal as I expected to go down to Jacksonville or to San Francisco to dispose of the unused portion of my ticket? Because that is exactly what the Bill provides for. I buy a ticket from one of the many lines of railway that are feeders to the Grand Trunk Railway. I travel over the Grand Trunk, down, perhaps, to the town of Brockville, where I stop, not seeing fit, for good and sufficient reasons, to pursue my journey any further. Have I got to go up to Owen Sound and ask the company there to redeem my ticket. Now, I think that provision of the Bill is wholly ineffectual and useless. The hon. gentleman says the company that sold the ticket is bound to redeem the unused portion of it, and to pay for it at a rate which shall be equal to the difference paid for the whole ticket, and a cost of a ticket between the points for which the ticket is unused. Now, as I understand that provision of the Bill—and it is the only one of which the travelling public can avail themselves—it is this: If a ticket is bought at Chicago for Boston, we will say, at $10—I believe $13 was the price last year—the purchaser gets off at Toronto, and he loses the unused portion of that ticket, which has cost him $10; but the fare from Chicago to Toronto is say $10. In that case the holder of the ticket gets nothing for the unused portion of it, and so receives no benefit from this section of the Bill. That is the plain reading of the Bill, and if that is so, it affords no protection and no compensation whatever to the travelling public for that portion of the ticket not used. The main features of this Bill have been before some of the States of the Union for some time. I am not aware it has been adopted by any State except Pennsylvania. I know that scores of States have rejected that Bill. I am not aware that New York has adopted it; if it has adopted it it must have been last year, because I do not think it was in the Statute book of New York before last year. It was said that Pennsylvania passed it solely through the influence of the railway kings of that State. Now, let us see what the leading newspaper organs of the United States have had to say upon the principle of this Bill. Most every clause of my hon. friend's Bill are to be found in a Bill that was introduced into the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, and the 9th clause, I think, is about identical with a similar clause in a Bill introduced into the Kentucky Legislature. The St. Louis Globe, a paper with a very large circulation, and supposed to represent correctly the sentiments of the people on this subject, says:

"Instead of legislating to break up the 'scalping,' it would be much better if legislators would devote their attention to the punishment of railway companies which offer low rates as an inducement to purchase tickets, and then forbid the using of the tickets except at their royal pleasure."

The Louisville Commercial says:

"The Bill (introduced in Kentucky Senate) is simply scandalous: the travelling public have few enough rights as it is; and the Kentucky Legislature should consign this villainous Bill at once and for ever to the limbo of all vicious legislation."

Now, I do not propose to consign my hon. friend's Bill to the "limbo of all vicious legislation," I only propose to put it under the Table. The Chicago Tribune says upon the subject:

"We regard the Railroad Ticket Scalper's Bill as a blunder, and have an idea that it will be declared unconstitutional."

The Courier-Journal, published in Kentucky, says:

"The Bill (pending in the Kentucky Legislature) should be called 'An Act for the Perpetration of Frauds on Travellers.'"

My hon. friend is quite willing to prevent frauds upon the railway companies; but I think they are sufficiently protected on this subject already. It is perfectly well known that frauds upon travellers are constantly being perpetrated. The Cincinnati Gazette says:

"Railroad tickets are sold to bearer, as bank notes are issued to bearer, and, of course, are transferable. It is clear enough that this traffic is legal."

Well, where is the saving to the travelling public in the United States? It does appear to me that this Bill, instead of saving money to the great mass of the people, will be a very serious injury to them. I shall oppose the hon. member's Bill at every stage. I think it is a step in the wrong direction, and I regret to see that it is seconded by the hon. gentleman who sits beside him, and who, instead of legislating in the interests of the great railroad companies, ought to direct his attention to protecting the interests of the travelling public.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The argument addressed to me by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, appears to me to be founded upon a misapprehension of facts. His whole argument rests upon the basis that the railway company contracts to carry one person between two given points, and that that contract involves the obligation to carry any person, or any number of persons, who may purchase that ticket between those two points. Now, that is not the contract the railway companies make when selling a ticket. The railway company sells a ticket to an individual for the purpose of carrying that same individual from one point to another, and the party who uses that ticket for any other purpose than that for which he bought it, commits a fraud upon the railway company from whom the ticket was purchased. The hon. gentleman himself has stated that the railway company in Boston, in times of sharp competition, sells a ticket to a party, to carry him to Chicago, for a much less sum than he would have to pay to carry him to Toronto. Then, I ask the hon. gentleman, if in the face of it, that contract is not a contract to carry one and the same person, and not two different persons, between those two points? The hon. gentleman's own sense of justice, his own sense of a commercial transaction, will at once show him that the contract is not to carry two different persons over the distance between two extreme points, but to carry one and the same person, because, otherwise, it would be quite impossible to carry out the intention of the company in giving a ticket from Boston to Chicago. The hon. gentleman says that my hon. friend, who introduced the Bill, has given no sufficient grounds for it. I think he has offered the very strongest grounds for the favorable reception of this measure by the House, that it is possible for any hon. gentleman to offer in favor of any Bill. What does the hon. gentleman show? Why, he has shown that this process of ticket scalping is a cause of fraud and dishonesty in the country, and that, moreover, it causes railway conductors to become dishonest, because it puts before them the temptation not to punch the tickets, and in not punching the tickets when they take them up, they can sell them for money. The Bill of my hon. friend makes it impossible to sell it, because the party receiving it cannot sell it again. The result is that the present system affords great temptation to dishonesty, and causes honest men to become thieves by exposing them to temptation. It is well known to any person that has anything to do with railway management, that this system is a fruitful cause of fraud and dishonesty in conductors, because by not discharging their duty in punching the ticket they are able to dispose of it to their own advantage. The party who purchases from the conductor also becomes a party to the fraud, and becomes an avowed assistant in the act, because he knows when he buys that ticket from the conductor that it has not been punched, and he therefore occupies the position of a receiver of stolen property. The hon. gentleman says that it is not the poor, but that it is the sharp practitioner who becomes the purchaser of these tickets and who makes the profit. But with what result? Why, with the result that the party who in the first place failed in punching the ticket, and the party who purchases it from the conductor, all become parties to a fraud, and have become so owing to the present condition of the law. Now, Sir, I ask the hon. gentleman if the House should not adopt a measure that is calculated to check any possible means of fraud, and means of fraud so palpable that they are known to be widely adopted all over the country, and to be, not only calculated to demoralize, but to be absolutely demoralizing. There are hundreds of people throughout the country connected with these transactions, and I ask if that is not a sufficient reason for the House adopting such legislation as will meet the difficulty. The hon. gentleman said that this Bill is entirely in the interests of the railway companies, and not in the interests of the travelling public. Suppose it were, does the hon. gentleman mean to say that it is not proper to pass any legislation in the interests of railway companies, if it can be shown to be honest and fair and just legislation? All this Bill asks from this House is to give such protection to the great railway interests of this country as they are entitled to receive at its hands, for the purpose of preventing their being made subjects of dishonesty and fraud, for the benefit of any person. I ask the hon. gentleman if he is so anxious to promote the interests of the travelling public, is he prepared to promote them by means dishonest and fraudulent. I ask him if that is the position he is disposed to take. I do not believe that the great travelling public of this country will thank the hon. gentleman for adopting such a position as this: that for the purpose of protecting them he is obliged to resist and throw out a measure which strikes at an open, known, notorious, fraudulent practice, existing in the country. I believe that the hon. members of this House have but a small idea, a very inadequate idea, of the prevalence of this custom, and the demoralizing tendency that the law, as it now stands, has exercised, and the measure, therefore, is one which, I think, on that ground alone, is worthy the careful consideration of the House. I believe the House will think very seriously of the responsibility that would be assumed by it, in refusing to send this Bill to a Committee where it could be carefully examined in the light of any testimony that could be brought for or against the measure, so that it would finally be a measure well calculated to promote the end in view. When the hon.

gentleman says that this Bill is entirely in the interests of railway corporations, I say no. I say that the passage of this Bill is in the interests of the travelling public. All the travelling public have a right to receive is that for which they pay. All the accommodation any member of the travelling public has a right to receive from a railway corporation is a proper consideration for the amount of money he pays. He pays money for a certain given and specific purpose, and he is entitled to receive all that he pays for, but nothing more. The hon. gentleman says the Bill will not benefit the travelling public; but I answer that a means of preventing ticket scalping is eminently in the interests of the travelling public, as, thereby, these corporations and their managers can give greater facilities with reference to the use of railway tickets when they are protected against the unjust, unfair, and dishonest use of these tickets after they are sold. Take the subject of the return tickets. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say, that because a man buys a ticket from a railway agent, and pays for it a certain sum of money, which will enable him to travel 1,000 miles and return, that it is doing a just act or one that is fair to the company, or honest as regards himself, if he travels to the extent of his journey and sells the return ticket to another person to enable him to travel over a road at a rate which he could not otherwise travel over it?

An hon. MEMBER. Why not?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let the hon. gentleman go to the Allan Company, asking for a return ticket to England, and what will they do? They will sell him a ticket for, say, $100, and if he asks for a return ticket they give him one for $140. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that that return ticket, which they have sold him at a greatly reduced rate because he is coming back by their line, can be honestly used by selling it for $90 or $100 to another man, who otherwise would have to pay the full single fare, and who, by this means, cheats the Allan Company out of the just passage money? I say that a man who uses his ticket in that way defrauds the company, and makes himself a dishonest man; and I say that the effect of this Bill is to strike at that dishonesty, and the very fact that any hon. gentleman can question such a proposition is to me a proof how widespread and demoralizing the tendency is, and how necessary it is to have some efficient means taken to check this practice. Apply the same rule to any other transaction in the world, and its dishonesty will at once be admitted; but because the contract is in the form of a railway ticket, parties seem to suppose that they may obtain the services of a railway corporation, which the latter have never engaged to undertake, and which the party has not fairly or honestly obtained. The same principle that applies to return tickets applies also to excursion tickets. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me—is there one hon. gentleman here who will stand up and say, that it would be an honest act for a man to go to a railway company and pay for an excursion ticket, on account of which he is carried 500 miles at one-fourth the ordinary rate, and then use this ticket for ordinary travelling purposes? Everybody knows that on such occasions the company provides means of carrying say a thousand people, and if a thousand people are carried at one time they are carried at a much smaller cost to the company than they could be carried by ordinary trains, and therefore the company gives the public the benefit of the reduced cost. I say a man that uses an excursion ticket in that way uses it for a purpose contrary to the contract which he has made with the company, and uses it in a dishonest way. That is my view of what is fair and honest, and I think it is a view which will commend itself to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. The present law leads not only to fraud but to forgery. It not only has a tendency to demoralize the conductor, the ticket scalper, and the private individual who purchases from the scalper, knowing at the same time that he is defrauding the company, but it leads to wholesale forgery. The very fact that these tickets can be sold is a strong incentive to widespread forgery in relation to these tickets, and that such forgery can be successfully practiced is one strong reason for asking the protection to the companies which this Bill will afford. The hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill has placed it on a foundation so broad and strong, and given such cogent reasons why it should be accepted, at least, in its general principles, with such modifications as may be required, that I do not feel it necessary to detain the House much longer, and I do not believe this House can be led to treat a Bill of this kind in the mode suggested by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that there was something wrong in the Bill because it provided that the Minister of Railways could appoint agents for the sale of railway tickets. I do not think that will be a great injury to the country. I am not inclined to think it would be; but the very fact that hon. gentlemen have been obliged to discover that in the Bill which is not to be found there, is the best evidence of the difficulty they experience in constructing an argument against it. There is no such proposal in the Bill. It provides that the Minister of Railways shall appoint agents for the sale of tickets on the Intercolonial Railway, and that all companies shall appoint agents for the sale of tickets over their own lines, and, therefore, the Bill is not open to the objection which has been raised. I believe the more this measure is examined, the more it will be found to be in the interests of justice and of honesty, and I trust it will receive the favorable consideration of the House; and there will be no objection to sending it to a Committee, where testimony may be received, and where the hon. gentlemen will, I have no doubt, have evidence tendered that will astonish them very much as to the frauds that are perpetrated in regard to the sale of railway tickets as the law at present exists. I can only say that, so far as the Intercolonial Railway is concerned, I have known that a great deal of fraud takes place, and I have appointed detectives and used every possible means for the purpose of ferreting it out; but while it remains a perfectly honest transaction for a ticket scalper to sell a ticket to any point; it is next to impossible to remedy the difficulty and prevent its recurrence. I trust the Bill will receive the favorable consideration of the House, and will go to a Committee which will be able to examine it and deal with it on its merits.

Mr. SPROULE. I think any merits which the Bill possesses are counteracted by the last clause. It provides for the redemption of unused tickets. A contract is entered into between the railway company on one hand and a passenger on the other, that the latter shall be carried between two points, and if, from accident or circumstances over which he has no control, he be compelled after travelling part of the distance to leave the train, he has no remedy. By the clause of the Bill it is distinctly stated that he shall be able to redeem any unused portion "at a rate which shall be equal to the difference between the price paid for the whole ticket and the cost of a ticket between the points for which a portion of the said ticket was actually used." If it had read: "rate paid for the ticket that the party holds," then the passenger would have got back something. Take the case of a passenger purchasing a ticket from Boston to Chicago for $12, the cost from Toronto to Chicago being $6. He arrives at the latter point, and, on getting out of the train, wants to sell his ticket. No sum will be due, as the cost from Toronto to Chicago will consume the balance. Besides, there might not be an official to return any balance, and it could not make any difference to a railway company to carry two passengers, if, between them, they covered the same distance, as to carry one the whole distance. Another reason why the Bill should not become law was because the present custom was for railway companies to appoint agents to sell tickets under the circumstances complained of. When companies issued excursion tickets they were not responsible for damages under special circumstances, and if a second party travelled on the ticket it would be on like conditions. I admit that there is some force in the contention that railway companies make special provision for carrying a large number of passengers at a certain time and special rate, and that, under those circumstances, the companies should not be compelled to carry parties at different times at the same rate, but the effect of the Bill is nullified by the last clause. If the last clause were adjusted it would still be open to the companies to appoint agents to redeem tickets or not. In order to make the Bill effective in the public interest, it will be necessary to insert a clause compelling the companies at every station to appoint agents to redeem tickets only partially used. Until such clauses are inserted the Bill is not in the interest of the travelling public. The tendency of the decisions of our courts is against the public; it is not so in the States. In this country an individual has practically no redress against companies. When this is the case there should be some machinery to compel them to protect the public.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I do not know much about the subject practically, but if I understand it aright a great wrong is done to railway companies. If a passenger takes a ticket from Boston to Chicago for say $10, and if he stops at Toronto, the cost from that point to Chicago being more than from Boston to Chicago, and at Toronto sells his ticket, a fraud is committed on the railway company. This is not done by persons who are compelled to leave the train but by those who purchase tickets at Boston and do not intend to go to Chicago, but purpose getting off at Toronto, selling their tickets, and making money out of the transaction. Whether this Bill will meet the difficulty and will prevent what I consider to be frauds on railway companies, I do not know. Under the circumstances, if it is possible by legislation to protect the companies in this regard, it is our duty to do so. I think, however, that the companies should have the power to protect themselves by regulations printed on the tickets, stating for example that they are not transferable. A remedy should at all events be found for the difficulty.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk): While I have no sympathy with ticket scalpers, I think the trouble originates with the railway companies themselves, when they undertake to carry passengers, in some cases two or three times a greater distance, for the same amount in some cases than in others. There is no trouble in carrying passengers such as there is in taking freight which requires handling; let the companies, therefore, regulate their rates on principles adjusted. I am not prepared to say that I will not vote for the second reading, because I think something should be done.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think either the mover of the Bill or the hon. the Minister of Railways has succeeded in making out a case in favor of the principle of the Bill. In my opinion, legislation has gone altogether too far in that direction already, and it is because the public are placed in an unfair and unequal position as compared with the railway companies that the transactions have arisen of which the hon. gentlemen has complained and undertaken to remedy by this extraordinary Bill now before the House. If, Sir, you look at the facts as they are, you will find that these corporations are not simply private companies. They are quasi-public corporations. We have given them powers which do not usually belong to private corporations. We have given them power to acquire and hold property taken from private individuals, to appropriate that property to their own uses, and, in many cases, almost on their own terms; and it is because we believe they can be made to serve the public as public carriers that we have permitted them to do this. But when the public, individually, come to deal with these corporations, we find that they do not stand on a footing of equality with them; and the well known rule in Courts of Equity is, that when two parties enter into a contract in which they do not stand on a footing of equality, the court will not allow the contract to override the strict principles of equity in the case. They do not, for example, allow a contract between a guardian and a ward, because the parties do not stand on a footing of equality; and to allow a railway company to print on its ticket, or on its bill of lading, the terms and conditions on which they will carry passengers and freight, seems to me a monstrous proposition, though it is constantly acted upon. It is simply because they are permitted to do so that the evils have arisen of which the hon. Minister of Railways and the mover of the Bill complain. With regard to the condition "not transferable," when I purchase a railway ticket from an agent I do not bind myself that I shall travel on that ticket. Supposing a person, who desires to travel on a road with the members of his family, buys, say half-a-dozen tickets, does he bind himself to the condition that one particular member of his family shall travel upon a particular ticket? There is no such contract as the hon. Minister of Railways refers to, for he may travel on the ticket himself, or he may give it to any member of his family, or to a stranger. Yet the railway companies print on their tickets "not transferable," and I suppose if they could identify the particular party who uses a ticket, they could, under the law, enforce what is a very unjust obligation; and if the hon. gentleman undertook to repeal that law, he would be moving in the right direction. The obligation is one which is forced on the party buying the ticket. Say that the person who buys the ticket wishes to travel from Ottawa to Toronto; he is handed a ticket on which is printed "not transferable." He says: "I do not want a ticket on these terms." He finds that he cannot make terms with the company; he must accept the particular terms which they impose upon him, or he cannot go at all. It is nonsense to talk of an obligation of that kind being a binding contract between the parties in any just or equitable sense, and it is because such obligations are attempted to be imposed that the difficulties have arisen of which the hon. gentleman complains. If railway companies had uniform rates of travel they would not have the slightest interest in saying that A should travel on a ticket instead of B; it would be a matter of no consequence to them; but having taken advantage of their power to charge different rates for travel and traffic from different points at the very time that the public are seeking to mitigate the mischievous effects of that power, they come here and ask us to come to their aid against the public by the Bill which is now before the House. A man who buys a ticket from a railway company buys the power to travel from one point to another, and, so far as the question of right is concerned, so far as those principles are concerned which justify Parliament in granting the power to expropriate property from private individuals to a corporation—so far as every consideration of public interest is concerned, which justifies us in creating railway corporations—that is all that they have a right to require. They have no right to say that A shall not travel a portion of the way because B has purchased a ticket between two particular points. It can be a matter of no consequence to them, except that they wish to charge different rates between different points on the line, and we have no right, in my opinion, to interfere in their behalf, and assist them against the public, who are seeking to protect themselves against this power on the part of the corporation. I think the Bill should not be read the second time.

Mr. PLUMB. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has made use of very ingenious arguments, and has uttered a great many of what might be called half truths. There is no doubt that the purchaser of a railway ticket acquires the right to travel on that ticket, and if there are any regulations printed upon railway tickets which are against the common law of the country, they do not bind the purchaser thereto. This has been held in a great many cases in which actions have arisen between railway companies and the holders of tickets. It has been held that if a person has a gratuitous ticket or pass upon which the company state that they will not hold themselves responsible for any damage, such a condition cannot be enforced on the part of the company, or that they are thereby exonerated from any damage that may ensue. If a person makes a bargain with a company to travel on their line he is entitled to travel on it in the way in which the ticket gives him permission. If he starts on an excursion train he is bound to go through on that train, because he is carried at a lower price by a special arrangement which does not apply to ordinary trains. If a man buys a ticket at Chicago, he buys it at a competing point, at a point at which, in consequence of the competition between roads, the railway company is obliged, perhaps for a time, to lose money in order to maintain its traffic, and he has no right to speculate on that ticket. He has a right to go through, and if he does not go through the company should be bound to redeem that ticket in proportion to the number of miles for which he has travelled and no more. I believe it often happens that our Canadian companies are subject to unfair cut-throat competition by the railways of the United States, and if they do not meet that competition by lowering their prices at competing points they lose money; they lose their business to the ultimate loss of the public, as they are thereby prevented from giving them proper accommodation. The Grand Trunk, for example, would soon become a fourth class railway, running a few passenger trains, with their cars not put in repair and at great risk to life, if they could not compete fairly with other roads for other traffic, and when there is no competition they get fair rates and some remuneration for the business. The evil is not that they carry passengers at too high a rate where there is no competition, but that they are obliged to carry them at too low a price at competing points, in order to maintain the traffic which is necessary for their success. It is no injustice to us if a man who travels from Boston to Chicago should travel for a lower rate proportionately than we have to pay, provided we are carried in proper time, with proper accommodation, and at a reasonable charge. That is the manner in which to consider it, stripped of all excitement and prejudice. That is the fair way to look at it and no other. I believe there are great evils growing out of this system of scalping. I believe there are difficulties affecting the whole railway system, and, while I do not propose to defend any injustice on the part of the railways, I say that, as great corporations which have done infinite service to this Dominion, they have been largely instrumental in developing the prosperity of this country, and as the shareholders of these corporations have furnished the money by which we have great public accommodation, they should receive adequate remuneration for their services, and they are entitled to our consideration whenever a question comes up in regard to them. They are entitled to justice, but they are entitled to nothing more. Under these circumstances, I believe it is desirable that Parliament should calmly investigate the question which is involved in this Bill; not that I intend to commit myself to the advocacy of the passage of the Bill if it be found, on hearing evidence and upon examining the facts, that we ought not to allow it to pass; but I say that any proposition of this kind, fairly brought forward and embracing questions on which there is a wide difference of opinion in this House, should not be strangled on the proposition for the second reading. It is a courtesy seldom refused to any hon. member who brings forward a measure of this kind, and, unless there is very grave objection, that courtesy ought to be extended. I would like to hear evidence on this subject, for I confess that, in this respect, I am in the same position as many other hon. members, that I am not fully conversant with all the difficulties which are sought to be remedied by this Bill. I would like to hear evidence on both sides. I would like to see what case is made out by those gentlemen who propose to spend money for the purpose of obtaining legislation upon this subject; and I would like to see what case is made out on the other side. I think this Bill should pass the second reading, and be referred to a Committee, so that after evidence is taken, and the Committee has reported, the House will be able, without prejudging the case, to decide whether the Bill should become law or not. I do not believe in condemning it in advance, and the hon. member introducing it is entitled to have a fair chance, and for that reason the Bill should be read the second time.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The House should not leave the matter as it now stands. We must either pass some such Bill as this, or we must legalize the business of ticket scalping. I do not agree myself with all the arguments that are based upon the assertion that a ticket is a contract. A ticket may be a contract in form but it is not one in reality, because the purchaser is not asked to agree to any terms; he simply asks what the fare will be to a certain place, and he supposes he gets something that will carry him to that place. There may be a lot of conditions printed on the ticket, it is notorious that it is so, but the passenger is not asked to assent to them. I think it is quite open to discussion whether we should not render railway tickets transferable; but I do urge that we should not leave the law in its present state. If, as the mover of the Bill has asserted, a great many poor people are being wronged by being lead to purchase tickets from scalpers, then Parliament should either suppress the business or legalize it. Hon. members who have advocated the Bill have not attempted to answer the objection urged by the hon. member for South Huron against the redemption clause. That clause is of no value as it now stands; it is practically worthless; because there may be places where a passenger wished to redeem his ticket, and no person there to pay him; and the Bill ought to provide that the amount to be paid as redemption money shall be a fair proportion, having regard to the distance travelled, as compared with the whole price of the ticket. If those amendments were made, I think the House would feel justified in giving a favorable consideration. The Bill should go to a Committee, but I do not wish to commit myself very strongly to the principle of the Bill, because the House will have to consider whether it should not make railway tickets negotiable or transferable.

Mr. IVES. It seems to me that the scope of this Bill is to create a new offence in Criminal Law. It makes it an offence, punishable by fine, for any person except the persons appointed to deal in railway tickets, to buy or sell such tickets. If we are creating a new offence under the Criminal Law, it should be perfectly clear and apparent that there is necessarily illegality or immorality in the transaction. It does not at all follow that because there are illegal tickets, forged tickets, or tickets the dates of which have been altered, all tickets which are bought and sold by persons not authorized by railway companies are out of date, forged or illegal. When a Bill goes so far as to say that the dealing in this commodity shall be an offence whether the tickets bought or sold are good or bad, is, I think, going very far indeed. If the hon. member had limited the scope of the Bill, to making it an offence punishable by fine to sell a ticket that was out of date or a non-transfernable ticket, I could have understood the principle upon which the Bill rests. The whole question of immorality or otherwise of dealing in railway tickets rests upon whether the ticket is transferable or not—whether the ticket is a contract between the company and he who takes it, that he, and he only, should be carried, and that no one else should be carried in his place. Now, I am quite aware that in Canada our courts, as a rule, have held that tickets on which the words “not transferable” are printed are not transferable, and that a railway company may put off the cars any one, other than the original purchaser, who seeks to ride on it. But I am equally aware that the courts in all the New England States—and I am speaking from knowledge—have refused to give that interpretation to such words; and that, upon the Grand Trunk Railway, the conductors on one side of the line receive one set of instructions, and the very opposite on the other side, on this subject. On one side they are authorized to kick a person from the cars riding on a ticket of a past date, or which he did not originally purchase, while on the other side they are cautioned against that course under the same circumstances, so long as the ticket has not been used before, no matter who is using it then. Many tickets dealt in by those scalpers are bought in Boston or other American cities, the words “not transferable” not being on them at all. And it is a well-known principle in law that a contract is to be interpreted, whenever it is sought to be enforced, by the law of the place wherein it was made. Now, this contract was entered into in Boston, and, by the law of that place, it is perfectly good for anybody to ride on between the points covered. If my interpretation be correct, when that ticket comes to Montreal, and any other person there purchases it and seeks to ride upon it, he has a right to do so, under the law of the place where it was purchased, and parties have a right to purchase these tickets and sell them. Therefore, it does not, as a rule, follow that all tickets dealt in by those scalpers are illegal, and that their trade is nefarious and immoral. It may be said, that to deal in tickets out of date is illegal. Well, it seems to me that is no reason why we should make it an offence to deal in legal tickets. The dates of promissory notes are occasionally altered to take them out of the statute of limitations. But will my hon. friend, who proposes this Bill, make it illegal to buy and sell those notes, because sometimes their dates are changed for this purpose? When the House undertakes to say that such and such a person shall deal in those tickets, and that any one else who deals in them, whether legal or illegal, shall be guilty of a new offence, it is going very far indeed. If an offence is committed by those scalpers—if they alter the date of a ticket and commit forgery, we have a law to punish them; and it will be no more difficult to catch them under that law, than under the proposed law. I do not see what is to be gained by the Bill; but I am sure, so far as I know, that the feeling in the country is very much opposed to making a new criminal offence of dealing in railway tickets. I think it would be much wiser for the House to remove all grounds for saying it is immoral, by amending the law in the sense recommended by my hon. friend who spoke last—namely, making all tickets good until used. It is intimated that those railway excursions are got up in the interest of the public. I was always under the impression that the railway companies got them up for their own benefit, to induce a very large number of people to make trips who at the ordinary rate would not think of them. As to the matter of return tickets, I cannot agree with the hon. the Minister of Railways that it is necessary for the same person to go and return. The intention of companies is to secure the return of the passenger by their line rather than by some other road, and not to secure the return of any particular person. I have no objection to the Bill being read a second time; because if it comes into Committee, I should like to move an amendment to all the clauses, providing that hereafter railway tickets shall be considered good until used, no matter in whose hands they may be.

Mr. McCUAIG. There are certain well-defined principles in commercial transactions which should be applied in this case. For instance, when a man proposes to leave Boston for Montreal, and gets a ticket at a low rate, in consequence of the competition between those points, he is guilty of bad faith at the beginning if he buys, not intending to go to the place named; he really wishes to buy a ticket for the purpose of making a profit out of it. If it were shown that the railways of Canada had charged an exorbitant rate, enabling them to pay enormous dividends to their stockholders, I could well understand that Parliament should interfere with their course. But, unfortunately for Canada, and more unfortunate for those who hold stock in its railway companies, I am not aware they have ever received dividends, and until you can show that reasonable dividends have been paid, I think we have no real fault to find with the arrangements of those companies. We know that the competition on the American railway lines has been so serious, that we have to depart occasionally from those strict rules that, under other circumstances, might be enforced. I contend that a man who buys a ticket in Boston for some other place, by way of Montreal, when he really wishes to go to Montreal only, is guilty of a certain amount of deception towards the company. The agents at Chicago, say, impressed with the idea that a ticket purchaser is going to Boston, in good faith sells him a ticket by a Canadian line, and so far as that is concerned the railway companies have in every instance acted in perfect good faith—the ticket to be good from Chicago to Boston—but they naturally are not willing, because it is not agreed, to carry one man to Montreal and another man to Boston on the same ticket. In cases of expediency it might, perhaps, be justifiable, but you cannot evoke any principle of right and justice in support of a proposal to force companies to act in the manner proposed. No one who votes against a Bill intended to correct this wrong can plead justice in its defence. I am sorry to say that many in Canada seem to run away with the idea that railways are built for the express purpose of carrying persons and traffic at rates which may suit their convenience, whether remunerative or not to those corporations. In the first place, the Canadian people have contributed largely towards the construction of those roads and the reduction of their capital stock, thus enabling many companies to proceed. But notwithstanding that, the capital has been so reduced, they have not been able to pay 1 per cent. dividend to the stockholders. That knowledge being before the country, it is wrong to charge these companies with practicing extortion or fraud against the public. As this law is intended to give fair protection to the railway companies, I shall give it my support.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I think we should allow this Bill to go to a second reading, because the subject involved is a very important one. I fear that if we should refuse to let it go to a Committee, so that these clauses could be put into a practical shape, the impression would go abroad that this House is inclined rather to protect these scalping gentlemen rather than to look into the matter to see if the evil cannot be remedied. These ticket scalpers are not honest men trying to make an honest livelihood, but they are dishonest men, trying to make money by fraud. I think the matter should be investigated. We should not allow it to be said that this House refused to consider a Bill so important.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings). I think from the description I have heard there is certainly a wrong somewhere.

There is an axiom in law that no man should be tried by a single Judge but rather by a jury. The hon. member asks that this Bill be submitted to a Committee, and if there is anything wrong to set it right. I do not think the railway companies should control this House, and I do not think the ticket scalpers should rule this House. Let a Committee investigate it as they investigate any other Bill, unless it emanates from the Government. If the railway companies are doing an injustice to the travelling community let us remedy that injustice. If the ticket scalpers have to go out of the business let them take up some other means of earning an honest livelihood. I believe we should submit this Bill to a Committee to investigate and report upon, and, if the Bill is not what it ought to be, we can throw it out and let the matter go on as at present.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee composed of Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Albert J. Smith, and Messrs. Weldon, Brecken, Desjardins, Guthrie and the mover.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it would be better to refer the Bill to the Railway Committee. It can then be considered by a sub-Committee and afterwards the Bill will come back to us with the authority that a Committee can impress upon it. It seems to me to be a peculiar Bill and that we ought to refer it to a Standing Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with my hon. friend. I was under the impression it would go to the Committee on Railways. As a matter of course they would appoint a sub-Committee, and when the sub-Committee reported, with the evidence which had been laid before the Railway Committee, their report, whatever it may be, will have very great weight with the House and the country.

Motion withdrawn, and Bill read the second time.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 11) to amend the Criminal Law, and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting offences against the person, said: I introduced this Bill in the hope that the Minister of Justice would deal with the question. I do not propose discussing it at length, but will make one or two observations on the subject, and give one or two reasons why I think this Bill should become law. It is known that the offence which I propose to make criminal by this Bill is not an indictable offence under the common law, and that no statute has been passed, either in this country or in England that I am aware of, making it a criminal offence. Of course they have in England a mode of dealing with it that we have not in Canada. In England notice is taken of it in the Spiritual Courts. In Canada we have no Spiritual Courts, and therefore there is no way in which we can deal with this offence. I never could understand the reason why this offence—perhaps one of the worst that possibly could be committed—has never been brought within the pale of the Criminal Law. My attention was particularly drawn to the question during the last fall circuit, when one of the grossest cases which I think I ever heard or read of came before my notice—a case in which a father was charged with having committed this offence with his daughter. The evidence was clear that the offence had been committed. The father was charged with having committed the crime of a rape; in my judgment the evidence fell short of establishing that charge; but so prejudiced, if I may use the expression, were the jury against the committer of such a flagrant outrage that the man was convicted of rape, and, I am glad to say, was sent for ten years to the penitentiary.

Now, I do not see why this offence—one against decency and every moral sentiment—should not be brought within the pale of the Criminal Law. As the law stands now, one who commits this offence may escape unwhipped of justice. Our Criminal Law, which provides for the protection of females in every direction but this one, inflicts very serious punishment on persons who commit offences of that kind. They are liable to go to the penitentiary for a series of years, and are subject, in some instances, to corporal punishment. My own opinion is that this is the kind of punishment that ought to be inflicted, and that very severely, for such offences. We have already provided that an offence against a female under a certain age shall be a felony, and that the same kind of offence against a female between the ages of ten and twelve shall be a misdemeanor. We have provided that assault with intent shall be a misdemeanor, and that the offender shall be liable to be imprisoned and flogged at the discretion of the court. But while we have done all that, we have left this most beastly and disgraceful of crimes without any punishment whatever. I see no reason why that should be so. There is another reason—which may, perhaps, not weigh so strongly, but is still a reason—why this should be made a criminal offence. The hon. gentleman who leads the House knows that a man who may be charged innocently with this offence, has no redress whatever. He cannot bring a civil action, and has no redress unless he can prove that he has sustained some pecuniary loss. I know of a case in which a Methodist minister was charged with having committed this offence with his own daughter, and it was held by our courts that there was no redress for him. He could not recover, because he was not charged with a criminal offence. It is singular that while in this country no punishment has been provided for this offence, almost every State in the American Union has made this a criminal offence, and attached severe punishment to it. In the State of Vermont, for instance, I find that it is an offence against their Statute Law for a man to have criminal intercourse with the mother, the grandmother, the step-mother, the daughter, the grand-daughter, the grandfather's wife, the son's wife, the wife's mother, the wife's grandmother, the wife's daughter, the wife's grand-daughter, the sister, the brother's daughter, the sister's daughter, the father's sister, and the mother's sister, and the punishment is five years in the State prison, with a fine of $1,000. In the State of Maine the prohibition extends to exactly the same class of cases, and the punishment is ten years in the State prison. In the State of Michigan the prohibition is the same, and the punishment fifteen years in the State prison; in Iowa the prohibition is the same and the punishment ten years imprisonment; in Ohio, the law provides that this offence committed with any person within the relationship of first cousins is a criminal offence, and the offender is liable to imprisonment for ten years; in Minnesota, the prohibition extends to the same class of persons as in Ohio, and the punishment is two years in the State prison; in New Hampshire, the prohibition is the same as in Ohio, and the punishment one year in the State prison and a fine of $100; in Massachusetts, the prohibition is the same, and the punishment twenty years in the State prison; in New York, the prohibition is practically the same, and the punishment ten years imprisonment; in the State of Pennsylvania, the prohibition is the same as in Ohio, and the punishment is imprisonment in the State prison and the forfeit by the offender of one-third of his estate; in Wisconsin, the punishment is two years imprisonment; and so on throughout nearly all the States in America. In my Bill, I fix a medium punishment—I say that a person guilty of that offence shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary for ten years, and shall be liable to be flogged. I think, if flogging is justifiable in any case, it is in cases of this kind. I find that even in India this offence is made penal by their criminal code. While we are sending almost every day missionaries to christianize the people of India, and spending hundreds of thousands to make them better than we suppose they are, in this respect they are far ahead of us. They make it a criminal offence there, and it is a criminal offence according to their penal code, and offenders are liable to be imprisoned. With regard to the first class of cases provided for in the Bill, I am not sure it will be wise at present to include them. The Bill was taken from the law in the State of Indiana, where prohibition extends to a step-daughter. I am not particular whether it extends that far or not; but in regard to the other classes of cases provided for by the Bill, I think it is the duty of Parliament to make this serious offence criminal by Statute. I propose adding, in line eleven, after the words, "or such," the following—"or if any grandparent shall have intercourse with his grandchild." With these observations, and trusting the Government will see the propriety of making this an offence by law, so that the strong arm of the law will reach any person who so far forgets what is due to our common humanity to commit an offence of this kind, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can quite understand the motives that induce the hon. gentleman to introduce this Bill. The case which came under his own special notice, I suppose, while acting as Crown Prosecutor, called his attention to its enormity, and very properly induced him to bring this subject before the House; but I think my hon. friend has not, and will not, under this Bill, attain what he would desire. In the first place the hon. gentleman already sees there perhaps may be an objection to one portion of the Bill, the first clause. I think that this sin, for it is not yet a crime, is connected more with the closeness of blood than with any other social relation, and if we are going to deal with this as a portion of the Criminal Law, we should keep the physiological distinction before us. Then the Bill is limited in too great a degree. The hon. gentleman has cited, for instance, a Bill passed by one of the States of the Union, in which the sin is made an offence, and is extended to blood relationships. I think this Bill should be carefully considered, and all blood relationships should be included as a whole, and not to the very limited extent that this clause provides. And then, I think, the hon. gentleman has forgotten to declare that the offence is a crime. He says the party shall be deemed guilty of incest. He might as well have declared that the party was guilty of hypocrisy or want of charity. The first clause must set out that incestual relations constitute either a felony or a misdemeanor. We have only the right to deal with sins when they are declared to be crimes, and we must legislate that they are crimes. I heartily concur in the motives which have induced the hon. member to introduce the Bill. I think, however, that it is not in such a perfect state as to warrant us in reading it a second time now, because there is no offence declared in the Bill and no principle in the measure. It simply says that any person who has this intercourse shall be held to be guilty of a sin, and, being guilty of a sin, shall be liable to certain punishment. We must, however, declare at the outset that the offence is a crime. I hope the hon. gentleman will move the adjournment of the debate, so that he can amend the Bill in this particular.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I quite agree that the Bill ought to have stated that the offence is a crime. If the hon. the First Minister approves of the principle of the Bill he can scarcely object to its reference to a Committee to consider whether the provisions of the Bill should extend to a larger class than that to which I have extended it. To declare the offence a crime can be done by adding one or two words.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is the whole Bill.
Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Mr. BLAKE. The objection of the hon. the First Minister can be remedied very easily by saying not that the offender has been guilty of incest, but that he has been guilty of the crime of incest, because that will be declaring that incest is a crime.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would not do.

Mr. BLAKE. The fact is that the difference of opinion on this subject is so finely drawn that it involves purely grammatical considerations. I quite agree in the general view that we have no right to deal with a subject unless it is one that can be properly brought within the domain of the Criminal Law, and if not so, we should declare that the particular Act we are about to bring within the domain of the Criminal Law, shall be a crime. It will be quite palpable what the House intends to do if it passes the second reading. I cannot approve of the course which the hon. the First Minister proposes, as it would amount to the order being discharged. As it appears to be the opinion of both sides of the House that incest ought to be declared a crime and punished, it will be a more sensible and more business-like course to allow the Bill to be read the second time and referred to a Select Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is very difficult to treat an unbusiness-like Bill in a business-like way. I quite differ with my hon. friend opposite, with all due deference to him, that the insertion of the word "crime" would have the effect contended for, without altering the whole construction of the passage defining what our Criminal Law is. The list runs—treason, felony and misdemeanor, and it must come under one of those heads; it will not do to put it as the hon. gentleman has proposed.

Mr. BLAKE. When I spoke of the crime, I, of course, omitted to rank it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It must be ranked as one or other crime, but the Bill does not say which. I do not see how this Bill can go to a Committee as it is drawn. But really there is no sense in the Bill from my point of view.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Why can you not add the word "misdemeanor?" That would be sufficient I think.

Mr. GUTHRIE. There is a decision as to what constitutes a crime that should lead us to regard this as sufficient. In a very celebrated case in England, the Court of Queen's Bench decided that the nature of the punishment is to be determined whether the offence came within the Criminal Law or not. There the punishment is of a criminal character and would be quite sufficient to show that we regarded the Act as an offence.

Mr. MILLS. It is also recognized that a crime should be considered misdemeanor if its class is not mentioned, and if this Bill declares certain offences a crime, they would be so regarded unless a further classification be given.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. According to the argument of one hon. friend opposite, the nature of the punishment defines the crime, and the nature of the punishment makes the offence a felony. If a man be sent to the penitentiary for ten years for an offence, it must be a felony. Another hon. gentleman opposite says this offence is a misdemeanor. There is the difficulty—settle it between you. The Bill was copied rather hastily from the Indiana Statute without due consideration. I do not think it can go to a Committee, or that it is fit to be adopted by the House. I think my hon. friend has made a great mistake in his law.

Mr. CAMERON. I understand the objection to the Bill is on this technical ground, but it is easy to insert the word felony or misdemeanor, as the case may be.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no desire to prevent the introduction of such a measure, or its becoming law—I quite agree with my hon. friend in some respects. If he would take my suggestion, and meet my difficulty—if he would adjourn the debate and propose a new clause, covering those difficulties, and widening the offence to the extent of the law enacted in another country, I should not oppose the reference of the Bill to a Committee.

Mr. CAMERON. I have no objection; but it would be better to refer it to a Special Committee with a view to consider that question carefully. Surely there could be no objection to that course. If it is a proper Bill to pass, it is for lawyers to settle the terms and formalities to make the Bill perfect.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to a reference to a Special Committee on that understanding.

Bill read the second time.

RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. THOMPSON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 58) to provide that railway passenger tickets shall be available to the holders thereof until used, said: The Bill is but short, and it requires but little explanation at my hands. There are but two clauses: one provides that all railway tickets purchased shall be available to the purchaser or holder thereof until used, and the second provides that no conditions shall be attached why it should not be used until the passenger receives the value for his money. I had intended to say a good deal more on the Bill; after the discussion this afternoon, I am pretty well convinced it is the better Bill of the two that has been introduced with reference to the railway tickets, and that it will receive a strong support. Therefore I move the second reading, and that it be referred to the Railway Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is rather a strong step to take, a motion to read the Bill a second time and refer it to the Railway Committee. I should have liked to have heard some argument or reason from the hon. gentleman why railways like any other corporations should not make conditional contracts—why they should be prevented from making contracts—why, notwithstanding any contract entered into willingly or unwillingly between parties, those arrangements might be set aside? The hon. gentleman is not arguing at all and has given no reason for it. It is not exactly in accord with the principle involved and sanctioned by the House in the disposal of the Bill before six o'clock. However, I would like very much to hear my hon. friend.

Mr. THOMPSON. I may just say that I am aware of many instances in which tickets have been sold to people who were not aware that they were entering into a contract with the railway company. They paid the company so much money a certain distance, and they expect that portion of the agreement to be carried out. If anything should occur to a passenger on the way, that requires him to delay his journey beyond the day which the ticket says it is good for, then he loses the ticket and his money too. To-day I have been informed of a gentleman who came from Winnipeg with a through ticket to this city. Upon his arrival at Brockville he was late by a day or two, the detention being caused by a storm, over which he had no control, and he had to pay again in order to complete his journey here. I believe there are many instances of this kind on record, and this Bill is to make the railway companies do what they ought to do—give value for the money they receive.

Mr. MILLS. I think this is a very necessary Bill, and it ought to receive the sanction of Parliament. I do not agree with the suggestion hinted at by the hon. the First Minister, that a railway company ought to be free to enter into a contract with individuals who have business with the road the same as two parties who are standing upon a footing of equality. As I said this afternoon I say again: that a railway corporation and a private individual having business with it, do not stand on a footing of equality. A railway corporation is, to a large extent, a public corporation, and its public character cannot be overlooked by Parliament. It comes here and asks for certain special powers. You do with railway corporations what you scarcely ever do in any other case—you compel private parties, who have property along the line of railway, to part with that property, whether they are willing or not. You exercise towards the public at large, on behalf of the railway corporation, so far as their interests require, the right of eminent domain; you treat the railway corporation in that respect as a public body and not as a private proprietor. I think you are bound to see that the corporation exercises its powers in the public interest. You have a right to exercise over that corporation a restraining influence. You have a right to interfere with the freedom of contract in a way which you would not have any right to do in the case of two individuals who stand on a footing of equality. Now, if any person comes to a railway station for the purpose of having goods shipped by that railway, from that point to some other, or if they wish to go as passengers, they are not free to negotiate with the railways, they are not free to enter into a contract. The railway corporation can insist on their own terms. They prescribe whatever conditions they please; and because they have printed those conditions upon what is after all simply a receipt for the money which they acknowledge having received from a party, to carry some one from one point to another. I say this is regarded as a contract binding upon the party receiving it, and we are told that we are interfering with the freedom of the contract if we interfere with the railway corporation in this particular. I would refer the hon. the First Minister to an instance that recently occurred in Great Britain. Take the relation between landlord and tenant in Ireland. Upon what principle has the recent Bill regulating rents been based? Upon the principle that the tenant does not stand on a footing of equality with the landlord: that it is all nonsense to talk about applying the principles of freedom of contract between the parties. We have recognized the same principle over and over again in our jurisprudence. We do not permit a person to sell his property to his trustee; we do not permit a guardian to purchase a property from his ward. Every contract of that sort is closely scrutinized. Now railway corporations have certain corporate rights. They have certain special privileges and advantages that have been conferred upon them in the public interest. The rights of private parties have been interfered with by the State in consequence of the public duties these corporations have to discharge. My hon. friend proposes by this Bill to say that a railway corporation, when it receives money and gives a ticket, which is simply a receipt for that money, authorizing a party to be transferred from one point to another, shall fulfil that contract whether that party goes the whole journey or whether he goes part of it and transfers his right or receipt to another party. Take the case of postage stamps. The hon. gentleman's colleague sells postage stamps, and what are they? They are receipts for money; when that receipt is put upon a letter, it entitles the party who has dropped that letter into the Post Office to have it carried to any part of the Dominion. It is a receipt for the money and a promise to do a certain thing on the other. It is none of the postmaster's business whether that receipt has been stamped on the letter by the party who purchased it or some one else. So a railway corporation has no right, looking at its public character, to say we will give you a ticket and that ticket shall be good only for a certain time, and when that time expires you shall not force upon us a contract for which you have received pay. In my opinion this is the very principle of the measure. All the difficulty that has been complained of, and which I shall not mention as having been complained of in another debate, because that would be irregular; but I say that all the difficulties that have grown up, relating to frauds committed by ticket scalpers and others, are simply attempts of the public to protect themselves against the special powers railway corporations possess. If the hon. gentleman would support this Bill, or permit some other similar measure to be carried, all those arguments, and all those acts which are designated as frauds would at once disappear. Why should a railway corporation interfere between two parties and say, although we have got the money we will not permit you to transfer your receipt and your interest in that receipt to another party. Why do they do so? Because we grant special privileges to railway corporations which are not enjoyed by individuals. But if Parliament does not give them that power it may be well to say, that having received the money for carrying a party from one point to another, the obligation shall be fulfilled, and that the party himself shall choose his own time when he will insist upon the completion of the obligation. It can make no difference to the company. What difference can it be to the railway company whether A or B travels on the ticket after the money has been received? They have entered into a contract to carry some one from one point to another, and if that party does not see fit to go himself, the contract ought not to be regarded as binding upon him to go. I say that it can make no difference to the railway company whether A or B travels on that ticket, or whether both of them use it, one travelling a certain distance and the other travelling the remainder of the distance, if the company have received their pay. What we have to consider in this matter is the public interest, and I say the public interest will be served and promoted, and the grievances that have been felt by the public will, to a certain extent, be remedied by the Bill now before the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not suppose it required this elaborate argument from my hon. friend to convince me that Parliament has the power to interfere with contracts. We do so continually. The hon. gentleman has no right to believe that I was opposed to the principle of this Bill. I merely said it was rather a strong measure to introduce without a word of explanation. I merely asked an explanation from my hon. friend who has introduced the Bill, to see whether I could accept the principle. After his very lucid and clear explanation of the principle of the Bill, and the great wrongs the public suffer from the want of such a Bill, I am convinced, with my hon. friend, that this Bill ought to go to the Railway Committee, and I am also convinced, with my hon. friend from Bothwell, that this Parliament has the right to legislate.

Bill read the second time.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT SACKVILLE.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH, in moving for copies of all correspondence relating to the superannuation of James D. Dixon, Collector of Customs, Sackville, and the appointment of his successor, William C. Milner, said: I may say, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Dixon is a highly respectable man living in my county. He has been connected with the Customs for many years, and I think the records of the Department will show that he has been a most able and efficient officer. The community in which he lives are very anxious to know the reasons why he was superannuated. His successor, Mr. Milner, I have nothing to say against, except that he is the publisher and editor of a very violent political paper in my county. Mr. Dixon, without any good reason, so far as the public knows, was dismissed, and if there are any reasons for that dismissal they are anxious to have them known.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to bringing down all the papers in the hands of the Department. I am not aware that anything has been said against the respectability of Mr. Dixon, nor is there any record in the Department of that kind. He is admitted to be a very respectable man; but with Mr. Dixon, as with all of us if we live long enough, there is a period in his life when he became unfit to perform his duties, and from that fact, and a knowledge of the mode in which the business of that port was conducted, led to his superannuation. My hon. friend has not moved for any papers in reference to an assistant of Mr. Dixon, who was under the purview of that port. He also is a man highly respectable, but he had arrived at a time of life—his age was something like eighty, I believe—when it became necessary, in the interests of the revenue, and particularly for the protection of the revenue, that both gentlemen should be superannuated, and more active and live men, if I may use the expression, should be appointed to perform the duties. The very fact that since the change took place a number of seizures had been made from parties who were in the habit of defrauding the revenue, is the best evidence that the duties of the office are now being efficiently performed. I do not say that Mr. Dixon was unfit to sit in his office and perform the indoor work, but such was his age and state of health that we knew he was not fit for out-door work, hence, as I said before, a more active man was appointed. I am not prepared to admit the theory that because a gentleman is an editor of a newspaper opposed to my hon. friend, he was, therefore, unfit for such a position. Neither am I prepared to admit the theory that because a man was what might be called a violent politician he should not be eligible for such an office. If that theory were adopted in practice I am afraid there are few of my hon. friend's supporters, either in the Maritime Provinces or anywhere else, who would be fit for office. Mr. Milner is an active, energetic and educated man, who has shown the same attention and energy in the discharge of his duties as Collector of Customs that he displayed in conducting his newspaper, and if he proves as successful a Collector of Customs as he was an editor, I am sure the country will have cause to be thankful that such a change has been made.

Motion agreed to.

FUEL SUPPLIES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE moved:

That this House do forthwith resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House to consider the following Resolution:—

That the future of the vast Territories of the North-West is largely dependent on the supply of fuel at a moderate rate;

That the present information as to the country and the coal areas is not sufficient to warrant Parliament in creating long enduring interests in large quantities of the coal areas;

That the Regulations as to coal lands laid on the Table make no provision for the application, as a general rule, of the just principle of public competition to the acquisition of those valuable lands, and thus leave open the door to disadvantageous cessions of the public domain for the benefit of individuals;

That the said Regulations make no adequate provision to check the consolidation of large blocks of the coal lands in few hands, and the consequent restriction of competition and enhancement of the price of coal;

That the said Regulations make no provision to secure any working of the coal mines by the lessee;

That the said Regulations provide, by the arrangement for twenty-one year leases, renewable, for the creation of interests of longer duration than prudence at this time would, as a general rule, lay down;

That they make no proper provision for the settlement of the terms of renewal;

That the said Regulations do not become operative, if disapproved of by this House; and the House is responsible for their coming into operation;

That this House disapproves of the said Regulations.

He said: In asking the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the resolution of which I have given notice, I desire to say that there is perhaps no subject which, so far as we can forecast the future of the North-West Territories, is of greater consequence than—setting aside the question of railway construction and the question of the settlement and sale of agricultural lands—that of the fuel supply. When the hon. gentleman a year or two ago brought forward his proposal for the alteration of the law with reference to the disposal of the coal lands, I suggested the propriety, in view of the importance of this subject, of providing that the regulations to be from time to time made, should be operative only after being laid on the Table for a certain number of days without being disapproved of by either House of Parliament. These regulations that I think were made in December last, have, in pursuance of that provision of the Act, been laid on the Table and are now within our purview. We are not in a position, so far as my information enables me to judge, to speak with any degree of accuracy at this time as to the nature, extent and location of the coal and lignite beds of the North-West. Such information as we have is to be found in detached portions of the various reports which have been made largely upon other subjects, and which contain here and there allusions to the existence of beds of coal and lignite in various points of the territory. But there does not seem to me to have been, as yet, placed before Parliament—if there is accessible to the hands of the Government—any information which is of a satisfactory character as to the extent and nature of the fuel supply in this record of the North-West. I have moved this resolution in the form of a proposal that we should go into Committee, because, while I think it proper to suggest various points which seem to me to be worthy of the attention of the House, I was extremely anxious that we should have upon the question, whether we decided it at this moment or not, the utmost latitude of action and that it should not be said as an objection to my proposal that some one or other term in the resolution which I submit was a reason why the House should not assent to it. I am only asking the House to go into Committee at this moment to consider these resolutions, and if there be any parts of the resolutions which are fit to be accepted, those parts can be retained, and if there be any parts which, upon the explanations which may be made from the other side of the House do not appear to be consistent with sound policy, of course those parts can be eliminated, and we are not bound by the entry into Committee to adopt the whole or, indeed, any part of the resolution. Now, the first position which I take is—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment? The opening remarks which the hon. gentleman has made have convinced me that it would be better if this debate were postponed, and I will tell him the reason why. In consequence of delay by the printers, the report of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, and the Geological Superintendent, has not yet been laid before the House, but I think it will be before the House on Monday next—at least it has been promised by the printer, and I think the hon. gentleman will find in it some additional information respecting the coal fields which I would like the House to have.

Mr. BLAKE. Then it stands at the request of the Government?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

BOAT LICENSING ON GEORGIAN BAY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for all correspondence concerning the boat licensing system, and its operation, as it affects the Georgian Bay, Ontario, any applications or correspondence on the subject of the formation of a company to become sole licensees of all or a large area of these fishing grounds, and copies of any departmental or other action thereon. He said: I make this motion because I have received a communication from persons resident on the shores of Georgian Bay in which they state that the boat licensing system, which has been in force for some time, has given general satisfaction, has worked well, and has conduced to the interests of a very large body of fishermen, who ply their vocation in that part of the country, adding that it is bruited abroad that arrangements have been made for the formation of an extensive corporation to do the fishing and to obtain a sole license for the whole or a very large portion of this area. It seemed to me important at the earliest moment after receiving this communication to move for these papers in order that no transaction of that kind should be completed without the House being in possession of the facts and having an opportunity to pronounce on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

THE FACTORY COMMISSION.

Mr. BLAKE moved:

For copies of all instructions to, and correspondence with, the Commissioners on Factories, including instructions and correspondence as to information and enquiries on other points than those on which their report, laid on the Table, touches; and copies of all further reports made by them.

For the detailed statements in possession of the Government, showing as to 460 factories, from which information was obtained last fall.

(a) 1. The locality and nature of business of each of the ninety-five new factories, said to have been established since March, 1879.

2. The number of hands employed in each, distinguishing between adults and children, and males and females; the number in each employed at piece work, and their remuneration; and the number employed at wages, and the rate of wages; and the hours of labor.

(b) 1. The locality and nature of business of each of the 365 factories said to have been established previously to March, 1879, and to be still in existence.

2. The number of hands employed in each of these factories, in 1878, with the information before mentioned, as to sex and age, piece work, wages and hours of labor.

He said: In moving for this return, I would beg to point out that the report of these Commissioners, which has been laid on our desks, says that the report is handed in in accordance with the instructions they received, but no such instructions have been communicated to the House. It is, therefore, proper that we should have the instructions under which this Commission acted—issued departmentally, I presume, by the hon. Minister of Finance, because I observe that the letter is addressed to him, and speaks of his instructions—and also all correspondence with these Commissioners. I make this proposal to the House, because I think it is clear, from the statement made in the paper on the Table of the House, that further instructions were given to these Commissioners, to report on other points, and to accumulate other information than what appears in this report. This report states that the Commissioners have obtained statistics from some 465 factories, which they have visited, and gives a good deal of information with reference to the quantity and classification of and remuneration for the labor in these factories. Of these factories some ninety-five were stated to have been established since March, 1879, and the remainder to have been in existence prior to that date. It is very obvious that these figures either present a very extraordinary accidental coincidence, or the source of information which the Government had as to the 460 odd factories, is the source of information from which they obtained these statistics, and, therefore, it is that I presume that the same Commissioners enquired into the condition of these 465 factories, of which ninety-five are new. Then I ask for detailed information regarding each of these ninety-five new factories. It will be observed that the report indicates that this information has been obtained by the Commissioners, because it mentions the number of hands in the various establishments and gives a more minute classification of them than I ask for in this motion. The total number of hands in all the factories is stated to be 43,511, of whom 19,131 were engaged at piece work, and 19,365 at day work; from which it appears that there is about an equal division of piece work and day work. My proposal is that we should have detailed information with reference to each factory. The statement, if I recollect aright, is that the rate of wages has increased from 5 to 35 per cent., averaging 17. Of course, if we take the figures 5 and 35 the average will be 17 or 17½, but that may not be at all the true average increase in the rate of wages, because there may be a very much larger number of persons who may have received a lower rate of increase, or a very much larger number who may have received a higher rate within those figures of 5 or 35; and in order intelligently to arrive at an accurate approximation of the state of the case in that regard it is necessary to ascertain the details of the information from which the hon. Minister has deduced this general conclusion upon so unsubstantial a basis as the minimum and maximum amounts. Then I ask for similar information as regards the 360 factories said to be established previous to March, 1879, and to be still in existence, and the number of hands employed in 1878 and 1881. The number of hands employed in 1878 is given by the hon. Minister in some shape, after some calculation, on some information. I do not agree with his figures. I think they are almost demonstrably inaccurate; but it is convenient that we should have information on which we can reach a conclusion, and, therefore, I ask that the information be communicated in detail, inasmuch as we have a large part in gross, in order that we may deal with the subject more intelligently than we can do on the present information. I am sorry I was unable, from the statement of the hon. Minister and from the report, to add another proposal which I would have been very glad to add, and I would be very glad to add it now if the Administration would say to me that they had obtained information on this subject. There is a statement that there were ninety-five new factories or businesses established; also, that there were 200 and odd factories which were in existence in March, 1879, and are still so; but there is no return, either in the statement of the Minister or the report, of those establishments which, since that date, has ceased to exist, and without some information of that kind, the tables, for some purposes, are wholly valueless. That is the case of the Massey works, which are entered as a new industry established since March, 1879. The fact is, that the Massey Agricultural Works have been in existence for not less than twenty-five years. They existed in the riding which I represent until they were removed to Toronto comparatively recently, and there existed also large agricultural works adjoining Massey's new location, known as the Toronto Mower and Reaper Company, but the two concerns have been amalgamated. It is, therefore, obvious, if we could get from the hon. the Minister any information on this point, it would be desirable, but not finding in the speech of the hon. the Minister, or in the report of the Factory Committee, that they had entered upon that fruitful sphere of enquiry, I did not think fit to propose that we should ask such information.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC MANUFACTURES EXPORTED TO BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. VALIN moved for a statement of the goods which were manufactured in the Province of Quebec, and exported to British Columbia, between the 1st January, 1880, and the 1st January, 1882; and also a statement showing the value of these goods and the names of the vessels in which they were carried. He said: It might seem strange to the House that I should move for an order of that kind, representing as I do one of the counties in the Province of Quebec. I believe, however, that I am not only representing Quebec, but other Provinces which export goods to British Columbia. I am aware that last year a vessel, which was built in the Province of Quebec, took a large cargo of goods manufactured principally in Montreal to the Pacific Province; I say from Montreal, but I might have added also from Ontario, as I know a large quantity of goods are manufactured at Hamilton and elsewhere and shipped to British Columbia. One of the great principles and objects of the National Policy was the supply by one Province or part of the Dominion, of the wants of another, thus assisting the home trade. We know that much goods are wanted in British Columbia, for example, not manufactured in that Province, so that they can be supplied by the Province of Quebec. The far western Provinces need goods of various kinds, including agricultural implements, and boots and shoes, which they can procure in Quebec to their mutual benefit, thus excluding the products of the United States. Some have styled the National Policy a bad policy, but I call it a good one, as it encourages the transmission of manufactures of Quebec and other Provinces to British Columbia, thus extending and assisting our home industries.

Mr. BOWELL. It would be impossible to bring down the return desired, because there is no distinction made, nor is there any entry in the Customs Department, Quebec, as to where such goods were manufactured. The value of the goods sent to British Columbia from Quebec would be given, and also the quantity; but there would be no entry as to whether they were the product of Canadian or foreign manufactories. I dare say we could name the total amount of goods shipped from the Province of Quebec. I have been enabled to obtain the amount of goods shipped from a few of the Ontario ports and also from Montreal, during February last, for the far western Provinces, and it is only such a return I should be able to bring down. From Hamilton, during February, goods to the value of no less than $103,250 were shipped to Manitoba and $25,804 worth to British Columbia. From Toronto the amount was $301,000, and from London $60,000; or from those three ports alone to the two Western Provinces, a total of $490,269 worth. For the information of the House, I may state that as regards the exports from Hamilton most of the goods were the product of the different manufactories of that city.

Mr. VALIN. That is satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN VESSELS IN FRANCE.

Mr. VALIN, in moving for the correspondence between the Government of Canada and that of France, respecting the entry of vessels built in Canada, said: I have sought for such information for a long time. I remember that the shipbuilders of Quebec have sought for free trade in vessels with France since 1875, year by year. We cannot exchange our materials used in shipbuilding on a free basis with France; for many years we have sought the privilege of selling in France vessels built in this country, knowing that such a trade would benefit the city and all points of Quebec. We should like some information on the subject.

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to know if there has been any correspondence between the Government of Canada and that of France on this subject?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There has been no correspondence between the Governments of France and Canada at all. Any negotiations, or anything in that nature respecting international trade between Canada and France have proceeded, of course, through Her Majesty's Minister in France. Sir Alexander Galt, our Ambassador in England; is attending to that subject at present, and is, I believe, at this moment in Paris, accompanied by an officer of the Foreign Office, for the purpose of making arrangements specially applicable to the trade of Canada with France, inasmuch as I believe all hopes of a treaty between France and England have vanished. Sir Alexander Galt was yesterday in France for that purpose, with good hopes of making some special arrangement with the consent of Her Majesty's Government, but there is no direct correspondence on the subject.

Mr. ANGLIN. In 1877 and 1878 the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House and their friends and press throughout the country, especially in the Province of Quebec, made a great noise respecting a trade that might possibly be done between France and Quebec. They complained very loudly that the late Government did not take special energetic action, or raise means to bring about an arrangement that would increase that trade. I think that complaint was one of the factors in the election of 1878, in Quebec especially, and the difficulty to the late Government was created by the statement so made. It was asserted that a trade could be created between Quebec and France, and that if the Mackenzie Government had done their duty that trade might have been in existence and a very large number of vessels might have, and would have, been built in Canada for the French market. That the Mackenzie Government had grossly neglected their duty was loudly asserted and widely believed, I have no doubt. But since the present Government was formed it does not appear that they have taken very much more energetic means to bring about that desirable end than their predecessors. It does not appear that there is any greater trade between France and any portion of the Dominion than in the years of the late Government; and especially in regard to the shipbuilding interest it clearly appears that it has not made any progress under the present Government, but has seriously declined. In fact, there is very much less shipbuilding to-day than in those years when the deplorable condition of the shipbuilding industry of Quebec was so much commented on—when it was often made the subject of probable lamentations of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Motion withdrawn.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

Mr. VALIN moved for all documents relating to accidents which have occurred on railways, to accidents in which there was loss of life, to the number of lives lost upon the railways under the control of the Government, between the 1st January, 1880, and the 1st January, 1882; and to the names of the persons who have thus lost their lives.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I wish to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that these documents are now before the House, except for the last six months of 1881; so I would suggest that he limits his motion to the period of the first of July last and the first of January last.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think the Minister of Public Works is mistaken. I think the only accidents reported to the House are accidents to the person. Many other accidents occurred during that period, in which there was no injury to persons but where there was a very serious injury to property.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I made the statement on the authority of my colleague, the Minister of Railways. As he could not be here this evening, he told me these documents were all prepared in anticipation of this motion.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course the documents before the House must be the documents which are the statutory returns made by the railways themselves. I do not at this moment recollect whether the statutory return includes accidents which are not attended with injury to persons.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It does. I remember some years ago when I presided over that department, the Government returns included not only accidents that were followed by death, but, also, other accidents. In the present case, if we find that the return is not complete we will make it so.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

BRANCHES OF THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. ANGLIN moved for a return showing what branch or branches and sidings of the Intercolonial Railroad were built or commenced during the year ending 31st December, 1881; the length and the cost of each, and the amount expended and estimated total cost of any branch or siding commenced and not completed before 31st December, 1881. He said: Although the Minister of Railways is not in his place, I will state my particular reason for moving for this return. I heard it stated, and I believe correctly stated, that during the last year a branch railway was built from the Intercolonial Railway, at or near the village of Lexford, in the county of Cumberland, a length of four or five miles. There was no order of this House obtained, no authority of Parliament, that I am aware of, for the construction of that branch. I can hardly suppose that the Minister would wish the House to regard so important a work as a mere siding on the railway which he would be authorized to construct under the existing laws of the country. It is, I believe, intended that this piece of railway should form a portion of a line running from the Intercolonial Railway, through the city of Cumberland, to the harbour of Pugwash on the Straits of Northumberland. It runs at present chiefly to supply the wants of a thriving woollen factory at the village of Oxford, and, of course, the immediate neighborhood. There are, I presume, other sidings and other branches which will be included in this return. I make the motion for the purpose of enabling the Minister of Railways to explain what has been actually done in this respect, and whether he has or has not caused this railway to be constructed, and if he has, under what authority he acted in the matter.

Motion agreed to.

INSTRUCTIONS TO HEALTH OFFICERS.

Mr. WELDON, in moving for copies of circulars and instructions issued to the Health Officers at the ports of Halifax and St. John, N.B., in regard to vessels arriving at those ports having contagious diseases on board, said: I wish to call the attention of the Government to a matter of considerable importance to the whole country. I understand that a vessel arrived at Halifax with a contagious disease on board, and that owing to the health regulations having been violated, the disease was spread over a large portion of the Dominion, including the Provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Quebec, and Ontario, and some lives were lost in consequence. I understand that only a fine of $400 was imposed—a fine entirely inadequate to the gravity of the offence.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will give some explanation of what seems to me to be a most serious transaction. The matter attracted a great deal of public attention owing to the widespread outbreak of the disease, in consequence of the infraction of the regulations.

If it be the fact that only a fine of $400 was imposed, it seems to me to be an altogether inadequate penalty for so grave an offence.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I had not heard of the outbreak in Ontario, though I know of the case in New Brunswick which has been alluded to. I immediately took steps to have the matter looked into; those who were not infected were separated from the others; and those who were exposed were properly looked after. With respect to the fine, it is the maximum fine which the law allows; and as soon as I heard that the regulations had been infringed, I gave instructions to have the offenders dealt with. We could do no more than we did, though I quite apprehend the serious difficulties which may arise in such cases.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says that all the Government could possibly do to mark their displeasure has been done. I am not conversant with the regulations; but I accept the hon. gentleman's statement as to the maximum fine which can be imposed. There may be other things, however, which might be done by the Government. I think the law is imperfect which permits a vessel to come in with perhaps an enormous number of persons on board. It may be occasionally that there are a thousand immigrants on board, who, if the quarantine regulations are broken, may disseminate a terrible disease all over the country. As the hon. gentleman says he has not heard of the disease being in Ontario, I can say that I saw the statement in a newspaper that a person in Toronto had this disease, who was a passenger on that vessel.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I can assure my hon. friend that the Government, as far as possible, has enforced the Quarantine Act. But the hon. gentleman and the House must understand that at present there is very little disease brought into the country—so little that we have reduced our quarantine staff considerably. We cannot prevent a case occasionally occurring, but when it does occur, as in the present instance, we put the law into force as early as possible. The first I heard of this case was from the Local Government at Fredericton, and I immediately telegraphed to our agent in St. John to place the other passengers in such a position that the disease would not be disseminated throughout the country. I do not know that we could do anything more, or that the law should be more stringent than it is. It may be that the officers of the ship were to blame.

Mr. WELDON. A fine of $400 is a very trifling matter compared with the landing of persons afflicted with contagious diseases. I am very glad to learn of the promptness of the hon. Minister of Agriculture in sending directions to the health officer at St. John, and I believe no more danger has been heard of from that quarter.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton). I wish to call the attention of the Government to the necessity of strictness in this matter of quarantine. I may say that the port of Sydney, in Cape Breton, is unrivalled as a harbor, either by Halifax or St. John. 400,000 tons of tonnage called at the harbor of Sydney last year, exclusive of the other ports of the county. Several cases of small-pox arrived at that port; and yet, unlike either St. John or Halifax, we had no quarantine officer there at all. I wish to urge on the hon. Minister of Agriculture the necessity of appointing a quarantine officer, and building a quarantine hospital at that port. Vessels have come there, which have been obliged to build quarantine hospitals at their own expense; and when such ports as Charlottetown, Pictou, and other places have quarantine officers, I think it is important that the Government should place one at Sydney.

Mr. DALY. With regard to the question brought up by the hon. member for St. John, I may say that the feeling at the time this unfortunate occurrence took place was one of great indignation at the captain of the Peruvian, who deliberately broke the regulations of the port and came up to the dock, in violation of the directions he had received by the health officer. The feeling was that the Government could not impose too heavy a fine, and the heaviest fine that could be imposed was inflicted. But subsequently a certain amount of sympathy was felt for the company to which the steamer belonged, and we were told, forsooth, that the health of the country was to be injured that the mails might not be delayed. Now, I consider that the health of the people of Halifax, and the whole Dominion, is of far more importance than that the English mails should not be delayed for ten or twelve hours at the port of distribution. I may also state that there is some excuse for the peculiar circumstances under which the passengers were landed on that occasion. A violent storm was raging, and it would have been hardly safe for the vessel to anchor on quarantine ground; and it was partly on that account that the captain made so bold as to come to the wharf; but on being warned that by so doing he was infringing the rules, he should have removed. The health officer did his duty by removing the patient to the quarantine hospital. After that, I believe every precaution was taken to secure the port against danger. Unfortunately, the evil arose through the gross negligence of the captain in breaking the rules of the port.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Has the fine of $400 been paid or remitted?

Mr. POPE (Compton). I believe the fine has been paid. I know it has not been remitted. It was ordered to be collected. With respect to my hon. friend's observations about Sydney, I admit that Sydney is a very important port; but we have a great many important ports in the country, and where there is no quarantine, the Collector of Customs is made the quarantine officer, and in case of infected ships he is empowered to employ a doctor to board the ship, and if he thinks proper, to prevent the passengers from landing. This is done because the country cannot afford to keep a quarantine at every port.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think the prevailing feeling must be that a fine of $400 or £100 is quite insufficient to deter any steamboat captain from entering Halifax or any other port. We all know the importance which steam vessel owners attach to getting their vessels out of port with the least possible delay, and a delay of half a day is very much more important than the imposition of a fine of $400; and therefore the Minister should have authority to impose a much higher fine if he found the circumstances demanded it. In the particular case under consideration, if the statements made respecting it are true, no penalty could be too severe for the offence committed. Despite the remonstrances and protests of the officers at Halifax, the captain chose to run his vessel up to the wharf and land his passengers; and the penalty should be so severe as to deter all steamboat captains from following such a bad example. If the Minister does not possess power to impose heavier penalties, he should ask Parliament to clothe him with power to impose such penalties as will prove deterrant in future. I rose chiefly to direct the attention of the Minister to a report in the Halifax papers to-day that one of the steerage passengers went to Digby, Nova Scotia, and there became sick of the disease—probably he was sick before he left the ship—and two persons had since contracted the disease, and there is great danger of it spreading. I am sure, from what I know of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, he will adopt prompt measures to stay the disease.

Mr. GAULT. I think, under all the circumstances, the captain was quite justified in going into port as the vessel was in danger of being wrecked. There was only one case on board. Everything was done on the vessel to prevent the spread of the disease, and the ship was fumigated. It went to Boston and returned to Halifax, where the second mate or steward died. I might as well leave the city of Ottawa because there is a case of small-pox on Gloucester street.

Motion agreed to.

THE STATE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the House adjourns I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the state of public business, in some particulars of great importance to us. At all events, I am glad to observe that he has laid the Indian Report on the Table to-day. I had intended to recall his attention to it; and we are to expect the report of the other branch of his Department on Monday. But there are, with respect to Dominion Lands, a very large number of questions which I suppose will not be answered in detail by the report, and upon which returns, unopposed, have been granted. Some time ago it was said by the hon. member that those returns had been formulated in such detail, a very long time would be required to bring them down, and the suggestion was made that the work would be facilitated by adopting motions such as were framed. The returns that have been brought down are but a drop in the bucket compared with what we deserve. We are exceedingly anxious to obtain information upon many leading points connected with the administration of the Dominion Lands—connected with the mode in which the regulations have been carried out, with respect to applications made for land under the colonization scheme, and so forth; and we are anxious, if we can obtain full particulars, to get some abstract of the particulars in order to deal intelligently with the subject. The House has been in session a month, but we have had no information on the subject up to this time. With respect to the Pacific Railway, hon. gentlemen opposite conceded, by agreeing to the motion which I made on the subject, the expediency of our being placed permanently at an early period of each Session in possession of very much fuller information than has been given in the Minister's report. The report this year gives us really no information of any value whatever. We had learned, perhaps not very accurately, still with comparative accuracy, no doubt, very much more from the ordinary sources of information than from the ordinary report of the Minister. Numerous returns have been moved for. I know a great many will require a very small amount of clerical labor to answer. Then, with respect to the Railway Commission, which was instituted before last Session and which has wandered from Dan to Beersheba taking evidence, we have seen statements of the evidence taken, and if my information be correct, the evidence is in print and has been ready for distribution almost since the opening of the Session. Whatever measure of importance we may attach to the report, we will attach more to the evidence, and if the formal report and finding of the Commission be not yet prepared and they have been unable to reach a unanimous and deliverable verdict, a short report might be laid before the House accompanied by the two volumes of evidence. It seems to me we ought to get what information we can on that point. There are various subjects which were before us in some sense before that Commission was instituted, and various others have come before us in some sense since; but it has been thought fit not to challenge discussion or enquiry in regard to them until the machinery the Government set in motion should have insured its policy and views, and until their evidence had been brought down. It is not unreasonable, now that the Government have used this Commission so long, that we should use what has been obtained, and that if we cannot get the verdict of the Commission, we should get their evidence without delay. Several returns of great consequence have been asked for, and I would like the hon. gentleman himself to look at the volume brought down, and see that greater expedition be used in producing those wanted. The papers with regard to the disallowance of the Streams Bill are still awaited, though returns respecting Laval University and other subjects have been brought down. It does seem those papers ought to be brought down promptly, and that in several departments greater energy should be used in the production of this and other valuable information. We have a considerable staff of supernumerary clerks who enjoy a considerable amount of leisure, which ought to be utilized as well as other resources to expedite the bringing down of those papers, without which it is impossible to consider and properly dispose of the business of the country generally. I ask for the exercise of a greater amount of diligence, so that we may find next week the bulk of those documents brought down for early action upon them. We are pretty much in the same position with reference to legislation. We have been one month in session, and have got yet but one Government Bill on the paper, the Civil Service Bill. My hon. friend the first Minister has had the Census Returns of the population before him, with the various constituencies and sub-districts, and has had the opportunity of deciding the fortunes and fates of the Opposition and Ministerial party, by leaving to one or other that portion of the population they may aspire for support, for he informed us the other day that he was engaged in considering the Representation Bill. Now, at this period of the Session, I am still anticipating and uncertain what sort of a measure he will submit. He might have decided that question some time ago; but it is to be hoped we may soon see it, however late. And so with reference to the Supreme Court Bill. Two years ago we were promised it; and also one year ago, at the earliest period of the Session, we were again promised it; but even yet I do not see it, whether the delay be due in part to the lack of system on the part of hon. gentlemen or to that removal of which I complained of, the Minister of Justice from this Chamber, I do not know. It is a fact, however, at least, that there never was in the history of Canada, since we first assembled, one Session in which it could be said, that after the expiration of one month, there was but one Government Bill seen on the paper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With reference to the returns the hon. gentleman asks for, I will venture to say, that during the twenty-eight days, the four weeks or lunar month during which we have been sitting, as many or more returns were brought down as during any month when the hon. gentleman opposite was employed looking after such papers. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have tried, of course, to make up for their want of numbers by their vigor in asking for such papers, nearly every one of them moving for a string of returns. They are of an enquiring mind, to satisfy which they have put all sorts of questions and asked for all sorts of returns. It is not for the officers of the different Departments to judge of the comparative value of those returns, or to know which of the hon. gentlemen opposite wishes to have his first and which wishes to postpone his return. The papers are prepared and put in hand the moment they are communicated to the different Departments—are prepared according to their advice. Every attempt is made to carry out the wishes of hon. members in this respect. I think the hon. member for North Norfolk suggested that some special returns should be brought down, they are being expedited, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that a considerable staff has been put on to produce them with all possible speed. I hope the hon. gentlemen opposite will not accuse the Government of extravagance in putting on so many clerks to satisfy the demands of their inquisitive intellectual minds. The hon. gentleman says there is only one Government Bill before the House. True, but this is not the only branch of the Legislature as yet. The other branch is considering several measures which, if the hon. Minister of Justice had a seat in this House, would have been introduced here. But I think they can be as well discussed in the other House and sent down here, as discussed here and sent to that Chamber. I have no doubt the measures will not be protracted, nor will the business be slighted by its being introduced in the other House. The hon. gentleman's memory is not very good. Not many years ago, the sturdy legislative efforts of the Ministry of that day amounted to the merest trifle, if you leave out the private legislation. I dare say before the Session gets through it will be found that the legislation is of as important a kind as has been passed for the last seven or eight years. With reference to the report of the Pacific Railway Commission—the Commissioners in the first place will see the business-like remarks of my hon. friend opposite, and will also see that he is not going to pay any regard to their report. I shall convey to them in as earnest terms as I know how, the extreme desire of my hon. friend to have the report and the evidence, or the report without the evidence, and I dare say he will get them. He says there is only one Government Bill on the paper. You know the old fable of the rabbit and the lion—how the rabbit said to the lion, I have twenty children to your one; ah! but says the lion, mine is a lion. Our Bill has been asked for, and was embodied and discussed when the hon. gentlemen were on the other side of the House, and at considerable length; and my hon. friend, not now in his place, made praiseworthy efforts to introduce a Civil Service Reform Bill—not supported or encouraged by the hon. gentlemen opposite. That Reform Government did not want Civil Service Reform. But my hon. friend sowed the good seed and his efforts received the attention of this effete Tory Government that now exists, and they have attempted to bring down a measure which has given satisfaction to my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey).

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; we discussed that subject during last Parliament, and my hon. friend said he approved of the measure in his place. He said that it was a good Bill, but that he was disappointed that the principle of competition was not involved—that with that exception it was a move in the right direction. I do not think, if the hon. gentleman from Gloucester was a Minister, he would go for the principle of competition.

Mr. ANGLIN. I would not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman wishes to leave himself out. Badinage apart, we shall endeavor to please the hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, who knows that we have already brought many returns down. They are now in active progress, and to-morrow I shall see and exercise, with his permission, my own idea of the comparative value of these returns. I shall try to bring down what I think most important, and postpone the others, to bring down as quickly as possible those affecting the Land Department.

Mr. BLAKE. I may say, with reference to the hon. gentleman's observation as to the activity displayed in bringing down returns as evinced by the results, that a great many returns brought down this Session were moved for more than a year ago, and which he took about a fortnight or three weeks of this Session to bring down. And as the clerks the hon. gentleman speaks of have been so diligently occupied in getting up the returns that have been brought down, why were they not getting up returns that ought to have been prepared long before the Session commenced at all and ought to have been ready the first day of the Session? I may just add that the Bill the hon. gentleman compares to a lion in some of its respects, reminds me more of another animal who was once said to wear the lion's skin.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before entering upon a discussion of the main question before the House, I shall ask its indulgence, while I allude to a matter that I think may properly be considered one of a personal nature. I refer to the allegations made, and repeated upon the floor of this House, and in the country, with reference to my alleged inconsistency upon the trade question. The hon. and genial member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), the other day, in the course of his speech, took occasion, I think, for about the hundredth time, upon the floor of the House, to allude to a speech made by me in 1876, and he reminded me of the fact, Sir, that we are all growing old. It is a characteristic of old men to dwell upon the scenes of youth, and the hon. member seems to go back to that speech with peculiar unction on every and upon all occasions, and to quote garbled portions, which give us an incorrect impression as to the nature and character of my remarks upon that occasion. That speech has been quoted by various hon. members of this House, and it has been alluded to by the press of the country. Now, before making any quotations from the speech, with reference to the question of inconsistency itself, I presume that no hon. member of this House will claim that he has absolutely lived without inconsistency in his whole life. I believe my hon. friend the member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), can hardly make that claim. In his speech the other day, he gave utterance to some very glowing sentiments with reference to the loyalty of the people of this country and of himself, to Her Majesty, and I was carried back in imagination to the time when he was a resident of the city of Albany, and when, as a prominent member of the Democratic party there, he was loud in his denunciations of everything British in order to catch the vote of the Irish population. I was carried back to the time when the hon. gentleman advocated a revenue Tariff as the principle of the Democratic party of the United States, and I have no doubt advocated it ably and well. And I think I can refer to other instances in this House where an hon. gentleman has changed his position and sentiments. I see before me the hon. Minister of Finance, and I have been informed that he was once a very eloquent advocate of free trade principles in the Legislature of New Brunswick. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, I am informed, was also once a very eloquent advocate of free trade, and I believe that the right hon. leader of the Government (Sir John A. Macdonald) has not always entertained the views that he now propounds with reference to this trade question. I do not find fault with these gentlemen. They have a perfect right to change their sentiments in this matter. The only being in the world who can maintain a consistent course is an animal. The donkey, for instance, can keep a consistent course. But the intelligent and studious man must necessarily be advancing and modifying his opinions. Now, Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed to say with reference to myself, that I was brought up and instructed as a protectionist from my youth, and I accepted as axioms with regard to trade, certain things that I now doubt the correctness of. I am perfectly willing to say that I have modified my opinions upon the trade policy. I claim that I have a right to modify them, that there is nothing discreditable in a modification of views, and the only question that can be properly be raised is, am I honest on the matter. If this is denied by hon. gentlemen opposite, it simply becomes a question of varacity. Let us see what my public utterances have been on this matter. Let us take that very speech quoted by the hon. member for Niagara, and read the first clause and the conclusion. Upon that occasion I opened my remarks by saying that, like many hon. members of this House, I believed in protection to a certain extent as beneficial to the country. Now the question was what was the extent to which I advocated protection, what were the limits within which I would confine a protective duty. Those limits are defined in the concluding clauses of that speech. I said:

"In conclusion I may state that I am desirous of doing everything calculated to promote the manufacturing interests of the country. But, looking from my standpoint, I believe that the present Tariff is adequate, that at all events to demonstrate the adequacy will require more time. I heartily endorse the policy of the hon. Finance Minister in declining to advance the rate beyond 17½ per cent."

Did you ever hear hon. gentlemen opposite making an honest quotation from that speech.

Mr. RYMAL. Never.

Mr. CHARLTON. There was a portion of the Reform party in this country advocating an advance of these duties from 17½ to 20 per cent. I am free to say that I was in favor of that advance, and, in my opinion, had that advance been made, every gentleman who sits upon the Treasury benches would have taken the ground at once of free traders, and would have denounced the protectionist policy of the Reform party. When I made that speech I did it from the standpoint that the duty of 17½ per cent is protective. It is a measure of protection though, perhaps, not quite enough to suit all parties. Having now dealt with this personal matter, I shall address myself to the question before the House. In the discussion of the trade question, and the policy and politics of the day, there is one thing apparent to the close observer, and that is the desire and aim of the Government, upon all occasions and at all times, to divert attention from all other issues before the people of this country, except the National Policy alone. The National Policy floated them into power, through the delusion practiced upon the people, and through false promises that were never realized. To-day, they intend to make use of the same delusion and the same policy, in their efforts to delude the people into the belief that the revival which has reached this country as well as older countries, in consequence of causes entirely outside of this Tariff, is due to the National Policy. They carefully abstain from a discussion of such questions in Ontario, as, for instance, the Boundary Award, a question of infinitely greater importance to the people of Ontario than the National Policy or anything growing out of it. They also abstain from discussing the disallowance question, the great constitutional question, involving the rights of the Provinces of this Dominion, and of infinitely more importance than the National Policy. They refrain from discussing the pernicious land regulations with reference to our domain in the North-West, nor will they discuss, unless compelled to do so, that stupid and disastrous contract for the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway made a little more than a year ago. In the policy they pursue in the discussion of the public questions of the day, certain salient points are presented. The first is their tactics in endeavoring to ascribe to the policy of the hon. member for Lambton and his colleagues, the depression that existed in this country from 1874 to 1878. Now, I intend, Mr. Speaker, briefly to enquire into this question, as to whether the policy of the late Government had anything whatever to do with the condition of things during their term of office, and I think it will be an easy thing to prove that there is no good authority for the assertion of hon. gentlemen opposite that the change in the commercial condition of this country is due to the policy of the present Government. The panic or depression that afflicted Canada afflicted as well every portion of the commercial world. It had its inception in the United States in 1873. It was caused in that country by large unproductive investments in railways, by a series of years of extravagant speculations, and by the operation of an unsound currency upon the business of the country. For many years the currency of the United States had been a depreciated, an irredeemable currency, and in consequence the transactions in all branches of business partook largely of the nature of gambling. In the gold gambler's rooms in Wall street the fluctuations in gold were closely watched, and according as gold was "bullied" or "beared," according as it was forced up or forced down, the prices of commodities in all branches of business rose or fell. This uncertainty of prices gave to every legitimate business a character of gambling, and the losses of the business classes in the country culminated in the panic or depression, which, though it was hurried on by other causes, would have ultimately resulted from the operation of their unsound currency alone. This prostration which, in the years 1874, 1875, 1876 and 1877, left one-half their blast furnaces idle, which left a large proportion of their great manufacturing industries idle, which, in 1877, left 2,000,000 men in that country without employment, and, for the first time in the history of the United States, set loose an army of tramps to roam up and down the country, which left idle $100,000,000 of capital in blast furnaces alone, which led to the production of only 2,069,000 gross tons per annum from 1874 to 1878, when the capacity of the furnaces was 4,876,000 gross tons. I say that this state of things, brought on in the United States by the causes to which I have alluded, produced that commercial depression that afflicted Canada during most of the years during which my hon. friend for Lambton was at the head of affairs. That American panic also affected England, and that reacted upon us. How did it affect us directly? It affected us in the price of certain commodities we sell to the United States. It affected the price of barley and of peas, two articles for which we find a market almost exclusively in that country. But the chief effect was upon the price of lumber. This is one of our great industries, and ranks next in importance to that of agriculture. The effect of the panic in the United States was to stop almost entirely the progress of building operations there, and thus put an end to the demand for our lumber. There was scarcely a lumberman in the Ottawa Valley but lost money steadily and rapidly during all these years. Most of these men, had the banks closed down upon them, would have been bankrupt, and the only reason why the banks did not close down upon them was that so much was at stake that it was thought better to carry them along. I think I see my hon. friend for Ottawa City (Mr. Currier) smile. No doubt he could confirm the truth of what I say. To-day the price of lumber is advanced 50 or 60 per cent., and we are able to get more for it now than we could during the Rebellion, when everything sold at war prices, and when United States currency was worth only 40 cents on the dollar. The effect of this panic upon our industries was, of itself, sufficient to produce the state of things we found existing in Canada from 1874 to 1878. But it was aggravated by other causes. Singularly enough, in conjunction with this panic in the United States, and with the depression, which, as a consequence, settling down upon our industries, Providence seemed to have withdrawn its favors, and we had a succession of bad harvests, so that, in 1877, our net export of course grains and meal was only $2,597,000; and the country did not raise its own bread, and, as I showed in some remarks I made the other day, our exports of the products of the soil, during the five years my hon. friend for Lambton held office, were less than the three succeeding years since the right hon. gentlemen on the other side became the First Minister of the Crown. Will any one accuse my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) of being responsible for the seeds of disaster which were sown for years in the United States, and for the crop that was ultimately garnered? Was his influence so great and far reaching that it controlled the interests of that great country? Will any man accuse my hon. friend of controlling the interests of England—her vast interests by sea and land? Will any man accuse my hon. friend of being responsible for the bad harvests during the years of his Administration? If it can be shown that the Reform Government were responsible for all these things, it follows, as a matter of course that they were responsible for the depression that afflicted this country during that period. But if this cannot be shown to be true—and it would be an insult to the intelligence of the Canadian people to say that it was true—it follows, as a matter of course, that the Reform Government of that day were in no way, direct or indirect, responsible for the hard times that paralysed the industries of Canada during that period. Well, Sir, having shown that the panic was not confined to Canada, having shown, I think satisfactorily, that the Government was not responsible for that depression, let us next enquire whether that depression was more grievous in Canada than in other countries. If we examine into this question carefully we will find that Canada, though she passed through a period of great trial, had cause for thankfulness in the fact that the depression existing here was less grievous than in other countries. I might spend much time in elucidating this point, but it is not necessary to do so and I have not time. I will simply allude to one or two facts bearing on the matter. The facts I give relate to our manufacturing interests which are brought more immediately under consideration in this discussion. By the statistics of forty-eight New England manufactories, in 1877, employing a capital of $52,320,000, it was shown that sixteen declared no dividend; nine declared dividends less than 6 per cent.; eight, dividends of 6 per cent.; seven, dividends of 10 per cent. and upwards. In 1877, I was at some trouble to get returns for a number of manufacturing industries in Canada. I addressed circulars to a great number of manufacturers and received answers from twenty of the principle ones, and upon tabulating that information I find that six of the twenty in that year earned a dividend of 20 per cent. and upwards; that two of them, although not giving their dividends stated they were satisfactory; that two of them declared dividends of 10 per cent.; that six declared dividends of from 6 to 8 per cent.; that one declared a dividend satisfactory as compared with former years, and two only declared no dividend. Two establishments in Canada as against sixteen in New England declared no dividend. It is evident, if this is a fair criterion on which to form an opinion, the condition of the manufacturing industries in this country was greatly better than that of New England at that time; and I venture the assertion that during the entire period of the depression the manufacturing industries of Canada were more prosperous, and felt the effects of the depression less severely, than the manufacturing interests of the United States or any other country. I found, on looking over the returns of those manufacturers, that they all considered their condition a ruinous one if they had only made ordinary interest as their dividend; if they had not declared more than 6 per cent. they affirmed they were on the verge of ruin. I found one large cotton mill that gave a return of no dividend had actually earned 10 per cent., and expended the money on plant, being unable to meet its orders and obliged to enlarge its capacity. I found one large woollen mill with a capital of $180,000, declared a dividend of 10 per cent.; that many manufacturers reported strong competition among themselves; that the sewing machine manufacturers wanted reciprocity with the United States, and would be glad to be able to meet the Americans on equal terms in their own markets if they had the same privilege in the markets of the United States. I found agricultural implement manufacturers reported, without exception, business good, that during the depression they were fully occupied, and one large foundry reported business improving and the profits 20 per cent. It would seem then that our manufacturing industries were not on the verge of ruin. It would seem that the depression that affected our industries affected them in a less degree than it did their customers, the farmers. I believe their business was in a better condition than that of their customers the lumbermen; in short, that there was no interest in the Dominion that less required the fostering care of the Government, or felt less severely the depression, than the manufacturing industries at that time. Why, in the Census returns of 1871, it was shown that the production of our manufactures was $221,000,000, that they had grown to such an extent that they had employed at that time 187,000 men. The depression was not due to the policy of the Government, and, on comparing the condition of our manufactures, with those of other countries, we had every reason to be thankful that our condition was not worse. The second salient point to which I will refer is, the policy pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by the Government, in the discussion of this question. After having claimed that the hon. member for Lambton and his colleagues were responsible for the depression that existed, they proceed to claim that to the National Policy is to be attributed the revival. They remind me of an African asking a missionary for good medicine, in order that he might shoot straight, and asking for a charm to keep away wizards. It was like the North American Indian asking for a charm to defend himself against evil spirits. They claim they dispensed good medicine—the hon. member for Lambton's bad medicine—that his policy had nearly ruined the country, and brought about the disaster, which was due to other causes, and that they had brought about the revival, with which they had as little to do as the natives of Africa or the Blackfeet at the base of the Rocky Mountains. Let us enquire as to what is the true cause of the revival. All periods of commercial depression are brought about by over-trading and extravagance. During every period of commercial depression one feature of the depression is that the people uniformly economize; they seek to get out of debt; and the practice of that economy will in itself bring about a return of good times, usually within a year or two. In Canada, during the entire period of this depression, the people were practising economy; during the entire period of the depression the people of the United States were doing the same; and, but for the evil effects of the vicious currency system of the United States, the depression which extended over five years would probably have passed away in two. Hon. gentlemen opposite, who claim to be the parties who brought about this revival, take credit to themselves for the effects that were produced in this country by the economy practised by the people, from 1874 to 1878. Then another great cause of the revival in business was the return to specie payment in the United States, on 1st January, 1878. On that date, when the Government returned to specie payment, there was a marked improvement in public affairs, and that improvement has continued to the present day. The country was waiting in expectation for the time when they would have a solid basis for their currency, and the moment that occurred the affairs of the United States improved, and steadily continued to improve. It is needless to say that it reacted upon us, and that improvement in trade was largely due to the return to specie payment in the United States. Another reason for the revival is the fact that there have been two bad harvests in England since hon. gentlemen opposite came into office, and the consequence of this was that the prices of the products of the soil were largely increased in this country. Another feature of the case was, that in conjunction with the fact that two bad harvests came in England, two good harvests were reaped here. Here are the causes of the revival in a nut-shell: economizing during five years of bad times, the return to specie payment in the United States, and the great boom in business that occurred there, affecting in a most remarkable degree our lumber market, the failure of harvests in England, which gave higher prices to the productions of our fields, and two good harvests which occurred in this country, enabling our farmers to reap an enormous advantage from the advance in prices. These are the causes of the revival, causes entirely beyond the control of the Government of the day and beyond the control of any Government, and yet causes so palpably natural that no man can for a moment doubt that these were the real causes that produced the revival. Let us see what story our exports tell bearing on this question. The other day I drew a comparison between the exports for the period of the incumbency of the hon. member for Lambton and of hon. gentlemen opposite. I will take the two last years of the Administration of my hon. friend from Lambton, and compare them with the two last fiscal years, and we shall find that our exports in butter and cheese, for 1877 and 1878, were $13,201,000, while the exports for 1880 and 1881 reached $16,035,000. Exports of animals and their produce, including butter and cheese, for 1877 and 1878, $28,240,000; for 1880 and 1881, $38,967,000. The agricultural products of the country exported in 1877 and 1878 came to $32,698,000, rising, in 1880 and 1881, to $43,562,000. Exports of the products of the fisheries, 1877 and 1878, $10,498,000; 1880 and 1881, $13,447,000; showing an excess in the export of those articles for the two years, 1880 and 1881, of $24,550,000, as compared with the years 1877 and 1878, the average annual excess being $12,275,000. My hon. friends will see what effect that state of things would naturally produce on the business of the country. The causes of the revival in trade are not far to seek. I alluded, a few moments ago, to the fact that the manufacturing industries of this country had attained to considerable development in 1870, when we were manufacturing $221,000,000 worth of goods, and were employing 170,000 men. Let us enquire into the circumstances of this development, this very great development of our manufacturing industries. Under what circumstances did they develop to this extent—was it through the operation of a protective policy? No; it was not—not protection as we generally use the term. Every business was then developed under a revenue Tariff policy, during the greater part of the time, of 15 per cent. duties. Under this policy we had developed great manufacturing industries in this country, and, as we have seen, they rested on a firmer basis, they paid better dividends during the period of depression than the manufacturing industries of the United States, which had been fostered by very high protective duties. True, there was a class of manufacturers who, at the time, were without adequate capital; but can we point out any instances where, under this revenue Tariff, manufacturers had accumulated wealth? I think we can. I find in the commercial reports of that year, that J. and R. Molson are credited with being worth $1,000,000; J. G. Worts, $1,000,000; E. & C. Gurney, $750,000; E. K. Green, $500,000; Mr. Gault, $500,000; William Darling, $500,000; Mr. Hay, $500,000. And most of these men had accumulated that amount of property commencing with nothing, or a very small capital. I know of numerous cases in which large manufacturing interests were built by men commencing with nothing but their naked hands, honorable instances of business success and energy. I believe that the manufacturers of this country have had nothing to complain of in the progress made up to the present date. I would now ask do they need special favor—favors that the lumbering interest, the farming interest, and the fishing interest of the country does not need? Was there justice in singling out this interest, which at that very moment was a more prosperous one than the others named, and making it the recipient of special favors? I believe there was not, and all that was proper for us to do was to continue our policy of incidental protection that had been in force, with such modifications as experience might dictate—with modifications which, in my opinion, would have pointed in the direction of a slight increase in the duties levied. Here let me say, that in the discussion of this question, from the beginning to the end, there has been a determination, on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, to place the Liberal party in a false position—to induce the manufacturers to believe that this party are their natural and sworn enemies. Certain expressions, no doubt, have been used in the heat of debate, which, taken isolated and by themselves—like those extracts from my oft quoted speech—might be tortured into a meaning of this kind. But I hold that the Reformers of this country are as solicitous as to the prosperity of this interest as any other party in the country, and that they are willing to do for the manufacturing interest all that it can legitimately claim or ask. But they are not prepared to give it special favors—unjust favors at the expense of others. The Liberals are prepared to arrange a schedule of duties of such a character, and to such an extent, that every industry that can be created in the country to advantage can flourish under that Tariff. They are prepared to give the manufacturers a better Tariff than they have to-day, by sweeping away the duties on raw materials, and placing duties on imports to a degree sufficiently high to afford to those industries all the protection necessary to enable them to build up a business and realize profits that ought to be satisfactory—not, perhaps, profits of 50 per cent.—but such as they enjoyed in 1877, 20, 15 or 10 per cent. profits, which ought to be satisfactory to them. It was asserted when the Tariff, now in force, was put in operation that we were to have a Canadian market for Canadian manufacturers; that the object of the Tariff was to give the manufacturers control in the Canadian market? Has that occurred? Has that object been realized by this Tariff? Will any hon. member say yes?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. We shall see. I find that, in 1874, we imported \$11,341,000 worth of cottons; woollens, \$11,160,000; iron, steel and manufactures of the same, \$12,934,000. In 1879, under the operation of a revenue Tariff of 17½ per cent., the importation of goods in those lines was largely reduced; cottons had fallen to \$6,535,000; woollens to \$6,992,000; importations of iron and steel, \$6,457,000; the total importation of these articles for 1879 was \$19,980,000, against \$35,449,000 for 1874. I hear an hon. gentleman say we had no money to pay for them in 1879. It seems, then, we were buying some goods and manufacturing largely. It seems that our manufacturing industries were in a prosperous condition and were actually declaring dividends of 20, 15 and 10 per cent., and I presume we had a little money to buy goods during that time. Well, Sir, what do we find in 1881, after some three years of this protective policy? Do we find the importations are smaller than they were when this policy went into operation, in goods of this character? They ought to be, but they are not. I find the importation of cottons last year was \$10,267,000, against \$6,500,000 in 1879. I find that the importation of woollens was \$8,739,000 in 1881, again \$6,992,000 in 1879. I find the importation of iron and steel and the manufactures thereof were \$12,460,000 in 1881, against \$6,457,000 in 1879, or \$31,407,000 in the aggregate, against \$19,985,000 when this protective policy went into operation. Why have you not the market for the Canadian manufacturer? Why have you not shut out this entire importation, instead of having an increase from \$20,000,000 to \$31,500,000. Now, I propose to examine the total importation of goods that are susceptible of manufacture in this country. I made an estimate in 1877, and by that estimate I found that we imported that year of goods susceptible of manufacture in Canada on the specific duty list, \$398,000; on the 17½ per cent. list, \$35,209,000; on the 10 per cent. list, \$508,000; on the 5 per cent. list \$3,383,000; and of free goods, \$3,322,000, making a total of \$42,830,000 imported in 1877 of goods susceptible of manufacture in Canada. Now, are the imports of last year of goods susceptible of production in this country less? They ought to be if this Tariff was to shut out foreign importation. Let us see what they are. I find that, in the year 1881, we imported \$10,267,000 worth of cottons, \$8,739,000 worth of woollens, \$12,461,000 worth of iron manufactures and steel, and of all other goods susceptible of manufacture in Canada, not including refined sugar, \$27,227,000, or a total, in 1881, of \$58,695,000, against a total, in 1877, of \$42,830,000, an increase of \$15,865,000, or 26.8 per cent. This does not indicate a very remarkable degree of success for this policy, which was to exclude foreign goods and give the Canadian market to the Canadian manufacturer. It shows, on the contrary, that we are importing more, three years after this policy went into operation, than we were before, and this in the face of the fact that the importations to this country are very much in excess of what the returns indicate, because smuggling has greatly increased during that time. I see by Secretary Blaine's report that the United States exported to Canada 24,000,000 yards of cotton cloth in 1881; that, of that quantity, 19,000,000 yards were smuggled and 5,000,000 appear in the Customs returns. I venture to say that, if we take into account the extra amount of goods smuggled into Canada, the importations would amount to more than \$60,000,000, as against \$42,000,000 in 1877. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has made a failure. His policy has not secured to the manufacturers of this country the control of their own market. Now, I wish to call attention to a statement in detail as to the operation of a number of our manufacturing industries in Canada. I shall not read the whole statement, but I will give you a summary of it. I have here a list of forty-one industries. These industries produced, in 1871, \$165,000,000 worth of goods. I find that in respect to nineteen of these industries the importation in their line from the United States was greater this year than it was in 1877. The industries in which the importations were greater are brick and tiles, brooms, brushes, carriage-making articles, cooperage edge tools, hatters' goods, paper-making, tubs, oil refiners, India rubber goods, soap, candles, rope, twine, sewing machines, trunks and valises, railway goods. In all these lines the importation is greater now than it was when this Tariff went into operation. I find that in these forty-one industries, the total importations from the United States in 1877 were \$3,797,000, or $2\frac{2}{10}$ per cent. of the whole amount manufactured in the country in 1870; that the total imports from all countries, in 1877, were \$6,753,000, or 4 per cent. of the total amount manufactured. I find that, in 1880-81, the imports from the United States had increased to \$4,618,000, or $2\frac{2}{10}$ per cent. of the whole amount, an increase of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in the importation from the United States, in this entire list, of \$165,000,000. I find the total imports had increased from \$6,753,000 to \$8,047,000, being $4\frac{8}{10}$ per cent. of the whole production. I find that, while nineteen of these forty-one industries had increased their importation from the United States, last year, as compared with 1876-77, that in seven more of them the reduction was very slight indeed. Now, these returns indicate very clearly that the operation of the Tariff has not been what its friends claim it has. These statistics prove very plainly that the importation of goods, susceptible of manufacture in Canada, are increasing, and I infer from this and various other facts, that a revenue Tariff of, say 20 per cent., with material admitted free of duty for the use of manufacturers, would be a better Tariff for the manufacturing industries of this country than the Tariff now in force. I think it might be profitable in this connection to point to the experience of another country in that matter, which has a direct bearing upon the question, as to whether a revenue Tariff is as well calculated to foster the manufacturing industries of this country, and give them a permanent and prosperous growth, as the hot-bed forcing process of high protective duties. I shall take the condition of the manufacturing industries in the United States for a term of years, and quote a few statistics with reference to the importation and exportation of goods, and the growth of manufacturing industries in that country during a revenue Tariff period and a protective period. I find that, in 1850, four years after the commencement of a revenue Tariff policy, the gross production of manufactures in the United States was \$1,019,106,616, and the net production was \$463,982,734. I find that, in 1860, after ten years more of a revenue Tariff policy—which went into force in 1846, and ended in 1860—the gross production was \$1,855,861,676, and the net production was \$854,251,584. I find that ten years later—in 1870—after ten years of protection, the gross production was \$4,232,325,442, and the net production \$1,743,898,000. From the best information obtainable, it is supposed the gross production of manufactures in 1880, as shown by the Census tables when completed, will be, \$5,000,000,000, in round numbers. What does this show? It shows that the increase in the net production from 1850 to 1860, under a revenue Tariff policy, was 84 per cent. It shows the increase from 1860 to 1870, under an extreme protection policy, was 104 per cent., if we value the goods in the depreciated currency of that time; but if we make a due allowance of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. discount for the average 20 per cent. premium at which gold stood during that year, we find that the actual net increase was, $86\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or an increase of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., in the decade under the forcing process of high protecting duties, over a decade under the operation of a revenue Tariff, or 84 per cent., from 1850 to 1860, against $86\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., from 1860 to 1870. I find the increase in the second decade, under protection, from 1870 to 1880, amounts, on gross production, to 18 per cent. only, against 84 per cent. on net production from 1850 to 1860; but if we deduct from the price of goods in 1870, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., to make it equal to gold, the increase was 43 per cent., and this is as favorable a shewing as can be made for protection—43 per cent. increase for 1870 to 1880, against an increase of 84 per cent. in the revenue Tariff period, from 1850 to 1860. The wealth of the country, in 1840, was, in round numbers, \$4,000,000,000,000. The wealth of the country in 1850, embracing four years of a revenue Tariff, was \$7,135,000,000. In 1860, after ten years of a revenue Tariff, it was \$16,150,000,000. In 1870, after ten years of protection, it amounted to \$30,068,000; and, in 1880, to \$39,400,000, including payments on the public debt. Let us analyse this statement, Mr. Speaker, and see what are the average increases in the wealth of the country during these various periods. From 1820 to 1830, the increase was 41 per cent.; from 1830 to 1840, the increase was 53 per cent. From 1840 to 1850, it showed a rapid rise to 80 per cent., and four of those years they had a revenue Tariff. From 1850 to 1860, there was a marvellous rise from 80 per cent. to 126 per cent. during a period of revenue Tariff. From 1860 to 1870, the increase dropped down from 126 per cent. to 85 per cent., and from 1870 to 1880, when the full force and effect of this policy had been brought into play, there was an increase of 31 per cent. against an increase of 126 per cent. from 1850 to 1860. From 1850 to 1860, during this revenue Tariff period, the woollen manufactures of the United States increased 62 per cent. mainly in the last three years of the period. In 1860, under a revenue Tariff, the production of pig iron was 100,000 gross tons greater than in the previous year, reaching the amount of 900,000 tons. In 1860, the export of domestic manufactures was \$48,000,000, an increase of 200 per cent. in ten years under the operation of a revenue Tariff, while, under the operation of a protective Tariff, the exports of domestic manufactures has steadily decreased in proportion to increased population and, to-day, it is smaller per capita than at the end of this revenue Tariff period. The exports of domestic manufactures from the United States in the year 1880, leaving out of account petroleum, of which they have a monopoly, were \$70,000,000, an increase of exports of those goods of $2\frac{2}{10}$ per cent. per annum under a protective Tariff period, as against an increase of 20 per cent. per annum under a revenue Tariff period, from 1850 to 1860. Had the rate of increase that obtained from 1850 to 1860 been continued, the export of domestic manufactures from the United States this year would have reached \$240,000,000, in place of being \$70,000,000, excluding petroleum. As it is, the export per head, in 1860, was \$1.55, as against \$1.40 in 1860. Now, if we place this showing against that made by England, we shall find a very remarkable contrast. While the United States are exporting \$1.40 per head of domestic manufactures, England exported \$32, and her foreign commerce is greater than that of the United States and Germany combined, with a population of 91,000,000, and greater than France, Russia and Holland combined, with a population of 124,000,000 inhabitants. During the period from 1850 to 1860, the increased value of agricultural products in the United States was 100 per cent., and during the same period, with ten years of a revenue Tariff, the increase of the value of farm property was 103 per cent. The export of cotton goods afford a fair indication of the operation of these two systems. In 1846, at the commencement of a revenue Tariff, the export of cotton goods was \$3,500,000. In 1850, after four years operation of the revenue Tariff, the export of cotton goods was \$4,240,000. In 1860, after fourteen years of the revenue Tariff, the export of these goods was \$10,934,000. Then the policy was changed, and after an experience of six years of a protective Tariff, we find that the export of cotton goods fell from \$11,000,000, in round numbers, to \$1,780,000. In 1870, the export of domestic cottons was \$3,787,000. In 1880, after twenty years of protection, the export of domestic cottons from the United States was less than 1860 at the end of the revenue Tariff period, the amount being \$9,981,000. In that same year England exported \$367,000,000 worth of cottons. Now, Sir, while the United States were importing largely of all classes of manufactured goods, I will call the attention of the House to their imports in various lines. While they imported, in 1881, \$40,860,000 worth of woollens they exported \$346,000 worth, or two-thirds of a cent per head; while they imported \$31,219,000 worth of cottons, they exported the \$9,981,000 worth which I have spoken of. They also imported of iron and steel, \$46,491,000 worth; linen and flax, \$16,150,000 worth; silks, \$32,000,000 worth; and these five lines of imports amounted to \$166,668,000 in the year. These were goods, every dollar's worth of which were susceptible of production in that country, and should have been produced there if the promises made by the protectionists had been fulfilled; and to secure their own control of the markets in that country there was an average rate of 60.4 $\frac{1}{100}$ per cent. levied on woollens; 38.5 $\frac{4}{100}$ per cent. on cottons; 36.7 $\frac{2}{100}$ per cent. on iron; 50.5 $\frac{2}{100}$ per cent. on steel; 58.8 $\frac{2}{100}$ per cent. on silk; 33.3 $\frac{2}{100}$ per cent. on linen; in the year 1881, and yet with these enormous duties—duties which were absolutely to exclude these goods from the markets of the United States; duties which were to give to the manufacturers of the United States the entire control of their own markets—with these enormous duties the United States imported, of these five articles, \$166,668,000. Clearly, Sir, the operation of the high protective duties, as shown by the experience of the United States as well as by our own experience, has not been to give to the manufacturers of the country the absolute control of their own markets. It will be found, Mr. Speaker, on careful examination of the Treasury reports of the United States as to the price of various commodities—the averages have been kept monthly since 1825—that the highest prices for wool, grain, butter and cheese, and other farm products, have been realized in the United States during revenue Tariff periods. Well, Sir, if that be the case, as it is, it is clear that there is some humbug about this talk about agricultural protection in the United States. If the farmers of the United States, after subjecting themselves to the operation of these duties, averaging over 36 per cent. on all the imports of that country—these duties which have wrung from them hundreds of millions of dollars annually—have not realized a better market for their productions, and if it can be shown that the prices of agricultural productions were better under a revenue Tariff, then protection, clearly enough has failed in that respect. They have been deluded with false promises, and they have been paying millions, hundreds of millions and billions of dollars for a shadow of something they have never realized. Now, let us see what kind of a home market these farmers have. They have been submitting to this taxation for twenty years for the purpose of creating a home market; that is the inducement that was held out to them, that was the promise they believed. In 1860, the agricultural exports of the United States were \$295,000,000, or 78.6 $\frac{1}{100}$ per cent. of the whole amount; in 1870, they were \$391,000,000, or 79 per cent. of the entire amount of exports; in 1880, they were \$685,867,000, or 83 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the entire amount; and, in 1881, they were \$730,000,000, or 83 per cent. of the entire exports. That is not a brilliant example of the fulfilment of prophecy, or of securing to the farmers of the country a home market by the policy of protection. Let us look more closely at what has it cost the farmers of the United States to secure this home market? Senator Beck, of Kentucky, estimates that last year the farmers of the United States paid for domestic goods produced in that country, 25 per cent. more than they would have paid without a protective policy; in other words, that they paid upon the \$5,000,000,000 worth of goods which were manufactured in that country, in round numbers \$1,125,000,000, more than they could have been imported for free of duty, in order to secure a home market that only left them a small surplus of \$730,000,000 worth of productions to export to foreign countries. It is a swindle, a fraud, and we, in Canada, are developing a home market in the same direction. Under the operation of the National Policy the agricultural exports of this country have increased. Last year they were greater than they were in the last year of the Administration of my hon. friend from Lambton. We exported food enough to feed 1,000,000 people; and yet this policy was to give the farmers of this country a market at their own doors for all the productions of the soil. But the hon. Minister of Finance tells us that all we have to do is to have a little patience—that he has made a start, and that if we have a little patience, we shall soon have a home market for the balance of our production. Let us see what increase in the home market the hon. gentleman claims to have created already. On reference to his speech, I find that he claims that ninety-five new industries have been started in this country, employing 7,242 persons. He goes on to say:

"Some 400 odd factories visited and that were in existence, less the ninety-five that I have named as being established since 1878, show an increase of employés varying from 5 to 30 per cent., and with an average of 17 per cent. in these 350 odd factories that were in operation before. That 17 per cent. on the number of employés, as far as we can gather from the Census of 1871, and making an allowance for reduction in the number employed between 1871 and 1878, would give 17,850."

Now, I want to ask my hon. friend the Finance Minister if he has the hardihood to assert, with regard to industries created in this country under a revenue Tariff, industries which had grown to such proportions that they produced $221,000,000 worth of goods a year, that any increase in their operative force, in consequence of a revival of business throughout the world, is due to the National Policy? I utterly repudiate such an idea; it is preposterous. These manufactories would naturally increase their business in consequence of that universal revival of trade. They were in existence before the National Policy was adopted, not one of them was created by that policy, and the assertion that any one of them was created by the National Policy is, as I have said, preposterous and absurd. The hon. gentleman asserts that ninety-five factories were established.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is only a part of them.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, we will take into consideration the part he has given, and we shall see what kind of a list it is; and we shall ask him afterwards to give us an amended list, and then a supplemental list of the rest. On classifying the list of ninety-five new industries which he claims as due to the National Policy, I find that there are four cotton manufactories, sixteen woollen and knitting mills, twelve iron and steel establishments of various kinds, three boot and shoe factories, three furniture factories, two tobacco factories, seven musical instrument factories, five sugar refineries, three bone button factories, three glass factories, three pulp factories, three picture frame factories, and thirty-one miscellaneous concerns; employing in all 7,242 hands. In the miscellaneous list there are paper box factories, children's carriage factories, glove and slipper factories, cigar box factories, emory wheel factory, paint works, plated works, salt drying works, clothing company, corset factory, beef cannery, canned fruit factory, hat factory, pottery, brush factory, planing mills, etc. Of course a planing mill would be created by this National Policy in a country which exports its lumber. I find the hon. gentleman, in his list, claims that the new establishments in Montreal employ 1,839 hands. I have information which leads me to believe that the number in the horse-blanket factory is overstated by nine; in the shirt factory, by thirty-five, and in the glass factory, by 175; that he takes credit for the old Redpath sugar refinery, which was built before the National Policy was adopted; that the shirt factory is an old concern resuscitated and the old business continued under a new name; that the St. Lawrence Sugar Refinery is the DeCastro Syrup Company enlarged; and that the employés in the really new concerns are really 760 instead of 1,839. I hope the hon. gentleman's statistics in other cases are more reliable than they are in this case. I find that he takes credit for a new establishment in London, which the local papers know nothing about. I find, with reference to Toronto, that he claims the Massey Company, which was removed from Newcastle; the Heintzman piano factory, which is an old concern; Childs & Company's boot and shoe factory, which is an old firm resuscitated; Gray's & Company's clothing establishment, which is an old firm; the Nut and Bolt Works, ten years old, which was closed up and removed; the Canning Works, which employ about 300 girls for a few weeks in the year; and the mill furnishing factory of Barter & Company, which is in no wise due to the National Policy, being an old establishment for the manufacture of a patent machine. The total number of hands—1,635—which he claims to be employed in new factories in Toronto is, by this means, reduced by 578, leaving a balance of 1,058, of whom 300 are girls employed a few weeks in the year in canning fruit. We have seen how much the case is overstated in Montreal. We have seen how much it is overstated in Toronto, and it leads us to have suspicion as to his statements in other respects. I find that in the hon. gentleman's own city he puts down a bolt manufactory, employing twenty-five hands, that is an old concern, and he fails to inform us that the Safe Company and the Colebrook Iron Works, employing five times as many hands as this establishment, have been killed off by the National Policy. I would like to ask the Finance Minister if he heard that statement. He no doubt is familiar with the affairs of that country. Does he know that the Colebrook Iron Works have been killed off by his policy?

Mr. DOMVILLE. Oh, I know all about it.

Mr. CHARLTON. The question does not interest the hon. gentleman. I have gone carefully through this list and I have arrived at the following estimate as to how much of this industry is due to the National Policy. I estimate that in the cotton trade 450 hands are employed in ways that may perhaps be considered due to the National Policy. In woollen goods I estimate 400 hands, in furniture 40, in sugar refining 298, unless we also take the number employed in the Redpath refinery which was created before the Tariff. In glass establishments I estimate 360 hands, in miscellaneous establishments 232, making a total of 1,680, or adding the Redpath concern, 2,030 hands employed in establishments given in this list whose existence may fairly be attributed to the National Policy. What have we on the other hand? Are there any establishments killed off by this policy? How many would be required to manufacture the goods we do not export, that we did export under the Administration of my hon. friend the member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie)? I think we may fairly claim that there have been driven out of the country at least 2,500 operatives owing to this policy. The net result is a loss to this country of 500 operatives. But, even if we assume that the hon. gentleman's estimate is correct, and that his policy has given employment to 7,242 more operatives than were employed before the National Policy, I would ask if that is a benefit commensurate with the cost of this policy to the country. What does this policy cost us? How much excessive taxation is levied in consequence of this policy? In 1878, the revenue from Customs amounted to $12,782,000, and there was a deficit during that year of $1,128,000. I estimate that it would have been necessary under a Reform Administration to increase the expenditure $1,500,000, which is a liberal estimate, had my hon. friend continued to manage the affairs of the country, because in five years he only incurred a gross increase of expenditure of $200,000. This estimated increase of expenditure would have required a revenue the present year of $15,400,000, and the hon. Finance Minister tells us we are to have $20,500,000, or $5,100,000 more than would have been necessary to manage the affairs of the country. From this it is plain that we are taxed $5,000,000 more than would be necessary under prudent management. We have an excessive tax of $5,000,000. But that is not all. It is estimated that under the protective policy, for every $4 that is collected and placed in the coffers of the Government, at least $9 are collected in the form of enhanced cost of domestic goods by the manufacturers. I will modify my estimate. I will suppose that consumers are paying $8,000,000 more in increased cost of domestic goods manufactured in this country, and upon that estimate we have an increase of $13,000,000 a year on the burdens of the people in direct and indirect taxation. $13,000,000 is the cost to the country of a policy that, upon a liberal estimate, has increased the number of operatives in this country by 7,242 souls. If the actual increase is 2,500, which is a liberal estimate, the cost per head to the country is $6,600. If each of these represents three in a family, the cost per head to the country is $1,733. If there are 7,000 of them, the cost is $1,850 per head. If there are 7,000 of them, and three in a family, the cost is $617 per head. But the hon. gentleman tells us that, in compensation for this great cost, we have an extensive market for our "garden sass," and he revives what is known as the "garden sass theory" of political economy. I find, in the report of his Budget Speech, the following:—

"Why, Sir, under the operations of this Tariff, for the vegetables, the fruit, the poultry, the lamb, the veal and other meats, the butter the cheese, for almost everything they offer for sale, they obtain higher prices on account of the home market."

Well, Sir, I suppose we can manage to dispose of all the butter we have to spare. We do now find a profitable foreign market for a large amount of butter and cheese. We can let our calves grow up to oxen and let our lambs grow in the same way if we can find no market for them. I will admit, for the sake of argument, that there is an increased market for garden sass, and let us estimate the cost to the people of the country. By the Census returns of 1870 I find that there were 275,000 acres of garden and orchard. That was an average of one acre for every fourteen and a half inhabitants. If the population had been increased by 7,000, and each person represented three in a family, there would be 21,000 of an additional population requiring an increased area of orchard and garden of 1,500 acres, at a total cost—if this were the only benefit—of $13,000,000. The cost per acre at this calculation would be $8,666. The cost to the country, if the National Policy has increased the number of operations, 7,000, and each represents three in a family, would be $617 per head. I propose now to refer to some of the statements made by my hon. friend regarding the market for farm produce. I find in the report of his speech that he refers to the exceptional state of things that has existed in the American grain market for the last two years. Well, certainly, Sir, there has been an exceptional state of things. Under the operation of the National Policy for the last two years grain has been higher in the American than in the Canadian markets, higher in Chicago than in Toronto, and that exceptional state of things will continue so long as the hon. gentleman's fiscal policy remains in operation. In this he refers to the effect of "corners"—of speculators forcing up the price of wheat. Undoubtedly, an exceptional state of things has existed in the West. No. 2 spring wheat has at times been 10 to 15 cents higher in Chicago than in Toronto. Whatever that state of things may be due to, it is at all events apparent, Mr. Speaker, that the duties upon American wheat are rendered useless by the fact that wheat is higher there than here. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

"Well, now, Sir, ten days ago wheat was sold in the Toronto market 3 cents higher per bushel than it was sold for in the Chicago market, and it could not have brought these 3 cents per bushel in excess had it not been for the Tariff."

You see, Sir, the hon. gentleman had one crumb of comfort. He was able to pick out one day when wheat happened to be 3 cents higher in Toronto than in Chicago. Well, Sir, wheat of the same grade was higher even on that day in Chicago than in Toronto, for the grade of spring wheat sold in Toronto is superior to that of the same name sold in Chicago, and when Chicago No. 2 spring is lower by 3 cents than No. 2 spring in Toronto, the fact is that grade of wheat, such as is raised in Canada, would be worth, even in Chicago, several cents per bushel more than the ordinary Chicago No. 2. Hard No. 2 is usually quoted in Chicago at from 4 cents to 7 cents higher than ordinary No. 2 spring, and that would be the class usually sold in Toronto. But, Sir, whatever may be true as regards the hon. gentleman's assertion that wheat could be sent from Chicago to Liverpool as cheaply as from Toronto to Liverpool, on account of the ring controlling freights, that is not the question affecting the people of this country, but the question is whether the duties upon grain are doing them good or not. The question is, would wheat, quoted 3 cents higher in Toronto than in Chicago, be brought from Chicago to Toronto and sold there at prices to depress the market. Will the hon. the Finance Minister tell us the 3 cents per bushel in favor of Toronto market on the day of which he speaks, would pay the freight from Chicago to Toronto. Will he tell us there was any possibility of going to Chicago, buying wheat at 3 cents per bushel margin, bringing it to Toronto or any other Canadian port, and selling it there so as to depress the price of wheat in the Canadian market? If it is not the case, then, so far as the farmers are concerned, it has no bearing on their interest and nothing to do with the question of practical protection. Then the hon. gentleman tells us, Sir:

"As we know, after a heavy shipment of produce, after the harvest is in and a large portion of it has been shipped to England, the quantity of Canadian grain in the country being diminished, Canadian millers have to pay an increased price for the wheat which they require, and this increase goes into the pockets of our farmers, who reap the benefit."

In other words, Sir, after the crop in Canada is gathered, after it is sold, after it has gone out of the farmers' hands, after it has been exported from the country, when it becomes necessary for the miller to import wheat for home consumption the price of wheat rises. Of course it does. Can the hon. gentleman contend that the rise goes into the farmer's pocket? It does not; because the farmer is not selling the wheat. The fact is the country has sold short, and the supply must be imported. Except when wheat is imported, prices here are invariably lower than in corresponding markets in the United States. I would like to give some quotations of prices. I may say that in the course of the past summer, addressing audiences at various times, I have made a practice of compiling the latest market quotations on each occasion. This course I have followed during a period of several months, and in no case have they failed to tell the same tale that these grains were higher in American markets than in corresponding Canadian markets. I have market reports for March 2nd. On that day No. 2 spring wheat was worth $1.26½ in Toronto, it was worth $1.26½ in Chicago, but hard No. 2 was quoted there at $1.30. No. 2 Duluth, the same day at Buffalo was $1.45, and No. 1 Duluth was $1.60. I find that on that day barley sold for 70 cents in Montreal, 87 cents in Toronto, $1.14 in New York, and $1.04 in Chicago, $1.05 in Buffalo, $1.08 in Oswego, in any case almost 20 cents higher than in Toronto. Oats, Toronto, 41 cents per 34 lbs.; Chicago, 42 cents per 32 lbs.; Buffalo, a corresponding market to Toronto, 47 cents; Toledo, at the head of Lake Erie, 44 cents, or 3 cents more than in Toronto. Peas, Montreal, 76 cents; Toronto, 80 cents; Buffalo $1. Rye, New York, 90 cents; Chicago, 88 cents;

Mr. CHARLTON.

Toronto, 83 cents. Best grade of butter, Montreal, 34 cents; New York, 47 cents; Toronto, 26 cents; Chicago, 30 cents; Buffalo, 36 cents. Best grade cheese, Montreal, 12½ cents; New York, 12½ cents; Chicago 13½ cents; Buffalo 14. It can readily be understood how necessary it is for the protection of Canadian industries to impose duties so as to prevent any lunatic from going to Buffalo buying No. 2 spring wheat for $1.45, bringing it over to Toronto to sell at $1.26½, to hinder evil disposed persons from buying oats in Chicago at 42 cents per 32 lbs. and slaughtering them in Toronto at 41 cents per 34 lbs. How great the benefit that no person is allowed to buy barley for $1.08 in Oswego, bring it across the lake and ruin our markets by selling it at 87 cents. The whole system of duties is an absurdity in every article that can be named. Of what value is protection to us when the prices of all these articles are higher in the American markets than in ours.

Mr. PLUMB. If that argument means anything it means that we have not protection enough.

Mr. CHARLTON. In every article which can be enumerated, grain, butter, cheese, and other produce the prices are higher in the American markets than in the corresponding markets in Canada; they have been so for months and even years previous.

Mr. PLUMB. If the argument means anything, it is that we have not now enough protection.

Mr. CHARLTON. It means that there is no danger of American grain being brought into this market to depress prices here. That argument means that the idea of preventing produce being sent from a high-priced market to a low-priced market is an absurdity and a fraud. It means that hon. gentlemen opposite have been palming off on the country one of the greatest humbugs ever palmed off on the public. I repeat that the American farmers and the Canadian farmers have been made the victims of a fraud, through the promise that the imposition of duties on grain would raise the prices in either of those countries, when both of those countries have vast surpluses to export. How absurd it is to suppose that in the United States, of whose wheat crop 36 per cent. was exported last year, a duty on wheat would raise the price in that country. The Canadian farmers now clearly see that such a duty does them no good.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at 6 o'clock I was just upon the point of entering briefly into the consideration of the coal question, and I shall only touch upon that matter. It is said that the Oracles of ancient Greece, when giving utterance to their announcements, felt that they were imposing upon the public credibility. This feeling made them laugh in their sleeves, and in fact two augers could not meet each other without indulging in a hearty laugh at the remembrance of the sells they had palmed off on a confiding public. I thought of that circumstance when the hon. Minister of Finance gradually broke the ground for the good news we were to receive, by telling us he thought the consumer in Ontario did not pay all the duty on coal, but that, at least, one half of that duty was paid by the American coal merchant. Having thus broken the ground for the reception of the good news, the hon. Minister of Railways proceeded to inform us that not only was that true but in point of fact the news was better than that, and that the American coal dealer paid all the duty. It reminded me of a story of an old African in the palmy days of American slavery. In driving his master's oxen he met with a misfortune one day. The team ran down a hill over a precipice, and the waggon was smashed and both oxen were killed. Cæsar, in revolving in his mind how it would be best to break the news to his master, concluded he would break it gradually. So he came in and he says: "Massa, the waggon am broke." Well, the master thought that was bad. Then, the darkey says again: "Massa, the nigh ox am killed." Well, that somewhat excited the master. After a pause, he says again: "Massa, the off ox am killed, too." "Well," said the master, "you rascal, why did you not tell me this all at once?" "I was afraid, Massa," said Cæsar, "that if I told you all at once you could not bore it." So the hon. Minister of Finance prepared us gradually for the reception of the full measure of blessing we receive under this duty. I shall not enter at length into a discussion of this question, but I propose to read a letter from a gentleman, a very high authority, a gentleman who, some years ago, was employed by the Treasury Department of the United States, to write a report for that year on the trade relations between Canada and that country, a gentleman who has been at the head of the editorial staff of a prominent daily newspaper for several years, and who is an authority of some repute. Knowing this gentleman's familiarity with trade affairs, I wrote him the day following that on which the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways was made. His reply is dated Buffalo, 5th March. I may say that Buffalo is a great entrepot for anthracite coal. Buffalo is the point from which immense shipments are made by the lake vessels, and the great coal companies have enormous quantities in Buffalo, and a very large amount of coal is kept constantly in stock there. The letter is as follows:—

"MY DEAR SIR,—I have seen Mr. Underhill, one of the representatives here of the great coal companies here, and he assures me that there is no kind of a rebate, in any form or under any name, given on coal going to Canada. He says the duty is one element of the Canadian price, which is just as distinctly calculated by the dealers there as the freight is. He expects, in a few days, to meet the general Canadian agent of their association, and promises that he will get from him a memorandum of facts, to be put in your hands. Meantime I enclose circulars Buffalo prices (wholesale) for the past year. The prices given in the October circular are still prevailing. The difference between price free on board vessel 'and to dealers on board cars, at Buffalo and the bridges,' going into or through Canada—is simply the cost of transfer from car to vessel, and includes no rebate. I will send you what further information I can gather as soon as possible.

"Sincerely yours,

"J. N. LARNED."

"Mr. JOHN CHARLTON, M.P.,
"Ottawa."

This, then, is the declaration of the agent of coal companies in Buffalo, and it is fairly contradictory to the declaration made by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways. I now propose to deal with one or two points raised by the hon. the Minister of Railways in the course of his speech; and I must say I have a sincere admiration for the hardihood, the unbounded hardihood, of that hon. gentleman. I really think that in the course of debate he warms up, and he is something in the condition of a rider in a steeple chase, who gets so excited in that ride that he has only a hazy recollection of the way he scaled the hedges and leaped the ditches in the course of his ride. I am inclined to believe that the hon. Minister of Railways, warming up to the subject and launching out so freely and making assertions so palpably absurd, must have lost his head and lost sight of what he intended to say. On this occasion he said that there really was no choice in 1878 between adopting the National Policy and resorting to direct taxation. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do candidly say that I never heard a more absurd assertion made on the floor of this House than that is. Let us examine into it for a moment. I showed before recess that to provide for the expenditures on the scale on which they stood in 1878; to provide for the deficit that existed in that year, and to provide for the additional annual expenditure of $1,500,000—which would be an ample increase—we would require an increase of $2,620,000 upon the revenue of that year which amounted to $12,975,000. Now, Sir, are we to believe that it would have been impossible to secure that additional revenue after the revival came, or that there could not have been a revival and an increase of revenue on the scale of duties levied under the old Tariff to meet that increased expenditure. If it was impossible to realize that amount then some change would require to be made—perhaps some slight addition in the revenue duties, but even then it was not necessary to resort to a policy such as was inaugurated by hon. gentlemen. But I think I can show, to the satisfaction of this House and of the country, that it is within the limits of reasonable expectation to suppose that the revival in trade would have produced, under the scale of duties imposed by the old Tariff, an additional revenue sufficiently great to meet this necessary addition to our expenses. That addition would have been, in round numbers, 20½ per cent. on the Customs duties of 1878. If we look to the United States, a country similarly situated to ourselves, and examine the increase in the Customs duties in that country consequent on the revival of trade, I think we shall be satisfied that the revival here would produce an ample amount. I find from the returns of that country that, in 1878, the American revenue was $130,000,000 in Customs. I find that, in 1881, that revenue had increased—without a solitary change in the Tariff, without a change in the minutest particular, but solely in consequence of the revival of trade in that country—from $138,000,000 to $198,000,000; that in four years the revenue of the United States, without any change in the Tariff, had increased 52 per cent. That being the case, I would ask is it unreasonable to suppose that the revival in trade here would not have produced an increase in revenue at least two-fifths as great as in the United States. I hold that the supposition is not unreasonable. I hold that it is morally certain that if the Cartwright Tariff had continued in force until last year it would have produced more than $2,600,000 more than in 1878, and if that can be shown then the assertion of the hon. Minister of Railways that there was no choice between the National Policy and direct taxation in 1878 is an utter and unmitigated absurdity as it undoubtedly and positively is. The hon. gentleman then went on to speculate a little and theorize on the increase of our public debt, and he told us that if we sold our lands at $1 per acre we would reduce the debt $100,000,000. The hon. gentleman has no doubt heard of the old lady's calculations as to how many chickens a certain number of eggs would produce, and how many more chickens would be produced when the eggs which these laid were hatched, and the arithmetical proportion of increase; but a great many slips occur between the cup and the lip. The old lady did not realize her expectations, and I am afraid the hon. Minister of Railways will never realize his expectations in reference to the revenue to be derived from the prospective sale of public lands. I wish to direct his attention very briefly to certain statistics in regard to the American public lands. They had a great public domain like ourselves. They have sold large quantities of land; millions and tens of millions have settled upon them. They are now a nation of 50,000,000 of people, and if we can expect to reduce our debt $100,000,000 by the sale of lands, what might we reasonably suppose that country has derived in nearly a century from the sale of its public domain. I see by the returns of the sales of lands in the United States, from 1796 to 1881, that they realized $207,000,000—certainly a very large sum. But I see that the expenses of the land department for that period—and the statement does not include the expenses of the general Land Office up to 1852, which would be many millions—were $74,366,000, and that the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, from 1796 to 1881—almost one round century—amounted to $133,000,000, an average amount of $1,550,000 a year. That sum represents interest at 4 per cent. on $38,777,000. That sum stands the United States only in an amount of $38,770,000 capitalized; and in the face of these figures how absurd is the assertion of the hon. gentleman with regard to the revenue likely to be derived from the sale of lands in the Canadian North-West. Then the hon. gentleman makes another assertion, and, of course, he does it on the theory I propounded a few minutes ago, viz., that if the hon. gentleman was to assert that a great flood swept over the earth, and that thousands of people were destroyed, we would be told, when we came to eliminate the portion springing from his own exuberant fancy, and got down to the bottom facts, that it meant only a heavy shower. He says that the farmers are now receiving higher prices than ever before. Evidently the hon. gentleman's memory is defective. He probably forgets the prices we received during the Crimean War, when we had prices nearly twice as high as to-day. His memory does not even extend back as far as 1877, when the average price of wheat for a whole year was $1.47. In January of that year it was $1.34; March, $1.47; April, $1.74; May, $1.97; July, $1.65; August, $1.40. In January of that year oats were 46 cents; March, 47½ cents; April, 46 cents; May, 52 cents; July, 46 cents; August, 41 cents. Peas were 92½ cents in May; and all grains that year were higher than they have been this year.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Why did you not have good times with such splendid prices?

Mr. CHARLTON. We were laying the foundation for the good times which the hon. gentleman is now enjoying, and which we would have enjoyed had we remained in power. We did not reap as we sowed, but we sowed and another reaped. That is all the trouble there was about it. The hon. gentleman, after this absurd statement, proceeds to make an enquiry. He enquires of this House: "If we were had in 1873, what must you have been in 1878, when the people drove you from power?" Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. gentleman has not reached that sublime height of hardihood to assert that the Reform party were driven from power in 1878 for reasons similar to those that operated in producing the downfall of his own friends in 1873. I think that the hon. gentleman will see that there is a marked difference between the circumstances of the two cases. In fact, his party can scarcely be said to have been driven from power; they left power as a debtor leaves his country, between two days; they left power as a soldier leaves the ranks and skulks in the bushes during the hours of battle. They were here one day, and when we came here the next day, we had, in the meantime, received notice that the contest would not take place, in consequence of one of the combatants being unavoidably absent. So they were not driven from power, but skulked away, not daring to meet the vote of the representatives of the people. Whatever lead to the downfall of the late Government in 1878, they could not be accused of dishonorable conduct. They were not driven from power because they betrayed a great public trust; they were not driven from power because they received money for a public charter. They were, it is true, defeated, but they were honorably defeated; they stood by their principles, and they fell on the field of battle, honorably if disastrously, and no stain rests on them such as rests on hon. gentlemen opposite, in connection with the event of 1873.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). What about stolen letters?

Mr. CHARLTON. I think that must be our hon. friend from Hastings; I failed to catch what he said, and therefore it must be lost. The hon. Minister of Railways next referred to the question of the balance of trade, and he told us in relation to this matter that England occupied a different position from that of any other country, and that what was a good thing for England was a very bad thing for any other country; he also quoted from President Grant's message of 1876, congratulating the United States on the possession at that time of a favorable balance of trade. Now Sir, it is well known to political economists that in countries situated like Canada and the United States, what is known as a favorable balance of trade is in most cases an indication of distress. Favorable balances of trade almost invariably accompany periods of commercial depression, and it is generally found that when good times follow depression, what is known as an unfavorable balance of trade occurs. And that happens to be our case. It happens, notwithstanding the position hon. gentlemen take on the subject, that Canada in the last fiscal year has an unfavorable balance of trade of \$8,000,000, exclusive of our specie reports. We find that in the United States, from 1856 to 1881, inclusive, that in seventeen of these years the country had an unfavorable balance of trade, and in nine of these years it had a favorable balance of trade. From 1856 to 1874, there were but two years when a favorable balance of trade occurred, and those two years were immediately following the commercial revulsion of 1867. England has had the balance of trade against her time out of mind. From 1861 to 1880 the balances of trade against England amounted to £2,496,000,000 sterling, or \$11,481,000,000, an average of \$574,000,000 a year of a balance of trade against that nation for every year since 1856; and yet that condition of things has not ruined her—why? Because it represents the profits of England. Mr. J. G. Mulhall, in a recent article, gives the component parts of the balance of trade for one year. He tells us that the profits on the ocean-carrying trade of that year amounted to £45,000,000, and this reminds us of the fact that the American foreign carrying trade has fallen from 89½ per cent. in 1830, to 16 ⅔ per cent. in 1881. If that state of things continues, hon. gentlemen can figure for themselves how long it will take the protective policy of the United States to obliterate this trade altogether. Mr. Mulhall also gives, as making up the balance of trade against England, the following items: Insurance, £3,500,000; interest on capital in foreign trade, £5,000,000; merchants' profit, £17,500,000; interest on foreign investments, £55,000,000; making a total of £126,000,000 of an unfavorable balance of trade, every pound of which represents England's profits. We may count on a considerable sum from our own ocean-carrying trade until the present policy obliterates it, and we may count on a profit from our merchant's trade; and with these two items, we need not be alarmed if we have a balance of trade against us. So much for the criticisms I wished to make on the points raised by the hon. Minister of Railways. Now, I wish to refer to one or two points made by the hon. member for Glengarry. That hon. gentleman asserted that the Legislature of Ontario was not warranted in discussing the National Policy. Well, Sir, I am at a loss to understand why even a country debating school should not be permitted to discuss the National Policy. A matter which may be discussed in private circles, which is discussed everywhere, is surely a legitimate subject of discussion in the Legislature of Ontario. I presume that my hon. friend, taking the position that his party does, that the Provincial Legislatures should be trampled upon, that their acts should be revised by the Governor in Council and set aside for ever, thinks it is beyond the prerogatives of the Ontario Legislature to discuss anything pertaining to Dominion politics. The hon. gentleman says, speaking of us, that our friends have not got a policy, and are disappointed if anyone else has. Well, I think before this Session closes the Reform party will be able to demonstrate that they have a very well defined policy. I think the lines of its policy will be set pretty clearly before the country, and will be such as will challenge the approval of all right thinking men. In treating of the question of the rates of duties, I wish to lay before you one feature of the question which is generally overlooked. When we speak of a 20 or 25 per cent. duty, it is thought that the price of the article is increased by 20 or 25 per cent., or whatever the duty may be. Such is not a fair statement of the case; we should add to the duty the wholesale dealers' profit. If a wholesale dealer imports \$100 worth of goods, and pays \$20 duty on them he charges a profit of say 10 per cent., not only on the cost of the goods but on the duty as well; then the retail dealer charges 25 per cent., if that is his profit, not on the \$100 or on the \$120, but on the first cost, the duty, and the wholesale dealer's profit together, amounting to \$132. He charges 25 per cent. upon \$132, the cost to him of the article, and I have made up a table here, Sir, which shows what the ultimate cost to the consumer is, assuming that the wholesale profit is 10 per cent. and the retail profit 25 per cent. I find, Sir, by working it out, that a duty of 20 per cent. means an increased cost of $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to the consumer, that a duty of 30 per cent. means an increased cost of $41\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., that a duty of 40 per cent. means an increased cost of 55 per cent., that a duty of 50 per cent. means an increased cost of $68\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., that a duty of 60 per cent. means an increased cost of $82\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., that a duty of 70 per cent. means an increased cost of $96\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., while a duty of 75 per cent. means the doubling of the cost to the consumer, increasing its cost, as it does, $103\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. So that, Sir, the injury inflicted upon the consumer by the policy of unnecessarily large duties is not to be measured by the amount of duty, but is largely in excess of the amount of duty imposed by the Government. Now, one word or two, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the question of what constitutes the character of the principle under discussion. Sir, I contend that the money levied upon the people in proportion to their ability to pay for the support of the Government is just taxation.

But the National Policy does not do that, it does not levy its taxes upon its people in proportion to their ability to pay; on the contrary, it requires the poor man to pay more taxes in proportion to his ability than the rich man. It places a heavier duty upon the low grades of cotton and woollen fabrics, such as poor men use, than it does upon the finer and more expensive grades. It places a duty upon breadstuffs in the Maritime Provinces, and that duty bears unequally and with unjust rigor upon the poorer classes of those Provinces, as compared with the rich; it places a duty upon coal, of which the poor use more in proportion to their means than do the rich. Consequently the National Policy does not equally distribute taxes among the various classes, so that each should pay in proportion to its ability. The next principle that applies to taxation is that it should be levied in such a way as to put money into the Treasury with the least loss, direct or indirect; that is not only just, but wise taxation. Now, Sir, does the National Policy fulfil this requirement? I maintain that it does not; it fails in the first requirement by levying its duties unequally. It has levied the taxes in such a way that, while it brings some $5,000,000 extra into the Treasury, yet in its operation it adds at least $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 more to the burdens of the people by their being compelled to pay enhanced prices for the domestic fabrics of the country, so that the policy fails in this requirement, and actually causes unnecessary waste. Then, Sir, these taxes are levied not for the support of the Government, but for the benefit and aggrandisement of particular classes; and therefore the taxation is neither wise nor just, but may properly be characterized as unjust, if, indeed, a stronger term should not be used. But it may be asked, does the National Policy do this? I answer, yes; for while it does not come up to the requirements I have first named, it is liable to the objection, to a great extent, of aggrandizing particular classes. We hear, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Redpath is reported to have purchased the late residence of the Empress Eugenie (Chislehurst), and, I ask, how did he make the money to buy this palatial residence? How is it that he is able to vie with the Vanderbilts, the Rothschilds, and other millionaires of Europe and America to-day? How has it been accumulated? Simply out of the taxes imposed for the benefit of himself and a few others. I claim that the National Policy is open to the objection of having produced this result in this case, and in numerous others. Now, Sir, revenue taxation is right, but if the Government must get a revenue, let that revenue be derived in such a way as will bear equitably and give such incidental protection to the industries of the country as may fairly be given. And we have seen, Mr. Speaker, that under the revenue Tariff in Canada we have had a large development of our manufacturing industries. We have seen, Sir, that under a revenue Tariff prevailing in the United States from 1846 to 1860 during that time the manufacturing industries of that country increased. I repeat that a revenue Tariff is consistent with the national wealth, progress and growth. Now, a revenue Tariff of, say 20 per cent, with raw material for manufactures admitted free would unquestionably greatly lessen the burden of the people of this country, and it would, with equal certainty, greatly stimulate the growth and manufacturing industries of this country. We should then have just such a measure of protection as this country requires and one in the interests of the manufacturers themselves, but it is unwise to force the development of manufactures, and to overcrowd the markets, it is only wise to do what is necessary to aid the operation of business, and to tend to a safe and healthy growth. There is something comical, Mr. Speaker, in the efforts made by our hon. friends opposite to attribute everything that is cheering in the present condition of the country, to the effects of the National Policy. Why, Sir, if we believe these hon. gentlemen, we will consider that the increased prices of butter and cheese are owing to it; that it has increased our population, in the face of the well known exodus; that it has increased the price of wheat, oats, barley and rye, even in the United States; that it makes the Yankee coal dealers put down the price of coal, and while it makes coal cheaper than it was before, it at the same time makes it enough dearer to enable the Nova Scotia dealer to bring his coal as far west as Coburg, when he could not formerly send it further west than Montreal. In fact, it makes coal, at the same moment, dearer and cheaper. It increases the cost of manufactures, the cost of importation, and yet the people are said to get goods cheaper than before; in fact, it produces the most opposite results, does this National Policy. Why, Sir, for the results of the five years of economical administration and economy of the people that we have had, under my hon. friend from Lambton, we are called upon to credit this wonderful National Policy. As to the short harvest of 1876; why, the recurrence of such a melancholy event as that is rendered impossible by the operation of the National Policy. For the three good harvests that succeeded that short harvest, we must again give credit to the National Policy, and for the two bad harvests in England that policy must also be thanked, as the result was a greater demand for our productions. Our National Policy has also brought about the resumption of specie payment in the United States, and the revival of business there—so far reaching are its effects. For the effect of the revival of trade in the United States by which our lumber trade has obtained such increased profits, credit to the National Policy; for a bountiful Providence and for all the merciful dealings of a just and gracious God, credit to the National Policy. If you wish to find the grand first cause upon which all human events depend, for the great pivotal point upon which all interests of nations, all interests of individuals, all interests of commerce and trade rest, all the world over, put your finger on the Canadian National Policy and you have it. Mr. Speaker, the Reform party will not assume the responsibility for certain things, either in the past or in the future. They do not propose to assume the responsibility for drought, plague, potatoe rot, the potatoe bug, short crops and matters of that kind. They distinctly and emphatically disclaim all responsibility for these things now, in the past as in the future. There are certain things which the Reform party will not claim to be able to do; it will not claim to be able to avert events which are overruling Providence has fore-ordained shall come to pass. Whatever God decrees in human affairs the Reform party professes to believe will come to pass, and it does not and will not profess to have the ability or power to avert any of these events. But there are many things which it will be able to do; it promises to have sympathy now and in the future for every move made in the direction of human progress. It promises further to give to this country a policy which will give just and equal taxation, and at the same time lead to a rapid and healthy development of all the interests especially the manufacturing interests of this country. It promises to call a halt in this sweeping tide of public expenditure, which threatens to engulf the country in financial ruin. It promises to adopt, as a matter of parliamentary policy, the assumption that the public debt is large enough, and should not be permitted to exceed reasonable limits. It promises to pay due regard to provincial rights, and prevent the Federal power trespassing on the rights of the Provinces in this Dominion. It promises to adopt a land policy for this country with regard to the disposal of that vast public domain in the North-West, which is to be the home of future millions—a policy conceived in the interests of the masses, in the interests of the men who will till that soil, and not in the interests of that horde of speculators who throng to that country, and desire to win millions out of the sweat and toil of those who will be called upon to pay the vast profits they expect to make from lands the settler will be compelled to buy from them. And, Sir, the Reform party promises this country honest administration. It promises an end to those contract scandals at the head of which stands the Pacific Railway Syndicate bargain, a disgrace to this country; and not far distant from which stands the Onderdonk contract. It promises to remedy these things, and it promises to place the affairs of this country in the hands of a leader who is temperate, honest and capable; a man of the highest personal character; a man who, without rank or the flummery of titles, is recognized as a prince among his fellow-men.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk). The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was very witty at the expense of the hon. member for Niagara. He said he could look back and remember when the hon. gentleman was not so loyal as he was when speaking of our Sovereign the other night. He might look back a very few years when he himself was not so super-loyal as he is now, when he ridiculed the volunteers of this country for going out to defend it. He said the hon. member for Niagara could look back to the time when he was a democrat and a free trader, and now he is a protectionist. The hon. member for Norfolk might look back to a period not so far remote as that—only the other day—when he was a republican and a protectionist. Why, let him look back at his own history. He speaks of inconsistency. Trace his own inconsistencies, and they are numerous. He was like a chameleon in the rapidity with which he changed his political opinion, indeed he might be called a chameleon politician. The hon. gentleman was great upon statistics; he is marvellous as a compiler of statistics; he is great as a manipulator of figures. Give him figures and he will prove anything, even that white is black, and black no color at all. The hon. gentleman was fond of dealing in hard words, and spoke of the audacity of the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Railways. If you were to take away his own audacity and his figures, there would be very little left. The hon. gentleman has said that he was a protectionist and always was a protectionist. That is true. He declared that 17½ per cent. was enough, yet he advocated 20 per cent. But if 17½ per cent. was sufficient, why did he deliver that great speech in favor of protection? It was not a necessity. No one calculated to do away with the 17½ per cent. Tariff, which had been in existence two years before he made the speech. Then, again, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to say—I suppose he judges other men by himself—that if the late Government had proposed an increase, their opponents were prepared to denounce them and come out as free traders. As regards the boundary question, I remember that, in 1872, the hon. gentleman travelled through his own constituency and mine, and what did he say with respect to the land which is now of such immense value? He declared that the whole of the lands on the north shore of Lake Superior were worthless and would not pay to occupy; but now, because he seeks, if possible, to embroil the Ontario and Dominion Governments, he places a high value on them, saying that the people of Ontario are being robbed of their rights and of valuable land. The hon. gentleman proceeded to account for the depression in the United States by ascribing it to inflation. Evidently, he has inflation on the brain, and he can never have given the subject a moment's thought. When did the depression begin, was it at the time of inflation? No, it was long afterwards. I heard an anecdote the other day, and, although I am not good at telling anecdotes, I will relate it for his benefit. This is the anecdote I wish to tell in illustration of my point: two boys were attending school, and one of them had an india-rubber band, which he showed to his neighbor. The little fellow said: "Come, tell me what is that?" The other replied: "It is an india-rubber band and I will show you the use of it; you catch hold of it in your teeth," when the other took it as bidden. The other boy then pulled it out and let it go when at its full length. Now that is an illustration of expansion and contraction? The expansion in the United States did no harm, but it was the contraction that produced the bad effect.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). It hit them in the mouth.

Mr. WALLACE. Another of the hon. gentleman's propositions I am glad to be able to agree with. I am glad to be able to agree with him sometimes; it was this: that Canada had good reason for thankfulness. While I agree with that proposition, I differ with him as to the cause. I believe that Canada has great reason for thankfulness in having got rid of the imbeciles on that side of the House, who brought ruin and distress on the country—who were the flies on the wheel. Then, again, he said that the manufacturers would prosper under a 15 per cent. Tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite lacked one thing when in office; they could not take a wise and comprehensive view of the situation. When that Tariff was in existence we had a much better protection than any Tariff could give—namely, higher wages for labor in the United States than existed in Canada. But when the depression overtook the Republic—when labor fell to a lower point than in this country—they sailed into Canada with their goods at slaughter prices, and destroyed our manufactures that had been established, and that were prospering before that state of things commenced. The hon. gentleman also told us in one breath that the manufacturers of Canada are not prospering, and in the other that they are making too much money by robbing and ruining the people. The two things cannot be true; one or the other must be false. Then, again, when speaking of the imports of cotton, they were much larger in 1881 than in 1878. But he forgot to tell us that in the first year we only imported the raw cotton to the extent of $7,250,000, and in the latter over $16,000,000 in the same material. Furthermore, he said that the manufacturing industries of this country have decreased, as shown by the exports—Why? Because we are not exporting as much as in former times, and the reason is obvious, because there is nothing to export. The manufacturers sell all they make in this country; and they are better employed, working longer time, and turning out more goods than when they exported largely. But there was one industry referred to as not flourishing now as when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and that was the export of rags. Well, I admit that the late Government was an instance of a signal success in the manufacture of rags; their do-nothing policy brought a great many people to beggary and rags, and the reason why the people had none to export was that they had to wear them themselves. I am happy to say that the people of this country now have rags to export, because they can wear good clothes. Then, again, when I heard the hon. gentleman talking about the farmers of the United States paying hundreds of millions, for the encouragement of manufactures, as he said for a home market, that did no good, I bethought me what a set of fools the people of the United States must be, and what a loss they sustained when they did not keep that prince of political economists in that country, that Solon, to tell them how to manage their own affairs. They ought to send for him, because he knows more than those 50,000,000 of people how their country ought to be governed. The hon. gentleman also asked what is the result of the National Policy? First of all, he replied, it extorted $5,000,000 of taxation; and it took $8,000,000 from the people for the pockets of the manufacturers. Does it stay there? Is it not sent out again to employ labor and make the people prosperous, by furnishing more abundant and remunerative employment. He also asserts that the manufacturers are not making money, and that he wishes to make them more prosperous by a Tariff of 20 per cent. and removing the duty on raw materials, in order to give them a better opportunity of enriching themselves at the expense of the consumers of this country, for whom at other times he professes so much sympathy. The hon. gentleman also dealt with the coal question, which I wish the hon. gentlemen opposite to think for a little. I lay it down as a principle that I think cannot be gainsaid, that the duty on an imported article that meets with home competition is paid by a foreign producer or exporter. For instance, a Canadian importer is nothing more or less than a salesman for a foreign manufacturer, and it is as the importer of the foreign goods that he pays the duty. I lay it down as a rule then that, where home competition obtains, the duty on the imported article has to be paid by the owner or producer. Now, as regards United States coal as an article of fuel that comes in competition with the coal of Nova Scotia, and with the wood of Ontario, or old Canada generally. What is the effect of the quantity? The quantity regulates the selling price or marketable value of a commodity. I find that by looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns that we imported to this country over 1,000,000 tons of coal. I ask hon. gentlemen what effect the introduction of that 1,000,000 tons has had upon the fuel market of Canada? Is the tendency of the importation of that article not to reduce its price? If that be true, the introduction of that 1,000,000 tons gives the Canadian consumer fuel at a cheaper rate; if it has any effect at all. Then to get into the market the coal has to pay a duty of 50 cents a ton, which duty has to be paid by the coal miner, or by his agent, before it can be used in Canada. Therefore he has to pay $500,000 of duty, and the result of his bringing his coal into this country is, I repeat, to give the Canadian consumer fuel at a cheaper rate than otherwise. I believe this view cannot be gainsaid. I think there can be no doubt that an American coal miner pays the duty on coal.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Then put $1 a ton on it.

Mr. WALLACE. An article may be sold, for a short time, below the cost of production, but it will not be for long. It may be said that, if the American coal miner had not to pay the duty, he could sell that coal so much cheaper. It is true, but would he? The principle you hon. gentlemen recognize is this: that to sell in the dearest market, the American coal miner sells coal at the highest possible profit, and he would not reduce it in price if he met with no competition in this market. As far as competition is concerned, the 1,000,000 tons is the quantity that makes the competition, and, if he has a duty to pay to get that in, he can sell it for no more than he would have to sell it if he had no duty to pay. That is all I will say of the coal question. Then, I say, the hon. gentlemen on the other side are guilty of a fallacy in reference to the grain trade. It is an almost universally recognized maxim that the Liverpool market regulates the price of grain. I say it does not. I say that the people of this continent, being 50,000,000, as against the smaller number in Great Britain, and being, consequently, larger consumers of breadstuffs, they have more influence in regulating the price of breadstuffs than the people of Great Britain. The quantity again comes in, or the law of supply and demand, and the markets of the world regulate the price. But I will ask the hon. gentleman how the Canadian farmer could avail himself of the English market if he had no competition. I would ask him how he could avail himself of the markets of the United States. He could not take his grain there to sell it because in taking it there he would have a duty to pay. He could not send it there to sell it himself, he would have to employ an agent; and no Canadian farmer is interested in a market further away from him than he can carry his produce to market himself, or than he can send it and go to look after the selling of it. Unless he can do one or the other of these things he is bound to sell in the nearest market to himself. It would not matter to him what the market price was in Montreal, or New York, or Liverpool, it is the market in which he is to sell that regulates the price he will get for his grain; and it is the home competition that the Canadian farmer has to consider to get the highest price. We say that the National Policy has established a greater home market than we had before; and this cannot be otherwise than true, because we are manufacturing more goods than we did before, and unless we have towns and cities and villages, we cannot have a home market for the produce of the farm. Every hon. gentleman knows that it is impossible to have towns and cities if you have nothing but farmers in the country; unless you have manufacturing going on there is no possibility of having an urban population in this country. The hon. gentleman, in referring to some of the industries that were said to have been started under the auspices of the National Policy, referred to the Redpath Sugar Refinery. He said that was an old industry that was not started under the National Policy. It is true it was an old industry, but gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, by their bad legislation, had destroyed that industry, and the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, by their better legislation, called it into existence again. Is that not equivalent to establishing a new industry. He also said that some of the industries that were characterized as not new ones, are new ones, and are due to the National Policy entirely. Among these is the Heintzman Piano Factory. He said that was not a new one, but I am informed that it was started in 1830. Then he referred to the Toronto Bolt and Nut Factory. That is another industry that was killed under the government of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and was revived under the present Government. Childs & Charlsworth's Shoe Factory was established in 1881. The Barter Manufacturing Co., the hon. gentleman admitted was started since, but he said it was not due to the National Policy. The St. John Nut and Bolt Factory is another one. But I was informed that the manager of the institution stated that it was due solely to the National Policy. These are some of the industries he referred to as not having been benefited by the National Policy; but, from the information I have, there is no doubt they were all new industries, or were revived under the National Policy. Now I come to the revenue Tariff that these hon. gentlemen speak so much about. I would like some hon. gentlemen to define what they mean when they talk of a revenue Tariff. Is it a Tariff that will raise revenue? If it is, then I apprehend they will have to admit that the Tariff of the hon. Minister of Finance is an immense success, because it has raised revenue sufficient, not only to meet the expenditure of the country, but he has a surplus of over $4,000,000. But, oh! says the gentlemen, you have unjustly taxed the people, you have raised more money than was needed. Well, Sir, I think it is a good fault to have too much money. It is a far better position than these hon. gentlemen were in when they occupied the Treasury benches. I think the hon. the Minister of Finance levied, at one time, duties that he said would raise $3,000,000, at another time, that would raise $500,000, yet they had not enough revenue, although they had a revenue Tariff, and they had to come down to this House, year after year, announce a deficit, proving clearly that their Tariff was not a revenue Tariff. But my hon. friend the hon. the Minister of Finance has a revenue of over $4,000,000 too much. They say this is a bad thing, but I think it is rather a good thing to have too much money. Is it not in the interests of the people, is it not a prouder position for the hon. the Finance Minister to be in, to be able to say: "I am not disappointed; the country has been so much more prosperous than I anticipated, it rose from its depression so much sooner than I expected, that instead of having, as I estimated, a surplus of $1,500,000 or $2,000,000, we have a surplus of $4,000,000," and then having that surplus he is able to say: "I will take off the duties on teas, on coffee, on some other things; I will reduce the taxation, and keep up the revenue still, and also reduce the debt." I think the people of this country, at the present moment, are not suffering from taxation. You hear no man complain: they are all willing to pay the taxes. And why? Because they have more employment and better wages, and have more means to pay with. I am inclined to think it would have been as wise to retain the duties and still further to have reduced the debt of this country, but my hon. friends do not always agree with me, and I have got to submit to what they do. Again, these hon. gentlemen say that the old Tariff would, under the improved trade of the country, have raised sufficient revenue. Well, I cannot understand upon what ground they say so. I take up the Trade and Navigation Returns, and what do I find? I find that the imports of goods entered for consumption, in 1877, were $96,000,000 and upwards, yet that did not raise revenue enough. I find the goods entered for consumption, in 1881, were only $91,000,000. Well, if the $96,000,000 of imports, in 1877, could not raise revenue enough, I would like to know how, under the same Tariff, $91,000,000 of imports could have raised sufficient revenue? Then, again, we hear much of imports and exports. Well, in my opinion, neither give unerring evidence of the prosperity of a country. A people may be importing goods they cannot pay for. They may be enjoying a present pleasure at great future pain. They may be getting themselves into trouble by importing too largely. And, again, a people may be importing goods and keeping their own workmen standing idle, and the idle people would be a tax upon the industrious to support them, and it would not be in the interest of the country, perhaps, to have too much importation. And, again, I do not think that exports are evidence altogether of prosperity. I have read that the people of India exported rice and wheat when numbers of their own people were dying of hunger. Every man knows, who knows anything, that the people of Ireland have to export the pigs or the butter that their families should consume to pay the rent, but will any man say that the export, under such a condition of things as this, would be evidence of the prosperity of the country? The true test of the prosperity of a country is the comfort enjoyed by the masses of its people, and will the hon. gentleman, or any one of his friends, dare to say that the people of this country are not at this moment infinitely more prosperous, that they have not more comforts than they had when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power? But these hon. gentlemen say this state of things is not due to the National Policy, but to the increased exports and the better crops. Is this true? If, as they say, the increased exports are the sole cause of the prosperity of this country to-day, then, by a parity of reasoning, the increased exports at other periods should have produced prosperity also. Let us see if that is true. I look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find that for the three years ending 30th June, 1873, the total exports of the products of this country were $200,053,380; while for the three years ending the 30th of June, 1876, they were $218,943,037. Will any man say that the country was as prosperous in the three last-named years as in the three first? If it be true that increased exports are the cause, and the sole cause, of prosperity, why does not the same cause provide the same result in every case? Then take the three years ending the 30th of June, 1878. The exports in these three years were $208,511,779, or $8,000,000 more than the three years ending June 30th, 1873? Why did not the larger exports of these years produce greater prosperity than for the three years ending on the 30th June, 1873? Then, again, they say that our prosperity is due to the products of the farm, but what do I find on looking at these returns? I find that we exported of animals and their produce, and agricultural products, for the three years ending on the 30th June, 1873, they were $77,469,233, as against $98,885,496 for the three years ending on the 30th June, 1876. Why, I ask, did not the better crops, the larger crops as evidenced by the larger exports, make the country more prosperous and give us better times than for the three years' ending in 1873. But, Sir, these hon. gentlemen are impious. They dare to charge Providence with their own imbecility. They say the depression was due to the failure of the crops, when it was due to their own bad management, as I shall endeavor to show further on.

An hon. MEMBER. Go for them.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not go for anybody, I go for principles. Now, Sir, I shall endeavor in my own way to account for the depression which we had in this country. It is true, Sir, that if men cease to toil, if Providence fails to reward and bless their labors, there can be no prosperity, no happiness; there can only be misery, for it is only by nature and labor, which are the only two producers, that men can live and men can enjoy life. But it is equally true that men, by their own acts, can mar prosperity, destroy happiness, and create misery. Now, Sir, what it may be asked was the cause of our misery. First of all, I attribute it to the folly of a Government, which, when asked, when entreated by the people to change the policy under which they were ruining the country, lent a deaf ear to their entreaties, and paid no heed to their miseries. They said: "Wait, and things will come all right;" they said, almost as unconcernedly as Nero as he looked upon the ruins of Rome, and fiddled as it burnt: "Wait, wait and it will come all right." When they saw the industries of the country sacrificed by the introduction of goods from the United States, why did they not take hold of the question, impose a duty, and prevent that injustice being done to the Canadian people? But they did not do it; they sat and looked on, and saw ruin settling upon the country—they did nothing to avoid it. Another reason, and one of the chief reasons, in my opinion, was the action of the money-lenders of this country. What had the bankers of Canada been doing? They began gathering in the savings of the people, paying them a higher rate of interest, and lending the money to the importers, to bring in more imported goods than the country wanted, more than the people could consume. They gave money to the importers when they would not give it to other people, because they could sell them exchange, and make more money out of it, and the result was to destroy the trade of the country by bringing in imported goods, and having them sacrificed in the country, as they were. They did it in another way: they paid 6 per cent. to the people for money at deposit in the savings banks; they came in competition with the private borrower, and because they were better off they could get it on better terms, and the result was that the people had to pay exorbitant rates—sometimes 10 to 12 per cent., a rate which no man could pay—the effect being that capital was thrown out of employment, and labor being stopped, production was also stopped. I hold that the causes of the depression were two. First, the incompetency of the Government, amounting almost to imbecility; and, second, the greed of usurers. There was no necessity for this depression. There was no time in which the country had not good crops, although they say so. But the hon. gentleman went further along, and said that, in 1877, we had better crops and better prices than we have had since; but when it suited his purpose to say the other thing, he said that the depression was due to the deficiency of the crops and decreased prices. These hon. gentlemen are not consequential. They are illogical in every step. They are reasonable in nothing. Why did the country improve under this Government? First of all because of the restoration of confidence; the change of policy set capital and credit to work. On the 1st of July, 1878, as any hon. gentleman can find on looking at the bank returns, we had only a bank circulation of $16,000,000, or a little less to do the business of this country. Cannot any man see that with such a limited circulation and with a broken credit, why there was a depression? And why have we better times to-day? Because of increased confidence; because when this Government came into power they said they would try to adopt the policy to benefit the trade of this country; and the very fact they promised to try to improve matters increased confidence—just as you would help a drowning man to make an effort to save himself by promising to throw him a rope, or would make him despair by not offering to help him. The hon. gentleman also spoke of expenditure, referring specially to the controllable expenditure. It is true, I find, that last year the expenditure amounted to $7,293,361, or $751,000 more than it was in the last year of the late Government. But what was it in the second or third year of their existence? I find that, in 1876, when they had no fear of the elections before their eyes, the controllable expenditure amounted to $8,559,774, or $1,276,210 more than it was in our last year. I would like to know where the economy of these hon. gentlemen comes in. It is true, they made a saving; but what is economy? I hold that economy is a wise and judicious expenditure of money; and if we can afford it and have the money, it would be niggardly and foolish not to carry on public works for the benefit of the people; and I ask hon. gentlemen to look and see wherein the expenditure has been increased. I find that the present Government expended $125,979 on the Census more than their predecessors did in their last year; for public works, the utility of which hon. gentlemen will not pretend to deny, if we are to develop the resources of this country, $140,797 more; for Indian agents, $383,984 more—this expenditure may have prevented an Indian war which would have cost infinitely more in treasure, it may possibly have saved a large sacrifice of life; for immigration and quarantine, $70,000 more to make provision for the large immigration that was expected last year; for ocean and river service, $27,067 more; for militia service, $46,863 more; being a total increase of $795,798, or $44,000 more than the increase of the entire expenditure of last year over the entire expenditure of their last year, showing that in all other branches of the service the present Government must have economized. Hon. gentlemen speak also of the decrease in shipbuilding and the shipping trade, which they attribute to the National Policy. Now, the material used in ship building is wood, iron and rope. There is certainly no duty to be paid on timber required for this purpose; and on imported articles used in shipbuilding I believe there is a drawback which does away with all the duties upon them; so that it cannot be said that the decline in shipbuilding is due to the National Policy. Every man knows that steamers are largely superseding sailing vessels, and that wooden ships are going out of use, and, therefore, there is not so many ships built or used as in former years. Hon. gentlemen also say that this policy will destroy the foreign trade of this country. Is that true? I find, on reference to the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the tonnage of vessels entered inwards and outwards in this country, in 1878, was 12,054,890 tons, and, in 1881, 13,804,402 tons, or an increase of 1,750,000. I also find that the two smallest years of shipping in Canada were 1875 and 1876. In the first of these years the shipping amounted to only 9,900,000 tons, and in the second, 9,100,000 tons. Another evidence that the foreign trade of the country is not injured, is found in the fact that the total imports and exports, in 1878, were $173,405,484.

against $203,621,668, in 1881, showing an increase of over $30,000,000. The hon. member for Lambton, speaking the other night, said that free trade was the great principle. Well, Sir, admit that it is the great principle, and follow it out to its logical conclusion; and what is the result of universal free trade? The inevitable result of it must be that it will reduce all labor to the level of the lowest. Because it is known that the people that can live cheapest will work cheapest, and those who work cheapest will be able to sell cheapest; and what will be the result of that? It will put the people of Canada into competition with the Chinese labor, and will force them to live upon rice and nuts, as the Chinese are said to do. It will put them into competition with the serfs of Russia, who live on train oil and black bread, and can scarcely be said to have any civilization. And it would have the people of this country placed into such competitions as this. This must be the inevitable result of universal free trade. Although it may be good for the whole world, still it might not be good for each individual, and, so far as Canada is concerned, I maintain it would be of injury. I ask the hon. gentlemen if this is what they desire in this country—that the labor of this country shall be ill-paid? Why do men come to this country and expatriate themselves? It is that they may be able to do better than at home: they would never have come to be put on a worse footing than before. I want to see the laborer of Canada and every man in Canada enjoy as much of the comforts of life as the people of any other country in the world. But the hon. gentlemen opposite are aiming at reducing Canadian labor to the level of the lowest classes in Europe and the older countries of the world. Then, Sir, with regard to the cheap bread cry. Why was it raised in England? Was it for any good purpose? Was it that the laborer might have more to eat? No, Sir; it was for this reason—that they wanted people to work cheap, so as to get manufactures cheap, and by manufacturing cheaply that their employers could make themselves suppliers of the world. It was not to benefit the workingmen, or to give them more comfort; it was that they might be able to get the work done cheaper, so that they might sell more largely of their manufactures to foreign countries. We hear much about the poor man and much about workingmen. Why, Sir, sometimes it makes my blood boil to hear these remarks about workingmen; of all men the workingman is the most independent, and the one who requires least sympathy. Many of these hon. gentlemen who speak of the workingmen in this sympathizing manner, it was generally before election time and when they are trying to make political capital out of it. When elections are over they have little or no affection for the workingman. I like to see hon. gentlemen always consistent. Now, the hon. leader of the Opposition in this House, who is a Free Trader on principle, I would ask why it is that he does not apply that principle to the profession of which he is a member? Why does he not come down and say we will have no protection for the law. We will do away with the table of fees which has been made by those who sympathize with learned gentlemen of the long robe. Let us have Free Trade; but these hon. gentlemen, when that principle affects their interests, they practice Protection. These hon. gentlemen are very desirous of getting to the Treasury benches. What reasons do they put forward as a justification for putting themselves in power again? The hon. leader of the Opposition at one time announced certain ideas that he intended to follow and by which his party ought to be governed; he made a speech at Aurora, and he threw out the idea of Federation of the Empire, minority representation, and abolition of the Senate. But that hon. gentleman has been a member of the Government since that time, and now he is leader of the Opposition, yet he has not carried one or other of these schemes—reforms as he called them—into force. He said he would not belong to a party that had nothing to reform. I was not a little amused to hear my hon. friend from North Norfolk talk about the Pacific Scandal. That gentleman said that this Government was turned out for being guilty of the infamy of selling a charter and of getting money for the purpose of corrupting and bribing electors in this country. How bad these gentlemen must have been; and yet, after sending the gentlemen on the other side of the House to power, and after four or five years' experience, what did the people do? They turned them out, and brought back those men who were so guilty. What does this prove, Sir? Either that the people thought they were more corrupt, or, if they were honest, they were imbecile. They said, let us have corruption, if you will, but let us get rid of imbecility; and they turned them out. Now, Sir, I think it is about time that I was bringing my remarks to a conclusion—

Hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh! save me; I cannot undertake to speak four hours; it would kill me if I did. But I believe that we, the advocates of the National Policy are supporting an enlightened system of commerce; we are advocating a policy that will give to the poor man a just reward for his labor—at all events, that is what we aim at, and we endeavor through the Government to conduct the affairs and commerce of the country upon the maxim of live and let live. The hon. gentlemen on the opposite side are the advocates of a policy of buying in the cheapest markets and selling in the dearest. Why, Sir, what would be the result of that policy? It would be this, that it is destructive of all patriotism; those who advocate that policy have no humanity, they do not recognize the brotherhood of man, they look upon their kind as machines to be taxed, as a man out of whom you can make money by selling to him dear and buying from him cheap. It is antagonistic to right, Sir, and calculated, if it is carried out, to make every man an enemy of his fellow, to make of this earth a hell. That is practically the result of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest—the whole idea is antagonistic to that most perfect of precepts: "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you."

Mr. IRVINE. Although I do not consider I possess less courage than other men, I confess I am entirely unaccustomed to guerilla warfare. I admit that my grammar is not very good and that my arithmetic is not such that I can apply it to some of the calculations presented to this House. I have listened with a great deal of pain and some pleasure to the speeches delivered during the debate. I have listened with pain to hon. gentlemen trying to prove the most absurd propositions on record. I confess that I like a man from the Lower Provinces better than a man from Ontario; but I would like, when Maritime Province members rise to the intellectual standard of the House that they should neither deceive the people or pursue a course of absurd reasoning. It was with pain that I listened to the statement of an hon. gentleman occupying two hours in delivering, that the people of Ontario were paying less for coal because they were paying half a dollar per ton duty. My arithmetic does not answer in that particular. I shall address myself to the discussion of the National Policy. I am quite an humble man; I belong to a very small party in this House, but, if I am informed correctly, to a large party in the country; I am a practical farmer, not a gentleman farmer, who has servants near him to whom he can say "come and go," but I issue orders and I assist in executing them. I am one of those who, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, have been enriched by having taxes heaped upon them. I can speak from practical experience, and one ounce of such is worth a pound of theory such as is addressed to the House. I am pleased to say I belong to the party to which I have always belonged, the great Liberal party of Canada, which has given to this country all she possesses in the shape of liberty—religious and civil. I am glad also to think that I have a love and respect for the Old Country, and when the Liberal party of Canada and the Old Country are compared, they will be found to be very closely allied. The Liberal party in the old land is always the friend of the poor man; the Tory party, prior to Sir Robert Peel and the repeal of the corn laws, was the friend of the land monopolists. The Peelites and Liberals were friends of the poor, and in this country the Liberal party has always been a friend to the poor, while the Tories, like the Tory party in England, are supported by the monopolists. I am glad to say that I have the honor of following a leader in this House against whom, after sitting in this House a month, the worst thing that can be charged is comprised in the two words: "Speak now." I am gratified also that the man, whom I love above any other man in Canada, the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), has been followed by his opponents from Dan to Beersheeba, and the only charge ever preferred against him—and that charge never stuck to him—was that he had purchased rails, and the price had afterwards fallen. I remember very well in 1848, when I landed in New Brunswick, a boy, that the times were hard. I bound myself at £16 a year to do labor as a servant, and I have never been ashamed of it. I have heard that Andrew Johnson, when he was in the height of his glory, was asked whether he had not been a tailor, and he replied: "Yes, and I was a good tailor too; I made clothes and was a good workman." If I was a servant, I was a good servant, and the man who hired me for £16 a year was the first man to vote to send me here. Nor am I ashamed of my ancestors, for I am descended from a stock which wherever placed in the world makes its mark. Whether at Alma or the Heights of Inkerman it is always to the front. Whenever I go in Canada and come across a full-fledged Tory manufacturer, when he is defeated in argument, he turns round, whether in the social circle or market-place, and says: "You are not patriotic, where is your patriotism and loyalty?" That is the incessant cry. That was the old story and cry when our fathers were fighting for responsible Government. They too were told they were disloyal when they were abolishing Clergy Reserves and other grievances. I am glad to say, however, that reproach and cry had died out entirely in this country till lately. After the Union, we were for a short time troubled with it, owing to the want of patriotism and the tyrannical treatment of Nova Scotia by one man. If they had been properly treated there is no people more loyal. They were accused of base disloyalty, because they did not follow the beck and nod of the tyrant. Happily, till this National Policy was started, we never heard this disloyalty cry of late years. We entered the Union in good faith, expecting to be treated constitutionally; but we find to our sorrow we were not so treated. I am bound to say we have never been troubled with this foolish howl about want of loyalty and patriotism until lately—till hon. gentlemen opposite returned to power. Why do they fling this disloyalty cry across the floor? Simply for the reason, that those gentlemen who formed the coalition, including some of the men of New Brunswick that we honored—though we never liked coalitions, we were willing our representatives should assist in consolidating this country into a grand Dominion—find it to their benefit. In order to keep themselves in power they committed acts, which in the eye of the people of Canada, and according to the universal verdict of England, disgraced this country; and in order to get back into power they propounded a theory or policy which we were promised would make everybody rich—farmer, manufacturer, and all. This reminds me very much of what Barnum said when getting up a great show. He was asked what he was about, and answered: "The people of this country like to be humbugged, and I might just as well humbug them as anybody else." The Ministerial party tried this plan, and returned to power. They think they can capture the county I represent, but they are much mistaken, if we take, as a criterion of the moral sentiment of my county, its action in electing a representative. I find it stands higher than the average constituencies of Ontario which sent Ministerial supporters to Parliament to support men who were not penitent for their past political conduct.

An hon. MEMBER. The National Policy.

Mr. IRVINE. I will come to that subject soon enough, if you will keep quiet. I remember very well, from 1848. It was a very poor time when I settled in my county. We had no stimulus to trade. I remember about 1854, when the Russian War broke out, prices reached their highest figure. Hay sold at $40 a ton; oats at 80 cents a bushel, and spruce logs $13 a thousand, in St. John, a point never touched since. We had no National Policy then, however. From that time until the American Civil War broke out, we had a very poor period. But during that war the farmer received excellent prices for his products, though we had no National Policy then. Afterwards we had a poor spell again, a time of depression. What I hold is, that we have generally seasons of prosperity followed by seasons of depression the one following the other quickly. I am sorry that we had to pass through a season of depression after 1878, and I am bound to say without reference to the National Policy, that I sold farm produce lower in 1879 than since 1848, and 1879 was the first year of the present Government. Oats in Carleton then sold at 22 cents a bushel. We had the National Policy then, but of course it is said, it had not had time to bring forth fruit. But I sold hay lower in 1880—fifty tons at $5 a ton—lower than ever before. At present, notwithstanding the National Policy, we are not receiving exactly as high prices as some years ago. But I admit that my county is now very prosperous. We have lumbering, and, if a man cannot get employment on the New Brunswick side, he can cross to Maine, where there is any amount of work for man and beast. There are no idle men in the county, whatever be their occupation. If that be due to the National Policy, let its friends prove it; I do not think so. With regard to manufacturing interests in New Brunswick, they have always done well. I never knew a manufacturer to fail. We have in Woodstock two iron foundries, whose owners commenced with a little capital and are now reported wealthy. I have it from both proprietors that they were better under the old than under the present Tariff. As far as that is concerned I think it is very plain that the new arrangement has been no benefit to them. Then there is one thing in reference to the manufacturers that we always laid down in New Brunswick, and that our Government appears to have laid down—that was, that it was unwise for a new country to encourage every class of manufactures, but that only those should be encouraged which could be carried on successfully. Another principle laid down was that raw material should be allowed to come in free, so that our manufacturers could compete with others. Another point I wish to dwell upon is this: Before the Union, certain propositions were made to us that I am bound to say the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches have not fulfilled. When these propositions were made to us to enter the Union, New Brunswick was under a 12½ per cent. Tariff, and Old Canada was under a 20 per cent. Tariff, and, in order to induce us to enter the Union, they reduced it to 15 per cent. If it was for our interest to reduce the Tariff to 15 per cent. in order to induce us to enter the Union, how can it now be for our advantage to have a Tariff rising to 30 or 40 per cent.? Then I must say this—and I am sorry to say it, I blush to say it—that Canadian statesmen are not exactly the material we thought they were. It is said of English statesmen that they consider their country's honor as their own, but I am sorry to say Canadian statesmen are not so sensitive as that. If they can compass their own ends they are not so very careful of their personal honor. Another point I wish to direct attention to is, that when the statesmen of this country decided to make such a great change in the Tariff, all parties should have been consulted. I am glad to say that I have the honor to belong to a great party in this country—the farmers. It is said that four-fifths of the people of Canada are farmers, but I am sorry to say there are less than a dozen farmers in this House. You cannot walk about here without running against manufacturers. This country will soon be ruled by manufacturers and doctors and lawyers. I say, with all due deference to the occupants of the Treasury benches, that a party as influential as we are, who contribute so much to the material prosperity of Canada, who export more than half the products of Canada to the European markets and bring the money back in gold—I say we are entitled to some consideration at the hands of the Government. When they proposed this great change in our fiscal policy, did they call upon the farmers to know what changes they required? No, Sir; they promised that they would make everyone rich, and, if I am informed correctly they sent over to Uncle Sam's territory and brought over two Tariff tinkers to fix this up, and then the hon. Minister of Finance issues his circulars to all the manufacturers to come up and meet the Tariff tinkers, and arrange the Tariff so to have just what they wanted. The farmers of Canada have to purchase goods from the manufacturers; but did he ask the farmers to come up here to see whether he was giving the manufacturers' produce preference or not? No, he insulted them, openly and knowingly insulted them, and they are of poorer stuff than I think they are, if they do not resent it, they are not the material I think they are, if they do not drag the Tariff down upon the wretches' heads. No wonder hon. gentlemen laugh when I say wretches' heads; but you must always remember that I am an Irishman, and have the privilege of "speaking twice."

An hon. MEMBER. Their righteous heads.

Mr. IRVINE. Righteous heads? I do not mean such a thing as that. No, for you might as well look to Sodom for righteousness. If there were two righteous men among them they might be saved. Righteous! The whole head is sick and the whole heart faint. Righteous! The men who would—perhaps I had better stop. I am very glad I have a chance to meet these silk-stocking chaps that have been running the farmers. I am about the first farmer that has had an opportunity of stating his case here, and want to state it fairly, and I am bound to say that I think you are good-natured gentlemen. I am wonderfully pleased to think that I am just in the place where I am, for I tell you that down in my own county I had to oppose these giants; these ravenous wolves were around, and I had a serious time of it. I am bound to say that here British liberty is the ruling principle in this House. If we take the returns of Canada we will find that manufacturers succeeded much better under the Mackenzie Administration than they do now. As far as exports of manufactured goods are concerned they exported nearly, if not quite, three-quarters of a million more in 1878 than in 1881. The exportation of manufactured goods in 1878 amounted to $4,715,776, and, in 1881, to $4,042,123, so that the manufacturers made a better showing in 1878 than in 1881. But what I object to in this arrangement is, that the manufacturer has an undue advantage over the farmer. I will explain the farmer's position. He has no home market except for a limited amount of his products. In 1831, the entire exportation was $93,000,000, of which farm produce amounted to $44,000,000. The farmer is obliged to go into the broad world to dispose of his produce; he cannot do it at home. Now, I ask you if every weight should not be thrown off the farmer? I ask you, if he is to run the race successfully, should not every weight be thrown off him? But the gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches have weighed him down still more instead of taking the weights off of him. We have to go to the markets of Europe to sell our produce. There is not an implement the farmer uses on his farm, that is not heavily taxed—not one solitary implement. I will take the liberty to read the letter that was read the other day by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). It will answer my purpose as well as it did his. It is in reference to the extra duty under the present Tariff on agricultural machines over the duty under the Mackenzie Administration. The letter is as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—Yours of yesterday received asking for details of extra duties over those of 1878 in our manufactures. Below we give them to you, and they are under rather than over the mark. In the construction of our reaper we use 500 lbs. of cast iron, 50 cents; 5 lbs. malleables, additional duties 24 cents; 32 lbs. spring steel, 13 cents; 16 lbs. machinery steel, 10 cents; and say $1 worth of bolts, 25 cents; 75 lbs. wrought iron, 19 cents; 1 lb. nuts, 1 cent; paints and oils, 4 cents; varnish, 5 cents; coal, 3 cents; wire, 1 cent; knives, 20 cents; total, $1.75."

I wish to ask hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches if they think that by taxing the raw material of every implement used on the farm they can enable the farmer to work to greater advantage? Previous to this there was a tax upon the tin which the farmer used, but if it was for sealing fish or any purpose like that a rebate was allowed. I ask if the Canadian farmer can compete fairly in the race with other nations in the markets of Europe, if he has to pay more than his share of the revenue of his country? The materials of which implements are made were never taxed before, or, at all events, only to the extent of something like 5 per cent. It is said that we are opposed to the manufacturers, but we never heard that until these hon. gentlemen came into power in 1878. There is no reason why we should oppose the manufacturers. We have mutual interests with them, we sell them our products and they sell us their goods. But the farmer asks no favors from the Government, he has the common sense to know that the Government cannot give him a market, and that it is only taunting and humbugging him to tell him so. What we object to is that the Government should take the manufacturers under their particular protection, that they should put them in hot-houses so that they are afraid to come out for fear the cold blasts of winter may strike them. The farmer, they say, is able to compete in the markets of the world, but the manufacturer is not. As a farmer, I am willing to protect the manufacturer to a reasonable extent, but not to such an extent that the purchaser of his goods may not have the right to use his own judgment in purchasing goods. I do not think it necessary to give the implement manufacturers of Canada a protection of 30 per cent. I do not mean to say that the manufacturer is made of any such material that he will fold his arms and say: "I am unable to compete with the American manufacturer unless you give me the benefit of a 30 per cent. duty." At all events, if the manufacturer does say so, he is not of the stuff that Britons are made of, because, wherever you find a Briton, he says: "I am able to meet the world." We all know that it was the farmer who had much to do with making this country what it is; who went in and cleared the forest and made the wilderness blossom as the rose and drove the aborigines back, and brought our vast domain into cultivation. We know who should receive a fair kind of protection at the hands of the Government, but who have received insult upon insult and who, instead of being invited to give their opinion when the great change was made in our fiscal system, were treated with silence. I think 30 per cent. is too large a duty on agricultural implements. I think 15 per cent. should be enough and let them have the raw materials free of duty.

Mr. DOMVILLE. What would you do with the raw materials we produced? Would you leave them unprotected?

Mr. IRVINE. We will come to that by-and-bye. But I would like to know how the farmers are used. It takes the lawyers and doctors of the House to explain anything like that. One of the cries of the Government in 1878 was that Canada should be kept for the Canadians. Well, I believe they are bound to keep Canada for the manufacturers; but what is to be done to secure Canada for the Canadian farmers? Supposing that when the change was made in our fiscal system, a committee of Canadian farmers had been invited to discuss that point and say what protection should be given them. Do you think the first step they would have taken would have been to ask the Government to place a duty of 20 per cent. on horses? We exported 29,000 horses last year; would a duty of 20 per cent. upon them have put money in our pockets? Last year we exported 62,179 head of cattle, and 354,155 head of sheep. If a practical farmer had been asked to assist us, would he have placed a duty of 20 per cent. on cattle and sheep? Certainly he would not. He would have seen that we imported last year 75,000 barrels of pork; and would not a practical man have said to the Finance Minister, "We do not want you to put a duty on those things which we export, but we would like you to put a duty on the article we import, namely, pork." But he did not put a duty on that article. The 10 per cent. duty was on before Confederation. No; he insulted us first and humbugged us afterwards. Then, again, he placed 15 cents on barley and 7½ cents on corn. We export barley largely; we exported last year 8,800,519 bushels of barley and imported about 7,000,000 bushels of corn, about 3,000,000 bushels being for home consumption. The excuse he gave for putting the light duty on corn was that it was used by the brewers, and he is a great friend of the brewers. Everyone knows that a bushel of corn is worth two bushels of oats; and there has not been a year since 1879 in which oats have not ranged 4 or 5 cents a bushel higher in Maine than in New Brunswick. It is taunting and insulting the farmers, pretending that this kind of thing is any protection for them. The Finance Minister talks of retaliating against the United States. It is humiliating to hear him talk such nonsense as to say that this is any retaliation. It is all very well to talk of imbecility, but who is the imbecile? Then I come to the article of wool. The Finance Minister says we export 1,000,500 pounds of Canadian wool, and the inference naturally is that we are raising more Canadian wool than we can manufacture. But what is the fact? We import eight million pounds of foreign wool. After this Tariff was in operation a great cry was raised that foreign wool was imported by our manufacturers, to the great injury of the Canadian farmers, and he placed 3 cents a pound on wool. Yet we bring in 8,000,000 pounds of wool duty free, and we are obliged to ship 1,000,500 pounds of our native wool. Now, Sir, the farmers of Canada ask that Canada should be for the Canadians, and that you should place the farmers on an equality with the manufacturers. On the wool for a suit of woollen clothes worn by the poor man a duty has to be paid, while the wool for the clothing of the silk-stockinged fellow is allowed to come in duty free. What can we expect better from the Tories than that? They never were the friends of the poor man; they always pressed him and made him subservient to the rich; and I am sorry that a gentleman whom we took from the apothecary shop should be the enemy of the poor man.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. He was a good apothecary.

Mr. IRVINE. Now, Sir, I come to his friend Parks, of the cotton warps. There are two men in the cotton business; one man manufactures and the other purchases, and I am the purchaser of cotton. Is it not very strange that the manufacturer, who gets his raw material free of duty and his labor cheaper than it is in the United States, should want a duty of 2 cents a yard on cotton when its first cost is only 5 cents a yard? We are told that it requires 2 cents per square yard to give him protection against the United States. Well, what is the inference? It is this—I may be unparliamentary (if I am I will take it back after I say it), but it looks to me like another Hugh Allan job; as if they were hard up and wanted to raise the wind. I do not believe a Canadian manufacturer would come here and say that he required that protection to hold his own. Why, then, are we compelled to pay so much into the treasury? Well, the hon. Finance Minister explains it away; he says: cotton is as cheap now as it was in 1878, that it is sold as cheap to-day in Canada as it is, I think, in New Hampshire. But how is this? Why, I live within four miles of the American boundary, and I have as good a right to know what the retail prices of goods are as any other man in Canada. We are told that our cottons are as cheap as those of the United States markets, but I say, Sir, there is more Yankee cotton used, a large part of it smuggled into Carleton county, than there is of Canadian, and I am willing to let the statement go back to my constituents. Now, in reference to Parks' cotton warps, I will stake my reputation against that of the Finance Minister in this matter; he says, I think, that these warps are sold as cheap to-day as they can be purchased in New Hampshire, freight added. Well, what is the fact? From my own observation I know that, in 1880, the price of Parks' warp—white warp I have reference to—five pounds in weight, was, at retail in the stores there, $1.50; and the retail price of the same article, in 1881, was $1.35. Now, both in 1880 and at the present time, you can go across the line five miles and buy a better warp for $1. I pledge my honor to this fact, and the hon. Minister can ascertain it from his own party in the county. Now, Mr. Speaker, can you blame a poor man in that county if, instead of paying $1.35 out of his day's wages, he goes across the line five miles and buys American cotton for $1.00. And the difference in value in favor of the American cotton is 2 to 2½ cents per yard. Now, Sir, we come to the matter of hides. It appears, as though in 1880 and 1881, we imported $2,184,884 worth of hides—duty free. Well, I have never objected to that. I believe that we should import duty free the raw materials which we manufacture; still I am forced to fight for myself. If, as the hon. Finance Minister says, $1.75 duty upon the material that goes into a reaper makes that reaper cheaper, how, I ask, will 20 per cent. added to those hides make them dearer? I cannot reason it out and must leave it for my hon. friend opposite. The hon. Minister says that 50 cents added to coal makes it cheaper for the people of Ontario, and I would have 50 cents added to the hides that they also might be cheaper. I wish to illustrate one point with reference to machines. If my memory serves me right, I think the first mowing machine imported into the county of Carleton—it was about twenty-five years ago, and a very crude one—cost $145, and you can buy the same machine now for $65, that is $80 cheaper than the original price. This is equal to a falling off of $3 per year previous to the National Policy. But the hon. Minister of Finance—I must give him credit for it—did not say that the machine is cheaper by putting a duty upon it, but he says it is cheaper than in 1878. He also says that hats and caps are cheaper than in 1878; he says to the manufacturers—he does not say it to the men who purchase the hats—send me a letter, and the manufacturer, who, of course, is making money out of it, is quite willing to write a letter to suit him. He says hats and caps are cheaper than they were in 1878, but I venture to say they are cheaper by 15 per cent. in England than in 1878. There is so much dodging and squirming, and so much chicanery in all the arguments used by hon. gentleman opposite that I am thoroughly disgusted. I have observed with pain and a good deal of indignation that the hon. Finance Minister has tried within the last two years to make it appear that New Brunswick is paying less per capita than Ontario or Quebec or any other Province in the Dominion, a course of action which I think unworthy of the man, for he should have been the last man to have done so. But I must thank the hon. Minister of Customs, who came to the rescue. I do not think he came voluntarily. The speech of the hon. member for Brant, (Mr. Patterson) in which he pointed out that the Tariff had not fostered the export of manufactures, and that the exports last year were less than four years ago, forced him to do so. The hon. Minister was driven into a corner, and he did us involuntary justice. I will read, for the edification of the people of New Brunswick, the words used by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. The hon. Minister said:

"The hon. gentleman knows, and no one knows better, because he has given much attention to the question of export and import, that inter-provincial trade, which has grown up within the last few years, and particularly within the last five or six years, is double that which existed a few years ago. Let me give the hon. gentleman a few figures. I think they will show that whereas the exports, accepting the figures he has given, have fallen off on some thirty or forty articles, that inter-provincial trade has increased and quadrupled the total sum. Take, for instance, the returns from Nova Scotia. In 1875-76 the imports into that Province, from foreign countries, were $14,000,000. If the hon. gentleman will consult the Trade and Navigation Returns, he will find that the imports from foreign countries into that Province have decreased $5,000,000 or $6,000,000. Who have supplied those $8,000,000 worth of goods, except the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec, and the farms and dairies of this country? The same facts exist in regard to the trade of New Brunswick. If hon. members will refer to the imports from foreign countries, they will find that, seven or eight years ago, they reached $10,000,000 or $12,000,000. During last year they amounted to little more than half that sum. The hon. gentleman knows that the people of New Brunswick consume as much to-day as they did five or six years ago, that the Province is just as prosperous, and if that be the case, either the goods must be manufactured within the Province, or they were received from Ontario or other Provinces of the Dominion, which have entered largely into the production of articles formerly imported from foreign countries."

I thank the hon. Minister of Customs most heartily, and I feel uncommonly grateful to him for having done what the Finance Minister failed to do. When New Brunswick imports $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 worth of goods she pays more duty than when she imported $10,000,000. In 1873, the value of the goods entered for consumption was $10,849,763, on which a duty was paid of $1,246,138. In 1881, the value of the imports for home consumption amounted to a little over $6,000,000, while the duty reached $1,266,000. And that was done in the face of the fact that it was publicly stated there was to be no increase of the Tariff, but merely a readjustment. I will read for the edification of the House what the hon. Minister of Finance said in St. John in the campaign of 1878. Here are his words; I have taken the report from a paper, but if it is not true he can deny it—it is taken from a Tory paper and is therefore all the worse. The Finance Minister said:

"If I had been in Parliament last Session I would not have voted for increasing the duty on unenumerated articles from 15 per cent. to 17½ per cent. I am now coming to the delicate question of flour and coal, the great question on which this election is to be run. I have no hesitation in saying that if I had been in the House last Session when supporters of the Government proposed a tax on these articles, I would have voted against the motion. It is not true that Sir John A. Macdonald advocates a 35 per cent. Tariff, or any increase in the volume of taxation. The alteration of the Tariff does not mean the imposition of more duty, but merely a readjustment of the burden."

Those are the hon. gentlemen's words, and it will be remembered that he got the Accoucheur-General of New Brunswick to send a telegram on the question, and the answer he received was that there would be no increase, but a readjustment. What opinions can I entertain of such men?

Mr. IRVINE.

Take this, in connection with the fact, that when the proposition was made to increase the Tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent., the hon. Minister of Railways was reported in the Mail to have said that it was entering the thin end of the wedge of taxation. If the present Tariff did not increase the burdens, how came it that we are paying as much duty on $6,000,000 of imports, as we formerly did on $11,000,000? Truly these are model statesmen. I sincerely regret that the honor of our Canadian statesman who rule half a continent is not of more value. I want to touch on the National Policy again, which I find hard to quit. It is doubtless very productive of good, as one of the most fruitful sources of blessing to some people in this country; if they had not its help they would have nothing. This reminds me of a man in our Province who was not exactly round, or as they say in Ireland, was half-witted, who, when he saw the hon. Finance Minister spreading his hands and belauding what the National Policy had done, said: "Sir Leonard, what have you done to increase the price of spruce logs from $4 to $8?" He replied: "The prosperity is due to the National Policy;" the National Policy which made spruce logs $8 in St. John, instead of $3 or $4, in a year. We do not know half the virtues or powers of the National Policy.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Did the crowd believe him?

Mr. IRVINE. Believe him! Why, the man was half-witted who asked the question.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). And how much wit had the man who answered it?

Mr. IRVINE. You can guess by the answer. Now, coming to the question of the interests of the farmer, I remember last fall, when the Prime Minister came over from England, the Tory press loudly proclaimed that England was going back to her position before the repeal of the Corn Laws, or to adopt the Fair Trade principle. This press said that the hon. gentleman had set the heather on fire in England too, and that we should have fair trade in England as well as in Canada. But there was no great prospect of that event in England. Let us see whether the present Ministers are friends of the farmers. The fair traders in England say, they are going to pay all their taxes by putting a 20 per cent. duty on foreign wheat and a duty on lumber, too, all of which, according to this theory, must be paid by Canadians. This is the policy which the Tory press claim that our First Minister originated when in England. He not only binds down the farmer with clogs and taxes and other obstacles in Canada, but incites the English fair trade party to impose duties on our products when they arrive in England. This policy would not injure the manufacturer, for he is not obliged to go to the outside or English market, because they have the slaves in Canada to impose their goods upon whether good or bad. The English manufacturer does not pretend to sell goods cheaper than any one else, but he fears not to sell them on their merits; but the Canadian manufacturer says to the people, "You must take my goods and pay for my shoddy whether good or bad," and to the lumberman, "You must take your lumber to the English market and bring back the money to spend in such goods as Canadian shoddy." That is the freedom and liberty we are treated to. One class is to be favored, and all the others are to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for it. The cry of disloyalty in Nova Scotia and elsewhere has only lately been raised by the present Government, who have set one class against the other—the manufacturer against the farmer and the laborer. I do not think we are going to cement the bonds of union in a country stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific by any such means. We now come to another point: The National Policy was to make a home market for our produce. Speaking from memory, the Finance Minister said he had found a market for about $6,000,000 of farm produce in this market. I will not dispute that, but I think we exported $3,000,000 worth of farm produce more in 1881 than in 1880; this would show that he has not made much of a market. I must give him credit for this, however, that he has made a market in the Maritime Provinces, for six or seven millions worth more of Canada manufactures than formerly. He also made a market for the market gardeners of Ontario, and especially for the men of a place called Gananoque. I wish to read his own words on this subject, for I am afraid that the people of New Brunswick would not see them except through me. This is one of the nicest productions I have seen, and it will add much to the literature of the Lower Provinces. The hon. gentleman spoke thus, as I see by the official report:

"Let us see now if these leading articles which he is consuming are no higher than before, and in many cases they are less than before, what benefit he has in addition to the lower prices. In my judgment the farmer is as greatly interested in this Tariff as any other class of men in the Dominion. In the first place, he has the home market. An hon. member opposite referred to the home market last Session, I think, stating that it was of very little importance. Visit any section of the Dominion, put yourself in communication with a farmer, especially in the different towns where manufacturing industries have been established and are increasing, and ask them if they are deriving no advantage. Why, Sir, under the operations of this Tariff, for the vegetables, the fruit, the poultry, the lamb and veal, and other meats, the butter, the cheese, for almost everything they offer for sale, they obtain higher prices on account of the home market, than is obtained in localities where they have to sell to the middleman and ship to another market. Now, Sir, in conversation with some of those gentlemen, I found that, in 1878—I speak more especially of a conversation I had with some farmers not a hundred miles distant, in the active and energetic manufacturing town of Gananoque—I ascertained that they frequently came to market with their vegetables, would stand there all day, and, not being able to get a price which would be an object to them, would drive home and wait for another opportunity, frequently being compelled to return and take what was offered. "How is it now?" I said. They returned: "There is no difficulty now. We sell everything we bring in for cash, at better prices." Why? Because in that locality everything is in an active and flourishing state. Manufactories have increased, the number of the employed has increased, and their wages have increased. They have plenty of money with which to buy perishable produce—I speak particularly of perishable goods which cannot be sent to a distant market."

That is the market we receive for the $6,000,000 worth of goods manufactured in old Canada, and an excellent market it is. It is a great compensation. But there is another thing that I would like to say in behalf of New Brunswick, and that is in reference to the flour business. If the people of Ontario believe the statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways that 50 cts. a ton duty on coal makes the coal cheaper, we are willing to let the duty remain. Seeing we are purchasing $6,000,000 worth of manufactured goods from Ontario, it might be well for you, seeing that the duty on coal does not affect you, that you should abolish the duty on flour. We are willing to let it remain on coal, owing to the convincing argument of the Minister of Railways, and you would do well to leave it there. But I think that seeing the hon. Minister of Finance himself made the statement, it would be just as well in the interest of the coasting trade of the Maritime Provinces, to abolish the duty on flour. Well, I am about to finish, and I dare say the House is very glad of it. When I get home to my own people they will ask me: What is doing up there now? What is the news? In reply I shall have to commence something after this fashion: "You did a great deal for a man in New Brunswick. You took him up and made a man of him, and he is now, I believe, like some of the rest of his colleagues, a belted knight. When we entered into the Union he stated that $2.68 per head from the Dominion Government annually would be sufficient for 25 years, and that sum has already been doubled. After promising a market to the farmers of Canada, according to his own words, he has simply made a market for the gardeners of Gananoque." In addition to that I would tell the people: You know that on every platform in Central New Brunswick he went round telling you that the Intercolonial Railway was coming right down the valley of the St. John. The hon. gentleman had been from one place to another making these promises. A gentleman put him a poetical question. He says, mentioning him by name, though I believe it is unparliamentary to mention names here—but he said:

"Come, Tilley, stop your puffing and blowing,
And tell us where the railroad is going."

That hon. gentleman told the people who made a man of him that that railway would be built by the Valley of St. John, and if it was not that he would resign. He wrote his resignation, and put it in his pocket, and he kept it in his pocket, he kept it in his pocket, and he kept it in his pocket, and at last, Mr. Speaker, he took it out of his pocket, and they say that when he took it out of his pocket he put it into the spittoon like the man he was. I believe there is an hon. gentleman here—they say he is the hon. member for Halton, I am speaking from memory now—who told the people in St. John shortly afterwards that these Tories built the road and throw $8,000,000 into the sea, and what was that for? It was to keep the Province of Quebec in the traces. But the hon. member that they made a man of, put his resignation just where he intended it, and he kept it there. When I go home again I will tell them in addition to that, that he said "if I had been in Parliament in 1878, I should not have voted for the duty on flour or coal." And I will tell them that the hon. Finance Minister, and the Prime Minister too, declared that in changing the fiscal system of the country, there would be no increase but a readjustment; but that, nevertheless, under that readjustment we are paying as much duty on $6,000,000 that we import now as on $11,000,000 under the old Tariff, besides paying tribute on $6,000,000 western of manufactures. By-and-bye, they will be so proud of the giant, that they will not know how to contain themselves, and they will wonder what sort of a man this is that can adapt himself to every circumstance. Why, these men, if they were out of power to-morrow, there is not a pledge they would not make to get back to power. There is nothing they would not do to get into power. Just think of it! If I am correctly informed, there is a smooth-faced gentleman over there, whose garments smell with a bribe of $32,000. If that is unparliamentary, I will take it back. Some hon. gentlemen surrounding me seem to think it is. The last observation I made had better perhaps not have been made; I do not know but my hon. friends are right, because they do not wish to throw mud, and I object to that myself. But perhaps it is just as well I had not said it. However, Mr. Speaker, it is said. But I suppose it is quite enough for me to tell the good this Minister of Finance has done to the Province of New Brunswick when I go back. I desire to say what the gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches have done for the farmers. They have not placed them on an equal footing with the manufacturers. We do not object to protection, provided we are not taxed too much to pay for our manufactured goods. We are willing our manufacturers should have a reasonable protection—not 35 or 40 per cent. We are willing to buy their goods and to unite with them in the work of building up a great country. I have said that under the present Tariff arrangements we have not received justice at the hands of the Government. I have only to conclude by thanking the House for the kindness with which they have received my remarks. This is the first occasion on which I have attempted to address the House, and, if it is the last, I am thankful for the opportunity thus afforded me.

Mr. GIGAULT. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has spoken in glowing terms of the Liberal party and their policy. He claims to be an honest farmer. I think he should not content himself with being an honest man; he should study a little of the political history of Canada. I would like to ask the hon. member for Carleton, N. B. (Mr. Irvine) what has the Liberal party done for Canada? I would ask our opponents what measures they have adopted to improve the material welfare of the country? None. The members of the Liberal party who sit in this House have always opposed measures which have been advanced to promote the best interests of Canada. They opposed the building of the Grand Trunk Railway; the erection of the Victoria Bridge; they opposed Confederation—

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh.

Mr. GIGAULT. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the Liberals of the Province of Quebec opposed Confederation. They opposed, also, the building of the Intercolonial Railway, and they are opposing the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is very ridiculous on the part of the Liberal members of this House to pretend to be the successors of Baldwin and Lafontaine, as they often say they are at public meetings and even in this Parliament. Do they forget that Baldwin was defeated by one Hartmann, a clear Grit? Do they forget that Lafontaine was denounced as bitterly by the Liberal party as they now denounce the leaders of the Conservative party in this House? Do they forget that in the Province of Quebec the Liberals said that all the acts of the Baldwin-Lafontaine Administration were acts of treason?

Mr. GEOFFRION. Not at all. The Tories said so.

Mr. GIGAULT. If the hon. member will turn to Le Pays, the organ of the Liberal party of that time, and read the number published on the 20th January, 1852, he will find the following:—

"That Mr Lafontaine, who, in 1834, denounced the traitors, has become himself a traitor."

The editor further said that all the acts of the Lafontaine-Baldwin Administration were acts of treason, and that Lafontaine himself trampled on the rights of the people. That is what was said by the organ of the Liberal party of that day, and I do not know how the member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) can so far forget the past history of his party as to say that the Liberals of Quebec are successors to Lafontaine and Baldwin. They are ashamed to-day of having opposed these men, just as they will some years hence be ashamed of having opposed the present policy of the Conservative party. When our National Policy and our railway policy have fully developed the resources of Canada, as they will certainly do, and have made of it a country of which we will have reason to be proud, they will then perhaps say that they never opposed the policy of the Conservative party; but it will be too late for them to say so then as it is now too late for them to proclaim themselves the successors of the illustrious statesmen whom they branded as traitors. I understand that our opponents are going to publish a manifesto to the people of Canada. If it contains the arguments employed by Liberal speakers inside the House and out of it, it will certainly be very amusing to the electors. The member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) said that the farmers received no advantage at all from the present Tariff, and the member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson) affirms that in Nova Scotia they are obliged to buy corn and oats from Ontario and Quebec and pay higher prices than they would otherwise have to pay but for the Tariff. The member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) says we are drawing millions from the masses of the people to favor a few manufacturers, and the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in a speech delivered on the 23rd February last, declared that this Tariff was ruinous to the manufacturers. The member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) asserts that the farmers pay higher prices for manufactured goods, and he alluded chiefly to the agricultural implements sold in Canada. What did the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) say on the 23rd February? Alluding to the manufacturers, and chiefly to the manufacturers of agricultural implements, he said they were selling mowers and reapers and agricultural implements at as low prices as formerly. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has put himself to a good deal of trouble to show that the farmers pay higher prices for agricultural implements, and how can he answer what was said by one of his friends a few days ago? The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret), speaking of the duty on wheat and flour, said that on certain days in the year in the Province of Quebec we paid 50 cents more for each barrel of flour. If that hon. gentleman reads the speech made in 1879 by the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Bechard), he will see that his friend affirmed that the duty on wheat and flour would never have the effect of increasing the price of wheat and flour by one cent; as for the member for Iberville himself, he said last Session that agricultural protection was a humbug and was useless; and what motion did the same member make a few years ago? He contended then that we imported too large a quantity of oats and corn from the United States, and he moved in this House then in order to promote the interests of the farmers we should impose a duty on these cereals. The hon. member for Lambton says that the duties are always paid by the consumer; yet that same gentleman, in 1874, sent the Hon. George Brown to Washington to endeavor to get the duties removed which were imposed by the American Government on Canadian oats, corn and barley which were imported to the United States. Did the hon. gentleman then believe that the duties were paid only by the consumer? No; he worked so hard to have these duties removed because he was convinced that they were detrimental to the interests of the Canadian producers. The hon. member for Centre Huron pretends that the farmers receive no advantage at all from the present Tariff; but that hon. gentleman does not require his neighbor to contradict him, because he can do that himself. In that same speech he weeps over the fate of the workingman, who pays $3 a year more on account of the tax on flour. Does that statement agree very well with the statement made in the same speech that the farmer receives no advantage from the Tariff? The member for West Durham affirms that we are going to make millions of the manufacturers, and the member for West Middlesex asserts that the Tariff is ruinous to the manufacturers, that it will build up so many manufacturing establishments that there will be over-competition, and that at last they will sell at very low prices to those much-to-be-pitied consumers. The member for Centre Huron, in a speech in 1879, asserted that this Tariff would certainly injure our credit in England. Now, it is proved by the facts that our rate of interest is lower, although our public debt has increased. The same gentleman, at the conclusion of his speech in 1879, said that by this Tariff the Conservatives were wrecking their fortunes and the fortunes of Canada. If he wishes to know whether his prediction has been fulfilled, let him listen to the sweet voice of his friend, the hon. member for South Brant, who said a few days ago:

"I believe that perhaps never were the manufacturers of Canada enjoying more prosperity than they are to-day. The same may be said of the farmers, the lumbermen, and the other classes of the community."

I will ask the hon. member for Centre Huron if these words sound like the wrecking of the fortunes of Canada. Instead of the desolation which that hon. gentleman expected from the present Tariff, we have had prosperity. But that same gentleman attributes our prosperity to the abundant harvests which we have had during the last two or three years. During the late Administration we had also abundant harvests; which were it was alluded to in the Speeches from the Throne in 1875 and 1878; but those abundant harvests could not counteract the bad effects of the policy of the late Government. The member for Lotbinière contended that the Tariff was of no benefit to the farmer. I would ask that hon. gentleman if the Finance Minister would have been able to reduce taxation—to remove the duties on tea and coffee, to diminish the tax on tobacco, to abolish the stamp duty—if he had not received large duties since 1879 from breadstuffs; but for that revenue the Finance Minister would not have been in the fortunate position of being able to reduce the duties by $1,500,000 this year. If we reverted to the revenue Tariff spoken of by the hon. member for South Brant, the farmers would be obliged again to pay duties on tea and coffee, higher duties on molasses, tobacco and malt—duties which would only give revenue, but which would not foster our industries, and we should always prefer taxes which bring revenue and at the same time foster our industries. If we adopted a revenue Tariff the American farmers would again flood our market with their grain and produce without paying a cent of duty, while the Canadian farmer would have to pay 15 cents on each bushel of barley, 10 cents on each bushel of oats, and other duties on grains which he might export to the United States. Our farmers understand their interests too well to submit again to such an injustice. They know that the present Tariff is fair to them; it says that as soon as the American Government will remove the duty on Canadian grain, then our Government will remove the duty on breadstuffs coming from the United States. If they wish to admit our breadstuffs free, we are willing to admit theirs free; that is the right and equitable policy to adopt. Many Conservative members were led to believe that, seeing the results and the popularity of the National Policy, our opponents would give up all opposition to it. But they were mistaken. For the sake of the Conservative party we may certainly be glad to see the Liberals continuing to support a revenue Tariff, as it will be a great help to us in the coming election. Even some Reform newspapers predict for our opponents a crushing defeat if they continue to support their Free Trade theory. We see the World of Toronto, and the Tribune of Montreal, warning the leaders of the Liberal party that if they persist in their opposition to the National Policy they will certainly receive a crushing defeat in the coming elections as they did in 1878. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) alluded to the increase of the public debt, and of the annual expenditure. He acknowledged, at the same time, that under the late Administration there was a large increase under those heads, but he declared they were not responsible for it. Can the hon. member hold the Conservatives responsible for the establishment of the Supreme Court? for the establishment of the Military College? Are we responsible for the public money squandered on the Fort Frances Locks, for the Georgian Bay Branch, for the purchase of steel rails and other enterprises of that character? We must expect that, in proportion as our population and wealth increase, our annual expenditure will increase. The President of the United States, in his last Message, said that $400,000,000 would be, this year, the revenue of his Government. When the population of the Union was less, the expenses were much less, but as the population augmented they had to increase their debt and annual expenditure. The hon. member for Lotbinière alluded to England as being a very prosperous country, because it had Free Trade; but my hon. friend should know that in England under a revenue Tariff the annual expenditure per head is $12.35, in France $14.07, while in Canada it is only a few cents more than $6, and there are a great many countries in the world where the annual expenditure per head is much higher than in the Dominion. When we see the results we have obtained from the National Policy, we should not fear to go again before the electors. I was sorry to hear the language used by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Irvine) toward our present Finance Minister. If there is a man who is highly esteemed in Canada to-day it is the Finance Minister, who is the author of our protective Tariff. In the United States the American people, grateful to Henry Clay for having introduced a protective Tariff in their country, have erected statues in his honor; and during coming years it will be recorded in the history of Canada that the present Minister, by introducing a protective Tariff, contributed to the prosperity of Canada as much as any man could do.

Mr. McLELAN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock, midnight) the House adjourned.

Bill (No. 27) to further amend the Act incorporating the Mutual Life Association of Canada, and to change the name thereof to the "Life Association of Canada."—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 28) to amend the charter of the Chartered Bank of London and North America, and to change the name thereof to "The Chartered Bank of London and Winnipeg."—(Mr. Haggart.)

Bill (No. 29) to incorporate the North-Western Bank.—(Mr. Rochester.)

SUN MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. GAULT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 4) respecting the Sun Mutual Life Assurance Company, Montreal.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) said: In reference to this Bill I desire to move that it be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with a view to the adding of a clause which was struck out by the Committee on Banking and Commerce. When the matter came up in that Committee, by clause 2 in the Bill as originally printed, which provides for the reduction of the quorum of directors, some objection was made to it; and the hon. member for Montreal West, who has charge of the Bill, stated that he did not attach any importance to the clause and was willing to have it struck out. But I find that, by some of the directors of the company, a good deal of importance is attached to the clause, the object of which is to reduce the qualification of directors from $5,000 to $2,500. The object is to enable directors to be obtained in some of the towns away from Montreal. In the Canada Life Assurance Company the qualification for director is only a single share, and it is desired, in this instance, to make the qualification but twenty-five shares. People find that at points like London, St. John's and Halifax, it is sometimes difficult to obtain directors willing to take as large a number of shares as fifty, and, with the view of securing the assistance and co-operation of gentlemen at such points, the Board of Directors have unanimously expressed the desire that the qualification should be reduced. I, therefore, move that the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to Committee of the Whole, with instructions to add the following clause thereto:—

Section 9 of the said Act is hereby amended by striking out the word "fifty" and inserting the word "twenty-five" in lieu thereof.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not personally observe that there is any objection to the statement of the hon. member of the reasons for voting for that amendment. But the hon. gentlemen has stated that there was in the Committee a discussion on this subject and some objection made to the clause. It seems to me, then, that the case comes within the spirit, if not the letter, of our rule, which, I think, provides that no amendment shall be proposed without a certain notice. We are yet in the early part of the Session and there can be no difficulty in complying with this rule. I suggest, then, whether the Bill should not be allowed to stand, so as to allow of notice being given of this amendment in order to its consideration by the Committee.

Mr. WHITE. There was no discussion on the subject in the Committee. Some one objected to this as an unusual clause to reduce the qualification, when the member for Montreal West simply stated that he attached no importance to it, and was willing to accept of a change. But if objection is taken to the amendment being proposed without the notice required, of course I shall have to give it.

Mr. BLAKE. The point is this, if I rightly remember the rule of the Committee: It says that no important amendment shall be made without due notice before hand. I should attach some importance to an amendment that had been the subject of discussion, and should observe sufficient respect for the decision of the Committee, which forbids the acceptance of such amendments without the opportunity of sufficient consideration.

Mr. WHITE. I am content, then, to allow the item to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER. Let the order stand.

BILLS IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bills were considered in Committee and reported:—

Bill (No. 48) respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Arkell.)

Bill (No. 65) respecting the New York and Ontario Furnace Company.—(Mr. White, Hastings.)

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time:—

Bill (No. 86) to amend the Act incorporating the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company, and to authorize the said Company to erect a bridge across the Ottawa River.—(Mr. White, Renfrew.)

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

Bill (No. 87) respecting a certain agreement between the Canadian Securities Company, and the Liquidators of the Consolidated Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Brooks.)

Bill (No. 88) to explain the Act to grant relief to the Canada Agricultural Insurance Company, and to define the powers of the Assignees therein mentioned.—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 89) to incorporate the Great Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Massue.)

Bill (No. 90) to incorporate the Ocean Mutual Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 91) to amend the Act to incorporate the St. Lawrence and Pacific Railway Ferry Company.—(Mr. Massue.)

Bill (No. 92) to incorporate the Sisters of Charity of the North-West Territories.—(Mr. Tassé.)

Bill (No. 93) to incorporate the "Grand Central Station Company."—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 95) to amend the Act incorporating "The Bell Telephone Company of Canada."—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 98) to incorporate the Canada Provident Association.—(Mr. Currier.)

GREAT AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN SHORT LINE RAILWAY.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 94) to incorporate the Great American and European Short Line Railway Company.

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to know whether the line is shorter than the main.

Mr. CAMERON. Much shorter. It is only three or four hundred miles long, I believe.

Bill read the second time.

MONTREAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 96) to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Montreal Telegraph Company.

Mr. BLAKE. I should like to ask my hon. friend if this Bill affects the recent arrangement made with the Great North-Western Telegraph Company.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). No, it is simply a consolidation of the Acts relating to the Montreal Telegraph Company with the introduction of the same clause that was put in the charter of the Dominion Telegraph Company some year ago.

Mr. BLAKE. But that would affect it.

Mr. CAMERON. It does not affect the existing arrangement.

Mr. BLAKE. But it would give the power.

Mr. CAMERON. It would give power to make a lease. Bill read the second time.

IMPROVEMENTS OF THE HARBOR OF MATANE.

Mr. Fiset enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Supplementary Estimates, a certain sum in order to continue the improvements in the Harbor of Matane?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No decision has yet been come to in this matter, which is at the present time under consideration.

LINE OF STEAMERS BETWEEN CANADA AND BRAZIL.

Mr. LAURIER enquired, Is the service by the subsidized line between Canada and Brazil to be a monthly one? If so, what is the reason that no steamer of that line has arrived at Halifax since December last?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The service in question is monthly, indeed. As to the second part of the question, I am not in a position to-day to answer the hon. member.

IMPROVEMENT OF WHITBY HARBOR.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), in the absence of Mr. WHEELER, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to place a sum in the Estimates for the improvement of Whitby Harbor, on Lake Ontario?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The matter is still under consideration.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during this Session, a Bill to amend the law of evidence in criminal cases, similar to the Imperial Act of 32nd and 33rd Victoria, chapter 68?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The matter is now before the hon. the Minister of Justice, who has it under consideration.

RIGHTS OF THE HUDSON BAY COMPANY.

Mr. MACDOUGALL enquired, Whether the Government has recognized the right of the Hudson Bay Company, under its charter, as modified by the 9th article of the agreement for transfer, of March 22nd, 1869, to trade in the public lands of Manitoba and the North-West Territory?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government has never been requested to recognize such a right, and has not recognized it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL enquired, Whether the Government has recognized the right of the Hudson Bay Company to claim, under the 17th, 18th and 19th sections of the Public Lands Act of 1872, or any other, and what authority, lands of great value in the Red River Settlement belt, in lieu of lots assigned to the Company in the adjacent "townships" and "bona fide" settled on, under the authority of any Order in Council, or of the said Act?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There has been an Order in Council on this subject, and, if my hon. friend will move for it, it will be sent down.

THE DRAWBACK REGULATIONS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of correspondence and information in possession of the Government as to the use of barrels, or parts of barrels, in which American flour had been imported, for the purpose of exporting Canadian flour in evasion of the regulations as to drawback, said: I may say that since I made a former motion, in which I asked for such information as was in the possession of the Government as to some other modes of evading the regulations as to drawback, I have received one or two communications intimating that the heads of barrels in which American flour was imported have been used in barrels in which Canadian flour has been exported, with the view of evading the regulations as to drawback. I would like to know what information the Government have on that subject.

Mr. BOWELL. The attention of the Government has not been called to any wrong of this kind, but I saw a communication on the subject in a Montreal newspaper. Upon reading it, I cut it out and sent it to Montreal for information; and the answer I received I shall be very glad to bring down for the hon. gentleman's information.

Motion agreed to.

COST OF CANADIAN AND FOREIGN COTTONS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a copy of all statements in the possession of the Government showing, in detail, the cost of specified brands of like qualities of Canadian and foreign brown and white cottons, with dates and other particulars, said: This motion is made in consequence of a statement made by the hon. the Finance Minister the other day, that he had in his possession papers showing that the cost of white and brown Canadian cottons was from 5 to 7½ per cent. over the cost of the foreign goods. Information that I have received from a number of very extensive dealers in cotton is that, as to foreign brands capable of being compared with Canadian brands, that statement is not in accordance with their experience. It is important that we should have the precise facts on this subject, and as the hon. Minister announced that he had in his possession the paper which contained the facts, I suppose there will be no objection to bringing that paper down.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I wish to correct the hon. gentleman's last statement. I did not state, with reference to cotton sheeting, that I had the papers. I had reference to correspondence in connection with information furnished me by Mr. Parkes with regard to warps and other things.

Mr. BLAKE. I think, on reference to the record of the debate, the hon. gentleman will be found to be reported as saying that he had a statement as to white and brown cottons. I was not present at the time.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not say so.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course, if the hon. gentleman says he did not say so, I accept his statement.

Mr. BOWELL. No such records as these are in the keeping of the Customs' Department. But if such a statement is brought down, there should be added the price of the raw material.

Mr. BLAKE. My motion is founded simply on the reported statement of the hon. the Finance Minister, that like qualities of brown and whitesheetings made in Canada, cost in Canada, from 5 to 7½ per cent. more than the same quality of American cottons, and if the hon. the Finance Minister has in his possession the evidence on which that statement is based, I want that evidence brought down. I do not expect that that evidence would be in the Department of Customs, I expect that it would have reference to the same dates, which alone would be the proper basis of comparison, without any reference to the raw material, which, being bought in the same market, would be of the same cost.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The statement I made, so far as my memory serves me, was that I had correspondence, which passed with manufacturers in the United States, in reference to cotton warps and yarns. I have in my possession the letter from the person who furnished me with that information, which I have no objection to bring down.

Motion agreed to.

STATION AT ST. ANACLET.

Mr. FISET moved for copies of the correspondence between the Government and interested persons of St. Anaclet, and of Pointe aux Pères, and all other persons whatsoever, respecting the erection of a railway station in the parish of St. Anaclet. He said: Mr. Speaker, in making this motion, I wish to say a few words. The parish of St. Anaclet, through which the Intercolonial Railway passes, does not possess a station, although the population of that parish exceeds 1,400 souls; there is besides another parish in the rear of St. Anaclet which will shortly become very populous. Farmers have to travel two leagues and more to reach the nearest station, when the train passes before their doors. Another reason for which the Government should construct a station at St. Anaclet, is the neighborhood of Point-aux-Pères. As it is more than probable that a road is to be made between St. Anaclet and Point-aux-Pères, that road will enable the people of the whole locality to enjoy the advantage of a station at St. Anaclet, and will add to its importance. Again, pilgrims going to Ste. Anne in summer, would get out at that station as being the nearest to their objective point. I think, Mr. Speaker, that for these various reasons, the Government should try to grant a station to the parish of St. Anaclet at as early a date as possible.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member having addressed the House in French, I am requested by my colleague sitting on my right to reply to him in the same language. A station has been asked for at St. Anaclet, as stated by the hon. member; petitions have been presented, and recently the curé of Point-aux-Pères, or the priest who serves the mission there, made the same request by letter or otherwise; he pointed out the advantages that would accrue from a station at St. Anaclet, for on a road being opened from Point-aux-Pères to St. Anaclet, Ste. Anne would become easier of access and the railway would reap the benefit of their travel. The railway company has not yet decided the question, which remains open. The principal object is that we have been asked to give money to build the road, which is a thing we cannot do. The hon. member understands this. If the station is granted, the two parishes must necessarily come to an agreement to build a road to give access to their station, from the river shore to St. Anaclet.

Motion agreed to.

PICTOU DRY DOCK.

Mr. DOULL, in moving for copies of petitions and all correspondence in connection with the dry dock at Pictou, said: The other day, two hon. members on the other side of the House, the hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac), and the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell), declaimed very loudly because no appropriation was made for certain breakwaters and repairs to piers in their counties. Reference was made to myself by one of them. I have no doubt their complaints were well founded. I am aware that the pier at Arisaig requires to be repaired; I am also aware that the wharf at Port Hood requires repairs, and that a considerable trade is growing up between Pictou and that port. Those hon. gentlemen are pleased to complain that provision has not been made in the Estimates for those works, but whilst they have ground for complaint, I think I have much stronger ground, because no provision has been made for the dry dock which has been petitioned for not only by the people of the port of Pictou but also by the shipowners and masters of different ports of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and, if I mistake not, of New Brunswick. I have better reasons than the hon. gentlemen opposite for feeling dissatisfied that no provision has been made for the work to which I refer. In the first place, I support the Government, while those hon. gentlemen do not. Another reason is that a dry dock at Pictou would prove of general benefit, whereas the works to which those hon. gentlemen referred would possess only local and comparatively small benefit. Still another reason is that the work for which I desire an appropriation will, in reality, take nothing out of the Treasury that will not be returned. I will endeavor to show this House why I think the aid asked for should be given by the Government. Every person who is acquainted with the trade of the Dominion knows that the larger portion of the shipping passes through the Gulf of St. Lawrence, which is one of the most dangerous waters of the world. Since the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) secured the adoption of his telegraphic system the dangers have been reduced, still the navigation is sufficiently dangerous as to cause every year many disasters and shipwrecks, and insurance underwriters ask a higher rate for vessels navigating the waters of the Gulf in spring and fall, than for vessels navigating the larger waters of the ocean. But it may be said that a dry dock is being built at Point Levis, which will answer all purposes. I contend that the Point Levis dock, when built at a considerable expense, will only prove serviceable to vessels entering and leaving the River St. Lawrence. I will give a reason why I think so. Most of the disasters in the Gulf occur under north and north-west winds, when vessels could not possibly make the river, whereas if a dock were built at Pictou those winds would enable a vessel with temporary rig to make that port and receive the necessary repairs. That the carrying trade of the Dominion through the Gulf requires a dock of that kind, I think will appear evident, when I inform this House that the rates of freight charged from the Gulf ports are as a rule much higher than from the Atlantic ports of the United States, and they will continue to be higher until such time as we afford to our seaports the same facilities and advantages to sea-going vessels as are furnished at American ports. While we have spent millions of money in improving the inland navigation of the St. Lawrence and our highway from the Lakes to the sea-board, in order to bring the produce of the West at lower rates to the sea-board by that route than it is carried by other routes to the sea-board of the United States; we must afford such advantages to sea-going vessels as will enable them to carry freight as low from our ports as from those of the United States, otherwise the rates from the United States ports will continue to be lower than from our ports. I, therefore, contend that the money spent in improving our inland navigation will be, to a large extent, useless, unless we give these advantages to our sea-board, and for this reason I maintain that this dry dock is a necessity in the interests not merely of the port of Pictou, but of the whole Dominion, and not merely for our sea-going vessels but also for the whole of our shipping interests. You may carry freight from the West through our inland water-way at a low rate to the sea-board, but if the rate from the sea-board to Europe is, in proportion, higher than the inland freight is lower than that charged by rival routes, the trade will continue to go pretty much to the seaports of the United States. It is not, therefore, local, but one affecting the interests of the whole Dominion; and I, therefore, consider I have some reason to complain that there is no appropriation for it in the Estimates. But, apart from that, I said this work was not going ultimately to take any money out of the Dominion Treasury. The dock proposed to be built at Pictou is of the description known as Simpson's dry dock. It is not very expensive, and they are found in the United States to answer the purpose equally well with the more expensive docks. The estimated cost of this dock will be $150,000—the outside estimate. The proposition for the building of this dock is, that the Government should lend the money to the Commissioners of the port of Pictou at 4 per cent.; that the port of Pictou should pay the residue of the harbor dues, after paying the Harbor Master's fees, towards the payment of interest on this amount. If the harbor dues are insufficient, they might be increased to a small extent to enable the Harbor Commissioners to pay off this interest out of the harbor dues—at least $3,500. The estimated revenue to be derived from this dock is set down at $7,500, which, together with the $3,500 from the harbor dues, will make $11,000. The interest on the $150,000 would be $6,000, and the estimated cost of working and maintenance, $2,500, making $8,500 of an annual payment for interest, working and maintenance. That amount taken from the $11,000 will leave a balance of $2,500 towards a sinking fund that would be over and above what is necessary to pay the interest of that money, and would ultimately wipe out the whole amount. But that is the estimate at the present time, under the existing state of matters. But we look forward to the trade, not only of the port of Pictou but of the Dominion, especially the carrying trade increasing; and, as a matter of course, the number of ships required will also largely increase. If so, it is only fair to calculate that that sum of $11,000 will be largely augmented, and the earnings of the dock will also be swelled. I, therefore, contend that it is only fair that the Government should not only give the port of Pictou, but the shipping interest of the Dominion, what is asked for in this petition. I hope that, after what I have stated, the Government will re-consider the matter and give the money that is required.

Mr. KILLAM. I have no doubt that the subject brought before the House is one of very great importance, and the more so because we have had evidence before the House—I think a year or two ago, affecting the action of the Government with regard even to their own steamer in the port of Pictou—and which evidence was brought before certain Committees of the House to show that it is possible to haul the Government steamer on a slip which is under the control of a member of the Liberal party. I have myself in my possession a piece of the sheathing of the steamer Mayflower, which I shall be happy to show the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Public Works, to let them see what an industrious insect our teredo nautalis is, and to show them that even so strong a Government as theirs can have their steamers destroyed, partly for want of a dry dock, and partly for want of a feeling for a gentleman who might not be grudged a fair price to haul up their boats.

Motion agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF CASCUMPEC HARBOR.

Mr. HACKETT moved for all correspondence with the Department of Public Works since the 1st July last, having reference to the improvement of Cascumpec Harbor, Prince County, Prince Edward Island. He said: My object in making this motion is to ascertain what has been done during the last year for the purpose of improving this harbor. I regret I have to trouble the House again with relating the facts in connection with this very important harbor. Last year and the previous year I had this motion before the House, and almost succeeded on one occasion in obtaining a grant of money for the purpose of improving it. But through some mysterious cause I failed. I need not say that this harbor, being on the north side of Prince Edward Island, and the only deep water terminus of the railway west of Summerside, is of very great importance to the Government, and should be improved, thereby facilitating the trade in that part of the country. But apart altogether from the trade consideration, or its being an outlet for the produce of the western and northern part of Prince Edward Island, as a harbor of refuge it is most important that it should be improved. Last year the works of the Island required a very large amount of money, but a very small amount would make the improvement now asked for. The trouble is there are two bars at this place, an inner bar of rock, and an outer bar of sand; and engineers have stated that if the inner bar were blasted, and a channel of sufficient depth made, say 14 or 15 feet—there is only 12 feet now—a corresponding increase of the depth would take place at the outer bar, probably making the harbor accessible. This harbor is not merely a local matter. It is necessary as a harbor of refuge for vessels engaged in the carrying trade, going through the Gulf—being quite in the bight of the Island on account of the strong current which the north-easterly wind makes, and which obliges the vessels to go in-shore. There is no opportunity other than strong crafts working out against these obstacles; therefore it is necessary the harbor should be improved. A large number of fishing vessels from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, frequent our fishing grounds in the vicinity of this harbor; but I regret to say that on very many occasions a number have been cast away, and not only property, but the lives of the crews lost sometimes. I have here a statement of wrecks that took place in the vicinity of this harbor since we entered into Confederation, eight years ago. Fourteen vessels, of the value of $146,000, have been lost on that coast, owing to the want of a harbor of refuge. Not only were the vessels lost, but a very great destruction of property ensued. There were thirty-eight or forty unfortunate seamen lost as well. I think, in the interest of humanity, as well as in the interest of trade, this harbor should be improved. Last year, when I brought the matter before the hon. the Minister of Public Works, I felt almost certain he would make an appropriation for this improvement. To remind the hon. gentleman of the promise made, I will read his exact words:

"We have to see what are the works called for in the different parts of the Dominion, and then decide which of these works should be undertaken now, and which delayed. Under the circumstances, this harbor—though I understand the importance of the work—may have to stand over, though I am not in a position to say to-day it will have to stand over until next year. We may be in a position to ask Parliament, in the Supplementary Estimates, for a vote for this; nevertheless, I cannot promise that, first, because it would not be my duty, and secondly, because I have no right to anticipate the vote of the House, though the matter will be looked into again."

Now, it will be seen by this that the hon. gentleman stated last year he was in hopes to be able to put an amount of money in the Supplementary Estimates for the improvement of this harbor, but that as it was necessary to delay some work, this might also have to stand over. Although I was not at all satisfied to have it stand over last year I hoped it would be put in the Estimates this year, but my hopes were blasted. When the Estimates came down I was disappointed to see that no appropriation was made for this harbor. If the hon. gentleman has not already placed a sum in the Supplementary Estimates, I hope my calling his attention to it now will induce him to do it. It has been said that the Province of Prince Edward Island is taking considerable money out of the Dominion Treasury. That statement has been made not only by the Opposition, but it has been repeated on the Government side of the House. I remember that, in 1880, the hon. leader of the Opposition stated that Prince Edward Island had extracted up to that time something like $1,200,000 more out of the Dominion Exchequer than she had paid into it. In the last Session I think the hon. Minister of Finance also stated that we had largely overdrawn. I think that is very unfair. If that is the only reason why our public works are not attended to it is a very poor one indeed. It is a fact that the imports of dutiable goods into Prince Edward Island have fallen off considerably within the last few years. In 1876, the total imports of dutiable goods into Prince Edward Island amounted to $1,590,981; for the year ending 30th June, 1881, they amounted to $907,825, or a falling off of $683,156. Now, although the Trade and Navigation Returns show a falling off of imports direct to the Province, still it is a well-known fact that the people use as many dutiable goods as heretofore, although the goods have not been imported direct from foreign countries. They are purchased at other ports in the Dominion. The goods that are imported into the ports of Halifax, St. John, Montreal and Toronto, are bought by the Prince Edward Island traders; the duty is paid at the port of entry and credited to the Province in which they are entered, and, as a matter of course, the people of Prince Edward Island thus get no credit for the amount of revenue these goods pay. There are a few lines of goods manufactured in Canada that are bought by the people of Prince Edward Island, and there are many other lines of goods sold by the wholesale merchants, and also used by the people, that are imported. I may say that with regard to these, that print cottons, certain line of woollen goods, fancy goods and hardware, are largely imported at the ports mentioned by me, and are bought by the traders of Prince Edward Island, but as the duty is paid where the goods are entered, that Province gets no credit for it. On three or four lines of goods alone, cottons, woollens and hardware, there is a falling off of $400,000 or $500,000, showing conclusively that, although the Province is not credited with so large an amount of duty paid per head as some other Provinces, still they pay the duties nevertheless. I hope that this apparent deficiency in the duties paid by Prince Edward Island will not stand in the way of the Government prosecuting the public works. I trust that this very important harbor of Cascumpec, which I have brought so many times to the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, will be attended to this year, and if the hon. gentleman cannot see his way to grant an amount sufficient for the whole works, a reasonable amount will be quite satisfactory.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sure the House, as well as the county the hon. gentleman represents, cannot complain that the hon. gentleman has been remiss in bringing this subject to the attention of the Government. As far as I am concerned, I must say that I am well acquainted with the whole subject. The hon. gentleman has done all he could for the last three years to induce the Government to ask Parliament for a vote of money for this work. I, for one, am aware of the importance of that harbor, and of the works the hon. gentleman wishes the Government to undertake. But the Government have so many works, so many calls from various portions of the Dominion, that we have to postpone some of them from year to year, in order that we may do those which are most immediately necessary. This harbor, as the hon. gentleman knows, has been much damaged on account of the natural breakwater of the harbor having been broken through by the sea, and consequently it does not afford the shelter it would if that natural breakwater had not been partially destroyed by the sea. In any improvements the Government may make in that harbor, they must keep in view the fact that the natural barrier will have to be restored, which will necessitate the expenditure of a large sum of money. The most pressing work, as the hon. gentleman says, would be the removal of the bar of rock, and he thinks if that were done, the water might then destroy the outside bar. That is quite possible, but the removal of the bar of rock is a work of considerable magnitude. However, the hon. gentleman having once more brought the matter to the attention of the Government, I shall again bring it before my colleagues. But if I am not able to bring down an estimate for this work, let not the hon. gentleman say next year that I promised it for the Supplementary Estimates. I will lay the matter before my colleagues, and if, after reconsidering it, they think we shall be justified in asking for a vote, I shall be very happy to put in an estimate for that purpose.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOM HOUSE BOATMEN AT QUEBEC.

Mr. AMYOT, in moving copies of all petitions from the Customs boatmen of the city of Quebec, applying to be supplied with official uniforms, and of the replies to such applications, said: Mr. Speaker, I hope the Government will give that petition its earnest consideration. It is very important to the Customs service of Quebec, that the boatmen be distinguished by a special uniform, which would give them a greater authority when they board foreign vessels. It would be a very small expense for the Government, and would considerably increase the efficiency of the service.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. HACKETT.

THE APPOINTMENT OF THOMAS RYAN.

Mr. COURSOL, in moving for copies of all correspondence, certificates, &c., addressed to the Government in relation to the appointment of Mr. Thomas Ryan as engineer of the Custom House at Montreal, with the date of such appointment, said: Mr. Speaker, before asking of this honorable House, an order to obtain this correspondence, I trust I may make a few remarks on a subject which interests me particularly, as the representative of the division of Montreal East. Towards the middle of last February a deplorable accident occurred in the Montreal Custom House through the bursting of a steam boiler. The engineer in charge of this boiler was fatally wounded by that explosion, and died therefrom in the afternoon of the 1st March instant. Shortly after that accident I had occasion to talk with the hon. Minister of Public Works, and he said to me at the time, as indeed it was but just that he should, that he hoped and that he wished that the appointment of an engineer should be made with the concurrence of the three representatives of the city of Montreal. Now, Mr. Speaker, no one knows better than yourself and my hon. colleagues in the House, how difficult it is for a member to dispense patronage, even when he represents alone an electoral division. It is ever a source of trouble to him, and, at the same time, it is sometimes a source of unpleasantness between the Departments and the members of the House. This difference of opinion may go a long way, when the question is one of exercising one's right of patronage in a city like Montreal, where there are three members, each one representing a division. Under such circumstances patronage should be dispensed with discernment, and especially with justice. I have a complaint to make with regard to the manner in which the appointment in question was made. It is not the first time that I have reason to complain. On the several occasions when I have had complaints to make, I have always done so to the face of the Government. I am one of the supporters of that Government. I support with my vote the policy we have inaugurated and which we think to be to the greater advantage of the country; but although I uphold the policy of the Government, as a general rule, I desire it to be well understood, that I do not intend to support individuals, or any member of the Government, if justice is not done to the division which I represent. Now, in the present instance, I presented on the 2nd March instant, to the hon. Minister of Public Works, a petition signed by one Gunn of the city of Montreal. This petition had been brought to me by one of the electors of my division, and it was accompanied by a large number of testimonials as to the applicant's ability, signed by men competent to know, certifying that Mr. Gunn was able to fulfil the duties of engineer. At the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Public Works, I sent him that petition, together with the testimonials and a letter from myself. Four or five days later, I received a letter from the Department stating that Gunn's petition had reached too late, and that the appointment had already been made when the Department received it. Well, Mr. Speaker, this appointment must have been made hurriedly, and that is the cause of my complaint. The individual died on the first day of March at 4 o'clock p.m.; the same day the petition was presented, and the day following I was informed that the appointment had been made. But since that time, I have reason to believe, that another petition was sent to the hon. Minister of Public Works by other persons, by my two colleagues and by the Senator for the division of Alma. I complain of the fact, that Senators, who are not elected by the people, and who in certain electoral divisions could not get themselves returned, should be the first to come and recommend certain appointments to be made without the concurrence and participation of the member, who is left by them in complete ignorance of what is going on. I have, therefore, to complain that this appointment was made without my participating in it, and the reasons since given to me by the hon. Minister of Public Works are rather an aggravation of the injustice, I will even say the insult done to my division. I hope there will be another opportunity to enable me to show to this House how patronage is dispensed, and the difficulties which we have to encounter each time an appointment has to be made. I complain especially of the fact that the Government and Ministers lend a too willing ear to persons who do not represent electoral divisions, which has the effect of weakening the candidate's strength in the division, and he has already trouble enough to secure justice for his constituents. If I make these remarks, Mr. Speaker, it is not in a hostile spirit; I do so from motives of duty and fully understanding the position I take in this matter. I am entrusted with the defence of the interests of my constituents, and I will not, as long as I am the representative of Montreal East, allow the members of the other parts of the city to obtain any advantage over me. Let things be done openly and publicly, so that the responsible member be cognizant thereof, and then he will have no cause to complain if he does not obtain what he asks for; but what I do object to is the manner in which these things are done; sooner or later, it will end badly.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, the documents asked for in the hon. member's motion shall be brought down as soon as they can be copied. The hon. member has certainly the right to complain if he thinks that an injustice has been done to his division, and I would be the last member of the Government to blame him for so doing, the more so, that he has done it in most proper terms, which show that he is to-day as ever the friend of the Government. But, Mr. Speaker, the facts of the case seem to have been presented to the hon. member in a different light from what they really are. The accident which took place resulted in the death of the engineer and the stoker, and the official whom I sent to repair the disaster reported to me that it was necessary to have a competent employe, and one upon whom the Department could place dependence. In consequence I sent an engineer from my Department to replace temporarily the victim of the accident, pending the time when I should have a competent man to assume the post. Meanwhile, the engineer who had been seriously wounded, succumbed; the stoker had died sometime previously. Whereupon I received at different times a recommendation from Messrs. Gault and Ryan, two of the members representing the city of Montreal, who both favored the appointment of Mr. Thomas Ryan as engineer.

Mr. COURSOL. And one from the Senator.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I received those two recommendations from Mr. Gault, one of the members for Montreal, and from Mr. Ryan, another member for the same city. I also received another recommendation to the same effect from Mr. Ogilvie, Senator for that division, and another from Mr. White, also a member of this House, and from other persons of Montreal. The hon. member came to me once and spoke to me of the appointment which was to be made, and mentioned to me that there was some one he wished to recommend. I told him to send me his petition, together with what testimonials he might have. Those documents reached me on the morning of the 2nd instant, as stated by the hon. member. I considered the question during the course of the day, and after having perused the recommendations and the testimonials sent in from divers sources, I found that the hon. member for Montreal East recommended one Gunn, whilst the Senator and the other members for Montreal supported the appointment of Thomas Ryan, and I came to the conclusion that Thomas Ryan should be appointed, and such appointment was consequently made. The hon. member says that the appointment was secretly made. It was made like all other appointments. When an official has to be appointed, he is appointed and receives the vacant position. The only thing about which the hon. member might seemingly have reason to complain about, is, that having called upon me, I should have made the appointment before receiving his letter, and the letter from the Secretary of the Department would certainly lead one to believe that such was the case; in fact, the letter actually says as much. This morning, upon seeing the hon. member's notice of motion on the Orders of the Day, I asked to see the letter written to the hon. member on the subject, and upon seeing that that letter stated that the appointment had been made before the receiving of the petition presented by the hon. member. I sent for the Secretary of the Department and asked him for the order by virtue of which the appointment had been made. The Secretary referred to the documents and found that he had made a mistake; thereupon he wrote me the following letter, which I will read to the House:—

“ OTTAWA, 13th March, 1882.

“ SIR,—Referring to the letter which Mr. Coursol, M.P., wrote to you on the 2nd inst, enclosing testimonials in favor of Mr. F. Gunn, applicant for the situation of Engineer to the Custom House of Montreal, I find that you endorsed on that letter instructions to return those testimonials to Mr. Coursol and to inform him that Mr. Ryan had been appointed to the situation applied for by Mr. Gunn. Your instructions were dated the third. I regret, that through an error which I cannot explain, that the letter written to Mr. Coursol according to those instructions, and which I signed, contains the unauthorized statement that ‘the appointment of another person (Mr. Thomas Ryan) had already been made to the vacant situation, previous to your (Mr. Coursol's) recommendation in favor of Mr. Gunn having reached the Minister.’”

Thus it is that the hon. member was perfectly justified in speaking as he did awhile ago, as the Secretary's letter put matters in that light; but the Secretary declares that he made a mistake in the close of his letter, and that the appointment had not been made when the hon. member's letter reached me. As a matter of fact, the question was only settled in the afternoon after I had examined the testimonials in favor of Gunn, submitted to me by the hon. member, as well as those in favor of Ryan. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. member will see that there was no intention of doing him a wrong in the present instance, any more than I have done in the past. I have always shown myself to be the friend of the hon. member, as he has always been that to the Government, and I hope that after these explanations, he will understand that the right appointment was made. It may be that he would have preferred that Gunn should have been appointed instead of Ryan, but I had to weigh matters and see who, in my opinion, should be preferred. I thought Ryan should be appointed, and therefore I did so.

Mr. COURSOL. There is another individual who was appointed the same day, the assistant engineer, and that on the recommendation of my two colleagues, whilst the man I had recommended was not appointed.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal). I regret very much that my colleague from Montreal East has thought proper to bring this matter before the House. I may say that the unfortunate accident which led to the death of the late engineer, Mr. Maghar—who, I may say, was a Protestant—occurred on the 15th or 16th of February last, and the appointment was made on the 2nd of March. I had the pleasure of knowing the gentleman whom the hon. the Minister of Public Works appointed to the vacant position. Although his name is Thomas Ryan, he is not a connection of mine; he does not happen to be even a co-religionist of mine. In Montreal, the rule is to appoint to any vacant position a man of the same religious persuasion as his predecessor. Knowing Mr. Ryan's qualifications for the position, I felt pleasure in signing a recommendation in his favor, and I think it is due to those of us who recommended him, and also to the hon. Minister who appointed him, that I should read some of the certificates he has received from high authorities in other quarters :

" DOMINION OF CANADA,
" Certificate of Competency.

" FIRST CLASS ENGINEER.

" To THOMAS RYAN,—Whereas it has been found that you are duly qualified to fulfil the duties of a First Class Engineer, the Board of Steamboat Inspection does hereby, in pursuance of the Canadian Act respecting Certificates to Engineers (31st Vic., Cap. 65), grant you this Certificate of Competency for a period of one year from the date thereof.

" Given under the Seal of the Chairman of the Board of Steamboat Inspection at Montreal this first day of January, 1880.

" SAMUEL RISLEY,
" Chairman of the Board of Steamboat Inspection."

" CANAL OFFICE,
" MONTREAL, 29th March, 1880.

" ANDREW ROBERTSON, Esq.,
" Chairman, Montreal Harbor Board.

" SIR,—I beg to state that I have known Mr. Thomas Ryan for upwards of twenty-two years. He is a first class mechanical engineer, of very sober and industrious habits.

" Mr. Ryan has had seven years practical experience in dredging, as engineer in charge of Dredge No. 1, belonging to the Department of Public Works, during which time he gave entire satisfaction to the late Mr. Sippell, who expressed regret when Mr. Ryan left the employ. Mr. Ryan is conversant with both languages, and, from his energetic disposition and mechanical as well as practical knowledge, I am fully of the opinion that he would make an efficient Mechanical Superintendent of the Montreal Harbor Improvements.

" I have the honor to be, Sir,

" Your obedient servant,

" M. CONWAY,
" Superintendent Lachine Canal."

" THE OTTAWA RIVER NAVIGATION COMPANY,
" 13 BONAVENTURE STREET,
" MONTREAL, 2nd March, 1880.

" MR. THOMAS RYAN, Engineer,
" Hochelaga, Que.

" DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in stating that, during the many years you were employed by this Company as engineer, you gave very general satisfaction. I can recommend you as a steady, sober and attentive man. I regret that the business of this Company would not enable us to pay you such wages as would secure your services for the future. However, I have no doubt but you will succeed well in the railway business, where there is far greater scope for a man of your ability. Wishing every success,

" I am, dear Sir,

" Yours very truly,

" R. W. SHEPHERD,
" President."

" Q., M., O. & O. RAILWAY, W.D.
" Master Mechanic's Office,
" HOCHELAGA, March 27th, 1880.

" To the Chief Engineer and Harbor
" Commission of the Montreal Harbor Trust.

" I understand that the bearer, Thos. Ryan, is making application for the position of Mechanical Engineer for the Montreal Harbor Trust. I take pleasure in recommending him as a fit and proper person for that position. I have known Mr. Ryan over twenty-two (22) years. I know him to be a first-class steamboat engineer and a good mechanic; he has been in charge of first-class steamers as engineer, and dredges, for a number of years, and his character bears the highest reputation as to sobriety and integrity. I consider that he is one of the few men in Canada fit to fill such a position, and I take pleasure in recommending him for that position.

" A. DAVIS."

After these certificates, I think nothing need be said regarding Mr. Ryan's competency to fill the position to which he has been appointed. The moment I read these certificates, I had great pleasure in recommending Mr. Ryan, in whom I believe the Government have a first-class officer.

Mr. COURSOL. The hon. gentleman labors under a misapprehension. I never said a word against Mr. Ryan's ability. It was my right to bring this matter before the House, and to have my position respected. It was my right not to be made a subject of derision by being asked by the hon. Minister to send in a recommendation, and finding that before I had done so the appointment had been made.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman might have added that I have just read a letter in which the Secretary of the Department stated positively that the appointment had not been made before the hon. gentleman sent me the letter.

Mr. COURSOL. The letter was read before the House, and I thought the hon. Minister might have translated that himself. I know that the requisition of Mr. Ryan was sent on the 1st of March, and the man died at 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, and, not only was the chief officer appointed, but the assistant also.

Motion agreed to.

FOG-WHISTLE AT SHELBURNE HARBOR.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) moved for copies of all petitions and correspondence received by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, since 1st January, 1881, in reference to the erection of a fog-whistle at the entrance of Shelburne Harbor, Nova Scotia. He said: I was glad to learn from the Minister of Public Works, the other day, that it was his intention to provide for the erection of a fog-whistle at the entrance of Shelburne Harbor. I must, however, take objection to the manner in which he answered my question on the subject; and as he and his colleague, the hon. Minister of Railways, seem anxious to make a little political capital out of the erection of this work, for the benefit of a gentleman who is likely to be an opponent of the Liberal candidate for the county of Shelburne. I desire to refer to some papers which have been in the possession of the Government for some time past. The answer of the hon. Minister of Public Works was that the Hon. Mr. White had communicated with the Department about a fog-whistle, that it had been taken into consideration, and that the work had been decided on. My motion calls for this communication, which seems to have had considerable effect on the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. But I wish to remind those hon. gentlemen that many important petitions, asking for the erection of this fog-whistle, were presented in 1878, signed, not only by people in Shelburne, but by many influential shipowners in Halifax. A petition had been presented signed by Cunard & Co. and the Presidents of the various insurance companies in the city of Halifax. On the 18th February, 1879, I directed the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to these important petitions and urged on him the consideration of this work. I received a polite reply, such a one as is very often addressed to members of the Opposition, namely, that the matter was under the consideration of the Government. I again brought it to the attention of the Government on December 24th, 1879, and I again received the same answer. I next called attention to it in 1880, and again received the same answer. I still again called attention to this matter last Session. Another promise was made by the hon. the Minister of Railways in 1878. When addressing a meeting of the electors of the county of Shelburne, and advocating the return of the Conservative party to power, one of the first utterances of the hon. gentleman was in respect to this subject; he referred to the neglect of the important interests of the port by Mr. Mackenzie, and assured the electors of Shelburne that one of the first acts which would engage the attention of a Conservative Government would be the erection of a fog-whistle at the entrance of this harbor. This matter has been before Parliament about three years, and now on the eve of a General Election, according to popular rumor, a promise is made by the hon. the Minister of Public Works to have the fog-whistle erected there. I am very glad it is to be erected, as it is an important work, not local in its character, but affecting the shipping and Maritime Provinces; but I will use my influence to prevent the Conservative party from reaping any local advantage from this question.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course, the papers will be brought down; but the hon. gentleman should not find fault with the Government, and with myself in particular, if, at the fourth Session of this Parliament, we grant what he says he has been asking for for three years. Surely he should be glad that the Government has acceded to his request, and whether it was advocated by the hon. gentleman or by others, at all events our attention has been called to it in such a manner that we decided to ask Parliament to provide the necessary money to carry out the work. At all events, whether it has been secured by the good influence of one set of men or by another, the fog-whistle will be erected; of course, the hon. gentleman, who wants to use it as much as he can against us, is welcome to do so, though the fog-whistle will speak for itself.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend did not object to the Government having got light on the subject, but he rather complained that they had been befogged for three years, and although the applications of the great house of Cunard & Co., municipal bodies and other parties interested, had altogether failed to remove the fog during three years, the white light of the fourth year had effectually accomplished it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The facts showed that evidence was accumulated to such a degree that finally the Government acceded to the request. Whether it would be a white or red light, at all events, we shall have a light there.

Motion agreed to.

FRAUDS BY TRUSTEES.

Mr. McCUAIG, moving for a return showing the number of persons who have been convicted within the last ten years of fraudulently disposing of property held by them as trustees, said: The object I have in view is that some means shall be taken by Parliament to make it imperative on trustees or executors to make a half yearly return of the assets of the estates in their charge, and file the same in the Superior Court, or with the registrar in the different counties. There are many instances in this Dominion where large estates have been wholly lost by the negligence of the executors or trustees, and if a proper return were made every six months, and filed, as I have indicated, it would prove a very excellent effect on their action. We know that a man on his death-bed very often calls in a friend and appoints him his executor or trustee to administer his estate. The future of the family depends on the honest discharge of the trust undertaken. Very often it occurs that a brother is appointed, and friends of the family have every delicacy in asking him respecting the position of the estate. This would be obviated by having a law by which executors or trustees would be compelled, under the solemnity of an oath, to file, every six months, with the legal authorities I have mentioned, details of all the security and everything connected with the administration of the estate. I am not sure whether I am in order in bringing this question before Parliament. What I wish to do is to bring it forward so that it may be placed before the country, in order that it may receive early attention from whatever parliamentary body it might be found to belong.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government have no direct means of obtaining the information asked for by the hon. gentleman; but he has a very praiseworthy object in view, and the return will be very useful if it can be obtained. The Government will take such steps as they can to collect the information, but it will be some time before we can give any satisfactory statement.

Motion agreed to.

THE DOMINION LANDS ACT IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. MILLS, in moving for reports made by Crown Land agents relating to working of the Dominion Lands Act or land regulations in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, since 1st January, 1880, said: I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman continues to receive, from time to time, as was the custom formerly, suggestions as to the manner in which the land regulations that have been adopted, work in the various districts of Manitoba and the North West. Some years ago the hon. gentleman introduced, and got a Bill passed, consolidating the Lands Acts, and making certain changes, and, from that time to this, various modifications of the land regulations have been made. It would be interesting to Parliament, and highly useful, if the reports made by the land agents in reference to the matter were laid before the House, so that we may have an opportunity of seeing how far the regulations have been adopted, and the provisions of the Act are seen to be beneficial—also, what difficulties are found in the way of the efficient operation of the law. I trust the hon. gentleman will bring any reports of this kind down to the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I see no objection to the giving of this information. I shall instruct the Deputy Minister to look up any such reports, and, if there are any such reports or suggestions of improvements or modifications—or any opinions to the effect that any part of the law works badly—it will be well to make use of them at an early day.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF CAPTAIN ALLAN.

Mr. MILLS. In moving for all papers, correspondence and Orders in Council, relating to the dismissal of Captain Allan from the public service, said: I am not sure whether Captain Allan was dismissed or resigned, but I would like any information in regard to the subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Amend the motion so as to make it read papers relating to the dismissal or resignation and it may pass.

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection to that amendment.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

VOLUNTEER COMPANIES IN ALGOMA.

Mr. DAWSON moved for a return of all correspondence and documents relating to applications made on the part of the young men of the district of Algoma, to the Department of Militia and Defence, for the privilege of being allowed to form volunteer companies within that district. He said: In making this motion, I may call attention to the fact that for a number of years the young men of Algoma have desired to form volunteer companies throughout the district, and that they have always met with very courteous replies from the Department of Militia and Defence, but nothing so far has been done to enable them to form such corps. Now, in the whole district of Algoma, with its 21,000 inhabitants, there is just one half company of volunteers. I think if there is an expenditure on account of the Militia Department, it ought to be distributed equally over the Dominion; every district ought to have its full share of the volunteer force. I may mention in regard to Algoma, that very great numbers of railway laborers are likely to be drawn into it—large bodies having gone there within the past few years; and it is very desirable that there should be volunteer companies in the different parts of the district. We have the best material for the formation of such companies. I may add, that the young men of Prince Arthur's Landing and of the north shore of Lake Huron are anxious to form companies also, as are some on Manitoulin Island. I do not see therefore why the district of Algoma should not be treated with the same respect in that regard, as the others throughout the Dominion.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. GUILLET moved for a return showing the average number of miles of the Intercolonial Railway worked each year since any portion of that road was opened to public use; the cost per mile of running the road each year, and the average quantity of freight carried per mile, and the average earning per mile in each year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask my hon. friend to allow this motion to be amended by striking out the words "any portion of" after the words "opened to public use," or since the year 1876. That will give all the returns he asks for from the date of the opening of the Intercolonial Railway in 1876. To go back to the time the first portion of the road was opened would take us to 1853, when the section was opened from Halifax to Bedford.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think we ought to have that information too.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no objection then.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Let us have it. There is some very interesting information back of 1876.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not the information at hand. The procuring of it will occupy a long period. It will not be possible to give it to the House as soon as some hon. gentlemen may desire.

Motion agreed to.

WELLAND CANAL CONTRACTS.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I should like to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals to the fact that in the papers brought down in reference to this contract (27) on the Welland Canal, there is no statement of the quantity and value of whatever materials were taken from the late contractors, in making up the amount of the award by Mr. Page, at $61,313. There is a book of writings stating that there was a quantity of goods at one place and a quantity of timber at another—a derrick at one place and a derrick at another; but we have no value attached to this property, and know neither the prices nor the quantities. I hope the hon. gentleman will bring down this information as speedily as possible.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentlemen will put on a slip of paper the subjects on which he wishes information, I will draw the attention of the head engineer to it, and get the facts required as quickly as possible.

Mr. BLAKE. I ask for copies of the valuation of the materials on hand, and a statement of the price at which they were taken over by the Government. There is no statement of any valuation of those materials on hand, nor the prices of the property taken over by the Government.

BROWN SHEETING AND BLEACHED SHIRTINGS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders are called, I would just call the attention of the hon. the Finance Minister to this passage from his speech, and ask if he intends to bring down the statement referred to:

"I have here a statement showing that brown sheeting and bleached shirtings manufactured in the Dominion were sold at from 5 to 7½ per cent. over the net cost price of the same articles in the United States."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, I have that statement and shall bring it down; but the correspondence with the United States merchants and manufacturers has reference to the cottons.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

Mr. Dawson.

After Recess.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 9) concerning marriage with a deceased wife's sister.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). Before adopting the first clause, I wish to make an amendment to the same effect as that which I gave notice on the second reading of the Bill, declaring first marriages valid. I wish, also, to make another amendment, in order to meet some objections that have been raised by some hon. members, especially from Nova Scotia. It is stated that in that Province the law prohibiting marriage with a deceased wife's sister contains also several other provisions, and it has been objected that the first clause, as worded, would repeal the whole of that Statute. I am not sure that such would be the effect of the clause, but, in order to meet the objection, I would ask that to the first clause the following be substituted:—

"All prohibitions of marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife are hereby repealed."

And then to add the following words, in order to meet the case of past marriages:—

"To the same effect, both as to past and to future marriages, as if such prohibitions never had been enacted."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should attach to the Bill a schedule of the laws prohibiting marriages.

Mr. GIROUARD. I do not think it is necessary, but, at the same time, I have no objection to give them verbally. We have, so far as I recollect, Statute 34 Victoria, Statute of Henry VIII., Lord Harvey's Act of 1835. So far as the Province of Quebec is concerned, we have Article 125 of the Civil Code.

Mr. BLAKE. I observe that my hon. friends from Jacques Cartier and Maskinongé (Mr. Houde) are agreed this Session. They were not quite agreed in 1880, when my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier introduced his Bill upon that subject. That was a Bill which rendered legal all marriages between a man and his deceased wife's sister, and my hon. friend from Maskinongé was dissatisfied with that, and upon the occasion of the third reading he moved an amendment in the sense of this Bill, providing that the prohibitions should be removed, and that amendment was defeated by a vote of 133 to 10, which singular success of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier upon that occasion has induced him to propose the clause of the hon. member from Maskinongé on this occasion. For my own part, I have great objection to the clause as it is now proposed, for reasons which I gave, and which other hon. members gave, when my hon. friend's Bill came before the House in the first instance in 1880. As it first came before the House it was a Bill which rendered legal the marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister, and then proceeded that legality with exceptions of all prohibitions, or dispensations, or rules of various churches, somewhat in the language of the 127th article of the Code. During the progress of the Bill that eliminated all these exceptions, when it reached the third reading it was simply a Bill to render legal the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister, and also the other marriage which is now dropped from the Bill. Now what was the reasoning upon which the House was induced to eliminate these conditions and reject by a vote so decisive as 133 to 10, the alternative proposal of the hon. member for Maskinongé, which is now in this Bill. In the first place, the law of marriage was assumed to be placed within the province of this House upon the theory that there ought to be one uniform law of marriage for the whole Dominion. The distinction which is made in the Confederation Act between the law of marriage and the law effecting the solemnization of marriage, must be referable to that consideration, that is, as to the validity of time, as to the classes of persons between whom it should be lawful and between whom it should not be lawful that marriage should be contracted. It was expedient that there should be one uniform law, and that uniform law was to be obtained only by the legislation being in the Central Parliament. That was the first consideration. The second consideration was presented to the House, firstly, I think, by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott) and afterwards by others, and it was that this was a relation in which it was essential that the law should be plain, clear, certain and precise, exposed upon the Statute-book, and that we should know exactly what our law was. Now, of course, we have not got one marriage law for the whole Dominion, because this Legislature has not hitherto acted upon that law, and the laws of the various Provinces, therefore, are at this moment as they were. It is one thing to legislate on a subject untouched; it is an entirely different thing when we are called upon to legislate in a sense which shall not produce uniformity or certainty, but which will perpetuate a difference and an uncertainty in our law. Now, the purpose for which this change was proposed by my hon. friend from Maskinongé in 1880 was the purpose, presumably, for which the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has adopted, in 1882, that clause, notwithstanding the strong vote against it in 1880. By these means a very different result will be accomplished from what was accomplished by the Bill as it passed to its third reading in 1880. By that Bill, as it passed this House, the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister would be civilly legal wherever it took place within the Dominion. The effect of the present plan is, that by the 125th section of the Code, such marriages are made absolutely void, and in the Province of Quebec those marriages are absolutely void to-day. To make them legal is one thing, but simply to repeal the prohibitions against them is to bring into force the 127th clause; and that is the purpose, I presume, of my hon. friend, to apply to these marriages, the prohibition in the 125th clause being removed, the provisions of the 127th. As the Bill stood in 1880, the marriage being made legal, the 127th clause would not have applied, but as it now stands it is intended to apply that clause. That clause will apply in Quebec, and what will be the consequence? That clause reads:

"The other impediments recognized, according to the different religious persuasions, as resulting from relationship or affinity, or from other causes, remain subject to the rules hitherto followed in the different churches and religious communities. The right, likewise, of granting dispensations from such impediments as heretofore to those who have hitherto enjoyed it."

The consequence of that will be that, instead of a marriage with a deceased wife's sister being a legal marriage in the point of view in which the law makes it legal or illegal, it will be subject to this 127th clause. It will, therefore, be a void marriage in the Province of Quebec as between persons of the Roman Catholic faith—not merely void according to the doctrines of their own Church, but now in the eye of the civil law—unless a papal dispensation be obtained. Nor am I quite certain whether the effect would not be the same with reference to the particular church to which I belong—whether there would not be an impossibility of contracting marriage, even civil, between such persons belonging to the Church of England. Thus it will happen that, by the Bill as now proposed, we shall have no uniformity; but, instead of that, we shall have a different law in one Province from the law in the other Provinces, and a different law, perhaps, affecting more than one of the religious communities into which the population is divided. It will happen thus, that we will not have certainty, because this question is to be disposed of according to the rules of the different churches which are not within our cognizance; but, as I observed in the Session of 1880, with reference to certain of these contentions, they are to be brought, according to the views of many jurists and Judges, before the Ordinary in the Province of Quebec, and—as happened in former cases—it happened not long ago in a case, for the judgment in which I moved the other day, that the decision as to the validity of such a marriage is to be determined first by the Ordinary, before a Civil Court can decide whether it is valid or not. I submit, therefore, that the House is taking a retrograde step if it chooses to assent to the view which was rejected by a majority of 133 to 10 in 1880, if it chooses now to adopt this provision of the Bill of my hon. friend instead of the provision which he warmly advocated in that year. The hon. gentleman's own name was recorded with the majority of 133, who voted against the proposition of the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Houde), and which he has now accepted and made the foundation of the present Bill. The hon. gentleman certainly owes us some explanation why he has adopted the proposition which we defeated by so large a majority on that occasion; but for us who, perhaps, are not so deeply interested in the understanding between the parity of two, as my hon. friend from Maskinongé (Mr. Houde), and my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard); it is important, also, to know why, when the principle in view in having the marriage laws to be disposed of by this Parliament was to secure uniformity, we should be asked to legislate, not in that direction, but in the direction of perpetuating diversity.

Mr. GIROUARD. I expected that the point, which the hon. gentleman has raised, as to the uniformity which would exist all over the Dominion, except the Province of Quebec, would be raised, but I expected that it would come from another hon. gentleman, a representative from that Province. The hon. gentleman says that the tendency of this Parliament is to have uniformity of law all over the Dominion on matters of marriage, that the clause was inserted in the British North America Act with that view; but it must be admitted that no action has been taken on the sub-section of clause 91, assigning different powers to different Parliaments; and it must also be admitted that there is another clause which defines the powers of the Local Legislatures, and a clause which will always prevent uniformity in the laws on the subject of marriage. I refer to the sub-section which entrusts the Local Legislatures with all matters pertaining to the celebration of marriage. The Dominion Parliament have nothing to do with the celebration of marriage, and consequently we never will succeed in having uniformity of legislation on that subject. To day, all over the Dominion, the marriage laws are quite different in one sense. We have no one civil officer by whom marriage has to be celebrated, and some years ago the Church of England in Upper Canada insisted that Non-conformists should be married by their ministers; and it was only when a special law was passed that marriages could be celebrated even between the Dissenters themselves by Dissenting ministers. As I stated, the laws of marriage all over the Dominion are quite different, and we have put that construction on the Bill as it is now framed to-day, and I do not see why it should not be adopted if the Government is willing to accept it as it is. The hon. gentleman asks why I have accepted certain provisions of the Bill which I opposed on a former occasion. The present Bill, I admit, differs from the other in many respects, but the other was defeated in the Senate by the narrow majority of one, and I regard it as of great importance that we should secure the present one from defeat in the other branch of Parliament. I know, as a matter of fact, that the Bill worded as it now is will meet the views of more than half-a-dozen Senators who would have opposed it in the shape in which it appeared two Sessions ago, and this is one reason and the main one which induced me to adopt these changes. There is another part of the Bill to which the hon. gentleman has made allusion; that is to the marriage of a widow with a deceased husband's brother. That change which the hon. gentleman asked for was defeated by a large majority, and the reason I accepted it to-day was not to get a majority here, because we know the feeling to be in favor of it in this House, but for the same reason that I mentioned with regard to the other part of the Bill, viz., to secure a majority in the Senate. I know, as a matter of fact, that if that provision had been included in the other Bill it would have passed the Senate, and, although I believe that that provision should not have been included, I have made the alteration in order to ensure the success of the measure. I, therefore, submit that the wording of the Bill as framed to-day is sufficiently warranted by the circumstances of the case.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think that the reasons given by the hon. gentleman are sufficient to justify the important changes which have been made in the character of the Bill. Now, the hon. gentleman proposes to provide by this Bill that all these disabilities shall be removed; but he does not provide for the absolute removal of these disabilities, so far as the Province of Quebec is concerned. The hon. gentleman knows that parties standing in the relationships which are now declared improper for marriage, cannot marry in Quebec without a dispensation, and they will not stand on a footing of equality with persons similarly situated in the other Provinces. The hon. gentleman, in this Bill, does not recognize the right of the individual at all. In the Province of Quebec, he says, the disability shall continue unless a dispensation is obtained. The Bill, as it stood before, did not attack the religious opinions of anybody; it did not say that any person should be in good standing in a church, who did not marry according to the canons of the church; it left that to be decided by the religious society to which the person belonged. But it said that if he wished to contract such a marriage, no impediment should stand in his way. I do not think we ought to subject parties to disabilities in one Province which would not exist in any other Province in the Dominion. This, the hon. gentleman does by his Bill. The hon. gentleman says, he is making these changes, not because he thinks them right or proper; on the contrary, he prefers the Bill as it was before; but he makes them in consideration of the hostility of certain gentlemen in the Senate. Now, the passage of this Bill in this House last Session by a very large majority, and its sanction by the popular branch of Parliament for the second time, would be very good reasons why the Senate should not persist in their rejection of the Bill. We know that the rule that prevails in the Parliament of the United Kingdom is, that if a measure is carried through the House of Commons one year after another by very large majorities, the House of Lords abandon their objections out of deference to the thus well-expressed will of the representatives of the people. There is no doubt that rule would prevail here if the hon. gentleman persevered in the Bill as it passed this House the Session before last. I regret very much the changes made in the Bill, because I do not think they will secure uniformity in the individual rights of the people in the different sections of the Dominion, and we ought not to legislate for the purpose of making such distinctions as the hon. gentleman proposes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I agree with my hon. friends on the other side in preferring the Bill as it passed this House the Session of 1880, when it was a simple declaration that such marriages were legal. However, I have not charge of the Bill of my hon. friend, who desires to carry out, as far as he can, the principles of the Bill which he introduced and pressed in this House with such force in 1880, for the reason that in its present shape it is more likely to become law. And that is a very good reason—at all events to myself—why I should vote for this Bill, although I would have preferred that it had another form. I do not quite go with my hon. friend from West Durham in the view that the division of the jurisdiction between the Local and Federal Parliaments was for the purpose of producing uniformity in the law with regard to what marriage consists of. We can well understand the reason of that division of jurisdiction; from the fact of the Catholic religion prevailing in Lower Canada, it was thought better that the Provinces should each provide for their own mode by which marriage could be effected. To say what marriage is, who a person may marry, belongs to the Federal Parliament; the mode of making them man and wife belongs to the Local Legislature. But it does not follow that we cannot recognize and provide for the different divisions of the Dominion, just as is done in England with regard to England and Scotland. I presume, however, that this clause will, in effect, amount to what the Bill of 1880 proposed to effect—that, as a general principle every man will be free to marry any woman who will marry him exclusive of the prohibition which the law of the country establishes. The 125th section of the Code which the hon. gentleman cited, prohibits marriage “between a brother and sister, legitimate or natural.” This clause removes that prohibition, and if it stood alone it would have the same effect as if it positively declared the marriage to be legal. But my hon. friend says the 127th clause would prevent this Bill going into operation in the Province of Quebec as it would elsewhere. This clause speaks of “the other impediments recognized according to the different religious persuasions resulting from relationship or affinity.” What other affinities are referred to? I would like to hear my hon. friend on that point for whose legal acumen I have the highest respect.

Mr. BLAKE. If my hon. friend is right, I am sure his faithful followers, the hon. members for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), and Maskinongé (Mr. Houde), will be very much disappointed, because the object they have in view would not be attained. I will tell the hon. gentleman the reason why I think the change has been made. As long as the 125th section and the 127th section remain, “the other impediments” do not mean the impediments that exist under the 125th section. But the instant you wipe out by this law the particular impediment, it proposes to wipe out, viz., the prohibition as to marriage with a deceased wife's sister, it ceases to be one of the impediments mentioned in section 125, and therefore it becomes one of “the other impediments” mentioned in section 127. Such is the process of reasoning which has convinced the hon. members for Jacques Cartier and Maskinongé that this clause will secure the particular result they hope to obtain. Of course, they may be mistaken; but is it well that the marriage law should exist in such uncertainty? Had we not better make the matter plain before we get through with the Bill?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The 125th clause prohibits these marriages; that is repealed. But my hon. friend says that if that is repealed then the 127th clause must prohibit such marriages. I think subsequent legislation must override both clauses.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. McCUAIG. As a layman, I am entirely opposed to this Bill. I believe that the educated opinion of Great Britain is against it, and all the possessions of Great Britain should follow the example of the Empire. Believing that I will record my vote against the Bill, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Daly, that the following proviso be added to the Bill:

"Provided that no clergyman or minister of the Gospel, authorized to perform the ceremony in marriage, shall be obliged to perform such ceremony if the woman is the sister of the former wife of the man to whom she desires to be married."

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I beg to ask the mover of the Bill if the Roman Catholics in my Province will be under a different law to their co-religionists living in the Province of Quebec, where such marriages would not be good without a papal dispensation.

Mr. GIROUARD. I never said they would not be good without a papal dispensation. The application of article 127 is open to some doubt, but most assuredly that article can have no effect in New Brunswick, to which the Civil Code does not apply.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman doubt whether clause 127 does apply? I do not think we shall pass a law when such a doubt exists.

Mr. GIROUARD. It will not be the first instance where the laws of marriage will not be the same within all the Provinces.

Mr. BLAKE. It is quite different whether the laws will be diverse or whether the laws will be but uncertain.

Mr. GIROUARD. It is not uncertain.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member said it was uncertain whether clause 127 would apply.

Mr. GIROUARD. What if it does?

Mr. BLAKE. We want to know whether it does apply or not.

Mr. GIROUARD. Suppose it does?

Mr. BLAKE. The House should pause before it passes a law with respect to the marriage contract, which is the foundation of all society, when the author of the Bill confesses the doubt as to its meaning. I think the course should be that adopted with respect to all important legal Bills, namely, a reference to a Select Committee.

Mr. GIROUARD. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I fancy there is no doubt about the question.

Mr. GIROUARD. In regard to the amendment of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig), I doubt very much whether this House has jurisdiction, but if it has I have no objection to its insertion in the Bill.

Mr. MILLS. The Bill should provide that marriage between a man and the sister of a deceased wife shall be legal, instead of putting it in the form it is here. That being what the House is anxious to declare, why should we not say so?

Mr. HOUDE. When I proposed, two years ago, an amendment similar to the present terms of the Bill, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier opposed it, because he did not see any material difference in the form proposed by me and the form proposed by himself then. I understood it was the general opinion of the House at that time that there was no material difference in the two forms, although I and some others thought the form proposed by me was the better one.

Mr. BLAKE. Why?

Mr. HOUDE. I stated at the time why. The hon. members for West Durham and Bothwell now show much solicitude for my co-religionists of the Province of Quebec. I am very glad of that fact, and, no doubt, when an occasion presents itself my co-religionists will show themselves thankful for that solicitude; but, under these peculiar circumstances, I think there is no need of their kind protection. I think we can interpret and represent their sentiments on this occasion as well as the hon. members for West Durham and Bothwell. I do not think they can speak better than others for the Catholics of Quebec, and the Bill does not affect brethren of a different faith. It is only Catholics who might be affected by this particular form, if affected at all particularly. As my co-religionists have not complained—they have seen the form, as now presented, for several weeks, and I believe not a single voice of complaint has been heard—I do not believe those two hon. gentlemen are justified in appearing here in the role of protectors of my co-religionists of the Province of Quebec. As regards the amendment of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) I must say that the Civil Code of Quebec contains sufficient provisions to protect ministers of every denomination against being forced to celebrate marriages to which they have religious objections. If the other Provinces have not the same stipulations they might imitate that part of the Civil Code; but I do not believe we have the constitutional right to accept the amendment of the hon. member as it refers to solemnization of marriage; to say that ministers shall not be obliged to celebrate marriages, is to trespass on the ground of the solemnization of marriage, a power which belongs to the Local Legislatures.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend has moved an amendment to the first clause, and then my hon. friend from Bothwell moved an amendment to the amendment, to strike it out.

Mr. MILLS. I did not move anything. I asked the hon. gentleman if he would accept such an amendment. I said, in reply to the hon. gentleman from Maskinongé that he appeared to take greater care for the Province of Quebec than for the people of the other Provinces. Now, Sir, before the hon. gentleman can indulge in argument of that sort, he must confine his Bill to the Province of Quebec; but he has not done so, he has taken the whole Dominion under his patronizing care. So has the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill; he has undertaken to deal with this question on behalf of the whole Dominion, and I think he is quite right and proper in doing so. I believe, Sir, we sit here as the representatives of Canada, not as representatives of the Province of Quebec or the Province of Ontario; we are here as representatives of the whole Dominion, and we should so discuss this question which affects the common well-being of the country at large. The hon. gentleman has introduced his Bill and it relates to the whole Dominion, yet he undertakes to deal with one Province in a way a little different from that in which he treats the other Provinces; then he says, this is my special Province you have no right to interfere here, this is sacred ground and you have no right to enter here and discuss what we have to do in this particular Province, you must confine yourself to the other Provinces of the Dominion. That is the position which the hon. gentleman has taken towards the hon. leader of the Opposition and towards gentlemen on the other side who have discussed this particular measure. Now, Sir, I think in discussing a question of this sort we should try to put the people of the whole Dominion upon a footing of perfect equality; the hon. gentleman refuses to do that, and he places a certain portion of the population—the people of Quebec—in an entirely different position from that occupied by the people of the same faith in every other Province of the Dominion. I object to that, and the hon. gentleman who now has charge of the Bill objected to it when it was proposed two years ago, and when a very large majority of this House refused to concur in an amendment of exactly the same character as the Bill that is now before the House.

Mr. HOUDE. In answer to the remarks of my hon. friend from Bothwell, I must say that I believe the ideas which I hold on this and other subjects are not more narrowly bounded than his own. I was not the first to drag the name of the Province of Quebec into this debate, but that was done by the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Mills), and the member for West Durham. I am discussing this Bill from the point of view of my conscience, as the hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, also does, and it was because the Bill, as at first presented, according to my views, was contradictory to the doctrine I hold and opposed to my religious views, that I did not accept it. I contend that I am entitled to the same latitude as the hon. gentleman himself in this direction, when dealing with so important a subject. I do not know what are the peculiar views of my hon. friend on this subject, but my view is that marriage is a religious contract before being a civil contract, and, because I entertain these views, I prefer the later form of this legislation to that which was at first proposed.

Mr. BLAKE. But my hon. friend attacked both my hon. friend for Bothwell and myself, because he said we were interfering with Quebec, and that this Bill was going to interfere with Quebec. The hon. gentleman will not deny that it is going to alter the laws as they affect Quebec, Ontario and all the other Provinces of this Dominion, but he seems to think it was wrong to mention the circumstance that he would produce a different state of law in the Province of Quebec than in the other Provinces. Is there anything wrong in that? Is it proper that the hon. gentleman and his friends should confine their remarks to the effects of the law upon the one Province, of Quebec; and if they do not speak of the other Provinces, are all to be dumb? The hon. gentleman really agrees with me as to what the effect will be, and it certainly will not be good, yet he says in substance—I do not choose to say so, and you have no right to say so—I deny that I hold any such restricted tenure as that. I have a duty to perform and must point out what the effect of the proposed change will be upon all the Provinces. I deem it of the last consequence that in dealing with this contract of marriage our legislation should be perfectly clear and that there should be no uncertainty about it: that some classes of persons are entitled to marry and others are dis-entitled to marry all through the bounds of this wide Dominion, and I cannot think that I have done anything wrong in stating and endeavoring to enforce that proposition.

Mr. McCUAIG. I can very well understand that the laymen of this House should not be familiar with this subject, and they cannot perhaps understand the proposed effect of this law introduced by my hon. friend. I think, however, when we see, as we do this evening, the ablest lawyers of this House disagreeing as to its effects, then by far the safer plan will be to throw it out altogether.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me that the effect of the proposition as it stands would be in the case of a person in the Province of Quebec having married his deceased wife's sister, and which marriage was long void; if such a person afterwards married somebody else, which marriage was good, he would find himself suddenly married again to this sister of his deceased wife.

Mr. GIROUARD. There is a second clause to meet that.

Mr. BLAKE. I think that would be the effect.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Boulton). The first clause reads:

"All laws prohibiting marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife."

Mr. Girouard moves to substitute for that the following:—

"All laws prohibiting a marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife are hereby repealed, both as to past and future marriages, and, as regards past marriages, are as if such laws had never existed."

Mr. WELDON. This proposed amendment, as regards New Brunswick, is going to have some effect; for instance, it will legalize marriages which have been declared by our Provincial laws as void.

Mr. GIROUARD. There is a clause to protect you from that result.

Mr. WELDON. When a decree has been pronounced there may be a call to reverse it. I feel doubtful as to the effect of this clause. Indeed, so far as my feeling goes I am opposed to the Bill altogether; and after what has been stated as to the diverse effects it will have in the different Provinces, I believe it requires further consideration. I should certainly like a clause inserted to the same effect as the amendment of my hon. friend from Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig), in regard to the protection of clergymen of conscientious scruples. There is a great difficulty about the solemnization of marriage, with regard to the constitutional position, and something like a declaration should be made. In fact, I receive letters from persons of high position in my church, the Church of England, asking for something of that kind. Indeed, many of the bishops and clergy are strongly opposed to the Bill, and will experience strong scruples in carrying it out. There is a difficulty about the solemnization of marriage. This subject long confused the Local Legislatures; but something should be done to show it is not the intention of the Dominion Parliament to place fetters on a clergyman who may have conscientious scruples in regard to this measure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it was the object of the Legislature in 1880 to take care that the law, if the principle of the Bill was adopted, should affect past as well as future marriages. It would be rather absurd to sanction any other result, or to provide that one marriage with a deceased wife's sister was lawful and proper after the Act, and that another, before the Act, must be considered incestuous. It would be wrong and absurd that our legislation should have that effect. But my hon. friend opposite says there may be cases of an absolute declaration of the illegality of a marriage, and that in consequence the parties might consider themselves as severed, standing towards each other as if no marriage had taken place. Well, I understand that a subsequent clause in this Bill removes that objection. If the clause as it stands in the Bill does not remove that objection, it should be so strengthened as to produce that effect; if there has been any judicial binding severance of a marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife, that should be held to be binding till a new alliance took place subsequent to such decision. I think that view is quite right as to the other point raised by my hon. friend opposite and the hon. member for Prince Edward. I am not aware, as regards Ontario, that there is any law obligatory on clergymen to compel them to marry people whom they do not choose to marry. In England, where there is an Established Church, and where formerly, marriages could only be celebrated by clergymen of that Church, they were obliged to marry parties in cases where there was no legal disability. I do not remember, at this moment, if there is any obligation upon the clergyman of any denomination to marry people whom they do not choose to marry.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me the hon. gentleman's observation does not completely answer the point. I think it will not be right that the Bill should simply deal with the cases in which a judicial severance had been followed by a second marriage, or in which, without judicial severance, if the marriage was simply null there had been a second marriage; but also cases in which there may have been a judicial severance and the parties may have been remaining together.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They may be married again.

Mr. BLAKE. I know they can, but if you provide that all the provisions are removed, as if the laws had never existed, then in what position are those parties with reference to whom there has been a judicial declaration under the old laws that their marriage was a void one? How do they stand after that? Are they married?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think it would be for us to marry them. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier would quite object to this part of it.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I think it is very clear that this clause, as it stands now, would legalize a marriage which had been declared void by the judicial tribunal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is another clause to meet that. First, we legalize the marriage, and then comes the clause containing the exception.

Mr. GIROUARD. We have to provide for vested rights.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. What do you call vested rights? If a marriage by law is absolutely void there is no vested rights.

Mr. GIROUARD. The hon member forgets that, by the first section, that marriage void to-day will be valid.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. No; you make exceptions; even though they are separated by judicial decision. I think we had better report progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend if he ever heard of a judicial separation by either husband or wife unless they wanted to marry somebody else.

Mr. WELDON. Under our divorce laws they would have to have a permission from the Divorce Courts to marry again. I know a case where a marriage was declared void on this ground, and neither of the parties are married again.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Would it not be better for the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, knowing that every one is desirous of aiding him in this matter, to refer the Bill to a small Select Committee.

Mr. GIROUARD. The Bill has been so much discussed already there is no need of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is quite evident there is a wide divergence of opinion as to the terms. My hon. friend had a consultation with the hon. the First Minister, but the result was only the changing of one word. Now, if he gets his hon. friend on a Select Committee, and two or three other legal gentlemen with him, the Bill may be produced in such a shape that we can all accept it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Bill of 1880 provided in the positive that all such marriages were legal. This merely provides in the negative, but containing a proposition that all such marriages are repealed—just exactly the same thing, according to my view. My hon. friend says that by having it in one form rather than the other the Bill will pass both Houses, and, if we adopt the phraseology of 1880, the likelihood is the Bill will be lost.

On clause 2,

Mr. GIROUARD. The clause is put in with a view of meeting open estates, where estates have devolved to the children of the first marriage. I, therefore, propose the following:—

“Nothing herein shall affect the rights acquired by the issue of the first marriage previous to the passing of this Act.”

Mr. BLAKE. The practical result would be, in the case I have stated, that if there has been a judicial declaration that the first marriage is void, the effect of this clause will be to re-marry them.

Mr. McCUAIG. I think this had better be referred to a Select Committee. The mover of the Bill does not seem to understand what it will accomplish.

Mr. GIROUARD. Of course, it is very difficult to provide for all cases which may come up hereafter; that is the reason I make the clause general, as it is in the Bill. It will be for the court to decide, in any case coming before it, what shall be the effect of this clause. We might put in this clause:

“Nor shall this section render legal any such marriage where either of the parties has afterwards, during the life of the other and before the passing of this Act, lawfully entered into marriage with another party.”

I have taken this from the debate in 1880, as given in the Hansard.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend will observe that he has not yet met the case stated by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon).

Mr. GIROUARD. I do not intend to meet every case. Let him propose an amendment to meet it.

Mr. BLAKE. We have got to meet every reasonable case that may occur. That would meet the case I had suggested of a subsequent marriage. But the hon. gentleman for St. John says he knows a case of a judicial declaration that the marriage was null, upon which the parties had separated and had lived apart for twenty years. Do you propose, by Act of Parliament, to join them together again as husband and wife? Why do it? They were not married. The law has declared they are not married. They are separated for twenty years, and they have not married again. You surely are not going to marry them again at 9 o'clock in the evening.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think they ought to be married by Act of Parliament. They had no right to sever.

Mr. HOUDÉ. Retroactive laws are always pregnant with difficulty and danger, and I think it would not be desirable to regulate retroactively in a matter of such importance as the present.

Mr. GIROUARD. I agree with the hon. gentleman, but it is difficult to frame a clause on such terms as to meet so many different views.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. It is obvious that, in a question of this kind on which so much depends on phraseology, and in view of the fact that the marriage laws of Nova Scotia—and perhaps of some of the other provinces—exist by virtue of an Imperial Act (which Acts we are by the Constitutional Act prohibited from repealing)—in view of these facts I think it would be well if my hon. friend would accept the suggestion from the other side and refer the Bill to a Select Committee where legal gentlemen from the various provinces could meet together and agree on the language to be used in the Bill—language which must carefully discriminate between the powers of the Federal Parliament and the powers of the Local Legislatures. In the Constitutional Act there is to be observed a distinction—upon the exact limits of which, however, no two lawyers in the House, perhaps, could be found to agree—between the powers of the Local Legislatures, as to the solemnization of marriage, and the powers of this Parliament with respect to the general question of marriage and divorce and the consequences that flow from them. As the question is one of very serious import to private parties, if the Bill is to be workable, I think it would be well to have it carefully considered by all the light possible to be obtained from the legal minds of the House so as to render it creditable to Parliament, and to the hon gentleman who has it in charge, and satisfactory to the public.

Mr. WELDON. Do I understand the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) to say that we cannot repeal an Imperial Act? If that is the case that principle will apply to the Province of New Brunswick, as our marriage law is based on a statute of Henry VIII.

Mr. GIROUARD. I am rather surprised to hear a constitutional lawyer, like the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) say that we have not power to repeal an Imperial Act. When this same question came before the House, two years ago, we intended to repeal an Imperial Act in a very direct manner, by saying that such marriages shall be declared legal, and if we could say so then, why not now? The question then, to-day, is whether we shall repeal an Imperial Statute, and I do not see why this House should not pass the present Bill without referring it to a Select Committee. There is, of course, the difficulty about making the provisions of the Bill retroactive in their effect—every hon. member is anxious to meet his own particular case—but I think the Bill is much more likely to be dealt with intelligently and effectively by a large Committee like the present than by referring it to a Committee composed of five or six members.

Mr. RICHEY. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) appreciates the difficulty which some of us feel very strongly. We are assuming to do what really we are not doing by the Act. We hold out to the country that we are about to legalize throughout the Dominion of Canada, marriage with a deceased wife's sister, whereas the Act seems to be framed solely with regard to one Province, the Province of Quebec. It seems to me that the Bill will be productive of mischief greater than the mischief which it proposes to remedy. Suppose the Act is passed, it is assumed all over the Dominion that a man is to be allowed to marry the sister of his deceased wife, and that such marriages may be carried into effect. A great deal is left in this Bill to the construction of the courts. Some of the courts may decide that, under this Bill, marriage with a deceased wife's sister was not rendered legal. What would be the position of the married parties then? Infinitely worse than if such an Act had not been passed. The hon. gentleman does not seem to make a distinction between an Act such as this, declaring in general terms that all laws opposed to marriage with the sister of a deceased wife are repealed, and a law which declares such marriages to be valid. In this Province we are assumed to have brought with us the Common Law of England, and such portions of the Statute Laws, as are applicable to our several circumstances. Assuming the Acts of Henry VIII to be applicable in the different Provinces, the courts of these Provinces may have declared such marriages to be voidable under the Statutes of Henry VIII. Now, the point to be put to the House is, whether if, under such a generally expressed statute as that, the Statute of Henry VIII is to be repealed. It would be competent for us to legislate on all these subjects and declare that notwithstanding that Act such marriages shall be legal, but to assume to repeal an English Statute is a different thing. For these reasons we should feel disposed and desirous to sustain the Bill which was originally brought into this House, because it is simple and complete in its terms. It declares that these marriages shall be valid, and that is the very thing which the House assumes before the country to do.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I hope the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill will consent to refer it to a Committee. Its phraseology instead of being such as to make it likely to pass this Parliament will, I am inclined to fear, have the opposite effect. The difficulties which have been suggested in regard to it are of such a character that as a layman I feel that I should have grave doubts about voting for it as it stands to-day, strongly as I am in favor of allowing marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife. I am satisfied, looking at the measure simply from the discussions which have taken place to-day, that the effect of the Bill is to make it apply specially or particularly—in terms at any rate—to the Province of Quebec alone. Of course, it applies in general terms outside of that Province, but at the same time there are distinct provisions which are introduced expressly and simply because of the Code of Lower Canada. My hon. friend from Maskinongé (Mr. Houde) seemed to feel that any reference to that fact was taken in the point of view of the hon. gentleman who made reference to-day to the Roman Catholics of the Province of Quebec, but who should remember that there are a few Protestants in the Province of Quebec, and that the clauses of the Code apply to them as well as to the Roman Catholics. I think, therefore, we should have either a declaratory law, as we had two years ago, declaring such marriages to be legal, or else put this Bill in the hands of a Select Committee of lawyers from the different Provinces, who will be able to settle the phraseology as will make the Bill one likely to pass this House, and make it effective in the country for the end we have in view.

Mr. GIROUARD. I think the objection of the hon. gentleman applies to the first clause of the Bill, which has been adopted, and the same difficulty will be repeated with regard to its retroactive effects.

Mr. WHITE. But the hon. gentleman must remember that his Bill has not yet passed this House, and the discussion will probably be reviewed when it comes before the House, and, therefore, those of us who are really in favor of the measure can discuss it, with the view of having it adopted, as it passed this Chamber before.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Several hon. gentlemen have spoken in favor of referring this Bill to a Special Committee. They say simply that they prefer the Bill of 1880 to that of 1882, and if you had a Committee it would have to decide in favor of one or the other. There is no use of having a Special Committee to decide that point. My suggestion is that the Committee should rise and report the Bill; and in concurrence, on the third reading, any hon. gentleman who desires the Bill of 1880 to be substituted for this Bill may move it, and we shall have this question settled at once.

Bill reported with amendments.

PUNISHMENT OF ADULTERY, SEDUCTION, &c.

Mr. CHARLTON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 25) to amend the Criminal Law and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting offences against the person by providing for punishment of adultery, seduction, &c., &c., said: I have long felt, Sir, that the state of our Criminal Law is very incomplete in regard to the class of offences which the Bill I now desire to be read the second time, deals with. The preamble of the Bill states very clearly the reasons which have led me to propose that these offences should be made criminal:

“Whereas it is expedient to provide for the punishment of offences against chastity, morality and decency, and to afford some measure of redress to the victims of the debauching wiles of offenders against virtue and domestic peace.”

In moving the second reading of this Bill, I shall simply ask the House to affirm one or more of the principles embodied in it, and if the House sees fit to do that, I shall then move for its reference to a Special Committee. The principles of this Bill are already embodied in the Criminal Statutes of Canada. We have on our Statute-book a law providing for the punishment of seduction under certain circumstances. We have a law providing that seduction on board a vessel is criminal, and I am unable to see why the principle should not also prevail on land. The first section of this Bill provides that adultery shall be a misdemeanor; that no prosecution shall take place except upon the complaint of the husband or wife of one of the offending parties, and that no prosecution shall take place two years after the commission of the offence. The third clause provides for the punishment of lewd cohabitation or behavior. The fourth clause provides for the punishment of inveigling or concealing a previous chaste female into or in a house of ill-fame. The fifth clause gives power to search for a female so inveigled, and to bring her before a magistrate for delivery to parents or guardians. The sixth clause provides punishment of teachers seducing their female pupils. The seventh clause provides punishment for seduction under promise of marriage. The eighth clause provides for punishment of seduction, by a married man, under promise of marriage and pretence of being unmarried. The ninth clause gives right of action for seduction, by females seduced. The tenth clause provides that the father or mother or guardian may maintain such action. The eleventh clause provides that in those actions, action for loss of service shall not be prevented. The twelfth clause provides that the testimony of the female, in certain cases, shall require corroboration. The thirteenth clause makes provision with respect to the finding of indictments. I find that a law similar to the Bill I have introduced exists in twenty-seven States of the Union; in Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New Jersey, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, California, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Arkansas, South Carolina, Oregon, and others. Every one of the Northern States has a law of this nature on the Statute-book. I find the English Commissioners who were charged with the duty of making enquiries with respect to the abduction or inveigling of females to the Continent, for the purposes of prostitution, have recommended a law similar to this punishing seduction. Believing these are offences which the Criminal Law of Canada should take cognizance of, and believing this Bill is a step in the right direction, whether the details are right or not, I beg to move the second reading, with the understanding that if the Bill is read a second time, it shall be referred to a Special Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a good deal of difficulty, under the present circumstances, in introducing a Bill of this kind. A certain portion of the Bill meets with my most hearty approval and will receive my most hearty support. I think, however, some portions of it would not serve as a protection to female virtue, but have a contrary effect; but as the hon. gentleman says he is going to send it to a Special Committee, and as I go with the hon. gentleman fully in all that portion of the Bill which affects attacks on the sacredness of the marriage tie, I shall be glad to see the Bill have a second reading and go to a Special Committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 14th March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE PUBLIC LANDS OF THE DOMINION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move for leave to introduce Bill (No. 101) to amend and consolidate the several Acts respecting the Public Lands of the Dominion of Canada. As it is known to the House, there are three Acts in existence at present in regard to these lands—the Dominion Act of 1879, and two amendments; and it is found exceedingly inconvenient, by those persons who are going to the North-West, to be obliged to scan them in order to find out exactly what the provisions of the Land Act are. Consequently they are being consolidated for the convenience of the country. There are some amendments with which I will not trouble the House at present, but which will appear fully marked in the Bill, so as to be seen by every hon. member.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD

DOMINION MOUNTED POLICE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move for leave to introduce Bill (No. 102) further to amend and consolidate the several enactments respecting the North-West Mounted Police Force. The main object of the Bill is to enact the resolution which I have placed on the paper, for the increase of that force, which I think is necessary. I may, on Friday, move that resolution. There are sundry clauses affecting the discipline and training of the force, which may be found to be necessary.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to ask if the right hon. gentleman has made any provision in the Bill for the taking of old volunteers into the North-West Mounted Police Force. Many of them look forward to that as a kind of promotion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Men cannot be taken into the force under eighteen, nor over forty years of age. Subject to this rule, if they pass military inspection and can read and write, they are admissible, if their characters are good, and their characters are supposed to be good. Recruits will be taken as they offer themselves. They must, however, be able to read and write; being peace officers they must be intelligent, be able to serve processes, and must have the physical qualifications of a soldier. With those qualifications the rule will be, first come first served.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I desire to call the attention of the House to a paragraph in the Montreal Gazette of to-day, which reflects seriously and most unjustly on my conduct as a member of this House. The paragraph is as follows:—

"Among the Bills which passed a second reading was that to amend the Act relating to the Montreal Telegraph Company. When the Bill, which is in the charge of Mr. Hector Cameron, was reached, Mr. Blake enquired whether the Bill asked for powers which would legalize the lease to the Great North-Western Telegraph Company. Mr. Cameron endeavored to evade the question and mislead the House by answering 'no,' that it merely asked for the powers granted to the Dominion Telegraph Company some years ago. 'But,' said Mr. Blake, 'the power which it seeks is the power to lease, or, in other words, to confirm the arrangement with the Great North-Western Telegraph Company.' The brief altercation, this afternoon, indicates that the leader of the Opposition will oppose the Bill of the Montreal Telegraph Company."

I find the report in the Hansard of what did occur is as follows, and is substantially correct, I think, with the exception of a couple of verbal errors:—

"Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 96) to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Montreal Telegraph Company.

"Mr. BLAKE. I should like to ask my hon. friend if this Bill affects the recent arrangement made with the Great North-Western Telegraph Company.

"Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). No, it is simply a consolidation of the Acts relating to the Montreal Telegraph Company with the introduction of the same clause that was put in the charter of the Dominion Telegraph Company last year."

What I really did say was "some years ago."

"Mr. BLAKE. But that would affect it.

"Mr. CAMERON. It does not affect the existing arrangement.

"Mr. BLAKE. But it would give the power.

"Mr. CAMERON. It would give power to make 'release.'

The word should be to make "a lease." I do not intend to submit, without remonstrance at least, to an imputation of improper motives on my conduct and language as a member of the House; either coming from an irresponsible newspaper correspondent in the gallery, or from any hon. member on the floor of the House, who may be responsible, either directly for his utterances in this House, or indirectly for what may appear in the newspaper under his control. The statement that I endeavored either to evade the question or mislead the House is false. The statement which I made was literally true—that the Bill in question in no way affects the existing arrangements with the Great North-Western Railway Company, nor is it intended to do so. I stated exactly what is the case in saying that its object is, simply, the consolidation of the Acts in relation to the Montreal Telegraph Company, with the addition of a clause copied, verbatim, from the Act passed in relation to the Dominion Telegraph Company several years ago. When the hon. member for West Durham asked the question, if it would not affect the lease; I replied, it does not affect the existing arrangement between the companies, nor does it. The existing arrangement stands on its own validity. It may be now either valid or invalid; but that existing arrangement stands entirely unaffected by the Bill introduced. Then, when the question was asked, would it give the power to make any new arrangement in the form of a lease or otherwise; I expressly stated, that it would give the Montreal Telegraph Company shareholders, if they thought fit, power to make new arrangements in the former lease if they thought it was in their interest to do so. I stated candidly to the House exactly what the Bill was intended for, what it contained, and what its effects would be. I neither evaded the question of my hon. friend, nor did I mislead, or endeavor to mislead, the House. I regret that I do not see in his place in the House at present an hon. member who is supposed to have some control over the utterances of this newspaper, but I would venture to say that if he is not prepared to make a statement on the floor of the House of the kind that is in this newspaper, neither let it appear in the form of a communication from the irresponsible gallery correspondent under his control.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. McLELAN. Mr. Speaker, when the hon. the Minister of Finance delivered his Budget Speech some time ago, it was not expected then, I think, that this discussion should be so prolonged. That speech so clearly established the soundness and the wisdom of the policy adopted by the country in 1878, so triumphantly vindicated the course which the Government has since pursued, and so completely refuted all the objections which hon. gentlemen have brought against that policy, that we might have expected that they would remain almost silent upon the question. It was not unreasonable to suppose, I think, that in view of the position of the country, as shown by that speech, they would have abandoned all opposition to that policy, and would have said across the House to my hon. friend: "Whatever may be our opinions on the abstract theory of free trade, the experience of the past year or two has shown us clearly that, with the great natural resources our country possesses, and situated as Canada is, it is our duty to protect our own sons in the development of those resources, and in the building up here of a great country." But the hon. gentlemen have chosen to take another course; they have chosen to show themselves as active in opposition to this policy as they were in 1878. We should be thankful that they have so clearly and so distinctly defined the hostile attitude they assume towards this policy. We should be thankful that they have, with all the ability and ingenuity they possess, with all the zeal for which they are so remarkable, attacked the position of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance with so little effect. We have reason to be thankful, especially to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), for having directed our attention to that celebrated speech of his delivered in 1876, prepared and delivered at a time before this question had assumed so strong a party aspect as it has now, and which, when read, completely refutes and answers all the speeches the hon. gentleman has made upon this great question since that time. The hon. gentleman was good enough to tell us that he was born and bred a protectionist, that through the ardor of his youth, and far into the experience of the intellectual vigor of mature manhood, he lived a protectionist, that nine-tenths of his life he was a protectionist. Mr. Speaker, what is bred in the bone is hard to get out. I am sure that after that long experience and that long life spent in the advocacy of protectionist principles, if we could get behind party obligations, we would find the hon. gentleman the best protectionist that sits in the House. When the hon. gentleman was listening to the Budget Speech of my hon. friend, I was amusing myself in fancying the conflict that was going on in his mind. As a protectionist he must have been delighted, he must have rejoiced in the position of the country, as shown under that protective policy; he must have been delighted with the exhibit made when subsequently my hon. friend, in answer to him, gave the statement that, during the last six months, although there has been expended on public works $3,500,000, the public debt has been reduced $1,300,000. I am sure the hon. gentleman, as a protectionist, was jubilant and joyful; but, as a member of the Opposition, as a member of the Grit party, discomfited and discouraged; he would be ready at the same time, Sir, to give us a repetition of that quotation which he gave from the "Bigelow Papers":

We are clean out of hope, and almost out of lyin'."

If the hon. member for Lambton will permit me to use that choice and select couplet of his, I would say that the hon. member for North Norfolk, as a protectionist, "quoted a hymn and uttered a psalm;" but, as a disheartened Grit, he savagely said damn. The hon. gentleman has, however, defined his position. He has told the House that there is no change in him since last year, no change since the year before, there is no political change but one since 1876. He supports Free Trade and a revenue Tariff, and all the gentlemen who have spoken on that side of the House have defined that to be their position. The hon. member for Lambton has told us in his speech that he is ready to defend the principles he held in 1878, the principles upon which he went to the country and upon which he fell. He says that those are the principles by which he stands, on which he fell, and which he is ready to defend. In 1879, and in 1881, he stated in this House that he was ready to go out of the House but not ready to desert the principle of Free Trade. He now says:

"During the election of September, 1878, I am sure there was no lack of abundant declaration of policy on our part, to indicate precisely what was the line we intended to follow. We declined to accept anything looking in the direction of protection."

Again:

"The principle upon which the late Administration desired to conduct the affairs of the country, was to remove restrictions of all kinds from trade; to enable every one to buy and sell in the cheapest market without restriction, so far as it was possible for us to do this with the necessity resting upon us of raising a revenue from the Customs duties."

Further, he says:

"Protection, as a system, is a relic of barbarism. There should be free trade in goods as well as in land."

It is true the hon. gentleman referred to the opinions which had been advanced by him previous to 1878, and down through the controversy; that is, incidental protection, and his position now is the same position which he held previous to the elections, and all through the contest, viz., that there shall only be a revenue Tariff, and such incidental protection as may flow from it. But the House will see that the manufacturers can count nothing from such protection as the hon. gentleman advocates, because, if his object is solely to collect a revenue, the moment it prevents importation then he would lower the Tariff in order to induce a larger flow of imports into the country. The hon. the ex-Finance Minister (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) in defining his position, was more out-spoken and more violent than any of his hon. friends. On several occasions, in this House, he asserted that the cause of the failure of the manufacturers of this country, before the adoption of the National Policy, was simply that they had not brains enough or money enough to carry on their industries. He stated, further, that those who failed were shiftless and wanting in vigilance; and that the National Policy only provided for the shiftless and idle men who could not maintain a profitable business under fair competition. I ask the attention of the House for a few moments, while I read extracts, showing the views entertained by the hon. gentleman of the manufacturers of this country:

"Socially, I do not conceive it possible to imagine a policy which is likely to do more to corrupt the people of Canada than that brought down to-night. We have two dangerous classes to deal with; there is, at the base of society, always a class of shiftless and idle men, not having sufficient self-reliance to maintain themselves, and only too glad of any excuse to thrust the burden of maintenance on other persons, and you absolutely tell them that it is the duty of the Government to make the country prosperous, and provide employment for them all. Every one who knows anything of European affairs is aware that one of the greatest dangers with which European statesmen have to contend, is the spirit of socialism and socialistic ideas among a large class of the population, and, Sir, you are here deliberately introducing a system which recognizes the leading ideas of socialism, which, indeed, practically justifies the leading tenet of socialism, that property is theft, for, assuredly, property acquired in this way, under a Tariff such as this, is very little better than downright, legalized robbery."

He then says that:

"The manufacturers of Canada who had supported this National Policy are men who deliberately and shamelessly sold themselves to the present Government."

He goes on to say:

"But I know, also, there were many manufacturers who offered themselves for sale as shamelessly as it was possible for men to do. They were as frankly cynical about the matter as the Norman chief, who told the French Archbishop who proposed to convert him to the true faith:

'As for thy faith, a sea-king's gods
Are those which give him most.'

So these gentlemen's politics were as they openly declared: 'The politics which would give most,' and no doubt they did exercise a most powerful influence in displacing my hon. friend and of enabling hon. gentlemen opposite to return to power."

Again he says:

"Nor can they, with any degree of justice, raise the plea of vested interests which has been often used to prevent alterations of the Tariff as it stood. Where men have created a business under the operation of the Tariff framed for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the whole people, I admit a great deal may be said against any violent alterations or interference with what has been the settled policy of the country. But when men deliberately sell themselves to this or that political party for the avowed purpose of taxing the rest of the community, for their private benefit, there are no vested rights in such a case, though they may be vested wrongs enough for the people, when they come to their senses, to redress."

From these extracts will be seen the position which the ex-Finance Minister has taken all through this discussion; and at the present time all those who have spoken on the other side of the House have taken the ground that there can be no vested rights in the manufacturers, and the issue they put squarely before the people of this country is the same as it was in 1878; viz.: free trade or protection—our own markets for our own people, or our markets for the American manufacturers. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that we, on this side of the House, are anxious to avoid the discussion of other questions of infinitely greater importance, such, as the Boundary Award, the enlargement of the debt, and the public expenditure of the country, by bringing forward the question of the National Policy. I think the hon. gentleman will find that when the proper time comes there will be no shrinking, on the part of the hon. gentlemen on this side, from the discussion on any other question which he, or those who sit around him, may choose to raise. The hon. gentleman amused the House, I may say, with the large number of promises in which, speaking on behalf of the Reform party, he indulged. He says the Reform party:

"Promises to call a halt in this sweeping tide of public expenditure, which threatens to engulf the country in financial ruin. It promises to adopt, as a matter of parliamentary policy, the assumption that the public debt is large enough, and should not be permitted to exceed reasonable limits."

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman and those associated with him had, during the five years they sat on the Treasury benches, striven to stop that tide of public expenditure; if they had striven to keep down the public debt, the promise which the hon. gentleman now holds out to the House and to the country, would have been worthy of more consideration than it is. I did not expect that the hon. gentleman, who seems to be so familiar with the public records of the country, would have referred at all to the public expenditure and the creation of the public debt. Let me, for a moment, turn his attention, first to the condition of that debt, and show him who is responsible for the creation of the larger portion of it. Now, in all the comparisons hon. gentlemen opposite have made, they insist upon giving to the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House the year 1873-74, and in their own expenditure stopping at 1878. Let me make a comparison as to the public debt. On the 1st of July, 1874, the net debt was $108,324,964; on the 1st of July, 1867, it was $75,728,641; showing an increase of $32,596,323. Hon. gentlemen will bear in mind that this increase of debt, large as it was, was not nearly all for public works; $29,452,334 formed the debts of the Provinces which were added to the Confederation between 1867 and 1874, as well as the debts assumed from Ontario and Quebec which existed previous to 1867; leaving as the net increase during the seven years of the Administration of the hon. gentleman now occupying the Treasury benches the sum of $12,143,989, or an average increase for expenditure on public works of $1,734,555 a year. Hon. gentlemen should further bear in mind that during those seven years the Government also expended on public works, chargeable to capital, but paid for out of revenue, $14,778,034, or an average of $2,111,147 a year; and during that time they reduced the taxation by over $1,000,000, by remitting the duties on tea and coffee, and other articles of necessary consumption. Now, let hon. gentlemen opposite contrast and compare this with the five years that they held office. On the 1st of July, 1874, the net debt was $108,324,964, and on the 1st of July, 1879, it was $142,990,187, an increase in five years of $34,665,223. In addition to that there was spent $4,490,000 of the Fishery Award—and hon. gentlemen will see that but for the payment of the Fishery Award that amount of money would have been borrowed in the English market and have been added to the indebtedness—making in all $39,156,105, or an average of $7,831,221 a year, against an average increase by their predecessors of $1,734,855. Now, I have shown that hon. gentlemen opposite borrowed money upon the public credit of this country to be expended for the public works of this country, but which they expended in the ordinary expenses of their Government to the extent of $1,034,708. The hon. member for Lambton the other night took a good deal of credit to himself and his Government for having secured the Fishery Award to which I have referred.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McLELAN. Does the hon. gentleman forget that the hon. member for Lambton sent an ambassador—a quasi ambassador, as he called him the other night—down to Washington to negotiate a treaty to give up all claims to that Fishery Award, whatever it might be, and to give to the Americans permission to introduce a great portion of their manufactures into this country; in which, however he failed. And let me say this, Sir,—that there is on record the proof, which cannot be controverted, that all the arrangements for conducting that arbitration were made previous to the change of Administration.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No, there is not.

Mr. McLELAN. It is on record that the arrangement was made and sanctioned by the British Government that the arbitration should be held in a Dominion city, and that one of the arbitrators should be a Canadian subject. All these arrangements were made before the change of Administration, and the only thing the hon. gentleman's Government can take credit for is their negligence in bringing that arbitration to an earlier termination and getting the use of that money. The hon. member for North Norfolk will see from the figures I have given him, taken from the Public Accounts, that his own associates are directly chargeable with having increased largely the public debt of this country during their Administration.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us on what public works this borrowed money was expended.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. member for Lambton stated every dollar of it was expended honestly. We are not disposed to question his honesty or that of the hon. member for Middlesex, or to go all through the Public Accounts to find out whether this or that dollar was honestly expended. The question is: were not a great many thousands and millions of dollars improperly expended?

Mr. ROSS. No.

Mr. McLELAN. I am not to be drawn aside to go over the history of the public expenditure of these hon. gentlemen during five years. I am not going to refer to all the mistakes and blunders of their Administration from the St. Francis Locks down to the last dollar they improperly expended. I am willing at the present moment to say that the hon. gentleman acted honestly; I admit that the hon. gentleman who was then Premier of the Government did his incompetent best in controlling the expenditure, but I do say that a great many thousands and millions of dollars were expended uselessly for all time to the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite, I know, have said, time and again, that they were in difficulty on account of legacies left them by their predecessors. Why, the hon. member for Middlesex knows that, for seven years, the men who went out of office had been expending over $2,000,000 a year on an average, out of public revenue, on public works of capital account; and if the succeeding Government wanted to borrow money to prosecute these undertakings left them, the completion of the Intercolonial and the Pacific Railways, they had a surplus of over $2,000,000 a year, left by my hon. friend on my right, which would have paid the interest, at 5 per cent., on $40,000,000. When hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, the first thing they did was to increase the taxation of the country, by $3,000,000, which would have paid the interest, at 5 per cent., on $60,000,000; so that, with the surplus left by my hon. friend, and the additional taxation put upon the country, they had the means to pay interest on $100,000,000 with which to carry on the public works left to them. But the hon. member for West Middlesex asks me how that money was expended. I come back to the statement of the hon. member for Lambton, that every dollar was honestly expended, and that, when his Administration came out of office, they had 200 miles of railway running. They had expended nearly $11,000,000 on the Pacific Railway, and had not quite, as the hon. gentleman said, 200 miles of rails laid.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman read what I said?

Mr. McLELAN. I will give the hon. gentleman the figures exactly as to the position of the road at the time he went out of office. They had expended about $11,000,000 on the Pacific Railway in detached pieces, without any connection or even possible means of connection, not even were the St. Francis Locks finished. Here are the figures:

	Miles.
From Fort William to English River.....	97
" Selkirk to Telford.....	70
" Winnipeg to Selkirk.....	22

or an average of $37\frac{1}{2}$ miles per year. The rails were laid on these detached pieces of the road to the length of 189 miles, but, though the rails were laid, the road was far from being completed, and not a single passenger had been carried over a single mile of the 189 miles after an expenditure of \$11,000,000. With this expenditure they had only succeeded in laying rails, without carrying passengers, at the rate of thirty-seven miles a year. What has been accomplished by the present Administration?

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is not correct, the hon. gentleman embraces all that was done by the previous Government in what was done by the present one.

Mr. McLELAN. Will the hon. gentleman have a little patience? He will find patience in this life is a great virtue. Deduct from the 641 miles the 189 miles which the hon. gentleman had laid down but not finished.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There is more than that.

Mr. McLELAN. You will find with rails laid and in use, carrying passengers, 452 miles, constructed by the present Administration in three and a quarter years.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Mr. McLELAN. The contrast stands this way: The late Government expended $11,000,000, and laid at the rate of thirty-seven and a half miles of rails per year. The present Government have not expended so much money, and have built 139 miles per year. The hon. member for Middlesex can draw what comfort he likes from those figures, which are taken from the public records of the country. The hon. member for North Norfolk has referred to the sweeping tide of public expenditure, and promised, on behalf of the Reform party, to stop it. One would suppose that the hon. gentleman would have made some reference to the past, and been guided in his conclusions by the record of the five years during which his party were in power. A good deal has been said as to the manner in which the Public Accounts for 1873-4 have been prepared. It has been charged, and not denied, that the hon. gentlemen opposite who made up the accounts of 1874, held hon. gentlemen on this side responsible for the expenditure up to that year. Included in these Accounts are sums that were voted by the previous Parliament to be charged to capital account, sums amounting to over $900,000. And, Sir, it is upon the preparation of that account that they attempt at all to go into comparison of the expenditures of two Administrations. An American paper asked: "Can a democrat get to heaven?" And the Boston Transcript replied: "Certainly, if he has the handling of the returns." The hon. gentlemen opposite can go into a comparison when they have the handling of the returns, when they have the making up of the accounts, as they had in 1874. Now, Sir, they have been placing the gross expenditure of 1873-74 at $23,316,316, but with the deductions which have been shown as not properly belonging to that account, the true expenditure is $22,224,316. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) claimed the other night that he should receive credit for the increase of interest, for the amount paid to sinking fund, and the management of the debt. Take the whole amount for interest, sinking fund, management of debt and subsidies to Provinces at $11,952,641 in 1878-79, and deduct the amount paid in 1873-74 for the same services, and the increase of interest, sinking fund, and management, $10,255,793, and add the difference to the expenditure of 1873-74, and you have a total expenditure, assuming there have been increases in other departments, of $24,091,159; but we find, in 1878-79, the expenditure was $24,455,381, or an increase of $364,222. You will find also, in looking at the Accounts, that in addition to this hon. gentlemen opposite cut down the important and vital services of the country. They reduced Immigration and Quarantine, $106,318; Militia and Defence, $344,584; Public Works and Buildings, $812,408; Lighthouses and Coast Service, $89,491; so that, taking these into consideration it would be seen that in the other departments there was an increase of $1,717,053. The hon. member for Lambton told us the other night that there had been charged to capital account a large sum for Dominion lands, and I gathered from his manner that he thought it was an improper charge, and that it should have been charged against the revenue. But the House will bear in mind that in 1874-80 Parliament set apart 100,000,000 acres of land for the construction of the Pacific Railway, the proceeds thereof to be a capital account, and the cost of the survey of those lands is a proper charge against the sale of them, and should be so placed. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in making a comparison between 1873-74 and 1878, claim credit for having reduced the public expenditure, but, making a true calculation and deducting those charges which properly belong to capital, and those expenditures which were exceptional at the time, I have shown there was, during that period, an increase of really $1,717,053. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that in the present Estimates there is an appearance of a large increase, that whatever had been the expenditure up to 1878-79 on their part, hon. gentlemen who came into power in 1878 have largely increased the public expense of the country. I wish to turn the attention of the House for a moment to the remarks of the ex-Finance Minister upon this point, and I wish to show, from the speeches of the hon. gentleman, that his complaint in 1877-78 was, that the condition of the revenue was not such as to enable him to make that expenditure which the public service called for. The hon. gentleman said:

"No doubt, Sir, there is this misfortune in our present position—we are debarred, so long as our revenue continues in its present state, from attempting many things which I shall be glad to see attempted. There are valuable improvements which the hon. gentlemen are not able at present to consider. There are valuable suggestions made from time to time, which we would desire, if our circumstances permitted, to carry into effect. We are obliged, no doubt, to abstain from doing those things, but when we are told, after having to contend with the difficulties we have met with, that we are wrong for not attempting to do more, I must venture to enter a protest against such censure. Sir, to condemn us, in the present state of our finances, because we are unable to undertake new enterprises, is as unreasonable as if the passengers were to rise in mutiny against the captain and crew, because they were unable to make progress to port while obliged to lie in a storm."

This proves that hon. gentlemen opposite were unable to expend as large an amount as they desired, and thought the wants of the country demanded; but now, when we have, under the fiscal policy which has been adopted by the present Government, an overflowing Treasury, and when called upon by the wants of the country to make a larger expenditure to meet the needs of the public service, hon. gentlemen opposite condemn us for pursuing that wise course. They refer especially to the expenditure on Civil Government. I find, on turning to the Public Accounts of almost every country in the world, that there is a continuous and continued increase of public expenditure. I find that, in the United States, a country to which hon. gentlemen opposite so frequently point, there was expended for Civil Government—that is, exclusive of the war charges, navy, Indians and pensions—in 1830, \$3,250,000; in 1840, \$5,600,000; in 1850 it rose to \$16,000,000; in 1860, to \$2,000,000; in 1870, to \$53,000,000; and, in 1880, it was \$57,500,000. I find that in Great Britain, which may be called a finished country, the public expenditure year by year steadily increases. In 1870, it was £68,864,000; in 1875, £74,328,000; and, in 1880, it had risen to £84,105,705, thus showing a steady increase. So in this young, unfinished country—as I may call it—in this active, enterprising and growing country, under the policy which has been adopted by the present Government, there must be necessarily an increase of the annual expenditure to meet the public wants and services of the country. But some hon. gentlemen opposite have referred especially to the Civil Service increase of expenditure. If you take the average for the five years of the late Government, you will find their expenditure under this head was \$349,598. The average for 1879-80 and 1881 was, under the present Government, \$907,281.97, or an average increase of \$57,683—that is the average for the last three and a-half years. The House will understand that, under the Statute governing the Civil Service, its members receive an annual increase of from \$50 to \$100 a year, and that without any action on the part of the Administration. This annual increment amounts to \$14,000 a year, which, for the three and a-half years, would amount to \$49,000. There was also an additional charge upon the Civil Service of \$14,000 for our High Commissioner, Sir A. T. Galt—a charge which I do not gather an approval of from the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton. But I am sure after the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister, that by his assistance in the negotiations in Europe, the Government have been able to make a saving in the payments of public interest, and on our indebtedness, very largely exceeding Sir A. T. Galt's salary, no valid objection can be raised to that charge. Now, those two charges amount to more than the admitted increase for the Civil Service, of \$57,683, by \$6,000 a year. The House will bear in mind, having been so informed by members on this side, as well as by hon. gentlemen opposite, that there has been a considerable increase in the expenditure of the Post Office Department. I find that postal expenditure all over the world, increases largely year by year; and it is not strange to find an increase in this new country, where many new settlements have yearly to be provided with postal service. Let us notice the increase in the work in the Post Office Department in 1881, and compare it with the services rendered in 1878. The number of post offices increased, from 1878 to 1881, 15 per cent.; miles of postal routes, $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or from 38,730 to 41,600 miles. There has been a large increase also in the labor connected with the Post Office Savings Banks, between even 1880 and 1881; deposits in 1880, \$56,031; 1881, \$71,747, an increase of \$15,716, or 28 per cent. The amount on deposit in 1880, was \$2,720,000, and, in 1881, \$4,175,000, or an increase of nearly \$1,500,000, or 53 per cent. Withdrawals in 1880, 9 per cent.; 1881, 14 per cent. With regard to the number of open accounts—and here is where a great amount of labor is incurred and expense involved—they numbered, in 1880, 31,865, and, in 1881, 59,605, or an increase of 8,240, or 25 per cent.; and there was an increase remaining, of the balance due to depositors of 57 per cent.; so that the work performed by the Post Office Department has largely increased the expenditure, and mainly in providing for the North-West Provinces and the territories. The hon. member for West Middlesex, I think, (Mr. Ross) went over some of the departmental expenses in detail, and referred especially to the Department with which I have had some connection, the Marine and Fisheries, stating there had been a large increase in its cost from 1873 to 1881.

Mr. ROSS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McLELAN. If the hon. gentleman had looked at the figures and taken them correctly, he would have found there has been no increase beyond the statutory increase of $50 to $100 a year, already mentioned. In 1878 the expenditure on Civil Government in that Department was $32,632; contingencies $8,270—making $40,902. For 1881, the same Department, the expenditure was $36,447; contingencies $6,270; increase by Statute, $1,897, leaving a balance of $40,820. A comparison of the expenditure with 1878 shows there has been an actual decrease in the Department of $132, a diminution effected not by transferring any of the charges under that Department to other services, as hon. gentlemen opposite did in 1875, in order to enable them to come to the House and boast of a saving in the civil expenditure. I am quoting from the ex-Finance Minister's speech. He says:

"Coming now to the other side of the account, the House will perceive that, for Civil Government, we have effected a decrease of $27,352."

I have not had an opportunity of going through all the Departments; but in that Department of which I have been speaking, I find that, in order to enable the hon. gentleman to make that boast, he took between $15,000 and $16,000 from departmental salaries and transferred it to the account of the lighthouse and buoy service; that is, Agents of the Department whose salaries had always been included, up to to that year, in the charges for Civil Government; that hon. gentleman took them out of this account and transferred them to the lighthouse and buoy service, to enable him to boast of his economy. I remember seeing, somewhere among the Public Accounts, in some out-of-the-way place, under the head of immigration, I think, that a member of that Cabinet made a trip up to Winnipeg, and $1,000 for expenses was there charged instead of being under its proper head—Contingencies. I remember also in the correspondence which took place between the Government and Mr. Jenkins, after the latter's dismissal, that the hon. Premier invited him to visit Paris, and the $500 or $600 of expenses on that occasion were charged to Immigration. If you take the records of the five years and go through them carefully, you will find that the little hen had a habit of hiding her nest eggs where she hoped no one could find them. But the hon. member for Lambton seemed to complain that the Dominion Lands account had not been charged to capital account, and that the expenditure for Indians had so largely increased. In view of the critical position we occupy towards the Indians, I think the House and the country will admit that a large expenditure, if it be successful in keeping the peace, is wisely made; the House can understand how very slight an outbreak would check the tide of immigration that is setting into that great North-West, and how the expenditure of a few thousand dollars or a few hundred thousand dollars in keeping peace with the Indians and preventing disturbances between them and the immigrants is the wisest possible expenditure the Government can make. I say that it is a critical time because the tide of immigration has been largely increased. We have been told by the Minister of Agriculture that during the last year something like 28,000 people have settled in Manitoba. In the United States, it is customary for the authorities to estimate at $1,000 per head the value to the country of every immigrant coming into it; and, at that rate, these 28,000 people who have settled in Manitoba, during the past year, are worth to the Dominion of Canada

$28,000,000. If you look at it merely in this light, a large expenditure to keep peace with the Indians in order not to check that tide of immigration, is the wisest possible expenditure the Government can make. Let me say another word on that point as to the value of immigration to the country. I think we may safely put it down that since the change of Government, and since the adoption of the policy by the present Government to open up communication with the North-West by means of the great Pacific Railway through that country, that there has been given an unwonted impetus to the tide of immigration into that country, and to that impetus at least 100,000 of a population may fairly be credited. If you take the same valuation that the Americans give to their immigration of a $1,000 a piece, there is $100,000,000 added to the wealth of this country.

Mr. MILLS. By transference from one Province to another?

Mr. McLELAN. Let the hon. gentleman consider for a moment. How many of these people would have gone out of the Dominion into the United States?

Mr. ANGLIN. A penny saved is a penny gained.

Mr. McLELAN. I thank the hon. member for Gloucester for the remark. A penny saved is as good as two earned. If we have saved one-half that number of people from going into the United States we have saved 50,000, and a penny saved being as good as two earned, for every person being worth $2,000, we still have $100,000,000 added to the wealth of the Dominion. Does the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) know how many people went out of Canada into the United States previous to the opening up of the North-West? In 1850, there were in the State of Connecticut 3,145 people born in the Dominion of Canada; and, in 1870, this number had risen to 10,840. In Illinois, in 1860, there were 20,932; in 1870, 32,388. In Maine, in 1860, there were 17,540; in 1870, 26,661. Massachusetts, 1860, 27,060; in 1870, 69,491. Michigan, 1860, 36,582; in 1870, 89,335: or a total, in 1870, of about 500,000 people born in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. How many are there now?

Mr. McLELAN. Not so many by at least 50,000 or 100,000 as there would have been but for the opening up of the North-West. And I may say more, there are more Canadian born people in the United States to-day than there would have been if the hon. gentleman had never delivered that speech of his in praise of the Western States. I will not undertake to say how many people left this country in consequence of the speeches delivered by himself and the hon. member for Lambton, but I beg him to bear in mind, when next he desires to make a speech decrying his own Province and bemoaning the United States, to bear in mind the remark of the hon. member for Gloucester, that a penny saved is as good as two earned, and every one that goes out of this country in consequence of his speeches involves a loss of $2,000 to the Dominion of Canada, and a gain of $2,000 to the United States. Now by this large exodus of people to the United States there went out of Canada, from 1860 to 1870, 22,000 or 23,000 people each year on an average, all of whom went to swell the population of the United States and to increase the wealth of that country. I say there never was a wiser step taken by any Government than the hastening of connection with the prairie lands of the Great North-West, in order to turn aside the tide of immigration to our own country. As the hon. leader of the Opposition has referred to that question, I may say that that tide is not quite so strong and fall as it would have been, had the hon. gentleman taken a different course and spoken differently of his own country and of the United States. Whatever hon. gentlemen on the other side may say, I think the country understands that, owing to the great impetus given to the construction of the railway by the bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that tide of immigration has been increased, and we have a greater number of actual settlers who have gone into the North-West country. And placing the money value on each of these settlers, which is placed by the United States on their settlers, more than the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the country will be returned to the country by these additions to its population and its wealth. And that tide will go on so long as the present Government remains in power, and so long as the National Policy continues in existence. Complaint has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite that the National Policy has largely increased the taxation of this country.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McLELAN. Let me refer the hon. gentleman who says "hear, hear." to the Finance Minister of his own party. I fear that that hon. gentleman will not accept the position—correct though it be—that taxation should be the measure of expenditure. Let me point him, first, to the fact that the expenditure under the present Government is less to-day by 22 cents per head than it was when hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power. The mere fact of their expending without collecting does not alter the force of the charge against them. Suppose the hon. gentlemen had left a deficit of $10,000,000 a year, and had only collected $10,000,000 from the country, would any man stand up and say that this latter sum was all the taxation they put upon the country? But I wish hon. gentlemen to mark, learn and consider well the position taken by their own Finance Minister. His position was, that but for this "Tariff of abominations," as he called the Tariff of the hon. Finance Minister, there would have been as much money collected from the people of this country under his Tariff as there has been under the present Tariff. He says that he would have collected $18,000,000, and how does he attempt to show that? He says that the importations of the country have always borne a certain proportionate excess over the exports—that the exports of 1881 exceeded the exports of 1877-78, and that, in 1881, there would have been the same proportionate increase of imports under his Tariff that there was in 1877-78. If hon. members will take the imports and exports of 1878, and those of 1881, they will find that, according to the ex-Finance Minister, we should have imported over $21,000,000 more in 1881 than we did. The hon. gentleman claimed that he would have collected a revenue on that amount; and would thus have received in all $18,000,000. Will hon. gentleman opposite tell me wherein lies the difference? If my hon. friend the Finance Minister has collected $18,000,000 under his Tariff—and his predecessor claims that under his Tariff there would have been larger imports, and that he also would have collected $18,000,000—why do they charge us with having so largely increased the taxation of this country. When he claims that the amount he would have collected from the country would be the same as has been collected by the Finance Minister.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all. He says he would have collected enough money. You have collected too much.

Mr. McLELAN. He estimated that he would have collected under his Tariff last year, about $17,000,000, and this year, $18,000,000. But he would not have collected that much. The hon. the ex-Finance Minister has not got so far away from the raw material for a Finance Minister as to understand that there is something more necessary than the mere imposition of taxation on a country, in order to raise a revenue—that you must, with that taxation, correspondingly increase the purchasing power of the people. The hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross), the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), have taken the ground that we are destroying the manufactures, because there has not been a large exportation from the country during the past year. If hon. gentlemen will look at the position taken by their own ex-Finance Minister, they will see why there were not other exports. The little boy asked his mother: "Ma, what is a junction?" "A junction," said she, "is where two roads separate." In the party opposite there seems to be a junction; in the Grit mind there is a separation of ideas, in all directions. The ex-Finance Minister takes the position that, under his Tariff, we would have imported $21,000,000 worth more of goods, and the hon. members for Middlesex, Brant, and Norfolk say that we are killing out the manufactures of this country. According to the ex-Finance Minister there is a void of $21,000,000 to be filled up; and I ask the hon. member for Bothwell what is the difference between importing $21,000,000 worth of goods and collecting taxation on them and shutting them out and collecting the same amount of money on the imports that really come in? There is this difference: that you get back the $21,000,000 in gold, while you employ your own people in supplying the void created. Why, Sir, it is as plain as a sunbeam, that if, according to the hon. member for Centre Huron, $21,000,000 worth of goods have been shut out from this country, the manufacturers of this country have been employed in filling up that void, and that $21,000,000 coming in in gold and circulating through this Dominion has given employment to the people, and enabled them to purchase, not only that $21,000,000 worth of goods, but many millions more. Upon this question of exports hon. gentlemen refer us to England and the United States; they say we have just the same fate as all protective countries, and that we should take a lesson from the experience of all free trade countries—that we should allow the Americans to send in as many goods as they please for the benefit of our manufacturers—to add to their prosperity and to enable them to export largely of their products. If hon. gentlemen will turn to the record, they will not find what they claim, that England is going on largely increasing her exports. They will find that of the products of England exported there has been for a number of years a steady decline.

Mr. McLELAN.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Hear, hear.

Mr. McLELAN. I hope the hon. gentleman is not saying "hear, hear," because he rejoices that this is the case; he is saying it, perhaps, because he thinks this statement incorrect. I take it from the parliamentary returns in the Library, and I will refer to a few articles. The export of cotton manufactures in 1873, was £69,228,000, in 1878, £65,000,000 and, in 1879, the last year given, £63,000,000; in woollens and worsteds, the export, in 1870, was £20,952,000; and, in 1879, £19,575,000; in iron and steel manufactures, the export, in 1877, was £20,000,000, and, in 1879, £19,000,000; in coals, it was £8,000,000 in 1877, and £7,200,000 in 1879; in linen goods, it was £7,000,000 in 1877, and £6,793,000 in 1879. The only article in which there seems to have been an increase in the export is machinery, which shows a large increase, I suppose in consequence of other countries providing for the manufacture of the goods themselves. But one would suppose that in that free trade country there were no importations of manufactured goods, according to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, I find that, instead of there being no importations, there is a very large increase in the importations into England of very many manufactured articles. The importations of manufactured cottons, in 1876, amounted to £1,750,261, and they have since gone up to £2,500,000; in the simple article of buttons the importations have increased in four years by over £1,000,000; in iron and steel manufactures there has been an increase, since 1876, of more than £1,000,000, or 70 per cent.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Where from?

Mr. McLELAN. Partly from the United States, part from Germany, part from France, and all other parts of the world—from highly protected countries, as some hon. gentleman behind me suggests. The importations of silk have gone up from £11,815,740 in 1876, to £13,324,935. Hon. gentlemen will therefore see that, in that free trade country, which they take so much delight in pointing to, there is a steady decline in exports, and a steady increase in the imports of manufactured goods. In the simple article of woollen manufactures, the importations have increased from £6,676,000 in 1876, to £9,700,000. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen seem to take great delight in making comparisons between that country and the United States. In the increase of business in the world there may have been larger exports than in 1879, but the fact remains on record that there has been for a long series of years a steady decline. And why? Look at Great Britain on the map, and you will find her manufacturing region very little larger than the Province of Nova Scotia—I think about 21,000 square miles—

Mr. MACKENZIE. The area is 67,000 square miles.

Mr. McLELAN. Supposing it is, all the manufactures of Great Britain are produced in the 21,000 miles. Supposing the area to be 67,000 square miles, or double that—if it will satisfy the hon. gentleman any better—Great Britain, even then, is not much larger than the two or three little Provinces down by the sea. What is the rule in Great Britain? Everything that passes outside the border is classed as export, even if only sent to the Channel Islands. Go to the United States and take the manufacturing portion, say the eastern States, draw a line round them and call everything that goes over that line into the far West, or the cotton and Pacific States, an export, and you will find that the manufacturing exports of the United States compare favorably with those of Great Britain. The manufacturing portions of the States have got to supply 50,000,000 people, you go to Great Britain and only find 35,000,000; thus they have 15,000,000 to supply in addition to the population of Great Britain. So that, when you come to look at the position of the two countries, you find the difference in the exports and manufactures is not so very great as the hon. gentleman would have us believe. I am just now reminded of the arguments used by the hon. member for Centre Huron the other night—it seems the poor but respectable farmer will write if he will not speak to him, as the hon. Minister of Railways said the other night. From that letter the ex-Finance Minister stated to the House that the poor farmer paid $150 per year to the Treasury of the Dominion. Taking the average, rich and poor together, and supposing that that poor farmer pays up the average, this would make, according to the position taken by the hon. member for Centre Huron, a revenue of $72,000,000 in Customs. The absurdity of the position is manifest. Hon. gentlemen opposite try to persuade the people that they are enormously taxed, but when the figures are worked up the results show a revenue four times the actual amount. I would ask the hon. gentleman how it fares with the poor man in England? Is he free from taxation under a free trade Tariff?

Mr. ANGLIN. He has got free bread.

Mr. McLELAN. And so do people in this country get free bread; they get it cheaper now than if they imported it.

Mr. MILLS. The English workingmen get free sugar.

Mr. McLELAN. Everything that the poor man looks upon as a necessity is taxed, except bread, in England—tea, tobacco, beer, spirits, and all these things that are largely used by the poor man—very much more than they are taxed in this Dominion. Nearly $40,000,000 are raised on tobacco alone, of which the poor man is the largest consumer, the tax being about $1 per lb.; tea is taxed 12 cents per lb., and rum and spirits, the poor man's drinks, are heavily taxed, while wines, the beverage of the rich man, come in comparatively free; silks are imported to the extent of $65,000,000, and come in free, while the poor man's spirits, tobacco, tea and beer are all taxed; so that if you look into the condition of the poor man in that country you will find he pays more taxes by far than the poor man in the Dominion or the United States. There is one thing which stands out painfully in the records of Great Britain, and that is that there are 1,000,000 paupers supported by charity in that country. One would suppose that in that free-trade country the people ought to be so prosperous that there would be no poor men, yet one in every thirty-five of the population is a pauper. But the hon. gentleman has claimed that we tax them $150 a year each: not only do they assert that we have drawn from the poor people at the rate of $72,000,000 into the Treasury—and the Minister of Finance says he can find no such sum there—but the hon. gentlemen state that we have taxed the people in the increased price of products that the people of this country cannot manufacture, and do not manufacture, and sell as cheaply the goods they produce as goods from the United States. The hon. ex-Finance Minister states that the larger the market the cheaper you can produce goods; that if you have a market of 50,000,000 people you can manufacture cheaper than with a market of 4,000,000. Suppose it be so, does it follow that we are to give the Americans our market of 4,000,000; that we are to permit them to send in everything to Canada, while we are not permitted to send anything across the boundary line; that they are to manufacture for three-fourths of our people, and our manufactures are to be confined to perhaps one-fourth of the population of the Dominion? Taking the hon. gentleman's own argument, the larger the market the cheaper the goods; if you shut out American goods and allow our manufacturers the whole Dominion, goods would be cheaper for the 4,000,000 than if the market were limited to 500,000 or 1,000,000. But hon. gentlemen opposite take the ground, also, that the National Policy is about to induce a large competition among domestic manufacturers, and that they themselves are to suffer by it. We hope—and we take the ground that if we secure to our manufacturers the market of the whole Dominion, and we have declared to them that it is our policy that they shall have market—they will be induced to enter more largely into manufacturing interests, that keener competition will arise between them, and through that competition there will be a reduction of prices, and that, eventually, although it may be possible in some cases for a year or two that the prices of certain articles may be increased with this policy in operation, yet still, when you have encouraged and induced manufacturers to establish different industries, you will eventually have goods cheaper in the Dominion than you would have them under any system of importation under the old policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that they never could have a revenue Tariff which would be under 17½ per cent. A few manufacturers might be induced to go into the business, but they would always count upon their competition as being outside, and they would add 17½ per cent. to the prices. There would not be a sufficient number of them to make competition among themselves, and they would look to the competition outside, being themselves protected by the 17½ per cent. duty; so that we would never get from the manufacturers of this country under a Tariff that permitted half the goods to be imported goods at prices below those of the imported articles plus the duty and cost of transportation. So I think it is plain, from the position taken by the hon. gentlemen themselves, that the National Policy induces domestic competition, that it will create such a number of industries in this country as will result in such competition as will reduce prices for home-made goods. The ex-Finance Minister takes the ground that you can manufacture cheaper for 50,000,000 than for 4,000,000. The market depends on the number of manufacturers who go into a certain line of business to supply the demand. Take the article of cotton. There are between 800 and 900 factories in existence in the United States, while here, with 4,000,000 of people, we shall require seventy or eighty factories before we shall be any better supplied with such factories than they are in the United States, and under this policy I hope, and indeed I am sure, that, one after another, industries will spring up and the competition will bring prices down as low, if they be not so already, as are paid either by the people of the United States or the people of England. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) told the House that the late Government did more for the manufacturers than we are doing, because they admitted, duty free, more of the raw materials for manufactures than we are doing under the present Tariff; and the hon. gentleman went into a calculation and gave figures to show that under that Tariff they admitted $31,000,000 worth, while we have only admitted $19,000,000 worth, and that, therefore, the advantages to manufactures were greater under the Cartwright Tariff than under the Tariff of the present Administration. I have turned to the figures and find them not exactly what the hon. gentleman has stated. It is, I suppose, fair to assume that it is an error in figures, but it is somehow curious that the figures given by him favor his own side. The true figures are: Free goods, in 1878, $30,619,262; in 1881, $19,990,879, being a difference in favor of 1878, of $10,628,383. Upon the face of this statement, without any explanation, it would appear that hon. gentlemen opposite had, in 1878, admitted more goods duty free than we did in 1881; and the hon. gentleman would convey to the House and the country the impression that the goods comprised raw material, to be used in manufactures, and that, therefore, they were the friends of the manufacturers, and not we. Looking at the imports of that year, 1878, I see the aggregate includes barley, $137,243; oats, $651,441; peas, $18,729; rye, $77,398; Indian corn, $3,535,619; wheat, $6,510,148; flour, $1,866,101; rye, $8,655; Indian meal, $619,380; oatmeal, $22,226; in all, $13,451,849 worth of bread stuff, admitted and computed in that $30,000,000, which he claims as raw material. Why, when you eliminate this large sum from the imports of 1878, and take out, also, coal, $3,054,852, you find that, under the present Tariff, $5,878,318 worth more raw materials for manufacture are admitted under this Tariff, than came in under the Tariff of the hon. gentlemen opposite, which, they think, did so much for the manufacturers in 1878.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Does the hon. gentleman eliminate the raw materials from the imports of 1878, as well as from the imports of 1881, and place them on precisely the same basis? That is the position I took, and that is the calculation I made.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman, in his calculation, took the gross figures of the free goods in 1878 and added $400,000 more than the books warranted on the one side, and deducted on the other side, thus making a difference of $12,000,000 instead of $10,600,000. That is the calculation of the hon. gentleman. I have taken out the articles that, in 1878, came in free of duty; the breadstuffs to the amount of $13,500,000, and I have shown that the Tariff of the present Dominion admits a larger quantity of goods free, for manufactures, than did the Tariff of 1878.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. And a larger value.

Mr. McLELAN. And of larger value—goods that enter directly into manufactures. I think it will not be denied that there has been a large increase in the manufactures of the country, and that I have shown, at least from the position taken by the hon. the ex-Finance Minister, that the manufacturers of this country have had at least $21,000,000 in supplying the people of Canada. I have shown that we have admitted more raw materials to encourage those manufacturers, and that although the exports of manufactured goods may have fallen off, the House can easily see the reason why—that it was to supply that void created by the shutting out of $21,000,000 worth of goods that the hon. the ex-Finance Minister stated would have been brought in under his Tariff. The supply of that void, as my hon. friend the Finance Minister stated, has given employment to a large additional number of workmen. There has been from new industries and the increase of old, an increase of about 24,000 workmen. Now, take the usual number of persons dependant on every workman, and if you believe with the hon. the ex-Finance Minister that without this Tariff there would have been $21,000,000 worth of goods more imported—if you take the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that every workman produces about $1,000 worth of goods a year, these $21,000,000 would give employment to 21,000 workmen, or a little less than the number which the hon. the Finance Minister stated as the number of new hands employed by the various industries created or stimulated under this policy. If you take the employment of this large number, and the maintenance of the people dependent upon them—the returns of the United States manufacturers, show that every man and woman employed has upon an average three or four persons dependent upon him or her for support—you will find that the supply of that void, the manufacturing of that amount of goods, has given employment, or support, to something like a total population of between 80,000 or 100,000 persons. The position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite is that we should do away with this policy and go back to the Tariff of 1878, and should admit all these goods—the $21,000,000 worth which the ex-Finance Minister stated would have come in under the late tariff; then, as a consequence, you would throw out of employment 21,000 persons now engaged in manufactures under the present policy, and all the people dependent upon them—say between 80,000 and 100,000. If you thus deprive them of a living, you would have to maintain them at the public expense, or they would have to leave the country. A return to the tariff of the late Government means this: That you will thereby shut down so many of the industries of this country, as would throw out of employment all these persons, depriving of support the 80,000 or 100,000 dependent upon them; and you make it imperative upon that large number to go to the United States. As I have shown previously, taking the amount set down as the value of each emigrant to the United States, you would send them persons to the value of $80,000,000, which would represent the loss to the Dominion. I want now to refer to the general prosperity of the country.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. McLELAN. Before recess I was referring to the exports of this country, and to the reasons why there should have been, in the past year, a decrease in the outgo of manufactured goods. I was referring to the position taken by the ex-Minister of Finance, that $21,000,000 had been prevented from being imported by the Tariff of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. I was referring to the great impetus that the expenditure of $21,000,000 in gold among the manufacturing industries of this country had given to them. I need not have elaborated that position, because the hon. gentleman themselves stated this year that an income of $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 would greatly improve the condition of the people, and would greatly stimulate and encourage manufacturing industries of all kinds. He said:

"I need not tell any one who has paid attention to the actual operation of commerce, how enormous by an income to the people of $10,000,000 in the space of six months would tend to encourage and stimulate every kind of industry at home, and increase our powers of purchasing, and our consumption of dutiable articles."

I think, then, that from the words of the hon. gentleman himself, it is proven that the manufacturers of this country have had a yearly expenditure among them of at least $20,000,000 in gold more than they had under the operation of the Cartwright Tariff. The hon. gentlemen opposite seemed pained and dissatisfied because we did not purchase those goods abroad, because, as they claimed, we hinder the prosperity of this country by not having a larger trade balance against us. The true index of the prosperity of a country, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, is that there shall be a large balance of trade against a country.

Mr. ANGLIN. No.

Mr. McLELAN. I think an hon. gentleman who was his leader entered into a very elaborate argument to show that the larger the balance of trade against a country was, the greater its profits.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Mr. McLELAN. It was stated that the balance of trade represents the profits which a country had made upon its exports, and hence the larger the balance the greater the profit.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It very often does.

Mr. McLELAN. If the hon. gentleman will enquire into the operation of trade, he will find that, perhaps, even supposing there are large profits upon the goods exported from this country or from the United States, it is not the exporter who receives the profits. I ask the hon. gentleman to state to us what profit the English manufacturer has upon the sale of cottons which he sends to this country, after they come here. His profits stop at the price that is fixed, and in the bills for the exportation; and when they come to this side, and are sold here, the man who handles them, and not the exporter, receives and pockets the profits. So is it with almost everything that is sent from this country. Upon goods that come from the other side the price is fixed before shipment, and the profits, whatever they may be, belong to the merchants on the other side of the water. But, even suppose it were otherwise, suppose that upon the $100,000,000 worth of goods we had exported there was a profit of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000, did it never enter the minds of hon. gentlemen that it would be better for the country to have the profits come back to this country in gold to be expended among the people themselves? Why, surely, if there are profits, is it not better to use them in employing our own people than to expend them in employing the workmen and manufacturers of other countries. But it is because there has not been the large balance of trade against us, because we have reduced that largely from former years, that there has been, as I contend, an increase of prosperity among the workmen and among all the manufacturing industries of the country. The hon. gentlemen opposite have made a charge against us that we have discriminated in this Tariff against England and in favor of the United States.

Mr. ANGLIN. Hear, hear; that is so.

Mr. McLELAN. If the hon. gentleman who indulges so much in averages will take the average of importations from Great Britain for the five years of their Administration, he will find that, from 1874 to 1879, the total amount was $209,077,876, or an average of $41,815,575. The average for the years 1880 and 1881 has been $43,583,800, or an increase of $1,768,235. So that if you take the average of the time which they administered the Government under the Cartwright Tariff, and if you take the average of the years under the Tariff of my hon. friend, you will find that from Great Britain there has been an increase of $1,768,235. Now, how has it fared with the United States? During the five years of their Administration, the average amount of importations was $48,111,896; the average during the two years this Tariff has been in full operation, has been $36,704,012, or a decrease of $11,407,884. So that the figures demonstrate that, however strongly or often the hon. gentlemen may assert it to the contrary, the Tariff has operated to increase the trade with Great Britain, and to decrease trade with the United States. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), in referring to this matter, stated that we have a larger percentage of duty upon the importations from Great Britain than upon those from the United States. If the hon. gentleman had looked at the articles imported he would have found that there are a large amount of free goods, consisting of raw cotton, raw tobacco and hides, that come from the United States, which swelled up the list of free goods from the United States in excess over the goods from Great Britain. This change in the current of trade, and the employment which it has given to our own people here, as I maintain, tended largely to increase the prosperity of this country. I know, Sir, that hon. gentlemen on the other side were very slow last year in admitting that there had been any change in the condition of the country, and it is only now when the evidence has grown so strong as to be incontrovertible that they admit that the country is exceedingly prosperous. But they say that this is all due to Providence, and that it is impious on the part of the Government to claim any share in the change. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said that the members of the Government, when they claimed any hand in effecting this change in the condition of the country, reminded him of the Africans who went to the missionaries to purchase gun medicine to make their guns shoot straight. The hon. gentleman told a number of other stories in which colored gentlemen figured. In fact all through his speech there was very strong coloring, but the hon. gentleman laid such unction on the story of the gun medicine that I feel like obliging him by telling him a little African story. I remember very many years ago that a gentleman in Halifax invited me to go and spend a day shooting with him in the neighborhood. We procured a gun each and went to one of the colored settlements. One of the young Africans attached himself to our party and went into the woods with us. The young colored man rather preferred the city gentleman at first and followed him, but after a number of shots had been fired by my friend with no effect, he left him and came back to me and said: "Massa, don't you think there's a spell on that man's gun?" I said: "A spell, what do you mean?" He said: "There are some people who can put a spell on your gun, and it makes the gun so that it will never shoot straight afterwards. The shot comes right back, or else it goes around a corner. Daddy lent a gun to a man once and it came back with the spell on it, and it never shot straight afterwards, but would shoot round corners." The hon. member for North Norfolk, in 1876, had a protection gun, which shot true to the mark every time and made a bulls-eye. But the hon. gentleman lent himself to party interests, and the spell of party spirit was put on his gun and he has been shooting around corners ever since.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. His spell was not the go-spel.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), in his list of promises, gives some insight into the theological opinions of the party to which he belongs. The hon. gentleman tells us what the party to which he belongs believe, or rather what they profess to believe. He tells us that his party profess to be strong on foreordination and election. Ex-Governor Vance once had a negro servant who was also very strong on foreordination and election. He said to his servant one day: "Peter, do you think I am elected to be saved." "I do not know, Massa; I never knew of anybody being elected without being a candidate and working for it." These hon. gentlemen hold to the opinion that Providence foreordained everything, but the fact is that they never were candidates for the good times; they never worked in co-operation with Providence to bring them about, and hence they were not elected. We find, in 1876 and 1878, that in the Governor General's speech they return thanks to Providence for the abundant harvest, so that it seems that during their Administration the sun shone, the dew fell, and the rain descended, and there was an abundant harvest. The hon. gentleman makes another promise. He promises to have sympathy now and in future, with every move made in the direction of human progress." They may have had that sympathy for the struggling manufacturers of the country, up to 1878, but instead of doing anything for them they folded their arms and said they were flies on the wheel, and that the manufacturers might struggle on and contend against the inflow of slaughter invoices, which were coming in from the United States. They had sympathy, but nothing more; but the men who now administer the affairs in this Government, claim that they will not only sympathize with those struggling in the direction of human progress, but will lend a helping and a protecting hand to help them forward in their efforts for progress. They tell us that the farmer has not been benefitted under this policy, but I would ask how can it be possible that with all the circulation of money that is going through the various industries of the country, there should be such an increase of expenditure within the country, with 24,000 workmen—as my hon. friend pointed out—to be fed, and 80,000 to 100,000 dependents upon them, how it is possible that there can be this expenditure taking place without affecting the condition of the farming population. Now hon. gentlemen take the ground that it is impossible to do this, because they say that the prices of the Canadian farmers' grain is fixed in Mark Lane. I want to know, Mr. Speaker, why it is that these prices are fixed in Mark Lane. I tell the hon. gentleman that it is because England protected her manufacturing and mining industries for many years and increased the population engaged in those industries over and above the agricultural interests. I was referring, before recess, to the manufacturing extent of that country and mentioned what was in my mind, as the extent of the whole territory of the country instead of the manufacturing districts; but taking the whole country you will find that agriculture has reached a higher perfection in England than in any other county in the world almost, and that the average yield of wheat per acre in England is in excess of that in America or any country of Europe. Now, why is it that in England there is such a demand for grain? Why is it, as the hon. gentleman says, that she fixes the price of the grain from this country and the United States? It is because by protection she has fostered a great mining industry, because by protection many years ago she created a great manufacturing industry, and a great commercial industry depending on it; and, in consequence of the existence of these three great industries, she is obliged to send to America for the food required by the population thus created. The hon. member for North Norfolk will tell the hon. member for Gloucester that there is great advantage in having these people brought near to the farmer, instead of 2,000 miles away. Now, if the price of Canadian grain is fixed in Mark Lane, so is that of American grain, and both stand on an equal footing in that respect. Why then do the people of this country desire reciprocity with the United States? It is because we live alongside of the manufacturing population of the United States, who consume everything that the farmer has to produce, and who would afford a better market than we now possess for our agricultural produce. But we are not able to secure reciprocity, and we must do the next best thing: we must create these manufacturing industries within our own borders, and within reach of our own farmers, in order that they may enjoy increased prices. But, Mr. Speaker, let me strengthen my position, because not only cereals, but all the other various products of the farm, are affected by close proximity to large manufacturing centres of population. I take half-a-dozen of the great grain-growing States and compare them with the same number of manufacturing States. The State of Illinois had, in 1870, a population of 1,809,606 over ten years of age, of whom 365,754, or 20 per cent, were engaged otherwise than in agriculture; that State, in 1879, yielded 312,000,000 bushels of corn and 44,000,000 bushels of wheat, and the average value per acre of her produce was $12.47. In the State of Indiana 16 per cent. of the population are engaged otherwise than in agriculture, and the average value of the produce is about the same; in the State of Iowa the average value per acre of produce is $8.88; in the State of Kansas—a favorite State with some hon. gentlemen opposite—19 per cent. of the population are engaged otherwise than in agriculture, and the value per acre of the produce is $9.11; in Minnesota—another of the hon. gentlemen's favorite States—the average value of the produce is $10.29; and in Nebraska, the average value of the produce is $8.60 per acre. In all these States the average of the population engaged in pursuits other than agriculture is 19.13, and the average value per acre of the produce is $10.67. These are the great grain-growing States of the Union: let us compare with them the great manufacturing States. In Connecticut 35 per cent. of the population, over ten years of age, are engaged in manufacturing industries, and the average value per acre of the farm produce is $16.82; in Delaware 26 per cent. of the population are engaged in manufacturing, and the average value of the farm produce is $15; in Maine, which is often counted as one of the poorest States, 25 per cent. are engaged in manufacturing, and the value of the farm produce is $13.51, which is higher than that of any of the grain-growing States; in Massachusetts, 43 per cent. of the population are engaged in manufacturing, and the average value of the farm produce is $26.71; in New Jersey, 34 per cent. of the population are engaged in manufacturing, and the average value of the farm produce is $18; in Pennsylvania, a great mining district, nearly 30 per cent. of the population are engaged in manufacturing, and mining, and the average value per acre of the farm products is $17.68; in Rhode Island, 44 per cent. of the people are engaged in manufacturing, and the average value of the farm produce is $29.32 per acre. In the whole of these great manufacturing States, where the farmers have their market at their own doors, the average value of the farm produce is $19.69 per acre, against $10.67 per acre in the great grain-growing States, or nearly two to one. If we, by the encouragement of our manufacturing industries, increase the population who do not follow the pursuit of agriculture, we create a large consuming population in the midst of our farmers, and thus furnish a ready market for our produce.

Mr. McLELAN.

The position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite is, that we should content ourselves with the production of raw material for the rest of the world to use in manufactures.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You touch them on the raw there.

Mr. McLELAN. The position of the hon. member for Lambton is that we should have free trade in American goods just the same as we have in lands, and the hon. member for North Norfolk on this position said that the people who have got the start in manufacturing are the people who will hold that position unless you intervene with a protective policy. The hon. gentleman said, the other night, there had never been an honest quotation made from his speech in 1876.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The speech was not honest.

Mr. McLELAN. My right hon. friend was not here when I took the position that it was an honestly prepared and delivered speech, before a spell was cast on the hon. member's mind; before this question of the National Policy had assumed that strong party aspect it has now. But that hon. gentleman said no person will assert it is proper to protect industries that are not natural and adapted to the country, but when they are suited to the country it is the duty of the Government to foster them. Manufactures do not spring up readily on a virgin soil, their tendency is to remain in a beaten track; now if we adopt the policy of the hon. gentleman and let in a flood of American manufactures, trade would follow the beaten track and we would have to content ourselves with the production of raw material to supply the American manufacturers. What benefit can it be to the farmers of this country to have even a large number of men employed in producing the raw material? There is no great amount of skill required to cut down a tree, or take out the ore, and the rates of wages paid to those engaged in those operations are always low—so low that the men have just enough to obtain the bare necessities of life—and have no money to expend in the purchase of those articles which make the profit of the farmer. Encourage manufactures and the people acquire a higher degree of skill, and obtain higher rates of wages, so that they have a surplus, after purchasing the necessities of life, to expend in articles that bring profit to the farmer. Manufacturers are paying from $2 to $5 per day to the men they employ, and one man at $5 a day is of greater benefit to the farmer than a dozen who would earn 80 cents per day, because he has more money to spend outside the bare necessities of life. You must consider, not alone, the number of men you employ, but also the rate of wages paid. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to take the Maritime Provinces under their care, and lament that there is such a falling off in the shipping. True, there has been a decrease in the construction of vessels, but the reason has been explained, time and again, namely, the change from wood to iron. The hon. gentlemen seem to be very much grieved that there is not a much larger fleet in the United States. Why, the United States commercial fleet ranks second in the world. If the language of hon. gentlemen opposite were taken to indicate their feelings it would seem they desired the United States should rank higher than Great Britain. I have turned my attention to this, and it is not because of any increased burdens that have been placed on the construction of ships,—not at all. There is no man acquainted with the construction of ships that will pretend to say there is any greater burden now than there was before the adoption of this policy; but one of the main arguments used up to 1878 was, that we would destroy the commerce of the country, internal and external.

If hon. gentlemen would just turn to the records, they would find that not only has there been an increase of sea-going vessels visiting the Dominion during the past year over 1878, but a marvellous increase of coasting and inland navigation as well. Take the entries inwards and outwards, of sea-going vessels: In 1878, there were 17,000 vessels, 6,684,000 tons; and, in 1881, 20,762 vessels, 8,104,331 tons, or an increase in the latter year of 3,246 vessels, 1,420,334 tons. In the coasting inwards and outwards the year 1881 shows an increase over 1878 of 2,189,300 tons, or, taking the coasting inland and the sea-going together, you have an increase of 3,609,083 over 1878, so that the assertion of the hon. gentleman that this policy is destroying our commerce with the world and our trade among ourselves falls to the ground when you come to figures and hard facts. The hon. Minister of Railways also showed the House the enormous increase there was in railway carriage; in 1881, the tons carried were 12,102,245; in 1878, the quantity was 7,000,000 odd tons, the increase being 4,218,000 tons, and in receipts $7,787,000. So that both by sea and land, by ship and rail, the position of hon. gentlemen opposite has been taken away and it has been demonstrated that our policy has not had the effect of decreasing our trade. We had a visit from a number of distinguished gentlemen belonging to the Opposition down to the Lower Provinces, with the purpose, if we can judge by their arguments, of destroying that trade, and of crushing out that inland trade. The leader of the Opposition accompanied by a number of gentlemen, a band of missionaries, visited us last summer to prove to us, as one of the gentlemen put it, that we who voluntarily accepted the National Policy are as much deserving the commiseration and attention of political missionaries as are the heathen. I remember that a gentleman, having heard the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), one of the devoted band, in his little speech in which he endeavored to show that it was their duty as missionaries to come down and break the bonds under which the people of the Maritime Province were held—having heard the speeches by the missionaries, said:

"I feel like quoting the words of the old Master of the Rolls of Nova Scotia, when he was running an election against a deacon. I feel like saying, how pleasant are the footsteps of these devoted missionaries, through the hills and valleys of Nova Scotia; how beautiful on the mountain tops are the footsteps of these devoted missionaries, shod with a preparation of the gospel—the gospel according to Edward Blake—and heel-tapped with all the misrepresentations of the party."

This band of missionaries came down and endeavored to persuade the people of Nova Scotia that they were in the dark; that while we were creating a great internal trade and were, by our policy, protecting our people from undue competition from abroad, but giving the freest trade within our own territory, it was the duty of the people of the Maritime Provinces to cease trading with Canada, and trade with the United States. At meeting after meeting, the hon. the leader of the Opposition labored with that argument, to show that the people of the Maritime Provinces should trade with the United States.

Mr. BLAKE. That is not so.

Mr. McLELAN. I understand the hon. gentleman says it is not so. The speeches of the hon. gentleman were reported on so many occasions by his own friends, and the arguments by which he endeavored to persuade the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, that the true course was to trade with the United States, were so often published and repeated that I did not think it was worth while to gather them and bring them here; but I happen to have by me a little speech which he made at Newcastle, when he was taking his departure from the Province, in which he made an incidental reference to this point; and I may say that in that speech he repeats the idea that they entered as missionaries and departed in the same character. He said:

"The scheme of this world is an harmonious, not a contradictory one. Therefore, when we use our best endeavors to spread the blessed doctrine of free trade, we act in the spirit of the gospel."

But the hon. gentleman said:

"We should leave each Province and man free to make the best of their own, and labor for greater freedom of trade with the United States as well. The Government's policy hinders such a result. Quebec interests, like those of the Maritime Provinces, lie in the direction of as free a trade as possible with the United States, and Ontario was equally desirous of having closer commercial relationship with the people over the border. He hoped that instead of maintaining a retaliatory policy against each other—a policy by which we both lose—both countries would abandon it. If they did not, it was no reason why we should continue it for 'half a loaf is better than no bread.'

Mr. MILLS. Is that not so?

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman says: "Is that not so?" It depends a great deal on who has the half-loaf. You want to give the whole loaf to the United States. You believe in the spirit of the gospel according to Mr. Blake, revised and approved by Brother Jonathan, that it is more blessed to give than to receive; that we ought to give Americans the privilege of sending their goods here whether they accord to us a like privilege or not. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in a speech at New Glasgow, as reported in the Eastern Chronicle, a Grit paper, said:

"If you had not been at liberty to exchange your property you would find it useless to continue to produce more than you required for your personal wants, for you could not get rid of it. To restrict or prevent you from exchanging what you desire to exchange would be a restriction against which you would rebel. Restrictions which have a tendency to divert trade from its natural channels are injurious to the country: Your natural channel of trade is with the neighboring Republic. Your exports will find the best market there, and your imports should come from there; but that natural channel of trade has been to a considerable extent restricted by the revenue necessities of that country. This country also requires a revenue, which must be derived from indirect taxes; but the very moment you put a tax upon an article capable of exportation, that moment you apply the restrictive principle."

The hon. gentleman is reported in a Charlottetown paper as having spoken thus: "Your natural channel of trade is with the neighboring Republic. Your exports will find the best market there." And again he says: "Your natural market is the United States; that country will be your market for potatoes and a large number of other articles," and so forth. But the whole tendency of the argument of the hon. gentleman is that we in the Maritime Provinces should cease to trade with Old Canada and go to the United States.

Mr. ANGLIN. No.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. Minister of Customs made some reference to this subject in the earlier part of the Session. Now let us see what will be the effect of adopting the policy which the leader of the Opposition proclaimed from almost every platform in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward's Island last summer. What does the hon. gentleman suppose the trade of the Lower Provinces is worth to Quebec and Ontario? In 1864, the last year before Confederation we imported $12,604,642 worth of goods into Nova Scotia, and, in 1865, there was an increase to $13,087,000. The hon. gentleman will not pretend to say that, previous to Confederation when everything that came from all the other Provinces was counted in the imports, and when of those $13,000,000 worth of goods only $500,000 came from Ontario and Quebec, the trade between those Provinces could have been anything like so large as at present? What were the imports of Nova Scotia in 1881? The total imports, outside of what came from Ontario and Quebec, reached $7,052,000. Do you suppose the people of Nova Scotia have grown so poor that in 1865 when there were only 350,000 or 360,000 people, that they imported more goods than in 1881, when they had increased their population by 100,000, and participated in all the increased wealth of this great country, that they imported goods worth only $7,000,000 odd, in 1881, as against $13,000,000 in 1865? No; the consumption in 1881 was greatly increased, but the supply was from home produce or from Quebec and Ontario. The amount of goods we purchased from Ontario and Quebec will be judged by the great diminution in the foreign imports from 1867 down to 1881. Our imports from the States, in 1864, were $4,303,000, in 1881, only $2,216,000.

Mr. McLELAN,

Mr. ANGLIN. What about the effect of the Reciprocity Treaty?

An hon. MEMBER. The National Policy has done it.

Mr. ANGLIN. No.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman wants to know what effect the Reciprocity Treaty had. I tell him the import of dutiable goods into Nova Scotia from the United States, in the five years previous to 1865, had increased 21½ per cent. under the Reciprocity Treaty; the importation of goods, subject to duty outside the Treaty, had decreased 20 to 21 per cent. But now with internal trade between the Provinces, the imports into Nova Scotia from the United States, have fallen off from the amount in 1864, $2,000,000. The arguments of the leader of the Opposition in Nova Scotia were that we should cease purchasing goods from Quebec and Ontario; that we should increase our purchases from the United States instead; that our trade should flow in its "natural channels," and that we should deal with our natural customers, the people of the United States. If you followed out the hon. gentleman's argument, you might go into this great North-West which we are spending such large amounts, and into which the tide of immigration is setting so strongly and say: "Stop the trade with Ontario and Quebec, and deal with the United States." If the hon. gentleman does not want to break up the political union by his advice, he did his utmost to break up the commercial union between the Provinces. If the hon. gentleman came to power, and should say to the western and other Provinces: "You must not trade with Quebec and Ontario, we shall arrange to have our trade flow in its natural channels;" if he should say to the North-West people: "Your natural channel is the road to St. Paul—get all your goods from that place and stop importing $5,000,000 worth of goods from Ontario," these Provinces would suffer beyond calculation. The hon. member for Lambton said the other night, in speaking of the deficits under his Government, that, in 1856 or 1857, under a previous Government, there were deficits very much larger. As a matter of course there were deficits, because there were not customers enough for the goods of Ontario and Quebec; there was no internal trade—no sufficient circulation among the people to enable them to purchase goods, and the want of that circulation from 1874 to 1878, from the same cause, produced the deficits in 1877 and 1878. If you cut off the trade of the Upper Provinces, you will return to the days of poverty and deficits, and the loss to Ontario and Quebec will be incalculable. Artemus Ward said of Jefferson Davis, when he was attempting to break up the Union, that it would have been better than $10 in his pocket if he had never been born. And if the leader of the Opposition succeeded in carrying out that policy, it might be said of him also that it would have been better than $10 had he never been politically born—better than that he should go into Ontario suffering from the effects of that policy. We do not feel disposed to accept the policy and arguments of the hon. gentleman; nor do I think that any very large proportion of the people of Nova Scotia accepted the policy he laid down. I do not think his own friends were willing to accept the doctrines which he propounded. We were pleased to have them come down and visit us and see our country. We were pleased with the eloquent speeches the hon. gentleman delivered on most occasions, although they contained sentiments and propositions which the people were not disposed to accept. So we had nothing to complain of in the hon. gentleman's going down, but all we complained of was as to the manner of his going. What we had to complain of in that visit was that he announced it so many months before he went, and kept us so long in the suspense of waiting for the policy that would carry the whole Province, as we feared. It was the long long suspense that was painful to us. Carlyle, when travelling in the north of Scotland, was very much annoyed at the crowing of a cock in one of the neighbor's yards at the house where he slept. In the morning he was in great wrath, and at breakfast, stating what had been the disturbance of the night, he went out and found the old lady who owned the rooster in the adjoining garden, and fell to berating her. She said: "Oh! Mr. Carlyle, he did not crow so very loud, nor so very often." Said Carlyle: "Woman, I dinna mind the crowing of your old rooster, but you dinna ken how I suffered a'tween whiles waiting for the crowing." So, Mr. Speaker, it was the long, long months of suspense that was painful to us, and now you dinna ken what we poor blue-noses suffered waiting for the cock of the pairty to crow. You know that hope deferred maketh the heart sick, and so even his friends were sick with suspense, waiting for him so many months, but they were a very much sicker crew when he went away. The Grit countenance, after the elections in Colchester and Pictou, was a study; they were solemn as a tombstone. But when the hon. gentleman had come and gone, they had stretched out as long as a grave yard fence. The hon. gentleman came down with no policy that reached the political heart and aroused the enthusiasm of his followers, or gave them any hopes of a change of Government for this Dominion. But, Mr. Speaker, we do not complain of that visit nor the result of it; but I am sure that if the policy he propounded there were adopted, the whole country would soon have reason to complain, both of the policy and of the hon. gentleman who would impose it upon this country. The whole tendency of the Opposition has been, not only to diminish the internal trade of the country, but to belittle the country in every possible manner, and by all possible means. The position of the two parties was this: that the party now governing the country claim to be able to improve it and to render it prosperous, and their position is dependent upon their success; the party in Opposition deny this and are aiming and determining that this country shall be a poor one, and that the promises and the hopes of the Administration shall not be realized. On every possible occasion when a statement is made that this country is prospering, that our industries are increasing, that new manufactures are springing up, we have hon. gentlemen opposite denying it and trying to create the impression that there is no industrial prosperity and that the country is not advancing. We have hon. gentlemen opposite even going so far—going beyond what has ever been done in any civilized country—I believe, declaring that the Census taken is a fraud, declaring that we have not increased in population and creating the impression abroad that we are not advancing at the rate the Census shows. If we have good lands in the North-West, if we have a valuable country there, the hon. gentlemen opposite again tell us, and tell the world, that there are better lands and a better country for agriculturists across the borders in the United States. So often have they done this and derided and belittled their own country, that their speeches now form part of the land advertisements of land agents in the United States. But, Sir, the opposition the hon. gentlemen have brought to this policy has not been successful. All their efforts to belittle this country have not stopped its growth. We know not how much it has hindered this country, but it has not altogether stopped the growth of this Canada of ours.

"Ours is no sapling, chance sown by the fountain; Blooming in summer, in winter to fade."

Ours is a strong, a vigorous plant, hardy as the oak that strikes its root to the soil and spreads its branches to the sunshine. This Canada of ours stretches far outward to the Atlantic to catch the first beams of the morning sun, and goes with that sun westward to the far off Pacific. Growing in the sunshine, hardening in the storm, it shall strengthen through all the coming years. It shall grow and harden and strengthen so long as the seasons come and go, so long as agriculture yields her food to man and beast. This Canada of ours will increase so long as commerce interchanges and distributes the varied productions of the earth. It will prosper so long as manufactures exist. It will increase and prosper, so long as there are human hands to throw the shuttle in the loom, to drive the locomotive on the rail, to guide the ship on the sea, to draw the fish from the depths. It will abide in strength so long as there are hands to draw the furrow, and plant the seed, and gather the harvest, and be uplifted in gratitude to Him who hath given so largely, so liberally, so bountifully of everything that is necessary to make a great country. How liberally, how bountifully, have we been dealt with? We have countless acres of soil, rich as the hand of man ever strewed with seed for grain, or planted with flower for beauty. We have great storehouses, inexhaustible mines of every mineral substance that can minister to man's comfort, and make for his adornment. We have in the North almost measureless forests, that give, when the wind, that grand old harper, strikes the pines, the music of work and wealth. We have lake joined to lake, great inland seas and rolling down from them magnificent rivers, affording facilities for a vast internal trade, which the hon. gentlemen opposite would seek to destroy. Whilst the great oceans whose billows beat on opposite shores connect us with the commerce of the world and bring to us in their fisheries a perpetual harvest of food and wealth. When I think of all these things I am thankful that there is a great party—the great Liberal Conservative Party—in this country who have realized the full value of these resources, and that they are ready to discharge the responsibility which rests on us to develop them. And I am proud to stand here to-night an humble member of a Government commissioned by the people in 1878, and consecrated to the work of guarding the interest and protecting the industrial rights of the 4,000,000 of men and women who inhabit this country—men worthy of the great races from which they sprang—women who, with their beauty, their grace and their intelligence, will transmit to the coming generations all those high qualities which have made the name of France and Britain so glorious in all history—4,000,000 of men and women who, guarded in their interests and protected in their rights, will go forward to develop the resources committed to their care and make of this country a nation of which all the nationalities of civilization shall be proud.

Mr. FLYNN. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is the last man that I should have expected to see stand up in this House to defend a high protective Tariff. It will be remembered, Sir, that at the time that a Union of the British North American Colonies was proposed, among the many arguments that were urged in Nova Scotia against Confederation, there was none more prominently brought forward, none more often used, than that the taxation of the people of Nova Scotia would be largely increased by Confederation. Among the men who opposed the Union of the Colonies on that occasion, the member for Colchester (Mr. McLellan) was a prominent man, and there was no man among that party who, from the platform, and from his place in the old Parliament of Nova Scotia, advocated that particular view more strongly than did the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McLelan), so I cannot but express my surprise to find the hon. gentleman to-night defending a high protective Tariff, and one that bears so unequally and unfairly in his native Province. It is not my intention to follow that hon. gentleman through his long speech. It would be impossible for me to follow him if I desired, because it appears to me that a great many of his remarks had little bearing on the question before the House. He employs to-night the same brilliant oratorical powers and the same splendid peroration in which he magnified the extent of this vast Dominion—the same brilliant language which he now uses to laud up the Dominion to the skies he used in the old Parliament of Nova Scotia in belittling Confederation, and teaching the people of that Province that they would commit the grossest error, and make the grandest mistake of their lives, if they linked their destinies with that of the Confederation. The hon. gentleman has referred to the speech delivered by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on the Tariff in 1876. The charge of inconsistency has often been made against that hon. member with regard to that speech. The changes have been wrong upon it in this House, and the charge has gone to the country that he had shown himself to be inconsistent on the subject of Protection. But it is to be noticed that those who make these charges quote only the opening portion of the speech. Is it fair to take an isolated extract from a speech of two or three hours duration, and say that some particular position was the one which he assumed. The hon. member for North Norfolk at the conclusion of that very speech stated very distinctly what he meant by a protective Tariff. The Tariff then was a Tariff of 17½ per cent. ad valorem, and the hon. gentleman went that far in the direction of Protection and no further.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. FLYNN. I will read what the hon. gentleman said :

"In conclusion, I may state that I am desirous of doing everything calculated to promote the manufacturing interests of this country. But, looking from my standpoint, I believe that the present Tariff is adequate ; that at all events to demonstrate its inadequacy will require more time. I heartily endorse the policy of the Finance Minister in declining to advance the rate beyond 17½ per cent."

Mr. BOWELL. How does that affect the argument ?

Mr. FLYNN. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that there is no protection in 17½ per cent.; that that is Free Trade, but surely that Tariff gives protection to a very considerable extent. I think the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), was more consistent than the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The latter has alluded to the Fishery Award as due to the present Government. All I shall say on this subject is, that it was during the time of the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) that the matter was brought to a conclusion. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman who preceded him in his Department was an excellent and a vigilant officer. I wish to take no credit from him to which he is fairly and honorably entitled, for I believe he discharged the duties of his office well ; but, at the same time, the whole matter was negotiated and brought to a termination during the period when the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) was Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McLelan) spoke of the decline of manufactures and imports in England. I think he stated that the manufacturing industries had declined in that country. I wish to read from a speech, delivered before the Chamber of Commerce at Leeds, by Mr. Gladstone, on that subject :

"His country, whose life-blood the vampire of Free Trade is insidiously sucking—(cheers and laughter)—let us see what share in this little island we have got of the trade of the world. In 1880, our trade with the world amounted to £693,000,000 in value—the largest, I believe, imports and exports taken together, and, of course, re-export—the largest ever known. In 1873, or the year of our greatest exports, I believe the total trade represented £682,000,000 ; but I will take our worst year, 1879, which was the year of that darkness which called forth all the owls and bats in the country, and sent them creaking about (laughter) in order to disturb us, and, if possible, to teach us to walk in the ways of another policy. In 1879, it is quite true, the trifling sum of £612,000,000 was all that passed through our hands in this business of exchange in a population of 35,000,000 people. Let us compare the trade and population of some other countries. The German Empire, with 40,000,000 of people, had £371,000,000 of trade. The United States, with 50,000,000 of people had £239,000,000 of external trade, most of which, an enormous share in which, as you know, was owing to our demand for the food and provisions which, thank God, she produces ; and these two countries together—two of the most civilized countries of the world, and both of them highly productive—with a population of 90,000,000 had a trade of £610,000,000, while we, with 35,000,000 of people, had a trade of £612,000,000. (Loud cheers.) So that, comparing ourselves with these great and intelligent countries, man for a man, you have nearly three times the amount of trade that is in their hands. Take again three other countries, which I take on account of the large figures which represent their high place in the trade of the world. France has £313,000,000 of trade with 36,000,000 of population. Russia has £183,000,000 of trade, with 80,000,000 people. Holland has £116,000,000 of trade, a great deal of which, as you know, is transit trade for the supply of the interior parts of the Continent ; she has 5,000,000 people. There, again, we have a population of 121,000,000 with a trade of $612,000,000, exactly that which in the disastrous year of 1879 fell to our share with a population of 35,000,000.

That clearly proves that England, under a Free Trade policy, has not certainly declined in her industries. I said, in opening my remarks, that I was surprised at the position taken by the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McLelan) with regard to the high protective Tariff, and on that subject I wish to quote from a speech delivered by that hon. gentleman in 1865, in the Nova Scotia Assembly, in reference to the question of Confederation and the increased taxation which it would inflict on the country. In the extract he is reported to have said :

"Confederation, instead of extending the commerce and developing the natural products of this country, will rather cripple trade. I have already shown that Confederation must necessarily impose upon us a very heavy Tariff and exceedingly large burthens. The consequence of that is to increase the cost of living and producing the articles of export, and when you increase the cost of living and of wages, you are unable to compete with other countries in the sale of your coal and fish and other articles which Nova Scotia is especially calculated to produce."

That speech was delivered in 1865. Again, during the first meeting of this Parliament after Confederation, in 1867, when the Minister of Customs of that day introduced his Tariff, in which he proposed to impose a duty of 25 cents a barrel on flour, the hon. President of the Council made a speech, in which he said :

"The Minister of Customs assumes that there being no duty between the Provinces, that we shall purchase largely in Canada, and so escape duty. It may be that while goods from other markets are shut out by a 15 per cent. Tariff, that we may get some articles from Canada, but they will, in all probability, cost the consumer more than if we could get them from England and elsewhere by paying 10 per cent. The fact that while we had in Nova Scotia the same rate on manufactured goods from all countries, we did not import from Canada, proves that manufactured goods there are not sold so cheap as in other countries. And if we do, hereafter, import from Canada, the consumer will pay as high or higher for the goods than when admitted from England at 10 per cent., the difference being that the money goes to the Canadian manufacturer, and not the Treasury for the public benefit."

The hon. gentleman went on to show that the increase on certain staple goods then proposed in the Tariff—which was to be only a 15 per cent. Tariff, much below the present one, and in which many articles now taxed were on the free list—would increase the taxation in the Province of Nova Scotia to the extent of $35,000. He also said :

"The Minister of Customs in commencing his speech stated that the object was to present to the House such a statement of figures and facts that no Unionist should return to his people in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, hanging his head in shame on account of increased taxation."

But what has he shown? That, on the bread and articles necessary for the sustenance and comfort of the poor man, there is a large increase of taxation, while in the rich man's wines and brandy there is a reduction. Sir, I scarcely think that any Unionist will venture to hold up his head and attempt to justify Confederation with the argument furnished by the hon. gentleman's explanation of the result of this Tariff. But it matters little to the poor man what saving there may be on luxuries. His complaint will be, as ours is, that you tax the bread and necessaries of life."

That was what the hon. gentleman said in 1867. It was taxing the bread of the poor man then to impose a duty of 25 cents a barrel on flour, but to-day it is not taxing the poor man's bread to impose 50 cents a barrel, 100 per cent. more. To further show the inconsistency of the hon. gentleman, I may quote some questions which are put to him by a correspondent belonging to his own county, in to-day's Globe:

"Why did you, at a meeting in your own village, when answering A. G. Archibald, draw a map on the wall to show that the proposed Confederation would comprise a 'narrow strip of land,' and that Nova Scotia was at the extreme end, and had no natural relationship with the Upper Provinces? Why did you tell us that, if we were confederated, that we would have to buy largely of Ontario, and sell her people nothing in return? Why did you tell us that Ontario would send us her beef, butter, cheese and all kinds of manufactured goods, and take little or nothing from us except the 'hard cash,' and get that as we could? Why did you repeat to us a thousand times that the raising of our Tariff from 10 per cent. to 15 per cent. would entail upon us a taxation grievous to be borne? But more, in 1867 you told us that a Tariff of 15 per cent. was the most outrageous taxation that ever was imposed, and if we were only strong enough it should never be collected. You told us too, what has since come true, that the Tariff could not long remain at 15 per cent., for the Tariff of old Canada had been brought down from 20 per cent. to 15 for the express purpose of catching Nova Scotia. In 1881, you have a new tune. A Tariff that averages nearly 30 per cent., about double your ruinous 15—is the most glorious piece of legislation ever enacted by any Parliament. What made the change?"

Now, Sir, I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman any further in the speech he has made. I think the extracts which I have given from his own speeches prove that if ever a man was inconsistent in his public utterances that man is the hon. President of the Council. We have been told by that hon. gentleman, as well as by the hon. Minister of Railways and the hon. Minister of Finance, that this country is in a flourishing condition. The hon. the Finance Minister drew a glowing picture of the prosperity of this country, which he attributed entirely to the National Policy. Now Sir, there are portions of this country which have not yet participated in that prosperity; there are portions which have felt, and are still feeling, the evil effects of the National Policy. It is true that Providence has blessed this country with good harvests; the farmer has received good prices for the products of his farm; the lumber industry, which for many years was in a depressed condition, has revived; and there is a general revival of trade. But this revival is certainly not due to the National Policy, but in spite of it, as it has certainly added to the cost of the production of lumber and other goods. But the hon. Minister of Finance has told us that a protective policy was necessary to the material advancement of this country. Now, let me refer that hon. gentleman to a period in 1873 when he occupied the same position in the Government that he occupies to-day, when he came down with his Budget he then drew a vivid picture of the prosperity of this country and the wonderful increase in trade and in large banking institutions. Yet all this was under the 15 per cent. Tariff. Now, if the general trade of the country advanced under this 15 per cent. ad valorem duty, if under it the manufacturing institutions of the country flourished and were prosperous, it proves this fact, that it is not necessary to the material advancement of the country to have a high protective Tariff. Let me refer him back to a period some years before that, under the old Province of Canada. Then for a period of nearly ten years, under a high protective Tariff, they had hard times and a general depression in trade, and in every branch of industry, and the Government which then ruled were forced to meet Parliament with annual deficits. We have had good times under a revenue Tariff and we have had bad times and general depression under a high protective Tariff. But this only proves that either under a revenue or protective Tariff you may have periods of depression, with this difference: that with a protective Tariff you approach depression by imposing burdens on the people when they are least able to bear them. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Finance in his Budget Speech of this and last Session, tried to convince the country and the House, that, under this Tariff, the people are getting goods cheaper than they were under the Tariff of 1873, and, in order to establish this point, he read letters from several manufacturers which he calls reliable data. I consider this is not a fair way to put the question. If the hon. Minister of Finance wishes to put this question fairly he had better give us the opinion of somebody else as well as the manufacturers. He had better write down to the lumbermen, fishermen, merchants and other people in the Maritime Provinces and get their opinion; or, better still, let him visit those Provinces and interview the people there. Let him ask their opinion of this Tariff, and whether they consider they are getting goods cheaper. I will engage, they will show him it is not a fact; he will find that the people pay more for woollen and cotton goods, and have more difficulty in making both ends meet, than they had before. Now, Sir, much has been said about the prosperity of this country. I admit that some parts of the country have prospered in a very great degree, owing to the revival of trade, but other parts have not. Now, I contend, in several parts of Nova Scotia, and I think it is the same in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, that real estate which, perhaps, is the best test of the prosperity of a country, has fallen as much as 100 per cent. in some places. I am aware that in Halifax, so it has been stated in the press, more laboring men are out of employment, and there is more suffering in that city this winter than for many years previous. Property that sold some time ago, perhaps eight or nine years ago, in the very centre of the business part of Halifax, for $40,000 was sold only the other day for $21,000—a reduction of 100 per cent. in the value of that property, which, one would think, should now be more valuable, consisting as it does of stores and wharf property. Now, Sir, the hon. the Minister of Finance told us that woollen and cotton goods were cheaper under this Tariff than under the former. If this is the case, I ask why do the manufacturers of those articles come here and ask for a higher protection to prevent their being slaughtered, as they term it, by American goods. If they can now sell their goods cheaper than before, it seems to me highly absurd to clamor for more protection. We say that the Tariff operates against the poor man and in favor of the rich; that is the contention of those who have spoke on this side of the House, and there can be no doubt that the specific duties are the same on the cheaper cottons, shirtings, flannels, cloth, and other things used by the poor man, as they are on the better quality of goods used by the rich. The poor man pays 10 cents per lb. specific duty for his clothing, and the rich man, who is more luxuriously clad, pays the same. The specific duties are the same for poor and rich on the cheaper kinds of cotton. Why, the Tariff of 1879 nearly doubled the duty on cottons and more than doubled it on woollens which are chiefly used by the poorer classes. Again, Sir, does not your bread tax discriminate against the poor? Why, you have 50 cents per barrel on flour, the same on the poorest grades and cheaper quality used by the poorest people as on the highest quality and dearest kind used by the rich man. Then, Sir, have you not a tax of 40 cents a barrel on corn meal, an article which costs even less than one-half the price of flour, and has a duty upon it nearly the same as flour, and this is used by only the very poor classes. Now, Sir, in the course of his speech, the Minister of Finance said, in alluding to the people of the Maritime Provinces, that there were some of these things which they did not seem to understand. I must say I thought when he made that statement he was paying a very poor compliment to his countrymen down by the sea. I do not hesitate to say that the people of the Maritime Provinces understand these things and are as well able to judge of them as the people of the other Provinces of this Dominion. In order to show the hon. Minister of Finance that this Tariff discriminates against the poor and in favor of the rich, I will read an extract from a journal published in Charlottetown last summer, it said :

" A leading merchant of this town directed our attention to five items in one entry he was making out. These goods were used chiefly by the poorer classes, fisherman's blankets, cotton tweeds, woollen clothes, &c. Here is the cost and duty paid on them :

Fishermen's Blankets.....	$ 49.00—Duty is $ 32.80.
Bale White Cotton.....	383.00— " 126.44.
Flannels ..	74.00— " 19.15.
Woollen Cloths.....	308.00— " 98.00.
Cotton Tweeds.....	132.00— " 34.00.

A total cost, as per invoice, of $946, with a duty of $310.39, or an average of 33 cents on the dollar, upon the poor man's coarse blankets 67 cents, and it is within a small fraction of 40 cents on the dollar upon the coarse tweeds worn only by the poorer classes. I will now read from a speech delivered by a merchant of the city of Halifax before the Halifax Chamber of Commerce. This speech was made after the introduction of the present Tariff by Mr. Adam Burns, a large importer of dry goods, a prominent man, and a strong supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. Let us hear what is the opinion of this gentleman on the Tariff, and I presume to testimony like this the hon. Finance Minister will have no objection, coming, as it does, from his own side. On that occasion Mr. Burns said :

" He thought the Tariff was objectionable in many respects, but he did not criticise it in any spirit of hostility to the present Government whom he looked upon as the persons best suited to administer the affairs of this Dominion. One objection he had to the Tariff was the specific duties which were excessive and very unjust to the poor man, cheaper kinds of cloth used by him and the fine broad cloth of the rich man were alike taxed 10 cents per $1 which all could at once see was unjust to the user of the cheaper material. The speaker instanced cotton batting, wadding, cotton warp, knitting, grey and white cotton, colored cottons for shirtings, flannels and blankets, clothing, tweeds, &c., carpets two ply (such as the majority of the working class use) and many other articles as commending themselves to the favorable consideration of a considerate Finance Minister as needing very little protection and being under the specific duty system enhanced in price greatly to the injury of the class of people least able to bear increased burdens. The specific duties he looked upon as the most obnoxious feature in the Tariff. Our worthy Doctor represented he said in discussing the Tariff, that he thought it unfair that the poor man's serge should be taxed to the same extent as the rich man's broad cloth—what would that gentleman's feelings be when he found the poor man's clothing taxed at the rate of 45 per cent., while the rich man only paid 30 per cent. under this iniquitous, he might almost say diabolical specific duty system. It might be said that the inequality was only apparent, and as manufactures extended things would differ. As a rule, however, our prices would be ruled by those in other countries and manufacturers would pocket larger bonuses. No doubt in time so many would become manufacturers, that they would kill each other and prices would go down so low that the whole basis of business in the Dominion would become unsettled. He denounced the Tariff generally as unnecessarily high, tending to stop healthy competition with outsiders, encourage smuggling, and offer a premium generally to dishonesty."

This was the language used by Mr. Burns on that occasion, and any one who knows him will admit he is a gentleman quite as capable of intelligently discussing the Tariff question, or any other question, as any of the manufacturers of this Dominion. The Halifax Chamber of Commerce is a body which contains very many Conservatives, yet, on that occasion, not one was to be found to defend the Tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite. In looking over the Trade Returns I find that, in 1881, the imports of foreign cottons reached $10,244,465, and, of woollen goods, $8,744,000, making a total of about $19,000,000. The consumer of these goods pays the duty, but it presses more heavily on the poorer classes under what Mr. Burns terms the diabolical specific duty system. Notwithstanding the statement I have read the Finance Minister has told the House that the people are getting their cotton and woollen goods as cheap as at any time previous to the pre-ent Tariff; but I hold the testimony of Mr. Burns to be worth more than that of interested manufacturers, who have an interest in keeping up the delusion of low prices. We contend that, under this high Tariff, many of the manufacturing establishments are making large profits, and that if that be so the people are paying a great deal of money besides what goes direct into the Treasury. It has been contended by the hon. the Finance Minister that goods are being sold cheaper now than they were before the Tariff. Let me quote the opinion of a Montreal paper supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, the Canadian Spectator. Speaking of the cotton factories, it says :

" Nothing can more strikingly illustrate the marvellous prosperity of Canada under its protective Tariff than the condition of the cotton factories in and near Montreal. The annual meeting of the proprietors of several of these establishments have been held during the last few weeks, and the statements presented are said to have been of the most glowing description. In one instance the profits are said to have been $200,000, equal to 100 per cent. upon the original paid up capital of the company, on a turn over for the year of some $900,000. We congratulate the fortunate shareholders on their enterprises."

I might say I commiserate the unfortunate tax-payer. We have it announced on good authority that the stock is paying 100 per cent. on the original capital. We have it on good authority that the wages dispensed by one of the companies for this year was some $90,000, giving employment to 600 souls. It is true that the average rate of wages paid was not very high, being somewhat under 48 cents per day for every man, woman and child employed. Here is the other side of the picture, the dark side. While the fortunate stockholders were securing 100 per cent. on the original stock the wages of the poor laborers averaged only 48 cents a day. One would suppose that when the stockholders were making immense fortunes they would afford something more than such a miserable pittance for their laborers, who had to toil during long hours to earn large dividends for their employers. But no; it does not matter what the wages may be so long as the cotton lords make their money and the National Policy flourishes. Having said so much in regard to the Tariff, I congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance on having at last had the courage to come down and propose something in the shape of a bounty to the fishermen. The hon. gentleman says that the $150,000 is proposed to be given in lieu of the Fishery Award. It will be remembered that, in 1879, the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Yeo) made a motion here, claiming the Fishery Award for the Maritime Provinces. The Government, on that occasion, took the position that those Provinces were not entitled to it, and they decided against the views entertained by that hon. gentleman and others, who supported him on that occasion. It will be further remembered that at an early period of the Session of 1880, the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell), introduced a resolution, declaring that the proceeds of the Fishery Arbitration, in right and justice, belonged to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. He supported the view then enunciated in an able and eloquent speech, and was ably sustained by most of the representatives of the Maritime Provinces, who set forth the claims of those Provinces to the Award. How was the gentleman met by hon. gentlemen opposite? The hon. leader of the Government came forward, denying the right of the Maritime Provinces to the Fishery Award, stating that they had neither a legal nor an equitable claim to the money, which belonged to the Dominion Treasury. In short, it has been absorbed into it. Notwithstanding this denial of the hon. gentleman opposite, and this amendment moved and carried by a large majority in that House, the hon. the Finance Minister in his Budget Speech, stated that we are giving to the fishermen of the Dominion, $150,000—not as a bounty on fish, but in lieu of their interest in the Fishery Award—thus admitting our claim to that award. Now, if his position is correct, we are entitled to the whole interest on that amount, the $4,500,000, accumulating from the time it was paid by the United States to the end of the current year, 1882, which, according to the calculation given to the House the other night by the hon. member for Antigonish, exceeds $800,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. FLYNN. I am glad to hear the hon. leader of the Government say hear, hear.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. He will put it in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman's speech is neither here nor there.

Mr. FLYNN. It is evident that this $150,000 is but a small instalment of what is due to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. I am afraid it will go but a very short way in making up to them the exactions of the Tariff. It would put but a very small sum into their pockets, as against the very large amount taken out of them by the Tariff. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) asked the hon. the Finance Minister lately if this grant was to be secured by Act of Parliament, or during the existence of the Washington Treaty. The hon. gentleman replied that he would say nothing until the item was submitted to the House. I would much prefer, small as this sum is, to see it secured by Act of Parliament, so as to be sure that the fishermen should possess a guarantee of getting it. No class of people in the Dominion are more entitled to the consideration of the House than the fishermen, whether we look at the extent and value of our fishery exports and trade, or at the risks and dangers to life and property involved in this interest. No class pays more into the revenue than the fishermen, or suffer in a greater degree from the effects of a protective policy. This was one of the arguments to induce the people of that Province to accept Confederation. It was stated by the Minister of Railways and his friends, before Confederation, that a bounty would be given to fishermen. I believe that on the hustings in Halifax, in 1867, a telegram was sent to one of the Union candidates (Mr. Hill), in which it was stated: "You can assure the fishermen of Nova Scotia that they shall have a bounty if we confederate." This despatch was scattered all through the Province, and it was generally believed that a bounty would follow Confederation. But during the seven years that the hon. gentleman held office no bounty was given, and we never heard a word of it till this year, when rumors were current of a general election. What did the President of the Council say on the occasion of the Tariff discussion in reference to the fish bounty in 1867? He said:

"We are told that we may have bounties to fishermen. We have no assurance of this. But if by any possibility we do, I think, from the statement I gave to the House, last night, showing that, even under the old Tariff in force in Nova Scotia, the result of the last five months has given the Dominion Treasury a profit of over $150,000 out of us in that short period, and from the increase I have shown this Tariff imposes, it follows that if our fishermen get bounties, it will only be a portion of our own taxation."

This statement was made by the President of the Council in 1867, when there was a rumor of the fishermen getting bounties, namely, that they would be receiving only a portion of their taxation. I now come to the subject of coal duties. Both the hon. the Finance Minister and the hon. the Minister of Railways have stated that the increase of the output, from the mines, is due to the National Policy entirely, and that the consumer in Ontario does not pay the duty on the foreign coal. The hon. the Minister of Finance did not go quite so far as the Minister of Railways. He stated the people of Ontario paid half the duty. I believe that unless the Government can show that they have given, to a large extent, Ontario as a market for the coal of Nova Scotia, the coal duty is a failure. The hon. the Finance Minister stated in the House, in 1879, that the duty would give a market in Ontario for this coal, by displacing 400,000 tons of foreign coal, and that if his policy was successful, the demand for Nova Scotia coal would increase still further. Now, he states his policy is successful beyond his most sanguine expectations. Yet, we find that 400,000 tons of coal have not been sent into Ontario. We have nothing to show that more than 800 tons were sent there, having gone as stated, to Cobourg; but we hear of none having gone anywhere else in that Province. In the Report of the Mines of Nova Scotia, we find that wherever coal is sold the name of the Province or country is given with the quantity sold; but no mention is made of Ontario; therefore, I conclude that no coal has been exported to that Province; and if the Finance Minister's policy has failed to give the markets of Ontario to the coal of Nova Scotia, there is no longer a reason for inflicting on nearly a million of people of the three Maritime Provinces your bread tax, and on the people of Ontario your fuel tax—both sectional—both unjust. As to the 400,000 tons of an increase in sales that he speaks of, the Mines Reports give but 341,503 tons in excess of 1879. I contend that this increase is due to entirely different causes than the National Policy. In the first place it is due to the revival of trade, from which the coal trade as well as other industries has benefitted. It is, in the second place, due to the increased demand for coal in the Lower Provinces, coal taking the place of wood for domestic purposes; in the third place, to the great quantity of Bunker, sold to foreign-going steamers; and, in the fourth place, to the increased sale of coal in foreign markets. I have made a comparative statement of the coal sold in 1879 and in 1881, which I will read. In 1879 the sales of Nova Scotia coal reached 278,120 tons; in 1881, 382,413 tons, or an increase of 104,293 tons. In 1879 the sales in New Brunswick were 84,731 tons, and, in 1881, 123,526 tons, showing an increase over 1879, of 38,796 tons. In 1879, the sales to Newfoundland were 57,651, and, in 1881, 62,174 tons, showing an increase of 5,153 tons. In 1879, the sales to Prince Edward Island were 43,412 tons; in 1881, they were 49,313 tons, showing an increase of 5,901 tons. In 1879, the sales to the United States were 51,641 tons; in 1881, 113,728, showing an increase of 62,087 tons. In 1879, the sales to the West Indies were 10,124 tons; in 1881, 21,600, showing an increase of 11,476. In 1879, the sales to Europe were 10,124 tons; in 1881, 13,612 tons, showing an increase of 3,488 tons, or a total increase over 1879 of 231,163 tons. Here we have an increase in the sales of Nova Scotia coal of 231,163 tons accounted for. Surely the hon. Minister of Finance cannot claim an increased sale of 62,000 tons to the United States, as due to his policy. Surely he cannot claim the increase to Europe and other countries as due to the National Policy. Therefore, he cannot claim an increased consumption of over 100 per cent. These 231,000 tons he cannot lay any shadow of claim to as due to the National Policy. Now, if we take the balance of the increase, and if we can find out the quantities of coal carried in those vessels that are now traversing the Atlantic so frequently, and touch at the mines of Cape Breton and Pictou, and if we include the quantity sold to Quebec, we will account for the increase in the sales of coal in 1881 over 1879. Now, Sir, I am free to admit that the National Policy may have displaced a few tons of English coal in the Province of Quebec, but beyond those few tons it has had no other effect whatever. It has a tendency in doing that to raise the rates of freight across the Atlantic. It prevents our own shipping, which is in a depressed condition now, from taking coal as ballast, as they were in the habit of doing, and therefore it inflicts a serious injury on the shipping interests, proving that the National Policy, where it benefits one, injures a dozen. But we had the market of Quebec to a large extent before the imposition of a duty. Now, let me refer to our export of coal in 1874 to the Province of Quebec. In one year of depression I find we exported to that Province, 189,574 tons. Now, I may fairly assume that if the revival of trade increased the quantity sent from Nova Scotia to Quebec, that quantity would have been sent without a duty at all on coal. The hon. gentleman stated that his policy of imposing a duty on foreign coal was going to displace 400,000 tons the first year in the Province of Ontario. Has it done so? Not at all. So far from displacing foreign coal from Ontario, the importation of foreign coal has increased. We find the imports of foreign coal, in 1879, amounted to 863,061 tons; in 1880, to 973,610 tons; in 1881, to 1,159,106 tons; or an increase of nearly 300,000 tons, in 1881, over the imports of 1879. Now, so far from shutting out our coal from the Province of Ontario, we have an increased importation into the Dominion of over 300,000 tons. The hon. Minister of Finance claims that this increase in the output on Nova Scotia coal was due to the National Policy. Let me direct him back to the period of 1873, the period that he himself referred to as the golden period of Canada. What was the product of her mines then? I find by the report of 1873, that the coal production of her mines for that year was 1,051,469 tons. I mention this fact to show that when trade was brisk, when there was a demand for coal in foreign markets, the products of our mines in 1873, under a revenue Tariff, when there was no duty on foreign coal, were not as great as in this boasted year of 1881. The coal trade had to share the general depression, like all other trades; but when times changed for the better, then, like other industries, it became more prosperous. Now I propose to read from the official report of the Inspector of Mines for Nova Scotia, in 1878. I propose to show by this document that if the coal industry was suffering under the late Government, it was due to the general depression of trade, that other industries were suffering at the time as well as the coal industry, and that the coal industry was suffering in other countries as well as in Canada. The report says:

"Great Britain and the United States were alike affected by the wave of financial depression, and though coal dealers of these countries also sought relief in exportation, Nova Scotia struggled for a part of the trade with the West Indies, but was overpowered by her powerful competitors controlling return freights."

Now, it was stated by the hon. Minister of Finance that this great increase in the product of coal in 1881 was due to the National Policy. I propose to show that since the opening up of our mines in 1785 the increase has been gradual every decade. It was greatly stimulated after the settlement of the Duke of York's lease, in 1858, by the Nova Scotia Government. He says:

"Comparing the Trade Returns for a number of years, a permanent, though fluctuating progression is noticeable, each decade, roughly speaking, doubling the output of coal. The annual sales of the present time are more than double what they were in 1858, when the trade was opened to competition. This year's output has exceeded that of the often styled prosperous year of 1865, and though it has so, and also that of the preceding year, it is regarded as most unsatisfactory, and naturally so, for it has not been remunerative. But then, nowise has coal-mining generally of late been prosperous in England and the United States. Every one is familiar with the accounts of the extreme destitution and desolation of districts of South Wales, but lately prosperous and thriving; and, in the anthracite regions of Pennsylvania, of the collapse of many companies, of the large sacrifices of members to keep their works in operation, and of the hardships endured by workmen forced to accept short time and starvation rate of wages. It is sufficient to call such circumstances to mind, and to remember the conditions of those engaged in the trade abroad, to cause some feelings of resignation that, trying as the times may be for us, they are no worse than with our neighbors. * * * But the conditions involved in the direct and indirect advantages to the trade and in the gain and loss to the country at large by such a tax, are so many, and the whole question is so involved, that I shall not attempt to classify and consider them. It might, however, fairly be asked whether a tax which checked importations from Great Britain would not so raise the rate of freight up the St. Lawrence as to practically defeat the end in view, and increase the homeward freights on grain and lumber. It is also questionable whether a tax would stop the importation of hard coal which we cannot supply. It is certain that by it the exports would not directly be increased, and it is also certain that with it the western consumer of coal must pay it or go back to the use of wood. * * * If the business of coal mining is to be fostered, a bounty is said to have this advantage over a tax: it would not bear unequally on different parts of Canada, nor interfere with the export trade of the St. Lawrence, while it would increase the exportations, and benefit the failing West India trade, while contemplating the several means open for winning the trade of the Upper Provinces."

That was the opinion, in 1878, of Mr. Poole, given in his official report to the Government of that day, and no man was more competent to give an opinion. He was thoroughly conversant with the management of our mines, and he is now discharging the duties of an important position as manager of one of our large collieries. The more I consider the question the more strongly am I convinced that it is impossible to give the market of Ontario to the coal producers of Nova Scotia with a less duty than $2 per ton. In 1877, a Select Committee was appointed in this House to enquire into the condition of the coal trade. The hon. Minister of Railways was a member of that Committee, and I also was a member. Witnesses were examined, who urged this duty, and based their calculations on the probability of establishing inter-provincial trade with the Upper Provinces. But that inter-provincial trade has never been created, it has been found impossible to compete with the United States, simply because the Pennsylvania mines lie so much closer to Ontario, that the cost of transportation is much less, and the cost of mining is much lower than with us. We have no statistics giving the extent of the trade between the upper and lower Provinces since Confederation. If we had I believe it would show that while our imports from the Upper Provinces have largely increased since Confederation we export very little to them. In 1865-66, the value of Canada exports to the Maritime Provinces was $1,571,516. In 1866-67, the year of Confederation, they were $3,418,589—an increase of $1,847,473, while our exports to the Upper Provinces remained about the same; and I believe if we had the means of finding out the extent of that trade, there is no doubt that the exports from the Lower to the Upper Provinces would be found to be about the same that they were before Confederation. One of the witnesses examined before the Committee to which I have referred, stated that from statistics he had obtained, and from his knowledge of the commerce of Canada, the Maritime Provinces and Newfoundland imported, in 1876, from $10,000,000 to $11,000,000 worth from the Lower Provinces, while our exports to them were only, $1,500,000 to $2,000,000. Judging by these facts, the inter-provincial trade has been altogether one-sided. The goods which we could send to the Upper Provinces are not the goods that they will take from us. Much stress has been laid on a statement made by the leader of the Opposition, that Ontario was not the natural market of the Lower Provinces. But who will say that the United States are not the natural market of the Maritime Provinces? Have not they been our natural market for years before Confederation, and has anything which hon. gentlemen have done altered that fact? Will they take our products if we send them to Ontario? They do not take them; and I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to show by any statistics they can produce that since Confederation they have increased the purchase of goods from the Lower Provinces; so that the hon. leader of the Opposition was not wrong in stating what was an absolute fact and truism, that the natural market of the people of the Maritime Provinces was the United States. It has been their market in the past; it is their market now, and it will be their market in future. There are physical difficulties in the way of putting our products on the Ontario market. The cost of transportation is too great, while we have our natural market along the sea board of the United States for everything we produce. These hon. gentlemen talk about protection to the farmers, but where are the benefits which the farmers of the Maritime Provinces have received from it? Were their products bought by the manufacturers of Nova Scotia? No, Sir, they find a market for their surplus products in the United States, Newfoundland, and other countries, particularly the United States. They are the people we must trade with, so that no man can reasonably charge the leader of the Opposition with stating what was not absolutely correct in saying that the United States was our natural market. Am I, or is any other inhabitant of the Maritime Provinces, so patriotic, so deeply in favor of inter-provincial trade, that we must send our goods to the Upper Provinces at a lower price than we can obtain in the United States? With regard to the question of sending our coal to Upper Canada, let me read an extract from the report of the Committee on Coal:

"A recent contract made by the Grand Trunk for a supply of steam coal for its locomotives may afford some criterion whereby to judge of the cost at which, without regard to any special arrangements for downward freights, it may be laid down in bulk at Montreal and Toronto respectively. The tenders accepted for Montreal by the Grand Trunk were, for Nova Scotia coal, at $3.96 per long ton on the wharf, or adding 27 cents for cartage, $4.23 in the yard. At Toronto, the tender for American coal was accepted at $3.40 per short ton in the yard, or equal to $3.78 on the long ton, a difference in price between the two tenders of 45 cents in favor of the United States coal at Toronto. If to this be added $1 per ton, the lowest rate at which it has been suggested coal can be borne from Montreal to Toronto, and the difference may be stated in round figures, at $1.50 per ton against Nova Scotia."

Now, Sir, according to these facts and figures, we find that American coal has an advantage of $1.50 over Nova Scotia coal in Toronto; and if times revive we might fairly allow for a margin of 50 cents a ton freight, which would make a difference of $2 a ton in favor of American coal at Toronto. What did the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Doull) himself say in 1879, when this coal duty was discussed? He then said that a duty of 50 cents a ton was not sufficient to give the coal owners of Nova Scotia the market of Ontario, and would only be a tax on the people of Ontario and Quebec. Anybody who gives the slightest attention to this subject must see that the coal duty has entirely failed to give the people of Nova Scotia what was promised to them, namely, the market of Ontario. But, Sir, the hon. Minister of Railways stated in his speech that the people of Ontario do not pay the duty—in fact, that coal is cheaper to-day than it was before the duty was imposed. If this contention is correct—if the people of Ontario are actually getting their coal cheaper than they did before the imposition of the duty, the natural inference is that the duty of 50 cents is of no good, but a positive injury, to the people of Nova Scotia. But, Sir, if, on the other hand, the coal producers themselves think that the coal duty is a benefit—and many do seriously think that it is—why not give them the 75 cents a ton which they asked, and which was promised to them; and if, as the hon. Minister of Railways says, the Americans pay this duty, why not put on the 75 cents and please the coal producers in Nova Scotia. The hon. Minister of Railways, in order to establish his theory, contrasts the prices of coal since the duty was imposed with those which prevailed when there was no duty. But, Sir, these prices do not prove his theory. The price of coal, like that of other articles of commerce, varies from time to time; whatever may be the price, you must add to it the cost of transportation and the duty, and then the consumer pays the duty beyond any doubt, whether in Ontario or elsewhere. I have said that the coal duty does not benefit the coal producers. Let me read a statement made by Mr.

Brown, the manager of the old Sydney mine in Cape Breton, one of the oldest mines in Nova Scotia. He says:

"He stated most emphatically that the duty on coal had not done them one cent of good; in fact, this mine had to pay annually $1,500 more duty on articles needed in operating it than under the old Tariff: the duties on colliery plant, supplies, &c., had, in fact, been doubled without the slightest corresponding benefit. He instanced the great increase of duty on rope wire from 5 to 20 per cent. The duty was imposed on coal to secure the Ontario market. This it had utterly failed to do. Several of the Cape Breton mines shortly after the establishment of the National Policy, sent cargoes to Ontario, and they had invariably lost by the operation and would not again repeat the experiment. Some may say the large output of coal in Nova Scotia is an evidence of the stimulating effects of the National Policy. This does not at all follow; it arises from other and totally different causes. In 1878, Ontario imported from the United States, 588,000 tons of coal; in 1880, her imports from the same markets were 740,000 tons, an increase of 161,000 tons. With just as much propriety might it be said this increase was due to the National Policy, which was avowedly adopted to secure this market for the miners of Nova Scotia."

This is the opinion, not of a person interested in arguing against this duty, but of the manager of one of the oldest collieries in Nova Scotia, and therefore entitled to respect. Now, let me give the opinion of another gentleman, a friend and supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite—a gentleman belonging to Halifax, who had written a great deal in favor of the National Policy, and who supported hon. gentlemen in the last election. He says:

"Any one acquainted with the wants of a colliery in Nova Scotia will tell you that the new Tariff about doubles the duties payable under the old Tariff, and that the duties now imposed on colliery plant and supplies average more than the duty levied on imported coal and coke. When I think of how the National Policy proposed to foster our mining interests, as Mr. Tilley's proposing to impose such a duty as would give the home industry the home market, and then think of what it would have done for the coal mines—well, I better not write my feelings lest the Philistines rejoice. My conviction is the Cape Breton collieries are much worse off under the new than under the old Tariff—they cannot now get any more for their coal, they cannot now put their coal into Ontario, they have now to pay about twice as much duty as before."

These two gentlemen, who are thoroughly acquainted with the coal interests of Nova Scotia, tell you that your National Policy has doubled the cost of operating the mines, and that the duty has totally failed in sending the coal of Nova Scotia to the Province of Ontario; and what these gentlemen say is endorsed by the statement of the hon. member for Pictou, in 1879. When the hon. the Finance Minister made the coal duty a part of his policy, he claimed that it would benefit not only the coal owners of Nova Scotia, but the men engaged in the mines, as well as the coasters engaged in carrying the coal to market. He said that the wages of all these people would be increased by the National Policy. Let me enquire how far have the wages of these men been increased? To show you that this is not the fact, I will read from the Trade Journal, and would call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the quotations here, which I have given them from papers and from gentlemen who are friendly to the policy of the Government. The journal from which I will now read is friendly to hon. gentlemen opposite, and to the policy of protecting home manufactures. In April last, I find the following extract—I might here say there was to be no exodus of our people, they were to be kept at home and were to have constant employment, every man was to get work within the Dominion, and we were told we should not find them going to the United States, as under the regime of Mr. Mackenzie—but what does this say? I read, Trades Journal, April, 1881, quoting from a Cape Breton paper, a report of the departure of a number of men for the United States, rejoicing over the exodus, because it may give employment to those who remain. The Journal says:

"Men are as thick as mushrooms in Cape Breton, and the abundance of labor there has been the principal reason for the low rate of wages prevailing. If there are at any given place twice as many laborers as are required to meet the demand, the consequence must be a severe competition to secure employment. Take away the surplus labor, and a better chance presents itself to those remaining to receive a sufficient remuneration for their labor. If economists are correct in their statements that the value of labor can only advance as the supply is restricted, it must be a source of gladness instead of sorrow to every well-wisher of the working classes to know that the supply is becoming every day more limited. Of course, we could wish that all could receive remunerative employment at home, but so long as that is impossible, it is a patriotic thing for those who can to find employment out of the country, so that those who remain will have the opportunity to make themselves more comfortable."

I again quote from that journal of February 15th, 1882:

"A quarter of a century ago laborers' wages in Nova Scotia were as high as they are at the present time. Laborers then got $1 per day, and to-day the orthodox pay for a laborer is no more than that though in some cases—the Acadia Colliery, for instance, it is even less—as low as 90 cents. It is asserted also that the purchasing power of 50 cents twenty-five years ago was as great as $1 at the present time. While inclined to think the statement somewhat exaggerated, we know that a $1 now does not go so far as it did a number of years ago. Somehow or other $1 a day seems to be generally accepted as the proper pay of laborers, and it is a most difficult thing to induce employers to believe that the matter needs readjustment. When labor is abundant and provisions cheap, employers hasten to bring the wages, if possible under the standard price; but let the labor market be ever so tight and provisions high, nothing it seems will induce them of their own accord to raise the wages above the accepted standard. That a laborer is inadequately paid for a day's work at $1 must be admitted by all who study the question. At the present prices for the necessaries of life it is impossible for him to keep himself and his family without running into debt."

Here we have a statement that the wages the men are now getting are the same as they were twenty-five years ago, with the producing power of $1 double what it is to-day. But even under a policy of Protection, strikes have been occurring. There was a strike at one of the collieries not a long time ago, and there is a strike now in Nova Scotia, at one of these coal mines, for higher wages. These men, in 1875 and 1876, during a period of depression, were willing to have a decrease in their wages; they allowed their employers, knowing that times were hard, to deduct some 10 or 12 per cent., from their daily pay, and that remained, not only during the period of depression, but it continued after the time of the inauguration of the National Policy, and up to this winter. They were, from 1879 until the other day, working at less wages than they were getting from 1874 to 1877, when their wages were reduced; they are now on strike, not to have their wages increased, but to be put in the position they held in 1877. I may now ask, has this National Policy made freights higher? I will show, so far from that being the case, that they were never lower. I find that during the years 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873, a period of a revenue Tariff, when there was no duty imposed on coal to foster and stimulate that industry and other industries—I find that then the rate of freight on coal per ton averaged from $3 to $5, to Boston, New York, and other places in the United States. I ask what has it been during this protected period, during these years of prosperity and abundance when everything was flourishing? I find that in 1879, 1880, and 1881, it ranged from $1.40 to $2.50, or 100 per cent. less than the coasters were getting in 1871 and 1872, when there was no duty on coal. From these facts and figures we must inevitably conclude: First, that the coal owners have not been benefitted by the National Policy or the imposition of a duty, inasmuch as it has failed to give them the market of Ontario. In the second place, we find the working men have not been benefitted, because they are getting less wages than they were twenty-five years ago, when $1 would purchase very much more of the necessaries and comforts of life than it can at present. We find, in the third place, that the coasters are not getting within 100 per cent. of the freights they received previous to the imposition of the duty; and besides when they returned from their trips with small quantities of flour or meal for their family, they are met by the Customs officers and forced to pay a duty, in effect a bread tax. Might I not ask every candid and impartial man, if this coal tax has not completely failed in the purpose for which it was intended. This is an important matter for the people of the Maritime Provinces and I speak to-night on their behalf. It is a serious matter to tax their flour 50 cents, and their meal 40 cents; to say that you give us as a compensation 50 cents per ton on coal, is not satisfactory to our people. I am aware that the coal industry of Nova Scotia is an important one, and I am willing to do all I can to foster it, but there are other industries of greater importance, such as the lumbering and fishing interests of our Lower Provinces. Why should this special coal industry be singled out, and the attempt made to foster it, and a duty imposed in its interest, when the other two industries which I have named, lumbering and fishing, are neglected? Let me compare them. I find that the number of men engaged in lumbering is 80,000, as stated here by a table prepared by a lumberman; the capital employed is about $100,000,000, and the export trade is $25,000,000. The fisheries, according to the statistics, employ 60,000 men. I have not been able to arrive at the capital invested in this industry, but the export trade is nearly $7,000,000. Now, I ask, what is the coal industry? According to the figures we find that it employs 3,567 men, taking the Report of the Mines of Nova Scotia for the year to December, 1881. It is stated that the capital invested in that industry is $12,000,000, while the exports are of the value of $1,169,058. Here we have an industry that employs only 3,567 men, whose exports are only $1,169,000, and is the pet of the Government, and fostered by the National Policy at a duty of 60 cents per ton, while we have lumbering and fishing interests giving employment to 140,000 men, with exports amounting to $32,000,000 and over $100,000,000 of capital invested, not protected, or is any attempt made to protect them. Can anything be more absurd than to foster and protect an industry such as coal at the expense of other industries. I am opposed to the imposition of the duty because it is part of a policy that involves taxation on nearly a million of people in the Maritime Provinces. I am opposed to it because it is part of a policy that makes the lumbering and fishing interests contribute, by paying this bread tax, to foster this industry. I am opposed to it because it makes the great bulk of our people—the farmers, mechanics, laborers and the men who have limited incomes—pay higher for many of the articles required in their families. I do not intend to weary the House with many further remarks; but when I heard the Minister of Finance boast of a surplus of over $4,000,000, I did hope that he would reduce the taxation of the people to a greater extent than he proposes. I hoped the hon. Minister would reduce the Tariff on cheap cotton and woollen goods, and abolish the bread and fuel taxation. But in this I have been disappointed, and the people of this country, the toiling masses, will yet have to bear the burdens his Tariff imposes on them. The hon. gentleman, in his Budget Speech, drew a vivid and graphic picture of the vast resources of this country; he spoke of the ability of the people to pay taxation. When I heard him speak in that strain, he reminded me of a speech delivered in the English House of Commons by Edward Burke, on economic reform. It would appear that the hon. gentleman had to deal with a taxing Finance Minister in England just as we have to do in Canada, I think the extract is not inappropriate and I will read it:

"He had no wish to deny that our resources are as brilliant as any one chooses to make them. Our resources, too, may be as unfathomable as they are represented—indeed, they are just whatever the people possess and will submit to pay. Taxing is an easy business, any projector can combine new impositions, any one can add to the old. But is it altogether wise to have no other bounds to your impositions than the patience of those who have to bear them?"

I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance if it is altogether wise to have no other bounds to his impositions than the patience of those who bear them? If this young Dominion, this Canada of ours, as it is sometimes called and was termed to-night by the President of the Council, is to flourish in the future, if Confederation is to be a success, if we are to have a real and solid Union, not depending on an Act of Parliament, but upon the mutual interests and mutual affection of the people—and it is only on this basis it can ever be permanently established—if we are to have within our borders a happy and contented population, then we can only accomplish these desirable results by pursuing a policy that will tend to harmonize every section of the Dominion, that will make every contributor to the National Treasury feel that he is only paying his just and fair proportion. While the Tariff as a whole is oppressive and burthensome, there is, to my mind, no portion of it more objectionable and less defensible than the bread and fuel taxes. In a climate such as this is, with long and severe winters, this tax is a cruel one, and, as was justly stated by the hon. member for Lambton, is a relic of barbarism. There is no doubt, with our public works, with the construction of the Pacific Railway, and with our increasing debt, we shall require a large revenue in future; but if we do, let us at least in one respect imitate the example of the Mother Country—let us have in Canada no corn laws, no taxes on bread and fuel, readjust the Tariff so that it may bear more lightly on the poor man. Do this and you still can have the Tariff sufficiently high to protect and give a fair return for capital invested by prudent and careful manufacturers. That is all they can reasonably expect—it is all to which they are entitled.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton). I have listened to the long speech of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) with some surprise, for he devoted three-fourths of his time to belittling the coal interests of his Province. That industry is peculiarly a Nova Scotia industry, and it is very surprising that a representative of that Province should devote such a long time, as the hon. member for Richmond has done, to deprecating the coal duty. In order to prove his case, he has quoted statements of agents of some coal mining companies of that Province, among them a gentleman who resides at Halifax, and who is known, to-day, as one of the strongest supporters of the National Policy—I refer to Mr. Lithgo, of Halifax. No doubt, that gentleman wrote the letter, but he did not oppose the duty on coal; he regretted that the duty was not larger, and what he objected to was an increase of the duty on articles required in mining coal. The hon. member for Richmond referred also to a gentleman, agent of the General Mining Association at Sydney, and quoted an extract from the St. John Telegraph. I have reason to believe that Mr. Brown was misrepresented in the correspondence of that paper, and I have reason to believe that Mr. Brown is not aware that he ever made to the representative of the Telegraph the statement attributed to him. It is true that gentleman may have crossed Mr. Brown and had conversation with him.

Mr. FLYNN. That statement was published in the Provincial papers and never contradicted.

Mr. McDONALD. That gentleman is not aware of ever having had an interview with a reporter of the Telegraph; that he does not know a reporter of that paper; that he may have had a conversation with a stranger, but Mr. Brown is not opposed to the coal duty. What he complains of is the increase in duty on articles required in working a mine. No man with any intelligence, or the owner of a coal mine, or anyone interested in a coal mine, is opposed to the duty on coal. The hon. member for Richmond has also quoted extracts from the Trades Journal to the effect that the wages of coal miners was as low in 1881 as some years ago. But he must remember that its editor is the secretary of a number of unions among the miners of that Province, and that it is his interest, and the interest of those miners, that he should advocate an increase of their wages. The hon. gentleman must also remember that there is quite a difference between the wages for 1881 and 1880 and the wages from 1873 to 1878, when the miners were unable to earn anything like a living, the men not working more than half time; and he must also know that the Government of Nova Scotia was compelled, a few years ago, to come to the relief of those miners, to prevent their starving, and to supply them with the necessaries of life, and that the municipal council of the county I represent also had to come to the relief of those men. The whole thing is changed at present. Those miners, for the past two years, have been perfectly able to earn a living, and pay off some of the debts contracted during the years from 1873 to 1878. They have been able to buy better clothing, and have had constant employment, though their wages is small. No man in the House, or anywhere else, would better like to see their wages increased than I, and I have every reason to believe that the coming year will see it increased. The hon. member for Richmond quoted some statistics to prove that the National Policy did not benefit the coal industry. I have a few statistics here which I will read to the House, to controvert that opinion. It must be remembered, however, that the National Policy produced no effect early in 1879. It was put into operation in the spring of that year, and, consequently, the coal owners had no opportunity of making contracts for that year; so that the increase for that year is naturally very small. In 1879, the total coal sales of Nova Scotia were 688,624 tons, being less than those of 1878 by 4,883 tons, the falling off being chiefly to the West Indies and the United States. But the sale of round coal, which bring the higher prices, exceeded that of 1873 by 12,923 tons, more than making up the deficiency in quantity by the increased value of the kind sold. This year, the very first year of the National Policy, the most notable point in these sales was the increase of sales to Quebec and Ontario, which, in 1879, reached 154,118 tons, against 83,710 tons in 1878, being an increase of 70,408 tons, or 84 per cent. In 1880, the total coal sales were 94,659 tons, being an increase over the sales of 1879 equal to 266,035 tons, and an increase over those of 1878 to the extent of the handsome difference of 261,152 tons. In the year 1880, there was a large increase of the sales to New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, the West Indies, Europe and the United States; but the most satisfactory to the growth of inter-provincial trade is the fact that the sales to Quebec and Ontario went up, in 1880, from 154,118 tons in 1879 to the handsome volume of 239,091 tons, being a clear increase in the consumption of Nova Scotia coal by the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, to the extent of 84,793 tons more than in the previous year, and amounting to an increase of no less than 155,351 tons over the last year of the defunct sectional Tariff of 1878. In addition to the large increase of inter-provincial coal sales in 1880, there is the gratifying fact that our coal sales to the United States were 123,423 tons, being the largest sales by us in that direction since 1874. I may here say that the hon. member for Richmond was mistaken in stating that the coal sales of 1874 were the largest of any year during the history of the coal trade. I find by the Report of the Superintendent of Mines of Nova Scotia, that the total sales in that year amounted only to 881,106 tons, instead of the 1,000,000 tons which he mentioned. This increase, I consider attributable to the stimulated power of production given to our coal mines by the large demand arising directly from a better control of our home market, whereby our coal owners were placed in a better condition for competing with the mines of the United States in their own ports and in the face of a heavier Tariff than we charge upon their coal coming into Canada. I think, Sir, this amply demonstrates to the entire satisfaction of every unbiassed mind, inside or outside of this House, that our Nova Scotia coal producers fully sustain what they claimed in their fruitless petition to this House in 1875, when they asserted that all they asked was an even start in the competition, fair play, but for no favors, and that with these they were prepared to compete with all comers in the open marts of the world. We now arrive at the coal sales for 1881. The total sales for this year has entered, for the first time in the history of this country, the loftier spheres of the millions, being 1,035,014 tons, an increase over the previous year of 80,355 tons, and an increase over that of 1878, the last year of the reign of sectional discrimination, of no less than the handsome balance of 451,304 tons. The sales this year, 1881, to the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, have also gone a stride higher, having been 268,628 tons, equal to an increase of 29,537 tons over that of the previous year, and no less an increase over 1878 than 184,918 tons, equal to a gain of 321 per cent. It is also important to note that in this last year, 1881, there is the important item of increase of sales to the West India Islands of 9,455 tons, which, although not large in the abstract, has the important significance of our being likely to secure restoration of our larger coal sales to these Islands, previous to the extinction in this country of the sugar refineries by the policy of our Liberal friends; and more important still is the fact that as our coal sales to these Islands increase, so will our direct importation of sugar and molasses, and as our ships will in this way be able to secure direct outward and inward cargoes, the freight in each direction can be carried at a cheaper rate, the direct effect of which must be to cheapen the cost of sugar and molasses to the people of this country. Let me now, Sir, call the attention of the House to the following memoranda of summary increase of coal sales from Nova Scotia to Ontario and Quebec each year since 1878, inclusive,

do do do 1879.....	154,118 do
do do do 1880.....	239,091 do
do do do 1881.....	268,628 do

To Quebec and Ontario :

1879 over 1878.....	70,408 tons.
1880 do 1878.....	155,381 do
1881 do 1878 ..	184,918 do

The figures show an increase in the percentage of the sale of coal to Quebec and Ontario for the undermentioned years, as follows :—

1879 over 1878.....	184 per cent.

while the total coal sales of 1881, for the Province of Nova Scotia, have attained the unprecedented volume of 1,035,014 tons, or 341,503 tons over that of 1878, it should not be forgotten that, owing to the terrible accident which befel the Foord pit, in the Albion mines, in November, 1880, which so destroyed that mine that its production, last year, was lessened to the extent of 90,000 tons, every pound of which would have found a ready sale, and which, but for this calamity, would have brought the total coal sales of Nova Scotia up to about 432,000 tons, as the direct result of the National Policy in this single branch of industry, over and above the sales of the last year of the pro-American legislation of the hon. gentlemen opposite. It may be said, although erroneously so, that these benefits are merely of a local character, and that direct benefits are not common to the whole country. Now, the reply is simple and answerable, which is, that whatever production of a useful kind involves the investment of a large amount of capital, gives employment, disburses large sums in the payment of employes, and consumes largely the produce of the other staple industries of the country and fills an important place in the prosperity of the country. Let us see how the coal mines of Nova Scotia stand these tests. The capital invested in these mines is not less at the present time than \$20,000,000. During the year 1881, they employed 3,567 persons who performed 894,961 days' labor, besides employing continuously 324 horses. Hence it follows that not less than 21,400 persons derived, directly, their maintenance and support from their connection with these mines, and the disbursements for labor, including men and teams, amounted to \$1,418,499, and there was paid out on construction account which includes colliery buildings, dwellings, &c., \$125,374; and in addition to these there was paid as royalty into the Provincial exchequer, the amount of \$82,600, in addition to taxation for municipal purposes on the value of the properties. Nor should it be forgotten that the 21,400 persons deriving their sustenance from the disbursements of these mines, consume Ontario flour, wear Ontario tweeds, and other fabrics of her production for clothing; wear boots and hats manufactured in Quebec, and sleep under Ontario made blankets. Neither should it be lost sight of by our friends of the Upper Provinces, that every ton of Nova Scotia coal, sent into these Provinces, adds power to the lever which keeps down the crushing force of American coal monopolists; and this competition is rendered the more necessary from the fact that the quantity of English and Scotch coals hitherto brought to Canada is becoming less year by year, and at no distant day will about entirely disappear. The reason of this is, that steamships are rapidly driving sailing ships out of the transatlantic trade, and it is the latter kind of ships which, alone, carry out coal for ballast, because steamships find it more convenient and cheaper to ballast by the use of water tanks. It is, moreover, a matter of vital importance to these border Provinces lying side by side with the United States, that in the event of an interruption to the present peaceful relations of the two countries, the Provinces should be in a position to furnish within themselves the essentials of existence and motive power. Our neighbors of the United States felt the force of their inability to supply this important article to the extent of their own needs, at the time of their late civil war, as was seen by Nova Scotia coal being sold in Boston for \$14 per ton in 1864, and in 1865 for the enormous price of \$18 per ton. Neither is it unimportant to remember, that a large proportion of the material used in coal mining pays import duties ranging from 25 to 10 per cent., and taking the average of articles extensively used in mining, we have an average of nearly 18 per cent., viz. : powder, 20 per cent. ; locomotives, 25 per cent. ; cordage, 20 per cent. ; iron wire, 15 per cent. ; boiler tubing, 10 per cent. ; leather belting, 15 per cent. ; making an average of 17½ per cent. The American people have long regarded coal as a production entitled to protection, and in order to protect and build up this industry, have, since the date of 1824, imposed a duty on imported coal, varying at different dates from that year forward, of \$1.68 per ton, \$1.75 per ton, and \$1.10 per ton; and at another period, when their coal mines had developed to enormous proportions, and they had less fear of competition, but fearing retaliation on the part of Canada, they reduced it to the present rate of 75 cents per ton. At one period, from 1846 to 1862, their coal duty was an ad valorem one of 30 per cent. ; from 1862 to 1865, they substituted an ad valorem duty of 24 per cent., and then returned to a specific duty. Now, the result of this long continued fostering care has been that the coal production of that country had, in 1870, attained the large proportion of 32,863,690 tons, and in 1879 it attained to the enormous volume of 59,808,398 tons—an increase of annual production, in nine years, of 27,000,000 tons. Just in proportion as the volume of the coal production of the United States increased, so did their iron and other manufacturing industries expand, and the stimulus of demand kept their agricultural productions all the while in the van of progress. Comparing our Canadian duties on foreign coal with our duties on ordinary lines of manufacture, it is seen for instance that on woollen goods there is a duty of about 35 per cent., on cotton clothing about 30 per cent., and on cottons about 20 per cent., making on these four lines of production an average duty of $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. On coal we have a duty of about 25 per cent. Thus, on three articles now supplied, mainly to Nova Scotia consumers from Quebec and Ontario, we find an average duty of $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., so that it is difficult to see wherein there is anything worthy of the name of a grievance existing by an undue sectional protection. I was of the opinion, when this Tariff was introduced to this House in 1879, that a duty should be placed on American coal equal to what they imposed upon ours, and that this would not increase the price to the Ontario consumer, and I believe that many of the representatives and mercantile men of that Province were of the same opinion. I hold to this opinion still. The hon. Minister of Finance, when introducing his Tariff of 1879, told the House that he calculated this duty of 50 cents would increase the production of the Nova Scotia coal mines by 400,000 tons, by the expiration of two years; and I beg here to congratulate the hon. Minister on the correctness of this calculation, for wherein it differs from the realized results, that difference is on the right side. Surpluses result from all the hon. Minister's calculations; deficits are ghosts of darkness that appear to flee from his presence. But I may also say that on no other grounds could I support the general scale of the present Tariff, except the present one, of extending a share of this general protection to the great coal producing industries of this country. It is a matter of congratulation to the people of Nova Scotia that their great and growing coal industry has been so rapidly increased under the present fiscal arrangements; it is a matter of very great congratulation to the people of these Upper Provinces that their manufactures have so rapidly developed as to require this increase of supply, and that their furnaces have been supplied with a superior coal at a reduced cost. It is a matter of vast congratulation to the Government of this country, that they have succeeded in so harmonizing the interests of the different Provinces, in such a manner and so successfully, as to make this interchange of trade mutually profitable to all, binding more firmly their bonds of a common loyalty to each other. Nova Scotia discovered by experience, previous to 1878, which of the two great parties of the Upper Provinces were her true friends, and most ready to extend fair play and even-handed justice to her people; but if anything further was necessary to confirm Nova Scotians in the knowledge of who were their true friends in this House and in the councils of the country, the doubt, if it existed, has been thoroughly removed by what has been said and done since September, 1878. They now perfectly understand that, from the accession of the Opposition to power—should such ever happen again and of which the appearances are growing beautifully less—they have nothing in expectation to gain, but, on the contrary, they have everything to lose. In every constituency opened in that Province since 1878, the electors have given such unmistakable proof of their fully realizing the facts of the case, that there remains not the shadow of a doubt, but they will add to the numbers of the general and generous support they have already extended to the Government of the day, which has proved itself so able an administrator of justice and fair play to all, and the Opposition pledged to take the duty off foreign coal can expect but little support, if any from the Province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. KRANZ. At this late hour I shall ask the indulgence of the House only for a few minutes. After three years of trial of the fiscal policy of the Government, I think we are now in a position to judge of its merits by the results it has achieved, and these results I feel warranted in saying will be proclaimed by a majority of the people of this country as being most beneficial to the interests of the farmer, the manufacturer, the merchant and the miner. The fiscal policy of the present Government fulfils what has been promised to the people. It has given to them the home market to as full an extent as it is possible under the circumstances. We have good times, it is acknowledged by all hands, and we rejoice in acknowledging that the good harvest and the good prices at which we have sold the products of the farm and the forest during the last two years, have furnished material for our prosperity, but at the same time I claim that the protective policy of the Government has furnished the means and the machinery by which we have turned the blessings of Providence to good account. It is the machinery by which we husband the products of the soil and the mine, and the means by which we increase them. What would have been the effect of our good crops, had the one-sided trade policy of hon. gentlemen opposite been in operation? The millions which we have received for the products of the farm and the forest would have been spent for goods manufactured in the United States or Europe. These millions would have, in a short time, gone back to foreign countries to enrich their manufacturers and workmen; but how do matters stand at present? Our farmers are freely spending their money for goods which are manufactured in Canada. They buy Canadian blankets; they do not pay $1.43 duty on their blankets. They buy Canadian cottons, Canadian buttons, Canadian gloves, they spend their money for Canadian manufactured goods, and by doing so they keep a great amount of money in this country, thereby increasing our wealth, and giving employment to our people, and the farmer is at the same time at no disadvantage. The fiscal policy of the Government has given him the home market, so far as the home market goes. According to the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister we see that over 5,000,000 bushels of Canadian grain have been consumed more than in previous years. These 5,000,000 bushels have kept out American grain to the same extent, and the Canadian farmer has had the home market thus far. But besides the grain the farmer reaps a great benefit from the sale of many other articles which are consumed at home. As an example of how the National Policy works I may state how it works in my own riding. In the town of Berlin there were employed in the old factories, in 1878, 360 hands; now the same factories are employing 686 hands, not including new establishments in which 212 hands are employed, making a total of 898 hands, or an increase over those employed in 1878 of 538 hands. In the adjoining town of Waterloo there has been started one new button factory, which employs 70 hands. In a furniture factory are employed 40 hands more than in 1878. A woollen factory employs 75 hands more than it used to employ; it employed 45 hands in 1878; it employs 120 in 1882. In an agricultural implement factory, the increase is 13. The total number of hands more employed in Waterloo is 197, not including the increase in a large foundry and a carriage factory, for which I did not obtain the correct figures, and excluding, also, the increased number of hands employed by the distillers and brewers, who have doubled their capacity by erecting new buildings and machinery. The village of Bridgeport, adjoining Berlin, employed in a woollen factory, in 1878, 8 hands; it now employs 30, or an increase of 22. So that, within a radius of two miles, there are 758 more hands employed now than in 1878. I might go further and state the facts with regard to several other villages in the county. In Conestoga there is an increase in the number of hands employed in the flax mills. The Messrs. Perrine, who have a flax factory there and at Doon, employed, in 1878, 70 hands, in 1882, 150 hands; and they assure me that they sell their goods, such as rope and twine, now from 15 to 20 per cent. lower than in 1878. I may also mention that their raw material is all produced in the country. In the village of Wellesley, the working population has increased about 50 per cent., and the knitting factory of Reiner and Steins turns out as fine goods as were ever imported from Germany or England. In the villages of Bloomingdale, St. Jacobs and Elmira, woollen factories and cabinet factories, which were carried on on a small scale, have also increased. I think I may fairly say that the number of hands employed in North Waterloo at present exceeds the number employed in 1878 by fully 800, and in the South Riding by 600, which gives a total increase of 1,400 hands in the whole county. The hon. member for Lambton, in his speech the other night, said :

"How is capital created except by industry? Were there no labor in the world there would be no capital, and were there no labor in Canada there would be no money to distribute."

Now, if these 1,400 hands which are employed in the county of Waterloo more than were employed in 1878, earned only 50 cents a day each, that would be $700 a day, or creating $210,000 of capital in one year; and this is done without damaging the farmers in the least, because the farmers are going on creating wealth by tilling their farms, and at the same time they find an improved home market for the produce which they have to sell. I hope the fiscal policy of the present Government will not be changed for many years to come, and I am not in the least afraid that the prediction of the hon. member for Lambton with regard to it will be fulfilled. The hon. gentleman cites France and Germany as instances of the bad results of protection. He says :

"We will set one class at war against another, and we will produce that feeling of disaster which has prevailed in Germany and in France for the last two years in consequence of their protective Policy. I intended to refer to the condition of these two countries, two of the most highly protected countries in the world, except the United States. The state of Germany is such at present in consequence of protection—as those authorities show, that the people are flocking in hundreds of thousands from her shores and seeking homes across the Atlantic."

I think the hon. gentleman must be misinformed in this respect. The people of Germany are leaving because the country is very populous, having over 40,000,000 people, and it can very well afford to send to America a few thousands or even hundreds of thousands every year; that process has been going on for years, and yet the population of Germany is not decreasing. The hon. member for Lambton also said :

"They are simply able to keep their own markets. It is perfectly well known that their export trade is destroyed by the protection they have."

Now, the hardest blow the German export trade ever received was from the high protective Tariff of the United States, which kept German manufactures out until the Germans had to emigrate and transport their manufactures to the United States in order to compete there. On the other hand, the Americans lately exported a great many manufactured goods to Germany; so did England, and the German Government found it necessary to protect their own manufacturers against these foreigners. Any one who believes that the emigration from Germany is due to the protective policy of the empire, is quite mistaken.

Mr. RYMAL. On looking at the Census returns, I find that between 1871 and 1881 there has only been an increase of 800 people in the entire population of the South Riding of Waterloo, and in the North Riding there has only been an increase of 1,600. It appears to me that the figures the hon. gentleman has given will not be borne out by the facts.

Mr. KRANZ. The hon. gentleman is not correct. You will find that the farming population has decreased, and yet we produce more grain and more fat cattle.

Mr. ANGLIN. Then the farming population have left, and the home market does not keep them at home.

Mr. GILLMOR moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Really, I think this debate must come to an end. We are now getting towards the end of the Session, and this discussion on the Budget is really blocking the way. We must try to come to a vote very soon. We can sit until two or three o'clock this morning, and to-morrow I am going to ask the House to give us Thursday so that we can get through, unless we want to sit until July next.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. GILLMOR. The debate would, no doubt, be unnecessarily prolonged if I propose to speak for four or five hours, but there will be an end of all these things as there will be an end of the Government, I hope. I do not intend to comment upon the speeches of hon. gentlemen at all; whatever speeches may have been made by them will go for what they are worth. I will, however, reply to the last speaker, who dwelt upon the home market. That is a favorite phrase with hon. gentlemen opposite, but I do not exactly understand what they mean by this term. There is no increase in the population since the National Policy went into operation, and what greater home market have we now than before? Did not the people eat bread and meat; did they not use the Finance Minister's "garden sass" before the National Policy? I cannot understand how the home market has been increased without a very material increase of population. Our people had to be fed and clothed before that policy was introduced, and there is no greater market for the products of the farmer now than there was before; there is no force in that argument. The discussion to-night has been chiefly upon the coal question. I have never studied it, but I was surprised at the arguments of the hon. Minister of Railways in reference to it. He undertook to prove that the Americans paid the duty on the coal; I do not know. I am sure, whether that is the case elsewhere or not—I do know it is not the case with us in New Brunswick; our importers go and enter their coal and pay 50 cents per ton upon it, that is added to the price of the coal, and the purchaser buys it, paying the first cost, freight and duty. It is, therefore, absurd and a waste of time, in fact it is counting upon the credulity of this assembly, to begin to talk and to urge any such argument as that; it is perfect nonsense. The hon. Minister of Railways tried to prove that at some certain competitive points the duty was not paid by the consumer, but that the American producers paid it. Now, these competitive points existed before there was any tax, and I ask: Cannot competitive points exist without a tax and yet have the same effect? There is no argument, to my mind, in that. Having said so much about the speeches of other hon. gentlemen, I will now begin my own. No one that has listened to the arguments and speeches of gentlemen on the other side of the House, particularly the members of the Administration, can fail to have discovered that they think their government is quite perfect. I always supposed that all human institutions were more or less imperfect, but their government is the ne plus ultra of perfection, there is nothing more that can be done in that direction. Yet I thought I discovered in the Estimates brought down that they are not altogether satisfied with their National Policy, and it occurs to me that in these Estimates there are several items that look like supplementing the National Policy. They think it necessary, notwithstanding all the National Policy has done, to supplement it and to bid for the people's support at the next General Election. Now the hon. gentlemen can boast of a good many things; they can boast of having the largest majority at their back that any Government in Canada ever had, and without wishing to depreciate their supporters. I think they can boast of the most accommodating majority—that is my impression; they have perfect confidence in their leader, and a great admiration for everything he does. They can boast, too, of having incurred the largest debt that Canada ever knew. They can boast of having incurred the largest debt of any like population anywhere, where there has been no extraordinary occasion to incur that debt; they have got the debt up to $200,000,000. I do not mean to say that much of this money may not have been appro-riated or expended upon public works that will eventually be of benefit to the country. I do, however, pretend to say that it is a debt far beyond our resources and far beyond the interest of the country. There is a limit, no matter how much public works may be required, to the obligations and to the debt which we shall fix upon a people numbering a little over 4,000,000. There is another matter they can boast of—they have inflicted upon this country the most obnoxious and most oppressive Tariff that it has ever experienced. There is another thing, they have imposed a gigantic railway and land monopoly, the greatest that any country ever had forced upon it. Monopolies grow upon countries by degrees, it takes years to establish a monopoly, but these gentlemen can boast of having placed on this country a complete monopoly at the start, perfect in all its parts, a monopoly that this country will not get rid of and which will hold it by the throat in years to come. These things are, perhaps, to be boasted of by the gentlemen on the Treasury benches, and if they are matters of congratulation they truly can laud one another to their heart's content. There is another marked characteristic of the gentlemen opposite, that is the disposition to magnify everything, to exaggerate everything of a general character. They do not seem to be able to take a fair view of anything that is presented to them. During the late Administration when we all knew and admitted the depression that existed in this country, was there anything like fair treatment of that question? In all their speeches they dealt in the grossest exaggeration, they depicted the state of the country then in a very much worse light than the facts justified, there was no moderation, no sticking to facts in reference to that depression, which was very great it is true; but there was no distress in Canada at that time, there was no starvation, no hunger, no real want. The depression at that time was felt by all the industries of Canada, and no one industry suffered more than any other; the agricultural interest suffered from short crops for a certain number of years, the lumber interest suffered from low prices in the markets to which we had to send our production, manufacturers suffered, of course, to some extent, and all these interests alike were depressed. We admitted that, but there was the greatest exaggeration resorted to by hon. gentlemen opposite to magnify the depression which then existed. All who remember the discussions of that date know how they endeavored by all their eloquence, by all their powers to exaggerate, to make people believe they were in a great deal worse position than really was the case. They were bad enough, no doubt, but not at all in such a condition as they were depicted. There has been a change in the circumstances of the country, but they cannot treat them now in a fair, rational, reasonable manner; they refer to them now as though the millenium had arrived, as though nobody knew what want was. They exaggerated the improvement in the state of things and could not treat any question of this kind without magnifying and distorting it. I admit that there is an improvement in the times. I am glad to say it, but I know that the improvement is not at all commensurate with the statement they put forward. I speak now for my own Province; I know that we have been benefitted in the locality where I live, because we export lumber largely there. That is the principal industry, or one of the principal industries in that locality. We get better prices for our lumber, and, consequently, times are somewhat improved. With regard to other parts of the Province they are improved in that respect also; but, generally, times have not very much improved in New Brunswick. With regard to the crops last year, we have not for many years had so poor a crop as we had there. Our potato crop, which is a very important one and one from which the agriculturist derives a great deal of money, was almost a failure, our wheat crop was a failure, and our "garden sass" was not as good as usual. The hay crop was, no doubt, a large one, but it was very much injured in being got in, and, taking all in all, not for twenty years have agriculturists had poorer returns than last year. Notwithstanding that, we have very much in New Brunswick to be thankful for, but not to the National Policy. What I say for New Brunswick, I can safely say for Prince Edward Island. I read in the papers that in Charlottetown not for many years has there been so much depression as at present. I am satisfied it must be so. The National Policy is doing nothing for them, and in order to off-set its effects they are asking for breakwaters here and appropriations there, trying to satisfy their people to stand the grinding taxation placed on them as well as on the people of the Lower Provinces. In times of depression such as prevailed when the late Government were in power, a good many people left the country. Whenever members of the Opposition rose to speak in the House they referred to the exodus; but we hear nothing about that now. I know, in the locality where I reside, the exodus was greater during the last three years than ever before, and never in New Brunswick were there so many vacant farms and houses as to-day; yet the Finance Minister and his associates talk about general and universal prosperity, that there was never anything like the wonderful change three years of the National Policy has produced. They cannot speak on any subject without giving it a false coloring and magnifying it,—that is the most moderate word I can apply. During the years of the late Administration there was another cry—the slaughtering process. It took me some time to find out what hon. gentlemen meant, but it turned out that it was this: that the Yankees, in order to break down our manufacturers, brought in vast quantities of goods and gave them to the people for little or nothing. How truly liberal our American neighbors are! I never received anything from them without giving a quid pro quo. I do not think much harm would be done if they brought over all the goods we require and gave them to us; it might injure the manufacturers, but it would help the masses, and the Government should help the majority. Of course, there is no slaughtering now; there is no difficulty which the National Policy has not relieved! It has found a market at home for all farmers' products and has made everybody rich and happy! I have not heard it has made a Christian of anyone; no doubt, it prepares them nicely for this world, and, no doubt, it will prepare them for the ascent and perfect them for the future life. I do not think the National Policy or Confederation either, the way it has been managed, has done anything for New Brunswick. It is no use to open old wounds, or to go back too much to those past issues that we cannot remedy, but I will make a slight reference to New Brunswick before Confederation. In 1866, the imports of the Province amounted in round numbers to $10,000,000. There can be no doubt that the people use as much dutiable goods as they did in 1866—indeed, they must use a good deal more as the population has somewhat increased, though it has not increased so much as it ought to have done and a great many have gone away. This importation has very much decreased; I cannot exactly tell the reason, but the hon. Finance Minister who has made this subject a study, and who knows almost everything, can, I suppose, tell the reason. We only entered for consumption last year, $4,698,632 worth of dutiable goods, and $1,318,480 worth of free goods, making a total of $6,016,972. In Customs duties we paid $1,256,638. Excise $29,445, stamp duties $9,174, making a total of $1,560,398. This is not probably quite two-thirds of what we do pay, because we pay a large amount on goods imported into other Provinces, and brought down there, and in addition we pay a good deal into the pockets of the manufacturers of the Upper Provinces. I am not over-estimating or exaggerating when I say that New Brunswick is, to-day, paying $2,000,000 a year into the public Treasury. When you make a fair estimate of the amount of goods we consume in that Province, when you take what we pay on imports and add that, and what we pay to manufacturers whose prices are increased by the amount of the import duty it is not surprising that New Brunswick pays $2,000,000 of taxes. The average rate of duty for 1868 was 13½ per cent, it is now 21½. If these figures are correct, has New Brunswick anything to thank the present Government for—to thank the National Policy for? In my opinion, she has not. We, in New Brunswick, export of the products of the forest, in round numbers, about $5,000,000, constituting about three-fourths of all our exports. The exports of our fisheries do not appear large, some $700,000 or $800,000. I have often desired the adoption of some better mode of showing the extent of that industry, and of obtaining correct statements on the subject. The county I represent has a large fishery business, a population of nearly 5,000 persons being engaged in it. I know that the Dominion does not give us credit for the amount of fish exported from our Province. I think the reason is that we are located on the border, and a good deal of the fish we catch and cure is taken in small boats over to Eastport, and sold there for export from that part of Maine. The amount mentioned looks small for all New Brunswick; I am satisfied it should be given at three or four times $700,000 or $800,000. Besides, Nova Scotia gets credit for a larger export of fish; but that Province exports much caught by the people of New Brunswick, who cross to Yarmouth and sell their fish. With regard to the large lumbering industry, I do not want to favor it more than any other; I have no preference for any, they are all alike to me, and we engaged in them are all one family. No one industry should be burdened at the expense of another. But the hon. Finance Minister admits honestly and candidly that he can do nothing for our great lumbering industry. But he can assist and bolster up other industries at the expense of this one. He stated, a Session or two ago, that lumbering was a waning industry, which would eventually die out, leaving its place to others. Now, it is a strange argument, because an industry is weak and languishing, it should be left to its own resources, or to die a natural death; that it should be taxed for the purpose of building up other industries, including the manufacturing, which are not more important. What is the argument with regard to the manufacturing industry? That it furnishes a home market. Is there any industry that furnishes a home market to the agriculturist equal to the lumbering, or buys so much oats and hay? Is there any industry that wants as much of the farmer's flour, pork, butter and everything else produced on the farm? Our lumbermen consume as much of the agricultural products, man for man, as those engaged in any other industry; and do they not help the farmer as much as the cotton or wool spinner? Why not, then, give them credit for affording a home market for our agricultural products, and give them the same fair show as persons in other industries? Does lumbering not furnish labor also for the strong right arms of our young men, as well as employment to our ships, stevedores and other toilers? Why, then, should this interest be ignored? Why does the hon. Finance Minister sanction a policy that obliges him to admit that he cannot help this important lumbering industry? If he would let it alone and let alone every industry that is not self-sustaining, he would follow the right policy. No country is enriched by fostering an industry that is not self-sustaining any more than a man is enriched by embarking in an unprofitable business. If an industry is not self-sustaining, the country does not want the burden of supporting it. It has been a favorite theme with Ministers and their supporters that England is declining, that she has reached the zenith of her power, is becoming old and feeble in a commercial sense, and is tottering to decay. That has been the burden of the hon. gentleman's song, and that she adopted protection during her earlier years till she became strong and rich and able to stand alone, and after she became rich enough she threw off this beautiful policy and adopted free trade. Well, now, how illogical that is, how contrary to common sense, how contrary to all the instincts of human nature, that a country adopts a policy that makes her great in commerce, and rich, and when she gets rich enough she throws it off, but she never does throw it off until she gets rich enough, and nations, like individuals, never throw off a system that enriches them. England, all down the ages till very recently, had the same obnoxious policy, loaded with monopolies and restrictions that crushed and prevented the growth of commerce, and she never took any strides in progress till about forty years ago. Some of her restrictions were so absurd that one would hardly think a civilized people could adopt them. I find, on reference to some works, that in Queen Elizabeth's time she said the finest flowers of her garden were these monopolists, and those patent rights she granted to her favorites. There were certain individuals who had monopoly of the sale of certain articles. Some favorite had the right to sell salt, some others had the right to sell iron, and others to sell vinegar, and many other articles I need not mention, the sale of which was confined to a few favorites. Nobody else could sell salt, vinegar, and so forth but some favorite, and so trade was crippled, and the people were robbed; down even to 1834 the East India Company had the exclusive right to sell tea in England. I dare say many here remember the circumstances. Now, was not that a very singular thing, that a country so enlightened as England should give the right to sell tea to the East India Company, and prevent competition? In that very year the people of England paid $7,500,000 more for tea than they would had the right system existed, and there had been free competition in the sale of tea. It was in consequence of England's absurd colonial policy that she lost the best half of the North American continent, a country that those hon. gentlemen admire so much. I do not wonder that they admire that country, it is one of the greatest countries in the world. That territory was lost to Great Britain by the determination to control the trade of her people in the colonies. In 1651, England prohibited all nations from importing into England any commodity that was not the growth of that country, and it extended this absurd law to the American colonies, and compelled them to have nothing carried to and from the colonies, except in English ships. The colonists could not export to any place but to Great Britain any of their products, neither sugar, tobacco, wool, indigo, ginger, dye wood, molasses, rice, pitch, tar, turpentine, coffee, hides and numerous other articles. That was the policy under which she was becoming strong, and making those colonists do all their trade with her, not allowing them to go into the best markets and get the most they could for their exports, nor would she allow them to purchase in any other market. In 1700, no man could be a hatter in the colonies unless he had served seven years at the trade, and no hat, after he had made it, could be taken from one colony to another to be sold. They must only make hats enough for their own people, just about like the present policy. All manufactures of iron were prohibited in America; no wool nor manufactures of wool could be carried from one portion to another.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I rise to a point of order to ask the hon. member what he is quoting from. The rule of the House is that copious notes are allowed, but when an hon. member reads from a document we are entitled to know what document he is quoting from.

Mr. GILLMOR. I am quoting from a pamphlet written by the hon. member for Charlotte, and you can have the perusal of it to-morrow in the Hansard.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I ask for a ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not see that the hon. member is reading his speech, he is only quoting his notes.

Mr. GILLMOR. Even Lord Chatham, who was the greatest friend the colonies ever had, stated on one occasion that under certain circumstances he would not allow the colonists to make a hob nail or a horse shoe. These were the years in which England was becoming great, in which she was increasing her wealth and her conquests. Mr. Speaker, the decline of England's greatness has been predicted by honorable gentlemen on the Treasury benches, and it has been predicted by some Tories in England too. I hold some statistics in my hand which, I think, will convince those hon. gentlemen that she is not in her dotage. England is still strong and vigorous. I do not usually read much statistics; I do not intend to read any thing from the Trade and Navigation Returns. That volume has nearly a thousand pages, and it has been gone over several times since this debate commenced. There is nothing in it that has not been repeated over and over again. I shall read some statistics that bear directly on this question, and which go to prove that the free trade policy of England is an enlightened policy, a policy which has benefitted England and, I think every nation that has adopted it, a trade policy not formed upon the principle that if you trade with me I will trade with you. After England had become enlightened on this subject by her statesmen and her philosophers, she stepped out entirely independent, when all the nations of Europe were protected and to a great extent they remain so still. Her progress has astonished the world. I do not admire everything in England, I was never accused of being extra loyal, but wherever I can see anything that is right, whether in England or in America, no matter where it is, I always acknowledge that which appears to me to be good and true. And with regard to England receding from free trade principles, it cost her too much trouble, too much money, too many hard-fought battles, to get rid of the odious monopolies which ground down and fettered her commerce, ever again to return to such a hateful and injurious system. The population of the United Kingdom, in 1841, was 26,500,000; in 1881, it was 35,000,000, an increase in these years of 33 per cent. The taxable property, not including Ireland, increased during these forty years—and they formed the period during which we may fairly say free trade principles prevailed—from £51,000,000 sterling to £542,000,000 sterling, and I might add to this increase £40,000,000 more of property which was excluded from taxation, or an increase of ten fold. Could such a result ever have been obtained under a system of protection and odious monopolies? In 1840, the exports of England was £51,000,000 sterling; in 1880, it was £223,000,000, or an increase of 450 per cent. In 1841, the deposits in the Savings Banks were £24,500,000; in 1880, they were £75,500,000. In 1849, there were in England and Wales, 201,000 able-bodied paupers; in 1880, when free trade had begun to do its work, with a large increased population, there were only 111,000 paupers. With regard to the doctrine of the balance of trade to which the hon. Finance Minister referred, I do not pretend to know much about it, and judging by his speeches on the subject, with all due deference I must say that he does not appear to have studied it very much. The balance of trade has all the time been going against England, and during the last thirty years it has gone against her to the extent of £1,600,000,000 sterling. How on earth has England ever been able to pay up this balance? Has England any debts with foreign nations for her imports? What nonsense to talk about the balance of trade being against England! Has she exported gold to make up this difference. On the contrary, we find that during those years she imported four or five millions more gold than she exported. The trouble is that during the existence of her free trade policy England has been drawing money from all these protected countries, and enlarging her riches, at the same time, that she opened her ports and made her trade as free as the air that surrounds the Island. The solution of the whole question is, that the exports brought back more imports than the goods sent out. They made money in the transaction. Talk of England being in debt or having a balance of trade against her! Where does Canada go when she wants money, and Australia and almost all the nations of the earth? To England, of course. And what goes back to England for that money? £60,000,000 sterling for interest—for interest on investments in foreign countries. This balance of trade against her gives her £60,000,000 sterling, some of it—and a precious sight too much—from Canada. And yet, these hon. gentlemen say that England is going back from light to darkness, and that she does not understand her business. There are no such financiers there as in the Dominion of Canada! No, they do not know how to get the balance of trade, but they know how to get the money, and make money out of it; and the way they get it is by freedom of trade and freedom of exchange. Between 1875 and 1880 the imports were £622,000,000 sterling more than the exports, but according to the theory of hon. gentlemen opposite, who dwell so much on the balance of trade, England had to pay that in gold. It must have drained her coffers, or else she owes the money still. But the truth is she is making money out of the system just as an individual does in the same way. If I send out a cargo of lumber valued at $500, and get back $1,000, this is against me, but the truth is I made $500. That is the explanation of it. During those five years England imported £147,000,000 sterling in gold, and exported £144,000,000 so that, besides the £622,000,000 which she owes on the balance of trade, she has £223,000,000 more by bringing in more gold than she sent out. I am giving these statistics to show these gentlemen the condition of that country for which they profess so much loyalty, but are always striving to depreciate in comparison with France and Germany and the United States. Nobody ever heard them predict anything else for her than failure, decline and decay so long as she continues to adopt this system.

Mr. HESSON. What brought England to her proud position—free trade or protection?

Mr. GILLMOR. Do you think that any man would get rich under a system and then abandon it? What hon. gentleman, if he found himself becoming wealthy, would say, "I am going to stop getting rich so fast and become generous—I do not want to get rich so fast?" Why, the thing is absurd. The investments of England abroad have been tending rapidly upwards until they are now supposed to have reached the enormous sum of £1,300,000,000 sterling, on which she is receiving an interest of £60,000,000 sterling; and this has been achieved since the introduction of free trade. Now, let us make some comparisons between the foreign trade of England and that of France, Germany and the United States, the countries which are continually referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1849, France exported £49,000,000 worth of manufactured goods; in 1879, thirty years afterwards, with all the protection she wanted, she exported of the same goods £34,000,000 worth, and her population did not increase much during that time. Hon. gentlemen say that the United States is pursuing the course that will enable her to distance England in the race—that in a few years England will have to occupy a second place in matters of trade and commerce. I know that the United States is a great country, but I have no more doubt that its greatness is not due to the protective system, than I have that it is not due to slavery or to Mormonism, because these exist there. I say their greatness just proves that the evil policy that they have adopted cannot crush out the energies of the Anglo-Saxon race, but that it has retarded them in the race I am satisfied; the best minds in the United States believe so too, and the majority of the electors of the United States will so vote, and did so vote when Hayes was elected President. You would think, to hear hon. gentlemen opposite, that protection was the universal sentiment of that country. Not at all. A great battle was going on there, and I believe some men here will live to see the time when they will abandon their pernicious policy. England has been a protected country nearly all through her history until recently, and one would have thought that the struggling industries of the United States would have been a little strengthened in their limbs by this time and would have been able to compete with Great Britain to some extent. They have more raw material, they have the climate, they have the food, they have everything to make a great manufacturing country, and they ought long ago to have gone forth and possessed the world in spite of Great Britain. But have they done so? They have not, as the record which I am about to read will prove. How do the United States compete with England in Asia, Africa, and Australia, three countries which are open to both alike? The whole of the exports of manufactured goods sent to these countries from the United States in one year amounted to £4,751,000 sterling, while England sent £78,140,000 sterling. That shows what a free trade country can do, as compared with a highly protected country. But how is it in regard to trade with the whole civilized world? In 1880, the trade of Great Britain with the world amounted to £698,000,000 sterling. That is what a population of 35,000,000 can do under a free trade system, while the German Empire, with 40,000,000 people, had a trade of £371,000,000 sterling, and the United States, with 50,000,000 people, had a trade of £229,000,000 sterling, and that was in wheat and agricultural products and manufactures that she sent to all the world. Why, it is insignificant compared with what many other countries send. These, the two most civilized nations, Germany and the United States, both of them under a system of protection, with a population of 90,000,000, do a trade of £610,000,000 sterling. England, with 35,000,000 of people, does a trade of £612,000,000 sterling, three times as much, man for man, as those two countries. France has a trade of £313,000,000 sterling with 36,000,000 of people; Russia has a trade of £183,000,000 sterling, with 80,000,000 people; and Holland has a trade of £116,000,000, with 5,000,000 of people. These countries combined have a population of 121,000,000, or £612,000,000 sterling, exactly the amount of England's trade with 35,000,000 of people, and that not in one of her best years, but in a year of depression. I will now speak of the terrible disasters which have happened British shipping under her Free Trade policy. The tonnage of England in 1840 was 6,490,000 tons; in 1880 it was 41,348,000 tons, an increase of more than six-fold in forty years under her free trade system. I myself remember that the United States liners used to come occasionally to the place where I live and take cargoes of lumber to England. I remember they were the admiration of the world, they were the finest ships that had ever been seen on the ocean. They are entirely removed under their system of protection, you hear nothing about American liners now. Thirty years ago Americans had four-fifths of the carrying trade between America and England, but free trade has enabled England to change the picture and to do most of that trade. In 1850, American ships were represented in the trade of the world by say fifteen as against forty for England; in 1840, the forty of England had grown to fifty-seven and the American fifteen had diminished down to six. That was the effect of protection upon the United States, that the 35,000,000 of the British Isles have 52 per cent. or more than half of the trade carried on by the entire human race. In all this growth, this wonderful increase is an argument that ought to convince any man that was not willfully blind to the best advantages of free trade as compared with protection. Can you find such an example elsewhere? The world has never shown such an example. England sits to-day the mistress of the world as far as trade and commerce are concerned, and it is due not to her natural resources but to her enlightened free trade policy. While others may be looking at her she is extending her trade and increasing her wealth, setting an example that all the world, if they wish to be great, will eventually have to follow. The principle of protection, I say, is no evidence of the greatness of the United States. That country is great in spite of protection as she was great in spite of slavery, as she is great in spite of Mormonism and all the other "isms" that ought to be removed; she is great on account of her own wonderful resources because she is the finest country under the sun, and England lost that country by her miserable colonial policy and by protection. That country is great because she has a climate for every nation in Europe. Anybody who wants to come from the north of Europe and look for a cold, bracing climate can find it in the United States; if one comes from the sunny climate of Italy, he can find a genial atmosphere in the Central States; or if one comes from Africa and wants a scorching sun, he can find it there. Her fields, forests and gardens will make her great, notwithstanding rings and the operation of monopolies which have ground down her people. In this connection I am satisfied the time is not far distant when they will rise in their might and sweep these men from power who have so long imposed upon their credulity. That time will come sooner or later. God grant that it may be very soon, and that the Dominion will follow their example. Statistics have been compiled from which it appears that during the year 1881 there was shipped from New York 72,276,312 bushels of grain, and not one solitary bushel of that went in American vessels, either propelled by steam or by sail. How is that; what is the reason of that; are they not enterprising, do they not know how to build, maintain and sail ships as well to-day as before? Yet the fact is that of the carrying trade from the great city of New York, the commercial metropolis of America, not one bushel of that grain in that year was shipped in American bottoms; and it is absurd to talk about protection when such are the results that flow from it. The Suez Canal reports tell a wonderful story of England's trade. During 1881, 2,250 English ships passed through the canal. This was four times greater than the total of the other nations of the world during that year; and how many American ships do you think passed through that canal during that year? You could not tell me one, for there was not one. France came next to England with a magnificent total of 109 as against England's 2,256. That shows why England has money to lend, that tells the story of the balance of trade. Her ships are on every sea gathering, like the bees, honey from every flower over the wide world. That is what makes the balance of trade, makes it the glory and admiration of every Englishman. The hon. Minister of Railways said we must necessarily, as we are alongside the United States, shape our fiscal policy to meet theirs, and that is a sentiment which has been expressed by nearly all hon. members. In fact, it is a known principle of the Tory party—they must of necessity do it. We are the colony of a limited monarchy, and is there any necessity for changing our constitution because we lie alongside a Republic? Is there any necessity, moreover, to adopt their institutions because we lie alongside? There is no more necessity for imitating their trade policies than there is for imitating their constitution. It is quite a separate and independent matter. But that idea involves another idea, that we must declare a war of tariffs with the United States. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not now talk much about this war, they are constantly making comparisons unfavorable to every country except the United States. With respect to this retaliatory policy there is no part of the National Policy which has had a greater effect in giving hon. gentlemen opposite a majority than this idea of retaliation, a war of Tariffs declared with our neighbors across the line. There is not a more silly portion in the whole policy than that. I will give an illustration, and illustrations can be obtained every day. I live on the border, and our trade is very considerable with the United States. A farmer comes in to market at St. Stephens with a load of potatoes, but as there is no demand he passes over to Calais. On arriving at the end of the bridge on the American side, he is compelled by the Custom House officer to pay a duty of 15 cents a bushel. He gets one black eye there, according to the hon. gentlemen's theory. He is in a country where meal, cotton, sugar and oil are cheap, and he buys one dollar's worth of cotton, like amount of sugar, a bag of meal and a can of oil. The punishment of the Yankee, it will be remembered, is the gist of the whole Tariff system. On arriving at the Canadian side the Custom House officer seizes him by the throat and compels him to pay 40 cents on the cotton, 40 cents on the sugar, 20 cents on the meal, and as the kerosine oil will not stand the Canadian test it is confiscated. That is another black eye. I have heard the Minister of Finance talk about a victim, but I shall be glad if he can find a greater victim than this farmer who goes home to his family with two black eyes and little else from the proceeds of his potatoes. It is a disgraceful system to exist between two civilized nations. The man who went from Jerusalem to Jericho only fell among one batch of thieves and they robbed him of his raiment, but this farmer fell among two batches one on each side of the boundary. That is retaliation! Why, if the policy is so good, increase the army of detectives? The truth is that the people do not believe entirely in that policy and will trade along the lines. The Government are even appointing female detectives. Hon. gentlemen opposite all admire the system, but I am ashamed of my country and of the fact that a Canadian is made to suffer with a view to punishing the Yankees. I have no prejudice against the manufacturing or any other industry; but there is no reason for taxing the whole Dominion to be able to make such a statement as the Finance Minister does about some new factory in some locality. I do not deny that the erection and establishment of a manufactory, will help the locality in which it is placed, give employment to the laborer and do good to the people of the place. But why should every other locality that derives no advantage from that factory suffer in consequence? Why should the manufacturers have this advantage? Are they the class that ought to have the sympathy of the Government. As a class, they are rich, educated, and able to command the services of eloquent advocates. They can control the press, and, as a class, are the last men that ought to be singled out for any special privileges. I regret that with all those qualifications they do go about like mendicants and pass round the hat to force contributions, under the present system, to make the poor pour riches into their lap. That is the plain interpretation of your policy; and where is the reason for it? No; you do not reason logically about it; you deal in generalities and fallacies, as well as with the prejudices of the people, making them think that because some manufactory is being erected in some place in Ontario, the whole people are going to be enriched by it. You talk as if all the manufactories had been brought into existence by the National Policy, and exaggerate from first to last all through the chapter. The manufacturers are not the men that this paternal Government ought to look after. How is it with the great mass of the people who are poor? Without exaggeration, I should say that the poor you have always with you, and always will have, for the majority of the laboring classes are comparatively poor. Though not suffering hunger, the present Government party made them believe they were suffering during the late Administration. While it was in power, I saw in Ottawa how you arranged the working-men's meeting, inflamed their minds and brought them up to ask the Prime Minister what he would do with them. You brought them up to ask for bread; and before the demonstration ended they would hurrah! for Sir John.

Mr. HESSON. I protest against the hon. gentleman libelling the working men.

Mr. GILLMOR. The hon. Finance Minister said in his great Budget Speech—in fact everything hon. gentlemen opposite say or do is great, the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways was so described. In reference to something about the leader of the Opposition—that he fed the people. I have known the hon. Minister of Finance, and leader of the Government, and most of the leading men opposite for thirty years, but never was aware of their feeding the people. But I have known the contrary and the poor have fed and clothed those hon. gentlemen well; with their hard-earned wages they have clothed them in purple and fine linen, and let them fare sumptuously every day; and I see that the eyes of some of them stick out with fatness. They ought to be grateful for the good feed that they get out of the laboring classes. Those hon. gentlemen say the people want work. Of course they do, but they want the proceeds of their work; they want money. But the laboring men want work, and to get their money not unfairly. I will say a little about the National Policy, with which I do not profess to be acquainted very minutely. I have not made a study of political economy, like some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, though I do not think they have studied it to very much advantage. Notwithstanding that I differ very much from them with regard to the National Policy, I admit their great ability and information. Some of them are orators, and in all ordinary walks of life, they occupy a good position. I have no doubt they are good husbands, neighbors and citizens, and right in all respects save the National Policy. When they parade it they do not act like rational men. As a medical man, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you have, as well as men's bodies, studied their mental construction; and if so I will recall some lesson I read many years ago in a treatise on mental philosophy, to show that men may be sound on every question but one. One instance was that of a certain nobleman in England who to all appearances was perfectly sane, going about his ordinary business in a way to cause no suspicion of unsoundness of mind. But there was a certain hallucination which drove him into his garden about 12 o'clock every day, under the impression that he had become a plant, when he would insist on being watered, and the servant would have to go through that process for him. After that he was just as sane as anybody else till the same hour next day. Another man, to all appearance also sane, when he had occasion to sit down, would do so with the greatest care thinking that a certain part of his person was glass and that if be dropped down hard, there would be a regular smash up. There was another case of a nobleman who died, leaving a very large estate with his son as executor. This case will come nearer my point. A brother of the executor discovered, as he thought, that he was not sane on some points; and so he thought that the executor was not capable of managing the estate, when he applied to the courts for an investigation into his brother's condition. So, accordingly, a court was summoned and the examination commenced. The counsel examined a witness, and in all possible subjects they found the man sane. The audience all concluded that the man was sane and that he should remain executor as he was appointed. But just before the case was concluded, his brother said to his counsel: "Just ask him who created the heavens and the earth." So the lawyer asked him; his eyes flashed as he said: "Why, I created the heavens and the earth." "Ask him who makes the rain to descend, and the sun to shine and the earth to bring forth her fruits." "I do, of course." "Ask him who controls the nations of the earth and the trade of empires." "Why, I do." Well, Sir, the jury at once decided that the man was insane and that a new executor would have to be appointed. The story is suggested to me by the conduct of these hon. gentlemen who pretend that it is they who make the rain to descend and the sun to shine and the earth to bring forth her fruits. They regulate the trade of foreign countries, they improve the price of grain, and produce it here—or their National Policy does—they improve the price of lumber, and they are making all the people happy. Now, I do not think they talk sanely on that subject; in that respect they act like crazy men, and there is a jury that will try them and decide they are crazy. I am a free-trader, but I know that certain revenues must be raised in order to maintain the institutions of the country. I would raise these, as near as I could, upon the free-trade principles of England if I had the power. I know that we have got to have revenue, and therefore every man ought to contribute a certain portion of his gains to maintain the institutions of the country which afford protection to life and property and in which we all participate. But I maintain the principle is wrong to take by law any part of one man's earnings and give it to another man. It is unjust. A system of taxation that would be just is one that will not increase the price of any commodity, if that could be arrived at. The next best system is that which will tax goods the least possible amount that will meet the requirements of the revenue—that is, a revenue Tariff. The worst system that has been ever devised is the system which raises a revenue by making goods dear, and that is your protective policy. Whatever system takes a portion of one man's industry and gives it to another man is an injustice, and you are doing that by your protective system. Whenever a man earns a dollar by the sweat of his brow he has a right to that dollar himself, and has a right to purchase with it as much as he can get in any market in the world. There is no danger in their trading where it is not best for themselves. Why does the Government know more than the business men of this country, and does this Government understand how to do business better than they? Can they tell the people where they ought to trade and where they must trade? I see my hon. friend the Minister of Customs is in his seat. If there be one man in the Government that my heart warms towards it is the hon. Minister of Customs. He has always treated me well and given me the honor to come down to my county last summer. I was delighted to see him, and when he got there he was received with great éclat. He made a speech. I do not know exactly whether the rostrum was a barrel or a bag, but he stepped off the rostrum into a coach, into a chariot with white horses, and the National Policy men around him, one on his right and one on his left. They drove through our commercial metropolis, and the people were so excited you would have thought it was Barnum's museum. Nothing was ever seen like it there before. But the greatest amusement was to see the gentlemen that were on his right and on his left, exhibiting the champion of the National Policy. That was Canada for the Canadians, no trade with the Yankees. That community gives about two-thirds of its vote to the Tories. I get about one vote out of three in that community, but I hope to get more next election. My hon. friend went down there, and he was treated as I was glad to see him treated. After he was there a little while—I do not think he exactly liked the looks of things—he thought the National Policy was not commending itself to that community. After he came away, and without consulting his friends at all, he appointed two more preventive officers, although there were already five or six. He did it without anybody's knowledge. After they had been driving him around in a waggon he did not believe these gentlemen were just the men to carry out the National Policy. He did not believe he could trust them in that respect, and so he had to add to the staff two more men to watch these good friends of his—these good friends that were loud in their praises of the National Policy from daylight till dark, at the corners of the streets, on the hustings, everywhere they were remarkable National Policy men; but from dark to daylight they were great Free Traders. His friends were great National Policy men all through the week. They go to church on Sunday, but Monday night they look out for Free Trade. He took the patronage out of their hands. I would like to see the correspondence. Will the hon. gentleman give it if I ask for it; but there will be no correspondence. They put it to him, and he had to come down with $15,000 to build a Custom House to reconcile these gentlemen. He never had such a time in his life to carry out the National Policy. Why? You might as well try to stop the St. Lawrence as to stop people from buying and selling where it is best for them. They know better how to do it than you do. They are a law-abiding people—I mean to say where these laws are equitable; but you drive them to desperation. You are aiming to disturb every branch of industry. You are driving the commercial men whom it effects more almost than other class, over to the other side. Many of the important traders there have got their warehouses on the other side. I know several who are strong National Policy men, extreme party men, that were this fall looking out for stores in Calais to rent in order to keep a part of their trade that you are driving across the border. I do not believe that it is right to break the laws in this respect, but I mean to say that when you force an obnoxious policy on the country, when you try to force men to buy from Canadians at a higher price than they can buy from Americans, a sense of justice and of fair play will go further than the law, and you cannot control it. All along the frontier there is the same objectionable system. In Ontario if one man wants to exchange an article he has with another man for an article which he requires, he is allowed to do so, but if the parties happen to be situated on opposite side of an imaginary line in New Brunswick, they are prohibited from trading in that way. I do not care whether a man is black or white, if he has something which I want to buy, and I have something which I want to sell, I believe that we should be allowed to trade; and if I am compelled to buy from the people of Ontario, when I can purchase at a cheaper price from the American people, there is a failure on the part of justice and fair play. The Government have got one part of the policy of free trade running correctly. If you have a cargo of lumber to export they will allow you to export it, but if Canada is to be kept for the Canadians, why not keep it at home? But, on the contrary, the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. McLelan) said it was better that it should be exported, because you bring back the money. I want to bring back that on which I can increase my wealth most, and if I bring back an article on which I can enrich myself, does not the increase of the individual increase the wealth of the whole country? I produce, say, a cargo of fish or lumber. I send it to the United States, and it is convenient for me to bring back the money or such goods as I find cheaper to purchase there; and why should I be compelled to correspond with some man in Ontario, and make a bargain to send us down flour or any other goods or produce at a higher rate? Why should I be compelled to contribute to the proceeds of any particular institution in Ontario? I am attached as much to the Dominion as any other man, but matters of trade and matters of benevolence are on an entirely different arena. Men trade and exchange to make money honestly, and that is the object of trade; but by the National Policy, you say to a country: "We know where you ought to trade; we know who you should trade with, to make yourselves richer, and we will make you trade there else we will tax you for the benefit of some one else." That is unjust and wrong from the beginning to the end. Anything which I can buy from the Canadians as cheaply as I can buy from the Americans, I would buy for my own interest and that is the only motive. How absurd it is to compel a man living on an imaginary line between New Brunswick and the United States to go up to Ontario and buy from Canadians at a higher price, goods which he can obtain much cheaper a few miles from his own home. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that that is keeping wealth within ourselves, and that we will become rich by that method of trading. We cannot get rich in that way. Robinson Crusoe, on the Island of Juan Fernandez, was on that principle the most independent community that could be imagined. He had no import trade; he had no export trade; he traded with his own community and he had it all to himself, and I never heard that Robinson Crusoe amassed very much wealth or enjoyed very much comfort. The whole thing is illogical; all the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite are mere expedients and fallacies. They cannot argue the question logically and convincingly with anybody, and unable as I am—and I certainly do not pride myself on my knowledge of these matters—I am not afraid to meet the cleverest man among them on the trade policy here or anywhere else, and discuss the question with them half an hour about. They dare not take me up. They will admit that free trade is all right in theory, but in practice it is all wrong. I say, Sir, that this is a contradiction in terms. I say that what is right in theory can never be wrong in practice. If the proposition is right theoretically it must be right practically. In conclusion, I may say that this is a most serious question, because these hon. gentlemen who have been Revenue Tariff men all through their history until now, when they are blossoming for the grave, have very recently become converts to this policy of protection. I have known the hon. Finance Minister for a long time. I was associated with him for many years, and I never knew him, in Parliament or out of it, to defend a protective policy until he came here. He was always in favor of free interchange of commodities and unrestricted trade. Those were his theories. I know also that by reputation the Minister of Public Works entertained the same opinion; but a time occurred when trade was depressed, and these hon. gentlemen, instead of acting the part of statesmen, acting as men on their side of politics in England would have acted, have played on the prejudice of the people, got them to elect them to seats in the House, and they are now—having nailed their colors to the mast—endeavoring to fix this system on the country. The longer it is fastened on the country the harder will it be, as in the case of the United States, to throw off the fetters which they have placed on the country; the more difficult will it be to remove the corrupt influences which have sprung out of rings and monopolists and designing and anxious politicians and syndicates. They are, too, becoming fixed on the country and a power is being created which it will be hard to break. We have to fight this battle out to the end. I may not see the end, but I hope my friends around me will accept no compromise; that they will have nothing to do with the protective system, but that though a small band they may like the army of Gideon gird on their swords and put the Midianites to flight. I have an abiding faith in the independence and intelligence of the people of this country. I have an abiding faith in the correctness of the principles of free and unrestricted trade, but I want no compromise in our own ranks. I would rather have an army of 300 men good and true, prepared to fight the battle to the end on the square issue of right and wrong than all Gideons host. Now, Mr. Speaker, the great battle all down the ages of mankind has been around three central points: one is the freedom of the person, another the freedom of opinion, and the other freedom of exchange, or the liberty to buy where we please and to sell where we please. The first great point has been gained after many hard-fought battles, and the time has arrived, thank God, when in most of the civilized countries of the earth no man is held a slave, whether black or white. Freedom of opinion has been another hard-fought battle; men still have their prejudices in social life, in politics and religion, but such immense strides have been made in gaining freedom of opinion that men can hold their opinions and express them, so long as they do so within the bounds of prudence and not in violation of the law. The next great battle to be fought out is freedom of exchange, the right of which has been implanted in man by the Creator as much as the right to breathe the vital air, and no argument can prove the contrary. You may say we must pay our legitimate taxes; I admit it; but when you come to matters of trade between man and man, I say that the Government who taxes one industry to support another industry does an injustice and robs the man of that which rightfully belongs to him. Am I afraid that these principles will not triumph? No, Sir; I have an abiding faith in the people of this Dominion. They may do wrong for a time; you may humbug them a little longer; you may deal in your sophisms and your exaggerations; you may get the manufacturers and the monopolists of this country to aid you; but there will be an end to it. The time will come sooner or later, when the liberty to buy and sell, when and where we please, will become international and universal. And now, I cannot better conclude a speech of greater length than I intended, than by this quotation:

"God speed the ship, but let her bear
No merchandize of sin,
No groaning cargo of despair
Her roomy hold within,
No lethean drug for eastern lands,
No poison draught for ours,
But honest fruits of toiling hands
And nature's sun and showers."

Mr. LONGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this debate has already been carried over a period of nearly three weeks, during which time a number of very lengthy and very excellent speeches have been delivered, covering almost every point embraced in the very broad and comprehensive speech of the Finance Minister; and I would not presume to offer any additional remarks were it not that some matters of a somewhat local character have been incorporated into the debate, to which it would be a gratification to myself to make some reply. Since the union of the British North American Provinces, I presume that it has not fallen to the lot of a Finance Minister to present to Parliament a Budget speech under circumstances so satisfactory and so gratifying as those under which the hon. Finance Minister spoke to us on the 24th of last month. It did seem at that time as though that speech might well be allowed to stand against all that could be said in opposition to it; and my impression is that it would have withstood everything that has been said against it to the present moment. But our friends opposite are not of that opinion and they have been indulged to their hearts' content in attempting to pick that speech to pieces. Now, I would like to know in what one particular that speech has been successfully assailed. Has any gentleman in the Opposition ranks pretended to controvert the fact that there was on the 30th of June last a surplus of $4,130,000 in the Treasury? Has any member of the Opposition controverted the fact that there have been a large number of new industries established, and that there have been more employment and better wages for the working people of the country? Has any man attempted to deny that the two great objects of the National Policy have been most successfully achieved? They know that it is useless for them to attempt to do so, for they themselves have repeatedly admitted that the condition of the country has been greatly improved; and I want to know why the condition of the country has improved except largely through the instrumentality of the National Policy, and through the wiser counsels that have prevailed since 1873. Now, the question has frequently been raised in the discussions between the two great parties in this country as to whether it is or is not a good thing to have a large balance of trade against us, or whether it was, speaking generally, a good thing for any country that there should be year by year a large balance of trade against it; in other words, that the imports should so largely exceed the exports of a country. That being the fact, as in the case of a private individual, when his expenditures largely exceed his income he must come to grief; and countries, with the rarest possible exceptions, when their expenditures are more than their receipts, or when they import more goods than they export, it must necessarily be with them as with an individual, and we have had a very striking illustration of that in the history of the last fourteen years. At the risk of being a little tedious I want to go into some calculations which I have made, and I would say for the gratification of those who are listening to me, with a view of affording some measure of relief to their minds, that if I shall find that more time than I anticipated in the beginning will be required in order to finish my speech, why, we may just say it off in the middle and I shall pursue it on some other occasion. The exports in 1880-81 amounted to $98,290,823 as I have it, and I am inclined to think it is the largest export we have ever had; of that, however, I am not certain. The exports in 1874-75 were $77,886,979, or a difference between the two periods of over $20,000,000. Now let us turn to the imports; in 1874, they amounted to $123,070,283; in 1880-81, the total was $105,330,840 or a difference between the imports of 1881 and 1874-75, of $17,739,443. The difference between the exports of 1880-81 and the imports of the same year, and the exports and imports of the former period, namely, 1874-75, amounted to $38,143,287. Now, according to my arithmetic the balance of trade in 1881 was better by $38,143,287 than it was in 1874-75. Now, I think that proves pretty conclusively that it is very much better to have a large export and a comparatively small import, provided we can supply ourselves in the mean time in a large degree, than it is to have it the reverse. The average annual balance of trade against us from 1867 to 1873-74 was $20,356,438 and that was during what we would call the rule of the Liberal Conservative party. The average annual balance of trade from 1873-74 to 1878-79 was $24,807,346, or between four and five millions worse during the latter than during the former period. The average annual balance of trade from 1879-80 to 1880-81 was $4,725,107 instead of more than $20,000,000 from 1873-74 to 1878-79. From 1867 to 1873, as our enemies are constrained to admit, it was an exceedingly prosperous period in the history of Canada, and progress was greater than during any previous period. This I will illustrate better by-and-by; whereas, on the other hand, from 1873-74 up to 1878-79, I need not describe the condition of the country. Gentlemen opposite seem to forget that by their mismanagement in various ways, by their blind adherence to a free trade policy they were successful in one department at least, viz., in rolling up deficits. It is noticeable that the years during which the imports and exports most nearly balanced have been our most successful years, viz.: 1869-70 to 1879-80, while the years in which the imports have been most largely in excess of the exports have been most disastrous years. I am talking now about the latter period from 1867 up to 1873. We are not here to speak of these years, but I have already said they were eminently prosperous and successful. Our revenue increased very largely to the extent of $7,000,000 during that period and our trade extended to the amount of $86,000,000. What was the condition of our savings banks, what was the increase of the bank capital of the country? In every respect there was every indication of prosperity, but during the other period there was every indication of approaching ruin and bankruptcy if we had continued on in the same ratio as we had been going for two or three years previous. In 1869-70, the balance of trade was more in our favor than during last year, 1880-81, but the aggregate trade was $55,000,000 smaller than in 1880-81 and the aggregate trade smaller by $29,000,000 in 1879-80 than in 1880-81. The total yearly increase of tonnage, inwards and outwards, from 1867 to the end of 1873-74 was 709,000 tons. The yearly increase from 1873-74 to 1878-79 was 7,438 tons; in 1879-80 and 1880-81, 1,007,893 tons. From 1874-75 to 1878-79, shipbuilding decreased annually 19,254 tons, or 77,015 tons in five years. In 1879-80 and 1880-81 the annual decrease was only 12,093 tons, or 24,187 for two years. It will be noticed that whereas from 1875 until 1880 there was a decrease each year in shipbuilding, yet, in 1880-81, there was an increase. The tonnage added to our shipping fleet during the year 1880-81 was 10,500 tons. From 1875-76 until the end of 1878-79 the total tonnage of steamers in the coasting trade increased 2,884,584 tons; the sailing vessels tonnage decreased 1,118,833 tons; or a total increase in coasting trade in three years of 1,765,751 tons. In 1879-80 and 1880-81 the steamer tonnage increased—2 years nearly as much as in five years—2,132,482; in 1879-80 and 1880-81 the sailing tonnage increased 917,601; or a total increase in coasting trade, in two years, of 3,050,083 tons. There was a decrease of sailing vessels employed in coasting each year of the Mackenzie Administration. Under this Government they have largely increased. It is a noticeable fact that while the steamers increased only 104,713 per year more under the present Government, the sailing vessels were 831,744 tons per year better off under them than under the Mackenzie regime. From 1867 to 1880-81 the average annual excess of imports over exports was $18,971,114; the excess for 1880-81 was only $7,040,017, or better by $11,931,097 than the average since Union. From 1867 to 1874 the exports increased $32,000,000, or $5,333,333 per annum. From 1874 to 1879 the exports decreased $18,000,000, or $3,600,000 per annum. Adding the increase of exports from 1867 to 1874 to the decreased exports from 1874 to 1879 make an average against the latter period of $8,933,333. The exports have increased $27,000,000 since 1879, two years. The exports decreased $18,000,000 from 1874 to 1879, making a difference of $17,500,000 per year. That is to say, that the increase of exports during the last two years has been $13,500,000 per annum, while the decrease in exports during five years—1872-74 to 1878-79—was $3,600,000; total, $17,100,000. Now, what becomes of the argument of the hon. member for Brant. He, indeed, admitted that the export of manufactured goods had fallen off. Well, what then? Why, first, it proves that under the present policy we command our own markets; secondly, that we save immensely by thus supplying ourselves, keeping the money and our men in the country instead of both going out of it, and reaping all the benefit of the labor bestowed upon the goods manufactured and consumed. At any rate, it would be something new were any hon. gentleman to succeed in such an enterprise; because, although we have been discussing the National Policy for three or four years up to the present hour, I am not aware that any hon. member has successfully controverted this position. None deny but that the times are better than they were three, four, and five years ago. To what other causes can the improvement be ascribed than those claimed for the National Policy? That is the question we ask, and more, we say that you gentlemen of the Opposition cannot controvert the statement, else we are persuaded you would do it, which you have never done yet. Let us examine this question. First, the member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) admits a larger employment in connection with the manufacturers; secondly, he states that the exports of goods made in connection with those same manufacturers has fallen off in 1880-81. Now, granting these two propositions, are they not the plainest possible evidence that the home manufactures are in good demand for home consumption? If this is correct, then is not the great object of the National Policy attained—namely: Home-made goods for the home market. Now, we will take the hon. member for Brant, who doubtless is a protectionist at heart. So strongly are his protectionist proclivities that he has to be carefully on his guard whenever he gets up to speak on the other side of the question. Out of the hon. gentleman's own mouth, taking his own argument, we prove conclusively that the chief ends of the National Policy have been accomplished. The member for Lambton said the other day that labor is the foundation of all work, saying that no country can be rich without labor. These are two propositions to which people will readily assent. Let us see at what conclusions we shall arrive by logically pursuing the argument, that a policy such as that of the late Government which allowed goods to be manufactured in other counties and sold here is calculated to ruin this country; while a policy which increases labor, as even the hon. member for Brant admits ours does, is the one to make a country rich. Now, then not only have we the testimony of this hon. gentleman in favor of our policy, but we have even a greater name, the hon. member for Lambton, who was at one time looked upon as a great authority. It is true he has lost a little of his prestige since that time, but we still look to him as an authority in most matters that relate to the interests and concerns of this country. Therefore, by the hon. member for Lambton's doctrine and the hon. member for Brant's admission, it follows as the night follows the day, that the National Policy is the policy for Canada. But the hon. member for Brant proved an increased import for 1880-81, of the class of goods manufactured at home. If, therefore, the imports have increased, and new manufactures have also been established, while all the manufactories are doing a larger business than before, have we not the plainest possible proof of the greatly increased purchasing power of the masses of the people, and is not another doctrine of the National Policy advocates established, namely, that increased labor will give the laborers more money to spend? In other words, when all have full employment the purchasing power of the country is vastly increased. Those are our cardinal doctrines, and it would seem as though these are doctrines now held by even such free traders as the members for Lambton and Brant, one of whom declared not many years ago that he nailed his free trade colors to the mast and was determined to go down with the ship rather than haul them down. Unfortunately for him, but very fortunately for the country, his ship did go down, although he had his colors nailed to the mast, and if that ship were afloat, being buffeted by the tide now as it was then, it would go down a second time, and for this reason. I was surprised to hear the member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), who entertained us with such a peculiar speech, say that the country was only waiting to expel the present Government. I thought to myself: have we had no test of the popularity of the Government, of the position they hold in the confidence of the people? Even so recently as the day on which the electors for South Simcoe deposited their ballots; and pray what was the result of that election? Was it not simply to double the majority of the former member? Then look at the Government as it was supported when we first assembled here in 1879, and how are they supported to-day? They then had a majority of about eighty, which was thought quite large enough by the Ministers themselves; but that majority of eighty has since been increased to ninety odd; some say ninety, some say ninety-six. Every constituency opened, save two, has been gained by the Government; a proposition hostile to the Government would be voted down by a majority of over ninety any hour. I rather think the majority is all the time growing, and that we do not want any better signification of what the sentiment of the country is in regard to the distinctive policy of the Government. So much has been said about England, that it were a pity, perhaps, to make any further allusion to that noble country, which we all love so well; and all I shall do will be to say this, that for one, I think much of England and have too ardent a desire for her prosperity to rejoice in any way at seeing indications of her decay. Now, I am not prepared to say that England is less powerful to-day than she was a quarter of a century ago. In some respects she has increased her importance among the nations of the earth. Her relative power to-day, may be as great as it was years ago; but we cannot deny the fact that, in regard to England's agricultural interests there has been a very signal decay during the last six years. In respect to the number of horned cattle, they have decreased about 2,000,000, and in respect to sheep, swine, horses and all sorts of stock there has been a corresponding decrease. We know, also, that some 600,000 acres once sown to wheat have recently been turned out to pasture, and that year by year the English agriculturist is less able to compete with his brother agriculturist on this side of the water.

Mr. BORDEN. They are sending potatoes over this side this year.

Mr. LONGLEY. I know they are, and I am glad they are able to send them. It has been many years since they have had many potatoes to send from England. It is to be regretted that they have had little, except manufactured goods, to send, because it is notorious that England, with all her greatness, has been largely dependent upon America for much of her food for years past, and the problem is to know where that sort of thing is to end. One word more with regard to England's wealth. I am an utter disbeliever in the statement made by hon. gentlemen that the wealth of England is materially, if at all, increasing. I cannot suppose for a moment that England's manufacturing industries are in nearly as good a position as they were ten or twenty years ago. It must be obvious to every man who will look into the subject that though England commanded the markets of the world in a former period she has been from year to year in the position of being driven out from one market after another until she now reciprocates to a small extent with many leading nations of Europe. She is almost shut out of the markets of France. And, by the way, it would not be inappropriate to remark that England has very recently sued for a treaty with France, a treaty which, years ago, France willingly enough accorded, but which for reasons which France best understands, is now refused. At one time an alliance with England was coveted, almost every nation was ambitious to cultivate trade relations with her, but it does not seem to be so now. If I am correctly informed as to the condition of France, she is much more prosperous to-day than even Old England, and that too in face of the fact that twelve years ago France was at the feet of an exacting and despotic power, but in six years after the adopting of a highly protective Tariff, her industries became flourishing and to-day she is acknowledged to stand among the foremost nations in the world. Germany, also, has been referred to as a signal instance of the unwisdom of adopting a protective Tariff. While I am not conversant with the exact position of Germany, and am satisfied that in regard to manufacturing skill and in regard to the increase of her power, there is scarcely a nation in the world whose power and influence are so great as those of Germany, and that, too, in spite of the fact that she maintains a million men in arms, which of itself is enough, almost, to break any country down—but to speak of Germany having suffered in consequence of the adoption of a protective policy, is to talk in utter disregard of the facts which are acknowledged by the whole world. You do not usually find all the nations of Europe trembling at a power that is going to decay. Then, if you were to speak of the comparatively small country of Belgium, with a population of 5,000,000, look at the progress of that little country in manufacturing industries. She has come into sharp competition even with England herself; and it is noteworthy that the nations which have been the sharpest competitors should obtain that excellence, with power to compete with England, through the adoption of the protective policy. You will find that whenever a nation has adopted a protective policy for a number of years, that nation has increased in material wealth, and in every respect has improved her condition; and, on the other hand, you will find that in almost every instance where there has been a blind adherence to the principles of free trade, especially where the surrounding nations have adopted a protective policy, that nation has gradually gone to decay, or at any rate has decreased in power in comparison with other nations. France maintains an enormous army which must be a drawback to her, but I look upon the history of France during the last twelve years as little short of marvellous. She was supposed to have incurred a debt that she could never discharge; she had been mutilated by her enemy; and yet we find that in a very brief interval she springs up to her former position, and bids fair to rival any nation in Europe; but she has had a protective policy to some extent for seventy-five years, and notably since the disaster of 1870. There was an attempt made the other night by the hon. member for Lambton to show that the present Government was extravagant, and that the Government which he conducted for five years was a very economical one. The increase of expenditure in 1875 over that for 1873-4 was $2,960,336 and the increase in 1876 over 1875 was $717,062. In 1876, the amount disbursed over 1873 was $3,677,398; I believe that in fairness we might deduct from that the sum of $1,500,000 which was paid to Prince Edward Island and $370,000 which we might by a very liberal allowance to the Government regard as being paid in unusual expenditures. This would reduce the excess in 1876 over 1873 to $1,800,000. Now then, the increase of expenditures during the interval under review only amounted to $5,760,764, and yet the hon. member for Lambton, the other night, without a change of countenance seemingly, in the most modest way imaginable, coolly told us that his was a most economical Government and this a most extravagant one. I admit at once that the Government which ruled the country from 1867 to 1873 was a most liberal Government—in the matter of expenditure—but the marked difference between that Government and the one which succeeded it was this: that while the one had surpluses amounting to over fifteen millions of dollars, the other had deficits amounting to about one-third of that sum.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). How?

Mr. LONGLEY. Has the hon. member for Middlesex the cheek to say that there were not over $15,000,000 of a surplus during that period?

Mr. ROSS. How much?

Mr. LONGLEY. Some hundreds of thousands; and if the hon. gentleman does not take my word I will give him the word of the ex-Finance Minister, and ask him if he desires to controvert my position. Whenever they were charged with having made large expenditures they laid the blame on their predecessors. Will they name the objections of which they complain so much? The total expenditures on public works paid out of Consolidated Revenue in 1873 was $1,977,613; in 1875, $1,757,075; and in 1876, $1,948,941; the increased expenditure upon piers, harbors and breakwaters in 1876, over 1875, was $130,248. The expenditure charged to Consolidated Fund in 1875-6 for works not begun in 1874, but voluntarily assumed by the then existing Administration, viz., on piers, harbors, river works, custom houses, penitentiaries and marine hospitals, amounted to $621,669. Now, it seems to me, that however desirable it may have been to have that money appropriated for the purposes to which it was applied, I say it was not expedient or wise for them to expend that amount of money when there were constantly increasing deficits, and when it was obvious that they really had not the money to expend. The total amount expended in 1874 upon works not commenced in 1873 was $327,552.

Mr. ROSS. You are reading Senator Macpherson's figures?

Mr. LONGLEY. I do not care whose figures they are. If they are Senator Macpherson's figures no man has yet had the courage to undertake to refute them, although frequently challenged to do so. I do not say whether or not they are Senator Macpherson's figures, but I will say that there is scarcely a man in this wide Dominion who understood better what he was about than Senator Macpherson when he was compiling those figures, nor a gentleman who would be a safer guide in matters of finance than that hon. gentleman. Our trouble with our opponents is that they do not meet us face to face. When, for instance, certain statements are made by the Minister of Finance, which those gentlemen in general terms, are fond of disparaging and disputing, why do they not rise to their feet, or take the first opportunity that offers afterwards, to grapple with those facts? Why, the hon. Minister of Finance gave us more facts and figures and sound arguments the other day than those gentlemen could digest in a lifetime; they would not be so foolhardy, they know better than to undertake to wage a direct war with that hon. gentleman, or to bring things to a direct issue, because, so far as we can judge at any rate, when the Minister of Finance undertakes to talk upon matters of finance, or in relation to the National Policy, and matters in relation to the Tariff and various classes of goods, he knows exactly what he is talking about and no man in this House has yet been able to controvert his statements. Well, possibly the hon. member for Bothwell may undertake to combat that, he is able to talk on questions of constitutional law and is very wise and learned upon a variety of topics which he does not infrequently drag into this debate, when in the estimation of others they do not seem very much to belong to it. A man may be learned upon a variety of topics, but then after all it depends very much upon the use a man makes of what he knows, and his judgment about displaying it. The total amount expended in 1874 on works not commenced in 1873, was $327,552, and the total amount expended in 1875, upon works not commenced in 1873, was $203,546. The amount expended in 1876 on works not commenced in 1873 was $556,596. That is pretty fair for a Government that was going behind at the rate of $2,000,000 a year, and at the same time increasing the aggregate expenditure. Now let us try civil government. I may say I have only one objection to the use of these figures; it is a somewhat serious one, viz.: that they have been used before in this House, but then after all those hon. gentlemen have to be reminded very frequently of certain unpleasant facts, and the only apology I have for using them at the present time I have already referred to, that the hon. gentleman for Lambton for the twenty-fifth time undertook to tell the House the other night that his was an economical Government, and that ours was an extravagant one. Now, civil government was in 1873, $750,874, but in 1875, the cost was $909,265, a jump up of $175,000 in a single year. In regard to expenditure for Civil Government, contingencies account in 1873, reached $287,000 odd; in 1875, $302,327; in 1876, $301,602. There is no excuse for that increase.

Mr. ROSS. What was it in 1878?

Mr. LONGLEY. I am glad the hon. member reminded me of that. The then Government took alarm in 1878, and no wonder. The people had come to find out that their statements in regard to economizing were delusive; they had commenced to examine for themselves, and besides they were approaching a general election, and on the score of saving their credit and commending themselves to the country, they effected economy in certain directions, but it was too late to begin to reform. I do not think the country gave any credit to them for doing so, otherwise the people would not have sent them about their business and given their opponents a majority of 80 in a House of 200 odd members. The Administration of Justice increased as follows: 1873, $393,966; 1875, 497,465; and 1876, $544,091.

Mr. ROSS. Why does the hon. gentleman stop with 1876?

Mr. LONGLEY. It will be bad enough to go to that length. In regard to that particular case, and on many other occasions I have had my sympathies considerably aroused as matters went against them from 1873 to 1878, and also against the country. I do not see how hon. gentlemen opposite can obtain any encouragement. They can find no encouragement in the by-elections, but they comfort themselves with the idea that a good time is coming, and I hope the youngest will live to see it. In Customs the cost was, in 1875, $682,673; in 1876, $721,008. I think it would have been bad enough to have kept the expenditure up to the level of the previous years. The deficits were piling up in an alarming manner. The Excise Department cost, in 1873, $103,704; in 1874, $119,000, and, in 1879, $203,759. This is a comparatively small branch of the public service, yet here there was a proportionate increase as in all the other departments. Let us turn to the Emigration Department. In 1873 the expenditure was $277,368; in 1875, $302,770; in 1876, $385,845.

Mr. ROSS. Give us the figures for 1877-78.

Mr. LONGLEY. I have already explained why I do not speak of it. I will ask one of my friends to pursue the enquiry in regard to that year about which the hon. gentleman is so solicitous. Let us see what the sequel of this extraordinary expenditure was. The number of emigrants obtained by us in 1873 was 36,901; in 1875, with a very considerable increase of expenditure it was 16,038, or less than half; and in 1876, 10,901 for an expenditure of $385,000. The cost per head, of these immigrants in 1873 was $7.76, quite a moderate sum, because each immigrant might reasonably be expected to be worth what he cost. But in 1875, the cost per head was $18.09, and in 1876, $26.55. I could by no very unfair comparison say it was $30.10. But I have deducted from this computation the cost of the Mennonites, which might be fairly included. Thus we have a cost of $7.76 for 1877-78, and for 1879, $26. It seemed that the larger the expenditure was, the fewer became the immigrants. I will not pretend to go all round Departments and institute comparisons; but if you will go into the various public services during that time and carefully note the management which distinguished each Department, you will find that the management in other places was about on a par with the management of the Emigration Department. From the 30th June, 1873, to 1876, the total increase of interest chargeable to the Consolidated Fund was $1,203,797. That only involved an annual increase of expenditure in connection with Public Works of about $400,000 a year. Now, there could not have been any great progress made in connection with the public works during that interval. I say here—although it may be an individual opinion that I express—that the Macdonald Government never imposed an onerous obligation upon the Mackenzie Government. I say, and I am in the presence of gentlemen who understand the question much better than I do, that the Mackenzie Government, in view of all the circumstances, was not obliged to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. But he voluntarily took upon himself obligations which the former Government had assumed, and far transcending the obligations of the former Government. The former Government never contemplated, when they formed the union with British Columbia, to give more than $30,000,000 as a subsidy to the construction of that work. What was that in comparison with the onerous obligations imposed upon the country under the Act of 1874? One can have but a feeling of amusement that men who conducted the affairs of the Government at that time have now the face to speak about the country again entrusting them with power. Now, if the ex-Minister were in his seat, I would just give the House, a chapter on the steel rail transaction. I shall make a remark or two, and I will make them with every reasonable consideration to the gentleman who is absent, because I entertain for him a very high respect. There is no denying now, in view of the revelations that have taken place since the purchase of these rails, that over $2,000,000 were lost to this country, which will entail upon us and our children through ages to come a very large annual burden in the shape of interest. The act was all the more inexcusable, inasmuch as the article purchased was not wanted at the time, nor would they have been wanted for years afterwards. Such a thing as the purchase of 50,000 tons of steel rails, when there was not a mile of road graded, is an unheard of thing in the history of Canada, or, I think, in the history of any other country. There was one thing that was very significant about that transaction, independent that the article was purchased long before it was needed, purchased in a falling market and at a time when everybody must have known that the price was likely to fall. And here is what I refer to—and it is the most awkward feature of the whole transaction. The Minister of Railways, although he proposed to purchase 50,000 tons of steel rails, did not issue his advertisement until the 29th of September, though the tenders were to be opened on the 8th of October.

Mr. ROSS. Did he not extend the time?

Mr. LONGLEY. Yes; but it would require one day for the advertisement to reach anybody, and another day to send the tender, and thus—allowing for the sabbath which intervened—only six or seven days were allowed for the consideration of tenders to be put in. At least three months should have been allowed. Yet because some of the late Premier's friends remonstrated vigorously the time was extended to a month. I think the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), spoke of the accumulations in the savings banks previous to the inauguration of the National Policy. Did he think that made the difference? Did he happen to think that at that particular time we could do without a National Policy? The fact is, the Grits were not in power at that time, and hence the accumulations in the savings banks; but as soon as they came in, the savings banks were depleted, like everything else. We should not overlook the relative positions of Canada and the United States at that particular time. We could then do very well without a National Policy; we were scarcely interfered with at all by the United States. But subsequently it became a very difficult thing; it did not matter how many goods were slaughtered in our markets, or to what extent we were being sacrificed to the United States, these gentlemen adhered to their policy. With regard to savings banks, I have a statement with reference to the savings in the shire town of Annapolis County, my own county. It shows the amounts on deposit in each year from 1875 to 1882: On the 30th June, 1875, there were $22,059.06; in 1876, $19,291.48; in 1877, $22,587.08; in 1878, $36,013.33; in 1879, $65,875.60; in 1880, $52,145.21; in 1881, $92,782.44; and on the 1st January, 1882, $125,951.77. And that is only one of the many signs of the times, of returning prosperity and comfort on the part of the people; of the little surpluses which they have accumulated under improved times, and which they are careful to place in the savings banks. Now there was on the 31st January, 1882, five times the average amount that was in that bank at any time from 1875 to 1878; I think that is very significant. My statement in reference to the surpluses from 1867, down to 1873 has been confirmed by the ex-Minister of Finance, who gave the moneyed men of England a vivid description of the prosperity of Canada at that time. He said that although there had been very large expenditures in connection with improving the public works of this country, yet the revenue had steadily increased, so that there were between fifteen and sixteen millions of a surplus, and that the money which had been thus expended would in years to come greatly contribute to the progress and prosperity of the country. He also said that no man who had money to lend need be under the slightest apprehension in regard to the credit and resources of Canada—and remember, Sir, that was two years after the advent of the Mackenzie Government to power. I know that at Aylmer the ex-Finance Minister, two years afterwards, undertook to tell the people that the outgoing Government were little better than a drunken crew and that the last act of their lives was an attempt to scuttle the ship of State. I know he said that, but unfortunately he had said a very different thing before, and that was two years after he himself had taken charge of the finances. But the Opposition say it is all owing to depression of times. Was the depression of times in Canada any greater than it was in the United States during the same interval, with this simple distinction, that the return to better times began a little sooner in the United States than here? I assume that the depression affected the United States just as much as Canada.

Mr. ROSS. With a protective Tariff?

Mr. LONGLEY. I will point out the distinction between the position of the United States during that time of depression and the condition of Canada. In the one case we were not able to meet our annual disbursements and at the end of five years we had deficits amounting to something like $6,000,000; and the present Finance Minister has assured us that, but for the National Policy which saved us from a very serious disaster, the debt would have amounted to seven or seven and a-half millions. In the United States, however, they were able not only to prevent deficits but had larger surpluses and for a considerable length of time and instead of increasing the natural debt, they year by year reduced it. There is no escaping from the conclusion that the condition of things for 1873-4 led to this conclusion—that the depression was due first to extravagance on the part of the Government in regard to the expenditures, and second in regard to general mismanagement; and probably if the hon. member for Middlesex had had a seat in the Cabinet he might have avoided the breakers into which they ran the ship of State because it is notorious that a portion of the late Cabinet rendered but little aid in the way of managing public affairs. I will not undertake to describe the heterogenous masses that were got together. But if I had a file of the Globe or some of the other organs of my hon. friend from Middlesex, I would be relieved from the necessity of saying a word myself in regard to the personnel of a part of the late Government. And these were the men who swore all their lives that about the greatest crime men could commit was to form a coalition government.

Mr. ROSS. Grits do not swear.

Mr. LONGLEY. I hope the hon. gentleman does not, but I would not trust many of that party. Had the conditions of things been unpropitious from 1867 to 1873 and prosperous from 1873-4 down to 1878-9, we could have attributed the success during the one period and the disasters attending the other to accidental causes, or, in the former case, to unpropitious circumstances. But it is significant that no sooner were the late Government displaced from power and the Liberal Conservatives restored to office, then the old prosperity that marked the experience of the country from 1867 to 1873 was won back, so that there is no escape from the conviction that it was simply from mismanagement that while there was success in the first period, there was want of success in the second, success following again in the third period.

Mr. ROSS. You had deficits in 1879-80.

Mr. LONGLEY. And why? Our friends opposite almost ruined the country and we were not able to restore its prosperity in a single year, but what was the state of things from 1867 to 1873? From the first year of the present Government, beginning with a small surplus of about $200,000, we ran it up in one year to $3,617,000, I think. But that was not equal to $4,130,000 lately announced. I do not wonder that the hon. the Finance Minister was strong and eloquent when he went into the minutæ of his subject the other day. There was inspiration in a surplus of $4,130,000 obtained through his own wise policy, matured by his colleagues. He had occasion to be proud of its results, and he was able to speak in such a way as to captivate all of us, not only in the House, but the public equally outside. Scarcely a newspaper, with any pretension to fairness, but was almost as unqualified in its praise of that speech and of the success of the National Policy as were the papers of the Government; and this applies to all the independent newspapers also. Let anybody read the Evening Telegram, the Toronto World, and other papers that claim to be independent, and see what they say with regard to the Tariff and the results achieved under the National Policy and the wise administration of the present Government. The leader of the Opposition is away at present, or I would make remarks at some length in regard to him. I will only make one or two observations at this time, however. Lured by the brilliant prospects held out to him last winter by the members from New Brunswick, that hon. gentleman was tempted to make a visit to the Maritime Provinces. I will not undertake to describe the many ovations he received, nor the large and enthusiastic meetings he was enabled to gather. His principal argument had reference to Mr. Parks' cotton factory and the cost of the various kinds of clothing, which he told the people they were obliged to purchase at extravagant prices. One meeting was held in my own county, at which there were assembled 300 persons all told. He told us a good deal about the impositions of the Tariff and about the extravagance of the Government, but he laid the chief stress upon the fact that the Tariff was oppressive, that poor people were obliged, when they went to purchase their garment, to be satisfied with six or eight yards instead of ten, and he intimated to them that they must cut the garment according to their cloth, and he was disposed to dock them in regard to the various articles of clothing they were to wear. With reference to flannels, with reference to cottons and all those fabrics, he was going to dock off considerable from the liberal allowance the ladies had indulged in previously. We did not have time to ask two or three members of the Cabinet to enlighten us on that occasion, though we thought it especially needful after the visit of the great luminary of the west. The truth is, however, that we came to the conclusion after the visit of the hon. gentleman, that we could dispense with a call from any of the leaders of the Government. In fact, we came to the conclusion that if we could not get these leaders of the Government to come down, the best thing would be to get the leader of the Opposition to come down again—the one plan would be as effective as the other. The fact is the hon. gentleman came down on a fool's errand. He found he had no cause to advocate as he and his friends found in this Chamber. Almost within sight of the spot where the hon. gentleman addressed a small number of the electors of Annapolis, there stood a furniture factory, and its history, since the inauguration of the National Policy, would be the strongest argument that could be offered against anything the hon. gentleman could say against that policy. The proprietor of that factory informs me that he has doubled his business in two years. He has, since last summer, erected a two-story building, 60 feet in length by some 30 in breadth, in which has been started a manufactory of organs and other musical instruments. So as one thing leads to another, we have here a manufactory of our own, where, but for this Tariff, American goods would have been offered at slaughter prices. The first statement is that he has doubled his business in two years. He says: "I have doubled the number of my workmen. Parties in St. John first gave me an order for twelve suits of furniture of a certain make. That was to cover an interval of six months. The same parties gave me an order in December last for 80 suits, to be delivered in four months." Then he goes on to state that parlor furniture has increased in same ratio. This gentleman states further that he pays out about $60,000 a year for labor and stock, and about $2,000 a month for wages. The best of all is that since the inauguration of the National Policy he has sold his furniture, not higher, but ten per cent. lower. This is in full confirmation of the arguments we have adduced from the time that policy was introduced until now. What does this little industry which I have referred to, mean? It means the retention in the country of 30 or 40 workmen, to begin with—most of them, skilled workmen, and all good citizens. There can be no manner of doubt but what these 30 or 40 men, or the larger proportion of them, would have been in the United States at work in some of the factories in that country to-day, but for the inauguration of the National Policy. It means a better home market for the producer, and a large amount of money unspent for foreign articles, which might be furnished as cheaply, yea, cheaper, and as well made, at home. It also means greater self-respect, and a constantly increasing advance in every way, and no one can controvert that reasoning. I have not mentioned this as being a very important matter in itself, but simply as it is indicative of the tendency of the policy to which we ascribe the present prosperity of the country. Foundries, shoe factories, canning establishments and various other manufactures have been started and to-day we bid fair to make more money in consequence of the convenient home market than we would have made before this beneficent policy was introduced. I shall speak now from a Nova Scotian standpoint, and the outlook for that Province, at a moderate computation, is 25 per cent. better than it was in 1877-78. Let us look outside of this little county of Annapolis and extend our thoughts and observations to the two Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Two sugar refineries have been established in those Provinces, one at Halifax and another at Moncton; two cotton factories, one at Halifax and one at Windsor. Now, a cotton factory is being started in Halifax, and one at Windsor, and both of them it is expected will be opened in the spring and in operation

An agricultural implement factory is about being started at Amherst, so we are informed through the newspapers; a woollen factory at Hopewell has been started, and a glass factory at New Glasgow, both places being in Pictou county. And other enterprises are in prospect. Now, this is just a fair beginning of a new order of things, the starting of manufactures to supply all our own wants. Very soon, Mr. Speaker, we shall be relieved from the necessity, I hope, of looking to Ontario and Quebec for the bulk of our manufactured articles. There is no reason why we should not manufacture as well and as cheaply, yea, in every respect to manufacture more cheaply than in any other part of the Dominion of Canada, and that is more particularly the case in the vicinity of the coal mines, where the coal is right alongside the factory. Taking, for instance, the glass factory at New Glasgow, any coal that is used in connection with that factory is right at the door, and may be hauled by a team and put into the factory at $2.00 per ton, perhaps less. Well, now, will any one pretend to say we shall not, if we get started, be able to hold our own with the older and more populous, if not the more enterprising Provinces; I think it cannot be disputed. Not that we begrudge to Montreal or Quebec any advantage they have reaped from our patronage. With the most friendly feelings towards the United States, believing in their institutions, and admiring them as I do, nevertheless I very much prefer trading with the Upper Provinces or any other portion of the Dominion, if we cannot supply our own wants. But remember that the United States is what she is in consequence of a protective policy, much more highly protected than our country. What but this policy could have carried the States through one of the most disastrous and expensive wars in which any country was ever engaged, and enabled them shortly after its close to more than regain the position they had occupied in the scale of nations previously; and to-day to such a degree have the Americans carried forward their manufacturing industries that it may well be doubted whether any country on the face of the earth manufactures better articles or sells them at cheaper prices.

Mr. ROSS. England does.

Mr. LONGLEY. No; England does not. She may exceed the United States in certain articles, but in regard to others she is far behind the United States, as is seen by the fact that England has been driven out of the Australian market by the Americans in respect to the sale of certain manufactured articles; and not only out of Australia, but out of other countries. This has in a measure been done by France, which is quite as highly protected as the United States. Wherever you find a nation in the first rank at the present time you will find it has attained that particular excellence and success chiefly through the initiation of a policy similar to that which we entered upon as it were the other day. I want to know why it is we, with a territory equal to that of the United States, and richer in regard to mining interest than almost any other country, as broad and rich and diverse, except, possibly, our climate—why may we not achieve what the United States have achieved during a century. If we progress for fifty years as we have done during the last two years, we shall ultimately rival the United States, because we have this advantage in regard to our land especially, that while our land is almost untouched, their land is mostly or very largely occupied. Their time may be said to be in a large measure past, but our time has just come. I do not believe there is a country on the face of the earth, with a population so small, that has as fair a prospect before it as this Canada of ours. I hope we shall see the time when none of the statesmen or politicians in Canada will think it either becoming or necessary to disparage and belittle their country. We have had enough of that. We have one of the best, richest and most diversified countries, in regard to natural resources, on the globe I will now say a word or two about the coal industry. Years ago we had—I presume now have, $15,000,000 invested in the Nova Scotia coal mines, an industry which gives the Province a revenue of $100,000 a year, or one-fifth of its entire revenue. Is it any wonder, then, that we should attach some importance to the coal industry, and to the fact of 60cts. a ton duty having been imposed upon it? I think not. It would be odd if we thought less of it. I think I shall be able to demonstrate that this duty has had an immense influence on this industry—that it has wonderfully increased the output of coal, and that nobody has been injured by it, but Nova Scotia has been very largely blessed. I approve of reciprocity between the different parts of the Dominion and the cultivation of interprovincial trade. What were we united for, if not to interchange commodities and do one another good? If we glory in the name of Canadians—if we have any pride of country—what can we more earnestly desire than to see every part of the Dominion grow, thrive and expand into a nation, until we shall even rival the great nation alongside of us. I speak thus not because I represent a county that has any direct interest in the coal mining business; I speak first as a Nova Scotian and second as a Canadian. The people of Ontario ask us very kindly to put up with the inconvenience of paying 40 cents a barrel on corn meal, and 77 cents a bushel on corn. We cannot exactly see the necessity of that provision in the Tariff, but so far as I know the friends of the Government, at least, cheerfully acquiesce in it, and it is only the grumblers from Yarmouth and certain other places that are constantly driving into the ears of the people that there is any special hardship in this matter. We believed that the Tariff would promote the cultivation of corn in the valley of Annapolis, where we can grow corn as well as in any part of Ontario. Now, for the coal. I propose to read a statement which has been carefully compiled by a gentleman who thoroughly understands the business, and I think I can vouch for the accuracy of his figures. Here is a comparative statement of coal sales, labor, etc., of Nova Scotia and shipping for 1873, the last year of the Macdonald Government, to 1878, the last year of the Mackenzie rule, down to 1881, the third year of the present Government. The total consumption of coal in the Dominion in 1878 was 1,415,576 tons; in 1881, 2,150,528 tons, or an increase of 735,112 tons, or 51 per cent. Now, I think that is pretty fair in three years, an increase in the consumption of coal to the extent of 51 per cent. We now come to the coal sales in Nova Scotia. The sales of coal in Nova Scotia in 1873 amounted to 881,106 tons. In 1878, 693,511 or a falling off in that year compared with 1873, of 187,559 tons, or 21 per cent. The total consumption of coal, in 1881, was 1,034,800 tons, an increase of 341,289 tons, or 49 per cent. I wish to call attention to one significant fact. Several hon. members have undertaken to prove that there has been a falling off in the output or consumption of coal since 1873. In dealing with that point I wish to give the total imports of coal into Montreal and Quebec. In 1873, there were 415,380 tons. In 1878, 328,074, or a falling off of 87,306 tons or 21 per cent. The increased consumption in 1881 over 1878 was 201,017, or 61 per cent. Now, the coal shipped from Nova Scotia to Montreal and Quebec in 1873 was 187,059, and in 1878, 83,710, or a decrease of 103,349 tons. In 1881 there were 263,629 tons shipped or an increase of 22 per cent. Will anybody say in the face of that fact that the National Policy has had no effect on the coal industry. But let us try this matter by another test. The number of men employed in 1873 was 4,362. In 1878 it was 3,135, or a falling off of 28 per cent. There was an increase of 15 per cent. in the number of men employed in 1881. The number of days' work in 1873 was 995,153, in 1878, 663,800, a falling off of nearly 50 per cent., and in 1881, 847,595, an increase over 1878, of 183,795, or 28 per cent. Now, let us look at the imports at the harbor of Sidney. In 1873, they were $350,760, in 1878, $260,760, a falling off of $90,000 or 26 per cent., and in 1881, $396,750, an increase of $135,990 or 52 per cent. The exports from the harbor of Sidney in 1873, were $526,792, in 1878, $276,122, a falling off of $250,670 or 48 per cent., and in 1881, $542,922, an increase of 97 per cent. The Custom receipts at the harbor of Sidney in 1878, were $23,481, and in 1881, $27,226, an increase of $3,745, or 16 per cent. The Sick Mariners' Fund in 1878 amounted to $931, and in 1881 to $1,963, or more than double. The number of steamers which arrived at the port of Sidney in 1878, was 24, in 1881, 255, an increase of 231 per cent. That wonderful increase in the number of vessels calling at the port of Sidney is largely owing to Sidney being on the way to Montreal, where they go for freights. The tonnage of the ships arriving at the port of Sidney in 1873 was 222,999, in 1878, 215,061, and in 1881, 401,082, an increase of 186,021 tons, or 86 per cent. Now, I will give you one fact. From 1873 to 1878 the days labor at our coal mines decreased 33 per cent., and from 1878 to 1881 increased 28 per cent.; that is only a difference of 61 per cent. The Nova Scotia coal trade gave 847,594 days' work to the people. Then here is a statement of the iron industry and gold mining, &c., which I won't refer to any further. Nova Scotia and British Columbia give Canada 2,235,770 days' labor, or a circulation of over $4,100,000 for mineral labor. I am coming now to the part that I promised a while ago. I hold in my hand a statement of the cost of coal in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick for the years 1877, 1878, 1879 and 1881, and if this be a correct statement I think that it settles conclusively the fact, and establishes our contention that a duty of 60 cents per ton on coal has not increased the cost to the consumer. If I am wrong in this respect, or if these figures are incorrect, I shall be glad to be set right and to have the figures controverted; they will be accessible to anybody. In 1877 the cost of coal in Ontario was $4.45; in 1878, $3.85; in 1879, $3.04; in 1881, $4.25—that is just 20 cents lower for coal per ton in 1881, in Ontario, than was paid in 1877. This is in one sense a dark subject, but it is capable of illumination and it is possible that the hon. gentlemen opposite may get their dark understanding—politically—illuminated through its instrumentality. In Quebec the price of coal in 1877 was $4.00 per ton, in 1878, $3.15 per ton, in 1880, $2.65; in 1881, $3.75, or 25c. a ton lower than in 1877. But it is pretty clear it could not be the National Policy, else coal would have been higher in 1881 or at least as high as it was in 1877 when we had the National Policy. In Nova Scotia the cost of coal was, in 1877, $3.74; in 1878, $2.93; in 1880, $2.58; in 1881, $3.70, or a difference this year of 4 cts. in favor of 1881. In New Brunswick, the prices for the same years were $4.00, $3.46, $2.81 and $3.70. I think the hon. Minister of Railways will not be found to be so extravagant or so far out of the way in the declaration he made the other day in regard to the cost of coal, saying that Ontario had obtained coal quite as cheaply under the National Policy as it would have without it.

An hon. MEMBER. How about the hon. Minister of Finance?

Mr. LONGLEY. I do not think the statements of the hon. Minister of Finance, either as to the effect of the National Policy or the coal industry are often questioned in this House.

An hon. MEMBER. The hon. Minister of Railways questioned them.

Mr. LONGLEY. The difference between those hon. gentlemen is narrowed down to about this: that it is not conceded to be so much for the interest of the Opposition to disparage statements made by the hon. Finance Minister as statements made by the hon. Minister of Railways. But it comes to just the same thing, because the Opposition have been so little able to fasten any misstatement or untruth on one hon. member as well as on the other, although I have heard from day to day intimations made in regard to one of those hon. gentlemen that he was extravagant and exceeded the bounds of fact and so on; but I am not aware that either in this chamber or out of it anyone has ever been able to establish any misstatement against him, notwithstanding that he has offered in many instances, at all events more than once, to place a sum of money in the hands of any disinterested person as a forfeit if able to convict him of the slightest departure from truth and accuracy; yet hon. gentlemen talk about those various transactions as if the charges had been proved. Well you may say, in reference to this, and as the big Scotchman said about the beating his wife used to give him: "It pleases her and does not hurt me"; and if those hon. gentlemen opposite derive amusement and gratification from the iteration and reiteration of statements which they never have had the ability to prove, let them continue the operation. I do not know but what the Minister of Railways will profit more by the operation than if those gentlemen ceased to practise it. I repeat that from 1867 to 1873 the banking capital of the Dominion doubled, as did the Savings Banks deposits, and the trade of the country expanded to $86,000,000. The shipping increased, and every industry and interest seemed to thrive during that period, notwithstanding that the Treasury was subjected to extraordinary exactions. During that period several of the Provinces were incorporated into the Union, including British Columbia; expenses of the Fenian invasion, and various unexpected and unusual expenditures were incurred. Notwithstanding all that, the revenue showed a buoyancy and productiveness never witnessed before, but probably rivalled by its buoyancy during the last year.

Mr. ROSS. The balance of trade was against us.

Mr. LONGLEY. It was from 1873 to 1878, but not half so much during the time of the Conservative Government as under the regime of the friends of the hon. member for Middlesex. I wish now to refer to a subject a little outside the range of my argument for which I claim the indulgence of the House a few minutes longer. I now refer to a discussion which took place not long ago, and to the invidious comparison and criticisms instituted in regard to the President of the Council, and the relations he sustains to the hon. Minister of Railways. Reference was made to a period long past when the President of the Council used severe language in regard to the hon. Minister of Railways. I think after what was said by the Globe in reference to several members of the Mackenzie Administration, that a little discrepancy, or difference in severe language that may have passed the lips of the President of the Council in regard to the hon. Minister of Railways, would scarcely be worth mentioning. But I think I can give a pretty good explanation in a very few words in regard to the matter. The difficulty all grew out of the fact that the Minister of Railways was able to take the wind out of the sails of the Local Government of the day, in a way they did not dream of. The Pictou Railway was let in nine or ten contracts, being 52 miles in extent. One after another the contractors broke down because the prices they received were insufficient to enable them to go on. Finally the engineer resigned his position. Another engineer of considerable eminence was appointed to take his place, and an estimate was made of the cost of completing the road, and Mr. Fleming became the contractor at a sum below the estimate made by the new engineer. When the new contractor took that work several thousand dollars below what the second engineer estimated it at, the Opposition thought they had reasonable grounds of attacking the Government. However, not a single successful assault was made, and out of a House of 55, when a vote came to be taken, there was a majority of 25 to sustain the Government. Although there were intimations of improper action on the part of the Government made by the leader of the Opposition, when he had time to cool down he volunteered to say that he never suspected the Minister of Railways of having derived one dollar's advantage from that transaction. Although it has been repeatedly asserted that he did, nobody has ever been able to furnish a tittle of proof that such was the case. One word with regard to the future; it is full of promise. The condition of the country ought to make us the envy of our neighbours. The industries of the country are in a flourishing condition, but that is not the best of it. The Government, in view of the splendid financial condition in which they found themselves, came down to the House with a proposition to remodel the Tariff in such a direction that there will be a remission of taxation to the people of this Dominion of $1,500,000, or $1,750,000. In addition to this they have voted $150,000 to the fishermen. I have been assured that the good things which are sure to follow, are too numerous to mention. I have this to say, that whether in regard to the fiscal policy of the Government or whether in regard to the finances or the industries of the country or the public works of Canada, which practically embrace all matters of large import,—you find matters in an equally satisfactory condition. I am satisfied that if the Government had occasion to appeal to the electors of this broad Dominion to-morrow they would not be guided by a majority of 80 such as they had in 1878, but of 95 or 100 such, as I think, they will have when they next come to appeal to the electors of the Dominion.

Mr. RYKERT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 4.25 o'clock, a.m., Wednesday) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 103) to incorporate the Qu'Appelle Land Company.—(Mr. Boulton.)

Bill (No. 104) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents, certain powers for the relief of John Dickenson Brunton.—(Mr. Ryan, Montreal.)

Bill (No. 105) to amend the charter of the Fellow's Medical Manufacturing Company.—(Mr. Gault.)

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DREW moved that the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills, and presenting Private Bills, be extended to Saturday the 1st day of April next.

Motion agreed to.

PATENT ACT (1872) AMENDMENT.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria), in moving for leave to introduce Bill (No. 106) to further amend the Patent Act of 1872, said: The amendment is simply to give to the Commissioner of Patents the same discretion, in reference to extending the time for importing articles covered by patent, that he now has in reference to extending the time for manufacturing. It has been discussed, I believe, by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, as well as by the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, and when the time comes for the second reading, of course it will be a more proper opportunity for further investigation in the matter.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I crave the indulgence of the House for the purpose of making a personal explanation. Yesterday, before I came into the House, having been detained some little time, I find an hon. member complained of something that appeared in one of the public newspapers. In looking at the Official Report, I find these words:

"I do not intend to submit, without remonstrance at least, to an imputation of improper motives on my conduct and language as a member of the House; either coming from an irresponsible newspaper correspondent in the gallery, or from any hon. member on the floor of the House, who may be responsible, either directly for his utterances in this House, or indirectly for what may appear in the newspaper under his control."

Then I find the hon. gentleman went on to say:

"I regret that I do not see in his place in the House at present an hon. member who is supposed to have some control over the utterances of this newspaper, but I would venture to say that, if he is not prepared to make a statement on the floor of the House of that kind that is in this newspaper, neither let [should] it appear in the form of a communication from the irresponsible gallery correspondent under his control."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the hon. gentleman did not do what parliamentary practice would indicate he should have done—that when he intended to make a personal reference to a member of the House, to have given him notice that he intended to do so, in order that he might be in his place. Had he done so it would have avoided the necessity of my making an explanation the second day. What I desire to say is this: that I have no control or connection in any form or shape with the parliamentary correspondence of that paper or any other paper in this country during a Session of Parliament. Since I have been a member of this House, I have studiously avoided all responsibility for what appears in the newspaper. I do not direct what appears in these communications, I do not dictate them, I do not suggest them, I do not see them before the matter leaves the House, and my only knowledge of what appears in the parliamentary correspondence of the Montreal Gazette is derived from a perusal of that paper when it reaches me by mail the following day. I desire to make this statement, simply for the purpose of putting myself right in relation to that matter. As to the matter itself, all I wish to say is, that I have no doubt that newspaper and that correspondent are both abundantly able to take care of themselves. I go further, and say that in view of the fact that this Bill would not be before the House, to-day, had it not been for the decision of the courts voiding the arrangement made between the North-Western Telegraph Company and the Montreal Telegraph Company; in view of the fact that it is here only because of the decision of a meeting held after that decision of the courts, I think we may fairly come to the conclusion that the paragraph which appeared in the paper did not warrant the strong language which was applied to it by the hon. gentleman who spoke yesterday.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). As my hon. friend has referred to me, I am quite willing to accept his disclaimer of any responsibility for anything that appears in the columns of the newspaper in question, or any other newspaper in Canada, so far as its parliamentary correspondence goes. I presume, however, that he has that responsibility that attaches to the position, I believe, he occupies of managing director of the company which publishes the newspaper.

Mr. WHITE. I may say that I am not the managing director.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I am misinformed as to the position my hon. friend occupies. But he will not go so far as to say that he has no connection with the newspaper. As to my not having given him notice of my intention of referring to the matter, all I have to say is, that I desired to take the earliest opportunity of referring to the matter; that I did refer to it yesterday as soon as it came to my knowledge, and I expected that, with the usual punctuality of attendance which distinguishes my hon. friend in being in his place in the House, from moment to moment, he would be here. If I had had an opportunity of giving him notice I should have done so. Of course he has availed himself now of the permission which has been given him to disclaim any responsibility for that paragraph, and I am quite content to accept his disclaimer. As to whether the individual in question who wrote it, though he may be quite prepared to take the responsibility, I do not think it is my business to go and seek him out, whoever he may be, or do more than call the attention of the House to the matter as I did yesterday. What I thought then I think still, that it was a most improper reference to the conduct of a member of the House, and a most unwarranted one so far as it imputes to me any intention or desire to mislead the House in the remarks I made. As to the statement that this Bill would not have been before the House but for the decision of the courts, I am not well advised whether that is the case or not. So far as the consolidation of other companies goes, I should think it was a very reasonable thing for them to do. Their Act at present, comprises at least a dozen Acts, extending over a period of from thirty to forty years, many of them contradictory and manifestly requiring consolidation. As to the clause that has been added that will be discussed when the proper time comes, and an opportunity will then be afforded my hon. friend, or anybody else who objects to the granting to this company the powers the Bill has granted to other companies, to state the reasons why they should not be so granted.

WHARF AT ST. MICHEL.

Mr. AMYOT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government this year, to grant aid to the municipality of St. Michel, in the county of Bellechasse, in respect of the repair and maintenance of the wharf on the River St. Lawrence in that municipality?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The matter has not yet been looked into by the Government. I have caused the papers relating to it to be put before me, and I will probably come to a decision next week.

RAILWAY INSPECTION FUND.

Mr. McCARTHY enquired, (1) Whether an annual rate has been fixed on by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, of the sum per mile payable by railway companies towards the fund called "The Railway Inspection Fund," pursuant to the Railway Act, Section 97. (2) How much has been paid into that fund; and the amount now to the credit thereof?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that no rate, I believe, has been fixed, and that, consequently, no amount has been received to the credit of the fund. I may be allowed to explain, at the same time, that the Railway Act contemplated the appointment of an officer for the discharge of the duty of inspection, but such an appointment has not been made. When a railway requires to be inspected, an engineer or some other officer is detailed from the Department. Consequently the expense has been very trifling.

THE BOUNTY TO FISHERMEN.

Mr. GILLIES enquired, Is it the intention of the Government that licensed fresh water fishermen, operating on the lakes, shall participate equally with the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces in the sum of $150,000 to be voted as a bounty for the encouragement of those who follow that calling?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I may say to the hon. member, as I said to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith), that, when the vote is asked, the fullest particulars will be given as to the mode in which it is proposed to appropriate it.

MAIL SERVICE IN BRUCE COUNTY.

Mr. GILLIES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates this Session, for the purpose of bearing the expenses of an evening mail service, by Great Western Railway, from Walkerton to Paisley, Port Elgin and Southampton, the same as at present enjoyed by Walkerton?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The matter referred to in the question is now engaging the attention of the Post Office Department.

Mr. GILLIES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the current year, to give a daily mail service between Warton and Lion's Head, in the Saugeen Peninsula?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have to answer this question in the same terms as the previous one asked by the hon. gentleman.

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that Government business shall have precedence on Thursdays during the remainder of the Session.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF PICKLED HERRING.

Mr. FORTIN moved for copy of letters, reports or other papers relating to the importation into Canada of pickled herring, in barrels or half barrels, or of other kinds of fish from Newfoundland or the Labrador Coast, and the inspection of such fish in Newfoundland or elsewhere, and the stamping of the barrels or half barrels containing the same, by the Inspector of fish and fish oils in Canada, with their inspection brands. He said: Before the year 1873 the inspection of fish and fish oils was not compulsory; but there was a fish and fish oil Inspection Law for Lower Canada and a similar one for Upper Canada. The Maritime Provinces had also a fish and fish oil Inspection Act. In 1873, a general Act was passed for the whole Dominion, making the inspection of fish and fish oil compulsory, and in the year 1874 an Act was passed to make better provision for such inspection, most of the Act being the same as the first one. But there was added a clause with reference to Newfoundland herring, which seems very strange to any one acquainted with the fish trade of this country. I was not in Parliament at the time or I would have opposed it. This clause allows the herring taken in Newfoundland by Newfoundland fishermen to be inspected by their own inspectors and to be entered into Canada free of inspection. Our inspectors, instead of inspecting these in the same way as Canadian fish are inspected by law, are simply obliged to put a brand on the barrels on the payment of only 2 cents per barrel.

Now, I have papers in my possession which prove what I say. I will first read extracts from letters I have received from an overseer of fisheries, who lives on the Labrador Coast, at Bonne Esperance, in Canada, and who has seen both Canadian and Newfoundland fishermen at work:

"BONNE ESPERANCE,
"LABRADOR, 9th February, 1880.

"DEAR SIR,—I see in the Chronicle, received yesterday, a notice of a letter written by you to the Government, on the subject of fish inspection.

"Fishermen will be very thankful, if you would bring this to light.

"We labor under great disadvantages, and cannot compete with Newfoundlanders, who send their fish to Montreal and Quebec, while we, who have to pay duties, etc., have to pay heavy fees to incompetent fish inspectors to enable us to sell fish in our own markets.

"My neighbor, Capt. Joy, is an inspector, (every Newfoundland captain, who chooses, can be appointed).

"We take herring, it may be from the same seine. He simply brands his name on his barrels; they pass into Canada free (2 cents inspection fee), while we poor Canadians have to submit to see our fish turned out on the wharf, and have to pay 50 cents per barrel on an average.

"If some relief cannot be had, by placing the fishermen of both countries on the same footing in some way, we shall have to sell our fish to Newfoundlanders, who, by simply placing their names on the barrels, can pass them through Canada to the west or other markets.

"I do not object to fish inspection, but, in my opinion, it should be made to apply to all fish from Newfoundland as well as Canada, or else be made optional.

"WM. H. WHITELEY."

"BONNE ESPERANCE, 14th October, 1880.

"DEAR SIR,—I received your letter of 20th August, and was glad to hear from you. As regards your enquiries about Capt. Joy:

"He comes every season, in June, to Salmon Bay, and carries on the cod and herring fisheries. He is appointed an inspector by the Newfoundland Government, and when he gets herring, inspects them, and ships them to Quebec or Montreal.

"In the event of any other fisherman having herring to ship, either to Canada or Newfoundland, all he has to do is to borrow Capt. Joy's stencil plates, and use them on his barrels. Salmon, of course, Capt. Joy has to leave to the tender mercies of the Canadian inspector, also oils.

"I think it very unjust to the Canadian fisherman, to be forced to pay an average charge of 50 cents, while herring are landed, it may be from the same vessel and sold to same parties, which only pay the nominal fee of 2 cents, because they belong to some Newfoundland concern. * * *

WM. H. WHITELEY.

"ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND, January 22nd, 1882.

"DEAR SIR,—

"Newfoundlanders possess an advantage over Canadian fishermen in being able, by branding their name on their barrels, to get their herring into Canada without any inspection fee, a tax which all Canadian fishermen have to pay. Wherever they catch their fish they may, and they do sometimes, take them from the same seine, bring them in the same vessel to Quebec or Montreal, then the Newfoundland brand is rolled away with a nominal charge of two or three cents per barrel, while the Canadian must pay, on an average, 50 cents per barrel for the same herring. Any Newfoundland, on application to his supplying merchant, can be appointed inspector, and every man who carries on fishery on any large scale can do so, and is an inspector. It is a curious state of things, but it is so.

"WM. H. WHITELEY."

Now, let me tell this House how this imposition is carried on. I have a list of all the fishery inspectors of Newfoundland for the year 1880, from which it appears that there are no less than 127. This confirms what Mr. Whiteley says—that every fisherman from that colony who wants to be a fishery inspector has only to apply to the merchant who supplies him, and he becomes inspector of his own fish. Not only is this so in their own country, but many hundreds of Newfoundlanders come and fish on the coasts of Canada, cure and pack their fish there, brand them, and then take them to Quebec or Montreal to sell, which he can do by paying only two cents of inspection fee; while the Canadian fisherman, if he does not get his fish inspected according to law, and for which he pays from 20 to 25 cents a barrel, is liable to have his fish seized. I say it is not fair play. In this a list of the charges paid by Canadian fishermen for the inspection of herring is given, and I will read it to the House. It is as follows:—

1876, Caprain F. Lachance, 350 bbls.....	$ 70
1876, Lachance & Dugal, 460 bbls.....	92
1876, Michaud Coulombe, 200 bbls.....	40
1877, Leblanc, 300 bbls.....	60
1877, Michaud Coulombe, 250 bbls.....	50
1877, P. Landry, 300.....	60

I need not read the whole list, but I may say that, in 1878, 1879, and 1880, parties from Quebec who had gone along the shores of the Gulf to fish for herring, and brought herring to Quebec, had to pay from 20 to 25 cents per barrel for inspection fees. Here is the record of Captain Kennedy, who paid $100 for the inspection of fish on board his vessel. I will show the House what a bounty, so to speak, is given to the Newfoundland fishermen to bring into Canada their fish and destroy the trade of our fishermen. I have been investigating the subject for two years, because I knew when I came to bring the subject before the House I would have to give the true figures. You might believe that the Government of Newfoundland is very liberal in its dealings with this country. Well, let us see, many hon. members and many fishermen will remember the time when the Newfoundland Government, not only charged light dues to Canadian vessels on the coast where the Government of Canada had built lighthouses and maintained them, but they charged them double the price paid by Newfoundland vessels. Not only so, but here is what a fisherman that went into a Newfoundland port for the purpose of legitimate trading was called upon to pay. This is an account signed by J. P. Kearney, a sub-collector of Labrador on the Newfoundland coast. For 300 empty barrels he was charged $35, being 20 per cent. duty on empty barrels. Remember that the vessel never landed any of those articles, but went into the port to get a load of fish, by changing those articles with the fishermen on shore. Other items are: Salt, $2; flour, $4; tea, $2.50; soap, 26 cents; tobacco, $8.40; and other items, bringing the amount up to $74.52; adding 15 per cent., there is a total of $85.70. Here is a Canadian trader going to the Newfoundland coast, and he is made to pay on a small cargo $85, while Newfoundland fishermen bring their fish—sometimes taken on our coast, and branded by our officers—into Quebec and Montreal, and are charged only 2 cents; while our fishermen have to pay from 20 to 25 cents. I will now give a statement of the herring inspected in Quebec and Montreal, first Newfoundland herring, and second Canadian herring; I will also show what each paid, and what a bonus is given, in a certain way, to Newfoundland fishermen to keep the trade from Canadians. Of Newfoundland herring there were inspected in Quebec, in 1875, 5,648 barrels; 1876, 4,227 barrels; 1877, 5,262 barrels; 1878, 1,119; 1879, 1,803. In Montreal there were inspected in 1875, 37,687; 1876, 19,526; 1877, 24,831; 1878, 14,791; 1879, 11,380; making, with the half-barrels of Newfoundland herring, in 1875, 44,700; 1876, 24,892; 1877, 32,625; 1878, 16,728; 1879, 13,818; total, 132,764. Formerly the herring fishery and trade were very productive in Lower Canada, but when the Newfoundlanders were allowed to bring in their fish for 2 cents inspection fee, while Canadians have to pay 20 or 25 cents, the table is turned, and many of our capitalists had to abandon the business, and the trade went into the hands of other fishermen. For that reason less herring is now brought into Canada by Canadian fishermen than by Newfoundland fishermen. The herring brought by Canadian fishermen into Quebec, from the Maritime Provinces as well as from the Gulf, but principally from the Province of Quebec, amounted as follows: 1875, 18,087; 1876, 5,579; 1877, 12,537; 1878, 2,465; 1879, 1,649 barrels. Only a small quantity went to Montreal. If Newfoundland herring had paid the same inspection fee as our fishermen are compelled to pay, the amount would have reached the sum of $26,552.80. But as they were charged only 2 cents, they only paid $2,665.28. The herring taken by Canadian fishermen, which was only 40,317 barrels, compared to the 132,764 barrels from Newfoundland, paid $8,023, which shows that 40,317 barrels of Canadian fish paid, as inspection fees, over $8,000, while those 132,000 barrels from Newfoundland paid only $2,655, giving a bounty of $23,000 to the fishermen of Newfoundland to bring their fish into the country and destroy the trade of Canada. I have given the figures and a statement for five years, made up by myself, and which I believe correct. Now, I think I have made out a case for the attention of the Government, who, I hope, will look into the matter, and give our fishermen redress for the injustice committed against them the last few years. Our fishermen are not so rich, or do not make enough money to enable them to stand that treatment. On the contrary, they ought to be treated as favorably as possible by the Government and the country. Those Newfoundland inspectors inspect fish even in Quebec. Sometimes they come to that port with fish taken off the coasts of Canada—perhaps by Canadian seines and with the help of Canadian fishermen—they come to Quebec boldly on their muscle, and sometimes find some of their barrels not branded, when they brand them there, and the fish receives the inspection brand from our own fish inspectors for a 2 cents fee only without having been inspected; it then enters and passes as if inspected by Canadian inspectors, and sells as high as our own fish. I do hope the Government will put an end to this injustice.

Mr. KILLAM. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Gaspé is fully informed on the subject on which he has addressed the House; and I regret that during his able speech, it has been difficult where I sit, opposite, to catch the facts and figures he has presented, and that he, perhaps, has not received the attention from the Government that the subject deserves. I do not intend to make any lengthened remarks on the subject; but I should like, for a few moments, to receive the attention of the hon. member of the Government, under whose Department this matter comes, because the subject is one of great importance, and worthy, at least, of some attention. I had myself grave doubts, when the Inspection Act passed, whether the system of compulsory inspection could be properly applied; and whether it was likely to be a success, and I consented to it only under reservation. My experience of it, up to this time, is that it has not been a success. In the first place, it has not been generally applied in the country; in the second place, where it has been applied, it has been applied in such a way as not to secure the object expected. The character of our fish in the foreign market and its price depends, not upon the character given to the fish by the brand of the Canadian inspector, but upon the quality of the fish as shown by foreign inspection. Without touching particularly upon the points advanced by the hon. member for Gaspé, I wish to refer to something which comes more particularly under the head of the fisheries of our own coast, with which I am more conversant. The hon. member himself will remember that, in the consideration of the Inspection Act, the question of the inspection fee upon imports from Newfoundland was taken up principally with regard to the Halifax market, which receives fish from Newfoundland, and re-exporting it to the West Indies. I suppose a branch of this subject which does not come so much within the Quebec and Montreal trade as within the Halifax line. But beside that, we are placed in this position: fish caught in one county are inspected; in the next county, no inspector has been appointed. I have not been enabled to learn that the inspected fish ever received any higher award in the markets than those uninspected in such counties. Beyond that, we have a large spring mackerel fishery on our Nova Scotia shore. It is a catch of what we may call spring mackerel, fish not commonly used in this country, but which are exported to warmer countries and sold at a fair price, and in which a very large business is done. This fishery along our shores employs a large number of fishermen, particularly in the counties of the west end of Nova Scotia. I am not myself prepared to point out or trace the course the mackerel take on the maritime coast towards the Bay of Chaleurs. We know that immense shoals of mackerel pass the shores of Nova Scotia in the spring. They become gradually larger and fatter fish, and perhaps more valuable as they reach the Gulf. But at the same time the quality of fish caught along the western end of Nova Scotia, and along the eastern shores of the United States, are valuable for a certain market, and a large amount of money is invested in the catch. The Inspection Law towards the fishermen who are employed in this business works in this way—at least I know it works in this way in my own locality. The fish are caught in traps, sometimes 200 or 300 barrels in a catch. They are taken up, split, dressed and put into barrels, green, perhaps the next day, with just a slight proportion of salt, enough to preserve them for a few days, and sent to the American market, the proper market for fish. It is impossible, as my hon. friend probably knows very well, to cure these fish in that time, so that in an ordinary mackerel barrel 200 pounds could be put. They have to be thrown in, as it were, and headed up, sometimes in a slipshod way, but just cured sufficiently to enable them to reach the Boston market in good condition. There the fish are weighed, sorted and repacked, and perhaps, in five or six days after the fish are taken from the water, they are sold in the south western States. What does the fish inspector do? Of course the result of the matter is—I am not laying any blame upon the inspector—but the result of the system is that the inspector takes from the fishermen 10 cents a barrel for letting his fish go out of the country, contrary to law. It simply annoys the fisherman without doing him any good. I am instancing this one case out of a number I might give, to show the bearing of the compulsory Inspection Law. I wish particularly to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to this matter. I hope he will take the matter into his consideration, and if he does so, I am sure we will have the practical help of the hon. member for Gaspé—in order to remedy the evils complained of, and which exist in the inspection system all round the coast of the Dominion.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. I am sure the facts brought to the attention of the House by the hon. gentleman, will receive the careful consideration of the Government. There exists indeed an apparent monopoly on fish coming from Newfoundland, and passing without inspection. There may be many reasons for that. My hon. friend knows very well that some business houses or companies have so good a reputation that their produce is always received without inspection. For instance, I know of some firms on the Gaspé sea coast, whose dry fish are so good and command such a price that, when exported into Great Britain, they are received without inspection, although inspection is compulsory and very severe on other fish. In two particular cases the attention of the Government has already been drawn to that monopoly, though it is really trifling. There may be sufficient reason for bringing this subject to the attention of the Government, and especially to the Minister immediately concerned.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). This is a matter of considerable importance to my own county particularly. Last year, on a motion, I brought this to the attention of the acting Minister of Marine, and he promised to give it some consideration, but no notice has been taken of it. As has been stated by the hon. member for Yarmouth, the mackerel fishery was seriously affected by the Inspection Law. It is carried on in the early part of the season, usually lasting from five to six weeks. In my own county thousands of barrels of mackerel are annually caught and sent into the American market. It is only within the last year that any attempt has been made to carry out the Inspection Law in that county. I know that in one case a charge was made against the Deputy Inspector, and I was requested to bring it to the attention of the Government to the effect that he had, in a wholesale manner, inspected a large quantity of mackerel. The fact is that the inspection, as now enforced in that county, is of no value whatever to the packers. They are called upon to pay 10 cents a barrel for an inspection that is of no value in the Boston market. The local brand, of some packers, has more weight with the Boston purchasers. Almost all the mackerel sent out of the county of Shelburne, are taken into the Boston market, where they have to be reinspected by the Boston inspectors before sale in that market. I trust the Government will enquire into this matter, and remedy a great injustice to that branch of our fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

PROVINCIAL RAILWAYS.

Mr. BLAKE. I observe by the public press that a resolution has been passed by the Order in Council on the subject referred to in the motion I am about to move, accompanied with a request that it should be transmitted to His Excellency the Governor General, for the purpose of submission to this Parliament. I therefore move for a copy of any resolution of any Provincial Legislative body transmitted to His Excellency on the subject of the exercise by the Parliament of Canada of the power to declare provincial railways to be for the general advantage of Canada, and of any correspondence in connection with any such resolution.

Motion agreed to.

LAND SOLD TO THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a statement of the total quantity of land agreed to be sold by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the total price agreed to be paid therefor during each month up to the 1st day of March, 1882, distinguishing between the sales of farming lands and those of town, village or station lots, wood land, mineral, quarry lands, and other special sales, and including the quantities and prices realized for lands in which the company became interested by agreements in connection with the location of stations. He said: I observe that large sales are said to be made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of the lands which they have received and are to receive under their contract, and that very considerable sales have been made of special lots as well as agricultural lots. It is, of course, important to know from time to time the progress of these operations. We are interested in the transactions as to the sales of land in view of the regulations and arrangements as to tolls and traffic, as well as to the other questions which arise under the contract, and may observe that it is important to learn the prices realized for lands in which the Company becomes interested by agreements in connection with the location of stations. If I am rightly informed, a sum not far from $1,000,000 has been paid either by actual receipts or by agreements for sale in connection with station lands, and it is expected, under the operation of the contract and of the administration of Dominion lands, that very large sums will be made on the lands through the prairie country generally, not merely with respect to lands which the Company itself owns, but also with respect to Dominion lands on the alternate sections which adjoin station grounds. This is a subject of no insignificant importance. My own belief is—I have a notice on the paper on the subject, but I mention this as relevant to the motion—that unless the system be changed the whole advantage due to the enhanced value of the Dominion lands around the stations to be fixed on the Canadian Pacific Railway, will go to the Company instead of the public, and that a very large sum indeed, will be realized from station lands—a sum which by itself will go very far to construct the railway over the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In the absence of the hon. Minister of the Interior, I may say that there will be no objection to the motion, and that all the information which has been asked for, so far as it is in the possession of the Government, will be brought down, and any information which is not in the possession of the Government we will endeavor to obtain.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT ON COURTNEY RIVER, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUNSTER moved for Dominion Agent's report on Courtney River, in Comox District; also, to state which was the lowest tender for the clearing of said river. He said: I ask for these papers in the interest of a very thriving settlement, who consider that they have been greatly abused by not having this river attended to. It would shorten the distance they would have to come to market, by about seven miles, and allow the farmers of the district to make three or four trips a day instead of making one trip, as at present, and that over a very bad road. As I understand it, the Dominion Government are obliged to keep all navigable rivers open. A few years ago this river was navigable for vessels drawing as much as twelve feet, but from the falling in of trees and the carelessness of lumbermen it has been allowed to become obstructed. A sum has been placed in the Estimates year after year for the purpose of clearing it out, but it has not been expended. I believe a Dominion Agent was sent by the hon. the Minister of Public Works to report on the matter, but I consider that he did not do his duty, as if he had advertised for tenders the sum which was placed in the Estimates, and the contributions of settlers, together, would have made the river navigable. The matter is also of importance because the river is one which will contribute to the wealth of the Dominion by its salmon fisheries.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The papers will be brought down, and when they are brought down the hon. gentleman will see that, if a discussion is to take place, it had better take place when the vote for the estimate is considered.

Motion agreed to.

EXPENDITURE ON COWICHAN RIVER, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUNSTER moved for a copy of all statements showing, in detail, the money expended on Cowichan River, and surveyor's report as to whether the said river was completed as per contract, and how much money was paid out of the sum voted for its improvement. He said: This is a motion which I should probably have made last year or the year before. The late Government granted a sum of money for the purpose of clearing out this river—a sum something like $1,500. I never could get full details on the subject so as to satisfy my constituents as to how the money was expended, but, one thing is certain, the river never was properly cleared out. The river leads to a large lake, twenty miles long by ten or fifteen wide, and opens up a large tract for settlement. When this river is cleared out, it will open up a section of country which will contribute a great deal more to the revenue of the country than the Government will have to spend in performing the work. It is declared a navigable river, and, therefore, it is the duty of the Dominion Government to have it cleared out.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE OF MANITOBA.

Mr. SCHULTZ moved the reading of the journals of this House on Monday, March 7th, 1881, so far as the same relate to the petition of Henry J. Clark, Q.C., and others, of Winnipeg, Province of Manitoba, setting forth certain charges against the Honorable Edmund Burk Wood, Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench for the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not observe that the hon. gentleman who has made this motion has followed it up with a notice of any motion proposing to take any further step upon the reading of the petition, nor do I conceive—subject to your decision, Mr. Speaker—that it would be competent for him to take any further step without giving notice. We are dealing with a very grave question, a question involving the mode in which a Judge shall be dealt with. We have had two instances in the history of this Parliament—one during the former reign of hon. gentlemen opposite, and one when the hon. member for Lambton was in power—in which this question came up, and a certain course of procedure was established in regard to it. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether they have considered the propriety of allowing the reading of this petition to take place, unless it be accompanied with some further step.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not had my attention called especially to the practice, and I cannot say whether this is an improper motion or not. Of course, we have to proceed with great circumspection in any charge brought before the House in respect to the position of a Judge; we must not allow any technical objection to prevent substantial justice being exercised towards him. I am not aware whether my hon. friend who makes this motion is prepared to make a further motion just now, or whether, if he is prepared to make that motion, he could do so without having given notice.

Mr. BLAKE. I submitted that point to Mr. Speaker, and I understood Mr. Speaker to assert that no such motion could be made without motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it would be unfortunate in the interests of justice that there should be any error in proceeding against a Judge, and therefore I would ask my hon. friend to allow his motion to stand over, in order that he may give notice of any motion which he may intend to make after the reading of the journals.

Mr. SCHULTZ. It was my intention to follow the adoption of this motion with a motion for a Committee; but in view of the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the Government, I am willing that the present motion should stand.

Mr. MILLS. Before the order is disposed of, I would ask whether the Government have not received a reply to this petition, and whether that ought not to be laid before Parliament, before any further action is taken.

Mr. BLAKE. That is one of the addresses which have been passed, but to which as yet no answer has been received.

Motion allowed to stand.

DAMAGES ALONG THE GRAND RIVER.

Mr. McCALLUM, in moving for copies of all reports made by James Cowan, Esq., Dominion Arbitrator, on the claims of the inhabitants for damages sustained along the Grand River, on the upper level of the Welland, by the rising of the water for canal purposes, said: I make this motion in order to draw the attention of the Government to the great injustice which has been done to the people I have the honor to represent. The late Government, in 1874, considered it expedient to raise the dam across the Grand River, in order to supply the Welland Canal with water for navigation, as well as for manufacturing purposes. In consequence of that action, lands along the Welland Canal and the Grand River were submerged, the barns and houses of the inhabitants in some instances being washed away. I called the attention of the Mackenzie Government to the matter, and they appointed arbitrators to look into these claims. I moved for the instructions given to the valutors, but they were not in the Department, and I believe no instructions were given to them. Only one class of damage is covered; that is the land submerged. They did not take any account of the lands washed away by the action of the water, and if they had any instructions as to that matter, they must have been verbal instructions. They undertook to do justice to the people by taking receipts in full as well for the damage created by the washing away of the banks as well as by the lands being submerged. I cannot do better than read one of the receipts presented to a gentleman who suffered damage. He was offered a small sum of money as damages for his land having been submerged, and for having had part of his farm washed away by the action of the water, and they wanted to take his receipt in full, including damages sustained from the washing away of the banks. The receipt reads as follows:—

Know all men by these presents, that I, David Reid, of the township of North Cayuga, in the county of Haldimand, in the Province of Ontario, farmer, in consideration of the sum of $115, to me in hand paid by Her Majesty the Queen, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have released and forever discharged, and hereby for myself, my heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, do release and forever discharge Her Majesty the Queen, her heirs and successors, of and from all claim or claims which I now have or may hereafter have against Her Majesty, her heirs and successors for all damages which I have or may hereafter sustain or suffer, by reason of my land, situate on the Grand River, being overflowed or submerged by the waters of the said Grand River, said overflowing or submerging being caused by the addition made to the height of the dam at Dunnville, which said land so overflowed or submerged, may be described as follows, that is to say the south part of lot six in the third concession of the township of North Cayuga, also the south part of seven in the third concession of the township of North Cayuga. This discharge to cover all damage arising from wash of banks or in any other way by reason of said addition.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this day of October, A.D., 1877.

Signed, sealed and delivered in } duplicate, in presence of }

It appears it was the intention to pay the property holders only for the land submerged, but the valutors added these words in writing:

"This discharge to cover all damage arising from wash of banks, or in any other way by reason of said addition."

This receipt I find is dated October, 1877. The gentleman referred to refused to take the amount of money offered. The valuator of that day threatened him with law, or, in other words, gave him notice that if he did not accept this small sum for the damages done him, the matter would be referred to the Arbitrators of the Dominion. When the late Government was in power, I called their attention to this matter, but, from that day to this, the gentleman has not obtained redress. I now call upon the Government to remedy this grievance; of course, the damages took place when the Government of the hon. member for Lambton was in power, but it is about time it should be settled. I will read the notice which the valutors gave to the inhabitants, setting forth that if they did not agree to accept the small sum mentioned, the matter would be referred to arbitration. The notice reads as follows:—

We, Archibald Livingston and James F. Lister, valutors duly appointed on behalf of the Dominion Government, do hereby, on behalf of the Minister of Public Works for the Dominion of Canada, give you notice that we do hereby, on behalf of the said Minister of Public Works, tender you the sum of $20 in full satisfaction of all damages which you have or may hereafter sustain by reason of the washing, overflowing or submerging of your land, being the south part of lot six, in the third concession of the township of North Cayuga, by the waters of the Grand River; also the sum of $95 in full satisfaction of all damages which you have or may hereafter sustain by reason of the washing, overflowing or submerging of your land, being south part of lot number seven in the third concession of the township of North Cayuga, by the waters of the Grand River, and that we consider the said sums of $20 and $95 respectively to be reasonable compensation in the premises, and further, that the question as to the amount of the said damages will be referred to the arbitrators duly appointed under the Act in that behalf unless you accept the said sum of money within ten days after the service of this notice upon you.

Dated this 26th day of September, A.D., 1877.

A. LIVINGSTON,
J. F. LISTER,
Valutors.

DAVID REID, township of South Cayuga.

This gentleman has not obtained redress yet, and I call upon the hon. the Minister of Railways to look into this matter. I suggest that he should send a valuator at once and remedy the grievances, which could be done without the expenditure of much money. I understand there is a report by Mr. Cowan, one of the Dominion Arbitrators, in the possession of the Department of Railways and Canals on this subject, and I therefore move that it be brought down.

RETIRING ALLOWANCES OR SUPERANNUATIONS

Mr. KAULBACH, in moving for a return showing the sum total paid each year by the Government for all allowances or compensations granted as retiring allowances or superannuations, in all services, from the 30th June, 1873, to the 30th June, 1881; also, for a similar return of all moneys paid by the Government as pensions, said: The system of superannuations is looked upon by many with much disfavor, and is a theme worthy of being carefully considered and discussed, in order that this House and the country may be better satisfied than at present, that the system should be still continued. With a reckless, unscrupulous and extravagant Government—which, I am happy to say, we are not having at the present, but under the wise and careful management of our right hon. and respected leader, a prudent and economical one—the door is opened widely for much favoritism and corruption, which, without it, could not exist. This House is aware that the impression prevails abroad that in numberless instances under other Governments, officials have been dismissed from office, rather superannuated or pensioned—more properly speaking, "shelved"—well qualified to discharge the duties required of them, and others are planted virtually less capable of filling the position than their predecessors. Yet, in order to give the party position and influence, resort is very frequently had to this unfortunate privilege for unfair practice. Now, can any one tell me what benefit is derived from this system other than a personal interest of the staff of employes? Does the widow of the pensioned, after his decease, receive any benefit from this system? I will answer—No, not in any way. The poor widow and fatherless children have to battle their way through this hard, cold world, the best they can, without a dollar of aid from this service. Then I ask why cherish the system any longer? I have a great respect for old age, and would be the last to discard an official, or recommend his dismissal from office were he capable and willing to discharge the duties satisfactorily and well. But I think we can improve the present condition of things very considerably, and which I consider to be a step in the right direction, were we to discard the system entirely, except as respects those already on the lists as officials, who have been and still are contributors to the fund; and letting it be understood in future, that all parties taking office take it to perform the work simply for the salary it offers, as a doctor or a clergyman would accept his position, and if, through physical infirmity or advanced age, he becomes unequal to the work required of him, then to vacate the position and make room for others. Thus, by this open, fair, square system, officials would better understand their positions, and would feel satisfied to lay by, of their earnings each year, for a rainy day, by investment in the Government Savings' Bank, or any other security they may think proper, which would be a sort of sinking fund from which to derive a revenue when disabled through illness, or when the evening of their day arrives and their sun is well nigh set. Now, as the present system is unpopular, and by many considered often improperly made use of by Governments to serve private and party ends, a "behind the curtain scene," I would certainly recommend that some measure be adopted at an early day to block out an improvement.

THOMAS POTTS OF ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. ANGLIN moved for copies of all correspondence between Thomas Potts, of St. John, N.B., and the hon. the Finance Minister, the hon. the Postmaster General, and the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, or any officers in their Departments, regarding the destruction or abstraction of letters addressed to him from the Department of Agriculture. He said: Some years ago, Thomas Potts, of St. John, N.B., who had been for some time in the employ of the Government as an Immigration Agent in England, returned home, having been relieved from his position. He continued for some time expecting an appointment from the Government, and on December 3rd, 1880, he received a letter from the hon. the Finance Minister, informing him that the Minister of Agriculture had agreed to appoint him an Immigration Agent to the eastern States, but did not wish the fact made known until the appointment was made, as he would be deluged with applications. This intimation caused Potts to await quietly for some time a notification of his appointment. He, however, made preparations to accept the office and discharge his duties. He left his house, and, I suppose, disposed of some of his furniture, continuing to await the notification until the following March. On March the 3rd a letter was written to him, which he received some days after, informing him that an official letter was sent to him some time before appointing him Immigration Agent, but that nothing had been heard from him in reply. He received the letter in Fredericton, but telegraphed immediately to the Department that no official document had reached him, and that he would write. He did write, after calling on the Postmaster at St. John, who told him that no such letter had reached that office, or it would have been delivered to him. Mr. Potts then, on March 14th, received a letter written by Mr. Currier, in which he was informed that not only was a letter, dated 8th of January, written to him and mailed to his address, but two official letters were subsequently sent him.

Mr. POPE (Compton). That is wrong; there was only one official letter.

Mr. ANGLIN. Mr. Currier's letter reads:

"I am to inform you that an official letter was mailed to you on the 8th January last, and addressed St. John, N.B., and also to state that two official letters were subsequently sent you."

Mr. POPE. That is wrong.

Mr. ANGLIN. That is the statement of Mr. Currier, the Private Secretary of the Minister of Agriculture. Mr. Potts was, of course, surprised at this, and he immediately telegraphed to the Minister of Finance, informing him, at least, so he says, that he had not received those letters. He added that he was still awaiting instructions, and sincerely trusted that circumstances, over which he had no control, would not be allowed to inflict such an injury upon him as his deprivation of the office expected, to which letter

there was no reply. However, he continued to make further application on the subject. Mr. Currier again wrote to him on the 14th of March, 1881, as follows:—

"Mr. Pope desires to acknowledge your telegram of the 9th and letter of the same day, and, in reply, I am to inform you that an official letter was mailed you on the 8th of January last, addressed St. John, and also to state that two official letters were subsequently sent to you."

Again, Sir, Mr. Lowe writes in reply to another application:

"As respects our several communications, I may tell you that I wrote that official letter of 8th January, by the direction of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture."

And there is another thing. He says:

"The second letter referred to by you, dated March 3rd, was also intended to be signed by me. It was written by the shorthand writer, and I can very easily understand the accident of its having slipped in the mail without any signature."

He says that the three letters were written to Mr. Pope, and Mr. Pope then says that no reply was ever received to any of these letters. But Mr. Lowe writes:

"I could not tell you its precise date, the date of the last letter, but I did feel surprised at not getting an answer from you; and Mr. Pope spoke to me three or four times on the subject. It was in the early part of March that Mr. Pope sent Mr. Daley, the agent at Montreal, to do the duties which he had designed that you should do."

Mr. Potts, in one of the letters he did receive, was told that in consequence of the delay, the hon. the Minister of Agriculture found it necessary to appoint another person to the office that Mr. Potts was expected to have received, and that nothing could be done just then in his behalf. It does seem to be a very extraordinary thing that these three letters, all having the departmental and official marks upon them, should have been lost in transmission through the post office. He believes great injury was done to himself by the fact of those letters being somehow prevented from reaching him. He demanded an investigation in the matter, not only on his own behalf, but also on behalf of the public, for he naturally assumed that great injury was done to the public, if the Post Office Department was so administered that letters of that character could be abstracted or destroyed in transit. It was a remarkable presumption of a reasonable cause of complaint, and he applied to the Postmaster General of that time (Sir A. Campbell), making strong representations on the subject. Before he wrote to the Commissioner, he wrote again to the hon. the Minister of Finance, under date of the 15th of April. In that he takes strong ground. He says:

"I think that it will be universally conceded that no department of the public service can afford to condone crime, or pass lightly over offences in its subordinates which would consign private individuals to penal servitude."

He was strongly under the impression that there was a wilful or deliberate withholding or destruction of those three letters. Mr. Lowe's explanation in regard to that is that the letters were entrusted to Mr. Small, the accountant of the Department, and that Mr. Small stated, in the presence of the hon. the Minister of Finance, that he actually did mail those letters.

Mr. POPE. No; one of them.

Mr. ANGLIN. But that one, Mr. Potts asserts, never reached him. He made application again to Sir A. Campbell, demanding further investigation, and declaring that there must be one or other of the Departments utterly unworthy of public confidence. He was led to the conclusion that the letters were destroyed by some persons in the Department. He demanded a full and thorough enquiry. Some enquiry, it appears, was made, but Mr. White of the Department writes to him as follows:—

"I have the honor to inform you that full enquiry has been made for the missing letters, mailed at Ottawa, from the Department of Agriculture to your address at St. John, N.B., to which you refer in your communication of the 27th of March, but I regret to state that no intelligence of them has been received."

Mr. Potts thinks it very extraordinary that it is so utterly impossible to trace letters, and especially letters of this character, letters which naturally catch the eye of any person handling them, inasmuch as they had usually the official endorsement and departmental marks. He thinks that it is in the public interest that some further steps should be taken in this matter, to obtain a more thorough and searching investigation. He cannot believe it possible that, in any of the Departments of the Government of Canada, letters of this kind could be destroyed, and all trace of them lost. He uses strong language, and says that some parties render themselves liable to penal servitude. The hon. the Finance Minister then writes to him as follows:—

"Since my return to Ottawa, I have had personal communication with the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, and the officials of the Post Office Department, touching the investigation that has taken place referring to the non-delivery to you of letters written you by the officials of the Department of Agriculture. I regret that they have completely failed to trace the abstraction or destruction of the letters referred to, to any party in or out of the same. The case is a mysterious one I admit, and the operation has been so cleanly performed that I feel the guilty party will not be discovered. I do not know what further steps can be taken."

Well, Sir, it may be difficult to know what further steps can be taken; but I would like, by making this motion and asking for these papers, to stimulate the energies and perceptive powers of the hon. gentlemen, who as heads of those Departments, are responsible, not only to Mr. Potts, who has lost his situation, but also, I think they will admit, responsible to the public at large for the proper administration of affairs in their Departments. I therefore beg leave to move for copies of all correspondence between Thomas Potts, of St. John, N.B., and the hon. the Finance Minister, the hon. the Postmaster General, and the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, or any officers in their Departments, regarding the destruction or abstraction of letters addressed to him from the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. POPE. In the first place I would like to know what my hon. friend intends to do? What action is he going to take in this matter? So far as these letters are concerned, there was but one letter that was an official letter, the letter, I think, of the 8th of January. In the clearest manner possible he accused the office of my Department of making away with these letters. If men are going to do anything like a crime they usually have some motive for it. Why should these men make away with a letter that I had directed to be sent to this Mr. Potts? Mr. Potts had been agent in England for some time, he had applied for the agency again. At that time we were not sending travelling agents away, but we had decided to circulate in the New England States certain handbills and certain information regarding the North-West in order to induce people to go to the North-West from the New England States. This position I offered to Mr. Potts for four months. I leave it to the House whether it is at all likely that the gentlemen in my office had any interest that would induce them to make away with a letter of that kind. I ask if it is not unreasonable for the hon. gentleman to stand up there and talk about men who never thought of any crime, as if they had committed a crime. This is a crime which, if proved against him, would send him five years to penitentiary, and the hon. gentleman insinuates—though he does not say positively—that the crime was committed by a man who never had the slightest stain on his character. As to Mr. Potts, the best proof that he had no ground of complaint, was the fact that he was offered a better position and refused it, and it is not likely that he would have accepted an inferior one. It is my strong opinion that the letters were taken out of the post office at St. John, by some one else bearing Mr. Potts' name. I have the declaration of Mr. Lowe and Mr. Small, that they remembered mailing the letter; I believe the letter was mailed and that it was taken out of the post office, perhaps, by some one else bearing Mr. Potts' name.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture misunderstands me if he assumes that I make any charge against any officer in his Department. Nor does Mr. Pott himself make any charge with regard to these letters. He says that they miscarried; that they must have been abstracted or destroyed, and that therefore there must have been wrong doing, and that if so, the wrong-doer should be discovered and punished. He thinks it a most extraordinary thing that three letters, all relating to the same subject, and bearing the official stamp, and one that would be remarked should have been mislaid, and that no trace can be found of who is responsible in the matter. Whether Mr. Potts would or would not have accepted the situation I am not very able to say, but judging by the correspondence it seems to me that he was very anxious to obtain it. It was stated to him in the letter of the hon. the Finance Minister, of December 3rd what the position would be, and he says he made preparations to enter on the discharge of his duties whenever his notification should arrive. He waited for that notification, the hon. the Finance Minister telling him that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture did not wish him to make his appointment known, as, if known, it would rush on other applications. Now, if the whole case has not been fabricated for the purpose of making trouble, he was evidently willing to accept that position, though the hon. Minister thinks he was not. He has applied repeatedly to have a thorough investigation made. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture wants to know what I intend to do further. I may say as I said before, that one of my objects in making the motion was that, perhaps, I might stimulate the hon. gentleman himself a little, and the present hon. Postmaster General, as the persons most interested in maintaining the character of their Departments, to make some further and more thorough enquiry, in order, if possible, to discover how and by whom the letters were lost, or mislaid or destroyed. I confess that I cannot see very clearly what more I can do in the matter than I am now doing. Mr. Potts is a gentleman with whom the hon. the Minister of Agriculture was well acquainted. He served under him with entire acceptance, as the phrase goes, and has always, I believe, been regarded as a gentleman of very considerable intelligence and a great deal of energy, and a very useful public officer. Mr. Potts is well known in St. John, and it is not at all probable that any other gentleman of his name could have received all these letters. If he had received the other letters they would be an intimation to him that the third letter, which was official, had been sent, and would enable him at once to communicate with the Department, but that three letters, all bearing on this subject and all forwarded at various times, should be mislaid, is certainly, as the hon. the Finance Minister himself admits, a very mysterious affair. I hope a thorough investigation will be made. I may say that I have no personal interest in the matter. Mr. Potts simply requested me to bring it before the House as he thinks that the public have a right to know the way in which matters are done in the Departments of the Government. He thinks a great wrong has been done, and that it is a pitiable thing, an intolerable thing, that the Government of this country should have to confess that they are unable to provide a remedy for such a wrong.

Motion agreed to.

Bill (No. 113) to amend the Act incorporating "The Canadian Steam Users Insurance Association," and to change the name of the Company to "The Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada."—(Mr. Beaty.)

NAVIGATION ACT.

Mr. McCALLUM, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 82) to amend the Act 43 Victoria Chapter 29, respecting the navigation of Canadian waters, said: The object of this Bill relates to the responsibility of vessel owners for damages in cases of collision, and is to assimilate our law, to that of the United States. As the law now stands, it is unjust to Canadian owners, as it makes them responsible to the extent of $32.92 a ton, on the registered tonnage of the vessel, while American vessel owners are responsible only to the value of the vessel. The object of the Bill is to make our law similar to that of the United States.

Mr. McLELAN. As my attention has only now been called to this Bill, I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow it to stand over.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

The following motion for a return was agreed to:—

Bill (No. 114) respecting the Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa Railway.—(Mr. Abbott.)

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton), moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 115) to amend the law of evidence in criminal cases. He said: I may say that my object in introducing the Bill is to conform with the law of civil cases in Ontario. The Legislature of that Province, at its last
Mr. ANGLIN.

Session, amended the law of evidence in civil cases so as to permit certain persons to make them compellable to give evidence, who were not competent before the passing of that Act. It is now the law of Ontario:—

"If in any court of justice, any person called to give evidence in a proceeding in respect of which this Legislature has jurisdiction to enact as is in this section enacted, shall object to take an oath, or shall be objected to as incompetent to take an oath, such person shall, if the presiding Judge is satisfied that the taking of an oath would have no binding effect on his conscience, make the following promise, affirmation and declaration: 'I solemnly promise, affirm and declare that the evidence given by me to the Court shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth'"

That being the law in civil cases, I submit that it is desirable that the law should be amended so as to apply the same provision in criminal cases, and, if the Bill becomes law, I shall ask that it apply only to the Province of Ontario, as I understand that there is not a similar law to the one from which I have quoted in any of the other Provinces of the Dominion.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

FRENCH TRANSLATION OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. FISET. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention to the French version of the Hansard. I would like to know why that translation is so much behind hand this year. The same complaint was made last year, yet the translation was more advanced at the same date than it is this year. To date, we have not yet one hundred pages of the French version of the Hansard.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Chairman of the Committee, I have to state that these delays have been repeatedly pointed out. I have taken information with regard to the reasons which prevent the due distribution of these debates, and I find that to-day there are 130 pages of them translated, but yet to be printed; so that if any blame is to be attached to any one, it is to the printers. I have informed the Clerk of the House of the complaint made, and I trust that steps will be taken to remedy this delay, which is much to be regretted.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. RYKERT. Mr. Speaker, so many able speeches have been made during the present debate, and so much ground has been covered by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have discussed the policy of the present Government, that I find some difficulty in knowing what course to take on the present occasion. I desire not to trespass on the ground already so well occupied by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in the debate. I shall probably take a different line of argument in defence of the policy of the Government from what I had otherwise taken had I spoken at an earlier stage of the debate. I shall endeavor to show what are the antecedents of those men who are now attempting to form public opinion in this country, and who so kindly offer their advice on this important question. I shall endeavor to show, out of their own mouths, that the policy of the Government is acceptable to the people, and that the National Policy has been a success, so far as the action of the Government is concerned; and I think I can satisfactorily prove to the House and the country that the gentlemen now occupying the Treasury benches are fairly entitled to ask for a renewal of the confidence reposed in them on the 17th of September, 1878. The discussion so far has, no doubt, taken a very wide range. The Budget debate was anticipated by my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), for what cause I cannot possibly understand, unless to show to the House and to the country, probably, that he is best qualified to occupy the position of Finance Minister when the time may come for hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House to be called to this side; that, however, I think, lies in the remote future. These hon. gentlemen, in the discussion of the Budget brought down by the hon. the Finance Minister, have entirely lost sight of the fact that the question of the National Policy was fairly and squarely tried by the electors in 1878, and that the people then rendered a verdict not only upon the question of Protection and Free Trade, but also upon the merits and demerits of the late Administration. They have endeavored in this debate to draw aside public attention from the great issues before the country; they have endeavored to draw a red herring across the trail, hoping thereby to escape the responsibility cast on them by the electors. But what has been the most extraordinary circumstance, to my mind, throughout this whole debate, is that the leader of the Opposition has so far remained silent. It may be, Sir, that he is framing a policy to launch upon this House and the country before the close of the debate; but so far he has allowed the lieutenants and subordinates of his party to discuss the question, without offering one single word to show what are his views on the fiscal policy of the Government. The hon. member for Lambton, a few nights ago, uttered a mournful dirge over the downfall of his Government, and with his usual boldness—if I may use that expression, and I do not do so in an offensive way—asserted that his Government fell without sacrificing any principle. That remark must have struck every gentleman in this House with astonishment. Hon. gentlemen who know the record of the country during the five years these gentlemen were in power, must recollect that they violently cast aside every political principle which they held dear while on the Opposition side of the House; every principle these gentlemen laid down for the guidance of Constitutional Government one after another was shamefully cast aside. I could point probably to a dozen or more planks of the Reform platform as laid down by them on different occasions, which were broken as soon as they entered office. I need only refer to one or two of those planks in order to satisfy the House and the country that when these gentlemen proclaim that they did not sacrifice any of their principles, they are not speaking by the book, but are endeavoring, for some reason, to deceive the electors. It will be fresh in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that one of the great principles of the Reform party, was that no public money should be expended without a vote of Parliament—that no contract should be undertaken for public works without the consent and approbation of Parliament. Yet when the question of the Nanaimo and Esquimalt Railway was before this Legislature, and when the hon. member for Lambton was asked by the present leader of the House to explain why he had undertaken that work, the hon. gentleman said: "I have nothing to tell this House, I have nothing to tell the country, I have decided that it is in the interest of the country that the work should be done, and I have determined not to give this House any satisfaction." It was one of the planks in the platform of the Reform party, that all contracts should be given to the lowest tenderers, provided that they had the ability to perform the work; but we know how they violated that principle. We know that the hon. member for Lambton, in his celebrated address when going before the electors, said that he was going to elevate the standard of public morality which his opponents had done so much to debase and to conduct public affairs upon principles which honest men can approve of and by practices which will bear the light of day. Well, Sir, how did he do it? I will call my first witness into the box, the Lilliputian Premier of Ontario—what does he say, with regard to the elevation of the standard? There was a celebrated trial in the city of London, familiarly known as the "Come-along-John" trial, in which a large amount of corruption is shown. On that occasion Mr. Mowat attempted to justify the course his friends had pursued in violating one of the important principles of the Reform party; and this is what he said:

"Well, it got over the country that our opponents would spend money. Well, full of this idea, a good many Reformers spent money; some $5, some $10 to purchase votes. I am afraid in London we spent more money (cheers and laughter); but I consider that the expenditure of money under such circumstances was quite justified, considering the antecedents of the opposing party."

That is the testimony of the Premier of the Province of Ontario. The hon. member for Lambton also laid down the proposition that the policy of the Liberal party was to make Parliamentary Government supreme, and to take from the Government all power to use the people's money without a direct vote of Parliament. I need not refer the hon. gentleman to that celebrated instance when he expended $300,000 without asking Parliament for its consent. I refer to the Fort Frances Locks. I might go on and point to the ground taken by the hon. gentleman in building the Pacific Telegraph Line, and also in regard to the Georgian Bay Branch, to show how the hon. gentleman failed to carry out that doctrine. I simply point to those facts to show the country that, when hon. gentlemen opposite, on every public platform, declare that the Reform party fell sacrificing no principles, those hon. gentlemen had no principles whatever, which they did not violate at one time or another. There can be no doubt that those hon. gentlemen feel somewhat chagrined and mortified at the defeat they sustained, and hope by some means or other to return to the Treasury benches. Some hon. gentlemen say that this Government ascended to power on false pretences. I should like to know what those false pretences were. Will some hon. gentleman kindly tell us what they are? If they are not prepared to do so, then it must be held that the assumption made by them is for party purposes. They know right well that the issues before the country were, viz.: the fiscal policy of the Opposition, as laid down by the proposition of the right hon. leader of the Government in its resolutions of 1878, and also the extravagant administration of public affairs by the Administration of the day. It seems, however, that hon. gentlemen opposite are not prepared to discuss those questions in the manner in which they should be debated. It is true we have certain hon. gentlemen making speeches of two, three, or four hours' duration, among these being the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and no doubt, by-and-bye, we will have the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson). They pursue different tactics, however, and seem to think it important to pile up figures and thrust them before the House and the country in order that the people may be mystified, and in order that their attention may be drawn from what are the questions directly in issue. Those hon. gentlemen are not satisfied with discussing the subject as I think it should be discussed, but they go behind the Mackenzie Government and say: "Look at your administration during the preceding five or six years." Those hon. gentlemen say that the annual expenditure of the Government was increased by some $10,000,000. What that has to do with the present discussion I cannot conceive, but they must fill up their speeches with something, and they accordingly fill up their time with old issues, long since settled by the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite say, in justification of their extraordinary extravagance, that it was caused by the legacies left by the previous Government. I should like to know what those legacies are. Have they ever told us what they are? Not to this hour have they told us what they are, but they make repeated statements, in order to lead to the conclusion that they were compelled to run into this extravagance and corruption. Hon. gentlemen will not say that the Intercolonial Railway was a work not recognized by all parties; and that was an expenditure which necessarily increased during those years. There could be no doubt that the enlargement of the several canals was a work approved of at the time of Confederation, and recognized as a work of public necessity, and of which they have no reason to complain. Let them point to the public records, if they dare, and show one instance where their votes are recorded, either against the building of the Intercolonial Railway or the enlargement of the Welland Canal. It is true there were differences of opinion in regard to the route of the Intercolonial, but in regard to building the railway itself there was no question whatever. I should like to know if the Pacific Railway is one of those legacies left by their predecessors. If so, why did they not, when the opportunity arose, at once decline to go on and finish the road. They had a convenient majority at their back, numbering fifty or sixty, and they could have entirely reversed the policy of their predecessors. They could have done so if they liked, but they felt it was in the interests of the country that the railway should be built, that the road was an enterprise which the country was bound to undertake, an enterprise which must, sooner or later, be carried out for the purpose of developing the great resources of the far West, and they themselves have placed on record that the Pacific Railway was a public necessity. The leader of the Opposition, in his famous Aurora speech, of which we heard so much, declared that the building of the Pacific Railway was a great public necessity. If that were one of the causes of the increase in the public debt, hon. gentlemen opposite cannot now say it was a legacy left them by their predecessors. Now, if they cannot, by any possibility, tell the House and the country what those legacies were which have caused so much increase of expenditure, they ought forever to hold their tongues on that important question. While hon. gentlemen say that we have increased the public debt, and added largely to the public expenditure, they, at the same time, declare that the increase has been caused by constructing works of public utility. But we have the evidence of the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance, so often referred to in this House, when he appealed to the capitalists of England in 1875 for a loan, and at a time when he wished to present the bright side of the picture, and it cannot be too often referred to, because it will show the country that those hon. gentlemen now airing their theories are not sincere in what they say, that hon. gentlemen opposite are wrong when they declare that the public debt has been increased for works of no public utility. When that hon. gentleman explained how the debt and expenditure were increased, he glided in the fact that all the works carried out were of public utility, and when they have that evidence, it does not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite to go behind that statement, and say that the expenditure was unnecessarily increased. If the expenditure was unnecessarily increased, that offence was condoned. But there was another issue before the people. In 1878, that question was thoroughly discussed. From public platforms and different parts of the country, he declared that, although there was an increase of $10,000,000 annually, he could not find fault with that increase. In his celebrated picnic speeches, he did not condemn that expenditure; nor did he say it was not incurred under various pleas more or less valid. We do know, however, how that debt was increased, one being the assumption of the debts of Ontario and Quebec. But of this increase it does not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite to complain. I would like to know in what financial position Ontario would be to-day had the Dominion not assumed that debt at the time. Instead of a surplus to-day that Province would probably owe $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, or be in a state of insolvency. Did any of the hon. gentlemen opposite oppose the increase of this Dominion debt in this way? If so, why do they not say so, telling us when and where? They do not, however, nor do they say what were the questions before the House at the time. But I will remind hon. gentlemen opposite that they did something when in office that they will probably never accomplish again—because I do not expect to see them in office again during my lifetime—they turned our surpluses into deficits. They raised the public debt by $34,665,233, that is to say from $108,324,965 to $142,405,892, while up to July, 1881, the present Government had only increased the debt by $12,405,792. The present Government, however, have this year realized a surplus of over $1,000,000 and decreased our debt since July, 1881, by $1,319,510. If that is not a record of which any Government should not feel proud, I cannot conceive of any. The member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), the other night, criticized the ordinary expenses of the present Government. That is a fair subject of discussion—one of those issues which should be put fairly and squarely before the people. If hon. gentlemen opposite will only select issues of that kind, instead of running away in every direction for other subjects, I shall have no objection to meet them. But if you strip that hon. gentleman's speech of the big mass of figures carelessly thrown together, and its heavy draft on the imagination, you will find little left—only the old saw-saw story of taxation and the poor man's sufferings. Another hon. gentleman has taken a very active part in this debate. He seemed to find fault that the member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) had criticized his position in this House and country—I refer to the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Until he shows sufficient repentance on his part, and has got absolution for past political errors, I do not feel disposed to accept him as a proper person to give advice in this House. His speech of a few nights ago was nothing but a rehash of the speeches made in 1870 and in 1879-80. Comparing the last with the former speeches, I find he simply repeated the same story, and threw together the same figures, but in a more confused way. He told us the old "garden sass" story over again, with which the House is very familiar; and, although it was taken up with great gusto by that celebrated hon. gentleman from Carleton, N.B., it produced very little effect on the House. But, says the hon. gentleman, what right have you to criticize my speech—why did you not read it fairly? He says it is read by his opponents in a manner to misrepresent his views on Free Trade and Protection. If I recollect that speech of 1876—and my memory is good in following the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite—my reading is different from that of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), who feels a little annoyed that his speech of 1876 has not been read and commented upon. I intend to show the House that he is a stronger protectionist than even his hon. friend behind him; but the difference is, that the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk had for its head, protection, and for its tail, free trade, while the speech of the hon. member for South Brant had for its head, free trade, and for its tail, protection. As suggested by an hon. friend behind him, if the two were put together they might make a fair protection speech. I like to see a man, who, having learned his principles as a child, develops and adheres to them at mature age. After having lived some thirty-five or forty years as a protectionist, and having received those principles, as he said the other night, at his mother's knee, I cannot conceive how he could have failed to enunciate them, lately, and could have turned a political somersault in a few days. If he be a protectionist, let him act as one manfully. If, upon a public platform, he talks protection principles as the only remedy for the country, I do not like to see him say afterwards, on finding the audience are of a different opinion, confess that he talked nonsense the day before, and say that he ought not to have spoken as he did, and wants now Free Trade. Such men are not proper guides for us on the eve of a General Election. They would deceive the electors. He says that he has changed his mind, but I cannot find a proof of it. No doubt, whatever this House will allow him to recant if he likes, he must confess he was wrong, and go through a certain amount of penitence before we can receive his opinion on the other side of the question. The hon. member for North Norfolk spoke, the other day, with a view to bidding for the manufacturers votes. I must confess he is rather cunning, as well as the hon. member for South Brant, in this respect, and that they are most useful men when they get on the stump. Because if the audience faces one way, against their views, they will promptly turn round and say, I have been talking a little nonsense; but here is my protectionist speech made elsewhere. They will meet another audience of the Free Trade sort, and they will say when they find themselves perplexed by a difference of views, here is my Free Trade speech, reported in the Hansard. These are most convenient men to go before the country and address the electors. The hon. member for North Norfolk, in order to condone the errors of his past career, now tries to make friends with the manufacturers. A few nights ago, he said:

"Certain expressions, no doubt, have been used in the heat of debate, which, taken isolated from the context, like the extract from my celebrated speech, might appear a meaning of that kind."

That is one of the speeches that the hon. member for North Norfolk generally makes on the eve of an election. I am satisfied the hon. gentleman, if he found his party were going to adopt a Protection platform, or a Free Trade platform, could change his tactics to suit either case. The hon. gentleman said, the other night, that he was in favor of a 17½ per cent Tariff, but he candidly admitted he wanted 2½ more! The hon. member for South Brant very quietly tells us that, although a free trader, he would still like a 20 per cent Tariff. Now, Sir, the hon. member for North Norfolk, in criticizing the course pursued by the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), thought he made a point against him when he said he was brought up a democrat on the other side of the line, and, therefore, assumed that he must have made some speeches in favor of Free Trade views, though the hon. gentleman failed to point to one single address made by him. However, there is no doubt the hon. member for North Norfolk is a Simon Pure Yankee. He seems to be a Yankee of the first water in all his views, as expressed in this House. But the hon. member for Niagara is a gentleman who, in all his utterances, has never plagiarized. He does not copy wholesale the speeches of Wilson and of Cox, in the Congressional Globe. In looking over his speech the other day, and the speech of 1876, I was reminded of the speeches I had read in the Congressional reports, and I turned them up in the Library, and there I found that the hon. gentleman has taken, almost wholesale, the speech of Samuel Wilson, in the year 1862, on the Morrill Tariff; and later on he followed the doctrine of Mr. Cox. If you take out of his speech the Yankee notions and plagiarisms, there is neither head nor tail left. There is another hon. gentleman in this House who attempted to lecture us rather severely, and that was the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Irvine). Now, I do not propose to refer to that speech of his, but I would just remind him that he was not in a circus. While his acting was very fair, as a political effort I think he was a great failure. I think he did well to announce to the House that it was his last speech. It is just as well, when hon. members come here for the first time, to let their seats get warm before they burst out into such floods of eloquence and abuse of their opponents. Now, Sir, these hon. gentlemen having failed to agree upon a policy or upon a mode of attack, they set to work and join hand and hand in one thing. There is one thing a Grit—call him a Reformer if you please—will always do out of office. The moment he finds he cannot get possession of the Treasury benches, he sets to work to belittle his own country and cry down its credit, hoping by that means in some way to induce the electors to believe that he is the right man to hold the reins of power. Now, these gentlemen seem to forget what the issues were in 1878. These issues were the National Policy and the expenditure of the Government, and both were fairly placed before the people. The right hon. leader of the Government moved a resolution in favor of a higher Tariff, and issue was taken upon it by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) in a celebrated speech, in which he denounced that as legalized robbery. He stated the country was not prepared to accept the proposition of the right hon. gentleman, and publicly declared that taxation in any form, such as suggested, was legalized robbery. Not only that, but these hon. gentlemen, upon every public platform, endeavored to show the electors that by adopting the fiscal policy proposed by the right hon. gentleman, they were going to make the consumer pay the duty, and to enrich the rich man at the expense of the poor man. According to the hon. member for Centre Huron, they were going to impose $2 a ton on coal, and $1 a barrel on flour. By all such devices they sought to induce the electors to believe that the proposed fiscal policy would be destructive to their interests. However, the people believed that the reins of power ought to be entrusted to the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches, and the result was the verdict of the 17th of September, 1878. Now, mark what these gentlemen did when they went out of power. They set to work immediately to cry down the credit of the country. The country was going to the dogs; the land in the North-West would never build the Canadian Pacific Railway; it was only a barren waste, the home of the buffalo and the wild cat, I think the hon. member for Gloucester said. One of those gentlemen denounced it as one of the roughest countries in the world. There was also going to be a great exodus from the country—they were all going to Kansas. Now they are adopting a different course, and, as I said a few minutes ago, I can conceive why it is that the hon. members for North Norfolk, West Middlesex, and South Brant are put forward to discuss the question of drawbacks, and all those matters, in anticipation of the Budget. There is no doubt there is a little rivalry among them as to who shall be Minister of Finance, but I think the hon. member for West Middlesex will carry off the palm, because, as a mixer and muddler, he has no parallel, and according to the Globe, that is the very highest qualification. After hearing the hon. gentleman's figures, I was more mystified than when he began his speech.

Mr. ROSS. Do you comprehend them now?

Mr. RYKERT. No, I cannot. The hon. gentleman has a habit of drawing conclusions from a mass of figures before him, without considering whether they will justify him in coming to that conclusion. However, I have no doubt that before very long he will find himself qualified to take one of the front seats, as Minister of Finance, in the distant future.

Mr. ROSS. Will you be kind enough to say wherein they are astray.

Mr. RYKERT. I will do so. The hon. gentleman knows I never yet made a speech without proving my statements as I went along, as hon. gentlemen have found to their cost before. Let the hon. gentleman bide his time; I will satisfy him before I sit down. I shall show that these gentlemen are not the professed educationalists they seem to think they are. What surprised me most was the entire silence of their leader. He is perfectly indifferent to everything around him. I do not think he sleeps all the time, but is waiting to see how the course of events will turn. He is true to that Aurora speech, perhaps he may recollect it. He thinks it is not the duty of hon. members in Opposition to form a policy. He then laid down the broad proposition that it was not necessary for hon. members in Opposition to have a policy for the country. Let me quote from that celebrated speech of his, because I think the more that speech is kept before the public, the more they will be satisfied that the hon. gentleman should remain in Opposition for the next half century. He said:

"I know that I have made a rather disturbing speech, but I am not afraid of that. As far as I can judge, not much can be done without disturbing something or somebody, and if that is the only objection to be made to the sentiments I have uttered, I am quite ready to meet it. I may be said, also, to have made an imprudent speech, at least it might be said, if I were one of those who aspire to lead their fellow-countrymen. This is the function of Ministers, we know it, and we do not quarrel with it—to say nothing that can be caught hold of—nothing in advance of the popular opinion of the day, to watch the current of that opinion, and when it has gathered strength to crystallize it into Acts of Parliament."

Well, Sir, it may be we are going to have those acts crystallized, but if we have to wait till he comes upon this side of the House, we shall have to wait for some time. I was rather amused the other night, on going out of the House, after the hon. member for North Norfolk had spoken. I met a chap in the ante-room who said to me: "I guess that Yankee has made a pretty long speech, but if he cannot make any more than he made out of the 'garden sass,' I think the old fellow will remain in power for a long time yet;" meaning Sir John A. Macdonald. Now, I thought that chap's head was level. Now, Sir, I propose to give a few instances of the somersaults which those hon. gentlemen have made in jumping from a Free Trade, to a Protectionist platform. The hon. member for North Norfolk, who has now disappeared from the House, was, at one time, in favor of a revenue Tariff policy. In 1876, he said:

"With regard to the resolution, I confess I would like to see a retaliatory policy adopted which would bring the United States to terms, and would at least protect us against slaughter invoices."

Now, the same gentleman in 1879, made the following remarks, as will be seen by reference to page 536 of the Hansard :—

"One or two words in regard to retaliation. I always listen to talk about retaliation with a certain degree of nervousness. I always have a feeling of fear when that matter is referred to just as I do when I see children handling dangerous edge tools. Retaliation. Forcing the United States to come to our terms. Why, that is sheer madness."

He also was one of those who lately joined in the hue and cry raised by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) when he stigmatized this policy as legalized robbery. But, in order to place the two statements made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) side by side, I will quote from one of his speeches in 1876. He said:

"It may be safely assumed that no nation has attained to greatness in commerce or manufactures without having, in the course of its history, imposed exactions and restrictions. I believe that the interests of the nation at large would be promoted by judicious protection; I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by protection, and that the manufactures, being brought to the door of the farmer, would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were 3,000 miles away."

But the hon. gentleman turned a somersault on that question in 1880, as will be found by referring to Hansard page 849:

"Protection is, under every state of circumstances, a loss to the many for the gain of the few. It can be nothing else, it never has been anything else, and it never will be anything else, to the end of time, but legalized, organized robbery, under the forms of law."

Another of these hon. gentlemen who is fond of lecturing to the country on this subject, is the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), and I have no doubt he will rise, in the course of this debate, and give us his experience in discussing this important question. I believe that, generally speaking, that hon. gentleman is pretty honest in expressing his opinion; but when he comes to the question of politics, he inclines to lean strongly on the side of his "party," but, perhaps, he is excusable for that. I think, however, I owe him an apology for having to introduce his speech before the public, because I intend to show that of all the protectionists in this House, he was the greatest—that he was a protectionist in 1876, pure and unadulterated. That hon. gentleman helped to form public opinion in 1878, and, if I am not mistaken, he said that he could not be elected unless he promised protection to the farmers. Is not that so? The hon. gentleman does not answer.

Mr. PATERSON. My time will come.

Mr. RYKERT. Well, I will answer for the hon. gentleman. On page 186 of Hansard, for 1876, the hon. gentleman is reported to have used some words which I will quote, as showing how he managed to get elected. I will not be so unparliamentary as to say that he got into Parliament on false pretences, but I will let the House draw the inferences when I quote his language. He said:

"At my last election when my opponents told them that they need not expect any protection from the Reform Government, I had to assure them that whenever this subject came up in the House I would raise my voice in their behalf, and I think it is hardly possible that the duty on wheat will give increased prices."

Mr. PATERSON. Hear, hear.

Mr. RYKERT. Wait—you are not out of the woods yet. I hope the hon. gentleman will possess his soul in patience, and I will endeavor to be as brief and as pointed as possible. I think it would be rather unkind, when the hon. gentleman is no doubt going to make a speech to the country, that I have to put him on the defensive by obliging him to reply to his own remarks of previous years. As I said, he is one of those who go about the country delivering lectures, but I have noticed that these hon. gentlemen never care to enter my constituency. I can never catch them there. I have begged and beseeched them to come, but without effect, and the only chance I have, is to read their speeches in the Globe and comment on them as I think proper. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

"I think it is hardly possible that the duty on wheat will give increased prices, because we raise a surplus and export it. Nevertheless, it will be a protection to our millers, and if any can be given to our agriculturists by a revision of the Tariff they should get it. The party to which I belong, and which is led by the Premier, will make a mistake if they refuse to grant this Committee."

The hon. gentleman goes on to tell the hon. the Finance Minister that the farmers have a strong case which the Government cannot refuse, and if they did refuse he could bring down a petition signed by 100,000 grangers to make them do what they wanted. In speaking about the case made out for the farmers, he said:

"It is true some hon. gentlemen here think the United States pursue a commercial policy that is utterly nonsensical in some respects; but until the duties on agricultural products are removed, it is prima facie evidence that the farmers believe protection to be in their own interests."

These appeals to the hon. Finance Minister were not received with much favor; but the hon. gentleman says: "You must give us a lever to fight Brother Jonathan." He claimed that if we had protection for our home industries, if we protected the produce of the fields and the produce of the mines, we could bring Brother Jonathan to his knees and compel him to give us reciprocity. Let us see what the hon. gentleman said on that subject:

"The question is whether in the event of future negotiation, the imposition of a tax on grain would operate in our favor. Fancy a Commissioner, delegated by this Government and sanctioned by the British Government, sent to Washington to negotiate such a treaty. The question might be asked what he desired. He replies: 'I wish to have a free market in the United States for the products of our forests, fields, and mines.' Then the United States Commissioner might ask: 'And what will you give us in return?' Our representative replies: 'The free use of our markets for similar products of our country.' The astute American would naturally say 'We have that already. I do not see that you offer us anything.' We must remember we should have something to offer when we attempt to open up anew the reciprocity question. I need not remind this House that the great lever we had before in negotiating a reciprocity treaty is ours no longer."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What was that lever?

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman knows, and if he does not, he can refer to the speech and find out. I do not intend to spend much time in repeating the speech of the hon. gentleman, except to show the House and the country that he has been as great a chameleon on the protection question as the hon. gentleman behind him (Mr. Charlton). The hon. gentleman appealed to the Ministry for a defensive policy. On that subject he said:

"The hon. the Finance Minister should ascertain, if possible, what articles are being slaughtered in our market, what industries are thus being crushed out in our midst, what enterprises could be successfully fostered in this country, and then frame a Tariff that would be defensive in its nature. He, being the champion of our interests, should use, not offensively, but defensively, the weapon that has been placed in his hands, in order to prevent the life-blood of this country being drawn from it."

What does the hon. gentleman mean by that, if not protection? The hon. gentleman, a little farther on, speaking of the hon. member for South Waterloo, says:

"The hon. member for South Waterloo predicted the result of protection would be to stimulate our industries so much that more factories would arise than the country could sustain. That would bring down prices, and ruin the manufacturers. If that be the case—and I believe the hon. gentleman is right—it would be the concern of those gentlemen who are asking for protection at the present time. Prices would be brought down, and consumers would get the benefit of cheaper goods than they now have. It would simply remove the competition from the American manufacturers to our own, the consumers receiving the benefit all the same, but the country being enriched by the industries."

Now, Sir, what would you call that if not protection? Upon that occasion the hon. gentleman was desirous of showing that political favors had been conferred upon himself. He talked about the great industry in which he was interested, and spoke about a thousand people from Germany having been brought into the country in consequence of it being protected. The hon. gentleman was a little afraid that the hon. the Finance Minister was a little too strong for Free Trade, and he wanted him to go a little further, and make all the manufacturers prosperous in the same way. Let us see what he says:

"If the Finance Minister finds such is the case, I trust that the wisdom which led him to yield that point will induce him to grant the same to other industries, and that no sectionalism will tie his hands. I hope that other hon. gentlemen will speak on this subject, and whether the Committee is appointed or not, the interchange of views will lead the Finance Minister to bring in a Tariff which will redound to the prosperity of the whole Dominion."

Now, Sir, I have shown you the free trader and the protectionist. The hon. gentleman says, in opening his speech:

"I am not a protectionist. I am not one of those who believe in erecting a wall so high that you cannot trade with any other country, but I must admit I am in favor of a defensive policy."

The hon. gentleman was a free trader when he began his speech, but a protectionist before he ended; on the other hand, the hon. member for North Norfolk was a protectionist first and a free trader in the end. In order to convince the hon. Finance Minister, who sat there with his arms folded, allowing the country to go to the dogs, perfectly helpless to improve the country's condition, and caring not what happened, so long as he remained on the Treasury benches, the hon. gentleman made another pathetic appeal to him. He spoke soundly when he said:

"It is well known that we pay a cash bonus to the inhabitants of other countries to come into Canada and settle in our midst. It is a fact that some of those who have been thus induced to emigrate to Canada have been compelled, from want of employment to which they have been accustomed, to go to the United States. I believe by a defensive Tariff you would not have to pay to bring those men here. Adopt it, and you will find the steam-whistle of our factories will be the call for them to come."

What other inference can we draw from this language than that the hon. gentleman is a protectionist at heart, but for party purposes a free trader. It struck me on reading that speech that the hon. gentleman was trying to lead up to his own industry. He was a little afraid that the hon. the Finance Minister would destroy that industry by taking away the little protection it had, and in order to lead up to it, he pointed out that if one industry flagged another flagged, and therefore he hoped the Minister would do what he wanted. He said:

"I have confidence that he will arrive at a conclusion on this point. I know the difficulty he will have in satisfying all parties, but we should keep in mind the fact that we are one people, and when one of our industries prospers all must benefit, while if one languishes, all must suffer more or less."

They seem to admit that manufacturers are a little pushed and are not getting the prices they ought to have, but that consumers obtain the goods as cheaply as before. There is no increase of price to consumers, and the only persons who might be dissatisfied are manufacturers who have been investing large amounts of capital. The hon. member for South Brant is selling candy and sugar as cheaply as ever to consumers, but he does not make as large profits as formerly, and he therefore speaks feelingly on the subject. But what is a most extraordinary circumstance is that while all the speeches were being made in the House in 1876 upon the resolution of the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), the leader of the then Government was perfectly silent; not one word escaped his lips in condemnation of what was said by his supporters; indeed, he tacitly acquiesced in what they said. He as leader of the Government, was bound to declare then and there, whether those views were acceptable to him, but instead of doing that the hon. gentleman remained perfectly quiet and allowed those hon. gentlemen to run riot in speaking of the beauties of protection, and did not say one word against their statements. But there was an issue in 1878. Times were changed. They knew if they followed the present leader of the Government in his protectionist views, they would be berated by the organ of their party. They knew they had to come within the traces, that they had to submit to the lash, and they at once declared they were free traders. They pronounced protection legalized robbery, but the people said: "How are you able to say so, when a short time ago you declared that the establishment of one industry would foster another, that thereby employment would be given to the people, and that we would have thousands of immigrants." The result was that hon. gentlemen opposite received notice to quit on that memorable occasion which they will not soon forget. But after 17th September, 1878, those hon. gentlemen adopted different tactics. They thought their policy was to belittle the country as much as possible; they felt it was not in the interests of the country that capitalists should invest money here, and they bent their energies to turning out the Government. They adopted a new role. There is one thing which hon. gentlemen will have remarked in their experience as public men, namely, that the moment their party gets into Opposition its members become prophets; they prophesy for good and evil; and I want to show how the prophecies of hon. gentlemen opposite have been verified by events. The hon. member for West Middlesex adopted the role of a prophet. He was strong in the idea that an increase in the Tariff would be productive of a decrease in the revenue. He said that by no possibility could there be an increase in the revenue, that when a large expenditure was incurred in the collection of revenue the revenue must naturally decrease. I want to show he was wrong, that the cost of collection was not what he anticipated, and therefore his prediction has not been realized. The hon. gentleman said, in 1879: "It (the Tariff) had been conceived in iniquity and brought forth in sin." The hon. gentleman uses pretty strong language sometimes, and yet he lectured the hon. the Minister of Railways the other night on the use of strong language; but there never was an hon. member who used stronger language than himself, and from his position as an educator of youth, or rather as a late supervisor of the instruction of pupils in different places, one would suppose he would be a little more careful in the choice of his words, because I think there should be some limit to language used in this House, and such terms as jobbery and corruption, although used in a parliamentary sense, are not exactly what should be used on the floor. The hon. member for West Middlesex further said:

"It was a Tariff that discriminated between the rich and the poor, and it was a Tariff which would bring destruction on those who had introduced it. He objected to the Tariff, because he believed it was going to be very expensive, not only in the sense that it would increase the cost of goods to the consumer—"

Mr. ROSS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RYKERT. What does the hon. member for North Norfolk say in answer to that?

Mr. ROSS. Let him answer.

Mr. RYKERT. He says the consumer does not pay high prices, and I will show by evidence that such is the fact. The hon. member for West Middlesex continued:

"But because it increased the expense in the mode of collecting the revenue."

Has that been realized? Let me make a comparison as the hon. gentleman is fond of comparisons. In 1877, there was collected $12,546,987. at a cost of $721,601; in 1878, $12,784,824, at a cost of $711,527; in 1881, $18,406,012, at a cost of $717,704, or, in other words, while it cost $714,000 to collect $12,000,000, hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches paid only $13,000 more for collecting $6,000,000 additional, in round numbers. I think this establishes that the hon. member for Middlesex was a false prophet. The hon. member for North Norfolk also adopted the role of a prophet. A prophet sometimes is not best known in his own country, and I think the hon. gentleman, when he is reminded of what he predicted during his speech in the Budget debate of 1880, will come to the conclusion that he is not a very safe prophet. With regard to Conservative expenditure we hear enough from hon. gentlemen opposite; but not a word about our surpluses. Said the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk, speaking of the present Tariff and its author:

"Has the hon. Minister of Finance found that this policy at the end of the year, has added materially to the revenue of the country? He has not and he has still further lessons to learn; as the evil of protection develops itself, he will be enabled more thoroughly to appreciate the fact that, in adding to the burdens of the people he is destroying the revenue."

The member for North Norfolk will bear that in mind, and will see that he was a false prophet. Again, it was said:

"If the manufacturers are to have that monopoly, by excluding foreign goods, what revenue are we to get from the Tariff on those goods? The sources of revenue are dried up by the same Act which compels the people to pay large prices to favor the home monopolists."

Now the hon. Finance Minister pledged his word the other night that prices are not increased, and announced a large increase of revenue instead of a deficit, a surplus of $4,000,000. So the hon. gentleman is not very capable of acting as a reliable prophet. Now a word or two to the member for West Middlesex.

Mr. ROSS. Only?

Mr. RYKERT. I will make my remarks as short as I can. I do not wish to be prolix. That hon. gentleman will, probably, be glad to know that he has been a false prophet also. He said, in 1879, this Tariff was going to operate seriously against Great Britain; and he read a large mass of figures, though I do not say he was responsible for the result. He said:

Mr. RYKERT.

"The great cry of the protectionist used to be protection against importation from the United States. Judging from the manner in which the Tariff was framed, he would suppose it was distinctly prepared with the view of protecting us against Great Britain. He would give one or two instances in which this was done. In the article of cotton goods we imported $4,500,000 from England and $2,500,000 from the United States. The Tariff has been increased from 35 to 42½ per cent. in the matter of tweeds of which we imported 100 times as much from England as the United States, viz., $936,000 from Great Britain, and only $9,507 from the United States. The Tariff has been increased 22½ per cent."

Now mark the result of the Tariff. In 1881, cottons imported from Great Britain, $7,911,743; from the United States, $2,166,140; or a decrease from the United States of $400,000, and an increase from Great Britain of $3,400,000. Was the hon. gentleman in this instance not a false prophet?

Mr. ROSS. The duties are higher.

Mr. RYKERT. Of tweeds we imported from Great Britain, in 1881, $3,363,469, and from the United States, $15,877, or an increase of $2,400,000 from Great Britain, and of only $6,000 from the United States. I think he was a false prophet in this instance too. The hon. gentleman stated that in flannels we imported seven times as much from Great Britain as from the United States, and that the Tariff had been increased 32½ per cent. See the result in 1881, $255,060 from Great Britain, and only $12,216 from the United States. Other woollen goods imported from Great Britain, $1,099,595, and from the United States $55,483, or nearly a hundred times as much more from Great Britain, instead of less as predicted. Now, as the hon. gentleman said, let us turn to the other side of the picture. He likes to compare our trade with each country, and to say our Tariff is going to be disastrous to Great Britain. The hon. member for West Middlesex, said: In the matter of carriages, we imported from the United States $83,299, and from England only $2,130, but the duty on this article was only increased 7½ per cent.; or, in other words, he wants us to believe that the importation from England largely decreased. Now, in 1881, we imported from England $5,865 worth, or double the amount in 1879, and from the United States, $70,973. At page 634 of the Official Reports, Mr. Ross said:

"If this was not discriminating against Great Britain, he did not know what was. If this was not framing a Tariff distinctly to exclude British goods, what did it mean? He noticed in the resolutions brought down by the hon. the Finance Minister, that it was proposed that, when the Americans reduced their duties on certain articles going into the United States from Canada, the Governor in Council might reduce the duties on those articles coming from the United States into Canada. But was there any such provision in regard to goods coming from Great Britain? He could not find it in the Tariff from one end to the other. He would almost suppose, reading that Tariff in the light of British interests, British trade, and British manufactures, that it had been framed by some designing Americans, with the view of crushing and destroying the commerce which was happily established between England and this country."

In 1879, we imported from the United States, $188,540 worth of rubber goods; from Great Britain, only $55,924 worth; in 1881, from Great Britain we took $199,220 worth; and from the United States, $291,994. Of leather manufactures we imported, in 1879, from the United States, $207,960 worth; and from Great Britain, only $29,360 worth; yet the duty increased only 2½ per cent.; in 1881 the imports from Great Britain were $576,264 worth; from the United States, $614,523 worth; increase from Great Britain, over $370,000. But the hon. gentleman in his concluding remarks said that the Tariff was 24 per cent. against England and only 22 per cent. against the United States, but he forgot to tell the House this was caused by the more expensive goods and luxuries used by the rich coming from England as, for instance, I find in 1881 we imported:

Woolleens.	From Great Britain.	From United States.
Cashmere	$3,358,616	$ 4,174
Dress Goods	1,480,756	79,083
Carpets	907,045	46,181
Shawls	150,587	2,141
Hose, Clothing and Flannels.	2,289,447	114,280
Oottons	5,746,807	632,206

I have shown that the predictions of the hon. gentleman on this point have not been realized; that he is one of those false prophets, whose opinion we ought not to consider in discussing this important question.

Mr. ANGLIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. RYKERT. I find that I have aroused the hon. gentleman from his slumbers. I will pay him a little attention before I sit down. Then in addition there were feathers, \$4,888, as against \$1,206; manufacturers of flax, \$1,361,880, as against \$49,750; silks, \$2,589,000, as against \$760,000, or, in other words, a total of \$18,370,018, as against \$1,619,016 from the United States. In other words, there were nine times as much imported goods from Great Britain, of an expensive quality, as there were from the United States; goods which were bought and used by those who were able to pay a high price for them. Mark you, that in those articles I have mentioned, over one-half of the \$35,000,000 worth imported came from Great Britain, and from the United States only about one-twelfth. So you will see when you come to look at this question from a national point of view, the only conclusion we can come to is that the Tariff imposes more restrictions on the rich man than upon the poor man. But on another class of goods coming from the United States in large quantities, such as wheat, flour, coal, books, and things of that sort, these pay a duty of 14 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., while others pay a duty of double that amount. I merely allude to these things in order to satisfy the hon. gentleman that he was wrong in his prophecy. He was wrong in his statement and wrong in his conclusion, and that being the case I think I may justly ask the House not to place any confidence in statements made by that hon. gentleman in that reckless manner. I do not use the word reckless in an unparliamentary sense. Now, the hon. gentleman from South Brant also went to the country and lectured the people on what they should do in the coming campaign. He performed, it is said, a missionary tour in the county of Haldimand to introduce politics into municipal elections with the result that a Tory was elected for warden by a majority of ten to six. It seems to me that before these hon. gentlemen discuss questions of fiscal policy they ought to reconcile their differences, they ought to show they have formed their principles; they ought not to come into this House, one expressing an opinion directly in favor of Free Trade, and another in favor of Protection. They ought to endeavor, at any rate in caucus, to harmonize their views, and lay them before the House and the country, in order that the people may see what their views are. The hon. member for South Brant was read entirely out of the list of free traders by that celebrated speech of his on the drawbacks. It still rings in our ears, and we cannot help thinking of it, although it is against the rules of the House to refer to former debates. In eloquent language my hon. friend pictured the miseries of the manufacturers, because they have to sell so cheap to the consumer, and he urges the House to give, at least, 20 per cent. to manufacturers. But then we find the ex-leader coming out fairly and squarely a free trader. He pronounced Protection a relic of barbarism of the worst kind. He says, however, very kindly, that in case he comes to the Treasury benches, he will let the manufacturers die by inches. I think he is very accommodating, but I do not think he will have a chance of accomplishing his policy very soon. The leader of the Opposition, who seems to be deaf to all that is said around him, has a sort of wandering policy, a policy for the Maritime Provinces, a policy for the Upper Provinces, in other words, speaking in the Province of Ontario, he has a milk and water policy, and speaking in the Lower Provinces he is a strong free trader. I will not add to the misery of the hon. gentleman in quoting his speech, but we have on record in the Library speeches of the hon. gentleman, no doubt revised by himself, at any rate published in his own organ. The hon. member for Gloucester, with that modesty for which he is so famous, and with that kindness and consideration for hon. gentlemen for which he is so well known, says that the hon. gentleman did not express those views. Well, I cannot say what he said down in Gloucester, I have not been able to find the speech he made there, but I find eight or ten in which his policy seems to be that Canada must be sacrificed at the feet of the United States. He says, in the Lower Provinces, that he is a free trader, but when he comes to the Province of Ontario he has no objection to turn a somersault upon a protectionist plank, provided it lands him into power. I fancy, however, the country will say that it wants his policy defined. But, in point of fact, we have got his policy on record, and I do not think he will recant so readily as the hon. members for North Norfolk and South Brant. I do not think he is so active as they are in turning somersaults. However, no matter what he now says we have him fast. The hon. gentleman went down by the sea. For months and months it was predicted that the great champion of Canadian Independence, the hero of the Aurora speech, was going down to teach the Nova Scotians and New Brunswickers what they were to do. The hon. gentleman was a little reckless, he must confess, in his remarks there. He laid down his platform, we have got it and intend to hold him to it. I must refer to it, however unpleasant it may be to the hon. member for Westmoreland. I direct my attention to him because the hon. leader seems to be asleep.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Talk louder and wake him up.

Mr. RYKERT. The St. John Telegraph is a real Simon Pure Grit organ, judging by its editorials. I find a report of the hon. gentleman's speech in that paper of 16th July, 1881, and in that speech, which is elaborated at great length, and apparently revised by the hon. gentleman, I find language which admits of no doubt, and I think we can safely say that, at last, we have got him nailed, although his friends have been trying to squirm out of it in this House. But the little bird has told us what were the utterances of the hon. gentleman who, in the exuberance of his loyalty, said he was capable of leading the great Reform party in Canada. He gave utterance to certain expressions which unmistakably fasten him down as a free trader pure and simple. The Reform party, in 1878, froze fast to the poor man, and they want to freeze to him again, but we are determined with good prices and plenty of labor—men getting $1.25 per day—we are determined to keep him on our side. I think hon. gentlemen will find, when the time comes round next year, a very large majority of the poor men will vote in favor of the friends of the poor man.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Perhaps that will be this year.

Mr. RYKERT. I do not know that the hon. gentleman would like to have it this year. A short time ago they were frantic in their demands to this House that there should be an appeal to the country, but they have discovered in the course of events that the affairs of the Government have been so fairly, honorably and honestly administered that the people have faith in the honesty and integrity of the Government, and they are not quite so anxious now to have an election. Why, Sir, a short time ago they made frantic appeals to go to the people, but a few nights ago we found the organ in large black letters stating that it was unfair to foist an election upon the country now. They do not want it now, but it seems—I do not like that last picture in Grip of Sir John whispering in Mr. Brown's ear, and I think that he is keeping rather too close company. I hope our leader will not be found whispering.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I won't be done brown.

Mr. RYKERT. I hope we will have the pleasure of hearing of it first. That is merely an interjection. However, I was proceeding to state what the leader of the late Government and the ex-leader of the Opposition said: "I am a free trader in principle, I believe in free-thought, free men, free property," I expected to see free love next. "The last mentioned is the latest to be acquired." Now here we have a free trader; that is something very satisfactory and I have been wanting to find out, for some time, where the hon. gentlemen stood. Again, in another speech which he made at the place called St. John River, I find recorded in the St. John Telegraph:

"He showed that the same principles which governed inter-provincial trade applied to international commercial transactions, and anything which unnecessarily interfered with it, any restriction not the fruit of necessity, was a wrong and an injury."

Then, in pointing out the great affliction to the poor man necessitated by the policy of the present Government, he went on, speaking of the present fiscal policy, to say:

"He dwelt at some length on the evils of restriction and especially the embargo on trade with the United States."

Then, again, at New Glasgow he used this language:

"Nova Scotia was not the natural market for Ontario flour. Geography was against the exchange. Why then not leave the people of Nova Scotia to buy American flour if they wanted it, and the people of Ontario to buy American coal if they wanted it."

This is the platform upon which the hon. gentleman stands. While these political missionaries, who give the people the benefit of their eloquence, do not try to reconcile their policy with the policy of their leaders, why do they not say they are in favor of Free Trade, and adopt it fairly and squarely, instead of beating about the bush? As to the hon. member for North Norfolk, we know what his affinities are, and where his ideas spring from, but I say let them go in for a united platform, let them support their leader and discuss unitedly any policy they like. I think we can safely say we have got a platform upon which we can fasten these hon. gentlemen; moreover, the first lieutenant of that party says the same thing. The hon. member for Centre Huron uses the term "legalized robbery" with reference to enriching our manufacturers at the expense of the poor man; he comes out fairly and squarely as a free trader, and there is the secret of the Opposition in the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite, and accounts for the resolution which was sprung upon the House before the Budget Speech. The members for North Norfolk and South Brant were afraid lest the hon. ex-Finance Minister should anticipate what they were going to say, and they feared he might mould public opinion, that he might promulgate certain views distasteful to themselves. They anticipated his views by moving a resolution in this House, declaring that their ideas were in favor of a sort of milk and water protection. I say we ought to have these statements before they go to the country, in order that the people may pronounce upon their views. The hon. member for Gloucester made a great speech of from four to five hours long—more or less—the other night; and with his usual eloquence, and that earnestness of manner characteristic of his countrymen, bewailed the misfortunes of the Lower Provinces. Poor Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were going to the dogs, everything was sacrificed to the interest of this Province; Nova Scotia being sacrificed to the Province of Ontario.

Mr. BRYANT.

That hon. gentleman, however, in the face of the declaration of the hon. member for Lambton, had to admit there was some degree of prosperity cropping up here and there; but the hon. gentleman said: "Look at the exodus from our country; people are leaving every hour." The hon. gentleman in drawing this picture, says the Minister of Agriculture, has sent a false report down to this House, and he does not believe that it is a correct report. He does not believe there are as many as 4,000,000 of people in this Dominion, and bewails the misfortunes of his countrymen, attributing the whole of them to this abominable National Policy. Now, these gentlemen, I might say these apostles of Protection, the members for South Brant and North Norfolk, have been going about the country gathering up a little information about public affairs, and they are forced to add their testimony to the prosperity of the country. Sir, the Government wanted no better defenders than those hon. gentlemen. Take their speeches from beginning to end and they are manifestos declaring that the fiscal policy of the present Government is a success. In whatever direction you go you find an increase in manufactures, and they are forced to admit that our manufacturers are making a home-market—not over 3,000 miles away—but at the door of the farmer. Their whole argument is in favor of Protection and of the fiscal policy of the Government; but, Sir, these hon. gentlemen, while admitting that the policy of the Government has brought prosperity—for the hon. member for Lambton says that as a matter of fact the country is prosperous—attribute it to various reasons. They admit, in the first place, that the country is prosperous, but they say that a revenue Tariff is a success. They beat about the bush to find an excuse for it. They say the hon. Finance Minister has no right to say that his policy has made the country prosperous. Providence did it all, they say. We all look forward, with a great deal of pleasure and respect to Providence smiling benignly upon us on all occasions, but it is a most extraordinary thing that, when a Grit Government is in power, Providence does not smile upon us and help us. They had good crops from 1874 to 1879, with few exceptions; indeed, they had better crops in that period than we have had since, and yet Providence did not smile upon them. And why? Because Providence helps those who help themselves. They sat with arms folded and let the country go to the dogs, and how could they expect Providence to help them. These hon. gentlemen now adopt a new role. They say you are putting heavy burdens on the people by the imposition of these fiscal duties; you have taken $4,000,000 out of the pockets of the people and what was done with it? Well, at all events that sum represents a surplus; it represents something in actual existence at any rate. A good and frugal farmer finding himself in embarrassed circumstances will do his utmost to make the soil produce as much as possible. He applies to it all the well known rules of husbandry by which to increase its productiveness, and when he gets a surplus—more than he requires for his living—he puts it in the bank either to pay off the mortgage or to add to his capital. Surely he is not any poorer by doing so. It is the same way with the Government. By the imposition of these duties—though the matter was at the time prospective and doubtful—the Finance Minister who proved himself a good prophet, obtained the surplus which we now enjoy. We have that much money to put to capital account, but this is an experience which hon. gentlemen opposite never enjoyed. It seems to me that the fact that we are able to raise a large revenue is an evidence that we are not in a very unfortunate position, and a strong proof of the prosperity of the country. But, say these hon. gentlemen, people are leaving the country in every direction. It seems to me that if the leader of the Opposition still maintains the idea which he promulgated a few years ago, and if the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) still adheres to the opinions expressed in his celebrated Dundee speech, and says that the National Policy is a system of legalized robbery, we have a right to ask these hon. gentlemen that they shall, now, once and forever, promulgate their policy, and let the country know what they intend to do. I am satisfied that the country does not want a policy which will place us at a disadvantage with the people of the United States. These hon. gentlemen do not say what kind of a policy they want. If they want a defensive policy let us know it. If they want a defensive policy, or a revenue Tariff policy, or a retaliatory policy, let us know it. They say that such a policy as we now enjoy might have been useful some time ago, but that now it is a thing of the past. But if, as some of these hon. gentlemen say, a defensive policy was good in 1876, why is it not good now, and why should we return to a revenue policy. I was rather severely criticized because I gave the definition of their policy once before, but I shall now give the definition adopted by the Chicago Tariff Convention some time ago. At that convention it was Resolved, That a Tariff for revenue only, is a system of duties on imports based on the false and ruinous idea that the Government will look out for itself and the people must look out for themselves, that home industry will thrive most when it is least cared for in the laws, and that it is expedient to hire foreigners to produce manufactures for our use, while tens of thousands of our workmen are deprived of employment and our own good raw materials be neglected to make room for importations—a system which has always ended in prostrating our industries and in reducing multitudes to idleness.

It seems to me that this is rather a good definition of a revenue policy, and one which we have had illustrated and proved by what we have heard in this house. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) endeavored to prove the failure of the National Policy, by showing that the exports had fallen off largely on some sixty articles. He says we have fallen off in our exports of manufactured goods, $1,652,610, but if the hon. gentleman desired to place the case fairly before the public, he would have placed a list of the imports alongside the list he gave us. I find that between 1878 and 1881 there has been a falling off in imports of twenty-nine different articles, of no less a sum than $3,296,468, which conclusively shows that our manufacturers have got the home market. Among the articles to which I refer, are musical instruments, axes, stoves, furniture and another article which is so dear to the heart of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson)—candy. It seems, therefore, that even the hon. member for South Brant makes more money than he did, now that he has got a home market, and I would like the hon. gentleman, when he gets up, to tell us how much more he manufactured this year than last, and whether he has not found his market in Manitoba, the North-West and the eastern Provinces? There is another industry which has thriven under the influence of the National Policy, and that is fruit. In the one article of green fruit alone, the importation has fallen off $70,000 in the course of one year. If the hon. gentleman had been disposed to be fair, he would have stated these facts, and would have shown, also, that the inter-provincial trade is proved by the fact that the importations into Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have fallen from $17,947,689 in 1878, to $14,016,366 in 1881. I cannot imagine that the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick eat less or work less than they did before, and yet they have imported $3,000,000 less than they did in 1878, and have exported $1,000,000 more. The Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, in 1878, exported $15,469,562, and in 1881, $16,349,868. This shows an actual difference, in their entire trade, between the two years of $4,000,000. The natural conclusion which we draw from these facts is, that they have the whole market. As a further proof of inter-provincial trade, let me point out that Nova Scotia imported from the United States, in 1878, of flour from wheat $605,633 worth, and, in 1881, only $98,699 worth; and of oatmeal, in 1878, $4,286 worth; and, in 1881, $255 worth. I do not think this reduction is accounted for by Scotchmen giving up their oatmeal porridge, because they do not generally do that. In New Brunswick we find that the imports of flour from the United States, in 1878, were $336,722 worth, and, in 1881, $83,299; and of oatmeal, in 1878, $1,514 worth; and, in 1881, only $440 worth. In Prince Edward Island the importations of flour, in 1878, were $50,536 worth; and, in 1881, $9,169 worth; and of oatmeal, in 1878, $456; and none in 1881. Another fact which, to my mind, conclusively shows that we have secured the home market is, that in bleached and unbleached cottons, gingham, jeans, &c., the importations have fallen in these three Provinces from $768,912 worth in 1878, to $286,881 worth in 1881, or a difference of $482,931. This must show that these goods were manufactured in the country, unless we say that the people used less cottons. Now, let us see how this inter-provincial trade has benefitted the farmers. These gentlemen coolly and deliberately talk of this Tariff injuring the farmers in the presence of men who know as much about it as they do themselves. I apprehend that a farmer knows what benefits him as well as a manufacturer or anyone else, and when we find that there has been such a change in the course of two or three years, we have a right to attribute it largely to the National Policy. We find that the importations of grain for home consumption have fallen from $13,438,758 in 1878, to $2,397,250 in 1881, or a difference of no less than $11,041,508. That is one benefit that the farmers of this Dominion have derived. We also find that the exports of horses, in 1878, were $1,273,728, and, in 1881, $2,094,037; and of cattle, $1,152,334 in 1878, and $3,464,871 in 1881. I might go on and show the same increase in our exports of sheep, barley, Indian corn, oats, wheat, rye, peas, and a whole catalogue of articles which form the produce of the farmer; and I think that the hon. gentleman will admit, if he concedes that the hon. the Minister of Finance has not cooked the Public Accounts, that the farmers have now a home market, and have an opportunity of selling their produce at almost any price they ask. They have the market brought from 3,000 miles distant to their own doors, they have all their wants supplied within their own reach, and in the eloquent language of the hon. member for North Norfolk:

"A farmer raises a bushel of corn which he sells for 50 cents in a foreign market, and with the proceeds he can buy three yards of cotton; but supposing the manufacturers brought to his door and the better market which it creates increases the price to 60 or 70 cents per bushel, and although import duties are levied on cottons from Manchester so as to add largely to its price, still he may be enabled to buy four yards of cotton with his bushel of corn instead of the three yards it was able to purchase before, as the purchasing power of his labor is increased."

That is another portion of the brains of the hon. gentleman's speech. The hon. members for North Norfolk and South Brant might find evidence of the extraordinary success of the fiscal policy of the Government also in our exports. We find that in the last three years of the Administration of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the exports were $236,165,405, and the imports for home consumption $282,233,268, or an excess of exports over imports of $46,067,773. Now, look at the other side of the picture: during the last three years of the present wise and economical Administration the exports were $257,603,536, and the imports for home consumption $243,734,561, or an excess of exports over imports of $13,968,975. How can hon. gentlemen explain these figures? They may perhaps attempt to explain them away, but to my mind these figures are unanswerable.

We can draw but one conclusion, namely, that there has been a great change in the producing power of the country, that a great benefit has been derived, that a great change has taken place in placing our finances in a healthy condition, and the fact that the excess of exports and imports in the three years show a difference of $13,000,000 is strong evidence in favor of the Conservative Government. As another evidence of the benefit of the National Policy we can point to some of the industries of this country, and I shall be able to show that the reckless statements made by the hon. gentlemen opposite, in regard to the schedule of the hon. Minister of Finance, are not justified by the facts.

After Recess.

Mr. RYKERT. I have shown, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen opposite had no settled or defined policy. Upon the question of fiscal policy they were entirely at loggerheads, that while the leader was a pronounced free trader and his first lieutenant was a free trader, we had, on the other hand, the hon. members for North Norfolk and South Brant who were pronounced protectionists in the past, and were now endeavoring to shift their sails in order, if possible, to catch the popular vote. I think I have also shown that the only policy of these hon. gentlemen was a desire and greed for office. No man will attempt to controvert this after hearing the record of these hon. gentlemen and remembering their action during the present Parliament, and the extraordinary efforts made by them in 1872-73 to seize the reins of office from the hon. gentlemen who now control the Treasury benches. I think I have shown that those public lecturers have been at times free traders and protectionists. Whenever it suited the view of their audiences they were free traders and delivered free trade speeches, but when it suited them to play the part of protectionists they at once appealed to their past record as contained in the parliamentary Hansard and said: "there are my speeches," so they have the happy faculty on all occasions of adapting themselves to the audiences which they are addressing. I think I have shown satisfactorily to this House that those hon. gentlemen who now profess to lead public opinion attempted to frame a policy for this House and country which was not deserving of public confidence. I have also shown, I think, out of their own mouths, that the country is prospering, and that under the benign influence of the National Policy it is bound to advance and bound to prosper. I think I have also shown, out of their own mouths, although it is like drawing their eye-teeth from them, that the revenue vastly exceeds the expenditure. Having accomplished that much, I think I can fairly claim to have performed the task which I assigned to myself on opening my remarks, and have satisfactorily redeemed the pledge I made when I commenced my speech. I have some few more observations to make in respect to the National Policy. I desire to correct the representations of hon. gentlemen opposite, and show that those who made these representations, in my judgment have not the interests of this country at heart, but made them from a desire to remove the effect of the magnificent speech delivered by the hon. leader of the Financial Department of this Dominion. These hon. gentlemen felt the effect of that speech like a bomb-shell in the camp, and when the hon. the Finance Minister made the public declaration that, after a year's experience of the National Policy, he could point to an overflowing Treasury of $4,000,000, the statement fell like sour vinegar upon those hon. gentleman, and they made all sorts of contortions. There remains the plain, naked fact, that there are upwards of $4,000,000 in the Treasury, and they, to break the effect of it, are obliged to declare that this sum has been extracted from the pockets of the poor people. The hon. member for North Norfolk might possibly have pointed with the greatest pride and satisfaction, if he had chosen to do so, to the very extraordinary and rapid advance made in another industry, that is, the cotton industry. I have before me a record, showing the vast increase in that enterprise. The mills of 1878, had an aggregate of 75,000 spindles, which, with 173,000 now being erected, would bring the total to 248,000. It has been asked what was the use of all this importation of raw cotton. We have the answer there. In every direction these cotton manufactories are springing up, and the vast increase in the importation of raw cotton, from 5,800,000 lbs. in 1877, to 16,018,000 lbs. in 1881, shows clearly and conclusively where it has gone. I am happy to state I have received to-day, an application to the Government for water power on the Welland Canal, for a factory that will employ 400 hands. In every direction we have people applying for permission to utilize the water power along that canal; and I look hopefully to its supplying many manufactories along its line. Those hon. gentlemen opposite, on a former occasion, after I had addressed the House on the Budget Speech, took the opportunity to set one of themselves up to cry down the credit of the town I have the honor to represent. I do not know that it was greatly to their credit, because they dislike its representative to run down the town. I know that they have no partiality for myself.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). Oh, we have.

Mr. RYKERT. They have no great reason for any partiality, but still that does not justify their discrediting the town, or my constituents, whose confidence I have enjoyed for nearly a quarter of a century. As an instance of what is being done by the manufacturers at present, I shall quote an article which I cut from one of the Hamilton papers, showing the immense trade springing up between the Dominion and the North-West. It is dated 6th March:

"Among the goods sent from this city to Manitoba and British Columbia during last month were: Clothing, $70,292.87; boots and shoes, $7,526.20; stationery, $5,490.29; stoves and castings, $7,634.54; tobacco, $6,041.52; groceries, $3,131.49, and other articles, making in all $129,056 67."

These goods were all sold in one month, $129,056 worth, giving evidence of the great benefit of the National Policy now in securing to ourselves this inter-provincial trade. I am addressing myself more particularly to the hon. member for South Brant, because he is going to follow me, because he is a protectionist one day and a free trader the next. The head of one portion of his speech is free trade, and the tail protection; and I would like him to explain what the body is. If the body is generally protection, as it is, we should know the reason. The hon. gentleman never told us that manufacturing industries had been developed by the Tariff in his own city. I hold in my hand a Brantford paper, which may be the organ of the hon. gentleman for all I know, setting forth the benefits of the National Policy. I have been surprised and disappointed that he did not take an early opportunity of telling the House what this paper reports. Under the date of February 10th, and the heading—"Good-bye Mr. Paterson," I read as follows:—

"Mr. William Paterson has taken his departure for Ottawa. What a pleasant story he will pour into the ear of his chief! He will tell Mr. Blake that the commercial aspect of Brantford never looked brighter than it does to-day. He will say that our new cotton mill now employs in the neighborhood of 200 hands, and that the proprietor has a sufficient number of orders on hand to keep his mill going for twelve months. He will report that many of our manufacturers have at least doubled their works during the past fifteen months, and in proof of this he will declare that in the year 1881 alone the new machinery purchased, and the new buildings erected, by the heads of our industries, represented a sum not less than $250,000. Mr. Paterson will also tell Mr. Blake that the North-West trade, given to Ontario by the present Tariff, has brought thousands of dollars to Brantford, and then to back up this statement he will say that the Harris Agricultural Implement firm, who have eight large warehouses in Manitoba, have determined to build immense premises to enable them to supply the orders that come from the Prairie Province. Mr. Paterson will also take delight in detailing the numerous small industries, such as canning and fruit evaporating works, that have sprung up in Brantford since the early part of 1879. In this connection he will probably say that a company with a subscribed capital of $50,000, has recently been organized in this city to manufacture farm and dairy utensils, and that premises and lands have already been purchased for the purpose. But the acme of Mr. Paterson's satisfaction will be reached when he informs his leader that another English manufacturer, attracted by the field that Canada, through the beneficent agency of the National Policy, offers for the industry, is, in conjunction with Mr. Slater, of the cotton mill, entering into negotiations with the city to erect a large wincey factory in Brantford. How we envy our member! What a lucky man he is to be the bearer of such good news! What a glowing picture William the Distorter will, on the floor of Parliament, draw of the good fortune that has, in these National Policy days, fallen upon the chief municipality of his constituency!

"Good-bye William! Don't forget to mention the new cotton factory, the new farm and dairy works, the new wincey mill, the new canning factories, the proposed extensions under consideration by Buck, of stove fame, and Harris, Son & Co., the large increase in the workmen at the G. T. R. shops, and last, but not least, the boom in your own establishment. Ta! ta! William. Ah! but you are a lucky man."

I expect the hon. gentleman, in his speech, will tell us all about that subject. The hon. the Finance Minister did not know of these new industries, and, consequently, did not include them in the schedule he laid before the House lately. The hon. gentleman opposite might have enlightened us on the matter, but chose to refrain. I fully expected that some hon. gentleman would have given us a quotation from the speech of my colleague in the Local Legislature. They say that no man of any experience or practical knowledge would stand up before a public audience and declare that the National Policy had benefitted our commercial and agricultural interests. I reply that no man will stand up and say that Mr. Neelon, the member for the Local Legislature, is not one of the most practical and experienced business men in the whole Dominion, and when hon. gentlemen opposite saw how this hon. gentleman put an end, in the Local Legislature, to the discussion of the National Policy by the Government, I would like to know how they felt. Up to the time he spoke, every little penny-a-liner and penny whistler of hon. gentlemen opposite aspiring to be leaders in politics, had something to say about the effects of the National Policy, with which the Local Legislature had nothing to do. But when the member for Lincoln arose in the Local House, it was like a bomb-shell in their camp. Speaking of St. Catharines, that miserable little place, so belabored by my opponent, he said he knew one establishment which, in 1878, employed only some sixty hands, that now employed 125, the production of the establishment during the Mackenzie regime reached between $50,000 and $60,000 a year; but now they amounted to $125,000. Another establishment, in 1879, turned out but $30,000 worth of goods, although they had three travelling agents endeavoring to sell them. During the last year the out-put was $100,000 and all the goods met with a ready sale. Let me give the testimony of Mr. Neelon as to the benefits of the National Policy. He said:

"In fact, the agriculturist secured at his very door, owing to the protective policy, from 15 to 30 per cent. more for these products than if he were compelled to sell them for export. Without a protective policy our artisans would be compelled to seek employment over the line, and our farmers must consequently seek their market for these products of the farm over the border. A ready and profitable market was now furnished for these articles at the farmer's own door, and if he did pay a little more for the goods he purchased he could, and should be quite willing to afford it. He thought that the National Policy, instead of being a detriment was of decided advantage to the farmer."

And he further said if he were in Ottawa he would support Sir John A. Macdonald. Now, let me give further testimony. I would like to give some information respecting my own town. Smith's saw factory employed thirty men in 1878, and sixty are employed there now, the sales are more than double. I cannot give the exact amount, but wages are increased to all the men; while everybody was then working only three-quarters time, now they are working full time. Collinson's factory employed fifty-five to fifty-seven men in 1878, and at present they number 107; they produced $58,000 worth of goods in 1878, and $107,000 in 1881. The Welland Vale works employed forty-five men in 1878, and now have 120; they manufactured $50,000 worth of goods in 1878, and now the amount is $140,000. I will just read now from a circular issued by another manufacturing company, which certainly corroborates what the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk said to this House, namely, that while the manufacturers' expenses have increased, yet the prices to the consumers are not greater. I hold in my hand a circular of Whitman & Barnes Manufacturing Company, one of the largest in our city (St. Catharines), employing 175 men, in which they say:

"We find that the orders for 1882 are at present far in excess of the total orders for 1881, and although some lines of stock used by us have advanced step by step for the last three or four years, still the prices of knives are not as high as four years ago; and it is our determination to keep prices as low as possible, giving first-class goods at a price that will make us a living profit, and give satisfaction to our numerous customers."

The hon. member for North Norfolk and the hon. member for Lambton have spoken of the incorrectness of the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Finance with regard to the prosperity of the country. Now, I find they have omitted to mention a great many instances of prosperity. In sight of my own door a manufactory established in 1878, employs now about 100 men. Why even the Thorold Post, a good substantial Grit paper, finds fault with the hon. the Minister of Finance for giving them the go-by. It says:

"How was it that Sir Leonard Tilley, in the list which he submitted to the House of Commons, of the factories which have sprung up under the benign influence of the National Policy, made no reference to our Thorold industries, which can come under that head, namely, the two knitting factories, pulp mill, and basket factory, which altogether employ about 150 hands. Poor Thorold has been sadly left out in the cold by the Government, in more ways than one."

They never write an article without having a sting in the tail end, there is some little grievance against the Government, which, no doubt, they will rectify before long. Now, let me draw the attention of the House to another statement—I will not say it was made designedly—but the hon. gentleman from Lambton stated that in Montreal he had not been able to discover the Glass Company as one of these wonderful evidences of prosperity. I have here a letter from a manufacturing establishment, showing how many men they employed. It is called the Excelsior Glass Company, and was erected in the summer of 1881, working since then, the production is $1,000 per day, and up to Saturday, 2nd March, they employed 496 hands and had discharged some because they could not get coal from Nova Scotia fast enough. In September, 1881, they employed 525 hands. Now this is an industry which the hon. gentleman could not discover even with a search warrant. Then we find the hon. member for North Norfolk, who is so huge in the matter of figures, urging that most of these new establishments have long existed. Now it grieves him terribly to see these factories resuscitated. Nothing grieves hon. members of the Opposition so much as to see evident signs of prosperity in the country; they do not like it, and for that reason they would rather sacrifice everything—their country, their wives and relations—than themselves, and they will not see facts which are within their reach and knowledge. I have a letter from the Hyndman Company dated 13th March, 1882, in which they say: "We started in 1881,"—that is a pretty old concern is it not—"we are now employing twenty-five to twenty-seven men directly and about double as many indirectly." This establishment the member for Norfolk said was an old concern. Here is another company, R. H. Gray & Co., which he says is an old firm also. I do not wonder that the member for North Norfolk will not like that company being resuscitated. Well, it started in January

1878, a weakly miserable concern, employing ten to twenty hands; it now employs sixty hands steadily, and the proprietor states: "We are pleased to bear testimony to the good effects of the National Policy." Then another statement from the Bolt and Nut Works of Toronto, see what the proprietor says. They failed in 1874, under the benign influence and regime of hon. gentleman opposite, and remained closed until August, 1879; they are now getting steady work, they are running from 7 a. m. till 10 at night; they employ 193 men in their factory, and a large number besides making boxes. Under the old Tariff it had no existence whatever. The salaries range from $1.25 to $3.25 per day, and this is, no doubt, bad news to the hon. gentleman opposite. I can almost fancy I can see the wrinkles on the face of the hon. member for South Brant and his annoyance, because new industries are flourishing in the country. I will now address myself to a subject with which I am somewhat familiar, and which I am sure our friends will be glad to hear discussed, and on this question there is one thing in which we have an advantage over them; it is this: We have surpluses where they had deficits, and that is the great difference between them and our party. We have also the fact staring us in the face, that the public debt has largely increased, though at the same time we know that that debt had been increased for works of public utility. I referred, this afternoon, to the speech of the hon. member for Centre Huron, in which he said publicly—when showing that bright shield to the capitalists of England—that the whole expenditure had been incurred for works of public utility. I cannot do better than repeat it, because it is a matter that I like to hear read, and because the hon. members for North Norfolk and West Middlesex are accustomed to proclaim to the general public that the debt had been increased by the extravagant course of Sir John A. Macdonald, during the time he was in power previous to their getting office, and pointing to the fact in order to justify their own extravagance during the preceding five years; in other words, while condemning what is wrong in the other party, they justify themselves in doing the same thing. The hon. member for Centre Huron says:

"The revenue has shown a continuous surplus during each year since Confederation, although it has in the interval been charged with much heavy expenditure of an exceptional kind, such as the outlay connected with the several Fenian attacks on the country, the acquisition and organization of new territory, and providing an adequate defensive force for the Dominion."

Now, Sir, that is the testimony of the hon. member for Centre Huron. Let us call into the witness box the master of the hon. gentleman, and see what he says. I find in the Globe—they have heard of that paper, no doubt—of November 16th, 1881, in speaking of Goldwin Smith, the following:—

"Who does not see that Mr. Smith wants the same thing for Canada, and is ready to decry this country if so he may injure its credit, and thus prevent development of its incalculable resources and induce the people to look to Washington or despair; it is true that the debt of the Dominion is large, but nineteen-twentieths of it have been incurred for productive purposes, and the interest has always been promptly paid. With no debt and without works, in which the money has been expended, the country would be infinitely poorer than it would be were the debt doubled without adding to the works."

Now there is the testimony, not only of the hon. member for Centre Huron, but of the organ of the party, that the public debt, large as it was, was justified under all the circumstances. When the hon. leader of the Opposition went down to the sea, he discussed the financial policy of the Government. He had never been much of a success at figures, but when he was not in the hearing of gentlemen who knew better he undertook the financial aspect of affairs in the Dominion of Canada. The hon. gentleman made a speech containing what I would call reckless statements. What struck me as being most remarkable was one in reference to the deficits of the late Government. Now, I have been on almost every platform in the Province of Ontario and heard these spouters talk about the deficits of the Dominion, but I never yet heard one of them say the deficits were caused by expenditures in the North-West Territory. But the hon. leader of the Opposition wanted to let himself down lightly by catching on to the coat tails of the Mackenzie Government. He stated the whole of these deficits were caused by expenditures in the North-West Territory. Let me read an extract from that speech, revised by himself, which I find in the St. John Daily Telegraph of February 16th—I believe the hon. member looks upon that as a good clear Grit paper:

"But for the North-West there would have been no deficits in the last Administration. It was the North-West that created them. If you remember what has been done they must go on. I believe they must go on."

Well, Sir, that is something satisfactory. We have a statement here under the hand of the Deputy Minister of Finance where I find what were the deficits and what were the expenditures. During the years 1875-76, this economical Government, of which the hon. gentleman was so distinguished a member, ran behind $1,900,085; in 1876-77, $1,460,027; in 1877-78, $985,776, making a total of $4,346,588. The great trouble is this: that the hon. gentleman knows so little about figures, he cannot tell whether it is capital account or otherwise. If he will turn to the 24th schedule he will find that the Pacific Railway expenditure is carried to capital account. And how did they get the money for that? Why, they borrowed it. The whole expenditure of the North-West, in 1875-76, was $1,136,194; in 1876-77, $918,742; 1877-78, $864,890, or a total of $2,919,026, showing a difference between that and the deficits of $1,427,762. Now, Sir, why did not the hon. gentleman state the fact? It seems to me it would have been far better and more to his credit in aspiring to lead the government had he stated the facts just as they were, and allowed the country to judge whether his position was better than that of the right hon. gentleman at the head of the government. Now I propose briefly to refer to some financial statements in connection with this matter. The hon. member for West Middlesex, who lately has assumed the position of Minister of Finance for the Opposition, undertook to criticize the expenditure of the Government, and in that criticism he did not deal fairly with those figures at all. Nevertheless, I do not blame the hon. gentleman because he knows as little about figures probably, as the leader of the Opposition, and for that reason it is natural for him to mix and muddle figures. Now, let us take a few figures: for 1877-78 they collected $22,375,013 at a cost of $5,301,124, or at the rate of 23 per cent. For 1881, they collected $29,635,297, at a cost of $5,683,123, or at the rate of 19 per cent., a difference of 4 per cent. in favor of the Conservative Government. The collection of Customs cost, under the Grit regime in 1877, 5.82 per cent.; in 1878, 5.59 per cent., and, in 1881, 3.89 per cent., or a difference of nearly 2 per cent. in favor of the present Government. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) took the average expenditure of the last two years of the Grit Government, and he took those years because he thought he could make a point with them, although he knows right well that the last year was no fair test. In that year they starved everybody and everything in order that they might be ready to meet the electors, as was evidenced by their bungling on the great public works. They so starved the Welland Canal that it has taken thousands and thousands of dollars to cover up their neglect. The average expenditure during their last two years, according to that hon. gentleman, was $23,511,229; the average expenditure under two years of Conservative rule was $25,177,574, or a difference of about $1,665,355. Now, if the hon. gentleman had been desirable of telling us facts—and I do not accuse him of being so desirous—he would have informed the House that the increase was caused by their own recklessness, by adding to the public debt $34,000,000, making an increase in interest of $1,521,902, and $542,497 sinking fund, making a total of about $2,064,381, which, if taken into account, would leave a balance in favor of Conservative rule of $399,016. We will now take the ordinary controllable expenditure, to which he also referred. In the two years of Grit rule the amount was $13,377,588; during the two years of Conservative rule, $14,257,415; making a balance of $879,827 in favor of the Grits. But from this you must deduct the item of Census, which was not an expenditure in their year, and also the excess in the expenditure of Indian Affairs. These items in their two years amounted to $731,698, and in the two years of Conservative rule to $1,626,944, making a difference in favor of Conservative rule on those items of about $894,944. Deducting that from the excess of expenditure mentioned by the hon. gentleman, we have $15,177 in favor of the Conservative Government. Now, Sir, these hon. gentlemen say your ordinary controllable expenditure has increased very rapidly, and no doubt it has; but I am going to prove, out of their own mouths, that that expenditure has not increased as rapidly as they anticipated, or as rapidly as they stated the country would require. I will not go back to last year's expenditure, but I will give them the benefit of quoting the Estimates for this year which are the largest. I do that for this reason: that when the hon. the leader of the Opposition went down by the seaside, to discuss the financial affairs of the nation, he would not take last year's expenditure at all, so I will follow his example, so as to put the worst possible phase on our side of the question. Now, the Estimates of 1882, are $8,381,673, and, comparing this with the expenditure of 1875-76, we find a difference of $188,101 in favor of that year. If you deduct from this the excess in 1882, on account of Indians and Census, you have a sum in our favor of $682,793, which added to the other balance makes a total, in favor of 1882, of $870,894 as compared with 1875-76. Now, take another view of the matter. The expenditures of 1874-75 were $7,868,690, which, deducted from the Estimates of this year, leaves an excess for 1882 of $512,983. Deduct from this the excess on account of Indians, $813,829, and Census, $41,628, in all $855,457, leaving a balance in favor of 1882 of $342,454. Let us now compare the Estimates of 1877-78 with those of 1882, and let us deduct from the Estimates of 1882, those items which did not occur in their time, or the amount of excess in 1882. These are: Indians, excess, $487,805; Census, $58,947; Public Works, 706,281; Immigration, $197,616; Ocean Service, $78,256; Militia, $140,364; or a total of $1,669,269, which deducted from the Estimates of this year, leaves $6,712,404; and if from this you take the expenditures of 1877-78, you find that the difference is only $169,894, and this in face of the fact of the great development of the country. Let us now make a comparison of the ordinary expenditure of the two Governments. This ordinary expenditure for the last three years of the Grit Government amounted to $21,947,362, and for the last three years of this Government to $21,134,992, leaving a balance in favor of Tory rule of $812,374. I will now make a comparison between the expenditure of 1881 and the Estimates made by the late Finance Minister in his Budget Speech. His estimates were as follows: Legislation, $600,000; Civil Government, $900,000; Administration of Justice, $900,000; Marine, $900,000; Militia, $1,050,000; Public Works, $1,500,000; Immigration, $500,000; Miscellaneous, $150,000, or a total of $6,500,000; while the expenditures for 1881 for the same services were $5,534,593. I think, Sir, that when we find that this country has, during the past year, been able to carry on its affairs without visibly increasing the national debt, when we find that within the last eight months we have been able to reduce the national debt by $1,300,000, and that we have to our credit $4,000,000, it is a very satisfactory exhibit. This is not money wasted; it has been paid by the people, and no person has complained of it. Can hon. gentlemen opposite give a single instance in which the people have complained of these taxes during the last year? They cannot name one. Now, Sir, some of the speakers in this debate have stated that we are indebted to the Liberal party for everything that has been a benefit to this country. That is a statement I have heard made on public platforms during the last quarter of a century, and I have failed, with all the research I could bring to bear on it, to discover what great work of public utility is entitled to be placed to the credit of the Reform party. What are they? Will some hon. gentleman name one great act of public utility which that party has placed on the Statute-book? Now, I am not going to review their past legislation, because if I attempted to do so, I would have to look at a blank. Their record is before the country—a record of extravagance and corruption, a record which shows that they were totally incapable of administering our public affairs, a record of deficits substituted for surpluses. I am not going to go over that ground, which was so well covered by the hon. member for Rouville, (Mr. Gigault), who, I think, must have satisfied every hon. member of this House in the very eloquent and logical speech which he delivered, that the Reform party can lay nothing to their credit in respect of legislation. We, on the other hand, can say that we have a happy and prosperous country, we can say that we have a happy and a contented people, we can say that our expenditure has been kept within the revenue, we can point to an overflowing Treasury, we can point to a home market for our people, we can point to our laborers and mechanics enjoying peace and prosperity, and we can point to the rapid development of the North-West, a country which will become the financial safety-valve of this Dominion. With regard to that country, I cannot do better than quote from a recent speech of the Hon. Senator Beck:

“I went to Winnipeg last summer and there saw a thriving city of 15,000 people, with a railroad about finished to Lake Superior. It was being pushed with great energy and abundant means westward to the Pacific Ocean to reach the trade of Australia, China, Japan and the Indies on English soil, with cheap ships ready to furnish free goods for transportation over this continent to Europe. I went west of Winnipeg nearly 200 miles on that road, and saw thousands and thousands of acres of wheat clearing forty bushels to the acre, weighing sixty-three and sixty-five pounds to the bushel, and was assured by undoubted authority that on Peace River, 1,200 miles north-west of where I was, wheat was being produced in immense quantity equal to the best I saw in Winnipeg, while great herds of cattle were being fed without cost on as fine grassy land as the world affords.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, one hon. gentleman has stated that we were the subservient followers of the right hon. leader of the Government. Well, Sir, I admit the charge if he pleases to term an honest following subservient. I am proud to be an humble follower of that hon. gentleman. But, Sir, we can say what they cannot say—we never turned traitor to our hon. leader. In the hour of our hon. leader's greatest difficulties, the Conservative party stood shoulder to shoulder at the back of the hon. gentleman as the leader of the party; they recognized that he, of all others, was Canada's greatest statesman; and it is no reflection upon us to say, that we have followed that hon. gentleman faithfully. I take it as a compliment, and I thank the hon. gentleman for it. Sir, what are the issues before the country? The right hon. leader of the Opposition down by the sea has stated them. He says: “There are three issues before the country, and they are plain and definite—revenue and expenditure, the Tariff, and the development of our young country.” Sir, on these three questions we take issue, and we have the advantage in taking issue upon them, because we can point to the rapid development of our country, to a wise and economical arrangement of our financial affairs which has produced a revenue far in excess of our expenditure, and to a Tariff which has promoted and built up new industries, a Tariff which is day by day developing the material resources of our country. We have to choose between these two parties: on the one hand, we have a disorganized party, having a divided fealty, recognizing no particular leader either within or without Parliament; a party desiring to obtain power for their personal aggrandizement and not for the interest of the country; a party bound together for the defeat of the Government, but for no other special purpose; a party which, when in power, turned surpluses into deficits and did their utmost to destroy the prosperity of the country. On the other hand, we can point with pride and satisfaction to the fact that we have a Government with a policy well defined and well matured, a policy which extricated our finances from confusion and filled our Treasury to repletion; we have a Government able to deal with the question of the development of the North-West Territory; we have a Government which has done its utmost to encourage and foster the industries of the country, and I do not hesitate to express my belief that when the electors of this country shall have an opportunity of pronouncing upon its policy they will render an overwhelming verdict for the Government which has sought to encourage the struggling industries of the Dominion and protect the rights and liberties of the people.

Mr. PATERSON (South Brant). I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words before this debate closes, and in doing so I will try to remember the desire of the Government that the debate may soon be brought to a close, and also to remember that there are other gentlemen who desire to speak on this question as well as myself. I will, therefore, endeavor to limit my remarks to a few points that seem to me necessary to be touched upon. It would be a difficult matter for a member on this side of the House to say anything very new, very fresh or very interesting on this subject after the long, able and exhaustive speeches of many members of the party to which I belong. Still, we all have our own way of presenting our case, and I desire to present the question at issue between the two political parties as they strike my mind, as I see them, as I feel them to be. And I would say that, while I fully recognize the fact that the speaker who has just sat down has reminded us of, and which we are constantly reminded of by every speaker who addresses the House from the Government benches, that we are but a miserable minority in the House, and but a miserable minority in the country, as they affirm; yet, though we may be but a minority, hon. gentlemen recognize the fact that there is some little life to be found on this side of the House yet. I do not deny that the party to which I belong was defeated in the election of 1878. Hon. gentleman opposite are very fond of reminding us of that fact; that fact was borne home on our minds, that we could not fail to note. The hon. the leader of the Government, in a congratulatory speech he made shortly after the elections of 1878, was reported to have said that on the day after the election it was impossible to find a Grit in Ontario, or a Rouge in Quebec, even if you offered a reward. Their faces were so long that our good friend Mr. Geo. Brown, who has gone to his rest, and whom the Conservative party did honor to in common with ourselves, after he had gone, was charged 15 cents for shaving on the day following the contest, instead of 10 cents, on account of his face being so long. The Reform party believes in the eternal fitness of things. There is a time to laugh and a time to refrain from laughing, and, it strikes me, there was nothing particular for the Reform party to laugh at on the 18th September, 1878. I will not say it was a time to weep, but it was not the most appropriate time to laugh. We had been defeated in the country, we were passing through a long period of depression; but if it were true we had been so beaten, if it might be said we should have hidden our diminished heads, hon. gentlemen opposite, at all events, know that the heads have since come to light; that though beaten at the polls, there is a party which stands by the principles contended for at that time, a party that is represented in this House, a party not represented in this House in proportion to its numbers in the country, but a party that we believe, when an appeal is made to the people again, will come back to this House numerically stronger than they are at the present time. It is not always a proof that men are right because they secure the verdict of the people. If the people had the questions fairly presented and if they were properly understood, then I would bow, and I bow now to their decision, but I would bow more complacently to the public will as expressed at the polls. But the contention of the party to which I belong is this: that the people of the country did not pronounce in favor of the policy that hon. gentlemen opposite have given us, and which they term the National Policy. The question that was asked the public was to place in power men who would give the manufacturers better markets, larger markets, bring more of them into existence than before, that would give the artisans higher wages, and give the farmer higher prices for the products they had to sell. It was an appeal to the pockets of every class in the community, and though hon. gentlemen would not redeem the promises they had given, because to fulfil one would have been in conflict with another, they were careful in the different Provinces and on different platforms to make such promises as, for the time being, they thought would catch the popular ear. And thus it was they attained to power, while the hon. the Finance Minister himself is an evidence of the fact I am pointing out. The hon. the Finance Minister—if newspaper reports of meetings are correct, I have no reason to doubt they are not—stood on a platform in his own Province, a few days previous to the election of 1878, and though he did not use the words himself, his colleague running with him—he, the hon. the Finance Minister, being on the platform with him, and by his silence endorsing what his colleague said—stated that no statesman would ever propose to place a duty on flour. The hon. the Finance Minister did not deny that on the platform, and the audience no doubt interpreted, from the promises and statements made by the colleague of the present hon. Finance Minister, not challenged or contradicted by him, but endorsed by his silence, that the policy of the Conservative party, if restored to power, would not be a policy that would tax the food of the people of his Province. The hon. Finance Minister himself, knowing that the people of his Province were opposed to the burthens of taxation being increased, assured them that it was not contemplated to increase the Tariff, but simply to readjust it. When the leader of the Government was giving utterance to sentiments different to that from platforms in Ontario, word was passed over the wires to New Brunswick, and a telegram was sent from there to him, to ask if he meditated and had stated there would be an increase in the Tariff, and he replied that it was nonsense, that there was no increase of the Tariff meditated, but simply a readjustment of it. Then I ask whether the people of the Maritime Provinces gave their verdict in favor of the policy which hon. gentlemen said they had pronounced on. Hon. gentlemen said that if restored to power they would not increase the taxation and not tax breadstuffs; and as they were restored to power on these distinct pledges, it is for the people of those Provinces to settle the question with hon. gentlemen opposite who certainly misled them at that time. Another cause that led to the disaster was the continued misrepresentation of the Reform party with regard to the position they occupied towards the manufacturing interests. From every platform we were denounced as the enemy of the manufacturers, we were told that our policy was a policy for the destruction of manufacturers. The Finance Minister himself stated that unless there was a change in the Tariff within two years, almost every manufacturing interest in this country would be closed up. Such extravagant statements being made, and a time of depression existing in the country, ears receive the words they utter and hearts believe them to be true. Had they contemplated and more clearly looked at the position of parties in the history of this country, they would not have entertained the views that some of them appeared to have entertained at that time. What has been the history of political parties with respect to the manufacturers of this country. Their position was not one of antagonism to the manufacturers. I have challenged on the platform, as I challenge the hon. gentleman now, to point out an act of the Mackenzie Administration designed to do an injury to the manufacturing industries of the country; and I defy them to produce a proof of Mr. Mackenzie ever having levelled a blow at those interests. Let them take up that challenge. This is beyond their power, so far as I remember, to prove any act of the kind. But, on the other hand, I can adduce to the House and country, proofs that cannot be refuted, that while the Mackenzie Administration were careful to conserve the rights and interests of all classes of the community, they took care that the manufacturing industries should also have that share of encouragement that I believe they ought to have. Hon. gentlemen opposite say hear, hear. They seem to think it a strange thing for a member to stand on this side of the House and pronounce himself in favor of our manufacturing industries. The member for Lincoln spent three or four hours this afternoon speaking, during which he referred to speeches I have made, and quoted garbled extracts therefrom, as well as from the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and several other members. His object was perhaps a double one. It may have been, primarily, to misrepresent the sentiments of myself and other hon. gentlemen in the House; but he may have had, in the second place, another object in view. He may be cognizant of the fact that nothing he can say would be received on its own merits; and in the speech in which he attempted to argue the question on its merits, he pursued this year precisely the same plan he has pursued on the occasion of every Budget Speech. He made the old argument, searched Hansard for proofs, he quoted from eminent speakers portions of their speeches in order that they might appear in the Hansard as his own, and lend grace and dignity to that performance. In his speech of last year you will find the same remarks and garbled quotations, and you will see that my hon. friend the member for North Norfolk then referred to his garbled quotations, that he would like to see a retaliatory policy. But, when the hon. member for North Norfolk said that it would be unwise, impolitic and injudicious to attempt a retaliatory policy, did the hon. gentleman opposite quote that utterance of my hon. friend? No, he did not quote it, and he quoted it not designedly, because he had received the explanation, and it was in the Hansard, as made by my hon. friend last year. He has quoted from my speech, and said a great deal with reference to it. He pretended to have found a mine there, and the sentiments uttered by me in that speech, he said that I do not hold at present. He is mistaken: I stand here to-night prepared to utter the same sentiments—to say that on no occasion, either in the House or on the platform, do I remember having uttered sentiments contrary to the true tenor of my argument contained in that speech. And I am willing to be held to the tenor of that speech, because, at that time, I uttered the sentiments I believed; and while I hold the right, if my views become enlarged, if my stores of information become any greater, if to-day I see things in a different light, to change my views and the expressions of my views, I would not disguise my real sentiments. It would, indeed, be strange if, in this Parliament, when the able men on both sides have debated this question with the vigor and power we have seen for many years past, if a man might not learn something new with reference to these matters. But while I am willing to admit that my views may have been, perhaps, a little modified, and that my expressions may have been, in some points, a little toned down by experience, I yet stand here, abiding by the tenor of that speech, when that speech is fairly quoted and taken in its connection. And just permit me here to make an allusion to one instance the hon. gentleman related, in which he was thoroughly unfair to myself in making—that is, in reference to a word or two that passed between me and the hon. the Finance Minister in the course of that hon. gentleman's speech, with reference to an interjection I made, in which the hon. member for Lincoln said to-night that I had denied the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister. I did not deny that statement, and I believe my hon. friend did not so understand me. I have not heard any hon. gentleman during this argument express himself in that way. The hon. the Finance Minister was speaking about the employment of labor and the bringing in of men from the United States. I asked him was there a tax on labor coming in. He replied: "No; but we propose giving laborers the same encouragement that the hon. member complimented his leader for giving to the cigar industry, when he put a duty on cigars, saying it had brought thousands into the country." What I said to the hon. the Finance Minister, which he will admit, was—that it was very nice, but his quotation was not correct. I knew in the speech I made there was a sentiment like that, but at that time I did not think the phraseology ran exactly as it did; and I said the quotation was not exactly correct, and I thought I had said that the effect of the imposition of that duty by the Finance Minister of that day had been the same, as if a thousand men had been brought from other countries and set to work in this country. But I am bound to say that the phraseology of my speech in the Hansard did not bear me out, and so far the hon. Finance Minister was right. That is very different to saying that I denied his statement. Now hon. gentlemen opposite understood that, while saying that I was not attempting to repudiate the fact that I had uttered the sentiment that this change of policy had given additional employment to men in this country. That I did say and stand by, because it is the truth, and I desire to speak the truth at all times. But who effected the change in the Tariff that produced that result? We are told the late hon. Finance Minister is a gentleman whose whole aim and policy was to destroy the manufacturing industries of this country. How then will they reconcile that with the fact that through the revision of his Tariff, he was enabled to bring about this result? The hon. gentleman insinuated to-night—and it was an insinuation unworthy of him—that the late hon. Finance Minister yielded to pressure from me, and that the tax was imposed to benefit myself. I think I can stand here in presence of men who know me and say, with a clear conscience, that I have never made anything out of parliamentary life; and if every other hon. gentleman can say the same, with as clear a conscience, I shall be glad. I stand here to-night to defend the changes in the Tariff effected by the late Finance Minister. I propose to take that very change as an illustration of the principle that would guide me in a revision of the Tariff. I take that very instance as a proof of the ability and wisdom of that hon. gentleman so much denounced by hon. gentlemen opposite as an enemy of the manufacturers and unable to grapple with the commercial questions of this country. I take that instance as a refutation of such assertions. I am told this change affected the cigar industry. While he remembers this, it is not so mentioned in the speech. But I do not deny it. What were the facts with reference to that industry? The protection enjoyed by those manufacturers, ranged from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3, 5, 10, 15 and 20 per cent. An average of 11 per cent. was all the protection the cigar manufacturers enjoyed on their products in this country. And, on revising his Tariff the late hon. Finance Minister gave that industry an average protection of how much? Fifteen per cent.; and it was in consequence of this increase that all the beneficial results that have been noticed appeared; and when hon. gentlemen opposite increased that protection from 15 to 31 per cent., no such large beneficial results followed. Then I said that other industries might be benefited in the same way. The late hon. the Minister of Finance, in revising his Tariff, respected the other industries, and increased their protection from 15 to $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., which was a wise and prudent step in my judgment. And when, in 1876, I made the speech referred to, which is on record now, and of which I am not ashamed, I was then in favor of an advance in the Tariff in that direction, provided any change was made, and the necessities of the revenue demanded it. I admitted then, as I admit now, that my policy would be a defensive one, and that in raising the revenue of this country, if foreign goods were being slaughtered in our markets, or sold under ordinary prices—if our manufacturers were thereby being crushed out—that I would use the Tariff as a means for securing the revenue, and at the same time affording encouragement to those industries natural to the country. Sir, that has been the policy of the Reform party, and was the policy of the Mackenzie Administration. Their Act is on the Statute-book, and judged by their action they stand there as the friends of the manufacturers, and of all classes of industries that are to be found in this country. With reference to that particular industry, it may have been; and, indeed, I was myself inclined to think that perhaps I had over-estimated it somewhat in referring to the good that had been done with reference to it, when I put it down at 1,000 men, which the hon. the Finance Minister magnified undesignedly, I believe, into thousands. But, Sir, what was the fact with reference to that change in the Tariff, when 15 per cent. and no more of an average protection was given to this industry? I will show the hon. gentleman what was produced by it. In 1874, there was 437,281 lbs. of foreign cigars imported in the country; in 1876 that had fallen to 195,387 lbs. That industry had given employment to a very great number of people in this country, and it was a wise and prudent change to make in the Tariff, and good was effected by the imposition of a duty that gave the manufacturer not more than 15 per cent. protection. Then I told my hon. friend at the time, what my views were with reference to that change in the Tariff. I said that the article would cost no more to the consumer, that the profits of the middle man would be somewhat diminished, but the consumer would not suffer one iota. Let me remind the hon. gentleman of this fact, that the profits of the middle man on that article are from 60 to 120 per cent. But it is known that cottons, woollens and other goods are sold at close prices and the middle men cannot afford to cut upon their margin. The increase upon these goods must fall upon the consumer, and he must pay it. Another point with reference to the cigar manufacture, there is an Excise duty on cigars as well as an import duty. If the hon. Minister of Finance had placed his import duty on these cigars, and excluded them from the country, and had no Excise duty on them his revenue would have been diminished, and he would have had to tax the people upon some other article. But there being an Excise duty upon cigars he raised the Excise duty at the same time as Customs duty, and secured the same revenue that he had before. That is what I call an arrangement of the Tariff, an adjustment of the Tariff, that is wise and politic. What he did in reference to that industry in giving it a fair and legitimate protection, under the operation of his Tariff, enabled him to secure a revenue to carry on this country, and so with other manufacturers. And bear in mind another fact, that in 1876 gold in New York was quoted at 113 $\frac{1}{2}$, and the protection of manufactures was very much reduced by the price of gold. But the hon. gentlemen have not been content to leave the protection of manufactures at from $17\frac{1}{2}$ to 20 per cent., they have given some favored lines 25, 30, 35, 40 and even 50 per cent. of protection. There, Sir, is where my contention is with the hon. gentlemen opposite, that is my quarrel and the quarrel of the Reform party with them. The Reform party has never said that it objected to duties on manufactured goods in this country. We never gave effect to such a policy, and we do not now wish to give effect to any such policy; but we say this: that an industry if it cannot live on from $17\frac{1}{2}$ to 20 per cent. protection, with its raw material free, is an industry that is not needed here. That we can afford to wait until it shall be found to be called into existence by that amount of protection. Let me call to the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, who talk as though we had no manufactories in this country prior to the advent of this glorious National Policy, how the manufactories of this country stood. Why, in 1871, when the last Census was taken, when we ascertained what the industries of this country amounted to, we had 140 different lines of manufacturing industries employing some 187,942 hands, and they produced \$221,617,778. Yet we hear these hon. gentlemen speak as though we had no manufacturing industries in this country before the National Policy was introduced. What was the condition of manufactures in 1876? Depressed, no doubt; they must have been depressed, when the whole country was so. We had a year in this country when we did not grow as much wheat as we wanted to feed our own people, and there must have been a depression felt by our manufacturers, by our artizans, and by every class in the community, as they may feel it again if Providence should withhold his blessings, and we should have an equally small crop in the future. But, Sir, in 1876 even, and from that down to 1878, the manufacturers of this country, as a class, were in as prosperous a condition as any class in the community—I believe more prosperous. And I defy the hon. gentleman opposite to show, from the Trade Returns, or statistics, or mercantile agencies, anything to the contrary. And what was the record of the hon. gentleman with reference to our manufacturing industries? In 1876, there was to be an exhibition, to be held at Philadelphia, of our manufactured goods, and the hon. gentleman from Lambton, who was then leader of the Government, came down to this House and asked for a grant of \$100,000, to enable the manufacturers and farmers of this country to make an exhibit at Philadelphia. He was supported in that application by members on this side of the House, and the money was granted. But what was the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite? Why, Sir, the right hon. leader of the Government rose in his place and opposed that grant; he spoke in disparaging terms of it, and sneered at the manufacturing industries of this country. He said the country was too young to make a creditable exhibit of her manufactures at the world's exhibition, and he considered the money thus granted would be entirely thrown away. But the hon. gentleman from Lambton carried his resolution, and this country made a most creditable exhibit at Philadelphia; the eyes of the world were directed to the manufactures displayed by this country there. In connection with that exhibition, and at a subsequent meeting of the Dominion Board of Trade, Mr. Thomas White, jun., asked permission to introduce a resolution respecting the question brought before that meeting, by Dr. May, on the previous day :

"That this Board, recognizing the creditable display of Canadian manufactures and products, made at the recent Centennial Exhibition, at Philadelphia, is pleased to learn that the event of the distribution of awards to successful exhibitors, by His Excellency the Governor General, is to be marked by a public banquet; and that the President be requested to appoint two gentlemen each from Ontario and Quebec and one each from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, to act as members of the Central Banquet Committee."

That, Sir, is the testimony of Thomas White, the present hon. member for Cardwell, as expressed by a resolution moved in the Board of Trade, in 1876, with reference to our manufactures. Then, if there was a period of calm for some of the manufacturers of this country, in 1875 and 1876, in 1878 when these hon. gentlemen went to the polls, in 1879 when these hon. gentlemen were passing their National Policy, that period of calm was passing away, gold had become par in the United States, and there was greater enterprise and greater prosperity than there was at that time. Yet we have the testimony of Mr. Thomas White, with reference to the creditable display we made at the Centennial Exhibition. We have more than that, we have the foreign trade which sprang up, largely fostered and influenced by that display, the result of it standing in our Trade and Navigation Returns, a proof of the wisdom of the Mackenzie Administration in aiding those manufacturers to show what they could do in the markets of the world. Let me give you another idea of what was being done by the manufacturing institutions of this country in 1876, to show how far wrong the Minister of Finance was when he said that if two years longer had rolled round under the existing laws almost every manufacturing industry would be wiped out. I find, in the correspondence of the Montreal Gazette in 1876, an account of a visit to the manufacturers of the town of St. John's in the Province of Quebec. A correspondent writes as follows:—

"The town of St. John's (Quebec Province) so often spoken of by Montrealers during the summer months 'as a pretty little place but terribly dull,' remarks which the quiet appearance of the town several years ago gave little ground to doubt, has, during the past few years, made such rapid progress that only the first of the above clause applies."

After describing the city he adds :

"In every direction the stranger turns he is confronted with fresh evidences of improvement in the number of new dwellings, he sees nearly all of them occupied and some still in various stages of completion. When he hears of the great increase of population and in the value of real estate he is still further surprised and wonders what can have caused the change. He does not take long to discover the cause, for several tall chimneys that led from large buildings, erected within a very few years, belch forth a thick heavy smoke, that tells the tale without further remark, of the industrial work going on in the factories. The most important of these is the St. John's Stone China Ware Manufactory, erected some three years ago. A short sketch of what this factory was intended to do was published in our columns some years ago, and then the most encouraging prospects of success were held out to the newcomer among our manufacturing interests. The most complete realization of all that was then hoped has taken place, and it is with the greatest pleasure we find the St. John's Stone Chinaware Company's manufacturing in successful and complete operation. Quietly and without advertising, save the short sketch alluded to above, the company has progressed step by step, meeting one difficulty after another and successfully conquering all opposition until now, with a producing capacity, equal to forty-five or fifty packages weekly, it finds a ready market and good prices in all parts of the Dominion."

There, Sir, is the testimony with reference to the manufacturing institutions of St. John's in 1876. He goes on to speak of the boot and shoe manufacturing there and the woollen manufacturing.

Mr. GAULT. That company failed and shut up, and had to be reorganized after 1878—St. John's Stone and China Ware Company. It is now a completely new industry.

Mr. PATERSON. Is the hon. gentleman sure of it?

Mr. GAULT. I am quite certain.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, it is very strange then, and I think it will not do, or should not be recognized as a wise thing on the part of the hon. the Minister of Finance, to prop up and keep from falling an institution that finds a ready market and good prices in all parts of the Dominion. That is what the testimony was with reference to that. That information was furnished to this correspondent, it is to be supposed, by the managers of that work—a ready market and good prices in all parts of the Dominion, and yet he says they have failed. And this was done, mind you, in the year when gold was 13½ premium, yet the hon. gentleman tells us they failed. So the Prince Edward Island Bank failed the other day. Is that the National Policy? Had that anything to do with it? There was a large sugar refinery failed in Halifax, was that due to the National Policy? There was a large sewing machine factory failed in Guelph, was that due to the National Policy? No; hon. gentlemen will tell us—the Finance Minister did tell us—that there was not proper management in the Halifax refinery and that therefore it failed.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It has not failed.

Mr. PATERSON. Well, suspended. I do not wish to injure any manufacturing industry, and I thank the Finance Minister for suggesting the better word. But the Finance Minister will agree with me that a large amount of capital has been lost in it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. So it has been said.

Mr. PATERSON. And I think the Finance Minister admitted in his speech that it was not as well managed as other concerns, and so it may have been true with regard to this chinaware factory. The same correspondent spoke about a glass factory that failed, and about another being started in its place, and perhaps that is the one to which the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Gault) alludes. But, at all events, here we have the testimony of a correspondent of the Montreal Gazette, on information furnished, I suppose, by the proprietor of the concern, for it could not well be obtained from anyone else, showing that they found a ready market and good prices in all parts of the Dominion. But we have testimony from other sources. Take my own town, to which the last speaker referred me. In Brantford we have a new cotton factory; but, outside of that, I do not remember any manufactory of any importance which has been brought into existence under the National Policy; and we had manufactories there years and years ago, before the National Policy was ever dreamed of; and these manufactories were doing business and prospering, and were in a better position under the Tariff of the Mackenzie Administration than they are under the National Policy at the present time. Therefore, when hon. gentlemen opposite represent the Mackenzie Tariff as a Tariff designed to destroy the manufacturing industries of the country, they are stating what is not borne out by the facts; they are making mis-statements which they ought to know are mis-statements from their own personal knowledge of flourishing manufacturing institutions before 1879. I stand here and attack their Tariff and denounce their Tariff and fight against them and their Tariff, because, while it has given exceptional advantages to a certain few industries, it has in addition to injuring other industries, actually placed some manufacturers in a worse position than they were before. I can prove it. It is susceptible of proof—that is, if the Minister of Railways will be accepted as proof. I can prove it, if the statements of the Finance Minister will be accepted as proof in this matter. In 1875, I remember that the Minister of Railways denounced the Mackenzie Administration because he said that the 2½ per cent. additional protection which they gave the manufacturers had been wiped out by taking the raw material out of the free list and taxing it. What did the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite do? Why, Sir, it took the raw material of a large proportion of the manufacturers of this country out of the free list and imposed duties upon it, and by the imposition of these duties reduced the advantage that the manufacturers had in this market as well as in the foreign market; and the very fact, Sir, that the Minister of Finance said, with reference to the foreign trade, that a drawback would be given equal to the amount of duty paid by the manufacturers on the raw material entering into the manufacture of goods, shows that he knows that the imposition of duties on the raw material wipes out the protection that is enjoyed by the manufacturers to that extent. Take the manufacturing institutions in my own city, as well as in other cities in the Dominion, and their coal is taxed that used to be free, their iron is taxed that used to be free, their bar iron is taxed at a greatly increased rate, boiler tubes have increased to 25 per cent., their boiler plate has been taxed, and every department of brass goods—to them the raw material—has been taxed, so that they are actually to-day in a worse position than they were before. What is true with regard to them is true with reference to the manufacturers of agricultural implements and many others of this country, and with the exception of a few industries to which the Government have given special favors the manufacturers of this country would be in a better position, I believe, under a 17½ per cent. Tariff with their raw material free, than they are at the present time. Let us look, for instance, to this same question of crockery. In 1876, under a 17½ per cent. Tariff, with gold at 113½ in the United States, the manufacturers of these goods could find a ready sale and good prices for all they could make. But let us see what the hon. gentlemen did with reference to crockery. In 1876 there was imported of crockery into this Dominion $430,888 worth. In 1881 there was imported into this country $139,029 worth, or $9,000 worth more of crockery from foreign markets in 1881 than in 1876. Now, Sir, what are the facts? The hon. the Finance Minister has raised the Tariff on crockery to 30 per cent., and yet there have been imported $400,000 of these goods. What is the result? The purchaser of crockery not only pays that 30 per cent. on the crockery imported from other countries—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Do you mean on all crockery?

Mr. PATERSON. No, on white ware. The hon. gentleman will agree with me that the Trade and Navigation Returns, not being exactly classified in each year, it is difficult to understand what they mean. I think, however, I said white crockery, and that I will have been found to have said it.

Mr. PLUMB. Say it slow, over again.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know whether it could be said slow enough to enter the cranium of the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). I find iron, stoneware, &c.,—that is, cream color—classified in 1881, $250,435, as being imported. Now, the serious fact with reference to that is that under the National Policy, that amount of crockery was imported on which we paid 30 per cent. more, and the people had to pay the manufacturers of crockery 30 per cent. on all the goods they turned out, or 30 per cent. more than if it had been on the free list. I am willing, and the Mackenzie Administration were willing to give, and did give, the manufacturers 17½ per cent. protection, and under that they prospered and improved for several years; and while we might help to give protection to that extent, I may say, that to go beyond that and impose higher duties is to make the people of this country pay a higher rate for protection than they should pay. I am one of those that believe in building up the manufacturing industries of this country, and with a view of having that they must have some advantage, and that they cannot exist when they are young without such advantage. I have supported always and am now advocating such a view, and when the Reform party come back, effect will be given to that view. If a revenue could be raised on that, and if, at the same time, we could, by its operation, afford such protection to the manufacturers as they are fairly entitled to in the interests of the country, I should support them. But I say that when you give the manufacturing industries of this country a protection of 30 per cent., you are making the people pay more for that interest than it is worth. I am glad to see our sugar refineries opened. Our friends opposite speak as if it was a source of satisfaction to gentlemen on this side of the House to see our sugar refineries closed. Not so; it was no action of the Mackenzie Government that closed the sugar refineries. The Mackenzie Government did not open them, and the reason assigned by the Finance Minister of the Mackenzie Government for not doing so was that the manufacturers of sugar, the washers of sugar, or one at least—for that was about all there was—stated that it was necessary in order to bring that result about, that he should have an amount of protection that would bear unduly on the 4,000,000 of consumers; and the position the Finance Minister took, on looking at this question, was that he was bound, as the man entrusted with the financial interests of the people of this country, to consider the interests of the 4,000,000 consumers as equal to the wishes of one sugar refiner, and he said he could not see his way to do what that sugar refiner wanted and at the same time do justice to this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite did it, however; and what does the country pay for it? Last year the hon. Finance Minister said they paid 25 cents a hundred; but this year he says the country has paid nothing for the benefit. Let us see how that sugar calculation bears out, and the people of this country will be able to form some idea of what they are paying for opening the sugar refineries. In 1878, we imported 105,240,173 lbs. of sugar, on which there was paid into the Treasury $2,515,823, a duty equal to $2.39 per hundred; in 1881, we imported 135,126,176 lbs. of sugar, on which a duty was paid of $2,438,857. Now, Sir, if the same average duty that was levied under the Mackenzie Administration had been levied on that 135,126,176 lbs. imported in 1881, there would have been paid into the Treasury $3,229,515, instead of $2,438,857, or $790,658 more than was paid under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, I am willing to admit that that figure is subject to a slight decrease, because many of the sugars brought in, in 1881, were for refining purposes, &c.—it might be alleged, did not possess the full weight of sugar; but the loss would be very slight, and there stands the fact of the loss of revenue. If the people got their sugar cheaper, it might be made up to them; but, calculations made in this House show that, while you lose that amount of revenue, the people are paying more for the sugar they consume. Now, let us see the effect of this? The people of the Maritime Provinces and the people of Ontario pay between them, on the articles of breadstuffs and coal, prime necessaries of life, about $800,000 per annum; under the arrangement of the sugar duties by the Mackenzie Government, we should have received from the 135,000,000 lbs of sugar imported, as much revenue as we have at the present time in the public coffers, and the people of this country would have free coal and free breadstuffs of all kinds. That shows what the country is paying for these sugar refineries. Then, Sir, with reference to the article of wood-screws, there was a duty of 17½ per cent. on them under the late Administration and a factory was in existence. Hon. gentlemen opposite raised that protection to 35 per cent., and yet there are more screws coming in now than there were then, which proves that the people of this country are paying not only the enhanced price on what is imported, but also on what is produced in the country. So with reference to woollens and cottons—there are excessive duties placed on them, there are more cottons and woollens being imported, and the inevitable result is that the people are paying more for their cotton and woollen goods—not only for what are imported, but for what are made in the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite attempt to deny this; but if a little common sense is brought to bear on this matter, it ought to make it patent to every business man in this House that where you do not produce as much goods as the country wants, you not only increase the price of the goods coming into the country, but enhance the price of those made in the country. To argue differently is to say that human nature does not avail itself of any advantages within its reach. The manufacturers of any class of goods will, as an effect of their human nature, take the advantage that the Tariff gives them, and if it enables them to demand 10 or 15 per cent. more for their goods than they could get without that Tariff, they will take that advantage and use it. When manufactures increase in the country, and when in any line of manufactured goods you produce more in the country than the country requires, then the imposition of the duties on foreign goods of a like nature does not necessarily raise the price of the goods made at home; because you have a home competition, and the home competition will bear down the price, and then you have reached the second stage of protection when you get cheaper goods—this fact being always borne in mind, that that is the result unless these manufacturers combine to restrict production and force up prices, which they can do under a high Tariff, and there a high Tariff is dangerous; or this other fact, that the raw material these manufacturers use being taxed, they must of necessity ask more for their manufactured products, or be content with a less margin; or the other result, which sometimes follows over-protection, and will not wholly be remedied by home competition, that the manufacturer does not keep up to the mark by sharp, keen competition from without as well as from within, is contented to work along with his old-fashioned machinery in his old-fashioned way, and does not bend his energies to forward his enterprises as best he might. With these exceptions, I admit that the proposition is correct; that when we produce more manufactured goods in the country than the country wants, the imposition of the duty does not necessarily enhance the price.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. The Finance Minister agrees with me and every business man in this House will agree with me. If a little common sense is brought to bear on the discussion of these matters, we will all know that such results must follow, but it is certain that there are not enough goods produced to supply the public wants; then the imposition of duties not only increases the price of the foreign goods imported, but it enhances the price of similar articles made in the country. I have endeavored to show that under the Mackenzie Administration, and their Tariff, the manufacturers were in existence in this country, that they were doing as well as many of them are doing now in comparison with how all other classes were doing; they had come into existence, and prospered equally in years gone by, as they have since the introduction of the National Policy. I come now to speak with respect to the promises made by hon. gentlemen opposite, to another class, and another great industry, the agricultural industry. The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Rykert), did me the honor to quote from another of my speeches in regard to agricultural protection, and in that matter he, as he has done in other matters, misquoted, took out of their connection my words, so as to present them in a different manner from what my sentiments and expressions really were. In 1876 the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) moved for a Committee to enquire into our agricultural interests; there had been previously a Committee moved for and granted to enquire into our commercial and manufacturing interests. The hon. member for Centre Wellington had made that motion the previous year, I think, if not during the two previous years. He had previously obtained a Committee, but it failed to make a report. When he moved his motion in 1876, the hon. member for Lambton, then leading the Government, rose and objected to it on the ground that the hon. member had previously had a Committee granted, but nothing resulted from it, and he objected to granting the Committee, as he viewed the motion as a buncombe one. It was on that occasion I spoke, and advocated the appointment of that Committee. I said there might possibly be two sides to that question of agricultural protection. I said that my own opinion was, that a duty on wheat would not raise the price of wheat, because we grow a surplus and export it; but, nevertheless, there might be two sides to it. I thought it was desirable, when a Committee was asked for, to ascertain whether that was the case or not that a Committee should be granted. Mark what the hon. gentleman opposite said. The hon. gentleman, in quoting me, stated that I rose and said my party will make a mistake if they refuse to grant this concession, leaving the House to understand that I advocated duties on breadstuffs, and that I said my party would make a mistake if they did not grant that concession. That is the word you used, is it not?

Mr. RYKERT. Probably you heard what I said.

Mr. PATERSON. You do not deny it. I say it was with deliberate intent to misconstrue my language and deceive this House.

Mr. RYKERT. Will the hon. gentleman say I did not read his exact words?

Mr. PATERSON. I have asked you whether you used that word or not. I gave the opportunity of saying whether the word you used was concession.

Mr. RYKERT. I read your words exactly as they were.

Mr. PATERSON. Did you read from Hansard?

Mr. RYKERT. Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order.

Mr. PATERSON. I hope the hon. gentleman will not find fault when I ask the hon. gentleman what word he used. I understood him to use the word concession.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I called the hon. gentleman to order because he was addressing himself directly to my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman must address the Chair, and speak in the third person.

Mr. PATERSON. I quite understand, and will accept that hint from the leader of the Government. His is an example we sometimes find it difficult to follow, and if I have been a little unparliamentary, I know you, Mr. Speaker, will pardon me because the leader of the Government sometimes sets me that example. As I understood the hon. member for Lincoln, he read that I stated my party would make a mistake if it refused to grant concessions, while the word I used was Committee. The impression left is different in that case. I was advocating the appointment of a Committee to ascertain whether the duty on breadstuffs would benefit agriculturists. I said it would be a mistake if my party refused to grant the Committee, and, without egotism, I may say that at my request the leader of the Government withdrew his request and a Committee was appointed. I went on in that speech to say that possibly the Committee might find in their report that the imposition of duties on articles that the farmer produced would be an injury to him instead of a benefit, in which case no person would advocate the imposition of those duties or the carrying of them into effect. It was my wish, however, to ascertain what influence the imposition of such duties would have on the farmers; it was not an argument, as the hon. member for Lincoln tried to make out, for placing duties upon breadstuffs, but it was the expression of a desire to ascertain what effect such duties would have.

Mr. RYKERT. I read your exact words.

Mr. PATERSON. No; my exact words were, Committee, not concession. Do you say that that is not correct?

Mr. RYKERT. I do not.

Mr. PATERSON. Then I accept the statement. The hon. gentleman will also admit that he did not read what I subsequently said, which explains the whole matter, and that I wish the appointment of the Committee in order to ascertain the effect of the imposition of duties. A Committee was granted. Did the Committee ever report in favor of the imposition of the duties on grain? The Committee never so reported, but it submitted the evidence to the House, and left every man at liberty to determine the question for himself. To-day it is a problematical question whether the imposition of those duties has been productive of good. A Committee was appointed the other day on the subject, showing that there is a dim suspicion that those duties, after all, have failed in doing what they were expected to do in benefitting the agriculturists of this country. If there might be anything said in favor of the imposition of those duties, it is what I said in that same speech, that with the imposition of those duties, we might be able to say, in the event of the Americans desiring a renewal of reciprocity, that we have duties on grain. I say now, that if there is any value in having those duties, that is the value; but it will be a very little value, because the Americans would say it would be no advantage to them to get this market for their grain. If there was any argument in it, it was that; but what did hon. gentlemen opposite tell the farmers? They told them they would get better prices as the result of the imposition of this duty on grain, and whether designedly or not, in that, the Government of this country have deceived the farmers and they are attempting to deceive them to-day. But farmers have been undeceived with reference to it, and many of them who cast their votes in favor of hon. gentlemen opposite, under the delusive promises broken by them since they have been in power, will withhold their votes from them at the next election. Let us bring a little common sense to bear upon this question. I ask the hon. Minister of Finance to follow me for a few moments. He admitted my proposition, made a little while ago, with reference to manufactured goods, viz.: that when you produce more manufactured goods in a country than it wants, that then the imposition of a duty could not benefit the manufacturers, except they wanted to enter into a combination.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not say anything of the kind. I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to put a construction upon a remark I made across the House, that it did not bear. The hon. gentleman said that when in a community, or any section of a country, the people produced more than the country required, and they had to seek a market abroad, then it was not necessarily the consequence that it should increase the price to the consumer, and, under those circumstances, I said hear, hear, to it.

Mr. PATERSON. Perhaps in words a little more plain, my hon. friend that sits beside me says that he used the same words that I did, and now the Minister of Finance has endorsed that hon. gentleman's position. I knew he would, because it is common sense, and the view which a business man would take of a business question. But, Sir, the farmer had reached the second stage of protection before the National Policy was put in force at all, and therefore the imposition of duties on grain is a force, a delusion and a snare, and they know it. If they do not they show no more intelligence on this question than the gentleman who addressed us this afternoon. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that when you have a surplus of any article in this country, and are obliged to send to foreign markets to find their prices, the imposition of duties upon that article is harmless to increase its price. Now, as admitted by the Minister of Finance, you cannot protect the agricultural products of this country except in the one article of Indian corn. I say here, as I have said on every platform, on this article you can enhance the price. And why? Because we do not grow as much of it as the country wants, and therefore the imposition of a duty on corn raises its price to the Canadian farmer some 7½ cents per bushel. The Minister of Finance agrees with that in his speech, but the hon. the Minister of Railways said that the imposition of 50 cents a ton on coal did not raise the price of that article, because Yankee coal came into the country and met coal produced here, and consequently the Yankee paid the duty. Corn comes into the country and meets corn grown here; how is it that the Yankee does not pay the duty? The hon. the Minister of Finance says that the duties on corn did not raise the price to our farmer, and I say so too. He is logical and I am with him, but as a consequence the hon. the Minister of Railways is illogical and inconsequential with reference to his coal duties. With reference to duties on corn the farmer has had his prices enhanced, and that cannot be prevented; but is that in the interest of the farmer? It is in the interest of the farmer who has corn to sell, but while one farmer has one hundred have not. An hon. gentleman says that it gives the farmer a better price for his oats. It is a very strange thing, if that be the case, that oats should be higher in the Chicago market than they are in Toronto, as I think the hon. member for North Norfolk pointed out the other day. If the farmers are content with it I have no reason to complain of the duty, but I argue simply on business principles, and the hon. gentlemen know for a fact that the farmers, having reached the second stage of protection, before the new policy was introduced, it is impossible to protect them; that being the case a Tariff that makes them pay enhanced prices for what they have to buy is an imposition upon them, and they have a right to resent it. Trace the hon. gentlemen opposite in their action in this matter; they put a duty of 15 cents per bushel on wheat and 50 cents per barrel on flour. The duty on wheat is greater in proportion than the duty on flour, and that shows that the hon. gentlemen knew that the impost of a duty on wheat would not raise its price at all. What did they do further? They went through the farce of putting a duty on wheat, and then they passed an Order in Council permitting the millers of this country to go to the United States, where they could buy 2,000 to 10,000,000 bushels of American wheat, and bring it into Canada, and not pay one cent of duty on it, but simply give their bond, grind that wheat into flour, sell that flour in Canadian markets, within a period specified, and if the millers had sold and realized their prices within one year after, they could export a like quantity of flour and wheat, and the exportation cancelled the bond they gave for the duty, and thus they never had paid one cent of duty upon it. That was the treatment the hon. gentlemen opposite gave the farmers, and that would have been the fact still, if the attention of the country had not been called to it by a gentleman on the Opposition side of the House, denied, at that time, by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, who subsequently had to admit it, however.

Mr. BOWELL. No, no.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, he changed.

Mr. BOWELL. I never made any denial. I said, when the Tariff was first under discussion, that the principle of allowing an equivalent to be used instead of the actual product was not only discussed, but was affirmed in that debate, and the hon. gentleman knows that.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman said that I had not interpreted it right. I say, I proved I was right on that occasion, and that the hon. the Minister of Customs, though thinking I was not right at that time, very soon found out that I must have been right, judging from the fact that he passed another Order in Council in which the phraseology was changed, requiring them to export the product of the same wheat that was imported.

Mr. BOWELL. That is quite true, but I did not make any such denial as you attribute to me.

Mr. PATERSON. I accept what the hon. gentleman says. But I think the hon. gentleman said I did not give a proper interpretation; I accept his statement. Now, let me call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Finance to the agricultural protection, and to his reasoning in reference to it. There is something very strange, when he touches upon this agricultural protection. I find that he says in his speech, made this year, that through the imposition of this 15 cents a bushel on wheat the Canada farmer gets 3 cents a bushel more than otherwise practicable; that at a certain season of the year when the farmers are sold short it would be possible to get a higher price by a duty on wheat, and he goes on to say that the cost of the transmission of that particular kind of wheat from Chicago to Liverpool was precisely the cost from Toronto to Liverpool by the Grand Trunk Railway and the Allan line of steamers. Therefore, if the price depended on the English market, that wheat would have had to go down 3 cents more; because as we know, after a large portion has been shipped to England, the quantity of Canadian grain in the country being diminished, the Canadian millers have to pay an increased price for their wheat, which goes into the pockets of our farmers, who reap the benefit, and, therefore, the millers have either to go to the United States market and pay the duty, or pay the price demanded by the Canadian farmers. Consequently, ten days ago they received 3 cents a bushel more for their wheat than had our markets been open to the Americans, and exposed to the danger of being broken down by the shipments from the other side. What does the hon. the Finance Minister mean by this? Why does the Canadian farmer, by this duty of 15 cents on wheat, get 3 cents a bushel more? Because he says he would not sell his wheat unless the Canadian miller gave him his price, and, if the miller went to the United States, he would have to pay 15 cents more. If that be so, why, I ask the hon. the Finance Minister, does he not ask more than 3 cents a bushel extra? Why, if the miller must pay what the farmer asks, does he stop at 3 cents—why not ask 10 cents or 12 cents? The matter must be explained on some other ground than the 15 cent duty. Take the article of wool, and see how the farmer was treated by the Government. They told him they would put a duty on wool that would enhance its price. What are the facts? The first year they imposed no duty on wool. The next year the farce is gone through of imposing a duty on sorts we were not importing. The Trade and Navigation Returns for 1880 showed that some 6,000,000 lbs. of wool were imported without paying duty; in 1881, 8,000,000 lbs. entered without paying one cent of duty. The farce was again gone through of placing duty on other things, which hon. gentlemen opposite knew would not have the slightest effect in enhancing their price. Now, with reference to another class in the community, the mechanics and artizans, I take this ground—and I have thought a good deal upon this subject—that it is the bounden duty of the men entrusted with the affairs of this great country to recognize the fact that there are other men besides the manufacturers whose interests ought to be conserved at their hands. While I am willing and anxious, and while the Government I supported and the party I am connected with were and are willing to arrange the Tariff as to give fair protection to manufacturers, they felt and feel bound, at the same time, to do fairly with them; to not place these men in a position to extort heavy prices from the consuming classes. When you remember that the National Policy does this, that while it gives to certain manufacturers 35, 40, and 50 per cent. protection, it leaves the mechanics and artizans who work in those factories without it—while we, the manufacturers, are protected against the competition of foreign countries, the men by whose energies we are enriched are not protected in the slightest degree, our labor market being open to the whole world, foreign artizans may come in, under-bid them, and take away their living. I do not intend, of course, to put a duty on labor; but I say this, while the labor is left untaxed, the articles purchased by the laborer should not be heavily burdened. That is the principle we war against, and not against the manufacturers, but against a Tariff that would give them an illegitimate amount of protection. We are told that hon. Ministers have made the times better. All the credit for the prosperity of the country is arrogated by them, by virtue of their legislature. It was pointed out by the hon. gentleman who preceded me in this debate, and by myself in a few remarks I offered on a motion made the other day, and for the making of which I was found fault with by the hon. the Finance Minister, who said I desired to anticipate him—it was stated also by the hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon, that I wished to anticipate that hon. gentleman by requiring a reply to my motion, although my remarks had an entirely different object, being intended to elicit information that would enable us to determine on the question in which some of my constituents were interested—I say that on that occasion I pointed out that the prosperity of the country had been brought about by the fact that within the last two years there had been $30,000,000 extra gold brought into the country, as a result of extra sales of lumber, animals and other agricultural products. I also stated that unless the hon. gentlemen opposite could claim the power of raising the price of lumber in the United States market, compelling Heaven's rain to fall on our fields, and of raising the price of grain in the British market, that those $30,000,000 could not be credited to them, and I argue that through the operation of this $30,000,000, circulated through this country, manufacturers have experienced an impetus that would bring about the result we have witnessed—peace, plenty and prosperity in our country. But the hon. gentlemen opposite, and the Finance Minister, said: we will show the hon. gentlemen in Opposition, that our prosperity could not have come from the large increase of exports. A more rash statement was never uttered. That $30,000,000 should be brought in and not produce an effect in the shape of greater prosperity is a statement so rash that the Finance Minister should not have ventured upon it. Why, any one can understand what the effect of such a benefit would be in this country. He claims that the whole prosperity the country is enjoying, is due to the beneficial effects of his National Policy; but as a proof he furnishes us with a list of industries that it has brought into existence. Let us look at them and examine this statement, with a view of ascertaining the course of the greater prosperity and wealth of our country. I find in the list of manufactures that he has given us as having been established in this country, that that statement leads us to certain results. He tells us that there has been some manufactories started in Hamilton in which 255 extra hands have been employed. By the Census of 1871, there were 4,456 hands employed in that city, and in the three years the National Policy has been in force he tells us it has put 255 extra hands there. In the city of Kingston, in 1871, there were 1,298 hands employed in the manufacturing institutions, and he says the National Policy has given us 40 more hands during the last three years. In London, 2,261 hands were employed in 1871, and he claims that 130 extra hands have been put there as the result of the National Policy during the last three years, but a newspaper in that city says that he cannot find even that manufactory. In Quebec, there were 7,250 hands employed in 1871, and the National Policy is credited in three years with having put 300 more hands in that city. In St. John, N.B., there was employed in 1871, 4,103 hands; the National Policy is credited in the return furnished by the Minister himself with having given an addition of 25 hands to that city. No wonder there is a boom in St. John. Any one can readily understand why there should be an immense boom there as the effect of the National Policy, if 25 additional hands, according to the showing of the Minister of Finance, have been placed in that city. Eight extra people a year to consume the products of the country surrounding that city.

Mr. HESSON. Is the hon. gentleman comparing his statements with 1878?

Mr. PATERSON. 1871, seven years before that; in 1878 the population would be much larger than in 1871, and therefore the comparison is altogether in the hon. gentleman's favor. The hon. gentleman knows very well that until we get our Census returns we are not in a position to tell what the manufacturing industries were in 1878. The hon. gentleman opposite knows, or he ought to know, that it is only when the Census returns are completed and tabulated, that we are able to ascertain the aggregate of the industries of this country, therefore the hon. gentleman knows I am quoting from the only figures it is possible for me to quote from. But I fancy this statement of the hands that were employed in this country, in 1871, was vastly increased in the seven years that intervened before 1878. That I can tell from my own personal observation, as can every other hon. gentleman. In the city of Halifax, 1871, there were 2,167 hands employed, and the National Policy is credited with putting 183 more there, 60 hands a year in that city—all idle now, I am told. In Montreal, there were 21,187 hands, in 1871. The National Policy is credited with adding 1,924, including Redpath. In Toronto, in 1871, 9,400 were employed, and Toronto is credited with 1,638 more. In Paris—I could only get the returns from the cities; in the towns we could not get them in the Census separately; but I take the town of Paris, and I find there has been five extra hands set to work, as the result of the National Policy—that is hardly two hands extra per year in the town of Paris. Every merchant in Paris is doing a better business than he did; manufacturers are busier than ever before. The reason of it is plain. The hon. Minister of Finance has told us, it is because he set five extra hands at work, and they are consuming the goods of the country, that is the five extra hands, that, during the last three years that have been put in the town of Paris, have made the farmers of North Brant rich. In Woodstock it has given them twenty-one hands, seven hands a year. The county of Oxford is prosperous, the towns of Oxford are going on, and that is only one town in Oxford, and the whole county of

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Oxford with 50,000 inhabitants, has an increase through the operation of the National Policy of 21 hands. Yet all the towns in that thriving county are busy and flourishing, the farmers are prosperous and doing well, better off than ever before. Why? the hon. Minister of Finance has given us the secret—the home market that was produced by these twenty-one hands in the town of Woodstock; and any man must be blind that cannot see it. Then we go into St. Catharines. We heard something about St. Catharines. The hon. gentleman opposite has told us a great deal about St. Catharines. We find the hon. Minister of Finance only claims to have put ten extra hands in St. Catharines as the result of the National Policy during the last three years—three hands and one-third per annum in the city of St. Catharines.

Mr. RYKERT. How many additional men did I claim?

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman claims so much that we cannot accept his claims. Will the hon. gentleman not take the official document that has been submitted to us by the hon. Minister of Finance, as having weight and authority? I find that comparing the list of the Minister of Finance, St. Johns, Quebec, that thriving town whose chimneys were belching forth their smoke in 1876, has gained thirty-eight hands. Why? There were hundreds during the Mackenzie Administration. That one stoneware factory, erected during the Mackenzie Administration, employed 120 hands; the hon. gentleman's National Policy has added thirty-eight more. The town of Sherbrooke, 48 extra hands added, 16 per annum according to the statement furnished by the Finance Minister; the town of Cobourg, 32 hands extra; Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, 25 extra hands; and I call the attention of my hon. friends from that Island, one of whom a year or two ago, in this House rose and demanded that a sum of money should be given to that Island for improvements because the National Policy had not benefitted them, and they demanded that they should have an extra sum given to her to be applied to some public works in order to compensate them. I tell my hon. friend that his difficulties, in that direction, from this time cease. The Island of Prince Edward has been benefitted by the introduction of the National Policy. The hon. the Minister of Finance has given us a statement in which it is conclusively proved that in Charlottetown twenty-five extra hands have been employed as a result of this policy during the last three years—eight hands per annum—eight extra consumers a year for Charlottetown. That is all I say the Minister of Finance claims having done for the capital of that island, and that is all that is given to the island anywhere. But there are unreasonable people there who, having had an extra market provided for them by eight hands per annum to consume their agricultural products, are not content with the effect of the benign National Policy. The list is valueless. Let me do the hon. Minister of Finance this justice, that he told us, when he submitted this list, it was only a partial one. I agree with him, it was only a partial list. That list does not represent and cannot represent the number of extra hands employed in this country at the present time. As a result of the National Policy, it exhibits more; but the hon. gentleman knows that while manufacturers are working and more hands are employed, they are employed not as the result of the National Policy, but as a result of an increased demand for all classes of goods which the people are enabled to buy by virtue of the $30,000,000 of extra gold, wealth brought into this country from sources over which the Government have not the slightest control or the slightest power. The hon. gentleman opposite asked me how it was with reference to the branches in which I am engaged myself; he asked me to tell him, and said I would be afraid to say what the effect would be upon that industry. I am not afraid to tell the hon. gentleman opposite that the industry in which I am engaged, so far as I am myself personally concerned—and I believe that is true with reference to several others in the same line—we had last year perhaps the most successful year we have had in our business career.

Mr. PLUMB. It all ends in smoke, though.

Mr. PATERSON. No, there is some taffy in it. The hon. gentleman would like to know, perhaps, what the reason of it was. I will tell him one of the great reasons why we are doing a better business. After the introduction of the National Policy by my hon. friends opposite many of the largest manufacturing concerns in that line failed, closed up, the machinery was torn out, the hands were discharged and had to find their way to the United States, and the places have not been reopened. That took place subsequent to the introduction of the National Policy. My good friend who sits in front of me knows one of the large establishments. The hon. member for London (Mr. Carling) knows another of the largest establishments, and the hon. member for Lincoln knows another. Every one of them were in the position I pointed out after the introduction of the National Policy, and some of them months after it came in.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Under that protective policy given by the late Government, with 10 cents more added?

Mr. PATERSON. No. Under the protective policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. That is one of the industries the hon. gentleman did not protect additionally.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We gave 10 per cent. to it over and above that splendid Tariff you are boasting of.

Mr. PATERSON. Ten per cent., and the hon. gentleman will understand when I tell him, that he did not give any more protection for the same reason, the hon. Minister of Railways said the ex-Minister of Finance added his 2½ per cent. protection by taxing raw material.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Mr. PATERSON. He doubled raw material in these lines.

Mr. PLUMB. What was it?

Mr. PATERSON. He raised it on lard from one to two cents per pound.

Mr. PLUMB. Oh, lard!

Mr. PATERSON. When I tell the hon. gentleman this, he laughs; he does not seem to understand; but the hon. Finance Minister will understand that some of those institutions use tons of lard every week; and when they raised the duty on that one cent a pound they took away a large share of this extra 10 per cent. protection.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is 10 cents a pound, and if you put a pound of lard in, you only pay one cent on that as increased duty.

Mr. PATERSON. Increased duty on what?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. On cigars. I was aware they put glucose in them, but I did not know that they put lard.

Mr. PATERSON. I think when the hon. Finance Minister was in Brantford, he did me the honor to visit my establishment, and I showed him my bakery where biscuits are made.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I had forgotten. The other branch of his business is so frequently mentioned here that I had it in mind.

Mr. PATERSON. I know very well, of course, that the hon. Finance Minister cannot be expected to remember all the details of the many establishments he visits, but I may tell him that the cigar branch of my manufactory is but a small one, and that my principal industry is confectionery and biscuits, to the latter of which I referred when I spoke of lard. The duty on confectionery was raised to one cent per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem, but the duty on the raw materials, such as sugar and lard was such as to largely reduce the benefits on the product. The same is true of the duty on agricultural implements and the bulk of the other manufactures of this country. The result of the increased employment of men by the men remaining in this business at the present time is largely explained by the fact, that under his policy many of the large institutions of this kind of manufacture, the machinery was torn out. Fewer men were employed in manufacturing the same line of goods, the demand became enhanced because of the good times, and the men in those trades are doing better than before. Now, I think I have made that sufficiently plain to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PLUMB. That is a "candied" statement.

Mr. HESSON. Would a little more duty have saved those industries which the hon. gentleman says were crushed out?

Mr. PATERSON. No, certainly not.

Mr. HESSON. Then what is the hon. gentleman complaining of?

Mr. PATERSON. I am not complaining. I am supremely happy. I am merely stating that I am willing and anxious to give the Finance Minister all the credit that I can, but so far as that trade is concerned, any step he took was more to their injury than their benefit. The hon. Finance Minister knows, though the hon. member for North Perth does not, that, so far as that article is concerned, it had arrived at the second stage of protection before his policy came in; that we could produce more goods than the country required; that we have an excess of competition, so that the weaker went to the wall, the result being that fewer remained in the business, so that the imposition of the duty neither caused these men to go down nor prevented them from going down. So with regard to the great bulk of the manufacturers of this country. I shall give the House a few figures to show conclusively that the prosperity we are now enjoying is not attributable to the National Policy at all. On the 17th of September, 1878, the Government of the hon. member for Lambton was defeated. Hon. gentlemen opposite came in power, and I propose to give a list showing the comparative prices of bank stocks and various articles of merchandize on the 12th of September, 1878, and the 11th of September, 1879.

Mr. PLUMB. Why do you not take 1880?

Mr. PATERSON. I take a date immediately before the downfall of the Mackenzie Administration and another date a year after that under the new Tariff, which I think is a fair comparison.

Mr. PLUMB. No.

Mr. PATERSON. Why?

Mr. PLUMB. You know as well as I do.

Mr. PATERSON. If the National Policy was the cause of the rise in the value of bank stocks and of various products, then I think it is fair to take September 11th, 1879, one year after the Mackenzie Administration had fallen, and after the National Policy was fairly established.

Mr. PLUMB. Why?

Mr. PATERSON. You claim that the enhanced value of bank stocks and agricultural products was due to the National Policy. The Prime Minister even said before the Government came in power, that a change would be produced before the policy came into operation, but I do not hold the Government to that statement; but after the National Policy was put in operation then we might rightly look for its effects and expect them. The prices of bank and other stocks in September, 1878, and in September, 1879, were as follows:

	Sept. 12, 1878.	Sept. 11, 1879.
Commerce Bank.....	113½	112½
Federal Bank.....	104½	98
Hamilton Bank.....	99	97½
Imperial Bank.....	103	95
Montreal Bank.....	170½	130
Dominion Bank.....	117	110½
Toronto Bank.....	138	111
Merchants Bank.....	95
Canada Permanent Loan.....	181	172
Canadian Government Debentures, 6 per cent. sterling.....	101½	100
Dominion 6 per cent Stock.....	101½	100
County Debentures.....	102	101½

There was a fall in all these stocks, although one year had elapsed after the Mackenzie Administration had left office, and hon. gentlemen opposite had taken their places and months after the National Policy had been put into vogue. If it was the producing cause of the prosperity we enjoy, why do we find such a decline in these stocks, and no enhancement in the price of other articles? Because it was a year of depression and there was a fall in our exports of that year.

Mr. BOWELL. I will send the hon. gentleman the price list of this year if he likes.

Mr. PATERSON. The following show the extent to which prices of farm produce fell from September, 1878, to September, 1879:

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have gone through a list of bank stocks and of produce; I have shown hon. gentlemen that in all these items of produce that the farmer had to sell, there was a fall in prices months after the National Policy was the law of the land from what they were during the last days of the previous Administration; and these figures point out this significant fact, that prices were lower because the depression had not passed away in the markets of the world, and that when good times came and we had the produce of the field, farm and forest to export, bringing wealth into this country and increasing the purchasing power of the people, prices advanced until to-day we are in the enjoyment of the blessings we have, and which hon. gentlemen opposite verily seek to claim as the effect of the Tariff they have introduced. Now, Sir, I have not indulged in personalities, and do not intend to indulge in personalities; I have not read up other men's records; I have not attempted to point out inconsistencies in other men. I might, indeed, point out that there has been a remarkable change of opinion in sentiment and action on the part of many hon. gentlemen opposite, which is perfectly within their right, and I do not think it is a part of my duty to take up the time of the House regarding the opinions of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I might point to the President of the Council. I might read extracts from his speeches in which he admitted himself to be, what I never admitted myself to be, as out-and-out

free-trader. I might read extracts from speeches of other hon. gentlemen much more able on trade questions than the hon. gentleman who addressed the House this afternoon and quoted extracts so largely. I might quote extracts from speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken, if not in this House, in other places where this subject has been as intelligently discussed, who took precisely the line I now take and have always taken; I could do that, but I think it is not necessary I should do so. That hon. gentleman (the President of the Council) could give reasons why he supported a Tariff at a higher point than he was willing at a former period to support; no doubt he could give good reasons, and I will not take up the time of the House to point out changes of sentiment and action on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. It must be borne in mind that if I were to do so there is scarcely an hon. gentleman opposite whose votes could not be pointed to as having voted down a protective policy; but I do not desire to do that, it is not necessary. A question may be debated on its merits, and in that way some good may be obtained and we may ascertain what views hon. gentlemen on both sides hold in regard to it. We have been charged with a want of patriotism because we do not submit to the National Policy in quietness and peace. Hon. gentlemen opposite often make the charge. I do not, however, think that charge is fairly to be levied against us. I do not think it exhibits want of patriotism on the part of a man to object to excessive and undue taxation being levied upon him. Let me call the attention of the House to an article I found in the organ of the Government in this city, yesterday, an article that afforded me some little amusement, an article that places the party to which I belong in the light in which hon. gentlemen opposite are continually endeavoring to place us as being the enemy of manufacturing industries. What did I find? I found there an article reciting that the Princess of Wales and a great many of the first ladies in England attended one of the late drawing-rooms of Her Majesty dressed in silks and satins made in England, and the reason why these ladies appeared in this wise was because the English silk and satin industries were in a depressed condition, owing to French silks and satins having taken possession of the market. The ladies seeing that such was the effect determined that they would support English manufacturers, they adopted the plan of wearing English silks and appeared in them at Her Majesty's drawing-room. And we are told that those ladies, if they had been here, would have been ridiculed by the Reform party, for its policy was to crush out manufacturers. But it would not be so. The most ardent free-trader on this side, and the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) will go as far in that direction as any man, never objected to anyone wearing Canadian-made goods, but simply to a law that compels him to do so or pay 30 per cent. by way of fine into the Treasury. If hon. gentlemen opposite are the patriots they claim to be, I will give them clearly a solution of the whole troubles in regard to the National Policy. We are told that we are a remnant of the people of the country, and that the overwhelming mass are in their favor. Let them carry their principles into effect and let them see to it that they obtain nothing for the household or for their personal wear, except such as is produced in Canada; then will they benefit and foster our manufacturing industries. Is that the position hon. gentlemen opposite take? Look at the Finance Minister; my eyes may deceive me, and I am not a good judge of dry goods, but if I see correctly the hon. gentleman's portly form is enclosed in a coat made from cloth bought from the hated foreigner. The hon. Finance Minister knows that there is cloth made in this country which is good, substantial and sound. The hon. gentleman knows that this industry, or he tells us that he knows this industry was in a depressed condition. Would it not be more patriotic to follow the example of the English ladies and, instead of using imported goods, wear a coat made of good Canadian material. His waistcoat I believe is formed out of the same material. I cannot say, at this distance, what kind of goods it is with which his limbs are enshrouded, but I am very much inclined to believe that they are not Canadian tweed; and when the hon. gentleman attacked the Liberal party for its want of patriotism, he did so in pants made of foreign cloth. If not, let him speak.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not ask my tailors.

Mr. PATERSON. There sits the hon. Finance Minister, who denounces us for want of patriotism because we object to undue taxation on Irish linen instead of Canadian cotton. He might reply that cotton is hardly a proper article of which to make a shirt for a Finance Minister of Canada. I agree with him that linen, perhaps, looks better; but for the patriot he is, and for the men who denounce us for want of patriotism, he should come forward and be prepared to wear good Canadian cotton. What is true of him is true of the hon. member for Niagara, who poses here as a patriot; but we will not spend the time with him. On all occasions he takes care to tell us how thoroughly loyal he is. It cannot be expected of him, that he should be found refusing to wear English-made goods, but let the gentlemen opposite give evidence of their patriotism, and besides raising their voices in favor of our manufacturers, let them set an example and were these Canadian goods themselves. Then we may expect to have our manufacturers prosper without even the imposition of those duties which are repugnant to the great part of our people. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance if he burns in his grates any Nova Scotia coal.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do sometimes, not always.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know if I am correctly informed, but I ask the hon. gentleman if it is true that in asking for tenders for the supplies of coal for the Parliament Buildings, it was expressly stated that the coal should be American coal, and that the same thing was done with regard to Rideau Hall?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Only a small quantity of it and for a specific purpose.

Mr. PATERSON. Why should you put in any of it; when you took the duty out of the Yankee, why did you not take it all? The hon. gentlemen divided their patriotism, they wanted a certain amount of money out of the Yankee, and yet they wanted to encourage the Nova Scotia miners; and while I am on that point I might just as well ask another question, and I ask it in all fairness. If the coal duty is paid by the American producers, I ask the hon. Finance Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Railways, why he remitted the duty on material that the Syndicate used in constructing the bridges on their road? The hon. Minister of Finance was a party to making a clause in that Syndicate bargain by which they gave them all the iron for their bridges and all their bridge material, their fish-plates, spikes, and all their telegraphic apparatus, I believe, used in the original construction of the road, duty free; and why, according to the showing of the hon. gentlemen opposite, did they do it to leave an amount of money in the pockets of foreigners which ought to have been taken from them and put into the Treasury of this country. In doing that they gave up the whole question; they admitted by that action that the statements which they make on the floor of this House are without foundation; that the producer pays the duty on goods that come into this country. The hon. gentleman can take, as they say sometimes, either horn of the dilemma—either the foreigner does not pay the duty or they have made a present to the Yankees of the amount of revenue we should have derived. The hon. gentlemen know how it was; it was a present to the Syndicate; and then they passed an Order in Council by which the manufacturers of iron producing a like material in Canada for supplying any of that article to the Syndicate, is to have an actual bounty given to him out of the taxes of this country. We are quite willing to appeal to the country and make the issue between the Tariff that we advocate and that of the hon. gentlemen opposite; we will be able to show the manufacturers that under the Tariff which we would impose the people will derive as much advantage as they do now, they will get all the legitimate protection they can demand. We will show the artizan and the laboring classes and the agriculturists that they will be placed in no worse position than they have been, but rather in a much better one. We are ready for the fight which the Minister of Finance says will come soon, but there will be other issues than the National Policy before the people then, of which they must take cognizance. There will be the bargain made with the Pacific Railway by hon. gentlemen, and on that the people's judgment must be asked. When that bargain is placed before the country in all its iniquity, hon. gentlemen will find that they cannot force its acceptance upon the people as they did upon this House. The First Minister said in this House that he could sell all our public lands in ten years for $69,000,000 which he would have in the Treasury, either in cash or in securities as good as cash; and the Minister of Railways gave this House an estimate of the cost of that portion of the work that the Syndicate were to construct; on it he pledged his word, and the statement of his Chief Engineer, that this portion should not cost more than $48,500,000. They will have to explain to the people of this country how they abandoned that plan without the sanction of Parliament, and gave to that Syndicate, according to their own showing, for $48,500,000 worth of work, 25,000,000 acres of land (worth at their own calculation $3 per acre), and $25,000,000 in cash, making in all $100,000,000. They will have to tell the people of this country why it was they did not sell those lands and realize the $69,000,000, and out of that take $48,500,000 and complete that road and own it themselves, and have $20,500,000 of cash left in the Treasury; these are points on which the people will have to be answered. They will also have to show why they have locked up that great North-West for the next twenty years in a gigantic monopoly, and they will have to justify the bargain they have made with the Syndicate. They have locked up deliberately that great North West, that empire that is to be, and in addition to $50,000,000 over and above all they have to expend, they have a monopoly to the right of all freights and of all passengers who may come in and out of that country for 20 years to come. The hon. Minister of Finance knows, and it is a matter of record, that amendment after amendment was moved when there could be no reply made to them, they were so reasonable in themselves, but by their brute force they bore us down in this House, and the people of the country knew it and hon. gentlemen opposite will feel that at the next election. We know the result with reference to that matter—that hon. gentlemen opposite have exercised the power of disallowance of a charter passed by the Manitoba Legislature, and have evinced a determination to keep the lands locked up in that country. They will have to answer, with reference to the Pacific Railway Company, the increased charges imposed. One of their planks before the people was a diminution in the public expenditure. But what are the facts? Why it has gone up, as their Estimates ask $3,000,000 more than was required by the late Administration. On those points they will have to answer to the country, as well as for all their acts of maladministration since they assumed office.

Mr. PLUMB. What is the "diminution?"

Mr. PATERSON. I do not know what it is.

Mr. PLUMB. It does appear there is bad grammar on the other side sometimes.

Mr. PATERSON. I do not think there was an error in my grammar, but I think I transposed some syllables. But I thank the hon. gentleman for correcting me. Hon. gentlemen quote so largely from my speeches—extracting their elegant portions—that they may be anxious to quote from this one too. It should be free from all errors. I hope they will quote from it its very proper language. I may say, however, that I am not, generally, in the habit of complaining of interruptions; but the hon. member for Niagara, when speaking the other day, was asked a question by an hon. gentleman on my side, when he resented it, saying he did not want to be interrupted.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not say so.

Mr. PATERSON. I beg your pardon—you did say so.

Mr. PLUMB. I beg your pardon—I said the hon. gentleman who interrupted me will have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. ROSS. No; you said more than you are charged with.

Mr. PATERSON. At any rate, the hon. gentleman manifested an indisposition to be interrupted, and there is no hon. gentleman who interrupts members on this side more. I care not if a gentleman asks me a question properly; but when a member professing to be a gentleman, thinks an opponent is making a point—when he feels the iron is entering—and embarks upon a deliberate system of interruption, he places himself beyond the pale of politeness and has no right to be treated in the way he wants. Let me tell the hon. gentleman if he would prate less about British loyalty and study more British courtesy and politeness, he would stand a little higher in the estimation of every true lover of British institutions in this House. Let him speak if he has anything to say; but I do not like the continual chatter and gabble. I would bear with it on account of his years; but he has placed himself beyond the pale of forbearance. He systematically interrupts without sense or reason. He should be prepared to defend his course and give reasons for it.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the hon. gentleman, with his usual courtesy, allow me to call attention to the fact that, for three years, in this House, when he was one of the tyrannical majority, I never rose but I was hounded down by himself and his supporters. I never was able to make my voice heard, for the howls on the other side. I do not claim anything exceptional. I rise like any other man who has a right to speak here, and the hon. gentleman knows how systematic were the attempts to hound me down. There has been no disposition on this side ever to trifle with hon. gentlemen on the other side. They may cry "Order," as they like. But we, as a minority on the Opposition side, were never treated with the forbearance and courtesy with which we have treated our opponents, to whom we always listen. We have never formed a claque to prevent them from speaking. We have listened to them and their tirades, hour after hour, with a forbearance which I say now has almost ceased to be a virtue.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. gentleman's defence is not a denial of my statement. He could not deny it. A man with less vanity than the hon. gentleman, or less anxious to have Hansard record his wise sayings, would have been appalled by the noise often made whilst he spoke, but it was not I who made it.

Mr. PLUMB. Very likely not.

Mr. PATERSON. No; it was his own political friends who hounded him down by their noise.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman knows better.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. PATERSON. No, not only in this House, but in the country, if report speaks true; particularly at North Ontario, the cry was: "take this man out of the constituency; he is doing more harm than good." You must not try to fasten upon the Opposition the blame of the interruptions here received.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is openly stated and reiterated frequently that at North Ontario the hon. member for Niagara was treated discourteously, that his speech was not acceptable to the people he addressed. I was present, and there is no foundation for that statement whatever.

Mr. PATERSON. The statement has been reported in the press; the hon. Minister knows that.

Mr. PLUMB. Who reported it?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I admit the report has been published.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. member for North Ontario.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. the Finance Minister has not attempted to deny that it was his own political friends in the House, on more than one occasion, who interrupted him with their noise.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I was not here at the time.

Mr. PATERSON. On reflection, I admit you were not here, but the hon. member for Niagara knows it himself. I do not wish to be discourteous, however, nor to say a word offensive to any member. I never use personalities, but in discussing public questions I have a right to be listened to without continual interruptions, made for the purpose of making me lose the thread of my argument. I do not know that I need continue speaking longer, as other hon. gentlemen wish to address the House. I have only a few words to say in conclusion on one other matter, and that is, that the party to which I belong have been not only misrepresented on this trade question and many other subjects, but the hon. gentlemen have made a practice, not only in the House, but through the country, of pointing to us as a party not thoroughly loyal to the British Crown. They charge us with annexation proclivities, with a leaning towards the United States, and scheming for political annexation. I remember the leader of the Government, in a talk on one occasion, at a Canadian gathering, described the Grits as hybrids, and said that they were a cross between a Democrat and an Annexationist.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. members opposite say, hear, hear, as if they endorsed the sentiment. I think, Sir, those gentlemen will have to look in vain through the history of that political party to find evidence of disloyalty. They are a party, it is true, that do not prate about their loyalty upon all occasions. They take it for granted that being loyal men every one will know that they are loyal, and that it is not necessary to proclaim it on the house-tops. With reference to annexation sentiments being held by them, I deny it. I have to rejoice that I do not belong to a party, the leader of which expressed in plain terms that his choice as between independence and annexation would be annexation to the United States. I am happy to say that utterance coming from the leader of one of the great political parties, came not from the leader of the political party with which I am associated. I have to rejoice that it was not the leader of the Reform party that pointed the young men of Canada to look to Holland and to Belgium to see the position their country occupied with reference to the United States. I am happy to say that it was not the leader of the Reform party that belittled his country by pointing the people of Canada to those countries in Europe surrounded by powerful nations without the power of extending and developing themselves, to show that we are in a position like them. Sir, I am glad the leader of the political party that found it necessary to express such a sentiment in favor of annexation to the United States before the independence of this country, if choice had to be made, was found leading the party opposed to the one I am associated with.

Mr. BOWELL. Why not accompany that statement with the reason the right hon. gentleman gave at the time.

Mr. PATERSON. I can give you the reason. He said Canada was not able to hold her own, that she was too small, that the condition in which she was placed was one that rendered her unable to develop herself.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That annexation would follow.

Mr. PATERSON. I have it here:

"Independence is a farce—Canada must belong either to the British system or to the American system. Here we are with 4,500,000 people lying alongside of 55,000,000, the most unhappy position in which a nation can be placed, the most crushing to its energies and its intellect, the most destructive to its prosperity is that of living next door to and at the sufferance of a powerful neighbor. Look at Europe and you see the position which small nations occupy. Look at Belgium and Holland, Belgium trembling for fear France will take her, and Holland in fear of Germany. There is no spirit, there is almost hopelessness in those countries; and I say, looking at the question of independence that if we had to make a choice between independence and annexation, I would rather that we should have annexation and join with the United States at once than be here a small nation, a dependent nation obliged to raise the phantom of an army and navy, obliged to have foreign Ambassadors at an enormous expense, and after a brief existence to be absorbed as Texas and California were absorbed, and as Mexico will be absorbed."

There is a statement endorsed by the party by ringing cheers at Toronto and by the ringing cheers of the hon. gentlemen opposite in this House. Annexation for these men before independence, holding out Holland and Belgium as an instance of what Canada is. Holland and Belgium, surrounded with powerful nations, no room to develop themselves, no more territory to conquer, no land to which to invite the emigrants of other countries. That is the likeness this Canada of ours is compared to by the great leader of the party opposite. I see representatives who from 1,200 miles to the east have come here, and I see representatives in this House who have come here 3,000 miles from the west, and I will see, if I live a few years, men coming from thousands of miles from the North-West standing in this House. Yet these hon. gentlemen opposite talk about Holland and Belgium as being fit comparisons of this great country. They talk about raising the phantom of an army, the phantom of a navy—words from the leader of the party opposite—when we have 50,000 trained men now and are paying for them. They talk of the phantom of a navy when we now rank fourth in mercantile marine among the nations of the earth. They talk to us of being like Holland and Belgium, when we have not only all the old provinces, but have the North-West as a home for millions and millions of people from all climes and from all zones, whom we ask to cast in their lot with us. "Holland and Belgium, young men of Canada," says the leader of the Conservative party, "look to those countries, with their energies crushed, almost paralyzed; your Canada is like theirs." A fine picture for the young men of this country; a fine picture to induce the young men of Canada to develop their energies and lead on. Sir, I give the monopoly of these sentiments to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. We maintain and firmly adhere to the British Crown; but, Sir, if the time comes which the leader of the Government refers to, when a choice would have to be made, if the Government of England should submit the question to this country, if choice had to be made, and the question was put to me whether I would go for annexation with the States, or for an independent country, I would say, and many others would say it with me, I am a Canadian freeman; I see from the east to the west, a fertile region; I see that our shores are washed by three oceans; I see that we have the largest fresh water seas on the globe; I feel the life-blood of a Canadian pulsing through my veins; and if choice is to be made, the choice I shall make will be this: That Canada, maintaining her own separate existence, should go forward, hew her way, nobly go forward, triumphantly—not defiantly—till she reached the fulfilment of the great destiny that I believe is hers, of being a nation of people among whom shall exist liberty and order and freedom, and the highest state of civilization, and whose right arm shall ever be extended in the hour of Britain's need—if Britain should ever have an hour of need—to help her as devotedly as she has done in the past. These are my sentiments, and let hon. gentlemen opposite wipe out the expression of their leader, let hon. gentlemen blot out the cheers with which they endorsed it a short time ago, before they venture to charge hon. gentlemen sitting on this side of the House with being in favor of annexation to the United States. No, Sir; and it is because I see the grand future that is in store for our country, that we have here a country with immense possibilities which are calculated to stimulate our young men to develop the noblest sentiments that are in them. And, Mr. Speaker, it is because we believe in this great possibility, and desire rightly to develop the immense resources of this country, that we want them not to be belittled, and we want the ambition of our young men not to be crushed out by sentiments so derogatory to their country. What we want to do in this House is so to legislate that, in this country, which I believe has such a magnificent future before it, we shall prevent all monopolies, all preying of one class upon another; that all unjust laws shall be taken from our Statute-books, and that we shall be able in all our deliberations in this Assembly ever to remember that we stand here two political parties, opposed to one another on many points, but one party having as much right as the other, the right to express its sentiments; ever remembering that in the heat of strong debate gentlemen opposed to us are gentlemen, that we are not to indulge in personalities; ever remembering that we should guard our tongues against uttering charges against public men that are not true and only maintain such charges as may be fairly urged against them in their administrative capacity, that, laying aside all such methods, we shall rise to the discussion of subjects on their own merits, and thus set an example to the young men of Canada, outside these walls, worthy of their imitation; ever remembering that others should enjoy freedom of thought and freedom of speech with ourselves, and that we should be able to bear quietly the arguments that may be advanced by our opponents. I believe that we have before us the possibilities of a great heritage, that a grand future is before us; and I would desire, recognising my own failings as I might the failings of others, that we may be enabled, as legislators in this House, to have this for our aim and object at any rate, though we may have different ways of accomplishing them, that our hearts shall be united together as one man, that Canada shall be made to increase and prosper, and that we shall set such an example to those outside this House as to argue on their merits all questions that may be discussed with reference to the future welfare of this country; that all unseemly strife and bickering, and harsh personalities are not necessary between the public men of Canada; but that when the people have rightly understood and determined upon these questions, effect shall be given to their wishes. I have been led to make my remarks at greater length than I intended as the interruptions with which I have met have led me a little out of the path I intended to pursue. I have endeavored to argue the question on its merits, to show what my course has been in the past on this question; and while I do not pretend to say that I would not modify my views and learn lessons from the experience of the past, that with reference to the trade question they have very slightly changed; that they are much in the same direction as they were, and that I am persuaded that the best interests of the country are not to be served by the policy in force at the present time, which gives an undue amount of protection to certain manufacturers and does not give a proper amount to others. The Tariff I advocate is a Tariff designed to give a revenue without unduly pressing upon the people, and to show that that has been my view, I will read not my own sentiments but an expression of opinion of a Board that could speak with a great deal of authority with reference to questions of trade and finance; I refer to the Board of Trade resolution passed in 1878 when the Mackenzie Administration was in power. That resolution was seconded by Mr. E. K. Green, who, if I remember rightly, was mentioned by the Finance Minister the other night. In quoting that resolution I give what were my sentiments on the trade question in 1876, what have been my sentiments as expressed in every speech I believe I have made down to the present time both in this House and on the different platforms of the country, even when my audiences were largely composed of agriculturists:

"That while in the estimation of this Board, the present Tariff of 17½ per cent. is fair and reasonable, yet in the event of its being found necessary to increase the duties for revenue purposes, that this Board would respectfully request the Government to consider the industrial development of the country in any readjustment of the Tariff."

That motion was carried. If the revenue demanded an increase of Tariff I would have that increase made in such a way that it would develop the industries of the country; but if not demanded by that, then, Sir, that the people should not be made to pay for sheer protection on any other ground. I may also say in conclusion that while I recognize the fact that the Government have a majority of supporters of this House, while I would not venture in any predictions of what may take place in the future, yet that this side of the House will not be unprepared for the coming conflict whenever it comes, or shrink from it. I should suppose that hon. gentlemen opposite will naturally be anxious that the same constituencies that pronounced on them in 1878 shall pronounce upon them when the next election comes. I suppose that hon. gentlemen will not endeavor to change the bounds of any of the counties. I am quite willing that the four additional constituencies that we are entitled to in Ontario, as the result of the Census, shall be so arranged as to ensure the election of supporters of the Administration. That satisfaction I would not attempt to take from them, and I suppose they will see that they enjoy it. But, having done that, I suppose that they being so strong in the affections of the people—so sure that the people will endorse their policy—they will never consent to any cutting and carving and dividing, and re-arranging of townships, to give undue advantage, for if they desire to give the country an evidence of their faith in what they say, they will take the verdict from the same constituencies that gave it in 1878. If they do that we are prepared, first to meet them and discuss these questions, and then to abide by whatever verdict may be given, as we did on the last occasion when we met them at the polls. If that verdict should be against us we will still maintain what we think is right; we shall battle for our principles until we shall find a majority of the people agreeing with us, and when that time comes, I trust that hon. gentlemen opposite, in transferring themselves from that side of the House to this, will conduct themselves with courtesy, with proper humility, and with the decency and quietness which we have always shown.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not purpose, Mr. Speaker, to follow the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House in all the subjects to which he has referred. It will be within the observation of hon. members, that during this debate the Opposition have taken a somewhat new position. The hon. member who has just taken his seat anticipated the debate, to some extent, on a motion he introduced into this House, evidently proposing to place himself before the country in a position less inimical to its great industrial interests, than that which during the last three years he and his party have occupied in Parliament. Since that time almost every speech which has been delivered on that side, if we except the speech of the late Minister of Finance, who, I am bound to say, was honest and candid enough to maintain here the same views that he has always maintained—has indicated that they propose to go to the country with the assurance to the manufacturing interests, that those interests will receive a certain amount of protection at their hands. Well, Sir, we can remember what took place during the last Parliament; we can remember that there were in Parliament, supporting the then Administration, a certain number of very pronounced protectionists; we can remember that the hon. member for South Brant, the hon. member for North Norfolk, the then hon. member for Lincoln, the late hon. member for West Montreal, the two hon. members for Hamilton and other hon. gentlemen in this House, made speeches in favor of protection, which undoubtedly for force, vigor and strength of argument, have not been excelled by any speeches delivered on the same subject since. But, Sir, we remember also that, with all the influence they possessed in Parliament, and with all the undoubted influence of the conviction that reigned in the minds of many people that they more accurately represented the popular sentiment than many of their friends, they were yet utterly powerless to induce their leaders to modify their trade policy; and I am sure that, under these circumstances, the great manufacturing and industrial interests of Canada of every kind will be slow to entrust the Government of the country to gentlemen, who, as a party, were quite regardless of the warnings of a few of their friends, and still adhered to the principles of Free Trade, so far as those principles could be applied in this country. There is one satisfaction to be derived from the statement the hon. member for South Brant has made to-night. We have listened with some anxiety to learn what is precisely the policy they are to give us, and to-night we find that the hon. member for South Brant has spoken of the Tariff which he proposes to give us, as the Tariff that was formerly in force. Well, Sir, that is, at least, a candid, a frank, a straightforward statement. The change we are to have is a change to the condition of things that existed under the late Administration; the Tariff of the future is to be the same Tariff that existed before, if the change of Government takes place, and with that frank and intelligible statement, I think we may fairly leave the issue to the people of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite, beginning with the hon. member for North Norfolk, seem to be alarmed lest the issues before the country shall be confined to the National Policy; they tell us that long before the elections take place, that question will be so overwhelmed by the other issues which have since arisen and are arising that it will have but little influence with the people of Canada. The hon. member for South Brant, in a speech delivered in another place a few evenings ago, made the statement that the National Policy was no longer an issue in this country, that it was not worth while discussing it at all, that the questions which would be decided by the people of Canada in the elections, were the question of the financial administration of their affairs, the question of the Pacific Railway, the questions connected with the development of the North-West, and other questions apart altogether from the National Policy; and we were told that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House were most anxious to avoid the discussion of those other questions. Sir, for one, I have no desire to avoid the discussion of the other questions; I should be sorry indeed if this party had to go to the country in 1883, if the elections shall then take place, depending simply upon its record in connection with the question of Free Trade and Protection. On the contrary, I am convinced that there will be no shirking of other issues; that we shall be able to appeal to the country on all the issues the hon. gentlemen opposite have named; that we shall be able to show that the financial administration of the affairs of this country by the hon. gentlemen now in office has been a wise, economical and patriotic administration; that we shall be able to show that in relation to the development of our great North-West, they have adopted a policy which was not only wise and patriotic in its inception, but which has already vindicated itself by the results which have since taken place; that we shall be able to show that in consequence of the land regulations of the Government, settlers and capital have been flowing into that country, giving to it a development such as we could never have hoped for two or three years ago. Upon all these questions the party now in power will be able to appeal to the country, quite as certain of a favorable verdict as they are upon the great question of the National Policy, upon which I venture to say, if you were talking with hon. gentlemen opposite in their private chambers, simply as their private friends, nine-tenths of them would declare that the people of this country are against them. Sir, much has been said in relation to the financial administration of this Government, and though I do not propose to take up much time in discussing it, I have grouped together a few figures which I think will show that we have nothing to fear in presenting the record of this Government on that subject. It is important that this subject should be referred to for two reasons: the question of whether the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches or hon. gentlemen opposite, happen to hold office is in itself, apart from the interests of the country and the policies they respectively represent, a matter of no great consequence; men reign and pass away, but the influence upon the country of the discussions which take place are lasting and abiding, and it is because of a settled determination apparently on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite, for what reason it is difficult to appreciate, to show that this country is going headlong to financial ruin, that it is important to present the facts as they exist as tersely and as briefly as possible. Scarcely a speech is made by hon. gentlemen opposite, especially outside of Parliament, in which we are not told of the enormous increase of expenditure which took place under the Conservative Government of this country, from $13,500,000 in 1867, to nearly $23,500,000 in 1873-74; and we are asked to believe, from that bald statement of figures, that the financial administration of the Conservative party was disastrous to the interests of the country. Let me, in the first place, protest against the method of calculation which hon. gentlemen opposite adopt. The year 1873-74, which they always assumed to be a year of Conservative administration, does not in any sense belong to that party; they are not responsible for the expenditures of that year, as I shall be able presently to show. But even assuming for the purpose of this argument, that they were responsible, what are the facts? Surely hon. gentlemen, in the interests of the country, might be honest enough to state that the Dominion in 1867 comprised only four Provinces. We were for the first year only laying the foundations for the future government of the country; the expenditures were small in all the Departments; Parliament simply met together for the purpose of paving the way to that greater policy of development which was followed afterwards, and therefore to speak of the expenditure for 1867 as an expenditure which ought to be considered in any matter of comparison or calculation, is to do a great injustice not to the party then in power but to the country itself. At the end of the period what was the position of the country?

Instead of having four small Provinces we had seven Provinces and the great North-West. The country as it exists to-day had been completed as regards its geographical boundaries. At the end of that period, and as a consequence of that enlargement, the expenditures which were made during those six years were all expenditures, as was stated by the late Finance Minister in his celebrated circular when he went to England to float his first loan, made on works of great public utility, on works of improvement, on objects of development, and on the necessary expenditure connected with the enlargement of the Dominion, and the acquisition of the great North-West Territory. I have the accounts here, but I will not detain the House by dealing with particular items of increase. All of them are of the character to which I refer. But if it was wrong during those six or seven years to have increased the public expenditure, if it was a crime on the part of the Conservative party to have done so, what shall we say of hon. gentlemen opposite, who came into power full of promises of economy and retrenchment, with a backing such as no Government before that time had, and who yet went on adding to the expenditures all the time they were in office? But I have said the comparison was not a fair one. The Conservative party were not responsible for the expenditures of 1873-74. I am not going to refer to the fact that the accounts were made up by hon. gentlemen opposite so as to include certain items of capital expenditure, such as the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway, on the Dawson Route, and certain Customs refunds; but there is an easy way of testing this matter. The Government of that day were responsible for the Estimates they submitted to Parliament. The Estimates were the measure of what they believed would be the proper expenditure during that year. Well, Sir, what did we find? That the total amount included in the first Estimates brought down were for $31,008,423; that the expenditure on capital account included in that, amounted to $9,974,240, leaving the expenditure, on account of Consolidated Fund, according to the Estimates as first brought down, a little over $21,000,000, exactly $21,034,183. Then there were certain Supplementary Estimates brought down, three sets, aggregating $604,483, making the total Estimate, for 1873-74, as brought down by the then Administration, $21,639,666. The expenditure for that year—and hon. gentlemen opposite were in office for eight months of the time—was $23,316,316, or $1,676,650 more than the Conservative Government obtained power from Parliament to expend in the Estimates which they brought down at that time. It may be said that Governments very often spend more money than is estimated; but I think we may fairly assume that had the Administration which was in office before 1873 continued in power, they would not have spent more, judging by their record of the preceding year. The warrant for assuming this is to be found in the fact that the Estimates brought down for 1872-73 amounted to $29,675,460, including an estimate for capital expenditure of $9,949,500, leaving $19,725,960. The Supplementary Estimates amounted to $575,774, making the Estimates brought down by the Government for the expenditures required for 1872-73, $20,301,734. And yet, although they obtained the power from Parliament to expend that amount, the actual expenditure made by the Government in that year was $19,174,647, or $1,127,087 less than they had obtained power from Parliament to expend. If we find a Government bringing down Estimates on the eve of a general election, as those Estimates of 1872-73 were brought down, with every desire to make the probable expenditure appear as low as possible, and if we find that the Administration remaining in office is able to get through the year's business and expend $1,000,000 less than they had obtained authority from Parliament to expend, we may fairly hold that the same Government remaining in office will make ends meet and be able to carry on public affairs without increasing the expenditure beyond the next year's Estimates. Yet we find that hon. gentlemen opposite, having control of the expenditures, exceeded the Estimates by $1,676,650. How was that excess made up? In Civil Government, for instance, hon. gentlemen opposite spent $150,226 more than had been voted by Parliament; and when I tell the House that in the one item of contingencies they spent $75,000 more in that year than the Government had estimated would be necessary, and had taken the authority of Parliament to expend, I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me in the statement that that was a reckless expenditure on their part. Then in the Administration of Justice they spent $78,776 more than Parliament had voted. For Legislation they spent $354,970 more than Parliament had voted. It is quite true there was a general election which was not anticipated when the Estimates were brought down, and they are perhaps entitled to say that they could not have anticipated that expenditure. But we were told when that Government came into power, and especially as a reason for the entrance of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) into the Government, in violation of the principle which he himself had laid down, that the number of the Executive Council should not be increased beyond that which the law specified, even in cases where an hon. gentleman entered without salary, that 119 members of the House, which is a good working majority, had requested the hon. gentleman to enter the Cabinet, and had given him assurances of support if he did so. With 119 members supporting the Government in a House of 206, I may fairly say that they were not bound to have a general election. Having regard to what occurred at that time, they had no intention of having a general election until they began to see, looking at what they might be requested to do during the five years they would be in office, that it would be better to secure, if possible, a larger majority while the influence of that great slander, usually called the Pacific Scandal, was upon the country. Then I find that for the collection of Customs they expended $56,062 more than Parliament voted; and in the collection of Public Works revenue they spent $319,034 more than was voted. For Post Office revenue collection they expended $71,270 more than voted; so that in these items alone, and which it must be admitted were controllable expenditures and within the competency of the Government, within certain limits of course, to regulate, they expended $730,338 more than had been voted by the preceding Administration. I am aware that it may be said, in relation to the years 1878-79, that the Government which is now in office expended also more money than had been voted by their predecessors; but we may fairly account for that from the fact that during the time hon. gentlemen opposite were in office their financial administration was very severely criticised by the press and public men of this country; and on the eve of going to the country and as a preparation for the elections, their Estimates were so framed as to give the appearance, at any rate, of the greatest possible economy. Although that was the fact, what was the real result? The Conservative Government spent $758,508 more than their predecessors had obtained the authority of Parliament to spend; and of that for the collection of public works alone, largely connected with the work of the Intercolonial Railway, there was $414,714; while, Sir, the Liberal Government had expended $1,676,650 more than the Conservative Parliament had voted. Now, let us take some contrasts. Under Civil Government hon. gentlemen opposite spent $150,226 more than their predecessors had voted; the Conservatives when they came in spent $27,804 less than their predecessors had voted. Under the head of Administration of Justice the Liberal Government spent $78,776 more than their predecessors had estimated; the Conservatives when they came into office expended

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

$36,734 less than their predecessors had provided. On Weights and Measures, the Conservatives spent $25,296 less than had been voted by Parliament for that service. In the collection of Customs duties the Liberals expended $56,062 more than their predecessors had voted, while the Conservatives only expended $13,875 more. In the collection of Post Office revenues the Liberals had expended $71,270 more than their predecessors had voted, the Conservatives only exceeded the amount by $17,423. In Legislation the Liberals expended $354,970 more, while the Conservatives only spent $58,071 more. I have said enough to show that the only true course in making a comparison of the two Administrations is to take the last complete year of each Administration of the results of which there can be no doubt as to where the responsibility rests. Doing so, what do we find? We have been told, if I mistake not, by the hon. gentleman from West Durham, in a speech which he made out of session, that the increased expenditure during the five years of Mr. Mackenzie's Government was only $200,000; and referring to a remark made by the First Minister in a speech at Toronto, that the Liberals when in office were like soldiers marking time, moving but making no progress, he said that was true with reference to the expenditures of the country, because they had succeeded in carrying on the Government during these five years, and at the end of that period found themselves spending only $200,000 more than their predecessors had spent. Now the ordinary expenditure—what in Public Accounts is put down as ordinary expenditure—in 1872-73 was $7,062,095, and in 1877-78, $6,542,510, an apparent decrease of $519,585. But in dealing with questions of controllable expenditure it seems to me that we must always include the charges upon revenue. There is not after all any part of the expenditure, except perhaps Public Works, Militia and large items of that kind, which is more within the control of the Government of the day than are those expenditures connected with the collection of revenue. If we add these items we find the controllable expenditure of 1872-73 was $10,457,570, while, in 1877-78, it was $11,843,634, or an increase in the aggregate of these two classes of expenditure of $1,386,064. But, Sir, let us look at this decrease in "ordinary expenditure" and see how it is made up. Well, we find in the item of Militia and Defence a decrease of $630,527. We all know how that was effected. The country corps were cut off from their drill; and if hon. gentlemen opposite had simply wiped out the Militia altogether, as I believe some of them would desire to do, they could have made a much larger reduction than that. They could have presented a much more taking aggregate to the people. Then we find in the matter of Public Works expenditure, such as improvements in harbors, putting up public buildings, and other works of that kind, there was a decrease of $599,017. In that case, also, all they had to do was simply not to spend a dollar on harbors or public buildings, and stop all public works; they could thus have saved very much, and they could have made a much better show in the aggregate figures. Then I find in connection with the expenditures on Dominion lands, there was a decrease of $150,048; they had only to stop sending out surveyors, to stop everything in connection with the development of the North-West, in order to make the decrease very much larger and thus present a better picture. But in these three items alone, which I will not admit were economies, which were simply a starving of the public service—in these three items alone—the decrease was $1,379,592, or $800,000 more than the entire aggregate decrease of which they are in the habit of boasting so much. Now, while this is the case as to these items, what do we find as to others in connection with which economies might have been practiced? In the matter of Civil Government, which they tell us we have been much too extravagant in administering, during their five years of office, they increased the cost by $160,180. Under their rule, the cost of the Administration of Justice increased $163,954; the cost of the Post Office Department—of the collection of the Postal Revenue—increased no less than $657,206, making a total increased expenditure in those items—all controllable expenditures—of very nearly $1,000,000, viz.: $981,206. Under those circumstances can hon. gentlemen opposite, with any regard for accuracy, at any rate, say to the people of this country that, during the time they were in office and had control of the expenditures, they did anything to entitle them to claim credit for economy or retrenchment? What has been the expenditure under the present Government? I take simply the Public Accounts as my authority, because it is most inconvenient to deal with the Estimates. Last year the present Government spent half a million dollars less than they obtained the authority of Parliament to spend. Therefore, having regard to fairness and accuracy we can only deal with the actual expenditure as brought down in the Public Accounts; but from them what do we find? That the total expenditure in 1877-78, the last year of the Mackenzie Administration, was $23,503,158, and, in 1880-81, under the present Government, $25,502,554; or an increase under the present Government, in three years, of very nearly $2,000,000. How has that increase been brought about? In one matter, the charges, interest, sinking fund and on the public debt, there is an increase of $883,604. Surely the late Government were responsible for that. I think I may say that the present Government have made no expenditures on capital account, if you except the payments that may have been made on the Yale and Kamloops Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and on the contract for the missing link between Thunder Bay and Selkirk—excepting on works begun by hon. gentlemen opposite, and for which the contracts were actually let before the present Government was formed. Then they have had to expend on an exceptional item—that appears every ten years in our accounts, and which fell in since the present Government took office—viz.: the Census, $127,033; and they have also been obliged to spend in Public Works, $140,171; and on Indian grants, $383,594; Post Office, increase in the Collection of Revenue, $151,719; and on Public Works, for the collection of revenue, in consequence of the greater mileage of the Intercolonial Railway, an increased outlay of $231,727, or on all these items a total of $1,918,848. This leaves only about $80,000 of an increase on the other items of the public expenditure. Not one of those items, I venture to say, can hon. gentlemen opposite fairly challenge. They cannot challenge the increase in the interest on the public debt, and the sinking fund and charges connected with it; nor can they complain of the item for the Census, for that is a statutory obligation, and an outlay we have to incur every ten years. They will hardly complain of the increased expenditure on public works in presence of our large revenue, our overflowing Treasury, or that the wants of the country in connection with the public works are being generously and fairly dealt with. They will not object either to the increased expenditure on account of the Indians. If they do I would refer them to the admirable correspondence from the North-West, which appeared in the Toronto Globe, the leading organ of their party, in which the policy of the Government in making larger expenditures in the North-West, in connection with the Indians, was fully sustained and vindicated, and in which the prediction was made, which has been realized since, that very large expenditures for this purpose would be required. They can hardly complain of those expenditures to which I have referred, and, therefore, the only expenditure, taking the whole service of the country, to which any exception can be taken is this item of $80,000. If I were disposed to take up the time of the House, I could show that every single item making up that sum may be vindicated and defended on its merits. Then, I say, if we look to the great increase of the public outlay during the time the late Government were in power, and compare it with the expenditures of the present Government, we will find these remarkable facts: The expenditure on the public debt showed an average annual increase during the administration of the late Government of $478,207, while the average annual increase since the present Government was formed is but $294,535. The Post Office expenditure during the late Government showed an annual increase of $131,441; during the three years of the present Government the increase has been but $50,573, and that in spite of the fact that within the last three years that service has been extended over our great North-West, and an enormous expenditure to the country has been required by the necessity of furnishing settlers with adequate postal accommodation. Again, I find that the annual increase in the cost of collecting Customs revenue under the late Administration was $29,352; under the present Government it has been but $1,059, or about one twenty-ninth part as large as the increase of the late Administration, and that, despite the fact that there was an aggregate decrease in the Customs revenue during their term of five years of $171,341, while there has been an aggregate increase under the present Administration of $5,621,268. I find also that while the collection of the revenue increased annually during those five years, by $381,130, the annual increase during the last three years has been but $127,343. Then, Sir, while the revenue itself increased during the period of the Mackenzie Government $312,308 per annum, it has increased during the last three years, $2,420,095. The hon. gentlemen opposite, when in office, actually increased the cost of collecting the revenue by $68,822 a year more than the increase in the revenue itself. I think that may fairly be said to be pretty strong evidence that there was no great economy or carefulness in the administration of public affairs by hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, I think you will agree with me, under these circumstances, that in relation to the financial administration of this Government, the hon. members of the Government themselves, and their supporters in this House, have no reason to fear any public criticism to which they may be subjected, and have no reason to fear the ordeal to which, within a short time, sooner or later, we must all submit at the hands of the people of this country. The hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of referring to the increase in the public debt. While as between the two parties it may be a matter of no great consequence whether the debt increased more during the five years one party were in power, or the six years another party were in power, or the three years that the same party have since been in power, the use which hon. gentlemen make of this increase in the public debt, is to create the impression through this country, and in other countries where it is our interest to stand well, and to which we are appealing for a share of the emigration that is going from them, that the Dominion is going headlong to ruin, that it is incurring debts beyond what its resources will fairly justify. In pursuance of this policy we are told the debt has doubled since Confederation. What are the facts? In 1867, the net debt was $75,728,641; in 1873, the debt was $99,848,461, or an increase of $24,119,820, or an average annual increase for the six years of $4,019,970. The net debt in 1878 had increased to $140,362,069, an increase in five years of $40,513,608, or an average annual increase of $8,102,721. The net debt in 1881, on the 30th July last, was $155,395,780, an increase in three years of $15,033,711, or an average annual increase of $5,011,237. Let me give hon. gentlemen those averages. Six years of Conservative rule, an average annual increase of the public debt of $4,019,970; during the five years of Liberal rule, an average annual increase of $8,102,721; three years of Conservative rule, an average annual increase of $5,011,000.

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon. gentleman include in that second statement the loan effected by the hon. Minister of Finance in the autumn of 1873?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, and I include also the loan effected by the present hon. Minister of Finance in the autumn of 1878. Now, Sir, what are the facts with regard to this debt, looking to the increase of our obligations? I find that about $20,000,000 of that increased debt since Confederation is represented either by the transference of the debts of the Provinces, or simply taking from one pocket and putting into the other, relieving the Provinces and putting it upon the Dominion; or it was incurred in bringing in new Provinces with their debts, and was, therefore, represented by an increased population, an increased area of country, and must not be considered an increase upon the debt of 1867 in which the four Provinces alone were involved. Before 1873, during the time the Conservative party were in power, I find no less than $15,525,279 was of this character; so that the actual increase of the debt during those six years represented by the increased burden upon the people, was $8,594,541, or an average annual increase of $1,432,423. Then, of the increase between 1873 and 1878, I find that $4,927,060 was of the character I have just described, represented by the introduction of new Provinces and their debts, or by the re-arrangements of debts, and was not an increased burden upon the people in relation to their debt. I find, therefore, that the average increase, deducting that amount of the five years of Liberal rule, was $7,117,109. Then, Sir, as illustrating the difference between Conservative and Liberal rule, let me point out one fact of very great importance, and that is, the expenditure upon capital account as compared with the increased debt during the periods the two parties respectively were in power. I find that during the six complete years of Conservative rule no less than $12,072,780 were spent on capital account in excess of the addition of the debt. During the five complete years of Liberal rule $1,997,613 were added to the debt more than was expended on capital account. Then I find that during the last three years of Conservative rule $991,683 were expended on capital account in excess of the addition to the public debt; or, if we take the expenditure up to the 1st January last, according to the statement by the Minister of Finance, we find that $4,522,822 was expended upon capital account in excess of the debt. That statement is more than fair to hon. gentlemen opposite, for it gives them the benefit of 1873-74, and it places on the hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches the responsibility of the expenditure of 878-79. But if we take their method of using figures what do we find? We find that during the time the Conservatives were in office, during the seven years which are usually credited to the Conservatives in connection with the public expenditure of this country, there were $12,833,009 spent on capital account in excess of the addition to the public debt. We find that the late Government added to the debt, in excess of capital expenditure, $4,257,512; and we find the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, since they have returned to office, have expended upon capital account, in excess of the addition to the public debt, no less than $7,543,033. Now, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask this honorable House, whether in relation to the public debt of this country, that is a record of which the Conservative party have any reason to be ashamed? But I know that hon. gentlemen opposite say: "We are not responsible for this enormous increase of debt during the time we were in office." The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) puts their responsibility for their increased debt at somewhere—I forget the exact figures—but certainly under a million dollars.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. $200,000, I think.
Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

Mr. WHITE. Considerably under a million, at all events. It is undoubtedly difficult to apportion between the two parties the responsibility for the increased public debt, or for the expenditures in connection with it. But my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), in the speech which he delivered this afternoon, pointed out what, I think, everybody must admit that they are quite as responsible for all the increases to the public debt which have taken place since Confederation as the party who are now in office. The Intercolonial Railway was an obligation at the time of Confederation; it was part of the Treaty. The then leader of the party, the late lamented Mr. Brown—and would to God he were with us to-night to see what are the principles his friends and former followers are venturing in his absence to proclaim—stated that Confederation was worth six Intercolonial Railways. I heard him make the speech myself in the old Music Hall, Toronto. That was an obligation resting on the country as a whole; for it both parties were responsible. It is true, as the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) has pointed out, that there was a difference of opinion as to the route; but I would like to ask the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) what he thinks of the route of the Intercolonial Railway. I would like to ask the members for Lower Canada—those who were in Parliament at that time and those who are in Parliament to-day—what they think of the route of the Intercolonial Railway. It is a notorious fact that except the Ontario Opposition and a few of the New Brunswick members, the whole of the Opposition—the Nova Scotia Opposition and the Quebec Opposition voted with the Government of the day in determining the north shore line as the route of the Intercolonial. What are the facts with regard to the canals, which is the next large item entering into the expenditures making up the increase of debt? Every one knows who has read the Confederation Act that the question of expenditure upon the canals, although provided for by that Act, was contingent on the condition of the finances. It was for the Government of the time, whatever the Government might be, to determine when they would enter on the work of enlarging the canals. Now, what is the history of the case? When the Conservative Government left office in 1873, I think I speak accurately in saying that there was not a single contract let for the enlargement of the canals west of Lachine, that all the work in connection with the canals west of Lachine was undertaken after the Conservative Government went out of office. Nay, more than that. Although the Conservative Government had advertised for tenders, and, I believe, had received tenders for certain contracts in connection with the Welland Canal, the Minister of Public Works of the late Ministry, when he came into power, stopped those tenders—rejected them—and advertised anew for tenders. It was competent for him, under the terms of the Confederation Act, under the obligation the country had assumed, connected with the construction and enlargement of the canals, to say that the condition of our finances would not permit us to go on, and, therefore, under the contract we are not bound to go on; and when we remember that the first act of the Government was to increase the annual taxation of the country by $3,000,000 because the ordinary requirements of the country necessitated it, including, of course, the expenditures on the Pacific Railway—every one will admit that the hon. member for Lambton might have taken that course, and have said our finances will not permit us to enter upon the work, and, therefore, we will not enter on it. But he did not take that course; he entered on the work, on his own responsibility as a Minister; his party supported him on their own responsibility; and their organs in the country, the Montreal Herald, the Toronto Globe and others, actually called on the people of this country to sing pæans of praise to them, because they entered on the work of enlarging these canals promptly which their predecessors had so long neglected to the injury of the country. In relation, therefore, to the canals they were undoubtedly responsible, and solely responsible, for the expenditures. Then, Sir, as to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Parliament of Canada had committed itself to the declaration that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be built by a company, aided by subsidies of land and money. That was the resolution that accompanied the contract with British Columbia. It was, in fact, part of the contract to all intents and purposes, and was accepted by the gentlemen who were here representing British Columbia; one leading gentleman from that Province, Mr. Trutch, declaring in a speech he delivered in the Russell House that it was part of the contract and that they were prepared to accept it as such. When those hon. gentlemen came into power it was for them to determine what they should do about the Pacific Railway. They arranged the policy. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) said in a speech to his own constituents that he proposed to go on with the work as a public work, because the country would then have the profits, instead of the contractors, in constructing the railway. And yet, after he had gone into the work, more as a matter of profit to the Government than of profit to the contractors, his friends now come down and say that they must not be held responsible for the expenditure, because, forsooth, the agreement that the Pacific Railway should be built was entered into before they came into office. More than that, we have had during the last three years, in every Session of this Parliament, declarations of the most formal kind—declarations recorded in the Journals of the House, which, if they mean anything, meant that that bargain was not binding on the people of this country; that it was a bargain to be executed or neglected just in proportion as the Parliament of Canada might consider it to be in the interests of the country to do consistently with the condition of its finances at the time. Surely, Sir, it was these same gentlemen who have thus formally interpreted the bargain for the construction of the Pacific Railway, who are responsible for the increase of debt involved in connection with it. That is the position in relation to this matter of the public debt; and I think, therefore, we might fairly say that on that question as in relation to the ordinary public expenditure, we can fairly claim that the policy of this Government, not as compared alone with the policy of their predecessors, but viewed simply by itself as a policy to be judged of in the interests of the country, is one that we can fully defend and one which the people of this country will amply sustain. Now, Sir, I come for a moment to deal with the National Policy. There is one fact, on which I think we may all congratulate ourselves, and that is, that with the exception of the particular surroundings of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), the condition of this country is everything we can desire. We find that every hon. member who has spoken on that side, from the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) and through all the others that have addressed the House—and I do not say through all the others in any tone of disrespect—I say we find an admission that the condition of this country is eminently prosperous; that every branch of industry, every branch of commerce is in a condition in the highest degree satisfactory. We heard to-day from the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and I do not wonder that he was so good-natured, so pleasant-looking when he made the announcement, I do not wonder that it prompted his eloquence to such an extent, that, in his own particular business, this last year had been one of the best years in his experience. I think the same thing may be said of almost every man, for whatever may be the condition of the country there will always be exceptional cases from exceptional circumstances of people who do not do as well as their neighbors. But I think we may fairly conclude that that is the opinion and that is the estimate of every man in this country in relation to the present commercial condition of the country. But, Sir, we are told—although the country is prosperous, although every industry is flourishing, although commerce is yielding a larger return to those engaged in it than it has yielded at any time in the past history of Canada, that this is not in any sense due to the National Policy—that this improvement is entirely due to Providence. Sir, I bow with awful reverence, with the profoundest faith, in the presence of that great mystery. I consider that now, as in all ages past, national blessings will follow national well-doing, and national curses will follow national wrong-doing. I am a profound believer in the over-ruling guidance of Providence; but I say the manner in which the hon. gentlemen have been dealing with this subject is little less than impious. It is a fatalist doctrine which they have proclaimed. They tell us, the sun shining and the rain falling will give everything that is required, and that nothing is left to wise fiscal laws or to the industry of the people. According to their doctrine men may fold their arms and drop on their knees and leave the rest to Providence; but if there is a doctrine of undoubted truth it is that Providence helps those who help themselves. In the very same breath in which they tell us that you cannot make men rich by Act of Parliament, these hon. gentlemen propose to make them rich by Act of Parliament, by changing this policy for another; their whole argument is that this policy is a bad one, an injury instead of a benefit to the industries of the country, and that if they were in office they would introduce an Act of Parliament by which they would promote the industries of the country and make men rich. Sir, we have great reason in this country to be thankful to Providence, but I think that in Parliament, dealing with questions of legislation, we may fairly confine our discussions to that legislation and consider its effects on the condition of the country, all of us recognizing how much we owe to Providence, without this perpetual invocation of that power as the one source of the increased prosperity of the country. I am sorry, Sir, and I say it in no irreverent mood, that this over-ruling power did not reach to the region of the hon. member for Charlotte, which seems to be the only place in the whole of Canada on which Providence frowns. I hope it is not a judgment on the people for sending the hon. gentleman to Parliament. Now, Sir, we are told that the whole of the increased prosperity is due to the fact that we have had better crops during the last year than we had before. What are the facts? The year 1877, for instance, was not a prosperous one in this country, but the very reverse. It was one of those years which hon. gentlemen opposite told us, happening to be a dull year in all departments of trade and commerce, paved the way for that great change which took place on the 17th of September, 1878. Now, what do we find with regard to the crops of that year? I hope that some day or other we shall have a Bureau of Statistics in Canada which will give us information on subjects of this kind. But in the absence of such information the annual crop reports, furnished by the Grand Trunk Railway, may be taken as official. According to them we find the state of the crops in 1877 and 1881 to be as follows: Fall wheat, there were 65 returns above the average in 1877, and only 45 in 1881, while below the average there were none in 1877, and 12 in 1881. Spring wheat, above the average, 53 in 1877, and 41 in 1881; below the average, 5 in 1877, and 9 in 1881. Oats, above the average, 56 in 1877, and 42 in 1881; below the average, 6 in 1877, and 3 in 1881. Barley, above the average, 47 in 1877, and 42 in 1881; below the average, 3 in 1877, and

5 in 1881. Peas, above the average, 43 in 1877, and 28 in 1881; below the average, 13 in 1877, and 23 in 1881. Thus we find from the only evidence of an official kind that we can get at, that the crop in 1877 was actually a better and larger crop than that of 1881. But what do we find further? We find that the value of the crop, as entered at the Customs for export in 1877-78, which was the crop of 1877, of wheat, flour, peas, oats and barley altogether amounted to \$15,375,486, against \$15,697,987 in 1880-81, or an increase in the latter over the former year of \$322,501, or only two per cent. Will hon. gentlemen tell me that this difference of about two per cent. accounts for the difference between the depression of 1877 and the prosperity of 1881? But, Sir, we have been told that the National Policy has lessened the price of cereals to the Canadian farmer. One cannot very well understand the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. When we are dealing with manufactures we are told that the imposing of a duty on the foreign article coming into Canada increases the price to the Canadian consumer by the amount of that duty; but when we are dealing with the cereals of the farmer, we are told that it has the very opposite effect and decreases the price of the article coming into the country. What do we find? I know that the hon. member for North Norfolk, the other evening, referred to the prices in Chicago as compared with those in Toronto. If they were disposed to deal with this question in that spirit of fairness which the hon. member for South Brant commended in his closing remarks, they would not make that comparison. They know the reason that at times prices in Chicago were higher than in Toronto. They know that for the same reason wheat in Chicago, during the last year, has been 6 cents. higher than in New York, and therefore they were perfectly well aware that it was not because of any question of fiscal policy either on this side or the other that this particular fact exists. On the contrary, it is due to that miserable gambling spirit which is eating like a canker-worm into the whole commercial transactions of the United States and this country. It is the result of the wheat corners in Chicago, where men seek, not by legitimate trading, but by finesse, by holding a hand which they think to be a strong one and going one better if they think it to be necessary; this wretched gambling which, as I have said, is eating as a canker-worm into the commercial honesty and honor of this country and the United States, is the cause of the fact that at times the prices of wheat have been higher in Chicago than in Toronto. But what is the general fact? I take the average value of American wheat exported from Canada as entered at the Customs as the easiest way of arriving at the facts in connection with this matter. In 1877, the average value of American wheat was \$1.50 per bushel, while the average value of Canadian wheat exported was \$1.22 $\frac{1}{2}$, or a difference in price in favor of the American wheat of 27 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per bushel. In 1881, the average price of American wheat for export as entered at the Customs was \$1.07 $\frac{1}{2}$, while that of Canadian wheat was \$1.03, or a difference in favor of the American of 27 cents in 1878, and of 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents last year. That is the fact as derived from the Customs returns in regard to the export of those cereals in the two years, 1878 and 1881. I do not say, I have too much respect for myself to say, that this is due to the National Policy. During the discussions that took place when those hon. gentlemen were in office, I never charged them with the whole of the depression that existed; what I did charge them with is this; that in the presence of the depression and in spite of suggestions made by wise merchants who understood trade and saw means by which the depression might at least be relieved and mitigated in severity, they failed to do anything. And although now I do not think that the change I have mentioned is due entirely to the National Policy, yet I do think it is an all-sufficient answer to the statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that the effect of the National Policy has been to reduce the price of wheat to the Canadian farmer. If it has, then I ask upon what ground, hon. gentlemen opposite go down to the Maritime Provinces, as they did last year, and speak to the fishermen about the enormous tax on breadstuffs. How can a tax on breadstuffs be detrimental if the effect of that policy is to reduce instead of increasing the price to the producer? Let them take one course or the other. Let them at least have this amount of candor, that they will have the same story for all parts of the country. If they will only do that I venture to say we can meet them fairly on every platform. But when they go to Ontario and tell the farmers that wheat was higher in Chicago on a particular day than it was in Toronto, and that therefore the National Policy has reduced the price of their wheat, and when they go down to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces and tell them they are paying 50 cents per barrel more for flour than before the duty was imposed—when they undertake to adopt a policy of that kind, then I say they are not adopting a policy worthy of a great party, as they are, or consistent with that fair, proper and reasonable method of discussion which the hon. member for Brant commended to us at the close of his remarks, although I am afraid he did not act quite up to it during the progress of his speech. What has been the effect on imports of agricultural products into this country for home consumption? I take the Trade Returns for 1878 and for 1881. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) last year made a comparison with the Trade Returns one year earlier than I am now able to submit. Taking the years 1878 and 1881, I find there is a decrease in the receipts of barley equal to 285,214 bushels, the aggregate in 1878 being 302,147 bushels, and, in 1881, 16,933 bushels. I find that the importation of Indian corn has decreased 5,344,198 bushels, and I venture to think that the coarser grains of the Canadian farmers supplied that large decrease. Oats declined 2,089,933 bushels between those two periods. Peas, which are not a large importation, decreased 6,306 bushels; wheat decreased 5,558,759 bushels; rye, 145,598 bushels; wheat flour, 126,939 barrels; and I venture to think that the void was filled up by the productions of the mills of this country which had to that extent a greater home market for their output. Then I find this fact, which is of interest to the fishermen of the Lower Provinces and the people of Lower Canada, who do not grow much wheat and have to get their flour from abroad, that, instead of increasing the price by reason of the tax, the average price of flour in 1878, as entered for export at the Customs, which ought certainly to have given us prosperity in that year, if the mere condition of our crops is the one test either of prosperity or the reverse, was \$5.93 per barrel, while in 1881 it was \$4.65. The people of the Maritime Provinces had certainly nothing to complain of in connection with the price of flour under this policy as compared with what it was before. But how far has the improvement that has taken place in the country been the direct result of the National Policy? I quite admit that a change of policy with good times following, and with good times following in other countries at the same time, renders it extremely difficult to apportion precisely where the influence of the policy comes in in those improved conditions; but there are some facts which I think go to show very clearly that the National Policy has done its fair share in improving the condition of the people of this country. It has not been the only factor in bringing about that improved condition, but it is a most important one, and without it that improved condition would not have taken place to the same extent. It is admitted that Canadian manufactures are improving—that they are in a prosperous condition. It is admitted, moreover, that new manufactures have been started. I am not going into details to show whether the gentlemen who made the report to the hon. Minister of Finance made a strictly correct one; they do not pretend to have done so; they have given an approximate report of the condition of things as they found them in the different cities and towns they visited. I do not propose to go into those particular details, but simply to state what everyone knows to be the truth, that there has been a large increase in the manufacturing capacity of the people of this country, as illustrated by the new industries that have sprung up in all parts. In spite of that and of the fact that the existing factories have been employed full time, it is only with the greatest difficulty that orders can be filled at this moment. Let me give you an illustration. Last year we had a provincial exhibition in the city of Montreal, and we had occasion to get an engine and boiler for the machinery hall; we sent round notices to a number of the people in Montreal who were in the habit of making those articles, and in addition we sent similar notices to other parties outside, for we required to have them within a particular time; and what was the fact? That only one man in Montreal even offered to do the work and when we went round and asked them why they did not make an offer, they said they were so busy it was impossible for them to get the order through within the time specified in the notice they had received. One firm from Stratford, who were anxious to introduce an admirable engine into the factories of Montreal and the Province of Quebec made a stretch to give it to us. We got the engine from Stratford simply because our own factories in the city of Montreal were so crowded with business that they could not possibly undertake to perform that small piece of work within the time required for our exhibition purposes. There is no merchant in the country who will not tell you to-day that he has the greatest possible difficulty in getting orders filled in almost any industry. Some of our factories in course of construction have been actually stopped that would otherwise have been going on; they have been retarded in their progress towards completion because of the difficulty of getting machinery from manufacturing establishments of that kind in different parts of the country. In view of these facts I think I may fairly say that the industries of the country are all most prosperous and busily employed now, and it is certainly admitted on all hands that they were not in that condition in 1877-78. Now is that due to the National Policy? Let me take only two examples. I take first the cotton industry, which is the special antipathy of hon. gentlemen opposite. In that industry there has undoubtedly been an enormous development during the last three years. The Hudon factory of Montreal is not referred to, I think, in the returns submitted to the hon. Minister of Finance, because it is not a new factory. It was in existence before that time, but it had two additions made to it since then, and if I am rightly informed another building very nearly as large as one of those additions, if not larger, is about going up immediately alongside of it. The Hudon factory has been trebled in capacity, and new cotton mills have sprung up in all parts of the country. We have the Stormont mill, the Hamilton mill, the Coaticook and Stratford mills, all of them in operation before the 30th of June last—new mills started as a direct result of the National Policy. Then we have in addition to that, a large number of new mills which were in progress at that time, which are approaching completion, and some of which, I believe, will be very soon in operation. I was glad to see, only the day before yesterday, that a new establishment near Montreal—the Merchants Manufacturing Co.—for the purpose of turning out white cottons, had been put in motion, and operations have commenced, and they are now turning out cotton for the Canadian market. And yet we find that in spite of the old factories and their enlargement and the building of new factories, we cannot meet the demand; that the imports of all classes of cotton goods actually increased from 1878 to 1881 by 66½ per cent. The hon. member for South Brant would say, by that process of reasoning which he adopts in this House, and which reminds one very much of the process by which a gentleman undertook to prove that fish-pie was better than heaven—he said fish-pie was better than nothing, nothing is better than heaven, therefore fish-pie was better than heaven. But, Sir, this large importation of cotton is simply an evidence of the increasing purchasing power, and of the increasing wealth of the people of this country. It shows that our people are to-day so very much wealthier and more comfortable, in so much better circumstances, that they are able, in spite of this enlarged out-put of goods in their own factories, to increase their importations from abroad by this 66½ per cent. But when we analyse the importations, we find that of the two classes of bleached and unbleached cotton goods that are going out of our own factories, there has been a decrease in the importations of 27½ per cent. What is the fair inference from that? It is that the National Policy has, by the establishment of these factories, been able to supply that larger want of our people, and has thus added to the prosperity and wealth of the country. Look at the further fact that, in 1878, we imported of raw cotton 7,243,413 lbs, and, in 1881, 16,018,721 lbs., very nearly 9,000,000 lbs. of cotton manufactured in this country more than was manufactured in 1878, and I believe more than we would have been manufacturing to-day of the National Policy had not gone into effect. We are told, however, that the cotton manufacturers are all growing rich, and therefore this improvement in the condition of the cotton trade, instead of being a result for which we ought to be thankful, is a ground for dissatisfaction on the part of this country. What has been the experience of people who have invested their money in cotton in Canada? Why, in 1877 and 1878 everybody knows cotton stocks for which people paid 100 cents on the dollar in order to establish industries and to improve the country, could be had for from 10 up to 60 or 70 per cent. of their value. You could have got the stock of the Cornwall Cotton mills at 10 per cent., and people would have thanked you for taking it even at that price. We find to-day that cotton stocks have gone up, and those who bought at such low prices are now reaping their reward. Is it any harm that they should make a good thing out of their purchase? Has anybody been hurt?

Mr. ANGLIN. Yes, a great many.

Mr. WHITE. Will the hon. gentleman explain who?

Mr. ANGLIN. Everybody who has had to pay the additional price for the cotton manufactured.

Mr. WHITE. Well, Sir, I shall go on with the argument; I propose to come to that point in a minute or two. I say that these people have not increased the price of their cottons, as compared with the foreign article, by the imposition of the duty. What do hon. gentlemen opposite propose? A 17½ per cent. duty, even if the effect were to wipe out the cotton industry altogether. In fact they regard that industry as something that, if weeded out, would be a national blot effaced. Then what would they have instead? Foreign manufacturers, cotton lords, cotton princes in New England and in Old England, instead of in Canada, sending their goods in here; and the consumer, because of the non-production of the article in Canada, actually paying the 17½ per cent., and the Canadian merchant's profit into the bargain. That is the way in which they propose to benefit the Canadian consumer. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not deny that there must be duty on those articles. They had a duty of 17½ per cent. themselves, when in power; and they tell us that that is the Tariff they are going back to; but they must admit that 17½ per cent. according to their principles, would be added to the price to the consumer, with the merchant's profits besides. I make the statement that, with manufactories in our midst, the price of the goods is reduced not increased. The difference is, that when the merchant imports from abroad he is away from the area of competition, but when he buys from the factories in Canada, he is within the area of competition. An Ontario store-keeper may go to Montreal—take that as an illustration—and enter the establishment of Gault Bros. to purchase cottons, manufactured in the Hudon factory on the one side, or in the Cornwall factory on the other. At any of those establishments he may himself buy goods. Thus, competing with the manufacturers, we have the importing merchants, who are thus compelled to sell at a smaller margin of profit. But, by importing the cottons from New or Old England, with no manufacturing in Canada, the merchant would be removed altogether from that area of competition and would secure a higher profit—as we were told by hon. gentlemen opposite—a higher profit not only upon the price of the goods, but upon the duty as well. Those cotton lords of Canada, as they are called, have succeeded in making some money, at least those of them who were fortunate enough to hold their stock, or to buy when low. They are receiving a fair return to-day. But the price to the consumer of the ordinary cotton goods manufactured in Canada—and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to go into an investigation of the facts—is not, on the average, 10 per cent. in excess of the price in the New England factories, from which the larger portions of those cottons were coming to us before the National Policy was adopted. But there are cotton lords everywhere. One would imagine, from the speeches of those hon. gentlemen, that it is a sin for a Canadian to make money by investing in industries of this kind. He may lend his money on mortgage, and take what interest he pleases, add commissions and adopt any other tactics he likes in order to get a large sum out of the unfortunate who is compelled to borrow, and is respected by hon. gentlemen opposite, as a man to be admired. But let him put his money into an industry which employs hundreds of people, and furnishes bread to them and their families, and if he makes money, and is encouraged to continue in his business by making money, he becomes an object of dislike to hon. gentlemen opposite. In England, with Free Trade, cotton lords are well known; they are the rich men of the country; many of them have made enormous colossal fortunes, and how—by the protection which cheap labor gives them. Hon. gentlemen opposite will argue that that is a policy in the interest of the people of the country where it prevails; that it is a cheaper country to live in, where the toiling masses eke out a miserable existence on small wages—that that is a system that we should emulate in order that the cotton lords in foreign countries may make money by sending the products of that cheap labor to this country. Then, Sir, I take the case of woollen goods. I find that the effect of the National Policy in relation to them, or at any rate the fact as it exists with the National Policy—if hon. gentlemen opposite will prefer that way of putting it—is that the imports from the United States have declined 48 per cent., and the imports from Great Britain have declined only 4 per cent., or while the imports of cotton goods from the United States in 1878 were 36 per cent. of the whole, in 1881 they were only 20 per cent., so that this policy cannot be said to have greatly injured our friends in the Mother Country. The decrease in the importation of woollen goods in 1881, as compared with 1878, is $476,907. To that extent and to the extent of the increased purchasing power of the people, we have had a home market secured to our woollen manufacturers, to an extent not witnessed before the National Policy was adopted. What do we find? The importations of raw wool have increased from 6,230,084 lbs. in 1878, to over 8,000,000 lbs. in 1881, or an actual increase of 1,810,203 lbs.; and that increase has been almost entirely in the finer grades of African or Australian wool, which we do not produce. The imports from the United States, of the class of wool which might to some extent compete with our own wools, decreased last year by 157,000 lbs. I find that the exports of wool from Canada have largely decreased. In 1878, we exported 2,445,893 lbs. of wool; and, in 1881, 1,482,928 lbs., or about 1,000,000 lbs. of a decrease. The farmers did not raise less wool in 1881, than in 1878; the decrease was simply the result of a larger consumption of Canadian wool in the factories of this country.

Mr. PATERSON. Do you not think less wool was grown in 1881?

Mr. WHITE. If less was grown, all I can say is that the fact is exceptional, because there has been a larger production of everything else in the country. I know that in my own district there has not been a decreased production. But the hon. member for South Brant, who, I know desires to deal with this question candidly and fairly, will not say that the woollen factories of Canada have not been enlarged and better employed in 1881 than in 1878; and they must therefore, in the nature of things, have consumed a larger quantity of Canada wool, as illustrated by the decrease in the export of that article. What more do we find now? There is an enormous improvement. The woollen trade of Canada, I admit, is an old trade—in existence for many years. It has had an existence of such a struggling kind that, I venture to believe, that but for the change of policy in 1878, the number who would have abandoned the manufacture of woollen goods would have been very large. What do we find lately? In consequence of the present fiscal policy and the introduction of new machinery, a very great improvement. Let any one go up to Almonte, as my hon. friend and I did, the other day, and take a walk through the mills; let him look at the improvements in the machinery there visible, and at the enlargement of the establishments, as well as at the cloth turned out, and he will certainly experience no little surprise. Indeed to-day, no man need wear foreign cloth unless he likes. My hon. friend is pleased to refer to the Minister of Finance and to the clothes he wears. Well, that is a kind of argumentum ad hominum that perhaps has some little influence. I happen to have a Canadian tweed suit on; I like Canadian tweeds—not particularly because they are Canadian, but because they are cheap. I am bound to say that if people do not like Canadian tweeds and wish to wear foreign tweeds, I can see no reason why they should not have the privilege of doing so if they are willing to pay the duty. But what I mean to say is this—and I know it from my own experience, that experience that comes to a man who is not rich, and who is compelled to calculate what everything is going to cost him—that I can get a suit of Canadian tweeds as good in appearance, and, I believe, better in wear than a Scotch tweed of the same pattern, that I can get it at least, in Montreal, for from 25 to 40 per cent. less than the imported article. But if people will use Scotch tweed—and there are many who will do it as the country gets richer—if the people will do it, then I say let them do it, but let them pay the duty upon it. Now, I claim that both as to the Canadian woollen and cotton trades the improvements in them are the direct result of the National Policy; and I claim further, that in neither one industry nor the other has the price to the consumer been in any way increased by the change of policy. There are people who prefer to wear foreign goods. They are found all over the world. You find, as a consequence of this, in the United States to-day, in spite of the enormous increase in the production of manufactured goods in the country, an enormous increase of nearly 50 per cent. in their importations.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE. Does the hon. gentleman think that is any illustration against a protective policy? It means that the people are using expensive foreign goods. There are persons, for instance, who will not wear Canadian tweeds, because they say that when they go on the street to hail a carter they may find him with a suit from exactly the same piece, and, therefore, they prefer to pay the extra price for the foreign article. The effect of the Tariff in relation to the article of woollens has been this, that it has imposed the tax upon the shoulders of the people, who are the best able to bear it. There is no man in Canada to-day that cannot clothe himself from head to foot without paying one cent of duty or of tax, who cannot, on the contrary, get those articles just as good and at just as cheap a rate, having regard to the price of the raw material, as they are to be had either in England or in any other country where the articles are manufactured. But if he wants imported goods he has to pay at least a portion of the duty for them, and nobody will blame the policy which places that tax upon him. The effect of the other policy would be to drive these woollen factories out of the country, and that is the only way in which this matter can be argued. Drive them out of the country altogether, import the articles from abroad, and you put upon the poor man as well as upon the rich, the obligation of paying the full duty with the merchant's profit added. Now, I take another article, and perhaps hon. gentlemen will say it is my hobby, but I cannot help it. I take the tea trade as an illustration of the effects of this policy. In consequence of the differential duty put on by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, and accepted by this Parliament in 1879, a very important result has followed to the trade of the country. What do I find? That the import of tea—and perhaps no better illustration can be given of the generally improved condition of this country than is to be found in the increased consumption of tea in Canada—we find that the importations in 1881 amounted to 16,647,015 lbs.; in 1878, they were 11,019,231 lbs.; so that the people of Canada have been able to use half as much more tea in 1881 in consequence of the generally improved condition of the country, the greater purchasing power and comfort of the people, than they were in 1878. Now, how has this trade been effected? I find the importations from Great Britain have increased 27 per cent.; that is a foreign trade. I find the importations from the United States, which is not a foreign trade in the ordinary acceptation of the term, decreased 11 per cent. I find that the importations from China increased 358 per cent., from Japan 265 per cent. The importations from other countries were not large, so I give the figures because the percentage might appear to indicate a disposition to mislead the House. The figures are 6,385 lbs. for 1878, to 59,657 lbs. in 1881, or an increase of 900 per cent., so that from every country except the United States there has been an enormous increase in the importations, while from the United States the importations have decreased 11 per cent. notwithstanding that the aggregate increase from all countries has been somewhere about 50 per cent. We have had importations direct from the Dutch East Indies to Quebec, of 47,475 lbs. Now, Sir, I know hon. gentlemen opposite will say these were not direct importations. They will ask where was the ship that brought these teas into Montreal or Quebec?

Mr. ANGLIN. The Flying Dutchman.

Mr. WHITE. The hon. gentleman can sneer at a question of trade affecting the interests and well-being of this country; he has no better argument to offer. But, Sir, these are questions which affect the well-being of the people of this country, and they will recognize and realize the conduct of hon. gentlemen who, in this discussion, have nothing but sneers to offer. They ask, where is the ship? What is the fact with regard to it? What was the condition with regard to this trade at the time hon. gentlemen opposite were in office in 1878? New York was coming to be the great centre or distributing point in relation to the tea trade for the whole Dominion, and as merchants went there for tea, they went there for other articles as well. What was the general tendency and course of our trade? Every year there was an increased importation of goods from the United States, and a decreased importation from the Mother Country, and from other countries as well, largely in consequence of just such a policy as was involved in this question of a differential duty upon imports of tea from the United States. But as a result of these direct importations, whether they come from China and Japan to Montreal, or to Toronto or Hamilton merchants, over the American railways, or whether they come directly up the St. Lawrence, as a large quantity of tea did come—but however they came, they came as direct importations, as the result of business relations between the Canadian merchant and the producer in the foreign country, or the commission merchant or broker in the foreign country, thus leading to those relations of trade between the two countries which, in the future, I am quite satisfied will produce important results for the commercial prosperity of this country. The policy of the Government has restored the distributing tea business to the merchants of Canada instead of to the merchants of the United States. Now, I will take another article which may be considered a hobby of mine, and that is the business of sugar refining. I am not going to refer to sugar refining as it has been already dealt with so ably on the floor of this House. But I desire to refer for one moment to a sneering reference made by an hon. gentleman to Mr. Peter Redpath, who, it is said, has recently purchased Chisselhurst in Great Britain. The hon. gentleman who first made a sneering reference to that gentleman was the hon. member for West Durham, who, although himself a Chancellor of a University largely endowed with the public funds, and therefore not dependent upon the contributions of the benevolent and patriotic people of the country, ventured, at a public meeting in the city of Toronto, during an election, when he hoped to excite the popular mind against the sugar refining business, to taunt Mr. Peter Redpath with having contributed $50,000 to a museum in connection with McGill College, Montreal. I am glad to know that it was not $50,000, but $125,000 that Mr. Redpath contributed for that object. I do not think it comes well from a gentleman who occupies, in relation to the higher education of this country, the position which the hon. gentleman from West Durham occupies, I do not think it comes well from him to make every man in Canada who is engaged in the industries of the country feel, if he contributed to the support of these great institutions, he would render himself liable in consequence of it to be traduced, villified and sneered at by public men. I say it was not what was to be expected from a gentleman occupying his position. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) does not appear to be aware that the Redpaths were an old family in Montreal long before sugar refineries were heard of in Canada. They made money in the ordinary course of trade; they were not only a family of wealth, but a family of respectability, and they realized what, unfortunately few rich men realize, the responsibilities which belong to great wealth, and they were always ready to contribute of the means they had accumulated to the promotion of objects of usefulness in the city in which they lived. If the Redpaths have made money by sugar refining they have made it by a close attention to business, by watchfulness to even the one-hundredth part of one per cent, in connection with their transactions. In fact I may say that they have made their money more as merchants than as refiners. They were taunted with making money in the old times, and the Molson family—a family of great business capacity—started a sugar refinery alongside of them. But it went down. It had not the skill which was brought to bear for the success of the Redpaths' refinery, and it passed out of existence—an evidence of the fact that sugar refining requires great skill, great attention, great command of capital to make it a success. What occurred only the other day at the city of Halifax, and one cannot refer to it without a feeling of deep regret? A refinery was started there, and one would have thought that with the enormous profits which hon. gentlemen are always talking of, it would have been able to maintain itself. But it did not maintain itself. It has in the meantime, at any rate, suspended operations, and let us hope it will be able to renew these operations. But surely what has occurred proves that all these stories of the enormous profits that are realized as a result of the Tariff on sugar refining are simply fables to catch if possible the ear of the people of this country and of enlisting their sympathies against the National Policy. Mr. Redpath has gone to England, and it is said that he has bought the magnificent residence that has been referred to. With all respect to the unfortunate and distinguished lady who recently occupied—if she does not now occupy it—it never has had and never will have a worthier occupant than the gentleman who is now going into it. His going from here is a loss to the country. Men like him are few and far between in any country, and in this new country, where there are so many opportunities for the useful employment of wealth, such men are all too few. I am sorry—all his fellow-citizens in Montreal, all who know him are sorry—that he has felt it incumbent for personal reasons to leave the country. To find a man with his record sneered at and insulted in this House, because he has been able to do that which many merchants who have imported goods and made money could have done, as the result of employing his wealth in promoting the commerce of the country and building up a trade with the sugar producing portions of the world, is certainly what no one could have expected from hon. gentlemen having seats in this House. The point to which I wish to refer in regard to the sugar duties, is the change that they have effected in the foreign trade of the country. In 1877-78 we imported from Great Britain, 53,237,698 lbs. of sugar. We imported from the United States, 45,195,335 lbs.—or altogether, 98,433,033 lbs. From the countries of production we imported only 11,993,439 lbs.; while, in 1880-81, we imported from Great Britain and the United States, 21,263,390 lbs., and from the countries of production, 108,526,175 lbs.—a complete change in the current of trade in this country. Then, in 1877-78, when hon. gentlemen opposite had succeeded in utterly destroying the import trade from Brazil, we did not import a single pound from Brazil, while last year we imported no less than 23,603,875 lbs. Now, Sir, this change in the current of our trade shows us that as our other industries become more thoroughly developed we shall be enabled to send our surplus to other countries. This has been accomplished, and in addition to that an industry has been fostered in our midst which is so important in all its ramifications that even the leading apostle of hon. gentlemen opposite—Mr. David A. Wells—the great Free Trader of the United States, wrote a pamphlet to show that sugar refining must be taken out of the ordinary category of industries, and deserved the fostering and protecting care of the Government. The aggregate trade with South America has increased from $669,804 in 1878 to $1,369,731 in 1881; the aggregate trade with the West Indies from $1,035,531 to $6,742,933. These are direct results of the National Policy, so far as the imports from those countries are concerned, and, as I have said, the time will come in the nature of things when the multiplication of the industries and manufactures of Canada will give us a surplus for exportation, and when that time comes the business relations we have with these foreign countries will prove, to be valuable factors in the building up of foreign markets for the manufactures of Canada.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

This brings up the question which was started by hon. gentleman opposite, relating to the decrease in our exports of manufactured goods. Well, all I have to say about that is this: that assuming that all the manufactories in the country are fully employed, assuming that new factories are being built, assuming that in addition we are importing relatively to the articles manufactured in the country as much as we were before, all these things being taken for granted, and they cannot be denied, they simply prove that we are finding a home market for these productions, which everybody knows is the best market. Now, Sir, I take as a further proof of the fact, that our factories are all busy, the increase in the imports of raw products, such as furs and skins, grease for soap, raw hides and skins, raw silk, wool, broom corn, undressed hemp, unmanufactured tobacco, raw cotton, gums, crude gutta-percha, machinery for mills and unmanufactured steel; and I find that in all these articles we imported in 1881, 80 per cent. more than we did in 1878; that is to say, that to the extent of that 80 per cent. we had the manufacturing going on in Canada, not only giving employment to the people in our mills, but improving the condition of the people in the neighborhood of the mills. The hon. gentleman for South Brant, in one of his speeches, referred to sewing machines as having been injured by this policy. He stated that the exportation of sewing machines had largely decreased. As a matter of fact it has decreased. 7,946 machines, worth $107,806, have been exported less than were exported in 1878. Well, while the hon. gentleman was making his speech I thought I would write down to the manager of the Williams' Sewing Machine Co. in Montreal, and ascertain the cause of that circumstance, and here is the reply:

"In reply to your enquiries, I am happy to be able to state that our business has been very much improved by the operation of the National Policy. We are now employing three times as many hands, and making three times as many machines as we made before the National Policy came into operation, and we find our home market very much improved, that is to say, we find that more machines can be sold though we do not get any higher prices. In fact, prices are rather lower than they were, but we do not complain of this as we much prefer doing a large business on small profits than a small business on large profits; it is much more profitable and satisfactory.

"There is one point on which I wish to make a bold assertion, and make it with a strong emphasis, and that is on the question: 'who pays the duty on imported machines?' I say that the foreign manufacturers pay it. Let a Canadian dealer go to any of the American manufacturers for machines, and he can always get them cheaper than an American dealer by the amount of the duty. In other words, a Canadian dealer can buy machines from $3 to $5 cheaper than an American dealer can buy the same goods. Thus, the American manufacturer pays the duty which goes into our Dominion Treasury on machines imported into Canada."

Mr. MILLS. Then the duty can be no impediment to the importations?

Mr. WHITE. There is one of the wise sayings of hon. gentlemen opposite. I will tell you what the duty does: it ensures, to a certain extent, the Canadian market to the Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. MILLS. Not at all.

Mr. WHITE. They can sell more machines, and they would sell still more machines if that duty was higher. The object of the duty is not to increase the price to the Canadian consumer, but simply to give to the Canadian manufacturer that confidence which will enable him to enlarge his manufactories, to produce a larger output, and ultimately to sell to the consumer much more cheaply than before. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman who last spoke told us we were going to have new issues presented to the people of this country; he told us we were going to have as an issue that terrible bargain regarding the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have heard the hon. gentleman on that subject before; I had the pleasure, the inestimable pleasure, of hearing him in the town of Cobourg, when he appealed to the people in relation to this terrible, this iniquitous bargain to which he has referred to-night. I remember his graphic description of that long night's sitting we had here; hon. gentlemen moved an amendment, affirming the principle that ought to be adopted; they made their speech upon it; no answer was vouchsafed; the members were called in and the large majority voted them down by brute force, and so the hon. gentleman went on with his description. Well, the hon. gentleman might, when he goes into the country next, at least tell the people that we had been discussing that question for six weeks on the floor of Parliament, that every single point in this series of amendments had been fully discussed, and that it was simply a question of whether there ever would be an end to the discussion in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. But the hon. gentleman made his statement, and what was the result? In that town where he made the statement 125 of a majority was recorded for the Government, and in the entire constituency, in other parts of which the hon. gentleman spoke, there was, with the exception of three polling sub-divisions, actually a larger Conservative vote polled than was polled in the election of 1878; and I think I may fairly say that what occurred in that constituency, in spite of the eloquence of the hon. gentleman, will occur in other places when the day of trial comes. Why, Mr. Speaker, the last subject which they care to discuss to-day before the people is the National Policy; my hon. friend knows, in his heart of hearts he knows, that he would give the best dollar he ever was worth—yea, more than that—he would give half his last year's business, if he could wipe the National Policy question out of existence altogether, if he could only close the mouths of the gentlemen who sit on the front benches before him from presenting this perpetual Free Trade view to the House and the country. He would give his best half-year's business if he only could by some method prevent them from ever proposing the Free Trade view of the Tariff. If stories be true—I am not given to repeating matters of that kind in Parliament—an effort was actually made to induce a constituency in this country to drop the ex-Finance Minister at the next elections. I know the hon. gentleman found it necessary to leave this House and go all the way to Centre Huron in order to be present at the convention, and with his gracious smile and pleasant face mesmerize it into negating the suggestion made in other quarters that he should be left at home that they might rid themselves of his influence on the subject of a National Policy.

Mr. PATERSON. I hope the hon. gentleman does not mean that I made an attempt of that kind; I have not heard of such an attempt being made.

Mr. WHITE. I have too much respect for the hon. member for South Brant to think he would do that secretly that he would not do openly. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, would be glad to get rid of this question. In their heart of hearts, if we leave out doctrinaires like the hon. members for Bothwell and Centre Huron and the hon. member for Charlotte, there is not a member who would not give his best half-year's income to get rid of the National Policy as an issue. But I tell them this now, that when the trial comes they will be just as anxious to get rid of the Pacific Railway contract. There is no subject I know of that has been a subject of controversy between political parties in this country, where the argument is so overwhelmingly on one side, and where, what is very much better, the facts are so much on one side as that in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. We shall probably have an opportunity of discussing it before the Session closes, because, if what I hear be true, hon. gentlemen opposite are going to move amendments to almost every motion to go into Committee of Supply. I shall not object; it is a fair and legitimate course for the Opposition if they think fit to adopt, but when the time to discuss it comes there will be no difficulty whatever in dealing with it. Then as to this question of locking up lands in the North-West, what do we find? If we wanted any evidence that those hon. gentlemen do not believe—I use the word in a parliamentary sense—the arguments which they are using in respect to the influence of the Pacific Railway, we would have it in the fact that a number of them are now risking their whole fortunes almost in land investments in that country, which if all that was said last Session be true is going to be utterly paralyzed by the influence of the enormous monopoly imposed on it. What is the position of the country to-day compared with what it was in 1878? When hon. gentlemen went out of office what was its condition? Its industries were paralyzed, its commerce was almost at a standstill. There was scarcely a merchant or a man who had a dollar to invest in any enterprise in Canadian industries, but looked with anxiety to see whether the same insane policy—and insane it was, in view of what was taking place on the other side of the line—was to be continued or not. The hon. gentlemen opposite have referred to statements made by hon. gentlemen on this side, before the last election, and referred to a statement made by the hon. First Minister, that the very moment the elections took place and the Conservative party were returned there would be a revival of hope in the country. I say, there was a revival of hope in the country. That the mere passing of an Act was to operate as if by magic, without the influence of the operation of that Act on the country, nobody for a moment could believe; but what they would and do believe is this, because it is true and they had a right to believe it, that the fact of placing that Act on the Statute-book had this effect: more men at once looked forward to see where to invest their money in the industries of the country with a fair opportunity of receiving a profitable return. The attempt of the hon. gentleman opposite to contrast that the prices of bank stock in September, 1878, and September, 1879, when the hon. gentlemen know that matters were unsettled in the latter year in consequence of bank disasters that occurred at that time, the result not of what had occurred in the year immediately preceding, but of continued mismanagement which at last became developed and known to the outside world—the idea of stopping a moment to contrast the two periods, was simply to insult the intelligence of the country, and an injustice to his candor in dealing with questions of this kind. At that time business was paralyzed, the industries of the country were struggling almost hopelessly, our great North-West was looked upon by our best minds as an incubus, and people talked of abandoning it, and the people were looking forward with but a slight gleam of hope to the future of Canada. What is our position to-day? In every town and village we find reviving trade, in every homestead we find reviving happiness. The hon. gentlemen opposite tell us this Government does not make the sun to shine; but I heard a gentleman the other night say that this policy did make the sun to shine in many a household where formerly there was only sorrow, gloom and hopelessness. In regard to the North-West to-day, instead of its being looked upon as an incubus, we find our best men are going there. In every township of the country the hon. gentlemen opposite, like the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, know from letters they have received for maps of that country, that you cannot go into a bar-room or into a friend's house but the subject of the North-West is the general theme. In relation to the obligation undertaken by the Dominion for the construction of the Pacific Railway, we find that by the surplus of three years which the policy of this Government has brought about, and by the advantage which will result to Canada in saving of interest by the redemption of our bonds, which in the three years we shall have to redeem, we shall be able, without spending a copper as represented by the annual obligation by way of interest, to pay every dollar we have undertaken. If hon. gentlemen opposite will only give this country fair play, if they will remember that though they are in Opposition they yet owe some obligation to the country itself, if they will remember that they may attack the Government in regard to financial administration, and the conduct of the Departments, but keep their hands off the country itself—I venture to say that the future will be brighter, will be one of which none of us need be ashamed. The hon. gentleman opposite has also been pleased to refer to the speech made by the hon. leader of the Government in Toronto, in which he said he would prefer annexation to independence. But, Sir, what was the occasion of that speech? There was a demand in certain quarters in the country for an immediate severance of the tie that binds us to the Mother Country, and the establishment of a national independence. That demand came from the newspapers representing the wing of the Liberal party, which is popularly supposed to be identified in sentiment with the hon. leader of the Opposition. It was urged upon the ground that political independence would put us in a position to secure more favorable trade relations with the United States, something in the nature of a continental Zollverein. But if influenced by that hope, we secured an independence to-morrow, do hon. gentlemen imagine that the people of the United States—who naturally would prefer that this whole continent should be politically theirs—in order to preserve our independence, in order to give us that separate national existence on this continent which we had sacrificed so much to obtain, would give us those trade relations? Not a bit of it; on the contrary, they would draw the cords in trade matters more strongly than they are to-day, until men, sickened of the poor results of their past efforts at independence, would say “let us have annexation, it is the only thing now for us to get in order that we have the trade relations that we have desired.” It was no wonder that the right hon. leader of the Government said better have annexation at once than such a miserable interregnum between the two countries as the result of this deliberate policy, which they would adopt to prevent our getting those trade relations as an independent community which we have not now, knowing all the time that the effect would be to cause us to look for them in another direction. Sir, the right hon. gentleman requires no certificate of loyalty at my hands; his whole career in Canada has been one of fidelity to the Mother Country. Why, the very charge which hon. gentlemen have urged against him was that so true has he been in his allegiance to the Mother Country, that he has even sacrificed this country in the interest of the Empire; that was the charge made from one end of this country to the other a few years ago. And now they wilfully misunderstand and mis-state a speech delivered by him, and they undertake to pose themselves as the special loyalists of Canada, and ask us to believe that the right hon. gentleman was untrue to the Empire. He requires no certificate of loyalty from either inside or outside of this House; his record is his best certificate. And wherever he is known, whether on the other side of the water or on this, he is known to be a true servant of the Queen; a true, loyal subject, an earnest, devoted statesman, who has with self-sacrifice, such as no man in Canada has ever made before, given a valuable life to the service of his country which he might have used to the enrichment of himself; and when he passes from us he will occupy in the hearts and memories of the people of Canada, as no public man has ever done before, the proud position of its best and ablest statesman.

Mr. LANDRY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 2.25 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 17th March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 116) to prevent the amalgamation of railways directly or indirectly under the control of the Parliament of Canada, unless under express provisions in the Acts respecting each of the companies amalgamated; and to provide that in no case shall such amalgamation be lawful, unless and until bonuses or privileges of any kind paid or granted to either company by any municipality, be previously repaid or restored, or the grant or promise thereof cancelled.—(Mr. McCuaig.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to cast on the present debate that valuable light which other speakers, more eloquent and better informed than I, have caused to shine upon it, I will not say since a few days, but from the time that this question of the Tariff was submitted, now three years ago, to the deliberations of this House and the approval of the country. Such is not my intention. Moreover, the question has been thoroughly elucidated; theoretically by learned dissertations developed by both protectionists and free traders, with all the knowledge they were capable of, in presence of this deliberative assembly; practically, by the working of the new Tariff. What more could be desired? I would certainly not speak to-day if I had nothing better to do than to tread well-beaten paths, and following in the steps of my leaders, to send up to heaven an eternal hosanna of admiring approval. Representatives of the people, we have other duties to fulfil, and we must leave to the past and to the men whose popular confidence has deserted, the care of recovering these lost vestiges, this embodiment of the servitude of the will and of the intellect. Totally different is the spectacle which meets our gaze to-day, a new evil shows its face even in the midst of the assembly where are deliberating the representatives of the nation, and the nation which is after all the sufferer, calls upon us to arrest this flood which threatens to overthrow everything. I am referring to that deliberate manner of acting of certain people, which has become systematic, of falsifying public documents when quoting them, of altering facts and figures, in brief of deceiving one's audience and the people who read us. This system is much more in vogue than one would imagine, and if for some time back it has invaded the columns of a certain press, it has found in this very House devoted proselytes who have endorsed it by their adoption of it. Some there are who have acted with malice prepense and with good-will, but the majority, I doubt not, have unawares, and in perfect good faith, lent the aid of an honest tongue to this unceasing propagation of error. What do the motives matter, after all? The error remains and we have to fight it, under whatever shape it comes before us. And it is because it has made its appearance in this House, and that a servile sheet has published it con amore in our Province, that I wish to raise my voice in protest, Mr. Speaker, and re-establish the truth if possible. In other words, I intend combatting the errors given utterance to during the present debate by our political opponents in general and more especially by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret). I have listened attentively, and I am tempted to say with pleasure, to the speech of that hon. member, and if he has not succeeded in convincing me, I am bound to admit that he almost captivated me by the charm of his language, the flow of his speech and the ease of his delivery. The speech of the hon. member for Lotbinière, evidently intended in the mind of its author to become an important factor in the next electoral contest, may be divided into three parts, for it contains three distinct accusations brought against the Conservative party: 1st, that of having burdened the country with an iniquitous protection; 2nd, that of having increased the annual expenditure for Administration; 3rd, that of having increased the public debt. My friend the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) has already triumphantly replied to the first of these charges. His convincing arguments, strengthened by undesirable facts, and a reasoning not to be resisted, have destroyed the slender scaffolding erected by ingenious sophistry, and over which drooped in timid fashion the banner of Free Trade. Of this charge, nothing remains but the feeble echo which reaches us at a distance of 300 miles from the weak organ of a party destroyed by its own unpopularity. Let us stifle this last cry—after having pointed it out. The House will remember the interesting spectacle given us when the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol), answering the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret), called his attention, in the teeth of his own assertions, to what the leader of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec had said, not only in this House, but also before the Special Committee organized by it. To the blow struck by the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol), the organ of the Liberal Party in the Province of Quebec has answered, and what does it say? This is what we read in the Electeur of the 10th March, 1882:

" * * * Mr. Coursol recalled to the memory of the House that Mr. Rinfret did not profess the same principles as Mr. Joly with regard to the Tariff. He represented Mr. Joly as a full-fledged protectionist. Now, it is true that in 1872, Mr. Joly came forward in favor of reconstructing the Tariff as a protective basis. But there is a wide difference between what was proposed in 1872 and the present Tariff. What was asked for then, was the free entry of raw material used in manufactures. And again, we asked for the conclusion of commercial treaties with all countries to enable us to dispose of our manufactured articles. If Mr. Tilley had proposed to the House a Tariff such as the one sought for by Mr. Joly, I have not the slightest doubt that the Liberal party would have adopted it with a few restrictions. The Hon. Mr. Joly never pronounced for a Tariff of favoritism and of monopolies like the one we have to-day. Besides, those who are acquainted with the rectitude of mind and the spirit of justice of that distinguished man, know that he is totally opposed to the flagrant injustice of the National Policy, and to the heavy taxation with which are burdened the working and agricultural classes of the country."

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the answer of the Liberal organ of the Province of Quebec. And yet we have more to show than what the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) pointed out to this House. We have authentic declarations; we possess a letter, signed by the Hon. Mr. Joly himself, and to which I desire to call the attention of hon. members. Ten years ago, Mr. Speaker, on the 27th January, 1872, a few citizens of Quebec met in the Salle du Patronage. Their number was small, but their ambition was great. There were there, elbowing one another in a room, the noisy celebrities of an ancient and dying party, young recruits, future commanders of the party that was to arise, and there was also, one need not be surprised at the fact, a corporal's guard of those discontented souls whose hopes had never been realized; they are the malcontents who are known everywhere and in every age. The meeting was opened with Mr. Joly in the chair, Mr. F. Langelier acting as secretary. The papers of the time have preserved for us the report of what took place at that memorable sitting. The first thing done was the forming of a committee of some twenty members for the Quebec District; resolutions were then passed, speeches were made, and the policy of the new party clearly defined and notified to the country. Mr. C. A. Pelletier, who is to-day a Senator, proposed that as a panacea to the then existing state of affairs, the following reforms should be adopted: hence sprung into life there and then the programme of the national party. I do not intend to give it to you in detail, but there are two clauses of it to which I wish to call the special attention of this honorable House. The programme embodied in its clauses the line of conduct to be followed by the new party not only with regard to the Province of Quebec, but with regard to the whole Dominion. The programme was divided into two parts. There were clauses affecting principally the Province of Quebec, whilst others were to govern the Dominion. With regard to those affecting the interests of the Province of Quebec, I will call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the thirteenth clause of the programme, for I shall have to invoke it in support of certain arguments of which I am about to make use in favor of the increase of the national debt. This thirteenth clause reads as follows: "The Dominion to pay that portion of Canada's debt charged to Quebec and Ontario." With regard to what specially concerns the interests of the Dominion, there is clause 7, which states that "the national party will devote all its forces to obtain for us the absolute right of negotiating ourselves our treaties of commerce with other countries;" but, Mr. Speaker, that programme did not satisfy the ardent spirits of the members of our national party of that period. Speeches were made, and on that occasion, the leaders of the so-called national party thought the opportunity a favorable one to let the country know their views on the position of the affairs in the country. I have taken the trouble of collecting the opinions of the principal leaders of the party. There is, for instance, the opinion of Senator Pelletier. What did he say on the 7th March, 1872, at a second meeting called to approve of and confirm the proceedings of the first one? He said:

"Let us rather take into consideration the influence which keeps us at such a distance from the promised prosperity. As is shown by the resolution which I hold in my hand, we have not sufficient markets for disposing of our products. The manufactures, the different branches of industry which we could develop to such advantage, do not enjoy the necessary protection. Our country has immense advantages and yet it is the most backward country in America, owing to the want of encouragement given to manufactures, and the scarcity of markets for the sale of our products."

Thus, Mr. Speaker, in the opinion of Senator Pelletier, there were two causes to which we might attribute the languishing state of affairs throughout the country: in the first place, the dearth of markets; and secondly, the lack of protection for our manufacturing industries. In those days all the speakers who followed Mr. Pelletier confirmed the opinion of the hon. Senator; and this is the resolution presented at the time by the Hon. Luc Letellier de St. Just, which resolution was seconded by half-a-dozen of his most devoted partisans:

"5th. In order to ensure the development of agriculture, commerce, and industry in our country, to bring home our fellow-countrymen, to attract immigration, it is necessary that we should have every facility to help our manufactures to contend with foreign competition and to open new markets for our products; and this is only to be attained by our being allowed to determine ourselves our commercial relations with other countries."

That motion was unanimously carried. But not only is this the opinion expressed by these hon. gentlemen on the 27th January and the 7th March, 1872, but a short time before the leader of the Liberal party in this House, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), had the opportunity of making public his views on the question; and on the 9th November, 1871, at the time when the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska had chosen him as its representative, he said on the debate upon the Address:

"The principal cause of the evil from which we are suffering is, that up to the present time the production of the country has not equalled the consumption. The Ministry might as well admit this fact, as it is not alone to bear the responsibility of it; the whole nation is responsible. It is a humiliating thing to be obliged to state that after an existence of three centuries this country cannot supply itself, and that, whilst nature has prodigally endowed it with all that is necessary to make it an industrial country, it is obliged to seek its supplies in foreign markets. Sir, many years ago, a great patriot, Mr. L. J. Papineau, when seeking a remedy for evils existing in his day, summed up his policy on that subject in the following simple precept: "Nothing must be bought from the Mother Country." I am of opinion that the policy expressed in this sentiment comes home to us with as great a force to-day as it did when it was given expression to."

Such was the opinion, Mr. Speaker, of the leader of the French section of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec. His wish was then that the English markets should be closed to us, or, in other words, he justly wished to impose those high duties, and even higher ones, than those which he condemns to-day. He wished for a prohibitive Tariff, for a system which might prevent the Canadian consumer from going in quest of goods in the English market. Such were the views publicly professed by the hon. member for Quebec East. Now, Mr. Speaker, do you wish to know—it will answer more specially a few of the objections raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret)—what was the more particular opinion of the hon. member who represents in the Local House the same county as does my hon. friend in this House? On the 24th March, 1876, Mr. Joly wrote a letter in answer to questions that had been put to him by the Committee appointed by this House to enquire into the causes of the then existing commercial depression. Here are some of the questions put to him, together with his answers:

"2. Is it Canada's interest that we should continue to admit American products duty free, whilst Canadian products taken across the frontier are heavily taxed?"

"Answer.—No; it is against Canada's interest. My humble opinion is that we should admit free of duty only the raw material required for our manufactures."

Further on, Mr. Joly adds:

"4. * * * It is not by depreciating the price of everything that we shall attain national wealth. The higher we pay, the better for us, provided our means increase in par with the increase of price. Ask the workman which he prefers—flour at $5.50 a barrel and no work, and flour at $6 with plenty of work?"

And Mr. Joly goes on to say:

"9. As a matter of course our market is too circumscribed to allow us to employ all the hands which go and seek work in the manufactures of the United States, but we might yet employ a greater number than we do, were we to keep our market for ourselves, which we ought to do since the United States refuse to open theirs to us."

"10. Does the importation of American flour, free of duty and without reciprocity, place you in a disadvantageous position opposite American competitors? If so, state your reasons."

I call the special attention of the hon. member for Lotbinière to the answer of Mr. Joly:

"A.—Those who have grain to sell, must suffer seriously."

"12. As the ad valorem duty of 20 per cent. levied by the United States on flour, against the fixed specific duty of 20 per cent. per bushel of wheat, works generally as a differential tariff against the Canadian miller, is it, in your opinion, desirable that the Canadian Parliament should establish differential duties?"

"A.—Yes."

And that is, Mr. Speaker, just what Parliament has done.

"13. Do you think that the admission into the Canadian markets of horned cattle, horses and American sheep, subject to a duty of 10 per cent, whereas the United States impose a duty of 20 per cent. on the same animals coming from Canada, is damaging to the Canadian raiser of stock, and would you recommend a duty similar to that imposed by the United States?"

"A.—Yes."

That is what the present Parliament has done. And the declarations of the hon. leader of the Opposition in the Province of Quebec, of that hon. member who represented in the Local House the county which the hon. member for the county of Lotbinière represents in the Federal House, these declarations, I say, constitute the best answer that can be made to the objections raised against the Tariff developed a few days ago by the hon. member for Lotbinière himself. I have given you, Mr. Speaker, the opinions of the principal leaders of the Liberal party. But it will be objected that these opinions were liable to have been changed. Yes, these opinions may have changed; and I have here to explain the cause of such changes, the declaration of another leader of that party. Thus spoke, on the 27th of January, 1872, a man who began his speech by the following words: "I am a child of the Liberal party, and I intend to die one." 'Tis he who is to-day a judge in the District of Arthabaska, Mr. Marc. Aurele Plamondon, and he adds:

"The scene has changed, and so have circumstances; political parties must, therefore, slightly modify their ideas and bring themselves to the level of the state of things, without concerning themselves who is the standard-bearer, as long as that standard reaches the position where it should be."

Such was and such may be the power that influences the actions of hon. members who constitute the Opposition to-day. Willingly will they sacrifice their ideas, willingly will they submit to the current forced upon them by existing circumstances, provided, as has been said by one of their leaders, their standard reaches the place where it should be. But why should I seek in the past the necessary arguments to controvert the assertions of the hon. member for Lotbinière when I find in his very utterances the most complete repetition of what he has said in this House. Now, what does the hon. member really say. He first lays down his thesis, and says: "The resources of a country, the nature of its products, its geographical position, its population, those are the four elements to be considered in adopting a Tariff. In other words, true protection is that which fosters the development, the resources, of a country in the interest of the majority." Such is his starting point, his first principle. From this point of view the hon. member thinks that England is necessarily a free trader, because it is par excellence the greatest commercial country, the great manufacturing centre of the world. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not tell us that England, before becoming a free trader, built up her industry by the adoption of an essentially protectionist Tariff; and for us, in the condition in which the country is, and especially our industries, it is necessary firmly to establish them ere reaching this free trade which the hon. member praises so in England; we must create our manufactures to attain this result; we must of necessity have protection; we must, as has said the hon. member, adopt measures to foster in a direct manner the resources of the country in the interests of the greater number. The hon. member finds that our population in Canada is insufficient, that our products are in small variety, that there is an absence of raw material, that there is no cotton, that the climate lends itself with difficulty to the production of wool, that the working of coal and iron mines is attended with difficulty. On the other hand, he finds in it inexhaustible forests, magnificent water-stretches and a rich and fertile soil. According to the hon. member, protection should tend specially towards the development of our sylvan resources, towards the encouraging of navigation and towards agricultural production. Such should be, according to him, a true National Policy; but further on, the hon. member takes to contradict by fresh assertions the propositions he has advanced before. He asserts, for instance, that the protection of manufactures ruins mercantile shipping, and to prove his assertion he says that in 1879-80 imports amounted to $6,292,699, whereas in 1881 they reached $8,554,397, i.e., an increase—I am speaking of woollens only—in the enormous ratio of 35 per cent. for the last fiscal year; in other words, the hon. member establishes that the protection of manufactures is not at all the ruin of mercantile shipping, since imports have, in 1881, increased 35 per cent. over what they were previous to the putting in force of the present Tariff. He goes on to say that protection has the result of imposing excessively high duties on products required in manufactures, and notwithstanding that, he tells us that instead of increasing, raw wool has decreased 30 per cent., which is at once a contradiction of his first assertion. In speaking of sugar, the hon. member asserts that the price of that article has increased, and he adds that the Tariff of the ex-Minister of Finance brought in more revenue than does the present Tariff. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the Tariff of the ex-Minister brought in more revenue to the Treasury, it is probably because the duties at that time were higher than those levied now; it was necessary to levy higher duties, because it is duties that contribute to the increase of the funds of the Treasury. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the best answer to be made to the hon. member for Lotbinière, and to all others who pretend that the present Tariff is injurious to the people, is to make an appointment with them in presence of the people at the next elections. It was they who heralded that doctrine in 1878. At that time the country was suffering from commercial depression; at that time the Government in power could in no way remedy the state of things existing throughout the country. It was then that we came before the people in 1878. These hon. gentlemen pretended that they could save the country with Free Trade. We, on the other hand, maintained that we could not deliver the country from the evils from which it was suffering without adopting the more rational policy of protection. The contest took place and the people pronounced themselves in a decided manner for the adoption of protection. Isolated elections have taken place since then; from year to year, members have come before the people, either through a vacancy occurring in a constituency, or for other reasons, and on those occasions, when the people have been afforded a new opportunity for expressing an opinion, they have invariably—the facts are there to bear out what I state—by a large majority returned to Parliament members who supported the present policy of the Government. I will now come to the second charge preferred by the hon. member for Lotbinière, for I do not wish to abuse the patient hearing granted to me by this honorable House. This is what the hon. member says, when speaking of the expenses of the Administration:

"The accusation of extravagance brought against the Mackenzie Government was a bit of effrontery on the part of those who had increased public expenditure to $13,000,000, in 1867, and $23,316,000, in 1873."

Mr. Speaker, in order to be able to discuss it in all freedom, I think we should determine the basis of the discussion; it becomes necessary to make a comparative study of the two Administrations—between the first Conservative Administration, from 1867 to 1873, and that which succeeded it in 1873. I think it is important to know on what ground we are manoeuvring. According to the figures given to us by the hon. member, I understand that in his study of the question, he gives to us the year 1873-74, whilst he gives the year 1878-79 to the Liberals. If I am mistaken, I beg he will correct me.

Mr. RINFRET. If the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) requires explanations, I can give him some. I did not take into calculation the year 1878-79, because the Estimates that we made in 1878 were considerably exceeded by the Conservative party when it came into power; whereas we, in 1878, remained within the Estimates prepared by the hon. Minister of Finance; thus it is completely impossible for us to take upon ourselves the responsibility of the increase that took place in the Estimates of 1878.

Mr. LANDRY. I think that the hon. member is muddling the question instead of throwing any light upon it. If the hon. member gives us the fiscal year of 1873-74, I think that in all justice he is bound to take 1878-79.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANDRY. I think it was on the 7th November, 1873, that we lost the reins of Government, and those hon. gentlemen left office in October, 1878. Well, if they give us the whole of the fiscal year 1873-74, although they were in power nine months of that year, I think that they should take in exchange the fiscal year 1878-79; and I ask the hon. member if he will take that basis to establish any discussion whatsoever on.

Mr. RINFRET. I have given my explanations. I have said that we remained within the Estimates of 1873, and that our Estimates of 1878 had been considerably exceeded, and that we could not be held responsible for the surplus spent by the Conservative party.

Mr. LANDRY. This signifies that the hon. member holds us responsible for the whole of the increase which they created in the public service during the year 1873-74, but that he has not the courage to undertake the responsibility of the expenses for the year 1878-79. I expected more justice and more generosity on the part of the hon. member; and I thought that as he wished to shoulder us with the responsibility of the expenses of the nine months of administration during which they were in power, he would also have the courage to take the responsibility of the nine months of our administration in 1878-79. The hon. member tells us that we brought the expenses up to $13,000,000 to which they amounted in 1867, to $23,316,000 for the year ending 30th June, 1874, thus giving us the fiscal year of 1873-74. When, further on, he speaks of the public debt, he willingly forgets 1873, to be able to say that on the 1st July, 1874, our national debt amounted to so much, leaving to us the whole responsibility of its increase to that date. I ask the special attention of the hon. member, for I am about to show him the contradiction that exists between the assertions he has just made with that he made in his speech the other day. This is what the hon. member said: "The Liberal Government, during its five years of power, brought its expenses to $23,500,000 only." But what does the hon. member leave us? Why, the year 1873-74. Starting from the 1st July, 1874, he says that the Liberal Government, during its five years of power, brought the expenses up to $23,500,000; consequently, if the hon. member wishes to reckon five years from the 1st July, 1874, he is forcibly compelled to go to the 1st July, 1879, or calculation is a mere word. Thus, the fiscal year 1878-79, according to the hon. member for Lotbinière himself, must be imputed to the Liberals, otherwise we find that the Liberals were but four years in power, which is incorrect. Well, let us take the assertions made by the hon. member before this House, and let us prove to him that the figures he has given have not been given correctly, and that to the detriment of the Conservatives and the advantage of the Liberals. I will, in the first place, accept the gift of the hon. member, and I will take the year 1873-74 as one of our years, because the Budget that had been brought down by the present Minister of Finance, and who was Finance Minister at that date, determined, one may say, the expenses to be incurred during that year 1873-74. If for the expenditure of administration we take the figures given us by public documents, we find that from year to year the Conservative party, from 1867 to 1874, placed considerable amounts aside. We have to notice a period of surpluses. The first year, it is $201,835.53; the second, $341,090.52; the third, $1,166,716.07; the fourth, $3,712,479.09; the fifth, $3,125,344.86, and so on from year to year, so that during the first Conservative Administration we put aside $11,075,063.39. The following table is a resumé of my idea:—

Year.	Receipts.	Expenditure.	Surplus.
1867-68.....	13,687,928 49	13,486,092 96	201,835 53
1868-69.....	14,379,174 52	14,038,084 00	341,090 52
1869-70.....	15,512,225 65	14,345,509 58	1,166,716 07
1870-71.....	19,335,560 81	15,623,081 72	3,712,479 09
1871-72.....	20,714,813 68	17,689,468 82	3,125,344 86

What is now the balance sheet of hon. gentlemen opposite? They came to power with the programme of the national party according to which they were to reduce expenditure; yet, what do we see after five years of their Administration? In 1874-75 they have a surplus, the only one, alas, during the time they were in power, a surplus of $935,644. But, Mr. Speaker, they regretted that surplus and did not repeat the offence, for the following year brought a deficit of $1,460,027.60; the year after, another deficit of $1,460,017.66, and thus from year to year, reaching at last a total deficit during their Administration, of $6,426,958.51. I defy the hon. member for Lotbinière and the hon. members of the Opposition to contradict a single one of the figures that I have given to the House. But in order to be just, let us deduct the amount of their surplus from the total amount of their deficits, and we find an absolute deficit during their Administration of $5,491,314.51, as shown by the following table:—

Year.	Receipts.	Expenditure.	Surplus.	Deficit.
1874-75	24,648,715 04	23,713,071 04	935,644 00
1875-76	22,587,587 05	24,488,372 11		1,900,785 06
1876-77	22,059,274 11	23,519,301 77		1,460,027 66
1877-78	22,375,011 88	23,503,158 25		1,128,146 37
1878-79	22,517,382 14	24,455,381 56		1,937,999 42
				6,426,958 51
				5,491,314 51

But, Mr. Speaker, I have not given you here the cost of the new Conservative Administration since the Liberals left power. Thus, if we compare the receipts and expenditure, we find that in 1879-80, the first year which can be charged to the Conservative party, the receipts amounted to $23,307,406.69; and that in 1880-81 the receipts were $29,635,297.51. If we compare now the expenditure together with the receipts, we find that in 1879-80, the first year of our coming into power, we had a deficit of $1,543,227.76, not $1,700,000 as stated by the hon. member for Lotbinière, and the following year we had a surplus of $4,132,743.09. Now, if we consult the last number of the Official Gazette of Canada, we see that up to the 28th February, 1882, the receipts amounted to $21,624,819.65, and the expenditure to $16,956,817.25, leaving a surplus of $4,668,002.40; if we add these two surpluses, we obtain a total surplus of $8,800,745.49. Let us now deduct from that sum the deficit of the first year, and we get a final surplus of $7,257,517.73, as is shown by the following table:—

Year.	Receipts.	Expenditure.	Deficit.	Surplus.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
1879-80	23,307,406 69	24,850,634 45	1,543,227 76
1880-81	29,635,297 51	25,502,554 42		4,132,743 09
1881-82	21,624,819 65	16,956,817 25		4,668,002 40
				8,800,745 49
				7,257,517 73

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, if we compare the receipts and the expenditures of the Conservatives, with those of the Liberal Administration, we get the following results which I submit to the House: from 1867 to 1874, the first Conservative Administration, a surplus of $11,075,063.39. From 1874 to 1879, during the reign of the Liberals, we have a surplus of $935,644, but, on the other hand, a deficit of $6,426,958.61. From 1877 to the 28th February, 1882, during the second Conservative Administration, we have a deficit for the first year of $1,543,227.76, but, on the other hand, we have a surplus amounting to $8,800,745.49, i.e., that for the whole number of years of Conservative Administration, we get a total of $19,875,808.88, against a deficit of the Liberals of $6,426,958.51. If, on the one hand, we deduct from the Conservative Administration the deficit of its first year, and, on the other hand, add to the Liberal Administration the surplus of its first year, we obtain the following grand total: Conservative Administration, a surplus of $18,332,581.12; Liberal Administration, a deficit of $5,491,314.51, as shown by the following table:—

Year.	Conservative Administration.		Liberal Administration.
	Deficit.	Surplus.	Surplus.	Deficit.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
1867 to 1874.		11,075,063 39
1874 to 1879.			935,644 00	6,426,958 51
1879 to 28 Febu'y, 1882.	1,543,227 76	8,800,745 49		6,426,958 51
		19,875,808 88		935,644 00

But it has been said, Mr. Speaker, that the expenditure had increased, and that we had increased it by about ten millions during the time we were in power. Yes, the expenditure has increased. But it is easier, and the hon. member for Lotbinière knows it better than anyone else, that it is easier to cultivate at a lesser expense a property of one or two acres than one of fifty. In the same way, the more a country grows, the greater are the expenses. It is less expensive to govern four Provinces than it is to govern seven. But the hon. member, when stating that our expenditure had increased, did not add that the country had increased likewise; that instead of the four Provinces we had in 1867, we have now a considerable territory which comprises, besides those four Provinces, those which have been since added and which to-day form part of the Canadian Confederation. That is what the hon. member should have added. Nevertheless, let us take what he says. In 1867 our expenditure reached $13,486,092.96; in 1874, even if we take the year which hon. gentlemen are willing to grant us, our expenditure reached $23,316,316.75, or a difference of $9,830,223.70. Such is the increase of our expenditure; but, on the other hand, our receipts have increased likewise, but the hon. member for Lotbinière failed to say so. He failed to state that at the same time our expenditure was increased by the addition of the several Provinces forming Confederation, our receipts had so increased as to allow us to remove certain duties which were pressing on the people. As a proof, the duties on tea and coffee were removed in 1872 by the Conservatives and again removed by them this year, because the Liberals had re-imposed them in 1874. Well, what has been the increase in the receipts? In 1867, at the time of Confederation, our receipts amounted to $13,687,928.49, and in 1870-74 they had reached $24,205,092.54, or an increase of $10,517,164.05. Now, if we wish to deduct from the increase of our receipts the increase of our expenditure, we still find a balance in favor of the Conservative party of $686,940.26. Such are the figures supplied by the public documents. Let us now compare the Conservative with the Liberal Administration. Let us examine what the Liberal Administration has done during the five years that the hon. member says they were in power. In 1874-75, the expenditure was $3,713,071.04, and in 1878-79, the last year of their Administration, the expenditure reached $24,455,381.56, or an increase of $742,310.52. Is that the policy of economy promised to us by the Liberal party when it blossomed forth in the Salle du Patronage in Quebec, which was paraded later on in mid-Lent, in the Quebec Music Hall, and then from Province to Province, from county to county, but no further than the county of Montmagny, for the county of l'Islet was then closed to the national party, although it was still represented by an old Liberal. Now, Mr. Speaker, whilst the expenditure was increased by a sum of $742,310, what was the increase of receipts in 1874? The receipts amounted to $24,648,715.04, and in 1878 they had fallen down to $22,577,382.14; and yet hon. members had burdened the country with an additional tax of $3,000,000 at one sitting, and $500,000 at another, making $3,500,000. Thus, if we compared the increase of the revenue with the expenditure, we find against the Liberal party a balance of $2,873,643.42. The two following tables, the figures composing which are taken from the Public Accounts, show the difference existing in the increase of the expenditure and receipts between the two Administrations:—

CONSERVATIVE ADMINISTRATION.

Year.	Expenditure.	Increase.	Receipts.	Increase.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
1867-68....	13,486,092 96	13,687,928 49

				2,873,643 42

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the expenditure had been increased. It has been said that we had increased the expenditure by a sum of $9,000,000, but good care has been taken not to go into details. Thus, for instance, we have acquired more property; we have aggrandized the country that belongs to us. We have, in consequence, increased the national debt, and yet the hon. member has not stated that our debt which in 1867 obliged us to pay only $4,501,568.33 for interest, had reached in 1881 an amount that necessitated the payment of an interest of $7,594,144.88, i.e. an increase of $3,092,576.55. The same applies to the appropriations granted to the Provinces. In 1867, the population was not what it is to-day, and the Census of 1871 established a new basis for the granting of appropriations to the Provinces, so that the amount which was in 1867, $2,758,966.46, reached $3,455,517.73 in 1881, or an increase of $701,552.27. The Public Works have also increased. In 1867, when our country was, so to say, emerging from childhood, we spent on Public Works a sum of $126,269.78, and in 1881, owing to the increase of receipts, we spent a sum of $1,138,765.93, or an increase of $1,012,496.15. And then, we have had the Census. In 1867 there was no Census, and in 1881 there was an amount of $127,033.56 expended on that object; and thus, from expense to expense, we reach a total for the interest to be paid on the national debt, the appropriations to Provinces, the Public Works, the Census, the Customs, the Excise, the Railway and Canals, the Post Office, Immigration, Lighthouses and the Coast Service, the North-West and Manitoba, of $10,301,578.94, as shown by the following table taken from the Public Accounts:—

—	1867.	1881.	Increase.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is an examination to be made which is not to the advantage of the Liberal party, but which it is most interesting to make, if we wish to compare the expenses with those of the Liberal Administration. I will merely take a few items. Let us take the cost of Legislation as an instance: In 1876, the Liberals spent for that purpose, $627,230.67; and in 1881, the last year of the Administration of the Conservative party, for which we have details in the Public Accounts, we find that this expense was $611,375.73, or a decrease of $15,854.94. The Fisheries cost, in 1876, $108,183.73; and in 1880, we asked for but $80,560.35, or a decrease of $27,623.38. Then there are the Penitentiaries; perhaps in the days of the Liberals there were more criminals than now. We must believe such to be the case, for in 1875 they cost $337,593.55, and to-day they cost but $301,366.29, or a decrease of $36,227.26. Then weights and measures. It was in the good old time when those men had fine weights, but not many measures. In those days they spent on Weights and Measures, $111,085.70; and the Administration which governs the country to-day spent, in 1881, but $74,170.43 for that purpose, or a decrease of $36,915.17. Police. Evidently this is the complement of the penitentiaries, for naturally, when the penitentiaries cost higher the police must also. In 1875, the Police cost $54,563.06; to-day it costs but $13,525.77. Since the Conservative Administration has come into power tranquility has returned, and the police has no longer its raison d'être. Thus there is in that item a decrease of $41,037.29. In those days Statistics cost $67,552.16. We have reduced their cost to $22,408.13, or a decrease of $45,144.03. The Lighthouses and Dominion Coast Service, which cost, in 1876, the sum of $545,848.62, now costs but $443,724.36, a decrease which saves the people $102,124.26. Now, let us come to Immigration. Mr. Speaker, the stream of immigration is greater to-day than it was then; more immigrants are coming into the country to-day than then; less Mennonites have come, perhaps, but still we have a greater number of immigrants to people our lands; yet in 1876, immigration cost the country $385,845.36. We have reduced this amount to $250,812.99, or a saving to the people of $135,032.37. On the Militia, the amount has been reduced from $1,013,943.84, that it was in 1875, to $667,000.51 for last year, or a decrease of $346,943.33. If, Mr. Speaker, you sum up the few items I have mentioned, you will find, on comparing the expenditure of the Liberal with that of the Conservative Administration, that there is, in favor of the latter a decrease of $480,902.03, as shown by the following table of comparative statement of expenditure:—

	Liberals.		Conservatives 1861.		Decrease.
Legislation (1876).....	627,230	67	611,375	73	15,854	94

					480,902	03

But, Mr. Speaker, not only are there the expenses of administration, there is also the public debt to be considered. I will quote what the hon. member said in his speech on the 1st July, 1874. Said he: "The public debt was, in round figures, $108,000,000."

Mr. RINFRET. It amounted to $109,000,000.

Mr. LANDRY. I think I hear the hon. member say it was $109,000,000. A million more or less is not of much consequence to the Liberals. At any rate, I will take what he said from the Hansard, and I find the following:—

"On the 1st July, 1874, the public debt was, in round figures, $108,000,000; in 1878, it was $141,000,000, or an increase of $33,000,000 during the time the Liberals were in power."

Thus, according to the hon. member himself, the increase of the debt under the Liberal Administration amounted to $32,000,000. Well, Mr. Speaker, such is not the case. But, before discussing this question, I wish to make a simple comparison. A country is governed, from my point of view, at least, in the same way as a farmer cultivates his lands; there are what is called ordinary expenses as well extraordinary ones. Thus, the Administration of Justice, the working of the Civil Service, the salaries of its employees, the expenses necessary for Legislation, are ordinary expenses for any Government; thus, for a farmer, ordinary expenses consist in the cost of cultivating his land, seeding it, harrowing it, and so forth. But besides these expenses, there are others which increase the territorial value of the country in the same manner as a certain expenditure will increase the value of a farmer's lands; they are extraordinary expenses, for ordinary expenses do not increase the value of a property, they can only contribute towards the yielding of profits more or less considerable. But if a farmer buys the land of his neighbor, or if he carries out on his property works which double its value, naturally enough his earnings will not suffice to pay that increase; but then the farmer is justified in raising a loan. It is the same in the case of a Government of a country. When the question arises of increasing its territory, constructing railways, digging canals, then the Government is justified in raising loans to meet its extraordinary expenditure; and that is what both Liberals and Conservatives have done. Well, from that point of view, are we going to institute a comparison between the public debt under the Liberal and Conservative Administrations respectively. In 1867, the public debt was $75,728,641.37; in 1874, when we fell from power, it amounted to $108,324,964.42, or an increase of $32,596,323.05. Such was, in 1874, when the Liberals came into power, the real increase of the public debt; but, Mr. Speaker, I read to you just now clause 13th of the national programme, wherein it is said that the Federal Government should assume the debt of the different Provinces, and in the British North America Act, I find at clause 112, the following:

"The Provinces of Ontario and Quebec shall be jointly responsible towards Canada, for the surplus (if surplus there be) of the debt of the Province of Canada, if, at the time of the Union, it should exceed $62,500,000, and shall be obliged to pay the interest of that surplus at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum."

Thus, at the time of Confederation, in 1867, it was decreed that by that Act, that the debts of the two Provinces should amount to $62,000,000, and that any sum exceeding that should be paid as indicated by that clause. Now, in 1873, the amount of the debt was thus exceeded, and the various Provinces were to pay this increase. Hence the clause in the programme of the national party, which sought to make Confederation take this increase to its account. Our opponents cannot, therefore, complain; it is one of the fundamental articles of their programme. In 1873, we consequently assumed the responsibility for a considerable sum by virtue of a resolution passed by this House and embodied in 36 Vic., chap. 30. This is what the statute says:

"In the accounts between the several Provinces of Canada and the Dominion, the amounts payable to and chargeable against the said Provinces respectively, in so far as they depend on the amount of debt with which each Province entered the Union, shall be calculated and allowed as if the sum fixed by the 112th section of 'The British North America Act, 1867,' were increased from $62,500,000 to the sum of $73,006,088.84, and as if the amounts fixed as aforesaid, as respects the Provinces of British Columbia and Manitoba by the terms and conditions on which they were admitted into the Dominion, were increased in the same proportion."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken, the debt of the two united Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada was about $10,700,000. The Confederation having assumed that debt, it became necessary to grant to the other Provinces forming part of the Confederation a suitable proportion so as to put them on the same footing as the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The Public Accounts show that the Provincial debts thus assumed by the Confederation amounted in all to $20,452,340.58. I showed just now that the total increase of the public debt was $32,596,323.05 and if we deduct from that amount the amount of the Provincial debts, say $20,452,340.58, which is not an increase of the public debt, but merely the transfer of a debt owed by the Provinces of Confederation which has assumed the payment thereof, we find that the actual increase of the debt in 1873-74 was but $12,143,982.47.

But to this increase of the public debt, there is a corresponding and considerable increase in the territorial value, and on looking into the Public Accounts we find that during that period the Conservative party spent $3,672,663.91 for public works. We see, moreover, that the Intercolonial Railway cost during the same period the sum of $17,937,735.76; the Canadian Pacific Railway, $1,391,619 80, and that the acquiring of the North-West, together with the necessary expenses of establishing an Administration there, cost $2,920,000, or a total of $25,922,019.47. If we deduct from this amount the real increase of the debt, which is $12,143,982.47, we have a balance of $13,778,037 to the credit of the Conservative Administration. To sum up, Mr. Speaker, from Confederation to the day when the Liberals came into power, the Conservative party governed the country, increasing the debt by $12,143,982.47; but at the same time it increased the territorial value by $25,933,019.47, leaving a balance to its credit of $13,778,037. Let us now examine what was done by the Liberal Administration. When it came to power, the debt, as stated by the hon. member for Lotbinière, amounted to $108,324,964.42. In 1878-79, when it was driven from power by the people, the debt had reached $142,990,187.36, or an increase of $34,665,222.04, and not $32,000,000 as the hon. member for Lotbinière pretends. We must be fair towards our opponents and doing for them what we do for ourselves, allow them a corresponding increase of territorial value against that increase of the debt; they engaged in public works amounting to $17,645,985.12; they spent for the Canadian Pacific Railway, $11,052,617.30, and $5,283,965.47 for the Intercolonial Railway, which expense increased the territorial value by $33,982,567.89. But during the same period the public debt was increased by a sum of $34,665,222.94, i.e., there is a balance against them of $682,655.05. Such has been the consequence of the Liberal Administration. We returned to power in 1878. At that period, as I have just shown, the debt amounted to $142,990,187 36. In 1880-81, according to the Public Accounts, it was $155,395,780.40, or an increase of $12,405,593.04. But to that increase of the debt there corresponds an increase of territorial value, brought about by the following expenditure: Public Works, $4,413,035.02; Canadian Pacific Railway, $9,013,026.35; Intercolonial Railway, $2,656,747.40; Public Lands, $334,681.41, or a total of $16,417,490.48. In other words, whilst we increased the debt by a sum of $12,405,593.04, we were increasing the territorial value by a sum of $16,417,490.48, leaving consequently a balance to the credit of the Conservative party of $41,011,897.44. There but remains, Mr. Speaker, to collect these materials, to place them together in one table, and to prove to the House and to the country the cost of the Liberal Administration on the one hand, and that of the Conservative Administration on the other. From 1867 to 1874 the increase of the debt under the Conservative Administration was $12,143,982.47; at the same time, the increase of the territorial value, through public works, was $25,922,019.47. From 1874 to 1879, during the Liberal Administration, the increase of the territorial value amounted to $33,982,567.89, but, at the same time, the increase of the debt was $34,665,222.94. From 1879 to 1881 the increase of the debt on our side was $12,405,593.04, but, at the same time, the increase of the territorial value of the country through public works amounted to $16,417,593.04. To sum up, the Conservative Administration, during the two periods of 1867 to 1874 and of 1879 to 1881, increased the public debt by $24,549,575.51, whilst it increased the territorial value by a sum of $42,339,509.95, or, if we deduct the increase of the debt from the increase of the territorial value, a surplus in favor of the Conservative Administration of $17,789,934.44. Let us now take the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. They increased the public debt by $44,655,

222.94, and the territorial value, $33,982,567.89, which shows a balance of $682,655.05 against them, as will be seen from the following table:—

But I am mistaken, Mr. Speaker, for we have received more recent figures, and on Friday, the 8th March, the hon. Minister of Finance made the following statement in answer to a question by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton): The debt, on the 1st July, 1881, was $155,395,780.40; on the 1st July, 1882, it will be $154,085,910, or a decrease of $1,309,870.40; the sum expended for public works and chargeable to capital account during the first six months of the present fiscal year is $3,531,139. With these new data we get the following fiscal table, which briefly presents the actual situation of the country with regard to this question of the national debt. We have, under the two Conservative Administrations, from 1867 to 1874 and from 1879 to 1882, an increase of the public debt of $23,239,705.11, and whilst we were thus increasing the debt by that amount, we were at the same time increasing the territorial value of the country by a sum of $45,870,648.95, or a balance of $22,630,943.84 in favor of the Conservative Administration. And during the Liberal Administration, we still found ourselves face to face with the same result, the balance to its debit being $682,655.05, as shown by the following table:—

Years.	Conservative Administration.		Liberal Administration.

Mr. Speaker, those figures, better than any speech, better than ancient theories on Free Trade and Protection, show us that the Conservative Administration is a benefit to the country; for when, in 1870, the people cast off the hon. gentlemen who were then in power, it was sufficiently enlightened and the line of action then followed by it is a pledge of its action at the next elections. It is not the speech made by the hon. member for Lotbinière which will serve as a programme during the next struggle. The figures which he gave in perfect good faith, I believe, but which in the face of public documents are shown to be incorrect, may perhaps deceive a few people in his own county; but in all the other counties of the Province of Quebec, we shall see at the next election a repetition of the judgment rendered by the people in 1878, viz.: Down with those who can only govern by imposing taxes, and power to those who work with their whole heart to foster the interests of the country. After a few years of power, we are face to face with a surplus exceeding $4,000,000, and we are enabled to diminish the duties on tobacco and on many other articles. The word tobacco reminds me of what the hon. member said in his speech; it deserves to be taken up. He said:

"The duties on Canadian tobacco have existed since a number of years; they were imposed by the Conservative party and kept in force by the Liberal party for revenue purposes."

This assertion is perfectly harmless, Mr. Speaker, but, in order to be perfectly true, the hon. member should have added that not only were they kept in force but increased by the Liberal party. Those duties were increased by it to 10 cents, and when the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Bolduc) presented a motion for the reduction of the duties on tobacco, we saw the hon. member who preceded the hon. member for Lotbinière in this Parliament, Mr. Bernier, vote in favor of that amendment; but we have seen the leader of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) and other leaders of the party, vote against that motion.

Mr. RINFRET. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) should speak to us about his own vote in 1880 on a motion similar to that of the hon. member for Beauce, and about the vote of the hon. member for Beauce himself.

Mr. LANDRY. I am glad that the hon. member for Lotbinière should have raised that objection, and I will answer him in the very words of his leader, as he delivered them on the 23rd April, 1878:

"There is no one in a civilized country who would pretend that tobacco should be exempt from taxation; it is, of all others, an article on which every Government levies duties. At the present time there is not a civilized country that would venture to abolish this Excise duty and exempt tobacco from duty."

It is probably for that reason that last year the hon. member was one of that phalanx of eleven members who, during the past Session, tried to overthrow the Ministry on that question. Here is the further opinion of the hon. member for Quebec East, who adds:

"In the second place, it is impossible to levy a duty on foreign tobacco without levying the same duty on Canadian tobacco. If the duty is taken off native tobacco, the result would be to destroy entirely the revenue coming from that source. I am of opinion that tobacco is one of those articles that should be taxed, and that consequently it would be an erroneous and ruinous policy, so far as the revenue is concerned, the removing of the tax."

The hon. member for Quebec East goes further than any other Liberal member has gone up to this date, or than any other friend of the people, in the sense of the hon. member for Lotbinière. Another thing that deserves consideration is the following one; the hon. member, whilst explaining the increase of expenditure and of the public debt under the Liberal Administration, said:

"I do not intend to speak here of the enormous amount spent for the Canadian Pacific Railway, as every one knows who is responsible for this gigantic undertaking."

Well, Mr. Speaker, if that sentence is not intended to throw dust in the eyes of the people of the Province of Quebec, and of the whole of Confederation, provided always that the speech of the hon. member be read throughout the country, if that sentence was not spoken with an electoral purpose,

Mr. LANDRY.

I think the hon. member should withdraw it. Better than any one else does he know how that matter stands. Let us now make the acquaintance of the friends of the hon. member. On the 12th September, 1882, I think it was under the Maedonald Administration, the following memorandum was presented—

Mr. RINFRET. That is a thing of the past.

Mr. LANDRY. The hon. member thinks it is a thing of the past, yet it is a memorandum drawn up by his party in 1882, and we are going at any rate to see what was the opinion of the Liberal party with regard to the Pacific Railway. A convention was held under the auspices of the three Governments of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and that convention drew up the following memorandum:—

"The undersigned, representing the three Governments of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, assembled to consider the despatch of His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, dated 12th April, 1882, concerning the Intercolonial Railway, having given the most careful attention to the important points raised in that despatch, have come to an understanding on the following points, to wit:—"

The question then at issue was the obtaining of a guarantee for a loan for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, and one of the reasons given for making that request was the following. And among those points is the subjoined one:

"5. That the undersigned, in arriving at this conclusion, were principally guided by the firm opinion that a railway between Halifax and Quebec would form an essential link of a long and uninterrupted line of communication, crossing British possessions from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a road, in the construction of which all the Imperial interests in British North America are closely involved. And the undersigned, with the object of submitting in a proper manner that part of the question to the Imperial authorities, have decided that the three Provinces will shortly act in unison to demonstrate the high political and commercial importance of the western extension of the projected line."

(Signed),	J. S. MACDONALD,	L. V. SCOTT,
"	J. MORRIS,	WILLIAM MCDUGALL,
"	W. P. HOWLAND,	U. J. TESSIER,
"	F. EVANTUREL,	T. D'ARCY MCGEE, etc."

Such was the opinion of the Liberal party in those days; and if we refer to the speech made by Mr. Mackenzie, at Sarnia, we find the following declaration:—

"It will be necessary for us to complete our great national road across the continent, and I think it will be the duty of the Government, as it is its wish, to put into execution every plan that might tend to bring about such a result."

The Globe of that date is less explicit; it speaks as follows:—

"Nothing is further from truth. The speech of Mr. Mackenzie at Sarnia, distinctly gave to understand what was the line of action he intended following, and subsequent declarations have explained and developed all the ideas that had been then suggested. There is no doubt as to whether the Pacific Railway should be constructed or not. This question has been irrevocably settled in the affirmative, and there is not a single statesman in Canada who would undertake to defend the negative position on that point, on which every one is agreed."

But, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wishes to know the opinion of his own leader in the Province of Quebec, in the Federal House, this is what he said:

"Mr. LAURIER. We are all agreed upon this that the Canadian Pacific Railway must be built on Canadian soil; there is no difference of opinion on that point.

"Mr. LANGEVIN. Really!

"Mr. LAURIER. I do not think there are two opinions held on the subject.

"Mr. LANGEVIN. Your opinion differs from that of your leader.

"Mr. LAURIER. No; he said that we should proceed with the construction of the road gradually, as the country needed it. I have never heard any opinion expressed here against the construction of the Pacific Railway."

Well, after such testimony, I think that the little sentence ejaculated by the hon. member for Lotbinière should return into obscurity. Mr. Speaker, I will conclude the few remarks I have made on the question submitted to this House by recalling the words of the French poet, one of the ornaments of French literature, written some centuries ago :

" On conte qu'un serpent, voisin d'un horloger, (C'était pour l'horloger un mauvais voisinage)
Entra dans sa boutique, et, cherchant à manger,
N'y rencontra pour tout potage,
Qu'une lime d'acier qu'il se mit à ronger.
Cette lime lui dit, sans se mettre en colère :
' Pauvre ignorant! eh! que prétends-tu faire ?
Tu te prends à plus dur que toi,
Petit serpent à tête folle :
Plutôt que d'emporter de moi
Seulement le quart d'une obole,
Tu te romprais toutes les dents ;
Je ne crains que celles du temps."

That fable, gentlemen, contains a precious teaching ; the clockmaker is evidently the Conservative party which has given the policy of protection to the country, and the steel file on which the serpent breaks its teeth is protection. I need not say who is the serpent, but turning towards the members of the Opposition and taking them as a whole, I will read to them the following moral to the tale left to us by the great fabulist :

" Ceci s'adresse à vous, esprits du dernier ordre,
Qui n'étant bons à rien cherchez sur tout à mordre.
Vous vous tourmentez vainement ;
Croyez-vous que vos dents impriment leurs outrages
Sur tant de beaux ouvrages ?
Ils sont pour vous d'airain, d'acier, de diamant."

Mr. BECHARD. Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak, it is not my intention to make a long speech at this advanced stage of the debate ; but for the little that I have to say, I wish to do so in that beautiful French language in which you yourself made from time to time such eloquent speeches ere taking your seat in the chair which you now occupy. I have listened with interest to the majority of the speeches of the supporters of the Government, and I must say that if I had but to take into consideration the general tone of those speeches and the most striking feature of them, I would feel somewhat disposed to join those hon. gentlemen in proclaiming that the country is prosperous, that our commerce is flourishing, that our manufacturers are making fortunes, and that our farmers have seen their labors rewarded by the splendid results of the last two years. But, Mr. Speaker, those speeches contain certain expressions of opinion that I am far from agreeing with, and certain appreciations of fact to which I cannot give my adhesion. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), whom we have just heard, has pretended to say in his speech that some of the leaders of the Liberal party had in 1872 made speeches, and others had published writings, in favor of a protective Tariff, and he concludes therefrom that they have contradicted themselves and that the Liberal party has shown a want of consistency on that question. I trust I may be permitted to say here that the individual opinions of a few people, even of the leaders, cannot bind a party as a party, and the only instance where one can say that it has a binding effect on the party, is when it has been given utterance to before the electors as a doctrine of the party. Then has one the right, should it abandon that doctrine after having promulgated it, to reproach it with inconsistency. The hon. member has spoken of the deficits which occurred under the Administration of my hon. friend the member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). Let me state that these deficits were brought about less by an increase in the expenditure of the Administration of my hon. friend than by the considerable decrease of receipts. There was an increase in the expenditure, which it is well known was due to obligations which the hon. member for Lambton found imposed on the country when he came into power ; and again, no one has forgotten that the principal source of revenue of the Government are the Customs receipts, and these, which amounted to $15,000,000 in 1875, fell to $12,000,000 or $12,500,000 in 1876. Therein lies the true reason of the deficits which took place under the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton. At the beginning of this debate, we saw the hon. Minister of Finance present to the House and to the country a brilliant picture of our financial position, and at the same time attempt to paint in glowing colors the general prosperity which he attributed to what one is pleased to call the National Policy. His speech was received with oft-repeated plaudits from his friends in this House ; but those plaudits became the expression of a genuine feeling of enthusiasm, when the hon. Minister announced that for the last fiscal year there was a surplus of $4,500,000. Really, looking at the enthusiastic manifestations of my hon. friends opposite, at the mere statement of that fact by the hon. Minister, one would have been inclined to believe that that excessive surplus did not come into the public coffers from the pockets of the worker, of the consumer, in a word from the people of Canada, but that it had simply fallen to them as did formerly the manna which fed the Hebrews in the desert. If, on the one hand, it is admitted by every one that a surplus of receipts arising from a strict economy in public expenditure, as well as from the working of a moderate Tariff, gives a subject of general and legitimate satisfaction, I ask whether there is any particular reason to rejoice and to allow oneself to be carried away by enthusiasm, because after ascertaining an increase in the ordinary expenditure of $2,000,000 in the space of two or three years, one still finds oneself face to face with a surplus of $4,500,000, as if that enormous surplus had been derived from some marvellous source revealed recently to the hon. Minister of Finance. Let me say to my hon. friends on the other side of the House that what they appear to consider as an extraordinary financial success, others have the right to consider it as simply the legitimate result of an odious and oppressive system of taxation. Now if my hon. friend, the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), at the door of whose Administration one lays the bitter accusation of having allowed two or three deficits to accumulate—if the hon. member for Lambton—who, during the time he was in power, had the misfortune of seeing his country a prey to a commercial and financial depression, the most terrible, perhaps, which the world has had to endure for the last half century, noways taking into account the suffering caused by that crisis—had only had recourse to an increase of taxation, to this simple and easy method of covering up a deficit by increasing the taxes, he might easily, at the end of each fiscal year, have had a surplus instead of a deficit. But my hon. friend, true to his principles of frankness and honesty, rather than heighten the sufferings of a people already in distress by increasing the taxes, preferred to let two or three deficits accumulate, knowing full well that these deficits would disappear and become surpluses as soon as the crisis was over, without it being necessary to have recourse to an increase of taxation. It is thus that the hon. member for Lambton did not fear to risk his popularity, to risk the high position that he held at the head of the country, resolved if he had to fall to fall like a man ; and he fell, Mr. Speaker, but he fell like a man of honor, true to the principles that he had advocated during his whole life ; he fell, and I can venture to say that he fell carrying with him the heartfelt sympathies of his fellow-citizens, who, on the day after his fall, were proud to do homage to the integrity of his character and to his remarkable talents. Mr. Speaker, the statement that the hon. Minister of Finance should have been able to make to the House should have been one announcing a decrease instead of an increase of expenditure. The people had the right to expect such a statement from the hon. Minister after the blame cast upon the Liberal party during the last elections for slightly increasing the expenditure. The people had the right to expect that the Conservative party, on returning to power, would not increase the ordinary expenditure after what had fallen from the lips of the hon.

Minister of Finance during the last electoral campaign on that subject. Who does not remember that occasion when the hon. Minister, addressing his electors, severely censured the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton on account of a slight increase necessitated by obligations contracted before his Government came into existence? Who does not remember that memorable occasion when the present hon. Minister of Finance, speaking to the people, told them that a sum of $22,500,000 was sufficient to defray the ordinary expenses of Administration? These words, under such circumstances, constituted a promise, a rallying cry, which was repeated from county to county, from husting to husting, by the friends of the hon. Minister. How is it that, after taking so solemn an engagement, the hon. Minister should be compelled to-day to come and ask the representatives of the people the authority to expend for the next fiscal year a sum of $27,500,000—or $5,000,000 in excess of that famous sum of $22,500,000 which he himself declared to be sufficient for the purposes of ordinary expenditure. The people are not ignorant of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that it is they who will have to pay this additional sum of $5,000,000. The people are also aware that it is from its purse that this has been ruthlessly taken, to be tossed into the public coffers, the $4,500,000, constituting the excessive surplus of the past fiscal year. In the presence of these facts, it is to be hoped that the people will not be the dupes of the joyous manifestations of hon. members sitting on the right side of the House. In this debate, Mr. Speaker, hon. members on the right side of the House are making strenuous efforts to convince the country that the present prosperity is due to the operation of what is called the National Policy, and care has been taken to hold up to our admiration the prosperity which manufactures are now enjoying. I do not intend discussing whether this prosperity is real or exaggerated; but if that prosperity is as great as it is said to be, to what fortunate concurrence of circumstances, do I ask, is due that fortune which our manufacturers are acquiring so rapidly, and which has made some of them millionaires in a very short space of time. It is the work of the National Policy, I am answered from the other side of the House. So be it; but then it would be more explicit, it would especially be more precise, to say at once that it is the result of the present Tariff; that it is the work of the protective Tariff which creates this unjust privilege in favor of the manufacturers by an excessive protection; that it is the work of the protective Tariff, which, adding an artificial value to the real value of manufactured products, compels the consuming people of Canada, farmers, members of the liberal professions, workmen and laborers, to pay each day of their lives higher prices for the manufactured articles which they require than those which they would have had to pay if those articles were not so highly taxed. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that it has been said that there are certain goods which are sold cheaper in Canada to-day than in 1878; without stopping to discuss the exactness of this assertion, I say that the price of goods is ever determined by the unchangeable law of supply and demand, and that if it is true that certain goods are to-day cheaper in Canada than they were in 1878, it is because the price of goods has likewise fallen in those countries from whence we import them; it is because the production of those goods, as compared with the consumption, is greater to-day throughout the world than it was in 1878; or, in other words, that the supply of those goods, as compared with the demand, is more considerable to-day than it was then. But whatever be the price of goods, be it comparatively high or low, the consumer has ever to pay over and above the real value, the artificial value represented by the amount of duties levied on those goods. If I am told that the reduction in the price of goods is caused by a greater production of the same goods in our own country, then I will ask why do you maintain the high duties levied on these goods? As long as these duties are maintained the consumer has a right to say: "You are making me pay so much per cent. over and above the real value of the goods." Far from me, Mr. Speaker, be the thought of even hinting that the Customs should be abolished. I am not ignorant of the fact that in a country like this the Customs will, for a long time to come, constitute the principal source of revenue for the Government; but I share the opinion of those who think with modern economists that the Customs should be especially a fiscal instrument, and that in our country, whilst retaining its fiscal character, they can give sufficient protection to those of our manufacturers who are entitled to it. But the Customs must always avoid tending towards monopoly, because monopoly is naturally always unjust and odious, as its practical result can but be the enriching of one class at the expense of the greater number. It will, perhaps, not be out of the way, in the course of this discussion, to compare certain results with certain promises made to the people during the last General Elections. It is known that the opponents of the Government of the hon. member for Lambton, taking advantage of a crisis that was making itself felt, not only in Canada, but in the United States, in England, and in the whole civilized world, tried at first to convince the people that this crisis and the disasters which followed in its wake were attributable to the maladministration of the hon. member for Lambton. A remedy was suggested—we know now what that remedy is—but what was odious in it was disguised under a magic name, a name pleasing to the ear, especially to the ear of a suffering public; it was called "protection," and then one said to the people: "With protection will the golden age come back, your ills will disappear with protection; protection will cause the cessation of the greatest of the evils which afflict your country, the emigration of your fellow-countrymen to the United States; and not only will emigration cease, but those of your fellow-countrymen who have already gone to the States will be brought back into this country through protection." And yet the protective Tariff was hardly in operation, but one saw emigration increase to an alarming extent, hundreds of people, starting from the furthest parishes of the Province of Quebec, were daily crowding the trains going to the United States. One had never witnessed such an exodus as the one which took place in the fall of 1879, and the spring of 1880. It is but fair to add, Mr. Speaker, that the proportion of this emigration has considerably decreased recently during these times of plenty for the country, but no one would venture to state that it has completely ceased. As to those of our fellow-countrymen, whom protection has brought back into their country, I will not deprive the hon. Minister of Agriculture of the pleasure of informing us of their number, but he may feel certain that the country would be curious to get some statistics on that point. I will leave aside certain points that I might have made passing mention of, in order to arrive more promptly at an important part of the question. A great deal has been said during the course of this debate of the prosperity of agriculture. We agree on the fact of this prosperity, but we differ as to the principal cause to which it should be attributed. There are those who attribute it to the operation of the Tariff, or, at any rate, in a great measure to the operation of the Tariff, whilst others attribute it entirely to the action of Providence. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I am one of those whose faith is greater in the interposition of Providence than in the action of the Tariff. During the past two years our country has been blessed with abundant harvests, and I am fully convinced that we do not owe any part of that abundance to the Tariff; but that we owe it wholly to Providence, to its sun, to its rain. To the advantage of a good harvest has accrued yet another: that of being able to sell our agricultural products at highly remunerative prices. But here I recognize again the hand of Providence, which has shown itself most beneficent towards us, for whilst Canada was blessed with an abundance, which spread wealth and joy in the midst of our population, the European world saw its crops perish, owing to unfavorable weather. Hence a scarcity and a consequent dearness of agricultural products on the European markets; and in consequence of this falling off of the crops in Europe, we have been able to sell Europeans our abundance of agricultural products at more remunerative prices than usual. Such, Mr. Speaker, is the true cause of the increase in the prices of our agricultural products since a year and a half. The hon. members who sit on the other side of the House have persisted in trying to make us believe that that increase was to be attributed to the action of the Tariff, "for," said they, "the action of the Tariff has given our farmers the control of our home market." Well, I maintain—it is my humble opinion, although it may not be that of any other member of the House, yet it is my opinion—I maintain, I say, that in a country like ours, where we have an immense surplus of agricultural productions, the mere fact of this surplus gives to farmers the control of the home market, without the intervention of the Tariff. I should understand the force of the argument that a protective Tariff can give the control of the home market to the farmer, if we were like certain European countries, like England for instance, which is every year compelled to import large quantities of agricultural products for its consumption; I can understand that, in that case, a protective Tariff would give a great advantage to farmers and a greater control over the home market; but, in a country like ours, which every year has an immense surplus of agricultural products which we are obliged to dispose of on foreign markets to get something for them, I maintain that the mere fact of that surplus is sufficient to give the farmers the control of the home market. Under such conditions our market cannot offer any advantages for the sale of agricultural products brought from abroad. The American farmers of the Western States, against whom, practically speaking, our protective system has been instituted, understand their affairs full well; it is not in their interest to export their agricultural products to a market which, like ours, is supplied in abundance with agricultural products, but to a market where those products are in demand and where they can, consequently, sell them on better terms and at more remunerative prices. Now, let me give additional strength to my reasoning by an example: one knows that since a certain number of years, since we have had easy communication with the United States, the southern portion of the Province of Quebec—and I think that that branch of trade extends to the district of Three Rivers—sends a large quantity of hay to the American market. During the summer of 1879, after the coming into force of the protective Tariff, hay was selling, at least in my part of the country, at $8 per ton. In the fall of 1880, hay began to be sold at $10 per ton, and in the spring of the same year it was worth as much as $15. Last fall, hay sold at from $10 to $12, whilst to-day it fetches scarcely $10; it even sells for $9. Why these changes in the price of the hay which we export to the United States? It is because corresponding variations have been felt on the American market; as fast as prices rose on the Boston market, as fast did they rise in Canada, and as soon as they fell on the Boston market, they fell in the same proportion on the Canadian market; this shows that the price of hay in Canada is determined by the value of that article on the American market, whither we transport it. Well, Mr. Speaker, what I say of hay applies to all other agricultural products of which we have an enormous surplus; to barley, of which we export a large quantity, but which we do not import; to oats, to peas, to horses, to horned cattle, to sheep, and to cheese and butter, of which we yearly export millions upon millions of pounds. With regard to these products, I say that our market prices are not determined by the local requirements, but by the value of the products on foreign markets. One has given farmers to understand that under a protective tariff it would be easier to sell these products, because the Tariff gave them the control of the home market, and with that control, that market would be sufficient to absorb all their products. I ask what would have been the value of our products had we not been able to export some on foreign markets? During 1880, we exported, under the denomination of animals and their products and agricultural products, $42,628,546 worth. Let us suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the immense quantity of products which it has been necessary to export to realize that enormous sum, had remained in the country—that we had not had a foreign market wherein to sell them and to derive some profit therefrom—what would have been their value if we had had but our own markets to absorb them? Their value would have been nil, not even sufficient to reward the farmer for the twentieth, nay, the fiftieth part of the labor which this production cost him. Thus, as soon as we establish that to give a greater value to our agricultural products, of which we have an immense surplus, we are obliged to dispose of them in foreign markets, it necessarily and logically follows that the prices at which they are sold on our own markets is determined by their value on foreign markets, and not by the demand of our own markets. Now, if the rise or fall in the value of our products depend on the prices which these products are worth in foreign markets, what advantage can the present Tariff give farmers? Are we going to pretend that the present Tariff has the power of bringing about a rise in the price of agricultural products on foreign markets? Assuredly not. And if the present Tariff is powerless to bring about that rise, I say that it is equally powerless, whatever kind of a Tariff it may be, to give our Canadian farmer any advantage on the home market. But if the present Tariff does not secure any advantage to the Canadian farmers, it has at least the merit of working in a sense hostile to their interests, and the farmer has the right to say to Protectionists: "What do I care for your protection, which has not done anything for me? What do I care for your protection, which can have no effect in raising the price of my products? What do I care for your protection, which makes me pay on the woollens and cottons which I and my family require, a duty of 35 per cent. in excess of their real value? What do I care for your protection, which makes me pay on boots and shoes a duty of 25 per cent. in excess of the real value of those goods? What do I care for your protection, which makes me pay on the agricultural implements that I require for cultivating my land, a duty of 25 to 30 per cent. on each reaper, on each thresher?—which makes me pay a duty of 25 to 30 per cent. on every fork, on every shovel, on every rake, over and above the actual value of these articles, whilst under the Tariff of 1878 I paid only 17½ per cent. on the same articles? I am willing, adds the farmer, to pay certain duties as my share of contribution towards the revenue necessary for the purpose of Administration, but I object to pay exorbitant taxes which are not necessitated by the exigencies of the public service, and which can but tend to one result: the rapid enriching of certain men at my expense." My hon. friend the member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol), in his answer to the excellent speech made by my hon. friend the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret), in the course of this debate, addressed to the leaders of the Liberal party the same reproach which has been cast at them to-day by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry). He accused them with inconsistency concerning the question of Protection. I have but one word in answer to the hon. member for Montreal East, and I will content myself with repeating to him the English proverb with which he is so well acquainted: "Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones at their neighbors." Indeed whom do I see sitting before me on the Ministerial benches? Most distinguished men, for whom I individually entertain the greatest respect, but who have thought they should considerably modify their opinions on that question of the Tariff. For more than forty years that we have enjoyed in Canada the advantages of responsible Government, all parties have been agreed on that question of the Tariff, and we have maintained a revenue tariff based on the principle of the English school. Never has this question of the Tariff been made the subject of a struggle between the two great parties who have divided popular favors. It is only four or five years since that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House have seen fit to change their opinions and adopt the protective system which they offered to the people as a panacea for the evils they were suffering from. I could quote on that subject to the hon. member for Montreal East an authority which he no doubt will not reject—I refer to that of Sir George E. Cartier, expressed at a banquet which his friends gave him in 1870 or in 1871, and at which he said:—

“There are those who speak of introducing a protective Tariff. It would be a mistake; for a protective Tariff, by having the effect of diminishing our importations, would have a tendency to diminish our foreign trade.”

Such was the opinion of a man on that question whose memory is revered by hon. gentlemen opposite. Assuredly they have good reasons to respect the memory of that man; but while remaining faithful to his memory it is to be regretted that they have not also found it right to adhere to the economical principles of that statesman.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 20th March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FLOATING CORD-WOOD ON RIVER ST. FRANCIS.

Mr. VANASSE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 118) to regulate the floating of cord-wood on the navigable portion of the River St. Francis.

Mr. BLAKE. I should like to ask whether this is the same Bill that was introduced last year, the year before last, and the year before that.

Mr. VANASSE. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. I should have thought all the cord-wood would have been floated down by this time.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

THE STATE OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire again to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the absence of some important returns. The Canadian Pacific Railway returns, as to their lands, their money and their route, &c., which are very urgently required, have not been brought down. Returns as to railway supplies; as to grinding in bond; the abstract of the land returns; papers connected with the awards of Mr. Shanly, on the Intercolonial Railway; papers connected with the disallowance of the Streams Bill; supplementary papers moved for in connection with the Boundary Award, and returns in reference to the Welland contract and the taking over of Messrs. Murray & Co.'s contract, are all still required.

Mr. BECHARD.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far as returns relating to matters in my Department are concerned, I have given instructions that no time should be lost in preparing them. I wish to say a few words in reference to the statement made by the hon. member for Lambton a few days ago, that the returns in reference to the Welland Canal are not as full as they should be. I communicated with Mr. Page, the Chief Engineer of Railways and Canals, who did not, in reporting the amount that should be paid to the late contractors, act in the capacity of Chief Engineer of Railways and Canals, but as independent arbitrator, appointed under Order in Council, with the concurrence of both parties. Mr. Page said that, in his opinion, to give more specific and detailed information would be to establish a dangerous and inconvenient precedent which would not certainly be in the public interest. When the arbitration took place in this building, the amount claimed by the contractors was very large, and the arbitration was a very important one, as hon. gentlemen will remember. Mr. Page was then appointed sole arbitrator as in the present case.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Not sole arbitrator.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am giving Mr. Page's statement. There were two arbitrators, one for each block, the eastern and the western. It having been found a troublesome and expensive process to arrive at an award in that way, Mr. Page, as I understand, was made sole arbitrator in reference to this building. At all events, that was the statement made to me. At that time, the late Hon. George Brown was a member of the Government; and he advised Mr. Page in the strongest terms to make this important award a bulk sum, and not enter into details, as these, if given, would only furnish so many various points to which exception could be taken. The then hon. Minister of Justice, whom he consulted in that matter, gave him the same advice; and from that day to this Mr. Page has always, in the various cases in which he has been appointed sole arbitrator, given the award in a bulk sum, after entering into the most careful calculation of details to arrive at a just award. Under these circumstances, Mr. Page said he did not furnish the details; but, after the most careful consideration, had arrived at the amount that ought to be paid. If the hon. gentlemen will look at the papers that accompany this return, which is the specification on which the new contractors took over the works, they will find that it embraces a very close detailed statement of all the materials and everything taken over from the previous contractor, Hunter, Murray & Co., and a statement in detail of the property they were obliged to pay—some $119,000—for or be charged with as received on account of their contract. Before bringing down further details in the matter, I, therefore, thought better to inform hon. gentlemen opposite of the opinion which Mr. Page had expressed, an opinion in which I entirely concur, and to suggest that Mr. Page would be glad to place at the disposal of the hon. leader of the Opposition or the hon. member for Lambton, the fullest information they can possibly desire, and will wait on them at any time convenient for that purpose. If, however, these hon. gentlemen consider the other course should be adopted, I am willing to leave the responsibility on them of pressing for more detailed information, and will not hesitate to adopt what course may, in their judgment, be thought necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have no doubt Mr. Page has acted in this, as he has in everything else, in a perfectly conscientious desire to serve the public interest; still, I am not always able to concur in the conclusions at which he may arrive, and I feel some delicacy in accepting the offer to look at papers which may not be open to be examined by other hon. members. I will think the matter over, and look at some of the previous cases, and, in the meantime, put no notice on the paper until I arrive at some conclusion as to what should be done.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bill was read the third time and passed:—
Bill (No. 48) respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Arkell.)

The following Bills were considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 26) to incorporate the Saskatchewan and Peace River Railway Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 31) to incorporate the Clements Steamship Company (Limited).—(Mr. Wade.)

Bill (No. 34) to amend and consolidate, as amended, the several Acts relating to the British America Assurance Company.—(Mr. McLennan.)

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Planters' Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Gault.)

AMERICAN TELEGRAPH AND CABLE COMPANY.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria), in moving the third reading of Bill (No. 17) to grant certain powers to the American Telegraph and Cable Company, said: The Minister of Public Works, after having considered the measure, had suggested an amendment, in accordance with which he proposed to refer the Bill to a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of striking out certain words.

Mr. BLAKE. What words?

Mr. CAMERON. The words relating to the laying of the cable across the Pacific. At present this Company has power to lay a cable across the Atlantic or Pacific. Inasmuch as the House, last Session, passed a resolution in relation to the incorporation of a company for the laying of a cable across the Atlantic and Pacific, I understand the Minister of Public Works thinks that this Bill should limit the powers of the Company to the Atlantic. I therefore move that the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions to amend it by striking out the words "Pacific Ocean."

Motion agreed to.

Bill amended in Committee and reported.

Mr. CAMERON moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. Is this Bill on the same lines as the Bill we passed, I think, last Session, giving the promoters, I believe a British corporation, certain powers?

Mr. CAMERON. It was a French Company. The powers are, verbatim, the same.

Bill read the third time and passed.

SUN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. GAULT moved the third reading of Bill (No. 4) respecting the Sun Mutual Life Insurance Company of Montreal.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I move an amendment that the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions to add the following clause:—

"Section 9 of the said Act is hereby amended by striking out the word "fifty" and inserting the word "twenty-five."

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman explain the precise effect of this?

Mr. WHITE. On moving this amendment last Monday, I explained its object. It is intended simply to enable the Company to have directors in different places on a smaller qualification than provided for in the present Bill. The Bill requires a qualification of $5,000, or the possession of fifty shares, and my amendment is designed to make the qualification twenty-five shares instead, in order to give the company the benefit of the services of gentlemen who would prefer to qualify on twenty-five shares. The qualification for the Canada Life is but one share, and I think there are prominent members who are directors of it on no larger qualification.

Bill amended in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

NEW YORK AND ONTARIO FURNACE COMPANY.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings) moved the third reading of Bill (No. 65) respecting the New York and Ontario Furnace Company.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to this Bill, which seems to me to be rather of an objectionable character. I presume it has not been amended in Committee, but if it has, we have had no information of it. The Bill recites that the New York and Ontario Furnace Company has been "duly incorporated under the General Laws of the State of New Jersey and of the United States of America," and it expresses a desire "to mine for and ship iron ore and manufacture iron in its various forms, at various places within the Dominion of Canada, and for such purposes is desirous of having its organization and corporate powers recognized by the Parliament of Canada and extended to the Dominion." There is no information as to the character of this Company, the nature of its organization, what its corporate powers are, or who the incorporators are. As a foreign corporation, I admit it is within our competency to give it the corporate powers which are within our jurisdiction, whether they are created by a foreign State or by one of the Provinces, though I think that is an objectionable course unless there is a sufficient reason for it. The foreign corporation is granted power, and this is its main power—to acquire real and personal property in any Province. Now, it seems to me, first of all, that unless there is some overruling clause to the contrary, our legislation ought to be in the direction of creating ourselves the corporation to which we give power. We have just had an instance of the contrary. The Bill which has just been read, without exception, promoted by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron), the Cable Company's Bill, was a Bill granting to a foreign corporation certain powers here. Why was that unobjectionable? Because that corporation created by the foreign Government had obtained powers from that Government essentially to the carrying on of its enterprise, which we could not give, and therefore it is impossible, save by joint action of that description to invest a single corporation with the whole powers. That is a good reason, from my point of view, for our incorporating the entity which we have just recognized with the power of landing its cable on the shores, with certain other powers which it was necessary for them to have, and which they could only get by the joint legislative authority of two Legislatures of independent jurisdiction. But that reasoning does not apply to this case at all. All that is wanting to be done by the New York and Ontario Furnace Company can be done by a corporation composed, if you will, of the same proprietors as the company in this country. They can buy as they can acquire personal property, they can mine and carry on business, and there is no difficulty in their completing the whole of their operations by virtue of a Provincial or Canadian incorporation, as the case may be. That is the first difficulty I have in acceding to the third reading of this Bill, that, without a clause which would justify a course obviously inconvenient, we are simply recognizing a foreign entity and giving it powers. The next objection is this: that we are practically, as I am afraid, transcending our jurisdiction and acting upon the jurisdictions of the local bodies. It seems to me that the practical operation of this Bill is, that this Company or these corporators desire to own and work some mines in the Province of Ontario, and they ask us to give them power to acquire real and personal estate. Now, I say that our only power to do so is limited to the cases in which that is a necessary incident of some other power, as, for example, when we create a railway company, in accordance with our indisputable right to create certain classes of railway corporations, inasmuch as we know that it is a necessary incident to that power that a railway company shall have power to expropriate and hold lands, and we assume to ourselves the right to give them that power. But it does seem to me that in this case the primary object of this Company is to obtain the right to hold real and personal estate within the Province of Ontario or some other Provinces, I care not how many, and to work them. It seems to me we ought not so to interfere, it might be contrary to the policy of a particular Province to allow any corporate body to hold any land in that Province. The question of property and civil rights is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Province, save in so far as we are empowered incidentally to meddle with those subjects. The mere circumstance that we have something to do in the regulation of trade and commerce does not give us the power, as a general rule, simply to incorporate private companies, who are going to carry on trades. That is a different thing altogether from the general regulation of trade and commerce, as has been demonstrated in some recent decisions. Therefore, it seems to me the Bill is one deserving the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). My hon. friend has just said he understands that no amendment was made in Committee, which is not the case. In the Committee, of which I have the honor to be Chairman, some material amendments were made and, if I am not mistaken, an amendment was made declaring the incorporation of this body was for the general advantage of the country. If that be so, that amendment would clearly bring it within the functions and powers of the Legislature.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly that would bring it within the functions of this Parliament, if that declaration were made in this Act. Is not the erection of furnaces and the carrying on of smelting a business of a public character in that sense within the Act?

Mr. BLAKE. I think my hon. friend will find that that applies to public works and undertakings declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. CAMERON. Granted that it does. It has been applied to railways and other works purely local in their character, repeatedly in this Parliament, whether rightly or wrongly, I am not going to argue now. I have my own opinion as to the proper construction of that clause, but it has undoubtedly so been applied in our past legislation. A discussion upon the point that my hon. friend from West Durham has just raised occurred in the Private Bills Committee, and the question as to its involving property and civil rights was also discussed there at considerable length in reference to this Bill. It was found, however, that this House had in former Sessions passed more than one Bill of just this character, giving to a foreign company and corporation corporate powers in Canada, without insisting upon their being organized upon the laws of Canada, or their stockholders being residents here, and without any of those securities that the Legislature used to throw around incorporations of a public body; that we, at any rate, as a Committee only followed the established course of legislation in allowing the Bill to pass. I mentioned that to show that the matter was discussed and considered by the Private Bills Committee, and that we have only followed the precedent of allowing the Bill to pass in the shape in which it ultimately passed the Committee. The question, however, is a large one, and one which is well deserving the attention of the House, and I am glad the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has referred to it. Personally, I may say, that I am not at this moment prepared to accede to the position that we should give to companies incorporated abroad, for any purpose whatever, a corporate existence here, without knowing their strength and power of carrying on a business which, in regard to companies whose corporate powers originate in Canada, are so carefully looked after in the general Act. The principle, however, is one which, as I have already remarked, deserves the careful attention of the House. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. White), who had charge of the Bill before the Committee, argued that to throw restrictions in the way of giving corporate powers to foreign companies would be unnecessarily to keep out of the country a large amount of foreign capital which it would be desirable to have embarked in Canada. Under the Joint Stock Companies Act, it is necessary, I believe, that a certain number of the directors if not of the subscribers are required to be British subjects, and he argued that to compel them to go through the form and incur the delay, trouble and expense necessary to incorporation under the Act, would be to deter the influx of very desirable capital. He said that in this particular case the Company desired to put up smelting works, and also to carry on the business of mining and shipping iron ore largely to the United States, which would involve transportation in vessels, and in interchange of trade between the countries, and that, therefore, their incorporation would not be within the powers of any of the Provinces. He also pointed out that to refuse them corporate powers would be to retard the development of our iron industry, and exclude a large amount of foreign capital which it was very desirable to get into the country. I believe he stated that the capital of the Company was $1,225,000, and he instanced the fact that a company was incorporated the Session before last called the Consolidated Gold Mining Company to carry on gold mining in his own county, and that they had received their powers by an Act exactly like this. That Company has since brought into Canada a large amount of American capital, and is now carrying on an extensive business by virtue of the incorporation which it procured the Session before last. The same powers were granted last Session, I believe, to an English Company—the Winslow-Jones Canning Company—which carried on its operations in the Lower Province. If, however, the House should now take a retrograde step and declare that it is not in the interests of Canada to give this kind of incorporation well and good, but we shall be reversing the course of our legislation for some time back.

Mr. BLAKE. I may say that I have looked into the Bill, and I find that it has not been amended in Committee as supposed by the hon. gentleman.

Bill read the third time and passed.

EDISON ELECTRIC LIGHT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Edison Electric Light Company of Canada.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS. There was a strong feeling among many members of the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills that this Bill was one that more properly fell within local jurisdiction than perhaps any other Bill before the Committee this Session. The powers which it asks, the nature of the operations which it is proposed to carry on, prove that the Company should have sought an Act of incorporation from the Local Legislatures and not from this Parliament. There is nothing like trade or commerce connected with the operations of a company organized for this purpose. It is practically local in its character; it is for the purpose of carrying on a certain class of business within a certain locality, and, as this Company must be subject to municipal regulations, it should therefore receive its powers from Local Legislatures, but if this Bill were passed the Company might claim to be entirely free and exempt from municipal control. It is proposed to give the Company certain powers of expropriation and certain easements with respect to lands belonging to private parties. We cannot impart to a company any powers this Parliament does not possess, and we do not possess any such power as is proposed to be given by this Bill. The British North America Act defines that the control of property and civil rights is with the Local Legislatures of the different Provinces; in so far as this Parliament has any power at all it is expressly vested in it for special purposes, and it had no right to go outside those special purposes as it seems to me it will do if it undertakes to incorporate this Company. I say nothing about the merits of the enterprise; it may be greatly in the public interest that an organization of this kind should receive an Act of incorporation, but the point I desire to impress upon the Committee is, that this Parliament has no jurisdiction over the subject proposed to be dealt with by the Bill, and that the parties should have sought incorporation elsewhere and not from the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. COLBY. The object to be attained by the incorporation of this Company and other companies of a like character, is one with which the House and the country at large will undoubtedly have great sympathy, and one in which they will feel a very great interest. We all know the great expenditure of capital and the consecration of lives of many eminent men that have taken place for the purpose of solving this problem of an economical and improved light. We know the very satisfactory results which have been attained in France, England and the United States, that very rapid progress has been made, and that the problem may be now looked upon as practically solved. Those gentlemen who have devoted themselves so entirely to the solving of this problem, are prepared to introduce their system into Canada. Capitalists in this country are prepared to join them in the enterprise, and they simply ask from this Parliament the power which it has granted to telephone and similar companies which desired to do business through the Dominion broadly, and not in any special Province, city or locality. It stands precisely on the same footing in that respect as the telephone companies, which have been already incorporated by this Parliament. With respect to the power of expropriation there is no such power properly so called contained in the Bill. There was in the Bill, as I introduced it, certain powers of expropriation, and the question was carefully considered in Committee. Those powers were withdrawn. The only power left was a clause by which, under certain conditions, the wires may be placed under ground so as not to interfere with any houses or property, after full compensation had been given to the proprietors. The object of that was explained by the gentleman before the Committee who was an expert. He pointed out the dissimilarity between the conducting methods of electricity for electric purposes and for ordinary purposes, that there was an immense loss of power resulting from any increase in the length of the wire. It was explained in the Committee that Mr. Edison himself was only now able to cover by his system a radius of five-eighths of a mile from its centre, consequently distance is an object. In all ordinary cases, provision is made for the laying of mains in the streets, from which mains the houses adjacent will be lighted; but there may be a case where, in order to reach a water power, it may be of immense advantage to the Company, instead of traversing some street or square at a considerable distance, to take a direct line from the water power to a point which is to be the centre of illumination. There might also be a case in which the electric light, being used on the one side of a building in the centre of a block, it might become necessary to reach a corresponding building on another street, it would be of great advantage to have a direct line, instead of passing round a considerable distance. After thorough discussion in Committee, it was thought proper to give the Company such powers as were fairly incidental to their incorporation, or as would enable them to carry out their system successfully. The Committee, after mature consideration of this point, during two or three sittings, arrived at the conclusion to leave this one power. It is not the right of appropriating the land of another or owning acquired lands, but of simply passing their lines and affecting this important saving of distance. Ordinarily, it was explained to the Committee, the wires would be laid under ground, and would be laid, with the consent of the municipal authorities, along the streets, and the illumination would be imparted to buildings by circuits from these mains. I think the House will have no difficulty in coming to a conclusion similar to that arrived at by the Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend has confused the two topics, the reasonableness of the provisions contained in this Bill, and the question whether it is fit we should incorporate this Company at all. We are dealing, at this moment, not with the question of the reasonableness of the Light Company having certain powers of expropriation, but with the question whether it is fit this Company should be incorporated here. My hon. friend has referred as an instance to the case of the telephone companies. Well, there was a great deal of doubt as to the telephone companies, but they stand on a wholly different basis from this. At the time we incorporated telephone companies, the telephone system was also in its infancy; and we know it is susceptible, even in its present condition, of development in the way of very long circuits. This capability of development is quite inapplicable to the Electric Light Company. My hon. friend admits this since he says it is of great importance to the Company to save a few yards distance. Five-eighths of a mile is their extreme length of circuit. The Company is essentially local in character. They could not even light the whole of Ottawa from the same centre. It is, therefore, proposed to incorporate a company here which is to do a separate business in each town of the Dominion in which it chooses to do business.

Mr. COLBY. Absolutely the same as the telephone company.

Mr. BLAKE. No, because there was great possibility of the extension of the telephone. A telephone system might possibly be established, for instance, between Montreal and Kingston, and so forth.

Mr. COLBY. The possibility of extension exists here. The fact did not exist when the telephone company was incorporated.

Mr. BLAKE. If the hon. gentleman's statement of the case be correct, I think the possibility of extension would be a very slight pretext on which to assert our jurisdiction. The light can only be sent five-eighths of a mile now, and it cannot be presumed it may be sent so many miles as to make it a Dominion affair. I think we had better wait awhile to find whether such things exist, and when they do exist we can deal with them. My hon. friend puts the matter upon those public grounds which I think are entirely beside the question. He speaks of the consecration of their lives, by some eminent individuals, to such improvements as the production of this light. No doubt those men will be great benefactors to their kind; but, so far as I can observe, they are always particularly watchful to take care, and very properly so, that among the persons benefitted shall be the inventors themselves. I do not think it is free light that we are about to get. I believe that all those enterprises are covered up by patents, and that we shall be called upon to pay just as much as is thought, on the whole, to be the most remunerative price to the inventor. But that is not the question here just now, the question is not the incorporation of an Electric Light Company, but whether it should be incorporated; whether a light company for Ontario and Quebec, should be incorporated under the authority of the Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec, or under the authority of the Canadian Parliament, especially in view of the fact that it is admitted to be absolutely essential that the Company should expropriate real estate and interfere with the municipal regulations, and deal with those matters rather jealously kept hitherto within the control of the local bodies, and within the control of the local municipalities. We are treading upon a dangerous path when we propose giving a company like the present those large powers in this Parliament, and interfering in the manner proposed with what is properly a subject of local legislation.

Mr. COLBY. I think the analogy between the Telephone Company, which was incorporated and which now practically exists in Canada, and this Electric Light Company, is complete. Those who asked for the incorporation of the telephone company did not ask it on the ground that it would be a rival of the telegraph. The claim was put on the ground that it would be a local institution, as one convenient for use in the cities; and, at present, I am not aware of any points at considerable distances apart in Canada connected by telephonic communication.

Mr. BLAKE. There is an efficient telephone between Toronto and Hamilton.

Mr. COLBY. I was not aware of the fact. But I will suggest what I think will be obvious to every person who has any knowledge of the methods of electric lighting. The machinery connected with electric lighting is difficult and expensive to construct. It has to be manufactured under the superintendence of experts; and I believe I am correct in stating that, although there are several companies incorporated in the United States, that they have one central manufactory for their machinery, available to all the States. I believe that the machinery for a Canadian Company could not well be manufactured in the different Provinces, and that if we would ask for the effective construction of this machinery in the different Provinces, it would be necessary for the Company to manufacture its own apparatus and machinery in order to carry on its operations within each Province; the Company, I say, would be obliged to have a separate manufactory in each Province, whereas I think its work can be done much more effectively and economically by one central institution. The hon. member for West Durham seems to think, from the tone of his observations, that it is our duty to watch and embarrass this Company.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Mr. COLBY. This Bill is proposed in the interest of cheap lighting—in the public interest, and I think we should give every facility to those different rival companies to compete among themselves, as well as with gas companies, in order that the result of that general and firm competition may give cheap light to the people. I think this is an object which should be encouraged, instead of striving to embarrass and trouble such companies, and of promoting the formation of small companies in the different Provinces, which should operate in small local areas. We should give those companies the privileges they ask—of extending their operations through the whole Dominion, and doing so in the most economical manner. We should give them a helping hand, so far as we can profitably do it. I think they are only asking at our hands powers that we have already granted the telephone company, and which are perfectly proper for us to grant.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). When I stated that the preamble had been amended in the other Bill before the House, by inserting the statement that it would work to the general advantage of Canada, I was mistaken; I find it was in this Bill the amendment was made. The two were before the Committee on the same day, which may have led to my mistake. That Bill was fully discussed in the Committee on Private Bills, and the amendment to the effect I have indicated was introduced deliberately. It was considered at the time of its discussion in the Committee, that the introduction of the electric light system was a work to the general advantage of Canada; that, inasmuch as the Company have to carry on their operations in every Province, the best system would be the construction of one central establishment from which operations could be carried on between two or more of the Provinces. Supposing, as has been suggested, that the water power of the Chaudière was used to manufacture the electric light in Quebec and Ontario—a result which, I believe, is within the circle of probability; when it is considered that the Act of incorporation gives the Company power to manufacture the requisite machinery and carry on the business of selling all over the Province; when it is also considered that it dealt with the patents that were to be vested in the Company—that patent extending over the whole Dominion—the Company thought in their wisdom that this was a case in which that declaration was properly put in the preamble—that the incorporation of this Company was for the general advantage of Canada. If these words were properly inserted in the preamble this discussion is now out of place. If they were properly inserted they would give this Parliament jurisdiction to deal with this question. I entirely endorse the argument of the hon. member for Stanstead, that this Bill is within our functions, and I am aware that if the House does not accede to the proposition now before it—that when a company comes to this Parliament possessing functions so large, and asks for permission to carry on operations in every Province of the Dominion, we are to try them and say you cannot obtain your request; you must go to the eight or nine Provinces of the Dominion and get an Act passed by the Legislature enabling you to carry on your business. When a company asks such large powers—when its objects are good—to carry its work of connecting two or more Provinces—when it deals with patents and proposes to sell the articles it manufactures in every part of the Dominion, for the advantage of the whole people, I confess it is a company whose incorporation comes within the proper functions of the general Parliament. For these reasons, I think that the declaration is properly inserted, and that the decision of the Private Bills Committee, arrived at deliberately after full discussion, should be adopted.

Mr. MILLS. I am not surprised at the argument of the hon. member for Victoria, that we here can give the authority asked for by simply declaring that the subject may be dealt with by us, and is for the general advantage of the people of Canada. If the hon. gentleman is right, we can exercise jurisdiction in regard to any matter, however local its character may be. If it will simply require for any Act of Parliament that it be pleaded it is for the general advantage of Canada, no Court would be at liberty to go behind that declaration and enquire into the merits of the case.

Mr. CAMERON. Nor could any Court do so.

Mr. MILLS. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman. It was not intended that we should abuse the powers we possess by a declaration of that sort. We have to look at the facts and the nature of the case on all occasions. If the subject-matter is local in its character, we cannot divest it of that character and give it a Dominion character simply by a declaration such as the hon. gentleman proposes to impart into the preamble of this Bill. We must exercise the powers we possess of exclusive jurisdiction, and legislate in such a way as not to interfere with the powers given to the Local Legislatures. Local Legislatures have certain powers conferred upon them. They have powers to create municipalities, to confer upon a municipal corporation certain legislative and executive functions—to discharge certain municipal powers; and the hon. gentleman proposes here to exercise a power which might seriously interfere, which might, in fact, take away the power that a Local Legislature is authorized to confer upon a municipality. The hon. gentleman might, by this Bill—because we have the power to legislate upon this Bill, have given this Company much more extensive powers than they possess, he could give them power to take property absolutely. We have the power to say that a company may take the property of private individuals, or to take the property of a municipal corporation; we might authorize them even to take the property of a Provincial Government lying within a particular town or city where they propose to erect their establishment. Now, here is one of the powers possessed by municipal corporations: for instance, the power to see to the lighting of the city. It is one of their necessary functions, in order that they may discharge their municipal duties, to preserve peace and order, and properly enforce the law. But the hon. gentleman proposes here to deal with the subject in such a way as, it may be, seriously to cripple the municipal council of a town or city from the proper and efficient discharge of their municipal functions. It is perfectly clear that if we can incorporate this Company we can incorporate a gas company. All that it is necessary for a gas company to do is to come here and say that they wish for power to provide the various towns and cities with gas, and that they propose to carry on their operations in every Province of the Dominion. It is true this corporation would be necessarily of a local character. Their business in one place would be wholly independent of their business in another place, and yet, by the rules laid down by the hon. member for Victoria, we could incorporate a gas company for the entire Dominion, we could confer upon them extraordinary powers, and we could, in this way, obtain absolute control over the municipalities, throughout the various Provinces of the Dominion. It is clear, to my mind, that the Constitution never contemplated the exercise of any such powers as I have just referred to. I decline to enter into a discussion of the merits of a corporation of this sort. They may be, as I stated before, highly meritorious, much more advantageous than gas companies, but that is a question with which we have nothing to do. We have to do with the question of jurisdiction, and if the jurisdiction is vested elsewhere, then the merits or demerits of this Company may be properly considered in the Legislatures and not in this Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend who has just spoken has always taken this ground since 1867, but the hon. leader of the Opposition has never taken the position he now does, and I do not know that he has before expressed his opinion. I think it would be exceedingly unfortunate for the country if we altered the principle that has obtained in this House ever since 1867, and the constructive powers of Parliament that have been given by Acts again and again. Of course I have not them now all in my recollection; but if you go over the list of Statutes of Private Acts passed since 1867, you will find that my hon. friend, as a general rule, opposed them all in this House, but Parliament has always overruled his opinion, strongly and ably though it has been expressed. Acts have again and again been passed in the same position, and with the same rights, powers and privileges, as are claimed under this Act. I say it would be exceedingly unfortunate for any great undertaking or any great invention that any party desired to introduce, if the inventors of this new undertaking were obliged to go to every Legislature, to the seven or eight or twenty—as we may have by-and-bye—Legislatures to get power to have several separate corporations with separate powers, with separate privileges, or distinct various privileges under varying conditions and restrictions. It would be equivalent to the banishment from this country, practically, of any great improvement of the nature of this Bill. I do not think there is the slightest ground for the point my hon. friend has contended for. He is, however, not speaking to the question of whether this Parliament has power to incorporate this “Edison Electric Light Company,” but he is reducing his argument and objection to some of the clauses. He objects to the appropriation clause. Well, it may be that when we come to these clauses—if there are such clauses in the Bill, I have not read it—that my hon. friend can raise objections to them; but the question now is, has this Parliament the jurisdiction to grant an Act of incorporation to a company seeking to introduce the “Edison Electric Light” into every town and city of the Dominion? That is the simple question. Now, in the first place, the power of incorporating these companies cannot come within the general phrase of property and civil rights, and the hon. gentleman, if he will look at the 92nd clause of the British North America Act, will see clearly that it does not. Because, although the same clause that gives Provincial Legislatures the exclusive right to legislate as to property and civil rights, gives them especially the power to grant Acts for the incorporation of companies with provincial objects, and if that clause was not there it shows that the Imperial Legislature, by inserting that clause, say that they could not incorporate companies even for provincial objects under the general powers of legislating as to property and civil rights. They have only the power to incorporate companies with provincial objects. That being inserted there expressly, it shows that if it had not been so expressed they could not incorporate a company even for provincial objects. Then the British North America Act provides that we can pass all laws for the good government of the country, except when they are exclusively reserved for the separate action of the Provincial Legislatures, and that it must be shown, as an objection to any Act introduced here, that it comes within some of the special exceptions which deprive the general Parliament of this general power of legislation on all subjects for the good government of the country, that is, for the material advancement or improvement of the country, unless it interferes distinctly with that general power, when it is cut off, severed from this Parliament, and handed over, exclusively and beyond doubt, to the different Provinces. Now, if you look to the 92nd clause of the British North America Act, giving exclusive powers to the Provincial Legislatures, it provides that they shall have exclusive power of legislation as to “local works and undertakings.” Now, I call the attention of the Committee to these two points—“local works and undertakings.” Works and undertakings are not the same thing. The work is the thing to be done; the undertaking is the incorporation of the Company and the organization of the means to carry out the work, and the hon. gentleman will see that those two phrases, "local works" and "local undertakings" have separate meanings, because, looking at the 10th sub-section of the 92nd clause of the Act, we find that whereas the general language is local works and undertakings, in sub-section C the word "undertaking" is not used, but the word "works" only, and the sub-section only applies to works, the general purview, however, of sub-section 10 applying to both. I will read the first paragraph of sub-section 10 of this clause :

"Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces,—"

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman will please wait until I conclude the sentence, so that its continuity may not be interrupted :

"Or extending beyond the limits of the Province."

Now, the undertaking of the Edison Company is not for one Province, or for two, but for all. The undertaking which we are authorizing them to commence, and organize, and carry out, is to establish works generally for every Province in the Union.

"Lines of steamships between the Province and any British or foreign country."

My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) argued that, if you stretch this clause, you can do anything you like, you can pass any law, but we must read the language just as it is expressed :

"Such works as, although wholly situate within the Province, are, before or after their execution, declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada, or for the advantage of two or more of the Provinces."

This applies to the works, and it is this clause which supports the argument of my hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Cameron). We will suppose that Mr. Edison, as an individual, established electric lights in every town or city in every Province of the Dominion; that, after he had done so, he chose to make an incorporated company, and come to this Legislature, that company could get an Act for the construction of these works, declaring them to be for the general advantage of Canada. If we declared as a legislative body, if the Legislature of the Dominion declares that any work, no matter how local, or small, or insignificant, be for "the general advantage of Canada," it must be held that the Parliament of Canada will act with conscience, and will not declare any work to be for "the general advantage of Canada or two or more of the Provinces" if they do not think so. That declaration once made—any work, however local its character, so being declared legislatively by the Parliament of Canada to be "for the general advantage of Canada," it becomes a general Dominion work, just as the shortest railway connecting Ottawa with Prescott if declared to be for the general benefit of Canada at once becomes a Dominion work. The general legislation rests here; of necessity it rests here, whether for the purpose of forming before incorporation and commencing work if the work is created; the work so built, so organized, is for the general advantage of Canada. The language cannot be clearer, and the object of this clause, the object of the Imperial Parliament in passing the Act was to prevent absurdity and expense and obstruction to material progress by compelling every person introducing a great undertaking—offering to carry out a great undertaking in each other Province for the general advantage—to go to the several Provincial Legislatures. They might get power in one, they might be refused it in another; they might get restricted powers in one and large powers in another; they might be compelled to submit to conditions varying and inconsistent in their nature. All these obstructions were present to the legislative mind at the time this clause was adopted, and it would really introduce some of the worst and most inconvenient features of the Federal system if we were driven to this necessity. It was for the very purpose of avoiding such obstructions that this law was so framed. I say again that we have acted upon that principle. My hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has always objected to it from the beginning, but the Legislature has overlooked his objections, and it would be rather an interesting thing to go over and collate the various private Acts which have been passed in this Parliament since 1867, and see how universally on almost every possible subject of material progress, the principle contended for by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has been set aside, and Parliament has, for the general good of the country, adopted the principle which is asked for in the incorporation of this Company.

Mr. BLAKE. There are some things which the hon. gentleman has said to which I assent, and a good many others from which I dissent very strongly. I am quite aware that the hon. gentleman regards the Federal system as a very inconvenient system.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I do not.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, the hon. gentleman does, and he pointed out, in the remarks which he has just made, that by assenting to the principle contended for by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), we would be introducing one of the most inconvenient features of the Federal system, and we know that the hon. gentleman regards the system as an inconvenient one—one whose inconveniences are sometimes perfectly appalling. Fortunately, however, as some of us think, and unfortunately as some others believe, we have a Federal system, and we have to take the inconveniences as well as the conveniences. We have to take the good along with the bad. There is undoubtedly a great advantage in centralized power; the despot can do many things which cannot be done by the exercise of free government in a free country, but while there may be some slight inconveniences in the division of power to which the hon. gentleman refers, we believe that it is better to put up with these inconveniences for the sake of the greater gain which subsists between these divisions of power. I do not think the phrase which the hon. gentleman has quoted has so wide a meaning as he ascribes to it. It is a phrase that has almost a technical signification in connection with railway companies, and if you look at the context of this phrase, you will find that it is dealing with arrangements for transportation or communication of some kind or other :

That is the class of work spoken of; the incorporation of companies with provincial objects, as the hon. gentleman himself observed, is dealt with in another clause, the 11th clause. Now, I am inclined to agree with the hon. gentleman that it would be found difficult for any court, when the work or object was of a character which fairly comes within the description of local works and undertakings, to enter into the question whether the Parliament of Canada was right or wrong in declaring that the particular Act was for the general advantage of Canada; but I dissent from the view that the word "undertaking" applies to any company. A work to sell ginger pop in the street, for instance, would not come within clause 10; it must be a work or undertaking of the class specified in the exceptions given in this clause, such works as are wholly situated within a Province, but which are declared to be for the general advantage of Canada and not mere trading companies. If the words "for the general advantage of Canada" can be applied to a trading company under any circumstances, we are bound—and all the more absolutely bound because of the argument of the hon. gentleman, and because our action is not susceptible of review—to consider whether we can honestly, and with propriety, apply these words to any particular case. The hon. gentleman has said that it would be of great advantage to Canada to have the Edison light introduced. I doubt it not; but suppose the Edison light had not been invented, would it not be of great advantage to Canada to have gas introduced into every city or town, or to have waterworks? Could we not honestly declare these to be of great advantage to Canada in the sense that the hon. gentleman proposes? Certainly we could, and that proves that that is not the sense in which these words are used in this clause. We have to consider whether the character of the operations of the Company is local. The question is: whether the particular Company before us is a company which, within the true meaning of this clause, can be declared for the general advantage of Canada. It is not enough to say that it would be very useful for a great many towns or for every town in the Dominion to have the Edison light introduced, if the Edison light is to be introduced by separate arrangements in each town, else whatever was to be for the advantage of the towns or cities of Canada would be for the general advantage of Canada, and so you would practically absorb almost all the local powers with reference to incorporation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not wish to follow up the discussion, for I think the Committee will understand it; but the Statutes of Canada for 1877 have just been placed in my hands. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was then Minister of Justice.

Mr. BLAKE. No; I think not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I find that chapter 83 in this book is an Act to incorporate the Dominion Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry of Canada. If there is anything more local than another, it is the land in the Provinces; and yet here is an Act to incorporate an association having for its object "the improvement of agriculture and horticulture, the sale and disposal of their productions, and the procuring of their supplies to the best advantage, the systematizing of their work, the discountenancing of a system of credit, the encouragement of frugality, and the intellectual, social and financial improvement and welfare of its members in the various Provinces of the Dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE. But what are their powers?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will send the hon. gentleman the book, and he will see that they are local in all respects, and that they apply to every Province. I take it, if there is a local work, it is the printing of the Ottawa Free Press or the Ottawa Citizen.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes; or the Belleville Intelligencer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Or the Toronto Mail or the Toronto Globe; yet I find in the same book an Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Globe Printing Company, the preamble of which states: "Whereas, the Globe Printing Company has, by its petition, represented that it is desirous of establishing offices in various places outside of the Province of Ontario." It had a Local Act of incorporation.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. But that is clearly a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As an hon. friend says, there is a great absence of electric light about it. The Act goes on to say: "The said Globe Printing Company may establish branch offices in the capitals of the several Provinces of Canada, and in any other cities, towns or places in the Dominion or elsewhere." There is one fault in this, perhaps in consequence of the modesty of the promoter. It does not say that the distribution of this paper is for the general advantage of the Dominion, and that may be a ground for some of the friends of the Globe saying that this is unconstitutional. I do not know whether the hon. member for Bothwell opposed this Act in 1877 on that ground. Another Act of the same year is to amend the Act respecting the Canadian Engine and Machinery Company, which was a Local company before, and wished to extend its business of making machines to other Provinces. Except for the crotchets of the hon. member for Bothwell, we never raise the point; we always held the common sense view that any undertaking that was to be carried on in more than one Province should be authorized by a general Act of incorporation; and now this point is brought up at the very last moment.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). If I understand the hon. member for West Durham, he contends that works of this kind do not come within the 10th sub-section; that it is not a work or undertaking, and that those works must be limited as applying only to works of the class specified in such sub-section, namely, "lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs and other works and undertakings." The hon. gentleman argued that this Company could not be termed an undertaking. In sub-section C of section 10 the works and undertakings are declared to be:

"Such works as, although wholly situated within the Province, are before or after their execution, declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada, or for the advantage of two or more of the Provinces."

The question is, then, simply whether this is a work or not. If, however, the hon. gentleman is right in arguing that sub-section 10 does not cover works of this kind, what clause is there giving jurisdiction over matters of this kind to Local Legislatures? It can only be either the 11th clause for the incorporation of companies with provincial objects, or the 10th clause. What we contend is, that the incorporation of a company to do business all over the Dominion and carry on business of this particular kind is not the incorporation of a company with a municipal, local or provincial object. If it is not one or the other then the Local Legislatures can have no jurisdiction. If that were so, then the reserve power vested in this Parliament was the one to be exercised for the incorporation of this Company.

Mr. MILLS. I objected to the incorporation at the time, but the majority of the Committee having previously sanctioned the incorporation of companies with like power, a charter should not be refused in similar cases. In this case the Company cannot be incorporated and exercise its functions without seriously interfering with the powers which are conferred upon Local Legislatures, or by them conferred on municipalities.

Preamble agreed to.

On an amendment moved by Mr. COLBY,

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). It was objected that the exercise of this power by putting up electric light wires might be accompanied with inconvenience to individuals and the public, and also to telegraph and telephone companies. The attention of the Government was directed to it, and I believe the Minister of Public Works consulted the scientific officer connected with telegraphs and such matters in his Department, and the telegraph and telephone companies also took an interest in the subject. Finally the amendment as now proposed met with the approval of Government, and also of the telegraph and telephone companies. The amendment provides that electric light wires when carried above ground shall be wholly insulated so as to be free from any possibility of danger or inconvenience to any one, and in all cases the wires were to be worked on a metal circuit. That was insisted on by the telephone companies more particularly. They are in the habit of establishing earth-currents, and they contended that as the force of the electric circuit is much greater from the electric light wires than from the telegraph or telephone wires, if the electric light wires were placed so as to connect with gas or water pipes, the earth-current would be destroyed by the electric light wires. Those companies also objected to electric light wires being placed on the same side of the street, on the ground that they would have a similar effect.

Mr. BLAKE. We have noticed accounts in the public journals, of serious accidents that have occurred in connection with these wires. I was, therefore, glad to learn that danger was to be specially guarded against, but when I hear that, notwithstanding the insulation of the wires, telegraph companies objected to electric light wires being placed on the same side of the street, I doubt whether the insulation will be an effective remedy.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The officers of the Edison Company affirm that no danger could arise from the electric light wires. As a matter of precaution, and owing to the doubt which the telephone company more particularly put forth, this clause was modified. I am told also that in the case of the Edison light such an extension as that to which my hon. friend refers could not possibly occur. I am told that in some modes of using the electric light, danger does undoubtedly exist. In the case to which my hon. friend refers, no doubt it was the Brush light that was used, and in the case where, on the Marquis of Salisbury's property, a man was killed by unwisely taking hold of the wire, as the battery was turned, the wire ran along the garden wall close to the ground. The Edison Company say that under their system nothing of the kind could possibly occur, as the power is produced in a different way.

Mr. BLAKE. It is quite evident we are dealing with a thing of which we know very little, but if there is no danger from the wire carried overhead, with the precautions that are taken, it is still of very practical consequence that there should not be an extra set of poles on the other side of the street in order to carry those wires. We know that in the principal streets of our towns there are poles on one side of our streets, and, if this amendment be introduced, our streets will be further disfigured with poles on the opposite side.

Mr. COLBY. That can only be done with the concurrence of the municipal authorities.

Mr. BLAKE. The municipalities will be forced to the option of either allowing the Company to erect a second set of poles or —

Mr. COLBY. They may exclude the Company altogether.

Mr. BLAKE. Does not the hon. gentleman see I am speaking in the interest of the Company and the towns themselves? The price the latter will have to pay for the electric light will be the permission to erect a second set of poles on their streets. I think it is unfortunate we should put in a prohibitory clause of that kind. If the electric wire can be affixed to the telephone poles, without in the slightest degree interfering with them, why insert this clause? Why should our streets be disfigured by a second set of poles? I consider the enormous number of telegraph poles in our towns their greatest disfigurement. If my observations on this point meet with no better answer than they have met with, I shall take another opportunity of moving against that proposed amendment. I do not exactly understand what is the meaning of the clause: "Provided the Company shall not interfere with the public right of travelling on or using such streets, highways, bridges, public places, or navigable waters; and as to such streets—" I do not understand to what those words: "and as to such streets," apply; whether it was the intention of the draughtsman to provide there should be no interference with the streets at all, except with the consent of the municipality. If so, I think words could be devised which would make the meaning clear, for it is not clear now.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Halton). That remark of the hon. gentleman raises an objection which I did not think it proper to interpose when we were on the preamble of the Bill, though I do not agree with the views expressed on this side of the floor with respect to the constitutional right of the House to deal with this question in the way in which this Bill proposes to deal with it. But I agree so far, that it is in the power of this Parliament to incorporate this Company. We may give it the bare power of incorporation in the whole Dominion, on the decision of the Privy Council, in the insurance cases, that this Parliament may incorporate companies for a great many purposes, but these companies will only have the mere Act of incorporation, because the Provinces may make laws that will interfere with their various forms of business, since these may involve questions of civil rights and property in the Provinces. While we may incorporate this Company, it does seem to me necessary that we should oppose any attempt to deprive the municipal authorities, or the Local Legislature of any Province, of the power of making regulations for the protection of the lives and properties of their citizens. This is done by giving this Company power to force their way into cities and towns, despite the municipal authorities, and establish a dangerous enterprise in their midst, for though we may know little of the electric light we know that it plays occasionally singular pranks. I believe this is not a matter that was contemplated to come under the powers of this House, but is a matter of important local interest. I followed the argument of the hon. gentleman who leads this House, and whose opinion on matters of this kind I always hear with very great respect; but I do not see that, under the distribution of power in the Constitution, the Local Legislatures can be deprived of the power given them expressly in the 92nd section, because that is an exclusive power. Whatever power or right they have is exclusive, and we have no right to interfere with it. To pass this measure would be to strain very much the right given to this Parliament to deal with works that are for the general advantage of Canada. The lighting by gas and the furnishing of water to cities and towns, all these things by a similar declaration, can be seized—the jurisdiction ousted—if the direction of these matters can be seized by this Parliament under that declaration. I do not think that that was the intention of the Constitutional Act. I do not think it is within its spirit, meaning, or policy. I believe that a very uneasy feeling would be created in the minds of the Local Legislatures, and in the minds of the people of the several Provinces, in respect to the exercise of their provincial rights, if we undertook to deal with questions of this kind on such a ground. I make these observations with reference to the 5th clause, which appears to be open to the objection urged. It is the power of expropriation—of taking property by force, leaving it to arbitrators to decide as to the amount that should be paid for it. That power is given to the Company by this clause. The power of going into public streets is also given to the Company by this clause, and, as the learned and hon. gentleman opposite pointed out, the words of the restriction are insensible, and have not a grammatical connection. It seems to me to be an evasion—that some clever draughtsman has framed this clause for the purpose of appearing to give to the municipalities some power or right to control this matter. But I think he has succeeded in depriving them of this power. The language must be amended so as to show clearly what the restriction means.

House resumed.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Edison Electric Light Company of Canada.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sorry my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. McDougall), who was speaking at six o'clock is not yet present. I will, however, call the attention of the hon. member for West Durham to the fact of some previous legislation of this Parliament, in reply to the contention that we cannot incorporate any gas or water companies. I find this Parliament has habitually incorporated such companies, and on the ground that the common sense meaning of our Constitutional Act was this: that when any company desired powers to enter upon any undertaking in more than one Province, or in all the Provinces, it must come to the Central Government; if the undertaking was to be confined within only one Province, the company has to go to the Local Government. In 1876, there was an Act passed to incorporate the Canadian Gas Lighting Company, the 39th Victoria, providing as follows:—

"1. The said petitioners and all such other persons as shall be shareholders in the Corporation hereby created, shall be, and they are hereby made a body corporate and politic, by the name of the 'Canadian Gas Lighting Company,' and shall have the power to work the said inventions and processes, and also the patent known as Rigby's Excelsior Patent for the manufacture and sale of illuminating gas, and the apparatus to produce the same in any part of the Dominion of Canada, and may hold, use or dispose of the same for the benefit of the business of the said Company. Moreover, the said Company may acquire and hold by purchase or otherwise immoveable property, for the efficient and convenient carrying on and development of the business of the said Company, and may sell or otherwise dispose of the same, and in place thereof acquire other immoveable property for the same purpose."

That Company came to this Legislature in 1876, asking power to form a gas company in this city, Ottawa, and in this Province of Ontario. That is exactly the case with which, according to my hon. friend from West Durham, this Parliament could not deal. And the very next Bill passed is an Act to amend the Act incorporating the Ottawa Gas Company, and which was brought to this Parliament, not for the purpose of setting up a gas company, to do business in all the Provinces, but in only two of them, Ottawa and places across the river, including Hull, which are in Quebec. With this object the Company came to this Parliament and got an Act, giving them full powers to expropriate property, and do all other acts performed by such companies, although they were operating in only two Provinces.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Is it declared in that Act that the work is for the benefit of Canada?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; no such intention is declared in either Bill. But in the first Bill it was declared by the promoters that they desired to have power to manufacture and sell illuminating gas, and introduce any apparatus required in their business in any Province of the Dominion; and the next Bill provides for the conveyance of the gas made in Ottawa to the city of Hull, and the villages of New Edinburgh and Rochesterville. In both cases this was legislation which comes under the special disapprobation of the hon. member for Bothwell. I do not know whether my hon. friend was Minister of Justice then, but I think he had neglected a part of his duty as a member of Parliament in not pulling up the Legislature.

Mr. BLAKE. I was Minister of Justice then and the following year, to which the hon. gentleman alluded before dinner, but I never thought it was the duty of the Minister of Justice to be personally responsible for all the Private Bill legislation. While I occupied that office, my attention was too much engrossed with the public legislation to be able to attend very closely to the private legislation. I think the right hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying there has been such a large number of Acts of this character passed since 1867, though, I admit, that there have been several. As to the Bill of the Ottawa Gas Company, I have some recollection of it, but I have no recollection of the other. There was some discussion on that subject, and I think that the view in which that Act was passed was, as the hon. gentleman said, that the corporation supplying the gas was to extend its work across the river into the other Province. I argued that gas works, in the ordinary sense of the term, were local works, and that they were not properly called to the general advantage of Canada, because they were to the advantage of every town. I still think so, though I am not aware that that Company did any business. Of the time from 1876 to 1882, except in the case of a railway Act or two, I do not recollect a declaration having been inserted that the Act was for the general advantage of Canada. We have always assumed till now that they were so, because when Parliament chose to exercise this power in respect to the incorporation of companies, not for the construction of works, as I called them, such as railways, canals and telegraphs, but trading companies of this kind, they did it under what is called the reserved power, they did it in the view that it was for the incorporation of a company with more than provincial objects, and therefore, a company which we had the power to incorporate. I still think this Parliament has power to incorporate companies for purposes beyond provincial objects, and the question in this case is, whether it is fairly to be said that the objects of this Company are provincial and local objects, to be accomplished, therefore, by the Provincial Legislatures, or for the general advantage of Canada. However, I supposed we had passed that stage of the discussion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend brought it up in his remarks.

Mr. BLAKE. I think we are now engaged on the meaning of the clause. Both the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall,) and myself felt a little concerned to know what the able draughtsman meant by these words: "And as to such streets."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think my hon. friend will admit that the Edison Electric Light is as much a general light as the Ottawa Gas Company light, and may be as much for the general advantage.

Mr. CAMERON. I confess on reading that clause I do not see the grammatical or other difficulty in the way of understanding what is meant. I think it defines the power of the Company as to using the public streets for such purposes only as may be approved by the municipality. And "as to such streets," it means any of those streets mentioned in the previous part of the clause, that the Company shall only use them by the previous consent of the municipality.

Mr. COLBY. I think if my hon. friend would read that clause as a parenthetical clause, it would meet the difficulty.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The grammatical construction is plain enough. There is a proviso: "provided the Company shall not interfere with the public right of travelling on or using such streets, highways, bridges, public places or navigable waters," that is plain enough; "and as to such streets only," that is, shall interfere "only and upon, and subject to such agreements in respect thereof as shall be made between the Company and such municipalities respectively;" so that the Company cannot interfere at all with the use of the streets by the public, and can only interfere under agreement made between the Company and the municipality.

Mr. BLAKE. The proviso is doubled up; "provided the Company shall not interfere with," &c., is repeated.

Mr. CAMERON. I have no objection to my hon. friend suggesting any amendment that there shall be no use of the streets, except by the consent of the municipality.

Mr. BLAKE. I would propose to insert: "and shall only interfere" instead of "and as to such streets, highways and public places, with the consent of the municipality, and upon and subject to such agreement." I observe, in to-day's Montreal Herald, a statement on the subject of companies of this description which is interesting with reference to this clause. It says:

"There are thirty bills now before the British Parliament for the conferring of franchises on electric light companies. It is held that this is a very suitable occasion for overhauling the whole question, and a move is made for a Special Commission charged with that business. The bills, almost without exception, provide for over-head lines, and the attachment of lines to buildings. To both of these experts most strongly object on the score of safety to property and life."

I make that observation, because I notice that both here and in the proposed amendment at the close of the clause there is an obvious intention to carry the electricity not merely under ground but over head at the option of the company.

Mr. COLBY. Only on the streets.

Mr. BLAKE. Well I don't know that the streets are the least frequented part of a town, and if there is any danger in carrying the wires over head it will be on the streets.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It would bother the birds only, though.

Mr. BLAKE. We had a discussion on this subject when the Telephone Bill was before Parliament, and considerable objection was made to carrying these wires above ground. It was alleged, at that time that it was impossible to carry the wires below ground because it was really impracticable, so to insulate them, that the work could be carried on owing to the earth-currents. In that view the Committee rather reluctantly agreed to permit them to be carried above ground at that time, but they inserted an express provision which should come in force, in case an invention should be made by which the wires could be carried under ground without interfering with the efficiency of the service. There seems to be added reasons why such a provision should be made in the present case, unless there are reasons with which we are at present unacquainted, for carrying the electricity over-head. If such reasons exist, we must face the difficulty, but if it is possible to carry the wires under ground, I think that, perhaps, on the ground of security, and certainly for other reasons, it would be desirable that they should be so carried. There is no doubt that the existence of telephone wires at a high level over head, on the poles and over the roofs of the houses, has been a subject of difficulty in cases of fire. There has been more than one instance of firemen stumbling on these wires, and falling down, and there are also difficulties in using the ladders when these wires are present. There is also the question of unsightliness, to which I have referred, and if there is no incumbent reason why the wires should be carried under ground, I think it would be better that they should be so carried.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). Of course there is this difficulty, that the carrying of the wires under ground is necessarily infinitely more expensive than above ground, and it is very possible that, to enforce carrying the wires under ground in every case, would result in making the introduction of the electric light system so expensive that it would defeat the object which I suppose we have in view, viz., to encourage a cheaper and better system of lighting than at present. I understand that, as a matter of practice, the Edison Company prefer carrying the wires under ground wherever it is possible to do so; that is, in cases where the distance is not so great or the circumstances such that the cost would be prohibitory if not ruinous if they were put under ground.

Mr. BLAKE.

They are, however, unwilling to be tied down by an absolute provision compelling them to carry the wires over-ground. There is this point, however, to be remembered, that they can only carry them over-head with the permission of the municipality, and I think we may safely trust municipal councils of the different cities and towns to compel the company to carry the wires under ground when it is not unreasonable to ask them to do so. I think, therefore, the Bill should remain as it is.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Would it not be well to have an amendment referring the telephone and telegraph wires to the civic authorities as well.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). That clause was put in at the instigation of the Bell Telephone Company. I thought it unnecessary, and pointed out that the municipalities would afford them sufficient protection in this respect, but they asked for the clause, and we had no objection to it.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it is very important that we should not, unnecessarily, multiply the number of poles we have at present, a number of poles on one side of every principal street, and we are absolutely making it necessary that there should be another set on the other side of the street. I do not see why we should make such a provision.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Suppose it turns out that there is no danger, why should we restrict the powers of the Company because there is a difference of opinion now? It seems to me that it is tying the hands of the Company unnecessarily, and that it is an unjustifiable interference with the powers of the civic authorities unless there is an absolute necessity for it.

Mr. COLBY. On the subject of danger I have in my hand the report, in a recent Boston newspaper, of a meeting, in which this whole matter of the electric light was brought before the municipal authorities of Boston. The electric light companies were proposing to illuminate the city at the same price as the gas companies were charging and to give three times the volume of light. In that discussion this question of danger came up, and Professor Burnstein stated that the only cases of accident were where the ground circuit was made use of, but if the metallic circuit was used there was no danger whatever. The metallic circuit is provided for in this Bill, and it is not intended to use the ground circuit.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to the provisions of this section. It says that the municipalities shall have jurisdiction, subject to the by-laws passed by the Council in pursuance thereof. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, intends to give municipalities power to legislate on this subject, and indicates the way in which they shall exercise it.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). We give powers every day, conditional upon the municipalities giving consent; we have perfect authority to do that.

Mr. MILLS. This section does more than that. It provides how the municipalities shall exercise their powers, in order that such exercise of their powers may be valid.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think we have sufficient power to compel parties appointed under Provincial Acts to perform duties given to them by the Dominion Statutes; I think we have power under an Act passed by the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member, in clause 35.

Mr. BLAKE. I appeal to the hon. the Minister of the Interior, to know whether, with his new view as to legislation, he proposes to allow this clause to stand, which provides that meters and fittings shall not be liable to be seized for rent.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). That clause is copied verbatim from the Gas Company Act.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite allow that all old Acts are gospel; that there is no necessity for remodelling them.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The hon. gentleman is responsible for so many of them that he should believe in them. I have no objection, however, to the clause being struck out, without this course being taken as a precedent.

Bill amended and ordered to be reported.

CREDIT FONCIER FRANCO-CANADIEN.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 99) to enlarge and extend the powers of the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think that this Bill ought to be read the second time. It seems to me to be a very extraordinary measure of legislation. The Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien was a Quebec corporation, incorporated by the Legislature of that Province, and given a certain exceptional and peculiar powers and privileges, a monopoly in a certain limited sense, and certain other powers. Those privileges and powers were given to it because it was going to lend money to the good people of that Province at 6 per cent. or less, indeed 5 per cent. was the general promise and expectation; and the operations of a company so beneficent it was natural to expect would be eagerly looked for there and elsewhere throughout Canada. And as a consequence a Bill to extend the powers of the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien to all the Provinces of this Dominion, and to give the good people all over Canada money at 5 per cent., or at least less than 6 per cent., was introduced into the House, and pleaded for eagerly and with great pleasure by those who held that it would be a success. The measure came to the Banking and Commerce Committee, along with another measure to create a Dominion Corporation, with the same beneficent object, and subject to the same restrictions. Some of us thought that some of the powers which that Corporation was obtaining were peculiar and exceptional, and that it was an objectionable procedure to extend the powers of a provincial corporation in the manner proposed by the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien. Some of us held the opinion—which, I believe, the hon. leader of the House has himself expressed this very Session—that if a provincial corporation desires to have powers over the Dominion, and comes here with that object, it should come for the purpose of being re-incorporated here, within our own jurisdiction, and in order to obtain all its powers from us. We objected to that mode of extending the powers of a provincial corporation. We objected to some of the exceptional and peculiar privileges asked for, but our objection was overborne. It was no use talking—no use saying a word against the Bill—because this Corporation was going to lend money by this Bill at less than 6 per cent.; and my hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. White) and many other hon. members, desiring there should be legislation to reduce the rate of interest sustained the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), who protested that it was his patriotic desire and determination that the Company should not take more than 6 per cent. for their money. In fact, they were so generous that they would scorn to take more—they would insist more certainly on receiving less than 6 per cent.—but at any rate not more, including commission charges, fees, taxes and other claims from the borrower—would be received by this patriotic, self-sacrificing, and self-denying corporation; and so, with a sweep and a rush both Bills were carried through Committee and the House. Having obtained from the Local Legislature exceptional privileges, a monopoly as regards France, and from this Dominion Legislature, exceptional privileges—having obtained those advantages in the Local Legislature two years ago, and the rights and privileges I have spoken of in this Central Legislature one year ago, upon the assurance and understanding that it was going to lend money at not more than 6 per cent., this Corporation comes here now, just one little year after, and says: "We have got the privileges we wanted. Will you now be good enough to remove the restrictions?" I do not think we ought to remove the restrictions without removing the privileges too.

Mr. GIROUARD. Perfectly right.

Mr. BLAKE. It does seem to be an extraordinary thing that a corporation should come here and ask to be incorporated on specific grounds. They put in a claim to the favorable consideration of the Legislature that they were going to do what no other company would do, lend money at 6 per cent. and be bound not to collect more. The next Session of Parliament they come here and say they want the restriction removed. That is the first object of the Bill. The second is likened to it. They ask certain powers to borrow money. These powers were extravagant in the view of the Committee, and in the view of the hon. the Minister of Finance. He himself, after several days consideration, brought down a claim which he was prepared to assent to, a claim which went beyond the provisions which had been heretofore accorded to other corporations. But it was necessary to give exceptionally favorable considerations to a company that was benevolent enough to lend money at 6 per cent. Therefore this Company now come and say: "You will be pleased, first of all, in the first clause, to remove that restriction which obliges us to take 6 per cent. or less; secondly, you will be pleased to grant us larger borrowing power than last Session." It does seem to me that this Company either came to us under false pretences last year, or is coming to us under pretences that cannot be maintained this year.

Mr. BOURASSA (in French). Mr. Speaker, ever since the time I had the honor of sitting in the old Legislative Assembly, my opinions and actions have ever been the same in tending to repress usury and to determine the rate of interest. It is at least twenty-five or twenty-six years since I introduced the first measure to that effect, and I succeeded in getting it twice passed in our old Canadian Parliament, but the Upper House of that time rejected it. Every one knows the disasters brought about by this unrestricted money trade; a part of our farmers have been ruined by the system of usury; another part has gone to the United States, and the others merely exist and remain poor. Already has a large number of our finest farms passed into the hands of capitalists under this system of usury; and if we encourage usury, we shall, in the next twenty years, see all the lands of our farmers pass into the hands of capitalists. They will find themselves compelled, as one sees in Europe, to hold their farms under lease, which they will transmit to their children at their death, and at ruinous conditions, as it is done to-day in Ireland. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, do I hope that the members of rural districts, who are, like myself, witnesses of the disasters caused by usury, will do their utmost to repress them. I propose that this Bill be not now read the second time, but this day six months.

Mr. GIROUARD. The statement of the hon. leader of the Opposition does not cover the whole case. It is true that in 1880 the Credit Foncier was incorporated by the Quebec Legislature, with certain extraordinary privileges, but the hon. gentleman has not referred to those privileges in particular. The only privileges which the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien enjoys exclusively is that of having representation in Paris. That is the only privilege. No other company, either foreign or domestic, is prevented from carrying on business and lending money on real estate in the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman has said that, if we ask to-day to have the limitation removed, we should have no exclusive privileges. We have no objection, in the least, to abandon that privilege of having representation in France, to the exclusion of all other corporations. In my own estimation, I never attached much value to that concession, and I am authorized by the directors of the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien to abandon that privilege, if necessary. What has the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien done for the country? I was greatly surprised by the remarks of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Bourassa), who is so strongly against usury, and yet has moved the six months' hoist to this Bill. As a matter of course, this Company has reduced the rate of interest to 6 per cent. There is hardly a money lender in the country who has been able to lend money on real estate within the past year except at 6 per cent. The original subscribers of the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien have subscribed and paid in the sum of \$1,250,000. That sum of money has been lent in the country for terms varying from ten to fifty years at 6 per cent. interest, and not less. We never intended, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has said, to lend money at less than 6 per cent. When the Credit Foncier was established, money was worth $4\frac{1}{2}$ and 5 per cent. on the Paris market, and consequently its promoters intended to loan money at 6 per cent., getting 5 per cent. for the shareholders and 1 per cent. for the cost of administration. Has the Credit Foncier kept good faith with the country? The hon. gentleman who moved the six months' hoist ought to know. Many of his own electors have borrowed money from this institution, for terms varying from ten to forty years, at 6 per cent. per annum. He now repays that service by trying to kill this institution. The Company wants to get power to follow the fluctuations of the European market. Money which has been lent in this country is not money raised in this country, but is raised in the Paris market. and how can you expect, under the fluctuations of the Paris bourse during the past two or three months, to loan money here at 6 per cent., when it is worth, at least, 6 per cent. in Europe? When we ask for the removal of that restriction obliging us to lend money for not more than 6 per cent., we do not ask it with a view of extracting a rate of interest of 8, 9 or 10 per cent.; we want only to be in a position to follow the fluctuations of the Paris market. When money is worth, in Paris, 6 or 7 per cent., we have only 1 per cent. margin for cost of administration. We will lend money at 6 per cent. as long as we can get it in Europe at 5 per cent., but if we cannot get it at 5 per cent., permit us to lend, at least, at 7 per cent. I am surprised that, an institution which has already done so much good to the country, having loaned \$1,250,000, which sum was not raised by means of bonds, or by the subscribers or shareholders putting money into this Company and getting for it 6 per cent. for ten or fifteen years, but for thirty, forty or fifty years. I do not believe the hon. member for St. John's has really considered the whole question, because, if he had, he would see that the usury of which he complains so loudly, and with reason, will be practiced more than ever if this Credit Foncier is to disappear. But he need not be afraid. The present amendment is asked in good faith, and I believe it will be granted. As I said before, that privilege which has been granted by the Quebec Legislature to the Credit Foncier of having representation in France, we are willing to abandon, and we stand here on an equality with all loan companies. They have unlimited power to loan upon any rate which may be agreed upon. I had occasion to-day to examine the Act of incorporation of the Montreal Building and Investment Association, or the Company incorporated in 1874 by this Bill, and not only were more powers granted to it than were granted to the Credit Foncier, but the power of lending at any rate agreed upon between the borrower and the lender; and during the present Session a well known loan company of Canada have asked the very powers which we ask by this Bill, but we did not hear the hon. member for Iberville

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier).

(Mr. Béchard), and the hon. member for St. John, Que., (Mr. Bourassa), propose the six months hoist. Is it because the Credit Foncier has had the effect of calling in usury in this country that these hon. gentlemen did not speak out on that occasion? I hope the amendment will be negatived.

Mr. McCUAIG. After the discussions which have taken place on this subject, I think Parliament and the country have come to the conclusion that the farming lands of this country are unable to pay more than 6 per cent., and that this Parliament would be doing wrong if we allowed any modification of the charter of this Company which would enable them to charge more than 6 per cent. I notice that the first clause of the Bill reads as follows:—

Section 8 of the Act, cited in the preamble, is hereby amended by striking out the words, "not exceeding 6 per centum per annum" in the second and third lines thereof, and substituting therefor the words "that may be lawfully taken by individuals," and by striking out at the end of the said section the words "but in such case such percentage or commission and the interest together must not exceed 6 per centum per annum on the principal loaned."

By passing such a provision we would simply be giving powers similar to those which have enabled the loan societies of Upper Canada to charge the farmers rates varying from 6 to 16 and even 18 per cent. interest. I believe that the sooner the farmer who is obliged to pay even 8 per cent. interest sells out the better, and I think every farmer in the House and out of it will agree with me. I quite agree that this institution is one which has conferred great benefits on the farmers of Lower Canada by relieving many of them who were paying on mortgages 8 to 10 per cent. and even higher rates of interest, and enabling them to get their money at a reasonable rate; but at the same time my acknowledgement of this benefit will not justify me in legalizing a rate of interest higher than I believe should be charged on any real estate security by any corporation.

Mr. Fiset (in French). Mr. Speaker, as the seconder of the amendment which is before the House, I will add a few words to what has already been said. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) blame the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Bourassa) because several of his electors had been very glad to borrow money from the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien. As a matter of fact, they did borrow from the Credit Foncier, but at 6 per cent., and it is to protect those same electors and those who should find themselves under the necessity of borrowing, that my hon. friend is desirous that that Company should not have the right to lend money at a higher rate than 6 per cent. Another remark made by the hon. promoter of the Bill surprised me. He pretends that this Bill will prevent usury. I must confess that I cannot on that point grasp the hon. member's idea. He wishes to diminish usury and at the same time he is endeavoring to obtain that the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien, which, according to its charter, may only lend at 6 per cent., the privilege of lending money at any rate whatsoever. This is, in my opinion, a singular fashion of stopping the evils of usury. As my hon. friend has observed, he has been for more than twenty-five years the promoter of a Bill tending to repress usury, and he was formerly supported by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, who, I doubt not, will support the amendment of the hon. member for St. John. The Hon. Sandfield Macdonald, in 1864, during the debate on Confederation, made a memorable speech against usury, and he pointed out at the time, to the House and to the country, the interest which my hon. friend the member for St. John (Mr. Bourassa) had shown since 1858, in diminishing the rate of interest. Can we, to-day, give to so important a company the right of lending money at any rate whatsoever? Assuredly not. You know, as well I do, that when the Credit Foncier was established in the Province of Quebec political capital was made out of it, and this question was the all important one at the last elections. We were told to look at the advantages we were to derive from the Chapleau Government establishing the Credit Foncier, and when we replied that we were granting it a fifty years' privilege, what was the answer we got? We were told that it was true that the Company had a fifty years' privilege, but that, on the other hand, the rate of interest had been limited to 6 per cent. Well, what are we seeking to do to-day? We are seeking to give the company an unlimited privilege; and if steps are taken to obtain it in the Federal House, it is because we know that a Bill is shortly to be introduced in the Local House allowing the Company to raise the rate of interest, which is not to remain at 6 per cent., but the right is to be given to raise it to 8 and perhaps 10 per cent. We know this, and we wish that the first step should be taken in the Federal House, because we know very well that in the Local House, besides obtaining the privilege of lending at 8 or 10 per cent., the Company will preserve the privilege of fifty years, and that if the present step succeeded, it would greatly strengthen the vote to be given in the Local House, and no other Company would, during that period, have the right to establish itself in the Province of Quebec. I think, therefore, that in the interest of the agricultural class we should support the amendment of my hon. friend the member for St. John.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I believe that every man who has had to borrow money, not merely in Quebec, but in other parts of the Dominion, will acknowledge the benefit that has been conferred on the whole of Canada by these gentlemen from France, who brought money to this country and loaned it at 6 per cent. They have been benefactors, not only to the Province of Quebec, but of Ontario and of the whole of the Dominion, and they have done more good to money borrowers than any other institution of the kind; but, at the same time, if we should now give them the further power which they ask, we would simply be jeopardizing every man who has borrowed money from the Company. They will simply endeavor to compel every man who may have fallen behind in his payments to pay the higher rate by threatening legal charges—and everybody knows who has to employ the lawyers of this country that they are rather an expensive luxury—they will get him to agree to give them a new mortgage sooner than be sold out by the sheriff. I think, therefore, that we are bound to keep faith with the men who have borrowed money from them for 10, 20, 30 or 40 years, and that we should let the original Bill remain as it is. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) has introduced a very short and a very sweet Bill for the Company, but a very sour one for the borrower, and I think that we should not permit the Company, because they are a powerful and wealthy Corporation to have their interests advanced at the expense of the borrower, who borrowed his money at a lower rate than they would now charge should the proposed amendments be allowed. The effect of the operations of this Company has been to reduce the rate of interest all over Canada; as before they were incorporated it was not uncommon for 7 and 8 and 10 and 12 and even as high as 15 per cent. to be charged. There is no trouble in borrowing money in any part of the Province of Ontario to-day at 7 or even 6 per cent., thanks to the Credit Foncier, and I hope that Company will continue to succeed and to benefit the people of this country. The hon. gentleman says that they only want to get 1 per cent. above what they can borrow money for in France; but this Bill does not say so. This House has given its bond to the borrower, and I am satisfied that the present measure will not be allowed to pass the House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. This Bill purports to amend the law passed by this Legislature, but the true effect of the Bill is to alter the law establishing the Credit Foncier in the Province of Quebec, where it has had the right to lend money on condition that the total amount of interest should not exceed 6 per cent. I maintain that even if the Bill passes this House, it will not be worth the paper it is written upon, because notice is given that the same application is to be made to the Legislature of Quebec.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). No; it is not the same thing.

Mr. CASGRAIN. We have no right in this Parliament to transgress the condition imposed on the Credit Foncier Company by the Legislature of Quebec, and to say that that Company shall be allowed to lend money in the Province of Quebec at more than 6 per cent. The courts would not recognize such an act of ours. Clause seven of the Bill passed last Session provides that in all cases the commission and interest shall not together exceed 6 per cent. But apart from the constitutional question, what is the reason alleged by the hon. gentleman for the Company's desire to raise the rate of interest? He says that because it is raised in France, therefore it must be raised here. When the Credit Foncier Company and other companies were created on the Paris market, there was an amount of corruption that was not perceived at the time; but the crash came, and then the money rose, and the Credit Foncier was affected like all others. Nobody forgets that the promoters of this Company did not undertake it for nothing, or that during the elections in the Province of Quebec we were told it was to be one of the greatest blessings which had ever happened to the Province. Suppose the rate of interest increases again in Paris 1 or 2 per cent., the Company will want to increase the rate here still more. The Bill does not limit the rate to 1 per cent. over the rate at which it borrows. For the two reasons I have given I will not support this Bill, and I think the hon. Minister of Public Works should help in this matter, because he has in the past labored to reduce the rate of interest.

Mr. HESSON. I had great pleasure last year in supporting the Bill for the incorporation of the Credit Foncier Company, and I regret that it finds it necessary to ask the House for further legislation to enable it to increase the rate of interest. I am not certain that the country is altogether dependent on the Credit Foncier Company for lowering the rate of interest. I find, on looking at the Gazette, that there are $47,500,000 lying in the banks without receiving interest, and $45,000,000 lying there to be drawn out on notice. We know that the banks do not allow, as a rule, more than 3 per cent. interest on deposits, therefore I do not feel justified in agreeing to allow this Company to charge a rate of interest which is not justified by the circumstances of the country, and, therefore, I shall oppose my hon. friend's motion to allow it to fix whatever rate of interest it chooses. Reference has been made to a Bill brought before a Committee of this House asking for similar powers. I am not aware that that Bill has been reported to the House, but my impression is that the same objection will be made to that Bill, because I apprehend that the feeling of this House is entirely opposed to increasing the rate of interest. Six per cent. is the highest rate that can fairly be paid by any business man, and especially by the farmers of the country, who are more particularly interested in this question, and more largely involved with those companies.

Mr. DESJARDINS (in French). The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) is mistaken. The Quebec Legislature has not any right to fix the rate of interest, that power being vested in the Federal Parliament. All that the Quebec Legislature can do is to grant a charter to a loan institution, leaving to the Federal Parliament, or to law, to determine the rate of interest. I think that, under those circumstances, the promoters of this Bill have done right in coming before the House, not with the purpose of destroying what was done in Quebec, but to suspend the operation of the Bill, in so far as the Federal Parliament can do so. I have not any interest in this Bill nor in the Company that asks for it; on the contrary, I belong to a loan institution whom it has not at all suited to see the Credit Foncier spring into existence. I regret, for the sake of the general interests of the country, the position in which this institution finds itself, which, after all was merely an experiment made in this country by strangers who were desirous of coming here to invest capital, in the belief that they could find profit in so doing, even with the rate of interest at 6 per cent., through the difference existing between the value of interest on the Paris and Canadian markets. We are perfectly well acquainted with the extraordinary circumstances which have influenced the Paris market during the last few months; the wide margin existing twelve or fifteen months ago has ceased to be, and it is impossible to-day to find money on the Paris market at a higher rate than 3, 4 or 5 per cent. at the highest. Now, unless we absolutely wish to drive these capitalists from the country, under the pretence that having caught them with a Bill, the tenor of which they may not change, we hold them now, and whether they lose or earn money, we must compel them to remain in statu quo. Now I do not think that it is in our interests thus to discourage the importation of foreign capital into this country. One may well be disappointed, I am for my part; and I sincerely regret that the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien should be compelled to come and ask the Government to change its charter. I think that the privilege embodied in its incorporation was perfectly reasonable considering that it came here with an organization, such as to permit its lending money at the maximum rate of 6 per cent. Now, that this Company asks for a change in the principle which made a distinct institution of it, the whole question can be summed up thus: must we ask for the total stoppage of that institution because it is no longer able to lend at 6 per cent., or is it not better to put it on the same footing as other societies, and thus attract hither capital to compete with that of other societies, in such a way as to prevent those exaggerated rates of interest which companies might be inclined to adopt if there was not any competition in the market. Such is the notice that would determine my supporting the Bill proposed by my hon. friend the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). I say to myself: we cannot at present have an institution that will fix the rate of interest at 6 per cent., but if we adopt the proposed amendment, we enable that institution to continue the importation of its capital, which will come into competition with that of other lenders, and in a certain measure prevent the undue rate of interest of which we had to complain before the establishing of that institution. It is admitted that during the last year it has rendered great services, and perhaps will be allowed to render similar ones if the French market becomes stable again; should it enjoy once more its normal state, there is no doubt that it will become possible for it to obtain a rate of interest that will enable it to lend at the same rate as heretofore. It is its advantage to do so, for it is perfectly known that the greater the sum it will be able to invest there the more considerable the profits, even with a most restricted margin between the margin of interest paid in France and that charged here. I do not see why one should wish to treat with so much vigor capitalists whose intention was after all to endow the country with an institution from which we have derived great advantages. The position in which they find themselves to-day is one beyond their will; they are bowing to a case of force majeure, and they have the alternative of suspending their operations or of denying the conditions thereof. It seems to me that, under those circumstances, we should be a little more favorably disposed and not discourage men who are willing to continue under new circumstances, but who admit that they have no longer a right to the privileges which they enjoyed, when they themselves cease to grant to us the advantages which had obtained them those said privileges. As for me, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to support the second reading of the Bill, with the proviso of amending it, before the Committee of Banking and Commerce, in such a fashion as to meet the objections which might destroy the privilege which the institution obtained under its first charter.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk). Last year this Company was specially incorporated for the purpose of lending money at 6 per cent. If the Bill proposed to secure any change that would benefit the incorporation without doing injustice to borrowers, I might support the second reading; but this change, in regard to the rate of interest, is the only one proposed. Instead of continuing to lend money at 6 per cent. the Company propose to lend it on similar terms to individuals. Moreover, it is proposed to change the principle on which the company are allowed to borrow money. By the Act of last year they were allowed to borrow five times the amount of their paid-up capital, now they ask power to borrow on security of mortgages that may represent borrowed money; and that was a wrong principle. I can see no object in allowing the Bill to go to the second reading.

Mr. BECHARD. I must recognize that the institution is a useful one, provided that it fulfils the conditions on which it was organized. It is well known that this Company has received from the Province of Quebec a monopoly or privilege for many years, and it was said at the time, by the advocates of the Company, that the privilege was granted in compensation for the low rate of interest at which it proposed to lend money, namely, 6 per cent. Now the Company propose to have one of those conditions removed, and be authorized to lend money at high rates. I think the monopoly should also disappear if the Company claim to be placed on the same footing with other institutions of a similar kind. I understand this Parliament is not competent to remove this monopoly. That can only be removed by the authority which granted it. The Company should therefore have commenced by having this privilege removed before coming here for better terms. The hon. gentleman says that young as it is, the institution has contributed in a large measure to reduce the rate of interest. I remember well that the rate had already become considerably reduced before this Company came into operation. A year ago last spring the rate of interest had become reduced to 7 and 6 per cent., and then the Company had not commenced operations. At that time, you could hardly get more than 3 per cent. for deposits in the banks. The reduction was due in a large measure to the beneficial harvest we have had and the high prices at which we have sold our products.

Mr. COURSOL. The country, I believe, hailed the establishment of the Credit Foncier with pleasure, and every one supposed that the interest would continue at the rate that law gave that institution power to charge. Since that time, events in France have made money so tight that it is under the necessity of asking power to charge a higher rate. For my part, I would have no objections to our doing all in our power to relieve this Company, and I hope it will shortly be in a condition to lend at its former rate of interest; but I object to this Parliament legalizing usury by removing all limit on its power to charge interest. It may be said that people need not go to the Credit Foncier, but we are bound to protect the public at large, and see that those who go to the Credit Foncier are not imposed on. A maximum rate might be fixed in this instance, and the Bill might be referred back to the Committee to have this maximum rate settled.

Mr. SCRIVER. I do not see that any object will be gained by referring this Bill to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. There are no details in it. It is a simple provision to remove the restriction with regard to the rate of interest. I remember well the circumstances under which some of the extraordinary powers granted this Company were asked for before the Committee last Session. The promoters came before the Committee with beating of drums and blowing of trumpets, proposing to inaugurate a new era in this country in the lending of money. There was no intimation then that this extraordinary state of things would last only a year. We were given to understand that the result of our granting the legislation asked for, would be the power on the part of borrowers, especially among the farming community, to obtain money at lower rates than those ruling, and this was to continue for the fifty years of monopoly given by the Quebec Legislature. It is idle for the hon. member for Jacques Cartier to talk of the willingness of the Company to consent to the removal of this monopoly. We have no power to deal with it here, and until it is removed by the Province of Quebec I do not see what reason this Company can give for asking us to remove the restrictions to the imposition of which it agreed voluntarily a year ago. The circumstances under which this Company finds it difficult to continue lending money at a fixed rate, are exceptional. The state of things in France, brought about by the commercial crisis, is likely to disappear within six months, and it is quite possible the Credit Foncier may be able to obtain money in France, even at 4 per cent. Or, if they continue to lend money at 6 per cent., they would be making 1 per cent. more than he thinks they would be likely to ask. I am entirely opposed to the passage of the Bill and to its reference to a Committee, and shall vote heartily for the six months' hoist.

Mr. GAULT. I am aware of the favor with which this Bill was received, not only by this House but by the whole country; and I say from my own knowledge, that was the means of reducing the rate of interest from 8 and 7 to 6 per cent. Very large amounts have been lent at 6 per cent. On that account I should think that if the hon. member for Jacques Cartier would limit the rate to 7 per cent., his Bill should be allowed to go before the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Mr. GIROUARD. One or two hon. members have said that we should apply to the Legislature of Quebec for redress. We ask the interference of this Parliament in this question, because I consider it belongs exclusively to the Federal Parliament. The Local Legislature has no jurisdiction whatever as regards the rate of interest, which belongs to this Parliament alone.

Mr. SCRIVER. I only referred to the point over which the Quebec Legislature has exclusive jurisdiction, and said that they should go to that Legislature to ask for the renewal of the monopoly.

Mr. GIROUARD. Some hon. gentleman exclaimed: "You have obtained a monopoly;" but they take good care not to define what that monopoly is. Monopoly is a very big word, and we know its effect; but I hope it will not have the effect of defeating this Bill. What does the monopoly amount to? Having a representative in France?

Mr. SCRIVER. Exclusively.

Mr. GIROUARD. This is not simply a Quebec corporation. It has been incorporated by Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island; and it has lost about $200,000 in Ontario and $50,000 in Prince Edward Island. It is a Dominion corporation, enjoying no monopoly whatever. But it is said—you have obtained that monopoly, whatever it is worth, under the condition that you shall lend at 6 per cent. I defy hon. gentlemen to show a single word in the charter to support an understanding of that kind.

Mr. CASGRAIN. According to the language of the Act, 6 per cent. interest is sufficient, and the Company cannot pass that figure.

Mr. GIROUARD. That is not correct. The charter says the Company shall not exceed the rate of interest fixed by law, for the simple reason that the Local Legislature has no jurisdiction in matters of interest.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes 6 per cent. is the rate.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. In the absence of any agreement with regard to interest, the interest is fixed at 6 per cent.

Mr. GIROUARD. Yes; but we are told that the monopoly has been granted this Corporation to lend money at 6 per cent. Nothing of the kind. The contract with the Quebec Company was, that they should lend money only at the rate fixed by law. I ask is it fair to reject this Bill? Is it not better to refer it to the Committee on Banking and Commerce? Let the Committee pronounce as to whether there should be no liberty of the kind asked for. This is the first time that I have seen a Bill of this importance treated in this manner, and especially when the parties interested have done so much good to the country. If a limitation of the rate of interest must be imposed, let the Committee say so. If it fixes 7 per cent. we shall accept it. But why refuse to this institution, which has not abused its powers and privileges, a privilege which has been granted to every company of this kind that has come before Parliament? I am not speaking of this institution alone, but of hundreds of the same kind incorporated by this Parliament with no restrictions as to the rate of interest. Why should you be so severe, the moment the question is presented by the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien. I ask that this Bill should be treated fairly and referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. If it finds a limitation should be imposed, say 7 or 8 per cent., I have no objection. The Trust and Loan Company had 8 per cent. allowed for many years, and it was looked upon as very favorable in its operations to the country at large. The second clause of the Bill is very important. When the question of issuing debentures comes up we find a discrepancy between the Quebec and Dominion Charters. The Quebec charter gives power to issue bonds, on the basis of the money lent in the country by this Company; but the Dominion charter takes the basis of capital paid in. And consequently when we came to issue bonds we did not know exactly under which charter we issued them. It is important, therefore, there should be an agreement as to the basis. Is it astonishing that we should ask power to issue bonds based on the large amount of money we have invested in the country? Here is an institution which has commenced with $1,250,000. Money not borrowed, but subscribed and paid in, in good faith. Is not that a good basis for the issue of another $1,250,000 worth of bonds? It is not the general custom to examine such bills on the second reading, as I could not propose any amendment. Did we treat the Bill of the Trust and Loan Company in this way a fortnight ago? Did we not allow it to go to the Committee, and is not this Bill exactly similar except as to the matter of the issue of bonds?

Mr. ROSS (Dundas). It is very well known I have always been an advocate of a fixed rate of interest, though I regret I failed to obtain it. I cannot see fairness and justice in the course proposed towards those asking for the consideration of this measure, or of holding this Company to a fixed rate of interest and permitting other companies to charge what they please. I think this measure should be submitted to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. I cannot see why they should refuse the promoters of this Bill the opportunity of having it discussed, as all other Bills of the kind are. I go further, and say that I do not see, if this Company has committed a foolish act and bound itself to contracts it cannot carry out, that we should compel it to adhere to them; because no law compels any one to abstain from increasing the rate of interest if he can augment it. I cannot see any reason why this Bill should not be allowed its second reading and referred in the usual way.

Mr. GIROUARD. I wish to say, in reply to the hon. member for L'Islet, who said that we have no power to remove a monopoly, the hon. gentleman has forgotten that this Act is to amend another Act. We have a Dominion charter. But even if we have no power to remove that monopoly, has not the Credit Foncier power to renounce it? I hereby, on behalf of this Company, publicly renounce it before this House.

Mr. BÉCHARD. Put a clause in the Bill.

Mr. GIROUARD. I cannot do that now, it is against the rule.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The Act does not touch this Federal Act. It merely extends and enlarges the powers of the Quebec corporation.

Mr. GIROUARD. Does it not make it a Federal Act?

Mr. BLAKE. No; it does not.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 21st March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. BÉCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise with the intention of making a second speech, or of repeating, in English, what I said the other day in French on this question; but when, on Friday last, this House adjourned, I had not quite completed my remarks, and it was agreed, on the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman who leads this House, that I should conclude them on the resumption of this debate. I think I could hardly let this occasion pass without noticing, at least briefly, the speech which was made a few days ago by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault), who alluded to my course on one or two past occasions. The hon. member referred to something I said in the speech which I made in this House on the Tariff question during the Session of 1879, with regard to wheat and flour, and the effect of the duties imposed on those articles. What I said then I freely repeat now, for I still hold the same opinion—namely, that while there is in Canada a surplus of wheat and flour which we must export to foreign countries, the prices of those articles at home are determined by the prices abroad; and so long as we have that surplus, we are not in need of importing wheat and flour for home consumption, therefore, we have no duty to pay, and under those circumstances the duties imposed on such articles cannot be available to wheat producers in this country. To this opinion I may add, to-day, that, in consequence of a bad wheat crop in Canada, or of too large an exportation of our wheat and flour to the British markets where the demand for those articles may suddenly become great, were we are compelled to import those articles for home consumption, it is my opinion that we would have to pay the duties on them, and so long as that importation took place those duties would prove some advantage to our wheat producers in our market. As hon. gentlemen opposite are making great efforts, in eloquent speeches, to convince this House and the country that the increase which took place within the last eighteen months, in the prices of our farm products, must be attributed to the fact that the control of our home market has been secured to our farmers by the Tariff. I must say that I have very grave doubt as to the correctness of that proposition; for it will be remembered that, during 1879 and the first portion of 1880, farm produce in this country was sold at lower prices than before, notwithstanding the operation of the Tariff. If we were situated as the people of England are—if we were compelled to import every year large quantities of farm produce for home consumption—I could understand that the duties imposed upon those imports would be of advantage some to our farmers, in our national markets. But in this country we are not so circumstanced. Instead of being obliged to import farm produce for home consumption, we are, on the contrary, compelled to export it, if we wish to make it of any value to us. Last year we exported of home products $42,620,546. Suppose this immense quantity of farm produce which brought us this considerable amount had remained in Canada, and that we had only our national market to absorb it, what would have been its value to us? Everybody will see that it would have been wasted, or would have remained perfectly worthless to the farmer, notwithstanding the operation of the Tariff. Having every year a large surplus of farm produce to export, we are dependent for its sale upon the foreign demand, and the greater the demand the higher the price—the less the demand the lower the price. This being the case, it logically follows that the prices of our farm produce at home are determined entirely by the prices it produces in the foreign market, and not at all by the operation of our protective Tariff. Now, I believe that the surplus we have every year does more to secure to our farmers the control of our market than the Tariff; for to that extent itself that surplus excludes the foreign article from our market which, being already overflowing with our national products, cannot prove an advantageous market for the sale of foreign produce of similar kinds. The farmers of the western States understand their business very well when they will not sell their surplus in certain markets. They take good care not to send it to the markets already overflowing with similar products, and from which a surplus must be exported to some other country; but they take good care to export their produce to markets where it is needed, and where they can consequently sell at remunerative prices. I say then that the control of our market is secured to our farmers by the very fact of our having a surplus; and that the price of our produce at home is entirely determined by its price abroad, and not at all by the Tariff. Having disposed of this portion of my subject, I must return to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault). He referred to a motion which I made in 1878, asking for the imposition of a duty upon corn. I will not take the trouble to enter into any explanation of my reasons for making that motion, but I will content myself with telling the hon. member that I had as good reason for making it as his leaders had for imposing precisely the same duties in the Tariff of 1867, and for repealing them in the following Session of 1868. I had as good reasons for making that motion as his friends had for dividing upon it, one party voting for and the other against it. The hon. gentleman still upholds the doctrine that the producer pays the duty instead of the consumer, and he asserts that the hon. member for Lambton also upholds the same doctrine—that if he does not now uphold it he did so a few years ago; for he endeavored to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States Government, through the agency of the late Hon. George Brown, because he knew that the duties imposed upon our exports to the United States were paid by the producer. I will not attempt to give the reasons which impelled the hon. member for Lambton to attempt that negotiation, for he knows them better than I do, and is more able to explain them, if he thinks it worth his while. It is admitted on both sides of this House that a reciprocity treaty with the Americans on the basis of Free Trade would be beneficial to both countries. We know that the duties imposed on our exports to the United States hurt our sales, for in increasing the price of our products in the American market, they have a tendency to diminish their consumption and the demand for them; that is an evil. But on the other hand, it must be admitted that the duties imposed on our imports from that country hurt our purchasers, and that is another evil. These restrictions, it is admitted on all sides, are injurious to our international trade with the Americans, and it is for that reason we are disposed, on this side of the line, at least, to negotiate, if possible, a reciprocity treaty on the basis of Free Trade. But, Sir, if the doctrine of the hon. member, that the producer pays the duty, is sound, I say that protection to manufacturers, by the imposition of Customs duties, is an impossibility indeed, Sir. If the duties imposed on our imports are paid by the foreign producers, certainly they cannot have the effect of increasing the prices of foreign goods when they come into our own market, and where the protection is the advantage, then you give it to our manufacturers? But, that is not all. If that doctrine is sound, the present rates of the tariff are not high enough; they should be 50 or 75, and why not 100 per cent. With such a Tariff we would have a very large revenue. The hon. the Finance Minister would see flowing into his coffers, next year, not only the $20,000,000 which he expects from the Customs, but perhaps $75,000,000 or $100,000,000. With such a revenue what could not be accomplished? We could construct all our great public works without being obliged to borrow a single dollar. We could pay our national debt within the short space of a few years, and we could defray the expenses of this Government without imposing a cent of taxation upon our people, for all this money would be paid by foreigners with whom we have commercial intercourse. Now, everybody will agree with me, that a stringent application of that doctrine would be productive of the most beneficial results, and that surely the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) should soon take the place of the hon. the Finance Minister. But that hon. gentleman did not only allude to myself in the course of his remarks, but he also referred to several of my hon. friends sitting around me, and notably to the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret), and the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson). Each of these hon. gentlemen received his little share of the compliments so modestly distributed by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault.) But, among those hon. gentlemen, the hon. member for South Brant seems to have been a pet and a favorite with the hon. member for Rouville, for not only was he congratulated upon his utterances on different public occasions, but he was also congratulated upon his sweet voice. Surely, Sir, the hon. member for Rouville did not mean to be ironical when he spoke of the sweet voice of the hon. member for South Brant, for no man who has heard that full, sonorous tribune's voice, whose thundering tones have so many times, either from his seat in Parliament or from the hustings in Ontario, cast terror into the Conservative ranks, would dream for a moment to exchange it for the voice of the hon. member for Rouville, however agreeable, amiable and musical the hon. gentleman may think it is. Now, Sir, if that hon. gentleman chooses to indulge in pointing out what he, doubtless, considers to be contradictions between the utterances of public men at one time and the utterances of the same men at other times and on other occasions, he need not, in order to fulfil that mission, travel outside his own political atmosphere; let him, that star of the Conservative party, revolve in the orbit of that party; let him study the utterances and deeds of his friends on different occasions, and he may be sure to find enough there to gratify his inclination and to edify himself. The hon. gentleman, in another portion of his speech, seemed to feel that he would not be discharging his whole duty unless he directed a little attack against the Liberal party. I noticed, Sir, that since that hon. gentleman held a seat on the floor of this House, he never misses at every Session the opportunity of throwing bitter aspersions upon the Liberal party of this country. True it is that, perhaps, he has very good reasons for displaying that animosity, because the Liberals are numerous and strong in his own constituency, and they only need stand united, to make this hon. gentleman repent in sackcloth and ashes, the bitterness he has never failed to display against them. The hon. gentleman said that the Liberal party were always opposed to the great measures passed for the good of the country, and he mentioned the Intercolonial Railway and the Pacific Railway as among those measures. If I wanted to imitate the conduct of the hon. member, it would be proper for me, in answer to that charge, to direct his attention to the reading made by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) in his speech, of a memorandum of the proceedings of a convention composed of delegates from the then Liberal Government of Canada, and from the Governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in which it was shown that the respective Governments of those Provinces had decided that the Intercolonial Railway, and later the Pacific Railway, should be built. I might also refer him on that question to another extract made by the hon. member for Montmagny—namely, an extract from the speech delivered by the hon. member for Lambton at Sarnia, in which he declared himself in favor of the construction of the Pacific Railway. These extracts from the speech of his own political friend will, I think, be a sufficient answer to the hon. gentleman's groundless charge. The hon. gentleman in another part of his speech said that it was ridiculous for the Liberals to call themselves the successors of Baldwin and Lafontaine, whom they denounced as traitors; and on this charge being denied by my hon. friend from Verchères, the hon. gentleman quoted an extract from a paper published thirty years ago, which seemed to reflect upon these great political leaders. I well remember that some thirty-four or thirty-five years ago, a dozen of young men—all students—started a paper, which lasted about two years, and was succeeded by the journal from which the hon. gentleman quoted the other day. But I hold, Sir, that the Liberal party, such as organized later, cannot be held responsible for the writings or utterances of those young men, whatever they may have been, and it would be as unjust to bind them by what may have been written in those papers, as to attribute annexationist principles either to the Conservative or the Liberal party, because some of their members shared in the annexationist movement which took place in 1849. It is well-known that a distinguished member of the Conservative party now holding a place of high trust in the name of this Government, in England—signed an annexationist manifesto in 1849. Do we conclude from that fact that the great Conservative party are in favor of annexation?—it would be an injustice to do so. Sir, Lafontaine and Baldwin, were two great Liberal leaders, who fought for the institution of responsible Government in this country, by whom were they opposed?—by men who, in those times, were called the leaders of the Tory party, by men with whom a large portion of those who had previously followed Lafontaine and Baldwin, made an alliance, accepting the leader of the Tory party for their own leader, some time after these two eminent men had withdrawn from public life. Those who branded Baldwin and Lafontaine as traitors, were not the Liberal party, as was asserted by the hon. member for Rouville, but they were those men who had opposed them all their life, and who were so bitter against them that on a memorable occasion never to be forgotten, when what was called the Indemnity Bill passed Parliament, they succeeded by inflammatory speeches in infuriating a mob of their followers, who, doubtless, in order to show their loyalty to their Queen, did not hesitate to assail the representative of Her Majesty in Canada with a shower of rotten eggs, and who, after having accomplished that chivalrous exploit, a few days afterwards, in order to show their loyalty to their country, burned down the Parliament buildings of Canada. These are the men by whom Lafontaine and Baldwin were branded as traitors. Sir, I dislike to indulge in those regrettable reminiscences of the past, a past which is far behind us, but I am compelled to do so in defence of the Liberal party against the bitter attacks made by the hon. member for Rouville. Lafontaine and Baldwin were never called Conservative leaders, they were never known as Conservative leaders, they were Liberal leaders; and the Liberals of to-day, like those men, are imbued with Liberal principles, which they intend to uphold and defend against all assaults, from whatever quarter they may come, even when they come from the terrible member for Rouville. The hon. gentleman says, in another portion of his speech, the Liberals never accomplished anything for the good of the country. Sir, this charge is pretty vague, and no one is expected to recite here what the Liberals have done, in answer to that inoffensive charge which is absolutely gratuitous. It is true they have not been long in power. During the last thirty years, they have been in power but twice; first, under the Administration of the late John Sandfield Macdonald, which lasted about twenty months, and next during the Administration of my hon. friend from Lambton, which lasted only five years, and during which this country was distressed by a terrible crisis which paralyzed all kinds of industries, and which could be controlled by no power on earth except that of time. But, if the Liberals have not had sufficient opportunity to accomplish all they could wish for their country, they have, at least, one great advantage—they have often been promoters of great measures which, after having been resisted by their opponents, have finally been adopted by them. They have, besides that, a clear and noble record. There is no dark page in the history of the Liberal party, and after several defeats on the battle-field, they can look with pride to their escutcheon which remains spotless and unstained.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I feel reluctant to prolong this discussion, of which I am sure both sides of the House must be tired, as it has been continued now for some time. Yet I must say that this side of the House has hardly had their share of the speaking. On the other side of the House we have heard several speeches four or five hours in length, and I, therefore, have no need to apologize when I say that, if we continue this debate any longer, it will not be our fault, but that of the members opposite. Mr. Speaker, we need not fear the discussion that has taken place with regard to this matter. Our principles are the same to-day as they were in 1879; our position has not changed in any way. Hon. members on the other side of the House have especially attacked the hon. members for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and South Brant (Mr. Paterson). They have attacked these hon. gentlemen for speeches they made in the past in regard to this question, not by quoting the whole of their speeches, or giving a fair interpretation to them, but by quoting only a portion of them, which was very unfair to those hon. gentlemen. But when we come to review the speeches made by several hon. members on the other side in the past, and the course they have pursued with regard to this question, we have little to fear from comparison. Take the President of the Council himself, and his action in the past on this trade question has been entirely contrary to his action to-day. Prior to Confederation he was strongly in favor, not only of a revenue Tariff, but of out-and-out Free Trade. His strongest objection against Confederation was that it would raise the duty from 10 per cent., as it was then in Nova Scotia, to 15 per cent. The hon. the Minister of Railways, when in the Government of Nova Scotia, was a pronounced upholder of a Tariff for revenue. In the discussion that took place in 1874, in the resolutions of the hon. member for Centre Huron for raising the Tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent., the present hon. Minister of Railways then spoke in the strongest possible manner in condemnation, saying it was the entering of the thin edge of Protection. Here are his words:

"I fear the hon. Minister is seeking to enter the thin edge of Protection, which will eventually work ruin and desolation to the Maritime Provinces. Let the hon. Minister look at the neighboring Republic, and he will find that the policy of that country has swept their flag off the seas, and given to others the carrying trade of the world."

I find that the right hon. leader of the Government, in 1873, spoke thus:

"The flour tax has been imposed as an assertion of the independence of the country against American exclusive legislation. It has been maintained in this view until it had been found to work oppressively on certain sections of the community, and so it was repealed as a step in the right direction."

We find the Montreal Gazette of that time had the following:

"Let our wise men run the Dominion ship as nearly as possible on the Free Trade plan, and we shall have no fears for her safety."

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have also the resolution moved by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) in 1874:

"That, without forming any opinion upon some of the details of the present Customs Tariff, and the anomalies which are inevitable in all Tariffs, this Board is of the opinion that no change should be made in it unless the exigencies of the public service demand larger revenues, and that in such case any increase to be made should be in accordance with the principle of the present Customs Tariff, which, while not interfering with the commerce of the Dominion, affords incidental Protection to its manufactures. That this Board is of the opinion that permanence in the fiscal policy of the country is most important alike to its commerce and to its manufactures, and that no changes should be made in the Tariff not demanded by the absolute necessities of the revenue."

We might go on giving speeches and resolutions of other members on the other side of the House to show that only a very short period has elapsed since they took stronger ground than even we take now against Protection. I think hon. gentlemen opposite had better settle this question among themselves before they begin to lecture us on this side of the House as regards our policy. They have challenged us with being disloyal, with being hostile to manufacturers and hostile to the best interests of this country and to everything that tends to promote its progress; but I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to show any unpatriotic motive as actuating hon. members on this side. If they will travel through the country they will find that the largest number of people interested in manufactures and in enterprises of various kinds belong to the Liberal party; they will find them more liberal than conservative in fostering enterprises required to promote our industries and cause them to progress satisfactorily. The Liberal party believe that enterprise and energy are the only true motive powers to secure success in any enterprise; they do not believe in the assistance of legislation or protection to spur enterprises into existence and leave them afterwards to depend more on State support than on the energy and enterprise of the promoters. I therefore hurl back the charge that the Liberals are hostile to manufacturers, or to the progress of the country. The policy propounded by hon. members of the Opposition in 1879, has been maintained by them ever since, and the results have proved that they were right. When the hon. Minister of Finance introduced his Tariff in that year, he came down with the proposition to raise $2,000,000 of revenue by a readjustment of the Tariff. We, on this side of the House, took the ground that, if that sum was required, the hon. Minister had imposed an enormous burden to secure that result, a far greater tax than was necessary to raise that sum. We maintained that the Tariff introduced, if applied to the importations of 1878, would produce a taxation of nearly $7,000,000, either in revenue or in the pockets of manufacturers. If the Tariff of 1879 be applied to the importations of 1878, it will produce that amount almost precisely, and whatever does not go into the revenue will go to the manufactures. We showed that taxation would be increased, and the result has proved the accuracy of our prediction. With regard to the different industries, we maintained also that a vastly larger number of manufactures would be injured by the Tariff then proposed than would be benefitted by it; that they were not protected but injured by the increased taxation imposed on raw materials used. We maintained that over 500,000 farmers representing a population of over 2,500,000, could not possibly be benefitted by the Tariff but would be called upon to bear increased taxation. We maintained also that while we were a large exporting people and depended almost entirely on the exports of farm produce, lumber and fish for the imports of the country, and for our paying capacity to balance the trade, these industries being taxed very largely could not possibly receive any benefit from the Tariff and did not. We maintained that the lumbermen of the Dominion, who represent a capital of over $100,000,000 and who altogether support between 400,000 and 500,000 persons, and who have exported since Confederation nearly $300,000,000 worth of lumber, were called upon to bear increased taxation, and could not possibly derive benefit from the Tariff. We maintained that the shipping interest, which is a very large interest in this Dominion, representing about $50,000,000 capital, could not derive any advantage from the Tariff by being called upon to pay additional taxation, but would decline, as statistics have shown; also that the fishermen were additionally taxed and could receive no benefit from the Tariff. We maintained also that a large number of manufacturers were not only not benefitted but were injured by the taxation imposed on raw material. They have not got, as said they would, the home market, and their exports of manufactured goods steadily decreasing, as trade returns show. We took those strong grounds in 1879. The results have proved that we were correct in all our representations at that time. They were not only proved by the parties themselves, by farmers, lumbermen, shipbuilders, fishermen, and by several of the manufacturers, but also by the Government. The Government are aware that they could do nothing, and that they have not improved the position of the farmers. They know they have taxed the lumbermen, and have admitted it. They know that the millers have been taxed; and therefore, to satisfy them, they gave them the privilege of grinding grain in bond for exportation. They admitted that the shipbuilders have been heavily taxed, and they have given them a bonus of 75 cents per ton, but not the labouring men. They know that the fishermen have been taxed, for they come down this year and declare that: "We know you are taxed very largely, and we therefore give you $150,000 a year to help to make up for the taxation." The fishermen are a very important part of the community, the shore boat and schooner fishermen, represent 80,000 good, able-bodied men and support a population of 350,000 or 400,000 people. The lowest possible calculations made in Nova Scotia is that the taxation under the Tariff amounts to $12 per head for these men. But we will place the additional taxes at $6 per head, and we then find they are taxed nearly $500,000 a year by this Tariff, and the Government now come down and offer $150,000 in lieu of that sum. We find also that the Government admit they tax manufacturers, for they come down year after year with alterations of the Tariff, and they have extended the free list from time to time, as pressure was brought to bear on them by the manufacturers. So I say that as regards most of the industries I have mentioned, the Government themselves have shown that they know they have taxed them by coming down and making concessions in lieu of taxation. I might mention also that the blacksmiths, boiler-makers, coopers, engine builders, sail-makers, car manufacturers, sheet-iron workers, stone and marble workers, printing offices, paper manufacturers, sash and door manufacturers, wood turners, carvers, gilders, broom and brush makers, tailors, clothiers, furriers and hatters, trunk makers, and others, all more or less heavily taxed on the raw materials they use, and are worse off under this Tariff than under the previous one as manufacturers. Further, there was great and unjust discrimination in the Tariff introduced by the hon. the Minister of Finance. Certain classes of the population were taxed more than others, especially the laboring classes, who are large consumers of the cheaper classes of dry goods chiefly in woollens and cottons. These were taxed 20 to 30 per cent. more than those who can afford to buy the more expensive goods. With regard to the speech of the hon. the Minister of Railways, I do not think any speech delivered in the House this Session has done the Opposition more good than this. The extreme position he took on coal itself is an evidence of this. The hon. the Finance Minister talked of the Americans paying half the duty, but the hon. the Minister of Railways went further and said they paid the whole of the duty, and that coal could be bought cheaper here than in the United States. With regard to coal oil, the hon. Minister of Railways might have known, and probably did know, that the Opposition when in power reduced the taxes on coal oil from 15 cents to 6 cents per gallon. With regard to tea, he spoke of the enormous discrimination of the duty levied by the late Administration; but any one who will look at the importation for ten years back will see that none was imported at the prices mentioned by the hon. Minister, and that the duty was no greater on one kind than on another. As far as the loans floated by the hon. member for Centre Huron are concerned, the hon. Minister of Railways, in speaking as he did, cast a reflection not only on his own colleague but also on our general agents in London, for the charge that the late hon. Minister of Finance distributed his loans among his own friends in London would apply equally well to the present hon. Minister of Finance, since he adopted the same course and sold at rates no better in 1878-79, did he give to his friends thereby over $3,500. I am sure no hon. member on this side would charge the hon. the Minister of Finance with giving his friends any advantage over the public at large, who were the purchasers. The hon. the Minister also spoke of the London agents. Well, if they acted, as he asserted, they were certainly not worthy of being retained, yet the Government made no change of agents. We believe the transactions were, in all cases, perfectly honorable and fair, and that the agents are good, substantial, careful men, and that the hon. the Minister of Railways, in making the statement, not only showed his unfairness and reckless insinuation, but implicated in his charge not only his own colleague but the Government agents as well. As to the differences in the price of the last loan, 1880, the difference in the dates of negotiation will account for that. In 1873-74, there occurred in Vienna and New York, a panic of which many commercial and financial failures were the outcome. The crisis was something unheard of, so much so that the interest on money in London rose to 9 per cent. The following year, 1875, that panic continued. In 1876, the tightness in money still continued, and, in 1877, the Russo-Turkish war had a depressing effect on business. In 1878, the Glasgow Bank failure and other commercial disasters had made the negotiating of loans almost an impossibility on favorable terms; but, in 1879-80, the change took place and money went down to 2 and 2½ per cent. and remained so, thus making it much easier for the hon. Finance Minister to float his last loan. The hon. Finance Minister, in his speech, compared 1874 and 1878, 1875 and 1879, 1877 and 1879, 1877 and 1881—changing his base of calculation and comparison no less than thirteen times to suit his purpose in comparing the management of the late and present Government. It must be very amusing to the commercial community to be informed, as they were by the hon. Finance Minister, that they paid into the Treasury $18,500,000 as a voluntary contribution to the revenue. In comparing exports and imports, the hon. Finance Minister, in answer to the hon. member for Brant, took the years 1874 and 1878 and compared them with 1879 and 1881, showing very little exports on an average in the last three years over 1874 and 1878. But, to make out a case against the late Government—that the taxes levied by the present Government were less than those imposed by their predecessors to the extent of 23 cents per head—he takes the five years from 1875 to 1879, and compares them with the two years from 1880 to 1881, making use of the deficits and surpluses. He showed that the taxes under the late Government were $4.88 per head, and under the present, $4.65 per head. He takes in some cases where it suits 1874 to 1878, and has several times said that we are responsible for 1874. The hon. member for Cardwell, said, the other night, that we were responsible for that year, and we will, for comparison sake, take the years from 1874 to 1878, and the years 1879 and 1881 for all our comparison. For the period from 1874 to 1878, adding the deficits of $2,363,000, it leaves a tax of $4.80 per head. Now, take the three years from 1879 to 1881, and deduct surplus of $750,512, and we have a rate of $4.80 per head; or take the account as it stands in the Public Accounts, in which I think the people of the country will look for their information, and compare the years of each Government, as there recorded, and you will find, from 1874 to 1878, the taxation was $4.68 per head, while that from 1879 to 1881 reached $4.86, or was 18 cents less per head in the first period of the late Government than in the second, or present Government.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. BURPEE. Now, with regard to the average expenditure of, the two Governments, the Minister of Finance takes for comparison the outlay from 1874 to 1878 with that from 1879 to 1881, to show that the increased expenditure by the present Government over that of the late Government was only some $1,242,000. But there must be added to that amount $334,000 for Dominion lands, which the late Government always charged to revenue, but which the present Government takes out of revenue and charges to capital account. But while we are enquiring into the expenditure of the two Governments, it is best to take the Public Accounts, from which it will be seen that the expenditure of the late Government has reached only $23,500,000 in 1878, and that its expenditure had increased, from 1874 to 1878, but some $200,000; and that, notwithstanding that the present hon. Finance Minister said, during the elections of 1878, that all his party wanted was $18,000,000 from Customs, Excise, and Bill Stamps, or altogether but $22,500,000 to carry on the business of the country. Notwithstanding that the hon. the Minister of Railways said that they could do with less than $22,500,000 if they were in power, we find that in three years, their expenditure has reached $25,500,000, or with $334,000 more, which they charged to capital account, which we charged to revenue, (Dominion lands,) making an aggregate of $25,834,600, or $2,334,000 above that of the year 1877-78. But that is not all, they have not only increased the expenditure of the Dominion in three years, over $2,734,600: but they came down this year and asked, in the Estimates for 1882-83, the enormous sum of $27,600,000, and also $400,000 for Dominion lands, charged to capital which, I repeat, we charged to income, making a total of $28,000,000, an addition to the expenditure of $4,498,000 in five years of their reign. They may add and subtract from the figures as much as they like, but that is the result from the Public Accounts and their own estimates. Then we had the hon. member for Cardwell, whom I do not see in his place, dealing with this subject; he, the other night, also charged the late Government with the responsibility of the expenditure for the year 1873-74. He said that we exceeded the estimates for that year, the estimates of the present hon. Finance Minister, by $1,676,660. Now, I can show from the Estimates of that hon. gentleman for 1873-74 that the late Government did not only not exceed them, but did not expend the amount set down for that year. The original Estimates for 1873-74 were $20,941,182; first, Supplementary Estimates, $368,340; second Supplementary, $57,300; third, Supplementary, $100,000. Then, again, under the 36th Victoria, the provincial subsidy and assumption of the provincial debts produced another item of $918,000; increased salaries, $300,000; admission of Prince Edward Island, $418,000; organization of Mounted Police, $200,000; a further balance of $432,000, making a total of $23,685,000 of estimated expenditure for 1873-74. The expenditure of the Government of the hon. member for Lambton during that year was $23,316,317, or less than the estimate by $368,692, showing the member for Cardwell's great error. I may just give one of the many instances of the necessity of the Government of 1873 estimating very large amounts on account obligations incurred by them a few days before they left office, 7th November, 1873. We find that a number of appointments to office and increases to salaries were made between January, 1873, and 7th November, 1873, in the Civil Service as follows: Governor General's Office, three were increases in salaries amounting to $350; in the Privy Council one new appointment, $700, and six increases, $820, total $1,520; Secretary of State, nine new appointments, $4,690, and nine salaries increased $1,650, total $6,340; Militia, six new appointments, $5,600, eighteen increases, $2,677, total $38,277; in Receiver General's, two appointments, $1,600, and seven increases, $1,200, total $2,800. In the Public Works Department there were twenty-eight appointments, costing $21,546, and one hundred and seventy-one salaries increased, $19,074, making a total in the number of increases and appointments of 199, at a cost of $40,620. In the Department of the Minister of Justice there were seventy-five new appointments, $77,800, with eleven increases, $1,760, making an addition of $79,560. In the Department of the Interior there were nineteen new appointments, $14,070, and twenty-five increases, $5,000, total $19,080. Customs, new appointments, 111, $58,076, increase, 636, making an additional outlay of $125,461. Inland Revenue, eighty-four appointments, $30,575, and ninety six increases, $16,550, total 180, addition $47,065; Department of Finance, seventeen appointments, $15,400, increase twenty-four, $2,650, addition $18,050; Agriculture, forty-one appointments, $35,025, increase fifteen, $1,178, addition $37,203; Marine and Fisheries, 159 new appointments, $21,900, and forty-nine increases, $9,025; additional expenditure, $30,925; Post Office, seventy-seven new appointments, $36,020, and 311 increases, $22,220, additional expenditure, $58,220; altogether an addition made by the late Government of 1873 for the Civil Service alone, just previous to their going out of power, of $475,293 annually. What do we find under the Government of the hon. member for Lambton, the total reductions for ordinary controllable expenditure, between the years of 1874 and 1878, was $1,781,566, divided thus: Civil Service, reduction, $60,300; Penitentiaries, $37,500; Legislation, $166,000; Immigration, $137,822; Geological Surveys, $1,764; Marine Hospital, $8,972; Public Works, $827,404; Ocean Service, $5,328; Light-houses, $75,100; Miscellaneous, $21,000; Dominion Lands, $195,535; Culling Timber, $32,946; Militia, $359,239; Contingencies, $64,625. We find these several reductions, between the years 1874 and 1878, amounted in all to $1,781,566. The hon. the Finance Minister next in taking up the comparison of the two Governments for Post Office service he goes back again to the years 1875 to 1879 showing the average annual expenditure to be $1,709,000 and the average annual receipts $1,149,000, average deficits annually $560,000 for late Government; while for the years 1880-81 the average annual expenditure was $1,847,000 and the average annual receipts $1,302,000, average deficit $545,000, or a deficit of $15,000 a year less than the late Government. Mr. Speaker what are the facts of the case, taking the years for which the late Government are responsible and comparing with the years the present Government are responsible—1874 to 1878 inclusive, and 1879 to 1881:

Late Government, 1874-78, average annual expenditure...	$1,592,241
do do deficits	1,144,116
Average deficits.....	$448,125

Present Government, 1879-81, average annual expenditure..	$1,826,451

Or a greater annual increased deficit by the present Government of $119,318, instead of a decreased deficit of $15,000. The increase of expenditure for this service in three years by present Government has been $151,719, and the increase the present Government asked for up to 1873, $294,961. This statement shows the enormous increased expenditure of the Post Office service. Now, I think this will show the unfairness of the present Finance Minister in making comparisons in their favor, as against the late Government. The years from 1874 to 1878 are taken as those for which the late Government are responsible, although I say they are not responsible for the whole of it. The hon. the Minister of Finance next took up the Intercolonial Railway. I venture to say there is no part of the public service for which the late Government have been more abused than in connection with that railway. While the hon. member for Lambton was at the head of the Department of Public Works, he was abused from one end of the country to the other, for his alleged mismanagement of that road. When the present hon. Minister of Railways came into power, his first duty, of course, was to set things right, as he said, in dismissing officers, reducing the salaries of others, already small, shutting up the workshops at Moncton, and buying a good deal of the rolling-stock in the United States. During the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton, the cost of the construction work done at the workshops at Moncton was charged to revenue account, while after the dismissal of these men from the workshops, and when the rolling stock was imported, the cost was charged to capital account by the present Government. Some of the men dismissed from the Moncton workshops were found employment in the United States in the places where these locomotives and rolling-stock purchased by the Government were manufactured. The hon. the Minister of Finance makes the working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway, from 1874 to 1879, under late Government average, $2,659 per mile. He makes the working expenses for the two years of the present Government average $1,987 per mile, showing a decreased expenditure by the present Government of $672 per mile. He shows an average receipt per mile, from 1874 to 1879, of $1,760, late Government. The average receipts for the two years, 1880 and 1881, were $1,980 per mile, or $220 of an increase in favor of present Government. What do we find by taking the five years from 1874 to 1878 and comparing them with the years from 1879 to 1881, the correct years for comparison. As this is a subject out of which a good deal of political capital has been made against the late Government, I shall be more minute in this statement than I would be otherwise. In 1874, there were 371 miles of railway in operation, yielding a revenue of $893,430, and involving an expenditure of $1,025,831. In 1875, 422 miles; revenue, $861,593; expenditure, $850,775. 1876, 512 miles; revenue, $846,861; expenditure, $877,485. 1877, 720 miles; revenue, $1,154,447; expenditure, and $1,461,273. 1878, 720 miles; revenue, $1,378,946; expenditure, $1,611,273. Those were the years during which my hon. friend for Lambton administered that Department. In 1879, 720 miles; revenue, $1,294,009; expenditure, $1,875,000. 1880, 840 miles; revenue, $1,506,298; expenditure, $1,603,439. In 1881, 846 miles; with a revenue of $1,760,393, and an expenditure of $1,759,822. Now, Sir, for the purpose of making comparison we will take the five years of the late Government from 1874 to 1878, in which the receipts averaged $1,027,455 annually, and the three years from 1879 to 1881, in which the receipts averaged $1,520,283 annually, showing a balance in favor of 1879-81 on receipts of $492,778. In five years the expenditure, under the late Government, averaged $1,165,327; in three years, under the present Government, viz., 1879 to 1881, $1,746,417, or an expenditure by the present Government over the years 1874-78 of $581,090, or a net balance in favor of the late Government of $88,312.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say, in speaking of the railway expenditures, that he took six years. Allow me to read what I stated on that subject. What I said was this:

"Now, Sir, it may be well to call the attention of the House to one or two other facts, to show why it is that we have been able to keep the taxation of the people lower than it was during the time our friends opposite were in power. In connection with this, I desire to call the attention of the House to some facts with reference to the working of the railways, from July, 1874, to July, 1879."

All the calculations are based on five years.

Mr. BURPEE. That is just what I have taken—1874 to 1879.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Including both years.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. From July, 1874, to July, 1879.

Mr. BURPEE. For the purposes of comparison it will make little or no difference in the calculations, but in favor of the late Government, if you take it that way. I have taken the total receipts and the total expenditures of the railway, and I shall now take the receipts and expenditure per mile as the hon. the Minister of Finance has done. From 1874 to 1878, the receipts per mile were $1,886; from 1879 to 1881, $1,890, or four dollars per mile in favor of the present Government. For the five years, from 1874 to 1878, the expenditure per mile was $2,151; from 1879 to 1881, the present Government have expended $2,234, or a balance against the present Government of $83 per mile, or on the whole a net balance in favor of the late Government of $79 per mile. If any hon. member of the House chooses to go into these calculations, he will find, by the Public Works Reports, that they are accurate. I might say, before going further, that in the comparisons I have made I have put the late Government on the same footing as the present Government. I have taken the amount for steel rails, $700,000, paid by the late Government in 1876-77-78 out of revenue as the present Government are charged all such expenditure to capital account, and there are quite a number of smaller items in the Accounts which are now charged to capital account of the Intercolonial Railway, that were charged by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) to revenue. My hon. friend the member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was in power, sought to close up the capital account of the Intercolonial from the year 1876 and charge everything, to revenue account, instead of doing, as the present Government are doing, charging a large number of items to capital. In 1879, there is charged to capital account, $226,639; in 1880, $548,000; in 1881, $608,732, and in the Estimates for 1882, they took $446,469 for capital account—the supplementary estimates they ask for $383,639 more this year, making, for 1882, $730,308. They ask for 1883, $609,086, making altogether nearly $3,000,000 in the five years that they have charged and estimated for capital account. Then, Mr. Speaker, last year they asked

Mr. BURPEE (St. John).

$1,600,000 for running expenses, and they have asked, in the Supplementary Estimates this year, $300,000 more, making, in all, $1,900,000 for running expenses. Now, I think, when we consider the increased trade of the country, the increased freight, which has grown, between 1878 and 1881, something like from 7,833,420 tons in 1878, to 12,102,000 tons in 1881, or an increase of nearly 60 per cent.—passenger nearly same increase,—and when we consider that the receipts have been nearly 30 per cent. over those of 1878, and when we consider that during part of the time of the late Government the road was unfinished and incomplete, that it was laid with iron rails, and equipped with insufficient rolling stock, that it had to compete for two seasons with the Gulf line of steamers from Shediac to Gaspé, Quebec—I say that, when we consider these facts, it speaks volumes for the management of the late Government, and shows how unfair the criticisms are in which members of the Government indulge throughout the country regarding the management of the Intercolonial Railway by the hon. member for Lambton. We also find that in the three years under the late Government, from 1876 to 1878, there was a surplus in managing the canals of $4,629; while in the three years under the present Government, from 1879 to 1881, there was a deficit of $40,319, with a larger trade. Then we come to the reduction of taxation spoken of by the Minister of Finance. While we on this side of the House are willing to accept any reduction of taxes which the Government are disposed to give us, we say, or I for one say, that there is no tax which the people of this country feel less than the duties on tea and coffee. Last year's consumption was 16,000,000 lbs., which was certainly very large. In 1873, the consumption was 15,000,000 lbs., and, in 1875, it was 14,000,000 lbs; but in the highest year the average taxes on tea and coffee amount to only about 20 cents per head of the population of the Dominion—one-half of the taxes on one barrel of meal, a little over one-third of the tax on a barrel of flour, and one-third of the tax on a ton of coal. The boast is made from one end of the country to the other that the hon. Minister of Finance is giving the people a free breakfast-table by reducing the duties on tea and coffee; but before you talk about a free breakfast table, you should go back to the old duties on tables and chairs by reducing 17½ per cent. take off the 12½ per cent. additional on crockery-ware, 12½ per cent. on silver and plated ware, 50 or 60 cents a ton on coal, and 10 or 50 cents a barrel on meal and flour, all of which reductions are necessary to make a breakfast table as free as it was in 1878. When you consider the taxation on all these articles, you will see how false is the idea that is being spread abroad of the people getting a free breakfast table. The hon. Minister of Finance also referred to a prediction made by us on this side of the House, that the Tariff would interfere with the trade of Canada with Great Britain. No doubt it was said that the Tariff would change the current of trade, but it is almost impossible to make a comparison between the two regimes with respect to the trade with Great Britain and the United States. From 1874 to 1878, as the hon. Minister of Customs well knows, a large amount of the imports into this country from the United States, entered for consumption, were afterwards exported, and were not the products of Canada. From 1874 to 1878, the total imports for consumption were $529,256,000; the total value of goods entered for consumption and afterwards exported, not the products of Canada, in the same five years, were $38,976,000; leaving the net imports for consumption for the five years $490,279,000. Of these imports, there came from Great Britain $48,232,000, or 49 per cent.; and from the United States $42,425,000, or 43 per cent.; and from other countries $7,398,000, or 7 per cent. For the three years, from 1879 to 1881, the total imports for consumption were $243,735,000, less the amount for 1879, which was imported and afterwards exported, of $7,677,000, making the net consumption for the three years $236,057,000; of which there was imported from Great Britain, $36,346,000, or 46 per cent.; from the United States, $24,037,000, or 43 per cent.; and from other countries, $8,302,000, or 10 per cent., showing a decrease of 3 per cent. from Great Britain, while United States, remained the same. The average duty on English goods from Great Britain was 18 per cent. in 1879, 19 per cent. in 1880, and 20 per cent. in 1881, while the average duty on goods from the United States was 15 per cent. in 1879, 15 per cent. in 1880, and 15 per cent. in 1881. For my part, I do not place any value on this argument, only the matter is used throughout the country in order to make capital against the late Government for trading with our neighbors. I believe that merchants will buy their goods where they can buy them the cheapest, no matter whether in the United States or Great Britain. I believe that a great portion of the people of the Dominion are satisfied that when they trade with the United States it is for their interest to do so, and nothing can stop it; and if it is a profitable trade to our people, they should be allowed to do business wherever they can trade the best, and make the most money. Another statement made by the hon. the Minister of Finance was that, during the five years under the late Government, from 1875 to 1879,—change in years again—the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia paid 14½ cents per head more taxation than the Province of Ontario, &c., while in the two years under the present Government, they paid less per head. This argument is an unfair one, and ought not to be used by any Minister of Finance in a comparison of one Province with another. The hon. the Minister of Customs, at an earlier stage of the debate, showed very fairly and plainly that the trade of the Lower Provinces had fallen off very rapidly, and he believed the causes were the increase of the inter-provincial trade with Ontario and Quebec. The imports of New Brunswick have dropped from $10,223,000 in 1873, to $3,996,000 in 1880, and they rose last year to $6,016,000. Nova Scotia imported, in 1874, $19,907,000; in 1880, $6,133,000; and, in 1881, $7,052,000. The argument of the hon. the Minister of Finance means anything, only serves to expose the poverty of the Lower Provinces, in buying less than they were able to buy three years ago. The average duty paid by the different Provinces will show better how the Tariff affects the current of trade. In the five years from 1874 to 1878, Ontario and Quebec paid an average duty of 12·15 per cent., while in the three years from 1879 to 1881, they paid an average duty of 18·03 per cent. Nova Scotia, in the five years from 1874 to 1878, paid an average duty of 14·10 per cent.; and in the three years from 1879 to 1881, 19·49 per cent. New Brunswick, in the five years from 1874 to 1878, paid 15·50 per cent.; and in the three years from 1879 to 1881, 20·79 per cent. That shows very clearly the unequal taxation of the different Provinces. I have been very careful to go into this matter thoroughly, because the hon. the Minister of Finance has so repeatedly sought to show the people of the Maritime Provinces how little taxes they pay into the Dominion Treasury, and that they pay nothing towards the expense of the North-West Territory, or the expenditure on canals, railways, and other works, which are charged against the Consolidated Account. A careful examination of the provincial trade and taxation of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick will show that they pay heavier taxes than Ontario and Quebec, and have contributed per population every dollar of their shares to the expenditure of the Dominion. I think it will be a fair calculation if we take the imports into the Maritime Provinces during the five years previous to Confederation, as an average to work upon. If we do that, we find that, with the regular increase of population, according to the last Census, New Brunswick has imported for consumption, from 1863 to 1881, $123,468,000 worth of merchandise. The Trade and Navigation Returns, however, show that, from 1868 to 1881, the imports were $104,424,075, and the amount of duty collected thereon was $16,071,878. But on the consumption of $123,468,000, as I have stated, the duty would, under Dominion rates of taxation collected, $20,658,563, or $24,044,552 worth more goods consumed and $4,586,688 more duty collected. That is for New Brunswick alone. There can be no doubt that as the country advances the people consume more goods, and their consumption will yearly increase; but I have taken the amounts just as the population increased. For Nova Scotia, the Trade and Navigation Returns show in those years goods entered for consumption to the amount of $123,053,114, on which there was duty paid amounting to $17,834,855.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Do I understand the hon. member to say that during the five years previous to Confederation $104,000,000 worth of goods were entered for consumption.

Mr. BURPEE. No. I took the average of five years previous to Confederation as a basis to work upon. I take $7,978,183 as the average imports for the five years previous to Confederation for New Brunswick; I did so because during the year immediately preceding Confederation the imports were $10,000,000, and I thought the Minister of Finance would take exception to that year as the imports were so large, in making the calculation, I have taken the average amount which I have stated, and have taken into account the increased population year by year. The imports of Nova Scotia, during that period, amounted to $123,053,114, on which duty was paid to the sum of $17,834,855. The consumption on that basis, of the average of the five years before Confederation and on the increased population, from 1863 to 1881, would be $179,529,748, and the duty collected, directly or indirectly, was $23,894,055, or an increase of consumption from Ontario, or Quebec, of $56,471,634, in those years, and an increase of duty of $9,060,100. Those figures, I think, answer the question as to the consumption of the Maritime Provinces, and what these provinces do not import from Great Britain and United States comes from Quebec and Ontario. The hon. the Minister of Finance referred to the sugar question. There is a singular circumstance in connection with it, that it is impossible to find out, either from statistics or from the refiners, as to the loss of weight to the refinery in the quantity of sugar between the time when it is taken into the refinery and when it passes out as between the grades of sugar. In 1874, there were imported 111,934,604 lbs; in 1879, 118,366,467 lbs; in 1880, 116,847,000 lbs; in 1881, 136,416,000 lbs. The average price, in 1877, was 5½ cents per lb., and, in 1881, 3½ cents per lb. We find that the loss of revenue, comparing the two Tariffs, was, for the year 1880, $754,249, taking the same quantity and quality as 1878 for comparison, and $755,718 for 1881, making a total loss of revenue of a little over $1,500,000 on what would have been collected under 1878 Tariff if quality and quantity imported be the same. The average price, as taken from the New York Price Circular and Journal of Commerce, which is an authority on all wholesale prices, was, for sugar in bond in New York, $613, and duty paid into Canada under the Tariff of 1878 would be, in Canada, $3.66; 100 lbs. the average price for Canada refined, as taken from the Montreal Journal of Commerce, was $9.70. In drawing this comparison I have taken every week and month of the year, and striking an average it appears that the sugar of the United States taken out of bond and paying duty under the Tariff of 1878, would have cost here $1.04 per 100 lbs. less than it cost us Canada refined. Hon. gentlemen opposite will say that the cost of transportation should be added to the New York prices. To us in the Maritime Provinces and in most parts of Ontario, the cost of carrying sugar from New York to its destination is a good deal less than from Montreal. It is some 15 or 20 cents 100 lbs. less from

New York to St. John than from Montreal to St. John, and for the year 1881 the average price in New York, in bond, was $6.50, under the Tariff of 1878, would be on sugar laid down here, $9.12½ per 100 lbs, while the average of the Montreal was $10.09, showing an increase over that if imported under the Tariff 1878 from New York of 96½ cents per 100 lbs. The cost to the consumers (duty paid) on granulated sugars for the average of the year 1881 was, in New York, $9.61 per 100 lbs., and in Canada it was $10.09, showing 48 cents per 100 lbs. less to the people of United States than Canada. The hon. the Minister of Finance has spoken pretty freely of the increased cost of manufactured cotton goods and decreased cost of the article to the consumer as compared with 1878. I am not going into the question minutely, but I wish to refer to one point. The hon. gentleman, in his speech, said that raw cotton in 1881 was 2 cents a lb. higher in price than in 1878.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. More.

Mr. BURPEE. If the House will look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, hon. members will find that the price of raw cotton in 1878 was 10.70 cents per lb., and, in 1881, 10.44 cents per lb., showing what would be the cost to Canadian manufacturers, that is the value which manufacturers have entered at the Custom House in 1878 and 1881, and no doubt is correct. I do not propose to go through the different items to which the hon. the Minister of Finance referred, saying manufactured articles are less cost in 1881 than in 1878. I know from the information I have received, not only from merchants and consumers but from manufacturers, that the facts are quite different. There is an increase in the prices of a great many articles, but there may be some kinds of goods that are a little less in price owing to the cheapness of those goods in the European markets. Woollen goods are now and have been for the last few months nearly 20 per cent. cheaper in England than in 1878. Of course, our manufacturers are obliged to meet the competition and reduce their prices accordingly, but I venture to say the consumers and merchants can better decide what goods cost now as compared with 1878 than the hon. the Minister of Finance. The manufacturers control their prices according to foreign markets, and keep prices up so as to keep foreign goods out, which the consumers have to pay. With regard to the manufactures of the country, I believe that a revenue Tariff would but suit the business of the Dominion, and afford ample protection. I believe that a revenue Tariff such as we are now obliged to impose for the expenditure of the Dominion, properly adjusted, would suit all the manufacturers, and that they would prosper better under it than under the present Tariff. I admit that four or five manufacturers have been materially helped by the discrimination made in their favor by the Tariff, and that under it the cotton and woollen manufacturers, and sugar refiners, and perhaps the furniture manufacturers, have experienced a temporary help to their enterprises. But the question is, will they be able to stand in times of adversity as well as if they were of a slower growth and established on a better foundation. I have been more or less engaged in manufacturing, for many years, and I believe that it is more to the advantage of the manufacturers to be let alone as much as possible by the State and depend on the energy and enterprise of the promoters. Legislation in their favor does not prosper them on the whole; because they cannot and do not, as we know by the example of the United States, stand adversity as well as those manufactures which grow up, under less protection, by enterprise and industry. The Liberal policy has been very well defined—namely, to pursue such a course towards the country, in and out of this House, as will be to the interests of all classes in the Dominion, and not to discriminate between one class and another, but to legislate so that one class shall be as well protected and cared for as another. That policy has been pursued by us as well in as out of office, and I think the country will so appreciate and understand our policy. The laborers, the farmers, the lumbermen, fishermen, shipbuilders, as well as the majority of the manufacturers, have shown most conclusively, by letters and representations, that they are not benefitted by the present Tariff, but are taxed very heavily and unequally. Our policy stands in contrast with that of the Conservative party. Their policy is to take from him who hath not even the little that he has, and give it to him who has abundance.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John).

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Even at this late stage of the debate, I desire to make some remarks in reply to statements of previous speakers—

Mr. PLUMB. Will the hon. member allow me to say one word in explanation? I was violently interrupted by hon. members on the other side when I attempted to make an explanation—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has already spoken on this question.

Mr. PLUMB. I merely rise to explain and will not occupy much time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. You can only speak with leave of the House.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no doubt the House will allow me to make an explanation.

Mr. BOWELL. I take it for granted that in other cases the rule will be most rigidly carried out too. The hon. member for Niagara was asking leave simply to make an explanation when he was interrupted by the hon. gentleman from St. John.

Mr. BLAKE. He was not interrupted.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not think I am out of order, but if I am I will submit.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the permission of the hon. gentleman who has the floor to make my explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not the permission of the hon. member that is wanted, but the permission of the House.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the permission of the House, and if it is refused I will be glad to know it.

Mr. MACDONALD. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman making an explanation if he chooses. When he rose I was proceeding to refer for a few moments to some remarks made by the member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) during the course of his speech the other day. He said, on that occasion, that he quoted from the leading journal of Charlottetown, a statement that there had been less depression in that town for many years, and went on to trace it to the effect of the National Policy. Now this is far from being the case, and I cannot let that remark go uncontradicted. Any depression existing in Charlottetown is owing to different causes. We know very well we have had a very serious bank failure in that town, which has tested the business portion of the community very seriously. We know, also, that it has led to a temporary depression in business; but I strongly contend that the people of Prince Edward Island generally are in as flourishing condition, or as well off to-day, and as prosperous as they have been at any time in the past. I may add that the condition of the farmers and of the population generally was never better, and that money was never more plentiful, never circulated more freely, than during the past year and the present season. If we want to judge the real state of the country and the extent of its prosperity, we cannot go to a better source than the savings banks' accounts. Now, looking at the amount of the deposits in the savings banks in Prince Edward Island, what do we find? I just accidentally, this very day, saw a return of the deposits in the savings banks in Charlottetown for January, and I find that deposits for January, 1882, show an increase over the deposits for January, 1881, of 120 per cent. I find also that the withdrawals for January, 1882, over the withdrawals for January, 1881, only amounted to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and that the average deposits in January, 1881, reached \$97.74, while the average amount of each deposit for January, 1882, was \$127.33. Now, I contend that this is but an indication of the prosperity of the country. From my general knowledge of Prince Edward Island, there never was a time, in the history of that Province, when there was a larger circulation of money among the farming class than there is at present. The hon. member for Charlottetown, in the course of his speech, said he could not see how we could have a home market without an increase of population. He also said, I think, that, having the same number of people to clothe and feed as before, the National Policy could not furnish us with a home market. There is no doubt of this fact, that if a large number of our population turn their attention to manufacturing, and are taken from our farming population, there will be an increased market and consumption of the products of the farm; and there is no doubt that, if our people get increased labor and increased price for their labor, they will be larger consumers. Under the present policy, there is very little doubt the people eat better food and wear better clothes than they did under the policy of our predecessors. The hon. member for Richmond said that the people of the Lower Provinces pay more for their cotton goods, woollen goods and other articles than formerly. I deny that such is the fact. Having a good deal to do with that sort of business, I may say that never in my experience has the price of either cotton or the ordinary wear of woollen goods been sold at lower rates than at present. If people imported these goods under the present Tariff, it is probable they would have to pay higher prices for them, but we know very well that the wool of our own country is manufactured into the cloth that enters into general wear, and those articles are now sold at a cheaper rate than heretofore. The same thing may be said of cottons. Cottons are now manufactured in Canada and sold cheaper than if imported. The hon. member for Richmond, N.S. (Mr. Flynn) also said that the Tariff operates in favor of the rich man against the poor man. I deny that. The hon. member seems to think that the present Government are carrying out the policy of the late Government, when the latter taxed the tea of the poor man, as against the tea used by the rich. The hon. gentleman went on to say that the present Government taxed everything that was used by the poor fisherman. He seemed to have a great deal of compassion for the poor fisherman; but the poor fisherman is intelligent enough to know that the clothes he wears are manufactured in this country, and it is entirely useless for the hon. member for Richmond to try and make him believe he is paying dearer for them than he did under the late Government. The poor fisherman also knows that, under the policy of the present Government, the nets, lines, twines, hooks, &c., and other articles used by him, come in free of duty.

Mr. KILLAM. They always did.

Mr. MACDONALD. If these hon. gentlemen abuse the protective policy, they must, should they in the dim future return to office, put on a duty on those articles of the poor fishermen, if they carry out their theory. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat said the policy of the Opposition was not to tax one party at the expense of another. If they should carry out that policy they would have to tax every portion of the people alike, and to do that they would have to put a tax on the necessaries used by the poor fishermen, as well as those used by other classes. The hon. member for Richmond also said he would like to see the fishermen's bounty secured by Act of Parliament. On that score I agree with the hon. gentleman. I would like to see the bounty to the fishermen secured by Act of Parliament, because it is just possible some day or other the hon. member and his friends may come back to power, and, if they do, they will at once, should they follow out their Free Trade policy, remove the bounty that this Government, I am happy to say, has placed at the disposal of the fisherman. The hon. gentleman is opposed to Protection because, he says, it makes the fisherman, the mechanic, and the farmer pay more for the necessaries of life. Let us look for a moment at this statement. Everything that enters into consumption by the fisherman is manufactured in our country. His flour is ground out of wheat grown in Canada, his articles of clothing are manufactured here. There is, therefore, no foundation whatever for the assertion that the present policy taxes the poor fisherman. It has been said that the people of the Lower Provinces are prevented from taking flour from the United States with which they very often trade. The fact is quite the reverse. If our vessels go to Boston or New York they can always buy the quality that is used by our people, superior extra flour of Canada, in those markets, and lay it down at their own doors as cheaply as by the St. Lawrence or the Intercolonial Railway. Therefore the charge that the 50 cents duty per barrel is a tax on the poor fisherman falls to the ground. Now, Sir, with respect to the mechanic, we find he is situated, in some respects, like the fisherman. The material he wears is all manufactured in this country, and the increased employment furnished him by the increased prosperity, under the National Policy, puts him in a position to buy more goods from the farmer in a way that he could not do before. The farmer, in his turn, comes in for a share of the prosperity by finding a better home market for his productions. Not only has he a better home market, but he has reason to look forward to the time when we shall be in a position to treat with the Americans for reciprocity. We have now inducements to offer the Americans reciprocity. We can show them that they are losing the trade of this country to the tune of millions of dollars annually; we can show them that their coal is taxed when coming into Canada, and, in all these respects, that we have something to offer in exchange for reciprocity which we had not under the policy of our predecessors. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), in the course of his remarks the other day, took a fling at the coal duties. He said the coal duty was a fallacy; that it does not benefit the coal producers; and that it interferes with our shipping coal across the Atlantic. Now I am astonished at such an objection, because if a vessel has to take ballast across the Atlantic to the St. Lawrence ports she can come to the port of Sydney, get her cargo of coal there, and freight that will pay her for bringing it up to Quebec or Montreal, whatever port on the St. Lawrence she may go to for a return cargo. It is true, possibly, that the duty on coal has not given us a better hold in the United States markets, but it has placed us in a better position for a remission of the duty on their coal. The hon. gentleman also said that the coal production of the mines was greater in 1873 than in 1881. But he did not give us the returns after 1873, during the time his party was in power, for, during that period the production of the mines declined until they were at the point of closing. When the present Government came into power they began to revive, and the coal of the Lower Provinces is reaching the Upper Provinces to a greater extent each year. Not only that, but the manufacturers in the Lower Provinces are yearly increasing their demand for coal. Sir, I am not astonished at the hon.

gentleman for decrying the coal interests. I remember, not long since, when there was a fleet of vessels belonging to a company represented by the hon. gentleman, that was a credit to any country, and some of which were to be found on the seas in all parts of the world. That fleet flourished when the coal trade flourished, but when that trade went down the fleet of vessels that came into the harbor of Arichat went down also, and, so far as I know, they are not likely to come up again until the coal trade takes a turn for the better. The hon. gentleman also seemed to think it was a great hardship that the people of the Lower Provinces had to buy their goods from the people of the Upper Provinces, who, as he said, took nothing from them in exchange. Now, Sir, there is no doubt that we buy largely from the people of the Upper Provinces, and it is possible that they do not take as much from us in exchange. But it matters little to the people of the Lower Provinces so long as they have a good market for their productions elsewhere, so long as they can find an outlet in other countries for their products, of their fisheries, their farms and their mines. Not only that, but the policy of the present Government is building up a vast and extended country in the west which will in the future be one of our best markets for fish. Now, Sir, looking at this matter in a disinterested way, I may say that I believe it is in the best interests of the country that this policy was inaugurated. I believe it is doing good to the country generally, building up our manufactures, assisting our farmers and our mechanics, and I am happy to see that the Government have fulfilled their promises by taking the fishermen under their protection and affording them a small share of the prosperity that is coming to the people generally.

After Recess.

Mr. KILLAM. It is far from my intention to offer any lengthened remarks on the subject now engaging the attention of the House. I do not propose to go into any long discussion of the Tariff for reasons which must be obvious to every one. The subject has been very ably discussed on both sides of the House, and although, Sir, I had hoped that some of the arguments adduced on this side might have had the effect of converting some hon. gentleman opposite, I have practically abandoned that hope. I thought, Sir, that the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) might have had some effect on the hon. the Finance Minister, that he might have induced that hon. gentleman to see the error of his ways, and before parting from us this year might have made such a change in his policy as would have been more acceptable to the country and more creditable to himself. I thought probably that my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) and my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) would have had some effect on the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), and that the tone of that hon. gentleman's speeches and his other public statements might have been so modified as at least to have led the public to suppose that he had returned to the well known views that he once held on this subject. However, Sir, as I said before, I have about given up that hope. Hon. gentlemen need not ask if we are resigned to the situation, for we are not by any means. We are just as much opposed to the iniquitous National Policy, so-called—the policy of taxing the many for the benefit of the few—as we were when that policy was introduced. We are just as much opposed to the principle of taxing unnecessarily for the sake of accumulating a surplus to be expended in ways, proper or improper, as we were when the Tariff was introduced; but we find that it is no use to discuss the question with hon. gentlemen opposite. They are wedded to their idols and we will let them alone. But, Sir, we consider it our duty briefly, but in the most forcible manner, to state our views here in such a way that the country may be still aware that the representatives of the great Liberal party of this country in this House still hold sound political views—views in accordance with the spirit of the age, and the spirit of progress in the nineteenth century—views which we are proud to believe are wiser than those of our great grandfathers, which hon. gentlemen opposite pride themselves in entertaining. However, Sir, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the general principle of the Tariff. When this debate was begun by the Budget Speech of the Finance Minister I happened to interpolate a suggestion that he had fixed an arbitrary drawback for the duties paid on ship materials. The hon. gentleman liking, as no doubt he is justified in liking, the praise of those seated around him, made an answer which I did not consider a proper one, which I thought was rather disingenuous, and, of course, looking around to his followers for their applause he received it, and was very happy in having received it. I think it my duty—because it was no use for me to continue interrupting at that time—to address the House just now and vindicate the views which I hold and which led me to make the remark on that occasion. I do this in no captious spirit, but simply for the purpose of putting before the House plainly the views which are held by myself in common with hundreds of other people in this country. The hon. gentleman stated that, in 1879, he proposed to return all duties paid on all materials entering into the construction of ships, and he stated again and again that he was going to adopt the policy of returning on all goods exported a drawback equal to the amount of the duty paid on the materials entering into the manufacture of those goods. I know very well that in few cases has that been done. I understand that in the majority of cases, and in some important cases, he has refused to do it. The hon. gentleman afterwards professed to have carried out the policy which he promised in the first place, but he carried it out in this way: On the 12th of November, 1879, an Order in Council was passed, providing that a drawback not to exceed 40 cents per ton on ships without iron knees, or 50 cents per ton on ships with iron knees, should be paid on every ship built in the Dominion. The drawback was only to be allowed on canvas, paints, oils, chains, spikes, iron and iron knees actually used in the construction of the vessels, but, in 1880, the hon. the Finance Minister came to the House, and, in answer to an application from some hon. gentleman on this side, he brought down a return showing the amount of drawback claimed, and the amount granted; and he told us that he was giving an ample amount, because the most of those who had applied had asked for less than 40 or 50 cents a ton, as the case might be. He told us also, the other evening, that not one or only one had applied for any drawback in excess of the 75 cents which was to be allowed under the existing Order in Council. Well, the one statement had nothing at all to do with the other, and the hon. gentleman, in 1880, claimed that he was giving a sufficient drawback, but his return showed that out of fourteen applications four had applied for more than the amount given. The hon. gentleman, the other night, did not tell the House that most of the ships launched before the 1st of January, 1880, were built principally under the previous Tariff and were therefore not subject to the Tariff introduced by the hon. gentleman. More than that, the drawback was only paid on a few articles which I have just specified; and, besides, if the drawback was sufficient why did the hon. gentleman go on to increase it, and place himself in the position of paying out public money without the authority of Parliament? On the 15th of May, 1880, after Parliament had risen, an Order in Council was passed fixing the drawback at from 55 to 75 cents per ton, according to the classes of ships, payable, not upon proof of the duties having been paid, but simply payable upon every ship. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman intended to say that, but that is what I understood him to say. But if the hon. gentleman will bring down to the House one duplicate of the applications made with each case, and lay them on the Table, I think it will show that, in almost every case where application has been made by the builder of the ship, there is no reference whatever to the amount of duty paid, except that the blank is filled up with 55 to 75 cents, and that, in consequence, that amount is paid. It was not necessary to show that the duty was paid, because the Order in Council distinctly states that such a drawback shall be paid on ships, more in the nature of a bonus or a bounty than in the nature of a duty, because, as he explained, it was difficult to show which of these articles might have been imported and which were manufactured in the country, and very properly an arbitrary drawback was fixed. Having said so much on that point, I will review the question. The hon. gentleman proposed, in the first place, a drawback of 40 and 50 cents, claiming that that was the duty paid. By an Order in Council, he increased it from 50 cents to 75 cents per ton. In 1879, he repeatedly told us that he intended to return all the duty paid on all materials used in the construction of ships. In 1880, he said that 50 cents was generally sufficient. Well, we had various opinions about that. I think the case practically stands thus: In 1873, certain duties existed. I am unable to say what they were, but it is not necessary for the purpose of my argument that I should. It is not possible for any person to make an estimate of the actual duties paid on these articles going into the construction of a ship, but certain duties existed under the previous Tariff. In 1874 my hon. friend from Centre Huron brought down his Tariff, and we were then met with a howl of opposition from hon. gentlemen opposite, who said that $1 a ton extra was being imposed. We did not admit that at the time, and many calculations were made to show that the additional duty imposed would not amount to over 60 cents a ton. Last summer when the hon. Minister of Railways was down on missionary business to Nova Scotia, he made a speech at West Branch, in the county of Pictou, in which he is reported—I take the report from the Halifax Herald of the following day, as having said that Messrs. Jones and Carmichael had voted to put an additional tax of $1 a ton annually on ships. He repeated this statement again and again in the meeting, and stated, further, that Mr. Carmichael had voted that 380,000 Nova Scotians should pay $400,000 per annum of taxes on shipping. The hon. Minister of Railways is sometimes carried away by his enthusiasm, but I do not think he intended to make such a gross blunder as that. We will suppose, for the sake of argument, that before the hon. member for Centre Huron brought down his Tariff, the duty on shipping amounted to 60 cents a ton; according to the hon. Minister of Railways the hon. member for Centre Huron put on an additional $1 a ton; then the hon. Finance Minister came in with his Tariff of 1879, and proposed an additional tax we will say of 50 cents a ton; that will make a total of $2 a ton. Well, if $2 a ton exists on shipping, how does the hon. Minister of Finance suppose that he is going to counterbalance this by paying a drawback from 55 to 75 cents a ton? I am only making these statements for the purpose of showing the House and the country what reliance is to be placed on the statements of the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Railways. If these hon. gentlemen are no nearer the truth in the rest of their statements than they are in this matter, how can they be safely trusted with the government of the affairs of this country? The hon. Minister of Railways stated repeatedly during that canvass in Nova Scotia, that Mr. Carmichael had voted to make 380,000 Nova Scotians pay $400,000 annually on shipping. The real facts were these. In that year I think a larger number of tons were built than in any year in the history of Nova Scotia ship building—I think there were 84,000 tons building, on which, if the statement of hon. gentleman opposite had been correct, a duty of something like $400,000 additional would have been paid—though I deny that the hon. member for Centre Huron imposed more than 60 cents a ton additional; but the result was that the friends of the hon. Minister of Railways in Nova Scotia claimed that in consequence of his abuse, the hon. member for Centre Huron had been compelled to withdraw his resolutions. The contrary was in fact the case. Nobody supposes that the bluster of the hon. Minister of Railways would have the slightest effect in that direction; it was the moderate and reasonable representations made by supporters of the hon. member for Centre Huron, that induced him to take the matter into his consideration and reduce these duties to a figure, which probably left the increase at something like 30 cents a ton. The $100,000 of the hon. Minister of Railways are reduced on inspection to certainly not more than $25,000. Then it was considered necessary to increase the taxation of all classes, unlike the Tariff introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite, which increase the taxes of a few, and which was class legislation. I ask again, if all the statements of those hon. gentlemen are no more truthful than those I have cited, how can they be trusted to administer the affairs of this country? I listened with some attention, the other day, to the speech of the hon. President of the Council. I regret that he is not here, but I presume that, having been converted so often, it is idle to expect that any argument of mine will produce any material change in him. He has come into the House of Commons recently, after his long absence in another place, to treat us with doctrines the opposite to those advanced by him when he was here before. When I first had the honor to be a candidate for a seat in this House, I made liberal use of the arguments of the hon. President of the Council. He told us that when the Maritime Provinces were brought into Confederation, there would not be reciprocal trade between them and Canada—that our imports would increase, but that instead of paying duties into the public Treasury, we would be paying them into the pockets of Canadian manufacturers. That hon. gentleman cited, the other day, the fact that the imports of Nova Scotia had decreased by $7,000,000, and boasted that we were building up an immense trade between the Provinces. Formerly he said that we would be paying money into the pockets of Canadian manufacturers. I believed then that his views were sound, and I believe that the same views are sound to-day; I believe that if the Province of Nova Scotia had been left out of the Confederation, and we had been importing from wherever we chose, and buying where we could buy cheapest, the revenue that we would collect under such a Tariff as the hon. the Minister of Finance has levied would be, to-day, at least $3,500,000. I believe that we are really paying that amount now, but, under the Tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is paid in such a way that it does not appear, because instead of being paid into the public Treasury it is put into the pockets of Canadian manufacturers, and by the classes which form the majority of our population, and which, from the nature of their occupations, must consume a large amount of dutiable goods. I do not wish to refer at length to the remarkable speech of the hon. the President of the Council. I looked at him with sorrow; I thought what a useful man he might have been in the House of Commons, if he had not yielded to the blandishments of the right hon. gentleman opposite, and accepted office with a comfortable seat in the Senate; but he chose his own course, and, I suppose, he is responsible, not to us on this side, but to his constituents. Well, Sir, he gave us some remarkable ideas of trade; he quoted a lot of diminished imports in England, but was not sufficiently fair to the House to state that nearly all of those reductions were based on reduced values of the articles exported. He did not do that; he wished to convey the idea that effete England was dying out, because she had adopted the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that the New Zealander would soon be seated on London Bridge contemplating the ruins. There were now, he said, in Great Britain, no less than 1,000,000 paupers under Free Trade, while by adopting the principles of Protection, which we have carried out in Canada, what a prosperous country it might be. The President of the Council left out part of it. I am not going to refer at any length to the Trade Returns of Great Britain, I will just quote this with respect to the poverty question which may throw additional light upon the speech of the President of the Council. In England and Wales, in 1849, the first year for which there are complete returns, there were 931,000 persons of all classes receiving relief. On the corresponding day of 1881 there were 803,000, a reduction of 131,000. The population of England and Wales was estimated, in 1849, to be 17,564,000; the population in 1881 was estimated to be 25,798,000. The President of the Council came to tell the House that although there were 1,000,000 persons receiving aid in Great Britain—I suppose he meant in the United Kingdom—the proportion had fallen immensely; that while the number of persons receiving aid had fallen off 11 or 12 per cent, the population had increased 45 per cent. in the same time; that not only was there an actual decrease but there was an immense comparative decrease in poverty. Then, Sir, here is an indication of the progress of the country, and these are all the figures I am going to state on the subject because I think they convey a sufficiently correct idea as to the material progress of the Mother Country. The average annual value of property and profits assessed to income tax for the twelve years, from 1843 to 1854 (I commence at 1843 for the simple reason that that is the first year for which there are complete returns for the United Kingdom; it is rather before that, but I take an estimate for Ireland) was £277,000,000; for the twelve years, from 1855 to 1866 inclusive, £345,000,000; for the thirteen years, from 1867 to 1879 inclusive, £510,000,000; for the last five years of the thirteen £575,000,000. Is not that a complete answer to the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, that poor, unfortunate England is going to ruin and decay, because she does not adopt the far sighted policy of Protection which hon. gentlemen opposite advocate. I still decline to agree with hon. gentlemen opposite in their trade views. I regret to say that I will have to remain incorrigible. I think those views were only adopted as a policy of expediency during the time of depression in this country in 1876-77-78; that even now those hon. gentlemen are repenting that they were so short-sighted as to adopt this policy; and, if they are not repenting, at least that they see day by day that the country is repenting they ever placed them in power. We thought a short time ago that those hon. gentlemen were very much satisfied with themselves and their policy; we thought when we came here we heard rumors that in a short time they would seek an appeal to the people at the poll. Our hopes were excited; we thought, now is the opportunity of seeing how we stand, and what the people think on this question. Day by day those rumors have faded away—I hardly know the reason, there may be other difficulties in the way—but I think, as reports came in from different parts of the country hon. gentlemen opposite became more and more convinced that this policy was not one which is likely to be sustained by the people. However, we shall be very glad when they give us an opportunity. I suppose, however, the policy to be adopted would be very much like that pursued by the celebrated cook, of the Widow Bedott, in regard to potato puddings—that if the oven is very hot you will have to take them out some, and if it is not very hot you will have to leave them in a little longer. I apologize to the House for using such a humble illustration in such a dignified House, but my precedent is the President of the Council who interspersed his speech the other day as liberally with anecdotes of the kind. In conclusion, I beg to say that on this side of the House we have wider ideas than hon. gentlemen opposite. They talk about the poverty of England; they claim at the same time that the Tariff is calculated to foster trade with England, and to discourage trade with the United States. They wish us to trade, and they say they are doing all they can to assist trade with poor, falling England with England, that is hardly able to sustain herself, and to discourage trade with the prosperous and happy United States along our borders which are growing rich under the policy of exclusion, which hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to adopt. They tell us one moment that it is better to trade with England than the United States; at the next moment they tell us it is better to trade longitudinally than across a few degrees of latitude; and in almost the same breath they say it is better not to trade with any country at all, but that it is better to trade at our own doors and in our own home market. We on this side of the House have wider and larger ideas. I have heard the hon. Minister of Finance discoursing eloquently on the white sails and symmetrical hulls of the ships sailing on every ocean and carrying our flag into every port. What has the hon. gentleman done to assist in fostering that trade? He has given his attention to the sugar business. I think I will be perfectly correct in saying that only about $1,500,000 of fixed capital is invested in sugar refineries. To that subject the hon. gentleman devoted months of attention. I suppose I would be equally correct in saying that in the shipping and fishery interests there are $40,000,000 invested. What has the hon. gentleman done for these industries? To the ship-owner does he not say I return you 75 cents a ton, and to the fishermen I am going to give you a bounty this year of $150,000? The hon. member for Richmond, N.S. (Mr. Flynn) touched on this subject, and he was perfectly correct in saying that the hon. Minister of Finance has been bleeding the fishermen to the tune of hundreds of thousands of dollars during the last three years, and he now comes down and admits that the interest on the Fishery Award is due to those fishermen. If we add together the amount unjustly and unnecessarily taken away from them during the last three years, and the amount which the hon. Minister admits is due them, the interest on the Fishery Award, and gives them in return a bonus of $150,000 for this year, it cannot be expected that the fishermen of this country will approve the action of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The fishermen of this country are not to be led astray by any such sop as that. They know how they have been ill-used; they know how they have been unnecessarily taxed. They will take it of course, because men who are struggling for existence will not refuse a bonus of that kind when it is offered to them, but they will remember, when the day comes, that those who are entitled to their support are not those who place unnecessary taxation on them, who kept back from them their just share of the Fishery Award, but gentlemen on this side of the House, who resisted the policy of taxation, who fought well to secure their proper share of the Fishery Award for the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. VALIN. Will the hon. gentleman say what was the drawback given by the late Government?

Mr. KILLAM. Those will be the men who will receive the support of the fishermen of this country. I will not dwell longer on this question. I will content myself with saying that we are prepared to bide our time, to go to the country with those ideas, ideas broader than those of hon. gentlemen opposite. We believe, instead of imposing restrictions on trade, instead of doing all we can to obstruct commerce with the rest of the world, in removing trade restrictions, and that the greater the commercial intercourse nations have with each other the better it is for the interests of civilization and humanity in general, and for that country which was wise enough to adopt this policy first.

Mr. WHITE (North Renfrew). I do not intend to enter into any elaborate defence of the Government policy, or to discuss to any extent the question now before the House. I simply rise to offer a few observations in reference to the alleged disastrous effects of this policy on the lumber interest. I have been struck with the persistence with which hon. gentlemen opposite have devoted themselves to the discussion of the disastrous effects of this policy on that particular interest, and it has occurred to me that these hon. gentlemen would not be so solicitous for the welfare of the lumber interest were it not that my hon. friend the Finance Minister represents in the Government a Province specially interested in the success of that industry. In discussing the effect of the National Policy on the lumber trade we must take into consideration the fact that the hon. gentlemen opposite led by the hon. member for Centre Huron, followed by the hon. members for North Norfolk, Middlesex and Brant, have declared that the imposition of duties upon agricultural products had had no effect in enhancing the value of those products or of benefitting the farmers of Ontario. Again, the hon. member for Gloucester declared in the most positive terms that the introduction of the National Policy has had no effect in increasing wages. We must, therefore, come to the conclusion that the disastrous effect produced by the Tariff on the lumber industry has been produced by the increase of the price of manufactured articles. The hon. member for Centre Huron read, during the course of his speech, a letter from a leading lumber merchant whose name he did not give, but who had declared that the policy of the Government had increased the cost of lumber by from $1.00 to $1.50 per 1,000 feet. I propose, as I pretend to know something of the effect of this policy on the lumber trade and the comparative cost of the manufactured articles now and under the Administration of the hon. gentleman opposite, to read to this House a comparison of the cost in 1878 and 1882 of the manufactured articles that enter into the production of lumber, and as, like the hon. member for Centre Huron, I prefer to go to the fountain head to obtain my facts, I have extracted this statement from the books of the firm of which I am a member. I find these comparisons are as follows:—

Chains.....	6½ cents.	6½ cents.
Ropes.....	10 "	12 "

As the price in 1881 for ropes was 10 cents, you will observe the increase is due to the increase in the cost of the raw material, and not to the effect of the Tariff on that particular article:

	1878.	1882.
Iron.....	$ 2 60 to $ 2 75	$ 2 75 to $ 3 00
Steel, sleigh shoe....	04	03½
Cast Steel.....	18	16
Axes, scoring.....	13 00 to 15 00	13 00 to 15 00
" broad.....	4 50 to 5 00	4 50 to 5 00
" chopping.....	11 00 to 12 00	9 00 to 10 50
Grindstones.....	02½ per lb.	02½ per lb.
Tea.....	27	19 or 23½ with duty.

Now, a good deal has been said about the effect of this Tariff on woollen goods, especially on blankets in the price, an increase of which I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite dilate upon very feelingly. I am not in a position to make a comparison of the cost between 1878 and 1882, from my own knowledge, but I have a statement from a woollen manufacturer near this city, who is a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, and who held a seat in this House during last Parliament. His statement shows that those articles are now sold cheaper than they ever were in his experience.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Then raise the tax.

Mr. WHITE. If to raise the tax would have the effect as it has had of increasing competition and thereby cheapening the articles, we would be very glad to have the tax raised. These are the comparative prices of manufactured articles that enter into the production of lumber. But whilst I make the statement to the House, I frankly admit, that this statement of the hon. member for Centre Huron, that the cost of producing lumber has very materially increased during the last two or three years is correct. But, Sir, how has it been enhanced? I will glance now at the comparative prices of the agricultural products which entered into the production of lumber in 1878 and in 1882. I find that for pork we paid, in 1878, $16 per barrel, and, in 1882, $21.25; flour, $5.50 in 1878, and $6.25 to $6.50 in 1882; oats, 35 cents in 1878, and 40 to 43 cents in 1882—showing an average increase in the cost of those agricultural products of over 20 per cent. in 1882 over 1878. Then we come to the question of labor, which is one of the largest items of expenditure in the production of lumber, and we find that there has been of late a very material increase. Men to whom we paid $8 or $12, in 1878, we now pay $16 to $20; others whom we paid $18 to $22 in 1878, we now pay $36 to $36; and again, those to whom we paid $32 to $40 in 1878, are at present paid $40 to $55; another class paid $20 to $22 in 1878, are now paid $30 to $35, while men who got $12 to $15 in 1878, now receive $20 to $35, showing an average increase of over 50 per cent. in the value of labor in 1882 over its cost in 1878. Now, I contend that those figures show that the policy of the present Administration has succeeded; that the prophesies of hon. gentlemen who in 1878 sat upon the other side of the House and who then propounded a policy to the country, which they said they would carry out should they be invested with office again have been verified, and that the policy of the present Government has been completely vindicated. We then said that our policy was one in the interest of the farming community, and in the interest of the lumbermen, and it has had the effect of increasing the prices both of agricultural products and of labor throughout the country. Now, it is as I said, quite true that an increase has taken place in the cost of producing lumber, but I would like to ask the hon. member for Centre Huron, assuming that he pursued his enquires far enough to ascertain, whether his informant would rather have the result of business to-day, or the results in 1878—whether the increase in the value of the material of the lumber, as produced and manufactured, is not very much greater than the increase in the cost? I dare say that hon. gentlemen opposite will say that the increase in the value of that article has been brought about wholly by the foreign demand. But if these hon. gentlemen will take a little pains to ascertain what the consumption of lumber is in the country—which has been the direct result of the National Policy, the direct effect of the increase in the erection of factories, and in the furnishing of habitations for operatives throughout the country—I think they will admit that at least some effect has been created by the National Policy in producing a home demand for that particular article. I think I hear the hon. member for Gloucester dissenting from that proposition; but the hon. gentleman perhaps does not know that, in Montreal alone, during the past year upwards of 100,000,000 feet of sawn lumber and timber were consumed, and in Toronto upwards of 80,000,000 feet, while throughout the whole of Canada the same effect has been produced. Now, I repeat that if the member for Centre Huron had pursued his enquiries a little further he would have found that his lumber friend would have told him, that, notwithstanding the increase in the price of lumber, the increase in its value was so much greater that his net profits were very much greater in 1881 than in 1878 or 1876, years during which hon. gentlemen opposite held office. Surely it was not the disastrous effects of the National Policy on lumber interests that enabled the Ontario Government to make so successful a sale as that reported on the 6th December last, of which the Globe speaks in the following terms:—

"The sale of limited berths by the Ontario Government yesterday was more successful than any that has yet taken place.

"It was the first Government auction since 1872, and from various circumstances, including the present and prospective profitableness of the timber trade, prices were unprecedentedly high, averaging very nearly $600 per square mile, as against only $200 in 1872, at the last sale, and aggregating $717,176.

"The limits sold cover 1,281 square miles, an area equal to that of the county of Wellington."

And you will remember that, in 1872, the country was in a very prosperous condition, and we had not this disastrous National Policy that appears to sit like a nightmare on hon. gentlemen opposite. So much for the effects of the National Policy upon that industry. I think that hon. gentlemen opposite will find, when they come to make an appeal to the country—and I heard the last speaker say that they were anxious it should take place as soon as possible—but I can only tell him that he does not reflect the opinions of the leading organ of the Reform party in Ontario—because it seems to view the possibility of an early dissolution and election during next summer with some degree of alarm—I think they will find themselves very much mistaken if they calculate upon success. I can tell that hon. gentleman and his friends that appeal as they may to the different interests and industries throughout the country, taking them separately, and endeavoring to create prejudice in the minds of those connected with certain industries, that when that appeal is made to the country, the result will be more overwhelmingly disastrous to those hon. gentlemen than the elections of 17th September, 1878. I do not quite agree with the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance that it is impossible for this Government to protect or enhance the lumber interest. I agree with the hon. member for Centre Huron when he says that some encouragement should be given to the manufacturer of small wooden wares, of doors, sashes, blinds and goods of that description. I do not, however, agree with him when he says that the hon. the Finance Minister should give, for the purpose of encouraging the manufacture of those articles, a bounty to the lumber trade. I think that the better mode would be to adopt a policy favoring the conversion of a very considerable amount of material that now goes to waste into articles affording considerable employment to operatives and giving to the manufacturers a small profit. We must remember that in the United States there is a large home consumption, and the manufacturers of those articles in the country have a home market of upwards of 50,000,000, whereas the manufacturers of Canada would have a home market of only 4,500,000, so that the manufacturers in this country are to a great extent handicapped by the fact of a small home market as compared with the American market. I find that as the result of that advantage there is a large export of those articles from the United States to the British Colonies other than Canada. For instance, in 1880, there was exported from the United States goods of that description to Newfoundland and Labrador to the value of $16,864; to the British West Indies, $92,073; to British Guiana $13,134; British Honduras, $8,983; British East Indies, $4,174; British possessions in Africa, $303,345; Australasia, $367,677, making, in all, $806,240 of that class of goods exported from the United States to the British Colonies, whilst we in Canada exported to the British Colonies $18,566 worth. It seems to me that if the Government would, by the appointment of Commissioners to visit those colonies and endeavor to create an intercolonial trade, as inter-provincial trade has already been such a success, if they would take some means to build up intercolonial trade between Canada and the other British Possessions, they would confer upon the lumber interests the greatest benefit that could be conferred upon it. I throw out this suggestion with the hope that the Government may, in their wisdom, deem fit to offer some degree of assistance to that particular interest. I do not think, however, as I said before, that those engaged in the lumber trade and especially the operators, will be found to support the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I think that when the time comes it will be found that that interest will unite in returning the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches to the position they at present occupy.

Mr. FLEMING. The hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) claims, as a result of the National Policy, the increased price of agricultural productions and the higher rate of wages which is now paid. But it so happens that a higher rate of wages is now current in the neighboring country than was current in 1878, yet there has been no alteration in its fiscal policy. It also happens that a higher price is paid for agricultural products in the United States now than there was in 1878, and yet there has been no change in their Tariff. By referring to the Journal of Commerce of February 3rd of the present year, I find quotations of the price of wheat in the United States in the years 1878 and 1881, as follows: Winter wheat, in 1878, $1.01; in 1881, $1.44½. Spring wheat, 1878, 90 cents; 1881, $1.32. Oats, 1878, 28½ cents; 1881, 47 cents. Corn, 1878, 46½ cents; 1881, 69 cents. Butter, 1878, 16 cents; 1881, 25 cents. Tea, with regard to wages, day laborers were paid, in 1878, from $1 to $1.50 per day; in 1880, from $1.50 to $2.50. Carpenters, in 1878, from $1.50 to $2; in 1880, to $2.50 to $3. Bricklayers, 1878, $2 to $2.50; 1880, $3 to $4. Now, unless hon. gentlemen claim that the National Policy in Canada has raised the price of agricultural products in the United States, and also raised the rate of wages, I think they cannot contend that the National Policy here is the only cause of the increased price of agricultural products and the higher rate of wages. Hon. gentlemen are very fond of comparing 1878 with 1881, and the prices of articles in those two periods, forgetting altogether the change in the outside world with regard to those articles; and it is well known, for example, that goods can be produced in Great Britain at a much lower rate now than in 1878. If the duty was lower by 17½ per cent., would hon. gentlemen say that the working man would not receive a greater amount of the products which he desires in exchange for his labor? When we listened to the hon. member for Cardwell the other night—and we always listen to his remarks with pleasure—my attention was recalled to a statement made by him last year, wherein I was proud to find that he had made an important admission. During the campaign of 1878, the matter was much discussed as to who was responsible for the expenditure for the year 1873-74. I was proud last year to find that that hon. gentleman admitted the year 1874-75 was the first year in which the late Administration had full control of the affairs of the country. I was somewhat surprised to find this year, however, that he maintained positively that the present Government were not at all responsible for the year 1873-74. Last year he stated, as recorded in the Debates, page 1081, "in the first year in which hon. gentlemen opposite had complete control of the affairs of the country that of 1874-75." Now this year the hon. gentleman declares that the year 1873-74 did not, in any sense, belong to the Mackenzie Administration, that they were not responsible for the expenditure of that year. Now he gave us no reason why he changed his opinion in the matter, though we would have been very much pleased indeed to have learned the reason. I think, moreover, he scarcely gave the hon. gentlemen on this side due credit for the opinions they hold. I find him stating the opinions expressed by them with regard to the control of Providence over our affairs seemed to him very shocking. He said:

"The manner in which hon. gentlemen have dealt with this name is little less than impious."

Now, I think hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, when they speak of Heaven's rain and Heaven's sunshine, have in view, not these benign blessings coming down on the bare rock or the barren field, but upon the seed that has been put into the soil which had been cultivated by the hand of man, where time and labor had been expended in preparing the ground for receiving that seed. I think that was the idea in the minds of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House when they so spoke. Will any hon. gentleman on the other side say that; after a man had done all he could in preparing the soil and putting it into a proper condition to receive the seed, and after having scattered the seed thereon, that any policy that could be devised would cause one grain of that seed to germinate, that a 30, 40 or 50 per cent Tariff would cause that little germ to spring upward or the root grow downward? Would any National Policy that has ever been contrived cause that grain to grow? If there is any one impious, surely it is he who says that man, independent of the sun and of the seasons, can bring about prosperity, as was said on one occasion by an hon. gentleman who in speaking about the right hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) said the prosperity which he has given the country. The hon. gentleman also made a comparison of the value of the exports of agricultural products in 1877-78, with those in 1880-1881, and he made out the difference to be only $322,501 or only 2 per cent. Or, in other words, he claimed that only 2 per cent of the prosperity of the country was due to the good crops, I would not say that the hon. gentleman did so designedly, but it is singular that he omitted to mention a great many important articles of produce which were exported in 1881. Looking over the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find that, in 1877-78, we exported of green fruits, $149,330, and in 1880-81, $645,658; hay, in 1877-78, $1,163,628, and in 1880-81, $1,813,208; potatoes, in 1877-78, $361,134, and in 1880-81, $830,218; malt, in 1877-78, $439,792, and in 1880-81, $649,857; beans, in 1877-78, $76,013, and in 1880-81, $117,708; rye, in 1877-78, $251,669, and in 1880-81, $783,840; vegetables, in 1877-78, $26,026, and in 1880-81, $67,745, or an aggregate of $1,467,585 in 1877-78, as against $4,908,234 for these articles in 1880-81. The total amount of exports of agricultural products in 1877-78 was $18,808,754, as against $21,668,327, or a difference of $3,159,573, or 17½ per cent. instead of 2 per cent. as stated by the hon. gentleman. Let us look at the matter in another way, namely, by taking the average exports of agricultural products during the four years, 1874 to 1878—the years of depression—and the average under the National Policy, namely, from 1879 to 1881. The average during the former period was $17,774,038, and during the latter $21,063,706, an increase of 18½ per cent. Of animals and their products the increase has been still greater. I will not trouble the House with the figures, but I may say that the difference between the former period and the latter amounts to 30 per cent. Let us look at the matter in another way. The total amount of agricultural products during the four years 1874--78 was $71,091,153; while for the three years, 1879--81 it was $63,191,119, or a difference of only 3 per cent. The difference with regard to animals and their products is only 2½ per cent. Now, I think these figures show conclusively that the harvest was a material and important factor in the prosperity of the country, though I do not claim that it was the only factor. I believe that the three years of depression forced on the people of this country the necessity of economy and thrift, and the good times we are now enjoying are in a large measure the fruit of the savings of the people. We have had a great deal of wrangling on the subject of deficits, but let us look at that matter in a common sense point of view. The deficit showed that the people were not buying goods—that they would rather do without many of them until better times came, and in consequence the imports fell off, therefore the revenue. Hon. gentlemen opposite, sometimes, but very rarely, speak of Protection as one of the causes of prosperity, but usually speak of it as the sole cause, and if it be the sole cause of the good times surely the fact is susceptible of proof. It is not sufficient proof to say that before the National Policy we had depression, and under the National Policy we have prosperity. We require further proof than that. One thing preceding another does not prove that the former is the cause of the latter, and besides we are reasoning from one period of time to another, and we should be careful that no other cause slips in during the intervening period. We say that such a cause stepped in. To test the matter let us take a familiar illustration. Suppose that A is a known fact, and we find that A is sometimes along with B, if we can find by looking through a number of cases that A sometimes exists and B does not, we may take it for granted that one is not the cause of the other. Now, I want to show the House that prosperity can exist without Protection, and if I am able to show that, that goes far to establish the proposition that Protection cannot be the cause of prosperity. I will take the best illustration which I think can be found, that is the illustration of two countries lying side by side, Victoria and New South Wales, one having a system of Free Trade, and the other a system of Protection. I alluded to this on a former occasion, in the year 1879, when I compared the year 1870 with the year 1876. On the present occasion I will draw the attention of the House to the condition of these two countries in 1871 and in 1878, the last years of which I can obtain accounts. In order that we may have a fair understanding of the case, I will also compare our condition with the conditions of those two colonies, and if the comparison is unfavorable to us, it is with no disrespect to our own country that I make it known. I am quite willing to admit that these two colonies have natural advantages which we have not, and if they have increased in wealth faster than we have, I think it is due to that fact rather than to their own energy. If nature has done less for us, we ought to do more for ourselves; if nature has not furnished us with so genial a climate, then we ought to make this country as comfortable and inviting for the immigrant as we can—and this is one of the strongest objections I have to the National Policy, that it enhances the price of those articles that contribute to the comfort of the people in our climate. Fuel, food, and clothing, these three articles ought to be obtainable at the lowest possible price, and if we make these articles cheap in this country, we can offer inducements to emigrants to come here. Last year at a meeting of the Colonial Institute in London, Sir Alexander Galt asked why so few emigrants went to Canada, compared with those that went to the United States; and I think it was Mr. Anderson, the member for Glasgow, who replied that the United States had, on the whole, a better climate—a greater variety of climate—"and in order to make up for these advantages," he added, "you ought to offer them inducements to come; the protective Tariff which you have is making your country more objectionable than it should be; reduce your Tariff, make your country more attractive, and you will get emigrants." Now, let us make a comparison between Canada, Victoria, and New South Wales: and I may remark that the duties imposed in Victoria are not very heavy, ranging from about 10 to 20 per cent. New South Wales is as near Free Trade as it can be; there are no duties on manufactured goods whatever, the revenue being derived from the duties on teas and certain descriptions of sugar chiefly.

The increase of population in Canada during the last decade was 24 per cent., in Victoria 20½ per cent. in seven years, and in New South Wales 37½ per cent. in seven years. The exports of Canada have increased 32½ per cent. in ten years; the exports of Victoria have increased 2½ per cent. in seven years, while the exports of New South Wales have increased 66½ per cent. in seven years. The exports per head are $20.41 in Canada, $85.08 in Victoria, and $93.44 in New South Wales. The imports and exports per head in Canada are $41.60, in New South Wales $199.88, and in Victoria $176.96. We are not able to form an estimate of the value of the farm stock in Canada, but in Victoria it amounts to $75 a head, and in New South Wales to $205 a head. The bank deposits per head in Canada on the 28th of Feb., 1882, were $23.50; Victoria, in 1878, $100.72, and in New South Wales, $120.55. In regard to immigration, one of the statements made time and again against the policy of the late Administration, was that it was driving the people out of the country. Now, it was not a Free Trade policy that we had; there is no use of hon. gentleman opposite saying that we hold Free Trade views; whatever our views may be, they are only a difference in degree. But if we were driving the people out of the country under a 17½ per cent. Tariff, we should suppose that Free Trade would drive more out of the country; and yet we find that, from 1874 to 1878, the immigration into Victoria was 182,730, and the emigration 160,119, an excess of immigration of 22,611, while, in the same period in New South Wales the excess of immigration over emigration was 50,500. The imports from Great Britain to Victoria per head were $37.19, and to New South Wales $45. And while I make these comparisons to show the relative success of the two countries, you must remember that Victoria produced in twenty-nine years $9,615,000,000 in gold dust, while New South Wales produced in the same period only $1,620,000,000. I think that shows conclusively that it is possible to have prosperity with protection. I will now refer to some remarks made by the President of the Council which I can hardly allow to go unchallenged. That hon. gentleman, although he recently became a member of this House, is an old parliamentarian, I suppose of nearly a quarter of a century's experience, and of course he will not expect to have the same treatment meted out to him as would be given to a new member, and his position as the President of the Council gives authority to his utterances. Allusion has been made already to the hon. gentleman's manner of treating the Mother-Country. It is somewhat remarkable than hon. gentlemen opposite taunt us on this side of the House with playing into the hands of the Americans. They are continually thrusting into our teeth that our policy is one for the advantage of the American people. At the very time when those hon. gentlemen are doing this, they are trying in every way to belittle the Mother-Country, and speak slightly and disrespectfully of it. With respect to the comparison made by the hon. President of the Council as regards the exports from Great Britain, I think he was very unfair in his selection of years. He took certain years to make one comparison, and other years to make another comparison, selecting such years as would enable him to make a point in his own favor. Such is, however, a rather unfair way of making a comparison. For example, with respect to the exports of cottons, the hon. gentleman took 1873, 1878 and 1879; for wollens, he took 1870, and compared it with 1879; for iron and steel, he took 1877, and compared it with 1879; for wool, he took 1877, and compared it with 1879, and so on. And when he wanted to make a comparison the other way, he said there was a decrease in all those articles, except in machinery, which showed a large increase, which I suppose went to other countries to enable them to manufacture goods. If the hon. gentleman had desired to make a fair comparison of the exports, he would have taken the two last years, 1880 and 1881, and compared them with 1878 and 1879, and he would then have given a fairer comparison in regard to the progress of the country. With respect to linen goods, which the hon. gentleman quoted, we find that in 1880-81, as compared with 1878-79, there was an increased exportation of 6 per cent., woollens increased 8½ per cent., cottons 36 per cent., iron and steel 43 per cent., showing that the Mother-Country was not retrograding but progressing; that the reason why there had been a reduction in the exports in 1878 was largely owing to the shrinkage of value and to the inability of the people in other countries to purchase their products. Looking at the exports of Great Britain to the United States, we find that, in 1880, as compared with 1878, manufactured cottons increased 58 per cent., iron, wrought and unwrought, 699 per cent., woollen 32 per cent., again showing that Great Britain was not falling behind, but was holding its position, and that the depression was only a temporary one. The President of the Council made a statement at which I felt pained; he declared that the people of Great Britain were heavily taxed, and that the workingman was taxed on his sugar. The hon. member for Bothwell at the time endeavored to set the hon. gentleman right, and said that the English workingman had free sugar. "Then," said the President of the Council, "the records are wrong." This is most astonishing—that the President of the Council did not know that the duties on sugar were repealed in 1874. Where was the hon. gentleman all that time? He reminds me of Washington Irving's story of Rip Van Winkle. I imagine the hon. gentleman fell asleep in 1873 and awoke the other day to find that the world had progressed, and that Great Britain had advanced in its fiscal policy and removed the duties on sugar. With respect to taxes imposed on the people of Great Britain, there is no country in the world where the workingman can enjoy the fruits of his labor while paying so small taxes in the way of Customs dues. If he avoids drinking tea, coffee and wine and does not use snuff or tobacco he really has no Customs dues whatever to pay. The President of the Council drew a comparison between the shipping of this country during the past year as compared with 1877-78. He said the shipping of this country, in 1877-78, was 6,684,000 tons, while, in 1880-81, it was 8,104,333; but the hon. gentleman took the registered tonnage, and that is a very different thing from the freight tonnage. If he will examine the facts he will find that the whole freight tonnage, in 1877-78, was 5,187,892 tons, while, in 1880-81, it was 5,092,509 tons, or less by 95,383 tons. Here is a point which certainly possesses interest to the people in the western portion of the Dominion. It may be asked, what have we to do with tonnage? I answer that we have a great deal to do with tonnage. It stands to reason if vessels come to this country, the cost of carriage of freight will be lessened if vessels obtain return freight. I think it is very important there should be a trade both ways. If there is not, the farmer who sells his grain, or the lumberman who sells his lumber, has to pay the expense of the vessel coming out in ballast. This matter is a very serious one. The following is a statement of the register tonnage and freight tonnage of sea-going vessels leaving and arriving, 1880-81: Sea-going vessels leaving:

	Register tonnage.	Freight tonnage.	Percentage less than register.
British	1,673,117	1,529,162	8½ per cent less
Total	4,071,391	4,122,619	1 per cent more equal 51,228 tons over

The difference, therefore, between freight tonnage and register tonnage on English vessels leaving this country, is 8½ per cent., and the difference on the total tonnage is 1 per cent. more on the freight over the register tonnage. Sea-going vessels arrived :

	Register tonnage.	Freight tonnage.
British	1,752,888	534,413	75 per cent. less.
Total	4,032,946	969,890	75 per cent. less.
Total outwards and inwards	8,104,337	5,092,509	62½ per cent. less.

Total shipping trade outwards and inwards and including the inland trade :

Register.	Freight tonnage.
13,802,432	7,987,422	42 per cent. less, or 5,815,010 tons.

If we are to be a commercial people, we must consider how we are going to buy from other countries as well as how we are going to sell to them ; and when we are boasting of our trade with Brazil, with regard to sugar, our trade with Glasgow and Greenock is falling off to such an extent that our vessels are coming out in ballast. I think it would not be prudent at this late stage of the debate to enter into other matters relating to the effect of the Tariff. That has been discussed already ; but I would draw the attention of the hon. Finance Minister to this point. Speaking on the Budget last year of the benefits the farmer derived from the Tariff, he mentioned the article of rye and said :

"I find from investigation that there has been in part of the Dominion and along the banks of the St. Lawrence a new enquiry, enquiring for that article and that the distillers of Ontario and Quebec instead of using corn are asking for and buying rye, giving growers an increased price as the result of the duty on corn and rye."

The hon. gentleman, speaking on the same subject, this year, said :

"The distillers of Canada now come to the farmers of Canada for rye which they use as a substitute for corn. That gives an increased market, and, to a certain extent, affects the price."

These are plain statements. This is now a question of speculation, but one which we are in a position to prove beyond the shadow of doubt. The Inland Revenue Returns give us the total quantity of grain used in the manufacture of spirits.

	Total used.	Corn.	Percentage of corn.	Rye.	Percentage of rye.
1878	67,594,902	51,917,220	76½	10,529,912	15½
1880	53,394,258	41,409,142	77½	7,989,340	15

If therefore the proportion of rye used in 1878, had been used in 1880 and 1881, there would have been an additional consumption of 17,225 bushels in those years. Thus does that coincide with the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister, that the distillers of Canada are using rye as a substitute for corn, which gives an increased market and affects the price. With regard to the duty on corn, that is a matter in which I feel a very deep interest. If it was not that it would take too much of the time of the House, I would read an extract from the speech of Sir Robert Peel, in 1846, when he abolished the duties on grains of all kinds. As a result of taking off that duty and the importation of fertilizing substances we find that the farmers in Great Britain are able to produce on an average twenty-eight bushels of wheat per acre. I believe that for one farmer benefited by this policy, a duty on corn, a thousand are injured. I will give another instance of injustice to the farmer. Take the manufacturer of starch for example : he gets a drawback in the corn used by the manufacturer of that article ; but the farmer who purchases corn to feed the cattle, which is sold in the Old Country, in competition with the cattle of other countries, gets no drawback. Again, the miller may grind flour in bond, and oats in bond, and the pork packers may pack pork in bond, under this Tariff ; but the farmer cannot buy his corn without paying a high duty ; there was no help for him. He is made by the National Policy to be the ass which gets the least hay and bears most of the burden. I will notice another item in the Tariff, the duty on window glass. If there is one thing that ought not to be taxed it is the light of the sun. There is a protection in this article of 20 per cent, and, as I understand from hon. gentlemen well informed, the glass works at New Glasgow can be carried on profitably with this protection. Its owners have the coal convenient and can manufacture the glass required in the country and find a good market and make good profits at 20 per cent. But there is a new glass factory starting at Napanee for which this protection is not sufficient. How far will you carry that principle ? Suppose a man takes it into his head to work a sterile farm, all rocks and sand, and because he cannot raise the same amount of produce from it that he could from a fertile farm, he asks the Government to reimburse him for his outlay on the unprofitable place. Help given to such parties would but encourage men to go into business where they had no chance, and for which they were not suited. Under this policy, every settler who goes to the North-West has to pay more for a pane of glass, to foster that factory in Napanee. What is the benefit of this protection to the people of Canada as a whole ? The city of Montreal has, for example, derived its full share of benefits. I like to hear of its prosperity. I have no doubt there are many men in that city, of the highest culture, energy and enterprise, but it must be remembered that Montreal is not the whole of the Dominion. This country has a population of 4,302,000 odd, and the population of Montreal only about 140,000. Now, suppose a law were passed by which one man could take from every other inhabitant of the Dominion, 5 cents, he would gain by that operation $216,440 ; well, suppose this fortunate person were to pay out $140,000, or $1 a-piece to each inhabitant of Montreal, no doubt that would be considered a fine policy for the inhabitants of that city. This imaginary case gives a good idea of the operations performed by this Tariff. Would the country be any the richer from such an arrangement ? No, there would be just the same amount of money in it as before the operation ; but, instead of the money being in the pockets of the whole people, most of it would belong to one individual. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in pointing out the beneficial effects of the National Policy, forget that there are many others in the Dominion besides the manufacturers, that there are at least 6,000 towns and villages in the Dominion ; and if a map were employed, resembling the colored political map which, in not very good taste, was hung up at the entrance to the Library to remind the Liberal party of its defeat—if such a map were colored red so as to show the places where the National Policy produced any good effect, the blue, to show the places where it produced none—what kind of a map would you have ? You would have a map with just a few red spots here and there, but the greater portion blue. In dealing with protection to certain industries, you have to consider the whole country. The hon. Ministers forget that they are dealing with but a few individuals. One hon. gentleman, pointing out the benefits of the National Policy, reminded us how much more wealthy and prosperous the people of the eastern States were than those of the western States, and he pointed out a number of individuals immensely wealthy. He also showed that in the western States there were a considerable number of persons engaged in manufactures. It occurred to me, however, to ask—was it possible for any manufacturer to exist in the western States without protection ? The western States had no protection against the eastern States. How, then, can manufacturers exist in the western States? If it is possible for manufacturers to exist in the western States without protection, surely they might exist in Canada under a protection of 17½ per cent. If, again, it is possible for manufacturers to exist in New South Wales, where there is no protection afforded, surely they might exist in Canada under 17½. I wish to call attention to the condition of the manufacturers of New South Wales. One would suppose they could not exist without Protection. With regard to the woollen manufacture from 1860 to 1864, representing $32,632,000, the average importation from 1870 to 1874 was $29,571,950. Now, taking the increased population, the average for those last years should have been $47,684,620, the difference between these two sums showing the amount of home manufacture $18,112,670. In boots and shoes the average imports, 1860—64, were $8,626,380. In 1870-74 the average imports were $1,179,715. If the imports in the last series of years had been in proportion to the population, as they were in the first series of years, the imports would be $9,674,515, showing that there had been manufactured in the country $3,494,000. There are eighty-one large establishments in New South Wales engaged in the manufacture of boots and shoes, some employing 500 hands and some 350. I will read you an extract from a Melbourne newspaper :

“Our travellers report to us that they find great difficulty in placing our goods upon the neighboring markets, principally through the competition of Sydney with their own manufacture and European imported, sold sufficiently low to secure the custom. It must be remembered that Sydney has always had a steady export of her own manufactures, and that her manufacturers are giving inducements to our best workpeople to remove there. It also must be remembered that all leathers—the boot manufacturers' raw material—are admitted free into the port of Sydney, while an import duty of 7½, 10 and 20 per cent. is enforced in Victoria, thereby placing the Sydney manufacturer at an advantage.”

and if we look to the interests of the whole community, if we want to do what is just between man and man we must frame a Tariff by which no particular industry will be built up at the expense of the people, and if a man raise a crop that crop belongs to him and no one has anything to do with it. All he has got to do is to pay his share of the expense necessary to carry on the Government of the country, and if any law steps in and says to that man: “You shall not have the privilege of exchanging your article for another that you desire unless you pay tribute to some particular industry,” that interferes with the liberty of the subject. I have endeavored, Mr. Speaker, to show that many of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite are incorrect, that the arguments based upon these statements are consequently worthless. Believing that I have succeeded in exposing the fallacies of the hon. gentleman's reasoning, I am forced to the conclusion that men of ability and intelligence, such as these hon. gentlemen to whom I have alluded, must have been very hard driven, indeed, when they had recourse to such flimsy arguments, because I hold a skillful man will never use a bad argument for a good one. I will pronounce no panegyric upon Canada or its future. But I will say this: let us do the duty that lies nearest to us, and that is, readjust our Tariff so as to impose no burden on the people more than is necessary to carry on the Government of the country. Let our fiscal policy be such as will tend not to centralize, but to diffuse wealth throughout the country.

Mr. BEATY. It may be a comfort to the House to know that I do not propose to make any lengthy observations. Any that I shall make will be very general, and will bear in a general way upon the questions which have been presented to the House during this debate. I have watched the debate with some interest for the purpose of discovering the issues involved in this controversy. I have observed that the debate has been characterized with much ability and a good deal of industry, but it has also been, to a certain extent, strongly partizan and sharply hostile. Occasionally, I may say, happily not very often, it has been unseemly personal. I regret that these personalities have been imported into the debate; it does not add to the dignity of the House nor to the importance of the subject. When I come to consider the lines in which the controversy has run, I find two leading items. The first that is presented is the idea of a revenue Tariff. Now, I do not understand this idea to mean more than looking at it as a financial question. Revenue as a finance question solely. Now, is it possible for any Government to frame a Tariff for this country that shall have merely a financial aspect? It seems to me that there lies the fallacy of the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. Can a Tariff be framed that will simply have financial features in it? Must it not affect trade? Does not every Tariff affect trade? All the contention on the part of the Opposition with reference to the Tariff is that it affects trade; is it not that it affects it injuriously and that therefore it ought to be reduced? Now, as I view the case it is impossible to consider this question simply from a commercial point of view. It must always be considered in reference to the financial result as well as the effect it has upon the trade of the country. Now, their line of argument presented in this controversy is whether a trade policy—because I look upon the trade policy not altogether as the National Policy, although it has acquired that name—whether the trade policy of the country is a factor in the present prosperity of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite say it is not; hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have mostly contended that it has produced some result in the general prosperity which now prevails throughout the country. The contention, therefore, amounts substantially to this: Has the National Policy, the trade policy of the Government, an effect upon the national prosperity as it now exists? It is not denied that there is great prosperity all over the country—it is simply denied, as I understand the position of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the prosperity is attributable to the trade policy of the country, and nearly all the debate we have had on the Budget, has tended to that point. Now I submit the points of objection I have heard stated by the Opposition are not of a character to convince gentlemen in this House or in the country. They will fail to convince any one that the trade policy of the Government has not had a beneficial result in the Dominion from one end to the other. The objections which are chiefly urged against it are, first, that it is unsound in theory, that the laying on of a Protective Tariff is an unsound feature; that it is not a healthful feature or a helpful influence upon the country, and we are told, in reference to this matter, that it involves a question of Free Trade and Protection. Now, no person looking at the abstract questions of Free Trade and Protection can say that Free Trade should be applied to this country, more than that, so long as we have a revenue derived from indirect taxation the theory of Free Trade is impracticable or impossible in its application to this country. Under these circumstances, therefore, the doctrine of Free Trade cannot and should not be introduced into the controversy. The question is simply to what extent is any Government authorized for the benefit of the country to extend the rate of taxation and increase the Tariff. The contention of the hon. gentlemen opposite is that the rate of taxation is too high on some articles, and that it should be reduced to a moderate rate. In other words, that the Tariff should be re-adjusted. The theory, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite have been concerned, is that Free Trade should be applied, but only to the extent of producing a revenue by the Tariff, and they entertained that theory so far, that it ultimately ran away with them and ran them out of power. It was like the hunter and the bear. While the hunter pursued the bear it was good sport, but when the bear turned on the hunter the fun departed. Another objection which is presented, in reference to this matter, is that the increased taxation is oppressive, and this is their strong point. In the general aspect in which I shall look at the question, I judge that if the people were oppressed, if, as the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) expressed it, they are suffering from taxation, they would have expressed their sufferings so that we could hear from them in some form or other. I know that an agitation has been kept up on this question not only in the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite but at the public meetings which have been held throughout the country for the purpose of agitating the public mind. We know that the members of their party have wandered away down to the sea-side for the purpose of promoting health and politics, for the purpose of gaining fresh air and fresh conquests, and we know also that not a single objection has been presented to this House showing that any class of Her Majesty's subjects are suffering in consequence of this taxation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They rather like it.

Mr. BEATY. Yes, as my right hon. friend says, they rather like it, judging by the fact that they make no pretence of complaint in reference to the matter. And when you examine carefully the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite, what do you find? I do not recollect, at the moment, of hearing one hon. gentleman in this House, except the member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) and the member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) declare that his constituency suffered in consequence of this taxation. I find a general suggestion—and I would not have hon. gentlemen mistake me; I find cloudy insinuations from hon. gentlemen opposite that this taxation is oppressive, but when they come to the specific articles with regard to which complaint is made, we find they are very few indeed; and when we come to the different classes of people in the country what do we find? The manufacturers certainly do not complain. If we go to the traders who deal between the manufacturers and consumers, we hear no complaints from them; and when I speak of complaints being made, I mean complaints made in public meetings, and by those other means by which people are accustomed to make known their grievances. If we go to the farmers we find no complaint from them, and as to the mechanics, we simply hear that they want an increase of wages, because they know that the increased demand upon the manufacturers of the country is such that they can expect increased wages. The laborers stand in the same position, so that when you come to specific articles and particular classes of the community, we do not find that complaints are made in any substantial form which this House can take cognizance of in reference to the grievances which hon. gentlemen mention in connection with the Tariff. We find, on the contrary, that it has created great activity in the whole country; that it has increased the invention of the people, that it has resulted in improved machinery and the production of superior articles in consequence of the great competition and the skill and capital which is employed in production. Again, it is suggested that this is class legislation and therefore objectionable. Well, there is class legislation on a great many subjects. We have legislation for lawyers, for doctors, druggists, and others, but the question is, is it legislation for them or for the public. I think it is very objectionable to have legislation either for a class, or against a class, but Parliament has frequently passed Acts both for classes and against them, in a certain sense, but such legislation is always based on the principle that it is for the public good, and therefore a proper kind of legislation. That, I contend, is the kind of legislation that is presented in this matter. We are told that the consumer is affected disadvantageously by the Tariff, but where is the outcry coming from? From what class? What county has been heard from by petitioning or otherwise? We have innumerable petitions on questions of every description, but we have not had one petition representing the ideas put forth by hon. gentlemen opposite on this question. This is a substantial and undeniable fact which is clear in spite of all the figures which have been used so much in the course of this debate. We have not had from any part of the country, from Halifax to Victoria, a single petition on the trade policy of the country. Another statement put forward against this policy is, that it is detrimental to the country at large. In what respect is it so? What facts have been presented by hon. gentlemen opposite to convince any ordinary mind, any mind not given to figures, that this tariff is detrimental to the country at large? It can bear only two aspects—it must be either good or bad, beneficial or baneful. Now, we find on looking abroad, that the country, instead of going to the dogs, is prosperous; and while we are willing to give all the credit due to an abundant harvest, to an increase in the lumber trade, and to all the other factors in the development of this country, in any comparison we make with former years, we cannot exclude from our consideration the fact that the trade policy of the Government has been very beneficial, especially in the cities and towns for which I more especially speak. We are told by the hon. member for Yarmouth that hon. gentlemen opposite are in harmony with the spirit of the age. Wherein are they in harmony with the spirit of the age? Is it the spirit of the age in the United States, or in Germany, or in France? Is there not a tendency in England, to-day, to go back, to some extent—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. BEATY. Is there not a controversy going on in England, showing that there is a strong under-current in the English mind against the system of Free Trade as it exists there. It may not be at present very strong, because the traditions of generations cannot be done away with in a year or two. Is it with the spirit of the age in these countries that hon. gentlemen opposite are in harmony? And can it be said that they are in harmony with the spirit of the age in Canada, where they are in opposition to the policy supported by the people at the polls? Then the hon. member refers to the statements made by the hon. the Minister of Finance and the hon. the Minister of Railways in regard to these matters, and he wishes the attention of the country to be called to them. But has not the attention of the country been called to them? Has it not been called to them by all the organs of the Opposition, by all the speeches made in this country during the last three or four years, and by the thirty-six bye elections which have taken place? And what has been the effect of these calls? Has it not been to increase the number of the supporters of the Government, so that, out of these thirty-six seats, two were lost to the Government and six gained, leaving them four better than they were before? Then the hon. gentleman spoke of the trade of the country. Is not the trade of the country extending everywhere? Is it not extending within the country itself, to the West Indies, to England, and to the United States? All these things show that this policy has not been so disadvantageous to the country as hon. gentlemen opposite claim. But what is the positive evidence of the success of this policy? Why, we find new factories established, be they few or many, inducing capital to go into active works, instead of being invested in mortgages and land. In my own riding of West Toronto, for instance, representing about 39,000 people, during the last two years there have been nine new factories established, employing at least 1,600 hands; and the city of Toronto itself has increased in population 30,000, while, taking the suburbs with the city, there has been an increase of from 40,000 to 45,000 in the population; and this population, to my personal knowledge, is better off, has more employment, has more wages, and is in all respects more prosperous than it was three, six or eight years ago. And why is that? Not only because of good crops or increased prosperity in the lumber trade, but also because of the introduction of new factories and the enlargement of old ones. There has been an increase in the same direction all over the country. The other evening, while the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Kranz) was speaking of the increase of population in his riding, the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) interrupted him, and compared the Census of 1871 with the Census of 1881. At the time a memorandum was put into my hands, which states that the hon. member for South Waterloo was comparing 1871 with 1881, and not 1878 with 1881; that between 1875 and 1878 workman after workman and family after family moved away to the United States, because of the fiscal policy of the Government; that from the village of Hesper the establishment there for the manufacture of worsted goods was moved away to Holyoke, Mass., entirely because, as they said, of the trade policy prevailing in the country. That a different state of things exists to-day is what convinces people that the trade policy of the Government is a beneficial policy. Every man acquainted with city affairs knows that previous to about three years ago the manufactories were not fully employed; some of them had to give up, and some of them worked only half time; whereas now the manufacturers are busy all over the Dominion. That fact is undeniable; and thus not only mechanics and laborers are employed, but they in turn provide business for merchants and traders, and the result is found, as stated by the Minister of Finance, in an increase in the deposits of the savings banks during the last three years of over $13,000,000. Now that is a showing by itself indicating that in the cities and towns, for I am persuaded it is there that saving banks receive the largest amounts, mechanics and laborers are able to make deposits. That indicates as far as they are concerned that this policy is not detrimental but advantageous, that it is a policy which we at least are able to support, and which we think we can go to the country upon with full confidence whenever the time may come. I may add an observation in connection with what the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) said in connection with the lumber trade. Now, the fact that farmers obtain for their oats, pork and other produce larger prices where the lumber trade is carried on, is to my mind a conclusive proof of the truth of the contention of this side of the House that a home market is better for a country than a more distant market. Is it not a fact that wherever capital is brought and the lumber trade is carried on, farmers in those neighborhoods in most instances secure better prices for their oats, pork, hay and other produce than do farmers not in immediate proximity to lumbering camps? And that illustrates the idea which has been strongly and properly pressed here, that manufacturing industries in towns and cities furnish a home market which is a benefit to the farmers, and that the farmers therefore are not heard complaining or uttering any grievance in connection with that policy. I do not propose to dwell on that matter, because it has been so fully and with such detail presented to the House; but there is another item to which I wish to refer, namely, the railway policy which has been inaugurated and carried on so far with remarkable success under the present Administration. Now, what has been the effect of that policy on the country? Has it not relieved the Government of immense responsibilities in giving into the hands of a responsible and capable company the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Has not the giving of that work into their hands justified the method; have not the consequences which have resulted from it justified its adoption—the rapid construction of the road, the rapid development of the North-West Territory, the speedy settlement of the country, and the immense immigration which we shall have not only from Europe and all parts of the Eastern Provinces, but also from the United States, whereby a large number of Canadians who were driven across the lines by reason of the depression in former days will return to the Dominion? What do these facts prove? They prove that this policy in its national aspect is immensely beneficial to the whole community, that it gives vent to the energies which otherwise would be driven into foreign countries, that it opens out opportunities for the enterprise and capital of Eastern Provinces, and as we have seen by the statement made by the Minister of Customs the other day, it opens up new avenues of trade which otherwise would not be available to the Eastern Provinces. All this is in itself of the greatest importance to Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. But there is another feature in connection with the railway policy which is not often taken into account. While the Government is giving a large sum of money annually for the purpose of promoting this national railway enterprise, could any Administration have obtained for the same sum, better skill in railway matters, in financial enterprises, in opening up territory, in inducing immigration, than that possessed by the company which is at present carrying on the work? Not at all. They have found in the company superior skill, large capital, equal to the emergency and a faculty for opening up the country in a manner which has astonished everybody who considered the matter before the enterprise was entered upon. And there is in connection with this railway policy and general policy, a feature which I should not like to overlook, and it is this: I do not recollect any time since Confederation (of course there are hon. gentlemen who have been more largely engaged in politics who can speak more positively, as I have for many years only given a single eye to political matters) when there was such general tranquility as prevails to-day. There are no remonstrances from British Columbia or from Nova Scotia complaining of their condition in any particular way; they are quiescent, taking the circumstances as they come, and are enjoying the benefits of this policy. I am quite satisfied that at no time during those fifteen years were so few complaints, uttered in a tangible form, from any part of the Dominion. This railway policy produces an immense benefit to this country by opening up an avenue for the trade of the world. There can be no doubt whatever that it will open up an avenue between Europe and Asia across this continent. It is the shortest route, and, it may be said, it will be the best route, when established, for conducting trade between Europe and Asia. Our geographical position enables us to take this lead in the matter of inter-oceanic railways, and hence we stand in this position that, without this railway, Canada could never have attained to that condition of national aspiration which it has now reached, when the great North-West Territory is opened by running a railway from east to west. Then the land policy, which is a very important item, probably next in importance to the trade policy, and if there is any difference between them the land policy possesses a greater importance, is enabling the North-West to be settled up in a manner almost unparalleled in the history of this continent. While the United States have had to some extent the same run of events, yet now we are and will bring to a larger extent year by year the population of the Old World to new fields of enterprise in the North-West, in a manner that has never been paralleled in the history of the world. I notice that the Globe, in an article on Monday week, spoke in most enthusiastic terms of its effect on emigration from England as well as from Europe. The North-West not only gives room for emigrants from the Old World, but for the young and enterprising people of our own Dominion who want to enter into new fields and place themselves on that fertile land. Although not much has been said about the Colonization Companies, and we sometimes hear that the Policy is being abused, it seems to me that the Government would not be employing a more potent agency or a cheaper and better one for the interests of this country, than this scheme for introducing immigration, at no cost to the Government, but to the great advantage of the Dominion. The Government are relieved of the cost of bringing in immigrants, the land is sold for some money, which goes into the public Treasury, and reduces the public debt, and that being the case, this immigration policy, represented by Colonization Companies, is one of the best that has ever been devised. We sometimes hear of the national aspirations of the young men of this country. They have now a wide extent of country in the North-West, where they can employ every energy, invest every dollar of capital, and enjoy all the benefits which labor in that fertile country can give. The general results of our financial policy are the best that can possibly be conceived. When we look at the large revenue and surplus produced, without the country suffering or complaining, we must come to the conclusion that our financial policy was so well adjusted that no better result could possibly be arrived at. We cannot ignore that great fact of the immense surplus and revenue produced, without affecting the people injuriously, or even causing them the least loss of enjoyment, while promoting at the same time our national industries and national wealth. A policy such as this will, I am persuaded, be endorsed by the people at every opportunity. Then there is the general distribution of wealth evidenced by the large deposits in the savings banks, and by the opening of new channels in trade and manufacture to capital that formerly was locked up in land and other ways. These are the striking features of the National Policy which has been promoted by the present Administration, which has been supported by the great majority in this House and the country, and which has in every by-election almost that has taken place in the last three years, been endorsed by the people. Under the circumstances, should the House go back on the policy that has produced such beneficial results and being endorsed in so striking a manner? The lesson we have to learn is to let well enough alone. In reference to this matter it has been suggested that there will be a general election this spring. Whether there should be a general election or not, it is plain to me that it would be a great mistake to throw the country into the turmoil of elections during our present business prosperity. The party can well wait and the country can well wait. Let us then wait and see what the result will be; and then when we are all obliged to go to the people we will see what they have to say on this matter. I am persuaded, unless a very extraordinary revolution, which it is unreasonable to expect, will take place within the next 18 months, the country will support the policy which it endorsed in 1878. What is the policy proposed by the Opposition? It is, as far as I have been able to ascertain, the re-adjustment of the Tariff with the view of withdrawing its protective effect. Now, is that reasonable? Moreover, although that is the general proposition, what are the specified items presented to the people to induce them to endorse a re-adjustment of the Tariff? There are none whatever. We have presented the idea of a free breakfast. I would be glad if there was a free breakfast in every respect, and a free fire to cook it. But has it been proved that the duty has produced such results on coal and food, that they are dearer than they were three years ago? On the contrary, I bought coal cheaper than I could two years ago. The contention may be made that it would be still 50 cents cheaper without the duty, but even that is a question of doubtful controversy. Another item of the Opposition policy, as presented last year, more strikingly than this year, was in reference to the Pacific Railway. It was represented that only the prairie section should be built, and that the construction of the eastern and western sections should be postponed. This would not be a national nor a safe policy, and we can therefore the more readily support the policy of completing the whole railway from one end of the country to the other, thus opening up that internal trade which will bind all the provinces together and give to each its share in the advantages the whole Dominion possesses. There is one policy which undoubtedly the Opposition have, and that is the policy of opposing the Government. They remind me of the story of the emigrant who came to New York while the elections were going on, and was asked by both parties to give his vote. He refused, because he said he did not understand the issues, but on being pressed he said: "Have you a Government?" The reply was "yes." "Well," said he, "I'll vote against the Government anyhow." The Opposition vote against the Government everytime regardless of the results to the country and the merits of the policy presented. It is true some hon. gentlemen have said that the country has been the victim of fraud, been humbugged, and that the leaders of our party have shown imbecility.

Mr. MILLS. And of this side of the House.

Mr. BEATY. And possibly of that side also; but I do not like to see offensive statements and charges made against hon. members in this manner. I think it would be more respectful and proper that hon. gentlemen who have been twenty, thirty, or forty years in the Government and Parliament of the country, and who have manifested an honorable character in all their dealings in public affairs, and have shown, at all events, no imbecility, should never be exposed to such charges or insinuations. It would be much better to withdraw them or leave them to be made, if at all, outside of this House, and to let hon. members work in a dignified and harmonious manner in promoting the welfare of the whole country. I have listened carefully to the speeches made throughout this debate. I have listened attentively to the strong points which I think have been made by the Opposition against this policy and in antagonism to the present condition of affairs produced in this country by that policy. I have listened with earnestness and have sought with some degree of candor to reach the true conclusions that ought to be arrived at on this important question, possibly biased to some extent by my party predilections and associations, but I still think the true policy is to stand by the Government in its Tariff, on its commercial policy, its railway policy, its land policy, and endeavor, shoulder to shoulder, to carry on the work it has undertaken, and extend it, as opportunity presents itself, and for six years longer the country will reap the great benefits of a policy which for the three years of its existence has produced such marked results, and it will go on prospering and to prosper.

Mr. KING. I do not desire to trespass at very great length on the time of the House. I quite understand that hon. members on both sides are growing weary of this debate. I have listened with attention to the speeches made on both sides, and have been forced to conclude that on one point, at least, both parties, almost without exception, are agreed—that is, that to-day the Dominion is enjoying a prosperity beyond the measure attained two or three years ago. But while this is the case, I find a marked difference in the views of hon. gentlemen as to the causes. Members of the Government side are not willing to admit that the better times and increased prosperity are in any way due to the increased exports of lumber, to the improvement in the crops, or to any other cause save the National Policy. Though my remarks may be considered somewhat sectional, I intend to confine them to the Tariff as applied to my own Province, New Brunswick. I offer no apology in so doing, believing as I do that the Tariff has worked more injuriously to that than any other Province of the Dominion. I propose to confine my remarks mainly to the leading industries, viz.: farming and lumbering. The hon. the Finance Minister, in his Budget Speech, told us that we had reached a period more prosperous than ever known before; that our farmers had an increased home market, and were getting better prices for their produce than ever they were before. I will quote his own words:

"Manufactories have increased, the number of the employed has increased, and their wages have increased. They have plenty of money with which to buy perishable produce—I speak particularly of perishable goods which cannot be sent to a distant market."

And then he goes on to say:

"I think it will be difficult to convince the farmer that, under the present policy, he is not benefitted, and that he can be induced, under any circumstances, to oppose a policy that is calculated to increase, as it has done, the value of his produce, and give him higher prices and a better home market than he had before it was introduced."

I admit at once that if the Finance Minister can satisfy the farmers that his policy has produced the change he will have good claims on them for support. It will be difficult to show that such is the case. In the report laid on the Table of the House showing the number of new industries promoted by the Tariff, I find that three are claimed for New Brunswick; one of these is located at Moncton, a sugar refinery employing sixty-five hands; another at Moncton, a lock factory, giving employment to fifty hands; while a third factory at St. John employs twenty-five hands. If I were disposed to criticise sharply that report, I could tell the House that one of those industries was in existence some years previous to the National Policy, and that so far as the lock factory is concerned, the building was in course of erection, and the business was intended to be carried on, prior to the National Policy. But in the calculation I am about to make I can afford to treat the matter generously. It will be seen from that return, that all told, the only claim for the National Policy, so far as New Brunswick is concerned, is that it employs 140 additional hands. I do not know the average wages paid, but I assume that $1.20 a day will be up to the mark. If so, we find that gives an annual expenditure of $50,000 paid as wages to the employees in those factories. Now, by the Census of 1871, it will be seen that New Brunswick had considerably over 40,000 farmers. Allowing for the natural increase, it is fair to conclude that we have to-day somewhere near 50,000. If that $50,000 went directly into the pockets of those farmers it would be providing for each an increased home market to the extent of but $1 per head. I claim that such is not the case—that by no means can it be shown that they receive anything like that amount. For instance, the farmers in New Brunswick do not supply the people with the wheat flour used, which is largely supplied by Ontario. It is known that the farmers only furnish to the operatives in these factories the meat, vegetables and dairy products consumed, which I might put down at one-fourth of that amount, or $12,500, which may be said to go directly into the pockets of the farmers of New Brunswick. This would give them an increased home market to the extent of 25 cents each. To make the matter somewhat plainer it will be found that the average products of a New Brunswick farm is about $300. That gives an increased home market to the extent of one-twelve hundredth part of the products of the New Brunswick farm; or it simply gives an increased home market to the extent of a peck of potatoes to each farmer. But I want to treat the matter fairly and I am disposed to investigate it still further. It seems that the National Policy, by the efforts made on the part of the Government, and the gentlemen supporting them, has induced capitalists to invest their moneys in New Brunswick, and it ought certainly to have produced some results greater than we have seen so far.

Mr. KING.

I assume that, in the next year or two, we are to have some increase in the manufacturing industries of New Brunswick. I am prepared to admit that at the present time they are building a cotton factory at St. Croix which will give employment to 300 hands. In St. John, after a great effort they have managed to make a beginning in the erection of a cotton factory which will probably give employment to 200 more. At Moncton there is another in course of erection of equal capacity. In the city of St. John there is a cotton factory which has been a long time in existence, and which flourished long before the introduction of the National Policy. There are probably about 150 additional hands employed in that factory. All these together will give about 850 additional hands not shown in the returns laid before this House. I assume, that in the next year or two, some other small industries may be created, giving employment to perhaps 150 hands—for instance, the canning industry. I am at a loss to know the rate of wages likely to be paid to the operatives in the cotton factories. It is a little curious that the manufacturers of New Brunswick all seem to run in the cotton line. That is conclusive to my mind that this industry must be receiving protection over and above the other industries of that Province, or else the capitalists would find some other industries that would pay them as well. In looking over the report of the Factory Commission I find that about 75 per cent. of the labor employed in cotton factories is what is called adult female labor, but that includes girls of 14 years and upwards. Moreover, in this 75 per cent. is included the labor of children under 14 years, and many of them under 10 years. I assume that that class of people, at all events, are not in the habit of receiving extraordinary wages. Reports show that the wages paid in Montreal cotton factories average 48 cents per head. I know we have not got as cheap labor in New Brunswick as in Montreal, and I assume that 65 cents would be a fair rate of wages to be put down to the thousand of operatives to be employed in the Province of New Brunswick. This would give $650 per day or in round numbers, $200,000 per year. This is as much as can safely be claimed for the National Policy next year. Next year the farmers according to a former calculation, will have an increased home market to the extent of $1 per head. That, I think, at all events, the farmers will not appreciate as a very great boon on the part of the hon. the Minister of Finance. I fancy that will hardly satisfy them for the increased taxes imposed upon them by the Tariff. There is another point. This does not represent the profits of the farmers under the National Policy; it simply represents the increase in the home market. If I were to divide it by six it would come nearer the mark, and that would give less than 25 cents profit. In order to show that the farmers are not benefitted by that, I have but to show that the increased duty on a cotton warp would balance the account. But we are told that the farmers not only have an increased home market, but are getting better prices than before the introduction of the National Policy. On that point I have referred to the St. John newspapers published in the month of March, in 1874. The hon. Minister of Finance himself knows that the lumber business was then flourishing, and that that business is the great support of the farmers of New Brunswick. I find that instead of increasing the prices for the farmers the opposite is the case. In a list of eight articles, namely, beef, geese, lamb, mutton, pork, socks, turkey and wool rate to-day exactly as they did then; on butter, buckwheat meal, cabbage, chickens, ducks, eggs, cheese, hams, shoulders, tallow, yarn and oats, the price is 10 per cent. lower. Two articles, hay and potatoes, are higher than they were in 1874. I do not believe any hon. gentleman will claim that the National Policy has raised the price of hay in New Brunswick. Everybody knows that the increased cost of hay in New Brunswick is caused by the injury to the last year; and as for potatoes, the potato bug has had as much to do with raising the price as the National Policy. Every farmer knows that the price of this article is regulated entirely by the price in the Boston market, and they quote prices in Boston instead of the prices in St. John. I think I have shown conclusively that the National Policy has not done very much either in the way of increasing the prices or in increasing the home market to the farmers of New Brunswick. I propose to show now what has been, to my mind, the real cause of the increased prosperity of that Province. Some three years ago spruce logs were sold in the markets of St. John as low as $4.50 per thousand. The price on the average was $5.00 for the best kind of spruce logs. To-day logs of the same description bring $8.00. Deals were sold then at $6.00 to $7.00 per thousand; to-day they are quoted at $10.50 to $11.00. I think that will satisfy anyone who knows anything about the condition of affairs in New Brunswick that the higher price of lumber has had much to do with the increased prosperity of the farmer. But, in order to point out the difference between the home market provided by the National Policy and the market provided by the lumbering industry, I propose to submit a further calculation. The average exports of lumber from New Brunswick is about $5,000,000 per annum. The amount required for home consumption, of course, cannot be correctly stated, but I am safe in putting it down at $1,250,000. This includes the different products of the forest. The farmers not only supply to the lumbermen such articles as are made use of by operatives in the factories, but they supply in many cases, the standing timber. Then they supply the horses that are required in hauling out the lumber, the hay and oats required to feed them, and a large proportion of the team work required in that industry. I am safe in stating that so far as my Province is concerned, the farmers supply 50 per cent. of the labor required to cut and handle the lumber. In addition to that the families of the lumbermen afford a home market for farm produce. As I before stated, one-fourth of the amount expended in wages in factories went into the pockets of the farmers. I now state that one-half of the whole proceeds of the lumber produced in New Brunswick goes directly into the pockets of the farmers, after deducting Government stampage. So we have $3,000,000 to be expended among 50,000 farmers, which affords a home market to the extent of $60 a head, as against $1.25 per head which is credited to the National Policy. There is another point to which I desire to call the attention of the House—a statement made by the hon. Finance Minister last Session and repeated this Session :

“With reference to the price of oats, we have evidence beyond controversy, in my judgment, and which I stated last Session, after a careful calculation, that it has been increased to the lumberman 3 cents per bushel.”

Now, Sir, I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. I have had an experience in the lumber business extending over twenty or twenty-five years, and I have never known a time when the prices of deals were so high and the price of oats so low in comparison as at the present time; while oats were, in 1874 and 1875, 55 cents a bushel; to-day they are a drug in the market at 50 cents, and I do not think it would be difficult to show that the decreased price is largely due to the National Policy. The hon. member for Renfrew is generally spoken of as an authority on lumber, but I think it would have been better, if to-night he had pointed out how it would be possible to sell articles to lumbermen cheaper to-day than in 1878, when the duties upon them have increased, unless the prices have declined in the country in which they are manufactured. With regard to rubber belting, my experience is that I am compelled to purchase the imported article at an advance of 25 to 30 per cent. The hon. Minister of Finance asserted that there had been an increase in the price of hand-made boots. Now, while the employees of the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) may use slop-made boots, the lumbermen of New Brunswick use hand-made boots, and as each man wears about two pairs a year, the result of the hon. Minister's statement, if true, would be to take out of their pockets about one dollar a year on that article alone, at the same time, I deny that the maker of hand-made boots has benefitted by the National Policy to the extent of a single dollar. With reference to the price of lumber the hon. Finance Minister has admitted on two or three occasions that he could do nothing for the lumbermen; but last summer, in the county of Carleton, N. B., it was reported that he stated that his Government had increased the price of spruce logs in St. John. He claimed that by their legislation they had increased the prosperity of the country, and thereby the price of logs, but I think he would have been nearer the mark if he had attributed the increased prosperity of the country to the increased price of these logs. He threw out the idea that the increased price of lumber was due to the increase of home consumption, but it strikes me that the Trade and Navigation Returns show that there has been an increased export of lumber in the last year or two, and that in the face of that fact the export price has been steadily advancing; and I think the retail lumber dealers of St. John will bear me out when I say that there has not been a period for many years in which there has been so little demand for lumber for building purposes at home as now. While dealing with matters of detail I might be allowed to point out some old industries which have revived during the last few years and some new ones which have been introduced into the Province of New Brunswick, which have proved beneficial to the country, and especially to the farmers. Since the revival of business in the United States there has been a very large demand for hemlock bark, bark extract, spiling, ship timber and sleepers, and an entirely new industry has been created by the demand for soft wood in the lime-burning districts of Maine. This wood has become an article of commerce, and brings a large amount of money into the country, and gives employment to a large number of hands. Furthermore, I might go on and show that the National Policy has proved injurious by compelling the vessels that carry our products away to return in ballast. It might be supposed that no manufacturing was done in New Brunswick prior to the National Policy, but the hon. Minister of Finance has quoted on two occasions in this House, from a report published by the manufacturers of St. John, which shows that in 1874 there were 9,000 persons engaged in manufacturing in and around the city of St. John. As to the causes of prosperity or depression among manufacturers I will not give my own testimony, but I will read an extract from a speech delivered by a gentleman who differs from me in his political opinions—a gentleman who was a delegate from St. John Board of Trade to the Dominion Board of Trade, which met in Montreal in March, 1874—Mr. T. R. Jones, who said :

“There are many manufactories in St. John, including three cotton factories. But assuredly they did not owe their establishment or their prosperity to the protective Tariff which they now enjoyed under the Dominion. They had been before, and were flourishing under the low duties which had prevailed in the Province of New Brunswick previous to Confederation. The great article of the St. John cotton manufacture was what is called warps. A few years ago these were imported. Now hardly any were imported, the whole quantity being made in the country. Nevertheless, manufacturers were like other people in business. They sometimes found the examination of the balance sheets present a blue look-out. But the Government was no more bound to protect them against bad seasons or against the consequences of their own bad management in the shape of over-production and bad debts, than it was bound to protect any other class of the community. In fact, it could not do it. The manufacturers were now suffering mainly from over-production and from the ambitious attempts to make a class of goods which natural circumstances placed beyond their power. Mr. Robertson was quite right in imputing the depression of the woollen trade, especially to over-production, and as there was at present no foreign trade, it was quite easy to see that the over-production when it took place must be peculiarly disastrous. As an illustration of the truth of this opinion, we might mention that there was at Sherbrooke a single mill which, notwithstanding the small population of the Dominion, was larger than any similar mill in Great Britain, with one exception. The fact was that while this over-production prevailed no improvement would be made by increasing the Tariff, whether it was 20 per cent. or 50 per cent. the glut would remain."

That is the opinion of a gentleman who, I believe, is a warm supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, a manufacturer then and a manufacturer now in the city of St. John. But, Sir, what has taken place in St. John and elsewhere in the Dominion may, and is likely to occur again; and when the next wave of depression sweeps over this country, I fancy that many hon. gentlemen who are to-day so ready to invest their money in cotton factories, will have a similar experience to those who came before them. I hope it may not be so, but that they will get ample return for every dollar which they invest, and that we in New Brunswick may keep a portion of the trade within our own borders. I desire now to refer to a statement made by the hon. Finance Minister with reference to the position New Brunswick occupies in Confederation. I had the pleasure of listening to a speech delivered by that hon. gentleman last summer; the audience was very large and very attentive, and the hon. gentleman made one of his best speeches on that occasion. One remark of his, which I have not forgotten was this:

"If you charge New Brunswick with one-thirteenth of the cost of the Intercolonial Railroad, you have not paid a dollar which you have not got back, you have not paid a dollar for Indians, Mounted Police, or the development of the North-West."

Now, I have looked over the accounts for 1831, and I find that in that year New Brunswick paid into the Dominion revenue $1,703,000. I think it would be impossible to show any way in which New Brunswick has directly or indirectly received anything like that amount out of the Dominion Treasury. I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Finance that when he again makes that statement, either in this House or out of it, he should give us the details. It is possible that some items may be improperly charged against New Brunswick. For instance, $130,000 expended in that Province last year for the Dorchester Penitentiary, which is for the benefit of the whole Maritime Provinces; then there are the lighthouses on our coasts, which are for the benefit of the shipping of the whole Dominion, and the cost of which is debited in the Public Accounts against New Brunswick. The item of quarantine is also the basis of a large charge in the Public Accounts, although, as has been recently shown in a remarkable case, the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec are as much interested in an efficient quarantine as New Brunswick. Another item which is included in the subsidy to New Brunswick is $150,000 which the Province receives in lieu of export duty. The hon. Minister of Finance knows very well that in an arrangement made prior to our going into Confederation, New Brunswick reserved the right to collect export duty on lumber, and it is not fair to charge that against New Brunswick. The hon. Minister of Finance in his Budget Speech the other day, made the following statement:

"And, therefore, making every allowance for the duties that would have been paid by the people of the Lower Provinces upon the articles that are purchased from Ontario and Quebec, it will be found that this Tariff, instead of having an injurious effect upon the smaller Provinces, has had a beneficial effect, and it has a still more beneficial effect on the Province of Prince Edward Island,—it will be found that, if any person or locality or section has to complain, it is not the smaller Provinces that were arrayed here, and on behalf of whom the sympathies of this House were invoked, for the practical effect has been a reduction rather than an increase of their taxation under the operation of this Tariff."

Well, sir, prior to Confederation the hon. Minister of Finance told us that for twenty-five years to come our taxes would not exceed $2.75 per head; and I believe that prediction is about to become true under the operation of his Tariff by our exports being so diminished that the amount of the Customs duties which we have to pay must be diminished also; but I submit that the amount of import duties the people have to pay, as shown in the Trade and Navigation Returns, does not indicate correctly the amount of taxes imposed on us by this Tariff. In 1873, the imports of New Brunswick amounted to $10,839,000. That was a prosperous year, but it is not more prosperous than hon. gentlemen claim last year was—that if no change had been made in the Tariff to restrict trade, the natural increase in population would have in this prosperous year increased that amount to over $12,000,000. What are the facts? According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, in 1881, the imports were reduced to $6,016,972, on which that Province paid duties amounting to $1,256,638, or $10,000 more than she paid on the larger amount of imports in 1873. The difference in these two amounts shows that New Brunswick is purchasing $6,000,000 of goods in the Dominion; part in Montreal and Quebec in dutiable goods, the balance from the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec. Notwithstanding statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite that goods are supplied to us cheaper than they would be imported, the very fact that it is found necessary to impose a Tariff double what it was in 1873 in order to compel our people to buy these goods proves that we are paying the duties into the pockets of the manufacturers. It then follows that New Brunswick paid, in 1881, $1,703,979; that we pay duties in Montreal and elsewhere on a part of the $6,000,000; the remainder passing into the hands of the manufacturers is the amount paid indirectly on the $6,000,000 worth of goods purchased in the Dominion, and the whole can be put down as equal to the amount paid on $6,000,000 worth of goods imported, making the total amount of taxation under this Tariff nearly $3,000,000. This shows the true measure of taxation imposed on New Brunswick. The position of New Brunswick is this: She is unable to find a market in the Dominion for her products; she is obliged to export them largely to the United States. There they are met by a protective tariff which materially reduces their value. The proceeds must be brought back in gold, and in order to supply the wants of her people she is compelled to apply to the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec. There again the purchasing power of her way is reduced by the operation of our own protective Tariff. Her position is between two fires. This it is that is drawing the life-blood out of our Province; that is lowering the value of real estate in almost every part, except a few favored localities benefitted by the introduction of railways built at the whole cost of the people; that has diverted trade from our chief commercial centres, and reduced rents, particularly in St. John, below a point ever dreamed of. Speaking for myself, if this is to continue—if New Brunswick is to be taunted as being a dependent member of this confederacy and a mendicant among her sister Provinces; if, in the future glory that awaits this country she is not to share, if the only purpose she has to serve is to afford a market for subsidized manufacturers—if I believed this, I would then say sever the bonds which bind her to the Union, restore her to the position she once occupied as an independent Province. But I am not without hope; we have faith in the future of the country, and we look forward to the day when the great Liberal party will be restored to power, when this country will be governed in the interest of the many, not of the few, when monopolies will no longer dare to raise their heads, and when even-handed justice will be dealt out to all the Provinces composing this great Dominion.

Mr. DOULL. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the night and at this late period of the debate, I do not propose detaining the House for any lengthened time, and I am perfectly well aware that there is no occasion for me to go over the arguments which have been addressed from this side of the House so much abler than I could possibly submit them. I do not think I would have occupied the time of the House at all upon this question, were it not that the hon. member for Richmond, N.S., (Mr. Flynn) made reference to a speech of mine in 1879, on the coal question, and had that hon. member not made some statements that I consider are not strictly in accordance with facts. In 1879, I contended that a duty of 50 cents per ton would not secure the markets of Ontario for Nova Scotia coal; I, at the same time, stated that I thought it would secure a portion of the Quebec market for that coal. I do not think I was mistaken in either prediction. We obtained a very much larger portion of the Quebec market than we had prior to the imposition of that duty. In 1880, we obtained from the Government an increased duty on our coal, a duty of 60 cents on bituminous coal. That secured for us, I am very glad to say, a very large portion of the Quebec market, and also, notwithstanding all that hon. gentlemen opposite have said, enabled us to place some coal on the Ontario market. I might state here that we could have put a much larger quantity of coal into Ontario, were it not that we found for all the coal we could produce in Nova Scotia a nearer market, so that, as a matter of fact, coal producers sent their coal to the nearest market first. Hon. gentlemen opposite contend that because we have not been able under the National Policy to send Nova Scotia coal, or much of it, into Ontario, therefore the National Policy has been a failure. This appears to me altogether nonsense. It has given to our Nova Scotia coal producers a market for all the coal they can produce. Previous to the adoption of the National Policy and the putting on of this duty on coal, our coal owners could not obtain a market for their coal. This proves most conclusively that the duty has been an advantage to them. The object, more particularly, of my addressing the House to-night is to call attention to some remarks of the hon. member for Richmond, who I regret is not in his seat. That hon. gentleman said:

"Now Sir, I am free to admit that the National Policy may have displaced a few tons of English coal in the Province of Quebec; but beyond these few tons it has had no effect whatever."

I will show, before I sit down, the quantity of coal that it has enabled us to send to the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman also said:

"It has a tendency in doing that to raise the rates across the Atlantic."

I cannot comprehend the meaning that the hon. gentleman intended these words to convey. If the meaning I would take from them is correct, what follows cannot be correct, even according to his own ideas:

"It prevents our own shipping interests which are in a depressed condition now, from taking coal as ballast, as they were in the habit of doing, and therefore it inflicts a serious injury on the shipping interests, proving that the National Policy where it benefits one injures a dozen."

The more of the Quebec market that we obtain for our coal the greater the benefit to our shipping industry. You can understand, who live in Montreal, that the freights, as a rule, for some years back, from Montreal to Europe, have been unremunerative. They have been so low that ship-owners could not make anything of a profit out of them; but with the coal freight, which we get from our coal ports up to Montreal, we are enabled to make a profit out of the freights that we obtain from Montreal to Europe. That is one of the results of the increased market in Quebec for our coal, so that instead of the National Policy acting injuriously upon our shipping industry, it acts very beneficially. Another remark of the hon. member for Richmond, N.S., (Mr. Flynn) is this:

"We find the imports of foreign coal, in 1879, amounted to 63,061 tons; in 1880, to 973,610 tons; in 1881, to 1,159,103 tons, or an increase of nearly 300,000 tons, in 1881, over the imports of 1879. Now, so far from shutting our own coal from the Province of Ontario, we have an increased importation into the Dominion of over 300,000 tons."

This is quoted as an argument to show that, because we have not been able to shut out the imported coal from Ontario, therefore the National Policy has injured our coal industry. The hon. gentleman forgets, that although we have not shut out foreign coal, the National Policy has had the effect of increasing the manufactures and increasing the consumption through the manufactories to such an extent that the consumption of coal has been very largely increased, as I will establish presently. Whilst 300,000 tons of foreign coal have been imported over and above what was imported in 1878, still we have sent from Nova Scotia, between 300,000 and 400,000 tons, more into our markets than we did in 1878. Another statement which the hon. gentleman made was this:

"Let me direct him (the Finance Minister) back to the period of 1873, that he himself referred to as the golden period of Canada."

Well, we are trying to return back and I think the National Policy is helping us to get back to that degree of prosperity which we had in 1873. The hon. gentleman goes on to say:

"What was the product of her mines then? I find by the report of 1873 that the coal productions of her mines for that year was 1,051,469 tons, or a production of 1,600 more than in 1881."

Now, this is a statement which the facts do not bear out. We have never produced in Nova Scotia more coal than we did during 1881. The quantity produced in 1881 was 1,124,270 tons. According to his own showing, the production in 1873 was 1,051,469 tons, leaving a difference in 1881 of 72,801 tons. Now, in order to show that in 1878 the same depression existed in Great Britain and other coal-producing countries as then existed in Nova Scotia, he quoted from the report of the then Inspector of Mines. I think it would have been well for him if he had only quoted one-half of the section. I will read the quotation from the report of the Inspector of Mines for Nova Scotia, for 1878. He says:

"Great Britain and the United States were affected by the wave of financial depression; and as the coal dealers of those countries also sought relief in exportation, Nova Scotia struggled for a period to trade with the West Indies, but was overpowered by her powerful competitors controlling the return freights."

Now, I confess that the National Policy of the Government has given us the very thing, without which we could not contend successfully with our competitors in 1878, which will enable us and has enabled us to contend successfully with them, because we have already increased our exports of coal to the West Indies. Why? because we have now a direct trade with the West Indies, which we had not in 1878; and that has enabled us to send coal thither, which we were not able to do in 1878. Then he goes on to try to prove that the increase of our coal sales has not been owing to the National Policy, but we have every decade increased gradually the out-put and sales of our coal. He says: "I propose to show that since the opening up of our mines, in 1775, the increase has been gradual every decade." This is the language used. The statement is found in the quotation which the hon. gentleman makes at very great length from the report of Mr. Poole, Inspector of Mines. No doubt, he is a very able and competent man to give an opinion on the coal business; but I regret to see that he has expressed an opinion with respect to shipping, as well as this gradual increase, that is not borne out by the facts. In this part of the quotation from Poole's report these words appear:

"Comparing the average returns for a number of years, a permanent though fluctuating progress is undeniable each decade, roughly speaking, doubling the out-put of coal."

Do the facts bear out that statement? That is the question. We have, as well as Mr. Poole's statements and those of the hon. member for Richmond, the returns which show the out-put every year since the opening of the mines, from which you will see whether the increase has been gradual or not. In the first decade, from 1791 to 1800, the out-put was 51,048 tons; for the next decade, from 1800 to 1810, 70,453 tons, an increase of about 40 per cent.; in the next decade, 91,527 tons, increase about 30 per cent.; next decade, 140,820 tons, increase about 50 per cent.; next decade, 839,981, increase about 600 per cent.; next decade, 1,533,798, increase nearly 100 per cent.; next decade, 2,399,829 tons, increase 70 per cent.; next decade, 4,927,339, or something over 100 per cent.; and for the last decade, 7,377,428, or 50 per cent. increase. Now, these figures do not bear out the statement either of the hon. member for Richmond, N.S., (Mr. Flynn) or of Mr. Poole in his report. There is also another statement to which I made reference already, the statement of the hon. member for Richmond; it refers to the tax on coal, and reads as follows:—

"It might, however, fairly be asked if a tax which checks imports from Great Britain would not so raise the rate of freight up the St. Lawrence as to practically defeat the end in view, and increase the homeward freight on grain and lumber."

If it did increase the homeward freight on grain and lumber, it would be to the benefit of the shipping, and not to its injury, as he stated. But it has not had that effect. The effect has been the other way, because with the coal freights which we have had from the coal ports up to Quebec and Montreal, we have had more remunerative freights than had we not had those coal freights. Another statement of the hon. gentleman for Richmond is this:

"The more I consider the question the more strongly I am convinced it is impossible to give the market of Ontario to the coal-producers of Nova Scotia with a less duty than $2 per ton."

Now, we could have, last winter, if the railways had given us the cars necessary, placed in Ontario a larger quantity of coal—we lacked only increased facilities of transportation. At the prices asked in Ontario, we were in a position to compete successfully with the bituminous coal of the United States. With regard to the subject of transportation, I regretted exceedingly to hear the hon. Minister of Railways state that there would be nothing in the Estimates for the enlargement of the canals. If the canals between the lakes and sea-boards were enlarged to enable vessels sufficiently large to pass through, an inter-provincial trade would be opened up advantageous to all the Provinces, and which would enable Nova Scotia to send her coal into Ontario and compete with the United States coal—I do not care how low its price. One statement more of the member for Richmond I shall notice, and then I shall be done with him:

"Those hon. gentlemen opposite talk about protection to the farmers; but where are the benefits which the farmers of the Maritime Provinces have received from it?"

If the member for Richmond only came into the coal counties, where the coal industries are now carried on with energy, and where our coal miners and men employed about the mines have ample and sufficient work every day of the week and year to enable them to buy the produce of the farmers, he would then see the benefits which they derive from the National Policy. I am glad to say that we are in a fair way of giving them a market through our manufactories, too. We have in Nova Scotia quite a number of manufactories started under the National Policy. Some of them have been mentioned already, but I will give here a few of the new industries that are attributable to our new trade policy. Those that are already in operation are giving increased markets to our farmers and enabling them to get better prices for their produce than they would otherwise. We have two sugar refineries at Halifax, one sugar refinery at Moncton, a cotton mill erecting at Halifax, at Windsor, at St. Stephens, St. John and Moncton; woollen mills at Yarmouth and elsewhere; brass works at Moncton; boot and shoe factories at Halifax and Charlottetown, P. E. I.; glass works at New Glasgow; new organ factory at Truro; a new cutter bar machine factory at Amherst; a nut and bolt factory at St. John. These are only the beginning of the many factories which will spring up under the fostering protection of the National Policy. I do not think that the National Policy interferes with the people of the United States coming to purchase in our markets. They come to our markets as they did before, and we have besides an increased home market and an increased inter-provincial trade. Now, what has been the effect of this policy upon the demand for Nova Scotia coal? I have stated that in 1878 our coal producers could not obtain a market; in 1881 we had a market for all we could produce, we had a demand for a great deal more, and I hope the effect will be to induce our coal producers to increase their facilities in order to meet the demand which the National Policy has created for our coal. It is not the fault of the National Policy if we have not been able to supply more coal to the markets of this Dominion; the fault is, to a large extent, with the coal owners in not increasing their facilities to supply the increased demands. The benefit to the coal districts has been very great. In 1873, at most of the mines the men were employed on half time, some of them less and some of them more. They are now employed full time, with an increased number of men at the different mines. This is surely a marked benefit, particularly to the localities where the increased labor is employed. I do not think any better illustration of the beneficial effects of the National Policy can be given than is presented by the result of the National Policy on the coal trade since its adoption—by the large increase of consumption which is created, not merely by its stimulating existing manufactories, but by creating new ones. In 1878, the total consumption in the Dominion of Canada was 1,415,516 tons; in 1881, it was 2,150,528 tons; an increase of 735,112 tons, or 51 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not say that that increase was caused by an increased population. How, then, was it caused? I can see no other cause than the increased consumption of the manufactories. In 1878, Nova Scotia supplied 643,511 tons out of the whole consumption of that year. In 1881, Nova Scotia supplied 1,035,014 tons, an increase of 341,503 tons, or 50 per cent. That is one of the benefits that accrued from this policy. Now, with respect to the supply of Quebec. The total supply to Montreal and Quebec, in 1878, was 328,074 tons; in 1881, 529,091 tons, an increase of 201,017 tons, or 61 per cent. Now, I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to this statement. Nova Scotia supplied to Montreal, in 1878, 83,710 tons; in 1881, she supplied 268,628 tons, an increase of 184,918 tons, or 221 per cent. The total increase at Quebec was 61 per cent. The total increase that Nova Scotia supplied over and above what was supplied in 1873 was 221 per cent. So much for the displacing of foreign and English coal in the markets of Quebec. There can be no doubt that if it had not been for the National Policy, this increased consumption would not have taken place, and it would not have given the increased market for the Nova Scotia coal. Now, I want hon. gentlemen opposite to mark this: although the duty was 60 cents on bituminous coal, the coal consumers in Quebec received their coal cheaper in 1881 than they did in 1878, as contracts were made for Nova Scotia coal, and delivered in Quebec and Montreal, in 1881, at from $3.50 to $3.75 per ton, as against $4.25 to $4.50 in 1878, which is proof positive that, notwithstanding the duty, coal was supplied cheaper in the Province of Quebec in 1881 than in 1878. But the National Policy did more to benefit the Dominion of Canada than merely give a direct benefit to the coal industry. It increased the tonnage that was necessary for the carriage of this coal, and thereby gave us a benefit in our shipping industry which otherwise it would not have had. But it is contended that whatever this duty on coal may have done for the rest of the Dominion, it has not benefitted the Province of Ontario. Now, I am of the same opinion—and I do not hold the opinion without sufficient grounds—that was expressed by the hon. Minister of Railways the other day, and which is strictly in accordance with the facts, in connection with the price of coal, as furnished by the coal owners in the United States. The hon. gentlemen may sneer at these facts as much as they like, but they cannot controvert them. It is well known to everybody who knows anything about the coal trade, that the coal owners of the United States have not one uniform price for the same kind of coal at different points, either in the United States or in this Dominion. The hon. member for Gloucester, (Mr. Anglin) said that these coal owners must be united, and that they must have an understanding between them; and we know that, as a rule, they are united, that they are a ring, a monopoly—that is, when they are agreed among themselves. Sometime they differ and then the country gets the benefit of the difference, but, as a rule, they are united, and they fix the prices precisely as the hon. Minister of Railways said in his able speech on the subject a few days ago. They fix the prices so as to secure the markets at competitive points, and prices are lower there than at non-competitive points, so that the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways that the prices were higher in Chicago than in Boston, is accurate and susceptible of proof. And if it had not been for the duty on coal in this Dominion, prices in Ontario to-day would be the same as in Chicago and not the same as in Boston. The very fact of finding coal introduced to the consumers of Ontario, at the same price as to dealers in Boston, is proof positive that the National Policy has caused the coal owners of the United States to place the Province of Ontario among their competitive points, and hence the consumer gets coal cheaper than if the duty had not been imposed.

Mr. KILLAM. Does that raise the price to the producer?

Mr. DOULL. It does, because we get the increased market even if we do not get it in Ontario. It is a fallacy to suppose that because the National Policy has reduced the price to the consumer it cannot be a benefit to the coal producers in Nova Scotia. The National Policy has increased the demand in two years 50 per cent., and if we do not get the market of Ontario we get the increased market in the Lower Provinces and outside the Lower Provinces. There is one other point to which I wish to refer in connection with this question. Hon. gentlemen opposite have contended that because the exports have been less and the imports greater, the National Policy has injured and not benefitted our industries. Now, I think that the coal industry will prove most conclusively that that reasoning is unsound, and I have no doubt that if we had the facts in regard to other industries they would equally prove the unsoundness of the same reasoning when applied to them. The exports of coal from Nova Scotia, in 1878, were 185,443 tons. In 1881, it is true the amount was a little larger, viz., 190,551 tons; but you must recollect that through the National Policy we got an increased sale for our coal in the West Indies that we would not have had but for it, and if you take off the increased sales we made to the West Indies—10,000 tons—from the 190,551, we have 180,551, or about 5,000 tons less than the amount in 1878. The imports in 1878 were 863,061; in 1881, they were about 1,203,186, an increase of 340,765. In that case we have less exports and greater imports, and I know, and this House and the country know, that we have had a largely increased sale for our Nova Scotia coal. That industry has been very much benefitted by the National Policy, and I have no doubt that the same may be said of every other industry in the country. If the coal duty was taken off the revenue would be reduced by between $600,000 and $700,000, and that would have to be raised from duties on some other articles; and I do not see why coal should not bear a portion of the taxes as well as any other commodity. You talk about it being a tax on raw material; well, there are a great many raw materials. It is also spoken of as a tax on the fuel which is to warm the poor man; but we have a tax on the light which is to enable the poor man to see after night, and I do not know but one tax is about as right and reasonable as the other. The hon. member for Yarmouth sought to show that shipping was taxed under the present Tariff more than it was under the previous Tariff. The hon. gentleman knows more of the subject than I do, and if he says that the statement I am about to make is not correct, I shall accept his contradiction. From figures I have gone over, but which I have not here, I have the impression that under the present Tariff the shipping industry is less taxed than it was under the late Administration.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear, and the drawback being paid.

Mr. DOULL. Therefore that industry is not suffering under the National Policy. The hon. member for Yarmouth also referred to a speech made by the hon. Minister of Railways last year in the county I have the honor to represent. I do not think it was necessary for the hon. gentleman to come to this House to take care of Messrs. Jones and Carmichael, because I think they were both there to take care of themselves, and I do not think they very flatly denied the statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways, which statement was not as reported, or as stated by the hon. member. The statement was, that these gentlemen supported a Government that brought down a Tariff which was going to tax shipping to the extent of one dollar a ton. At this late hour of the night I am not going to make any lengthened remarks; but I felt called upon to make the statements I have made in connection with the coal industry, as I have the honor to represent a county which is a coal centre, and as the statements made by the hon. member for Richmond, if they were uncontradicted, might have an injurious effect in influencing some minds against the National Policy.

Mr. RYMAL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to discuss at any length the question which has so long occupied the attention of this Legislature, and which has been viewed from almost every possible standpoint by different politicians. I have heretofore expressed my opinion of the result of the National Policy, and I have yet seen no reason to change it in the least particular. I shall only refer to its effects, as I have viewed them, upon that class of the community that I have the honor to belong to—the farmers; and unless an angel or some one more highly gifted than any man I have ever met shows to the contrary, I shall not be convinced, against my senses of hearing, and seeing, and knowing, that the National Policy has done any good at all to the farmers of Canada, or that it is possible that it can do them any good. I have said before that when we have more than we want, when we have a surplus of all kinds of products to export, the idea of raising the price by placing a duty on imports coming into Canada is sheer folly. But so much for the Tariff, and so much only. What I have more particularly risen for is this—and, from my age, being one of the oldest members of the Liberal party in the House, and after having heard the Liberal party and their record attacked, as they have been by some members in this House, I think I may review the record of that party and leave the people to judge whether they deserve the praise and applause, or whether they merit the condemnation of the people of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold that the principles of the Liberal party, the world over, are truth and justice, liberty and equality. I do not mean to say that it is impossible for a Conservative—or a Tory, as I generally call him—to tell the truth, but I am afraid they sometimes fail to do it. John Bright, whom, I presume, knew the animal better than any man living, once said that when a Tory ceased to lie he ceased to be a Tory, and I do not know but I can go that length with John Bright. But I say that the eternal principles of truth and justice have been nailed to the banner of the Liberal party since there ever was a Liberal party. Let us see what they have done. I will commence with their record in the old land. Let us see what the Liberal party have done there for the amelioration of the condition of the people. What have the Reform party done for the people of Britain? They gave them Catholic emancipation. It relieved them from a system of bondage, and was looked upon by a great many people as a step in the right direction, and one towards which all Governments should tend, namely, that of giving the greatest amount of liberty to all people, so long as it was safe for them to be entrusted with it. They gave the Reform Bill, which enfranchised a great number of people that were not men in the full sense and acceptation of the word, because they happened not to be possessed of landed estates or pay a certain amount of taxation. The emancipation of the slaves, the abolition of slavery, was due to the Liberal party. The Liberal party, as a general thing, have opposed most of the bloody and unnecessary wars that have been carried on by England; and so far do they now carry that principle of peace and good-will and love for all mankind that they are sometimes stigmatized as the peace-at-any-price party. Now, these are some of the things that they have done in Britain; and what are they doing there to-day? They are endeavoring to bring unhappy Ireland, mis-governed Ireland into line, and to give it something like responsible Government, something like Home Rule, recognizing their manhood; and the Reform party to-day in Britain are endeavoring to bring about the pacification of Ireland and remove the wrongs and remedy the grievances under which that people have labored for many, many years. In contradistinction to that, what has been the record of the Tory party in Britain? They have opposed everything that tended to elevate the masses, everything that went to enfranchise the poor man, they endeavored to crush the manhood out of them. It was only through the efforts of the Reform party that the enfranchisement of a great number of the electors now in Britain was brought about. They have instigated, as the Reform party has opposed, most of the unnecessary, unjust and bloody wars that have cost England such an immense amount of money and drenched almost every country in the world with blood of British soldiers. The Tories of Britain, through maladministration of public affairs, drove the thirteen old colonies of America into rebellion, but had they pursued the policy of the Liberal party of that day Old England and New England of America might have been marching side by side to their ultimate destiny instead of being estranged. Now, I come nearer home, and I shall endeavor to show what the record of the Liberal party has been in Canada. Mr. Speaker, you are doubtless old enough to recollect the day when a Tory oligarchy existed in Lower Canada; when your countrymen were exposed to danger, unless they submitted themselves to the powers that were, and when the few ruled the many with an iron hand? To whom were the successors of your countrymen to ascribe the rights which they to-day enjoy—responsible Government—with which we are blessed, but to the efforts of the Liberal party. Those liberties were not secured without some sacrifices. Some men toiled and labored year after year, others laid down their lives; and the privileges that we enjoy at the present time were bought with some of the best blood of the French Canadian people. When I heard a French Canadian, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) enquire what the Liberal party had done, I thought that the descendant of an old Liberal who lived and died a member of the Liberal party might have known its record, and I was astonished to hear the descendant of a Lower Canadian Liberal ask that question. I am told that that hon. member himself was a Liberal until the last few years, that for some reason or other, which I cannot explain, has seen fit to cast the teachings of his parents to the dogs and make his mess with the dogs too. How strange it is that it should be left to a political renegade to denounce the teachings, to sneer at the sufferings and scoff at the whole Liberal party in having secured these privileges for his fellow countrymen. Suppose they had been left to the tender mercies of the Tory party at the time of the Lower Canadian rebellion, when they were being hunted from one post to another, and being destroyed by the troops at the command of the oligarchy, when the villages of Lower Canada were treated as rookeries by shooting the old and young birds. Had the advice of the Tory party been listened to at that time, the French Canadian people would have been exterminated, and it is to the efforts of the Liberal party at Home and in Lower and Upper Canada, that we enjoy to-day the blessings of responsible Government, and are free from the hateful rule of irresponsible family compacts and oligarchies such as Upper and Lower Canada labored under for a great many years. The hon. member for Niagara —

Mr. PLUMB. Oh, do not bring me in.

Mr. RYMAL. The hon. member for Niagara, no doubt, wishes to be considered a gentleman, and I would like to treat him as such, but his antics and cackling remind me more of a big chimpanzee that one finds in the wilds of Borneo than they do of the manners of a Chesterfield, and I am forced to believe that we have discovered in the hon. member the missing link of the Darwinian theory. I wish the hon. gentleman would consider the position he now occupies, and observe a little British fair play. When I think of the suffering that the people endured in Lower Canada, I cannot help but admire the heroism of the few brave men who stood out on behalf of the people, who dared to death to do what they believed was right; and when I hear of the name of Papineau —

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, he ran away.

Mr. RYMAL. If that hon. gentleman wishes to cackle and interfere, I cannot prevent him; but the name of Papineau and his compatriots who fought, bled and suffered will be fresh and green in the memory of Canadians when the memory of that hon. gentleman will be long forgotten. What is the record of the Reform party in Upper Canada? What state of things existed there prior to 1836? I became a politician very young. I happened to have access to the records of the House of Assembly at that time. I was then only thirteen years old, and my father related to me the incidents that occurred at a very trying time in the history of Upper Canada. Before that time the family compact ruled in Upper Canada, and had the ear of the Colonial Office. In 1834 the Liberals carried the Province by a strong majority. When they passed measures demanded by the people these measures were sent up to the irresponsible Legislative Council, and the respect that was paid to the laws passed by the people's representatives was shown by unceremoniously throwing them into the waste paper basket. This state of things continued until submission ceased to be a virtue. The only redress the people had was to stop the Supply Bill. That means was resorted to, and from that time the conduct of the Tory party was so hateful and repulsive that the people were goaded into resistance to their rule. Of course, the irresponsible junta that had governed the Province up to this time called that rebellion, and men were called rebels and declared outlaws, cast into prison, tried for high treason, and some of them sealed their love of liberty with their blood. Just so soon as the people began to draw one another's blood, the Downing Street authorities began to consider that something was wrong, and instead of sending out an old half-paid military officer or poor-law commissioner, they sent out a statesman in the person of Lord Durham, who was instructed to enquire into the causes of the Canadian rebellion. He did so, and reported to the Home Government, and Her Majesty issued a proclamation pardoning all implicated in the troubles, and Lord Durham, in his admirable report, said that the people were justified in resisting the Government and standing up for their rights as Britons. Now, the hon. member for Lincoln enquired the other day what the Reform party had done. Well, I thought that he, at least, might have exercised a little charity towards that great party, for well do I recollect the time when he stood waiting for them to open their arms and take him into their ranks. Well do I recollect the time when hissed at, sneered at, and jeered at by the Tory party, he was willing to take service under a Liberal, and I thought he might have spared himself the trouble of asking what the Reform party had done. He went to his election and the Reform party refused to receive him. The Tory party had kicked him out, and the Reform party kept him out. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why he felt so strongly against them. For a time the hon. gentleman was posing between the two parties. He might have adopted the language that Hosea Bidgelow attributes to some other gentleman who was posing between two parties. He might have said with the poet:—

“ You see my head is too nicely balanced,
To say which party has most sense;
There may be men with greater talents,
But they can't sit slender on the fence.”

Well, he sat on the fence for a time, but he got off after a while, and the regular instincts of the Tory animal were disclosed, for although he washed himself of the filth and dirt which he at one time said the Tory party was mostly composed of, although he denounced them heartily, bitterly, and had the wishes he expressed in regard to them been fully carried out, some of them would have been in a pretty hot place just about that time. We found him in a few short months going back to his old love like the dog that returned to his vomit and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire. I thought that the hon. gentleman who had been ready to step in and take shelter under the Liberals might have spared himself asking that question, which he was so well qualified to answer himself. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman, with his ability and eloquence could do much better than I in portraying all the good that the Liberal party has done to Canada. Some hon. member has said that the Liberal party had never inaugurated any great public work in Canada, or pushed it to completion. Now, it may be news to some, though I am sure there are some here who know it, that the Welland Canal which passes through my hon. friend's constituency, was promoted by William Hamilton Merritt more than by any other leading public man, and although he was never a strong party politician, I have sat in the House with him and always found him seated among the Liberals and assisting them in politics. Then look at the initiation of the Grand Trunk Railway. Under whose Government was it that the era of railways began in Canada? Under the Baldwin-Lafontaine and the Hincks-Morin Administrations. Oh, but some one will say, “ Messrs. Baldwin and Lafontaine and Messrs. Hincks and Morin were Tories.” How strange that they claimed them from the Liberals, the men whom in season, out of season, fairly and foully, they opposed, while living, and the garments of these noble men, most of them now dead, they would like to steal! The Tories would then appear like wolves in sheep's clothing, and would bray like asses in the lion's skin. I say the Grand Trunk was initiated by the Reform party, who took steps to carry out the undertaking which was carried out. This party never opposed the building of the Grand Trunk Railway. They never had a word to say against it as a commercial enterprise. But when it was run in the interest of the Tory party, and was made a political machine and came to the Legislature year after year to assist the Tory party in maintaining itself, then the Liberal party denounced it as a Tory political engine, and refused to support it with the public money. Who initiated the Intercolonial Railway? That was a scheme that British statesmen had looked over, causing a survey of the route to be made by Major Robinson. But who was the first Canadian and leader of a party who spent money to further that scheme? Another Liberal, Hon. John Sandfield Macdonald, in the time of the Macdonald-Sicotte Government—those were the men who initiated that scheme, and who arranged with the Lower Provinces for the construction of that road on a principle not afterwards carried out. They were the first who voted public money for a Canadian survey of the route. I suppose the Tories will continue to claim that J. S. Macdonald was a leader of the Tory party too? Of course they will. But when he got out of his coalition Government in Toronto, and the Tory party asked him to assume the leadership, he simply, in his characteristic way and forcible manner, told some of them he would see them dammed first. I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite claim that they are the fathers of Confederation. Well, I do not dispute the fact, that they took an active part in initiating some of the constitutional changes which ended in Confederation. But you, Mr. Speaker, are old enough to recollect that it was only when they were defeated, when the choice lay between resignation and the seals of office, that they assented to constitutional changes—that the First Minister of the day consented to enter into a coalition Government to bring about constitutional changes which years before he absolutely and positively refused to assist in bringing about. And so it is always with the Tory party; place before them the alternative of sacrificing their principles, or leaving the flesh-pots of Egypt, and I will bet you five to one they will stick to the flesh-pots. I think that another great undertaking, which the Liberal party advocated early, was the securing of the great North-West, that country to which we now look with so much hope. I recollect, twenty-five years ago, when I first issued an address to the people as a candidate for their suffrages, introducing a paragraph in that address, stating that if they would elect me I would do all I could to secure the breaking up of the Hudson Bay monopoly, and the obtaining for the people, the rights they had to the great North-West, to secure it and attach it to this Canada of ours. Well, I know that when this thing was brought about, the coalition Government was in existence, and that not one party only can claim the credit to the exclusion of the other. In so far as I might claim any lot or part in the glory attached to bringing about this grand Confederation, I wash my hands of it. I do not believe in it either. I do not believe it is going to answer the expectations the people have of it to-day; for already the Federal Government are, I believe, encroaching on the rights of the Provinces, and already the Provinces are being arrayed against one another; and unless there is less maladministration of the affairs of the country than during the past three years. I venture to predict, although I do not profess to be much of a prophet, that this grand Confederation will fall to pieces like a rope of sand.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). You will not live to see it.

Mr. RYMAL. I do not wish to live to see it. I would rather see us a great, happy, united people, cordially working together for the development of our country. I want to see Confederation a success, although I did not believe in it when it was passed, and I do not believe unless, as I said before, wiser counsels prevail than have heretofore prevailed, that it will be a success.

An hon. MEMBER. It is all right.

Mr. RYMAL. I presume it is all right. I have never attempted to say anything except what I really and truly believed was all right, and in what I have said to-night there is not a solitary word that I do not believe. Now, we have lost the men who secured us so many of these blessings to which I have referred. The men who secured to us responsible Government have all passed away—there is scarcely one of them left. But, Sir, among the names recorded in the annals of Canada, to my mind there are none that appear so glorious as those men who, in the days of trial, dared to vindicate the principles they believed to be right, and who suffered, bled, and some of whom died, in order to secure the form of Government we now possess. And it will not be long before most of us who are assembled here to-night will follow in their footsteps, and the place that knows us now will soon know us no more. And what will be the fate of Canada then? It may be doubted if Canada could exist for any length of time without the services of her greatest statesman, the leader of the present Government. He is a man of extraordinary ability, I admit. As a manager of men I have never seen his equal. I have often wondered how it was that he was able to so completely mould the character and shape the actions of the men who supported him—whether it is magnetism or necromancy, whether it is the inherent strength that he possesses, or whether it is the weakness of the gentlemen he leads, and I am bound to say that as yet that question is unsolved in my own mind. Amongst his supporters are a great many able men; and I will not go so far as to say that there are not even a great many good men; but good or bad, able or unable, weak or strong, he wraps them round his finger as you would a thread. They are moulded to his will as completely as possible. I have heard some of them, in days when a crisis was likely to occur, denounce the measures of the Government to say, "Well, I can't go that." Still I have known hon. gentlemen long enough to believe that they would go it, and after there was a caucus they did go it every time. Now, I say, what would become of Canada were we to lose this great statesman? Take the position of Canada in 1854, when Canada was in a prosperous condition, when her constitution, as it then existed, had been working well, and yet in ten short years of mis-rule and pitting one Province against another he brought things to such a deadlock that he agreed to consider constitutional changes, a thing that only a few days before his defeat he refused to consider. Was that evidence of great statesmanship, that the constitution of a great country was in ten years rendered unworkable by the maladministration of which this great statesman was guilty?

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). He is our leader; we did not desert him as you deserted yours.

Mr. RYMAL. There is a certain breed of politicians who, if they are suffered the run of the Government kitchen, never get away from it. Then, in the building of the Intercolonial Railway, this great statesman allowed $40,000,000, or thereabouts, to be spent on a work that he said would not cost $20,000,000. At all events, it cost twice as much as the most extravagant estimate; and under the able administration of Canada's greatest statesman, one of his colleagues, and one of his then colleagues, concluded that $8,000,000 had been thrown away. What is the next evidence of his great statesmanship? Well, I suppose the unconditional surrender of a good many of our rights and privileges at the time he consented to the Washington treaty was another evidence of his superior statesmanship. After that I suppose that the Pacific scandal arrangement was another evidence of statesmanship, and lastly the contract he entered into with the Syndicate by which $30,000,000 worth of road ready made was handed over to the Company, and $75,000,000 worth of land, according to their own calculations, and $25,000,000 in cash, amounting to $130,000,000, in order that they might complete a work, which, according to their own estimates, was only to cost $18,000,000. And that is statesmanship; that is statesmanship by which some $80,000,000 of the people's money were handed over to a grasping syndicate for which we never receive anything. For, mind you, although we give them this $130,000,000 for building the road, it is not ours when it is built; we give them the road besides. Moreover, they pay no interest on their property for twenty years, and we give them the monopoly of the trade of that country, the extent and value of which there is no man living at the present time can estimate. For I hold that, under the contract, the Syndicate can, if they will, and I believe they will, because they can, hold the people in their hands completely, and render the whole labor and toil of the millions who may settle in there during the next twenty years, tributary to their own interests. To-day they hold the best portion of that vast country, that heritage of the Canadian people which, according to my mind, should have been reserved for the deserving man who went in there, and allowed to have a fair share to make a home for himself and family. It will be held by grasping speculators, and ten chances to one the ills that now beset old Ireland from absent landlordism, jingoism and Toryism, will be felt in our great North-West for many years. Now, Mr. Speaker, what would happen the country if we should lose our greatest statesmen. I admit, Sir, it would be a great loss. But Canada does not depend upon the existence of one man or any dozen men. When every man of us shall have gone to his long home, I hope, I believe, that the people of Canada will be represented as well and better governed than they are at the present day. Then we have some other magnates whose loss would be great to the country if they were removed. My hon. friend, the Minister of Railways, is perhaps the most prominent representative of the Baron Munchausen family I ever heard, and his removal would be a great loss, for he is a great man, I quite admit, and I wish from my very heart that I could say that he is as honest as he is great. But even if he went the St Lawrence would continue to flow towards the sea as it does now, and Canada would find among her millions of people some one that would worthily fill his place. But, Sir, there is one thing that we could hardly afford to lose, and that is the gushing loyalty of my hon. friend from Niagara. When he fails then the time spoken of by the Prophet Jeremiah will have come, when the abomination of desolation will have come upon us. When that time will come in the life of Canada, then the golden bowl is broken and the fountain at the cistern will cease to flow, and men will go mourning about the streets—I say that when that time comes chaos and confusion will take possession of our country; but I hope that those of us who pray will pray that my hon. friend from Niagara will long be spared to sing us the loyal songs and give us the loyal speeches with which he has so long regaled us. But I hope that, clothed as he is now with all the majesty of a British subject, he will cease to annoy those who do not agree with him in all his political ideas, and will conduct himself so that I can, on every occasion, as I trust I am able to do, give him the right hand of fellowship, and declare to the world that he is not a very bad fellow after all.

Mr. GAULT. Before this debate closes I wish to say a few words in regard to the state of business in Montreal. In 1878 the majority of our industries were closed, and a large number of failures had taken place among our mercantile and industrial classes. There were over 35 failures among dry-goods men alone, and the hardware trade and the boot and shoe trades were so depressed that I heard one large importing merchant say that if business continued in that state two years longer, there would not be a wholesale importing house left in Montreal. I have some statistics which I have collected with regard to the business and industrial classes of Montreal, which are presented in the following table:—

	Sept., 1878.	Sept., 1881.	1878.	1881.
(a.) C. W. Williams Sewing Machine Factory	62	130	$ 628 70	$ 1,547 61	p. c.
Lawlor Manufacturing Co's. Sewing Machines.		54		675 00

Agricultural Implement Empire Works, C. B. Mahon & Co.	12 to 15	50 to 55	90 00	400 00
(c.) G. R. Prowse, Manufacturer, Tin and Iron Ware and Wrought Iron Ranges, a specialty.	18	40	100 00	225 00	125
(d.) R. W. Warmington, Tin Ware Manufacturer.	50	80	160 00	290 00
John McDougall, Caledonia Works, St. Gabriel Locks, Montreal Foundry Machine Shop, engine and boilers.	141	232	4,674 00	8,886 00
Joseph Dunn, Nail Factory, Cote St. Paul.	29	34	140 25	209 80

Charles Garth & Co., Brass Finishers, Hot Water and Steam-fitters.	78	125	438 00	806 00	20
(f.) John Date, Brass Foundry, Coppersmith, Plumber, &c., Montreal.	26	40	181 50	253 00	22
Robert Mitchell & Co., Manufacturers of Brass Goods.	114	168
(g.) Clendenning Foundry, Montreal.	150	250	900 00	2,000 00	33½

(a.) This is a new concern formerly carried on by Mr. Lawlor, who employed in 1878 none, now employs 100 to 110 men, which will double by next year.

(b.) I find business better this year than for twenty years past, and could have disposed of five times the number of machines if I could get them out.

(c.) During 1878 men were working on three-quarter time, and could obtain all the skilled workmen required since the adoption of the National Policy. I have had to double the facilities for manufacturing and employ more than double the men, as well as work over-time. Skilled workmen are now thoroughly employed, and very scarce. My workmen, with myself, are strong advocates of the National Policy, to which source we attribute the improvement.

(d.) Prices of goods are as low as in 1878.

(e.) The above does not include men who are indirectly employed by us, which would swell the amount somewhat.

(f.) We find the effect of the National Policy in the increase of our trade, and think it is a good institution for the country in general.

(g.) Mr. Clendenning says:—"The actual increase in wages is more than figures show, because men on piece work do not turn out as much per man when wages is high as when it is low. The increased demand is in every department of my business, and is from all over the country. Since September I have made my first shipment to Manitoba. I could have done a larger trade if I could have supplied orders, but could not procure the skilled labor. I have now more immigrants working in foundry than we ever had before, and I have as much work as my present facilities enable me to do. We are in daily receipt of orders from every section of the country for machine and agricultural castings. We have never been able this fall to meet the demand for the better class of castings. I have more men working to-day than I had in September. Our collections are better, our cash sales larger, and our bad debts smaller than any time since I have been in business, or say the past twenty-five years."

There are now three silk factories in Montreal, and all are likely to do very well. One of the firms is now entering into the manufacture of ribbons, while another firm is turning out the finest class of goods, which are being sold in Montreal as foreign manufactures. They are now building a new establishment on the corner of Ontario Street and Papineau Square, that will give employment to 200 hands. Every paper you take up, of Montreal, contains an announcement respecting some new interest. Messrs. Ives have gone to Longueuil, which has given a bonus of $10,000, to establish a foundry business there. I have travelled through many parts of western Canada, and the same activity prevailed there as in Montreal. At Brantford, Harrison & Co. were as busy as possible. They now want a larger plot of land to enable them to carry on their business. Messrs. Noxon, of Ingersoll, have orders for over twelve months on hand, being goods required for Manitoba and the North-West. The Waterous Co. took a portion of the Exhibition Buildings in Montreal, and as they were not able to forward any machines on account of being too busy, they offered anyone who specially wished to see their establishment to pay his fare up to Brantford. While the establishments in Montreal have increased and given employment to a large number of additional hands, they have also enabled the farmers to sell their produce at a very much higher price than formerly. The Chairman of the Market Committee informed me that one day over 1,000 carts and waggons came to Montreal with produce which they sold at such prices that if I could have obtained them when I was a farmer, I would have been a farmer still. When I was a farmer, I received 12½ cents a bushel for oats, 80 or 90 cents per bushel for wheat, 12½ cents per pound for fresh butter, and other things accordingly. I found I was not able to make it remunerative, and I therefore abandoned it. In Toronto the Dominion Bolt Works give employment to 181 people. As a proof of the great increase of wealth that has taken place everywhere in this country, I might instance Bank of Montreal stock which has advanced from 125

to 214, and Molson's from 109 to 127 and 128. The Windsor Hotel which we thought would be a complete failure has had its stock sold to-day at 70, which not long ago, was not considered worth over 10. Another matter that will show the prosperity of the people, is that the gentlemen in the club house of St. James, gave at New Year's and Christmas over $100 in presents to the servants. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that great distress exists in Montreal. In 1881, 1,326 people were assisted, while in 1880, 2,157 were assisted, showing a falling off in the former year of one-half. In Scotland I saw 6,000 men employed in one ship yard, and I do not see why we should not have similar ship yards in this country. I was very glad to know that the Allans' line of steamers have passengers booked to their full extent for immigrants for two or three months to come, and I have no doubt the Syndicate will induce a large immigration to our shores this year. My own impression is that we have not used proper exertions to bring immigrants this way. At Castle Garden, New York, they are given every accommodation; but here the case is different, though at Quebec, I must say, I went with another gentleman to the immigrants' rooms and had as good a breakfast as one could expect. In 1878, in Montreal, from ten to twenty per cent. of the stores were to be rented. To-day they are all being taken up as fast as possible. On behalf of the mercantile community of Montreal, I return my thanks to the Government for having repealed the stamp tax, which was a source of great annoyance to the merchants of Montreal. There is one thing personal to myself which I wish to set right. With respect to the statement that I made a few evenings ago, that my cotton stocks only paid three per cent., I regret that I made that statement, and now withdraw it. I frankly admit that the statement is incorrect, and was made without sufficient thought on what I considered, at the time, to be good basis.

Mr. SNOWBALL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 2:05 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 22nd March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DUTIES ON CARBOYS.

Mr. BORDEN enquired, Whether carboys containing sulphuric acid, imported for use in the manufacture of fertilizers, will be allowed to pass to and fro in bond, duty being paid on the acid.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In the absence of the Minister of Customs, I may say arrangements have been made by which carboys, after having once paid duty, will be allowed to return free of duty.

HARBOR COMMISSIONERS POWERS.

Mr. VANASSE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to modify the powers and attributes of the Montreal Harbor Commissioners at Montreal, and of the other ports of the Dominion.

Mr. McLELAN. A Bill will be introduced affecting the power of the Montreal Harbor Commissioners.

GOVERNMENT SAVINGS BANK AT LOCKEPORT.

Mr. TROW, in the absence of Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to establish a branch of the Government Savings Bank at Lockeport, in the county of Shelburne, during the present year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That matter is under consideration.

CANADIAN OFFICERS WHO TOOK PART IN THE RED RIVER EXPEDITION.

Mr. AMYOT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to distinguish, henceforth, in the Militia List, those Canadian officers who took part in the Red River Expedition, as is being done in England with reference to those officers of the English Army who joined the Canadian Expedition; and if such is the intention of the Government, whether such mark of distinction is to be the same as that adopted in England?

Mr. CARON. It is the intention of the Government to distinguish henceforth, in the Militia List, by a mark of distinction, those Canadian Officers who took part in the Red River Expedition. As to the second part of the question, the mark of distinction has not yet been decided upon, so it is not settled whether it is to be the same one as in England.

IMMIGRANT SHEDS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in view of the immense immigration about to take place to Manitoba, this year, to cause additional sheds to be constructed at once, at various points along the Canadian Pacific Railway, for the temporary use of the families of the new settlers?

Mr. POPE (Compton.) The accommodation for immigrants will be very much increased this year. There will be an immigrant shed beyond Winnipeg, at Brandon. There is a new shed now almost completed at Winnipeg, and an old one is being repaired. Besides, the hon. gentleman himself knows that Winnipeg is erecting two sheds at the expense of the city.

WHARF AT RIMOUSKI.

Mr. Fiset enquired, Whether the Government intend to place in the Supplementary Estimates a certain sum in order to raise and enlarge the wharf at Rimouski?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not the intention of the Government to make any addition at present to that wharf.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE HARBOR OF BIC.

Mr. Fiset enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause any works of improvement to be done this year in the Harbor of Bic?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This work is now engaging the attention of the Government.

POST OFFICE AT WHITE ROCK MILLS.

Mr. BORDEN enquired, Has the post office at White Rock Mills, King's County, Nova Scotia, been closed for some months? When did the postmaster there resign, who has been appointed in his place, and when was the appointment made?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am not aware whether it has been closed or not. The postmaster gave notice in October last that he intended to resign, and a successor was appointed in January. He was bound by law in the meantime to keep the office open. The name of his successor is O'Leary.

SAVINGS BANK OFFICES IN ST. RAYMOND AND ST. CASIMIR.

Mr. VALLÉE enquired, Whether the Government has decided to open savings bank offices in the post offices of the parishes of St. Raymond and St. Casimir, in the county of Portneuf?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The matter is under consideration.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS AT SOURIS WEST.

Mr. MUTTART, in moving for correspondence, papers, &c., received by the Government since the 17th February, 1881, relating to harbor improvements at Souris West, in Prince Edward Island, said: With reference to this motion I wish to observe that the Harbor of Souris West is a very important one to seafaring and business men, as well as to the farmers of a large section of country in the eastern part of King's County. Souris West Harbor is the last harbor on the Island to close in the fall and the first to open in the spring. The business of that place is considerable and steadily increasing. Before Confederation a large amount of voluntary labor was performed and about $1,500 expended by the Local Government in constructing a breastwork along the eastern side of the channel with the view of deepening the water on the bar outside; but the work was not built sufficiently high to prevent the sand from washing over into the channel. A large petition has been presented to the Department of Public Works asking for a few thousand dollars for this harbor. It is believed that $3,000 or $4,000 would so improve this harbor that ordinary fishing and trading vessels could pass in and out with their cargoes without being caught on the bar. Previous to my leaving home last fall a number of meetings in connection with the proposed improvement of Souris West Harbor were held. At these meetings the claims of the place to a grant of public money were fully discussed. The Minister of Public Works, when in Scuris last summer, was waited upon by leading men of the village, who urged the necessity of at once taking steps to improve this harbor, and I sincerely hope the Government may see fit to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates for this much needed public work.

Motion agreed to.

COAL HOPPERS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. ANGLIN, in moving for copies of all advertisements or circulars, tenders, contracts, correspondence, telegrams, accounts, vouchers and other papers respecting the purchase of second-hand coal hoppers from or through B. Burland, said: We have had, from time to time, with regard to the condition of the rolling stock on the Intercolonial Railway, the official report that the stock is in the very highest state of efficiency, always maintained in perfect repair, and quite capable of doing its work properly. Well, Sir, it seems strange and inconsistent with that statement that the hon. Minister of Railways seems to have found it either necessary or desirable to purchase, or cause to be purchased, in the United States, or to purchase from somebody who did purchase in the United States, a number of cast-off, second-hand coal hoppers of some United States Railway. One naturally asks why this was done. Are there not in the Lower Provinces, or in the other Provinces, a sufficient number of workers in wood and iron to produce any number of coal hoppers that may be required; and have we not, in point of fact, lying more than half idle in the town of Moncton, a very large amount of machinery belonging to the Government, on which a very large amount of money has been invested, and could it not have been possible to cause a sufficient number of coal hoppers to be made at this place instead of resorting to this extraordinary means of obtaining them? It would be impossible that any man in his senses can hereafter accept, without qualification, the statement that the rolling stock of that railway is in an efficient and perfect condition—in such a condition as the rolling stock of a great railway ought to be, when he finds that the hon. Minister, during one year, has purchased a large number of second-class coal hoppers. These coal hoppers, it is to be presumed, were found not to be good enough to be used on some private road in the United States, and were rejected for some reason or other by some coal company and perhaps imported into Canada and purchased by the hon. the Minister of Railways for use upon our railway, of which he is so fond of boasting, and of which we ought to be so proud, as a great public work to the credit of the Engineers who laid it out, and of all who were concerned in the constructing and working it. Now, to be frank with the hon. the Minister of Railways, and to give him an opportunity, if he chooses to do it, of removing an impression that has got abroad, should that impression be found to be unfounded, I may as well say to him that I have been told that this transaction arose out of the last Pictou by-election; that about the time the hon. gentleman was in the city of Pictou, or somewhere in that neighborhood, he either met or entered into communication with this Mr. Burland, who, I am told, is the son-in-law of a Mr. Moore, manager of one of the mining properties in Pictou, a gentleman who exercised very considerable influence at the last Pictou election. Of Mr. Burland himself I have not made particular enquiry, but I have been told that this Mr. Burland lives in Montreal, and that he is not a gentleman who is at all accustomed to meddle in transactions of this kind. I believe, if I am correctly informed, that he is an engraver, or something of that kind, and not a man in the habit of dealing in railway rolling stock. The statement further is that this Mr. Burland obtained from the Minister of Railways a letter of some kind, whether a letter promising to purchase those hoppers from him when he had first purchased them in the United States and brought them to this country, or saying to that effect something at all events which was held to be sufficient to give Mr. Burland the credit upon which, it is said, he bought these coal hoppers. These coal hoppers were admitted into the country at what appears to be a very handsome price indeed for second-hand articles, Mr. Burland having been paid the sum of $24,000, I think—a sum probably considerably less than what would have been paid for new ones, but certainly a very handsome sum for old ones. The Minister of Railways will probably claim that these articles were only second-hand in name, and very valuable, but if that be the case these gentlemen must have used extraordinary inducement to cause the railway company in the United States to part with them, because, as we all know, at the present time, rolling stock of every kind is scarce in the United States. The workshops have not been able to furnish all the rolling stock required, owing to the largely increased business of late years. I have just received a note stating that Mr. Burland has always been in the railway supply business, and I am glad to make the correction. The whole transaction appears to me to be a very extraordinary one, and one which the hon. the Minister of Railways would do well, for his own sake, to explain fully if it is susceptible of explanation, and whatever he may say, the fact still remains that we purchased for our great Intercolonial Railway the cast-off coal hoppers of some road in the United States.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am greatly obliged to my hon. friend the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) for favoring the House on this occasion with the rumors to which he appears always so ready to lend his ear, in relation to matters in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. I can, of course, quite understand, why that hon. gentleman should be particularly alive to this matter, if it were possible to connect it with the Pictou election, as I had the pleasure on that important occasion of measuring swords with my hon. friend, and of having some very pleasant and friendly passages at arms with him on more than one platform during that contest. I have no doubt, however, that he will be greatly relieved to learn that his information respecting this transaction is entirely inaccurate from beginning to end. The hon. gentleman will, no doubt, be glad to learn that at the time of the Pictou election, and long after it was over, I did not know that there was such a person in existence as Mr. Burland, and had never had any proposition before me in relation to these cars. I think it was on the occasion of my visit to Prince Edward Island and Pictou, after my return from British Columbia, and long after the Pictou election, that the matter was first brought under my notice. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman will be pleased that I should set him right at the outset, on a very important point, with regard to which he seems to labor under a great deal of misconception. The hon. gentleman seems to think that the purchase of additional rolling stock for the Intercolonial Railway involves a contradiction with the statement that the rolling stock of that road is in a thorough state of efficiency. The statement with reference to the efficiency of the rolling stock of the Intercolonial Railway applies to the rolling stock proper of that work. The hon. gentleman does not suppose that the rolling stock of any railway—the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk, or the Great Western—which is sufficient for its business at one time, the rolling stock which is furnished and charged to capital account for the purpose of doing the work in a certain condition of the traffic, is to be found sufficient if that traffic doubles. The hon. gentleman ought to know that on the Grand Trunk, the Great Western, and all these railways, when a great increase in the volume of traffic takes place the stock required to deal with the additional traffic is not provided from the revenue, it is provided and charged to capital account. All a railway is expected to do is to maintain in a thorough state of efficiency the rolling stock charged to capital account which was furnished in the first instance. The Intercolonial was equipped with rolling stock which was quite sufficient for the business required at the time, and what devolves upon me as Minister of Railways is to see that all that rolling stock, say 100 or 120 engines as the case may be, furnish a charge to capital account by the administration of the road, and all the cars, first and second class passenger cars, freight cars and everything connected with them are kept in a thorough state of efficiency under charges to revenue account. Now, what I have said—what I believe to be true, what officers in the Department tell me, men of the highest character and standing, men who enjoyed the confidence of the late Government as they enjoy my confidence, is that the rolling stock provided by the Government and Parliament for the Intercolonial Railway is maintained in a thorough and complete state of efficiency. That is to say: If a locomotive becomes disabled it is repaired or replaced by a new one, and charged to revenue, and if a collision occurs or a car is destroyed or damaged, it has to be rebuilt or repaired, as the case may be, and similarly charged to revenue. But the new stock required by the increased business of the road is not furnished and ought not to be furnished by revenue, when the rolling stock which was originally put upon the road, and was sufficient for the business done at that time, proves insufficient for double or treble that amount of traffic. The hon. gentleman will understand that when I showed an increase of nearly 50 per cent.—an increase of over 40 per cent. in the volume of traffic—that it is quite possible to maintain the rolling stock of the Intercolonial Railway in the highest state of efficiency, and yet to have to apply to Parliament for capital to furnish the new rolling stock that is required to meet the additional volume of traffic; and I am prepared to show and to prove that on the Grand Trunk Railway and the Great Western Railway that is the course pursued—when the volume of traffic altogether outgrows the traffic for which the road was equipped, they furnish the rolling stock that is required to meet the demands of the increased business, and charge it not to revenue but to capital account. So much, I have said, to show that the two statements to which the hon. gentleman refers are not antagonistic, but are perfectly consistent. I may say that when I found that this great additional and unexpected volume of traffic was making demands for additional rolling stock I applied for authority to purchase, and, having obtained that authority, tenders were asked from every one in Canada engaged in the construction of such rolling stock, from whom I had the least hope of obtaining the rolling stock required. And having learned by experience the difficulty of promptly obtaining from the sources we had in Canada, the rolling stock that would be required, I, at the same time, issued tenders to parties in the United States, from whom the Government had previously purchased rolling stock, and from whom I might expect to obtain it on favorable terms. I had these tenders all before me, and I found that it was not possible, either in the United States or Canada to obtain as promptly as the necessities of the road demanded, all the rolling stock that was required. A deputation of the coal proprietors of the county of Pictou waited on me, long after the Pictou election, and on my return from Prince Edward Island, I having also visited British Columbia in the interval, and pressed on me the necessity of providing for the very large engagements they had made for the delivery of coal in Quebec and Ontario. I told them the measures which had been taken, and the offer which had been made by Mr. Burland, who stated that he had an offer of some 200 coal cars in New York, which could be purchased at most favorable terms, and which would relieve the pressure of the coal traffic. On receiving that information, I despatched Mr. Whitley, Mechanical Superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway, and who has occupied that position from the time the Intercolonial Railway was opened, to New York to examine and report on these cars. Mr. Whitley visited New York and reported upon them, and stated that some fifty of them were practically new, having scarcely been used at all, that some fifty had been used to a large extent, and that the balance were what the hon. member for Gloucester has described as really second-hand cars. Under these circumstances I took no further action until great pressure was applied with reference to the demands and the necessities of removing the coal. I can show the hon. gentleman a score of letters from parties engaged in supplying coal in Montreal and elsewhere, in relation to the statement of the coal miners, that they were not able to obtain sufficient cars to furnish coal as promptly as was necessary to meet the engagements which had been made. I thereupon despatched Mr. Whitley again to New York, and told him to select some fifty of those cars which he had reported to be practically new; and upon Mr. Whitley making the selection of those cars, I obtained the authority of the Council to purchase those fifty cars at $228 each, the price paid for hopper coal cars being $432 each. Now, Sir, I think that is an explanation which the hon. gentleman himself will receive as quite covering the case; and I only thank him for giving me this opportunity of making an explanation which I have no doubt will not only satisfy the House, but that hon. gentleman, that everything done in this matter has been done in a manner that will bear the closest examination and inspection, and in a manner demanded by the public interest alone.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. the Minister of Railways has directed a great part of his speech to a question which I did not raise, or care to raise at all. I did not discuss the question of the introduction of new rolling stock on the road. What I said was, that the purchase of second-hand hoppers for use on the Intercolonial Railway was in itself prima facie evidence that the rolling stock was not in the position in which we would like to see it. A purchase of second-hand stock seems to be an extraordinary transaction, and I do not think the statement of the hon. gentleman deprives it of that character to any person who has seen the entry in the Supplementary Estimates. His calculation does not seem to be correct, as the amount debited is $24,000 for what I call second-hand coal hoppers. One of the things I objected to in my speech—and the hon. gentleman did not care to refer to that—was that, while we have in the town of Moncton large workshops and very valuable machinery, and while we have in the Lower Provinces hundreds of skilled workers in wood and iron who would have been delighted to obtain employment in these workshops at fair rates of wages, the hon. gentleman made up his mind to meet the demand for additional coal hoppers by purchasing them in the United States, instead of getting them built in Canada, by Canadians, from Canadian wood and Canadian iron, as one would expect from an advocate of the National Policy, who declares himself in favor of Canada for the Canadians. By taking the course he did, he has proved recreant to that policy which he is so fond of proclaiming as the policy most suitable to this country. The machinery and workshops are there, the workmen could have been obtained in a few hours, and Mr. Whitley would have been well qualified to proceed with that work, and turn out a hundred, or five hundred, or even a thousand cars in a short time. There was no necessity of going to the United States for these coal hoppers, and it is not creditable to the Intercolonial Railway that we should send to New York to purchase second-hand coal hoppers, which must have been cast aside by some railway company in the United States. No railway company in the United States would have sold coal hoppers worth $432 for $228, unless for some extraordinary reason. The hon. gentleman says he relied upon the report of his officials. What that report is I do not know. Perhaps it would be well to have it brought down. What I object to is, that without absolute necessity, the hon. gentleman did not choose to give employment to our own people in making hoppers that might be a credit to the railway, instead of introducing these second-hand hoppers, which, whatever he says, will not be regarded as fit rolling stock for the Intercolonial Railway, controlled and managed by the Government of this Dominion.

Motion agreed to.

MINING RIGHTS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all Orders in Council and regulations in connection with mining rights not already brought down, said: I observe by a return of correspondence in connection with mining rights, particularly in connection with gold mining rights, that various provisional permits have been given and interests created based upon the proposition that the Government are about to submit regulations, and that those parties may depend upon their interests being considered when the regulations come down. I also observe that among the interests which have been so created is one in favor of two parties, I think Messrs. Petley and Costigan, for bench or bar or drift gold mining on the Saskatchewan River, from a point four miles above to a point six miles below Edmonton, making ten miles on that river. I express no opinion on the present occasion as to the propriety of the Government granting such a right for ten miles along the Saskatchewan River to any one party. It may or may not be a prudent course to adopt in dealing with the subject; but that right, and other provisional rights, are such that it is important we should see what the regulations are, if they have been prepared, and if they have not been framed that they should be prepared and brought down at a sufficiently early period of the Session to make discussion practicable.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no objection to the motion. Of course if there are any new regulations they will be brought down at the same time.

Motion agreed to.

CONTRACTS ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all contracts for the construction of any part of the Canadian Pacific Railway made by the Company with any person or firm since the date to which the previous order extends, said: I observe that since the order was made for copies of contracts, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a very large contract, for the construction of about 500 miles of that railway across the prairie, has been let, and it will be interesting, of course, that the House should possess information respecting the construction of that road up to the latest possible date. I have, therefore, given notice of this motion, which is simply a motion to obtain up to a later date that information which the House has already ordered should be obtained. I observe, from an advertisement published by the contractors holding this contract, that the grading on the first 200 miles is so light as to require only 12,000 cubic yards per mile of embankment, and we will be very glad to know the parties to whom that contract of such extraordinary ease has been let.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, in reply to the hon. member, that the Government has no such information in their possession as has been referred to by the hon. gentleman, but no time will be lost in seeking to obtain that information, and when it has been obtained it will be laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course the Government have the power to demand this information. That point was decided long ago with respect to the Grand Trunk Railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is the first occasion since I have had a seat in Parliament in which it has been assumed that Government had a right to ask for contracts made by companies which are subsidized by the Government. The Canada Central Railway was subsidized by the Government not many years ago to a large extent, as the hon. gentleman is perfectly well aware. But I am not aware of any hon. member having moved for copies of sub-contracts made by them for the construction of the road.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We were not aware of any sub-contracts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are contractors with the Government, and if they have let contracts for the construction of portions of their lines they are sub-contracts. I am not aware of any occasion on which hon. gentlemen opposite, or any hon. members, stated that because the Canada Central was receiving $12,000 a mile for the construction of their road, they should submit to Parliament sub-contracts made by them.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We were not aware of their having made any sub-contracts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think if the hon. gentleman had been of the same enquiring turn of mind as the leader of the Opposition, he would have ascertained that the Canada Central let sub-contracts and secured the construction of their work to a certain extent in that way. We will ask the Canadian Pacific Railway to furnish the information called for, and will lay it on the Table of the House as soon as received. The hon. gentleman will no doubt be only too glad to know, when the contracts are obtained, if they bear out the assumption of the hon. gentleman, that the Company have discovered a very easy, level and admirable route for the railway; he will accept it as one of the advantages which the country gains by having the work placed in the hands of a company directly interested in it, instead of its being in the hands of the Government, who are obliged to rely on persons not so directly interested in the location and construction of the work.

Motion agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN MANITOBA.

Mr. SCHULTZ moved the reading of the Journals of the House of Monday, March 7th, 1881, so far as the same relate to the petition of Henry J. Clark, Q.C., and others, of Winnipeg, Province of Manitoba, setting forth certain charges against the Hon. Edmund Burk Wood, Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench for the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. BLAKE. The other day it was urged, the leader of the House being in his place, that the petition and the answer to the petition should be printed and distributed to members before this motion came on, and as that has not been done I ask that this motion should stand. That was the course pursued in the case of the petition against Judge Leranger.

Mr. SCHULTZ. I do not understand the arrangement was made in that way. I call attention to this fact that any further delay will prevent the order being reached this Session.

Mr. BLAKE. I mentioned the subject at the earliest moment after the hon. gentleman had put the notice on the paper. The day following the notice of the hon. gentleman I called the attention of the leader of the House to the circumstance that the notice was on the paper, and to the fact that the address moving for the response of the learned Judge had not been complied with, and that without having the petition and reply in printed form the House could not intelligently deal with the matter. The leader of the House endorsed that view, and he said he would take care that the response was brought down at once, and that both papers would be printed immediately.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I understood the hon. member for West Durham to say that he did not think it was fair to submit a motion for the reading of the Journals, without announcing what ulterior action he would take. The hon. gentleman was to give us notice, and then to explain the ulterior action he intended to take.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member for Compton is confusing two days. When the hon. gentleman proposed to move his notice, he gave notice of his intention to move for a Committee upon that notice being on the paper.

Motion allowed to stand.

KINGSTON AND PEMBROKE RAILWAY.

Mr. MACKENZIE, in moving for copies of all correspondence, petitions, or other documents in possession of the Government respecting complaints against the location and manner of working of the Kingston and Pembroke Railway in the city of Kingston, said: The road passed near a bridge at a very acute angle, and was a source of danger to passers-by. His attention had been called to the matter by correspondents, and he wished to know if the Government had given it any consideration.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My attention has been called to the subject, and it has been referred to the Department of Justice to ascertain what authority the Railway Committee of the Privy Council can exercise in the matter. I understand the Company obtained the permission of the civic authorities to run on this street, and it is a question of doubt what power we have to interfere.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I happen to be very well acquainted with the locality. I witnessed on that spot no less than three runaways, two of which resulted disastrously. I know, at least, that one fatal accident occurred in crossing this bridge. I have seen many railway crossings, but never any so badly arranged as this. If it be not in the power of the Government to interfere under the existing Railway Act, it would be well to amend the Act so as to give it such power. The Ministry will understand, without any further explanation, how in the case of a crossing which 4,000 people must pass, there may be many risks to life, in the attempt to approach Kingston; there may be very serious accidents to life and limb at this point, unless some precautions are taken.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. On a recent occasion when the hon. the Minister of Militia visited Kingston, his attention was called to the position of the gate of the Tête du Pont Barracks, and to the necessity that existed for a change in its position, so that instead of its projecting into the street, it should be made flush with the barrack-wall, which would remove to a great extent the evil spoken of. I am in hopes that the representations made to that hon. Minister will secure this improvement.

Mr. MACKENZIE. To open inwards?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. To make it flush with the wall, and where it now projects to take away the bastions. I have also spoken to and laid a complaint before the Manager and President of that road, on the subject, and urged the necessity of removing the evil mentioned, which exists to a large extent; and I have been assured that this evil is not so great as was represented, and is only temporary; that the Company are building their freight shed, engine-house and other workshops away from the barracks, and at the other side of the embankment, and that as soon as this work is done, and the buildings occupied this spring, there will be no shunting of trains or any such inconvenience as has existed in the past. That gentleman assured me as soon as this was done the evil would be altogether removed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Centre Huron respecting the Consolidated Railway Act and the powers of this Parliament, and with respect to the opinion that we have not authority to deal with cases like this, I propose to submit an amendment to the Act, to define and settle the question of our powers in such matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Would it not be well to consider whether joint action might not be had with the several Provinces? There is one crossing at Toronto, where some roads cross and start at the same point, and where others which have been chartered by the Ontario Legislature also cross; and to take measures for one class of road and measures for the other would be futile.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have already taken action in some of those cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will let us know when he is possessed of more information with regard to this particular case?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I am extremely glad to hear the assurance of the hon. the Minister of Railways. I would like to know whether any officer of his Department has examined and reported on the position of things at Kingston. There is no doubt that the suggestion made by the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), will to some extent, but only to a very slight extent, modify the risk which those travellers run in coming into Kingston.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton, I may say that we sent an officer from the Department here and the Government of Ontario sent one of its officers, and they made a joint report in relation to this very matter. Joint action in this case was taken by the two Governments. I will give the fullest information on the subject, when procured.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Motion agreed to.

THE NEWFIELD AND THE WRECKED MORAVIAN.

Mr. KILLAM moved for copies of all correspondence between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and any person or persons, respecting the employment of the Government steamer Newfield in connection with the wreck of the Moravian, with statement of the time so employed, the price to be paid, and the amount received. He said: In moving this resolution I do not desire to raise any question affecting the interests of the Allan steamship company, but simply to call attention to the principle involved in sending Government vessels to the relief of vessels not owned by the Government. I wish to enquire whether the right course was pursued by the Dominion steamer, and whether in such cases of shipwreck those steamers should be sent off promptly to the relief of wrecks. The custom of the English navy, when vessels are in commission and kept ready for service of that kind, is that they should always be prepared to assist any vessel in distress, and go to the rescue of life and property in such cases, and I believe no charge is made under such circumstances. In this country the circumstances are somewhat different. Our Dominion steamers are used for certain purposes; they are in no sense war vessels, although they may be useful some time for the protection of our coasts, when furnished with sufficient guns and men for that purpose. But as a general rule, those steamers are mainly employed in the maintenance of the Lighthouse Service, and in other services incident to the Fisheries Department. In this particular case the steamer Moravian was stranded on the 30th January, at Mud Island, and I understand that the Newfoundland, belonging to the same company, was not then able to go to her assistance and that of the passengers, to save life and property or assist the Moravian to get off. The agents of the Allan Company then applied to the Marine and Fisheries Department, at Halifax, for the assistance of the Newfield, and agreed upon certain rates and remuneration per day for her services. The steamer went as required, remained for several days, and returned to Halifax; but the Allan Company afterwards failed to pay the amount agreed upon. This is a matter of business perhaps between the Government and the steamship company. I should be the last to claim that any consideration should be given the Allan Steamship Company, on account of certain services rendered the Government, as some have insinuated. I merely refer to this subject for the purpose of raising the question as to whether it is the duty of the Marine and Fisheries Department, in the case of disasters to vessels, to send the steamers at their control to the aid of the distressed when assistance could be conveniently obtained otherwise. My own view is, that where local aid can be conveniently and efficiently procured, that it is not worth the while of the Government to send vessels to those wrecks; but that where there is a doubt in the matter or difficult to procure assistance in the locality, it is quite proper for the authorities to send a Dominion steamer to render all possible assistance without any charge to the owners of vessels, or with only such reasonable charge as would cover the expense incurred in the saving of the goods, in the saving of life and property, to be paid by the owners of the assisted vessels.

Mr. McLELAN. The correspondence is still going on upon the points raised by the hon. gentleman, and when completed it will be brought down.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS OF 1880.

Mr. BLAKE, in the absence of Mr. MILLS, moved that the following items of the Public Accounts of 1880 be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts for enquiry:—W. R. Brown, professional services (page 221), $1,500; A. McArthur, professional services (page 222), $750; W. Murdoch, C.E. (page 225), $11,499.47. He said: My hon. friend informed me that those accounts were not investigated by the Public Accounts Committee last year, and that he had within the last few days received some information which lead him to believe that they were to be investigated, and he thought that it would be more convenient to do that than to move for the papers to be brought down; so that by this procedure they will get before the Public Accounts Committee.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no objection to these accounts being brought down, and to this motion passing. I may mention there is a misprint in the Public Accounts, and, of course, in this notice: the name is Bown, instead of Brown.

Motion agreed to.

THE TOWN OF PEMBROKE AND THE CANADA CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) moved for copy of a petition presented to His Excellency by the corporation of the town of Pembroke, in the county of Renfrew (dated 30th January, 1879), praying that His Excellency may be pleased to relieve the said town from the payment of a bonus of $75,000, granted to the Canada Central Railway Company, on the 4th October, 1875, to secure the extension of the said railway from the village of Renfrew to the town of Pembroke. Also, copies of all correspondence between the Government, or any member thereof, and the said corporation, or any person or persons, in relation to the subject matter of the said petition. He said: The motion requires some explanation in relation to the reasons which induced the corporation of the town of Pembroke to make this application to the Government. I am aware that the mere bald proposal that the Government should take $75,000 out of the public Treasury and hand it over to a municipality for the purpose of relieving them of the liabilities voluntarily entered into on their part, may seem somewhat extraordinary, even a preposterous request. But I hope to be able to show, in the statement which I am about to make to the House, that the people of this town are, under the circumstances, perfectly justified in making the request they have made to the Government. It will be necessary, in dealing with this question, to say a word or two with reference to the railway project of that locality. As long ago as 1853 the people of the county of Renfrew, a large portion of which was then almost an unbroken wilderness, realizing the advantages of railway communication, granted to the Brockville and Ottawa Railway Company, incorporated to build and run a railway from the town of Brockville to the village of Pembroke, in conjunction with the county of Lanark, no less a sum than $800,000. That road was commenced but never completed. It was built to a certain point about six miles within the county of Renfrew, and, in 1870, the Brockville and Ottawa Railway Company permitted their charter to expire. In the meantime the Canada Central Railway Company obtained an Act of incorporation in 1861, which "Authorized the Company to lay out, construct and finish a double or single track of railway from such point on Lake Huron as may be found best adapted for the purpose to the city of Ottawa, by way of Pembroke and Araprior, and from the city of Ottawa to Montreal."

I desire the House to mark the fact that this Act of incorporation imposed on the Canada Central Railway Company the obligation, in building their line of railway from Lake Huron to the city of Ottawa, to pass by the way of Pembroke, because it is upon that point that I intend chiefly to base the arguments I propose to offer to the House. That obligation remained in full force and effect up to the time that operations were commenced by that railway company. They did not commence to build any portion of the line, which they were authorized to build in 1861, until 1870, and they then commenced, as I presumed they were perfectly authorized in doing, at the city of Ottawa and built a portion of their railway from Ottawa to Carleton Place. Subsequently, I think in the year 1872, they built another portion of their line of railway from Sand Point to the village of Renfrew, and they obtained control of the intervening link between Carleton Place and Sand Point, which had been built by the Brockville and Ottawa Railway. Well, Sir, under the authority of the Act of 1874—the Canadian Pacific Railway Act—and here I may say that up to the year 1875 the obligation to which I have referred, and which was incorporated in the original Act of incorporation to this Company, and which was continued by the subsequent remaining Act, still remained in full force and effect. In 1875, when the hon. member for Lambton, then leader of the Government, under the authority of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874, submitted to this House for its approval, an Order in Council granting a subsidy to the Canada Central Railway Company of $12,000 per mile upon the following terms, which I shall read from a report of the Privy Council submitted to Parliament on the 13th March, 1875:—

"The Committee of Council have had under consideration the application of the Canada Central Railway Company, for the subsidy proposed to be granted to railway companies under the terms of the Act thirty-seventh Victoria, chapter fourteen, intitled: "An Act to provide for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway," and they advise that a subsidy of $12,000 per mile be granted to the said Company to aid in constructing their line from the vicinity of the village of Douglas westward to the eastern end of the branch railway proposed to be built from the Georgian Bay by the Government, being about 120 miles, upon and subject to the following conditions:

1st. That the road shall be built upon a line to be approved by the Minister of Public Works, but which may be defined generally as ascending the Valley of the Bonnechère from the vicinity of Douglas via Golden Lake and Round Lake."

The temporary terminus of the Canada Central was then at the village of Renfrew, and, under the conditions that were imposed by the Order in Council from which I have quoted, it will be seen that the line, as defined by the then Minister of Public Works as the line which the Canada Central Company were obliged to adopt if continued westward from Renfrew, would carry them some twenty miles south of Pembroke. Therefore, it was impossible for the Company, under the Act as it then existed, to follow the line laid down by the Minister of Public Works. Knowing what the intentions of the Government were the Company applied to Parliament during the Session of 1875 for an amendment to their charter, relieving them from the obligation imposed on them by the original Act of incorporation and the subsequent Act amending the same. That Act is 38 Victoria, chapter 67, and is in the following terms:—

"1. The time limited for the deposit of maps, plans and books of reference of the Canada Central Railway, is hereby extended for two years, and the time limited for the completion thereof, for five years from the 1st day of September next, and from thence until the end of the Session of Parliament next thereafter."

"2. The said Company is hereby authorized to build the said Railway in the most direct and feasible route from Renfrew village towards Lake Huron, and is also hereby authorized to build a railway to Pembroke from said Canada Central Railway to be a part thereof."

It will be seen that in addition to the fact that the House relieved the Canada Central of the obligation imposed upon them to build by way of Pembroke, it also gave to the Company the right, which amounted almost to an exclusive right, to construct a road to Pembroke, and that concession was to be continued for practically six years from the Session of 1875. Now, Sir, the Canada Central Railway Company were not slow to take advantage of the position in which Parliament placed them by this amendment to their charter. They came to the people of Pembroke, and said: "We have practical control of the railway avenues to your town for the next six years, and if you do not accede to our line, you will not obtain railway communication until it suits us to give it." The people of the town of Pembroke felt the necessity of obtaining railway communication, and I think my hon. friend for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), who visited the town in 1876, will agree with me as to the necessity of obtaining that communication.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There was a still greater necessity for some political information about that time.

Mr. WHITE. I am glad that the hon. gentleman gave my constituents the political information, and that they profited thereby. In addition to the necessities for political information, the people, at all events, knew what the commercial advantages of obtaining railway communication would be, and finding themselves placed in the position in which they were placed they acceded to the proposition made them by the Railway Company and granted them a bonus of $75,000 with certain other concessions, amounting in all to a considerable sum in excess of that amount, and the road was completed to Pembroke in 1876. Now, Sir, I am quite free to admit that Parliament had a perfect right to relieve the Company of the obligation which was originally imposed upon them, and if matters had been permitted to remain as they were in 1876, with the road so completed to Pembroke, I do not think they would have had any right to apply to Parliament or the Government for relief. But the road having been completed to Pembroke, as I contend by the enterprise of the people of that town, the Government found it convenient to change their policy in relation to the route which they chose, and in 1878 the then Minister of Public Works came down to Parliament with an Order in Council from which I shall read some extracts:—

"That the engineers of the Canada Central, and those employed by M. Foster, reported more serious obstacles in grades and engineering work, and difficulties after leaving the lower part of the Bonnechère Valley; and though the Chief Engineer stated that he believed that a more thorough exploration would prove that they were mistaken, it became necessary to obtain the facts with greater particularity.

"That this engineer has reported, as the result of the season's operations, that a fair line can be obtained on Mr. Hazlewood's plan, but that for a considerable distance the work will be somewhat heavy, in consequence of the prevalence of rock cutting, and that the maximum grade rising easterly would be 52-80 feet per mile in an aggregate distance of about seven miles, and that there are three miles of the some grade rising westward. That this grade, though not excessive, is much higher than Mr. Hazlewood expected.

"That the engineer employed by the Canada Central Railway Company has reported that so far as works of construction are concerned, a more favorable line could be obtained ascending from Pembroke on a line nearly parallel with the Ottawa River, and distant from the same after leaving the Petewawa River, an average of eight or ten miles, and touching in its course the south-east corner of Lake Nipissing.

"That though the line would be lengthened by this deflection to the northward, the western end of the subsidized line, would, as stated, reach a point much further to the westward of the previously proposed terminus, or juncture with that portion of the Canada Pacific Railway proposed to be built under the terms of this Act, to the French River, and would thus save to the public the cost of constructing about twenty miles of railway.

"That the estimated distance from Pembroke to the south-east corner of Lake Nipissing is about 130 miles. This point is about twenty miles further west than the point previously determined on as the eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, thus saving to the public the construction of about twenty miles of railway."

There we have the statement twice repeated that by making Pembroke the starting point instead of Douglas, by carrying the road along the Ottawa River, there would be a saving in the cost of construction to the country of twenty miles. The Committee of Council, after fully considering the facts as already summarized, recommended:

"That the proposition of the Canada Central Railway Company of extend their line to such point as may be selected by the Government as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, at or near the crossing to the Nipissing Road at the south-east corner of Lake Nipissing, for the sum of one million four hundred and forty thousand dollars ($1,440,000) should be accepted."

That sum represented the amount which was to be paid on the distance from Douglas the commencement of the subsidized portion of the Canada Central to Burnt Lake at the centre of a certain block of townships which was laid down on the map. This Order in Council also provides that the Company shall enter into an agreement to grant running powers to the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, and Occidental Railway for any railway in extension thereof from any point of intersection west of the town of Renfrew that may be approved of by the Governor in Council, to the Kingston and Pembroke Railway from the point of intersection of their line, provided it is west of Renfrew, and to such other companies as may have the termini of their systems on or towards Lake Huron, on such terms as may be approved of by the Governor in Council. It also provides that the Government of Canada and the lessees or future owners of the Government line, westward of the western terminus of the subsidized line, shall possess running powers on similar terms to the companies designated. You will observe that not only does this Order in Council declare that by making Pembroke the starting point instead of Douglas, a saving of twenty miles of construction would be effected, but it also gives to other railways the right of running their trains over a portion of the Canada Central Railway which was not subsidized by Government money at all, but the construction of which was secured by a subsidy granted by the town of Pembroke. Now, Sir, this saving to the country I estimate at not less than $400,000; and when I show you the map, you will observe that by continuing the line from Pembroke, the terminal character of the town of Pembroke, that is as a terminus on the Ottawa River, was destroyed. Previous to the construction of the road westward from Pembroke, that town occupied the position of a railway terminus, with unbroken steamboat navigation for a distance of fifty miles westward, and the practical effect of that was that the town of Pembroke controlled the trade for lumber supplies for all points north and west of the town; but immediately on the continuance of the road westward from Pembroke, the base of supplies was moved further on, and instead of that town being now the terminal point, it is a mere way station on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not give that as a reason why the Government should accede to the proposition made by the town of Pembroke; I base my claim upon the ground that in changing the commencing point of the subsidized portion of the Canada Central Railway from Douglas to Pembroke, a very large sum of money was saved to the country; and I contend that, by the legislation of 1875, which relieved the Canada Central Company from their obligation to build their road by way of Pembroke, the people of that town were forced to accede to the demands made upon them by the railway company. That, by acceding to the demand, they secured the construction of the line from Renfrew to Pembroke, and thereby enabled the Government to adopt a line, as regards the subsidized portion of the railway, which had the effect of saving to the country, according to the estimate of the hon. member for Lambton himself, the cost of constructing twenty miles of railway, and that, in addition, that saving was effected to the country by the sacrifice of the local interests of the town of Pembroke; and I believe these reasons justify the town of Pembroke in coming to the Administration and asking to be relieved of that bonus. It seems to me wholly unjustifiable that a town with a population of 3,000 should be compelled to contribute $75,000 towards a great public enterprise such as this, and I am satisfied that when the Government and the House come to give this question fair and calm consideration, they will come to the conclusion that the town of Pembroke is justified in the demand it makes on the Government, and will not hesitate to relieve that town from the burden which it assumed.

THE POSTMASTER AT GREENWOOD, N.S.

Mr. BORDEN, in moving for copies of all correspondence, petitions, reports or other papers in the Post Office Department respecting the removal from office of William Magee, lately postmaster at Greenwood, Nova Scotia, and the appointment in his place of Marsden Foster, said: I am sorry the Postmaster General is not in his place, as I wished to call his attention to this matter. I am informed by friends of Mr. Magee that he was removed from his office without any reason being assigned, and that he is in entire ignorance at this moment of any cause for his removal. A petition, signed by every person in the community, except the man who has been appointed in his place and his bondsmen, has been forwarded to the Post Office Department, asking that Mr. Magee be reinstated. I am anxious to see these papers, in order, if possible to get at the reason of the Government for making this change.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no objection to the papers being brought down, and I have no doubt when they are brought down the hon. gentleman will see that there was good reason for the change.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What was the reason?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The papers will show that.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman not state the reason now? We would be glad to have the information he has himself.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The papers will show that when they are brought down, and then if the hon. gentleman wishes to discuss the matter further, we will be in a position to answer him.

INSPECTION OF FISH.

Mr. KILLAM moved for a statement showing the quantity of each kind of fish inspected in each inspection district of the Dominion in which an Inspector has been appointed, the name of the Inspector in each such district, the fees charged for inspection in each case, and the gross amount of fees received, the whole for the year ended December 31st, 1881, or the next previous fiscal or calendar year, the returns for which are in the possession of the Government. He said: Since the sitting of the Fishery Commission at Halifax, we have had no returns to throw any distinct light on the amount of the catch of fish, or the amount of fish exported from the different parts of the Dominion. I spoke the other day I think all that was necessary in regard to the Inspection Act; but I would again call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue to the necessity of placing before us such returns as are in his possession which will throw light on the catch of fish and the export of fish of the classes which come under the Inspection Act. I do not know whether the year for which the Inspector hands in his return ends 31st December or 30th June; that is not material, but if the Government will place the House in possession of fuller information before the close of the Session I shall be much obliged.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. The hon. gentleman spoke to me privately respecting the object sought to be attained by this motion. I have consulted the Department, and I will see that the returns are brought down.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier), moved that the amendments made in Committee of the Whole to Bill (No. 9) concerning marriage with a deceased wife's sister, be concurred in.

That the amendments be not now considered, but that the Bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to amend the same so that the law as regards marriage with a deceased wife's sister be made uniform throughout Canada.

Amendment negatived on the following division:—

Mr. AYMOT moved the following amendment:—

That every marriage celebrated by competent religious authority is hereby declared valid and legal.

He said: I do not intend to speak at length on this amendment, but with the permission of the House I will, in a few words, give my reason for proposing it. In the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, chapter 74, this principle is admitted :

"Whereas the recognition of legal equality among all religious denominations is an admitted principle of Colonial legislation ; and whereas in the state and condition of this Province, to which such a principle is peculiarly applicable, it is desirable that the same should receive the sanction of direct Legislative authority, recognizing and declaring the same as a fundamental principle of our civil policy. Therefore the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, so as the same be not made an excuse for acts of licentiousness, or a justification of practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the Province, is by the constitution and laws of this Province allowed to all Her Majesty's subjects within the same."

Now, I find the same law was enacted and given to this colony when first the British flag waved victoriously here. Since that time it has always been an admitted principle that all the religious denominations have free existence in this country. I do not think any one will deny that this principle is a fundamental law. Starting from that, my second proposition is that marriage, considered in itself, is a religious contract. This principle has been, I believe, admitted most emphatically or so implicitly that it cannot be denied, in the discussion that took place in this House when my hon. friend's Bill came up for the first time. It has been admitted by everybody that marriage is a religious contract. Of course, we have to apply to the civil law to get it recognized. Taking as a starting point that all the religious denominations in this country are free and their existence recognized by law, and admitting that marriage is a religious contract, I propose that the civil law recognize marriage contracts as they are celebrated and approved of by the different churches. This is entirely in favor of the free existence of all the churches that have been admitted in this country. It is also favorable to all the churches admitted by law, not only in one Province, but in every Province of this Dominion. If we take the Bill as it has been reported by the Committee of the House, we find it a most incomplete Bill. Under it a widow will not be allowed to marry with the brother of her late husband. If I were to go into details, I would probably find many other particulars in which the Bill is incomplete, and most probably every year we will have to come before this House and ask for further legislation on those religious questions, which are always difficult subjects to discuss. Religious questions should be always treated by the clergy of the different denominations, by those who have devoted their lives to the study and practice of the laws of the different churches. To bring these questions very often before this House would be only a loss of time. When under the law the divers religions in our country are free and receive the protection of the law, why should we not receive as law in the civil part which we have to administer, the laws which the divers religions enact themselves after mature study and experience in their churches. The amendment I propose says to the Protestant Church of any denomination: "What you do is right;" and it says the same thing to the Catholic Church. It does not interfere with the Confederation Act or with the celebration of marriage with which the Local Legislature has to deal.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman explain whether this Bill would apply to the Mormon Church?

Mr. AMYOT. I am happy to reply that the Mormon Church is not accepted by the law in this country, and I hope it never will be; so it is not necessary to consider that point.

Mr. PLUMB. I would like to ask whether by this amendment any marriage celebrated by a competent clergyman would be legal? Suppose a marriage was bigamous, performed by a competent clergyman, it would be made legal.

Mr. AMYOT. The marriage must be performed on a competent religious authority recognized by the State; if not so recognized it would not be legal. We have complete laws on the point. Marriages to be legal, must be celebrated by competent religious authorities, or such as are recognized by the law. But the law of certain Provinces prevents certain marriages that are allowed by certain churches.

Mr. PLUMB. I enquired whether a competent authority having celebrated a bigamous marriage that marriage would hold good. A clergyman may be called upon to marry a man and woman, the man being already married, and this resolution would make such a marriage valid.

Mr. AMYOT. There would be no marriage in such a case.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. If this amendment is carried, it will transfer the legislative power of this House as regards marriage to the various religious bodies of the country. Any church would be able to decide what the affinities and conditions of marriage should be, and marriages might take place, no matter how inconsistent with the views of this Legislature, and yet be valid. And further, as the member for Niagara has said, if persons misrepresented their relations in social conditions to a clergyman empowered by this amendment to celebrate marriage, if he went through the marriage ceremony the marriage would be valid.

Mr. GIROUARD. I shall vote against this amendment for the reason that we have no jurisdiction on the point. The amendment provides that every marriage celebrated by a competent religious authority shall be valid. What about a marriage celebrated by a Justice of the Peace, as permitted in some of the Provinces? We have no jurisdiction in regard to the celebration of marriage. To-morrow, our Provincial Legislatures may pass a law permitting civil marriages, if not in Quebec, at least, in some other Province; for that reason I will vote against the amendment, because I believe we have no power in the subject-matter.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Synod of the Diocese of Saskatchewan, and for other purposes connected therewith.—(Mr. Mills.)

THE EDISON ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY.

House resumed the consideration of Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Edison Electric Light Company of Canada, as amended in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I gave notice that on the third reading of the Bill I would move an amendment, which I now present. This amendment is not designed, in the slightest degree, to interfere with the operations of the Company, but I think it is important in the public interest. It refers to a provision in the Bill. It renders it impossible for the Company, even with the consent of the municipal authorities, to put up poles on which they shall carry the electric wires on the same side of the street upon which there shall at present be poles with telegraph or telephone wires. My hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Cameron), who had charge of the Bill, stated there was no report, that the scientific persons with whom he had communicated and who appeared before the Committee, said there was no difficulty whatever, that no injury would result to the telegraph or telephone companies. Besides which he has introduced another safeguard, providing that the wires carried over-head or along the streets shall be entirely insulated. Of course telegraph and telephone companies, would not like any more wires in the streets at all, and it is at the instance of these companies that this provision has been put in. Now, what is going to be the practical result of this provision? We all know that in all the principal streets of all our towns there are wires at present along one side of the street, poles and wires of telegraph and telephone companies—in some cases I believe, on both sides of the street, and in that case you cannot have the light in any of the streets at all. If they be only on one side of the streets, in order to have the Edison light, you must have the poles and wires carried along both sides of the street, which in the first place, extremely disfigures the streets, and in the second place it is an appreciable element of danger and difficulty in case of fire, both in respect to the placing of the hose and ladders and also in the operations of the firemen. That has been stated by those who have had practical experience. Now, on the score of public convenience it seems to me an unfortunate thing that we should make a parliamentary prohibition preventing any poles from being put up on the same side on which telegraph or telephone poles now exist, and thus requiring, as the only condition upon which, through all the central part of our towns and cities, the Edison light can be enjoyed, that poles should be put up on both sides of the street, and in those cases in which poles at present exist for the use of telegraph and telephone companies on both sides of the street, absolutely precluding the use of the electric light, at any rate by means of poles and wires. For these reasons I think no sufficient reason has been given for the demand made by the telegraph and telephone companies, that the public inconvenience to which I was referring, should be suffered and the public unsightliness should be created; and I move that the Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole with instructions to amend the third clause by striking out the proviso, "that no electric wire on poles shall be carried along the same side of streets as any existing telegraph and telephone wires or poles, without consulting the telegraph or telephone companies respectively."

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The amendment that was proposed here and carried the other day was, as the hon. gentleman has correctly stated, at the suggestion of the telegraph companies, and perhaps of the telephone companies also. I must say that there is a good deal of force in which the hon. the leader of the Opposition has just said about the fact, in certain streets there are telegraph poles on both sides of the streets, and that consequently, under the provision put into the Bill the other day, the electric light could not be introduced in those streets. By removing this proviso the position of these poles would be left to the municipal authorities to decide. It would be for them to say whether, under the circumstances, these poles should be put on the same side, or whether there would be danger in case of fire, and in that case the poles might be put on the other side of the street, perhaps carried into another street, and thus secure the advantages of the electric light, or the wire might even be carried under ground. I do not say there can be any objection to the amendment of the hon. gentleman, and for my part I shall support it.

Bill amended, read the third time and passed.

EXTENSION OF PATENT.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 104) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of John Dickenson Brunton.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. That is a Bill that should be explained before going further.

Mr. RYAN. The object of the Bill is simply to confer on the Commissioner of Patents power to extend a certain patent, held by John Dickenson Brunton, on machinery or apparatus for cutting, dressing, planing, turning and shaping stone. Mr. Brunton is a Civil Engineer residing in Kentish Town, in the county of Middlesex, England. He was elected domicile at the city of Montreal, Dominion of Canada. Under Letters Patent, dated 3rd March, 1876, he was granted a patent for an invention, by the name of "Brunton's improvements in machinery for cutting, dressing, planing, turning and shaping stone." The invention was in operation within two years from the date of the patent, at St. John, in the Province of New Brunswick, and has been continuously worked in compliance with the condition of the patent, up to the present time. The patentee has devoted much time and money in perfecting the invention. In the year 1880 he received from his patent agent a statement which professed to inform him that his patent was a complete patent, and that no further act on his part was required for keeping it valid and in full force in Canada during the full term thereof, as he confidently understood, for the period of fifteen years, and not renewable at the expiration of five years of its existence. On the 13th of February, ultimo, the patentee, for the first time, saw the patent in the office of his patent solicitor, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, and accidentally discovered that in accordance with the 17th section of the Patent Act, it was required at the expiration of the first five years to be renewed, which term of five years had expired on the 3rd of the preceding month of March. The patentee will therefore be deprived of all advantages to accrue to him, unless by Parliament, power is given to the Commissioner to extend his patent as though it had been done in accordance with the 17th section of the Patent Act. The patentee, on making the discovery of the inadvertent omission, without loss of time gave the requisite instructions for an application to the Parliament of Canada for such relief as would render his patent valid.

Mr. BLAKE. I have read the Bill, and I contend that Mr. John Dickenson Brunton has not shown good cause for the present enactment. It would appear that that gentleman obtained a patent, but that he never read the Patent Act, or the patent itself, and he supposed that he had obtained it for fifteen years, when it was only for five or ten years. We have had this subject before us several times for the last year or two, and a few Sessions ago a proposition was made to give the Commissioner power to extend these patents in a certain number of cases, but it was found impossible to overcome the objection of interfering with the law by granting this extension of powers unless the party applied within a reasonably prescribed time. Many of these cases are no doubt very hard. We have heard of cases where persons holding patents had instructed their agent to apply, but the agent had by some mistake neglected his duty, or a mail was delayed, and we were obliged to say in such cases that the party must have recourse against his agent for neglecting his duty, but that they could not come to Parliament, because, if the door were once opened for such cases the law would be always evaded. What we have done in one Session we will be asked to do in the next Session, and there will be a great many more cases than there were at first. Every one of us who has sat here for any length of time knows that in any case where we have passed a bad Act or granted an exceptional indulgence it is quoted time and again, and always as a precedent for doing something worse and opening the door wider. Therefore, as we have heretofore refused to grant relief in cases which certainly appeal to our sympathies, I do not think we would be justified in granting the prayer of John Dickenson Brunton, whose case certainly does not appeal very much to our sympathies, and still less to our following what is the whole-sale rule of law. I move, in amendment, that the Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Last Session an amendment was introduced to the Act to give the Commissioner of Patents the power of extending the time in certain cases which it might be considered to require that extension. As a member of this House, I did all I could to prevent the passage of that Act, and it never went further than its second reading. But when a special case of this kind is brought before the House, it seems to me that we ought to take the ordinary course of allowing an opportunity to prove the preamble before the Committee on Private Bills. We cannot possibly go into the evidence here, as to the propriety of granting the extension asked by the Bill, and, I think, it would be exceedingly unfortunate if, in a case like this, where there is a fact to be ascertained, we should reject the Bill on its second reading. I have no hesitation in saying that, as the Bill stands to-day, I would vote against it on the third reading.

Mr. SCRIVER. If we allow this Bill to go to a second reading, we shall reverse what has been the invariable practice of the House in the past. Several years ago, I introduced a similar Bill, and pleaded for it as strongly as I could, and offered, I think, better reasons on its behalf than the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Ryan); yet the House refused, by almost a unanimous vote, to allow it to go to a second reading, and, I think, that was not the first instance in which the House took the same action.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think no case has occurred in the last ten years in which a Bill was allowed to pass, having for its object the violation of the law, and it would be a most unfortunate thing for the House to allow this Bill to go to a second reading. There is nothing whatever in it to call for our sympathies or to justify a violation of the law by the House.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The case referred to by the hon. leader of the Opposition was still stronger than he presented it. The letter was registered and mailed in time to reach Ottawa and save the patent; but the connection at Montreal was not made and the letter arrived here after four o'clock, and as registered letters were not delivered after that time, it did not reach the Department till the next morning, when it was too late.

Mr. McCUAIG. In my case the patentee sent the necessary papers for a renewal to me early in the Session of 1879, and I unfortunately put them in my desk, where they lay for twenty-four hours beyond the time, when I called at the patent office only to meet a refusal to renew the patent. I think the case mentioned by the hon. Finance Minister is the strongest possible reason why this Bill should pass. I shall certainly vote with great pleasure for this Bill, and I hope it will give power to the Minister to grant relief in such cases as those mentioned.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I introduced the Bill last year, and I felt at the time that there was very great hardship suffered. Not that I believed in the general principle; but the law was a new law, and was not understood by the people, and I proposed to remedy the difficulty. The present case is, however, different, and there is always difficulty when legislation of this kind takes place. I would ask my hon. friend what notice has been given of this Bill, to enable parties in Canada interested in it to know of its provisions.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman must know that it passed the Committee on Standing Orders.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I understand that there was no notice, and that the rule was dispensed with for the purpose of allowing this Bill to be brought in. There may be fifty interests affected by this Bill, and the people have received no notice of it. While I would like to remedy all the cases that arise through ignorance, this man ought to have known when his patent ran out. I feel, under the circumstances, that the proper thing to do is to reject the Bill.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I have just learned from the Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee that the rule was suspended in this case. If so, that alters my opinion altogether. It is one of those cases in which the rule ought not to have been suspended.

Amendment, six months' hoist, agreed to.

FELLOWS' MEDICAL MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Mr. GAULT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 105), to amend the Charter of the Fellows' Medical Manufacturing Company.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not propose to object to the second reading of this Bill, but I think it is very objectionable, and it is well that the attention of the House should be called to it. The Bill has reference to a company incorporated by letters patent under the Canada Joint Stock Letters Patent Act, and it declares:

"That it is expedient that such capital should be proportionately represented on the Board of Directors of the Company, which it cannot be under the provisions of the said letters patent; and have prayed that they may be relieved from the restriction created by the said Act, as to the nationality and residence of the major part of their directors; and whereas it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition."

The enacting clause is as follows:—

"It shall not be necessary hereafter that the major part of the Directors of the Fellows' Medical Manufacturing Company shall be persons resident in Canada, or subjects of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization: Provided always, that the member of the Board who shall exercise the chief executive authority of the said Company in Canada, shall be a subject of Her Majesty, and shall reside within the Dominion."

Now, you pass a general Act in which you dispense with, rightly or wrongly, as your policy that the major part of the directors of companies incorporated under that Act shall be subjects of Her Majesty, and resident in Canada. Is that sound, or is it not? If it is sound, why should the Fellows' Medical Manufacturing Company be exempted from it? If it is not sound, why should it be continued in the general law? The way to remedy this, if it be wrong, is to alter the Joint Stock Letters Patent Act, and allow all companies to be incorporated without that restriction; but so long as you retain a General Act on the Statute-book by which you declare that these companies shall be subject to this restriction, it is certainly improper to grant exemption from that restriction without a cause. It may be said that there is no rule without an exception, and it is fit to deal with an exception, although there may be a rule; but there are no reasons given for this legislation, no special circumstances connected with the Fellows' Manufacturing Company, which is an existing corporation under the Joint Stock Companies' Act, why it should be excepted from the general rule. For these reasons I think the measure is one which is calculated to produce confusion, and I am strongly of the opinion that the efficiency of our Joint Stock Company's Act is dependent mainly upon our adhering strictly to its regulations. Modify them where they are found to be wrong; if experience convinces us that we have passed a law which is, in some respects, effective, let us change it and make it adapted to the circumstances of the country and available for the incorporation of various companies, but let all companies that come under it have no special authority which their neighbors and competitors have not got, but let them derive their authority from the general Act and not from private Acts of Parliament. We know that Private Bills contain most objectionable clauses and most extravagant powers; that is the system of Private Bill legislation in contra-distinction to that of the general Act. It is because I believe the latter system is prejudicial to the public interest, and that the efficiency of the Joint Stock Act is dependent largely on our paying strict regard to its provisions, that I have thought proper to make these observations.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I am satisfied that the hon. member for West Durham is entirely wrong in his contention. No doubt we have a general law, but that is no reason why a company which is incorporated under the general Act should not come before the House with a Private Bill, and ask hon. members to consider whether they should not receive greater powers.

Mr. GAULT. I hope the Bill will be allowed to go to a second reading. A point had already been considered in regard to the election of directors, the majority of the stock being now held by foreigners, and, therefore, there can be no objection to the Bill going to the second reading, and being referred to the Private Bills Committee.

Bill read the second time.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

House resumed consideration of Bill (No. 9) concerning marriage with a deceased wife's sister.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

Amendment (Mr. Amyot) negatived on a division.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH moved that the amendment be not now considered, but that it be considered this day six months.

Mr. STRANGE. I think it very unfortunate that this Bill should have been altered from what it was in 1878. It now makes no mention of the marriage between a woman and the brother of her deceased husband. I cannot find any objection to such marriage. I move, therefore, that the amendments to the Bill be not now considered, but that the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to strike out all the words after "deceased wife," and substitute the following: "And between the woman and the brother of her deceased husband are hereby repealed, and such marriages are hereby declared legal and valid."

Mr. GIROUARD. I agree with the principle of the amendment, but that portion of the Bill of 1880 was left out to meet the views of some members of the Senate. For that reason it is important, if we wish the Bill to pass the other House, that the amendment of my hon. friend should not be accepted.

Mr. BLAKE. I cannot quite agree with the view of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. I voted for the amendment to strike out that clause the last time, but I cannot agree that we ought to pass the Bill precisely in the form in which it is acceptable to the Senate. The Senate can alter the Bill to please themselves and send it back to us; but to tell us that we must pass the Bill in a form we do not approve of or they will throw it out, is to tell us what I do not think is correct. I intend, at all events, to vote against the amendment, because I think the Bill, though a bad one as it stands, is better than if amended in the direction proposed.

Amendment (Mr. Strange) negatived on a division.

Mr. McCUAIG. I am opposed to this Bill altogether. It is contrary to the law of the Empire. Under the English law, two British subjects, if they leave for the United States or Canada, or any part of the world, for the purpose of evading the law of England on this question, the issue of that marriage is considered in England illegitimate, and cannot inherit title or property. I think, as we are a dependency of that Empire, our laws should be made to meet theirs. No man has a right to marry his deceased wife's sister when he knows very well that in the Empire itself the children of that union are illegitimate. The law is so particular that, although a person may marry in the United States, the issue of that marriage is considered in England illegitimate, as far as inheritance is concerned, and I think no man has a right to place that stigma on his children. I move that the Bill, as amended, be not now taken into consideration, but be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole House, for the purpose of amending the same by adding the following proviso:—

"Provided that no clergyman or minister of the Gospel, authorized by law to perform the ceremony of marriage, shall be obliged to perform such ceremony if the woman is the sister of the former wife of the man to whom she desires to be married."

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would suggest that the hon. member for Prince Edward get married to the hon. member for Halifax. The hon. gentleman speaks of the law of the Empire. There is no such law in existence. He speaks as if this were a new question, when he ought to know this marriage is legal in the Australian colonies, that opinions are almost equally divided in England on the question, and that an overwhelming majority of our people are in favor of removing the unjust restrictions now existing; and the remarks he made are not complimentary to hundreds of thousands of people in England who have contracted such marriages and who are as respectable as any members of this House. The motion is absurd as well as wrong. We have no business whatever to direct a minister what to do or to prescribe the duties of clergymen. That rests entirely with the Local Legislatures. The motion is entirely out of order in proposing to do what the Act of Union declares we have no right to do.

Mr. McCUAIG. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that it is not the law in England, that if a man contracts such a marriage in the colonies, the issue is considered illegitimate as far as inheritance is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong.

Amendment (Mr. McCuaig) negatived on a division, and the main motion agreed to.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) moved that the Bill be now read the third time.

Mr. AMYOT moved that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be declared the Federal Parliament has no jurisdiction to legislate on this question, but that the terms and intention of the Federal Act gave that right exclusively to the Provincial Legislatures. He said: I am in a position to prove that my motion is directly conformable to the law, and that the law has been so interpreted by the highest authorities of the country. In such an important question which excites so much public opinion, we are called upon to give a vote that will form a precedent at the beginning of Confederation, for we are still at the beginning of Confederation, that every one should know exactly the meaning of his vote. In the debates on Confederation what do I see? That on the second day a member who has retired from political life, leaving behind him, however, an excellent name—I mean the Hon. Mr. Dorion—asked the following question, as reported in the Debates on Confederation, page 267—and he was a gentleman who did not often change his mind, and I am sure that were he still with us, he would speak as he did on that occasion. He enquired:

"But what is meant by the regulation of the marriage question? Is the General Government to be at liberty to set aside all that we have been in the habit of doing in Lower Canada in this respect? Will the General Government have the power to determine the degree of relationship and the age beyond which parties may marry, as well as the consent which may be required to make a marriage valid? Will all these questions be left to the General Government? If so, it will have the power to upset one of the most important portions of our civil code, and one affecting more than any other all classes of society," etc.

The speaker went on to establish that it would be bad legislation to give that power to the Central or Federal Parliament. Now, an answer was given by the then existing Government, by those whom we justly call the Fathers of Confederation, and what was the answer and the reason why the law was framed in the existing terms? It reads as follows:—

"The hon. gentleman has asked the Government what meaning was to be attached to the word 'marriage' where it occurred in the Constitution. He desired to know whether the Government proposed to leave to the Central Government the right of deciding at what age, for example, marriage might be contracted. I will now answer the hon. gentleman as categorically as possible, for I am anxious to be understood not only in this House, but also by all those who may hereafter read the report of our proceedings. And, first of all, I will prove that civil rights form part of those which, by Article 43 (paragraph 15) of the resolutions, are guaranteed to Lower Canada. This paragraph reads as follows:—'15. Property and civil rights, excepting those portions thereof assigned to the General Parliament.'"

Then the speaker goes on to explain his meaning, which any hon. gentleman may read at page 388 of the Debates, but I will only read his conclusion:

"So that the word 'marriage,' placed where it is among the powers of the Central Parliament, has not the extended signification which was sought to be given to it by the hon. member. With the view of being more explicit, I now propose to read how the word marriage is proposed to be understood:

"The word marriage has been placed in the draft of the proposed Constitution to invest the Federal Parliament with the right of declaring what marriages shall be held and deemed to be valid throughout the whole extent of the Confederacy, without, however, interfering in any particular with the doctrines or rites of the religious creeds to which the contracting parties may belong."

"There is something still more explicit on this point of great importance. He goes on to say that we should be thankful to them for the great care we have taken not to expose that important act of our lives to improper interference. I invite the attention of hon. members to these remarks:

"The whole may be summed up as follows:—The Central Parliament may decide that any marriage contracted in Upper Canada, or in any other of the Confederated Provinces, in accordance with the laws of the country in which it was contracted, although that law might be different from ours, should be deemed valid in Lower Canada in case the parties should come to reside there, and vice versa."

Some hon. members pretended that the clause was not necessary, while others argued that it was. The Speaker (Solicitor-General Langevin) thus replied on this point:

"It means that a marriage contracted in no matter what part of the Confederacy, will be valid in Lower Canada, if contracted according to the laws of the country in which it takes place; but also, when a marriage is contracted in any Province contrary to its laws, although in conformity with the laws of another Province, it will not be considered valid."

That was the existing law on this subject, and if there is anything plainer I would like to know it. But it will be said the question has already come before this House, and that the House seems to have declared that the Constitution should be interpreted otherwise. But since the question came before this House, the highest tribunal of the Empire, the Privy Council, has been called upon to decide an analagous question, and I will read its decision, as published in the Globe of 21st December last. The question was as to the power of the Provincial Legislatures to regulate insurance policies. In the celebrated case their lordships laid down the rights of the Local Legislatures on that point in the following language:

"Take as one instance the subject: Marriage and divorce contained in the enumeration of subjects in section 91. It is evident that solemnization of marriage would come within this general exemption; yet, 'solemnization of marriage in that Province' is enumerated among the classes of subjects in section 92, and no one can doubt, notwithstanding the general language of section 91, that this subject is still within the exclusive authority of the Legislatures of the Provinces."

I have quoted from the law and the words of its framers, recalling the solemn promise that was then given to the country by the father of Confederation—in order to establish that the meaning of the paragraph on marriage was not the giving of jurisdiction to this Parliament in regard to the act of marriage itself, or its conditions, but it was only intended to give the right to parties married in Lower Canada, or in any other Province, under a law different from that of the Province of Quebec, a right to be regarded in Quebec as legally married. We have the solemn promise of the old Canadian Legislature that such would be the law, and we have now the solemn interpretation of the highest tribunal on the same side. Under these circumstances should we be justified in passing a law in a contrary direction? Would we be justified in voting a law that would infringe upon the right of the Local Legislatures? Would it be reasonable, for instance, for the Provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to impose a law on the Province of Ontario? The Act of Confederation has secured to the majority of each Province the exclusive right to settle these questions. What would be the consequence, after the wrong we have received from the Privy Council? Our law would be declared to be unconstitutional, and 206 legislators would be declared by that Court to know nothing about their jurisdiction. I do not say whether the Bill itself is good or bad. But I say that if he consented to the Confederation Act, it was with the express understanding that these subjects would be left to the Local Legislatures. More than that, I think such is the interpretation given by the Courts to-day. Under these circumstances I make this motion, that the law be declared unconstitutional, so that the Confederation Act may not be broken, and that the unity of Confederation may not be broken by such a law.

Mr. McCUAIG. The hon. member for Lambton contradicted the statement I made a little while ago. I have the Law Journal of Canada, containing the opinion of Mr. Todd, who is considered as good an authority on such matters as the hon. member for Lambton. Mr. Todd says:

"Whatever the effect of a Colonial law may be within a Colonial jurisdiction, I believe it to be at least most doubtful whether a marriage wanting in these conditions can be made valid in England by any Colonial law; and if this be not the case, if the validity of such marriages and divorces is confined at most to the Colony in which they take place, the greatest embarrassment might result from the prevalence of different laws in different parts of the Empire. Marriages legally contracted in one Colony would be inoperative, for all legal purposes, in another. Children legitimate in one part of the Empire might in another find themselves incapable of inheriting their parents' property anywhere else."

I stated that if this law passes, even the children of such marriages will be considered illegitimate in England, and that is confirmed by Mr. Todd.

Mr. BUNSTER. I would like the hon. members of this House to proceed to business instead of losing our time at this season of the year. We are trifling with the time that belongs to the people in discussing a Bill like this which, in my opinion, has no right to be here. The hon. member for Lambton threw considerable light on it. He said it was a matter for the Local Legislatures to deal with.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I said the mode of the solemnization of marriages belonged to the Local Legislatures and not to this Parliament.

Mr. BUNSTER. I stand corrected, I was not taking any notes. In the various Provinces we have different laws on marriage, and the different churches regulate the laws of marriage better than we can.

Mr. GIROUARD. I wish to say one word as to the decision of the Privy Council. I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not read the report as it is to be found in the Law Report. I have the Legal News of January, 1882, and here is what I find with reference to the jurisdiction of this Parliament on the subject of marriage:

"Take as one instance the subject of 'marriage and divorce,' contained in the enumeration of subjects in section 91, it is evident that solemnization of marriage would come within this general description; yet 'solemnization of marriages in the Provinces' is enumerated among the classes of subjects in section 92, and no one can doubt, notwithstanding the general language of section 91, that this subject is still within the exclusive authority of the Provinces."

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member behind me is in conformity with the declarations which I made in Parliament fifteen years ago on behalf of the Government to which I belong. Those declarations were made in precisely the same sense, although not in the same words. We did not consider then that in placing the words "marriage" and "divorce" among the attributes of the legislation of the Federal Parliament, that we were giving that Parliament the right to determine what were to be the conditions of celebration of marriage, any more than the other conditions mentioned in the debate which took place at the time; but we were of opinion, and it was the intention of the then Government and Parliament, as well as that of the legislators and others busying themselves with the question in London, that the word "marriage" should be inserted merely to determine that a marriage contracted in a Province according to its laws, should be considered as valid in other parts of the country. Such was the only qualification we gave the word "marriage." Now, according to what has just been read by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), the highest tribunal of the Empire seems to agree with that opinion and endorse what I said on behalf of the Government fifteen years ago, in 1867, when the measure came before Parliament. I did not think it was necessary to make this declaration to-day, as the present Bill—towards which I am, nevertheless, opposed—does not contain any declaration to the contrary; but since the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has made a motion in conformity with the declarations made by the Government in 1867, I will vote for the motion.

Mr. BLAKE. In the debates on the Confederation Act there was a declaration made by the hon. the Minister of Public Works with reference to the meaning of the word marriage. The hon. gentleman read a written statement of what the meaning of the word was, but he enlarged upon and expanded his view of the meaning of that statement. The written statement, I presume, was made on behalf of the Government, and the oral argument with which he embellished it, as he always does every subject he touches, was his own meaning of the written statement. I have always regarded that exposition to be rather more authoritative than the written statement. I observed that when the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) was making his statement, that his views appeared to be familiar to me, and the most of them appeared to be in an article from Le Canada of the 22nd of March. I see an extract in that from the hon. gentleman's speech. I observe that the written statement that the hon. gentleman made of what the word marriage meant, is this:

"Le mot mariage a été placé dans la rédaction du projet de constitution pour attribuer à la législature fédérale le droit de déclarer quels seront les mariages qui devront être considérés comme valide dans toute l'étendue de la confédération, sans toucher pour cela le moins du monde aux dogmes ni aux rites des religions aux quelles appartiennent les parties contractantes."

Now, Sir, that statement is susceptible, perhaps, of bearing the exposition of the hon. gentleman, but it does not necessarily bear it. He says the word marriage was placed there to give the Federal Legislature the right to declare what should be the marriages which should be considered valid throughout the whole extent of the Confederation. The hon. gentleman to-night has said, and called our attention to the fact, that the words "marriage" and "divorce" appear together. These are two subjects given at once in the same breath, and as part of the same section, to the Federal Parliament. Now, does he mean to say that the word divorce, where it is there put, means only that it shall be an attribute of the Federal Parliament to divorce; that a divorce legally effected, under local laws in any Province, shall or shall not be valid throughout the rest of the Dominion; or that it means that the whole law of divorce shall be vested in the Federal Parliament? It obviously must mean the latter. It cannot but be that the law of divorce, and by parity of reasoning the law of marriage, save and except that portion which involves the solemnization of the marriage itself, have been expressly inserted as belonging exclusively to the Federal Parliament. When you find marriage given to the Federal Legislature, and when you find the solemnization given to a Local Legislature, you have in the strongest way declared that all that was to be given to the Local and taken away from the Federal was the solemnization of marriage. There has been this subject of discussion, and the law officers of the Crown, at an early period, were asked by the then hon. leader of the Government to advise as to whether, with reference to the Confederation Act, it was not an attribute of the Federal Government or Parliament to deal with the question of licenses in connection with the solemnization of marriages. They decided, and I think rightly, that that power properly fell within the Local Legislatures, because it was in point of fact part of the solemnization of marriage; but to go further and say that the whole law of marriage is with each Local Legislature, subject only to this exception, that the Federal Parliament has a right to declare that a marriage valid according to the law of the Local Legislature shall be valid through the whole extent of the Dominion, is not, in my opinion, to interpret in any proper sense our Constitution, but is to give it a meaning which cannot fairly be drawn from it. I maintain that we have the right clearly to determine between what parties it shall be legal to contract marriage and between what parties it shall not be legal, and to determine all that for every Province of this Dominion, but to determine how a marriage between persons who can lawfully contract it under our laws shall be solemnized, it is not within our power to adjudge. That is disposed of by the Local Legislature, and therefore, I think the motion of my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Aymot), is not only unnecessary, but is a misinterpretation of the true meaning and construction of our Constitution, and I shall certainly vote against it.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, the motion such as presented by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) embodies, in my opinion, two things: first, a declaration that the Federal Parliament has not the right to legislate on the necessary qualifications for marriage; secondly, that the necessary legislation to determine the required qualifications for marriage, has been left, according to the terms and the intention of the Federal Act, exclusively to Provincial Legislatures. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if the motion of the hon. member embodied simply the first declaration, our duty would probably be to vote in its favor, but if the hon. member declares by his motion that the Federal Parliament has not the right to legislate as to the necessary qualifications to contract a marriage, I do not see why it should grant to Local Legislatures the right of defining what these qualifications should be. If marriage is a religious contract, I do not see why the Local any more than the Federal Parliament should have the right to legislate on that point. Consequently, if the first proposition is true, the second which is its negative should succumb, and I propose an amendment, seconded by Mr. Desjardins, that all words after the word "marriage" be expunged.

Amendment (Mr. Amyot) negatived on a division.

Mr. STRANGE moved in amendment that all the words after "deceased" be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "and between a woman and the brother of her deceased husband are hereby repealed, and such marriages are hereby declared to be legal and valid."

Amendment negatived on the following division:—

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to observe with reference to the discussion which took place a little while ago, that when the Bill on this subject was before the House, in the Session of 1880, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, on an amendment then proposed, which would have left the Bill in this shape: "marriage and a man with the sister of his deceased wife, or the widow of his deceased brother, shall be legal," made some observations, in which he said:

"As a Roman Catholic I cannot admit that the Parliament of Canada has a right to legislate on the subject of marriage, pure and simple, which would be an interference with the rights and privileges of my church, which holds marriage to be a Sacrament. * * * I would have preferred to put in this Bill a proviso that any marriage contracted according to the rules and prescriptions of the church or the churches, to which the parties belong, between brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, would be legal; but considering the difficulties that such legislation would lead us into, and the difficulty there would be in determining the functions of the Legislatures and the Parliament on this point, I am ready for my part to vote in favor of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell. I cannot help thinking that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken is mistaken, if he says that the matter of dispensations is within the power of the Local Legislature. The Local Legislature has, by the Confederation Act, power to legislate about the solemnization of marriage, and the mode of celebration necessary to render the marriage legal and binding; but nothing to do with regulating as to the parties who shall marry. That, it is admitted, belongs to this Parliament, in the legal sense of the Confederation Act."

Main motion agreed to on a division; and Bill read the third time and passed.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time:—

Bill (No. 103) to incorporate the Qu'Appelle Land Company.—(Mr. Boulton.)

Bill (No. 113) to amend the Act incorporating "The Canadian Steam Users' Insurance Association," and to change the name of the said Company to "The Boiler Inspection and Insurance Company of Canada," (from the Senate).—(Mr. Beaty.)

Bill (No. 114) respecting the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway.—(Mr. Abbott.)

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following motions for Returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of any Order in Council, correspondence, reports, instructions, or papers, touching the appointment of a Commissioner in connection with the revision of the Canadian Statutes; and a statement in detail, with dates, of all payments made in connection with such appointment.—(Mr. Blake.)

Return showing the earnings, net and gross, of the Pacific Railway, constructed by the Government, and transferred to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, including the Pembina Branch, in accordance with the agreement; from the 9th day of April, 1881, to the 1st of March, 1882.—(Sir Albert J. Smith).

Copies of all correspondence and Orders in the case of Captain Glenn, of the 37th Battalion, Haldimand Rifles, during 1879 and 1880.—(Mr. Wallace, York).

Return showing the number and situation of fish-breeding establishments throughout the Dominion; whether situate on Government land or on leaseholds; from whom the property was bought or leased; what price paid for purchase or lease; sums of money expended on each since its establishment and the expense of management; the number of fry from each establishment in each year, and how distributed.—(Mr. Haddow).

Copies of the statement and complaint of Joseph St. Laurent, in relation to the killing of a horse by the cars on the Branch of the Intercolonial Railway at Rimouski; of the report of Mr. Rennie, and evidence thereunto annexed; and of all other documents and correspondence relating to the said accident.—(Mr. Fiset.)

The House adjourned at 10 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 23rd March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

GRADUATES OF THE MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 124) to provide for the admission to the profession of Dominion Land Surveyor, of the graduates of the Royal Military College. He said: I desire to say to the House that I have added the word "Royal" to the motion of which notice was given, as the proper name of the institution is The Royal Military College.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. HOUDE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 125) further to secure the independence of Parliament. He said: This Bill is for the purpose of preventing members of this House, except advisers of Her Majesty, from accepting offices of emolument under the Government of Canada during the Parliament for which they have been elected.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

RETURNS OF RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders are called, I wish to direct the attention of the hon. the Minister of Railways to a conversation that passed yesterday, as the subject is one of great public consequence. I submitted a motion upon the subject of contracts made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, stating it was but supplementary to a former motion I had made, calling for the return. He suggested some possible difficulty, and I sent for the Statute, but it did not arrive in time to bring it up then. I wish to call his attention to the fact that, in consequence of an arrangement suggested by myself last year, we passed a general law requiring, not merely the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but all railway companies, to make annual returns, which should include, amongst other things, copies of all contracts made by the Company for the construction of any part of the railway, and also a statement of the proceeds of all the grants of land, so that Parliament has recognized the propriety of this.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. After the informal conversation that took place across the floor of the House yesterday, I looked into the subject myself, and finding that we were empowered to call for these returns, I have called upon the Company to make them.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I be allowed to ask when we are to have the promised Bill relating to the Supreme Court. We have now been waiting for it about six weeks, and, unless we are going to be carried along to June or August, the Government ought to bring forward that measure now. It is a very important measure. I do not see that the Government are taking any steps either one way or the other.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Supreme Court Bill is one properly under the charge of the Minister of Justice, and belongs to the other branch of the Legislature. If he has not already introduced the Bill he will in a day or two.

DELAY IN THE RECEPTION OF MAILS.

Mr. FLYNN. I desire to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that it has been, this winter, a matter of frequent occurrence for the mails to be detained below Quebec. Previous to this winter the mails came by the Ottawa and St. Lawrence, although we got them late in the day; but this winter they are frequently a day behind. If we enquire at the post office the answer is, no mails from below Quebec. The connection is lost, and they are, at times, compelled to remain over.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Inverness). The members from Nova Scotia find that the mails take a much longer time to be carried from Nova Scotia to Ottawa—I think a full day. I do not know what the cause is, but, at all events since our mails have to come around by Brockville, a good deal of delay has been caused in their transmission. We have certainly been retrograding in regard to the transmission of our mails to and from the seat of Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I was not aware of any delay. I will look into the matter, and if there is anything wrong it will be corrected.

Mr. ANGLIN. Perhaps, at the same time, the Postmaster General will give his attention to the delays which have taken place for several weeks past in the arrival of the mails in this city from New Brunswick. These delays take place almost every day, and I think on only three or four occasions since the House opened have they arrived on time. Sometimes the mail which should be delivered in the morning is delivered in the evening, and sometimes not until the following day. Perhaps the Postmaster General will endeavor to get his colleague the hon. Minister of Railways, who is, no doubt, primarily responsible, to look into the matter.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. SNOWBALL. In continuing the debate, I wish to make reference to a few remarks made by the hon. member for West Montreal (Mr. Gault) before the debate closed on Tuesday evening last. From a great many of that hon. gentleman's remarks I have no reason to dissent very munch, but, like most hon. gentlemen opposite, he could not go entirely through his speech without making some references which we, on this side, cannot be expected to agree with. In closing his speech he thanked the Government on behalf of the mercantile community of Montreal, for the abolition of the Stamp Act. The abolition of this Act, no doubt, is a great benefit to the mercantile community of the Dominion; but the hon. gentleman's version and mine of how it occurred do not quite agree. I wish to read an extract from the St. John Sun, of the 13th inst., giving a different account of the proceeding from that related by the hon. gentleman. At a meeting of the St. John Board of Trade:

"The President read a telegram from Hon. Senator Boyd, stating that it was the petition of the St. John Board of Trade which secured the abolition of the Stamp Tax. Mr. Boyd said he knew this when he asked for the petition of the Board, for although Sir John was opposed to the removal of the Stamp Tax, he left it to the decision of Sir Leonard and Sir Leonard had done this for St. John."

Mr. Boyd, you will observe, asked for this petition. I should like to know, under these circumstances, why Montreal should interfere in this matter. Their effort to do so reminds me of a story of a worthy couple called John and Betsy, who lived in the backwoods. John was in the habit of visiting his neighbors in the evening, and getting a little elated, as many worthy people often do, and boasting of his exploits in the past, and of what he would do under certain circumstances—that he would venture upon death very readily, not only for the sake of his country, but, if necessary, for a very much less cause. It happened that this worthy couple having left the door of their house open, a hungry bear entered, and made for the cradle in which was their child. John speedily took up his position on the collar beam, while Betsy seized the axe and despatched the bear. When the bear was safely disposed of, John sallied forth to inform his neighbors of how Betsy and he had killed the bear. After telling it a few times he omitted to mention Betsy's name altogether and boasted of how he had killed the bear. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care who killed the bear, whether John, from the upper portion of the house, or Betsy from below; what I wish to do is to vindicate the cause of St. John in this matter. We find, Sir, that none but the people of New Brunswick were invited to the funeral, and I think it unkind of the people of Montreal intruding. But to return to the debate. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to take a good deal of pleasure in taunting us by saying that we are not agreed on this question of the so-called National Policy—or rather on the extreme imposition of taxes on this country. I can find no such disagreement among my hon. friends on this side; they think as I do that the whole system is obnoxious. We agree upon every step that should be pursued, and I think when the time comes hon. gentlemen opposite will find us always in line. These hon. gentlemen follow the multitude to do evil; we warn them against this evil. We do not believe in a system of hot-house protection in this country, which may prosper for a time, but is productive of nothing but evil in the end. We might, for example, produce pine apples in this country of a larger growth and better flavor than grow in their native clime, but it does not follow that the enterprise would be generally successful. You can force production in this country, but while in the one case you force it at the expense of a single individual, in the other you are forcing a community unwillingly to embark in an enterprise in which they have no interest. Now, I desire to refer briefly to the speech of the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White). In that speech the hon. gentleman made some statements which, I have no doubt, were candid, and based on such information as he possessed; but as I, like him, am engaged in the timber trade, a few remarks from me in regard to those statements may not be out of place. I may say that he views the matter in an entirely different light from what the people of the Maritime Provinces view it; it must be remembered that the product of the forest in the section in which he is interested is quite different from the product of the forest in the country I am interested in; the former is almost exclusively pine timber, while the latter is almost exclusively spruce, and while it does not cost any more to bring one to the market than the other, the lumber he speaks of is worth twice as much as ours. Then, again, their market is largely in the neighboring Republic, while ours is almost exclusively in Europe; that being the case, what governs the price of lumber in Canada? Is it not the value of our lumber in Europe, and the value of theirs in the United States? Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell us that the price of lumber has been advanced by the National Policy? Unless the hon. gentleman can show that we have not to seek a foreign market for our productions of lumber, but have a market for it all at home, it is not possible that the National Policy, or any tax on the materials going into the production of lumber, can enhance the price in the foreign market; it only shows that the materials going into the production cost more on account of that tax, not that we receive more for the lumber that is produced. But the hon. gentleman did state that we had a home market, and in connection with that he made a most extraordinary statement. He told us that they sold, last year, 100,000,000 feet of lumber in Montreal city alone, and 80,000,000 feet in Toronto, for local consumption. Let us see how he is able to sustain that assertion. I suppose there is no record to show clearly what quantity of lumber went into the market of Montreal; therefore the hon. gentleman must have spoken from some figures compiled by himself. Now, I have here the Trade Returns of Great Britain for the year 1881, which, I think, hon. gentlemen opposite will not dispute; and which show the quantity of wood consumed in Great Britain during the year. I suppose the hon. gentleman will not claim that the people in any portion of this Dominion consume more wood per individual than the people of England; as in this country we have many resources to draw upon for our supply, while there they have, comparatively speaking, none but their importations. I find that Great Britain consumed last year 3,321,000,000 superficial feet of lumber, which, divided by the population of 35,000,000, shows the consumption to have been 95 feet per head. Now, multiply the 95 feet per head by 140,747, the population of Montreal, according to the last Census, and according to this calculation the city of Montreal would consume 13,370,000 feet; yet he states that they consumed 100,000,000 feet. Again, there are not so many ways of consuming lumber in Montreal as there are in England. A few weeks ago I visited a clog sole factory in England, the proprietor of which told me that they consumed 15,000 superficial feet of hard wood per day in the manufacture of clog soles and brush backs; and I claim that when I make the allowance of 13,000,000 feet for the city of Montreal, it is about double the quantity actually consumed there. How is it possible that, without any outlet except the ordinary building trade of Montreal, no extensive packing-case trade of importance or other consumption, except the ordinary building trade, which comprises a small proportion of the consumption of lumber in Great Britain that there could possibly be an outlet for 100,000,000 of feet, when it is quite clear that it did not provide any outlet for much over 6,000,000 feet. If that statement made by the hon. gentleman is so very incorrect, that he is 1,000 to 1,500 per cent. out of his reckoning, what reliance can be placed on other statements made by him in regard to other matters dealt with in his speech. He had not the same opportunity of getting so many millions astray, but he was, proportionately, out of the way. If the hon. gentleman made mistakes in regard to pork, beef and oats, that enter into the production of the lumber trade, with which he should be thoroughly conversant, it was not surprising that he went equally far astray in dealing with other points. The hon. gentleman went on to make quotations to show what lumber would cost in 1878 and 1881, on account of the different values of the products of the farm that entered into the production of lumber in those two years. He told the House that, in 1878, pork was worth $16 per barrel, and, in 1882, $21; and gave the National Policy the credit of advancing the prices of pork to the farmers to the extent of $5 per barrel. Why did not the hon. gentleman take the previous year, 1877, and he would find that pork was $24 as against $21, in 1881. Why, if the hon. gentleman was going to make a comparison, he must prove that pork was never higher than $21 per barrel before the National Policy was introduced; and if pork was dearer before we ever heard of that policy, what had the policy to do with advancing the price? Pork raised in Canada is considered in Europe to be a superior article; it is fed better than that produced in warmer climates. The Canadian pork is supposed to be grain fed, and is worth more for exportation than for home consumption. If so, and we know we have a large exportation of pork, and it is more profitable to ship it to the European market and buy Chicago pork, what has the National Policy to do with the price obtained by our farmers? Nothing whatever. We do not use Canadian fed pork in the lumber woods. I have had considerable experience in the lumber business, and a barrel of Canadian pork never passed through my establishment; it all comes from Chicago and we pay the duty on it. We find American pork more profitable, it is salted longer, and goes further in the work of the woods than pork produced in Canada; besides, Canadian pork is dearer and we use that which is cheaper. The hon. gentleman also referred to flour, oats and other grains. He quotes flour at $6.25 per barrel during the present year, against $5.50 in 1878; but if the hon. member will look back to the year 1876, it will be found that flour was $8 per barrel, and yet we had no National Policy. But the hon. gentleman will say that when flour was $8 per barrel in 1876—I am not positive of the exact year—we had no flour to sell; but this year we have, thanks to the National Policy. Not one word is said about blessings received from Heaven, no credit is given to God, but it is all given to the National Policy and the hon. gentlemen opposite. Corn enters largely into the production of lumber. The hon. gentleman did not tell the House that corn meal, which is so much used, is worth $3.50 to $3.75 against $2.20 last year. Is that due to the National Policy also? The consumers have at all events to pay the 40 cents per barrel which the hon. gentlemen opposite have imposed. The hon. gentleman went on to deal with the question of wages, and detailed the rates in 1878 and 1881. But what has the National Policy to do with it? I would ask the hon. member what induced him to pay the additional wages last year? If he had not given them would the men have found employment in our factories or in industries springing up through the National Policy, or would they not have gone to Michigan and obtained there the higher rate of wages? But the National Policy must remedy everything, according to hon. gentlemen's opinion. I feel sorry to occupy the time of the House in dealing with these trivial matters; but if hon. gentlemen put forward these arguments we are compelled to answer them. The hon. gentleman talks of giving from $12 to $20 per month higher wages to certain men. Lumbermen from Michigan came into my mill-yard at Miramichi and took away teamsters, paying them $35 per month, and advancing money to pay their expenses to Michigan. Did the National Policy compel me to raise my rate of wages? No, but the advance of the price of lumber in the United States, and the demand for men, compelled me to the increase wages in order to compete. And the same cause also compelled my hon. friend to advance, but he now wishes to give the National Policy the credit. While referring to the question of wages, I had better deal with the whole question. The hon. the Finance Minister on page 12 of his Budget Speech, —and I am going to be very explicit in regard to these references—referred to wages. He said:

The hon. gentleman told the House there were 135 factories employing a large number of men, probably hundreds of men each, at all events, thousands in the aggregate, which had not been paid any increased wages since 1878, although the National Policy has been in force four years. If those 135 factories are paying to-day the same rate of wages as years ago, before we had a National Policy, and when we were told the country was in so depressed a condition that it was necessary to do something desperate to save it, one of two things is evident: either the country was not in the state in which it was represented to be by hon. gentlemen opposite, or, if it was, these manufacturers must have been out of their senses when they paid these rates of wages. Take the other factories in the country. The hon. the Finance Minister tells us the people employed in them are getting an increase of from 5 to 35 per cent. What a paltry increase of 5 per cent.? In the old times to which the hon. the Minister so often alludes, when people were starving, 5 cents might have been of some consequence, but in these days when the wave of prosperity is spreading over the whole world, not only over Canada, but over the United States and Europe as well, such an advance is not what we are entitled to, and we claim the people are not getting the full benefit of that prosperity. Take the rate of wages paid in New Brunswick. In New Brunswick, during all these bad years, and certainly they were bad years and wages were low, owing to the depression that existed all over the world, the people did not starve, as our friends opposite would like to represent. Wages were never as low there as in Ontario or Quebec, nor did the people suffer to the same extent, for they always had employment. Now we find that those engaged in the lumber trade, the principal trade of New Brunswick, are getting an advance of wages from 25 to 100 per cent. over what they got in 1878, they are, however, but little better off, because their increase of wages is not in proportion to what they have to buy. Hon. gentlemen say that farm produce has advanced in price. It has, but not on account of the National Policy. The advance is due to short crops in Europe. Our laborers have therefore to pay more for provisions, and when they come to buy clothes for themselves and families, they feel the weight of the Tariff. When from 25 cents to 50 cents out of every dollar has to be paid into the Exchequer, it is no wonder the people continue to be poor. The policy of the Government has the effect of making the poor poorer and the rich richer, to such an extent that the latter despise the country they live in. We find, as an effect of this policy, that some of those men over whom so much wailing was made in 1873-74, are to-day buying palaces in Europe, where they can revel in their wealth. Is this state of things to be tolerated? This is where the money goes instead of into the pockets of the people for whom this policy was supposed to be made. Are the people in these 135 factories not to get an increase of wages, and is this money to be wrung from them and put to purposes for which it was never intended. When this policy was being discussed last year, the hon. Finance Minister made a very gratifying statement to this House—one certainly for which I was not prepared to grant that importance which he did, but which appeared to give him great pleasure. The hon. Minister told us that, for the first time in the history of Canada, our exports exceeded our imports to the gratifying amount of $1,421,000. That was held up to us as one of the first apparent fruits of the National Policy. We were led to suppose that unless our exports exceeded our imports this country could not be prosperous, and to believe that in future, the hon. Finance Minister, in bringing down his budgets, would be able to congratulate the country on annual similar results. This year the hon. gentleman was silent on this matter; and as he did not choose to enlighten us I examined the returns and find that our imports exceeded our exports by over $7,000,000. Now, if the theory of the hon. Finance Minister be correct—that unless our exports exceed our imports we are not prosperous, where must we be going to now? Are we again on the road to ruin? And must the hon. gentleman put on the brakes again, and give us another National Policy? I am not, however, so alarmed as the hon. gentleman was on this point, for I find that other countries that have prospered, and continue to prosper, import more than they export. The time will come when Canada's exports will exceed her imports, and that will be when she will begin paying off her liabilities. While our imports have increased so rapidly last year, the Mother Country, which, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, will go to ruin unless she adopts our policy, exhibits a return just the reverse. Great Britain imported last year $80,000,000 worth of goods less than the previous year, while we are on the opposite track, our imports increased $19,000,000. A good deal was said by hon. gentlemen opposite last year about England adopting a policy of Protection. I have no fear on that point. The advocates of that policy found the word "Protection" was obnoxious to British ears, and used instead the term "Fair trade." What do we hear of fair trade to-day? The cry is silenced, and while I maintain that it never had any hold on any considerable portion on the people of England, I hold that such a movement hardly exists at present. England does not want any fairer trade than she has got, or any protective policy. Her exports increased last year and her imports decreased under her policy of Free Trade. We find England prospering beyond anything that we in Canada are enjoying, we may ask why she is prospering so much? It is well for us to look into the facts, in discussing this subject of national prosperity, and learn the reason why any nation prospers. A large portion of the prosperity of England to-day is derived from her ship-yards and carrying trade. Not more than three years ago I saw the dock of England filled with steam tonnage unemployed, and was informed by persons generally well informed on such subjects, by cautious, shrewd business men, that there was more steam tonnage in the country than the world could employ, and that England had so largely overbuilt that they feared the consequences would be serious. What do we find to-day? We see trade so increased and flourishing that every one of those vessels is not only employed, but profitably employed, and the ship-yards of England are full to their utmost capacity, with orders sufficient to keep them employed for the next two years. What a contrast with the condition of Canada! While English shipbuilders have orders ahead for two years, the ship-yards of Canada are silent. We maintain that our friends on the Government side have neglected this trade—that they have not built it up or attempted to do so. The hon. Finance Minister representing a maritime city, who should take an interest in everything pertaining to that port, has not only not done anything to foster this industry, but has done all in his power to injure it. We find him telling us that he cannot do anything to assist this or the lumber trade, the latter a business the export of which amount to 73 per cent. of the total exports of his native Province; yet he has repressed that industry by putting a tax on materials that go into the production of lumber, and has done nothing to assist it. Is it possible that

Mr. SNOWBALL.

73 per cent. of the exports of his own Province are to bear such burdens—and what for? To sustain the factories in Ontario and western Quebec. Why should we be thus oppressed? I heard the hon. gentleman himself call the lumber trade a waning industry. If it is waning, so much the more reason why it should be assisted. The hon. gentleman contended that under his policy good would be done to all the working classes; to every person in the Dominion, including the toilers of New Brunswick. He spoke that way in New Brunswick, but did not pretend to have such anxiety about the interests of Ontario and other Provinces. His speech did not smell so strongly of the manufacturing interests of the western portions of the Dominion. His points were all made for the benefit of New Brunswick, whose interests were to be greatly assisted by his policy. We now want some of those benefits that he promised us. We maintain we have got none of them so far, though largely injured by that policy. I was a little struck, I will not say amused, on reading an article in an Ottawa paper a day or two ago, on the subject of a meeting held in London in reference to an International Fishery Exhibition which is contemplated, and at which Sir A. T. Galt informed the Prince of Wales and others in England that Canada at present was too apt to take its direction of thought from the people of England, and that Canadians following, at a distance, English public opinion. We taking direction of thought and following at a distance English public opinion. Well, I think we are following it at a very long distance—at all the distance between Free Trade and Protection—and that is as great a distance as you can get between any two points. He also remarked that in England's commerce is found the secret of her greatness. I maintain he was quite right there, and so in our commerce lay the greatness of Canada previous to this tariff. And in that commerce I expect to see our future greatness, for I expect again to see the day when the wooden ships of Canada will take their place on the ocean in an extended trade. I see no reason why they should not. There are no better ships employed in long ocean voyages, and none in greater favor for certain purposes, and the time will come when our friends on this side of the House will take their seats on the other side, and we shall see how much they can do, both for the shipping and lumbering interests. Some persons, discussing this subject, suppose that the lumber interest needs no protection—that we have got the markets in our own hands—that Europe must have our lumber, and at our own prices. I find from the official returns authentic information which any hon. gentleman may examine, from statistics printed by order of the British Parliament, that Great Britain consumed during the last year, in round numbers, $70,000,000 worth of lumber. Where did she get that lumber? Of the imports into Great Britain, Canada produced something less than $19,000,000 worth, or only 27 per cent. of the imports. Now, when we consider the value of some of our woods, our pine, oak, and other woods exported, we can see what a very small proportion of the shipping employed in the wood-carrying trade of England is engaged in the carry-ing trade from Canada. While England is only getting 27 per cent. of her lumber from Canada, whence is she getting the rest? From Norway, Sweden and the north of Russia she obtained $38,690,000 worth, or 55 per cent. of her imports. Is England then dependent upon us? We have very little of her trade, and still less of the continental trade and little or none of the African, Australian and other business. The trade of Norway and Sweden in lumber extends even to South America. When the whole is computed—I have not the figures on that point—I think you will find that, of the lumber trade of Europe, our contribution does not embrace 10 per cent. of the whole. I think it may be said that, as to the pine of Quebec and Ontario, the dealers have the price, to a large extent, in their own hands, by means of a limited production, in this way they may, to some extent, control the markets of Europe. But, Sir, when you come to the description of lumber, such as spruce and coarse woods, shipped from the Maritime Provinces, we have no control whatever. A large quantity of such wood comes from the north of Europe, and we have to take such prices as we can get in competition with them. They have every advantage over us. We have the Atlantic ocean between us and our market, and have to pay from 60 to 70 shillings per standard freight, whereas they send theirs in for from 10 to 30 shillings, so there is at once from £2 to £3 against us in the freight alone. In dwelling upon the National Policy, I am not prepared to say that there is no section of this country receiving benefit from it; but if there are sections they are very small ones, and they are not in the Maritime Provinces. What we claim is, that the whole country should not be compelled to suffer to such an extent for the benefit of such a small portion. If you are going to give back to every man just what you take from him, what benefit does he receive in the operation? If you are going to protect certain industries at the expense of the whole population, you make one section of the people support another section. It is just another system of pauperism. It is not encouraging people to rely upon their own resources, but you teach them to believe that all they have to do in time of adversity is to lean upon the Government. Now, I find that the hon. the Minister of Finance sometimes makes extraordinary arguments. In looking over his speech, on the third page of the Hansard, I find he tells us what would be our position under certain circumstances. He says:

"If the Mackenzie Government, during their term of office, had collected $5,491,000, or more than they did collect, it would have amounted to $1.38 per head. But the Mackenzie Government did not collect that amount, and the people have got the money."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is where the trouble was.

Mr. SNOWBALL. Exactly, they have got the money and the hon. the Finance Minister does not want them to have it. He wants to wring money from the people, whether they like it or not. Good times or bad times, the hon. the Minister of Finance seems determined to have the money, and the people have to suffer. The hon. gentleman not only tells us that, if the Mackenzie Government had done certain things, how much extra they would have taxed the people, but he also tells us that if he, the hon. Finance Minister had not collected a surplus of $2,589,000, the people would not have paid 65 cents per head which they did however pay. He puts the two together, what they paid under him and what they did not pay under the Mackenzie Administration, and he makes it equal to $2.03 per head. Of course, if the Mackenzie Government had collected it, the people would have paid it, but that Government was too considerate to burden the people at that time; but the hon. the Minister of Finance was not so considerate, for he collected $2,500,000, which was not required, and the people had to pay it. But this is just in accordance with the hon. Minister's usual mode of argument. I will trouble the House while I read a few further remarks of the hon. the Minister of Finance. I find on page 9 of the Hansard report of his speech, he says:

"I desire to say a few words with reference to the predictions that were made on the opposite side of the House when this policy was introduced. I think, if my memory serves me, that every one of them have failed, and utterly failed."

Well, Sir, that is pretty good; we will see now how they have failed. He goes on to say:

"What were the statements that were made when this policy was introduced? One of them was, that it was calculated to interfere with the trade between the Dominion of Canada and Great Britain, that the policy was one that was in the interest of the United States rather than of Great Britain."

"Time solves many questions, and it has solved that. I have in my hand a statement—I have selected the year 1877 because the imports for consumption are nearer in that year to that of 1881 than that of any other year I could find under the old Tariff—from which I find that the gross imports for consumption in 1876-77 were $97,300,483."

Well, Sir, on this side of the House, we say just the same thing still, that our predictions have not utterly failed, and I will go on to show, by-and-bye, how they have not failed. Then the hon. gentleman goes on with apparent though not real honesty to take the amount of grain that was exported from this sum, because hon. gentlemen on this side of the House objected to its being included, he deducts that, and then goes on to tell us that the imports from the United States during the year 1877 were 51 per cent. of the total imports, while the imports from England were only 43 per cent. Then further on he proceeds to show the superiority of their policy, what it had done for the country, that the imports from Great Britain in the past year were 48 per cent. while the imports from the United States were only 40 per cent. Now, there was a decrease under his policy in imports from the United States of 11 per cent. while the imports from England had increased 5 per cent. Now, what is the actual state of affairs? The hon. gentleman, with, as I say, apparent honesty, has taken out the grain that was exported, but he has included the quantity that was consumed in this country. Certainly we imported at that time large quantities of grain from the United States. How the markets of the country were then I am not prepared to say, but no doubt much of what we imported went into the Lower Provinces. Does that argument show anything at all as to whether this National Policy is working for or against the United States, or for or against England? I maintain it does not. Where do the Americans buy their own supply? Looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns published under the authority of the Parliament of Great Britain, I find that the United States were compelled during the last year to import goods for their own use, much in excess of former years. I believe that the prosperity of that country has been great, and no doubt hon. gentlemen will claim that that prosperity has been caused by the National Policy in Canada. No doubt the hon. Minister of Finance must take credit for it, because if there be prosperity anywhere it must be his doings. I procured the Board of Trade Returns for Great Britain for 1880, but unfortunately I was not able to procure the annual returns for 1881, except monthly issues, and I have not had time to recapitulate them. I find in those returns that the exports from Great Britain for January of this year were $12,500,000 more than they were in the corresponding month of last year, but I am unable to say what portion of this went to the United States. The people of the United States have so large a consuming capacity that they have to import goods from other countries. We also find that the corn crop in the United States being an utter failure last year, they have not been able to supply us with corn for feeding purposes in this country, and consequently our imports from them have not been so great, and the National Policy again gets credit. In 1877, the very year the hon. gentleman takes for his comparison with the year 1881, the United States imported from England $81,884,000 worth of manufactured goods. In 1880 she imported $154,000,000, or nearly double. If the United States has to import goods for herself, how is she to sell them to us? Are the people of this country so lost to their own interests that they go to the United States to buy goods which they themselves import, instead of going to Europe, where we send our exports, and bringing back the goods we want in return? Is it not a natural thing that we should buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest? If the hon. gentleman had been honest he would have told us that the cheapest market for us at the present time was Europe, a fact which our merchants themselves knew, for they went there and bought their goods; and consequently our imports fell off from the United States because they had not the goods to sell us, but had to supply themselves from the markets of Great Britain. He goes on to say that one objection raised to the Tariff on this side of the House was that it would increase the taxation to certain of the smaller Provinces, and he asserted that we paid 14½ cents per head more than was collected from the people of Ontario and Quebec in the five years of the Mackenzie Administration—a small proportion certainly—while for the last two years we have paid less. He says, further, that the Tariff has had a beneficial effect on the smaller Provinces, especially Prince Edward Island. It will be found, he says, that if any person, or locality, or section had to complain, it is not the smaller Provinces that were arraigned here, and on behalf of whom the sympathies of the House were invoked, for the practical effect had been a reduction rather than an increase of their taxation. I find on page 11 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, the relative bearing of the Customs Tariff on the different Provinces of the Dominion, and the following are the results: The percentage of duty on total imports including free goods for the Province of Quebec, in 1831, was 15·79; Ontario, 18·27; Prince Edward Island, the Province that the hon. gentleman referred to, 26·58; Nova Scotia, 18·35; New Brunswick, 21·25; Manitoba, 22·60; British Columbia, 24·08. Prince Edward Island stands highest of all. While the hon. Minister asserted us she paid least, the Trade and Navigation returns show that all the smaller provinces pay in excess of the larger ones. The hon. Minister also referred at some length to the coal tax. We were informed that there were 400,000 tons more coal raised in the Dominion last year than in the previous year, which, the hon. gentleman claimed effected a certain amount of benefit. If we deduct the amount raised in British Columbia, this sum will stand at something like 350,000 tons. I may also refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Doull) while on this subject. Among the many statements he made was one to the effect that the coal owners of the world were in the habit of forming rings for the purpose of forcing the people to buy at their own prices, and he said that when the rings broke the consumers got the benefit. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is well for us to know that under this policy we are liable to be preyed upon by the formation of these rings to which he refers. The hon. gentleman also told us that the coal owners of Nova Scotia did not raise enough coal; that they did not exert themselves. This is exactly what we say is the effect of this Tariff: that it teaches the people to lean on the Government instead of exerting themselves. The hon. gentleman asserted that the export of coal to the West Indies had been increased, but I would like him to explain what the National Policy has to do with that fact. Certainly there must be plenty of room there yet for extension, as only 15,000 tons went there last year. He said, also, that they could have sold more coal, but that it took them a great deal of their time to supply the home market. This is all very well, but I say that these facts—especially as it is claimed that they could send their coal as far up the St. Lawrence as Montreal at least, and had plenty of freights in the early part of the season—only proves that the people of Nova Scotia like the people of every other part of the world, wish to lean on the Government for support. They want to get a clear profit of 50 cents per ton, and they would sooner raise 1,000,000 tons with a profit of 50 cents per ton than 5,000,000 with a profit of 10 cents per ton. Let us look at the exports of coal from England, as shown in the parliamentary returns. The exports of coal from Great Britain increased last year, although the price did not increase one cent—in fact, was rather lower than before. In other words, unprotected England exported millions of tons more coal last year than the year before, and yet she did not charge any additional price, while you find that in Nova Scotia, no sooner was the trade open than an advance of 10 cents per ton at once took place, followed this year with a further advance of 25 cents. We were told at the time this policy was being introduced, that all that Nova Scotia wanted was an increased market—and that she did not want an extra price. They wanted a larger field; they got it, and they no sooner got it than they advanced the price of their coal 10 cents a ton. When I was in England, I received a circular issued by coal owners of Nova Scotia, stating that there would be a further advance of 25 cents from the 1st of January last, and there was a note at the bottom from a friend, saying: "You had better buy your coal in Europe." These gentlemen do not want the trade; what they want is a big profit. If the duty was not on, they would have to exert themselves in their business as other folks must do; but instead of increasing their production, which the hon. member for Pictou tells us they are not doing to the extent to which they should, they are advancing the price to the consumer. They have not only the advantage of the duty, but they have special advantages in the way of freight from the Intercolonial Railway, and still they squeeze the miners in their employ. It is an outrage, and the Minister of Finance should warn these people at once that the coal owners are getting larger markets, an advance in price, and that they are entitled to a portion of the profits. In crossing the Atlantic just six years ago in company with the hon. member for Pictou, a conversation arose at table in reference to coals, in consequence of the steamer making poor time. We were told that the cause of the delay was bad coal, and that it took about one day longer to make a voyage from America to Europe when Pictou coals were used than it did when using English coals. The hon. member for Pictou naturally became a little irritated because these coals were not appreciated. There are good coals in Nova Scotia, but I am sorry to say there are not many in the Pictou mines. In the course of this conversation, some person asked the hon. gentleman why he did not go to Parliament and raise his voice in favor of getting an import duty. He said: "I am going to Parliament at the next election, and I will raise my voice to have a duty imposed." Then I was asked what I would do, and I said: "I will go to Parliament too, and vote against him." And true enough, after the election, my hon. friend was here voting for a duty on coal, and I was here trying to cancel his vote, showing that much said in jest may prove true. Notwithstanding the heavy duty, we find that in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the imports of coal are steadily increasing year by year, and the consumers have to pay the duty; so that I maintain that the coal duty affects the people of the Maritime Provinces injuriously as well as the people of Ontario.

Mr. DOULL. Will the hon. gentleman allow me one word of explanation? He has attempted to disparage the quality of our Nova Scotia coal. I can inform him and the House that a test will prove that the quality of our coal is equal to the quality of any coal in the United States with the exception of one.

Mr. SNOWBALL. I am very happy to allow the hon. gentleman to say anything he can on behalf of Nova Scotia coal; but I know you can always get a very good analysis for coal as well as for other things. There is one mine in Pictou which produces fair coal.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I may state that the Ontario Government made comparative tests of Nova Scotia coal and American coal, and they reported to a large manufacturing establishment with which I am connected that 130 lbs. of American coal is equal to 160 lbs. of Nova Scotia coal.

Mr. MACKENZIE. When was this report made?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Last autumn.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will state the descriptions of coal.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Coal for steam purposes.

Mr. SNOWBALL. I do not dispute what the hon. gentleman states; I have not made reference to United States coal; but I have no doubt that, if the gentleman who made this analysis wished, he might have found American coal that would go as far and probably much further ahead of Nova Scotia coal. He seems not to know anything about Nova Scotia coal, because there are mines in Pictou so close together that in one you can hear the click of the hammer in the other, and yet there is no comparison between the quality of the coal in the two mines. I know it is not safe to send a tug to sea with a heavy ship, when supplied with many qualities of Pictou coal. I tell that to the hon. member for Pictou, and he knows it perfectly well.

Mr. DOULL. I do not; it is not correct.

Mr. SNOWBALL. That was the case as regards the steamer in which he and I went to sea. I am quite willing to stand up for the coal produced in that Province, if I can do so; but it is no use trying to force it on the public, because consumers ascertain very soon whether it is suitable for their purpose or not. We know, both as regards steam vessels and dwelling-houses, what is requisite is a coal of which the smallest quantity will produce the largest amount of heat. That is not found in the section of Nova Scotia which the hon. gentleman represents. Spring-hill coal will produce the heat, and it is a splendid coal for steam purposes, but it is very expensive; it goes off like a flash and you have not to keep taking ashes out, as with Pictou coal, you have to keep putting coal on. I know pieces of coal can be found that will show an excellent analysis; but when you come down to actual consumption it will be found that of the tug-boats owned in New Brunswick, as well as in other parts of Canada, not many of them use Pictou coal.

Mr. DOULL. I ask again permission to make an explanation. On the contrary, Pictou coal is preferable for steam purposes to the coal he mentions.

Mr. SNOWBALL. We do not build tug-boats with capacity to carry a coal mine, but we construct them to carry a small amount of coal to do a certain amount of work. If the Government compel us to pay taxes, we have to pay them, and we have to use imported coal, and the charge has to be paid by the people in employing the tugs. What is this coal duty worth to the people of Nova Scotia? Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the coal owners raised 350,000 tons more coal last year than in the previous year. They would have raised that quantity under any circumstance. The consumption of the country has more than increased in that proportion. With the ordinary prosperity of the country that quantity would be required. The number of tug-boats on our rivers is increasing very rapidly, and, as our lumber gets exhausted, and business becomes more scattered, it is necessary to bring the different points together, and this can only be done by steam power which requires coal. Our railways and steamboats are constantly requiring more coal. The people in their households also consume more coal, and the natural increase would have been more than 350,000 tons, provided we had no coal tax, and the people would, have got their coal cheaper. What are the people of Nova Scotia paying for that tax? I take up the Trade and Navigation Returns and find that they paid $44,000 duty on cornmeal. What for? Was it not in compensation for the duty placed on coal? Who has gained any benefit from the duty? The miners of Pictou are not receiving any higher wages, and therefore the coal-owner must be getting the benefit. The poor people have been called on to pay $44,000 duty on cornmeal alone to maintain the coal monopoly in Nova Scotia. I find that, although the Intercolonial Railway passes right through the whole of that Province in one direction, the people paid $9,000 duty on flour, $15,000 on Indian corn; that Nova Scotia paid on Indian corn, flour and wheat, last year, $73,375 into the Treasury to maintain this monopoly. Are 350,000 additional tons of coal worth $73,000 to the people of that Province? They are paying a still further additional charge on flour because it enables the Intercolonial and other railways to charge additional freight to the people consuming it. On buying flour last fall—and this is a circumstance that happened to myself—I complained to the parties in Toronto that the freight charged was excessive, and I asked for an explanation. They wrote that they would deliver flour in Liverpool, England, 10 cents lower than at Miramichi. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell us that I was not paying a charge on that flour equal to more than the duty of 50 cents per barrel when I was paying 10 cents per barrel more than it could be delivered in Liverpool? The people of the West when they have a surplus must sell their flour in Europe; they have to compete with the American flour in the market and must accept current prices. But, the railway companies know there is no other means to get flour to certain portions of the Lower Provinces except by railway, and they place the freight so as to put 50 cents in their coffers from the pockets of the consumers, and the farmers derive no benefit, but the country suffers. This is the effect of monopolies on trade. The country is suffering, but this is not half what the people of Nova Scotia pay indirectly. The section of the country that comes within the railway system, pay a tax of $75,000 additional in freights and extra charges on bread-stuffs alone, making with the duty before referred to about $150,000—to maintain what? To maintain a duty of 50 cents a ton on coal to enable them to raise 350,000 tons extra. If there is anything in the protective system, it is the people that have a right to protection against these charges. I am not fighting against the coal duties so strongly as against the whole principle of the system. The principle is one by which the whole country is made to suffer. The next subject dealt with by the hon. the Finance Minister was that of sugar. I do not intend to make any special reference to sugar, as it has been fully exposed already by the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Burpee), but I find that the hon. the Finance Minister, in regard to sugar duties, said:

"Still, I admit that, as regards refined and granulated sugar, there was the difference of 25 cents. I have a carefully prepared return showing the values during two periods in each year in New York and Montreal, deducting the drawback and adding 30 cents per cwt. as the expense of importation, because the calculation made up shows 50 cents per cwt. profit on transactions between the New York refiner and the Canadian consumers; giving the consumers the benefit of that, there was 7 cents less charged to the people of Canada on that line of sugars than if it had been imported from New York, under the old Tariff."

That was to say, that the people of Canada were paying 7 cents per 100 lbs. less for sugar than they did under the late Tariff. What do I find? I find in examining those returns (because in the few remarks I am about to make, I am going to bring the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Customs into direct antagonism) that the hon. Minister of Finance made a Budget Speech, and the other Minister made a report for the benefit of the country. As the hon. gentleman's report has a blue cover, I admit I put more confidence in it than I do in the Budget Speech of the Finance Minister. Of sugars above 14 Dutch standard there were, the Minister of Customs informs us, 70,000,000 lbs. imported into Canada last year which paid an aggregate duty of $1,459,000. I find the first item in these sugar returns is 15,858,000 lbs., costing $756,186 or $4.76 per 100 lbs., and paying duty $423,265 or $2.66 per 100 lbs. Yet the hon. Minister of Finance contends that the consumers obtained their sugar cheaper than if that duty had been removed. How does the hon. gentleman reconcile the two statements? He tells us that by the imposition of that tax, we get the staple 7 cents per 100 lbs. cheaper. Will this statement bear investigation at all? If our manufacturers could manufacture the sugar and sell it cheaper than if imported, why did they not do so? Do the importers not understand their trade, and did the consumers not know what they were doing when we find that over half the sugar consumed in this Dominion last year was refined for use when imported and paid a duty of over 2 cents per lb? The hon. Minister said:

"I trust I may be able to use as strong language, or language very similar to that employed by my hon. friend from South Brant, that the result of the increase of the Tariff had not been to increase the cost of the article to the consumer."

He says he took up, in the first place, cotton goods. In that reference he also said:

"It was not from any ill-feeling towards our neighbors that this Tariff was established; but we were gratified when we found that the policy we had introduced to give additional industry to our own people, would strike against the industrial interests of the United States, rather than against those of Great Britain."

According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, page 62, I find there were imported last year of unbleached cottons, sheetings, drills and ducks, goods not printed or stained, 8,895,733 yards, on which an import duty of 30½ per cent. was imposed on that portion coming from Great Britain. I have made up the percentage, and the figures are there to verify it. We find that on the same class of goods imported from the United States, there was only 25½ per cent. duty collected. Does this not discriminate against the trade of Great Britain in favor of trade with the United States? In reference to these goods, the hon. gentleman said, page 13 of his Budget Speech:

"I stated last Session with reference to the grey and white cottons and brown sheetings that they were selling at 10 per cent less than the price at which they would sell under the Tariff of 1878."

But that Tariff was 17½ per cent., and under the present one the duty paid amounted to 30½ per cent. How can he maintain that goods are sold less under a 30½ per cent. Tariff than they would be under a 17½ per cent. Tariff? The additional duty cannot have the effect of making the price cheaper. Two men are in trade, one sells Canadian while the other sells imported goods. The one sells to people to whom the cost is not so much an object provided they can get what suits them; the other sells to the working class to whom the price is a serious matter. The one sells Canadian manufactured goods and the other imported goods at 30½ per cent. duty. Will the hon. member tell us that the people do not pay this duty? If the people who bought these 9,000,000 yards of cotton in Europe and paid this heavy duty on them, thought they could buy them cheaper here, does any one suppose they would have imported them and paid this duty? The people that use those goods pay the duty, and the people that use the goods manufactured in Canada pay a similar percentage on every yard they consume. The hon. Minister, speaking of knitting cottons, referred to Mr. Parks, a very estimable manufacturer of the city of St. John, who, he said, sells a certain class at 39½ cents against 40 cents per pound, the price in the United States market. If those goods sold for 40 cents in the United States market, how does the hon. member explain the fact that $8,073 duty was paid on the same class of goods imported into this country. Were the people mad in importing those goods from the United States when they could buy them in the factories here 30 per cent. cheaper? The hon. gentleman may console himself by smiling over any of these statements, but they are a little too glaring for the people of the country, who intend to get correct information on this subject, and are getting it very rapidly. This

Mr. SNOWBALL,

Blue-Book is very valuable; it is issued by the Department of the Minister of Customs, and should have great weight with the people. The hon. gentleman claimed that his Tariff did not discriminate against the people of Great Britain, hold a large amount of the cheaper goods—those almost entirely used by our laboring classes, are brought in from that country. There were nearly 10,000,000 yards of denims, bed-ticks and drills imported last year, that portion from Great Britain, on which we find 33 per cent. duty paid, and on those imported from the United States we find paid but 29 per cent., showing a discriminative duty against Great Britain of 4 per cent. These taxes the people paid against the 17½ per cent. duty of the late Administration. Yet the hon. gentleman will tell us that our people paid no extra taxes. With such official statements as these before us, where is the use of the hon. the Finance Minister making such statements as we now see published in his Budget Speech? The next item he dealt with was woollen goods. He said:

"Now, I have taken some pains to write to different parties who could furnish me with reliable information with reference to the price of cotton goods, and especially of woollen goods; and a gentleman sent to me, at the request of a friend, a letter, of which he authorized me to make any use I thought proper. I stated to the gentleman, to whom I wrote among others, that I wished reliable data—data that could not be upset by any statements of fact that could be produced in the House—because we wanted nothing but the facts, and if the manufacturers were getting large profits, it was just as well that we should know it, and deal with the facts as we found them."

The hon. gentleman gives the name of the firm from which he got his information, Messrs. Cantlie, Ewan & Co., Montreal, men of first-class standing, no doubt. He says:

"This letter I received from Cantlie, Ewan & Co., of Montreal, who, I believe, have been for years engaged in selling woollen goods. It has reference to the comparative cost of certain descriptions of woollen goods made in Canada, compared with the prices of the same goods previous to the change in the Tariff. It is as follows:—

"1st. Etoffes, tweeds and fabrics made from Canada wools and used chiefly by farmers, laborers, shantymen and mechanics in country districts are as low in price now as at any time during ten years previous to 1878. This refers to regular sales."

The gentleman who wrote this letter shows himself shrewd and cautious as a business man; he does not say what is the effect of the duty. He does not explain that the cheapness of woollens is largely due to the abundance of New Zealand, Australian and other wools, nor that the classes of goods manufactured from them are extremely low in England. The hon. Finance Minister got this statement, but he did not investigate it in order to arrive at the real facts of the case; so as to lay correct information before the people of the country as he should have done. No statement should come from the hon. Finance Minister unless it can be fully borne out by facts. If he may plead that his own time is fully occupied, but he has plenty of people in his Department to investigate so that he should give us nothing but correct information on such subjects. What do we find as regards those woollen goods? I find that as regards casimers, cloths, tweeds and doeskins, there was imported last year into the Dominion, $3,403,000 worth on which the duty paid was $1,094,000. Why was this duty paid? The duty on this class of goods, imported from Great Britain was 32 per cent. but upon those imported from the United States, 26 per cent. Was not that a discriminative duty against Great Britain? Under the old Tariff the duty would have been but 17½ per cent. How can the hon. gentleman tell the people that they are not paying any extra duty on those goods, and that they cost no more than under the Tariff of 1878. Such statements are not borne out by the facts. The next subject the hon. gentleman dealt with was flannels and blankets, in regard to which the same censure applies. I find from this Blue-Book that the duty paid on blankets was over $81,000. Why did we import those blankets if we could have bought them cheaper manufactured in our country, and if there was not a monopoly ensuring our manufacturers excessive prices? We paid 45 per cent. on these goods imported from Great Britain, and 32 on the portion from the United States, a discriminative duty of 13 per cent. against British products. The people have paid those large duties, and yet the hon. the Finance Minister states they did not pay them—there is no other way of putting it than to admit squarely that he and the Minister of Customs are at variance. We also find the same remark applies to a large amount of hats, respecting which he has a letter from a very respectable manufacturer. We are told there was no extra duty paid on hats at all—that the people are getting them cheaper than before; yet we find large importations and large sums paid into the Treasury on those goods. I suppose the only inference is that the people who pay for and wear those goods know nothing about their value, and buy them without any regard to price; that they import such articles just to gratify their whims. We know that the Tariff was supposed to protect certain manufactures, and we know it is protecting them, and that the manufacturers are not giving the people the benefit of cheaper products as they should. They are not paying the laboring classes the wages that they ought to pay, and are not manufacturing and selling as cheaply as we were promised. They have not yet increased productions equal to the demands of the country, because one-half the goods consumed are still imported. The hon. gentleman also spoke of tea, stating that the people would have a cheap breakfast table, and claiming that they are getting tea at 5 cents a pound less than under the late Tariff. He did not tell us the reason of this fall in price. He did not tell us that India has entered largely into the production of tea, and we know that tea was cheaper in Great Britain last year, not by 5 cents, but by 10 cents a pound, than the year previous. If the people of this country are getting tea at 5 cents a pound cheaper than formerly, the hon. the Finance Minister is not entitled to our thanks. At present tea is wonderfully cheap, and I do not suppose it will ever be as dear as it has been in the past. I contend that hon. gentlemen opposite are setting a bad example to the people of this country. As I said, they are teaching the youth of Canada that instead of relying upon themselves to rely upon the Government in time of trouble. The principle is a bad one. It teaches the young men not to do as their fathers did before them. These had to endure many privations and hardships, and they made considerable of a country of Canada before it fell into our hands, and if we do as much for it in the future as they did in the past, we may yet have a great country. But do not destroy the independence of the youth and teach them to suppose that the Government can assist them in every time of financial difficulty, but teach them rather to rely upon their own strong arms for assistance, and then Canada will become great and prosperous.

Mr. KAULBACH. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with wrapt attention to the various, and in some cases extraordinary speeches, of the hon. members on the opposite side of the House, on the subject of the fiscal policy of this Dominion, and I have yet to learn, through all their complaining utterances, one word suggestive as an improvement. Of course, I understand that they have no policy to recommend as an improvement to the one now adopted, but being in Opposition they feel they must needs take an opposite course. The subject of the fiscal policy is a theme so replete with argumentative matter, in support of its principles, so comprehensive in all its parts, so vital to the growth, industry and prosperity of this vast and important Dominion, that I feel none should sound a discordant note in relation to its wonder-working effects, and none do I believe indulge themselves in that way except those possessed of that party bias, and party spirit, and such uncontrollable feelings of a party nature, as to be incapable of giving a conscientious and unbiassed expression with regard to its beneficial deserts, or an approving sentence with regard to its merits. All true Canadians, patriotic to their country, seeing the beneficial results accruing from this policy, willingly sound their exultation of praise with one heart and one voice, in support of its merited deserts, and with delight and in all sincerity proclaim it to be life, unending success and prosperity to our nation and people. This policy, I have no hesitation in stating, should have been adopted by us long ere it was; to have protected the mechanic, the farmer, the fisherman, and all other classes, and to have made us a successful rival of our neighbors the Americans across the border, to whom it has been unquestionably a triumphant success. Was there any reason why the policy was not adopted earlier? Was it that the Government under the Mackenzie regime was not reminded of this important policy? Let us take a retrospective view of the position of things, as far back as 1876, and see what was then suggested. We find in the spring of that year when the hon. member for Centre Huron, the then Finance Minister, moved the House into Committee of Supply, that our right hon. leader, then leader of the Opposition, moved in amendment, substantially:

“That the House do not go into Committee of Supply, but that there should be such a re-adjustment of the Tariff which whilst not imposing any unnecessary burdens upon the people, would stimulate and protect, the agricultural, commercial, manufacturing, and other industries of the country.”

But the Government preferring still to continue the old policy of a revenue Tariff, which meant rolling up deficits instead of surpluses, voted the amendment down. What did Henry Clay, one of the greatest statesmen America ever produced, say of the effects of Protection on the national prosperity of the Republic? Addressing the House of Representatives in 1824 he declared:

“That never in the history of the American Republic has there ever been such universal misery, want, financial and commercial ruin and disaster as from 1817 to 1824 under seven years of Free Trade.”

And addressing the Senate in 1832 he said:

“That never in the history of the American Republic has there ever been years of such universal prosperity, aggrandizement, and happiness as from 1824 to 1831 under a high protective Tariff.”

And he added:

“That whilst the opponents of Protection declared that it would be the ruin of the provincial, commercial, and agricultural interests of the country, unbounded success was the result.”

A satisfactory proof of the beneficial workings of a protective policy is shown by the fact that at the close of the Civil War in the United States, which commenced in 1861 and continued till May 1865, when gold was in the market at 280 per cent., and an immense war debt incurred, they were able from the balance of trade in their favor under the workings of this policy, to not only keep up the various requirements of the country, but to pay off every year, very largely of their indebtedness; and at present to place their paper on the market at par with gold. To show the present satisfactory working of the system I will instance the high protection they exacted on imported coal which was, and still is, 75 cents per ton, and how it affected Canada under the late Government's one-sided Free Trade policy: it gave them a home market, and at the same time a market in the whole of Upper Canada, and a large portion of the Lower Provinces—as a consequence, locking up the coal industries of Nova Scotia, and compelling her coal mining companies to see their mines either closed or sold to pay losses. Since 1878, when a duty of 50 and 60 cents per ton was imposed on American coal coming into our markets, the mines of Nova Scotia have been running full time, and offering remunerative rates, supplying the Canadians previously supplied by the United States. From the statement by the hon. the Finance Minister a few days ago, I find the output of coal in Nova Scotia for the last four years was as follows: 1878, 770,603 tons; 1879, 778,271 tons; 1880, 1,032,710 tons; 1881, 1,116,248 tons, shewing an immense increase in 1881 over 1878. The protection on Canadian coal, shutting out the American article, and giving a market for our own, not only contributes to the revenue of the Dominion, but also to that of the Province of Nova Scotia, from the royalty paid in on the increased output; promising the coming season to be three times as much as it was in 1878, or about $150,000, which will largely supplement her road and bridge service, so greatly needed in the Province. The high protective Tariff exacted on coal by the Americans, was not the only one from which we as Canadians suffered; for instance take the following as examples: Lumber, pine or spruce, $2 per 1,000 feet, with an addition of 50 cents if planed on one side, and $1 if planed on both sides; also an additional 50 cents if tongued and grooved; making a total duty on the article, if placed in their market in this condition, of $3.50 per 1,000 feet. Thus entirely shutting out the Canadian labor in order to protect their own, and tying the hands of cabinet-makers, and depriving them of a living by allowing the same article, in the shape of furniture, to be returned into this country, under a very low Tariff. Furniture, 35 per cent. United States, as against 17½ Canadian; hats, caps, &c., 40 per cent. United States, as against 17½ Canadian; cutlery, 35 per cent. United States, as against 17½ Canadian; glass, 40 per cent. United States, as against 17½ Canadian. Fearing, however, that I am trespassing too much on the valuable time of the House in comparing these Tariffs, I would simply refer to the duties on tea and coffee, imposed by the late Government, viz., 5 cents per lb. on black and 6 cents per lb. on green tea; and 2 cents per lb. on coffee, both of which have been lately placed on the free list. Molasses also, which was 25 cents per gallon, is now charged 15 cents per gallon. I would also at this point, like to refer to the article of flour, upon which a duty of 50 cents per barrel is charged, to which duty some of the Maritime Provinces have objected, forgetting that they are part and parcel of our Dominion, and that they form as it were the arm, stretching out into the sea, of the great trunk of Canada; but were the duty to be removed, we should then be finding the Americans a market for their flour, and shutting out that of our Upper Canadians, who are already debarred from selling in the American markets by a duty more than double that imposed on American flour coming into our markets. The duty on flour certainly does not affect the price of the article to the consumer as it can be obtained from Upper Canada, through the American ports, in bond, at the same rates as American flour, and brought into Nova Scotia without any additional charge. These are absolute facts, and cannot therefore be controverted. To show the beneficial effects of the National Policy to my Province, I will compare the imports and exports of Nova Scotia in 1878 with those of 1881:

Balance of trade against us.....	$1, 07,406
Exports, 1881.....	$8,245,738
Imports, 1881.....	8,168,648
Balance of trade in our favor	$77,090

To prove further that the export trade of Canada is increasing, and that manufacturers are encouraged, I observed some few days ago that a shipment was made to Russia of 180

Mr. KAULBACH,

reaping and mowing machines, the manufacture of Canada; and a large quantity of woollen cloth, from the woollen factories of Nova Scotia, to England and France, which has arisen since the inauguration of this policy. Cotton mills are now being erected in different parts of the Dominion; and two, I am happy to say, are in course of erection in my Province, which will give employment to thousands of hands, indirectly—young women more particularly. A glass factory has been started in New Glasgow, and is now being run night and day, the demand for the manufacture of glass being so much greater than the supply. A knitting establishment has also been started in Halifax and is running on full time, and employs upwards of sixty hands. Sugar refineries have been built, employing upwards of 1,000 hands; and I am happy to state that Nova Scotia has the advantage in this industry over any other of the Provinces of the Dominion, as through it the fisherman and the farmer—the farmer more particularly—receive a very large benefit, and in this way: Previously to the erection of the sugar refinery, the fish merchant in shipping fish to the West Indies would, as a rule, bring a return cargo of sugar to the ports of Boston or New York, where they would have to pay light dues, wharfage and dockage, tonnage, pilotage, commission on the sale of the article, disbursement of the ship, and another commission for the purchase of sufficient cargo for ballast, or pay for ballast itself, or perhaps the article of sugar refined, whereas now they usually return direct to the port of Halifax with a cargo of sugar, which they dispose of either at the refinery there, or wherever the most remunerative prices are offered, thus saving money to the shippers and making them give better prices to the fishermen for their fish, and in addition encouraging the labor in our own country and a transit over our own Intercolonial Railway. The exports of Canadian products, including Canadian manufactures, in 1878, were $65,740,131; in 1881, $80,921,379. Raw cotton imported for manufacture in 1877-78, 7,243,413 lbs; in 1880-81, 16,018,721 lbs. Wool imported for manufacture, in 1877-78, 6,230,084 lbs; in 1880-81, 8,040,287 lbs; showing very conclusively the great increase in the trade of the Dominion. At no period in the history of Canada has the financial position of the country stood better than at the present time, and instead of a deficit of $7,500,000 which offered when the late Government went out of power, I am pleased to state that at the end of the last fiscal year we had a surplus of $4,132,700, whereby we have been enabled not merely to take off the duties on tea, coffee, tin, and other imports, but to abolish the Stamp Act, and give a bounty of $100,000 to the fishermen. The fishermen, renowned for their vigor and bravery, are a class in whom I feel particularly interested, as I am aware of the extreme toil, sacrifices and privations they have to undergo in prosecuting this most hazardous and dangerous industry, often having to leave their houses or cabin homes in the dark, dreary hour of night; tossed on the tempestuous waves of the stormy Atlantic in their frail little bark or boat; exposed at this season to the cold icy blasts of winter; often only to get a scanty living for their needy families—it is for them, whose interests I so greatly desire to cherish and protect, that I feel that this $150,000 bounty is a prudent expenditure, and am pleased that after upwards of two years' entreaty, I, with the aid of my friends, accomplished my object, and hope now that the distribution will be a satisfactory one—that all will be satisfied. The fishermen being the main artery of success to this Dominion, and the bone and sinew of the county I have the honor to represent, I am greatly desirous of fostering this industry, and hope that under this policy the Government will see fit to largely augment this sum another year; and urge that encouragement should be given for the construction of a particular class of vessels, propelled by steam instead of sails, to enable them to move more quickly to the different fishing grounds, much time being wasted at present with sailing crafts during spells of contrary winds and calms. Encouragement in this direction would offer employment to the machinist and others, as well as the shipbuilder, which the policy of this Government is designed to do and thus tend to expand this valuable industry. Whilst referring to the fisheries, I cannot refrain from drawing the attention of this honorable House to the unfortunate position in which the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces were placed at the hands of the late Government, by the seeming indifference they exhibited, in their interests, in securing the Fishery Award. It will be remembered that the Award was made in 1877, and Parliament, under the Mackenzie regime, sat in 1878; why was it that they did not then embrace the opportune moment, before the money was paid over to the Dominion, to advise the Imperial Government to pay it over for the benefits of the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, who surrendered their rights to the Americans to use our territorial waters in common with themselves? Was it not right of the members representing the various fishing constituencies in the Dominion to have made the demand during that Session, instead of holding themselves in silence and not offering a complaining word till the matter was brought up by myself and others when this Government came into power? Was it not their duty—nay, their incumbent right—to fulfil their pledges to guard and protect the interests of their constituents, more particularly an industry of this kind, offering such immense proportions? Most assuredly it was. The fish taken in Nova Scotia in 1880 amounted in value to $6,291,061, being nearly half the value of the entire catch of the Dominion, as the following statement for the fiscal year ending 30th June will show:

Lunenburg County	$1,176,159 05
Halifax do	894,451 80
Shelburne do	857,307 00
Yarmouth do	669,572 05

To show the high estimation in which the fishermen are held by the Americans, I will give the quotation of John Quincy Adams, one of the most learned and distinguished of American statesmen:

“There is something in the very occupation of fishermen not only beneficial in itself but noble and exalted in the qualities of which it requires the habitual exercise. In common with the cultivators of the soil, their labors contribute to the subsistence of mankind, and they have the merit of continual exposure to danger, super-added to that of increasing toil. Industry, frugality, patience, perseverance, fortitude, intrepidity, souls inured to perpetual conflict with the elements, and bodies steeled with unremitting action, ever grappling with danger and familiar with death. These are the properties to which the fisherman of the ocean is formed by the daily labors of his life. These are the properties for which He who knew what was in man, the Saviour of mankind, sought His first, and found His most faithful ardent, and undaunted Disciples, among the fishermen of His country.”

That the fishing industry is one of the greatest and one of the most important of Canadian industries, the following comparative statement showing the number of vessels, boats and flats employed in the fisheries in 1880, with the number of hands employed, will help to prove:

Province.	Vessels.	Tonnage.	Boats.	Flats.	No. of Men.
Nova Scotia.....	731	29,087	11,210	29,276
Quebec	166	9,970	4,816	2,440	14,771
New Brunswick.....	220	4,411	4,219	8,566
Prince Edward Island.....	32	1,167	1,383	4,031
Ontario	18	253	865	2,130
British Columbia.....	14	650	317	16	1,843
Grand Totals.....	1,181	45,810	22,810	2,456	60,617

The fishing Industry, however, is not the only one that has been fostered and encouraged by the beneficial workings of our National Policy, every other, whether manufacturing or agricultural, has felt its benign effects; so that go where you will, you find things prospering and every one contented and happy; pleased that a way has been found to lead the country out of that dreary state of depression which existed during the time the Government was carried on by the hon. members opposite. Even American citizens do not fail to see our flourishing condition, and offer their evidences as a proof of our success, as the following extract from one of their journals shows. The Philadelphia American says:

“The Canadian Ministry are fairly entitled to boast of the success of their National Policy adopted in 1879. In three years time Canada has been lifted out of the slough of depression and distress, employment found for her surplus labor, her manufactures extended, and made prosperous, and her annual deficit converted into a handsome surplus.”

This statement so truthful, ought to be a source of gratification to every Canadian statesman and a great satisfaction to every person irrespective of party, who feels an interest in his country's prosperity. The purchasing power of the masses was never greater than at the present time, markets unsurpassed for good prices, exceeding anything that could have been anticipated. We do not find, as I was pained to witness, the poor standing in front of the Parliament buildings and Public Works office here, and hearing them beg for labor, as was the case at the opening of the first Session of this Parliament, under the ill effects of the policy of the late Government. But, on the contrary, the vision of the tramp and the beggar has vanished from our high-ways, and insolvency has dwindled into a mere shadow. The question has been, and still is asked, shall this Canada of ours be a market for our own people, or a market for the people of the United States? The answer was given; the cry went forth when that noble battle was fought and victory won on the 17th day of September, 1878. “A market at home, and as much as we can get abroad.” But capitalists desirous of investing their means in industries in Canada, are anxious, before doing so, to still more firmly establish the protective policy in this Dominion by another appeal to the people on the question, and letting the few who entertain the erroneous idea of Free Trade, see that the farmer, fisherman, &c., of this country, are not going to give up labor at home for their sons and daughters, as well as a ready market for their produce. The beneficial effects of this fiscal policy, if not expressed by every man for certain political reasons, I believe are certainly entertained (our hon. friends on the opposite side of this House not excepted), and I am satisfied that it certainly commends itself in the main to the judgment of every right thinking man, who has ever made the question the subject of unbiassed and intelligent study. Some are willing to advocate or favor any scheme of spoliation to meet their own personal or political ends instead of advancing a comprehensive system of reform, tending to the growth, success, industry, and prosperity of this noble Dominion, and giving encouragement and employment to the industriously inclined, and working man. All our factories, all our industries, and all our enterprises tend to build up this Dominion as a great nation, and the money so disbursed in creating a diversity of employment is thus spent at home among our fellow country men, not sent abroad, as it had been in the past, to build up foreign capital and labor. Our aim has been, and still is, to encourage our own people to build, manufacture, and produce everything possible at home, and to retain and spend the money in our own country, and thus encourage a spirit of rivalry in trades as to bring everything to a par value in the market. Competition will bring about these results, and energy in this direction will work unmistakable success—by the imposition of a duty on foreign manufactured goods, as to enable us to produce all such manufactures as we require, and which, under favorable circumstances, can be manufactured in Canada, by the admission, free of duty, of all raw materials and commodities used in domestic consumption, and manufactures which cannot be produced in Canada. By the imposition of such duty on foreign agriculture as is imposed by foreign countries on our own, health and tone is given to this country, which does not enhance the price of imported goods in proportion to duty imposed, as illustrated by experience in the United States, but affords us a wholesome market at home, healthy revenues, and, at the same time, transfers the burden of taxation from the necessities of life to the luxuries, besides the many other happy and beneficial results. I am pleased to be able to stand in my place in Parliament, and conscientiously make this statement of facts so undeniably correct, instead of occupying the position of a complaining body, like our hon. friends opposite, unwilling to offer a remedy or formulate an idea, but simply to express a desire to return to their old system of one-sided Free Trade, which means rolling up deficits year after year, and sinking the country deeper in debt.

After Recess.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, the Opposition are under very great obligations to the President of the Council for the excessive politeness with which he has treated them. He has told the House that the leaders of the Reform party are without hope, and that their resources of falsehood are very nearly exhausted. He has spoken of their incapacity; of their incompetence; and the member for Annapolis, who is on excellent terms with himself, calls them imbeciles. If those hon. gentlemen think they can give dignity to this House and strength to their party by expressions of this sort; if they think they can make vituperation serve the place of argument, we, on this side, have no great cause of complaint. Our impressions of the public taste differ from those of these hon. gentlemen. The public take some interest in the standing of the House of Commons, they have some regard for the decencies of debate. They do not confound the self-complacency of the member for Annapolis with political wisdom, nor the petulance of the President of the Council with sarcasm. We have no objection to a comparison of our success or failure as administrators, with the success or failure of our opponents. The President of the Council has boasted of the success of 1878, and the First Minister informs the country that Providence was on their side. These hon. gentlemen owe their success to misfortune, over which we had no control—over which they had no control; but the greatest misfortune to the country was the victory of the Conservative party. The period was one of darkness, not in Canada alone, but over all Christendom, and the success of the Conservative leaders was due to the calamities of the times. They told the country that it was suffering from wounds and bruises which we had inflicted, and which they, as good Samaritans, were ready to heal. Time and the revival of commerce abroad, is curing the disease, but the country now discovers that it is in danger of dying from the attentions of its physicians. It has recently been well said by Mr. Gladstone, that during the periods of commercial depression the owls and the bats always go abroad.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Here they are at home you see.

Mr. MILLS. Now that the commercial condition of the country has improved, I think that the gigantic proportions which the owls and the bats assumed in the public minds, can be more clearly estimated. There is, Sir, a fitness of things in the success of those gentlemen during a period of darkness. It is in the night that the owls and bats come forth to seek their prey—the light is unsuited to them. The seemingly gigantic proportions which darkness gives them disappears with the light; and as they become incapable of seeing, they are themselves seen with all the more distinctness. The hon. gentleman boasts of the statesmanship of the Tory leaders. What important measure has, since Confederation, forced itself upon the attention of Parliament which these hon. gentlemen have successfully grappled with? Was it the Washington Treaty in which great interests were sacrificed, and important trusts betrayed? Was it the skill shown in putting the Fenian raids, and the raids of the Alabama upon the same footing? Was it in the temporary arrangement in relation to the Fisheries which left the headland question untouched? Was it in the skill with which the Minister of Railways succeeded in arraying the public opinion of Nova Scotia against Union? Was it the insurrection provoked in the North West? Was it in the position taken by the Minister of Public Works and his friends that the measure of the Government of which he was a member, was of so odious character that it justified a rebellion? That hon. gentleman spoke of that measure, as one of such tyranny that the people in the North-West Territory were justified in their course, or at all events their offence was to be extenuated in consequence of the inconsiderate and arbitrary manner in which the Government had dealt with them in seeking to bring them into the Union.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Never.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentlemen is wrong. But on what ground did he undertake to extenuate the resort to arms against this country? On what ground did his recent colleague the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), speak of Riel being entitled to the rights of a leader of a revolution, and appeal to the principles of International law in order to justify or extenuate the course he had adopted? Was it in the terms upon which British Columbia was admitted into the Union? Was it in the terms upon which Sir Hugh Allan obtained the Charter for the construction of the Pacific Railway? Is it in the bargain with the present Syndicate? The President of the Council has referred to the Fishery Award and claims that the credit of that Award belongs to the First Minister. To the First Minister belongs the credit of ignoring the headland question, and of providing for a temporary settlement. But the success of obtaining an award of $5,000,000 was wholly due to the skill and ability of the hon. member for Westmoreland. He managed the case very ably. The hon. the First Minister smiles at that remark.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. What would have been his position if he had been before that arbitration? The Americans offered to admit coal, lumber, and fish, free from duty for the privileges of fishing in Canadian waters. The hon. the First Minister refused this proposition. He and his friends say that the Canadians pay the duty upon the coal and lumber sent to the American market. If we look into the question, we shall find that for the period for which this treaty has to run, the Americans will have collected $16,000,000 upon these articles. Who pays this sum? We say the American consumers; but the men of capacious minds on the other side, like the hon. member from Annapolis, the hon. member for Cardwell, and the hon. Ministers, say it is paid by the Canadians. If they are right, the First Minister has thrown away $16,000,000 in order to get less than $5,000,000. But that is not all. The hon. gentlemen cannot take credit for the $5,000,000 which were received. The credit of that is due to the skill and ability with which the hon. member for Westmoreland superintended the case on behalf of this country. The United States Counsel claimed that Canada was largely benefited by the free market with the United States for their fish. They had remitted $2, I think, a barrel upon Canadian fish. They regarded this remission as a remission of tax paid by Canadians, and they insisted that this remission should go in reduction of compensation; and if hon. gentlemen opposite are right, their contention was unassailable. But the hon. member for Westmoreland took a different view. Being a free trader, he said these duties were paid by the American consumer; that their abolition was an advantage which accrued to the American consumer, and that they ought not to be regarded as a compensation. The hon. member for Westmoreland proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners that he was right, and his opponents were wrong; and, if $5,000,000 were obtained, it was largely due to this fact. What would have been the position of the First Minister or his friends upon this question? They would have said to the American Counsel, we concur in your view; you are undoubtedly right. The Canadians paid this duty, and this is now a simple question of account. All we have to do is to ascertain the amount of duty which you would have collected under your Tariff on Canadian fish, and credit you with this sum as payment of the Award. This question must soon come up again, and every one knows that the opinions held by gentlemen opposite will put them out of Court. They cannot obtain a farthing without abandoning their views upon Protection. They could not have obtained an Award of a dollar had they controlled the affairs of this country when the Halifax Commission sat. The hon. President of the Council has referred to the railway expenditure, and the railway construction of this Government and the late Administration, and his statement is as disingenuous as such a statement could well be. He says, that when the late Government retired from office, that there was not a mile of the Pacific Railway open for traffic. That from Lake Superior to English River, ninety-seven miles were built. That now there are from Lake Superior westward, 242 miles. That from Selkirk eastward there were seventy miles constructed there; that there are now 130 miles; that between Emerson and Selkirk, there were then twenty-two miles; that there are now eighty miles; that from Winnipeg westward before the advent of the present Administration, there was no road; that now 134 miles are in operation. And the hon. gentleman has referred to their patriotic endeavors to supply the missing link. If the hon. gentleman had striven to make a statement calculated to mislead, calculated to make impressions wholly at variance with the facts, he could not have made one which would have better served his purpose than the one he made to this House. Why, of this 134 miles west from Winnipeg does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that any portion of it is completed. Does he not know that the ties are laid down without any portion of the road being graded; that, in many cases, they are laid upon the ice, and that when spring opens, when the frost disappears, the road will be impassable?

Mr. BANNERMAN. Not for 120 miles, it is all graded.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman says it is all graded; he will have an opportunity of considering that at another period.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman knows that west of Winnipeg the road has been moved several miles to the south to another track. There is not a mile in use of what they pretended to have built.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is not the point. The point is this: The hon. gentleman is making a statement that the 125 miles west of Winnipeg is not well graded, and I say it is.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon. gentleman will permit me I will state my case in my own way, and if the hon. gentleman opposite does not agree with my view, if he disputes my facts, he will have an opportunity of correcting me, as I have no doubt he will. The hon. gentleman says, that but ninety-seven miles from Lake Superior westward was open under the Government of Mr. Mackenzie. That now 145 miles more are completed. But was there nothing done upon these 145 miles before the retirement of the late Administration? The hon. gentleman says that there was not a mile of this road open for traffic. There is not a mile now. It cannot be opened until the two sections meet, and a continuous line is made. The hon. gentleman says, that but twenty-two of the eighty-five miles between Emerson and Selkirk are completed. Will he say how much was done after the accession to office of the present Administration? He knows that that road was about completed. He knows the trains were running upon it a few weeks after the defeat of the late Administration, and that nothing was done by the present Government to hasten the completion of that line. The hon. gentleman has referred to the missing link as he calls it. He does not consider it beneath his position as a Minister of the Crown to seek to mislead those about him and behind him, who prefer to be misinformed upon this subject. He knows that it was not to the public advantage that a contract for the construction of the central portion should be given before the contracts already let for the construction of the ends approached completion. The country was inaccessible except by means of the two extremities, and to let the contract for the construction of this middle section at an early day, was equivalent to increasing the contract price to an enormous extent, without at all hastening the period of completion. Suppose this contract had been let two or three years earlier, what useful public purpose would it have served? How were supplies to be taken in there? Even as it was, there are instances of provisions having to be carried for thirty miles on the backs of men over muskies, and through swamps and lakes, and what would have been the difficulties at a still greater distance from any proper base of supply? Would not tenders for construction have been necessarily confined to those contractors who controlled the existing means of ingress to the country? I have seen it estimated, that it would have cost from 10 to 15 cents a lb. on every crow-bar, shovel, spade, pick and barrow, taken at the nearest point of operation, and yet the hon. gentleman expects the country will agree with him in his wild animadversions upon the late Administration for not beginning railway construction at points which were for the time being inaccessible. The hon. gentleman has referred to the 134 miles of road built from Winnipeg westward. This is a very tender topic; one which I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman mention. I would have supposed that he would have preferred the discussion of almost any other subject than this one. He knows that his colleague had located 200 miles of the road. The Syndicate have refused to accept the location. They said that it was bad. They set it aside, and chose a line for themselves. The eighty odd miles of road which he had built, they have abandoned. The Minister of Railways let a contract which paid so much more handsomely for ballasting than for grading, that I understand the contractor undertook to make the road bed with ballast. It was so well made that when the rains of autumn came, a considerable portion of it was under water, it can no longer be used; and there is now, a few miles from Winnipeg, a train frozen in the ice, and which has been frozen there since the early winter. There are some facts connected with this road which the House ought to know. We have a right to know whether the contractors were paid in full for a road built in this way. We have a right to know whether the Minister of Railways let a contract for the construction of a portion of the Pacific Railway upon plans and profiles so degraded that the road could only be used in the dry season of summer. I believe this statement is true. The Syndicate have found it to their interest to construct another line to Portage la Prairie and to abandon the line built by the hon. Minister of Railways. Who paid for the construction of this abandoned road—was it the Syndicate or was it the hon. Minister of Railways? What settlement has been made with the contractors of the second 100 miles who have not been permitted to go forward with their work? How was it the hon. Minister made such a mistake in the location of the road that the Syndicate found it necessary to abandon his line and to abandon all that has been done upon it? The hon. gentleman says that the Syndicate have now 134 miles built west of Winnipeg. I have good reason to believe that there is not one mile finished in such a way as to entitle the Syndicate to receive money or lands upon their contract, if that contract is strictly adhered to. Is it not a fact that a large portion of these 134 miles has been made by simply laying the ties upon frozen ground or on the ice? Is it not a fact that the road is neither graded nor ballasted, and that considerable portions of it must be unfit for traffic the moment the frost disappears and the spring opens? The hon. gentleman's statement, from beginning to end, can only serve to mislead. I am making no complaint against the Syndicate; they are men of great ability, who have gone into this railway as a commercial enterprise, who are studying their own interests, who are capable of understanding them, and who will do that—as they have a right to do—which they believe best for themselves. But the Government have not been equally mindful of the public interests, and the more the statements that the President of the Council has made, in reference to the Pacific Railway, is investigated, the more it will be found to be no ground for self-laudation. The President of the Council says that the present Administration have added $100,000,000 to the wealth of the country, by keeping 100,000 Canadians at home. He informed us that 28,000 settled in Manitoba last year; and he adds that the Government have added $28,000,000 thereby to the wealth of Canada. These are certainly novel calculations. There are not a hundred thousand people in Manitoba and the North-West. The Government have kept nobody at home. They have driven thousands abroad. According to the United States immigration returns our emigration thither was, in 1878, 21,474; in 1879, 31,156; in 1880, 99,000, and, in 1881, 125,000. The year 1879 was a year in which the Tariff was in operation for a little more than three months, and the emigration from Canada increased upwards of 10,000. The next year it was more than four times as great as it was in the year 1878, and during last year it was equal to the emigration for the five years for which the late Government held office. The hon. gentleman's arithmetic will, then, require to be reversed. Canada has lost, in the loss of her population, $224,000,000, during the years 1880 and 1881. And what have we gained in population by the efforts of the hon. gentleman? It is the height of absurdity to count the

Mr. MILLS.

Canadians who go from Ontario to the North-West as a population gained. I have never heard of such a calculation except in a single instance; and it is so much like the calculation of the President of the Council that I will mention it. He shall have whatever advantage it may afford him. On one occasion a school teacher gave a class of boys an exercise in composition. One of them wrote an essay about pins. He began by saying that pins were highly useful things, for they had been the means of saving the lives of thousands of people. The teacher was astonished, and he asked his pupil how thousands had their lives saved by pins. "By not swallowing them," replied the boy. The Minister says the Government have added $100,000,000 to the wealth of the country, and when we ask in what way he says, by keeping 100,000 Canadians at home, who are cheap at $1,000 a piece. Why did the hon. Minister stop at $100,000,000? Why did he not count the whole population, and he might have made the service of the Government to appear much more valuable. Although living may be dear at the present time, human flesh and blood is cheap at $1,000 a head. A good steer is cheap at $50, and an ordinary horse is worth $100, and why should not an intelligent, industrious, sober young man, be valued at $1,000 and placed to the credit side of the ministerial account? I am inclined to think that most young men will resent the ministerial calculation. I am inclined to think they will refuse to be put in the ministerial balance when the political day of judgment comes, and be weighed and sold for the advantage of the Government. The hon. gentleman may take whatever consolation he can get from the Trade and Navigation Returns. He may appeal to any monopoly that owes him gratitude; but he can hardly venture yet to look upon this country as a political slave market in which every man who ventures to go from one part of the Dominion to another part, is to have a value of $1,000 put upon him, and then have this sum credited to the wealth-producing power of the Government and the National Policy. I am not sorry, however, that such a line is taken, and the result will be as well understood as the argument. The hon. President of the Council says that upwards of 21,000 additional hands have been engaged in manufacturing establishments since the introduction of the present Tariff. He says that these represent from 80,000 to 100,000 of an additional population. He ought to know that this is not the case. A very large number of these 21,000 are children. In many of the cotton factories, all the children of a family are engaged, and the number of the population represented by these 21,000 would be less than 50,000 in all. The annual increase in the number of those engaged in skilled pursuits before the introduction of the National Policy was more than double the number who had been added since. We ought to have had an addition of 44,000 instead of 21,000. It is not true, then, that the National Policy has helped us in this particular. Many mechanical pursuits have been seriously injured by the policy of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. I have seen it stated that upwards of 90 per cent. of the stone-cutters have been driven from Ontario by the exclusion of Ohio freestone from the Canadian market. We do know that there has been enormous emigration from the country; that it has far exceeded anything hitherto known in the country. It has not been simply an emigration of unprotected farmers and laborers, but mechanics and artisans have also gone away in great numbers. Let me here refer in this connection to some very important statistics given by the hon. the Minister of Finance. They are anything but encouraging, and the results which they give are so disappointing that I am inclined to believe they have, indeed, very little value. The hon. the Minister of Finance told us that, in the city of Hamilton, there were employed, in 1878, 3,703 persons; in 1881, 9,054; giving an increase of 5,351 hands engaged in the manufacturing establishments of Hamilton within three years. The plant, he says, in 1878, was $538,100, and, in 1881, $1,174,750, an increase of 113 per cent. The aggregate production in 1878 was $3,857,000, and in 1881, $7,478,700. The hon. the Minister of Finance says that wages in 1878 were $1.07½ a day, and in 1881, $1.17½. Now, from these statements we see a great diminution per hand both of labor and of capital since 1878. The number of skilled laborers in the city of Hamilton have increased 144 per cent.; the value of the plant has increased 113 per cent.; wages have advanced 9¼ per cent., while the production has increased only 94 per cent. The annual production in 1878 was 7½ times the amount of plant; and in 1881 it was 6½ times the amount of plant. The production per man was $1,041 in 1878, and but $824 in 1881; and, if the hon. the Minister of Finance is right, in 1881 the wages of the laborer amounted to the enormous sum of 43 per cent. of the entire value of the articles upon which the labor was expended. I find in the United States that the wages amount to but 18 per cent. of the value of the articles upon which the labor is expended. The hon. the Minister of Finance gives the additional skilled laborers of Canada, since the introduction of the present Tariff, as 24,875. Now, the annual value of the products of their industry, at the estimate of the hon. gentleman, would be $19,906,000. But the Census of 1871 would give us $29,000,000, or nearly 50 per cent. more than the United States Census returns would place upon the articles upon which the same amount of labor has been expended—the value of $52,635,000. If the hon. gentleman is right, under the present Tariff the manufacturer produces goods to the value of $824 per man. In 1871, the manufacturer produced about $1,200 per man, and in the United States the manufacturer produces upward of $2,000 per man. If the hon. the Minister of Finance's statistics are at all to be relied upon, we are in a condition of utter helplessness. If the United States can produce $2,100 worth of goods with the same amount of labor that produces $824 worth of goods here—if $43 out of every $100 is required to pay wages here, and but $18 out of every $100 is required to pay wages there, it is as plain as noon-day that 100 per cent. protection would be wholly inadequate to exclude American goods. I do not believe that our industrial establishments are so disgracefully inefficient as the hon. gentleman has represented them to be. I believe the deductions which are suggested by his statistics, show that they are utterly worthless. In 1870, the value of the raw material used in manufactures in the United States was $2,488,427,242. The wages of the laborers, $775,584,343. The value of the manufactured products was $4,232,325,442. We see that the value of the material is 59 per cent.; the value of the wages 18 per cent.; and the earnings of the capital 23 per cent. It would have been interesting had the hon. the Minister of Finance given us the value of the raw material used in the city of Hamilton. We have for wages, in Hamilton, 43 per cent., and if we were to put the value of the raw material at the same sum, we would have but 16 per cent. left to cover the deterioration of plant, the cost of fuel and the earning of capital. The total amount of the capital in buildings and plant, according to the hon. the Minister of Finance, is but $248 per hand, which would represent an addition to manufacturing capital of the Dominion, during the past four years, of but $4,664,061—a much less sum than the estimated surplus of the hon. Minister for a single year. If the hon. Minister is right in the data which he has given us, the amount of capital invested in manufacturing pursuits is less than $1,200,000 a year, being not much more than one third of the sum similarly invested ten years earlier. I would like to know whether the hon. Minister of Finance thinks the House ought to accept the statistical information which he has given us? I would like to know whether he is of opinion that the manufacturing establishments of Canada are producing goods to the value of but $824 annually? Whether he thinks when he is shown that it takes nearly three men in Hamilton to produce as much as one man in Buffalo, he has proved the success of this policy? Whether he thinks that industry has been diverted into those channels where the largest measure of value is obtained by the smallest expenditure of capital and labor? I would like to know whether he does not think the information which he has undertaken to convey to the House is not wholly trustworthy? It has been conclusively shown here that the attempt to give the manufacturers strength and vigor by a system of protection has wholly failed. The hon. President of the Council has undertaken to show that in those States of the American Union where manufactures are established the farmer receives a larger return from his land, and he gave us the relative number of agriculturists and those engaged in other pursuits. In the State of Illinois, the number of agriculturists he says is 80 per cent.; of persons employed in manufacture, 20 per cent.; value of agricultural products, $12.47 per acre; Indiana: agriculturists, 84 per cent.; others, 16 per cent.; products, $12.47 per acre; Kansas: agriculturists, 81 per cent.; others, 19 per cent.; products, $9.11 per acre; Connecticut: agriculturists, 65 per cent.; others, 35 per cent.; products, $16.82 per acre; Delaware: agriculturists, 74 per cent.; others, 26 per cent.; products, $15.00 per acre; Maine: agriculturists, 75 per cent.; others, 25 per cent.; products, $13.51 per acre; Massachusetts: agriculturists, 55 per cent.; others, 45 per cent.; products, $26.71 per acre; New Jersey: agriculturists, 66 per cent.; others, 34 per cent.; products, $18.00 per acre; Pennsylvania: agriculturists, 70 per cent.; others, 30 per cent.; products, $17.68 per acre; Rhode Island: agriculturists, 56 per cent.; others, 44 per cent.; products, $29.32. Now, I may say, that the statistics of the hon. gentleman are wholly inaccurate, and if they were accurate they would be utterly valueless for the purpose for which he has used them. The hon. gentleman has left out of sight altogether the difference in the density of population, and he has also omitted the difference in value, depending upon the cost of transportation. Almost every kind of farm product has a higher value in Massachusetts than in Kansas, just as it has a higher value in Halifax than in London or Hamilton. Oats are worth more in Prince Edward Island than in Ontario, not because Prince Edward Island is a manufacturing Province and Ontario is not, but because it is nearer the market where the surplus oats are sent for consumption. But I find from the Census of the United States of 1870, the last which are available for this purpose, that the figures of the hon. gentleman are all wrong. I find that Massachusetts has but 73,000 of her population engaged in agriculture and she has 507,000 engaged in other pursuits. I find that Illinois had 375,000 engaged in agriculture, and 367,000 engaged in other pursuits. I find too, that the value per acre of farm products is not at all what the hon. gentleman represented it to be. I find that the value of farm products per acre was, in Illinois, $10.93; in Indiana, $12.20; Kansas, $14.21; Connecticut, $16.56; Delaware, $11.42; Maine, 11.33; Massachusetts, $11.03; New Jersey, $22.10; Pennsylvania, $15.90; and in Rhode Island, $17.38. I find that the number of acres of cultivated land has, in Connecticut, diminished during the decade between 1860 and 1870, 184,000 acres; in Massachusetts, 1860 and 1870, 88,000 acres, and in Rhode Island, 1860 and 1870, 46,000 acres. I find that the value of farm lands in the New England States has fallen, and that none of those results, which are so frequently pictured in glowing terms, as the consequence of extensive manufactures, have there been realized. The hon. gentleman has referred to the shipping interests of Canada and of the United States, and he has endeavored to show that the shipping interests of Canada are in a satisfactory condition. The testimony against him on this point is unanimous. We have had a great many attempts made to explain the decline of American shipping. We were told for some time that it was due to the piratical enterprises of the Alabama and her consorts. But, after all such piratical raids had come to an end, the decline continued; and when it was no longer possible to assign such a cause it was then attributed to iron ship-building. But Canada built wooden ships, Norway built wooden ships, Italy built wooden ships, and the tonnage of all these countries continued to increase. Their commercial marine prospered in spite of the iron ship building of the United Kingdom. No sooner, however, is a highly protective Tariff adopted here than our ship building begins to decline, and our tonnage is diminished, and hon. gentleman opposite import from Washington a reason just as they imported from Washington a tariff. Do they suppose that the House or the country will believe them? Do they suppose they can make the people believe that iron ship building, which did us no harm down to March, 1879, has suddenly become injurious since that period? How is it that iron ship building in England wrought such havoc with ship building in the United States at least ten years before it did any mischief here? How is it that we did not suffer from it sooner? How is it that neither Norway nor Italy suffer from it now? Do hon. gentlemen suppose they can persuade the people of this country to accept their reasons which they assign for the decline of a most important industry, as well as for the decline of our commercial marine which has hitherto been the pride of Canada? The hon. President of the Council has undertaken to explain the smallness of American manufactured exports, by saying that the United Kingdom is a very small country and the United States is a very large one; and that the only fair way to make a comparison is to mark out the size of England in the north-east part of the United States and to count all that is consumed elsewhere, exports. This, indeed, is almost a novel style of argument, I remember only one proposition like it. Curran, on one occasion, was engaged in a duel with a gigantic member of the Irish Bar, who complained that he was not fighting on terms of equality. He said Curran was a very small man and was much more difficult to hit than he. "We will chalk out" said Curran, "a figure of my size on you and all shots outside of that shall not be counted." If the United States have a larger territory they have also a very much larger population, and the 16,000,000 of excess in population are carrying on domestic manufactures for themselves, as well as the 36,000,000 which the hon. gentleman is willing to count. The business of manufacturing cotton is of very modern growth. It began in England and the United States about the same period of time. The United States had the advantage in a domestic supply of the raw material. For a time England had cheaper capital. At this moment there are 40,000,000 of spindles in England and about 9,600,000 in the United States. The United States are not supplying their own population. England is supplying nearly 300,000,000 of people outside the United Kingdom. In England there are 468,000 hands employed in the manufacture of cotton, or nearly ninety spindles to each hand. Now, when I look at the returns which have been submitted to this House, I am forced to the conclusion that they are either very inefficient or the information which has been given is calculated to mislead rather than to inform us of the actual state of things. The hon. Finance Minister has brought down a return which shows that since 1879 four new cotton factories have been established in the country, one at Brantford, employing 120 hands. One at Hamilton employing 125 hands, one at Coaticook employing 230 hands, and one at
