SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform this House that when the House attended His Excellency the Governor-General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament, and, to prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of the Speech, which is as follows :—

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The hope I expressed at the close of the last Session, that on the re-assembling of Parliament we should be able to congratulate ourselves on a season of peace and prosperity has been fully realized.

Canada has been favored with a year of great prosperity.

Her farmers have enjoyed a plentiful harvest and remunerative prices.

Her manufacturing and other industries have been and continue to be developed under favorable auspices.

Her trade and commerce have been steadily increasing, and peace and order prevail within her borders.

For these various blessings we cannot be sufficiently thankful to the Giver of all good things.

The Chief Magistrate of the United States has been cut off by the hand of an assassin, and it is fitting that the sorrow of our people for a loss which was not that of our friends and neighbors alone, should be here adverted to as another instance of the sympathy which unites in brotherhood the British Empire and the American Republic.

During the recess I had the pleasure of visiting the Province of Manitoba, and of traversing the extensive prairies of the North-West, and from personal examination can sincerely congratulate Canada on the possession of so magnificent and fertile a region, to be inhabited, I trust, in the course of years, by millions of thriving and contented subjects of Her Majesty.

The immigrants have not confined themselves to Manitoba or its vicinity, but are scattered over the country westward to the base of the Rocky Mountains, and from the international boundary to the banks of the Northern Saskatchewan. It is, therefore, thought that the time has come for the division of the Territories into four or more Provisional Districts with an appropriate nomenclature. This subject will be submitted for your consideration.

During my journey I was met by numerous Indian tribes, all expressing confidence in the continuance of the traditional policy of kindness and justice which has hitherto governed the relations between the Government and the Aborigines.

I regret, however, to say that the necessity of supplementing the food supply to the Indians still exists, and is likely to continue for some years.

Every exertion has been made to settle the Indian Bands on Reserves, and to induce them to betake themselves to the raising of cattle and cultivating the soil.

These efforts have met with a fair measure of success, but we can only expect by a long continuance of patient firmness to induce these children of the Prairie and the Forest to abandon their nomadic habits, become self-supporting, and ultimately add to the industrial wealth of the country.

The influx of a white population has greatly increased the danger of a collision between the settler and Red man, and in my opinion renders an augmentation of the Mounted Police a matter of urgency. Your sanction to this increase will be sought.

The second report of the Commission appointed to investigate the existing system of the Civil Service will be laid before you, and a measure on the subject submitted for your consideration.

The decennial Census having been taken last year, the duty of reconsidering and readjusting the representation in the House of Commons is imposed upon you. A measure for the purpose will be laid before you.

Several other measures of importance will be submitted to you. Among them will be Bills for the winding up of Insolvent Banks, Insurance Companies and Trading Corporations; for the consolidation and amendment of the Laws respecting the Dominion Lands; for the amendment of the Acts relating to the Supreme Court of Canada, and Bills relating to the tenure of office of the Judges of County Courts, and to Fugitive Offenders within the Empire; and your attention will be called to the present anomalous position of the Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction.

The work of construction on that portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway between Prince Arthur's Landing and Winnipeg is being pressed to completion, and it is confidently expected that in July next, railway communication will be established between those places. The section between Rat Portage and Winnipeg, one hundred and thirty-five miles in length, has been completed and transferred under the terms of the contract, to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, by whom it is now operated. Considerable progress has been made on the Eastern Section, commencing at Callander Station, and the vigorous prosecution of the work on that portion of the line during the present year provided for.

In British Columbia the work upon the section between Savona's Ferry and Emory's Bar is being carried on with every prospect of its completion within the time specified in the contract, and the line from the latter place to Port Moody, which has been carefully located during the past season, is now being placed under contract with a view to its completion at the same date as the section from Savona's Ferry to Emory's Bar.

Upon the sections to be constructed by the Railway Company, the work has been most energetically carried forward. During the past summer the road has been graded for the distance of two hundred and eighteen miles, and of this one hundred and sixty-one miles are open for traffic.

The Company have, in addition, graded eighty-nine miles of branch lines.

I am pleased to be able to state that the traffic on the Intercolonial Railway has largely increased, and that this line was during the last fiscal year, for the first time in its history, worked without loss to the country.

The works on the Welland Canal were so far advanced that the waters of Lake Erie were introduced for its supply in June last, and in September the new portion of the Canal between Allanburg and Port Dalhousie was opened for traffic.

You will be pleased to know that a monthly line of steamers, which has been subsidized under the authority of Parliament, is now plying between the Dominion and Brazil with good hopes of a mutually profitable trade.

The Report of a Royal Commission issued to inquire into the question of factory labor, and into the best means of promoting the comfort and well-being of the workingman and his family, without undue interference with the development of our manufacturing industries, will be laid before you, and I invite your earnest consideration of this report.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

The Accounts of the last year will be laid before you. It will be satisfactory to you to find that the Expenditure has been less and the Revenue considerably more than the Estimates of last year, leaving a surplus of over four millions of dollars. A portion of this sum has been used in the reduction of the public debt by the redemption of matured debentures bearing six per cent. interest, and the remainder applied to the payment of public works chargeable to capital account. The necessity of issuing the Debenture Loan authorized by Parliament for those purposes has therefore been obviated.

The Estimates of the ensuing year will also be submitted, and will, I trust, be found to have been framed with due regard to economy and the efficiency of the public service.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I now invite your attention to the several subjects mentioned and to the general business which will come before you, with full confidence in your ability and patriotic desire to forward the best interests of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved :

" That Select Standing Committees of the House for the present Session be appointed for the following purposes :—1. On Privileges and Elections. 2. On Expiring Laws. 3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph lines. 4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills. 5. On Standing Orders. 6. On Printing. 7. On Public Accounts. 8. On Banking and Commerce. 9. Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House the Report of the Librarian on the state of the Library of Parliament.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and (at 3:45 o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 10th February, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MEMBERS INTRODUCED.

The following Members, having previously taken the Oath according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took their seats in the House, viz. :—

DAVID IRVINE, Member for the Electoral District of Carleton, N.B., introduced by Mr. Blake and Mr. Burpee (Sunbury).

Hon. J. J. C. ABBOTT, Member for the Electoral District of Argenteuil, introduced by Sir John A Macdonald and Mr. Pope (Compton).

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. BERGERON. Mr. Speaker, I feel that, in rising to move the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne, I am not altogether in the same position as those members who have preceded me in former days in the fulfilment of this honorable duty. It is the custom to require that these speeches be made by recently elected members, who never fail to claim all possible indulgence from their colleagues who do not know them. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to say that I am not in need of the same indulgence, for no one understands better than I do at the present time my unfitness to worthily accomplish the duty that has devolved upon me: On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am glad to find myself once more in the midst of old friends, whom I have learnt to esteem from the time that I took my seat amidst them. I claim their friendship and trust that they will not be too exacting, should I fail in being as eloquent as one should be who is entrusted to move the Address. I would have feared, Mr. Speaker, to assume the responsibility which now weighs on me, had I not remembered the electors whom I have the honor of representing, and who have the right to expect from me all that may be expected of a representative who wishes to fulfil his duties conscientiously. The honor attached to the position which I occupy is fully theirs, for I will never forget that it was they who elected me when I was still but a very young man, entrusting me with their most precious interests, and that, in spite of those who pretended that years enough had not passed over my head to allow of my serving my country in Parliament. When I was asked to move this Address, Mr. Speaker, a thought occurred to me, and a similar one must have arisen in your mind, as well as in the minds of hon. members who are listening to me, to wit: that the policy of the Government must be a good one when the Government can entrust it to such weak hands as mine, and that its measures must be excellent for it to ask lips possessing so little eloquence as mine to move its adoption by this honorable House. For assuredly, Mr. Speaker, if we look back for a few years, and if we draw a comparison between the present and the then condition of the country, we find that the Government which rules to-day has well deserved of the country. As stated in the Speech delivered by His Excellency, the country is enjoying peace and prosperity; our farmers have been blessed with abundant crops, which they have sold at good prices; and manufactories, which had been closed, have re-opened and are in full working order, whilst new ventures are being made every day. Thousands of workingmen, who were starving four years ago, are now earning a good living for themselves and their families. Capitalists no longer fear to put their money into all kinds of commercial operations, confident as they are in the policy of the day and in the future which encourages them. As His Excellency has so aptly said, we cannot sufficiently thank Providence for all its gifts, nor must we forget to thank it for having granted us so good a Government to preside over the destinies of our country; for, Mr. Speaker, whereas the Canadian nation seems to enjoy an era of unprecedented prosperity, and that happiness hovers over us, we have regretfully to note the fact that the neighboring Republic, albeit enjoying much prosperity, has witnessed during the past year an abominable crime against republican institutions. A man who presided over the destinies of the United States, and who had been elected to that position by the free vote of a nation, was foully murdered by another, who has just been deservedly convicted by a jury of his countrymen, and who will, in a few months, expiate his crime by hanging. Americans have not been the only ones to deplore Guitau's act, but protests have been heard from all parts of the world, and sympathy has been expressed from every quarter. His Excellency, who takes a great interest in the destinies of this country, has, during recess, visited our great North-West. His report thereon is most encouraging, and proves the wisdom of the policy of the men who have governed Canada since Confederation. The Canadian people, Mr. Speaker, are not ignorant of the sacrifices which have been made, for several years past, in order to open those immense northern regions, which, as said by His Excellency, are so splendid in their fertility. The distinguished men who said that the future of our country was there, are about to see their predictions realized far beyond what they had expected. Those immense tracts of land, which could drain all Europe's population, are now known to the whole world. Our North-West is making rapid progress, under the able and energetic direction of those who are now at the head of public affairs. Towns and villages are springing up where but a few years ago stood the bare prairie; and the territories are being filled up so rapidly that, as mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, it would become necessary to divide them and designate them by names which will better express their situation. This, Mr. Speaker, resulted naturally from the National Policy inaugurated by the Government; and I remember when the discussion on the Tariff took place, that eminent members of this House predicted that the North-West would be the necessary and natural outlet for the industrial products of the older

Provinces. Civilization has driven back the Indian tribes, and the whites are filling the places of their dusky brethren; but the Indians seem to understand the course of events, and expressed to His Excellency, during his trip, their confidence in the Canadian Government. We might, perhaps, enquire why we must still feed these savages in a country which enjoys the reputation of being so rich. We must not overlook the fact, Mr. Speaker, that these sons of the woods, who scarcely know of any other means of subsistence but the chase, will have some difficulty in adopting our mode of life, and we can trace their instincts through what has taken place during the few past years. When the buffalo had almost disappeared, they commenced to cultivate the soil on a small scale, like the white people; but last year, having learnt that the buffalo had made his appearance on our side of the line, they immediately gave up their crops and fields to return to their favorite pastime. This explains the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, wherein it is said that food will have to be provided for them for some years to come. The Indians, not having harvested their crops, and the yield of the chase having been insufficient, it is necessary now, and will be for some time in the future, to provide food for them. The Government has done everything in its power to teach these savages to cultivate the soil, so that they might support themselves; but there is not a member of this House, nor is there any one in the country, who is ignorant of the fact that it will take long years to civilize the 30,000 savages who still inhabit our northern possessions. It has also become necessary to propose an increase in the number of the Mounted Police. An explanation is necessary, Mr. Speaker, as to the reason which has prompted the Government to incur this increase of expenditure. The whites residing in the North-West, who have brought with them the horses and cattle required for agriculture, have, at times, seen the savages, when pressed by hunger, hunt their domestic animals for the sake of food, in lieu of the buffalo and other wild animals which they were in the habit of hunting. Under these circumstances, the whites have sometimes taken the law into their own hands, and the result might be a general uprising of the Indians. It is in order to avoid such conflicts that the Government has seen fit to propose an increase of the little army of the North-West. I notice with pleasure, Mr. Speaker, and I am certain that the whole country will be glad to learn, that a measure will be submitted to the consideration of this House for the reorganization of the Civil Service. I do not know what the measure will be, but I feel certain that the Government is actuated by the best intentions in presenting it. I will not say that patronage is a great advantage for Ministers or Members of Parliament, nor, on the other hand, would I ask that all patronage should be taken from the hands of those who were responsible to the people, to place it in entirely irresponsible hands; but I believe that a system compelling candidates for the Civil Service to pass an examination, which would prove them reliable employes, would be a great advantage and would meet with the approval of the public. The Census taken last year shows a considerable increase of the population during the past decade. It is unnecessary to say that this increase means wealth for the country, for that would be a truism. We are, moreover, in hopes of seeing our population increased still more in the next decade, owing to the fostering care of the National Policy. The need had begun to be felt of a measure concerning the liquidation of insolvent banking, insurance and commercial companies. The Government has met this demand in the Speech addressed to us yesterday, and I feel sure that, during the present Session, measures of a nature to satisfy the commercial community will be passed. There will be a codification and amendment of certain laws relating to the Dominion Lands, necessitated by the extensive operations which have taken place in lands in the North-West during the last two years. The Government has also been true to its promises to the members of the Province of Quebec anent the Supreme Court. We justly complain that to us the Supreme Court is not such as we were justified in expecting it would be. There are, as you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, but two judges sitting in that court who are perfectly familiar with our civil laws, and when one unfortunate litigant from the Province of Quebec, after having gone through all the courts of the Province, comes before the Supreme Court, he sometimes loses his case when he has in his favor a greater number of judges thoroughly acquainted with our civil laws than are sitting in the Supreme Court. I feel certain that the Government, mindful of its promise, will amend the Acts having reference to that court, in such a manner as to redress existing grievances. It is impossible, Mr. Speaker, to notice the rapid progress made in the North-West without speaking of the great iron road, which more than any other cause has contributed to its development. Who is there who does not remember the anxious times through which the country has passed in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway? And when, last winter, a measure was brought before this House to place the construction of that road in the hands of a company, people understood then, and we have the proof thereof to-day, that we were right in stating it would be a gain to the country, and that it was taking a heavy load off the shoulders of the Government. The sincerity of the Syndicate has been demonstrated during the past year by the immense amount of work done on the line; and we can announce in this House, to-day, in presence of the representatives of the people, and to the country which gathers our words through the columns of the press, that by next July we shall have a direct line of railroad between Quebec and Sarnia or Collingwood on Lake Superior; travelling thence, by steamer, to Thunder Bay, and from there, by rail, to Winnipeg, with the usual rapidity of transit. The Syndicate has graded 161 miles west of Winnipeg during the year; and it is proposed to build 500 miles more next season. It should be remembered that work is also being done from Callander Station, on the east end of the line; not only has the Syndicate fulfilled its contract, but it is endeavoring to construct the road as rapidly as possible in advance of it; it is its interest, as well as that of the country, to accomplish this. In 1881, i.e., for the year just run out, they have graded and built 218 miles of road on the main line, and 89 miles on the branches, which are now in a condition to receive rails. No one could suppose that so much could be accomplished in such a difficult country. In British Columbia, in spite of numerous difficulties, the Government feels certain that the work will be completed within the prescribed time of ten years. Moreover, to assist colonization and encourage immigration to these far-off lands, the Government has assumed the responsibility not only of proceeding with the construction of the 127 miles which it had entered into the obligations of constructing between Savona's Ferry and Emory Bar, but had decided to construct also the 89 miles of road from the latter place to Port Moody, on the shores of the Pacific, which work it is not compelled to carry out at present. Basing their opinion on past operations, the Syndicate state that the whole Pacific road will be constructed in five or six years instead of in the ten years which had been expected to elapse, and in this short space of time we will be able to start from the Atlantic Ocean and cross on British soil to the Pacific shore. If, Mr. Speaker, one wishes to have an idea of the immense amount of work carried out on that line, one has but to remember that 218 miles were constructed previous to 1878, and that since then 653 miles have been built, or an increase of 435 miles. It will not be a difficult thing for the people to believe in the ultimate success of the Pacific Railway, when they have before them that of the Intercolonial Railway. It is not so long ago that speakers declared, both in this House and from the hustings, that this road would never pay the cost of the axle-grease it would use. During a certain time it cost the country a half a million of dollars to keep it in working order; but to day, Mr. Speaker, there has ceased to be a deficit, and the Intercolonial Railway is more than paying its running expenses. We could not wish anything better; as a matter of fact, the road does not cost the country anything to keep it in working order, whilst it renders a great service by the extent of its traffic through the fertile lands which it crosses. Its construction is certainly an honor to the Canadian Government. The following statement will show the increase of freight on the Intercolonial Railway:—

AMOUNT OF FREIGHT CARRIED.

In 1878-79.....	510,861 tons.
“ 1880-81.....	725,577 “
Surplus.....	214,716 “

This is an increase of 42 per cent., which is equivalent to a surplus of 21,472 car loads transported during 1880-81 over the number transported in 1878-79. The monthly service between Canada and Brazil is another consequence of our National Policy. This, Mr. Speaker, must be gratifying to those who have elected members supporting this policy in the House, and it is unnecessary to ask electors their opinion on this point, as they have plainly signified it in almost all the isolated elections which have taken place since that policy had been in vogue; and we may even foresee and predict that if that policy is continued, Canada will in time have commercial relations with every country in the world. The Royal Commission appointed to enquire into the treatment of operatives in manufactories, and to discover the best means to insure comfort to the workingman and his family, has made its report, and I see that the Government will submit to the House certain measures which, while not interfering with manufacturing interests, will in a special manner protect young girls and children working in factories. This subject is not a new one, Mr. Speaker. I remember that the hon. member for Cornwall has already proposed such a measure. I feel certain that this measure will meet with the approval of the House, for manufacturing interests are not to be encouraged at the expense of the public health, or at that of young people. One should not compel children to work in factories for such long hours as to preclude their acquiring the instruction they will need hereafter. In the United States there is a law preventing children under fourteen years of age from working in factories. I do not know if the same provision will be adopted here, but at any rate I have no doubt that the Government has mastered the subject and that the measure which it is to bring down will meet the necessities of the case. The country will be pleased to learn that the era of deficits has passed, and that last year's revenue has considerably surpassed the expenditure last year by over $4,000,000. With a portion of this sum the Minister of Finance has paid debentures which were due and on which we were paying six per cent. interest; and with the other part he has paid the cost of certain public works which would have had to have been paid out of the capital fund, or which is almost the same thing, the Government has not been obliged to borrow, as authorized to do so by Parliament. His Excellency hopes that these various subjects will be discussed with that degree of patriotism which he has the right to expect from this House. I am too young, Mr. Speaker, to speak of the past with a personal knowledge of the facts, but members of this House, who remember what this country was previous to Confederation, and who have since that time seen it advance with giant strides towards prosperity, must be proud to see the immense progress we have made. A distinguished man has said that we were a people chosen by Providence, and truly we are not quite 5,000,000 of people, but we inhabit a country capable of receiving hundreds of millions. Our public works are of such magnitude as to astonish foreigners. We live in peace, we speak nearly all the languages in the world, we adore the same God in many different modes, and we are going onwards, feeling both proud and secure in our future. The National Policy, which has had the approval of three-fourths of the Canadian people at the General Election of 1878, which has been endorsed by an overwhelming majority of this House, as well as in nearly all the isolated elections which have taken place, has not only given work and bread to our workingmen, enabled our farmers to sell their produce, given energy to our internal and external commerce, but it will also have the effect of bringing back in our midst our compatriots who have left for a foreign land during the times of depression and crisis, to earn that daily bread which their country could not give them; a large number are in exile, but they love their country and always speak of it with love. They will return; for one day, the Almighty moved by our fears and satisfied with seeing us taking steps to secure that result, will know how to bring back sons to their mothers, and citizens to their country. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I have much pleasure in moving the following Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne:—

1. That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to thank His Excellency for his gracious Speech at the opening of the present Session, and further to assure His Excellency, —that we feel with His Excellency that the hope he expressed at the close of the last Session, that on the re-assembling of Parliament we should be able to congratulate ourselves on a season of peace and prosperity has been fully realized:

2. That Canada has been favored with a year of great prosperity:

3. That her farmers have enjoyed a plentiful harvest and remunerative prices:

4. That her manufacturing and other industries have been and continue to be developed under favorable auspices:

5. That her trade and commerce have been steadily increasing, and peace and order prevail within her borders:

6. And that for these various blessings we cannot be sufficiently thankful to the Giver of all good things.

7. That the Chief Magistrate of the United States having been cut off by the hand of an assassin, we feel that it is fitting that the sorrow of our people for a loss which was not that of our friends and neighbors alone, should be adverted to by His Excellency as another instance of the sympathy which unites in brotherhood the British Empire and the American Republic.

8. That we learn with great satisfaction that during the recess His Excellency had the pleasure of visiting the Province of Manitoba, and of traversing the extensive prairies of the North-West, and is able, from personal examination, sincerely to congratulate Canada on the possession of so magnificent and fertile a region, to be inhabited, we trust, in the course of years, by millions of thriving and contented subjects of Her Majesty.

9. That we recognize the fact that the immigrants have not confined themselves to Manitoba or its vicinity, but are scattered over the country westward to the base of the Rocky Mountains, and from the international boundary to the banks of the northern Saskatchewan; that we agree with His Excellency in thinking that the time has come for the division of the Territories into four or more Provisional Districts with an appropriate nomenclature, and that this subject, when submitted to us by His Excellency, will receive our attentive consideration.

10. That we are pleased to learn from His Excellency that during his journey he was met by numerous Indian tribes, all expressing confidence in the continuance of the traditional policy of kindness and justice which has hitherto governed the relations between the Government and the Aborigines, while we share His Excellency's regret that the necessity of supplementing the food supply of the Indians still exists and is likely to continue for some years.

11. That we are happy to know that every exertion has been made to settle the Indian Bands on Reserves, and to induce them to betake themselves to the raising of cattle and cultivating the soil, and that these efforts have met with a fair measure of success; but we are aware that we can only expect by a long continuance of patient firmness to induce these children of the Prairie and the Forest to abandon their nomadic habits, and become self-supporting, and ultimately add to the industrial wealth of the country, and that the influx of a white population has greatly increased the danger of collision between the settler and Red man; that we observe that His Excellency is of opinion that an augmentation of the Mounted Police has been rendered a matter of urgency, and that our attention shall be given to the sanction of such increase as His Excellency may think it necessary to seek.

12. That we learn with satisfaction that the second Report of the Commission appointed to investigate the existing system of the Civil Service will be laid before us; and that any measure on the subject submitted to us shall receive our willing consideration.

13. That we are aware that the decennial Census having been taken last year, the duty of reconsidering and readjusting the representation in the House of Commons is imposed upon us, and we will carefully consider any measure for the purpose which may be laid before us.

14. That we learn with much interest that several other measures of importance will be submitted to us, and that among them will be Bills for the winding-up of Insolvent Banks, Insurance Companies and Trading Corporations, for the consolidation and amendment of the Laws respecting the Dominion Lands, for the amendment of the Acts relating to the Supreme Court of Canada, and Bills relating to the tenure of office of the Judges of County Courts, and to Fugitive Offenders within the Empire; and that our attention will be called to the present anomalous position of the Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction; and that all these measures, when submitted, shall receive our best attention.

15. That we receive with much satisfaction the information which His Excellency has afforded us respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, and are glad to know,—

16. That the work of construction on that portion of the said railway between Prince Arthur's Landing and Winnipeg is being pressed to completion, and that it is confidently expected that in July next railway communication will be established between those places; that the section between Rat Portage and Winnipeg, one hundred and thirty-five miles in length, has been completed and transferred under the terms of the contract to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, by whom it is now operated; that considerable progress has been made on the Eastern Section, commencing at Callander Station, and that the vigorous prosecution of the work on that portion of the line during the present year has been provided for:

17. That in British Columbia the work upon the section between Savona's Ferry and Emory's Bar is being carried on, with every prospect of its completion within the time specified in the contract, and that the line from the latter place to Port Moody, which has been carefully located during the past season, is now being placed under contract with a view to its completion at the same date as the section from Savona's Ferry to Emory's Bar.

18. That upon the sections to be constructed by the Railway Company, the work has been most energetically carried forward. That during the past summer the road has been graded for the distance of two hundred and eighteen miles, and that of this, one hundred and sixty-one miles are completed and open for traffic.

19. And that the Company have, in addition, graded eighty-nine miles of branch lines.

20. That we share the pleasure expressed by His Excellency in being able to state that the traffic on the Intercolonial Railway has largely increased, and that this line was during the last fiscal year, for the first time in its history, worked without loss to the country.

21. That we are glad to learn that the works on the Welland Canal were so far advanced that the waters of Lake Erie were introduced for its supply in June last, and that in September the new portion of the Canal between Allanburg and Port Dalhousie was opened for traffic.

22. That we are pleased to know that a monthly line of steamers which has been subsidized under the authority of Parliament, is now plying between the Dominion and Brazil with good hopes of a mutually profitable trade.

23. That we shall read with great interest the Report of a Royal Commission issued to inquire into the question of factory labor, and into the best means of promoting the comfort and well being of the workman and his family, without undue interference with the development of our manufacturing industries, which His Excellency is pleased to say will be laid before us, and shall give it our most earnest consideration.

24. That we thank His Excellency for the assurance that the Accounts of the last year will be laid before us: That it will be satisfactory to us to find that the Expenditure has been less and the Revenue considerably more than the Estimates of last year, leaving a surplus of over four millions of dollars: and that we thank His Excellency for informing us that a portion of this sum has been used in the reduction of the public debt by the redemption of matured debentures bearing six per cent. interest, and the remainder applied to the payment for public works chargeable to capital account; and that the necessity of issuing the Debenture Loan authorized by Parliament for those purposes has therefore been obviated.

25. That we shall respectfully consider the Estimates for the ensuing year which will also be submitted, and which will, we trust, be found to have been framed with due regard to economy and the efficiency of the public service.

26. That His Excellency may rest assured that we shall give our best attention to the several subjects mentioned by him, and to the general business which will come before us, and that we thank His Excellency for the expression of his full confidence in our patriotic desire and our ability to forward the best interests of the country.

Mr. BERGERON.

Mr. GUILLET. Mr. Speaker, I crave the indulgence and sympathy of the House, as a young member quite inexperienced in parliamentary affairs, in discharging the important duty of seconding the Resolution in reply to His Excellency's Speech from the Throne. Before proceeding to the consideration of the Resolution so ably moved by the hon. member for Beauharnois, I desire to express my sense of the general pleasure and satisfaction that His Excellency has safely encountered the perils and discomfort of a winter voyage across the Atlantic, and resumed the most exalted functions of the government of the Dominion which he has heretofore discharged with such distinguished ability and success. It is a matter of deep regret to the House and country that the impaired health of Her Royal Highness the Princess Louise still detains her from the social circles of our governmental life which she has so brilliantly adorned. That she may soon recover her wonted health is the earnest aspiration of every patriotic heart. I am sure I may say, Mr. Speaker, that we unitedly rejoice with His Excellency that the hopes expressed at the close of last Session have been so fully realized, and join with him in acknowledging our obligations of gratitude to the Almighty for vouchsafing to this great Dominion the manifold mercies and blessings which have so abundantly crowned the past year. He has, indeed, "given us all things richly to enjoy." His kind Providence has smiled upon the labors of the husbandman. He has filled their barns with plenty and their hearts with gladness, and has blessed with prosperity and increase all the varied industries and interests of our country. We have peace in all our borders, and order, harmony and contentment among all classes of our citizens. We have been spared the visitation of pest and plague, "the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noon-day." We, indeed, cannot be sufficiently thankful to the bountiful Giver of all good. I am sure the House and country will sincerely reiterate the appropriate expressions of sympathy with the people of the United States in the assassination of President Garfield. His was a character conspicuous for its Christian virtues and exalted patriotism. The extended tour made by His Excellency through the North-West, attended by much privation, fatigue and danger, has added to the many obligations we are under to His Excellency, for the warm personal interest he exhibits in our Canadian institutions and enterprises, and for the constancy and devotion he manifests within and beyond his large and elevated sphere of duty in promoting the welfare of our country and advocating her interests and claims. His visit to the North-West has been the means of publishing far and wide its great resources and superior advantages for settlement. He has proved, if I may take the liberty of using the term, an immigration agent of inestimable value. There is one feature of this subject which, to many like myself, is of a more sympathetic and amiable nature: that is the effort put forth by His Excellency, when at home, to induce marriageable young women to emigrate to Canada. On behalf of those of our countrymen who are deprived of domestic comfort and happiness, owing to the scarcity of that element in our population, I return grateful thanks. Doubtless, in the near future, in many happy homes the children will rise up and call him blessed. Referring to the subject of immigration, it is worthy of notice that there is now no outcry from the people against immigration efforts and expenditure. For two or three years previous to the adoption of the National Policy many amongst the people felt aggrieved that the revenues of the country should be appropriated to add to the number of those who were seeking in vain for employment, and intensifying the difficulties and privations of those partially employed. The formation of the Territories into four provisional districts will greatly facilitate the arrangements for the settlement of the North-West, promote the good government of the scattered settlements, afford precision and despatch to postal communication, and lay the foundation of four new provinces, a new constellation in our Dominion firmament. It is an assurance of the utmost importance, which His Excellency's intercourse with the Indian tribes of the North-West enables him to express, that they maintain an undiminished confidence in the kindness, justice and good faith which has always characterized British policy and British administration of Indian affairs. That they are suffering from an inadequate supply of food is a matter of deep regret, and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the House will cheerfully support the Government in any measures of relief, already undertaken or to be submitted for the consideration of Parliament. They cannot be allowed to starve, for the experience of the United States proves that it is far cheaper, apart from all humane considerations, to feed them, than adopt the only alternative and fight them, in consequence of depredations they would be driven in their extremity to commit on the settler. The House and country may well rejoice to learn that the present Administration have met with a fair measure of success in their policy of domesticating and civilizing the Indian by teaching him all the useful arts of social life. The effort being made to teach the Indians to cultivate the soil, and thus provide their own food and become self dependent—at the same time that they are taught all the mechanical arts which are connected with agriculture—will have the effect of not only relieving the exchequer, but will in the end, it is to be hoped, increase our productive classes and thus add to the wealth of the State. Moreover, the fact of occupation being given to these numerous tribes in the cultivation of the soil and in pastoral pursuits will check their migratory habits and warlike instincts, and tend to make them peaceful and useful citizens, and render them more susceptible to the christianizing influences of the missionary. The country will thus be relieved of possible enemies, and the settler afforded security and peace, and the great duty accomplished of improving the condition of these simple hearted and justice-loving red men of the forest and the great interests of settlement promoted. This policy is a new departure by the right hon. the Minister of the Interior from that pursued in the older Provinces, where the Indians have been allowed to pursue their own inclinations and to assume a position dependent upon the Government rather than on their own exertions. The following statistics show the progress made at the Farming Agencies among the Indians:—

No. of Acres under crop, 1880	1,815
“ “ “ “ 1881	3,491
“ “ fenced “	4,716
Hay cut “	2,873 Tons
Wheat produced “	4,471 Bush.
Oats “	4,377 “
Barley “	8,898 “
Potatoes “	18,631 “
Turnips “	19,775 “

There has been erected 600 dwellings of various kinds, besides barns, stables, root houses, &c., &c. The rapidly extending settlements have rendered necessary the strengthening of the force of Mounted Police. That it has been promptly done gives us additional proof of the prudence and vigilance of the Government. This force has rendered valuable service generally in promoting law and order in the out-posts of our advance into the new territories, and especially in the suppression of the liquor traffic. Prior to the establishment of this force there was no observance of the law prohibiting the introduction of intoxicants into the Territories. Had this continued, the result must have been the utter demoralization of many of the Indian tribes, and doubtless a costly Indian war. The several references in the Speech from the Throne to the rapid and extensive progress made in the construction of the Pacific Railway, will prove a most gratifying announcement to the country, as it has been to the House. The rapid prosecution of the work on all sections, the astonishing vigor and enterprise displayed, and the undoubted liberality of the Syndicate in its land arrangements, have challenged the admiration of the country and also of observant minds among our neighbors. On this subject the New York Times says:

“The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have had the wisdom to see that their royal road to success lies in the cultivation of their land rather than in any attempt to dispose of their land grant at a high price, and they are consequently selling arable land, worth, according to experts, from $5 to $10 per acre, as wheat lands, at $2.50 per acre, with a rebate of one-half the purchase money for all land brought into cultivation and settled upon within four years. This judicious policy is already bearing fruit by attracting from Ontario and from some of our Western States, as well as from Europe, a class of farmers, the produce of whose labor will afford an ample transit business for the great Canadian line.”

The important announcement which they have recently authorized, that they hope to complete the entire line in five years, is in a fair prospect of realization. How marvellous the change, Mr. Speaker, in the position and views of the country in relation to the Pacific Railway since it was first mooted as one of the terms upon which British Columbia was admitted to the Confederation. What a transformation has come over the prospects of the railway and the great North-West. I recall the effect of the discussion. It created grave apprehensions in my own mind. The Government was denounced by the Opposition in the strongest terms for undertaking to build the railway, and especially for substituting a railway for a stage coach road. To show how far short they were from grasping the great possibilities, the great latent resources of the North-West and the great future before this grand Pacific Railway, I have culled a few extracts from the speeches made against the railway when the British Columbia terms were under discussion:

“It would involve the country in ruin.”

“The scheme was an insane project, and sane men could not seriously think of it.”

“A commercial absurdity.”

“It would involve the country in a vast expenditure from which it could derive no possible benefit.”

“With mercury descending sometimes in winter to 50 degrees below zero it was impossible a railway could have a paying winter traffic.”

“There being no population far west, capitalists had no inducements to enter upon the work.”

In spite of these efforts to dismay the Government they had the courage of their convictions—they had the faith and prescience of statesmen in this great project, and the result is that today it is almost within our grasp. It is to be completed in five years. It is gratifying to observe that the great work of the enlargement of the Welland Canal is so far advanced towards completion as to be available for traffic. It is a matter of great advantage to our commercial interests and carrying trade to enjoy so largely improved facilities for transporting the increasing volume of the cereal and other products of the Western States and our own rapidly-developing North West, which may now be conveyed in vessels of several times greater capacity than could pass through the old canal. This will cheapen transport, and give much greater volume, it is confidently believed, to our export trade. It is a most gratifying and important announcement that the Government have succeeded in establishing, under authority of Parliament, a monthly line of steamers with Brazil, and it is to be hoped a like success will follow the negotiations now pending with France and Spain, thus opening large additional foreign markets for our produce and manufactures. The House will, I am sure, peruse with great interest the report of the Royal Commission issued to enquire into the best means of promoting the comfort and well-being of our working classes and their families. Doubtless important legislation will grow out of these investigations and good work accomplished in the direction of ameliorating and improving the conditions of all, especially the more youthful workers. The important subjects of ventilation, of precautionary measures against the spread of infectious diseases, the establishment of fire escapes in large establishments, and the regulation of the hours of labor among minors, will, it is to be hoped, be considered in the proposed legislation. The second report of the Civil Service Commission will be looked for with interest. The proposed legislation will, I trust, promote the increased efficiency of the Civil Service of the country by adopting correct standards of qualification and providing for deserved promotion. By the expression correct standards of qualification I would not be misunderstood. A liberal education is not the only consideration, a due regard should be had to all moral qualities, to energy, activity, adaptability of temperament, and also to physical strength and vigor. I will not refer at length to the splendid evidence of the prosperity of the country in the magnificent surplus of over $4,000,000 of the last financial year, now for the first time officially announced in His Excellency's Address, and the further announcement that this handsome sum has been applied to the extent of $1,250,000, to the reduction of the public debt, and the balance to the prevention of the increase of the public debt, by being applied to payment for public works chargeable to capital account. The effect of this handsome exhibit must be to still further improve our financial credit, already so high in the money market of England that our securities stand second only to British consols. The Government have reason to take a just pride in the abundant evidences they are able to produce in proof of the success of their policy. The facts are innumerable and striking. I need only, for my purpose, refer to the development and flourishing condition of the industries in my own riding. There are parallel cases of progress and development in every section of the country, but in West Northumberland we find abundant testimony to the wisdom of the policy which the Government, with the approval of the people, has adopted. I find that since the introduction of the National Policy the proprietor of the Cobourg Car Works has increased his car shops, in buildings and machinery, to the extent of $45,000; that he has increased the number of his employes by 224; that the wages he pays has run up from $7,960 in 1878 to $89,950 in 1881; and that the average advance in wages has been twenty per cent. I find also that to the business now branches have been added, including the building of mail, express and baggage cars, and that the manufacture of railway car-springs is to be commenced in about a month. The output of these works in 1878 was $17,300, while in 1881 it ran up to $620,000. Take, then, the Cobourg Woollen Mills. Large additions are being made to them with a view to doubling their productions. The hands have already been increased from eighty-eight in 1878 to 110 in 1881, and the wages paid have increased from $1,250 in September, 1878 to $2,092 in December, 1881, while the production has gone up from $93,244 in the former year, to $125,080 in the latter. Besides this there is a new mill, the Norval Mill, which has been started during the last twelvemonth. It employs thirty hands, and the wages average $700 per month. The Cobourg Mat and Matting Works, which were closed during the depression, have been re-opened under the National Policy, and are doing a good business. At Grafton, the mill of Mr. Greenwood was nearly at a standstill during 1878, but in 1881 it received more orders than its proprietor could conveniently fill. Its output in 1878 was $5,000, and, in 1881, $12,000, and the men employed in it received higher wages than previously. The large increase in the industrial population of the country has greatly benefitted the home market for agricultural products of all kinds, and the consequent competition among buyers has contributed another element of improvement of demand and price. The employment of so large an amount of additional capital in producing goods formerly imported has increased the circulation of money, infused new life into every branch of trade, and increased the purchasing power of all classes. Thus the consumption of dutiable goods has increased and the revenues of the country largely augmented. If I may be allowed to indulge in a retrospective glance and look back to the Session of 1878, when the right hon. gentleman the leader of the Government—then the leader of the Opposition—proposed to Parliament those famous resolutions which heralded the National Policy, and consider the state of the country at that time, the wide-spread depression, the distressed industries, the increased and increasing number of bankruptcies, the scarcity of labor, the dearth of money, the timidity of capital, the alarming state of our finances, with large and yearly increasing deficits accruing, the prospect was indeed gloomy and discouraging. The Government of that day were appealed to upon every patriotic ground to change their fiscal policy. They were offered the aid and support of the Opposition in carrying out that policy. They refused. They were joined to their Free Trade idols, and the country was appealed to, and the people, by a vast majority, "let them alone." They rejected the policy, and the people rejected them. Mr. Speaker, the eventful day of the inauguration of the National Policy marked the commencement of a new epoch in our economic affairs. It gave a new inspiration of life and progress to our country. At once there was restored confidence, and soon the tide was turned. Our industries revived, our failing credit became re-established, the days of deficits were ended, and the days of surpluses restored on a grander scale than ever. All the good anticipated of the new policy has been realized; all the evils predicted of it have proved but phantoms in the minds of its opponents, and I can confidently assert that, from the time of its adoption until the present moment, there has not been manifested on the part of the propounders of this policy, or of the supporters of this policy, any weakening or holding back. They have been, and are, a unit for its maintenance in its integrity. Every assault upon it has been driven back, and it stands stronger to-day in the confidence and respect of the people of the Dominion than ever before. Is it not time, Mr. Speaker, that this conflict should cease? Defeated on so many fields where they have offered battle, why should its opponents persist in the useless slaughter? Why prolong the fruitless struggle? Why continue to oppose so obstinately the will of the people? The Opposition threw down the gauntlet of Free Trade in the campaign of 1878. For long months before and during the contest they appealed to the people against it, through the press and from the platform, with the prestige and patronage of power and position in the Dominion to help them. They appealed to the deliberate and enlightened judgment of a free people. The verdict was given in unmistakable terms, yet again and again have they appealed to the people as constituency after constituency has been opened, and in almost every case the people have reiterated their approval of, and confidence in, this wise and beneficent policy. Would it not, Mr. Speaker, well become those who boast so loudly of their respect for the voice of the people, those who profess to believe in and obey the authority and will of the people when expressed in a constitutional way, would it not well become our Reform friends who oppose this policy to cease to object to and obstruct the manifest will of the people. I appeal respectfully to these gentlemen in Opposition to abandon the hopeless strife. It will give them elevation of character and purpose in the estimation of the country, and will win them more friends than they can possibly win by the unpatriotic course they are now pursuing. In making this appeal I but re-echo the sentiments of many Independent Reformers, and of the more liberal and independent journals of the Reform party. I can well understand that hon.

gentlemen find themselves in a very embarrassing position in relation to a policy or a platform. Their political following is made up of such heterogeneous materials. The views and declarations of their policy have been so dissimilar and antagonistic. The hon. leader of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition in his public utterances has evidently been feeling about for a policy. Like the young lady whom Bliffens declared played the piano with a great deal of feeling,—after the keys, he has played on the country with a great deal of feeling,—after a policy. What does the hon. gentleman propose—of what does the Opposition platform consist? They have no fixed policy for the Dominion. There is a policy of contradictions, a policy of sectionalism and provincialism. Their appeal is to sections and classes in strangely inconsistent language. The part and every part in turn is to the Opposition greater than the whole. They build little narrow platforms in each Province and among different classes. Among Free Traders they take up the parable of Adam Smith, and to Protectionists they talk of protection to vested interests. They tell the farmers his wool is insufficiently protected, and in the next breath ridicule agricultural protection and declare it cannot affect prices or improve the home market. They appeal to the mechanic and laborer, the carter and cab-driver, with the cry that they are taxed by this policy on their flour, bacon, corn and oats. In the Maritime Provinces they denounce the duty on breadstuffs. In Ontario they assail the duty on coal. These specimen planks are surely not the material out of which to build a platform calculated to sustain the cause of union, to broaden the views and sympathies of the people, and elevate their hopes and aspirations. Surely, if they are unequal to the work of constructing such a platform upon which the Nova Scotian, the New Brunswicker, the Prince Edward Islander, the chivalrous French Canadian, the citizens of Ontario, of Manitoba, and of British Columbia can unite and work together with a common impulse of patriotism, then they cannot hope to be entrusted with the weighty task of upbuilding this wide extended Dominion to the grand proportions of its vast capabilities—of its glorious promise. I need scarcely ask, Mr. Speaker, what is the manifest duty of the Government towards this policy, which is now the policy, the property in fact of the people, rather than the Government. And I am confident the people will not readily or easily yield or abandon this possession. The duty of the Government is clear, and they are faithfully and honestly performing it. What would be the effect in the country could the Government be so infatuated as to break faith with the people and abandon this policy? Would not such a whirlwind of indignation arise as would compel the representatives of the people, elected to support the Government, to abandon it to its fate? And the hon. the leader of the Opposition would not be slow to denounce the folly and perfidy of the Government, and to trim his sail to the popular breeze. Mr. Speaker, it affords me great pleasure to second the Resolution before the House, and, in doing so, reiterate the sentiments in the closing paragraph, that His Excellency may rest assured that we shall give our best attention to the several subjects mentioned by him, and to the general business which will come before us, and that we thank His Excellency for the expression of his full confidence in our patriotic desire and our ability to forward the best interests of the country. Before resuming my seat, I desire, Mr. Speaker, to thank the House for its patient attention and kind indulgence shown to my remarks.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not my intention to interpose for more than a very brief space between the business of the House and the passage of this Address. It has become our practice, unless under very exceptional circumstances, to close the debate on the Address at the earliest possible moment, and, I think, a practice conducive to the public interest and the despatch of business; especially on an occasion like the present, when many of the topics which are alluded to in the Speech, and many other topics—which have been attracting the attention of the public during recess, and must attract the attention of Parliament—require, for a profitable discussion, the production of the public documents and other returns which we hope shortly to find on the Table. To anticipate these discussions now would be worse than useless. I do not intend, therefore, to pursue the course which has, to some extent, been pursued by one of the hon. gentlemen who has just spoken. I may be allowed to express my congratulations to the hon. gentlemen who have moved and seconded the Address for the manner in which they have discharged that portion of their public duty. My hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) said he was a young man. He has that advantage, but possesses with it the rare advantage of being an old politician, for he has been some years with us here, and we have reason to know his public services did not begin with his election to Parliament. I do not think, therefore, my hon. friend was fairly entitled to claim—and I am equally bound to say my hon. friend did not stand in any need of claiming—the indulgence of the House when he stood up to express his views and sentiments on the present occasion. With reference to the hon. member for West Northumberland, he will excuse me if I decline, on this occasion, to enter into a controversy with him, either as to the accuracy of his historical retrospect or the position of the Government on the questions of the day. The proper time will arise at a later period, and the hon. gentleman will, perhaps, find reasons—if he be, as I suppose he is, open to conviction—to change his opinions on some of those subjects before the Session closes. We rejoice as heartily as any person can, on that measure of improvement and prosperity which the condition of the country exhibits, and we rejoice also upon the improved view as to the sources of that prosperity which is apparent on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. On former days we have heard Ministers declare that that prosperity was, in some small measure, due to the condition of agricultural products, and for that they were good enough to allow some small measure of praise and thanks and blessing to Providence; but for the rest, which, they said, was a great deal more than that, they claimed the blessings for themselves. I remember that the hon. Minister of Finance disclaimed, a little while ago, the arrogation by the Government of the merit for all that had occurred, and said the proof of this was that they had not long since instituted a day of thanksgiving to Providence for its blessings. That, Sir, is about the proportion: one day to God and the other 364 to the Ministry. But this time I am glad to see that the improved prosperity in its various aspects is attributed to the Giver of all good, by which, I presume, we are not to understand the Finance Minister. Now I believe that the Trade and Navigation Returns will indicate very clearly the propriety of attributing these blessings to Providence, and will establish, as will also other circumstances, the fact that it is to those changed conditions to which we have repeatedly referred, that the substance and essence of the improved condition of this country, in common with several other communities, is to be traced. The Speech, as was natural, contains a somewhat extended reference to the North-West, and we learn that two things are essential with reference to the Indian population, which, under various synonyms, is referred to in the course of these paragraphs. We warned the Administration a couple of years ago, when they announced that, owing to the expected total failure of the food supply, it had become necessary to expend a very large sum to prevent the starvation of the Indians; although such expenditure might be necessary, the course being pursued was one which would almost inevitably lead to the reappearance of that item in our Estimates for many years to come. It did reappear the next year, but again it was stated to be an exceptionable occurrence; but two years' experience on the part of these interesting children of the prairie and forest, of whom the hon. gentleman has spoken in such winning terms, having convinced them that if they do not hunt they will find beef and bread supplied to them by the Government, the Government have become convinced by these two years' experience that they must now lay down as part of their policy the supplying for many years to come, or until they teach them farming, of food to the Indians. The hon. gentleman has also announced that we shall have, besides feeding and keeping them comfortable, to control them more extensively than before. That we will require to watch them: we will require to watch them by nearly doubling the Mounted Police Force, as well as to keep them happy and contented by supplying them with food. These are no doubt considerations and policies which may well be questioned by circumstances and facts which hon. gentlemen may bring forward later. But it is certainly a grave circumstance in connection with the development of the North-West, that at the same instant we should be called upon to feed the aboriginal population of that country. I am told there is very great danger of collisions requiring severe repressive measures, and the establishment, to a large extent, of a force to guard the settlers in that country. Now the Speech, while it does contain extended reference, as I have said, to the North-West, is also conspicuous for certain omissions in that direction. Last Session there was brought to this House, in its dying hours, when it was impossible to discuss measures effectually—when there were but a very few members present—a measure altering the condition of Manitoba, increasing its boundaries and area. We contended it would have been fit and proper to bring down a complete scheme at that time; we held it was obvious that as the readjustment of the boundaries of Manitoba, to the extent proposed, meant financial changes as well, and that it would be proper to bring down proposals which, by mutual arrangement between the Government of Manitoba and the Government of the Dominion, had been deemed fit for submission to the Legislature, which should settle the question. It seems to me sufficiently obvious that in increasing the boundaries of Manitoba in the present manner, we are leaving open the other important question, which I hope it is now intended to submit to this Legislature. Can it be that an arrangement has not yet been made? Can it be that the question is still open? Can it be that the policy of the Government, as to the altered financial arrangements with Manitoba is not yet, even at this day, determined? Else, why should we find no mention of that in the Speech? We find the glowing picture presented two years ago, as to the expected immigration from older lands, not now referred to. I had hoped very earnestly that the condition of things, and the views of the Administration on this subject, would have justified a very strong expression of opinion in the Speech from the Throne. The subject has been under the consideration of the Government for some years. It has been brought before us, in this manner, more than once. As I have said, two years ago, a very distinct statement was made; but to-day, with the exception of an allusion to the subject of immigration, in that paragraph which speaks of the extent of country in which immigrants have settled, we find no reference to the past or future. Now, there has been a very considerable influx of people to the North-West; but so far as the information available to the public goes, it seems clear that the immigration, so far, has been due in its largest proportions to the older Provinces of the Dominion, and that, as yet, we have received but a very slight portion of those fruits which we hoped to reap from the extraordinary immigration from the older countries. I do not regret, for my part, to see the people of the older Provinces go

Mr. BLAKE.

West. I rejoice that our citizens, from any part of this Dominion, should find it possible to improve their condition, and probably to improve the condition of this whole country, by removing from one part to the other. But I do say it is a serious question for those older Provinces that this emigration should proceed in the measure in which it has been proceeding, without a supply from other countries coming in, to some extent to remedy the deficiency in population which must so result. The consequences in Ontario, if the present state of things continue—if there be not a very considerable immigration in that Province from the older countries—must be, in my opinion, very serious to the owners of land in its rural districts. There is a very large emigration from that Province, and there is not, so far as I can see, an adequate immigration from older lands to counterbalance that decrease. Therefore it is that we, as residents of the older Provinces, as well as people interested in the fortunes of the North-West, have experienced what seems a feeling of disappointment at the results thus far; and the fact that the circumstances do not seem to warrant any statement on that subject in the Speech from the Throne is sufficiently significant. The proposal to divide the North-West into four districts may be a very proper one. I trust that, taking the various circumstances with reference to the extreme difficulty of saying what the centres of population will be—where most rapidly the country will be settled—the arrangements will be of such a character as may not require very much disturbance, in the case of changes due to the creation of more railways in that country, and to circumstances of which we are not now cognizant. The present expectations as to the centres of population may be falsified. While it may be tolerably easy to point to certain places in that country, which from their position and relation to lines of travel, frontiers, territories and rivers, will necessarily be centres of population, I hold it to be very difficult to make arrangements of a permanent character at this time. I am a little surprised, however, at one paragraph in the Speech. The Speech tells us, first of all, of the great attention that is required to be paid to the Indian population. The question of the Indian population is a burning one. It then tells us that the white population requires more protection; but unless I was deceived, I thought I saw quite lately the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West in the vicinity of this building. So he seems a very long way from his white and red subjects, though he knows they require so much attention. There is another omission in the Speech, which I also greatly regretted to find—that is, that we are not promised a measure for the adoption of a simple, easy, less expensive mode of transferring real property, such as was brought forward in the time of the late Government, and to which I have once or twice directed the attention of the Minister of the Interior. I say that if our expectations as to the rapid settlement of that country are in any measure realized, as we hope they will be, we can do no greater practical benefit for the future of that country than now, while as yet the lands are ungranted—while there is no complication of titles—than to adopt a system which, so far as our present notions are concerned, may seem to us almost revolutionary, but which might make the title to lands and the security in reference to title, and the possibility of transferring interests, greater than they are in the older Provinces by the present system, and which will confer on those who will settle in the North-West, benefits which, if you summed them up, would be almost incalculable. This is the time to make such a change, the time at which it can be done without the disturbance of any existing system. I repeat my views on this subject to the hon. the Minister of the Interior, because I feel that at no time can this scheme be accomplished so easily and with such good results as at present. The Speech refers very properly to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it appears as if a policy had been adopted of concluding the construction of that railway, within a very much shorter period than that proposed to Parliament last Session. It is true the Speech itself does not contain a direct statement to that effect; but it does indicate as much, since it is declared that the section to Port Moody which, by the contract, was to be completed before 1891, will be completed at the same date as the section from Savona's Ferry to Emory's Bar—that is within four years of the present time. And the published statements and utterances which have taken place upon this subject lead to the other conclusion, to which indeed one or other of the hon. members who moved the paragraph now under consideration has also alluded. Well, Sir, that and other circumstances which have occurred are, so far from being, as hon. gentlemen would appear to argue, in contradiction of the views as stated last Session, the strongest verification of those views. Last Session we declared it to be our opinion that the proposed arrangement was one disadvantageous to the country, in this: that it imposed a burden infinitely greater than the necessities of the case demanded. The answer to that argument made was this: It is true that, as far as actual construction goes, if that were all, your position, although we do not agree with your figures, is correct; but there is another element to be taken into account, namely, the element of the expense of running the railway; that is an enormous expense for which we had to make payment, and it is included in this contract sum. Our argument was that the railway ought to be pushed from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg and through the prairie section, and that the time occupied, if a season or more, in doing that, will be time not lost with respect to the construction of the ends—time not lost, but gained with respect to the cost of the work, because more information will be obtained and more population will get in—and that the facilities will be infinitely greater, and that we will be better judges with respect to the scheme without any loss of time accruing. What was the fact? That the Canadian Pacific Railway Company propose, and have arranged with the Government, as I presume from the Government having made this contract in British Columbia, to hasten the completion of the ends of the line. And what does it prove? It proves this: that they cannot believe there will be a loss in the running expenses of the railway; that they believe that to anticipate the completion of the railway by five years will not be to involve a loss in running expenses, and if that be the conclusion which we are now to reach, is it not established that the investigations, the considerations, the fresh light thrown on this enterprise in the period of one short year, have shown us that the sum, whatever that indefinite sum may be, which was added to this contract price to pay the loss in running expenses, ought not to have been added. So with respect to the eastern link. The hon. gentleman has let out some of the secrets of the negotiations—secrets which were concealed from Parliament when Parliament was called upon to decide this question—for not long since he told us, at all events he told his friends and the public have heard it, that it is true that members of the Syndicate, during the negotiations and up to the completion of the contract, were greatly opposed to any plan for the construction of the railway north of Lake Superior as involving a heavy burden. Well, we all know that they did not succeed in carrying out their desire; that the Government insisted on that portion of the railway being included in the contract; that we paid because it was included, and that what the Syndicate thought was such an onerous proposal, a proposal which they would agree to only on being proportionately compensated for the task they were asked to undertake; and therefore a very large portion of the very many millions of money and millions of acres is attributable to the representations made that this was a very onerous part of the bargain—is now proved, according to information obtained by hon. gentlemen, to be a most valuable portion of the road; that the Syndicate will not part with it, and that what appeared to be a bad bargain proved to be a good one. That is the consequence, once again, of not adopting the policy we suggested of proceeding with those portions which were necessary for the immediate development of the country, and completing the road from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg, and looking around us a little more before we made what was believed to be a disadvantageous bargain, but which now turns out, on the statement of the hon. gentleman himself and of the Company and the Government, to be so much better even than his own followers supposed last Session. Of course, this change of policy is one which is of special interest, as it involves us in increased burdens. I quite agree that if it be true that the development of the country at each end is going to be promoted, it is another question, and it may be a fair reason for incurring that extra expenditure; but it is reasonable to point out that this is a serious change in policy whereby the expenditure which was to be spread over ten years, as far as the Government is concerned, is now to be concentrated in four or five years, involving an additional expenditure for the next four years of something over $8,000,000. Of course, even the hon. gentleman will not assert that the interest on the money so rapidly expended, and to such an amount, will be met out of the lands—it is to be met out of the taxation of the country; and that which we said on various occasions last Session with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway is fulfilled by the declarations in the Speech, because not merely must that large sum, to meet the interest, be paid out of the public revenue, but it appears by the statement in the Speech that a very large portion of the great sum taken from the people of the country last year in taxes has been actually applied to the construction of the Pacific Railway, and it has been built to that extent out of the public taxes. We alleged that the power which was given to the Company is inordinate, and that also has been verified, although perhaps not to the extent which it will be eventually. I do not enter into an analysis of the freight rates, but they are very, very high. I do not know on what terms the Government have sanctioned those rates, but they are such as, although perhaps bearable where produce happens to have high values and there is a large quantity to the acre—and we must not forget that the imports of the country are, to a large extent, paid out of capital—still, although bearable under those circumstances and of a less serious character, when once the settler has become a settler, the question simply is, what are my annual charges, and what are the annual returns of my farm. We find the policy of the Administration has been in the direction of giving what was asked. We find local railway charters disallowed; we find in this part of the country the indefinite powers given in that bargain availed of; we find local railways absorbed; and it is possible that those who viewed with considerable equanimity the consequences of great power being extended to a company to use in a land many many miles away and to be exercised over other persons, will now feel a little more alive to the dangerous consequences and the burdens which result from such powers when they find them exercised at their own doors with results which press upon their own shoulders. We said that Sault Ste. Marie was the objective point to be reached at that time, but that was repudiated. It was said that the right thing to do was to push for the north shore at once, to keep at a distance from Sault Ste. Marie; nay, more, we were told that it was a treasonable and unpatriotic thing to discuss connection with Sault Ste. Marie, and that those who proposed that plan—though, indeed, there was numbered among those who advocated it one short year before the Minister of Railways himself—were men who were leagued in a hostile league to the interests of this country. But we find that the Syndicate propose to go very near the Sault on the main line and all the way to the Sault by a branch, and it is now regarded as a very good thing, as an excellent thing, as a sort of betterment if possible of the Government policy, that a route should be adopted which enables them to go near to the Sault on the main line and altogether to the Sault at an early day. We said that the provisions as to the exemptions, the lack of restrictions in the conditions with reference to the lands, were likely to result in regulations not in the interests of the public, and I need not do more than point to the various series of land regulations issued by the railway for proof of that statement. It is true, and I rejoice to see it, that they have been modified lately in important respects; but in their objectionable form they are still quite within the competence of the Company. We cannot well find fault with the Company, for we gave them power to make them, and we knew that it would be to their interests to make them—the responsibility is on the Administration; nor do I believe that they would have been such as they are to-day, and still less, such as they were some time ago, if it had not been that power was given to the Company to hold their lands free from taxation, and had not absolute power been given them without restriction as to the mode of disposing of them. We said that the valuation of lands which the Government made for the purposes of the contract was a valuation contradicted by their own views of the year before, and a valuation not according to our reasonable anticipations of that time. This is proved from public documents and by the regulations issued by the Government itself as to its own lands, where lands at a greater distance from the railway than the railway lands and less advantageously situated are offered for sale at prices far in excess of those at which it was proposed to value the choice neighboring lands for the purposes of the contract last Session. I believe it is extraordinary the extent to which already events have gone in the direction of verifying those views which, as to some of the points, may require many years for their full development. I observe that we are offered for our consideration some subjects with which we are not wholly unfamiliar. Once again, there is a promise of a Bill for the reforming of the Civil Service, and my hon. friend, the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) in effect, if not in terms, informs us that he wants it to be an efficacious Bill, that he wants to preserve the patronage, but that he wants to secure it only for capable persons, and so on. I think he will find it extremely difficult to combine these two objects, and, if he succeeds, I would recommend him at the earliest possible moment to send in a draft of his measure to the Administration, who, I am sure, will receive it with that consideration due to so devoted a follower, and may receive from it new light on this important subject. But, so far as I can judge of the laws of modern days on this subject, and from the statements of the first report of this Commission itself, they differ rather from the view of the hon. gentleman, and I believe that the exercise of that political patronage is at the root of many of the most serious evils which certainly beset our existing Civil Service system. I find also reference to a Bill for the winding up of incorporated insurance companies, banks and trading corporations. That also is an old dish. When the Insolvent Act was repealed the Government assented to the view that its repeal should be conditional on such a measure, and it was promised that such a measure should be introduced. It was found impossible, I suppose, to redeem that pledge during that Session; the next Session it was promised but not brought down; but, as the third time is the charm, we may now expect to have the Bill brought down. We are also promised a measure relating to fugitive offenders within the Empire. Such a measure may be necessary, but I do say that there is a cognate subject of much greater importance—I mean the present condition of the law with reference to the extradition of fugitive criminals from foreign countries. I say that the condition of our law is a disgrace, that the proceedings going on from time to time prove it, and that we should take very earnest and strenuous measures to secure the improvement of those arrangements between ourselves and other countries, and notably the United States, which are now existing, and to secure the substitution of some other and better convention for the antiquated Ashburton Treaty, or if that were found to be impossible, to make provision for legislative extradition. I think that we should largely increase the range of crimes which ought to be the subject of extradition, and that we should secure the provision of this House of a few years ago before the coming into force of a better, simpler, more harmonious and plain mode of administering the law. The question was carefully discussed in a case which arose the other day, but I do not know whether it will be possible to get over the difficulty in that case under the Ashburton Treaty. In that case a proposal was made to extradite a man who is acknowledged to be a criminal—and what is the difficulty in the way? It is very sure that the person in question is a criminal, for he is not only an accused person, but one who was sentenced, convicted, committed to prison, and who afterwards broke gaol. The difficulty is that under the Ashburton Treaty he ought to be sent across the lines for trial, but because he has been tried, sentenced, and was undergoing sentence when he escaped, you cannot get him back again. I see by the newspapers that a fresh charge is to be made against this individual for some other crime for which he has not had the good fortune to be tried, and I hope that the proceedings thus taken will result in his being extradited. But is it not disgraceful that it should be even a question of doubt whether such an individual should be free to remain on our shores? The Speech refers, although in terms perhaps less strong than some former references when steps were proposed to be taken on the subject, to fresh outlets for our trade and commerce, and to the starting of a line between this country and Brazil. I rejoice to learn from the hon. gentlemen who have spoken that they take a deep interest in the extension of our trade and commerce, and are desirous of forwarding them in every way. So are we all. We may believe that the methods pursued by the present Administration and supported by these hon. gentlemen may not be well calculated to enable this country to compete in the markets of the world, or that the projects which they bring forward are such as would enable us to exchange profitably, and we are all quite anxious that that should happen. And I say here, what I said years ago, that if we are going to make real progress in that direction, it must be that we ought to have our own agents, and that we ought to have further power to make those conventional arrangements with foreign countries; and until we—recognizing the fact that our situation is peculiar, that it is our own situation, that our own people understand our own business and our own situation better—undertake to discharge that duty ourselves and on our own account, but little progress will be made by the hon. gentlemen in the accomplishing of arrangements which, if the conditions of this country were different, would result in a profitable outlet for our manufactures, and a profitable exchange for our natural products. The executive administration, Mr. Speaker, is becoming a greater element in the public transactions of the year, and ought to receive more and more the careful attention of Parliament. More and more, year by year, are important matters, which formerly would have been supposed to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament, handed over to the control of the Executive, and our action is that of the criticism of the past, instead of the potential action of deciding what the course shall be. Take the land regulations, for example. Those who think most of the North-West must feel most warmly as to the magnitude of that topic. It is admitted that the prosperity and progress of the North-West have for their base the fertile lands of that territory, and therefore the policy which is to be pursued with reference to the development of that country is largely a land policy. As to certain classes of these lands, it has been agreed that the regulations shall be subject to the disapproval of Parliament on being laid on the Table; but as to the bulk, the Government have taken absolute and uncontrolled power to make regulations, and we find series after series of regulations issuing, with almost the rapidity, though hardly with the symmetry, of the views presented by the kaleidoscope. The short motto we have adopted, year by year, for the North-West, has been "the land for the settler, the price for the public;" and after objecting as we did, though unsuccessfully, to the sale of land on other than conditions of settlement; after arguing again that if you should sell otherwise than on conditions of settlement, you should sell for cash only; after propounding resolutions in these directions for two Sessions in vain, we have found that the Government have conceded in part. We have found that what was proposed has been applied to the individual, and if he is to buy other than on conditions of settlement he is to pay cash. But what is good for the individual speculator is good for the party speculator, and the party speculator under one class of regulations, at any rate, is still to be permitted to purchase on credit. I very much dread that the effect of the last regulations in some important particulars will be to depart still more seriously from that motto, to introduce a system of large speculative holdings, and a system of middlemen, who will receive from the colonist a larger sum than the public gets, and thus to retard settlement for a long time and produce ultimate loss to the settler. We have to consider the regulations with regard to arable lands, to grazing lands, to wood lands, to coal and mineral lands and to town sites. All these are subjects of vastest importance, and subjects which one can do no more than make reference to at this time or until the regulations are before us, when they can be discussed profitably in detail. Amongst the subjects not alluded to in the Speech, is the exercise in the discretion of the Government, of the power of disallowance; and we see by the public papers that other instances are now pending before the Council or the Minister, in which it is seriously contemplated to pursue the same policy. I think it would be profitable for this Parliament, during the present Session, to engage in a discussion of that subject. It is of the last consequence that we should decide on the principles—applicable, of course, to all the Provinces—for they have all an identical and common interest in the matter—on which disallowance should be exercised—and decide, not in a limited sense, but in an enlarged sense, in a sense that, if it be necessary for the Government to take such action, will not make confederation a delusion and a snare, and result in bringing about that federal union which was once, and I presume is still, the dream of the hon. the First Minister. We have other subjects. We have had the Minister of Finance issuing a little circular—no, two—no, three little circulars, each of them corrective of the others, and circulars which I undertake to say Parliament considered it to be far beyond his power to issue, when he was authorized to issue any circulars at all—circulars, for instance, containing demands for statements regarding the private affairs of banks. He has done something else, too. We were told last year that it was utterly impossible, without lowering the dignity of Parliament, without insulting the representatives of the people, to inform them until the House should meet, until the Speech should be assented to, until the document itself should be laid on yonder Table, what the details were of a gigantic contract on which they were to be asked to pass within a few days of the time they were informed of it. But, how far is it in accordance with the respect due to the representatives of the people that public meetings of the electors should be informed months before the meeting of Parliament, what the policy of the Administration was to be in an important particular—that they should be told distinctly and plainly that the taxes on tea and coffee should be removed, and that we should hear nothing at all about it now in the Speech? It is true, I have heard the hon. gentleman frequently, when he was asked, in advance, what he was going to do about taxes, say: "I cannot tell you that until my Budget is brought down. It would never do to let a word out." But he has changed his views, and the change is so radical, so revolutionary, that while he is quite decided that we are not to know anything about it before he makes his Budget Speech, he is decided that all the rest of the world shall know all about it long before. The most extraordinary thing is, that the hon. gentleman, in this particular, appears to have been animated by benevolent intentions toward the trade, and that the trade seems not to appreciate his benevolent intentions. I am glad to observe that he is quite disposed, in discussion with the trade, to change again somewhat if that will suit. I observe, although he has not told Parliament about it, by a letter addressed to a gentleman in Montreal and published in the newspapers, that he now states that if it will do them any good to prolong the disturbance he will postpone the removal of the duties for two months more. When they are complaining that trade is paralysed, that difficulties are increased by a long postponement, and when they desire to be out of their pain, the hon. gentleman asks them to wait two months longer and keep things in the pleasant condition they are for that space of time. I suppose it is because he has not finished that correspondence that we have no announcement on that subject in the Speech. We will have no doubt an announcement on that subject, and the hon. gentlemen who have been rejoicing, and who are rejoicing to-day, in the surplus, and who are glorifying the Administration for having produced it, will immediately afterwards glorify the Administration for having taken off the taxes. First of all they call upon us to bless them because they imposed the taxes, then they call upon us to bless them because the taxes produced fruits, and presently we are to be called upon to bless them because they take the taxes off again. I recollect the story of a person who was found one sultry summer day walking up a steep hill with a fence rail on his shoulder. He was met by a friend, who said: "What are you carrying that heavy rail up the hill for when there are plenty of rails on the top?" He answered: "It is rather burdensome to carry it up, but then how well I shall feel when I lay it down on the top of the hill." Such is the view of the Minister. He put on the taxes; it was all right and a great blessing. He takes them off; it is all right and a greater blessing still. That surplus is no doubt very large, and the change in the tariff, which has been communicated by the Minister in the sense of a reduction of taxation, is what we suggested to him last Session. We said that the surplus ought not to be so large and that the taxes should be light. We were told that it was premature, that two or three years would be time enough to talk of reducing the taxes; and we are glad to know that in this case it takes but a few months, and that one Session after he made the proposal it is to be realized. That surplus has produced, as I have said, an increase of taxes, it has not been produced by an abnormal consumption of imported goods. The consumption has not been in the gross, at any rate, much in excess, if at all in excess, of that which, judging from the past of this country, we might have expected; but it is produced from a moderate importation, because that moderate importation is taxed at a rate extremely oppressive in the gross, and still more oppressive if you consider the incidents of that taxation. The legislation of last Session included the power to appoint judges for the Province of Quebec. While in some other subjects hon. gentlemen opposite have been active; while we have seen them everywhere except here; while they have been through the country from end to end, I suppose it was not to be expected that they should have found time to carry out that portion of legislation. I was told when I made the suggestion that other arrangements might be carried out which would give a more efficient judiciary to the Province of Quebec, without expense or an addition to the number of judges, that the matter was pressing, that it was urgent, that it ought to be passed that Session because the business of the litigants of the Province of Quebec demanded the appointment of an additional judge. The law passed, it came into force, and the judge is not named. How is that? What is the difficulty? Was it impossible? Was it found afterwards the judge was not needed? Was there an embarras de richesse as to the nominee? How does it happen that that which was so necessary, that no time was afforded for the consideration of some other plan, has turned out not to be at all necessary? So again with respect to another institution—the Penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul—where we had a report that it was necessary to supersede the warden, and that it was necessary to reorganize the establishment. We heard rumors that we were to suffer the loss of a respected member of this House—the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Hurteau). We heard that he was about to prefer the presidency over a number of convicted criminals to association with the respectable individuals who compose this Chamber. But we are happy to know that he is still with us, and we would like to know the reason why.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He cannot part from you.

Mr. BLAKE. It is said that he found a little condition attached to his elevation to that exalted office, namely, that satisfactory arrangements should be made for the county. The county was not capable of being satisfactorily arranged for, owing to an embarras de richesse of Conservative candidates. My hon. friend, who smiles at me opposite, went down there, and when it was found impossible to reconcile these differences, my hon. friend from L'Assomption announced that he would retain that mandat which he had been prepared to abandon, and my hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) congratulated him on the patriotic spirit which induced him, under such circumstances, and in view of these difficulties, to remain a member of this House and not become a warden of the penitentiary. And so it was that after many months of discussion the institution remained unprovided for, and it is but lately that an arrangement for the wardenship of that institution has been made; thus it being made palpable that political considerations, that the political view of patronage which my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) is very anxious should be maintained, have interfered considerably with the efficient administration of the public service in an important particular. I, of course, agree, and very heartily, in the views which have been expressed in the Speech with reference to the calamity which befel the Republic of the United States of America. We must all do that, and agree not merely in the spirit, but also in the language in which that allusion is made. It is a painful commentary upon an advanced civilization that such an event should have been possible, and that in the history of that great country, within so brief a period, the lives of two of the freely elected governors of that country, should have terminated in such a tragic way. I will add no more than this, that we heartily rejoice to know that the illness which unfortunately afflicted my hon. friend opposite (Sir John A. Macdonald) has terminated so favorably, and that he meets us again restored to his usual health; and that although we may hope that he shall change his position in this House at an early period, we hope he will continue to grace this House for many years with that ability which he has heretofore displayed.

Mr. BLAKE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can cordially join my hon. friend in many things he has said during his interesting speech to-day. In the first place, I join with him in offering my sincere congratulations to the Mover and Seconder of the Resolutions, for the able manner in which they have pressed those Resolutions on the attention of this House. I can also congratulate my hon. friend opposite on the kindly and pleasant tone in which he has addressed himself so early in the Session to the discussion of matters of legislation and administration to which he has alluded. I thank him especially, and most sincerely, for his very kind allusion to myself. Probably we are to remain looking at each other; I cannot hope—although I would like it—to be ranged on the same side as the hon. gentleman, but we will look at each other as pleasantly as we can. My hon. friend is pleased with the Address on the whole, and with the improved tone as regards the extraordinary prosperity in Canada. He said that formerly we attributed everything to ourselves, but now we are so far improved in our manners, our morals, and our sentiments, that we give some thanks to the Greater Power. The hon. gentleman said we had given one day to God and 364 to ourselves. My hon. friend seems to grudge that one day, and I really do think, from the tone—the rather light tone—of my hon. friend that he was not very thankful on that same day. There is no doubt we have great reason to be thankful for several years of prosperity, and it is one of the happinesses of myself and my friends who surround me that we have had Providence smile upon us; and all that we can attribute to ourselves is this: that under a favoring Providence we have attempted to the best of our humble capacity to develop the interests of the country, and remove the stagnation under which it suffered; and we are proud to know, from the statement of my hon. friend himself, that our exertions have not been altogether unsuccessful. My hon. friend laid down the true principle, I think, of discussions of this kind on the opening of a Session in Parliament. Motions in amendment and long discussions are obsolete, except in very exceptional cases where the continuance of the confidence of Parliament in the Administration of the day is to be questioned. Then, of course, the sooner that is brought to a decision, the better; but, with that exception, it is a well understood rule now that the sooner we get to work the better, and that this preliminary discussion is merely a sort of undress rehearsal.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am glad you have changed your mind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I sometimes do change my mind. I am not a Bourbon. I learn something, and I forget something; and apropos of that, the hon. gentleman congratulates us, on several occasions, on some improvements in land regulations and other matters,—that we have really taken a leaf out of his book, and the book of the Opposition. We are not too proud to learn even from my hon. friend. Not being Reformers, we find occasionally something to reform; and as with us who are not Reformers, the good of the country and not self gratulation or pride in our own opinion, is the chief guiding principle. We do occasionally, not very often, find that we can improve on even our own original ideas. Well, my hon. friend stated the principle correctly, but entered rather fully, and I think with some contradiction in spirit, into doctrines which he had laid down, and too fully, in the absence of papers and means of verifying statements, into the various subjects which the interests of the country demands should be discussed coolly. I do not, however, object to that or complain of it. The hon. gentleman speaks in a very proper and patriotic tone of his pleasure at the progress in the North-West. We are proud of that progress. We ought all, as Canadians, to be proud of it, and this Government has certainly some cause for congratulations through having been, in some degree, the means by which that country has been, and is now being, developed. We also believed, notwithstanding my hon. friend was an unbeliever at one time, in the future of that country. We always believed in the value of the land, and I was ridiculed—and by none more than my hon. friend—at the valuations that I ventured to place on some of the lands.

Mr. BLAKE. The calculations, not the valuations. You were only four millions out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I did not then give full justice to the power of my hon. friends opposite to keep back the development of the country. I did not believe that their candid, conscientious statements as to the future of the country would have such an injurious effect on its progress as they proved to have had. Still, we have overcome even the influence of their opinion and their authority as to the worthlessness of the land for present purposes, and as to the prospect of an early immigration into that country. We have got over that now, and the country is rapidly being settled. It is quite true, the hon. gentleman says, that a large European immigration has not yet set in. There is a very wholesome transfer of the population from the older Provinces to the North-West. I coincide with my hon. friend that that is not to be regretted. The people of this country have a right to go to where they think their interests can be most promoted; and every man who, by going to the North-West either from Quebec, Ontario or the Maritime Provinces, increases his comfort, wealth and means, adds thereby to the wealth of the whole Dominion. Not only that, but I believe that in Ontario, especially in the most fertile portions, there was going to be too great a subdivision of the farming property. What is the consequence? The man who had his farm in Ontario or Quebec does not throw it away, nor does he abandon his home. No; he sells to his richer neighbor, who wishes to remain in the older Province, at a reasonable price. The farmer who buys is the capitalist, and in view of a change in the older Provinces of the products of farms, the larger those farms become in the hands of the capitalist, the better. So that I do not think it is to be regretted. On the contrary, I believe it is to the interest of the old and new portions of the Province that a portion of the population should be moved from one section to another, if, by that transfer, the parties so moved gain in comfort or in wealth. The hon. gentleman spoke of the increased Indian expenditure. He said he had warned the Government some two years ago against the commencement of the expenditure which is now going on. It is very easy to give a warning, but I will venture to say that if my hon. friend had been in the Administration at the time those votes were asked for, he would have felt himself bound to make the same demand, and would have expected to receive the same response from Parliament. It was by no fault, either of the Government or the Opposition, that the buffalo, the food supply of the Indian, are disappearing. They are being diminished by the progress of civilization and by the senseless slaughter that goes on in those regions; and further, the Indians in our country have been almost deprived of that source of food supply by the action of the American Government in keeping back, so far as a cordon of troops can do so, the herds of buffalo from crossing the line towards the north. It was an absolute necessity to any Government to take care that those people should not be allowed to starve, as they were literally deprived of their chief sources of food supply. In some districts the Indians could fish, and were no burden to the Dominion Treasury, but in the places where the animals and game are rapidly disappearing with the advance of settlers, and the buffalo are disappearing altogether, there was but one thing to do, either to feed the Indian or let him die. That being the alternative, of course Parliament, as one man, and without objection, except perhaps the warning my hon. friend mentions, voted the necessary supplies, the Government have tried their best to induce the Indians to settle on the lands, and betake themselves to the raising of cattle and the cultivation of the soil. I believe, on the whole, the experiment has been successful, and, strange to say, the greatest success has been attained with the wildest tribes. The Blackfoot Indians seemed irreclaimable, but they have betaken themselves with extraordinary readiness to their reserves, and we have good hopes that near the Rocky Mountains, extending to the North Saskatchewan and Peace River, the Blackfoot, the Bloods, and other tribes, will ere long be self-supporting. With the other Indians we have not, on the whole, succeeded so well. While the Indians have got this year an unexpected supply of food from the partial return of the buffalo, I believe, on the whole, it is to be regretted, because they have been told that the buffalo had disappeared, and that they must become farmers or cattle raisers, on which belief they had betaken themselves to those enterprises. But when they learned that the buffalo had returned, they remarked that all the white men's prophecies as to the final disappearance of the buffalo had been falsified, and in very many instances they had left their reserves and fallen back into their old habits. We must, in the language of the Speech, submit to that consequence of our acquisition of the country. Of course, the hon. gentleman is quite right in his remarks upon the supply of food to the aborigines. No one felt, more than myself, that the consequence of giving such food as was absolutely requisite to save them from starvation was an inducement, to a certain extent, to abstain from working. The Indian will not work if he can get enough to eat without working, and no doubt one of the consequences of our assisting them has been a supply of more food than was absolutely requisite to keep them from starving. But on the whole, as far as I can gather, the distribution has been as economical and judicious as possible under the circumstances of the case. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite will feel that one of the obligations thrown upon us all, as a civilized people, is to take care that these poor aborigines, who are deprived by the progress of civilization of their own country, of their hunting grounds and usual supply of food, are furnished with the necessaries of life for a certain period. It is true the Government have thought it necessary to increase the Mounted Police Force, but not to repress the Indians, as my hon. friend has suggested. The force, I believe, at this moment numbers but 300 men. It was thus established, in the first place, by the Government of 1873, their policy in this respect being followed by the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite when in office. This force would have been quite sufficient to keep the Indians under proper restraint if no white men had gone into the country. The necessity for an increase is not the keeping of the Indians quiet, but the prevention of collisions between them and the white men. You can quite understand that if an Indian is starving, and sees a white man's cattle grazing, he will not starve—he will shoot the white man's ox for food, and it was not unlikely that the white man's ox will shoot down the Indian.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman explain the process by which the white man's ox is to shoot the Indian?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I was going on to say, had I not been rather uncivilly interrupted, that our object is to prevent white men and Indians coming into collision. There are large herds of cattle coming into our North-West Territory from the Southern States—brought in by herdsmen and drivers from Texas, and the region between that State and the International boundary; and we know from the history of the transactions between the white man and the Indian in the United States that in the western country the white man would be apt to shoot the Indian on sight, as he would a prairie dog. And such white men are coming into our Western Territory. They are accustomed to continual collisions with the Indians, and the great danger is that by any act of appropriation of a white man's property, the white man may be excited to protect it by taking an Indian's life, and the killing of one Indian might cause an Indian war, slaughter, and we do not know what other consequences. One thing is certain, that this would prevent or postpone for many years the immigration we hope shortly to draw into that country; and therefore it is that we ask the House to increase the Police Force to 500 men. Under the present Act, in case of immediate urgency or danger the Government have the power to do so; but as there is no such urgency, in my opinion, as to warrant that course, allusion is made to the subject in the Speech in the terms noticed. Although the force is to be increased if Parliament sanction it, I am happy to tell the House that the cost per man of the Police is very much diminished—in fact, to a very remarkable degree. To increase the number, therefore, does not involve a corresponding increase in the expense. My hon. friend from West Durham says that notwithstanding all the dangers that are apprehended in the North-West, he sees the Lieutenant-Governor and Superintendent of Indian Affairs at this Capital. He is here this winter as he was here last winter, and if I hold the position next winter which I do now, I shall certainly send for him to have the advantage of his assistance and advice, and explain to us of what goes on under his eyes in the Territory. I am happy to say that that gentleman has the confidence of myself as the head of the department with which he is most connected. I believe he is the right man in the right place—a very sensible, prudent man, cool, cautious and determined, while at the same time a man of kindly manners. He has got on very well, and has acquired the confidence and respect of the Indians with whom he has had to deal. My hon. friend has spoken of the measures mentioned in the Speech, observing there are some remarkable omissions. I do not suppose he has had the same experience in this respect. Report says he has had some very late experience in framing Speeches from the Throne, but I have no doubt that on no occasion would he make a Speech from the Throne, a mere catalogue or schedule of the measures of the Government which brings it down. We allude to subjects of general interest, as is always done on such occasions. We have, however, noticed at some length the position of the Indians in the North-West, and also the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway; but I must say, I have never admired my hon. friend's astuteness more, than in his attempt to find fault with the Syndicate for finishing the road in five years instead of ten. The hon. gentleman was loud in his denunciations, at one time, of the folly of building the road to the north of Lake Superior, urging that it ought to have been indefinitely postponed, and postponed in fact till the Greek Kalends, so far as regards construction through British Columbia. His idea was that we should not have a Pacific or trans-continental railroad at all; but if we should have one it was to be run from the head of Lake Superior, leaving the Canadian system of railroads for ever and ever, amen. The remainder of the road was only to be finished in 1890. After seven years, we at last made an arrangement by which the road was to be finished in 1891, just one year more. I think it is much to the credit of the Government that, in choosing parties to build the road, they selected men who formed themselves into a company, and who, with some degree of doubt, with great hesitation, entered into a contract to finish the railway in ten years, and now found they would finish it in five years. Their energies are wonderful, their resources are remarkable, and we shall have the road across the continent in half the time we anticipated. Some of my hon. friends opposite endeavored to raise a good-natured laugh at my having expected only to look down upon the completed railway. I think, Mr. Speaker, unless slain by the too vigorous assaults of the leader of the Opposition, I may hope, even at my age, to live long enough to travel across the Dominion, proceeding from Ottawa direct to the shores of the Pacific, without suffering any very great inconvenience or fatigue. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) has spoken somewhat, and I think, without sufficient examination into the state of the case, about excessive freight rates. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the rates, so far as I can learn, are not excessive. They are considerably less than those charged by the Government, when the railway was a Government railway, without any objection being taken by the people interested; and the Government was so particular in guarding the interests through which this road was to pass, that they have taken care that both passenger and freight rates shall be subject from time to time to thorough revision by the Government. It is quite obvious that a shorter road, running fifty, sixty or 100 miles, is not so profitable as one extending 200, 300, 500 or 1,000 miles, and there must be a proper and due proportion between the service provided by such railway and the rate of remuneration; and the Syndicate have been warned, and know that the Government will not hesitate from time to time to deal with the reconstruction of rates as the road extends from east to west, and as the comparative profits and expenses of running the road alter with every mile of railway that is constructed and brought into operation. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has spoken about the land regulations, and said there have been several changes. There have been, and I really expect, and I am not ashamed to say so, that further experience may cause the Government from time to time to alter those regulations. If we find any regulation is an obstruction to settlement, we will alter it; if we find the price of land is too low, we will increase it; if it is too high, we will diminish it; all those things must be matters which can only be dealt with as in the progress of the country the necessity of change or amendment is shown to exist. There is one thing clear, however, that by no chance can the individual settler be prevented from getting his land if he chooses to go there, without the intervention of the middleman, whether a rich capitalist or colonization association. The homestead principle is going to be reserved and preserved most carefully, and when you remember that all those colonization societies can only, under the present regulations, secure lands to the north of the Pacific Railway, twenty-four miles from the railway belt, and twelve miles on each side of any subsidiary road that may run through the country in any direction, the House will see that those companies cannot in any way interfere with the early settlement of the country. Of course, the rush will be to get as near railways as possible, and we preserve to the settler the right to establish himself within one inch of the railway if he goes there first and makes his entry on the even-numbered lots, whatever its value may be. We have carefully guarded the right of the immigrant, and even under the most sanguine view as to the rush of population into that country during the next few years, there will not be any lack of good land in the vicinity of railways; and before colonization and other societies—which I am happy to say have been established in very large numbers and are offering large sums of money for tracts of land—can commence to bring in immigrants, each immigrant must have made up his mind that it is better he should pay those colonization companies for the land he requires rather than he should take the land for nothing in the vicinity of the railway. While we have thus protected the actual settler for years and years, if the present policy be continued by the present or any succeeding Government, from the chance of being imposed upon, we have not forgotten the promise made by the Government that they would make the land in that country recoup to the Dominion the $25,000,000 that we have promised the Syndicate, and what the Dominion has already spent, or is spending, on the Pacific Railway. There is no reason in the world, as I have urged again and again, why the people of the older Provinces should put their hands in their pockets and settle that country and improve it and build railways at their expense. That country, which is going to reap the advantage of those railways, should provide the cost of the improvements, and the North-West, I am happy to say, is so rich and will be so sought after, that what was a reasonable proposition at the beginning is now a certainty, namely, that it will be able to sell sufficient land that, while preserving the homesteading right, it would be able to repay to those who have contributed to the taxes necessary in connection with building the road, the money with interest added. My hon. friend speaks about the Civil Service Act, and he indulges in a little good-natured badinage about political patronage, and says he does not know whether the Government would pay sufficient attention to the representations of my hon. friend, the member for Beauharnois. All I can say is this: that we will pay at least as much attention to the representations of my hon. friend from Beauharnois as hon. gentlemen opposite did to those of the member for West Elgin. The hon. gentleman refers to the proposed legislation regarding fugitive offenders and the law under the Ashburton Treaty. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that it would be well that that law should be extended—that the treaty should be extended, and that the number of offences under the treaty should be increased. I think now that there is such a similarity between the criminal law in the United States and Canada that every felony, and some of the crimes which are not technically called felonies, might well be subjects for surrender. If we can send back to Quebec a man who commits a crime in that Province, and escapes to Ontario because we have faith in their tribunals, we should have the same faith in the American tribunals and return their offenders across our borders, having every confidence that they will have as fair a trial as in our own country. I know that my hon. friend, and the Administration with which he was connected, attempted to deal with this subject. It is one which is not altogether, or in any considerable degree, within our power; it is only by action with the Mother Country and through the Mother Country that we can hope that a treaty may be made extending the terms of the Ashburton Treaty. The case which the hon. gentleman mentions, going on in Toronto, is certainly a strong instance of the imperfections of the treaty. Such a case arose when I was Minister of Justice, and, there being no Habeas Corpus, I tried the matter as on the original information, and the party was found guilty and returned to the gaol from which he feloniously escaped. The hon. gentleman, in referring to the trade which has been opened with Brazil, says that he would like to see all such commercial developments under the control of our own agents. If my memory serves me right, when we did appoint a quasi-diplomatic agent, one who was as nearly an ambassador as our colonial connection would permit, the hon. gentleman indulged in a good deal of the sarcasm, which he can use so powerfully and so successfully sometimes, upon the appointment of Sir Alexander Galt. I may say that in consequence of such arrangements made in England, Her Majesty's Government have agreed that in commercial treaties with any nations whatever, in which we may be interested, he shall be present as an assessor, and shall be put in immediate communication with those through whom the negotiations are going on. He has been so recognized both in Madrid and Paris, and though political events have, as we all know, prevented the progress of the treaty with the Mother Country, so successful have been our attempts to have control of our own treaty-making, that Her Majesty's Government have agreed that if no commercial treaty shall be made between France and England, our representative may negotiate with France and make an arrangement on our behalf, so that Canada will be enabled to deal directly with other nations in matters affecting our trade and commerce. I shall not now allude to the question of disallowance. That is a serious question, involving questions of constitutional law, questions between the Dominion Government and Parliament and the Provincial Governments and Legislatures, and matters which, as the hon. gentleman knows, must be carefully handled and fully and dispassionately discussed. I hope that these questions will be approached by both sides of the House with an ardent desire to prevent constitutional difficulties or undue friction between the Provincial and Dominion Legislatures, or undue exercise of power by any of these bodies. My hon. friend is surprised at the breach of Parliamentary practice by the Minister of Finance in announcing to the public generally, in these democratic days, that there would be a reduction of the tea and coffee duties. My hon. friend, I think, has carried out the old parliamentary practice, and has observed that respect which a Minister of Finance ought to pay Parliament in making his announcements. If I remember aright, the hon. gentleman took occasion last Session to say that if there were no negotiations going on for a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States, and if the state of the public chest would allow it, he would introduce a measure for the reduction or abolition of the duties on tea and coffee. There can be no mistake that he made such an announcement, and when he made the statement at the hustings or on the platform he was merely conveying to the public what he had previously, with due respect, conveyed to Parliament at his last Session. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, is rather mixed in his recollection about the tea and coffee duties. I think he stated that we had increased those duties.

Mr. BLAKE. No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He said that we imposed them. The hon. gentleman must know that they were an old source of revenue, that they were increased by the Finance Minister in the Government of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), and that we reduced them.

Mr. BLAKE. There were no tea and coffee duties when my hon. friend was in office.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And he imposed them, and now, under the favor of Providence and with the assistance of hon. gentlemen opposite, we propose to take them off. I have only one thing more to say, and that is, that I quite agree with the graceful and sympathetic terms in which my hon. friend spoke of the assassination of the President of the United States. It thrilled the heart of every man in Canada with horror to hear that, so causelessly, so sinfully, so wickedly, and so ferociously—from a mere desire for notoriety, or from some latent feeling of vindictiveness which we cannot fathom—so valuable and blameless and so worthy a life should have been shortened just as it promised to enter upon a new career of usefulness. I can only say, in conclusion, that I trust my hon. friend opposite and myself will conduct our discussions—the frailty of human kind intervening and interposing—in the same kindly spirit which I hope has actuated both of us in our remarks to-day.

On paragraph 26,

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to say, in answer to the allusion of the hon. gentleman to another speech, that I knew no more of the contents of that speech than the hon. gentleman himself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I certainly knew nothing of it.

MURRAY CANAL.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings) enquired, Whether the survey of the Murray Canal has been completed, and if so, has the route been definitely defined, and whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with its construction and when?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, in answer to the hon. member, that the final location is now being determined by the Chief Engineer, when contracts will be immediately asked for and the work vigorously prosecuted.

PROMISSORY NOTES AND BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce an Act during the present Session to repeal the "Act to impose duties on Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange?"

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The intention of the Government with respect to this subject can only be properly stated when the Budget is brought down.

SALE AND MANUFACTURE OF CANADIAN TOBACCO.

Mr. VALLÉE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to alter the law respecting the sale and manufacture of Canadian tobacco, in such a manner as to allow farmers to sell their tobacco in the leaf, and so as to enable manufacturers of foreign tobacco to manufacture at the same time Canadian tobacco, both kinds in the same establishment? Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce the duty of fourteen cents per pound on tobacco manufactured from Canada leaf?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I must answer the hon. member's question in the same terms as I answered the enquiry of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson).

ESTATES OF INSOLVENT DEBTORS.

Mr. HOUDE, for Mr. GAULT, enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session to provide for the equal division of the estates of insolvent debtors?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not the intention of the Government to introduce such a Bill.

IMPORTATIONS INTO BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. DECOSMOS enquired, What is the total value of merchandise imported into British Columbia from the other Provinces of the Dominion, during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1881? 2. What is the total amount imported by sea from Montreal, or other eastern ports, into British Columbia, during the last fiscal year? 3. What amount was imported in the same period into that Province by overland route via San Francisco? 4. How much of the merchandise so imported was domestic, and how much foreign?

Mr. BOWELL. There are no returns in the Department affording such information, but I have telegraphed to the Collectors to ascertain whether they can supply it.

CONTRACTS ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. DECOSMOS enquired, What was the total value of the work performed up to December 31st last, by Onderdonk & Company, contractors, on the Emory-Savona contracts of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as estimated by Government engineers? 2. What is the total amount that had been paid thereon to the contractor up to that date? 3. How much of these railway contracts was then completed? 4. How many tons of rails were there then at Emory, including what may have been used in construction? 5. How many tons of rails are now on the way to Emory, and how many tons for Port Moody?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg leave to say, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that the total value of work done, as estimated by the engineers, on the contract referred to, is $1,804,824; that the amount of money paid is $1,624,300; that no part of the work is entirely completed, but that rails are laid for about twelve miles, and the work is in progress all along the line. The number of tons of rails at Emory, including those laid on the track, is 5,077. There are now on the way to Emory's Bar 1,490 tons; there are no rails on the way to Port Moody.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. HOUDE enquired, Whether the report of the Civil Service Commission is signed by all the members of that Commission; and if not, whether the report of the minority will be presented to the House with that of the majority?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The report is not unanimous. The minority report will be brought down.

PARLIAMENTARY PRINTING.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved for a return showing the amount paid for printing, by order of the Government, to any person or persons other than the contractor for parliamentary printing, the persons or firms to which such money was paid, and the nature of work done or the name of the document printed. He said: I wish to say, in connection with this resolution, that I made a motion somewhat similar last Session, to which no answer has yet been made. I would like an answer to this motion at as early a date as possible. I find, on looking over the list of last Session, that to as many as seventy-seven motions for returns adopted by this House, no answers were given. I trust this will not be one of the unfortunate motions to be cast into the waste basket.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that a Special Committee of seven Members be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees ordered by the House on Thursday the 9th instant, and that Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Leonard Tilley, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Hector Langevin, Messrs. Blake, Mackenzie and Laurier do compose the said Committee.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire to say that I propose, to-morrow, to ask the hon. gentleman to make the usual explanations as to Ministerial changes. I think, if twenty-four hours were sufficient to make all the changes, twenty-four hours ought to be sufficient to make the explanations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

OTTAWA, 14th February, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

COMMITTEES APPOINTED.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD reported lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees of the House, from the Special Committee appointed to prepare said lists.

Ordered, That the said Report be concurred in.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that their Honors will unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses, on the subject of the Printing of Parliament; and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing will act as members of the said Joint Committee on Printing.

THE DUTY ON CANADIAN TOBACCO.

Mr. AMYOT in moving for a statement respecting the amount in detail, by counties, of the revenue produced by the duty on Canadian tobacco; also the detailed amount of the sum it has cost to collect this duty, and the amount derived from the fines imposed for the violation of the law on Canadian tobacco, the whole from 1st January to 31st December, 1881, said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to make an exhaustive speech on the question upon which I wish to throw some light. When the information which I require shall be before the House, it will, I think, be an easy task for me to prove that there is really no protection for Canadian tobacco, or in other words, that the cultivation of that plant does not participate in the advantages generally derived by the Tariff. It is admitted by those who know something about tobacco that there is between Canadian and American tobacco a difference between their intrinsic value of at least 7 cents a pound. Taking this as a standpoint, Mr. Speaker, and admitting that there is a difference in the intrinsic value, and then comparing the differential duty of 14 cents on Canadian tobacco with that of 20 cents on foreign manufactured tobacco, it will at once be found that there is a difference of 1 cent of protection in favor of foreign tobacco. If, in the next place, one calculates in detail the cost of foreign tobacco and of Canadian manufactured tobacco, it will be necessarily shown that this lack of protection represents much more than 1 cent. I have obtained from large manufacturers figures that prove that in order to give growers any kind of protection on Canadian tobacco as compared with American manufactured tobacco, it will be requisite to make a change in the actual duty and reduce from 14 to 6 cents the duty levied on it at present; thus, if one calculates the cost proper of tobacco, the cost of its carriage into town, the amount to be paid to the manufacturer, and if one adds thereto the profit of the manufacturer and of the retailer, one will find that one gets very good American tobacco at 37½ cents a pound. This, based on the following estimated calculation: the present value of American tobacco reckoned at 6 cents a pound, carriage from the United States and Customs' dues, $6\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound; packing, 2 cents a pound; manufacturing and manipulating, 2 cents a pound; wholesale manufacturer's profit, 2 cents a pound; retailer's profit, 5 cents a pound, and Government duty, 20 cents a pound. Now, with regard to Canadian tobacco, if one adds together 14 cents Government duty, 2 cents for carriage, 2 cents for manufacturing, cutting and manipulating, 2 cents for packing, $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents for the manufacturer's profit, 5 cents for that of the retailer, one gets $34\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound. What remains then as profit for the grower? About 3 cents a pound. Hence it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that there is actually no protection for Canadian tobacco. Now, if I am to believe the reports for 1880, all these duties which are levied on Canadian tobacco by means of stamps, licenses, &c., have brought the Government about \$7,600 for the past year. It is evident that the Government cannot, under such circumstances, derive any profit from the duty on Canadian tobacco, for \$7,600 do not represent an amount sufficient to cover the expenses incurred in collecting this duty. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, as well as I am myself, that it necessitates a whole host of officials to collect this duty, the establishing of offices, the engraving of stamps and other expenses as a natural sequence. Thus it is that the Government does not derive any revenue from this tax, but that it meets on the contrary with a deficit. Who, then, Mr. Speaker, is interested in such a system? Is it the grower? I have just shown, I think, that he does not get any protection, and whilst receiving no protection he finds himself constantly face to face with difficulties; he is, for instance, compelled to shape the tobacco, an operation for which there is no reason, and which causes considerable loss of time to the grower. Ere a pound of tobacco can leave his premises, he must have license, without which he cannot dispose of his tobacco. The law remains a dead letter, for no one takes out a license or submits to all the formalities. According to the present law the grower must roll his tobacco before it leaves his premises; then go to town, to reach which he has sometimes to travel a long distance, in order to procure the stamps; he then has to return, and if he has not a sufficiency of stamps the whole of his tobacco is immediately confiscated. The following case occurred lately:—A grower came to Quebec and purchased stamps for 350 pounds of tobacco; on returning to Lévis he stamped his tobacco, but it had so happened that his tobacco had dried, and that each pound did not represent what it did previously; thus he had a certain number of rolls of tobacco which were not stamped; he declined to sell these; nevertheless a revenue officer impelled by a motive which it might not be opportune to mention in this House, went to the grower's house, seized all his tobacco, as well as his horse and cart, and removed the whole; whilst the grower, who had honestly endeavored to fulfil the obligations of the law, was compelled to pay a considerable sum to recover his horse and cart, besides losing all his tobacco. On other occasions revenue officers and their subordinates, animated with a zeal hard to explain, have of a sudden entered respectable houses, where there might or not be people in bad health, broken open chests and cupboards, made confiscations or threatened to do so, and then left with that air of triumph which has the effect of causing the law to be laughed at, when enforced in such style. The present law is, therefore, not only unjust, but unreasonable, and imposes on growers formalities that have no cause to exist; a remedy is required, and I have no doubt that the Government will find one. I know that it is favorably inclined towards making all classes enjoy the advantages of that protection which has done the country so much good, and which has so powerfully contributed towards recalling prosperity; and I feel certain that when all this is proved to the Government, it will be the first—if the statement which I ask confirms my statements—to bring to this House a measure that will do justice to the growers,—by granting them the protection that they ask for,—which will remove the obstacles which impede this culture, by which the revenue of the Government will be considerably increased. It will be objected that if Canadian tobacco is grown on so large a scale, that the importation of foreign tobacco will thereby be diminished. Not so, Mr. Speaker, for three-fourths of the population who actually buy foreign tobacco, will continue to smoke it, as they have acquired a taste for it. There was a time when Canadian tobacco was not taxed; just as large a quantity of foreign tobacco was consumed nevertheless, and it will be the same in the future. With regard to the revenue collected by means of a duty on Canadian tobacco, it will increase considerably, and for this reason: the duty of 14 cents levied, actually is so excessive, that no one pays it, and that every one defrauds the revenue. Now, were the duty fixed at 6 cents, or at a reasonable figure, every one would pay it, and the revenue would be considerably increased. Let us encourage and protect this culture and thus both increase the revenue and meet the unanimous wishes of the people. That is my reason, Mr. Speaker, for presenting the foregoing motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, the motion of the hon. member cannot meet with any difficulty, and the statement which he asks for will be brought before the House. I seize the opportunity of congratulating the hon. member upon his maiden speech before this House. I feel convinced that he will be a valuable acquisition to members following and taking part in the debates; and I am certain, from the practical manner with which he has handled his subject, that he will be of assistance to us upon other questions than that of Canadian tobacco. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will excuse me, if I do not agree with him upon his argument concerning the duty on tobacco and the seizures that have occurred. The question will assuredly receive the attention of the Government, if it has not already done so; and if the Government is able to do anything in the matter, I am certain that the hon. member will have the pleasure of hearing the hon. Minister of Finance refer to the subject, when his Budget is brought down.

Motion agreed to.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Before the House adjourns, I desire to make the customary explanations respecting the changes in the Government. The only change in the personnel has been by the elevation of the late Minister of Justice, Mr. McDonald, to the Chief Justiceship of Nova Scotia, and the appointment of Mr. McLelan as a Minister in his place. The Department of Justice becoming vacant by the elevation of Mr. McDonald, Sir Alexander Campbell was transferred from the Post Office Department and appointed in his stead. The Secretary of State, Mr. O'Connor, was transferred to the Post Office Department, and the President of the Council, Mr. Mousseau, was appointed Secretary of State. Mr. McLelan, the new Minister, taking the position of President of the Council.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend's explanation partakes rather of the character of a statement. He has stated to us certain facts which the Official Gazette, and the other sources of public information, have rendered us familiar with some time since; but he has not given us any information which the House would have been glad to know. I had the good fortune last Session to be able to agree very cordially with the hon. gentleman in one of the transfers he then announced, and it is my misfortune not to be able to agree with one portion of his present announcement. Last Session he announced that the Post Office Department had been transferred from the present incumbent to Sir Alexander Campbell, and I stated that I believed that change to be in the public interest. The hon. gentleman has re-transferred the former incumbent to the Post Office Department, and I am, of course, unable to say that I think the public interests have been served by that change, because it is the reverse of what I approved of last Session. With respect to the Minister of Justice, we are gradually being shorn of our prerogatives here. Last Session the First Minister announced that he had transferred one of the great revenue departments to the Upper House. The Department of Inland Revenue ceased to be an appanage of the Chamber of the people, and was transferred to the Senate. Up to this Session, at any rate, we have been accustomed to regard the Ministry of Justice as belonging to us. As Attorney-General and Minister of Justice, the gentleman filling that position has important duties to discharge of a quasi-judicial nature with reference to the legislation of this Chamber; and we know that judicial questions will be discussed which will require his presence here, and the people cannot be satisfied with any other result. I regret, therefore, that the disposition has still further been shown to transfer to the other Chamber, Departments which have hitherto been regarded as part of this Chamber. I regret it, moreover, because I do not think it can be said that we were altogether lacking here in gentlemen able to fill that office. The hon. gentleman opposite did, I believe, try his prentice hand at the discharge of those functions, during the absence of the Minister of Justice, and exercised those functions by disallowing the Streams Bill, in which I apprehend he sent himself up Salt River. But there are other gentlemen in this Chamber, who, I think, hold themselves competent to fill the position of Minister of Justice, and the regret that the office has been transferred to the Upper House, is intensified by the regret we feel that it is not filled by one of these gentlemen. With reference to the other change—that by which the President of the Council has been introduced into this Chamber—I am sure we must tender him our felicitations. He is, indeed, a fortunate man, a fortunate politician. I remember, about eleven years ago, when he left this Chamber in order to assume an office of responsibility and emolument, which it was deemed inconsistent with the weaker and frailer nature of the members of this House to fill, but which, when wrapt in senatorial robes, he might well hold without feeling that it interfered with his position or legislative functions. He now comes back to hold a still higher office with greater responsibilities. He returns to us in good company. Fortunate in the association as well as in all the other particulars of his career, he comes, introduced by, in the closest intimacy with, championed by, his friend and provincial chief, the Minister of Railways. Well do I recollect that it was from the fervent eloquence of my friend, the President of the Council, garnished with episodes from Holy Writ, that I learned my first estimate of the political character of the hon. Minister of Railways, and I am bound to say that all subsequent experience upon that score has convinced me with an ever-increasing and deepening conviction of the sagacity of comprehension, the accuracy of view, which my hon. friend the President of the Council had as to the public character of the hon. Minister of Railways when he gave to us all that estimate which still remains on record, and long will remain on record. It is but fitting that, after this length of time, the eulogist and the subject of the panegyric should appear, as they ought to appear, together. It is but fitting that these close and friendly associations, naturally resulting from the warm and zealous efforts of the hon. President of the Council, to place in his true light the hon. Minister of Railways, should be rewarded by his attaining under the auspices of the latter his present position, and we rejoice to know that they are now publicly, as well as privately, associated, no doubt, in the earnest effort, in their responsible positions, to verify by still further proofs, to give still further testimony to the truth of that estimate. I wish them no worse fortune than that they may succeed, than that they may, to adopt the phrase of the hon. gentleman, be loaded down with the share of the offerings that fall to the priest, and that they may be able early and once for all to convince the public that these eulogies are true and are applicable, not merely to their author, but also to their object. My hon. friend, in referring to the Ministerial changes, did not allude to another subject to which we must all refer with regret, but which is of sufficient public interest that I should ask an explanation regarding it. We are led to believe that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is unfortunately seriously ill. I wish to know if it is expected that he will resume his seat this Session, and whether it is intended his office should continue in its present condition for any considerable length of time?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is quite true my answer was rather in the form of a statement, because I really did not think it required much explanation. In the first place, the fact of the late Minister of Justice being appointed Chief Justice and withdrawing from the Government necessitated his place being filled, and it was filled accordingly by Sir Alexander Campbell. The hon. gentleman objects very much to the Minister of Justice being in the Upper House. I think if any one ought to be there it ought to be the Minister of Justice. In fact, the office of the Minister of Justice is analogous to that of the Chancellor of England in the House of Lords—where all matters of legislation are revised. The Department of Justice is not a spending department in any great degree, as the salaries of the different Justices are appointed by statute. By the re-appointment of the present Postmaster General, we bring back to this House, for the efficiency of which my hon. friend is so anxious, the office which is a large paying Department. My hon. friend alluded to the fact that the present Secretary of State acted for the Attorney-General in the matter of the Streams Bill. That was simply because the late Minister of Justice did not happen to be in his place at the time he had prepared his report and did not sign it, but he is responsible for it, and readily assumed the responsibility. As to the remarks respecting the hon. President of the Council, I am very glad to see that the hon. gentleman pays so much attention to his opinions, and is so much impressed with his judgment and ability. I can only say he will exhibit the same eloquence, power, efficiency and ability in his present office. With respect to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I regret to state that, since his health broke down very painfully last summer, he has not materially improved. His physical health has increased, but his nervous debility has not been removed. We hope it will; and we think it but fair an opportunity should be given for the recuperative powers of nature to exercise their effect. In the meantime the public service loses nothing, as the President of the Council performs the duties of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; duties which his acquaintance with our marine interests renders him well able to fulfil.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. We all agree cordially with the last remarks of the Minister of the Interior. We trust that the rest he is about to obtain may restore the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to his duties. As to the point made by the hon. Minister of the Interior, that the Department of Justice is best administered in the Upper House, it has certainly the merit of novelty on this side of the Atlantic. I am not aware that we are about to make our Minister of Justice a judge who is to sit in court and decide on matters generally, although I am informed that is being actually done to some extent in the present instance. I think this is a fitting opportunity to call the attention of the House, and notably that of my hon. friend the President of the Council, to certain extraordinary statements which have appeared in the public journals, purporting to be faithful copies or extracts of speeches and declarations made by him on a former occasion in another place. I should judge from the remarks of the hon. Minister of the Interior that he can hardly be aware of the extraordinary nature of those statements and of what they implied. According to the reports of journals of extremely wide circulation, language of very forcible character has been used by the President of the Council with regard to the hon. Minister of Railways. After a resume of the history of the Pictou Railway, with which most of us are more or less familiar, and after giving an account of the proceedings of the Minister of Railways in reference thereto, he goes on to say :

"But the picture, dark as it is, has something blacker still. I see there, standing in the background, the Provincial Secretary of Nova Scotia privately handing over to this same engineer a contract for the whole work. I see him shroud it in darkness and bury it for months in the grave of secrecy. And now the Provincial Secretary comes forward and tells us it was so hidden to serve the public interest; to enable Sandford Fleming, after he had taken the contract, to make better terms with the old contractors; to grind a few more dollars out of them. Public interest, indeed! Mr. Sandford Fleming's interests alone. Sir, I know not what term to apply to such conduct in a Government. I know not what to call it—I shall not venture an opinion; but in private life it is called extorting money under false pretences, and our laws make it indictable knavery."

He continued in the following language :—

"They have heard of men riding in public conveyances with a loose mantle about them and a pair of false hands folded in front to lull suspicion, while the real hands were finding their way into their fellow-travellers' pockets, and they now think that when the hon. gentleman put on the mantle of Herbert Huntington and the old Reformers, the hands he put to the plough were not real—that the real hands were hidden, that they might the better get deep to the arm-pits in the public chest, and they wait, they long for the opportunity to sweep him from his position. Therefore, Sir, there was no necessity to bring this case here to excite public opinion. But, Mr. Speaker, if having brought it here for investigation in the discharge of a public duty, what if the people should, on an examination of it, decide that the public interests have been bartered away and betrayed—that the man whom they once believed in as the apostle of retrenchment has become the great high priest of jobbery and corruption? Who then shall restrain limits to the just indignation as they take him, loaded down though he may be with the share of the offerings that fall to the priest, and impale him upon the horns of the altar at which he ministers."

I cordially join with my hon. friend beside me in congratulating ourselves on having restored to our seats a man so eloquent, with such a wealth of imagery, as that possessed by the hon. President of the Council. Those statements have been widely circulated; they are very grave. It is very important, in the interest of the public, that we should know the actual facts. A Minister of the Dominion of Canada ought to be like Cæsar's wife, beyond reproach and suspicion; and I am free to admit that, in my candid judgment, some of the present Ministers are beyond suspicion. Now, if this quotation I have made, and which purports to form part of the Official Report of the Debates of Nova Scotia, be false, then there is no more to be said, except that the newspapers which have published and circulated these things are, in my opinion, worthy of and liable to the most condign punishment. But if these statements be true, that is to say, if the President of the Council did really make assertions implying so much, involving so much, alleging so much against the Minister of Railways, as the statements which I have read, most clearly divers questions of interest would arise. Supposing the President of the Council was correct in describing the Minister of Railways at that time, and in that place, as he did, then I would like to know whether that Minister has since repented and become good, and fit to be the associate of the President of the Council? Or, take the other alternative: supposing that the President of the Council was wrong—that he improperly asserted those things of the hon. the Minister of Railways—then we would like to know, because those charges were publicly made and ought to be as publicly retracted, whether he has likewise repented and become good? It is very interesting to know how the matter stands at present: who is the penitent sinner. One of these hon. gentlemen must be. We know that in old times, in Nova Scotia, public men were sometimes involved in rather curious proceedings. Nova Scotia has produced very able men, but those able men have not been always quite so consistent as people could desire. Not quite, I repeat. I do not say that Nova Scotia is the only Province in which such things have occurred. I have known a notable case of a very prominent politician in Canada, who did, upon a time, denounce another prominent politician as a man steeped to the lips in corruption, and take him to his bosom later, after all. I well recollect that, and I am free to say I do not know that any particular harm resulted therefrom, at least in the direction apprehended. I have publicly stated before, and publicly repeat now, that I do not think that any moral injury accrued to the right hon. gentleman in respect to what he did then. I do not think it would be possible for any amount of corruption in another to do any harm to that hon. gentleman. But I have a special reason for alluding to that matter, which is this: very hard things have been often said of the Minister of Railways by eminent countrymen of his own. This is not the first time we have heard that men of high position in Nova Scotia have uttered and endorsed statements almost identical, though perhaps not so strongly worded, as those I have just read, made by the President of the Council. I think I have heard, and think there are on record in our Hansard, passages nearly as explicit, from the speeches of the present Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia. Now, those things uttered by men of such reputation and of such high position, necessarily produce an unfavorable effect against the Minister of Railways in the public mind. That hon. gentleman occupies a prominent position in the House, and it is often said that when the right hon. gentleman proceeds to supervise the Canadian Pacific Railway, an event which we hope is a long time off, the hon. the Minister of Railways is the only man fit to fill his shoes and tread in his footsteps. Being a personage of such importance and so distinguished, it is most desirable that the earliest opportunity should be taken to enable the President of the Council, if he is wrong, to show us how he is mistaken; or, if the hon. the Minister of Railways was guilty of all these things attributed to him, to allow him to make a public profession of penitence thereon. I would be most loth to do that hon. Minister any injustice. I may say with perfect truth that my most earnest wish and most fervent desire for him is that he should get justice, and that right speedily. To borrow an expression from a speech of the hon. Minister of the Interior: "That is what I wish for, that is what I hope for, that is what I pray for." But on the present occasion I wish to give the President of the Council an opportunity of answering categorically two or three questions on this important point. I think that it is due to himself, due to the House, due to the position of the Minister of Railways. I desire to know whether these statements, purporting to be speeches of his, extracted from the Official Debates of Nova Scotia, are true and correctly reported, or substantially so, and if so, then I want to know if he still believes that he correctly described the Minister of Railway's conduct at the time and place I have referred to; and whether the President of the Council, if he correctly described him then, is quite satisfied that that hon. Minister has since abjured his evil ways and practices. But if, on the other hand, the President of the Council was mistaken and misinformed, then, Sir, I think it is due to the hon. gentleman, whom he designated as a great high priest of corruption, and by various other hard names, that the President of the Council should come forward and declare to us that it was all a mistake, that this all happened in the unregenerate days when he violently opposed Confederation, and refused to recognize the hon. Minister of Railways as the incarnation of all that is great and good.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I am sure it must be gratifying to this House, and I am sure it will be gratifying to the people of Canada, to know that the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition, especially the hon. gentleman from West Durham (Mr. Blake), and the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), take such a lively interest in the welfare of the country. They have not much to do, it is true, now with the conduct of its business, but they are able to criticize it as conducted by others. It is satisfactory to know that so much good feeling exists. The hon. member for West Durham is especially anxious that there should be no lack of harmony, no lack of a feeling of true community amongst the members of the Government—that they should all be in accord, and all agreeing well together. He seems to doubt whether that can be so, because he rakes up some old story of a quarter of a century ago, when strong men, fighting hard fights, said hard things, as men always do. But men are especially apt to say sometimes more than they exactly mean, and it is not a very good thing for society generally to bring up those things, because if we were to rake them up we would find that very awkward things might occur. Much later than a quarter of a century ago, even the hon. member for Centre Huron found it necessary to give a very different statement of what he thought to be true. He went to England to borrow money, and he conducted our affairs there in such a shape that he thought his credit was not very good, and he had to present, as he said, the silver side of the shield. When he came back here he presented the other side; but, of course he was only acting the part of a statesman, he was only trying to get money for Canada, he was only cajoling the unfortunate people of Egypt—or England—to some purpose, and it was not out of the way. I might also call that hon. gentleman's attention to something still later, and something that I do not think can be fairly urged against him except as an arm of party warfare. I only cite it as an example. Not long since we have heard his organ, the powerful newspaper we all respect and admire, the Globe, pointing at him as a sort of heaven-born financier, a man by whom the financial destinies of the country might safely be conducted, a man who would take care of our affairs. If he turns back to the files of that paper twenty-five years since, he will find himself designated as a mixer and muddler of figures—a man who was utterly unable to carry on any business whatever. Now, which of these things are true? Is the hon. member for Centre Huron a heaven-born financier, or is he a miserable mixer and muddler of figures, unable to carry on a Division Court clerkship? The Globe said he was the one thing, and it says he is the other. The people of Canada, carried away by the great influence of that paper, believed the Globe; they thought that he was simply a mixer and muddler of figures. Now, I cite things only to show that we should be careful not to attribute to men an evil disposition in the conduct of national affairs, because at one time or another they have been in antagonism, and there is no reason now to attribute to the President of the Council or to the Minister of Railways any ill-feeling at all. To the credit of the Minister of Railways I can say that all the men from his own Province who opposed him long years since are now here working in cordial harmony with him. Such is poor human nature. We have another example here before us. The air is full of rumors that even now there is strife and disunion, and that parties are being rent asunder among hon. gentlemen on the other side. We hear that there is some little trouble, that their little domestic matters are not conducted with perfect satisfaction. Well, all we can do is, entering into this matter with the same peaceful spirit as manifested in the elegant language of the hon. member for West Durham, to hope that they may get these matters healed, that they may be able to frame a policy such as will satisfy themselves, if not the country, and that at least they may be able to agree decently and harmoniously together. It is an advantage to the country. We are so strong on this side of the House, the Government is supported by a party so massively strong in the country, that even if there were little dissensions among us, it would not make any difference. But those gentlemen cannot afford to have any dissensions; there is not enough of them; if they were to divide up they are so few that there would be two on one side and one on the other. The thing becomes unsafe. I submit that perhaps in these matters it is as well that we do not, in this debate, do anything more than deal with the business before us, and not try to rake up issues of five and twenty years ago, for the purpose of showing that one speaker used strong and abusive language towards another.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The House, I think, will be a little surprised at the tone which the hon. leader of the Opposition and his former colleague, who sits beside him, have adopted on the present occasion. It is usual, I believe, on occasions of this kind not to exchange exactly the kind of courtesy that these hon. gentlemen have felt it their duty to use on the present occasion; but, Sir, I am not at all surprised that, placed in the very embarrassing position in which those hon. gentlemen are, smarting under the continued defeat which they have met with, they should now go out of their way to rake up the old quarrels of Nova Scotia, so long ago as 1866. I am glad those hon. gentlemen, goaded as they have been by the party lash of the paper that sustains them, have not ventured to assail my position in this House with anything more recent than the events of that period. Since I have occupied the high position of Minister of Railways and Canals, it has been my duty to make contracts involving an expenditure of something like $130,000,000. The country has been told from year to year that when Parliament met I should be called to account. Those hon. gentlemen have been goaded by the party lash of the Globe newspaper to assail me in my position in this House, and yet, down to the present hour, there is not a man among them who has dared, in his place in Parliament, to do so. I defy any hon. gentleman opposite to challenge the integrity of my conduct, and I invoke a comparison of my conduct with that of my predecessor who now sits on that side of the House. When those hon. gentlemen are ready to bring forward anything that interests the Parliament of Canada, and which comes within the purview of this Parliament, they will find me non nunquam paratus. I am ready to meet them on every issue, and with evidence to confront any charges they may make, and I challenge the closest scrutiny of my public acts here or elsewhere. It is true, Sir, that in the old party struggles of Nova Scotia, where very intense and strong feelings existed between parties, strong and embittered language was sometimes used between political rivals. But these hon. gentlemen ought not to forget that when I came into public life in 1855, nearly twenty-seven years ago, it is a matter of history, that I stood confronted by the old Liberal party, the old Reform party of that Province, numbering at least a dozen able, prominent and influential leaders in its ranks; and it is my proud boast to-day that, fierce as had been the battles, contests and encounters between myself and them, every man of them who has since died—and many of them are gone—died my personal friend and my warm political supporter. And every man of those old Liberal leaders of the great Reform party of Nova Scotia who lives to-day is my warm personal friend and my strong political supporter. And more, Sir, in the year 1855, one of the most intelligent and independent counties to be found in the wide domain of Canada—the county where I was born and where I am best known—elected me as its representative, and down to this hour, during nearly twenty-seven years, that county has given me its invariable and unqualified support, while these hon. gentlemen have been dismissed, contemptuously dismissed, from the seats which they held. They have been weighed in the balance and found wanting. They have gone about like Japhet in search of his father, looking for other constituencies to be bribed into electing them, while I have had the distinguished honor of having, in the county where I was born and best known, the unqualified, independent support of the electors for nearly twenty-seven years. These hon. gentlemen talked about the Pictou Railway, and they talked for six weeks about the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, in vain; but no, not in vain, for it had the effect of their being unable even to hold their own supporters together in this House or out of it. The reason they talk of the Pictou Railway is that they suppose they are best able to assail me on matters with which this House may not be very familiar. But they should not forget that on this floor one of their own colleagues, an able man, Mr. Jones, of Halifax, fought that question out to the bitter end with me—discussed it in all its bearings in their presence here—and with what result? With the result that when we went back to Nova Scotia, when the battle was ended, it was found that Mr. Jones was dismissed by his constituency, the large metropolitan constituency of Halifax, while I came back associated with fifteen supporters from Nova Scotia instead of five, which was all I had when the battle began. They should not forget that in the county of Pictou, where there was some feeling in relation to this matter at one time, I went down last summer at the solicitation of my friends there, and led our forces to the attack, and, after I had been confronted by all that could be said or done where the matter was best known, the independent electors of that great constituency of Pictou elected, as their representative in this House, a gentleman who had been unknown before in political life, in opposition to the popular and talented Mr. Carmichael who was long its representative. I give these facts as evidence that these gentlemen have failed in Nova Scotia, utterly and completely, to excite any antagonism to myself, or to prejudice the proud, the triumphant, the distinguished position I occupy as a representative of that Province: and they will be regarded as unworthy the position they occupy if they venture to go back to the events of 1866 in order to attack me. I defy them to challenge my conduct as a public Minister and a public man in relation to the events known in this House and in this country. Now, Sir, I may say, in reference to my friend Mr. McLelan, it was a source of just pride to me to find my old and bitter opponent for many years, Joseph Howe, on my side. It is a source of pride and satisfaction for me to know that having taken a straightforward course from the commencement, old opponents who had opposed me with great zeal on the Reform side in Nova Scotia could sit down in the Cabinet of the country with me when the time came for the public interests to require it. The course pursued by the pseudo-Reformers of Canada, the insincerity they exhibited, drove both Mr. McLelan and Mr. Howe from their ranks, and it is equally a source of great satisfaction to me to know that we have been able to meet on common ground, and discharge those duties imposed upon us in relation to the public interests of the country. Mr. Archibald has been referred to; but long after the circumstances to which allusion is made the hon. gentleman who referred to him knew that he (Mr. Archibald) had himself stated over his own signature, that he had never for a single moment ventured to impute to me anything dishonorable as a man in any sense of the word. That hon. gentleman knows right well that the very fact of the association of these hon. gentlemen from Nova Scotia with myself, gives to the world, in the clearest and most distinct terms, evidence that they believe me worthy of their confidence as well as the confidence of the public. But, Sir, from whom come these charges of inconsistency? Who are the men, who, in this period of the nineteenth century, venture on the floor of this House to talk of inconsistency because public men who have been in strong and bitter party antagonism are found combining together in the public interest? Do these charges come from gentlemen in a position to throw the first stone? Do they forget that the man held up to public execration by themselves and their press, who was denounced from one end of the country to the other, was received by them with open arms and all his offences forgotten the moment he was ready to become their associate? Do not they know that if ever any body of men took liberties with public consistency, they are the men who have done so whenever their interests required it? They are men who, having failed to obtain the confidence of the people of this country, never scrupled to combine with any person, no matter how violently they had traduced or assaulted him. They must take either one horn of the dilemma or the other; either they are ready to associate with any man however black his record, or they convict themselves of having, for personal or party purposes, denounced any gentleman who happened for the time to be opposed to them. But, Sir, I am not surprised that, smarting with defeat as they are, having tried their power in the House and found it nil, and having gone outside perambulating the country to the north, to the south, to the east and to the west, they come back, not to deal with the public interests of the country or to do the business before the House, but to vent the bitter spleen from which they suffer in consequence of their defeats. I congratulate the hon. gentleman who has opened this attack to-day on the courage which he shows at this late hour. I am glad that, having in vain, from the hour that the House took recess last year, when the hon. gentleman undertook to challenge the confidence of the country in the Government—having from that hour to this been unable to bring that hon. gentleman to bay, unable to get him to screw his courage up to the sticking point, so as to enable him to meet me in fair and open public discussion on a public platform, to deal with these questions—I say I congratulate him that he has managed to screw up his courage so as, out of the fyles of his party organ, to confront me with an event which occurred in Nova Scotia in 1866. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his great courage; but, Sir, I can tell him that no man so degraded himself in order to gain power as he did in Ontario. I tell him that he must stand convicted before the people of this country—and it is known everywhere that no man ever so degraded himself in order to obtain power as that hon. gentleman degraded himself in buying out one of the Ministers of a Government to which he was opposed. So long as that hon. gentleman lives he will have to meet the words: "Speak now." I say that he would give anything in his possession to wipe out the recollection of those words, which convicted him as a public man of forgetting, not merely what was due from one public man to another, but what was due from one gentleman to another, when he went to one of the members of the Ministry to which he was opposed, and made a corrupt arrangement which was afterwards rewarded by one of the highest judicial positions in this country—an arrangement, I say, for the most corrupt and dishonorable purpose by which one man could obtain the services of another. In conclusion I tell the hon. gentleman that here now, on this question, or any other connected with the public affairs of this country, either in my own Province, where my conduct as a Minister and as a man has been endorsed as few public men in this House ever had their conduct endorsed, or elsewhere, I am ready to meet him; and I challenge him, whenever he is ready for the issue, to meet me in fair and open discussion, and he will find me prepared for the combat.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think it will occur to the House, Sir, that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has travelled a little out of the record. He seemed at first to suppose that something unusual had been done in calling attention to the utterances of the distinguished gentleman who has lately been imported into this House as a Minister. Now, Sir, I do not think it is strange, but natural, that we should ask, when we heard that Mr. McLelan had been nominated President of the Council, who he was. I do not think that it is strange that hon. gentlemen with enquiring minds should say first of all, where does he come from? And they found he came from Nova Scotia. They remember that not many years ago he came to this House full of that bitterness which the hon. Minister had boasted that he had since extracted from him. They remember that the hon. gentleman, when he came here, protested, in the name of Nova Scotia, which sent him as one of its representatives, against the cause which the hon. Minister of Railways had pursued and to the view that in bartering and selling the rights of Nova Scotia he was promoting its interests; and it was natural that the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) should enquire, is this Minister the same Mr. McLelan? Then a little later on they saw him change his views. Why, they did not know; you cannot see motives, you cannot impute motives; but they saw him cross the floor not exactly cross the floor of this House, but assume a position which made it possible at the same time that he handed over his convictions to the Minister of Railways to accept an office from the Minister of Railways. Naturally my hon. friend, the member for Centre Huron, asks, is this the same Mr. McLelan who was appointed Commissioner of the Intercolonial Railway in such striking connection with his change of views on the great Nova Scotia question? It is a matter of history. Everybody would like to know who is this new Minister, and what he has done. Well, I do not think it is very strange that enquiry should be made respecting that hon. gentleman who distinguished himself in public life in Nova Scotia by bringing charges against the Minister of Railways, in connection with whom he came into the House, gross and base charges, which the Minister himself will admit, if true, to be widely calculated to destroy public confidence in him. The Minister of Railways boastfully told the House that he is a great man and occupies a high position; he taunted the Opposition on their minority in the House, he spoke indeed of everything except this particular matter. My hon. friends did not attack the hon. Minister of Railways, if the hon. Minister of Railways was an innocent man, they attack the circumstance that his colleague to-day had never purged himself from the accusation which, if an honorable man, and he still believed that accusation true, would have made it impossible for him to join the Administration. Sir, I think we must come back to the original position, notwithstanding the rhetoric and vehemence of the hon. gentleman. We do not want explanations respecting the "speak now" business. The duty of the Opposition is to enquire whether the new Minister is this Mr. McLelan, and whether he retains the same views, or whether he has changed his views. Before he asks the confidence of the House and uses his influence and eloquence, as he doubtless will do, to impress on hon. members his views, they had a right to ask whether he had changed his views as stated by himself, that the present Minister of Railways was a public plunderer and a disgrace to the Province he represented. If the President of the Council has eaten humble pie and handed in his submission to that hon. gentleman, as the hon. gentleman has boasted here and often, and if he has given up the views which he at one time entertained, we have the right to ask what were the circumstances which led to the change. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that we were not in favor of reform, and it will be a great calamity if we find we have lost their confidence; but is it not enough that we are not up to the standard. What we want to know is this: is the hon. Minister of Railways the man the hon. President of the Council painted him, did he enter into a corrupt bargain, did he commit a great crime; and if not, he commits a great crime in not withdrawing those accusations, since he has found the virtue of the Minister of Railways whom he at one time denounced as a man utterly unworthy of confidence and trust.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. McLELAN. I am somewhat surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the attention which hon. gentlemen opposite have bestowed on me this afternoon, as I did not expect so much of their attention, especially upon those old matters which occurred so many years ago in Nova Scotia. During the past summer I had the honor of appearing before the electors of Colchester and of meeting opposition there. I expected that in the heat of the contest everything connected with Nova Scotia and Nova Scotian politics might possibly be introduced; they were introduced, and this very question, this very speech which the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) has quoted here to-day was brought before the electors who understood the whole position of the case, and they passed upon that question and upon all other questions which were then raised, and sent me here as their representative in this House by an overwhelming majority. The hon. leader of the Opposition has told the House that I am a lucky politician. I regret that I cannot return the compliment, for if ever there was an unlucky politician it is surely the hon. gentleman who leads the present Opposition. It is true that he is at the head of a party which is growing small by degrees and beautifully less, if I do not mistake public feeling; but the foundations of every position which he has taken as leader of that party have been swept away, and he has shown himself to be an unlucky leader and politician right through. But, Mr. Speaker, he says I am lucky, because, after twenty-five years of public life in this country, I have been a few months a member of the Cabinet. Let me say this: that after spending a quarter of a century in public life, I entered the Cabinet, not by intrigue on my own part, not by intrigue on the part of any of my personal friends, but I entered it honorably. I was invited to enter it, and the people of my county sustained me. Mr. Speaker, if report be true, there are men occupying the positions of leaders of parties, who did not reach those positions without the intrigue of their friends. The hon. member for Centre Huron has read portions of that speech, and has put to me certain questions. As the hon. Minister of Railways has stated, party lines in Nova Scotia previous to Confederation were drawn very clearly. Party contests were very severe, and public men in that contest did use very extreme language in their references to each other. The question of the Pictou Railway came upon us suddenly in 1866, and it was surrounded by circumstances that excited the fiercest opposition, and aroused all the old party feeling that was so intense in that Province. Reference has been made to the language used by the present Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, but he has declared over his own signature that he did not impute any personal motives of wrong on the part of the hon. Minister of Railways. Whatever I may have said on that occasion I say now, namely, that when that contract was complete, and when the whole history of the railway was made known to the people of Nova Scotia, no man will pretend to say that, whoever may have benefited, the hon. Minister of Railways never personally benefited by that contract. Therefore, all the insinuations that have been made against him by the hon. gentleman opposite are unworthy of repetition on the floor of this House. The hon. member for Centre Huroh has insinuated that I have changed my position in the parties, and he says that, not only in Nova Scotia, but in other Provinces, there have been changes in the party feelings of public men. I suppose the hon. gentleman is a very good authority on that matter. But the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) has referred more pointedly to me as having changed my party on the floor of this House and in the country. He has spoken of me as having sat on the opposite side of the House and holding certain views, and a short time afterwards coming to support the party who now rule this country. Let me say to the hon. gentleman and to this House, that when I was first elected to this House in 1867, I was not sent to support any particular party. I was elected on a certain pledge I gave to the electors of the county of Colchester. At that time the question of Confederation was before the people of Nova Scotia. The Confederation Act had been passed, and at the very first meeting held in my county, after I was nominated, I said to the people: "The Confederation Act is an accomplished fact, and we have to accept that Act; but I believe the terms of Confederation are unjust to the Province of Nova Scotia, and if I am elected as your representative, I will seek to modify and improve the terms with that Province." I was elected upon that pledge, the only pledge I have ever made upon the hustings, and with the help of others I succeeded in securing a modification of the financial terms of Confederation, and my pledge to the people of Colchester was redeemed. I then supported the party and the men who I believed were working in the best interests of the Province of Nova Scotia and the Dominion at large; and, Sir, I never had occasion to regret that. The hon. leader of the Opposition says that I am a lucky politician; but I do not see any great amount of luck in being called to the Cabinet after twenty-five years of public life. But I was surprised to find the hon. gentleman opposite bringing against me the charge that sixteen years ago I had delivered a certain speech in the Legislature of Nova Scotia, and that I had ventured to come on the floor of this Parliament without making the declaration that I was then wrong. I have already stated that when the whole history of the railway was revealed, it showed that no personal benefit accrued to the hon. the Minister of Railways from the construction of that work; and now, believing that the course pursued by the hon. the Minister of Railways is that best suited to serve the interests of Nova Scotia and the Dominion at large, I am proud to give him my support. It is true that men differ in opinion and sentiments, and very often use strong expressions in debate; but it is no discredit to a man, after having used those strong expressions, if he can lay them aside, and join with another in promoting the general interests of the country. I would rather stand in that position of having forgiven even my enemy than in the position of having betrayed my friend.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I am a little surprised at the course of my hon. friends on this side of the House. They seem to be astonished that they should be attacked by hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, Sir, how can they be surprised at that? I do not want to go back sixteen or twenty years, but I want to call attention to the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite during the last Parliament and during this Parliament. Can my hon. friends here be surprised at such ungenerous treatment, when the hon. the the leader of the Opposition, at the time he supported the hon. member for Lambton, would go out of the House instead of supporting and standing by him? Need any one be surprised who saw the course the hon. gentleman then pursued, tripping up from day to day my hon. friend from Lambton, making every move to belittle him and oust him from the position he occupied until finally he succeeded. Can my hon. friends be surprised then that the hon. leader of the Opposition should go back for twenty years to rake up something that we know nothing about. I do not believe that this discussion, brought on by the two hon. gentlemen opposite, is likely to be of any great advantage to this country. I do not see what advantage is to be gained by bringing up old dead issues, and declaring that two hon. gentlemen who acted on different sides at one time have since come together. All those who formerly opposed the hon. Minister of Railways in Nova Scotia, have since then given him their support. What better proof could we have of the confidence of the people of that Province in that hon. gentleman, than the fact that every strong man there has rallied to his support. I can understand that this House should feel indignant, because the character of every member, the character of the House, is involved, and that the hon. gentlemen who have been attacked should rise indignantly to repudiate the aspersions cast upon them; but the course pursued is only on a par with that followed by hon. gentlemen opposite in the past.

Mr. ANGLIN. Some remarks made by the hon. Minister of Railways renders it necessary that I should take part in this debate, although such was not my intention. Before coming to that matter, let me congratulate the hon. Minister of Railways upon the fact that the introduction of this topic by the leader of the Opposition has contributed in so great a degree to complete the triumph of which he boasts. He triumphed in the fact that he had brought Mr. Howe to his side by some means or other. He boasted of the fact that he had brought the hon. President of the Council by some means or other; but he was not able to boast that he had induced the hon. President of the Council to withdraw, in as public a manner as that in which he had uttered them, a single one of the charges made by him against the hon. Minister of Railways. Nor was it until the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) had repeated the demand made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, that the Hon. President of the Council was forced to say the little he did. For sixteen long years, according to his own account, he has allowed that grave circumstantial charge of corruption of the grossest character to stand unretracted, unapologized for, and unqualified. To-day it remains unretracted, but it is somewhat qualified. The hon. Minister of Railways, perhaps, not expecting that his new found colleague would have been willing to go quite so far in the way of self-humiliation, tried to divert attention from the real nature of the statement of the hon. leader of the Opposition by the skilful dodge of carrying the war into Africa, and making charges in return, incriminating the hon. leader of the Opposition. We are all accustomed to that; we found it previously tried by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton), who is always ready to come to the protection of the Government when he finds it in a very difficult position, by either distracting the attention of the House from the real question at issue or forcing the debate to a close. We are accustomed to hear the hon. Minister of Railways, when a charge is made against him, declare that since such charge was first made he had gone back to the people of Nova Scotia, and had been triumphantly sustained by them, and that, because he had been successful at an election, the charge, no matter how strong the evidence or respectable the person who made it, must be considered as thenceforth and for ever disproved. That is not logic or good sense. We know that elections do not always turn on those grave personal charges. We know they are very often determined by influences which blind a large portion of the electorate to the real question at issue, and to the character of the man they are induced to support. When the hon. gentleman spoke of the election for the county of Pictou, he indulged in his usual course of making his case much stronger than the facts justified. I had the honor of taking some small part in the elections for the county of Pictou. Although the hon. Minister of Railways would like the House to believe that the leader of the Opposition was afraid to meet him on the public platform, I cannot recollect that I had any very serious apprehensions when I had the honor of meeting the hon. gentleman. My impression is that if I had a little more of the fair play he imagined he gave me, I would have made a more favorable impression. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that at that election this question of the Pictou Railway was brought forward as one of the elements of the contest. I had the honor of being present at the public meeting addressed by the hon. gentleman on nomination day, and subsequently at the meeting held in the Town Hall of New Glasgow. At the nomination a slight allusion was made by one gentleman, Mr. Carmichael, to this matter of the Pictou Railway—a slight passing allusion. He spoke only a few minutes, and he was the only speaker who even glanced at that question. That question was not brought into the issue in that election at all. We were there to discuss the great question of the National Policy, and also to ask the meeting to pronounce on the policy of the Government with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway contract. Those were the questions we met to discuss, and to which the hon. Minister of Railways addressed himself. He said a few words in his indignant, or assumed indignant, style, in reply to Mr. Carmichael's remarks on the Canadian Pacific Railway question. But there was no discussion of that question on that occasion; and let me say that when the hon. President of the Council states that the whole history of that Pictou Railway transaction has been made known to the public, he asserts something I have never heard before, and which I am not in a position entirely to accept at his hands. Perhaps he knows all the secret history of that very remarkable transaction, and perhaps I know something of it. I am not sure I do; but I have heard a good deal with regard to that railroad which I believe, and I am almost compelled to believe very much more, though I do not know whether to believe it or not, in regard to what has transpired since that railway was first put under contract. The President of the Council now says that when the history of this railway becomes known, no man in the country can honestly believe that the Minister of Railways made any personal profit out of that transaction. I think the hon. President of the Council failed in his duty, because, having proceeded so far he did not lay before the House the facts that led him, and him alone, to that conclusion. It would be but just to that colleague so much assailed. In fact, the hon. gentleman never did do justice to the hon. Minister of Railways on this subject. If this is his conviction he should have taken the first opportunity to state to the public at large that he had changed his convictions; and also why he had changed them. I am sure the House would now indulge the hon. President of the Council and allow him to make any statement of facts that led to that extraordinary change of conviction. He must have been a sincere believer in that deplorable state of things described when he uttered the remarks quoted by the hon. gentleman opposite to him (Sir Richard J. Cartwright). It would not do to say now-a-days that these were mere political differences—that party lines were very tightly drawn in Nova Scotia in those days—that party excitement ran high, and men said very hard things of each other. That we all understand, and we can quite understand that men may say very hard things of each other which, afterwards, circumstances having changed, and the public interest requiring that they should come together would not render their uniting and working in harmony without any loss of character or reputation impossible. But when grave circumstances arise, and charges such as are contained in those extracts are made by a public man in the Legislative Assembly of one of our Provinces—when those charges remain uncontradicted up to the present—it is no wonder that hon. gentlemen on this side, as well as the people throughout the country, should be astonished at the extraordinary spectacle now presented, a spectacle so humiliating to the hon. President of the Council—namely, his being introduced to this Chamber and walking arm in arm with a man whom he had denounced as the high priest of corruption. The hon. Minister of Railways would have the House believe—he repeats here what he said elsewhere—that during the last year the Liberal party has been losing ground in this country—or as the President of the Council says, that it has been growing beautifully less by degrees. We rather feel, on this side of the House, that it has been growing larger by degrees. If there has been any gain to any side, it has been to ours. The hon. gentlemen opposite have not, within the three years and a-half which they have held power, ventured to open a single constituency that at any time within the last dozen years has been regarded as absolutely Liberal. They have, however, opened constituencies which, even in the days of the Pacific scandal revelations and excitement, when a storm of popular indignation against the Conservatives swept over the country and hurled them from power, they were able to carry against us. Re-elections in such constituencies they are proud of to-day. What will they say of the election in the county of Carleton, in New Brunswick, where a gentleman almost unknown to a large number of the electors, came forward and boldly, manfully challenged the policy of the Government, and asked to be elected as one who would vote against it as unworthy of the confidence of the people? What will they say of the election in East Northumberland, an old Tory constituency not opened by them, but by the dispensation of Providence, to their terror and disgust —

Mr. PLUMB. Cite a few more.

Mr. ANGLIN. I wish we had a few dozen more constituencies open. We were never in such trim for the fight as at present. We are ready for the fray any day. Public opinion is now fully with us, an enlightened, liberal and indignant public opinion. The hon. Minister of Railways would have us understand that in Pictou the most extraordinary influences were all combined in favor of Mr. Carmichael, the popular and able gentleman who formerly represented that county. What are the facts? All the influences calculated to influence the public unduly were on the other side. The hon. Minister of Railways stumped the county. I was delighted to find when down there that he had been going round the county several days addressing public meetings—that, notwithstanding the severe illness from which he had previously been suffering, he was in full health and spirits, very anxious as to the result, and very much troubled, but as full of fight as usual, and for this I give him credit. In the county appeared the Premier of Nova Scotia himself, a representative of the county, contending on the same side with the Attorney-General of Nova Scotia, who represents the neighboring county, and is a man deservedly popular. Mr. J. Rigby, partner of the late representative, Mr. McDonald, who himself did business in the county a great many years, also held public meetings in many places, and the Minister had swarms of other assistants. And this is a county in which a Government railway runs, and in which a very large number of people expect the Dominion Government will build a branch railway for them if no one else will. All these influences were at work for the Conservatives. In this county there are several coal mines, as well as various other interests, which look for the support of the Dominion Administration. I say all these parties and interests were enlisted in behalf of the success of the Government candidate. In point of fact, we not only sustained a desperate attack, but we fought gallantly, and came out of the fight under circumstances that gave us good hope of carrying the county at the next election. Let me add, that it is asserted, and I believe with truth, that some one or other used money largely in addition to all the other influences that were used on the Tory side in that canvass. The hon. President of the Council boasts of his majority in Colchester. He seems to think that he should be held excused—indeed, I may say justified—for anything he had ever done, whether it was essentially right and proper or not, because he succeeded, by some means, in obtaining a large majority in the county of Colchester. Report said he was doubtful at first about the result; it said that if the people had gone to the polls on nomination day he would have been defeated by a large majority. Report says that extraordinary means were used, between nomination and election day, to induce that county to declare in favor of the Tory candidate and the Tory Administration. This may be calumnious. I myself believe that if there were any good grounds for such stories as these the matter ought to have been taken into the courts, which should have been invited to pronounce on the conduct of that hon. gentleman or his friends, whoever they were, who were charged with these malpractices. The reports and rumors in that direction were strong, so strong and so generally believed, that the moral effect of the victory throughout the Maritime Provinces is very small indeed. That, in brief, was the way matters stood in the county of Pictou. The hon. Minister of Railways is a host in himself. My impression is that if he had not gone into the county, Mr. Carmichael would have been elected. However, the majority was not a very large one, and it will be found that when an opportunity comes, the people of Pictou will do themselves the honor and credit of reversing their decision upon that occasion. But, Sir, if these matters are to be discussed at all, let me add this much: that instead of meeting charges by mere recrimination, instead of taking the course adopted by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulbee), the hon. Minister of Agriculture and the hon. Minister of Railways, of fiercely making charges against hon. gentlemen on this side, it would look better before the country for them to meet the charges in that cool and calm manner with which such charges are met by men conscious of innocence. The course taken by hon. gentlemen on the other side all through this debate is, I think, calculated very much to create the impression throughout the country that the charges made some years ago by the hon. President of the Council, against the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, had some foundation in fact, and that they have not, at all events, been thoroughly disproved or satisfactorily explained away.

Mr. BOWELL. The House, and particularly that portion of the members who have had the honor of occupying seats here for a number of years, must have been not a little surprised at the tone of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, who, forsooth, has been selected by his party to hurl charges at members on this side of the House, and to read them a lecture on the necessity of retracting something they may have said, or articles they may have written, against those with whom they may have been in conflict at some former period. Certainly, that gentleman is not the one who should have risen in his place to read a lecture to any man, either in the House or out of it. I have a distinct recollection of the language used in a certain newspaper which he (Mr. Anglin) controlled, against gentlemen who were then opposed to him, whom he denounced as the vilest and most corrupt of men, and yet he was willing to accept from these same gentlemen and their colleagues, the seat that you, Mr. Speaker, now occupy. He has never to this day, either directly or indirectly, retracted one word of what he then uttered against these gentlemen and the vast majority who sat in the House at the time. Not only that, but he denounced, in the same manner, the hon. gentleman now sitting on his left (Mr. Burpee), as being only fitted for a place in his own Province, where they teach people the trades. That is the language he used towards the hon. gentleman who is now his left hand supporter, yet he did not hesitate to accept the position which, as I will show presently, he used to his own personal benefit and the benefit of the party with which he is connected.

An hon. MEMBER. Feathered his bed.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; the Government gave him not only a feather bed to rest upon, but supplied him with the means to keep himself comfortable in future. Yet the same gentleman rises in the House and reads us a political lecture. Fancy a Speaker, the first Commoner in the land, occupying the most exalted position in the House, accepting it at the hands of those whom he had denounced as being fit only for the penitentiary, and then continue to occupy that seat in direct violation of the Independence of Parliament—in direct violation of every principle that should guide even a private member, sitting there and accepting contracts from day to day, from month to month, from year to year, in order to aggrandise himself. And this is the man who rises to administer a lecture to the members of this House, as if he had been selected by the leader of the Opposition to teach us parliamentary propriety. I think if ever we had a spectacle of cool political audacity we have had it exhibited to-day. The man who was only saved from being turned out of the House by the delay of the report of a Committee, which, if previously presented, would not only have expelled him from the Speaker's chair, but would have disqualified him from sitting in this House a single day, rises here to read us a lecture on propriety. This gentleman called attention to the language used by the hon. member for Colchester in 1856, at a time when they were fighting the great battles of their Province, and has endeavored to hold him up to execration because he then differed from the hon. the Minister of Railways, and now agrees with him upon political questions. Has he forgotten, has this House or the country forgotten, that the very man whom they denounced as being so corrupt that his very acts smelled to heaven, was, nevertheless, taken to their bosom and made a colleague a short time after? Did we ever hear one word of retraction from the hon. gentleman who then administered the affairs of this country? Did we ever hear of an apology by their then colleague, towards them, for his former acts? Nor did we ever have anything to show that they believed he was not as guilty and as corrupt as he was at the time that they denounced him. Not only did they take him to their bosom, not only did they take him to the Council Chamber and consult with him, but they made him the Governor of a great Province. Yet they are now horrified because the hon. member for Colchester differed from the hon. the Minister of Railways some fifteen years ago. It seems to be the policy of gentlemen opposite to hurl charges at the members, individually and collectively, of the Administration. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), says that because the Minister of Railways has not disproved these charges that have been made against him, ergo they must be accepted as true. Over and over again have those charges been repeated by the hon. gentlemen opposite and their newspapers since he sat in this House, and as often as the charges have been made, has the hon. gentleman retorted by challenging an investigation into any act of his life, parliamentary or otherwise, and not one of them to-day has dared to formulate a charge against his honor, personal or political. Does it follow, because these charges are constantly made, that they must be true? The logic of the gentleman is lame and impotent upon this point. No man in the House knows better than he, that it does not follow, because a charge against another, whether it be directly or indirectly, that therefore it is true. He may talk of the "remarkable" circumstances connected with the Pictou Railway; he may say that all the circumstances connected with it were of a "remarkable character," but that proves nothing against the party against whom he hurls the insinuation. The hon. member is equally at fault when he refers to Ontario constituencies. He says that no constituency has been opened that has not been "from time immemorial" a Conservative constituency. It is quite evident that the hon. gentleman knows as little upon this subject as he does of other matters upon which he has addressed the House. East Northumberland was represented in this House—and he, as Speaker at the time, should know it—by a gentleman who has since been called away, for a large portion of the time since Confederation; but previous to that time, by the late Mr. Biggar, and formerly it was represented by Mr. Ross, brother to the Hon. John Ross. It is one of those constituencies which has been vibrating from one side to the other, and its elections have been governed and controlled more by personal likes and dislikes than probably any other consideration. If the hon. gentleman knew anything of the recent election in that riding, he would know that it was the prejudices of the party with which he has allied himself that defeated Mr. Kennedy; his defeat was more on account of his religion than his politics. Yet we find him who prides himself on belonging to and championing that particular party in this country, standing up in this House and glorifying the result of that election. With regard to West Northumberland, does not the hon. gentleman know that for five years since Confederation it was represented by Mr. Kerr, and does not he know that it was represented by a member of the Liberal party before Confederation, and that it is one of those close constituencies which one party or the other has an equal chance of carrying. It was opened on the recent occasion, not with any fear of the result, and the people expressed their confidence in the policy of the Government, that being the only question which was agitated during that contest; still the hon. gentleman tells us that no constituency has been opened which has not been from time immemorial, what he pleases to term a "Tory constituency." Surely he will not venture to say that Carleton, in his own Province, has been a Tory constituency. We all know that the former representatives of Carleton previous to 1878, were members of the Liberal Parliament of New Brunswick, and that it had been in the hands of the Liberal party for a long time. True the late representative was elected as an Independent, but having become, like many others in that Province as well as in Ontario, so thoroughly disgusted with the policy and the whole conduct of his party, and particularly with the Speaker of the late Parliament, that he could not justify his support of them either to his conscience or to his constituents. They have snatched it for a moment. They have gained their point in that respect, and they are welcome to all the comfort they can extract from that fact. Nor has Pictou always been represented by a Conservative. It was represented in this house by Mr. Carmichael, a friend of the late Government. True, it was opened, and a gentleman brought from the Senate to contest it, and that, too, at a time when we dared not open any constituency in the Maritime Provinces; and he carried it by a larger majority. I had supposed that the result of that election was achieved principally on account of the presence of the Minister of Railways in the constituency, who went there to assist his friends and to prove to the people that the policy of the Government was the true policy for Canada—the one which every patriot should advocate in the interest of his country; but I have now learned that the hon. member for Gloucester

Mr. BOWELL.

(Mr. Anglin) was there, and it is no longer a mystery to me that the majority against that hon. gentleman's candidate was between 200 and 300. It was the same in Colchester. They sent the best politician and the cleverest man they had in Nova Scotia to contest that county with my hon. friend the President of the Council—I refer to Mr. Jones. Those who know him and have heard him in this House are aware that he is a man of talent and of great research, and that he referred to all the old disputes that arose in 1874-75-76, during which time the President of the Council was an Anti; yet, after explanations given to the electors by the President of the Council, as to the cause of his taking the position he had taken, after a thorough investigation into the policy of this Government, that gentleman's presence, like the presence of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), in the adjoining constituency, resulted in the election of our candidate by between 400 and 500 majority. I shall not refer particularly to all those questions which have arisen in the present discussion, but I do not think that either the House or the country believes that it lies in the mouth of the leader of the Opposition, or more particularly of the hon. gentleman who sits by his side, to read us lectures upon either constituency or party fidelity. I remember the time when the hon. gentleman was as ardent an admirer of certain gentlemen on this side of the House as any one in the country. I have a distinct recollection, and, perhaps, a little more knowledge than some others, of the reasons which led that hon. gentleman to desert his former leader. I know, also, that when he saw an opportunity of getting place and position by deserting his friends, he did not hesitate to desert them. I know that the present leader of the Opposition was always a restive bird; he could scarcely ever be content, and certainly not content to follow any one; he must always be, to use a familiar expression, "cock of the roost." In the Local Legislature he never was content until he had dispossessed Mr. McKellar, who was the leader of the Reform party. True, Mr. McKellar, like another deposed leader, fell into the traces, and worked under him for a short time. Afterwards he was amply provided for for the remainder of his life, and I certainly am not disposed to find fault with his fortunes. Well, the same course was pursued in this House, and it has been well exposed by the Minister of Railways. Appointment to office, and the giving to a certain person a constituency after he had betrayed his leader, were acts which history will declare to have been the blackest in the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Blake) political history. He did very little better when he came to this House. On various occasions when his conscience would not permit his vote to sustain his leader, he found it convenient, with three or four other members, to exhibit his coat tails, one hon. member passing out of this door, another at that, and two others at a third door. The hon. gentleman has explained to the outside world, at Cobourg I think, that when he found his conscience would not permit him to record a vote in favor of his party and to sustain his leader, he thought it his duty to leave the House. That was a frequent occurrence during the last five or ten years. I have seen him doing it when a Minister on questions affecting myself. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. When the Government, of which he was a member, were attacked for giving a contract to "his friend Moore," he said that as he was personally concerned in the matter he could not record his vote on it, and he walked out of the Chamber. No doubt his conscientious judgment would not allow him by any possibility to record a vote respecting a matter on which he himself had been attacked, however untrue the charge might be. Well, Sir, he followed in this line. The Minister who then led the Government was not, I think, of his liking; and if outside report speaks truly—of course, I speak under correction—he kept that hon. gentleman in a constant state of turmoil. There was scarcely a day when he was not throwing difficulties and obstacles in his way. He was in the Cabinet, and out of the Cabinet; but one thing is certain, he was always the power behind the Throne, and he was not content until he attained the position he now held as leader of the Opposition. The country will join me in the wish that he may long occupy that position. Mr. Speaker this debate has been sprung upon the House, I think, altogether unnecessarily. However, I can safely throw out this challenge: that whenever the time arrives for a comparison to be made either as to the administrative ability of the Ministers whom the Opposition have attacked, or as to their personal integrity, we will be quite prepared, individually and collectively, to meet any charge those hon. gentlemen may think proper to make; and I would advise them, when they have charges to make, to make them boldly on the floor of the House. Let charges be properly made and investigated, and we have no fear of the result. Let them act towards the hon. Minister of Railways precisely as I did to the late Speaker. When I had a charge to make I made it boldly, I placed it upon the Journals of the House, it was referred to a Committee, and the result is well known. Let hon. gentlemen opposite adopt the same course, and until they are prepared to do that, it will be more in accordance with parliamentary proprieties for, them at least, to hold their tongues upon questions affecting the personal honor and integrity of others. The hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) has particular delight in stirring up this kind of debate. The hon. gentleman did me the honor on one occasion to visit my constituency; he made an elaborate speech with the mercury 8° or 10° below zero, and it so completely froze the hearts of the people and so convinced them he was wrong, that I secured a large majority in the only Radical township then in my riding, a majority which is increasing every year; and if he with his friend from Gloucester, and Mr. Jones, of Halifax, would visit the riding at the next election, probably the majority would be a great deal larger than it has ever been in the past. In the meantime, I again advise hon. gentlemen opposite, if they have any charges to make, to make them in the proper manner, and we shall be quite prepared on any occasion to meet them. We only desire that when they fulminate charges they should be placed before the House in a manner so that they can be reached.

Mr. BLAKE. In view of the language used, and the compliments paid to me in the several speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite, perhaps the House will indulge me a few words on questions personal to myself which have been raised. I do not presume to engage in the general debate, and reply to other statements and arguments which have been urged and which must be replied to, if they be replied to, by other speakers. The statement which I made I must confess did not appear to me to warrant such an exhibition of feeling as has animated hon. gentlemen opposite. The reference to the recorded views of one colleague as to another colleague, is a reference which has always appeared to me perfectly justifiable, perfectly reasonable and perfectly proper, as furnishing fit occasion for explanation or correction. That was all that was done. If there was an accusation it was not our accusation—it was the accusation of his colleague, the President of the Council. The gist and weight, perhaps the gravity, of that accusation was in the quarter from which it came; he was wounded in the side by his personal friend, and it was thought fit to call the attention of the House to those statements coming from that quarter, with a view to obtaining an explanation. I make these observations, because I think I am entitled to make them from the personal aspect which this debate, as relating to myself, has subsequently assumed. I have to say this: that were I as black as I have been painted, it would not make the hon. Minister of Railways any whiter; it has nothing to do with the question raised by these quotations. That hon. gentleman stated, with respect to myself and my hon. friend beside me (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), that we, having been defeated, looked, as Japhet in search of his father, for some constituencies which might be bribed to elect us. That statement, so far as I am concerned—I was not in the county at the time, but I believe I can speak for my hon. friend—is absolutely without foundation in fact. It is well known that prior to the General Election of 1878 I had the honor of receiving nominations in the county of South Bruce and in the county of West Durham; that, owing to ill-health, I declined both those nominations, and intended to retire altogether from public life. I was ordered to desist from any active exertion whatever. At a subsequent period my friends in the county of West Durham were very anxious that I should allow myself to be nominated, and it was represented to me that I would be elected, although I was obliged, as I was ordered to do, to leave the country. I thought of accepting that nomination. Communicating it to some of my friends in the South Riding of Bruce, they said it would be discouraging to the party there if I declined their nomination and accepted another. Upon that I finally and irrevocably declined the nomination for the West Riding of Durham, and presumed myself entirely out of the contest. At a subsequent period, many gentlemen of weight and influence in the South Riding of Bruce called upon me, and requested me so earnestly to allow my name to be used, although I could give them no assistance, that I yielded to their request so far, although I was obliged, according to my announcement, to leave; and I was defeated in South Bruce under circumstances and by means that I need not now allude to. I declined to receive a constituency. I did not open the West Riding of Durham; on the contrary, had I been consulted when the West Riding of Durham was opened, I would have declared to my friends that I would not accept the vacancy; but the vacancy having been made without my knowledge, and my being asked to accept it, I felt myself bound to accept it, which I did, and I was elected by acclamation. These are the circumstances on which the hon. gentleman based his accusation that being rejected by South Bruce, I went about seeking a constituency that I might bribe to elect me. The second statement he made was one which I was not surprised at. He declared that I was afraid of him. I have been sitting opposite the hon. gentleman in this House during fourteen years. During the larger part of that time he has had the sympathy of a majority of this audience. I do not know any audience equally critical in this country. I do not know any audience which one might be more afraid to face, in view of meeting superior powers. I am not going to contrast our powers. I will only state that I have not felt that impulse of fear which the hon. gentleman attributes to me; that whenever I have found it necessary, I have dealt with the hon. gentleman's policy and measures as I thought truth and the interests of the public demanded, and I intend to continue to do so until the end. The hon. gentleman shall not move me either by threats, accusations of fear, or in any other way, into feelings of indignation. Many long years have elapsed since the hon. gentleman lost the power of awakening in me the feelings either of surprise or of indignation. The hon. gentleman says that I was guilty of a corrupt bargain in connection with a change of administration that took place in a Local Legislature. We have heard a good deal to-day of the impropriety of dragging before this House occurrences that took place in Local Legislatures; it was a shocking thing, an unparliamentary and undignified thing, and a waste of time to discuss what happened in Nova Scotia. But I have found, from year to year and from Session to Session, no more appetizing morsel rolled under the tongues of those hon. gentlemen than what occurred or what did not occur in the Legislature of Ontario. Well, Sir, time and again have these circumstances been discussed and the facts been stated, but time and again have they been repeated. The President of the Council has appealed to one election, when he says he was elected notwithstanding the accusations he made against the Minister of Railways. Well, I am not sure that it was not a point in his favor that he made them. However, the hon. gentleman appeals to that election as a proof that he did right—I do not know whether in making or in retracting the accusations. If I wished to use a similar argument, I might refer to half-a-dozen elections in which, whether as a member of a Government or a party, I have been successful; but I do not choose to appeal to them. I will simply say, as I did on a former occasion, when the hon. Minister of Railways made a similar accusation, that the statement he makes is utterly without foundation in fact; and I will add, as I did then, that if there be, if you can inform me of any more strong and cogent form of denial consistent with parliamentary usage, I wish to be understood as having used that form. As there are here, however, some hon. gentlemen who were not present the last time this subject was discussed, and who may not be aware of the circumstances under which the letter, or rather the note, the hon. gentleman has referred to was written, I will state briefly—though not at all with the hope that that slander will cease to be circulated because of my statement—how far, by a perversion of the facts and the dates, the hon. gentleman deceives himself by his reference to that note. The facts are briefly these: On a certain day—I cannot at this moment recollect the precise day of the week—the Treasurer of the Local Administration of Ontario had declared in the Local Legislature his resignation of his office. He had declared that he had resigned because he was convinced by repeated votes which had been given in the House, that the Government had lost the confidence of the country, and that it was not consistent with the principles of constitutional Government that they should longer protract the struggle, or attempt to retain office. The Government, however, did protract the struggle, and the debate continued. It was either on the following day or the day after, shortly after the House opened after dinner, that the Treasurer came to me—who was at that time the de facto leader of the House, having control of its deliberations by having a majority at my back—and said to me: “Mr. Blake, I have been attacked for my action in announcing my resignation, and I intend to speak before this debate closes. Do you think it will close to-night? If you do not, I would rather not speak until to-morrow.” I said to Mr. Wood: “My opinion is that the debate will not close to-night.” At a later period—an hour or two later—I perceived signs of the debate collapsing; and having made that statement to Mr. Wood, and he sitting in his seat, relying apparently on his belief that the debate would hold over till the next day, I scribbled on a sheet of paper the words: “You had better speak now,” and sent it across the floor of the House to Mr. Wood, who, having read these words, tore up the paper and cast it aside. Some adherent of hon. gentlemen opposite—and it has always been credited to a prominent adherent—picked it up and used it.

An hon. MEMBER. Out of a spittoon.

MR. BLAKE. Yes, I believe it was out of a spittoon. That is the state of the case. It is clear and simple, and effectually disposes of the accusation the hon. gentleman has made against me; and yet I have no doubt that it will continue to be repeated, with the false statements as to the dates and times, and the notion that I had arranged with Mr. Wood to make his resignation speech, when his resignation speech had been made either one or two days before that paper was written at all, and when it was written under the circumstances to which I have referred. The hon. President of the Council has said that he has won his seat, and that having won his seat he is assoziated from all charges. I know of none that have been made against him except that he knows his colleague. But certainly those who, like me, have had cast so wantonly at them the aspersion that they were looking about for constituencies which they might bribe to elect them, may fairly, on this occasion, retort on the hon. gentlemen the enquiry what the Gloucester election cost. The hon. Minister of Agriculture also intervened, and declared that my conduct had been such as to cast discredit on myself and party. He and the hon. Minister of Customs alike made great complaint of my having, in some two or three cases, I forget the exact number, not voted, and in some two or three other cases voted with hon. gentlemen opposite. I suppose that in the different circumstances in which these abstentions or irregular votes took place, when I voted with the hon. gentlemen or did not vote against them they thought they were right in the propositions they advanced and which they then supported. If it was my misfortune either to disagree with them or to doubt, surely it is not a thing for either grave or serious commentary. Surely I could not be so very wrong in their view when I was so close to them. But I will say now what I have said, on former occasions, when I had the honor of occupying the position of leader of the party, long ago to my followers, what I have repeated to my followers since, that I have never asked or never will ask from any man who does me the honor to follow me, any closer or stricter allegiance than I am willing myself to give to another man. I am not willing, in any case whatever, to ask a follower to vote contrary to the conviction of his duty, and am not willing myself, on any occasion, to vote contrary to my convictions of my duty. The hon. Minister of Agriculture used various harsh words about me. He said I endeavored to trip up my hon. friend from Lambton, to belittle him, to undermine him, to intrigue against him—that I did dirty things. The hon. Minister of Customs said I was not content until I had obtained the position which I now occupy. I meet those statements with the same absolute and unqualified denial. I absolve any person, whoever he may be, or whatever station he may occupy, from any supposed or implied obligation of confidence or silence. I call upon any person, who can establish any such imputation, to come forward and say what he knows. Those who surround me here know that I did not crave or desire, that I do not to-day covet, the position which I am occupying. They know that I did not intrigue for it; that it has never been the object of my aspirations at all; and that if I now fill it, it is because they desire I should continue to do so. I am at their service willingly as one of themselves; but I have always said to them, as I say to you in this House, that I am very unwillingly, indeed, at their service in the place I now hold. The hon. Minister of Customs is not content with referring to the circumstances which have attended my occupying this place, but said that I undermined the position of my hon. friend Mr. McKellar also. Why I was responsible for his having held that position, having myself proposed the appointment of Mr. McKellar as leader of the Opposition in the Ontario Legislature. I procured his appointment from my friends, and when the change was made it was Mr. McKellar himself who called his friends together in my absence, without my knowledge, and asked of them that substitution which he afterwards communicated to me and requested me as a favor to accept, and we have always been on the most cordial, intimate and friendly terms ever since. What I did, I did not merely with his consent, but at his request and instance. I have answered, as far as I could gather them, the personal charges made against me. I trust I have not intermingled with those answers much acrimony or acerbity. In truth, I have been injured to those charges. They have been so often repeated that the pain which, I confess, I used to feel when they were formerly hurled at me, unjust as they were, has become somewhat dulled by the repetition of the operation. But as we are here in what is a new Parliament for many, and as for some years those charges have not been made here, I hope the House will not think it out of place that I should have so far trespassed on its indulgence, and I did so because I considered it due to myself and to the respectability of the Chamber of which I have the honor to be a member.

Mr. McCALLUM. I happened to have sat in the House at the time the occurrence of which the hon. member for West Durham has entered into so elaborate an explanation, took place, and last Session I referred to the course he took. The hon. member now admits that he did send the letter across the House, whereas, last year, he repudiated the charge as an exploded slander. I have no desire to slander anybody. I never did so. But I say that there are any number of hon. members in this House, to-day, who will corroborate my statement, when I say that the first intimation we had of Mr. Wood being made to resign his seat, was when the letter "speak now" was sent to him. If there was any arrangement with Mr. Wood through his being dissatisfied with his position in the Government, it must have been at a private interview between him and the hon. member for West Durham. That hon. gentleman tried, on a former occasion, to get clear by saying: "Was I not tried by a Committee?" Yes, he appointed his own judges, framed the charges against himself, and drew up his own resolutions. He wanted to deny this afterwards; and he now puts on an air of injured innocence when he is twitted about his coat tails vanishing through the corridors. I have seen him disappear myself. The House never knew in what position he actually stood. It was a case of now you see it, now you don't.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken are such as I could not allow to pass unchallenged, having been at the time closely associated with the hon. member for West Durham. It was perfectly well known to every one in Toronto at the time, from Mr. Wood's statements, and from the records of the meetings of the Committee appointed to investigate the charges made by the Hon. M. C. Cameron, that he declined to follow up those charges in the Committee unless he obtained his own manner of doing it. The communication of the circumstances made by the hon. member for West Durham are absolutely and indisputably correct. Now, a word with regard to the subject before the House. I was a little surprised to hear the hon. President of the Council announce that he came here in 1867, not to oppose the Minister of Railways, but to endeavor to get better Confederation terms for his Province. I had the honor, if it be an honor, of having been frequently consulted by the hon. gentleman during the first year of his membership in this place, and I formed a very erroneous opinion indeed, from the advice asked of me and the counsels that I was obliged to give him, if he came here with any such humane and proper intention. His intention, so far as I could gather it from his conduct here, and that of other members from the same Province, was that of intense, bitter hostility to the member for Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper), and to the policy which he successfully carried out in the scheme of Confederation. I never felt any hesitation in saying publicly, in the House and elsewhere, that at that time I had the strongest sympathy with the majority of the people in Nova Scotia, under the circumstances in which they were dragged into Confederation; and it is the weak spot in the conduct of those who effected that change that the vote had been carried in the Nova Scotia House, with the sanction and by means of the proceedings of the hon. member for Cumberland. But I found, after a very short time, that there was a limit to the public virtue of the President of the Council. I found he was amenable to reason, as the saying is; that contemporaneous with his change in favor of Confederation, and getting Nova Scotia to accept it, was his appointment to a most lucrative office. I found he had not that strong sense of public propriety which should compel any member of this House to decline an appointment and refuse to go to the other House, when he could no longer sit in the House of Commons, which members acting properly have always done. The Minister of Railways declared to-night, with great pride, that he had successively humbled all the leaders of the Reform party in Nova Scotia; from being his strong and successful opponents, he had made them ultimately his followers and even his warm personal friends. Well, I assert that the friendship he acquired when he induced the late Mr. Howe, who was sent to England on a mission by the Nova Scotia Liberal or Anti-Confederate party, whither he was followed by the Minister of Railways—I imagine if it be true that he made proposals which induced Mr. Howe to desert his friends in Nova Scotia, to become an associate with the hon. gentlemen opposite, and ultimately reach the Lieutenant-Governorship by that means; if that be an exhibition of the friendship thus won by the Minister of Railways, long may I be spared friendships obtained and exhibited in such a manner. And so with the others: the friendship of the President of the Council was purchased by his appointment to an office in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. Instead of the hon. gentleman boasting that he had acquired and secured the friendship of his opponents, he ought to have stated frankly, what, I am sure, he is quite prepared to do with his usual boldness, that he succeeded in the course of a few years in debauching the whole of the public men of his native Province. But the hon. gentleman did not succeed, when winning over the enemy, in holding all his own friends. If I recollect aright, Mr. A. Jones was one of his followers, and as he succeeded from time to time in gaining over some of his Liberal opponents by the means I have mentioned, he at the same time sometimes lost the support of his own friends. The hon. gentleman boasts of having succeeded in carrying a majority for Nova Scotia in the present House. We all remember the time when, as regards that Province, he stood here alone, one member against eighteen. Does he mention that or boast of it? Does he boast of obtaining fairly his last victory at the polls, which I hope he has so obtained?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct him? He knows that having come here, as he says, one member against eighteen, I went back to the General Election of 1872, and returned to Ottawa with a very large majority. But it was not the first time, and the majority lost in 1874 was regained in 1878.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I believe the hon. gentleman is right; he had a small majority in 1872.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A large majority of the members elected in 1872; all except one man, were sent here to support the Government of which I was a member.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That was not the opinion of the electors. Those members the hon. gentleman claims may have supported him, for his bewitching manner and skill in winning such aid makes it difficult to know where such help comes from sometimes, though I admit he gained great success in his native Province at the last elections. But at the same time he cannot object to our calling up those reminiscences of the past when he boasts of having taken such associates into his bosom. All know the humiliating spectacle presented by the late Mr. Howe, who had declared at one time that sooner than touch the hand of the hon. gentleman—one of the most prominent men of Nova Scotia at the time—he would cheerfully grasp the hand of a dead Fenian; and yet the hon. gentleman was so cruel as to ask Mr. Howe to introduce that party to this House. The whole circumstance was recalled to my mind the other day when I found the President of the Council also introduced by the Minister of Railways after the humiliation to which he had subjected him at a former time. I have no desire to say more, or to detain the House from other topics, but I will take occasion to refer to this subject hereafter. I have now simply to say this: in a parliamentary sense and as a Member of Parliament, that I am surprised that the hon. gentleman opposite (the President of the Council) should rise to his feet to support his present colleague, if he entertains the same opinion of his public conduct in a particular transaction, which it is shown by his speech he entertained some years ago. It would be a humiliating thing if such a question was not by the public asked and answered. It would be a reflection upon the public morality of the country, and it became a necessity with the leader of the Opposition to refer to that matter to-day. The President of the Council has said he has left that matter aside. He does not say that he retracts what he said some years ago, but that he puts the subject aside to forget it as the circumstances demands. If that be all he has to say in justification of himself for his attack upon his present colleague, then he is not justified in sitting where he sits now, nor was the hon. gentleman so attacked, nor are hon. gentlemen opposite justified in allowing him to occupy that position.

Mr. RYKERT. I simply desire to correct a statement of the member for Lambton. I happened to be a supporter of the Government of the late Sandfield Macdonald in the Parliament of Ontario, and to be sitting beside the present Chief Justice Wood, of Manitoba, when he made his celebrated speech, and I unhesitatingly assert that the member for West Durham has stated what is entirely contrary to the facts in asserting what we have heard about the speech made at a late hour of the night.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman misunderstands me.

Mr. RYKERT. The House was satisfied that the debate was to be prolonged.

Mr. BLAKE. No, no.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. gentleman was afraid.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Mr. RYKERT. Thinking that the debate was about to be adjourned he thought it important to send that missive across the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Mr. RYKERT. I am certain, for I was a member of that House and sat alongside of Mr. Wood, then Treasurer of the Province, and the first information that I had, and the hon. members of the House had, was his having spoken immediately after he received that missive.

Mr. BLAKE. No, no.

Mr. RYKERT. And he never upon the floor of Parliament declared his opinion that they were acting unconstitutionally in holding their seats in Parliament. I unhesitatingly assert, as a strong supporter of that Government, that the first information we had of the disagreement in the Government was when he spoke after receiving that missive, and he never spoke but once on that occasion. The hon. gentleman knows right well that he spoke immediately after his sending the missive across the House, and the whole of his colleagues were astonished at his sitting in the Treasury Benches and making that speech. We all felt, as supporters of the Government, that if he desired to turn tail upon his colleagues he ought to have taken his seat on the other side of the House and then spoken. The facts were that from the intimate acquaintance of the hon. member for West Durham with the late Treasurer of the Province, and from the fact that he came with him a few days before in a stage coach, we all suspected that there was something wrong, and we were not at all surprised when we heard the hon. Treasurer stand in his place, and say that he thought the time had now arrived when they ought to resign their seats in Parliament because they did not enjoy the confidence of the House. No person gave the Government a stronger support than myself, and no person was more astonished than I was when the Treasurer arose and declared that he felt the time had now arrived when the Government should yield their places in the House, and the first information that we had was when this missive was sent across the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not impute any designed misinterpretation of facts to the hon. gentleman, but he is entirely in error. I did not say that Mr. Wood had spoken twice, because he did not speak twice. I said that one or two days after his resignation and after the final vote upon which the Ministry resigned, Mr. Wood came to me and asked me, "was the debate about to close?" I repeat—and it is impossible that I can be mistaken about it, because it was I who sent that note and not the hon. gentleman—I repeat it was either one or two days after, the very last day of that crisis, that Mr. Wood asked me how long the debate would last, and I gave him an answer; and seeing that my expectations were not verified, I sent a message to warn him that it was the last opportunity that he would have of making the statement he intended to make. Mr. Wood did not speak again, but he came to me afterwards and said: "I was obliged to you for sending me that word, but I had had a conversation with Mr. Sandfield Macdonald and he asked me not to speak again, and I agreed." "All right," I said, "all that I wished to do was to keep myself straight with you, because you had asked me when the debate would close." I had told him I thought it would not close that night.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman said distinctly that the Hon. Mr. Wood had previously spoken.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly, and I say so now.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman stated that the decision of the Treasurer was perfectly well known, that it was publicly known.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. And in pursuance of that he sent that message, and there is the gravamen of the whole charge.

WELLAND CANAL TENDERS.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I wish to ask my hon. friend, the hon. the Minister of Railways, if he will send down a copy of the advertisement asking for tenders on the Welland Canal, and copies of the tenders received. We have here a contract, and we are asked to sanction this contract without knowing any of the surrounding circumstances, and we cannot possibly give any deliberate judgment on that until we have obtained the other documents. If there are no Orders in Council concerning this contract, there must be an advertisement for tenders, and we must have copies of the tenders sent in. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman if he will bring these down without my making a motion?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it would be better for the hon. gentleman to make a motion. I am quite prepared to lay all the papers connected with the tenders on the Table of the House. The hon. gentleman is quite aware there were no advertisements; he is perfectly well aware of that, and that that is the reason this contract is made subject to the disallowance of Parliament. He knows we cannot bring down an advertisement that does not exist; but if he will put a motion on the paper for these papers—it might give me an opportunity of explaining the circumstances, I think, entirely to the satisfaction of the hon. member. At all events, every paper connected with the tender will be brought down and the fullest information given to the House, and the House will be in a position to judge whether the contract should be ratified.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken when he says I knew there was no advertisement; I did not know it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why did the hon. gentleman suppose this contract was made subject to the approval of the House if there was an advertisement?

Mr. MACKENZIE. I could not tell that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If there was an advertisement he is perfectly well aware it did not require to be made subject to the approval of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am quite aware of that, nor is there any law now requiring it to be subject to the approval of the House, even without an advertisement. The Privy Council has power to give a contract, but it is not in accordance with the Public Works Act. Although there was no advertisement I was not aware of the fact. I heard the rumor when I came into the House, but in order that I might verify my information I determined to make this request of the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am quite willing to lay every paper connected with the matter upon the Table without a motion, but if the hon. gentleman will make his motion it will give me an opportunity of explaining to the House all the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Very well. I now give notice that to-morrow I will make the motion.

The House adjourned at 6.15 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 15th February, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 3) to incorporate the St. Lawrence Marine Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 4) to amend the Act incorporating the Sun Mutual Insurance Company of Montreal.—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 7) for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK, in introducing Bill (No. 5) respecting the sale of Railway Passenger Tickets, said: The object of this Bill is to enable railway companies to appoint agents in different towns or places where they have any agencies for the sale of railway passenger tickets, and authorizes the hon. the Minister of Railways to do the same thing. It also provides that no person, except those so authorized, shall sell railway passenger tickets. It provides, further, the penalties which shall be imposed on any person who shall sell those tickets without authority; also, that the railway companies shall be bound to redeem all the tickets issued by them which are unused in whole or part; that is to say, that if any person in a railway company issues a ticket, and the person who buys it only travels on it a part of the journey, the company shall be bound to redeem it for the unused portion. I am satisfied that on the second reading of the Bill I shall be enabled to give the House reasons sufficient to induce them to pass it into law.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope the hon. gentleman will not die before he gets the Bill passed.

Bill read the first time.

STADACONA INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. CASGRAIN introduced a Bill (No. 6) to amend and extend the Act to empower the Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company to relinquish their Charter, and to provide for the winding up of their affairs.

Mr. VALLÉE. Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member give the House some explanation with regard to this bill?

Mr. CASGRAIN. The object of the bill is to wind up the affairs of this Company as soon as possible, which unfortunately cannot be done owing to certain claims pending in the courts, and especially owing to certain other claims which are not before the courts, which claims the Company is desirous of settling within a specified time, so as to be able to wind up its business and declare a final dividend.

Bill read the first time.

DUTIES COLLECTED IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. DeCOSMOS enquired, 1. What is the total amount of Customs, Excise and Stamps respectively, collected in British Columbia during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1881? 2. What is the total amount of revenue collected from other sources, during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1881? 3. What is the total amount of revenue collected from all sources in British Columbia during the last fiscal year?

Mr. BOWELL. The total collections on account of import duties in British Columbia for the past year, 1880-81, reached $599,477.72. From other sources: entrance and clearance fees, $320; bonded warehouse fees, $400; examining fees, $60.90; petroleum inspection, $848; mariner's fund revenue, $2,249.75; steamboat inspection revenue, $606.49; seizure's revenue, $620; copyright revenue, $2.49; total, $604,535.35. The following figures show the amount of Excise and Stamps, respectively, collected in British Columbia during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1881: from Excise, $46,355.78; Bill Stamps, $1,187.50; total, $47,543.28. The total amount of revenue collected from other sources, during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1881, by the Department of Inland Revenue: inspection of weights and measures $59.35; rent of camp reserve with buildings and wharf, New Westminster, $395; total, $454.35. Receipts from British Columbia, other than Customs and Excise: Post Office Department, $15,464.85; telegraphs, $8,931.24; steamboat inspection, $606.49; casual, $1,434.81; fines and forfeitures, $51; miscellaneous, $150.45; total, $26,639.84.

POPULATION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA BY LAST CENSUS.

Mr. DeCOSMOS enquired, 1. What is the approximate population of British Columbia, as determined by the Census of 1881? 2. What is the approximate number of the population, as far as ascertained, in each Commons electoral district. 3. What is the approximate number of Whites, Chinese and Indians respectively, distinguishing the number of adult males and females under each head.

Mr. POPE (Compton). The statement I will give is not an approximate but the real number. The total population by the last Census was 49,459. In New Westminster, 15,417; Cariboo, 7,550; Yale, 9,200; Victoria, 7,301; Vancouver, 9,991. Chinese, 4,350; Indians, 25,701; others, 19,408. Males, 29,503; females, 19,956. The relative numbers of adults cannot be now given, as the compilation of ages is not yet complete; but is unusually large.

RAILWAY FERRY AT QUEBEC.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether the Government have, according to the promise made on the 14th March, 1881, invited tenders for a railway ferry between the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway in South Quebec, and a point nearest the Occidental Railway on the Quebec side, so that the carriages may be transported from one side of the river to the other?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to say that correspondence is now going on between this Government and the Government of the Province of Quebec with a view to establishing a ferry for the transfer of railway carriages from one side of the river to the other, at Point Lévis, and that so soon as that correspondence is in a position to be laid before the House, Parliament will be asked to make an appropriation for that purpose.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. LANTIER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed, during next season, to the improvement of the River St. Lawrence from Prescott to the Lachine Canal, on the basis of the Welland and Lachine Canals; and in connection with that, whether the reports of explorations on the projected Cedars Canal have been examined by the Engineer-in-Chief, and a decision arrived at; and if not, for what reasons?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg leave to say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that it is not the intention of the Government to ask Parliament to provide for the deepening of the St. Lawrence Canals during the present year; and that as there is no immediate urgency, and the Chief Engineer has been greatly pressed with other duties, he has not been able finally to report on the question as to the route the canal will take at that particular point.

THE MONTREAL POST OFFICE.

Mr. HOUDE enquired, Whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the recent complaints in a portion of the Montreal Press, regarding the manner in which the work was carried on in the Montreal Post Office by certain employes accused of negligence or incompetence? Whether it is the intention of the Government to enquire whether there is any foundation for these accusations?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The attention of the Government was called a short time ago to those irregularities and complaints, and to some other complaints besides, respecting the internal management of the Post Office at Montreal. A Commission was appointed to enquire into the grounds of those complaints, and also into the general management of the Post Office; and they are now at work, and have been since Monday last.

POSTAGE ON NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. TROW enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government during this Session to abolish the postage on newspapers in the counties of publication?

Sir L. TILLEY. The Government have that subject under consideration.

SETTLERS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, When the report of the Minister of the Interior will be brought down? When the available information as to the result of the Census will be brought down? What was the total number of persons settled in Manitoba and the North-West during 1881? How many from the other Provinces of Canada? How many from the United States? And how many from other countries?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. Minister of the Interior desired me to say, in his absence, if this question was asked, that his report would be brought down very shortly.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I think the information respecting the Census will be available to-morrow. With respect to the number of persons settled in Manitoba and the North-West, I cannot say positively that every person included in the figures I am about to give, is actually settled there, but the total number of emigrants who have gone there and who are supposed to be settled there, is 28,611. The proportion from Ontario and the other Provinces is 21,514; those from the United States, 2,758; from other countries, mostly from England and Scotland, 4,339.

THE TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) enquired, Whether the location survey of the Trent Valley Canal has been completed, and if not, what progress has been made with it, and when it will be completed, and whether any report has been made by the engineer in charge of the survey since the former report was made by Mr. Stark, C.E., confirming or differing from the last mentioned report as to the probable cost and practicability of the work, and whether it is the intention of the Government to recommend to Parliament the construction of the work?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg leave to say that an appropriation having been made for the purpose, an engineer was detailed to make a careful location and survey of the Trent Valley navigation with a view to arrive at the cost and the feasibility of the construction of that work. Owing to the very extended nature of the country to be gone over, and the arduous duty connected with it, the engineer has verbally reported to me that he has not been able to complete the survey during the present season. He is expected, however, to make a progress report, and on the receipt of that report the question will be considered whether that work shall be proceeded with in part or in whole.

Mr. POPE (Compton). With reference to the question asked a moment ago by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), I would like to add, what I am sure will be satisfactory to him and the House, that the places of those who have gone from the old Provinces to Manitoba and the North-West, have been more than filled by immigration to this country.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope so, I am sure.

Mr. ANGLIN. Will the hon. Minister add how many have left the country for the United States.

Mr. POPE. I cannot exactly say how many have gone to that country, but I know there has been a large immigration into this country from the United States, and I presume about the same number have gone out. I think something like from 15,000 to 17,000 have entered goods as coming into this country, who are not included in that list at all, and I presume others have gone out.

GEORGIAN BAY BRANCH, CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. COCKBURN, in moving for copies of all correspondence since 22nd December, 1880, with Smith, Ripley & Co., and others, upon the subject of the Georgian Bay Branch of the Pacific Railway contract, said: I have made several similar motions to the present on former occasions, but I have so far been unable to ascertain what the country has lost by the cancellation of the contract for the Georgian Bay Branch. It is worthy of remark that the wisdom of the policy of the late Government, adopted in 1874, of establishing a port on the Georgian Bay, preparatory to the construction of the main line north of Lake Superior, is now being demonstrated by the policy of the Syndicate and the present Government; for, if rumor be correct, they have adopted a similar policy by establishing a Georgian Bay port at Algoma Mills, west of French River. I think they might as well have continued the Georgian Bay Branch to French River, which would have served the same purpose that is now being contemplated, and at the same time have saved the loss which took place on the contract. Considerable money has been expended on actual work on the road, and a great many people have suffered disappointment and actual loss by moving into the territory south of Lake Nipissing after the road commenced only to find their hopes blasted by the cancellation of the contract after the change of Government. It seems to be a settled fact that the party now in power are determined not to have the railway built south of Lake Nipissing on any condition whatever.

OFFICIAL VISITS TO ENGLAND.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving for a return shewing the expenses in detail incurred by the several members of the Government, and any other person or persons in the service of the Government, or paid by the Government, sent to England or elsewhere, on behalf of the Government, or in the service of the Government, from the 10th February, 1880, to date, said: I draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to the observations which I made the other day on this subject. On the 23rd of February, 1880, I moved a similar motion to this, and on the 7th of March, 1881, the hon. gentleman submitted the return. Surely the hon. gentleman has employes enough in his Department to enable him to prepare such a return in a shorter period than thirteen months, and it is simply a farce for Parliament to order such returns if so long a time is required to execute his orders. On the 16th of December, 1880, I made a similar motion, and I find that the return was only brought down to-day—some fourteen months after the motion was made. On the same principle I suppose I may indulge the hope that the return now asked for will be forthcoming some time in 1883 or 1884. Moreover, the return the hon. gentleman has brought down is not in accordance with the Order of the House, which was for the accounts in detail and not in a lump sum. For instance, on one occasion, Sir Leonard Tilley's expenses to England were some $800, and on another occasion some $2,400. One would like to have some information on this discrepancy.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I may say that that return has been made in the same form as all such returns for the last ten years. I am not aware that any detailed statement has ever been made by any hon. member of a Government as to the number of meals he had, and as to his hotel and various other expenses. I know some delay took place last year, because part of the payments that had been made were for expenses incurred by agents in England, and they did not appear until the accounts for the year had come in. The discrepancy in the two sums mentioned by the hon. gentleman is chiefly owing to the fact that a portion of the $2,400 was incurred on the first visit in 1878, but did not appear in the accounts until the next year, if my memory serves me. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has called attention to this matter, because the expenses of the two visits will compare very favorably with some others, I think. On the second visit, when I went to England to negotiate a loan, and in company with my colleagues to discuss other questions, my secretary accompanied me, and his expenses are added. Information is now in the Department which will enable me to furnish, in a few days, what the hon. gentleman asks for in the Address.

Motion agreed to.

PASPÉBIAC HARBOUR.

Mr. BEAUCHESNE moved for copies of the report of the engineer who made the survey of the harbour of Paspébiac in 1874 and 1875.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that any such report exists in any department; if a report has been made, it is one concerning the Intercolonial Railway. The motion may, however, pass. I shall make enquiries as to whether such a report exists, and if so, it shall be presented to the House.

Motion agreed to.

LAND GRANT BONDS OF THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for all correspondence, reports, and Orders in Council in relation to the acceptance of the land grant bonds of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company by the Government for any public purpose, and a statement of the action thereon, said: I call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that it is stated in a prospectus of the Company that those land grant bonds had been ordered to be accepted in respect of certain other public purposes than security for the construction of the railway itself.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CONTRACT RIGHTS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence on the subject of any railway or projected railway claimed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to be in derogation of their contract rights, said: If the ordinary sources of information are correct, there is more than one railway in respect to which there ought to be an answer to this motion.

Motion agreed to.

EXTRADITION.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence not already brought down, as to extradition, and as to the last Canadian Extradition Act, and as to the address of both Houses of the Canadian Parliament on the subject, said: I desire to call the attention of the Government and the House very briefly to the present position of this question with a view to obtain an early answer to this address. I think it is now two years ago since I proposed an address to the Imperial Government requesting their attention to the joint address unanimously passed by both Houses of this Parliament, so long ago as 1877, asking for certain executive action which was necessary in order that our Extradition Act of 1877, which also passed unanimously, might become efficacious within this country. To that joint address no response has been brought down to Parliament, and my motion lapsed at the request of the hon. the First Minister, who informed me that he was on the point, as he expected, of being able to make satisfactory arrangements; and it was not renewed last Session, owing to the circumstances which pre-occupied the attention of the House. It is extremely unfortunate—I do not blame the Government at all, because we have not any materials for judging of their action—that there should have been no action as yet taken in reference to the Act of Parliament which was so passed, as it would have removed very many of the evils and difficulties which now exist in the working of the present extradition convention between this country and the United States. I know of grievous injustice and wrong having occurred owing to the complicated character of the existing provisions. I know of a case in which the interest of justice has been thwarted owing to the miscarriages due to the complicated character of the old provisions. After some thousands of dollars had been expended the proceedings were abortive, and though it was quite clear that the man ought to have been, in any sense but a technical sense, sent over the water, the demand for extradition was refused. The persons who made this demand were disgusted at their large expenditure, and gave the matter up. Other instances also occurred. It is a matter of very grave consequence that we should learn, at this late date, what prevented our Extradition Act from being put into operation. This is but one part of this motion. I hope this correspondence will be brought down early, in order that I may be put in a position, while yet private members have an opportunity of engaging the attention of the House, to make some further motion on this subject. The other point to which I refer is of equally, perhaps of greater, importance. I refer to the necessity of taking active measures for the enlargements of the range of extradition offences. That subject was discussed during my visit to England upon this topic—both the enlargement of the range and the more liberal application of the international law to this question. The difficulty that existed at that time, and which resulted in the temporary suspension of the Ashburton Treaty, was due to the controversy between Lord Derby and Mr. Fish as to the course that each country was entitled to take on the subject of extradition. That difficulty was ultimately resolved by the retirement of the Imperial Government from the position it had assumed; and the Royal Commission, composed of numerous eminent persons on both sides of politics, presented a report entirely abandoning the old exclusive and illiberal doctrines on this subject, and propounding doctrines more satisfactory to modern notions and the exigencies of the present state of the case. This report renders it impossible that the cases which were formerly suggested of the right of asylum, &c., and which had really no sound foundation, and the difficulties suggested as to the range of offences, which have equally, to the present day, no solid foundation, should form any obstacle. I maintain it is a special interest and duty not merely to procure an efficacious mode of working existing arrangements, but to press for further treaty arrangements extending the range of existing offences. If that fail, we should do what was suggested long ago to this House, on the occasion of the visit to which I have referred, and what has actually taken place in the early history of the old Province of Upper Canada and several other dependencies of the Crown, we should proceed legislatively, in order that, if we are unable to obtain from other countries the rascals that fly from us to them, we may be able to relieve ourselves of the rascals who fly from other countries to us.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. With reference to the first remark of the hon. leader of the Opposition, the correspondence, of course, that has taken place—I do not know that any has taken place—will be laid on the Table. Judging from the remark made by the hon. leader of the Government, on Friday last, he is in accord with the hon. leader of the Opposition as to the propriety of extending our treaty arrangements, and there will be very little difference of opinion on both sides of the House when that subject is dealt with.

Motion agreed to.

MILITARY DEFENCE OF CANADA.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for the correspondence between the Imperial and Canadian Governments, or any member or Mr. BLAKE.

officers therco^f, relating to the defence of Canada, said: It has been stated that, prior to the occurrence to which I am about to refer, a correspondence took place of considerable interest and importance with relation to the military defence of Canada, which has never been brought down, and that views of great interest to the people of Canada were communicated to its Government. I think it is about time we should be aware of what those views are. Later on, a memorandum in which the First Minister, and the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Railways joined, as expository of their view that the diplomatic office of a representative of Canada, should be opened at the Court of St. James, declared that at this moment certain subjects were under consideration, including the military defence of Canada generally, and of British Columbia more especially. That was some time in the year 1879. It is obvious, therefore, that the subject of the military defence of Canada, generally, and of British Columbia more especially, has been under consideration, at any rate, from the time I refer to, 1879; and, if my information is correct, it has been under consideration for a period considerably anterior. I think it would be of interest for us to know what the nature of the discussion has been, what the information is, and what are the statements to be made with regard to this very important subject.

Mr. CARON. This correspondence is of a most voluminous character, extending over a period of time previous to Confederation, and it will require some time to bring down all the papers. Of course, the whole of the correspondence, with the exception of what is private and confidential, will be submitted to the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman's statement means that no portions of that correspondence will be brought down, except such as will be of little or no interest.

Mr. CARON. When it comes down the hon. gentleman can judge for himself.

Motion agreed to.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND OTHER COUNTRIES.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence and reports relating to the improvement of the commercial relations between Canada and any other country, including the correspondence on the subject of the communication of the French Consul at Quebec to a member of the Government, said: It will be recollected that we have already had a certain amount of correspondence from the High Commissioner, which was brought down, I think, last Session, stating the results of his negotiations so far. I presume there has been some continuance of the correspondence on that subject, and that we have at any rate some letters to show for that appointment. Besides that, I have already alluded particularly to the subject of a correspondence which is of some public interest, and which was noticed in the papers of the country, and also in English newspapers, and which has occasioned a little discussion in the British House of Commons. It seems a report got abroad that a gentleman who at that time was, or who a short time previously had been, French Consul at Quebec, addressed a communication to the Minister of Public Works, or in some way intimated to him that the French Government was cordially disposed to us in this connection, and that the Minister of Public Works was disloyal enough to receive that communication, and actually to impart it to somebody or other, I do not know whom. It seems this gave rise to some political excitement in the English House of Commons, and that the British Government was interrogated on the subject; that they communicated with the Canadian First Minister; that he agreed that a glaring impropriety had occurred, and communicated his views to the Government in England to the effect that nothing of the kind should be repeated, and that a correspondence was addressed to the Government of France in order to ascertain how this dreadful thing had happened. I believe that ultimately the danger of a rupture of the cordial relations between France and England was averted by the assurance that the offending Consul had ceased to be an officer of the French Government, and that by means of that correspondence our Government has escaped from a responsibility it would, in the event of such a dire catastrophe, have had to assume. I desire all such information as the Government may possess on such an important subject, as well as that available on the perhaps more important question of what progress has been made in the improvement of our commercial relations with other countries.

Motion agreed to.

DEFAULTS IN THE LONDON POST OFFICE.

Mr. BLAKE moved for—

(1.) Copies of the evidence taken and the report made by Post Office Inspector Dewe, about 1880, on the defaults and irregularities in the London Post Office, and of any departmental action thereon, of the Reports and Order in Council as to the superannuation of the late postmaster, and the appointment of the present postmaster.

(2.) Copies of the evidence, correspondence, reports and Orders in Council or departmental action on which Scott Phipps, a clerk in the London office, was dismissed about 1875, and of all papers relating to subsequent re-appointment to office; copies of correspondence and statements as to the loss or disappearance of registered and other letters in the office within the last twelve months; and as to the action of the Divisional Inspector in suspending Phipps, and the evidence taken and the report made by him thereon; of all correspondence relating to that suspension; of the departmental direction to Inspector Dewe, the evidence taken and report made by him thereon; of the departmental direction to Post Office Inspector Sweetnam, the evidence taken and the report made by him thereon; of the departmental action and Order in Council dealing with Phipps, made after the reports; of all correspondence relating to that action, of the Order in Council thereafter made suspending Phipps; of the departmental or other action on which Inspector Dewe entered on a fresh investigation; of the evidence taken and report made by him thereon; of all correspondence relating thereto; and to the subsequent action of Inspector Sweetnam; and to the final action under which Phipps was reinstated and copy of such action.

(3.) Statement of the office held by the assistant postmaster at London prior to his promotion; of the date of his appointment as Assistant; of the time during which he has been a member of the City Council; and copies of any reports or correspondence relating to him.

(4.) Copies of any papers or reports relating to the late Deputy Inspector Cox shortly before his superannuation, and of the correspondence and departmental and executive action touching his superannuation.

(5.) Copies of any papers, correspondence or reports as to the condition of the London office.

He said: If it is understood, as I believe it is understood, from observations of the Minister of Public Works, that this motion will be granted and the papers brought down early, it will be convenient I should not give the House my reasons for the motion; and I will, on that understanding, propose the motion without any observations.

Mr. O'CONNOR. All of the papers that are not secret and confidential will be brought down. The papers are quite voluminous, and may be brought down in a week, or perhaps sooner.

Motion agreed to.

CIRCULARS TO DOMINION BANKS.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT, in moving for copies of all circulars issued from the Department of Finance to any banks of the Dominion since 1st January, 1881, said: This is very like the request already made by my hon. friend in his motion; but, as the motion is not made in the same shape, I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance if any circulars other than those referred to by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) have been issued since the 1st of January, 1881?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. None.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Then I will withdraw that motion by leave of the House.

INDIANS OF LAKES HURON AND SUPERIOR.

Mr. DAWSON moved for a return of all correspondence which has taken place within the past two years between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of Ontario, in reference to the arrears due to the Indians of Lakes Huron and Superior, under the Robinson Treaty, together with any petitions recently presented by the Indians on the same subject.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask from the Government before this motion is carried—I am sorry the First Minister is not in his place—whether this correspondence is still proceeded with. I would like to know whether demands are still made upon the Province of Ontario for the amounts that the Indians were to receive under this treaty when the territory which was then negotiated for by the Government of Canada was lying within the limits of Manitoba. It would seem to be a very extraordinary proceeding if it should turn out to be correct, that the Government of the Dominion is making a demand on the Government of Ontario for the moneys which the Indians are entitled to under that treaty, at the same time denying any right on the part of the Government of Ontario to the lands that were then ceded.

Motion agreed to.

ACTS OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURES.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence, petitions, reports, and Orders in Council relating to Acts of Provincial Legislatures or reserved Bills of Provincial Legislatures not already asked for by address or order of this House, said: As my hon. friend from Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) has pointed out, the motion which was made and assented to by the House the other day was simply a motion for the return of Acts which have been disallowed. It does not give any of the correspondence or Orders in Council, and so on. This is the general motion which we have been in the habit of making every Session, and it is wide enough to deal with every case which has not been ordered or brought down.

Motion agreed to.

TRUST AND LAND IMPROVEMENT FUND.

Mr. HESSON, in moving for copies of all correspondence between this Government and the Governments of Ontario and Quebec relating to the unsettled Trust and Land Improvement Fund account, said: I desire once again to draw the attention of the House and the Government to this matter, this being, I believe, the fourth Session in which I have been called upon on behalf of my constituents to refer to this unsettled account. After four years I have to say that my progress has not been very much, though I believe some progress has been made. The Finance Minister it appears, during the past few years, has made some efforts towards the settlement of this account, and these efforts have resulted in bringing down in the Estimates by the Treasurer of the Province of Ontario a sum of something like $125,000 for distribution to the various municipalities interested in this account. That sum is not anything like equal to the amount credited to the fund, and I see no reason why the account should stand longer in its present position. I have had interviews with the Minister of Finance and his deputy on this question, and they state that they are willing and ready to settle this account at any time they can get the two Provinces, interested with the Dominion in the matter, to come to a settlement. I shall be glad if some means can be devised by which to bring about the closing of this account once for all. It is a great injustice to the townships—and they are chiefly townships which are interested—that this account should be standing open so long, with the probability that when they come to close it the Governments may not see proper to allow them the interest which has accrued during these many years. I notice, from a discussion in the other House, that they have not included any sum for interest, and I wish it to be distinctly understood that wherever the blame for this state of things belongs, whether to the Dominion Government, or the Governments of Ontario or Quebec, the blame should be placed on the proper shoulders. If the fund is in the possession of this Government, I should think it is desirable that it should be placed to the credit of Ontario, to be distributed to the municipalities entitled to it. I trust something will be immediately done to have the account closed.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to say that I heartily agree with the views expressed by the hon. gentleman, not merely as to this specific item, which is, of course, of itself a great grievance, but also as to the importance of closing these accounts which have remained unsettled for the fifteen years which have now elapsed since Confederation commenced. I suppose it has been the pressure of other business on the part of all the Governments interested which may have led to this result, but I do not think it is a creditable or reasonable thing that there should have been so long a delay in arriving at a settlement. I trust a very earnest effort will be made by the three Governments concerned to close the whole account, so that the accounts of the two principal Provinces of the Dominion may not remain in the unsettled, incomplete and confused condition they are now in, in consequence of the account not being closed.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I entirely agree with the last speaker, that the time has arrived when these questions between the two Provinces and the Dominion Government should be disposed of. So far as the Dominion Government are concerned, it has been our anxious desire to have them closed. Immediately after the prorogation, in March last, communications were had with the two Governments, and I thought that in the summer we had reached a point where there was a probability of arriving at a conclusion; but the general elections, which shortly afterwards took place in Quebec, resulted in a further postponement of a settlement. The moment the House rises we will renew our efforts to bring about a settlement, because many of the accounts, such as those referred to by the hon. gentlemen, are in a condition most unsatisfactory to the parties interested.

Motion agreed to.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Mr. O'CONNOR presented the Annual Report of the Postmaster General.

LIBRARY COMMITTEE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN, in the absence of Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, moved that a Select Standing Committee, composed of Messrs. Anglin, Blake, Brecken, Cameron (Huron), Sir Richard J. Cartwright, Colby, Daly, Fortin, Houde, Laurier, Macdonnell (Inverness), McCarthy, Mills, Mousseau, Tassé, and Wright, be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library. He said: The only changes in the Committee of last year are the following: Mr. LaRue was replaced by Mr. McCarthy, and Mr. Masson, who will be unable to attend this Session, will be replaced by Mr. Mousseau.

Mr. BLAKE. I am sorry my hon. friend has made the exchange he proposes to the House, in substituting Mr. McCarthy for Mr. LaRue. That alters the composition of the Committee in two respects. I should have supposed the hon. gentleman would have left the Committee representing the Provinces respectively in the same proportion as last Session.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The composition of the Committee I think should meet the views of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE. The changes affect the political and also the Provincial complexion of the Committee.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. LaRue is replaced by Mr. Amyot, which I do not think changes the complexion of the Committee much, and the same remark will apply to the successor of Mr. Mousseau, who is unfortunately in ill-health. I think the hon. gentleman will see that the present Committee is fairly composed.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the changes are all right; but if the Committee is fairly composed now, it must have been unfairly constructed last Session, and unfair as against the hon. gentleman, who never was accused of being unfair to himself.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the Committee was unfair as regards us last Session, and I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman opposite will be happy to correct that unfairness on the present occasion.

Mr. LANDRY. I have not the same complaint to make to the hon. Minister with regard to the composition of the Committee, at least with regard to its political complexion, but I must ask why Mr. LaRue's place is taken, representing as he did somewhat the French Canadian element, by a member of a different nationality?

Mr. BLAKE. The Committee is not altogether the same; there is another change; Mr. Masson is succeeded by Mr. Mousseau.

Mr. LANDRY. I thought the Committee was the same as last year and that the only change consisted in substituting Mr. McCarthy for Mr. LaRue.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Mousseau takes Mr. Masson's place.

Mr. LANDRY. There is nothing to affect us in that change, but in the other case we lose a member, and I think that in all that concerns French literature, we are not in such strength that we can afford not to at least hold our own.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will examine the composition of the Committee, he will perceive that if Mr. McCarthy takes Mr. LaRue's place, that nevertheless the Committee's composition is excellent as the names of Messrs. Fortin, Houde, Mousseau and Tassé are on it, and he may feel assured that the literary and historical interests of our Province will be in safe keeping in the hands of these gentlemen, even if we do not take it into consideration the French propensities of several other members of the Committee; it would have been impossible to do better under the circumstances, and if the hon. member will look at the composition of the Committee from an Upper Canadian point of view, he will find that under the circumstances it was but fair that Mr. LaRue should be succeeded by the hon. member.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 8) respecting the Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada.—(Mr. Beatty.)

Bill (No. 10) to provide that persons charged with misdemeanors shall be competent as witnesses.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

Bill (No. 11) to amend the Criminal Law, and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting offences against the person.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) introduced a Bill (No. 9) concerning marriage with a deceased wife's sister.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to tell us whether this measure is the same as that which passed the Commons last Session?

Mr. GIROUARD. Not altogether the same. That portion of the Bill passed last Session which referred to the widow of the brother has been eliminated; that is about all the difference. The Bill reads in this way: "All laws prohibiting marriage between a man and the sister of his deceased wife are hereby repealed." The Bill will not affect in any manner existing vested rights.

Bill read the first time.

ELECTIONS OF MEMBERS TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Mr. IVES, in introducing Bill (No. 12) further to amend "The Dominion Elections Act, 1874," said: The object of the Bill is to amend a section of the Act, which provides that all candidates for election to the House of Commons shall deposit the sum of $50, which becomes a contribution to the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the country. It seems to me that when we have a surplus of $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 the country can afford to pay the expenses of the general elections. In the place of that provision the amendment proposes to substitute the provision of the local Quebec Act, which, in my opinion, is much preferable. By the provision of the Quebec Act, each candidate makes a deposit of $200. This is returned to him if he is elected, or if he succeeds in obtaining one-third of the votes polled. In fact, it is a provision which insures good faith in candidature, and in a measure will prevent candidates from being proposed from a mere desire for notoriety, or even from a more unworthy object. The provision of this amendment does away with the contribution to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and provides for the same deposit as provided by the Quebec Act.

Bill read the first time.

REGISTERED LETTERS.

Mr. FARROW enquired, Is it the intention of the Government this Session to provide greater security in sending moneys by registered letter by charging extra for registration purposes according to amounts sent, and the Government to be responsible in case the money is lost?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The question has not yet been considered by the Government.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. POPE (Compton) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor-General;

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

LORNE,

The Governor General transmits, for the information of the House of Commons,—Copy of the Numerical Census of the Dominion of Canada, taken under the Act 42 Victoria, Chapter 21.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

DRAWBACKS ON SHEET IRON.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence with the Customs Department on the subject of drawbacks on duty paid on sheet iron for nail making to the extent of the export of the nails made from such iron, said: I do not know what may be the extent of this correspondence, but there has been placed in my hands a copy of a letter written to the Customs Department, under date of July, 1881, enquiring, on behalf of a person engaged in this trade, whether the firm could get back the duty paid on sheet iron for nail making to the extent of the nails exported; and a copy of another letter, dated 8th September, 1881, referring to the former letter, and conveying the intimation that no answer had yet been received to that communication. I believe that no answer has yet been received to either of those two letters. There may have been some correspondence with other merchants on the subject, or, on the other hand, with those engaged in manufacturing sheet iron for nail making, such as the Londonderry Works for example. I wish to get all the correspondence whether with manufacturers or merchants; and I should have been glad to have had some explanation from the Minister of Customs of how it happened that a letter upon a subject so interesting to the trade of Canada should have remained unanswered from July last until to-day.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am unable to give an answer to the hon. gentleman, because the hon. the Minister of Customs is not present; but I am sure, when he is in his place, he will be able to give a satisfactory reason for the letter in question remaining so long unanswered.

CUSTOMS REVENUES ON HUDSON'S BAY.

Mr. BANNERMAN moved for a return showing the amount received for duties at the ports of Moose, York and Churchill, during the years 1876 to 1881, inclusive; also the amount paid to Customs officers at the several ports. He said: I wish to call the attention of the Government thoroughly to this matter, as I have been informed that there is something going on in that country against the interests of Canada, and the sooner it is remedied the better. During the last eight or ten years a large and increasing trade has been done in Hudson's Bay. By a return to the American Government, we find that in 1880 between $600,000 and $700,000 worth of furs, whalebone and oil was exported from Hudson's Bay into the United States in foreign vessels. These vessels trade there with the native population without restraint, and without contributing to the revenues of this country, whereas the Hudson's Bay Company, which is now a Canadian company, has to make returns and pay Customs duties the same as any other mercantile firm in the country. Furthermore, these foreigners have taken possession of a most important point, in fact, the key to the northern portion of Hudson's Bay, and that is the Marble Island. They have built large storehouses there, and are doing a larger business on the shores of the bay than the Hudson's Bay Company. A further evidence of the grievance that the Hudson's Bay Company have against the Government of Canada for not protecting their interests there, is this: that when the United States Government bought the Territory of Alaska from the Russian Government, the Hudson's Bay Company had six or seven posts in that territory. They were given twenty-four hours notice to leave the country; they were allowed nothing for their improvements, and they had not time to take away their provisions or goods, and had to leave them there, and they became the property of the companies whom the American Government allowed to trade there. I, therefore, think it the duty of the Government to protect any parties of Canadians who are trading in that country, and not allow American traders to enjoy greater privileges than our own people. I would suggest to the right hon. leader of the Government the advisability of combining the geological surveys of that country with the collections of Customs duties, and of sending a revenue cutter to see that justice is done. If this suggestion is carried out, I have no doubt it will be found to work successfully. I find that $1,800 is paid annually in commissions on the collection of revenue in the North-West, and I should like to know what percentage of commission is paid to those who are acting as Customs officers in that district. I think there are only two or three who are so paid, while something like $15,000 or $20,000 are collected annually there from the Hudson's Bay Company. I am satisfied that if the Government appointed a Customs officer, and used the proper appliances, the revenues of that country would be doubled, and the Government would be repaid for the extra expense incurred. But I maintain that the Government has a right to protect the interests of the traders in that country, whether at a loss or not, and the only way to do that is to send a revenue cutter there, which, I think, would put an end to the matter.

Motion agreed to.

MONEY ORDERS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. FARROW, in moving for a return showing the amount of moneys sent from Canada by post office money order to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the United States, and to all other countries during the past year 1881, also the cost of the same, said: Last year I moved for a similar return, and whether the return ever came down or not I cannot tell—all I can say is, that I never saw it. I consider this a very important matter, as both those who send money and those to whom it is sent are interested in it. When this return comes down it will probably be seen that a vast amount of money is sent in this way from this country to the United Kingdom, and in moving for this order I know I am acting according to the wishes of the vast majority of the hard workingmen of Canada. I have not a word to say against the money order system as in operation between this country and the United States. Most of the arrangements are good, while, at the same time, they are practical, convenient and cheap. But what I have to complain of is this: that while we charge only a small percentage on money going to the United States, even to extreme points, such as San Francisco on the west and New Orleans on the south, it is entirely different when you come to send money by post office order to the United Kingdom. I am very glad to know that when the Government came into power and enacted the National Policy, if they discriminated in favor of one country over another, it was in favor of Great Britain. The Government had an eye to that, and all their prognostications as to the results have been fulfilled. Our trade with the United States has been, in a great measure, dropping off, while our trade with the Old Country has been increasing. We want the Government to consider this postal question in this light: that whatever may be the cost of sending money to the United States, it shall be sent as cheaply to the United Kingdom. I believe this is the wish of the House and of the country, and I do not see why it should not be carried out. I hope the Government will take this matter into their serious consideration, and that we will shortly see regulations adopted in that direction. There are two reasons why the charges should be made similar. The Old Country is not a foreign country. We all pride ourselves that we belong to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. We belong to the fatherland; the majority of us are either English, Irish or Scotch, and we are proud of our connection with Great Britain. The United States, on the other hand, is a foreign country, and the money we send there goes into their coffers. The money we send to the Old Country is generally the savings of those who have come out here, and it is sent for the assistance of fathers, mothers, sisters or dependent relatives, to whom a few pounds sent from Canada is of great benefit. But the greater part of the money sent is for emigration purposes. Many a father comes out to this country alone, because he is only able to pay for himself. He works with determination for a year or two, and when he has acquired a few hundred dollars he sends for his wife and children. Under these circumstances, I trust the Government will seriously consider the matter, and at once apply a remedy.

Mr. HESSON. I desire to endorse the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for North Huron. It will be the opinion of the House, and of the constituencies which we represent, that this question is one of very great importance, and that it is not sufficient that the papers be brought down as a matter of form, but that the opinions of the hon. members should be obtained on the subject. It is true, as has been represented by the hon. member for North Huron, that a discrimination is made against the United Kingdom. When we are endeavoring to induce immigration from foreign countries, particularly from Germany, whose delegates we have invited to visit the Dominion, it is desirable that every facility should be given to strangers visiting our country, with a view to settling here, to assist their relatives in joining them by sending small sums of money to the Old Country; and it is rather unfair that they should be charged a heavier rate for obtaining such an exchange than if they were dealing with the people of the United States. The complaint made by my hon. friend is a just one, and it will be endorsed by the great majority of the House, and I trust there will be nothing to prevent the Postmaster General in devising some scheme whereby the rate may be reduced. It cannot be a matter of vital importance to the revenue, as we have a very large surplus; indeed, I fancy there is no strong reason to prevent an arrangement being entered into with the people of Great Britain and Germany, in order to place the scale of charges on a more reasonable basis than at present.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is no objection to the motion passing, but I may as well remark that the matter was brought before the Postal Convention, and the result of that convention was, that negotiations have been pending for some time past between the Post Office Department here and Great Britain on the very subject which has been brought before the House.

Motion agreed to.

ADMISSION OF LIVE STOCK INTO CANADA.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex), in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government, relative to the admission of live stock into the Dominion for breeding or other purposes, said: The House is aware that for some years the Imperial Government have prohibited the importation of live stock from the United States into Great Britain, and has only permitted importation from Canada upon the understanding that the Dominion Government shall strictly enforce a similar prohibition of the importation of live stock from the United States into the Dominion. About two years ago the stringency of this restriction was moderated by the Imperial Government consenting to the transportation of live stock through Canada, on the Southern and Great Western Railways, from the Detroit to the Niagara River, connecting at each point with the American system of railways, the stock in question having been first subjected to a rigid examination by a duly qualified veterinary surgeon appointed by the Dominion Government. It has been found, upon official investigation on the part of the United States Government, that the cattle disease is confined to the southern and eastern States of the Union, and that the western States have been entirely free from disease. In view of these circumstances the Dominion Government would be more than justified in representing the facts to the Imperial Government, in urging still further concessions with a view to the importation of live stock from the West, subject, if necessary, to quarantine regulations and inspection. Much inconvenience has been felt by the owners of thoroughbred stock in particular, in consequence of the existing restrictions. According to newspaper report some negotiations, with a view to what we suggest, have been in progress. A story is told, though I do not vouch for its veracity, of a gentleman living in Petite Côte, on the Detroit River, who had a valuable herd of Jersey thoroughbreds, and who was anxious to import from the neighboring State of Michigan a Jersey bull recently imported into that State from England. Finding it impossible to induce the Minister of Agriculture to waive the regulations, even after careful inspection, and being determined to have his Jersey bull at all costs, he sent the animal round from Detroit, by the Lake Shore Railway, through the States of Michigan, Ohio, New York and Massachusetts, then shipped him from Boston to Halifax, from which city he sent him West by the Intercolonial and Grand Trunk Railroads. But, unfortunately, the man in charge, instead of transshipping at Toronto by the Great Western Railway to Windsor, continued on the Grand Trunk and crossed the river, during the night, from Sarnia to Port Huron, finding himself in the morning in Detroit, the place from which he started. The story is good enough to be true, and, at any rate, it illustrates the inconvenience caused by the existing regulations. Now that it is an established fact that no cattle disease exists in the western States, the Government certainly should at least make efforts to have the restrictions withdrawn in favor of thoroughbred stock, with a view to subsequently extending the concession to all live stock under proper quarantine regulations.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Agriculture is not in his place, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Patterson) may rest assured that the Government has already taken measures, with the object of obtaining the improvement he wishes; and we hope the efforts we are making may be successful.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 17th February, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DREW moved that the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended to Wednesday, the 1st of March.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 13) to authorize and provide for the winding up of the Dominion Fire and Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Kilvert).

Bill (No. 14) respecting the Canada Southern Railway Company, and the Erie and Niagara Railway Company.—(Mr. Arkell).

THE ESTIMATES.

Sir LÉONARD TILLEY. I will state to the House that I hope, on Tuesday next, to lay the Estimates on the Table of the House, and to make the statement on Friday.

REVENUE CUTTER ON HUDSON'S BAY.

Mr. BANNERMAN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to send a revenue cutter or other vessel to Hudson's Bay next summer, for the proper collection of the revenue?

Mr. BOWELL. The matter is under the consideration of the Government.

GOVERNMENT COMMISSIONER AT PARIS.

Mr. VALLÉE enquired, Whether the Government have appointed, or intend to appoint, an agent or Commissioner to represent the commercial interests of Canada at Paris, France?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government have understood that the Government of Quebec purpose appointing a representative or delegate to reside at Paris in the interests of that Government. Should such an appointment be made, it is just possible that the Government of the Dominion might make the services of that gentleman available in the encouragement of immigration and the promotion of the commercial interests of Canada.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH SABLE ISLAND.

Mr. DALY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide for telegraphic communication with Cape Sable Island by means of a sub-marine cable, in accordance with the prayer of a petition of the Hon. N. W. White, and others, of the county of Shelburne, Nova Scotia.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is still under the consideration of the Government, but it is likely that we will be able to submit a vote to Parliament in the direction suggested.

EXTENSION OF THE PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE.

Mr. COSTIGAN enquired, Is it the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to so amend the general election law, that the right to vote for members of the House of Commons may be extended to a larger proportion of the people than now enjoy it, and be uniform throughout the Dominion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That subject is under the consideration of the Government in connection with a measure we will be obliged to bring down, in accordance with the British North America Act, after the Census taken last year.

SALARIES OF RURAL POSTMASTERS.

Mr. WHEELER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, during the present year, to increase the salaries of postmasters outside of towns and cities, in accordance with the increased revenue of the Department?

Mr. O'CONNOR. By far the greater number of postmasters outside the towns and cities are paid by a percentage on the amount which they collect, and, of course, as that amount increases from the increase of business, their salaries will be augmented in proportion.

CANADIAN TOBACCO.

Mr. VANASSE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause to be prepared some elementary treatises on the growing and preparation of Tobacco, and to have them distributed gratuitously throughout the country.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Department of the Interior will consider the matter.

REPORT OF THE FACTORY COMMISSION.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT enquired, When the report of the Factory Commission, promised in the Speech from the Throne, will be brought down?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It has been put in type for the use of hon. members, and I hope to submit it next Monday or Tuesday.

EMIGRANTS TO CANADA.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a statement of the number of emigrants booked and sent to Canada by the agents of each of the steamship lines, and of the number booked and sent by the agents of the Ontario Government, or any other Provincial Government, during the last fiscal year.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I may say to my hon. friend that it will be impossible for me to get the number booked by each of the steamship lines, though I can give him the number in the aggregate. As the hon. gentleman probably knows, that no agents of the Ontario Government, or any other Government, book these emigrants, they are only booked by the licensed agents of the steamship lines. The total number remaining in Canada of those so booked can be ascertained.

Mr. BLAKE. That will answer my purpose.

Motion agreed to.

GOODS IMPORTED FOR CONSUMPTION.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) moved for a summary statement, similar to No. 2 in the Trade and Navigation Returns, of the goods imported for consumption dutiable and free in the Dominion of Canada, the amount of duty collected, and the rates of duty levied thereon, during the six months ending the 31st of December, 1881. Also a similar statement to No. 5 in the Trade and Navigation Returns, of the goods, the produce and manufacture of Canada, exported from the Dominion of Canada, for the six months ending 31st December, 1881.

Mr. COSTIGAN.

Mr. BOWELL. I have no objection to the motion, except the time and labor involved in preparing it, as I have explained to the hon. gentleman. If these returns are to be asked for every Session, in addition to those which have already been asked for by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), they simply amount to a duplication of the Trade and Navigation Returns for every six months in the year, less those tables required for the registration of shipping. I shall see that as much as possible of the information sought for is brought down, and at as early a day as possible.

Mr. BURPEE. I think I should be able to reduce considerably the labor involved by keeping out some of the particulars asked for.

Motion agreed to.

THE PROPOSED MANITOBA AND HUDSON'S BAY RAILWAY.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT, in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and any other parties, in reference to the proposed railway from Manitoba to Hudson's Bay, said: I am aware that a number of gentlemen of some prominence in Canada, have had the construction of this railway under serious consideration. There are supposed to be very serious difficulties in the way of navigating Hudson's Bay. In the first place, the grain transported by that route would not be the grain of the current season, but of the season preceding; and, in the next place, vessels of different construction from those ordinarily employed would probably be required for a navigation which must be encumbered by a considerable quantity of ice. But my main reason for calling the attention of the Government to the matter, is this: I am inclined to think this subject has been brought to the notice of some shipowners in England, and I would suggest to the Government the expediency of urging the English Government to cause some of their squadron to be employed next year in ascertaining what length of time navigation remains open. If, as is asserted by some, that navigation is practicable for four months in the year, or thereabouts, this matter may be of considerable moment to the inhabitants of Manitoba; but if, on the other hand, it is practicable for only two months or six weeks, as some supposed-to-be-authorities assert, then it appears to me it would be an idle waste of money to construct this railway. As the matter is one of interest to English shipowners as well as to the people of Canada, I would suggest to the Government the desirability of having a thorough exploration in the way I suggest.

Motion agreed to.

SHIPPING DISASTERS ON INLAND WATERS.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT, in moving for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and any other parties, in reference to loss of vessels on our inland waters, in consequence of over-loading or shifting of cargoes, said: There have been, as the House is aware, some serious disasters on our inland waters, resulting in the total loss of the crews in some cases, and under circumstances which have led the public to believe that very gross carelessness was exercised in the loading of those vessels. This is a matter to which attention has been directed in England and elsewhere by Mr. Plimsoll and other persons who take an interest in these matters, and I would call the attention of the acting Minister of Marine to the desirability of seeing whether some regulations cannot be adopted, to secure greater safety to life and property on our inland waters. Unfortunately, in cases in which vessels are heavily insured, there is too much reason to believe that the owners are very careless as to the mode in which their vessels are laden, and, as we know, great loss of life not unfrequently results therefrom.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following motions for returns were severally agreed to:—

Return of all Customs seizures made at Moose, York, Churchill, and all other ports in Hudson's Bay, during the last seven fiscal years.—(Mr. Bannerman.)

Statement showing the amount of duties collected on Canadian tobacco, whether manufactured, twist, or in the leaf; the amount of stamps issued for duties on Canadian tobacco from 1879 up to this date; the amount paid for the preparation and distribution of such stamps; the amounts paid by way of commission for the sale of such stamps, by districts; the number of persons employed in the distribution of licenses for the cultivation of Canadian tobacco, and in collecting the duties thereon; the salaries of such persons, or the commission received by them; all or any expenses of such persons defrayed out of the public chest.—(Mr. Vanasse.)

Copy of the complaints against Thomas Gordon, agent for the Indians on the Thames River, in the county of Middlesex, a copy of the Commission issued to investigate said complaints, and the report of the Commissioner, together with all the evidence received by said Commissioner, and all correspondence, Orders in Council, or other papers relating thereto; also a statement showing the expenses of said investigation to date.—(Mr. Ross, Middlesex.)

Return of all Canadian grown tobacco, manufactured or unmanufactured, seized by officers of the Department of Inland Revenue, within the Province of Quebec, during the years 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878, specifying 1st, the date of seizure; 2nd, the names of the parties from whom seized; 3rd, the Inland Revenue Division in which it was seized.—(Mr. Gigault.)

House adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

PUNISHMENT OF ADULTERY AND SEDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON in introducing Bill (No. 25) to amend the Criminal Law, and to extend the provision of the Act respecting offences against the person, by providing for the punishment of adultery, seduction, &c., said: This Bill provides for the punishment of adultery and seduction under promise of marriage. I propose, if the House assents to the second reading of this Bill, to ask its reference to a Select Committee. When the Bill is printed, its provisions will, I trust, bear a fuller discussion.

Bill read the first time.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time:—

Bill (No. 3) to incorporate the St. Lawrence Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 4) respecting the Sun Mutual Life Insurance Company of Montreal.—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 8) respecting the Commercial Travellers' Association of Canada.—(Mr. Beaty.)

Bill (No. 13) to authorize and provide for the winding up of the Dominion Fire and Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

STADACONA INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend and extend the Act to empower the Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company to relinquish their charter, and to provide for the winding up of their affairs.

Mr. VALLÉE. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the mover of this bill to the fact that this House has not the right to legalize a similar measure; it would be interfering with the civil law of Lower Canada to establish a limitation other than that determined by our Civil Code. The object of the measure is to compel the creditors of the Stadacona Insurance Company to file within a year the claims they have against the company, and to bring such claims before the courts within the same period, should they be contested, failing which they are to be barred by limitation. Now the civil law of Lower Canada gives every creditor, in the case of commercial transactions, the power of claiming his due, within a period of five years; in other words it fixes at five years the time of limitation. The measure now proposed requests this House to authorize the Stadacona Insurance Company to plead limitation at the expiration of a year. I maintain that this is an interference with our civil laws, and submit, Mr. Speaker, that the bill should be declared out of order from a constitutional point of view.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am of opinion that this House has undoubtedly the right of legislating on the matter now before it. Moreover, I believe that the Government has today foreshadowed a measure similar to the one I now bring before the House. At all events, the question just raised is liable to be dismissed, not only in the House, but also before the Special Committee, which is to consider the measure, and I think that it has always been the custom to refer these bills to the committee, as this one should be, in order that the question be there discussed and explained. I have not had the advantage of seeing the measure which the Government intends submitting to the House, but I feel sure that the same difficulty which would arise from the passing of the measure now before the House to wind up the affairs of the Stadacona Insurance Company, will make itself felt, and that the House will see itself compelled to adopt a final mode of solution,—whatever local law there may be on the subject—towards winding up promptly and finally within a determined and reasonable delay the affairs of these various companies. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think that this bill should, like others, come before the usual committee, and there be discussed on its constitutional and intrinsic worth.

Mr. SPEAKER. If I understand the point of order raised, it is that the Bill is unconstitutional. That is a point of law which is never decided by the Chair, but is for the Committee to which the Bill is referred to consider and report upon.

STEAMERS ON BAY CHALEURS.

Mr. BEAUCHESNE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to subsidize a line of steamers to perform the service on the Bay Chaleurs, between Gaspé and Campbelltown, in connection with the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Parliament will be asked to provide an appropriation for that service.

PACIFIC RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, When will the report and evidence taken by the Commission in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway be laid before the House? Is the evidence now complete in print in the possession of the Government ready for distribution?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The report has not yet been received, but I understand it will be presented to the Government in a few days. The evidence is in the hands of the printer, and, together with the report, will be laid before the House in a few days.

FORM OF THE ROYAL ASSENT.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether the Government has taken cognizance of a Speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, at Quebec, on the 24th day of June, 1880, in which the noble speaker thus expresses himself:

"The very usages in the Parliament of Britain survive from the days when they were planted there by our Norman ancestors. I do not know that it has been observed before in Canada, but it has often occurred to me that in the British Parliament we still use the old words used by our fathers for the sanction of the Sovereign given to Bills of La reine la veult, or la reine remercie ses bons sujets, accepte leur benvolence, et ainsi le veult, forms which I should like to see used in Ottawa, as marking our common origin, instead of the practice that prevails of translating into modern French and English."

Whether it is, in consequence, the intention of the Government to yield to the wishes of the Governor General of Canada, and to adopt for this Parliament, whenever the occasion arises for sanctioning Bills, expressions which the Mother Country has retained, and which an ancient custom puts into the mouth of our Gracious Lady the Sovereign of the British Empire?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The form of giving the Royal Assent to Bills, as now adopted, has been used in Canada ever since it has possessed representative institutions. The language cannot be used exactly as it is used in England, for two reasons. In the first place, the Constitutional Act provides the mode in which the Royal Assent shall be given, and it also provides that it shall be given in both English and French. I think, if the old form as used in England were adopted here, it would shock the ear of my hon. friend, because the Clerk of Parliament says: "La reine le veult."

WOODSTOCK, N.B., POST OFFICE.

Mr. IRVINE enquired, Whether the Government have procured a site for Woodstock, N. B., Post Office? If so, when, from whom, and at what cost, and whether it is the intention of the Government to proceed with its construction, and when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. The site has been procured for the Woodstock Post Office from Mr. David Monroe, at a cost of $2,000. We are now negotiating for an additional piece of land, and when that has been obtained, it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the construction of the building.

THE MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. FARROW enquired, Is it the intention of the Government this Session to make provision to utilize the mail service in the interests of the public, so as to include the carrying of small parcels which are now sent by express at great expense?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The subject is under the consideration of the Government at the present time.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, when is it the intention of the Government to bring down the measure relation to the Supreme Court as promised in the speech from the Throne?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government has the intention of introducing a bill relating to the Supreme Court shortly, at a date early enough to allow the House and the hon. member to consider it, and I hope the hon. member will be able to give our measure the support of his vote.

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS IN THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Mr. IVES, in moving for copies of all representations made during the last twelve months by either of the sections of the Bar of the Province of Quebec, or members thereof, with reference to judicial appointments in that Province, said: The members of the Quebec Bar who reside in Montreal, or rather, perhaps, I should say, some of the members of that Bar, have taken a good deal of pains during the last few months to convince the people of the Dominion that pretty much all the legal business in the Province of Quebec is transacted in that city, and that by far the greater part of the legal ability and legal acumen of the Province is concentrated, and that the Judges of the Superior Court resident in Montreal are by far the most overworked men in Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, I, as a member of the Bar in a rural district, do not desire, and will not attempt, to derogate an iota from the magnificence of those pretensions; but I think it is only right, as I was not present during the discussion last Session in this House, and only just to the learned Judge who presides in the district of St. Francis, where I practice, to say that the whole of the legal business in the Province of Quebec is not done in Montreal, and that the Judges in Montreal, about whom we have heard so much, are not the most hard-worked Judges in the Province of Quebec. If we were to take the very statistics which were published by Mr. Pagnuelo, and which were quoted in the House during the debate last Session, and were to refer to the year 1879, we would find that those statistics, instead of proving that the Judges in the district of Montreal did more work than any other Judges in the Province of Quebec, show that the Judge of the district of St. Francis did more work, although he receives $1,000 less pay, than any one of the Judges in Montreal. If hon. members will take the return for 1879 they will find that in Montreal 860 contested cases were decided in the Superior Court. There were during that year at least seven Judges to do the work in Montreal. There was always one Judge from the country districts assisting the Montreal Judges; there were generally two and very often three. In fact, a very large part of Circuit Court work was done by outside Judges. If hon. members will take as a safe estimate seven Judges and divide the number of cases decided in that year by that number, they will find there was an average of 123 cases to each Judge; while in the district of St. Francis, 169 contested cases in the Superior Court were decided by the single Judge, which gives forty-six cases over the average for each Judge in the district of Montreal. In that year 2,358 Circuit Court cases were decided in the district of Montreal, which was an average of 322 cases for each Judge, while in the district of St. Francis nearly as large a number, namely, 281 were decided by the single Judge. But this was only a return for the district circuit, not for the six county circuits which are attended by the resident Judge in that district. Besides this work done by the Judge in the district of St. Francis, it should not be forgotten that he does the criminal business in that district; that he holds two sessions of the Court of Queen's Bench; that he also attends to six circuits, three terms each, in every year, and those circuits are situated at a distance from sixteen to forty miles from his place of residence; that he has, besides doing all the work in his district, to preside at proof sittings the last six days in every month at the chef lieu. I think I am justified in saying that he does more work than any one of those Judges in Montreal, about whom we heard so much last Session. But this agitation in Montreal by the members of the Montreal Bar, naturally affected the Attorney-General of Quebec, who is a member of the Montreal Bar, which culminated in a Bill passed at the last Session of the Quebec Legislature, providing for the appointment of an additional Judge to reside in the district of Montreal; and at the last Session of this Parliament a salary was provided for that Judge. Now, this was done notwithstanding the fact that one of the Montreal Judges, Judge Torrance, during the discussion in the Quebec Legislature, published an open letter over his own name in the Law Journal of Montreal, to the effect that the Judges of Montreal did not consider it advisable or necessary that an additional Judge should be appointed; and we must conclude that the Local Administration have come to the same conclusion, since they allowed nearly a year to elapse before issuing the proclamation which brought the Act into force, and the Dominion Government have not yet made the appointment. But the motion refers more particularly to representations made during the last twelve months with reference to this and other appointments. I do not know that such representations we are reported to have been made, have actually been made, but I think it is desirable that some declaration should be made by the Government, some return should be brought down, so as to set at rest the question whether such representations have been made or not. It was reported in the public press, shortly after the adjournment of Parliament, that a delegation supposed to represent the Montreal Bar, or rather the English portion of the Montreal Bar, came to Ottawa and urged upon the Government the appointment of an English-speaking lawyer as the seventh Judge, on the ground that Montreal was the commercial metropolis, and that their French Canadian confreres, though very able lawyers in other respects, were inferior to the English section as commercial lawyers. It is also reported that the French Canadian members of the Quebec Bar, represented very strongly to the Government that the appointment belonged to them, on account of the preponderance of the French Canadian population in Quebec. But the most extraordinary representation of all is not a matter of surmise, but a matter of record. It is to be found in the Legal News of December last, in the shape of a report by the Montreal Bar, and reads as follows:--

"The nomination of a seventh Judge to the Superior Court of Montreal, and the changes suggested with a view of shortening the enquêtes, and putting an end to long delibérés, would render scarcely necessary, in the future, any assistance being given by les juges étrangers. When it will be necessary to have recourse to these Judges, we hope that the hon. Chief Justice will consult the Judges of Montreal and our batonnier, with the view of avoiding an invitation being given to these Judges who have not the confidence of the Bar of this district, particularly those whose presence at Montreal has given rise to very general complaint. In case this representation should not be regarded, it will be the duty of our batonnier to convoke, without delay, a new meeting of this Bar."

Now, you will observe that the last paragraph contains a very formidable threat, one which allows the fullest play to the imagination of those who are terrified by it. If these gentlemen of the Montreal Bar had plainly set forth what they intended to do after another meeting of the Bar had been called—whether they intended to declare a rebellion, or whether they intended to attempt to capture the Custom House, or St. Helen's Island, or to proceed to Ottawa with a view of seizing the Capitol—some measures might have been taken to protect the public interests against them. But they simply say, that if the Chief Justice will not consult them with reference to each of the country Judges whom he asks to go to Montreal to assist in the performance of the duties of the Montreal Judges, they will call a meeting of the Bar. You can imagine the terror this threat struck into the hearts of the stranger Judges who had been in the habit of coming to Montreal to assist the Montreal Judges in the performance of their duties. You can fancy what embarrassment it must have caused Chief Justice Meredith and the Montreal Judges, lest by some accident they might not always be fortunate enough to select a Judge who would be agreeable to these gentlemen, and we must suppose it caused the Government some uneasiness, particularly when that threat was emphasized by the placing at that time of infernal machines in and around the Court House at Montreal. I do not suppose any proof was forthcoming that it was the committee of which Mr. Pagnuelo was secretary that placed these infernal machines around the Court House, but the fact of their being there at that time was very mysterious, and looked very suspicious. I desire to add that it is reported more recently that after the lamented death of Judge Laframboise a deputation from the city of Quebec waited on the Government, and urged that the appointment of a successor belonged to the Quebec division of the Bar, for the reason forsooth that Gaspé is nearer to Quebec than it is to Montreal. While the district of St. Francis is the third district in importance in the Province of Quebec, it has not a representative on the Bench at all; and we must conclude the reason to be that there are no members of the Bar in that district qualified for the position. We do not ask for a representative because we are nearer to the vacancy than some other district. We believe that the Government should not consider political exigencies, questions of nationality, questions of residence or proximity, in the appointment of Judges in the Province of Quebec. We believe that the sole and only consideration in the selection of men for the performance of the duties of that high and responsible office should be fitness. We trust the Government will not be terrified by the threat contained in this report, that unless the wishes of these gentlemen in Montreal are acceded to, another meeting of the Montreal Bar will be convoked.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved for a return showing the names of all persons appointed to office, either in inside or outside service, since the 23rd day of February, 1880, the offices to which such persons were appointed, and the salary attached thereto.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no objection to this if the words "and the reason of such appointments" are inserted.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURE CHARGEABLE TO CONSOLIDATED FUND.

Mr. ANGLIN, in the absence of Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT, moved for a return in detail of the receipts and expenditure chargeable to Consolidated Fund, from 30th July, 1881, up to 10th February, 1882.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This motion, and the next, seem to be the same thing, with the exception that this is from the 30th July and the next from the 1st July.

Mr. ANGLIN. I am sorry that I am not prepared to explain what the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) intended by putting these two motions in the way he has done. The objection made by the hon. leader of the Government seems to be well founded, so far as I can see.

Mr. BLAKE. It is possible the intention was to obtain, first, the statement for the longer period, as that would be almost immediately obtained; then the second one for the subsequent period, from the 10th to the 20th of February, for which there might be some greater difficulty in obtaining. If the whole could be rapidly obtained, perhaps it might be better to combine them, and take it from the first date down to the 20th February.

Mr. ANGLIN. Perhaps it would be better that the two motions be combined, and that afterwards the hon. member for Centre Huron should have the right to point out to the Minister of Finance why he put these motions separately.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. ANGLIN. Then perhaps it would be better to have the second motion passed first.

Mr. MILLS. I remember a discussion took place across the House between the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Centre Huron in reference to the motion, and I think the hon. Minister stated that the second motion was already in his possession. It is the ordinary ten days motion.

The second motion, covering the time from the 1st July, 1881, to 20th February, 1882, was agreed to.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION FROM CAPE SABLE ISLAND.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) in moving for copies of all correspondence with the department of Public Works, or petitions addressed to the Minister, asking the Government to provide for telegraphic communication between Cape Sable Island and the mainland in the county of Shelburne, said: This is a matter of considerable importance to the people of my county. The hon. Minister of Public Works the other day, in replying to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Daly) stated: "that it was possible that this service would be provided for in the Estimates for this year." I believe the expenditure made by the Department of Public Works in connection with this service in the Maritime Provinces is one of the greatest boons ever conferred upon our fishing industries. I only hope it will go on until every light station is connected with existing telegraphic lines, or by the semaphores patented by Mr. Gisborne. I have looked over the expenditure under this head, and I find it is carried on very cheaply indeed. I believe that service is under the control of one of the ablest of men in that department of science on this continent. I am glad to have the assistance of my hon. friend from Halifax. I trust that in the enquiry he made the other day he was actuated by a desire solely to advance the interests of the people of the Maritime Provinces, and I hope the Government will be careful to bring down all the petitions addressed to the Minister. I also trust that the hon. member for Halifax was not actuated by a desire to advance the political interests of his friends to whom he refers in the question he has asked. I think, however, he will find that the petitions addressed to the Department by that gentleman are very meagre indeed. When this plan was proposed by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin), I directed his attention to this matter, and Cape Sable light station was one of the stations fixed upon some years ago to be at an early date connected with the telegraph system of the Maritime Provinces. I hope I will have some opportunity of reciprocating the assistance which the hon. member for Halifax desired to render me in this service.

Mr. DALY. I have great pleasure in supporting this motion, and I do so in view of the fact that the production of these papers will show that the subject has not been lost sight of either by the people of the county of Shelburne or by the citizens of Halifax, which city I have the honor to represent in this House. The matter is not one of merely local importance to the county of Shelburne, but it is one relating to the interests of the whole Province of Nova Scotia; and I may go further, and state that it relates to the navigation of the high seas, and a telegraph communication once established between the Island of Cape Sable and the main land, will be a very great service in the future. We trust that no more unfortunate shipwrecks, such as have taken place upon that coast, will ever occur again. But should they occur on that coast the establishment of a line of telegraphic communication, such as now asked for, will be of great service. It will be found, I think, on the production of the papers referred to, that this scheme has been taken up by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin), and has been pressed by him upon the attention of the Government. Petitions have emanated also from the local representative of the county of Shelburne, and these petitions have been endorsed by such names as S. Cunard & Co., Lloyd's agents in Halifax, and by the representatives of almost all the marine insurance companies in the county of Halifax. It is, therefore, Sir, with no such view as has been so kindly attributed to me by the mover of the motion, but simply with a view of advancing the public interests, that I asked the question I proposed the other day, and it is also for the purpose of showing that due credit should be given to the hon. gentlemen who have moved in this matter, and to whom the credit will redound if the desired result be attained.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As I had the honor, when Minister of Public Works, to submit the policy which is now under consideration for the first time to the House, I may be permitted, perhaps, to say a single word in reference to this question. I would not have done so were it not that the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson) seems so very unwilling that any person should join him, or cooperate with him, or propose without his cooperation, anything which may indirectly benefit the county he represents. After the allusion which has been made to the Hon. Mr. White, the representative of the county of Shelburne in the Local Legislature, and a member of the Government of Nova Scotia, it is right that I should say that when I was in Halifax that gentleman waited upon me, and urged, in the strongest possible manner, the great importance of carrying out this extension of the telegraph system to the Island of Cape Sable. On my return I laid the views he expressed before my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, and subsequently transmitted a communication from that gentleman, urging, in the strongest possible manner, that the work should be carried out. I think that, under these circumstances, the hon. member for Shelburne should not go out of his way to belittle the services of a gentleman who has done so much to advance the interests of his county.

Mr. KILLAM. I would like to enquire if it is the intention of the Government to carry out this project. I might say that, apart from the use which this line will be in cases of shipwreck and for the purpose of transmitting weather reports, it will not likely be so great an expense to the Government as many of the cables will be, because the population on Sable Island should now be sufficient to support a telegraph company itself and I fancy that, apart from the expense of laying a cable and putting a telegraph line across the island, the other expenses—that is the annual expenses—will be very light.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no objection to bringing down this correspondence. I might say, in answer to the last speaker that it is the intention of the Government to extend the line.

Motion agreed to.

CASES IN THE MARITIME COURT.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for a return showing the number of cases disposed of by the Judge and several Surrogate Judges of the Maritime Court since the creation of the said court, until the first day of February, 1882; showing the place where each of said cases was disposed of, the name of the plaintiff and defendant in each case, and of the vessel or property seized, the amount of each claim, the amount awarded and the final disposition of each case, whether by appeal or otherwise, the amount of costs taxed to the successful party, the amount of Marshall's fees, the amount received by each officer of the court in each case, the appraised value of the vessel or property seized, the amount sold for. He said: I believe a return of a similar character to the one asked for was brought down on the 8th of May, 1879, including a statement of the cases disposed of by the Maritime Court up to the 1st of May, 1879, but that report was a very imperfect one. It did not embrace the information which I seek to obtain by this motion. I wish to obtain fuller information on several points, and more especially in reference to the costs incurred in the disposal of cases in the Maritime Court, and the delays that usually take place in the investigation and trial of cases before that court. I recollect when this subject was before Parliament some years ago, the propriety of a Bill of this kind was pressed upon Parliament in the interest of sailors. It was supposed that sailors coming before this court would have a speedy means of collecting their wages. It was said that without some such measure the sailor was, to a large extent, at the mercy of the vessel owner when he was discharged at a port from which he did not ship, or discharged before the period of his engagement expired. He had to pursue his remedy by suit, although subsequently, I believe, an Act was passed empowering him to go before two magistrates, but this measure was found very imperfect in its operation. It was supposed when the present Act was passed that the sailor would have a speedy and inexpensive remedy in cases of small claims against vessel owners; but I am afraid that that object has not been fully realized; and that our anticipations respecting the working of the Act have been disappointed. The present law does not give a safe and expeditious mode of disposing of these cases; and I know, as a matter of fact, that it affords an exceedingly expensive mode of proceeding, and that it is a very complicated piece of machinery. We have, first, the Statute itself, which is not a very long one though one of a considerable number of clauses; and, in addition, we have the rules of the court, 278 in number, all of which have the force of statutory provisions. In addition to all that, we have to issue the writ in the ordinary way, which is, of course, quite correct; then we have a statement of claims, then a defence, and then come the pleadings and replications and the demurrers and all the other machinery which is necessary for the purpose of putting this law in successful operation. It does appear to me that in cases where small collections have to be made, there should be a more expeditious and cheaper way of settling these disputes. Then, Sir, as to the question of costs, I am quite satisfied that if the Minister of Justice will examine the return which will be brought down in reply to this motion, he will be startled at the amount of costs incurred in the prosecution of cases under this law. I know of one case in which the amount in dispute was some $300 or $400, while the costs amounted to over $1,000. In another case, the amount in dispute was the small sum of $150, and the costs taxed to the successful party were $352, besides the costs the defendant would have to pay. I know of another case in which the amount involved was $110, and the costs on both sides were in the neighborhood of $1,000. These are facts which, I think, the return will establish beyond controversy, and, if so, I think it will be the duty of the Minister of Justice to remedy so great a wrong, and to provide a cheaper and more expeditious mode of dealing with cases of this kind. I observe that the Government promise some legislation with reference to Vice-Admiralty jurisdiction. I do not know how far they propose dealing with the question of the Maritime Court, but I earnestly press upon the hon. the First Minister the necessity of some legislation in the direction of making the machinery of the court less complicated, and the expenses less than they are now. I know of no reason why cases involving $100, or thereabouts, should not be disposed of in the same summary way as are cases in the Division Courts of the Province of Ontario, and at an expense not exceeding $10 or $20, including disbursements. Under the law as it stands, the Surrogate Judge has absolute and unrestricted power of allowing just what costs and fees he sees fit. I know of a case in which the amount involved did not exceed $110, and in which counsel fees were allowed by the Judge to the extent of $110. I say that it is an outrage and a scandal on the administration of justice, which, I trust, the Government will remedy without delay. I move for this return with the view of getting some information on the subject, and I wish, with the consent of the hon. the First Minister, to amend the motion by adding to it the words: "when the case was first instituted, and when finally disposed of."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to this motion. The Act has not been long in existence, and there cannot be many cases, I fancy, such as the hon. gentleman mentions. I have not heard of any complaints, and no complaints that I am aware of have been laid before the Government of the working of the Act or the proceedings under the Act. But I am quite willing that the hon. gentleman should have the return.

Mr. BLAKE. I fear there is only too much foundation for what my hon. friend has stated. Some time ago similar complaints were made, and I believe some remedy was applied in some of the smaller cases. The Act was framed with the view of giving the greatest measure of flexibility in the proceedings, so that the lessons of experience might not be lost; and with that view it was thought proper to submit the mode of procedure and the rules made by the Judge to the Governor in Council. What has happened is, therefore, not attributable to the Act, but to the mode in which the provisions of the Act have been worked. I am not now objecting to the original rules or the original tariff, neither of which I have seen; but I think it is very natural that they should have been framed in a manner which subsequent experience might prove was imperfect. But I think it is very much to be regretted that small claims, such as those of which my hon. friend has spoken, should continue to be tried, as I know they have been tried, by a procedure quite too cumbrous and expensive for the claim. I agree altogether in his view, that for those claims which do not exceed, at any rate, $100, we ought to have the very cheapest and simplest form possible, something analogous to our Division Court form; and beyond that there ought to be a very low scale of costs, if not a fixed scale. These are cases which have always been deemed the subject of expeditious decision, in consequence of the needs and circumstances surrounding sailors, who cannot wait long at one port without danger of losing their season's voyage. It is, therefore, I think of the last consequence that an enquiry should be made, not into the Act, but into the rules and regulations and the tariff adopted under the Act, which may have gone very far to interfere with its operation, which but for them would be a great blessing, and which, in cases involving larger sums, has been found of great advantage.

DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving that it is expedient to discontinue the arrangements for keeping female convicts at Dorchester Penitentiary, and to provide for their transfer to Kingston, as is done in the case of the Quebec female convicts, said: When the estimates for Dorchester Penitentiary were before the House, on the occasion of the inauguration of that institution, I ventured to point out that it was an impolitic and expensive thing to provide for a female prison there. It was obvious, from the experience we had already had of the number of female relative to male convicts, that there would not be enough prisoners to render it fitting to have a separate staff. In the case of the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary it was resolved not to have any female branch, but to send the female prisoners to Kingston; and unless extraordinary circumstances arose, there would still be a fewer number among the population of 800,000 people who inhabit the Maritime Provinces than there are among the population of Quebec, which is about half as large again. However, the Government decided that they were restricted by the plan which they had chalked out, and that they would organize the institution with the necessary apparatus for keeping female convicts there. I observe by the returns in the report of the Penitentiaries from the office of the Minister of Justice, that the matron and deputy-matron had nothing at all to do for some months after they got there; that then there were transferred two female convicts and one short-term prisoner—how they came to be transferred from Halifax to Dorchester I do not know—that two were discharged, and one convict was brought from St. John on the 14th January, leaving, on the 30th June, two convicts for the matron and deputy-matron to look after. In the larger institution of Kingston, receiving, as I have said, female convicts from the two Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, with a population by the Census of over three millions and a quarter, or about four times the population of the Maritime Provinces, the number of female convicts on the 1st July, 1880, was twenty-one; on the 30th June last it was but twenty-four, making an average of about twenty-two. For that branch of the institution there is a matron, deputy-matron, and assistant matron, who certainly would form a quite sufficient staff to take care also of the two convicts who now receive the sole benefit of the matron and deputy-matron at St. John. The extra expenditure occasioned by the transfer from St. John to Kingston would be merely the railway travel of the necessary guard attending the prisoner, and that expense, as far as Quebec, would be nil, as they would pass over a Government railway, and therefore we would have only to deal with the railway fare from Quebec to Kingston. Against that amount is to be set the fact that $500, salary of matron, and $300, salary of deputy-matron, are sums paid regularly at Dorchester, besides which, if I am rightly informed, those officials have free house, light, and fuel; and besides that, there is, of course, a certain portion of the penitentiary which, though now set apart for female convicts, is wanted for male convicts. I think, therefore, that all considerations of economy indicate that this change ought to be made; the salaries alone are $800, and the extra payments, allowance and use of apartments may fairly be placed at $700 or $800 more, making an extra cost to the country of about $1,500 for keeping two convicts in one place rather than in another. I believe, further, that there will be a better opportunity for the exercise of proper discipline and greater variety of employment, and of reformatory and penitentiary influences, where there are some twenty or twenty-five persons under a more organized system, than is possible to obtain in an institution where there are but two convicts. It is for these reasons I move the resolution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a good deal in what the hon. gentlemen has said on this subject, but the Government is not prepared at this moment to accept this resolution. Parliament has provided a penitentiary system for the Maritime Provinces, and the subject was discussed before and oft, that there should be a female prison as well as a male prison there. The House is aware that before the Penitentiaries were united there was a matron for the New Brunswick institution and another for the Nova Scotia institution, and that, for purposes of economy, the two prisons were united, making the Penitentiary of Dorchester the convict prison for the two Provinces. The parties are now appointed and hold office, and proper notice must be given them before they could be dismissed. I take it that the hon. gentleman having brought the matter before the House and expressed his views on it, has no intention of pressing it. The Government will take the matter into consideration; they are not, however, prepared, under the circumstances, to accede to his motion at present, and I hope he will not press it.

Mr. BLAKE. I am afraid I could not carry it.

GRINDING IN BOND.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all correspondence, Orders in Council and regulations, on the subject of grinding in bond; a statement of all bonds given under the regulations with dates and names; a statement of the action thereon, and of the present condition of things in respect of each such bond; a statement in detail of the duties paid under or other satisfaction of each such bond, with the dates of payment or satisfaction; copies of all correspondence with, and demands made by Government on each person who has given such bonds; copies of instructions given to inspectors or other departmental officers, to investigate matters connected with grinding in bond, and of correspondence with, and reports from them; a list of the cases so far as ascertained in which wheat belonging to others has been improperly exported in the name of a grinder in bond to evade the duty, and in which wheat has been sold by a grinder in bond a trifle under market rates, on condition that it should be improperly credited in the export to the seller in order to evade the duty, and all correspondence and Governmental action thereon. He said: As far as I can understand the position of the question, it is this: it was disputed across the House whether the regulations which were made by the Government for grinding in bond restricted, as I understand the Government alleged it was their intention they should restrict, the grinder in bond to export the identical wheat he had imported, after being manufactured into flour. I think I recollect a discussion in which the hon. the Minister of Customs alleged that in the view of the Government such was the meaning and intent of the former regulations; but not long after, if I rightly understand the question, there was a change made in the regulations to make more definitive, as I suppose, that portion, and make it clearer than it was under the old regulations, that it was the specific product of the imported wheat, the export of which was to satisfy the condition of the bond. My attention has been called to the practical operation, as far as the public can ascertain it, and as far as the course of trade has permitted it to be made known, of those regulations of late days. I have received letters from persons interested in the trade which indicate a state of things I think deserving some explanation. [The hon. gentleman here read extracts from a private letter intimating that Canadian wheat was shipped by some parties to cover wheat imported in bond, thus escaping payment of the duties.] The circumstances, I contend, amply warrant my making this motion.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to bringing down such information as we have in the Department, but I would suggest to the hon. leader of the Opposition that he leave out those words "So far as ascertained," because they imply what is not a fact. The motion asks for a list of cases, "so far as ascertained," of the wheat belonging to others which has been improperly exported. I beg to inform the hon. gentleman and the House that nothing of the kind has been ascertained. If he will substitute the words "if any" for the words objected to, I have no objection to the passing of the motion.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly. Substitute those words.

Mr. BOWELL. I may, for the hon. gentleman's information, say he is not quite correct in his view of the position taken by the Government last Session, when this question was under discussion. At that time the Order in Council which had been first passed regulating the grinding of wheat in bond and the shipment of flour contained the words: "or the equivalent of such wheat." The House will recollect that when the Tariff was under discussion and a duty imposed on wheat and flour, it was argued that the shipment of flour to an equivalent of wheat which might be imported, would answer the purposes then contemplated. But after experience, the Government decided, in order to make the duty what it was intended to be, a protective duty, the actual product of the imported wheat in flour should be shipped instead of an equivalent. That is the point to which the letter that the hon. gentleman has read, refers. In reference to bonds, we can understand, and any merchant will easily understand, that when goods are placed in bond, a certain time is allowed for the release of those bonds; and in the case of a bond for grinding purposes, a longer period is allowed than in the case of ordinary merchandise, because ordinary merchandise in bond pays the duty as soon as it is taken out for consumption. The mill or the warehouse into which the wheat is put, must, of necessity, be declared a bonding warehouse, in order that the grain may be ground and made up into flour, and sufficient time must be allowed the miller to do that. Then, at the expiration of the bond, the miller's duty is to account for the wheat which has been placed in his mill, by paying the duty, or producing certificates of exportation of the product of that wheat. If the flour has been put upon the market, as indicated in the letter which the hon. gentleman has just read, it must have been placed on the market between the time the wheat was put into the mill and the expiration of the bond. The duty of Customs officers is, at certain periods, to investigate these bonds, and see whether the miller has the wheat in the mill at the time of their expiration. If he has not, he must account for it by producing certificates that an exportation of its product in flour has taken place, or pay the duty on it. It is true that the Department have had their officers looking into this matter. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, knows that there are Inspectors of bonds on all goods, and my attention having been drawn to this matter, I made it the special duty of the different officers to investigate it. I will be quite prepared to bring down the statements asked for by the hon. gentleman; but I question very much whether the statement made in that letter, and the inference drawn from it by the leader of the Opposition, will prove to be correct. I assure the House that the insinuations made in that letter, that certain privileges were given to millers supporting the Government, have no foundation in fact, I might use a stronger word, but will refrain from doing so. I might also add that in this particular, to which so much attention has been drawn by the Opposition press, I have been very careful that no concession should be made to any one class of people more than another. I challenge any hon. member to point out a single instance, either in the administration of this particular part of my duty, or of any other, in which advantage has been given to one importer over another. In the administration of the Customs Department, so far as regards either the grinding of wheat in bond, the imposition of fines or seizures, or any other matter affecting the collection of revenue, every man, whatever may be his political complexion, has been treated alike. The only irregularity that I have heard of in connection with the subject-matter of this motion, was one in the western section of the country. This slight irregularity—because I think it was nothing more—occurred on the Welland Canal; but from the high standing and reputation of the gentlemen I cannot believe, for a moment, that they had the slightest intention of defrauding the revenue. The moment the officer called their attention to it they at once paid over all that was remaining unpaid.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). While no one would be disposed, I suppose, to believe that there had been instances in which the Government had favored certain mills, the leader of the Opposition, is certainly warranted in bringing this matter to the attention of the Government. It must strike the hon. the Minister of Customs that, so long as we have such an anomaly in the Tariff as we have with reference to the wheat and flour duties, the question will arise, whether it is well grounded or not. It is certainly an anomalous state of the tariff to have a duty imposed on raw material of 15 cents a bushel, and a duty of only 50 cents a barrel on flour, when it requires only $4\frac{1}{2}$ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour, thus discriminating against the manufacturer and the miller to the extent of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on every barrel of flour he makes. When people find strong baker's flour put in the market at a lower figure than they are themselves able to put it in, I say they are justified in suspicions with reference to these two items.

Mr. BOWELL. They would be if the fact existed that no duty had been paid upon wheat or flour.

Motion agreed to.

COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence and Orders in Council with relation to the tenure of office of the County Court Judges in any of the Provinces; of all Local Statutory Provisions bearing on the subject; of any Commissions of Enquiry issued with regard to any County Court Judge, and the instructions accompanying the same, and a statement of the action thereon; copy of any judgment of any Court upon any application for prohibition in connection therewith, he said: I observe, in the Speech from the Throne, that we are promised legislation on this subject, and think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that it is expedient we should be put in position of the facts related in this motion.

Motion agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN MANITOBA.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for correspondence with reference to any Commission issued by the Local Government of Manitoba affecting the mode of administering justice in that Province, copy of such Commission and of the proceedings thereunder, said: This motion is based upon information which has reached me by the ordinary sources of information, the public prints, with reference to a Commission and proceedings that have recently taken place in Manitoba, and which, I think, at any rate, are of very serious import to this House and the country at large. No doubt the administration of justice and the constitution, maintenance, and organization of the courts are vested with the Local Legislatures, and no doubt, therefore, there are cases in which Local Governments and Local Legislatures may well inform themselves as to the way in which legislation on this subject is making, with a view to the amendment of the laws which may need to be made; but, if the public prints are correct, to proceed in the way they have been doing in this case, seems to me highly objectionable. I do not, of course, know the exact tenure of the Commission which issued lately, but the papers show that under it an enquiry was entered into as to the mode in which a particular Judge was exercising his functions apparently with the object of ascertaining whether he was discharging his duties rightly or wrongly, and whether he was guilty of improper behavior in the exercise of his functions. That was a Judge of the Supreme Court of Manitoba. Now, while I have never regarded as otherwise than anomalous the provision in the Constitutional Act upon the subject of judgeships, I think it is equally clear that so long as a Judge of the Superior Court is appointed under our Constitution, and holds his office on a tenure of good behavior, removable only upon an Address from the Senate and the Commons, I hold it to be of the highest consequence that, while we should keep this great inquisition open to all subjects of Her Majesty, for all well grounded complaints, and take care that they are duly enquired into, we should not permit Judges who hold their position by that tenure to be exposed to other inquisitions, which cannot possibly be effective in removing them from their office, and which must have a tendency to degrade, and to impair the dignity of the office itself. It seems to me that the Commissions which Local Governments issue under cover of their powers, as to the administration of justice, ought to be Commissions directed to the question of how their laws work, but not to the question of how Judges appointed by this central authority, and responsible to the Houses of Parliament, are discharging their functions. It is with a view to this subject being brought under the consideration of the House and the Government, that I make this motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope my hon. friend will not be attacked for that attack on state rights involved in his motion. However, I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in the distinction that he has drawn. The Judges of the Superior Court, appointed by the Crown on the advice of the Ministry here, can only be removed by a Joint Address of the Senate and House of Commons, and any Commission issued in any Province—any colorable Commission, really for the sake of attacking a Judge and affecting his position—is altogether an improper proceeding and a direct violation of the terms of the Constitutional Act. The administration of justice rests with the Local Government; and if they, with a bona fide intention of ascertaining the working of the law, or any particular branch of it, either in the principle of the law, or in the practice of it, issue a Commission, it may be that the result of that Commission and the report may indirectly affect the position, character, and standing of a Judge. That cannot be helped—that frequently must occur; and any enquiries, to be effectual, may involve the necessity of impugning the conduct of a Judge in the particular subject referred to the Commission. But it is clear that a petition to issue with the object of attacking a Judge is altogether improper, unconstitutional and illegal, and the central authority here ought to take notice of it. I think, however, my hon. friend was quite right in making his motion. I am not able to say if there has been any correspondence in the matter, but I think it most probable that any report made by the Commission he speaks of, has been communicated to the Department of Justice. All the papers connected with the matter will be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE moved, that it is desirable that a report should be presented to this House, within ten days from the opening of each Session, giving full information on all subjects affecting the Canadian Pacific Railway up to the latest date, and particularly all details as to: 1. The selection of the route. 2. The progress of the work. 3. The selection or reservation of land. 4. The payment of moneys. 5. The laying out of branches. 6. The progress thereon. 7. The rates of toll for passengers and freight. 8. The particulars required by the Consolidated Railway Act and amendments thereto, up to the end of the previous fiscal year. 9. Like particulars up to the latest practicable date before the presentation of the return. 10. Copies of all Orders in Council and of all correspondence between the Government and the Railway Company, or any member or officer of either, relating to the affairs of the Company. He said: It seems to me, Sir, it will commend itself to both sides of the House as reasonable that there should be presented to us in consecutive, distinct and intelligible narrative, from full particulars of the transactions with the Company and all the events which have occurred up to the time of the Session in each year. We have already passed, with the assent of the Administration, a large number of motions calling for information on this subject, and some more are yet to come. This information will come down at various intervals during the Session, and perhaps, in some instances, full information cannot be obtained owing to oversights which sometimes occur in Departments. Further information will be required, but it will be difficult from the conjuncture of them to obtain, even at a late period of the Session, an intelligible view of the whole situation, as it has been changed by events which have happened during the recess. Nor in the public documents which are subsequently printed, will it, according to our custom, be possible to get it, because these returns are printed in the order in which they pass the House, and we will have to search over various numbers of Sessional Papers in order to collect together in proper shape a history of the whole. Some of these transactions may also bear upon others, and it is in that view desirable that they should all appear. Beyond that it is not possible for those, not possessed of the confidential information which the Government as the negotiating party on one side have, to anticipate or even to elicit in all cases all that has taken place. There are one or two cases to which I might allude as indicating, perhaps, in the report which has just now been given to us, the necessity for this motion. Take, for example, the report of Mr. Schreiber, dated the 1st of November, 1881, in which he tells us that "Engineers have been employed in locating a branch line from the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway to Sault St. Marie, a distance of about 200 miles, sixty miles of which is now under construction." Now, if we are to believe the statement made under the signature of the Company's Secretary in the public prints, that is not at present an accurate statement of the situation. So far as the Company has been informed, that which was to have been a branch is now in large part a main line; and if the sixty miles under construction be the sixty miles close to the shore—being part of the main line—the branch is to be but sixty miles long. I might refer to other parts of the report in which the meagreness of the information—if I may be allowed the expression—and some other characteristics of it, seem to render it necessary that we should have a fuller statement. We are dealing in this respect with a gigantic contract—an enormous concern which, in its financial aspect, and in all the other aspects which belong to it, is of an entirely exceptional character, and, it seems to me that it deserves that exceptional treatment which I take the liberty of suggesting for it. I do not bring forward this motion with the view of reflecting, even by implication, on the Government for not having taken the course which I venture to indicate, but I submit to the House and to the Administration that it is a reasonable course to be taken; that it would conduce to the public advantage and to our intelligible discussion of all the matters connected with the Pacific Railway; that for the next five years, during which such rapid progress is to be made in that concern, during which such important points are to be settled, as, for example, those with reference to the selection of the lands, those with reference to the selection of the route, those with reference to tolls—which are constantly coming up during the recess—I say I submit, as the necessary corollary from the enormous administrative and executive power which we have granted to the Government of the day, that we should have exceptional facilities for a full report, and for that intelligible discussion which I am sure we all desire.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no objection to the passage of this motion. I would suggest, however, to the hon. gentleman to insert twenty days instead of ten days. This would give an opportunity of making the return more complete and probably more satisfactory to Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie) suggests that we should split the difference, and make it fifteen days, as it is in other cases.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well. I would say, while on my feet, that the hon. gentleman is quite mistaken when he speaks of the inaccuracy of Mr. Schreiber's report. Mr. Schreiber's report is strictly accurate.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman quite misunderstood me. I did not state that Mr. Schreiber's report is inaccurate. It is dated the 1st of November, and quite possibly represents the condition of affairs to that date; but the information he gives may not represent the present condition of affairs exactly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. It does represent the present condition of affairs, because no such change has taken place as that to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Motion agreed to.

PIER AT ANNAPOLIS.

Mr. KILLAM, in moving for copies of all correspondence relating to the construction of the Acadia Steamship Company's pier, at Annapolis, and of any estimates or reports of the cost of that work, said: I make this motion with the object of assisting the company, and partly by request.

I understood that a promise was made last year to the hon. member for Annapolis that the sum of $15,000 would be given for the construction of a wharf at that place. If so, the Government should be in possession of plans of the work, and I suppose the construction has to some extent been under the direction of their engineer. At all events, I have seen the work, and it is probably a justifiable expenditure, and will be of great use to that port and the trade of the country. The question, of course, arises which of such work are private and local matters, and which of public importance, and it is necessary for us, when discussing these matters in Committee of Supply, to have every information possible before us concerning them; and if the hon. Minister will be kind enough to furnish the information asked for in this motion, it will enable us to discuss the question more intelligently.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not understand exactly whether the hon. gentleman means to imply that this is a work of a local nature which should not be helped by this Government.

Mr. KILLAM. I said that when subjects of that kind came up in Committee of Supply, some information was necessary to enable us to find out whether a work for which money was voted was of local or Dominion character. This work, I think, may be properly entitled to receive aid from the Dominion, as many other cases of this kind, and I thought the Government, before promising the money, must have taken some steps to ascertain that fact.

Motion agreed to.

MARRIAGES IN THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copy of opinion or judgment of Mr. Justice Jette, in a recent case affecting the validity of a marriage in the Province of Quebec, in which certain questions were referred to an ecclesiastical authority, said: As we have a Bill before us in the name of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, on which this question came under discussion the last time that Bill was before the House, I think it is important that we should have this judicial decision.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think the Government or the House has the power to order the Judge to furnish a copy of his judgment.

Mr. BLAKE. We have constantly asked for public documents which are difficult to obtain. This document either has been, or will be, made public by publication in the newspapers, and all we want is an authenticated copy of it.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY BRANCH LANDS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of any maps and plans of branch lines of railway, deposited by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the Department of Railways, with the date of each such deposit; copies of any prospectus, statement or advertisement issued by the Company in connection with the sale of their land grant bonds, and of the form of bond and of the mortgage securing the same; copies of any regulations or conditions from time to time made by the Company as to the sales of their lands, and of the forms of contract from time to time in use in respect of such sales; copies of any correspondence, and information as to the construction, maintenance and working, or acquisition, by purchase, lease or otherwise, of any lines of telegraph or telephone by the Company; copies of all papers affecting the amalgamation with the Company, or the purchase, lease, or other acquisition by the Company or any other railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The motion asks for two classes of documents, some of which are in the possession of the Government, others are not. All we can do is to bring down the documents in our possession and endeavor to obtain such further information as we do not possess.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY WORK BETWEEN SAVONA'S FERRY AND PORT MOODY.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of advertisements, specifications, conditions, tenders, correspondence, Orders in Council, and all other papers relative to the letting of the railway work between Savona's Ferry and Port Moody, British Columbia, said: I am not aware whether a formal contract has yet been signed in connection with this work; I, therefore, have included it, though it may not be necessary, because I presume it will be laid on the Table of the House. I have asked for those things which it is proper to ask for, even in advance of the execution of the contract, and which I hope, therefore, will be brought down at an early day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he does not mean Emory's Bar and Port Moody, because all other correspondence relating to the contract has been brought down.

Mr. BLAKE. Emory's Bar, of course.

Motion agreed to.

VOLUNTEER DISCIPLINE.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved for copies of all reports from General Luard, and from any other officer or court of enquiry, relative to matters connected with the command or discipline observed in the 27th Battalion of Volunteer Militia; and also of any departmental order made in relation to the same, and copies of all complaints or representation from any officer of the said battalion, or other correspondence.

Mr. CARON. I must state that it is quite unusual that any papers having reference to matters of discipline should be brought down and laid on the Table. However, under the circumstances, I have no objection that these be brought down, and they will be brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE. As the hon. gentleman has consented to bring down the papers, I shall not at present make the remarks I intended to offer. The matter is so serious as to require the attention of the House, and no mere usage of any sort will prevent us discussing intelligently the condition of the volunteer force.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL ROLLING STOCK.

Mr. ANGLIN moved for a return showing what number of locomotives, passenger, freight, and coal cars, and other rolling stock were purchased or contracted for or built at the Government workshops during the year ending December 31st, 1881, distinguishing those that were purchased, those that were obtained under contract, and those that were built in the Government workshops, and showing how, in each case, the locomotives, cars and other stock purchased were purchased, whether by tender or by private arrangement with the Department of Railways and Canals, or through an agent; if by tender, whether tenders were invited by public advertisement or by circular; if by circular, to what parties or firms such circulars were addressed, and where the persons to whom they were addressed reside or do business; if through an agent or agents, the name or names of such agent or agents, and the amount of commission paid in each case; whether any locomotives or other rolling stock, purchased elsewhere than in Canada, paid Customs duties; the class, diameter, size and power of each locomotive purchased, and the price paid for each, the amount of Customs duties paid on each, and all the charges adding to the cost; how tenders for any locomotives, cars, or other rolling stock contracted for were invited in each case, if by circular, the names and descriptions of the persons or firms to whom they were addressed, and a copy of the circular; the prices paid for any locomotives, cars, or other rolling stock obtained under such contract, or to be paid for such locomotives or other rolling stock as had not been delivered on December 31st, 1881; whether if, in any case, such locomotives or other rolling stock were built or are to be built out of Canada, the contractors paid or are to pay duties of customs on such rolling stock, and all other charges up to the time of delivery on any road in Canada belonging to the Government; the size, power and character of each locomotive delivered or to be delivered under any contract; the names, descriptions and place of business of all persons or firms from whom locomotives or other rolling stock were purchased, or with whom contracts for locomotives or other rolling stock were made, and the names of places or establishments in which the rolling stock purchased or contracted for were built or are to be built. He said: I do not know that we have any right to object that the works of the Province of Quebec have been used for a purpose of this kind; but we cannot forget that the Dominion Government has very large works at Moncton, which, I believe, are not fully occupied, and if an arrangement of that kind were made, an opportunity of that kind should be afforded to mechanics and contractors throughout the Dominion to build those cars at Moncton if they chose to do so, obtaining the same facilities in the Dominion Government workshops there that are said to have been afforded in the workshops of the Province of Quebec. With respect to all these matters the reports are entirely silent. Going through the Public Accounts carefully I could not find there anything that would afford the information to which I think this House and the country are fully entitled upon all these points. I do not at all insinuate that there is any intention to suppress any information, but there is certainly incorrect information in these reports which it would be well to have corrected.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will say, in answer to the hon. gentleman, that no time shall be lost in bringing down all the information that is sought for in this paper; but as he has chosen to make a few remarks in introducing this resolution, I am glad to be able to relieve his mind at once upon two or three important points. In the first place, no rolling stock has been obtained by private arrangement with the Department; no rolling stock has been purchased except by Orders in Council, stating all the facts relating to it. Secondly, no agent has been employed, and, consequently, no commissions have been paid to any person. In the third place, I may say that no rolling stock has been obtained out of Canada that could be obtained in it. I think it is right that I should state that no time will be lost in giving the hon. gentleman the information. I am glad he concluded his remarks by saying that he did not wish to insinuate that there was any desire to suppress information, because I think he will find the report is quite as full in relation to all these matters as has been customary under previous Administrations. It is quite impossible, in a report of this kind, to answer every possible anticipation, and to deal with it in the voluminous manner we otherwise would in dealing with a subject presented to the consideration of this House.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following motions for returns were severally agreed to:—

Return showing the number of claims referred to the Official Arbitrators from the 30th June, 1880, to the 1st day of February, 1882, the name of each claimant, the nature of the claim, when referred, when decided, the amount claimed, the amount recommended to be paid or the amount awarded, the final disposition of each case, if appealed, the final result, showing which, if any, of the claims formed the subject of an action or petition of right, the amount of costs paid the claimant in each case, the amount of costs paid on account of professional services rendered on behalf of the Government in each case, and to whom and when such costs were paid.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

Statement (1) of number of persons entering Manitoba and the North-West Territories, during the calendar year 1881. (2) Of the number entering Manitoba and the North-West Territories from each Province of the Dominion separately, and from each other country separately. DRAWBACKS ON GOODS MANUFACTURED FOR EXPORT.

Mr. PATERSON (South Brant) moved for a return of all claims presented for drawbacks on goods manufactured for export since January 22nd, 1881, showing the names of all applicants, their place of business, the articles on which the drawback was claimed and the amount of each claim, distinguishing between the claims which have been allowed and those which have been disallowed and those under consideration and not yet decided, and giving the reason for such disallowance; also copies of all regulations made by the Department with reference to such claims. He said: In introducing this motion, I think it well to bring before the House certain facts which are to be learned from the Trade Returns which have been placed in our hands by the hon. the Minister of Customs. It will be in the recollection of the House, I dare say, that last year I made a motion similar to this. I move this year in the same direction, because the evil I complained of at that time has not been remedied, and the evil results, in a measure, flowing from the want of that remedy being applied has gone on and has been increased and intensified. The Commissioner of Customs, in making his reports to the Minister, says:

"That he has the honor to lay before him returns which will be found, on examination, to present many features of a highly encouraging nature to all parties interested in the commercial prosperity of the Dominion.

"The first item worthy of special notice is the increase of the export trade. The highest figure reached in this department of commerce since 1868, was in 1873, when the total exports were valued at $89,789,922, but in the last year, 1881, the amount of the same, as shown in these returns, is $98,290,823, being an increase over 1873 of $8,500,901; and over 1880 of $10,379,365. This increase is wholly in the trade with Great Britain, and is principally composed of Canadian produce and manufactures."

I have looked, Mr. Speaker, into this statement in the light of the figures furnished by the Minister himself, and I have been totally unable to verify the statement there made, either in regard to the increase being wholly in the trade with Great Britain, or in regard to the other fact stated that the increase is principally composed of the produce and manufactures of this country. Now, Sir, with respect to the first item, which does not concern my question so much, but to which it is well to allude, because it shows hon. members that we may not receive with implicit confidence the deductions made by the Commissioner, that is if my figures are correct. I find, with respect to the total increase in the export trade having taken place wholly with Great Britain, these facts: I find we exported to the United States of the products of the fisheries this year, $2,241,585; that last year, 1880, we only exported to the United States $1,738,870, or in other words an increase of $502,715. The products of the forest we exported to the United States, in 1881, to the value of $8,349,844; in 1880, only $6,352,418, or an increase of $1,817,426. In agricultural products we exported to the United States, in 1881, $10,631,374 worth; in 1880, $8,086,795, or $2,544,579 more in 1881 than in 1880. In manufactured goods we exported to the United States, in 1881, $1,310,557, and in 1880, $1,283,342, or $27,215 more in 1881 than in 1880. Putting these four items together, we find that our export trade with the United States increased in 1881 over 1880, $4,891,935. Yet the Commissioner tells us and the hon. Minister of Customs, by receiving that report and dedicating it to His Excellency, has told us and the country that the total increase of ten million dollars odd of our exports in 1881 over those of 1880 has taken place wholly in our trade with Great Britain. We contest the accuracy of that statement by another table which the hon. gentleman has given us. In 1881, the total exports of the products of Canada—and that is what really concerns us; we are not concerned in what is merely passing through—

Mr. McCALLUM. Yes, we are.

Mr. PATERSON. If you take it on that basis you will find that the statement of the hon. Minister is equally not borne out by the facts. But I did not work up that table, because it is not pertinent to the question. What we are interested in is what we produce. Taking that table, we find that, in 1881, the total exports of the products of Canada to Great Britain were $42,637,219, and, in 1880, $35,208,031; an increase in 1881 over 1880 of $7,479,188. Yet the hon. Minister says the whole ten million dollars odd of increase in products exported is due to our trade with Great Britain. In 1881, the total exports of the products of Canada to the United States were $31,015,109; in 1880, $26,762,705, or an increase of $4,252,404 in 1881 over 1880; still the hon. Minister tells us, through the Commissioners' report, that this increase, in 1881 over 1880, of $10,739,365, lies wholly in our trade with Great Britain. Not that it is a matter of much consequence whether the increase is due to our trade with one country more than with another. I would find no great pleasure in contemplating the fact, if it were a fact, that the increase of our export trade has been wholly with Great Britain. Canadians care very little where their money comes from, providing it comes; and instead of having to rejoice that the increase in our export trade is altogether with Great Britain, I rejoice more to find that it has not only increased with Great Britain, but with the United States and some other countries as well. I merely allude to the fact, because these statements furnished to His Excellency should not be received without being enquired into, and a true estimate formed of them. What concerns me more, and is more pertinent to my motion, is the fallacious statement found in the latter clause of this section, in which the hon. Minister of Customs tells us that this increase of ten million dollars odd is composed principally of Canadian produce and manufactures. Now, that is put in such a way as to be wholly misleading. I would, indeed, that that were the case. But the question arises, how is it that a statement of this kind should be made when the facts do not bear it out. I will generously suppose that the hon. Minister of Customs, in the multiplicity of his duties, had not time, personally, to examine the statement. That would be a charitable construction on my part. But I have to tell the House that while the gratifying fact remains, that the Exports of our agricultural products, products of the forest, our animals and other products largely exceeded in 1881 the exportation of 1880, though the latter also exceeded the exportation of the previous year, we are, when we look at the exports of our manufactures, gazing, instead of upon a bright picture, upon as gloomy a picture as it is possible for us to conceive. If the hon. gentlemen opposite find any consolation in the fact, shown by the Trade and Navigation Returns, that our export trade of manufactured goods is dying out surely and quickly, then let them have all the consolation they can derive from it. In the year 1878, and years previous to that, a most gratifying state of things existed as far as our export trade was concerned, and qualifiedly, as far as our home trade in our own manufactures was concerned. Through the liberal measures taken by the late Government, in aiding and assisting the manufacturers of this country, and in exhibiting at the great gatherings in Philadelphia, Melbourne, and Paris, the products of our manufacturing industries, thus calling the attention of the world to the stage of progress we had reached in this respect, by this means a large export trade in manufactured goods was brought into existence in this country, and we have no reason to doubt that if the wise and prudent policy then adopted continued to prevail, the increase in the export of our manufactured goods might have gone on to the present time. What are the facts? I might point out to you the fact that, with reference to the products of the forest, there has been a very gratifying increase. Comparing, first, 1880 with 1879, we find that, through our products of the forest, we brought back into this country, in gold, $3,593,048 more than in the year 1879. We find that, in exchange for animals and other products, we brought back $3,486,973 in 1880 over 1879; of agricultural products, $2,664,864. Thus, in these three items, the production of which the Tariff imposed by hon. gentlemen opposite was not able to change or lessen, because, fortunately, heaven's rain and heaven's light are given free to man, and are beyond their power to hinder or hamper. We had an increase of wealth in this country, in the year 1880 over the year 1879, of $9,744,885. Now compare the past year, 1881, with the year 1879, and what do we find in these three items? We find in the products of the forest, $11,698,553 more money brought into this country in the year 1881, from that item, than there was in 1879. Of animals and their products, we find brought into this country, in 1881, $7,239,615 more than in 1879.

In agricultural products, we find brought back in gold to this country, $1,638,863 more gold in 1881 than in 1879; or, in these three items, we find an increase of the wealth of this country of $20,577,031 in the year 1881 over 1879; or, put these figures together, and we find that in the last two years there has been an increase in the wealth of this country, from these three items alone, of $30,321,916. Sir, we can readily understand that Ministers, when they gazed upon the Trade Returns—when they took in the fact that during the past two years we have had $30,000,000 of gold more brought into this country from sources with which they had no power to interfere in the slightest degree—we can understand how it is that the Minister of Finance, at one time disposed to share the credit with Providence, was good enough this year, in the light of these figures, to attribute the prosperity of the country to that source from which really comes the blessing of a merciful Providence. They have, however, interfered with the blessings of Providence in a measure, because if they had left our manufactured products alone, as they were forced to do from sheer inability, except in a slight degree in the articles before mentioned, we might have had the gratifying result declared to this House of an increase of gold brought back to this country as a result of increased shipments of exports of our manufactured goods. But, Sir, what tale do the books tell with reference to that matter? I have the figures here, and I find that in the year 1878, the last year of the Mackenzie Government, we exported, after supplying our home wants, $4,127,705 of manufactured goods. In that year, and in the year before that, owing to the encouragement received by those manufacturers, that legitimate encouragement which those manufacturers will always receive and must receive from the effects of a revenue Tariff, we were able to bring back of foreign gold into this country, as a result of the sale and manufacture of those articles, $4,127,705. Thirty different countries of the globe had Canadian manufactured goods in their midst in the year 1878. But what is the tale now? What was the tale told last year? An increase of those sales? No, Sir, but a decrease in the year 1880 from 1878 of $885,088. Come down to the year 1881 and compare that year with the year 1878. Is there any revival? Sir, the agricultural industry has revived, we have better crops. Our lumbering industry has revived, larger sales and better prices. Animals and their products have brought higher prices. There is increased wealth from that source. But how about manufactured goods exported in the year 1881? Why, Sir, while we exported in 1878, $4,127,705, this year the exportation has decreased to $3,075,095, or a decrease this year of $1,052,610, an increase in exports, during the past two years, of over $30,000,000 in agricultural products, &c., &c., but a decrease in the export of manufactured goods of nearly $2,000,000, or 50 per cent. reduction on the total exports. I have taken the trouble to classify them somewhat. These figures are fraught with interest. I am one of those who believe in the manufacturing industries of this country; I like to see them developing. I am one of those who want to see our manufactures, not restricted to the home market alone; but, unhampered by these duties that are tying the hands of manufacturers, placed in such a position as a revenue Tariff will place them in, by enabling us to give cheaper goods at home, while they can compete with foreign nations abroad. I find we have some fifty-eight articles of manufactured goods that we export, and, as I said a moment ago, we have had a decrease in those fifty-eight articles, from the year 1878, of $1,052,610. I have classified them in order to enable us to see which particular manufacturing industries are being injured by the Tariff now in force, for I hold, as I will endeavor to show at a later stage of my remarks, that the Tariff is greatly to blame for the deplorable fact that I have just related to you. I find that in thirty-six out of the fifty-eight articles we export, there is a decrease of $1,736,412. You will see in this list of thirty-six articles are composed some of the largest of our industries, in a manufacturing point of view. Take agricultural implements, a very large and expanding industry of this country, and one which you would naturally suppose would be able to supply our home market. But why is it unable to compete as successfully in 1881 as it was in 1878 with foreign countries, except it be that it has been handicapped in some way by the operations of the Tariff? In 1878, we exported of agricultural implements, $86,001; in 1881, only $31,269, or a decrease in that item of $54,732—63 per cent. of a decrease of the export of agricultural implements.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. The hon. member for Niagara says hear, hear, but a cat could mew with just as much effect as that. We are now talking upon a subject that interests intelligent men, talking to those who profess to take care of the manufacturing industries of this country. Take the item of biscuits, a decrease of 45 per cent. in that; candles, a decrease of 95 per cent.; carriages, a very large industry, a decrease of 20 per cent.; clothing, a decrease of 60 per cent.; confectionery, a decrease of 40 per cent.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings). Oh; you are a manufacturer of that.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, I manufacture confectionery, and I wish I had some now to send you and the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) to put into your mouths. In the item of cordage, ropes and twine, there is a decrease of 43 per cent.; in the export of cottons we have a decrease of 35 per cent.; in drugs and medicines of 98 per cent.; in manufactures of fur, 48 per cent.; in grindstones, 17 per cent.; ground gypsum, 40 per cent.; hats and caps, 80 per cent.; manufactures of india rubber, 60 per cent.; pig iron, 98 per cent.; other iron and hardware, 18 per cent.; leather, sole and upper, 26 per cent.; boots and shoes, 57 per cent.; other leather, 73 per cent.; wine, 44 per cent.; ale, beer and cider, 35 per cent.; other spirits, perhaps owing to the increase of home consumption—the hon. Minister of Customs will tell us—the decrease is $132,674, or 98 per cent.; in machinery, one of our most important manufactures, 48 per cent.; musical instruments, an increase in pianos and organs, but in other musical instruments, a decrease of 93 per cent.; oil cake, 43 per cent.; sails, 14 per cent.; sewing machines, one of our largest industries, one that was thriving before the present Tariff affected it injuriously, as shown by the Trade Returns, shows a decrease in exports of 39 per cent.; in ships sold to other countries, —a matter in which our Maritime Province friends will be interested—there was a decrease of 71 per cent. on the amount for the year 1878; in soap there was a decrease of 50 per cent. In tobacco stems and cuttings there was a decrease of 43 per cent.; in vinegar there was a decrease of 20 per cent.; in doors, sashes and blinds a decrease of 39 per cent.; in woollen goods—another great industry of this country—a decrease of 36 per cent.; or, in the exports of those thirty-six articles, there was a total decrease of $1,736,412, or an average decrease of over 54 per cent. The picture is not a bright one, but I will endeavor to give hon. gentlemen opposite the comfort of what little brightness there is in it. In twenty-two articles of manufactured goods the export has increased. The export of books has increased $8,908; the export of hemlock bark extract has increased $2,228; glass and glass-ware, $252; iron stoves and castings, $5,572; scrap iron, $153,374; jewellery and plated ware, $83; junk and oakum, $17,649; harness and saddlery, $1,341; whiskey, $1,557; wine in wood, $599; organs, $9,778; pianos, $705; oil (not elsewhere specified), $7,604; rags, $34,433; starch, $32,497;

steel manufactures, $111,038; wrought stone, $648; cigars and cigarettes, $5,625; household furniture, $20,497; other wood, $99,131; other articles, $168,792; or a total of $63,802 as the increased export on those twenty-two articles in the year 1881 over the year 1878. But I think the House will allow me to deduct from that amount the increase in scrap iron, which is not a branch of manufacture, and does not give employment to a single man in this country, the product being simply the refuse of the machine shop. The export of rags should also be deducted, as I do not think hon. gentlemen will hold that the production of rags is an occupation which requires skilled labor, or that there are any manufacturers in this country who are specially engaged in producing rags. Therefore, I will deduct these two items which, together, amount to $187,817, and the total increase would then be $495,985. But, Sir, leave both the rags and the scrap iron in the list, swell the amount of increases all you can, give hon. gentlemen opposite all the brightness there is in the picture, and yet the decreases exceed the total increases by $1,052,610 more than they did in 1878. I have another table which, I think, should teach the Ministry a lesson which they do not seem to have learned from their own Trade and Navigation Returns of last year. In this table I have compared the decreases in the exports of certain lines of manufactured goods in 1881 with those of 1880, for the purpose of showing that the decreases are going on; that it has not been arrested, but is daily becoming worse under the present system. Take the case of agricultural implements, and you have a decrease this year over last of $27,859. In biscuits, the decrease was $3,403; in candles, $3,738; cordage, ropes, &c., $2,053; in drugs and medicines there has been a decrease; in furs, hats and caps, grindstones and India rubber goods, while in pig iron we have a decreased export of $71,844; in cotton there has been a decrease, in 1881, as compared with 1880, of $2,630; in iron and hardware, $7,875; in boots and shoes the decrease, which was enormous in 1880, has become much larger in 1881, being $63,420 over what it was in that year; in other leather goods the decrease was $3,371 more in 1881 than it was in 1880; in machinery the decrease was $6,992; in musical instruments there was a decrease, while in sewing machines the decrease was $36,093 more than it was in 1880, while the decrease in the latter year was an alarmingly large one compared with 1878. The decrease in ships sold to other countries was very large in 1880, but it has been swollen during the past year by the sum of $116,309. There were decreases in soap; in tobacco stems and cuttings; in doors, sashes and blinds, while in woollens the decrease in 1881 as compared with 1880 was $11,006, and the total decrease on these twenty-four articles in 1881 over 1880 amounted to $328,957. And yet, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite cheer ironically as they hear the figures read which tell us that the proud boast we have made in the past with reference to our manufactures is a vain one under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that in a short time we will be obliged to confess that we are not able to meet the manufacturers of other countries, in other foreign markets. And this is not because our manufacturers are possessed of less energy or less brains than those of other countries; it is not because they are lacking in any of the essentials of a successful business career, but because they are handicapped and hindered under the operations of the Tariff which was brought in force by hon. gentlemen opposite, who, while pretending to be the special champions of that class, are yet ready to cheer when the figures are read from their own Trade and Navigation Returns showing that the business of these men is being destroyed. I wish to notice another point. Last year, in making a similar motion to this, I had occasion to give some figures, which, though not quite so startling in their nature as those I have given to-day, were yet in the same direction. The hon. the Minister of Customs replied to me, and I now desire to call attention to his reply, because, if he deigns to answer me to-day, he will have to make a different answer. His answer on that occasion was as follows:—

"It is not my intention to enter upon a discussion of the subject with which the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) has dealt during the last hour and a-half. I think that probably the best answer to all his arguments with reference to the exports of the country will be found in a short paragraph on page 6 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, in which the Commissioner points out the important fact that, for the first time in the history of this country since Confederation, the exports have exceeded the imports by $1,421,711, and that they exceed also the value of the goods entered for consumption by $16,129,109."

The hon. gentleman answered my argument, which was analagous to the one I use to-day, by quoting what was found in the preface to the Commissioner's report, stating that there was an increase of exports over imports. But what answer will the hon. Minister of Customs give me to-day, when this same Commissioner of Customs tells us that, instead of there being an increase of exports over imports, there is absolutely a decrease of over $7,000,000? When I reminded him of the fact that I spoke of manufactured goods, he said that I made out a very good case for the Government, because I showed that the home market was now secured for the manufacturer. That statement was also made by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who, at a later stage of the debate, replied to my arguments—and made as good a case for the Government, I am bound to say, as it was possible to make—but who failed, only because the facts and figures would not bear him out, and not from any want of ability. If he failed last year, what will his position be this year? Let us take some of the largest manufactures. There has been a great decrease in the export of pig iron, for instance. We have had a decreased export of 71,844 tons. No doubt the hon. member for Niagara will say that we have the home market; but what do the imports reveal? Why, that, in 1878, we only imported $488,824 worth, while, in 1881, we imported of foreign pig-iron, displacing our own, according to the hon. member's argument, 715,997 tons. Certainly, then, it cannot be contended that the Tariff has shut out foreign iron, or that it has given us the home market, according to the extent the exports have decreased. Then, in cottons there has been a decrease in the exports and an increase in the imports. In 1878, $7,104,517 worth of foreign cottons came into the country, while last year $10,244,465 worth came in. In boots and shoes we find that there has been a decrease in the exports of $134,618 worth. But have we the home market in consequence? In 1878, we imported $243,578 worth of boots and shoes, while last year we imported $105,592 worth. Therefore, I contend that the Tariff does not give our manufacturers a home market which they had not before; while it is so arranged that raw material is taxed, so that the manufacturer cannot produce goods as cheaply as he could formerly, he is, therefore, forced to charge us more for our goods, while at the same time he does not increase his home market. In machinery we exported $37,281 less in 1881 than in 1878, while we imported, in the latter year, $327,623 worth, against $1,047,549 worth in the former. Therefore, the decrease of the machinery exports cannot be accounted for by the fact that we have the home market. In sewing machines there is a decrease in the exports of 1881, of $107,806 worth, while the imports were $193,337 worth, against $101,404 worth in 1878. What could show the Ministers more clearly than these facts that the Tariff is so arranged that it is a positive injury to the manufacturing industries of this country? In woollens the decrease in the exports has been $12,216, while the imports were $8,742,024, in 1881, against $8,535,453 in 1878. I might give other figures to show that the decrease in our exports cannot be accounted for by our having the home market; but what I have quoted will, I think, prove indisputably that the reason our exports of manufactured goods are becoming daily and beautifully less is, that our manufacturers are unable, because of the burdens that have been heaped upon them by this Tariff, to produce goods as cheaply as they formerly produced them, or to compete as successfully in foreign markets. I have made these remarks in order to lead up to the point I bring before the hon. Minister of Finance, and that is, that—as was pointed out when this Tariff was introduced—it is a Tariff for which he is not entirely responsible, but with regard to which the manufacturers were consulted and the duties on different articles increased and increased until we have the Tariff that is the admiration of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Tariff trying to suit these various conflicting interests, and not for the public good, it is no wonder that the effect has been so disastrous as I have pointed out. I am not making that statement without having cognizance of the facts. Last year the hon. Minister of Finance asked us to vote some $400 to a gentleman interested in sugar refining, to pay his expenses to Ottawa and back. For what purpose did he come here? To help to frame the Tariff; and the hon. Minister of Finance, who had given him a Tariff to make him wealthy at the expense of the people of this country, was not ashamed to ask the House to vote his expenses, and a compliant majority did vote compliance. Therefore, we ought not to blame the finance Minister for this Tariff, because he was not altogether responsible. When I pointed out the inevitable result of imposing heavy duties on raw materials, that it would destroy the export trade, we were told: "No, we have a remedy in the system of drawbacks which we shall put into force;" that is, that they would, by a system of drawbacks, return to manufacturers the amount of duty that had been paid on the raw materials entering into manufactured goods that had been exported to foreign countries. When I moved for that return last year it came down, and what did I find? I found that twenty-one months had elapsed from the inauguration of the National Policy, so-called, to the period of my return, and that the total amount of drawback paid was $15,397.10; but there were 213 claims, amounting to $12,998.84, that were for lobster cans, which did not appear in the manufactured goods of the country, and therefore must come out of the total of $15,379. Deducting that, I found that the total amount paid by way of drawback to manufacturers, on exported goods, was simply $2,380.26 during that period of twenty-one months. Even of that sum $634 was allowed as drawback on corn, used in making starch; $275 on oats, used in making meal; $550 on oil cake, made from linseed; $49 in wire, used in making fences; $34 on tin, used in canning meats, and $836 on flour, manufactured into pilot bread. So the House will see there was not, during those twenty-one months, a single cent of drawback paid to any of the great leading manufacturing industries of this country. Whether the remarks I made last Session have led the Minister of Customs to be a little more liberal in this respect I cannot say; no doubt the hon. gentleman will inform the House with his usual candor. If my remarks had that effect, I am glad; but the hon. gentleman has not gone far enough, as is evidenced by the fact of the continued decrease in our exports of manufactured goods. Why, even admit that you give a drawback on the raw material entering into manufactured goods to the amount of the duty paid, that does not place the Canadian manufacturer in a position to compete with his rivals. Why, take the manufacturer of steam boilers and engines. He uses a large quantity of brass in his manufactures; there is a duty of 30 per cent. to protect the brass manufacturer in Canada. That manufacturer does exactly what every other manufacturer does: he takes advantage of the Tariff, and places 30 per cent. or 29 per cent. on his goods, just sufficient to keep out foreign goods.

So a manufacturer, making steam engines and boilers for export, if he brought in his brass goods from the United States, would have remitted to him the duty he paid on them in the shape of drawback, but having to pay an equal amount to the Canadian manufacturer, he is not allowed a cent of drawback in respect to that. So the House will see how the manufacturer reaps a disadvantage; and the result is, that this system of drawbacks has failed to relieve the difficulty that Ministers themselves saw must necessarily overtake the export trade of manufactured goods. I know no other way by which Ministers can learn a lesson of wisdom than by studying the facts presented to them, which should cause them to depart from their system of hampering the industries of this country. Return to a sounder and newer Tariff, let the industries stand on their own merits, giving no advantage other than such as will come to them in a legitimate way through the revenue Tariff, which, when in force, afforded to manufacturers in many cases better protection than they enjoy at the present time—at all events, affording them all the advantage they have any right to ask that the people of this country should concede to them. As illustrating the operation of the Tariff, let me give hon. gentlemen opposite an instance or two. I took the trouble to ascertain some facts from a large manufacturer in my own town, and I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that there is not a manufacturer of any size or importance there who is not my warm personal and political friend. I have to tell them that, such being the case, as a matter of course they are the open and avowed opponents of the present occupants of the Treasury Benches, and therefore all the manufacturers cannot be their friends, at all events they are not found in my town. Why should they? With the exception of the sugar refining and one or two other industries, what have the manufacturers to thank the present Tariff for? Nothing certainly as regards the manufacturers in my own town. I have here the prepared statements of one of the largest firms, which shows that it paid last year by way of enhanced cost through the operation of this Tariff over and above what duty they would have had to pay under the Mackenzie Tariff on their raw material, the sum of $6,096.04. That shows the extra cost they were compelled to pay on articles entering into their products for one year over and above the amount which they would have to pay had the old Tariff been in force, and that is a firm doing a large export trade. It is a firm which, before the present Government came into power, was doing an export trade with the uttermost ends of the earth—with Chili, Russia, and other countries; but their foreign trade is being slowly but surely crushed out under the operation of this Tariff—a result which is being brought about, whether through the inability of the Minister of Customs, I do not say, but I think it is. I have similar statements from other firms by word of mouth, though not prepared. One says the Tariff takes $5,000 a year extra out of us; another says the amount reaches $3,000. And what is the result of it? If the country were benefitted, if at home we were getting cheaper goods, we might view with some complacency the destruction of our export trade. But we have imports as great as ever, enhanced in price by the amount of duty, showing that we are paying enhanced prices on the same class of goods as are made at home, while, at the same time, there is a decreased export. I say these figures should challenge the attention of the hon. Ministers, and urge them, if possible, to devise some way by which this state of things may be remedied.

Mr. PLUMB. I am very glad to say that one of the earliest utterances from a prominent hon. member of the Opposition, who undoubtedly speaks with authority, shows that the undying hostility of his party to the fiscal policy adopted by this House continues as vigorous as ever. After the somewhat crude utterances of the late hon. leader of the

Mr. PATRICKSON (Brant).

Opposition, when he took a sad farewell of his constituents in Lambton, we were led to suppose that perhaps there might be some modification of the terms in which these hon. gentlemen have, from the beginning to the end, attacked, denounced and villified the policy of the Government. We can see, however, that the recess has stimulated my hon. friend, who has brought forward this resolution, to something more than his wonted energy, in the stentorian attacks which, from time to time, he is accustomed to make on the industries of this country. What is the scope of the hon. gentleman's argument? It is, so far as I am able to catch it, and I have endeavored to follow it very patiently, that because some items—and the hon. gentleman has very carefully made up his statements, since figures can be made to prove anything—of export have decreased within the last two years, that the National Policy is a failure, and is injuring our manufacturing interests. Well, I always supposed that we depended very much on our home trade, and that, though there might be a decrease in the exportation of some of our products, as the hon. gentleman says there is, the fact remains undisputed that the people are sufficiently prosperous not only to buy our own products, but also the imported products of other countries. We never pretended that we were going to build a Chinese wall about Canada, as hon. gentlemen opposite have so often asserted. We never pretended that we intended to take the course pursued by our neighbors on the other side of the border, of shutting out by our Tariff the manufactures of other nations, as hon. gentlemen opposite have so often said, and notably the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and who is master of a certain kind of specious argument. I give him credit for it. He is so notably a master of it that he has been utilized largely by his leader in the campaigns of this summer, which have not been very fortunate. But I say we never intended to shut out by our Tariff the manufactures of other countries.

Mr. ANGLIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman says hear, hear. We never intended to do so. We have said we intended to afford a reasonable protection to our own industries, which hon. gentlemen opposite refused to do. It is somewhat strange that in this argument we should be forced to meet the fact again, and the hon. gentleman is forced to meet it, that exports come to us from the country which has an almost prohibitory Tariff. Now, the hon. gentleman may take one horn of the dilemma or the other. Either the prohibitive Tariff of the United States does not prevent their exporting goods to us, or their Tariff does prevent their sending them. If it does not, if they do send us goods, it is an evidence that they are not handicapped by it. It is a fact, which every one knows, that one of the most sedulously protected countries in Europe sends to England large exports of iron manufactures, not small articles, but girders, and things of that kind, which they sell in the very heart of the iron district, underselling the traders in a Free Trade country. The hon. gentleman must take one side of the argument or the other. The hon. gentleman is, I believe, as the hon. gentlemen opposite generally are, greatly distressed that he has no longer the argument that the depression of trade in the country is so great as to force us to seek markets wherever we can find them, by sacrificing our manufactured goods. Within the last year or two they have been compelled to abandon the cry of famine and depression. Now, they are opening a discussion in this House upon an entirely different basis. The hon. gentleman says that in his town, the manufacturers have suffered. I have heard a very different story. My attention has been called to an article which appeared lately in the London Free Press, written from his place, and on which I might be able to lay my hands if necessary, stating that scarcely any town in Canada has more greatly benefitted by the Tariff than Brantford, that manufactories are springing up rapidly there. I presume the hon. gentleman, with his usual candor, will acknowledge that such is the case.

Mr. PATERSON. I will; but I desire to explain.

Mr. PLUMB. I have the floor.

Mr. PATERSON. I desire to correct the hon. gentleman on one point. I did not say the manufacturers were suffering. What the hon. gentleman says is true. I said they were suffering as far as their export trade is concerned. That is what my latter argument is based on.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman said they were handicapped.

Mr. PATERSON. I said they were handicapped in their export trade.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman said they were handicapped and suffering, not only in their export trade, but that our ruinous Tariff had paralysed our industries.

Mr. PATERSON. I did not use those words at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He never said so.

Mr. PLUMB. Then the hon. gentlemen did not mean what he said.

Mr. PATERSON. Oh, yes, I did.

Mr. PLUMB. It is not my fault if the hon. gentleman did not mean what he said.

Mr. PATERSON. You were making too much noise to hear what I said.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman said that he wanted to see our manufacturing interests developed.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. PLUMB. He said that under the favorable protection of the late Government, manufactures were flourishing and prosperous. The hon. gentleman contrasted the condition of things up to 1878 with their condition now, and the whole gist of his argument was, that we were more prosperous under that condition of things than we are now. The hon. gentleman cannot escape. That was the whole drift of his argument. I appeal to the House and the common sense of the country to say whether the hon. gentleman is correct. The hon. gentleman must be very badly driven into a corner when he opens a discussion with such a statement. The credulity of his party must be exceedingly great when they permit the hon. gentleman to make such statements without proof. I can only say I am perfectly astonished that, with the evidence before him everywhere, he should now seek to escape from the fact that the country is prosperous in all directions, and endeavor to prove that the present Tariff has paralyzed trade. I am astonished that, with the evidence before him, the evidence of his own senses everywhere, he now seeks to escape from the fact that the country is prosperous in all directions, and he endeavors to prove that the Tariff, as imposed by the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, has paralyzed and injured trade. The hon. gentleman throughout his whole argument uses another specious plea which is very common to hon. gentlemen on the opposite side. He speaks of the Tariff as if the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches had imposed the whole of it. He says that there is a Tariff of 30 per cent. or 35 per cent. upon brass manufacturers, in speaking of steam machinery; he says that the Tariff has increased the price just so much, but who is responsible for at least half of that, and perhaps more? I remember perfectly an hon. gentleman who did me the honor to visit my constituency to harangue the bucolic element who came there, and whom he thought would listen to his arguments—I had no opportunity to reply at the time he attempted to tell them that the Tariff on cotton had raised the price over 30 per cent. My hon. friend the late leader of the Government, in the strongest charge he could bring against the existing Tariff, when he was using every possible argument against it, stated—and we may always make a little allowance for the exaggerations used in the heat of debate—he stated that our Tariff was an average increase of 5 per cent. over 17½ per cent. Cottons may be increased on the average by 7½ per cent.; if so, that cannot increase the price to 30 per cent., unless by some locus pocus the manufacturers have been enabled, through the misrepresentations of the hon. gentleman opposite, and through the misrepresentations of the press which echo their views, to receive a higher price and to be sustained in it. The hon. gentleman speaks of the decrease in the exports of pig iron. There was no pig iron manufactured in this country until within a very short time.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes; in Londonderry and Three Rivers.

Mr. PLUMB. That at Three Rivers is a new industry of about three years date, but even then that industry was paralyzed, and they were not able to do any large business until they were protected by the present Tariff. It is a good sign that these works are prosperous. We are using their iron. There is a prohibitory Tariff in the United States, and it is not at all likely, and the hon. gentlemen cannot expect, that we will export pig iron to England. I think the whole of his argument is based upon a succession of similar fallacies, which are intended, not so much for the ear of this House as for his supporters outside. The hon. gentleman knows that the instant propositions of that kind are made in this House they will be met, and he knows that the delusive manner in which he has put these figures will be very easily exposed. I have not the figures present, I did not intend to answer him on that point, but I observe that, in order to increase the list of articles which have fallen off in exportation, he has made use of some very paltry items where the whole trade is scarcely anything, or amounts to but a few thousand dollars. On the article of drugs I believe the whole export is but $79. The exports of drugs and medicines, so far as I can see, that are not of our own manufacture, amounts to $365. But a detailed answer to the hon. gentleman can only be made by reference to the books themselves. I say, again, that it is a little extraordinary that the hon. gentleman argues that the effect of this Tariff is to decrease our export trade, when the very articles which are coming into us are sent to us from a country which is so largely protective. A great many of those articles from the United States are largely protected. The hon. gentleman speaks of a great increase in our exports. He says that he does not care where that increase arises. Well, that is of a piece with everything that is said by hon. gentlemen on the other side. He does not care whether the produce that is raised in this country is taken into the United States, and a duty averaging 30, 40 or 50 per cent. paid upon it. He does not care whether that is owing to the exigencies of our trade and the balance of our trade, as it was during the Administration which that hon. gentleman supported for five years, and which he is endeavoring to get back into power. He does not care whether the farmer is compelled to go there, or whether he has the English market opened to him, or whether he buys under a tariff at all. The hon. gentleman's arguments are all of the same character; all he desires to do is to make a point against the present Government, and I believe in that he has signally failed. But I say again, and I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact, that we see, from the course pursued by the hon. gentlemen, that their policy is one of undying hostility to the manufacturing interests, one of undying hostility to the National Policy. We will hold the hon. gentleman to his utterances, because we believe that those utterances are made in consequence of an agreement among the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition, and therefore, that he stands in the position of quasi-leader of his party in this House.

Mr. ORTON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MACKENZIE. It seems incredible that such a speech as that made by my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) should pass unanswered by a single Minister. There has been no answer made by the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). I think the hon. gentlemen behind them should make way for some of the Ministers.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). They are not ready yet.

Mr. BOWELL. We are certainly under a great compliment to the hon. gentleman. I dare say the members of the Cabinet will take their own opportunity to speak.

Mr. MACKENZIE. They are afraid to do it to day.

Mr. ORTON. I can hardly agree with the hon. member for Lambton in looking upon the speech of the hon. member for South Brant as one of such great importance, and especially of such importance to his side of the House. I think no member ever rose in this House who so well succeeded in advocating the cause of his opponents instead of that of his own side of the House, and think his whole argument goes to prove the success of the hon. member to the people of Canada. In the first place, he attempted to show that our export trade in manufactures had decreased. Do we not well know that one of the main objects of the National Policy was to give to the Canadian manufacturer the Canada markets? Is it surprising to him to find that the effect of the National Policy has been to do exactly what it was intended to do, and the manufacturers find it utterly impossible for them to-day to supply the demand in the home market for the various manufactures of this country, and the consequence is that they are not obliged to seek foreign markets for their manufactures. Furthermore, the facts show that the people of this country have increased their consuming power. They are not in that deplorable state in which they were previous to the inauguration of this policy. They do not now suffer from the hardships and trials they then suffered from. Our laboring men find employment in every city, town and village in the country, and the consequence is, they are enabled to buy more largely of manufactured goods. Our manufacturers are employed beyond the capacity of their machinery or their buildings, supplying the home demand, and the consequence is that manufacturers buy from one another, as hon. gentlemen are well aware, one class helping thereby to increase the prosperity of the other, the result being that they have benefitted largely by the operations of the National Policy. It has been distinctly shown by my hon. friend that such is the case, for in attempting to show that the increased export of farm products was a point against the National Policy, he gave a proof positive that the effect of that policy had been to some extent to stimulate the production of farm products. The Trade and Navigation Returns show that the effect of the National Policy has been to give to the farmers of this country an increased market of no less than $5,000,000 annually; and if they have also increased their exports, it only shows that a greater stimulus to production has been given to our farmers. It is true that Providence has done a great deal, but we find that not only the agricultural, but the lumbering industry and every other industry has been stimulated, and why? Because the people of this country are all prospering. Building operations are going on in all parts of the country; they are using lumber extensively, and the result is that the home market for lumber alone has increased enormously. If the hon. gentleman desired to give an honest and candid statement to this House with regard to the National Policy he would be prepared to show by statistics whether our manufacturers had increased their productions or not; and if he could have shown that the manufacturers had not increased their production of manufactured goods, or that the lumbermen had not increased their production of lumber, he might then have said, with justice, that the effect of the National Policy was injurious to those interests. But I think he will find, before this House dissolves, that overwhelming evidence will be forthcoming to show that in every class of manufactures the amount produced has been enormously increased, and that not only has there been an increased exportation of many of these articles, such as lumber and farm produce, but that there has also been a very large increase in the home consumption, owing to the increased prosperity of the people. The hon. gentleman referred to the manufacturers in his own town, and he admitted warmly that he did not intend to insinuate that they were not prospering; but when he attempted to show that the effect of the National Policy had been to destroy manufacturing industries, it would have been in order for him to show that the manufacturers of Brantford had suffered in consequence of its adoption. But the hon. gentleman says they have not suffered, and why? Because they cannot supply the demand for manufactured goods in their own country, and as soon as they can do so they will appeal to the Government for a drawback, so as to enable them to compete with foreign countries, and increase the export of manufactured goods. I wish to say one thing in reference to the agricultural interests, and I will put it in the shape of a challenge to hon. gentlemen opposite, and it is that this side of the House will be able to show, not only that they have given to the Canadian farmer an increased home market, but that they have increased his prices as compared with those in Liverpool. They will be able to show that the various articles used by the farmer in everyday life—the articles of common consumption, such as cottons and many other classes of manufactured goods—are to-day sold cheaper to the farming, mechanical, and laboring classes, than ever before. These facts will be forthcoming in due time, and then I think even the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) will—if he honestly confesses his opinion, as I believe he desires to do—acknowledge that the National Policy after all has been a blessing to the people of Canada.

Mr. HESSON. As the hon. member for South Brant has chosen to color the figures he has used, for the purpose of conveying the impression that the country is in a worse state now than before the introduction of the present Tariff, I have taken the trouble to compile a few figures which, I think, I may submit to the judgment of the House, to show that the hon. member is far astray when he imagines he can pull the wool over the eyes of hon. members, or of people outside, by applying his statistics in a way that will not stand the light. I will take the export of farm products for three years, during the previous Administration of the present head of the Government, viz: the years 1871-72-73, and show that they were very much less than they were in the three last years of the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton; and as the times were adverse during those three years, the argument he has used with regard to the significance of the export trade will fall to the ground. In 1871, the exports of farm products were $9,858,146; in 1872, they were $13,378,562; and in 1873, $14,395,340, a total export trade, during those three years, of $37,632,048. I will now take the figures for the three last years of the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton, and show that the difference was largely in favor of that Government, though the bad times accompanied its administration of affairs. The exports of products of the farm, in 1876, were $21,139,605; in 1877, $14,689,876; in 1878, $18,008,754; or a total, in the three years, of $53,834,235. In other words, there was a difference of $16,202,187 in favor of the late Administration, and yet I appeal to the House to say if its record was one to which even hon. gentlemen opposite can look back with pride and satisfaction, and say that under it the country prospered. But we have to look further than that: we have to look to the present prosperity of Canada; to the home industries which have been established; to the home markets which have been created; to the home consumption of all our manufactured products, and I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to say, if they can, that the country is in a worse state now than it was under the Administration of their own party. Hon. gentlemen talk of the exports of the forest as helping to produce the mercantile prosperity which at present exists. I have figures to show that the exports of the forest, in 1877, amounted to $23,010,349, and, in 1878, to $19,511,574, making a total of exports of the forest, in the last two years of the Mackenzie Administration, of $42,521,824. I presume that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will try to make the country believe that there has been an increase in the exports, and that therefore we have excellent times. In 1879, the exports amounted to $13,261,459, and, in 1880, to $16,854,507, a total of $30,115,966; showing a difference in favor of the exports of the forest, during the Mackenzie Administration, of no less than $12,405,858, or a total excess of the exports of the forest and farm, in favor of that Administration during the years I have mentioned, of $28,608,045. Now, I ask hon. members of this House if the three last years of the late Administration were prosperous years, which can be remembered with anything like pleasure, or if those who had to live by the sweat of their brows had full recompense for their labor. The hon. member for Brant tried to lead this House to believe that the manufacturing industries of this country were suffering. What are the facts? I appeal to the hon. gentleman to candidly state whether they are not prospering in his own city beyond anything he ever anticipated. He must admit that there is scarcely an industry there that is not busily employed, almost to double the extent it was in former years, and that new industries have been created. He speaks of cottons having been brought into this country. I could not go to the cotton factory in his own town and give an order in the hope of having it filled in less than three months. And yet the hon. member would make it appear that the industries of this country are in distress. I say it shows a want of fair play to quote figures in the attempt to show that times are bad, that the policy of this Government is a mistake, and that we ought to go back to the policy of their predecessors. When we compare the records, I think hon. gentlemen opposite should hide their heads in shame that they were unable to legislate in the interest of the industries of the country, and that they now try to show that the country is suffering, because it is ruled by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I desire to make only a few remarks in order to correct some words that have been put into my mouth. It is a matter of regret that when I endeavored to make my statement as fair as I could, the hon. member for Niagara should have made that a charge against me. The hon. member, instead of finding fault, should give me credit, because I made it a point to give every item of manufacture, no matter how it told, so that no man could say that I had made a garbled statement; and to make that a charge against me shows a lack of fairness on the part of the hon. gentleman. Another statement put in my mouth is, that the manufacturers of this country are not in a prosperous condition. I made no such statement. I was speaking wholly of our export trade, and I said that, so far as the ability of our manufacturers to do an export trade was concerned, they were handicapped by this Tariff. Hon. gentlemen call on me to testify as to whether the manufacturers of Canada are doing well or not. I believe that perhaps never were the manufacturers of Canada enjoying more prosperity than they are to-day. I believe that at no period have the manufacturers of Brantford done better than they are doing to-day. But if that is true of them, it is true of all other classes in the community. If the National Policy was intended to do anything, it was intended to kill off the importer, and yet the testimony of importers is that they were never doing as well as they are doing now. The same may be said of the farmers, the lumbermen, and all other classes of the community. But the great point to consider is this: When we are all doing well, is that fact due to the Tariff? I say that it is not a result of the Tariff, but in spite of it; that so far as the Tariff is concerned, it is an injury and not a benefit; in other words, prosperous as our merchants and manufacturers are, they would be more prosperous if the Tariff was to-day as it was before. The $30,000,000 of extra gold brought into this country during the last two years is the result of our exports of agricultural products, animals and their produce, and lumber. But did the National Policy cause heaven's rain to fall, or the sun to shine on our fields, giving us higher prices for our goods; or did the National Policy cause the rain to fall on the fields of England, Scotland or Ireland, blighting their harvests, and opening a market for what we had to sell? Did the National Policy raise the price of wheat in Liverpool, or the price of lumber in Albany, or in the markets of Great Britain? Clearly not. Therefore, that $30,000,000 of extra gold that came into this country came in, in spite of the Tariff, and not as a result of it, and enabled the people of this country to buy more freely the goods they needed than before, and our manufacturers are thus sharing in the general prosperity. When hon. gentlemen opposite point to the manufacturers of my town as doing better than before, they must give them credit for common sense; and the manufacturers of my town resent the theory that they exist by the grace of the Finance Minister of this country. They contend that they are thriving because they are putting money and energy into their business, and not because of this Tariff, which every one of these gentlemen wish to have changed. The manufacturers in Brantford are doing well, the manufacturers in Canada are doing well, all classes in Canada are doing well, and they are doing well in spite of the Tariff, and as a result of the extra gold brought into the country from the causes I have mentioned, over which hon. gentlemen opposite have no control whatever. I trust I have now made myself, at all events, sufficiently plain that hon. gentlemen opposite can comprehend the position I take on this question.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not my intention to follow the hon. gentleman through the whole of his speech, nor the details of the figures which he has presented to the House; but I desire to call attention to one or two facts in connection with his speech which may possibly explain why the exports of the articles to which he referred have not been so great as in former years. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) was very anxious that some member of the Cabinet should refer to the speech of the hon. member for South Brant, on account of the logic, I suppose, he thought contained in the remarks he had offered. If hon. gentlemen opposite would settle among themselves what their policy is, or is to be, it would be very much better not only for the country but for themselves. We have the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), who has declared that every manufacturer who has been protected is a highway robber, or language to that effect. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) has harked back since his speech made in Dundee, when he announced himself such an ardent Free Trader.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I made no change whatever.

Mr. BOWELL. He has told the people of this country, in a late speech, that he is going to lop off the protective branches by degrees. He has no idea of slaughtering with one blow all the manufacturing interests, but he will take them piecemeal; and I hope, when the time comes, if it ever should come, they may die in peace. It may be that there has been a decrease in the export of the articles referred to by the hon. member for South Brant. It is quite true that there has been a decrease in the export trade of confectionery; but the hon. gentleman should remember that, during the time his friends were in power, the people and children had very little money with which to indulge in lollipops; and the hon. gentleman has good reason to know, as that is the particular industry in which he himself is engaged, that if that business is now much more prosperous than it was in past years, it is because he has found a market within the boundaries of our own Dominion for the consumption of the articles he manufactures, while in 1878 he was obliged to send them out of the country in order to find a market. The hon. gentleman is aware and no one knows better, because he has given much attention to the question of the export and import trade, that interprovincial trade, which has grown up within the last few years, and particularly within the last ten or twelve years, is double that which existed a few years ago. Let me give the hon. gentleman a few figures. I think they will show that whereas the exports, accepting the figures he has given, have fallen off on some thirty or forty articles, that interprovincial trade has increased and quadrupled the total sum. Take, for instance, the returns from Nova Scotia. In 1865-66 the imports into that Province, from foreign countries, were $14,000,000. If the hon. gentleman will consult the Trade and Navigation Returns, he will find that the imports from foreign countries into that Province have decreased $6,000,000 to $7,000,000. Who have supplied those $7,000,000 worth of goods, except the manufacturers of the Maritime Provinces, Ontario and Quebec, and the farms and dairies of this country? The same facts exist in regard to the trade of New Brunswick. If hon. members will refer to the imports from foreign countries, they will find that before Confederation, they reached $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 in that Province, and that during last year they amounted to little more than half that sum.

Mr. ANGLIN. Yes.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman knows that the people of New Brunswick consume as much to-day as they did before Confederation, that the Province is just as prosperous, and if that be the case, either the goods must be manufactured within the Province, or they were received from Ontario or other Provinces of the Dominion, which have entered largely into the production of articles formerly imported from foreign countries. Take the wide domain that lies to the west of us. In 1878, the interprovincial trade, covering articles sent by Canada to the North-West, amounted to about one million and a quarter. The exports, if I may so term them,—that is, the products of Canada—have increased from that sum to nearly six millions, for the year ending 30th June last, and during the last six months—I have not the figures by me, but I am speaking within bounds when I say that the trade of old Canada with Manitoba and the North-West Territories has increased to a very much larger extent than during the last year. Who have supplied the Maritime Provinces with goods? and who have supplied the great North-West with the agricultural implements, which the hon. member for South Brant complains have not been exported, and which do not appear in the trade returns, but the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec? The fact that there is not an agricultural industry in this country recently established, or that was formerly in operation, which is not working to its utmost capacity, and this afforded the best possible evidence that they found a market for their products. If these were not sent abroad they were consumed here; if they did not go to the Maritime Provinces they were sent to the North-West. What did a Free Trader and former supporter of the hon. gentleman opposite tell me the other day in Toronto, and he is a gentleman living in my own county? He said, after travelling through the North-West last summer, and spending six weeks or two months there, he came to the conclusion, whatever his theoretical opinions might be, that a protective policy was the correct policy for this country. I said to him: "What has led you to that conclusion?" He replied: "I have come to that conclusion because, while travelling one or two months in the North-West and going 300 or 400 miles west of Winnipeg, I found almost every article on the farm, such as agricultural implements, ploughs and wagons, bore the mark of some Ontario manufacturer," while before this Tariff was inaugurated and extra duties imposed, nearly all those articles, nineteenth-twentieths I am sure, were imported from Racine, Wisconsin, Ohio and Illinois. If the facts prove that the manufacturers are fully employed, that they can scarcely supply the markets in the old Provinces, and that they find the market within the bounds of the Dominion, such is not evidence of a decrease in the industries of this country. Neither is it an evidence that the industries of this country are hampered or handicapped by the Tariff. If that be established, my hon. friend's logic and argument falls to the ground, and until he can controvert the figures I have given him—I will have an opportunity, no doubt, before the House rises, to give the exact figures—he must admit the correctness of my statements with regard to the increase of trade. How is it possible that all the articles to which he has referred can possibly be manufactured to the extent to which they are in this country, and yet there be—I will not say a stagnation in trade, because the hon. gentleman repudiates that—but a handicapping of the manufacturing industries of the country. If they are handicapped by the Tariff to such an extent that it ruins them, I ask how it is that men of intelligence, men who do not exist by Act of Parliament, but who use their own brains, energy and enterprise to make their fortunes, should go on extending their workshops and manufacturing more to-day than at any previous period.

An hon. MEMBER. Why do they not ask for a change?

Mr. BOWELL. They do ask for a change, but in the direction of a higher Tariff. They want an increased duty, for instance, on iron. We find that none of them, not even the personal friends of my hon. friend opposite, ask to have the duties taken off. Referring to his own town, the hon. gentleman says the manufacturers there are his personal and political friends. I am not at all surprised that they should be his personal friends. I question whether any one who knows the hon. gentleman would not be his personal friend; but I am safe in saying that there is not an hon. gentleman on the other side who can compare with him in specious argumentation. No one can better tell just half what should be told, in dealing with facts, than my hon. friend. A paper has been handed to me containing reference to his town, in which it is stated that, in the year 1881 alone, the machinery purchased and the new buildings erected represented not less a sum than $250,000. The promoters of these enterprises must be men lacking that quantity of brain and intellect to which the hon. gentleman referred, if they expend $250,000 in the city of Brantford—a city containing 9,000 inhabitants—for the purpose of being handicapped and ruined. In addition to these expenditures, in Brantford, a company has established a new industry, the manufacture of farming and dairy utensils, with a capital of about $50,000. The hon. gentleman knows that an English gentleman who had been carrying on business for a great number of years in Yorkshire, has, owing to the operations of this Tariff, taken his whole plant and located himself in the hon. gentleman's city. From what I can learn, he is doing remarkably well. The fact that he has invested some hundreds of thousands of dollars in one enterprise there alone, and is now inducing others to invest their money in the manufacture of an article not yet produced in this country, is the best evidence that the handicapping of which the hon. gentleman speaks, has not had a very serious effect on our manufacturing industries.

Mr. PATERSON. Deal with the export trade.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman's whole argument was based on the fact that in certain articles our export trade had decreased to the amount of $1,300,000. I pointed out immediately afterwards that our inter-provincial trade had increased since Confederation, in the Maritime Provinces alone, by some $14,000,000 or $15,000,000. I say that is dealing with the export trade.

Mr. PATERSON. No.

Mr. BOWELL. It may be that I am not able to make my hon. friend comprehend.

Mr. PATERSON. That is explained by other causes. It is due to the $30,000,000 import of gold arising from the export producing power of the people.

Mr. BOWELL. I quite admit that if they had no money they could not buy.

Mr. PATERSON. Where did they get their money?

Mr. BOWELL. Unless the people had the money to buy they would not buy. If they have got money, it is owing to the general prosperity of the country, induced to a very great extent by the establishment of large manufacturing industries. The hon. gentleman says that the money came into the country. I admit that, and contend that it is one of the results of the protective Tariff. If we did not manufacture to the extent we now do, all the products of the farm would be sent to foreign countries, and instead of the money being brought back to be expended here, we would bring back the products of foreign markets for our consumption. If we send to Europe 100,000 bushels of grain, and bring back in exchange gold, say, to the amount of $200,000, you have that much to expend here and purchase our own manufactures: whereas, if we imported foreign manufactures instead, so much money would be taken out of circulation here. Just so long as we keep exporting to foreign countries and bring back gold, and manufacture here the goods we require to consume, just so long will the country be prosperous. I know that does not meet the views of the chief Free Trader, but I have more faith in one ounce of practice than in all the theory that Free Traders can produce.

Mr. MACKENZIE. And the results?

Mr. BOWELL. And in the results. The hon. gentleman particularly referred to the question of pig iron. He says that, under the late Tariff, the export of pig iron was greater than at present. Those who know anything of the manufacture of pig iron know that the Londonderry works are the only ones that have had any existence in this country for some time.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Oh, no. There is Three Rivers.

Mr. BOWELL. For some time, I said, the Three Rivers works have been engaged in one particular manufacture. It is also known that at the time the hon. gentleman went out of power, these works, and the whole country, were, if I may say so, almost in bankruptcy. It may be true that the export of pig iron was greater then than now, and there may be two reasons for that. If there was none manufactured in this country for export, as there was not in 1878, then it follows that the export trade must have consisted of English and Scotch pig iron which was brought into this country, warehoused, and then exported to a foreign country. That is where my hon. friend gets his export trade for 1878.

Mr. PATERSON. My figures are all for Canadian products.

Mr. BOWELL. That could not be, because there was none of any consequence manufactured in the country in 1877 and 1878. The present state of the Londonderry works is this: That instead of manufacturing pig iron for export they are manufacturing pig iron into billets and booms, and from that into bar iron. Though their whole establishment has been running night and day during the last year they are unable to supply the demands made upon them in this country, and if they have not exported the products of the two furnaces which are now in full blast, instead of the one they formerly had, it is because they are consuming the product of these mines and the product of these blast furnaces in the country rather than sending it out; that is the only answer that can be given, and to my mind it is a conclusive one. I intended to ask the hon. gentleman, before he made his last speech, what industries had been handicapped to such an extent that they had been crushed out of existence, under the operation of the present Tariff; but he has told us that he never knew manufactures so flourishing in the history of this country as they are to-day; and if they are flourishing, they must have a market of some description for that which they produce in their different branches of industry. If it be not in the export trade then it is, as I have pointed out, in the inter-provincial trade which has grown up to such a large extent and is constantly increasing. I know it has been the policy of the hon. leader of the Opposition—he is not present, but my argument is none the less pertinent—I know it has been the policy in the speeches which have been delivered by the hon. gentleman, particularly in the Maritime Provinces during the past year, that they should not trade with Ontario nor with Quebec, that the natural outlet for their products and the natural market for them is in the United States. The present leader of the Opposition stated, in a speech he made at Summerside, I think it was, that the United States was their legitimate market, and that they should not be compelled to trade with the other Provinces.

Mr. ANGLIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I could admire his countryman, Mr. Parnell, when he tried to enforce upon his own people the necessity of wearing only products they manufactured themselves. However much I disagree with him and his politics generally, I say I could admire Mr. Parnell when he said to the Irish people: "Wear that which you produce in your own country," because if they wore that which they manufactured themselves, it must be the product of their own labor, and the manufactures of their own country. But there is no comparison between a man who will advocate a policy of that kind and the man who will say to his own people: "Go to a foreign country and spend your money and ruin the manufactures of the other Provinces." I repeat that, while I could admire the policy of the one, because it would give labor to his own countrymen, I look, and I believe this country will look, with strong disapprobation, to use no stronger language, upon the leader of a party who advise a portion of the people of this great Dominion to go to the United States and purchase goods with their money rather than deal with the manufacturers of their own country.

Mr. ANGLIN. He never said anything of the kind; I was present.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know that that is evidence of the fact, judging from the past, although, of course, in a parliamentary sense, I am bound to accept the statement of the hon. gentleman. I am only speaking from reports of speeches I read as having been delivered by the hon. gentleman. If he has been misreported, then, of course, I am wrong; but I cut the speech out at the time, and have it in my possession.

Mr. ANGLIN. Read it.

Mr. BOWELL. I thought it very extraordinary that a statement of this character should have been made in a country like this, where we are endeavoring to build up amongst ourselves a trade which will enrich the whole country.

Mr. PLUMB. He is reported in a half-a-dozen papers to have said it.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman says he was there, and that it was not said. What was the principal argument used by those gentlemen whom I may term the fathers of Confederation? It was that an interprovincial trade would grow up, and that articles which some Provinces could not produce would be produced by the other Provinces, being all members of the same family though living in different sections of the Dominion. Hence it struck me as very peculiar that the leader of a great party, and who is supposed to be at least in favor of the great principle of Confederation, should have given utterance to such language as this. I am not at all surprised that my hon. friend from Gloucester repudiates this sentiment, because we all know he was an uncompromising opponent of Confederation. I do not find fault with him for conscientiously believing that it would not be to the interest of that section of the Dominion in which he lived, and it was his duty, as a patriotic man to oppose it. But language of that kind, I say, is not that of a patriot. Any gentleman, any hon. member of this House, who has travelled through the Maritime Provinces and particularly in Prince Edward Island, must have found that the articles most largely in use there, particularly agricultural implements to which the hon. member for South Brant has referred, are nearly all bought from different sections of this Dominion, instead of being imported from the United States as formerly; but, what is still more gratifying, is the fact that, though being subjected to the heavy cost of transportation to the East, and to Manitoba and the North-West, these articles are sold, to-day, cheaper in these different sections of the Dominion than they were five or six years ago, when they were all purchased in the United States. The return for which my hon. friend has moved will be brought down. He tells us that the system of paying drawbacks—I think I may use the expression drawback to the drawback—has been intensified; that is, that the policy has been such as to prevent the possibility of these gentlemen obtaining their drawbacks. All I can tell the hon. gentleman is, that since our late discussion the principle has been extended to a certain extent, that in every single instance where manufacturers have presented their claims in such a manner that it was possible for the Accountant to arrive at a correct decision as to the amount of drawbacks they should receive, there has been no delay whatever in paying it to them. I think he will find that, when the return comes down, it will show that there was a much larger amount paid in the way of drawback than there was in previous years; and I have no doubt that, as the manufacturers continue to prosper, and when they shall have succeeded in more than supplying the home market, the export trade will continue to increase. And as it continues to increase, just so in proportion will the Government pay back as large an amount of drawback as the law will permit. But, unless manufacturers will place their claims in such a manner as will enable the Department, under the law, to deal with them, they have no right to complain of any delay which may take place. I make this explanation, because I know that in some cases manufacturers complain that their claims have not been attended to as rapidly as they should have been. Such claims, of course, come to the Department, and when complaints have come to me, and I have made enquiry, I have found in every instance that the claims have been made in such a way that it was impossible to deal with them until they were amended, and when this has been done no delay took place. I can only hope, as one of the best possible evidences of the prosperity of our country, that our manufactures will increase to such an extent that it will not be necessary for us to go out of the country for any of the articles we may require that can be manufactured here. As an illustration, I know that my hon. friend before me, the Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper) finds that the demand for rolling stock to supply the Intercolonial Railway and other Government railways, has been so great that it has been utterly impossible for the engine manufacturers and car manufacturers of this country to contract for and deliver the articles required within anything like a reasonable time, or within such a time that he would have been justified in waiting to receive them. This has been the case in the car and engine shops, not only of Ontario, but in the Maritime Provinces; they have been driven to this extent, not to supply a foreign demand, but for the home market; so that the Minister of Railways, as well as many railway companies, have been obliged to import rolling stock in order to keep pace with the increased traffic in various sections of the country. Let us hope that this state of things may continue, and when the time comes for going into this matter more minutely, I think I will be able to show the hon. gentleman that, even in the articles to which he has referred, the manufacture has not decreased but has rather increased, and that the market has been in our own country instead of a foreign country. No article I know of furnishes a better illustration of that fact than that of furs. The demand for furs from Montreal, and other places in the older Provinces, in the North-West as well as the usual demand in other parts of Canada, has been so great that the manufacturers have scarcely been able to supply it, and hence they had none to export to foreign countries; but if those markets were not open to them for the sale of furs, as well as other articles, they would have to export them in order to find sale for that which they produce.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General ;

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

LORNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons Supplementary Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1882; and, in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons,

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 23rd February, 1882.

Ordered that the Message and Supplementary Estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.

THE CIVIL SERVICE OF CANADA.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN in introducing Bill (No. 36) respecting the Civil Service of Canada, said: Mr. Speaker, the Bill is intended to apply to the inside and outside services. The Civil Service, by this Bill, will be divided, as it is now, into two divisions: there will be the first or inside departmental division, and the second or outside departmental division. The inside division will comprise the officers at headquarters, the outside division will comprise the officers and servants outside the Capital. The Bill provides for the appointment of a Board of Examiners, who shall be authorized to examine all candidates for admission to the Service, and to give certificates of qualification to such persons as are found qualified, according to the regulations then in force. The meetings of the Board shall be held at such times, and the proceedings thereof shall be governed by such rules, as may be decided by the Governor in Council. It is intended to fix the salaries of the examiners, when so employed, at $10 a day, and their travelling expenses; and if persons, as provided by the next clause, are employed as assistants for the examinations, they shall be paid $5 per day. The Board of Examiners shall sit at certain periods in the cities of Halifax, St. John, Charlottetown, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, London, Winnipeg, and Victoria, and such other places as may be determined by Order in Council. The Bill provides that all appointments shall be during pleasure, and no person except a Deputy-Head shall be appointed without a previous examination, in accordance with the provisions of the Bill. The Deputy-Head shall be appointed by the Governor in Council during pleasure, but may be removed for cause, and if so removed the cause shall be communicated to both Houses of Parliament at the next Session, within the first fifteen days. The salaries of the Deputies, by this Bill, are intended to have a minimum of $3,200, and a maximum of $4,000. The duties of the Deputy-Heads of the Departments are provided for by the Bill. In the absence of a Deputy-Head the chief clerk may be named by the Head of the Department to fill his office. The Bill provides for four classes of clerks: chief clerks, first class, second class and third class clerks. Under the law as it stands now, there are five classes besides probationary clerks, namely: chief clerks, senior second class, junior second class, third class and probationary clerks or fourth class clerks. We thought it would be better to have, besides chief clerks, only three classes: first, second and third. Chief clerks shall only be appointed, according to this Bill, by Order in Council, passed on the report of the Deputy-Head of the Department, concurred in by the Head of the Department, and after the salaries have been voted by Parliament. More than that, the party so appointed must have a certificate from the Deputy-Head of the Department, that he possesses the necessary qualifications. Hon. gentlemen will see that a great deal more power is given in this Bill to the Deputy-Heads than is given by the law as it stands. The salary of a chief clerk will be the minimum, $1,800, and maximum, $2,400, as at present. A first-class clerkship shall only be created by an Order in Council, based on a report of the Deputy-Head, and concurred in by the Head of the Department, setting forth the reason for creating the office, and provided the salary has been already voted by Parliament. The salary will be $1,200 minimum, per annum, $1,800 maximum, which are the present rates. The second class clerkships will be appointed under a similar Order in Council, and with similar certificates. The salary will not be changed from what it is under the present law, $1,100 minimum and $1,400 maximum. The minimum salary of third class clerks will be $400, and the annual increase of $50 per year, up to a maximum of $1,000. We have combined in the third class the two classes that existed before, namely, the third class and a junior second class. No increase of salary will be given to any officer unless on a report by the Deputy-Head, concurred in by the Head of the Department. There is the right of suspension of the increase, and when restored the arrears are not to be paid to the clerk. The manner of paying it would be from the beginning of next quarter. The number of officers and servants of a Department shall be determined by an Order in Council as well as the appointments; and all vacancies, however occurring, shall be filled in the manner provided hereafter in this Bill. No person shall be appointed to the Civil Service until he has passed an examination before a Board of Examiners. The examination will be according to the class to which the applicant aspires, and must be preceded by a preliminary examination to ascertain whether the candidate possesses such knowledge of orthography and elementary arithmetic, and whether his handwriting is such as to justify his admission to the qualifying examination. When that preliminary examination is passed he must be submitted to an examination for the class to which he aspires. No person will be admitted to be a candidate until he has satisfied the Board that at the time appointed for such examination he will have attained the full age of eighteen years, and that he is free from any physical defect or disease which would be likely to interfere with the proper discharge of his duties; also that his character is such as to qualify him for the Service. These examinations are open to all, but if the applicant wishes to be examined in English or in French, or in both languages, the examiners will have to grant his request. Then the Bill provides the machinery for giving notice in the papers, &c. When the examinations have taken place the examiners will send a list of the successful candidates to the Secretary of State, provision being made for the publication of the list in the Official Gazette. The examination, of which I spoke just now, will apply to the messengers, packers and sorters in the first division, also to the third class clerkships and similar officers and employes in the inside and outside services. I need not go through the whole list. The mode of appointment will be this:

30. When it becomes necessary to make any new appointment to any of the classes to which is herein provided that first appointments shall only be after qualifying examination, such necessity shall be reported to the Head of the Department by his Deputy, and upon such report being approved by the Head of the Department, and after the salary to be paid shall have been voted by Parliament, the Head of the Department shall select and submit to the Governor in Council for probation from the list of qualified candidates, made by the Board as aforesaid, a person fitted for the vacant place.

That person will be appointed after he has passed this examination, and even then he is to be under probation for six months, and if during these six months the Head of the Department is not satisfied with him, he may be sent back and another appointment will take place in the manner in which the first was made. There is a provision also in the Bill by which an officer who has been so appointed, even after the six months but previous to the end of the year, should he be reported by the Deputy-Head of the Department as unfit for the service to which he was appointed, will be replaced by another in the manner provided by the Bill. If an officer is required in the Department for work requiring special qualifications, then the Bill provides for his appointment in the following way. For example, for an architect, or an assistant engineer, or an officer of that kind, the requisite qualifications for which are not possessed by any person then in the service of that Department, the Governor in Council may select and appoint such person as shall be deemed best fitted to fill the vacancy. Then about promotions in the Department:

33. Promotion in either division of the Civil Service shall be by examination, under regulations made by the Governor in Council.

(2) Such examination shall be open to any person employed in the Department in which the vacancy to be filled by promotion exists (unless the Governor in Council shall otherwise order) in either division of the Service who holds a position below that to which the promotion is to be made, and—

(3) Shall be in such subjects as, after consultation with the chief officers of the Department in which the promotion is to be made, may be decided upon by the Board as best adapted to test the fitness of the candidates for the vacant office.

The Bill provides that once in a year there shall be an estimate made by the different Deputy-Heads of the Departments of the probable requirements, or number of vacancies to take place in their respective Departments during the year. Of course that will be, to a certain extent, approximate; but the experience of the past few years will certainly show them what is likely to be the probable number to be provided for during the year.

34. (2) To the number so estimated shall be added such further number as the Deputy-Head may deem necessary to compensate for any failure of health, death, or other contingency; and a similar estimate shall be made, at the same time or times, of the number of vacancies likely to occur in the second division, to which promotions can be made. The numbers so estimated shall be those with reference to which the examinations for promotion shall be held.

Notice will be given in the Official Gazette of the vacancies likely to occur in the Departments, and the candidates may come forward and pass their examinations at the places fixed by the notice in the Gazette. The Board will be bound to make a list of those who are competing for promotion, and send it to the hon. the Secretary of State.

36. When any vacancy occurs in one of the higher classes, in either division, the Head of the Department shall select from the lists made, as herein directed, for promotion thereto the person whom, having due reference to any special duties incident to the office, to the qualification and fitness shown by the candidates respectively during their examination, and to the record of their previous conduct in the Service, he may consider best fitted for the office.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Then there will be a probation for those as well as for the others, of six months, and if the probationer is rejected before the end of the six months, then another may be appointed in the same way and from the same list. During the time of probation, the office held by the probationer previously may be filled by another officer of the Department, under the same conditions.

40. So soon as conveniently may be after the passing of this Act, the Governor in Council shall determine the number of officers, chief clerks, messengers and other servants that are required for the working of the several Departments in each division of the Civil Service, but the amount of the salaries of the whole number shall in no case exceed that provided for by vote of Parliament for that purpose.

The object of this is, that if we wish to have this new law we must put in force as soon as possible, and for that purpose the Governor in Council will have to determine the number of officers that experience may have taught us is likely to be required for the proper performance of the duties of the Department, and will take the officers already there and use their services for that purpose; then if the number is larger, or if an officer holds a higher grade now in the Service than the grade to which he would be allotted were he to go into the Department for the first time, then he would be considered a supernumerary officer of his grade in that Department, thus he will be engaged in the Department with the functions, perhaps, of an officer of a lower grade till he is appointed permanently to the office, or has left the Service, or been removed. When a Deputy is required in a Department, he will have to be selected as ordinary clerks, from the list of those who will be declared, by the Board of Examiners, to have the qualifications of their class. The pay will be that which is now fixed third class clerks, not to exceed the minimum salary of a clerk of that class in proportion to the time he occupies the office, that is to say, the salary being, say, $400 per annum as a minimum, if he is employed only two months it will be a sixth part of that.

42. (2) The temporary and supernumerary clerks so employed shall be paid only out of money voted by Parliament for payment of the contingencies of the Department and division of the Service in which such clerks are employed, or out of money voted by Parliament for the construction of the works upon which they are employed.

The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) having been a Cabinet Minister, will remember that, when persons were required for the examinations of harbors or rivers, or special works of that kind, these persons were chosen from among those experienced in the business, and were paid out of the allowance voted for the work. Then the 43rd clause provides for private secretaries. That makes no change. Private secretaries may receive $500 per annum as such, and may be members of the Civil Service as now. But no private secretary shall be paid $600 unless the amount has been previously voted by Parliament. The 44th clause provides for three weeks' absence of officers during the year. It is customary to give officers working during the year three weeks leave of absence when they have performed their duties well, and it is to be given by the Head of the Department, or Deputy-Head, as the case may be. In case of illness or any other cause, the Governor in Council may grant to any officer or servant of the Department leave of absence not to exceed one year.

Mr. MILLS. Is it intended that a private secretary shall be subject to an examination before he shall be appointed, or may the Minister appoint a private secretary, a member of the Civil Service, without examination?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Bill provides that any member of the Civil Service may be appointed private secretary; but a Minister may, by Order in Council, obtain the appointment of private secretary without his being subjected to an examination. Of course, as the hon. gentleman knows, a private secretary should have the entire confidence of the Minister, and the latter selects him for that purpose, being first assured of his qualifications in other respects; and, therefore, that a private secretary, unless he may be a member of the Civil Service, is not subjected to the examination. The 45th clause provides that the Head of a Department, or, in his absence, the Deputy-Head of a Department, shall have power to suspend from the performance of his duties any officer or servant who shall be guilty of misconduct or negligence in the performance of his duties, and to recall such suspension and allow the suspended officer to return to his duties, but no officer shall receive pay for the time he may have been suspended. We think it better to put such a provision in the law, because, at present, if an officer is suspended for a time influences are brought to bear upon Ministers with a view of having the suspension revoked, as hon. gentlemen no doubt found when they occupied our places. We all know that pressure is brought to bear for the purpose of having his full salary paid to an officer who may have been suspended for three or four days or a week, as the case may be; and under the present law such requests are very difficult to refuse, whilst if such a provision is put in the Bill it will protect the Head of the Department as well as members of the House and others who may be kind enough to make such applications to Ministers. Another provision of this clause is, that in case of neglect of duty or misconduct by a civil servant, the Head of his Department may impose a fine not in any case to exceed one day's pay, and to deduct such fine from his salary. Hon. gentlemen may say that one day's pay is a small fine. In certain cases, in fact, I believe in any case, an officer, whether he be a chief clerk, or in the first, second or third class, will regard a fine of one dollar as almost as severe a punishment as if it were twenty or one hundred dollars, for, no matter how small the fine may be, it is equally a reflection on his conduct, and will give him as much pain as if it were a larger amount. All cases of suspension or fine by the Deputy-Head of the Department will, of course, be reported by him to the Head of the Department. The 46th clause provides that no extra salary or additional remuneration, of any kind whatsoever, shall be paid to any Deputy-Head, officer or servant in the Civil Service, unless such sum shall have been placed in the Estimates submitted to and voted by Parliament, and the name of the person stated. When the duties of any superior officer or clerk are continuously performed by an officer or clerk of an inferior grade during a period of more than three months, the latter may, on the recommendation of the Deputy-Head, concurred in by the Head of the Department, receive, in addition to his ordinary pay, the difference between such pay and the pay of the superior officer, whose duties he has performed. When the absence of the superior officer is not on account of illness, as, for example, if he were called away by important business to the United States, or England, the sum paid to the inferior officer who takes his place shall be deducted from his salary. The 47th clause provides for the retention of the attendance book. As hon. gentlemen probably know, this is not a particularly popular volume in the Civil Service; but, nevertheless, I am sure that the large majority of the officials who perform their duties punctually and well will not object to it, as it is a guarantee, to themselves and every one else, of their attendance in their offices, and the proper fulfilment of their duties. We, therefore, think that it should not be abolished. By the 49th clause it is provided:

That nothing contained in this Act shall prejudicially affect the salary or emoluments of any officer in the Service at the time of the coming into force of this Act, so long as he shall be continued in office, nor shall it affect any salary or emoluments granted by any Act now in force.

Of course we look to provide for the civil servants now enjoying office, and we do not wish to disturb the present staff except to the extent involved in the re-organization of the Departments. By clause 50 it is provided:

That nothing in this Act shall diminish in this way the rights and powers of the Governor General in Council to dismiss any officer or servant.

The 51st clause is an amendment of the Superannuation Act. I shall read it, as I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen will prefer my doing so, in order that they may know exactly what its provisions are:

The superannuation of any civil servant shall be preceded by an enquiry by the Treasury Board.

(a) Whether the person it is proposed to superannuate is eligible within the meaning of the Superannuation Act;

(b) Whether his superannuation will result in benefit to the Service, and is therefore in the public interest; or,

(c) Whether it has become necessary in consequence of his mental or physical infirmity.

2. And no civil servant shall be superannuated unless the Treasury Board reports that he is eligible within the meaning of the Superannuation Act, and that such superannuation will be in the public interest.

3. No person hereafter appointed shall be deemed to have served in the Civil Service of Canada for the purposes of the Superannuation Act, unless such person has been appointed in conformity with the provisions of this Act.

We have here a guarantee that no mistake shall be made with regard to the superannuation of any officer, because previous to the report to Council, and previous to the action of Council, the Treasury Board will have to investigate the position of the officer, and see not only whether he should be superannuated, but whether he has attained the age, and is otherwise in a position to have the benefit of the Act.

Mr. MILLS. Is there any power to add to the time?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; the law in that respect remains as it is. The 52nd clause provides that the Secretary of State shall lay before Parliament, within fifteen days after the opening of the Session, a report of the proceedings of the Board of Examiners; also, within the same period, a return of the names and salaries of all persons appointed to, or promoted in, the Civil Service during the previous year. The Minister of Finance shall also lay before Parliament a return of the superannuations made in the Civil Service during the year, in accordance with the Act. The next two clauses are the repealing clauses, and by the last it is provided that the Act may be cited as the Canada Civil Service Act, 1882. The second schedule of the Bill gives the divisions in figures, but the salaries will have to be filled in afterwards, and I suppose I will have to introduce resolutions to that effect. Having made these explanations, I move for leave to introduce this Bill.

Mr. CASEY. I am very glad to find that this important matter has at last reached the stage of being embodied in a Government Bill. But I am sorry that, so far as I could gather from the expressions of the hon. Minister, this Bill does not embody the great radical principle in the method of appointing civil servants which we expected it would, namely, that of competitive examinations. Do I understand the hon. gentleman aright?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; it is a modified examination.

Mr. CASEY. So far as one can judge, it contains some admirable provisions for securing greater efficiency and better discipline in the Service. But there is one thing which I think should have been done, even before the introduction of this Bill. Certain information has been gathered, and I believe very effectively, by the Civil Service Commission, for the express purpose of enabling us to discuss this question thoroughly, which information, I believe, has been prepared for more than a year, but has not been distributed yet to the members. I hope the hon. Minister will see that the evidence taken at that Commission is laid before us before this Bill comes up for a second reading.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman will find that most of these documents have been laid before the House. The first report was laid before the House, at all events.

Mr. CASEY. But not the evidence.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman may rest assured that the necessary time will be given to Parliament to examine the Bill, and to read the reports that have been made on the subject, before I move the second reading.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

MARITIME COURT OF ONTARIO.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) introduced Bill (No. 37) to amend the Act to establish a Court of Maritime Jurisdiction in the Province of Ontario.

BANK OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise for the purpose of asking leave to introduce a Bill (No. 38) for the relief of the Bank of Prince Edward Island, which I can only do by the unanimous consent of the House. It is a private Bill, for which there is no petition, and yet I am sure the House will, without opposition, allow me to introduce it. It is a Bill for the relief of the Bank of Prince Edward Island. It is known that that bank was obliged to suspend some little time ago. By its charter, which was granted by the Island Legislature, and is similar to our law, a suspension of ninety days operates for a suspension of the charter. The ninety days will expire on the 28th of this month. The bank has, I am happy to say, been able to make satisfactory arrangements with all its depositors, and I believe the directors are on the eve of making arrangements for the successful prosecution of their business, but not within the ninety days. A gentleman who is well known to a great many members of this House, Mr. Lewis Davies, formerly a member of this Parliament, is now in England, as the agent of this bank, for the purpose of making arrangements to enable them to go on with their business, and telegraphs that he is satisfied that he will be able to make those arrangements, but not within the statutory time. Of course, even if this Bill is passed by this House in one day, it will be too late, in consequence of the adjournment of the Senate, as the 28th will have arrived before the Bill can become law. There is, however, a clause in the Bill which provides that it shall have a retroactive effect; and if the Bill is not law at the expiration of the ninety days, it provides that there shall be an extension for ninety days longer. In that respect it is similar to the Act passed by the Canadian Parliament for the relief of the Royal Canadian Bank, in which a special clause was inserted granting an additional ninety days after the passing of the Act. I shall read the Bill, which contains only three clauses:

Whereas, the bank incorporated by the name of 'The President, Directors and Company of the Bank of Prince Edward Island,' by Statute of the Legislature of Prince Edward Island, passed in the eighteenth year of Her Majesty's reign, was compelled by unforeseen losses and difficulties, to suspend payment on the 28th day of November, 1881, and under the provisions of said Act, if such suspension continues for ninety days from that last mentioned, the charter of the bank will be forfeited except only for the purpose of winding up its affairs and business, unless legislative provision be made for its relief; and whereas, it appears that since the said suspension, efforts have been made, and negotiations entered into in England and elsewhere, for the purpose of enabling the bank to resume payment, and it has been satisfactorily shown that there is every reason to believe that such efforts and negotiations will be successful, and that the bank will be able within the period hereinafter mentioned, to resume payment; and whereas, in the interest of the public and more especially of the people of the said Province, it is expedient that the relief prayed for by the said bank be granted: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. The period of ninety days, during which the said bank may resume payment without forfeiture of its charter, is hereby extended for ninety days after the passing of this Act, and if within that period the said bank resumes and continues payment in specie or Dominion notes, its charter shall continue in force as if no such suspension of payment as aforesaid by the bank had occurred.

2. If the said period of ninety days should have expired before the passing of this Act, the effect of the preceding section and provision shall be retroactive, and the charter of the bank shall, on the condition therein mentioned, be, and be held to have been, revived and continued, as if this Act had been passed before the expiration of the said ninety days."

I move, therefore, for leave to bring in this Bill, and that all rules and orders with respect to private Bills be dispensed with for that purpose.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I assume that the Ministry have satisfied themselves that the facts are all correctly stated, and that being the case—speaking for myself, and, I think I may venture to say, speaking for my friends on this side—no objection will be taken to what the hon. gentleman proposes. Of course he is aware—better, perhaps, than any other gentleman here—that this suspension is in danger of becoming a precedent which may be put into effect on occasions when there is not so much to recommend it as in the present instance. Still, I have no doubt that the course the hon. gentleman proposes is the best in the interest of the shareholders, the depositors and the creditors of the bank; and, so far as I am individually concerned, I will be glad to support the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. Minister of Finance is satisfied that the statements made in the preamble of the Bill are correct. There is, in fact, a Government deposit there, and the Government are ready to abide the result with the moral certainty of being paid in full.

Bill introduced and read the first, second and third times, and passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEATS.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT enquired, When is it intended to introduce the Bill for the distribution of seats announced in the Speech?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Bill will be introduced very shortly, and early enough to give hon. members a full opportunity of perusing all its clauses, considering and discussing them.

THE CENSUS.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT enquired, Whether the information laid on the Table on the subject of the Census is all that is available, or that is to be submitted to the House this Session? If not, what further information is it intended to submit, and how soon?

Mr. POPE (Compton). Since the question was placed on the paper, other information has been brought down. Further information will be supplied, but when, it is impossible at present to say.

MONTREAL POST OFFICE.

Mr. COURSOL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause a clock to be placed in the central tower of the Post Office at Montreal; and if so, when the said clock is to be placed in position?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the intention of the Government to cause a clock to be placed in the central tower of the Post Office at Montreal; orders have been given to that effect, and the said clock is shortly to be placed in position.

AGED EMPLOYÉS IN THE MILITIA OFFICES.

Mr. AMYOT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place on half-pay, or grant a pension to those employes in the militia offices discharged by reason of age or infirmity?

Mr. CARON. In reply to the hon. member, I have the honor to inform him that the existing law does not allow the Government to place on half-pay, or grant a pension to those employes in the militia offices discharged by reason of age or infirmity.

MILITARY COLLEGE AT KINGSTON.

Mr. AMYOT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to abolish the Military College at Kingston?

Mr. CARON. In reply to the hon. member, I have the honor to inform him that it is not the intention of the Government to abolish the Military College at Kingston.

MILITARY SCHOOLS FOR THE INFANTRY SERVICE.

Mr. AMYOT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to open, in the principal cities of the Dominion, Military Schools for the infantry service (similar to those in operation about 1863, the success of which was so complete), in order that the infantry battalions may complete their complement of officers and non-commissioned officers, who will first have been enabled to acquire suitable instruction in the military art, and so prevent the active militia from becoming rapidly ineffective?

Mr. MACKENZIE. I object to the question, because it contains statements which are controverted.

Mr. SPEAKER. The first part is not objectionable, but the last part must be withdrawn.

Mr. AMYOT. I have no objection to withdraw the latter part, as it does not meet with general approval, although I thought the fact stated was admitted.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What is the question, as amended?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is: Whether it is the intention of the Government to open, in the principal cities of the Dominion, military schools for the infantry service?

Mr. CARON. I beg to state that it is not the intention of the Government at present to open schools, in the different cities of the Dominion, for the infantry service.

THE CORVETTE CHARYBDIS.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) enquired, (1) Whether it is the intention of the Government to utilize the steam corvette Charybdis as a training ship, as was originally proposed; and if so, when? If not, why not? (2) What has been the entire outlay by Canada in connection with the Charybdis?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I beg leave to say to the hon. member that the best mode of utilizing the steam corvette Charybdis engages the serious attention of the Government. As to the total outlay by Canada in connection with the Charybdis, if the hon. gentleman will move for a return, I will bring it down; or, on this question, I will bring down a return.

THE CLAIM OF JOSEPH CHARLES LISLOIS.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether the Government have taken into consideration, in accordance with the promise by them made, on the 16th March, 1881, the question of paying to Mr. Joseph Charles Lislois, the amount of the losses sustained by him in the destruction by fire of one of his buildings, caused by one of the locomotives of the Government on the Intercolonial Railway? What decision have the Government come to; and if it be adverse, what legal and equitable reasons can prevent a Government from repairing a wrong which the report of the official arbitrator shews to have been really done by them to a private individual?

Mr. MACKENZIE. I object to this question on the same grounds as in the previous case.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question must be, What decision have the Government arrived at in regard to the claimant in question?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I desire to say that the Government have considered the question and have decided that they cannot entertain this claim.

THE TELEGRAPH SYSTEM OF THE DOMINION.

Mr. GAULT enquired, Whether the Government have taken into consideration the propriety of assuming the telegraph system of the Dominion and running it in connection with the Post Office Department, the telegraph system to-day being under the control of foreigners.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The question is open to the same objection. We do not know that the telegraph system is under the control of foreigners.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that the Government has not taken this matter into consideration.

HAGGAS' WATER ELEVATORS.

Mr. WHEELER enquired, Whether the new system of supplying water to locomotives as adopted on the Government Railways in Prince Edward Island and the Canadian Pacific, known as the "Haggas' Water Elevators," is giving as good satisfaction as was claimed for it at the time it was adopted on the above railways.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I desire to say, in answer to the hon. gentleman that the adoption of the Haggas' Water Elevator system on the Prince Edward Island Railway has given the most entire satisfaction, and has proved to be quite equal to what it was represented. So far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned, the portion of the road on which that system has been adopted, is as yet in the hands of the contractors, and I have no knowledge further than that it is perfectly satisfactory.

MUNICIPAL AND LOCAL TAXES.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) enquired, Whether the Government intend, during the present Session of Parliament, to bring in a Bill making Dominion officials liable to pay municipal and local taxes upon their incomes, as is the case with other ratepayers?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government do not intend to propose such a measure.

GOODS FOR THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. KILLAM enquired, Whether any individuals or firms are permitted to import, free of duty, any goods for the use of the Intercolonial Railway; and if so, what are their names?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have to say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that no individuals or firms are permitted to import goods for the Intercolonial Railway free of duty.

MAILS FROM STRATFORD TO CHESLEY.

Mr. GILLIES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to have the mails carried from Stratford to Chesley this season, by the Port Stanley and Lake Huron Railroad; and if so, when?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is not, at present, the intention of the Government to send the mails by that railway.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

Mr. GIROUARD, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 9) concerning marriage with a deceased wife's sister, said: After having seen, as we have to-day, a petition from about three hundred ladies of Montreal, for the repeal of the prohibition of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, we cannot postpone the second reading of this Bill. It is perfectly clear that the passing of this Bill has become a necessity, not only in the interest of the female, but also in the interest of the male sex. This necessity is so manifest that I do not intend to repeat, to-day, the arguments which were made when this Bill was brought forward for the first time in 1880; the discussion then lasted four sittings. Every possible argument for and against the Bill was then advanced, and I would be abusing the indulgence of this House were I to deal with the subject-matter at any length. This House will recollect that on its second reading, this Bill was passed by 120 to 19, and on its third reading by a majority of 75. Finally, when the Bill was brought before the Senate, it occupied several sittings of that body, and there the Bill, after having been thoroughly considered, was not rejected, but its consideration postponed for another year. We have given the members of the Senate, not only one, but two years to consider it and arrive at a conclusion as to the tendency of public opinion regarding it, and what is the result? Do we find that public opinion is against the Bill? On the contrary, it is more in favor of the Bill than ever. So much so, that ladies have thought it necessary to adopt a very unusual proceeding on their part, and ask Parliament to adopt this measure. Since the Session of 1880 it has been constantly before the public. There is hardly a newspaper in the country which has not contained not only numerous correspondence, but also leading articles; and it is a most agreeable fact that not a single newspaper can be quoted against the provisions of this Bill. I do not intend to examine the question from any religious aspect. To-day, as two years ago, theologians are divided and will always be divided, but, I believe, that a large majority of the people of the Dominion are in favor of the measure, and that is the reason why I have the honor to ask the House to pass the second reading. I may add that this Bill has passed the British House of Commons ten or twelve times, and has been defeated in the House of Lords but by a majority of four—I believe in 1877. A similar Bill has become law in all the British Colonies except Canada. It has become law in South Australia, Victoria, Tasmania, New South Wales, Queensland and Western Australia. Since last Session it has passed the Legislature of New Zealand, and has also become law at the Cape of Good Hope. Undoubtedly those colonies but follow the natural law. I have changed a little the wording of the Bill. The first section provides that all laws prohibiting marriage with a deceased wife's sister are hereby repealed. The first Bill provided that hereafter it shall be lawful for a man to marry his deceased wife's sister. I make this change to meet the views of the hon. member for Maskinongé and others of his friends who moved an amendment to that effect. I do not see, really, that it makes much difference whether the prohibition be repealed or the marriage be made lawful; but I make the change to meet the hon. member's views, and secure as many votes as I can. That position in the old Bill which related to the widow's brother has also been left out, to meet the views of another portion of this House, who, to the number of thirty, supported an amendment to that effect. As far as I am personally concerned, I would be glad to see that portion restored. It is only a sentiment, but sentiment must be respected. The second clause is inserted in order to protect vested rights with which we have no desire whatever to interfere.

DRAWBACKS ON GOODS MANUFACTURED FOR EXPORT.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Paterson (South Brant) for a return of all claims presented for drawbacks on goods manufactured for export since January 22nd, 1881, &c.

Mr. CHARLTON. In view of the fact that the Budget Speech will be delivered shortly, and that matters pertaining to the trade policy of the Government will then be fully discussed, I shall not enter to-night into a lengthy discussion of the question under consideration. I shall confine myself to meeting a few of the views presented by the hon.

gentlemen who have spoken upon this question from the opposite side of the Chamber. My hon. friend from South Brant, in the course of his excellent speech, pointed out to the House, in a very forcible manner, the fact that, under the operation of the present Tariff, the export trade of the Dominion in manufactures is steadily decreasing. That, Sir, is a circumstance attending the operation of all protective Tariffs. The effect of high protective duties, when they are levied upon raw materials, is necessarily to diminish the ability of manufacturers to compete in neutral markets with the manufacturers in any country who are not subjected to the payment of duties upon their raw material. For that reason we find that in all protected countries the export trade in manufactures is insignificant. We might point out a good many instances to illustrate this view of the case. I shall confine myself on this occasion to one or two only, and I might cite, and will cite, the instance of the United States. The United States, after having been under the operation of a high protective system for twenty-one years have succeeded in developing, to a limited degree only, exports and manufactures, and I find that for the year 1880 the report of manufactures from the United States, including petroleum, a very large item, and an article in which, from the circumstances, they have a monopoly, and including also manufactured lumber, reached only the sum of $104,000,000 in round numbers. That country, in 1860, after a long period of a revenue Tariff, reached, in the exports of manufactured cottons, $10,930,000. In the year 1880, after twenty years of protection, the export of cotton manufactures from the United States, was $9,880,000, considerably more than $1,000,000 less than it had been twenty years previous; and at no time during the twenty years of the operation of protection in the United States, have the exports of cotton manufactures equalled those in 1860, at the close of the revenue Tariff period. I find that that country in 1880, after twenty years of protection, exported $346,000 of woollen goods. Their exports of woollen goods amounted to two-thirds of 1 cent per head of the population, and their exports of cotton goods to less than 20 cents per head. Their total exports of all manufactures, including petroleum and lumber, amounted to a trifle over $2 per head. Now, Sir, the country, whilst under the operation of this Tariff, taxed itself to an enormous extent. The best Economists in the United States tell us that the domestic productions of the country are enhanced in value to two-thirds the amount of the duty upon the imported article. The average range of duties in the United States is about 36 per cent. If this assumption is true, then the domestic productions of the United States, amounting to some 3,000,000,000 of dollars, are made $720,000,000 dearer to the purchasers of that country than they would be under a different system. This, then, amounts to a tax upon every man, woman and child in the United States, in the enhanced cost of domestic goods, of $18 per head; in other words, in order to secure a position by which they are enabled to export $2 worth per head of manufactures, they pay taxes of $18 per head upon the domestic productions of the country in addition to the tax they pay the Customs revenue. Well, Sir, the industries of that country that have been promoted and fostered for twenty years, are still reluctant to dispense with that protection which they claimed as infant industries twenty years ago, they are still infant industries, and they will ever remain infant industries under the operation of a protective system such as prevails in that country. Certain circumstances lead careful observers to the belief that one thing only prevents the United States from taking its position as the great manufacturing country of the world, and that thing is, its absurd fiscal policy. To-day, one of the great American manufacturing concerns, the Singer Sewing Machine Company, are erecting works, covering forty acres of ground, that are to employ

4,000 operatives and are to produce 3,000,000 sewing machines a year near Glasgow, they have transferred this business to Scotland, because, under the American tariff laws, they cannot prosecute it in the United States and supply the export demand. But for protection they could carry on the business in the United States, and make their three millions of machines annually, and at the same time supply the home market, as at present. This one fact illustrates the position I take—the position that is taken by Economists everywhere—that the Tariff system of the United States alone stands in the way of that great country assuming a position as the foremost manufacturing nation of the world, in place of the position it now holds of exporting, the beggarly amount of $2 per head of manufactures. While the export of manufactures has fallen off in Canada, as it has fallen off in the United States as compared with a revenue Tariff for the period ending in 1880, the Trade and Navigation Returns indicate that our manufacturers have not secured the control even of our own market. It seems that in the year 1881 we imported something over $10,000,000 worth of cotton goods. It seems that in that same year we imported $3,750,000 worth of woollen goods. It seems that in that same year we imported $12,800,000 worth of iron and steel, and their manufactures. It seems that in almost all lines imports are increasing, notwithstanding the adoption of a policy that was to exclude these products from our markets, and give to our manufacturers the control of the Canadian market. Now, Sir, in view of the fact that the imports of goods are increasing in Canada, in view of the fact that the exports of manufactures are diminishing in Canada, I would like to ask, at this stage of my remarks, what was the character of our last Tariff? Was that Tariff, which was supplanted by the present one, a Tariff that operated to the injury of the manufacturing interests of this country? Was it a Tariff under which our manufacturing industries could not be developed? I hold that, on the contrary, it was a Tariff under which the manufacturing industries of Canada had been developed, were developing, and would have gone on developing. I believe that, with the revival of times, with the increase of prosperity, that came from causes entirely beyond our control; that had that Tariff remained in operation up to the present time, our exhibit as a manufacturing people would have been more favorable indeed than it is under the Tariff now in operation. I laid before this House, in 1876, a statement, showing that, notwithstanding the depression that existed in Canada at that time, our manufacturers were in a better position, in a stronger position, were making larger sums on their investments, than were the manufacturers of New England or any other portion of the United States. That statement proved conclusively that, notwithstanding the depression, our manufacturers were in a fairly good position, in a comparatively better position, than the manufacturers of almost any other country. The depression was due, not to the Tariff, but to causes quite outside the Tariff. The depression would have passed away as readily, I believe more readily, without a change of Tariff than with the change of Tariff made by the present Administration. Then, Sir, with reference to the amount of our manufactures, the Census of 1871 shows that we produced in that year $211,000,000 worth of manufactured goods in this country. This is an increase which grew up under a moderate revenue Tariff. I believe that when the Tariff changed, our production of goods was not less than $250,000,000 per annum, and perhaps amounted to $275,000,000. I find, on looking over the field and examining into the various branches of manufactures, that most of our successful manufacturers began with little capital. In the case of one firm—and I take the liberty of mentioning their name, because they appeared before the Depression Committee in 1876—in the case of the Messrs. Gurney it was acknowledged in 1876 that they were worth $750,000. They commenced business, twenty years before, without a dollar and yet they managed to accumulate from their business an average of $37,000 a year besides their living. The Tariff, which allows such an accumulation of wealth in twenty years, the establishment of a great business founded on nothing but the intelligence and energy of the men who founded it, was certainly one which might fairly be claimed as calculated to foster the industries of the country. I find, in looking over the country, and by correspondence with manufacturers, that the great majority of manufacturers in Ontario were men who commenced on very small means; that the great majority were highly successful, and that the majority of them were highly satisfied with the fiscal policy which prevailed before the change of the Tariff three years ago. I find that a great many of these manufacturers to-day are dissatisfied with the present Tariff, and pronounce it worse than the one which preceded it.

Hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes. I will show, in the course of my remarks, that this is true, and that if the duty had been raised in 1876—as I am free to say it should have been—to 20 per cent., it would have been amply satisfactory to the manufacturers of this country, and, with free raw material, would have placed them in, and left them in, a better position than they have since occupied. I believe that if the duty had been raised 2½ per cent. my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper), was all ready and prepared to condemn that increased duty. I think it is a matter of public notoriety that the hon. gentleman made a very sudden and skilful change of base when the Finance Minister of that day disappointed the hon. gentleman's expectations by announcing that the duties would not be raised 2½ per cent. It is claimed that the Reform party are hostile to the manufacturers. Great pains are taken to impress the manufacturers with the belief that the policy of the party represented on this of the Chamber is one hostile to the manufacturing interests of the country. Sir, that is an allegation that I emphatically deny. The Reform party is not hostile to the manufacturing interests of the country; it is not hostile to any great interest of this country. It simply demands that there shall be equitable taxation, that due regard shall be paid to the interest of all classes; that no one interest shall be unjustly promoted to the detriment of other interests. The Reform party is willing to adopt a policy which has been conducive to the prosperity of the manufacturers in the past; which will be conducive to their prosperity in the future; which will be more conducive to their permanent and substantial prosperity than the one which is now in operation. I may say that I think we shall be able to quiet the troubled mind of my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Bowell), as to what our policy is. In the course of his remarks on this question he was very anxious that we should know what we meant—to define our position. We shall be able to define our position. We shall unquestionably define our position during the course of this Session, so that he will comprehend it. He will find it not hostile to any great interest in this country. He will find it calculated to promote all the great industries of this country, the manufacturers among the rest. And, Sir, we declaim most emphatically the allegation which has been made that we are the enemies of that or any other interests in this country. I hold that with a Tariff imposing duties for revenue purposes of 20 per cent., a Tariff permitting the admission of the raw material free of duty, would make the position of every manufacturer of this country, with possibly the exception of the manufacturers of sugar and cotton, better than it is to-day. I hold, Sir, that such a Tariff, while pressing less heavily upon the masses of the people, or extracting less money from their pockets, while yielding all the revenue necessary, would be infinitely better for the manufacturing interests. And the very fact, Mr. Speaker, that a drawback is allowed in some cases upon the exported manufactured article is itself a proof that the present Tariff is burdensome to the manufacturer. If it was not so, why the drawback—why the rebate? It is an admission, Sir, that the articles necessary to the manufacturer in the progress of his business—his raw materials—are taxed by the Government; it means that the cost of the article he produces is enhanced to that extent, and when he attempts to export it and meets his competitors in a neutral market, who are not subject to the same duties, it is necessary, in order to place him on a footing of equality, for the Government to repay to him the sum extracted from him in the shape of duty on the raw material. It is true that our manufacturers are prosperous at the present time; it is true that their prosperity is almost as great as it would have been at the present time, under the old Tariff with the revival which has taken place, but I do not believe that the great mass of the manufacturers are as prosperous as they would have been under the Tariff which was supplanted by the present one. I have some letters from leading manufacturers which explain their views as to the operations of the present Tariff. I have one from a large establishment in my own county, engaged in the manufacture of reapers and mowers, in which they explain the enhanced cost of each machine in consequence of the increased duties imposed by the Tariff. It is as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—Yours of yesterday received asking for details of extra duties over those of 1878 in our manufactures. Below we give them to you, and they are under rather than over the mark. In the construction of our reaper, we use 500 lbs. cast iron, 50 cents; 5 lbs. malleables, additional duties, 24 cents; 32 lbs. spring steel, 13 cents; 16 lbs. machinery steel, 10 cents; and say $1 worth of bolts, 25 cents; 75 lbs. wrought iron, 19 cents; 1 lb. nuts, 1 cent; paints and oils, 4 cents; varnish, 5 cents; coal, 3 cents; wire, 1 cent; knives, 20 cents; total $1.75."

This last sum represents the extra cost to that Company on one reaper as compared with the cost of material under the preceding Tariff. They say that this is within the mark, so that we may take the amount at $2 on each machine, or an aggregate cost upon their business of about $2,000, which they cannot get from their customers, because they have to sell their machines as low as formerly.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). How is it that the manufacturers are selling the machines from 10 to 15 per cent. cheaper than they were under the old Tariff?

Mr. CHARLTON. This manufacturer tells us that he is not making as much on his machines as he did before.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Then the manufacturers are not public robbers,

Mr. CHARLTON. He tells us that they are selling machines at as low a price as they did formerly, while under the Tariff they cost them more, and therefore the Tariff injures them. The question is not whether they are selling machines for more or less, but whether they are making as much under the Tariff as they were before it was adopted. Then we are told that they have control of the Canadian market. They had it before. This letter is from the firm of Green Brothers, of Waterford, Ontario. I have another from Noxon Brothers, of Ingersoll, one of the largest firms in Ontario, which I will take the liberty of reading:

"INGERSOLL, 2nd February, 1882.

"DEAR SIR,—I have your letter of the 27th ult. As nearly as we can estimate, the cost of our goods has been increased from eleven to twelve per cent. by the present Tariff. The cost of labor has not increased; we are not employing the same proportion of skilled mechanics as under the old Tariff; we have taken boys and ordinary laboring men and trained them to do our special kind of work only, and in this way displaced a large number of skilled tradesmen. The men and boys we train in this way never become mechanics in our works, and if put to other employment than the one single thing they have been trained to do, they could perform only the most menial labor. In this way, they making use of a greater number of labor saving machines, we have to some extent counteracted the effect of the Tariff on the cost of producing our goods. Our annual product of goods could be manufactured under the old Tariff from $12,000 to $15,000 less than under the present Tariff."

I have a letter also from a firm in the town of my hon. friend the member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson)—the firm of A. Harris, Son, & Co., in which the writer states that the Tariff is a damage to them of from $5,000 to $7,000 a year in the extra costs of materials. I have a letter to the same effect from the firm of Patterson Brothers, of Patterson, Ontario, which, like all the others, states that the Tariff has increased the price of their raw material and diminished their profits without reducing the price of their goods. If the position taken by these men is true, then the Tariff has not operated to their benefit as manufacturers; and I hold that it will be found that, with the exception of the sugar refiner, the cotton manufacturer and the woollen manufacturer, every manufacturing interest in the Dominion of Canada is placed in a worse position by this Tariff than it occupied under the revenue Tariff which preceded it. We were told by the hon. Minister of Customs that our manufacturers want higher duties. Well, it is certainly not the manufacturers I have alluded to who want higher duties on raw materials. He failed to tell us who wanted higher duties. Is it the Redpaths, who, under the operation of the present Tariff are making hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, and who are able to associate with the Rothschilds and the Vanderbilts? Is it the Valleyfield Cotton Company, who have declared a dividend of 50 per cent. on their capital? Is it those manufacturers who are running full time and are making enormous profits under the operations of this Tariff? I have heard of no others who want higher duties. We were also told by that hon. gentleman that our manufacturers are busy, because the purchasing power of the people is increased. I would like to ask him what would be the condition of affairs if we had a depression, if we had a failure of the harvest, if we had a year such as that of 1876, when we failed by over two millions of dollars in raising our own bread, if we had a period of depression all over the world, affecting the price of the products we sent to foreign countries, would he then be able to congratulate himself on the fact that the manufacturers were driven to fill orders, that the demand for goods was great, and that the people were able to buy freely? No, Sir. Then the condition of things would be as they were during the administration of my hon. friend from Lambton; then rigid economy would have to be practised by the people who were in trouble; and then the manufacturers would have to complain of diminished demand for their goods. The circumstances existing now are entirely different from those which existed during the three or four years previous to their advent to office. They flatter themselves that this is due to their policy. It is nothing of the kind. Have the good harvests been caused by the policy of the Government? Did the policy of the Government cause the depression here, or the depression that existed in the United States? Were the causes that produced that depression, that aggravated it, that continued it for five years, causes within the reach of this Parliament, or of any power in the Dominion of Canada? I hold that they were not. And to what is the revival due? Do hon. gentlemen opposite claim credit for the revival? Do they say that the National Policy has given us better harvests, that it has reached across the ocean and produced bad harvests in England, yielding us higher prices for our productions? Is it the National Policy which has reached across the border, and, in its potent influence, produced a revival of business there, which has re-acted on us. The assertion is absurd—the National Policy has produced none of these results. Well, Sir, there are certain facts on this problem of what has produced the revival, which I may allude to shortly. I find that the net export of cereals and their productions—flour and meal—from Canada from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, amounted to $48,767,000, and that the net export of the same articles in 1879, 1880 and 1881, amounted to $44,978,000; the former being in five years, and the latter in three years. The annual average for the first period is $9,753,000, and for the second period $14,990,000; the average annual excess in the second period over the first being $5,239,000. The excess for the three years since this Government came into power, amounts, therefore, to $15,718,000. For the period extending from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, the export of butter and cheese, the produce of Canada, was $31,860,960; for the three years, 1-79, 1880 and 1881, it was $21,927,109; so that the annual average from 1874 to 1878 was $6,372,193, and for the period between 1879 and 1881 was $7,309,036, being an excess for the latter period over the former of $936,843. I find, Sir, that in animals and their produce, the produce of Canada for the period from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, the exports were of the value of $69,137,804; for the three years 1878, 1879 and 1881, they amounted to $53,068,398, showing an annual average for the first period, of $13,275,560, and for the second period, of $17,698,466, being an annual excess for the latter period, of $3,861,906. I find, Sir, that the exports of agricultural products, the produce of Canada for the period from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, were of the value of $90,686,295, and for the period from 1879 to 1881 inclusive, they were $63,911,119, being an annual average for the first period of $18,137,259, and for the second period of $21,083,706, being an annual excess for the latter period of $2,946,447. I understood the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), in his remarks upon this question, the other day, to make a comparison between the last three years of the period covering the administration of the hon. member for Lambton and the three following years. I do not know whether I misunderstood him or not. He represented the exports of agricultural produce for 1876, 1877 and 1878 to amount to $53,834,000, and that the exports for the following three years were some $16,000,000 less. If I am incorrect I am open to correction.

Mr. HESSON. My remarks are before the House in the Debates. I said that, for 1871, 1872 and 1873, the last years of the administration of Sir John A. Macdonald, the exports of farms products, the produce of Canada, amounted to forty odd millions, as against $53,000,000 during the last few years of the administration of the Mackenzie Government, the difference was some $13,000,000. My object was to show that, although there was a larger export under the administration of Mr. Mackenzie, times were not better in consequence of that fact.

Mr. CHARLTON. I misunderstood the hon. gentleman, as I thought a comparison had been made for a period subsequent to, and not before, the administration of Mr. Mackenzie. However, it will show this: that if the exports for 1871-72-73 fell $16,000,000 short of those of 1876-77-78, that causes were operating at that time that produced the hard times that followed. Short harvests and diminished exports in due time produced their fruits. I find that for the three years 1876-77-78, as has been correctly stated by the hon. member for North Perth, the exports were $53,834,000, or $10,000,000 less than the exports for the years 1878-79-80. With regard to fisheries, the produce of Canada, I find the exports for the five years, from 1874 to 1878, were $26,671,899, while for the three years 1879-80-81 they were $20,876,242, giving an annual average for the first period of $5,337,179, and for the second period $6,792,080, being an annual excess of $1,454,901. I further find on summing up those excesses of export that the average annual excess for the latter period was made up as follows: Net export of cereals, flour and meal, $5,239,425; animals and their products, the produce of Canada, $3,861,906; fisheries, the product of Canada, $1,454,901; being a total of $10,556,232 per annum, or $31,668,695 for the three years. Add to this the fact that in addition of that increase of thirty-one millions odd during the three years I have named our lumber trade with the United States greatly revived, revived to such an extent that our manufacturers last year were receiving for their lumber a higher price in gold than they received during the inflated period of the Civil War, in currency was worth only 40 cents on the dollar; when you add all these facts together you are able to account for the improvement in the times quite clearly and quite satisfactorily, without any reference whatever to the National Policy, or to any other fiscal policy of this or any other Government. My hon. friend from Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton), in the course of his remarks, informed the House that the National Policy had stimulated the export of food. We were told, when the policy was introduced, that it would create a home market for our food; we heard nothing about the policy stimulating the export of food. We did hear that manufactures would spring up on all hands, that our consuming population would be largely increased, that a home market would be furnished for the agricultural products of the Dominion, that we would be no longer under the necessity of exporting food; yet hon. gentlemen to-day tell us that a diametrically opposite result has occurred, namely the stimulation of the export trade in the food products of Canada. How is it about this home market? Under what conditions can a home market be created in a country? Was it reasonable to suppose that when promises were made that the National Policy would result in the creation of a home market for the agricultural surplus of Canada. England has a home market; and why? Because of every $100 worth of textile products manufactured 65 per cent. were exported. She is not prepared to hand over the control of her own market, but she supplies her own wants under the operation of Free Trade, and exports more than one-half of her manufactures. In consequence of being the workshop of the world, she has a home market, and, besides, a market for the surplus productions of other countries. But it is useless to suppose that Canada can secure a home market surplus by supplying its own wants. A country situated as Canada is, with great agricultural resources, can never afford a home market for its own products by simply attempting to manufacture for its own wants. The United States have been endeavoring to secure this home market for twenty years, and with what result. After endeavoring for twenty years to foster their manufacturing industries to such an extent as to create a consuming population that would consume all their food, they exported, in the year 1880, food enough for 25,000,000 people, and Canada exported enough for 1,000,000. The hon. member for Centre Wellington also informed us that the agricultural interests had been benefitted by this policy. In what way? By the creation of this home market which was to absorb all our productions? By the duty upon grain which was to raise the price of grain that much higher? Will any hon. gentleman in this House inform me that the operation of the National Policy, in so far as grain duties are concerned, has conferred any benefit on the farmer? I would like to hear some individual make that assertion. I say no, it has not. In 1878, and a number of years preceding, Canada was presumably a better market for grain than the United States, and a great outcry was raised here against the importation of American grain. In 1878, oats were worth 10 cents and wheat 14 cents more in Toronto than in Chicago. It was clear then that, under the operation of Free Trade, we had a better market for grain than the United States; and at the same time the United States had, for seventeen years, been living under a protective duty on grain. Although they had a protective Tariff they were shipping millions of bushels to Canada, and, under the operation of Free Trade, the Canadian market was better than the American market. Is this the case to-day? Are oats to-day worth 11 cents more and wheat 14 cents more in Toronto than in Chicago? They are not. Since our present policy has been fairly in operation, there has not been a day when grain was not worth more in the American than in the Canadian market. I see a smile spreading over the countenance of my hon. friend for Niagara. If the hon. gentleman would follow—

Mr. PLUMB. Because we do not get protection.

Mr. CHARLTON. Wheat is worth more in Toledo, Detroit, Oswego and Buffalo than in Toronto. There is not a single grain on the list that is not higher in the American market than in the corresponding Canadian market. Such was not the case in 1878, yet we are told that the operation of the present duties is beneficial to the farmer. It is an insult to the farmer to try and palm off such nonsense upon him, which he does not believe.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

THE BUDGET.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker, in moving that you leave the Chair, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means, I desire to make the usual financial statement. I may be permitted, Sir, to say that at no period in the history of Canada has a Government met Parliament with the financial condition of the country in the position it is to-day; at no period in the history of Canada has its credit stood so high as it stands to-day; at no period in the history of Canada, possibly, was the country, generally speaking, as prosperous as or more prosperous than it is to-day; and I propose, Sir, in the statements that I am about to submit to the House, to establish that that prosperity is in a great measure dependent upon the policy of the Government adopted by Parliament. I know, Sir, that, in the estimation of some of my friends opposite, I have undertaken a herculean task.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hon. gentlemen opposite say hear, hear. In view of the predictions of hon. gentlemen opposite in 1879, with reference to this policy—when I am now able to submit, after an experience of less than three years, its results—I trust that I will be able to convince them even, that this policy has had much to do with bringing about the present state of affairs in this country. I regret, Sir, that I was not in the House either on Tuesday or yesterday afternoon (circumstances preventing my being present) to hear the speeches delivered by the hon. members for South Brant and Norfolk. I recollect, last year, that the hon. member for South Brant led up, as on the present occasion, a discussion of the policy of the Government, and the effect of the Tariff, in advance of the statement of the Budget Speech, and I called the hon. gentleman's attention, on that occasion, to the fact that it was not usual to pursue such a course, the hon. member told me we had been so long in bringing down the Budget, six weeks having elapsed, he could wait no longer; yet, on the present occasion, though not a fortnight had elapsed since the opening of Parliament, the hon. member was again to the front anticipating, as on a former occasion, the discussion that usually takes place after the financial statement. Sir, he was followed yesterday by the hon. member for Norfolk on the fiscal policy of the Government. I could not help thinking that the hon. member for Centre Huron may, by-and-bye—when the time arrives so much hoped for by hon. gentlemen opposite, when the present Opposition shall change places with us—find some rivals for the position he formerly occupied; but the hon. members for South Brant and Norfolk—provided they adopt our policy which, as I have stated on previous occasions, is the only course for them to pursue in order to get on this side of the House—will have the advantage of the hon. member for Centre Huron, because they can point to the emphatic, impressive and admirable speeches they delivered some three or four years ago in favor of a protective policy. Sir, the position of the Government, when they introduced what is called the National Policy, was a difficult one, because they had a difficult question to deal with. There was necessarily a great deal of speculation with respect to the effect of the adoption of that policy even in the minds of some of its friends and advocates. There was a question in their minds, as well as in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, whether, if it proved to be a protective policy, we would obtain sufficient revenue; if, on the contrary, it proved to be a revenue Tariff, whether it would give the protection to the industries of the country which was demanded by the people, as evidenced by the elections of 1878; and necessarily we, who had given careful consideration to this matter, had to speculate to a certain extent with respect to its effect. But, Sir, in 1880, the opinions that we had entertained in 1879 were being confirmed by the experience of the nine months. In 1881, they were still stronger, because evidence had accumulated to show that our position was the correct one; and, to-day, we stand in an impregnable position with respect to the results of the Tariff, both for protection and revenue purposes. I recollect very well last Session, when I made my financial statement, that it showed an apparent deficit of $1,500,000, and when I explained that, under the operation of the Tariff, it would have provided just about sufficient to meet the necessary expenditure had we not in the year previous received a large revenue on articles consumed in the year following, hon. gentlemen opposite laughed at that idea, declaring that the plea would not avail, and that the Government had a deficit to announce to the House. But what I stated was the fact. It shows that the producing power of the Tariff, as far as revenue is concerned, was such as to give us, if we had the $700,000 collected in the year previous for goods consumed in the following year, and $500,000 or $600,000 of Excise calculated in the year previous in anticipation of the change of Tariff on goods consumed in the year following, there would not have been a deficit of more than $200,000, showing how accurately and how fully the estimates of the Government were borne out. But, to-day, we stand here not with any doubt as to its revenue-producing power, but with evidence of the last year before us, with the Public Accounts and statements on the Table of the House, showing not only no deficit of even $200,000, but, instead of an estimated surplus of $2,000,000, there is a surplus of $4,132,743 in the Treasury, as the result of its operations. Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the Opposition, in discussing the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne (I regret he is not present, and we all regret the circumstances which render his absence necessary), said, that he could not understand why it was that the Government had asked the people to bear the additional burden of the surplus, unless it was after the manner of the man who was found carrying a heavy rail up a hill, and, when asked why he was doing it, said it was for the pleasure he would enjoy in laying it down. Now, Sir, in this connection permit me to draw a contrast between the effect that was produced by the increase of $3,000,000 taxation imposed by my predecessor, in 1874, and the proposition in 1879. In 1874, my hon. predecessor asked Parliament to give him, in addition to what he could collect from the then existing Tariff, $3,000,000 for the purpose of carrying on the public works, completing the Pacific Railway, and other engagements which the Government was bound to carry out. What was the result upon the revenue? In the year following a response was given in the shape of an increase of something like $2,000,000 paid into the Treasury; but, from 1875 down to 1879, the average amount received from the Tariff then existing was but $12,500,000 per year. Had there been no change in the Tariff in 1879, the receipts from Customs would have been but a little over $12,000,000.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, I will not simply say yes, but will prove it as I proceed. Sir, what caused this? It was caused by the general depression in the country. You may impose a burden upon a man, but unless you give him food and sustenance he will be unable to carry that burden. The hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) imposed burdens on the people, but gave them no food to supply them with strength to carry them. What was the condition of our people at that time? With the prices of all the manufactures and products of the United States at that time exceedingly low, owing to the condition of that country then, the Tariff that he submitted was food and encouragement for the foreigner, but both were denied to our own people. When our people asked the hon. gentleman for bread, he gave them a stone; and the result was that, all over this country, factories were either closed or working at half time.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No; you must prove that too.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, I can prove that also, because I saw some of them closed myself, and hon. gentlemen opposite asked me within a year after why we had not re-opened them. Men were without employment, knocking at the doors of Parliament, knocking at the doors of the Department of Public Works, asking for employment, and none could be got. It could not be expected, under these circumstances, that men could respond to the requirements of the hon. gentleman's Tariff; for if they had not the means they could not buy either the products of Canada or the imports from other countries. The result was that, instead of obtaining an increase to the revenue, the revenue fell to what it was in 1874 before the increases were made, and the people refused to bear the burden that was imposed upon them. How was it in 1879? We asked parliament to give us such changes in the Tariff as would not only protect the industries of the country, but give us an increased revenue. Was there a response? I stated at the outset that the response was ample provided the money had been paid in for the year 1879 that belonged to that year. And in the year that followed, what was the response? They gave us a surplus of four million dollars and upwards, because we found employment for the people; because, by obtaining for them employment and higher wages, they were able to buy more than formerly. Men who owned bank stock had greater value in it than in 1878-79; men who had tenements unoccupied in 1878-79, had tenants for their houses, and the additional revenue thus received on all hands enabled them to buy more than in previous years. Men who were formerly working at half time and on low wages received higher wages and were working over-time. Farmers who had low prices and found sales difficult received high prices and prompt cash sales. The result was that, while we estimated the capacity of our people to contribute, during the year, $17,000,000 for Customs to the Treasury, they paid in, voluntarily—because it was to a great extent voluntarily—$18,500,000. I say voluntarily, because, of the increases of last year over the previous year, $778,000 was paid in luxuries, such as wines, spirits, silks and satins, and articles of that kind. That indicates very clearly that the people had the means, and having the means they contributed more in that way than before. In the finer description of woollen goods, for instance, which are not manufactured in Canada, they contributed $400,000 more to the Treasury than last year. In the article of cottons, which pay 20 per cent., they contributed $300,000 more than in the year before. All this shows an increased purchasing power on the part of the people. We under-estimated their improved condition when we estimated that they would only contribute $17,000,000; they contributed $18,500,000. One important feature in this connection is, that though we expended for Public Works $8,150,000 during that year, and redeemed about $2,000,000 existing liabilities, bearing 6 per cent., the surplus of over $4,000,000, with the amount of deposits in the savings banks of the Dominion, $4,750,000, enabled us to meet these payments chargeable to capital, and still our interest account was less by $90,000 than the year before. But I qualify that in this way: we paid $90,000 less interest than the year previous; but, if we take the statement of the interest that was due for the year, and count it as all paid—though it was not all paid within the year—there would be still $25,000 less interest than in the year previous, notwithstanding the increase of the expenditure on debt account. Now, it has been said that this surplus was an unnecessary burden on the people, that it ought not to have been imposed; but gentlemen who hold that view, and say that it is unwise to have a surplus of three or four million dollars, have, at the same time, stated that the United States are paying off their debt at the rate of $100,000,000 per year and commend them for so doing; and assert that, unless we look carefully after our affairs, we will be subjected to burdens which, in view of the fact that their debt will speedily be wiped out, and they will have little or no taxation, will place us at a great disadvantage with them. Well, Sir, I cannot quite see, if it is desirable, in the opinion of those gentlemen, that there should be a surplus in the United States for the purpose of paying off their debt, that it is objectionable on the part of the Dominion of Canada to have a surplus, especially when it is collected under the circumstances to which I refer. Sir, it is customary, I find, with our friends opposite, when addressing either their own constituents or other constituencies in different parts of the Dominion of Canada, to refer to the present state of things as alone the result of large exports during the last two or three years, and if I am rightly informed, the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) stated that the present condition of affairs in Canada was not the result of the National Policy, but it was the result of large exports and a large receipt of gold coming into the country. Well, Sir, I find that that hon. gentleman and other hon. members, when they are speaking of the condition of the country, or when they are speaking of the position of the late Government and of the present Government with reference to their expenditure, are very apt to select one particular period against another period; one particular year, for instance, during the administration of the hon. gentleman opposite against a particular year of the present Administration. So, in the case to which I am now referring, the hon. member refers to the exports during the past year, 1881, and he says that the present condition of the country is to be attributed to that large export. Would it not be well, Mr. Speaker, for hon. gentlemen opposite, when they are making a comparison between the condition of the country under the two Governments, and embracing different periods, that they should select the whole period; for instance, that they should select the five years during which our hon. friends were in power and the two or three years during which the present Government have been in power, rather than select one particular year. It might not be convenient for the hon. member to do so; but I have had made up a statement to show that the present state of the country cannot be the result of largely-increased exports of the products of Canada.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will read them, and then I will challenge the hon. member to show that they are not correct. In 1874, the exports of Canadian products, including Canadian manufactures, were $73,926,748; in 1875, they were $67,490,893; in 1876, $69,861,849; in 1877, $65,864,880; in 1878, $65,740,134; or an average for the five years of $68,576,901. In 1879, they were $60,089,578; in 1880, $70,096,191; in 1881, $80,921,379; making an average, for the three years, of $70,369,049, an increase per annum of $1,792,148. Now, Sir, the present state of affairs is not dependent upon the exports alone of the products of Canada—considering the average population during that period, and the average population during the past three years—he will find that the then state of the country as compared with the present, or the present condition of the country as compared with its condition then, is not due entirely, as he claims it is to that cause or to causes quite outside the National Policy. I call his attention to that, because it is of importance to show that during the five years that our friends opposite were in power, the value of the exports, being products of Canada, was but $1,700,000 a year less, with a smaller population, than it was during the three years the present Administration have been in power. Moreover, hon. gentlemen very often take up the expenditure of 1877-78, by the late Government, and they compare it with the expenditure of last year, and then point to it as an evidence of the extravagance of this extravagant Government. Sir, I am prepared to show, from the data I have before me, that, if the hon. gentlemen opposite had collected from Customs, Excise and Stamp Duty, money enough to pay their expenditure, and if the present Administration had collected simply money enough to pay theirs, that upon the average population of the five years they were in power, and the three years we have been in office, the figures show that 23 cents per head less would have been collected from the people of Canada, during the last three years, than during the five years that my friends opposite were in power. I have the figures here, and I will give you the data on which they are made up. There were collected from Customs, Excise and Stamps, in 1874-75, $20,664,878.96; in 1875-76, $18,614,415.02; in 1876-77, $17,697,924.82; in 1877-78, $17,841,938.19; in 1878-79, $18,476,613.35; making a total of $93,295,770.34. The deficits during the five years were $5,491,269.51. If the deficits had been collected and added to the sums above, it would have amounted to $98,787,039.85. The average for the five years was $19,757,407.97. The average population for this period being 4,050,674, the per capita tax during that period was $4.88 per head. These are the figures and these are the results. There were collected, from Customs, Excise and Stamps, in 1879-80, $18,479,576.44; for 1880-81, $23,942,138.95, making a total of $42,421,715.39. Deducting the surplus for the two years, $2,589,515.36, leaves $39,832,200.03. The average for the two years of taxation was $19,916,100.01, being, on a population of 4,282,360, $4.65 per head during the last two years, as against $4.88 during the other period. Now, Sir, it may be said but you collected more. We admit it; we collected $2,900,000 in the two years more than was required for the expenditure. That was the surplus for the two years, and having been used in the reduction of the debt, diminished our taxation for all time to come. If any hon. gentleman on the opposite side should object to this it should not be the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), because, in a speech he made in the West not long since, he justified the collection from the people during the hard times of less than was required, and he said it was a proper thing to collect less because, when the times became better, they would collect more to make it up, and that is exactly what we have been doing. It is a very common thing to state—I have heard it stated in my own presence by a gentleman whom I am happy to see present, that the expenditure of the country has enormously increased within the last two or three years. I have shown that the taxation has not increased, because we require 23 cents per head less than before. But, of course, the expenditure has increased. How could it be otherwise? If we compare the average expenditure of 1874-79 and 1880-81, with the average expenditure for the five years previous—we find that our average annual expenditure—is $1,229,372 in excess of the average annual expenditure of our predecessors. I admit that fact; there is no denying it. It is a matter of record, and I do not wish to deny it. But what becomes necessary to do now is, to show how this increased annual expenditure of $1,229,372 was incurred, to compare the expenditure of the previous years with that of the last two years, and show that the present Government has been more economical than its predecessors by at least $1,000,000 per year. Now, what do we find? We find that, from the 1st July, 1874, to the 1st July, 1879, the expenditure was $119,679,284, or an average of $23,935,856 per annum. From the 1st July, 1879, to the 1st July, 1881, the expenditure was $50,356,866, or an average annual expenditure of $25,178,443, the difference in their favor being, as I have already stated, $1,229,372. And for what purposes were these expenditures made? In the first place, we find, that in 1879-80 and 1880-81, we worked an average of 401 miles of railway more than hon. gentlemen opposite worked when they were in office. These 401 miles of railway involved an expenditure of $802,000 in excess of the expenditure for the like service performed by our predecessors.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Where were these 401 miles of railway?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have the figures from a return furnished me by the Department of Railways showing that 401 miles were worked during 1881, over and above the average worked by hon. gentlemen opposite. These figures are furnished in a return from the Department giving the different roads, and I am satisfied it is reliable. I will give the figures in detail if hon. gentlemen want them. The average amount of interest paid on the debt during 1879-80 and 1880-81, was $7,648,006, against an average interest paid by our predecessors in 1874-75 of $6,806,507, making an increase in the average payment of interest during the two years to which I refer, since the present Government came into power, of $87,499. The increase in the sinking fund during the same period, over the average paid by hon. gentlemen opposite, was $353,457. This was a practical reduction of debt by that amount. Then take the average increase of expenditure for Indians, and for the management of lands in the North-West, as compared with the expenditure for these services from 1874 to 1879, and we find that we have added, on account of these items, the sum of $235,042. Take next the exceptional appropriations made by Parliament last year, averaging $58,500, for the relief of the sufferers by fires in Hull and Quebec, and the relief of our Irish fellow-countrymen, and the increased expenditure for the Census over their average, amounting to $56,079, and we have the following result—an increased expenditure altogether of $2,382,617, which hon. gentlemen opposite were not called upon to make, against an average increase of $1,229,372, or a difference of $1,153,245 in favor of the present Administration. If I add to that the $190,000 expended in the establishment of post offices in the North-West and British Columbia, and in the Post Office service generally, for which we have added nothing to the taxation of the people—because the difference between receipts and expenditure in the Post Office is less during the last two years—it would amount to $1,343,000. We have, then, an answer to the question which has been asked by the leader of the Opposition, how it was that in a speech I made in August, 1878, I stated that I believed that $22,500,000 would have been sufficient to pay the expenditures of the country during the five years the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power? If you deduct the amount I have mentioned from their average expenditure during the five years of their Administration—of $23,900,000—we have just about $22,500,000. In other words, deducting those expenditures, it will be seen that I was justified in making the statement to which the hon. gentleman alluded, because it is on that basis that we are carrying on the business of the country to-day. It is just as well that the whole truth should be known in reference to this matter, and while we, on both sides of the House, may be addressing public meetings, in different parts of the country, we may not often have the opportunity of meeting each other face to face as we do here in Parliament. It gave me great satisfaction to have my hon. friend opposite on the platform with me in West Northumberland, and I felt it an advantage—considering the position we occupy with reference to the financial position and the expenditure of the country—to have my opponent within reach, where he could make his statement, and I mine, and then leave the country, or those who were present, to decide who was right and who was wrong. It is desirable that we should meet our constituents and the people generally on all suitable occasions, but it is not always convenient for both parties to be present at the same time. Sometimes there is not sufficient time in an afternoon, and I admit that sometimes it is difficult to arrange that both sides should be heard on the same evening; and again, previous engagements may prevent; but, at the same time, it would be more satisfactory to the people who listen to those statements if they could hear, on the same occasion, the statements made by both parties—the one in opposition to the Government and the other in its defence. But here, we have the satisfaction of knowing that the hon. gentlemen opposite—gentlemen who are thoroughly posted in every weak point in the armour of the Government, who are ready to insert a lance if the opportunity occurs—are present to hear our statements, and that we can each present our claims in the presence of the other. It will be for the public to decide, after these discussions are over, who are most worthy of their confidence. I know, Sir, that it has been said, and said truly, so far as the figures are concerned, that the expenditure of 1878 was something like $23,500,000, while the expenditure of 1881 was $25,500,000—public attention has been called to this fact—and therefore it is that I now point to statements taken from the Public Accounts, of the receipts from Customs and Excise during the periods I have named, to the facts as they appear upon record, to show that not only have the present Administration taxed the people for the necessary expenses of the country less than our predecessors did, but that we have absolutely spent, for the services performed by them, more than a million dollars per annum less than they did. It may be of some importance, as I have already referred to the expenditures for postal service, to call the attention of the House to the details. From 1875 to 1879, the expenditure for this service averaged $1,709,375, and the receipts for the same period averaged $1,149,423, leaving an annual deficit of $559,952. From 1879 to 1881 the expenditure averaged $1,847,505, and the receipts $1,302,303, leaving an annual deficit of $545,202. That shows an average increased expenditure of $138,130 a year, with increased accommodation to the North-West, British Columbia, and various parts of the outlying portions of the Dominion, as well as increased postal facilities to the central and more populous portions, and an average increased revenue of $152,880, or a reduction of the deficit to the extent of $14,750 a year. Now, Sir, it may be well to call the attention of the House to one or two other facts, to show why it is that we have been able to keep the taxation of the people lower than it was during the time our friends opposite were in power. In connection with this, I desire to call the attention of the House to returns with reference to the working of the railways. From July, 1874, to July, 1879, the working expenses per mile of the Intercolonial Railway—and I have this return from Mr. Tims, the accountant—were, on the average, $2,659, and from July, 1879, to July, 1881, $1,987, or a difference of $671 per mile. The average receipts per mile for the five years, from the 1st July, 1874, to the 1st July, 1879, were $1,760, and for the two years, from the 1st July, 1879, to the 1st July, 1881, $1,930, or an increase in the income of $170 per mile, and a reduction in the expenditure of $671 per mile. The average mileage expenditure of the Prince Edward Island Railway, from July, 1875, to July, 1879, was $1,129, and from July, 1879, to July, 1881, $926, being a decrease in the working expenses of $203 per mile. The average receipts per mile for the four years, from July, 1875, to July, 1879, were $649, and for the two years, from July, 1879, to July 1881, $617, being a decrease in the mileage receipts of $32, against a decrease in the expenditure of $203 per mile. That I give, Sir, as one of the items of reduction in our expenditure which left us such a margin that it enabled us to incur increased expenditure, and at the same time to diminish the taxation. There has been another statement put forward calculated very much to discourage and dishearten the people of Canada, and at the same time to injure the Government; that is, that the debt of the Dominion of Canada is increasing in a greater ratio than its wealth and its population, and that, looking to the future, there is not a bright outlook for us financially when the Pacific Railway is completed, and all existing engagements fully carried out. Now, Sir, I think it is important, in the interests of the country, that the people should quite understand there is no foundation for the alarm thus attempted to be created. I say, Mr. Speaker, that looking at the debt as it is to-day, looking at the position of the debt three years ago, looking at the liabilities of Canada when this Union was formed, and looking at the liabilities that are ahead of us in connection with the completion of the Pacific Railway, I have risen from the investigation of this matter with the conviction strongly fixed in my mind that there is no reason whatever for alarm. But that there is the greatest ground for hope and encouragement. It is a fact known to many members of this House that when the four Provinces which originally composed this Union came together in Confederation, the then existing debt of Canada averaged $29 per head, based upon the Census returns of 1861. $25 a head was at that time assumed by the Dominion of Canada, with the exception of New Brunswick, which, under special circumstances, received consideration to the extent of $2.50 more. We know perfectly well that that did not pay all the debt of Ontario and Quebec. It left a debt equal to $4 a head, which was subsequently, in 1873, assumed by the Dominion. Therefore, there existed at that time a debt, taking the population of 1861, of $29 a head for every man, woman and child in the Provinces which in 1867 constituted Canada. Then there was the obligation, which became part and parcel of the Constitution—an obligation which has since been fulfilled—to construct the Intercolonial Railway; and the construction of that railway added $6 a head to the debt, over and above the $29 that existed at the time of the Union, making the debt practically $35 a head. In 1878–79 the net debt of the Dominion of Canada was but $31 per head of the population. At the present moment it is something like $35 per head of the population. Let us see what it will be in 1879, the net debt, as shown by the Accounts, was $147,481,070; in 1881 it was $155,395,680. Then our engagements from the 1st July last, for the completion of the Pacific Railway, including the $25,000,000 to be paid to the Syndicate, the $13,500,000 to be expended by the Government in the completion of the sections now under contract, canal expenditure; say $6,000,000, and other expenditure chargeable to capital, say $3,500,000, will make the total $203,397,680. But between this and 1890 the amount that is to be paid into the sinking fund, and which forms part of our annual charges upon the consolidated revenue, will average $1,500,000 a year for the next nine years. That will give, for the reduction of the debt, $13,500,000. Then the surplus for the nine years—

An hon. MEMBER. Oh!

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. An hon. member says Oh! but when we have $4,500,000 assured for this year, when there is no doubt, after the reduction that we propose to make, that there will be a surplus of $3,000,000 for the next year, it is not, I think, asking too much for the hon. gentleman to accept as reasonable a surplus of $1,000,000 a year, for the remaining seven years of the nine, commencing on the 1st July last, that would make $14,500,000 and would, with the sinking fund, reduce the net debt to $175,897,680. But if we estimate the increase of population at but 18 per cent. only during the ten years the increase of the last decade, the result will be that, taking the population at that period and the debt as stated, the net debt then will be $34.27 per head. If we have any extraordinary increase of our population (which I think it is but right to expect we will, but which I have not estimated for here) it will be ample to meet, at any rate, any extraordinary expenditure that may be made chargeable to the debt which we are not anticipating at the present moment. But, more than that, if the 150,000,000 acres of arable land that will be the property of the Government after handing over to the Syndicate 25,000,000 of acres, and which is now established as fit for settlement, yields but $1 an acre for half of it (the other half being offered as a free gift to settlers), it will meet the whole expenditure of the Government on the Pacific Railway, and in the North-West, down to 1890. If that be the case, then our debt, which certainly is not alarming, provided we realize from these lands the sum that I have stated, would only be about $100,000,000, instead of $175,000,000, or less than twenty dollars per head. Under these circumstances, Sir, I think there is no great cause for alarm as far as the taxation of the people is concerned, growing out of the increase of the debt. Then there is another mode of dealing with this question, and that is the interest we have to pay. We paid per head of the population :

In 1874.....	1 31½
In 1878-79.....	1 56½
In 1881.....	1 57½

In 1890, estimating the net debt at $175,897,680, and the population based on an increase of 18 per cent. for the ten years—taking into account the fact that the whole debt of the Dominion of Canada will then bear but 4 per cent., instead of the interest we are paying now—taking that into account, and placing the interest on the debt at $7,000,000 per annum the interest per head of the population at that time would be at most $1.37 against $1.57½ at the present day, and this estimate does not take into account the probable reduction of debt by the sales of lands. This, Sir, I think, is an encouraging feature in connection with the future taxation of the people of Canada. We now come to the estimated expenditure for the current year. I submit for the consideration of the House, an amended estimate of the receipts of the current year :

Customs.....	$20,500,000
Excise.....	5,600,000
Post Office.....	1,400,000
Public Works, Canals and Railways.....	2,460,000
Interest on Investments.....	750,000
Miscellaneous.....	900,000
Bill Stamps.....	100,000
Total.....	$31,710,000 and an expenditure of $27,250,000, showing a surplus of $4,460,000 for the current year. I laid upon the Table of the House, yesterday, a supplementary estimate for the present year, involving an increased expenditure, chargeable to consolidated revenue, of something like $1,000,000. That is composed of the following items: Indians, $327,189, (I need scarcely enter upon any explanation with reference to the circumstances under which this additional expenditure was made necessary for the current year. It was referred to by the right hon. the leader of the Government in the remarks that he made on the Address in reply to the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition.) The next item is working expenses of railways, $312,000. That is not an increased tax upon the people. It is an increased expenditure rendered necessary, I am happy to say, by the increased business of the railways; and I am also happy to be able to state that they are yielding a revenue equivalent to the increased expenditure, and, therefore, though it adds to the nominal sum of the expenditure of the year, it adds nothing whatever to the taxation of the year. Then we come to the immigration expenses, $28,000. This is an item that was formerly borne by the Government of Ontario, under an arrangement made with that Government, that they would bear two-thirds of the expenses of immigrants settling in that Province and coming by way of Quebec. They decline now to continue that arrangement, and we have to ask the House for $28,000, to pay the expenses thus incurred. The increased expenditure for the Post Office, is something like $75,000, but, as I explained before, it gives an increased revenue. Public Works, income and maintenance and repairs, show an increase of, in one, $98,336, and the other, $29,000, owing to increased expenditure in the maintenance of canals, in keeping them up and having them in efficient order and condition.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Can the hon. gentleman give the canals separate from the railways ?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. On Public Works for income is charged $98,366; for maintenance and repairs, $29,000; Mounted Police, $90,000. This was also referred to by the hon. leader of the Government in the speech he made in answer to the hon. the leader of the Opposition. It is for the proposed increase of the force; $90,000 is to be expended during the present year, because a portion of the force will be furnished with their outfit and sent there immediately. The expenditure this year is, therefore, larger in proportion for the time they will be on duty than that for next year. The engagements falling due for the year 1881-82, not chargeable to Consolidated Revenue, may be stated as follows: Redemption of the Debt, $2,758,880; Railways and Canals, $9,500,000, Surveys of Lands in the North-West, $400,000, making altogether $12,658,880. We purpose meeting this in the following way: Surplus for the year, $4,460,000; deposits in Government Savings Banks, in excess of payments, $4,500,000; in banks, to the credit of the Receiver General at call, $5,300,000, out of which we can take the remaining $4,000,000. This makes $12,960,000, without borrowing one dollar on Bonds or Debentures. Before I take up the expenditure of the next year, it will be convenient for me to give some idea of the proposed changes in the Tariff during this Session. I think it best to do so before I enter upon the estimated receipts and expenditures of next year. The following are the proposed changes in the Tariff. The resolutions are differently worded, but I have placed them in this form so that hon. members may understand exactly the effect of the resolutions. It is proposed to place upon the free list, taking them alphabetically, anatomical preparations; they were free previously to 1879, now they are restored to the free list; bees, brass in sheets; Britannia metals in pigs and bars, celluloid in sheets. Celluloid, is an imitation ivory used by cabinet makers and organ builders. It now pays 20 per cent. China clay. Chloralum as a disinfectant is a most valuable article, and used extensively by rich and poor, it has been thought desirable to place it on the free list. Coffee, green (except by Act 42 Victoria, chapter 15), free; fowls for improving stock; iron, sand or globules and dry putty for polishing granite. Quinine. This has been done in deference to the wishes of our hon. friends opposite. Quicksilver; spelter in blocks and pigs; tea, (except as provided in Act 42 Victoria, chapter 15). (Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it would be as well, while I am on the tea question, to say a word or two with reference to some criticism that has been passed upon the course the Government took in announcing in advance that Parliament would be asked to remove this duty. It will be remembered by the House, that, when last Session the hon. leader of the Opposition presented resolutions for their consideration, proposing a reduction of taxation, I rose in my place and on behalf of the Government, stated the reasons why, at that time, we did not feel ourselves in a position to ask Parliament to reduce taxation. We stated that it was uncertain, what effect this policy would have, although it had shown that it was a revenue-producing Tariff up to that period. Still, there was some uncertainty as to the effects it would have when the new industries being established were in full operation. What was more important, I also stated that there had been petitions sent to Congress from Massachusetts, from Maine, and from New York, asking them to appoint a Commission to confer with a Commission to be appointed by the Imperial Government, to consider the question of reciprocity, that under these circumstances, it was not desirable to remove any duties then collected, as by such an arrangement we would lose $1,000,000 revenue, at least, on natural products. If no arrangements were made with the United States by which this revenue would be interfered with, I stated that on the re-assembling of Parliament I would ask the representatives of the people to remove two items of taxation, namely, the duties on tea and coffee. In 1872, without any notice to the public, with a duty on tea 50 per cent. higher than at present, and when tea dealers were found with large stocks on hand duty-paid applications were made to the Government to refund it, which, under the circumstances, the Government then consented to do. At the present time, it would be exceedingly difficult to adopt that principle, particularly as we have a differential duty on tea coming from the United States. It would have been exceedingly difficult to decide as to its value, and whether it was American importation or not. The Government, therefore, decided, unless there were stronger reasons than we could then see, we would not take the course we did in 1872. And to diminish the difficulty what did we do? When visiting the Maritime Provinces in July, with other members of the Government as well, I declared distinctly what we stated in Parliament, that we intended, among other things, to ask Parliament to take the duty off tea and coffee. And we made this statement so that every dealer in the country would be on the alert. We did not want the revenue; we did not wish any man to lose by a reduction in the Tariff on these articles; and we did not wish to be subjected to the embarrassment that occurred in 1872; so we repeated what we said in Parliament, thus putting every man on his guard. Proceeding with the changes in the Tariff, we also propose to place on the free list tin in blocks, pigs, bars and sheets. That means a reduction of $100,000 of revenue at least. It is true, on the tins used for the fisheries and exported, the parties now obtain a drawback, but that is attended with considerable difficulty. There is a growing industry in this country—the canning industry—this covers canned fish, fruits and vegetables, the removal of this duty will be a relief to the agricultural and fishing industries. Woods—African teak, blackheart ebony, lignum vitæ, red cedar and satinwood—we propose, also, to place on the free list. This will meet the case of some industries in the country which use them and have to pay duty on them. The following duties are changed: Bookbinders' tools and implements, from 15 per cent. to 10 per cent. Common and colorless window glass, now 20 per cent., we propose to raise to 30 per cent. The late Finance Minister will be glad to hear this proposition, because one of the glass factories is located in a section of the country in which he is interested.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No; no.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Scrap iron, now paying $2 per ton we propose to reduce to $1. The question of the iron duties has been pressed upon the Government. The iron industry is an important one no doubt; but at this moment we are not prepared to submit any further proposition regarding it, and I can only say, in addition, with reference to it, that the subject is for the present under consideration. We, therefore, make no change except that I have named. The further proposals we make are:—Lead manufactures, from 25, to 30 per cent.; sand paper, from 20, to 25 per cent.; ships hulls, when containing machinery, to remain 10 per cent.; but the machinery in the hulls to be 25 per cent. This is because we found that under the old arrangement there was really an inducement to people to go to the United States and build a vessel and put in her machinery there, for they could be both brought in at 10 per cent., while machinery brought in separately was subject to a duty of 25 per cent. To spirits and strong waters mixed, now paying $1.90, 20 per cent. is to be added. I think this was an omission in the past, because we find, from observation, that the fluid extracts imported into the country only pay 12½ per cent., while those who manufacture them in the country have to pay $1.90 for alcohol used in their manufactory and have no protection whatever. On bags containing salt we propose a duty of 25 per cent. At present bags, in which fine salt is imported, pay no duty whatever; but the manufacturer of fine salt in the Dominion of Canada, if he purchases the cotton bag, has to pay the duty upon it, whatever it may be. Clock springs, now 35 per cent., are to be reduced to 10 per cent. Cotton seed, now 20 per cent. is to be 10 cents per bushel. Fireworks are to be at 25 per cent. Wrought iron tubing, one and three-quarter inch and upwards, is to be reduced from 25 per cent. to 15 per cent. Mustard cake is to be 20 per cent. Paraffin wax or stearine will be placed at 3 cents per pound instead of at an ad valorem duty. It has been difficult to arrive at a fair and just valuation, and it is because of that that this change is proposed. Rice, unhulled or paddy, is to be placed at 17½ per cent. This is for the purpose of fostering—and it is likely to do it, because there are a number of steamers now chartered—a direct trade between the Dominion of Canada and the East Indies. Besides, there is being erected in Montreal mills where we will obtain a better article at a lower price. The Customs officials have found great difficulty in fixing the value of different kinds of fruit trees imported. To overcome these difficulties we propose specific duties in lieu of ad valorem duties as follows: On apple trees, 2½ cents; pear, 4 cents; plum, 5 cents; cherry, 4 cents; quince, 2½ cents; grape vines, 4 cents. Silk plush or netting for gloves to be 15 per cent; harness and leather dressing will be placed under the head of blacking at 25 per cent; belts and trusses will come under the head of braces and suspenders. Kentucky jeans are to pay cotton duty. This is because efforts have been made to enter articles of cotton under the head of Kentucky jeans. Knitted cotton cloth we propose shall pay 30 per cent.; black and bleached cotton, three and six cords only, 12½ per cent. Tarpaulins coated with oil paint or tar, and cotton bags, made up by the use of the needle, to pay 30 per cent. A question has arisen in the Department as to what duty shall be imposed upon furs when in certain conditions of dressing. We now propose to add the words "wholly or partially dressed" after the word furs, to meet that difficulty. Bolsters and pillows have been entered at a lower rate of duty than mattresses. We propose now that the duty on bolsters and pillows shall be the same as upon mattresses. Glass (pressed or moulded) tableware is to be added to the 30 per cent. list. Under the head of paints, the duty on orange mineral, dry, which is much the same article as dry white lead, is to be reduced to 5 per cent. We also propose to add to the list of varnishes, lacquers, Japan and collodium. These changes involve a reduction in taxation, under head of Customs, of $1,000,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, I may say here a few words with reference to the proposed changes affecting the receipts from Excise. It will be remembered that a change was made with reference to the mode of dealing with home-grown tobacco. It required that all parties raising tobacco should have authority from a Government official to do so, but we now propose to remove that restriction, and that all parties shall have the opportunity, and as openly and as freely without license, to raise tobacco, as they have to raise potatoes as far as Government restrictions are concerned. It is proposed, however, to leave the amount which is collected for twist the same as it now is, and to license parties in different parts of the country, without the payment of any fee, to buy from the producers of tobacco anywhere and everywhere, whatever surplus they may have for sale, and such parties will sell to the individuals who have the licenses to manufacture. We propose that for the next two years, instead of 14 cents, as now levied, per pound, 8 cents per pound shall be levied on all tobacco which is grown in the Dominion of Canada, and for the two years following, 10 cents per pound. This change will probably affect the revenue, although we cannot pronounce exactly on this point—$50,000 the first year; after that the reduction will probably range from $50,000 to $75,000 a year. Then there is another question which has been brought under the consideration of the Government, by the commercial men and bankers of Canada. I refer to the legislation requiring stamps on notes and bills of exchange. In the preparation of this Tariff no special consideration was given to those who are engaged in business except in the way of increased business, and the prompt payment of accounts. We propose to relieve this class of the community of this duty, which has given a revenue of $200,000 a year. And further, the Government have decided to ask Parliament, in the Supplementary Estimates, for $150,000 to be distributed in the shape of a bounty to the fishermen of the Dominion of Canada in lieu of the interest on the Fishery Award. This subject, Sir, has been a difficult one, because pressure has been brought to bear by some of the local governments for the payment of the amount of the Fishery Award to them; but a vote—and a very large vote—of Parliament declared that this should not be done. In consideration, however, of the competition and interference of the Americans with our own fishermen, it has been considered desirable to give a tonnage bounty to every vessel engaged in the fisheries, and also a certain sum to every boat which is employed in the fisheries and which is licensed for that purpose. And while this will encourage the fishermen of the Dominion and extend our fishing operations—an important industry, the exports of which amount to over $6,000,000 a year—it is expected that it will increase the building of a certain class of vessels in the Dominion of Canada, such as are to be found in Massachusetts, and constructed especially for this branch of business. Our people go there now, as they have gone every year since the passage of the Washington Treaty, as well as before that treaty was in existence, and to ports elsewhere in the United States to make arrangements with the owners of the vessels and clippers which are adapted for their purposes, to man and sail them on shares—as we have no vessels such as they require—consequently, the step which we propose to take will not only encourage and benefit our fishermen in the prosecution of their occupation, but it will also give a new impetus to the construction of the class of vessels which are required for this special work. Now, Sir, the result is that the propositions which I have just submitted, will entail a loss to the revenue from Customs and Excise to the amount of $1,300,000 a year, while there will be an extra expenditure of $150,000 for the purpose which I have named. This will, of course, reduce the available means at the disposal of the Government to the extent of $1,500,000 per annum, and it may do more. Still that may be the limit, though other circumstances may reduce the revenue. We are now having erected three sugar refineries for the manufacture of beet root sugar. This is a business which, so far, has been limited, but still we must not shut our eyes to the fact that the day is not far distant—and, perhaps, it will occur in the next twelve months—when the revenue which is now received from imported cane sugar will be diminished, owing to the vigorous prosecution of this industry. That this will occasion a loss of revenue; but, at the same time an impetus will be given to a manufacturing industry, which will be of especial advantage to the agricultural interest, if it proves a success. When we bear in mind the fact that we have at present but 180,000 spindles engaged in the manufacture of cotton, and that, before the close of the year 1882, we are likely to have 400,000 spindles in operation, the probabilities are that we will not obtain from cotton goods the same amount of revenue which we have received from this source during the past year. The experience of the last three years has shown that where vitality is given to any one of these manufacturing industries, we find that the employes, and those who are connected with them, and the parties who import machinery, pay large sums into the revenue—the revenue from machinery alone during the past year amounted to $120,000—and these restore to the Treasury much of that which is lost in duties on articles manufactured; but still, as these industries increase and multiply, the imports of some of these articles must necessarily decrease. Still, we may fairly consider that, under the operation of these proposed changes, and under the operation of the increase in the manufacturing industries of the country, we may have available $1,750,000 less during the next year than we will have during the present year. Now, Sir, I desire to come to the estimate with these changes in view of the expenditure and the estimated revenue of next year. It is estimated that the Customs will yield next year, instead of $20,500,000, which was the estimate for this year, the sum of $19,500,000; from Excise, $5,500,000; from the Post Office, $1,500,000; Railways and Canals, $2,500,000; Interest on Investments, $700,000; and Miscellaneous, $900,000, making a total of $30,600,000. The expenditure, according to the Estimates which are now laid on the Table of the House, will be $27,300,000, or somewhere in that neighborhood. The vote that will be asked, in the Supplementary Estimates, as bounty to the fishermen, will be $150,000, and there will probably be further Supplementary Estimates amounting also to $150,000, making the gross Estimates, $27,600,000 for next year. The items in which the expenditure is increased are those which are placed in the Supplementary Estimates for the present year, the Indians, the postal service, railways, and various other services, and this will leave a surplus of $3,000,000. I have not taken into account the probable receipt of a very much larger sum from the proceeds of lands to be sold in the North-West, likely to be received during the present year. The estimate of receipts, from all sources, under the head of miscellaneous last year, was something like $800,000. They are estimated this year at $900,000, and I have continued that estimate for the next year, but there is every indication, and it is quite within the range, not of possibility, but of probability, that if the Government feel that they can reserve a sufficient amount of land in the districts of the country that will be required for actual settlement, the Government may be able to sell for cash, without interfering with the principle of actual settlement, a large quantity of land, and a very large revenue will be received from it. I have placed, however, in this estimate, nothing more than the ordinary sum expected to be received during the current year. It will be seen that we will have to provide a very large sum for expenditure under the head of Capital Account. For instance, the Minister of Railways has asked for $8,200,000, as subsidy to the Pacific Railway Syndicate during the next year. That is based upon their own statement of the work they expect to perform. I rather think that an outside estimate, but, at all events, whatever money may be required to pay to the Syndicate under the terms of the agreement will be received by the Government from the sales of the land-grant bonds, and therefore we will not require to go outside for any loan for the purpose of meeting whatever that expenditure may be. What is more, the hon. Minister of Railways and the hon. Minister of Public Works claim that they will expend, on the Pacific Railway now under contract, in the completion of the sections between the head of Lake Superior and Manitoba, on the British Columbia section, on the Canals and on other Public Works chargeable to capital, $9,000,000; and, in addition, we will restore—have to redeem—$7,340,000. I should not say have to redeem, we will redeem—we are not bound to redeem—$5,900,000 of it bearing 5 per cent. interest, but we have given notice to the holders of those $5,000,000 of 5 per cent. securities that we will redeem them in September next—and $2,340,000 of 6 per cent. debentures fall due in England; making altogether $16,340,000, that we will have to provide for outside of the sums to be paid to the Syndicate, and for which we have now on deposit on interest in the bank $5,000,000. We have an estimated surplus for the next year of $3,000,000; an estimated savings bank deposit of $4,000,000; we have an estimate of $1,000,000 increase in circulation of Dominion notes, leaving but $3,500,000 to be raised either by the exchange of 4 per cent., bonds for the fives to that amount, or the issuing, in Canada, of a loan at 4 per cent. for the $3,500,000. We were able to provide for $3,150,000 last year, $12,000,000 this year, and $16,000,000 for next year without floating a loan outside of the Dominion of Canada, or any loan indeed, except the amount received from the earnings of the people of Canada. It is a striking fact, to which I wish just here to call the attention of the House, that the amount that is now being paid into the savings banks of the Dominion of Canada every month is nearly $400,000 over and above the sums withdrawn, and has been so for the last three years. It is an important fact that I am able to state here, that in the three years and four months ending on the 1st February, there were deposited in the savings banks and in the Post Office savings banks of Canada, notwithstanding that the Government did not want all this money, and had indeed made regulations by which the amount to be received in the savings banks should be reduced from $10,000 to $3,000, that no interest should be paid for the month in which the money was deposited or withdrawn, so as really to discourage deposits—that notwithstanding that, the amount of deposits in the three years and four months in these institutions has increased over and above the sums withdrawn $10,000,000 and upwards, and in the banks of the country they have increased during the same period $26,000,000 and upwards, making an increase in deposits of the earnings of the people of this country in the banks of the Dominion and the savings banks in that time of $36,000,000 and upwards. And this, while we are investing in manufactories and other industries of the country large sums of money, while we are sending our money to Manitoba and the North-West and investing it there, while the people of Canada have invested in the last three months $3,000,000 in the bonds of the Canadian Pacific Railway, still, notwithstanding this increased demand, we find that deposits have increased in that period to over $36,000,000. No better evidence could be given of the prosperity of the country than this, and I say, and I hope to prove it before I get through, that this is largely due, as I stated at the outset, to the policy, the National Policy, which was adopted in 1874. Now, Sir, I know that, in dealing with figures, the subject is a rather dry one, and I have not, perhaps, made myself as clear as I would desire; but having stated briefly the expenditure for the last year, and income, the expenditure and estimated income for the current year, and the probable income and expenditure for the next year—I desire to say a few words with reference to the predictions that were made on the opposite side of the House when this policy was introduced. I think, if my memory serves me, that all of them have failed, and utterly failed. Now, Sir, I proceed to submit testimony in justification of my statement. I know it is a strong statement. It is going a great length to say that they have all failed. They certainly have failed to a very great extent, and I may say, and I repeat, that practically they have all failed. What were the statements that were made when this policy was introduced? One of them was, that it was calculated to interfere with the trade between the Dominion of Canada and Great Britain, that the policy was one that was in the interests of the United States rather than that of Great Britain, and therefore the feeling in the parent land would be one of great dissatisfaction with the Dominion of Canada, and the result would be damaging to our credit. Sir, time solves many questions, and it has solved this. I have in my hand a comparative statement—I have selected the year 1877, because the imports for consumption are nearer, in that year, to that of 1881, than that of any other year I could find under the old Tariff—from which I find that the gross imports for consumption in 1876-77 were $96,300,483. Deduct from that the United States breadstuffs exported, to the value of $4,562,000, included in the imports for consumption, that leaves a balance of $91,737,740. The imports from Great Britain in that year were $39,572,239, or 43 per cent. of the whole imports; from the United States, $46,746,736, or 51 per cent.; and from other countries, $5,418,765, or 6 per cent. In 1881, the imports from Great Britain were, $43,583,808, or 48½ per cent. of the whole, against 43 per cent. in 1876-77; from the United States, $36,704,112, or 40 per cent., against 51 per cent. in 1876-77; and from other countries, $11,323,684, or 11½ per cent.; making a total of $91,611,604, against $91,737,740, in 1876-77. These figures show an increase of imports from Great Britain of $4,011,569, a decrease of imports from the United States of $10,042,624, and an increase of imports from other countries of $5,904,916. Now, Sir, that establishes most clearly and agrees with the evidence submitted at the last Session of Parliament, that there has been a very large relative increase in the imports from Great Britain during the two years over those from the United States. It was stated by the Government in 1879 that such would be the case, because the manufactories that the Government expected to establish in Canada by means of the Tariff, were those the products of which we had previously largely imported from the United States. It was not with any ill-feeling toward our neighbors that this Tariff was established; but we were naturally gratified when we found that the policy we had introduced, to give additional employment to our own people, would interfere less with the industries and interests of Great Britain than with those of the United States. Such has been the result, and we thus have the answer to the fear that was expressed, that the Tariff in its operation would affect our trade with Great Britain more than that with the United States. Sir, there was another statement made; it was, that under the operation of a Tariff that imposed a duty upon breadstuffs, the forwarding trade between the United States and Europe via the St. Lawrence would be diminished. Well, I was able last Session to bring most conclusive evidence to show that it had not produced that effect.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What about last season?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am going to give you the figures for three years, and I will also speak of last season.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Give us last season.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I quote from the Trade and Navigation Returns for the last five years, and I will show that it was not the Tariff that caused the reduction last season. In 1876-77, converting flour into bushels of grain, the amount of foreign grain exported from Canada was 6,565,154 bushels; in 1877-78, the exports were 8,521,599 bushels; in 1878-79, they were 8,777,380 bushels; in 1879-80, 11,808,049 bushels; and in 1880-81, 12,143,720 bushels, or for the three years, from 1876 to 1879, an average of 7,954,711 bushels, before the difficulties said to be raised by the Tariff could have existed, while in the two years after the duty was imposed upon breadstuffs the average was 11,975,000 bushels. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) asks what about last season. After the opening of navigation—or after July—there was a falling off, but what was the cause of it? There was a decreased export from the United States ports during that period. At New York there was a falling off of 22 per cent., Baltimore about 24 per cent., Philadelphia 40 per cent., and Boston, which was the lowest, I think, something like 16 per cent. More than that there was what seldom occurs. There was a ring which had been in existence for two years by which the grain trade of Chicago was controlled, and which kept up prices, and this ring stipulated with the railway companies, such was the competition among the roads, for largely reduced rates, which had the effect of sending the trade by way of New York rather than by the St. Lawrence. It was to these exceptional circumstances, especially the reduction of the exports of United States grain, that the falling off of nearly 32 per cent., as compared with the previous year, was due. It was not due to the fact that the produce of the United States had to be passed through in bond and shipped in bond at the different ports of the Dominion. I give these figures to show that the fear, expressed by our friends opposite that the St. Lawrence trade would be diminished by the change in the fiscal policy, has not been realized. Now, Sir, the next objection raised by hon. gentlemen opposite was, in their own language, that the Tariff would dismember the Union. How was it to dismember the Union? Because, as they alleged, that the imposition of the new Tariff would increase the taxation of certain of the smaller Provinces, and that they would be knocking at the doors of the Dominion, demanding to be relieved of the burdens imposed upon them by the operations of that Tariff, or permission to withdraw from the Union. Let us place together for purposes of comparison the two Provinces of Quebec and Ontario—for a large portion of the goods consumed in Ontario are entered at the Port of Montreal—and place together the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, because New Brunswick receives from the western portion of Nova Scotia a large part of her natural products, while the merchants of St. John supply largely the merchants of the western part of Nova Scotia, the revenue being collected in New Brunswick, and paid by the consumer in Nova Scotia. If you take these two Provinces together and the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec together, what do we find? That under the Tariff of the hon. gentlemen opposite, there was collected $14\frac{1}{2}$ cents per head for Customs in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, during those five years, more than were collected from the people of Ontario and Quebec. Now take up the last Trade Returns, and see what is the operation of the new Tariff, as far as the people of those Provinces are concerned, and you will find the difference in the last two years is that, instead of being $14\frac{1}{2}$ cents in excess, it is largely below the amount that has been paid by Ontario and Quebec. The hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Anglin) claps his hands, and I am very glad he is pleased with such results. We must take into consideration that in 1879-80 the population of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick paid into the Treasury a considerable sum of money in the shape of duty on the sugar they consumed and refined in Montreal, but, during the present year, that has been reversed, and the tables will show, from this time forward, that the refiners of Nova Scotia and those of New Brunswick, will pay to the Customs officials of those two Provinces a large sum of money for goods consumed in Ontario and Quebec, and, therefore, making every allowance for the duties that would have been paid by the people of the Lower Provinces upon the articles that are purchased from Ontario and Quebec, it will be found that this Tariff, instead of having an injurious effect upon Nova Scotia and New Brunswick it has had a beneficial effect in reducing the comparative taxation, and it has had a still more beneficial effect on the Province of Prince Edward Island. It will be found that, if any section has to complain, it is not the smaller Provinces, and on behalf of whom the sympathies of this House were invoked; for the practical effect has been a comparative reduction rather than an increase of their taxation under the operation of this Tariff. Then, Sir, we were told that this Tariff would be oppressive to a certain section of the Dominion of Canada by the imposition of a duty on coal, while it would do no good whatever to Nova Scotia or other portions of the Dominion where there are large coal deposits. When I was asked by an hon. gentleman opposite in 1879 what increase of the consumption or what demand the Government expected to create for Nova Scotia coal by the operation of the Tariff, I stated that probably within a short time the consumption of Nova Scotia coal in the Dominion of Canada would increase to the extent of 400,000 tons.

Mr. ANGLIN. And displace American coal to that extent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, I did; "to a very large extent" I said; or, if it will please the hon. gentleman more, I will say to that extent. I did not suppose, Mr. Speaker, sanguine as I was, with reference to the effect of this Tariff, that in three years, by the increased industries and by the increased demand for steam power, it would make a demand which would require over 400,000 tons to meet it; but we find that these industries have been growing up all over the country to such an extent that it has required more than 400,000 tons from the Nova Scotia miners, and has also caused a largely increased amount to be imported from the United States as well.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman state where that coal was distributed in the other Provinces?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I cannot now say where, but I know some of it reached Cobourg.

Mr. MACKENZIE. How much?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I know that, because I saw it going into a factory there. It was 800 tons I think they told me they had purchased from Nova Scotia, and I heard that some Nova Scotia coal was furnished to a factory in Kingston, and it was declared to be the cheapest coal for steam purposes; and at Guelph, also, I am told there was some consumed. But there is this on record: that in 1877, 757,000 tons of coal was raised in the mines of Nova Scotia; in 1878, 770,603 tons; in 1879, 788,271 tons; in 1880, 1,032,710 tons; and in 1881, 1,116,248 tons; and to be added to that, there was in British Columbia, 214,243 tons, against 145,542 tons in 1878, or a total of 916,145 tons in 1878, against a production in 1881 of 1,333,391 tons, being an increase of 417,246 tons per annum.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman now state the amount of export in each of those years?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. To the United States it was just about the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE. To all quarters?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is just about the same, leaving the consumption in the Dominion of Canada, increased by that proportion, 400,000 tons.

Mr. BUNSTER. Mr. Speaker, might I—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. BUNSTER. I have a right to put the Finance Minister right. Were it not for the absence of the Island Railway we would have had over a million tons of an increase.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It only shows what is in store for us then. There was another very grave objection brought to this policy, and that was, that when we imposed an additional duty upon sugar refined in any country that granted a bounty—that is when we provided that on the importation of sugar from any country that granted a bounty, the ad valorem duty should be levied on the duty-paid value of such sugar, and when we increased the duty on raw sugar 5 per cent., and the duty on refined sugar 10 per cent. hon. gentlemen opposite said this was an outrageous proceeding, that the loss to the Dominion of Canada might be counted at least by a million of dollars—$900,000 to $1,000,000—and it would be better, said our friends of the Opposition, to take all the men that would be employed in these refineries, proposed to be put into operation, and board them at a hotel and pay their bill, than to introduce this policy. Now, what are the facts that have developed during these last few years? Last year, I think, certainly the year before, the ex-Finance Minister intimated that we would lose $900,000 of revenue; and the leader of the Opposition stated, here and at a public dinner in Toronto that, under the operation of this policy, we lost during the years 1879-80 $600,000 of revenue, and that the people of Canada paid $600,000 in increased price for the sugar which they consumed, so that the sugar monopoly, as he termed it, cost the people of the Dominion of Canada $1,200,000 a year. I stated in my place in the House last Session in answer to that hon. gentleman, when he said a loss of $500,000 revenue had taken place, that the returns laid on the Table perhaps justified the hon. gentleman in making the statement, because they showed that, in the year 1880, there had been $600,000 less of revenue collected from sugar than in 1879; but I pointed out that the revenue collected in 1879 was $300,000 more than it would have been, if they had not imported in January, February and March, before the Tariff was changed, $1,000,000 worth of sugar more than they usually imported in these three months; so that there would not have been an apparent loss of $600,000 if the $300,000 had been credited to that year; and, further, that from the returns laid on the Table of the revenue collected for the first six months of that fiscal year, it was clear that the revenue to be received during that year would be equal to, if not above, that collected in any previous year. What has been the result? The figures that I am now quoting can be found in the Trade and Navigation Returns, and they show this: that during the last year we paid into the Treasury for duties on sugar, $154,910 more than the average for the five years previous, and under the Tariff of the hon. gentlemen opposite, justifying the statement I made, and showing that, as far as the present Tariff is concerned, there is no loss, or comparatively no loss, of revenue, because if we add $800,000 to the value of the sugar imported, and that $800,000 is represented by freight from the West Indies, the labor in the refineries, coal consumed, interest on capital and other expenditures, and you add 43 per cent. duty collected in the year 1876-77 on the sugar imported, with the sums named added, then it would only give $40,000 more than we collected last year. There is the fact that $154,000 more were received during the last year than the average of the five years previous; so much with regard to the anticipated loss of revenue. A few words with respect to the cost of sugar to the consumer. When I made the financial statement last year I had obtained, from reliable sources, a return showing the comparative prices in New York and Montreal, when we had two refineries in operation. I stated that, as far as the prices of granulated sugar were concerned, it appeared that those paid by the consumers in the Dominion were 25 cents per 100 lbs. more than they would have been if the sugars had been imported under the Tariff of 1877-78; but I might have added, as I propose to add now, that that calculation did not take into account the profits of importers, the middlemen, between the New York refiners and the men who bought and sold the sugar here. Still I admit that as regards granulated sugar, omitting the profits of the middlemen, there was the difference of 25 cents per 100 lbs. The yellow refined sugars being much less than it could have been imported for under the Tariff of 1877. I have now a carefully prepared return showing the values during two periods in each month in New York and Montreal, deducting the drawback and adding 30 cents per cwt. as the expense of importation; this calculation does not include 50 cents per cwt. profit on transactions between the New York refiner and the Canadian consumers; giving the consumers the benefit of that also, there was still 7 cents loss charged to the people of Canada on that line of sugars than if it had been imported from New York, under the old Tariff; adding the profits of the middlemen, the saving was 57 cents per 100 lbs.; and, with respect to other refined sugars the difference was much greater. As far as the revenue is concerned, there has been no loss, and $800,000 were probably expended in Canada in refining sugars, in freights, and in cost of coal. What have we in return? I explained this very fully last year, and showed what the effect of establishing refineries had been. There are now employed 1,000 hands in the cane sugar refineries, or 1,100, including those directly connected with the beet-root sugar industry. Those men, most of whom have families, require food, clothing, tenements, and everything that the merchants, manufacturers, and farmers supply; those men are employed in this country at remunerative wages, whereas they would have removed to another country if it had not been for the policy that rebuilt those industries and placed them in motion. Then we have 400,000 tons of coal raised from the mines of Nova Scotia, giving employment to, perhaps, 1,000 men—60,000 tons of the 400,000 tons increase in the production of the Nova Scotia mines being used in the refining of sugar. Thus employment was given to the miners, a market was afforded to the coal owners, business was provided for vessels and railways, 60,000 tons of vessels being employed in conveying raw sugar from the West Indies to different ports of the Dominion, something like 90 per cent. of the whole coming direct to Canada, instead of 6 per cent. as in 1878. Employment was also given to coopers, and, in one section of the country I visited, the timber on the land had increased in value because of the demand for the particular wood used for sugar casks. Everywhere, in the extension of trade, increased machinery was required and in operation, and additional employment was given to the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite are aware that one of the refineries has not, so far, been a financial success; if it had not been for that the Moncton refinery would have been quoted as paying enormous profits. It will, however, give the ex-Finance Minister the opportunity of repeating that all those establishments will become failures when, by their increase, competition becomes keen, and loss would accrue to those engaged in them. If our policy stood alone on this question of sugar refining, which is announced as a huge monopoly, I hold that the facts I have given afford an answer to the statement and the fears expressed with respect to this matter. Now, Sir, it was alleged that this Tariff would fail either as a revenue-producing Tariff, or as a protective Tariff. What evidence have we that hon. gentlemen opposite were mistaken on that point? There are various ways of ascertaining the increase of industries as the effect of the Tariff. The one which I will now present is to show how the quantity of raw material consumed by manufacturers has increased since the adoption of this Tariff.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Before the hon. gentleman proceeds, I would like to ask him whether the $150,000, proposed to be taken as bounties for fishermen, is merely a grant for this year, or whether it is proposed to ask a similar grant every year.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is not proposed to provide for it by Act of Parliament, but to ask an appropriation year by year. When the House took recess, I was calling the attention of hon. members to some facts to prove that the fears entertained by some hon. gentlemen of the Opposition, that this policy would not increase the number of industries in the country or give additional employment to manufactures. I will take up, first, the increased imports of the following raw materials used in manufactures, namely: raw cotton, hides and wool. These three articles, especially cotton, because there is none produced in the country, give a very fair idea of the increased value of the manufactures. The raw cottons imported in 1877-78, amounted to 7,243,413 pounds; in 1880-81, 16,018,721 pounds, or an increase of more than double in the three years. Hides imported in 1877-78, amounted in value to $1,207,300; in 1880-81, to $2,184,884, or nearly double. Wool imported in 1877-78, was 6,230,084 pounds; in 1880-81, 8,040,287 pounds. Wool exported in 1877-78, amounted to 2,445,893 pounds; in 1880-81, 1,404,123 pounds, giving an increase of imports of 1,810,000 pounds, and a decrease of exports, which shows that there was a consumption, in 1880-81, of Canadian wool, over that of 1878, of 1,041,770 pounds, thus making an increase on the consumption of wool, between the two periods, of 2,851,973 pounds. The increased value of cotton, leather and woollen manufactures for the year 1881, as compared with 1878, therefore exceeds $5,500,000 on these three articles alone. Now, let us see what facts we have been able to gather with reference to the new factories established, and the number of persons employed. I will deal with the general statement first, and then with one or two different localities, showing the influence that has been produced there by the operation of this Tariff. I have statements with reference to wages, but I will take the number of persons employed first. Upon a very partial investigation, because it only extended over a portion of the Dominion, we ascertained that there have been ninety-five new factories established down to October last, since March, 1879, employing 7,025 hands. The cotton factories that are now in course of construction, and will probably be completed within twelve months, will employ 3,000 hands in addition to those I have already mentioned. 440 odd factories visited and that were in operation in 1878, less the ninety-five that I have named as being established since 1878, show an increase of employes varying from 5 to 30 per cent. and with an average of 17 per cent. in these 350 odd factories. That 17 per cent. on the number of employes, as far as we can gather from the Census of 1871, and making an allowance for reduction in the number employed between 1871 and 1878, would give 17,850, making 24,875 as the increase of employes since 1878. I will take, as an illustration of the effect of the Tariff, one of the cities of the Dominion to show what its operations have been—I refer to the city of Hamilton, that ambitious city, represented by my hon. friend on the right (Mr. Robertson). This is a statement made up by the immigration agent of that city, and, if my memory serves me, this is the gentleman who sent a return to a member of a Local Government with reference to the employment of men in the industries of that city, but it was not embodied in the statement made in the report of that official.

An hon. MEMBER. It was irrelevant.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It may be, but it strikes me it would be of some importance by way of making public the facts contained in this paper and to show there was employment for immigrants in that locality. Now we find that, in 1881, the value of buildings occupied in that city as factories, up to that date, was $1,074,100. I have the answers from the different parties communicated with that have been furnished to the Minister of Agriculture by the emigration agent there. In 1878, the value of the buildings occupied as factories in the city of Hamilton, was $705,200, an increase of $368,900, or a rate of 51 per cent. The value of plant, in 1881, was $1,174,750; in 1878, $538,100, showing a difference of $636,650, or an increase of 113 per cent. The value of goods manufactured in 1881—and I wish the House to give particular attention to this—the value of goods manufactured in that city alone, in 1881, was $7,478,700; in 1878, it was $3,857,000, making an increase of $3,621,700, or 94 per cent. The number of hands employed in 1881, was 9,054, and in 1878, as it is given here, 3,703, showing an increase of 4,351, or 117 per cent. as between 1878 and 1881. The average rate of wages per head in 1881, was $1.17½, in 1878, $1.07½, or an increase of 9½ per cent., or 10½ cents per head. The number of workshops and factories, in 1881, was seventy-eight; in 1878, it was fifty-seven, an increase of 37 per cent. In 1878, thirty-three workshops were running full time, and twenty-four short time. In 1881, workshops running short time, one; full time, fifty-six; over time, twenty-one; making seventy-eight in all. This is my statement with reference to one particular town. An hon. member on the Opposition Benches, an hon. member from my own Province, speaking of the effect of the Tariff, the Session before last, said there was one thing it was expected this Tariff would do, and that was to increase the wages, but it had not increased them. I have a statement here, from 460 factories, to show the rate of wages as compared with 1878. The wages in 135 of the factories out of 460 visited remained the same as in 1878, but were nearly all working on full time, while formerly many were on short time. Fifty of the new factories started at such wages and no change was deemed necessary. In 277 factories the wages have been increased from 5 to 35 per cent. The rate of wages generally throughout the Dominion, we all know, has been considerably increased; that settles, I think, the question of wages.

Mr. PATERSON (South Brant). How do they compare with wages in the United States?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I know, Mr. Speaker, that we have been obliged to send to the United States to obtain men for our factories, and to pay more in some cases than they have to pay there.

Mr. PATERSON. Do you have a tax on the labor coming in?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; we have no tax on the labor coming in. We give them the encouragement that the hon. member complimented his leader upon giving some years ago when they increased the duty on cigars, when that hon. gentleman rose in his place and complimented the then Finance Minister with increasing the duty on cigars, he said it had brought thousands into the country and it was just the policy to pursue. That is the kind of protection we are extending, and we hope he will give us his support.

Mr. PATERSON. The quotation is not correct, that is all the trouble.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Then I stand corrected. I have read it somewhere, and I have not seen it contradicted.

Mr. PATERSON. It was a figure of speech.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Hansard has just been put into my hand, and I have no doubt it passed through the hands of the hon. gentleman before it appeared in the Hansard.

Mr. PATERSON. This was a figure of speech, I said.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. But let us see, Mr. Speaker, who made this speech. I find that it was made by Mr. Paterson, and I am quite sure it was not my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Patterson, Essex). He says:

"The other year the Finance Minister, in revising the Tariff, gave some encouragement to our industry which it never had before. The result was that a thousand men who were engaged in that industry in Germany were literally transported by the change in the Tariff to Canada, and set to work here. The cost of the article was not increased one iota, and Canada got all the benefit. The middle men suffered a diminution of profits; but for them nobody seems to care much, the producer and consumer receiving all the sympathy."

Now, then, I tell my hon. friend—

Mr. PATERSON. I do not repudiate that yet. I said figuratively at that time that those men were not wrong.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I now come, Mr. Speaker, to another statement that has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite; but before I do so, in order to make my answer more complete than it would otherwise be, I desire to refer for a short time to the cost of the manufactures of the Dominion of Canada to the consumer compared with what they were in 1878. And I trust I may be able to use as strong language, or language very similar to that employed by my hon. friend from South Brant, that the result of the increase in the Tariff had not been to increase the cost of the article to the consumer. I take up, in the first place, cotton goods, because I know that in the Maritime Provinces as well as in the west, but especially the Maritime Provinces, great stress was laid on the increased cost of cotton goods as well as the increased cost of woollen goods, especially of the coarser classes. I stated last Session the prices of grey and white cottons and brown sheetings, but I have here a statement showing that brown sheeting and bleached shirtings manufactured in the Dominion were sold at from 5 to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. over the net cost price of the same articles in the United States, or 10 per cent. less than the price at which they would sell under the Tariff of 1877-78. That is to say, that with reference to this particular description of cotton goods manufactured in the Dominion of Canada, they are sold to-day at a lower price than they were sold under the old Tariff. I have here a statement from Mr. Parks, of the city of St. John, with reference to ball knitting cotton, manufactured and sold by him at $39\frac{6}{10}$ cents per pound, delivered in Montreal, Toronto, London or Hamilton, while the net price of the same article in the United States, is 40 cents per pound. I have in my possession the letters written to, and the answers written by, men engaged in this manufacture in Massachusetts, and they state their lowest net prices. Therefore, the consumer of this description of cotton goods has them $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. less than they had them in 1878. With reference to cotton yarns, No. 7 to No. 10, in the United States, in 1878, they were $20\frac{7}{10}$ cents per pound, the raw cotton being 10 cents per pound. The same articles are manufactured by Parks, and they were sold, in 1882, for $22\frac{5}{10}$ cents, the raw cotton being 12 cents per pound. There was an increase of price in this case of $1\frac{8}{10}$ cents per pound on the manufactured article, against an increase of 2 cents per pound on the raw material. Carpet warps sold in the United States, in 1878, at $22\frac{5}{10}$ cents per pound, while the same article is sold by Parks, in 1882, at $24\frac{3}{10}$ cents per pound, the increase being $1\frac{8}{10}$ cents per pound, against an increase in the price of the raw material of 2 cents, showing that the price was not really in excess of what it cost in 1878. Beam warps, No. 10, were $28\frac{5}{10}$ cents per pound in the United States, while in New Brunswick, in 1882, they were $31\frac{2}{10}$, an increase of $2\frac{7}{10}$ cents against an increase of 2 cents per pound on the raw cotton. Beam warps, in January, 1882, in the United States were $30\frac{6}{10}$ cents per pound net, while the price in New Brunswick was $31\frac{2}{10}$ cents per pound net, or less than 2 per cent. above the United States prices. These figures show that, so far as this particular class of cotton goods is concerned, they are sold to the consumer at a less price than in 1878, and many of the articles are sold at the American prices, or a fraction under or a fraction over them. I may add that it was not to be expected that the prices would be as low for the first year or two as they will be when competition is established. Take, for example, the year before last, when we had but two sugar refineries—those in Montreal—and look at the result which has followed upon the establishment of three others in the Maritime Provinces. A year ago I had to admit, on the face of the paper submitted to me, that 25 cents per hundred more was paid for sugar than under the Tariff of 1878. This did not include the charges by the middle men. Now we can state emphatically that the price is less to the consumer than if it had been imported under the Tariff of 1878. And I firmly believe that the competition in cost on cotton manufactures in twelve months, when we shall have 400,000 spindles instead of 180,000 which we have now, will produce such a result that there will be little difference in the prices here of any description of such goods and the prices in the United States. What our manufacturers say is: "that we can manufacture as cheaply here as in the United States, but we want the market. We are preparing for the sharpest competition, and we do not fear our friends on the other side of the line if we have the home market, and the competition among ourselves will keep the prices down to the consumer." This is an important subject. The leader of the Opposition referred to it, and in order to make the people in the Maritime Provinces see the effect of this Tariff as he sees it, said: that if a farmer visited one of the dry goods stores, and bought a dress for his wife, he would have to send out of the nine or twelve yards he would buy three or four yards up to Ottawa. One farmer who was present said: "that is not true, because I take what I buy home to my wife; I send none to Ottawa." However, he was speaking figuratively, like my hon. friend from Brant. Many gentlemen and some ladies who were present at his meetings, said that the main point made by him against the Tariff was with reference to woollen goods. He said that the poor man would be compelled to pay 40 per cent. duty and upwards, and the rich man but 25 or 27 per cent. I have taken some pains to write to different parties who could furnish me with reliable information with reference to the price of woollen goods; and a gentleman sent to me, at the request of a friend, a letter, of which he authorized me to make any use I thought proper. I stated to the gentleman, to whom I wrote among others, that I wished reliable data—data that could not be shaken by any statements of fact that could be produced in the House—because we wanted nothing but the facts, and if the manufacturers were getting large profits, it was just as well that we should know it, and deal with the facts as we found them. This letter I received from Cantlie, Ewan & Co., of Montreal, who, I believe, have been for years engaged in selling woollen goods. It has reference to the price and value of certain descriptions of woollen goods made in Canada, compared with the prices of the same goods previous to the change in the Tariff. It is as follows:—

"1st. Etoffes, tweeds and fabrics made from Canada wools and used chiefly by farmers, laborers, shantymen and mechanics in country districts, are as low in price now as at any time during ten years previous to 1878. This refers to regular sales. No doubt during the very severe depression special lines may have been sold at a concession to force sales, but the average price of such goods, for 1880, 1881 and 1882, is lower than the average of ten years previous to 1878.

"2nd. Medium and fine wool fabrics made exclusively from imported wools and used by farmers, mechanics in cities and towns, and by the large mass of the population, were, in 1880 and 1881, and are now selling for 1882, at lower prices than at any previous time since these goods were made in Canada.

"The goods now made in Canada from fine and medium wools have improved very much in character as to fabric, color and finish, and ought on this account to bring more money instead of less.

"3rd. Flannels are now as low in price as at any time during the past fourteen years, except for a short time during 1877 and 1878, when, under the pressure of hard times, a break in price took place by the largest manufacturer of such goods attempting to run out the other smaller makers. This failed, and the price has since been steady. No advance has taken place, although wool supplies and wages all have advanced very considerably.

"4th. Blankets are as low in price now as they were any time during ten years previous to 1878. During 1880 they were lower in price than at any former time in Canada. Our Canadian wools were then very low in price, about 21 cents per lb.; since then wool suitable for blankets has averaged not less than 29 cents to 30 cents, and blankets have advanced in consequence. For last year and this present year prices are as low as any year since 1869. Being compelled by forcing competition to give up making blankets for 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, have no record of prices for these four years."

Mr. Speaker, that speaks strongly with reference to the price and value of the goods made in the Dominion of Canada largely from wool grown in Canada, and consumed by the masses of the people of Canada; and, as I stated in the early part of my speech, while the masses of the people have been buying their woollen goods at prices as low as they were before the change of the Tariff, it will be found by reference to the Trade Returns that we received \$411,000 more from the finer descriptions of woollen goods, worn by the wealthier people, than we did the year previous, and an average of from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 9 per cent. duty more than we did in 1878, from the consumers of the finer goods, showing clearly that, instead of the rich man getting his clothing cheaper and the poor man paying more as a rule, the poor man gets his clothing as cheap or cheaper than he did before, while the rich man has paid from 7 to 10 per cent. additional duty.

Mr. MILLS. Then Canada never was a sacrifice market.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes it was; that was the trouble. I asked one of the manufacturers: "How is it that, although wages are higher prices are lower?" He said to me: "The fact is we used to have to spend a large sum in employing runners to go throughout the country to make sales. We lost a large amount of interest on the stocks we had in hand and could not sell in spite of this increased expense; but now we have doubled our production, have orders ahead, our expenses of management have not increased, and we can sell at smaller profits than we could before, and yet in consequence of the increased production we have larger profits at the end of the year." Thus we see that, while we are building up these industries, the people are getting cheaper goods, and the manufacturers are making more money than they were before. Now, Sir, as I have dealt with the cotton and woollen goods worn by the masses of the people, I thought I would like to know how the case was with reference to the hats and caps made out of coarse woollen goods, felts, and other materials; and I addressed a letter to a gentleman in Montreal largely engaged in the manufacture of these articles—a gentleman who is, I believe, known to many hon. members of this House—Mr. E. K. Green. He, among others, sent me a reply, and which he said I might make whatever use I pleased; and as he speaks very strongly and decidedly with respect to the effect of this policy on prices, I give him as an authority on the subject. I know he is a somewhat prominent man in the city of Montreal.

Mr. MACKENZIE. A prominent Protectionist.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; and he was, I believe, a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite at one time.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He is yet.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Then, Sir, I present the testimony of a gentleman who sympathises with hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, and who, under these circumstances, would not, except for the National Policy, maintain this Government in power.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman is not fair. I said he is a decided Protectionist.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Exactly so. Then he could not have any political object in writing a letter like this. I said: "I believe you are engaged in the manufacture of hats and caps, and that class of material," the relative cost of which, to the consumer, I had not, up to that time, received any information about. I was under the impression that some caps, made from the coarse woollen goods, cost a little more, and I was anxious to get information on the subject, so I wrote to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What is the duty on hats and caps?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Twenty-five per cent. His reply was as follows:—

"HAMILTON, February 3rd, 1882.

"I have gone over and carefully compared the prices of the various lines of caps and felt hats manufactured by us in 1878 and 1881, and I find, as the result of my investigation, that the average selling price of our goods during the past year has been lower than in 1878, for the same class of goods. This is the case, not only in those lines of goods on which the advance of duty has been slight, but also applies to those coarse, heavy woollens, on which the duty has been considerably increased. These results have been attained by an increased protection of this class of goods, in consequence of the present Tariff, and by a natural law of manufactures, whereby a larger quantity of a given article can be produced and sold to the consumer at a less price than a smaller quantity of the same article. In other words, owing to the enlarged market afforded by protection, and the keenness of home competition, we are able to supply the country generally with coarse woollen caps and felt hats at lower prices under the present Tariff than in 1878, before it went into operation.

"As an importer, manufacturer, general merchant, of twenty-five years' experience, extending at present from Cape Breton to British Columbia, I can safely say that the country as a whole, in its solid material prosperity and sound financial condition, has never been (during the period mentioned) as truly prosperous as at present. I believe this statement will be confirmed by every leading banker and merchant throughout the Dominion. You are at liberty to use this letter in any way you may think best."

We have taken the felt hats and woollen caps, the woollen clothing and the cotton underclothing, and, for the mass of the people, it does not appear to have cost them a great deal more for these articles—it cost them somewhat less; but, at any rate, we say they have cost them no more than under the Tariff of 1878. Let us see, what other articles have been affected by the Tariff. We increased the duty considerably on waggons and carriages. I have several statements all pretty much in the same direction—but I have one in particular in which is given the prices of waggons and carriages. Waggons which sold in 1871 for $64, sold, in 1878, for $62, and, in 1881, for $60. Carriages which sold in 1871 for $110 cash; in 1878, for $105 cash; and in 1881, for $100 cash. A carriage that sold in 1871 for $120, sold in 1878 for $100, and in 1881 for $100. A covered buggy, first class (giving the description of it), which sold, in 1871 for $170, sold in 1878 for $160, and in 1881 for $150; so that the increase of duty on carriages has not had the effect of increasing the price to the purchaser. Ploughs are selling at 15 per cent. less than in 1878. All agricultural implements are selling from 5 to 20 per cent. less than they sold in 1878. Organs are selling at 15 per cent. less than they were sold for in 1878, and the business has increased nearly four-fold. Sewing machines are reduced in price $10 each, and the business has trebled or more. Boots and shoes, and leather manufactures, first-class custom work, has increased in price about 15 per cent., equivalent to the wages of the men employed in that particular work; but factory goods are sold at from 10 to 25 per cent. less than in 1878, although the price of labor has increased. Lamp glasses sell at less than in the United States in 1878. In hardware goods there has been an increase in price for a portion, but not greater than the increased cost of labor and of raw material, but a large portion are sold lower than in 1878. The best class of furniture is selling at a somewhat higher price than before—that is, the very best description of furniture—but the furniture that is used by the masses of the people, manufactured at the large establishments of the Dominion of Canada, is sold as low, and lower in most cases, than it was in 1878. The price of iron castings in 1882 is 9 per cent. higher than in 1878; in 1879 the prices were at the lowest, pig iron being cheaper than at any period since. The increase in the price of iron castings is about 15 per cent., or equivalent to the increased cost of the pig iron and the labor—principally of the labor. Cut nails are 5 per cent. lower, and finishing nails are 9 per cent. lower than in 1878; pressed spikes, are 12 per cent. lower than in 1878, and railway spikes, $2 per ton lower than in 1878. Horse shoes are 8 per cent. higher than they were in 1878, because when the machine made horse-shoes were first introduced, in order to induce those who required them to abandon the manufacture of shoes, the prices were put down, and consequently they were lowered in 1878, and are now selling at 8 per cent. higher than in that year; but for nails there has not been an increase in price, though we have increased the duty upon them. Let me say that, as far as these particular manufactures are concerned, it does not appear that the consumer has been called upon to pay anything more, as a rule, but in some cases less than before, and consequently the Tariff, to the masses of the people, with reference to these manufactures, has not been oppressive. An hon. gentleman opposite, the member from the County of St John's, the late Minister of Customs (Mr. Burpee) took a different view of this subject. His view was endorsed by the late Finance Minister. He evidently entertained the opinion that this was a protective policy, and that it would increase largely the consumption of home manufactures at a higher price and yield less revenue. That hon. gentleman stated—and the late Finance Minister said that no answer had been given to it—that, under the operation of this Tariff, we would tax the people $7,000,000 more than before, and they would pay but $2,000,000 of that into the Treasury. Now, there has been $6,000,000 paid into the Treasury over and above what was collected in 1877, and if we increased the manufactures last year by $15,000,000, the average duty that would be imposed if imports would be 20 per cent., and if the increased cost to the consumer for that $15,000,000 worth of goods, manufactured in the country, was equivalent to the duty, then the hon. gentleman might claim that the people paid $3,000,000 for these goods that did not reach the Treasury; but I have shown, that, instead of paying the increased duty that was imposed, they have these goods as cheap as they were before the change and we have the $6,000,000 in the Treasury, and the people have paid no more for the goods manufactured under the protective policy. There are a great many statements made about the taxation of the working man, and especially upon the farmer. Now let us look at that view of the case for a moment. There is a good deal of sympathy manifested for the farmer. I, on a former occasion, made the remarks in answer to some statements made by an hon. gentleman that the farmer was heavily taxed under this Tariff, that from the peculiar position of the farmer, he would not in proportion to his means contribute as much as certain other classes. It was afterwards stated that I had said they would not pay their share, or would not pay enough into the Treasury. I simply said that under the Tariff, owing to his peculiar position, he would not contribute as much as some other classes of persons who were not producers, and who consumed largely of imported goods. Now, let us for a few moments consider the condition of the farmer in the light of the facts I have just presented—and when I am referring to the farmer, I desire to include the mechanic and the laborer. I am referring to the masses of the people of Canada. Let us see now under the change in the Tariff that has been in operation since 1879, with the reductions proposed to-day, how the farmer, mechanic and laborer stands. His tea will cost him 5 to 6 cents a pound less than it did in 1878. The duty is removed off his coffee. The sugar, considering the middle man and his profits, is at least 50 cents per hundred pounds lower than before. His molasses is 10 per cent. less than he paid in 1878. With reference to rice he will be able to obtain it, under the new arrangement, a little less than before. Soap has increased about 12½ per cent. in price, the increase, however, is due to the raw material from which it is manufactured, and this raw material pays no duty. With reference to spices the duty remains unchanged. With reference to woollen goods used by the masses they are as cheap or cheaper than before. With reference to woollen yarns they are as cheap or cheaper than before. Hats and caps are also as cheap as they were before. Custom made boots and shoes are 15 per cent. more, the others less. Agricultural implements are from 5 to 20 per cent. less than in 1878. Sewing machines are $10 less than before; carriages less than before; lamp shades and glass ware are less than before; organs are less than before; nuts and bolts, which I did not refer to previously, are less than before; furniture of common qualities is as low, if not less than before; nails and spikes less; horse shoes a little higher; stoves and castings a little higher; hardware, taking it all round, a little higher; tools and files less than in 1878. The reduction in cost will average from 5 to 10 per cent. as near as can be gathered on the articles named. Now, Sir, that being the case, let us consider the position of the farmer especially. I quite admit if it could be shown that this Tariff had no advantages for the farmer, that it was oppressive, that he paid more taxes than formerly and received nothing in return, then he might be induced to accept the invitation of hon. gentlemen opposite to oppose this policy whenever it is put upon its trial. But the leading articles which he is consuming are no higher than before, and in many cases they are less. We will now enquire what other benefit he has in addition to the lower prices. In my judgment the farmer is as greatly interested in this Tariff as any other class of men in the Dominion. In the first place he has the home market. An hon. member opposite referred to the home market last Session, stating that it was of very little importance. Visit any section of the Dominion you please, put yourself in communication with the farmers, especially in the neighborhood of towns where manufacturing industries have been established and are increasing, and ask them if they are deriving no advantage. Why, Sir, under the operations of this Tariff, the vegetables, the fruit, the poultry, the lamb and veal, and other meats, the butter, the cheese, for almost everything they offer for sale, they obtain higher prices on account of the home market than is obtained in localities where they have to sell to the middle man and ship to another market. In conversations with the farmers, I found that, in 1878 they frequently came to market with their fruit and vegetables, and would stand there all day; and, not being able to get a price which would be an object to them, would drive home and wait for another opportunity, frequently being compelled to return and take what was offered. "How is it now?" I said. They replied: "There is no difficulty now. We sell everything we bring in for cash, and at good prices." Why? Because the country is in an active and flourishing state. Manufactories have increased, the number of the employed has increased, and their wages also have increased. They have plenty of money with which to buy country produce—I speak particularly of perishable goods which cannot be sent to a distant market. Some 25,000 more people are employed than in 1878 in these manufactories, and if they represent four for each family, you have 100,000 people to be fed, the heads of whose families were without employment, or were only partially employed, or not in the country in 1878. What the effect of this is to the farmer can be clearly understood. But it is said the duty on oats is no protection to the farmer, the duty on corn is very little benefit to the farmer. What is the fact? Do they not obtain better prices for their corn than they did before with a duty of 7½ cents per bushel? They certainly do. There is no question about that. Do they not obtain better prices for their rye? admit that that is regulated to a very large extent by the price in Germany and elsewhere, the markets to which it is generally shipped from the Dominion; but the distillers of Canada now buy their rye from the farmers of Canada, which they use as a substitute for corn. That gives an increased market, and to a certain extent affects the price. With reference to the price of oats, we have evidence beyond controversy, in my judgment, that it has been increased to the consumer 3 cents per bushel. But it is said the European market regulates the price here. It does not matter an iota what duty you put upon it. Does it not? The leader of the Opposition said in Nova Scotia—and I do him the justice to say he made the same statement in Toronto previous to the West Toronto election—that the duty on coal increased the price of coal to the consumer in Ontario, and that the duty on breadstuffs increased the price of breadstuffs to the consumer in the Maritime Provinces. The operation of this state of things, he said, would create a bad feeling between the people of Ontario and the people of the Maritime Provinces, because the latter had to pay additional for the breadstuffs of Ontario consumed in the Maritime Provinces, and the former additional on the coal consumed in Ontario. On the subject of coal, I know there has been a great deal said; but my enquiries have led me to the conclusion that, while we receive a very considerable sum from coal imported from the United States and consumed in Ontario, one-half of that sum is paid by the coal producers in the United States. That is my conviction, and we have evidence of it. It is only very recently, in conversation with a gentleman who purchased in the United States 2000 tons of coal for consumption in Canada, that a portion of the coal duty was paid by the coal producers of the Western States. But, as I said on a former occasion, if the people of the United States were to say to us to-day, or any day, that they would go back to the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, by which the natural products of the two countries would be exchanged free, we would be prepared to agree to that arrangement. But it would be the greatest mistake that any Government could make at this time, while negotiations may be opened at no distant day, while notice may be given by Canada of the abrogation of the Washington Treaty, within twelve months, and when there is a desire in the United States, on the part of a portion of her people, to open negotiations for the free exchange of natural products, it would not only be a mistake—it would be madness, to yield one iota of the vantage ground we now possess. If we were to yield it now we would do that which we would regret for all time to come. Therefore, we are not prepared to offer any proposition for the reduction of the duties now levied on these articles. Sir, the prices have been quoted in Chicago and compared with the prices of wheat in Toronto, and the conclusion has been drawn that the Tariff has no effect on the price of wheat in Toronto. But, Sir, an exceptional state of things has existed in the United States for two years. This year especially the holders of wheat have felt that the short crop in the United States and the short crop in Europe would necessarily bring up the price above what it was when the harvest was completed in America. They have been holding for a time wheat at 6 cents per bushel higher than the price brought for that description of article in the Liverpool market, adding the ordinary freight and ordinary expenses in taking it to the market. What have they been able to do from the fact of holding the grain? They have driven the railroad companies and the shipowners to the point that, in order to enable them to get the price they were asking for it in Chicago, they have reduced the freight by railways, and the charges of transportation and the freights on shipping by which it has been sent forward, and thus made just a fair return considering the price which was paid for it in Chicago. And what was the difference a week ago. I will give an illustration, simply to show that this Tariff, while it does not, of course, increase the price of grain 15 cents a bushel, it does, as I estimated last Session, increase the price on an average of 10 cents a barrel on flour consumed in the Dominion of Canada; and, if the leader of the Opposition was present, I would thank him for the compliment which he paid me at one of his meetings when he undertook to show to the people of the Maritime Provinces that they paid more for their flour, and, in order to clinch the matter, he quoted my statement in Parliament to prove that the price was increased to the consumer 10 cents a barrel. Ten days ago wheat was sold in the Toronto market 3 cents higher per bushel than it was sold for in the Chicago market, and it could not have brought these 3 cents per bushel in excess had it not been for the Tariff; and I will tell you why. The cost of transmission of that particular class of wheat from Chicago to Liverpool, via New York, was precisely to a cent what it cost to convey the same description of wheat from Toronto via the Grand Trunk Railway and the Allan steamers to Liverpool;

therefore, if it depended simply on the English market, that wheat would have had to go down 3 cents in price per bushel, in order to compete with the wheat sent from Chicago. But it brought 3 cents more, because, as we know—after the harvest is in, and a large portion of it has been shipped to England—the quantity of Canadian grain in the country being diminished, Canadian millers have to pay an increased price for the wheat which they require, and this increase naturally goes into the pockets of our farmers, who reap the benefit. The miller, therefore, has either to go to the United States market and pay the duty, or he has to pay the price which the farmer demands for his grain here; consequently our farmers, ten days ago received 3 cents more per bushel for their wheat than they would have obtained had our market been open and exposed to the danger of being broken down by shipments from the other side, which, without the duty, would have been thrown in here, and thus brought into competition with the produce of our own agriculturists. The returns on the Table of the House show that in the years 1879-80 and 1880-81, there were 10,000,000 bushels more of Canadian grain consumed in Canada, than was the case during the two years previous. We had, therefore, a market for the products of Canada to the extent of 5,000,000 bushels of grain per annum, which we did not before possess, and it is thus we derive the benefit. Our exports of the products of Canada have been somewhat increased, and a home market for 5,000,000 more bushels of grain has been provided for our farmers who have obtained better prices than they would have received, had their market been open to free competition with the farmers of the Western States; and in this manner, the Tariff has conferred a decided benefit upon our agriculturists. I have the evidence here which will show the exact extent of the reduction in imports of breadstuffs. In 1877, we consumed in Canada, 5,210,890 more bushels of United States wheat than we did in 1881, and in 1878 we consumed 2,161,867 bushels more than we did in 1881. In 1877, we consumed 599,737 more bushels of American oats than we did in the year 1881, and in 1878, we consumed 1,999,153 more bushels of United States oats than we did in the year 1881, showing that in 1881 we had a home market for 7,302,000 bushels more of home grown grain than the average for the years 1877 and 1878. That is sufficient, I think, to establish pretty clearly that the home market for the farmers of Canada, with an increased price in certain seasons, gives them what they would not possess if that home market was open to the Americans to send in their produce free as they have done down to 1878 or 1879. Considering the fact that the farmer, as well as the laborer, the artisan and the masses of the people, pay no more for the goods they consume than they did in 1878; considering that he has the home market free from competition to a very great extent, for such products as I have named as well as vegetables, fruit and other articles that may be considered perishable, and securing higher prices than he did before; I think it will be difficult to convince him that, under the present policy, he is not benefitted, and to induce him, under any circumstances, to oppose a policy that has so increased the value of his produce. Having dealt with these points I desire to deal with another objection, and that is that the ill-feeling that would be created in England from the adoption of this policy would affect our credit there. I answered that last Session, and in this way: that in 1878 the securities of New South Wales, which were the highest colonial securities in the English market, sold from 4 to 5 per cent. above Canadian; that while Canadian 4 per cent. securities had increased from about 89 or 90 to 104, that the other colonial securities had not increased in like proportion; that then Canadian securities were 1 per cent. above those of New South Wales, and therefore their increased value was not solely attributable to the abundance of money and the lower rate of interest. I am in a position to state to-day, that our securities are 2 per cent. above those of New South Wales, showing a relative increase over last year, and standing, as they stood then, at the very top of every colonial security that is offered in the English market, and next to Consols. In this connection, I may remind honorable members that I laid on the Table of the House, a few days ago, the particulars of an arrangement made with our agents for the transaction of our business for ten years. Messrs. Baring and Glyn, Mills & Co. have acted as the agents of Canada for many years; and down to 1873 and 1874 the arrangements made by old Canada and the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were, that they were to receive 1 per cent. for the negotiation of loans, 1 per cent. on their redemption, and 1 per cent. for the payment of interest on the coupons. Since then an arrangement was made by which the percentage on the coupons was reduced to $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on bonds issued after 1873. It was in contemplation, when our High Commissioner was appointed to London, to make arrangements by which that agency should become a financial agency as well, and I stated to the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), who put some questions to me last Session and the Session before, that this matter was delayed, owing to a difficulty that had arisen with the agents, as they claimed that outstanding bonds having been issued, payable at the offices of Messrs. Baring and Glyn, Mills & Co. they had the right, as long as they were in a position to do so, to redeem them and receive the commission. As it was likely to lead to a controversy which neither party desired to bring about, the result was that a proposition was made to Sir Alexander Gait by our agents, that, for the future, commencing on the 1st of January last—and that proposal was accepted—the commission for paying all coupons would be uniform, namely, $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That saves \$15,000 yearly in commissions to agents. Then we have \$35,000,000 that may be redeemed in 1885. We have arranged in this contract, and instead of their receiving 1 per cent. on the redemption of these securities—they have agreed to exchange 4 per cent., or possibly securities bearing a lower rate of interest, with the holders of the 5 per cent. securities, who may desire to do so—that is, redeem them by an issue of new debentures for $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., which, if we paid 1 per cent. for the redemption, and even $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for the negotiation of the new loan, would save 1 per cent. on \$35,000,000, making a saving of \$350,000 on that transaction. Now, Sir, I think I have pretty thoroughly answered the objections made in 1878 to this policy, and answered them by facts gathered from the Public Accounts, facts gathered from the Trade Returns, facts gathered as I accept them from reliable men, but of course subject to correction, and if they are not correct we wish to have them corrected. We want to have the facts with reference to this matter and then we shall know precisely where we stand; but we present them here believing them to be correct, and consequently proving that our case is strong, and that the fears entertained by hon. gentlemen opposite were groundless. Let us look again for a few moments before I close, at the operations of this Tariff. How has it affected the different interests of this country? Take, for instance, the owners of bank stocks, it has not injured them. The stock owned in Ontario and Quebec to-day, at the quoted prices of sales made within a week, is \$20,000,000 above what the quoted sales in 1879 would produce. Has it hurt the manufacturers? It has not, because while they say they are selling goods less than they did before, business has largely increased. They are working full time, making prompt sales, and their increased productions, at even a lower price, have given them better profits than before. Have the men employed by the manufacturers suffered? They have not, because we find that in the cases where they have not had an increase of wages they have had constant employment instead of short time as before. In many cases they have not only constant employment but they work overtime, and their position is better than it was before. How is it with the laborer to-day? He has plenty of employment in every part of the Dominion.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Plenty of employment. I say that, and I am surprised that any hon. gentleman would say no.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No? Well, Sir, his position is infinitely improved, at all events, as compared with what it was before the adoption of the present Tariff. We do not now find the Government compelled to ask Parliament to authorize the construction of Public Works, in order to give work to unemployed men. How is it, Sir, with reference to the merchant. The wholesale merchant tells us that his trade has been doubled last year compared with that of 1879, and 50 per cent. larger than that of 1880, that he has had prompt payments, that there have been fewer bankruptcies, fewer losses than he has known before. How is it, Sir, with the shipowner? The shipowners are at this moment probably feeling less the changes that have taken place in the industries and general interests of the country than any other people. There are circumstances affecting the shipping interests of Canada that cannot well be reached by legislation. One is the fact that the iron ships of the old world are rapidly taking the place of the wooden vessels of the new, built by our own ship-builders. We give a drawback that is more than sufficient to make up for the additional duty imposed on the materials used in the construction of ships, and I give as an evidence of this fact that but one builder out of the eighteen or twenty who sent in their claims for drawbacks asked more than the 75 cents allowed. The drawback gives the builder more than he pays in additional duty, and, in many cases, gives a return equal to the whole duty he pays.

Mr. KILLAM. But the Government fixed an arbitrary drawback.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Of course we did.

Mr. KILLAM: If the amount was arbitrarily fixed, what was the use of any man asking more?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am speaking of the applications made before the adoption of the specific rate. Applications that were made to the Minister of Customs when it was announced to the shipowners that the extra duties they paid upon materials entering into the construction of ships, would be returned to them. But one of them made a claim above the 75 cents per ton subsequently fixed upon, and many of them claimed not more than half that sum. And, Sir, we now come forward with a new proposition—bounties on a certain class of vessels. The construction will give employment to our people in building suitable vessels for the fishermen. We are doing everything we can do to protect that interest, though, I admit, it is not possible to grant the same aid as to some other industries. How is it with the lumber interest. It is said the Government have done nothing for that. To a certain extent I admit it. We may have increased the cost of the oats and of blankets, if the lumberman buys those shoddy articles upon which a duty of 45 per cent. is paid. If we except those two articles, it will be difficult for the lumberman to show that he pays any increased taxation that does not go into the Treasury as his share of the $2,500,000 necessary to make up deficits of past years. It would, I admit, be difficult for us to show any great direct benefit given to them, but I throw out this idea. It is now well understood that after three years operation of this Tariff, that houses that were unoccupied before have no longer "to let" on them; that there is an increased demand in all parts of the Dominion for lumber for home consumption, as compared with 1878, for new buildings, and every thousand or million feet sold for use in our home markets decreases by just so much the amount that would otherwise be exported, and it is well known by those who live in the Maritime Provinces how much the prices in American and English markets depend upon the stocks placed upon those markets. The lumber we manufactured in 1878 and could not consume here, was thrown, in addition to the ordinary shipments, upon the English and American markets, reducing its value there. Providing an increased demand at home is the measure of relief afforded to the lumber trade. How is it with the mining industry? Has there been nothing done for that? Has nothing been done for the coal industry, by increasing its output 400,000 tons last year, and it would have been increased still more but for the accident at the Albion mine? There are two smelting furnaces where there was one before—and there is a proposition now, and capital paid in, for smelting works in Montreal. There are before the Government now propositions that may result in the establishment of other iron industries; but take the facts as they are, they show that the policy is doing something for this industry. I have already explained the effect of the Tariff upon the farming interest; I have shown that the farmer has a home market and higher prices owing to American produce being largely shut out, while the articles he consumes are not higher than they were before. Look at the railway interest. It was thought the operation of the Tariff would tend to diminish the amount of their traffic. If we could make a careful account of the manufactured goods carried over the railways, we would find that the revenue from these sources have largely increased. Comparing what they carried from the sea-ports in 1877-78, and what they carry from the sea-ports to-day, and add the manufactures from the various factories that are sending their products all over the Dominion, it will be found that the railway proprietors have a large interest in this new policy. Every interest in the country has been, in my judgment, largely and materially benefitted. This policy, supplemented with our legislation securing the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has combined to place us in the enviable position we now occupy—the best position of any people on the face of the earth. Let us look at it for a moment. Here we are, with large expenditures ahead, it is true, but with a rich, fertile and illimitable domain which will pay off largely the indebtedness that will be incurred in its development—nay more, the portion of it which was required for the maintenance of our police and Indians, and for the preservation of peace in that country, will all be reimbursed out of the proceeds of these lands; and if it were not for the consideration, a high consideration, I admit, a consideration that can not be overlooked by this Parliament, without injury to the country—that it is desirable to give to the people of the old world and the inhabitants of our own Dominion, free homes in that great North-West, we could realize in a few years, if they were put up at public auction, the money that would pay back, not only the expenditure up to the present time, but down to the completion of the railway. But it will come in the future; our public debt will be decreased, our annual interest will be reduced, and we shall occupy the proud position of being able to offer to the industrious and honest men, who cannot find work in the old world, a home here, with free lands, a country girdled with railways, and a canal system the best in the world, with institutions that will protect their lives, their properties and their rights, and that will afford a refuge for the oppressed men if there be any in any part of the old world. We will open our arms to them all, and bid them welcome, and make the Dominion of Canada, as I said in my closing remarks in a former speech, what Providence has designed it to be, one of the greatest, richest countries in the world, one we may be proud to belong to, especially by every man who has advocated and supported the policy that has in three years raised us to our present enviable position, a policy that will not be repealed, a policy that will be sustained either by gentlemen opposite, or by those on this side, for the will of the people will demand its permanency. Under these circumstances, we feel a pride and a satisfaction in meeting Parliament and presenting our case, and we are prepared to vindicate our position here and elsewhere, and we know that, at the close of this Session, when the arguments on both sides have been heard, and we have met our opponents face to face—as we are now stronger in the country than we were in 1878—we will be still stronger at the close of the Session than we are now, and that when the time comes to ask the people for the endorsement of our policy they will sustain us and send us back here to perfect and continue the policy we have inaugurated.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker: It is my pleasing duty, on the present occasion, to compliment the hon. the Minister of Finance on one important improvement on his previous practice. Until now, Sir, we have not, although he cannot say we have not urged and spurred him on, we have never been able to induce that hon. gentleman to bring down his Budget to Parliament in a reasonable time after the opening of the Legislature, and much valuable time has thereby been lost, wasted, I may say, to very little purpose. Now, Sir, although the hon. gentleman has been very slow, and very long in following the good example set under the Administration of my hon. friend, still even in this the eleventh, or it may be the twelfth, hour of this Parliament, we rejoice to hail ever so slight an improvement in this matter. I only wish I could push my congratulations further, and that the same improvement, which has been manifested in the expedition with which he has brought down his estimates, had been displayed in their preparation. I would that, besides copying us in the speed with which they were produced, he had also copied us in the economy with which they were framed; I would that he had produced a policy that might, in some small degree, justify the vaunts with which he has just concluded his exposition of that policy. It is not always particularly easy to follow that hon. gentleman. What between the subtlety of the hon. gentleman's logic and the complexity of the hon. gentleman's grammar, what between the curious convolutions of his arguments and the curious convolutions of his sentences now and then, if I should make a mistake and sometimes not clearly understand what he means, I must say I am not entirely to blame, and although he may not have any very great consideration for us on this side of the House—we do not expect it, and do not generally receive it—he ought, I think, to have some little consideration for those willing and faithful followers who are so ready to accept every statement that hon. gentleman may be pleased to make, either this year, or the year before, or the year before that. The hon. gentleman has given us, to-night, a new series of kaleidoscopic views of the beauties of the National Policy. If any of his followers happen to be afflicted with a sense of logic or good memories, they must be somewhat puzzled to reconcile the position occupied by that hon. gentleman to-night, with the position which that hon. gentleman has taken on many previous occasions. Sir, I think it would be well that the hon. gentleman should decide finally, what his followers are to believe on some of these important questions. Are we to understand, as we understood from that hon. gentleman not very long time ago, that it is a great misfortune for the people of this country if the balance of trade be against them; or are we to understand that it is a good thing, if the balance of trade be in their favor under certain circumstances; or are we to understand, as I rather think he would have us understand, that it is a good thing to have the balance of trade in our favor if we happen to have a deficit, but a very bad thing indeed to have it in our favor, when having it in our favor would prevent us having a surplus. Now, on the present occasion, the hon. gentleman, although on other occasions he was very loud in discussing this matter of the balance of trade, has said nothing about the important fact that the balance of trade is very seriously against the Dominion of Canada for the past year. He was pleased to tell us that he had an excess of several millions of dollars over the sum he expected to raise, but he left it somewhat dubious whether an excess of several millions of dollars is to be held as a proof of the wonderful accuracy of his estimates, or as a proof that he succeeded in his leap in the dark. He has left it a mystery to us whether the real virtue, the real blessing the National Policy has bestowed upon us, is, as he told us three years ago, to reduce imports in every way, or whether the real end and purpose of his National Policy is to stimulate imports and thereby create a surplus? Are we to understand, after perusing these figures, after looking through our Public Accounts, that the hon. gentleman holds it to be the best proof possible of prudent statesmanship, that he has succeeded in doubling the taxes, and in doubling the expenditure of the people of Canada within some thirteen years? Are we to understand the hon. gentleman still continues of the mind that it is desirable for us to take it out of the Americans, as he put it a few years ago; and are we to look upon this remarkable increase which the last year's Trade Returns show of the imports from the United States, as a proof of the success of this policy of taking it out of the Americans? He tells us that everything, or almost everything, is cheaper now, that we have more taxes imposed upon almost everything. Is he prepared to follow that to the logical result and put on more taxes, so that we may ultimately get these things for nothing. The hon. gentleman was loud in explaining to the House that a certain number of thousands of hands, as to which I will say something presently, have been added to our population by his policy; but the hon. gentleman said nothing, for reasons which will presently appear, about the exodus which his friends at any rate choose to assert took place under the Administration of my hon. friend, or perhaps he has got new light upon that subject? Has he discovered that this prodigious exodus has resulted, according to the Census, in the remarkable circumstance that the great Province of Quebec, by the Census, grew twice as fast, while my hon. friend presided over the destinies of the country, as in the decade before? The hon. gentleman alluded most gingerly to the fact that a very short while ago, a very few years ago, he, an old Minister of Finance, had formally and solemnly stated his conviction that $22,500,000 were ample to carry on the affairs of the Government of Canada. That was his statement before the last election. Now I find, in the year just closed, he spent $25,500,000, or $26,000,000 if we include the sum spent on Dominion lands. I find he asks for about $27,000,000 for the service for the present year, and we all heard him tell us he expected to require $27,750,000, without including Supplementary Estimates and without counting $450,000 for Dominion Lands, for the year 1882-83. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman will do well, at another time, to take some opportunity to explain the trifling contradictions which appear to be involved in the several statements made by him; and when the hon. gentleman glories in the surplus he has got and calls upon us to admire him because, owing to circumstances over which he had no control, we have a surplus of $4,000,000, or thereabouts, to-day, I, in turn, ask how that was got?

Of that $1,100,000 are derived from those two most odious and oppressive taxes, which were never imposed in any civilized country before—under similar circumstances at least—the taxes on breadstuffs and on fuel. And if we added the expenditure on Dominion Lands, we would find that—deducting these two taxes which ought never to be imposed, and which could only be defended by the most extreme fiscal necessities, and adding a sum which for the purposes of comparison at least should be added—the hon. gentleman's surplus of $4,000,000 would shrink to $2,500,000. I can understand, and I am quite prepared to admit, that there are circumstances under which a surplus is just cause for congratulation. We have known in the past some such circumstances. I remember very well, under the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, when, without adding one penny to the burdens of the people of this country, from its natural growth and increase, a surplus relatively quite as large as this of which the hon. gentleman boasts, was obtained by Sir Francis Hincks. I admit that that was a fair and just ground for congratulation. Had this surplus been so obtained I would admit that it was a fair and just ground for congratulation; but what does the reality show? The reality shows the most oppressive system of taxation. The facts are these: The statements made by myself and my hon. friend, which the hon. gentleman has no doubt inadvertently misquoted, have been verified to the letter. Those statements were these: I told the hon. Minister that if he aimed to obtain revenue, he would find his Tariff was a total failure so long as the exports of the country continued low, and so long as there was no general improvement; but that the moment our exports increased, the moment that the general improvement, which I foresaw would shortly arrive, came, that moment the Tariff which he chose to abrogate would, without any further burdening the people, have produced fully as large a surplus as the hon. gentleman has boasted of to-day—at all events fully as large a surplus if you deduct those obnoxious duties on coal and breadstuffs. What did my hon. friend beside me state? The hon. member pointed out what has since proved to be correct, that whereas the hon. gentleman stated that all he needed was $2,000,000, he had so grossly overloaded the taxation, and had gone so far beyond what was actually required, that this Tariff would produce $7,000,000 instead of $2,000,000 the moment our trade improved. The facts were that the $7,000,000 which my hon. friend stated would be produced, and more, were taken out of the pockets of the people when only $2,000,000 were required. Now, I will tell the hon. gentleman what were the conditions, in my judgment, at all events, under which the National Policy might fairly claim to be credited with this surplus and improvement. Let those hon. gentlemen show, if they can, that those increased exports, on which the whole increased imports depend, are due to the National Policy. Let them show that the increased imports are due to the National Policy, and then I, for my part, will freely and fully admit that the National Policy has had something to do with the increase of this surplus. But, Mr. Speaker, if we find that facts utterly and entirely contradict that absurd assertion, that the exports have increased from causes over which those hon. gentlemen could exercise no more control than over the procession of the equinoxes; if we find they are due absolutely and wholly to the increase in the lumber trade, exports of animals and their products, and of agricultural produce,—then I say those hon. gentlemen stand condemned as imposters who have laid claim to an improvement which their policy was not able to prevent, but which it certainly did nothing to create or stimulate. What are the broad facts of the case? They are these: that in 1879 we exported, exclusive of bullion and estimated short returns, $60,000,000 worth of products; that in 1880 we exported $70,000,000, and in 1881, very nearly $81,000,000. Now, Sir, how was that made up? Why, in two years, from 1879 to 1881, our exports of the forests rose from $13,250,000 to $25,000,000—$12,000,000 of that $20,000,000 were due to the increased exports of lumber—and in the case of animals and their products, the exports rose from $14,000,000 to $21,333,000. There, Sir, you have the whole increase. Does the hon. member expect we would believe, will he even venture to assert here that his policy has contributed to the increase of the exports of lumber or of animals and their products from the Dominion? If he does, I wish that he or some of his friends would condescend to show us how. I shall show him and this House, and I think the country, that what his policy has done in that direction has been to retard and injure the growth of those two great industries, that the hon. gentleman is not entitled to an iota of credit for the increase of exports which have taken place, and out of which the imports have been paid. How does the hon. gentleman propose to deal with these facts—facts contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns, and as well known to him as to hon. members on this side of the House. But probably, Sir, the hon. gentleman, as he has dealt with other difficulties, will not deal with them at all. The hon. gentleman is, however, blessed with colleagues a little more logical than himself, and I will give to the House an extract from a speech made by one of his colleagues, in which an explanation is offered tending to show that the National Policy, the policy of taxing everything that the producers of these articles use, did contribute to increase our exports of lumber and our exports of agricultural and animal products. On a certain occasion the hon. Minister of Public Works was banquetted in the good city of Hamilton, and after dinner the hon. gentleman was good enough to explain how it was that the National Policy had contributed to the increase of these exports. "The fact is," said he, "that as soon as that great policy was proclaimed, so great was the immediate revival of confidence in the people, that they at once set to work to plough more land, to grow more crops, and to raise more cattle." Well, the hon. gentleman, in order to establish his friends' case, found it necessary to assert this. But if the hon. gentlemen had been with me, a few weeks later, when I read that wonderful exposition of the effects of the National Policy to a couple of thousand of the best agriculturists in Western Canada, and heard the shouts of uncontrollable laughter which greeted it, he would have understood that, although logical, it was not likely to be effective, at any rate, with the hard-headed farmers of Western Canada. When I asked those 2,000 farmers, numbering among them as good agriculturists as can be found in the Dominion, and among whom were a great many supporters of the hon. Minister of the Interior, whether there was one among them who had been induced by the immediate revival of confidence to set to work and plough more land, grow more crops and raise more cattle, not one could be found to stand up and say he had grown a bushel more of grain or a pound more of beef. The actual fact is in direct contradiction to this ingenious theory. Immediately on the introduction of that policy, as every one acquainted with Western Canada knows, there was a large and lamentable exodus of many of the best farmers of the western region, not, I am sorry to say, to our own North-West, but to Dakota, Minnesota and other portions of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. And to Texas and Kansas.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. If the policy had any effect at all it was not to increase the number of acres under plough or the amount of crops and cattle raised, but sensibly and materially to diminish them. I said, and I repeat, that the hon. gentleman's Tariff, as a revenue Tariff, was an utter failure, as low as our exports continued small. Take the Revenue Returns for 1879 and those for 1880, and you will find deficits ranging from two to one and a-half million dollars; and not until these exports increased to the figure which I named was there the slightest sign of expansion or the slightest appearance of the surplus of which the hon. gentleman boasts. It is clear, I think, clear to demonstration, that had we had to-day the Tariff which existed in 1878, we would have had ample revenue without adding one iota to the burdens of the people. I invite the attention of the House to this simple fact. In 1875, our total exports amounted to $67,500,000; in 1881, to $81,000,000. Now, it is known to all practical men that the volume of our imports, and consequently our revenue, is necessarily regulated by the volume of our exports for the preceding year or two. Therefore, it is clear that if, in 1881, we exported, as we did export, $14,000,000 worth more than in 1875, our revenue, under my Tariff, would have proportionately increased. What was the revenue in 1875? The revenue from Customs amounted to $15,361,000. Now, if you make proportional allowance for the very large increase of exports which took place between 1881 and 1875, you will see that I am stating the literal fact when I say that, so far as it is possible to calculate in a matter of that kind, there is not the slightest or remotest doubt that, with such an export as we had in 1881, that Tariff would have produced at least $18,000,000, and that without at all burdening the people. But the hon. gentleman was good enough to allude, although in a gingerley fashion, as I said, to the fact that our imports at present were slightly in excess of our exports. I dare say the House will recollect that in a public document, emanating from a brother colleague, great credit was taken and great stress laid upon the fact that, although there was a deficit, yet for the first time in the history of the Dominion, the exports—in 1880—had exceeded our imports. Well, I am not going to delay the House by entering into a disquisition on the merits of the balance of trade theory. I am, I confess, myself of the opinion, which does not appear to be shared by hon. gentlemen opposite, that if we are lucky enough to exchange £60,000,000 or $70,000,000 worth of goods for $80,000,000 or $90,000,000 worth, we are largely the gainers by the transaction. That is a theory, however, which men like Smith and Mills, Peel and Gladstone, Cobden, Bright and Fawcett, are still deluded enough to entertain, but it is not the theory of the hon. Minister of Finance. That hon. gentleman entertains quite a different idea. First of all, let me correct one error into which he has fallen. The hon. gentleman has chosen to include in the relative amount of exports and imports, what are called short returns in inland ports. Now, I do not think he is quite right in including those, for two reasons.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not include them.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Those short returns are but a mere matter of guess-work.

Mr. BOWELL. Has not that been practiced for the past ten years?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I am quite aware of that, and in making my statements I have usually called attention to the fact that it is a mere matter of surmise, but there is special reason why this should not be counted in just now. As every man who lives on the frontier knows, there exists now what did not exist before, an enormous importation of smuggled goods into this country quite as much as any short returns from inland ports in the United States. Taking what are known and proved to have been exported, and what we know we imported, leaving out short returns on the one hand and smuggled goods on the other, you will find that the balance of trade is just $10,000,000 against us. Let us read what the hon. Minister of

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

Finance said on this subject three years ago. I quote from his own Budget Speech of 1879. He said:

"There are other difficulties. The volume of imports has not much diminished. Regarding the matter as I do, I think it is to be regretted that the volume of imports has not been materially reduced."

This was at a time when the volume of imports was $80,000,000:—

"I look upon large imports ever since the Dominion was organized, showing a large balance of trade against us, as one of the causes of the troubles with which we have to contend, one of the difficulties that it is our duty to remedy. Imports have been decreasing to a certain extent, but are still very large, showing distinctly and clearly, in my judgment, that they ought still to be further diminished. It appears to me that we should turn our attention to the best means of reducing the volume of our imports from all parts of the world."

That is his policy as expounded in 1879, when our imports amounted to nearly $80,000,000; but we find that now, that our imports, exclusive of bullion, amount to $90,488,000, the hon. gentleman has not a word to say about the duty of the Government to remedy this state of things if possible, about it being apparent to him that we ought to turn our attention to the best means of reducing the volume of our imports from all parts of the world. It may be news, or it may not be news, to the hon. gentleman to know that in the Mother Country, to which he was just inviting us to direct our attention in connection with some other matters, during the last twenty-five years, the balance of trade against England was something like two thousand millions of pounds sterling, or ten thousand millions of dollars. That he will find, if he chooses to look up the English Trade and Navigation Returns. It might interest him also to know that in spite of that, the English imports of bullion were about $500,000,000 more during the same period than the English exports of bullion. Now, I am in no respect concerned about this same disastrous balance of trade, but I do submit, Sir, that unless there has been a total reversal of the laws which, according to the hon. gentleman, ought to govern our conduct in these matters, then I suppose that this $10,000,000 against us is a most deplorable fact, and the hon. gentleman ought, as he said he would, to turn his best attention to remedy this terrible flow of imports from all parts of the world. Sir, the hon. gentleman has one ground—and only one—for contesting these statements. If the hon. gentleman be prepared to show that he and his colleagues were really the authors of the good crops which have increased our exports, and, which is also an important factor in the case, that they have contrived that there should be bad crops elsewhere, and so add to the prices which we receive for our goods, then I would say that the hon. gentleman had made out a case for his National Policy, but not till then, unless he is prepared to declare that the great expansion of business in the United States, to which an extremely large proportion of his surplus revenue is due, was caused by his having taxed considerably more every article which the Americans had to send us. When we speak of the injury inflicted by this over taxation, I would call the attention of the House and the hon. gentleman to this well-known fact; whenever you attempt to raise a revenue by heavy indirect taxation you must of necessity add very largely to the burden of the people, over and above the amount which goes into the Treasury. That, there is no possibility of avoiding, nor will all the calculations which the hon. gentleman has given in the slightest degree affect a fact so well proven as that. Now, Sir, it is not a point which necessarily militates against the National Policy per se. It is conceivable, it may be argued, that so great are the other advantages of that policy that it is worth our while to submit to a taxation of thirty or forty, or fifty millions in order to enjoy it; but there can be no excuse for concealing the self-evident fact that whenever you raise a revenue by indirect taxation, you so hamper commerce in a thousand ways, you so interfere with profitable production, that you add most enormously to the cost to the taxpayer; and that when you put $4,000,000 into the Treasury, even under an ordinary revenue Tariff, when the rate of taxation is not high, you certainly take at least $5,000,000 out of the pocket of the taxpayer. When you do it under a Tariff like this, it is almost impossible to estimate the total amount, but it is certainly vastly in excess of twenty-five per cent. True, there is the converse to that. After you have raised your taxes to a certain point you may then without fear go on and add as much as you please. But, except in very few cases, that has not been done by us, and my position is briefly this: although it is true the hon. gentleman has secured $4,000,000 of a surplus in the Treasury, it is none the less true that under his Tariff he has done that at an enormous cost to this country—a cost, I believe, of not less than eight or nine million dollars; and I will tell him, for one thing, and will show him presently, that in one article alone, that of sugar, he has taken $4,000,000 out of the pockets of the people, and put $2,500,000 into the Treasury. Now, I will take two special points touched upon by that hon. gentleman. First of all, I propose to refer to a question of great interest to the masses of this community, and that is the greatly increased cost of living. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman and his friends are apt to deal with this question by general assertions, not giving details, as, indeed, he dealt with it to-night. They do not appear to be able to see that these arguments are self-contradictory, self-condemnatory. If these men are able to produce these things as cheaply as they could elsewhere, what need have we, or what need have they, for a protective Tariff? Why, Sir, the case is clear. It is because, and only because, certain Canadian manufacturers, as a rule, cannot produce as cheaply as those of other countries—that they require to shut out, by a Tariff wall, the products of other countries. Probably the hon. gentleman does not hear the complaints of the poor. He does not hear the complaints of men with small fixed incomes. The hon. gentleman has been of late consorting with men who are making their thousands and tens of thousands in the operation of this Tariff, who have the greatest possible desire, and, I fear, the greatest possible inclination, to prevent that hon. gentleman from appreciating fully the mischief he has done, and in concealing from him the facts which he ought to know, and some of which, at least, I hope to bring to his attention to-night. The hon. gentleman cannot see how he has increased the cost of living; the hon. gentleman does not know, apparently, that on every yard of coarse tweed the poor man uses, his Tariff compels him to pay 25 or 30, or 40 per cent.—not more perhaps than in 1878, which has very little to do with the matter—but 25 or 30, or 40 per cent. more than that same article could be obtained for elsewhere, if it was not for his Tariff. The hon. gentleman cannot understand how he has added to the cost of living, when on every yard of coarse cotton, the man who consumes it is obliged to pay one-third more, at the fair market price, than if there were no tax and no Tariff to pay. He cannot understand how the man who purchases a pair of coarse blankets finds the cost of living increased when he is compelled to pay 60 per cent. more than the article would cost could he purchase it in bond without the duty paid. He cannot understand how the cost of living is increased, when, on every gallon of coal oil the poorest man consumes, he has to pay from 15 to 20 cents more than it could be obtained for, but for his Tariff, and but for the absurd and mischievous regulations which, in the interest of a monopoly, he has imposed on its inspection. He cannot understand how it comes to pass that the cost of living has increased, though he knows that on every barrel of sugar weighing 300 pounds the public have to pay $9 more than they would pay, if there were no taxes at all, and the hon. gentleman cannot see this, he cannot understand it, he merely denies the fact, and I venture to say that if in the course of his peregrinations through the country he will call on my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie), when he happens to be in Sarnia, and if he will go across the river to Port Huron, my hon. friend will be able to show him, in the course of half an hour's walk, a variety of shops in which he will be able to procure sundry of those articles at the prices I have named and much cheaper than he could purchase the same articles on this side of the border. Or if he will accompany my hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Wiser), or my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Gunn), either of these gentlemen will be able to show him a precisely similar state of things. I would like to ask that hon. gentleman whether it ever occurred to him why it is that people smuggle goods across the line. What extreme and absurd folly it would be for a man to run the risk of the penalties provided against smuggling, if he could obtain goods as cheaply in Canada as he could in the United States. I tell him this, and I make my statement on the authority of one of the largest importers of dry goods in the Dominion, that there are merchants in the United States who are prepared to deliver goods in Canada to any of the hon. gentleman's supporters who want to earn an honest penny under the Tariff, at the rate of some 10 per cent. higher than the invoice prices in the United States, but they do not calculate to pay the 35 or 40 per cent. duty when the hon. gentlemen's Tariff levies upon them. As I said before all these things are mysteries to my hon. friend apparently, but when the hon. gentleman comes to deal with the duty on coal, then all the hon. gentleman's wanted astuteness returns. He is prepared to explain that; he is prepared to do more, to illustrate his explanation, and a most remarkable illustration it is. Not long ago I saw a quotation from an eloquent speech of his, in which dealing with this question of coal, he gave an explanation not differing very much from that with which he favored us a little time ago. What the hon. gentleman says in the matter of this duty of coal, is, I had my difficulties once, but now everything is plain. Sometimes the consumer pays the duty, and sometimes the producer. The hon. gentleman went on to illustrate his position by telling the story of the student, who was asked whether the sun went round the earth, or the earth went round the sun, and who compromised the matter by declaring that sometimes the earth went round the sun and sometimes the sun went round the earth. It is much to be regretted that we have not the advantage of securing the services of that student amongst us. I am convinced that, under the guidance of the hon. gentleman, he could be trained into a most admirable Protectionist Finance Minister. There is the right raw material, the accommodating nature, the reluctance to push things to extremes which so eminently characterize that hon. gentleman. I am prepared to endorse him myself to some extent. I am prepared to admit that the consumer pays the duty just as often as the earth goes round the sun, and that the producer pays the duty just as often as the sun goes round the earth. But, Sir, doctors, and even colleagues will differ on these questions now and then, and I have observed that the hon. gentleman's colleagues, in dealing with this question of the duty on coal, have not always taken the view that he takes. We are aware that, not long ago, an election took place in the Province of Nova Scotia in which the Minister of Railways took a very active part, and this was how he explained the duty on coal to a listening audience at Pictou: "The policy of the Liberals," said the hon. gentleman, "is to take the duty off coal and saddle on you, the people of Nova Scotia, your share of the $500,000 now paid into the revenue of the one and a half millions of Ontarians. And he went on, the day after, to say that "The people of Ontario paid $400,000 of taxes on coal, of which taxes Nova Scotia is relieved, and Mr. Carmichael," said the hon. gentleman, "is anxious that Nova Scotia shall be saddled with it," and that is a statesman-like utterance calculated to remove entirely all those fears of disunion and sectionalism which the hon. Minister of Finance so justly deplored should be excited among our population; and I think, if I am not mistaken, the Minister of Railways went on to point out to his Nova Scotia audience that Ontario interests were greatly at a discount in this matter of coal. He said, and said truly, that you can get coal at the pit's mouth for 50 or 60 cents a ton, while they have to pay $4.50 or $5 a ton, and we have given you people of Nova Scotia an additional protection of 50 or 60 cents in addition to the natural production at $4.50, to enable you to deal with these million and a half of cumberers of the earth of the Province of Ontario. Other gentlemen who are deserving of the notice of this House, have a still different story to tell with respect to this coal duty. Here is what the President of the largest railway at present existing in Canada, has to say:—"Materials of all kinds," says Sir Henry Tyler, "are dearer than they were ever before, and in particular the price of coal has increased to the extent of the duty imposed. He could hardly conceive of anything more injurious in a nation like Canada than to place a duty on coal." That was the opinion of the President of the Grand Trunk Railway,—slightly different from the opinion of the Minister of Finance; and as his company pays some $50,000 or $60,000 of that impost he may be supposed to know something, at all events, of what he was talking about. I would like to know whether those shivering wretches, who have to experience extremity of our cold winter weather when the thermometer is 20 degrees below zero, have anything to say with regard to the benevolence which adds 50 or 60 cents to the price of each ton of coal they purchase. I cannot better conclude my remarks on the subject than by giving to the House a resolution which was introduced by a very distinguished and notable colleague of the hon. gentleman, a man who looms large in the public eye, no less a person than the present Speaker of the Senate, on this question. Some few years ago, the Hon. Mr. Macpherson moved in the Senate:

"That in the opinion of this House, by subjecting the duty of Customs as proposed in the bill—breadstuffs of any kind, or rice, coal and coke, salt or any of the natural products enumerated in Schedule C of the present Tariff, and which at present are admitted into Canada free of duty—a principle would be introduced that would be partial in its operation between the Provinces constituting the Dominion, that would distribute the burden of taxation unequally and vexatiously amongst the people, that would injuriously disturb trade and tend to engender sentiments of sectionalism and disunion in the minds of the people of Canada."

Well, Sir, we on this side of the House may be pardoned if we entertain some doubts as to which of the three—the President of the Senate, the hon. Minister of Finance, or the hon. Minister of Railways—has exactly got at the true inwardness of the same duty on coal. The hon. Minister of Finance finds it impossible to see how this Tariff can be unfair to the mass of the population. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman, I observe, when he wants to ascertain how a duty is going to affect the consumer, how it is going to affect the great mass of the people, wisely goes to the manufacturer of the article which is to be protected. He finds out what the producer thinks; but what the consumer thinks or feels appears, and perhaps is, to him a matter of comparative indifference. Now, Sir, I have pursued, I am bound to say, a different plan. When I want to ascertain how a system of taxes affects the poorer portion of the community, I endeavor to ascertain from those of them who keep accurate accounts of their domestic expenditure, what sums they spend on the various articles which are taxed, and in that way, I think, we can find out with some degree of precision what is the true incidence of the hon. gentleman's Tariff.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

Now, Sir, I have here two cases—one of a man earning about $300 a year, equal to about $1 per diem, and another of an artisan who receives about $400 a year, equal to about $1.50 per diem. Let us see how these men are taxed. I find that, in the latter instance, they are obliged to expend some $40 or $50 in the purchase of six tons of coal; I find that they are obliged to purchase about six barrels of flour, about 150 pounds of sugar, and to expend for clothing about $62 for a family of six; and they will consume some fourteen gallons of coal oil in the course of a year. Now, let us see how, on an income of $400 a year, these taxes will foot up. There is a specific tax on flour equal to $3, and a specific tax on coal equal to $3. On the coal oil they use, they are obliged to pay at least $2.50 more than, save for the operation of the tax, they could obtain that article for elsewhere, while on their clothing, which is necessarily the largest taxable item, taking the average of the hon. gentleman's Tariff, it is impossible that they should pay less than $21 a year. Their sugar costs them at least $5 in taxes, and if we put on the average allowance for excisable articles, we find that—without taking into account the vast variety of articles of food, bedding, tools, books, and other minor articles which every workingman uses—on an income of $400 a year, the absolute known Dominion taxes amount to not less than $43.50, not taking into account municipal taxes, which must average at least $10 a year more. In the same way, in the case of a family of five, living on an income of $300 a year, I find, allowing for excise taxes, that the taxation is not less than $37 a year, not counting municipal taxes. It may be, Sir, to the hon. Minister of Finance a matter of perfect insignificance that a man who receives an income of $300 a year should be taxed by the Dominion to the extent of $37, and that the man who has an income of $400 a year should be taxed to the extent of $43 for Dominion purposes; but I doubt extremely whether these men themselves are not beginning to wake up to the fact that they are taxed most oppressively and unjustly under the Tariff introduced by these hon. gentlemen. Sir, one of these men, a man of some education, wrote to a friend whom I employed to collect these facts—and I will give the hon. Minister of Finance a view of his tariff from the consumer's, and not the manufacturer's point of view. This is what this poor man has to write, and let the hon. gentleman ponder it well:

"I am certain of this—that under the revenue Tariff I was sickly. I had a good deal of broken days off work, but I was enabled to save from $30 to $40 a year. I have enjoyed good health during the last three or four years, and have been seldom a day off work."

Am I to think that the hon. gentleman imputes it to the National Policy, that this man enjoyed good health during the past three or four years.

"I have had to curtail my expenses considerably to meet the claims upon me every Saturday, and as to saving anything, it is impossible."

Sir, that is the exact fact. The hon. gentleman did not and does not intend it, I dare say; but the effect of such taxation as I have depicted on such incomes as those I have referred to has been most undoubtedly to interfere, first of all with the comfort of the working classes, and then with their power to better their condition. There can be no doubt that this heavy taxation deprives these classes to a great extent of the power of making a home for themselves, that it greatly impedes the education of their children, that it deprives them of the power of obtaining luxuries which they are entitled to as much as the hon. gentleman or anybody else, and that it distinctly lowers the standard of comfort. Although I do not mean to say that the Tariff is wholly responsible—because I believe the price of provisions, which forms the largest portion of a laboring man's expenditure, has gone up—yet there can be no doubt that there has been a marked and sensible degradation in the standard of comfort enjoyed by these men. Now, Sir, there are important questions underlying this whole subject, to which the hon. gentleman would do well to attend. There is evidence in such statements as I have made—and that evidence comes to us from every quarter of the country—which goes to show that the hon. gentleman has done two things likely to be attended in the future with great mischief, for this country. He has sensibly lowered the standard of comfort among the working people, and he has to a very large extent, by artificial legislation, interfered with the due distribution of property, without adding one farthing to the national wealth collectively. Sir, the hon. gentleman knows, or the hon. gentleman ought to know, that all over the world at this moment thoughtful men, men of the highest station, of the highest intellectual attainments, are most desirous to see how, if it be possible by law, great fortunes may be prevented from being artificially created, and the proper distribution of great fortunes may be ensured, and he might, if he chose, learn from the straits to which our friends in the Mother Country are reduced, the risk of artificially creating great fortunes by operation of law. Now, Sir, I have no objection whatever to any man accumulating as large a fortune as he can by any honest and legitimate means. I do not mean to say that I regard it as the highest aim and object of life; and I may say this, that if that be regarded as the highest end and object of life we would not be engaged in politics, for my experience in politics is this, that although many men have entered office rich and left it poor, no honest and honorable man ever entered office poor and left it rich. But, Sir, be that as is may, my objection to his whole policy lies here, that what he has been doing is, as I said, to take many millions from the great mass of the people and to divide it among a very small and favored few. I do not mean to say that there is not something, in a political sense, to be said for the policy. The men among whom you are distributing the millions are likely to help you at election times. They may control votes, very likely, and very often they do, and no doubt, Sir, as in old times, the public may be debauched by the free use of part of the money which has been previously taken from them. But I do not regard that as statesmanship. I do not regard that as an honest policy. Nor do I believe, whatever the hon. Minister may say, that that is a policy which is likely to be attended with any great ultimate advantage to the country. Now, the hon. gentleman was extremely anxious to have us show what ground we had for our allegation that he was unjust to the farmers of Canada. Sir, I might remind him of the promises made, if not by him, at any rate by his followers and friends, that these farmers should most undoubtedly obtain better prices than those paid in the United States. The hon. gentleman himself must know that that is not the case, because he devoted a long and labored argument to show why it was that to-day prices are lower in Toronto than they are in Chicago. Well, Sir, I think the farmers of Canada will require some better explanation than the hon. gentleman has given to satisfy them that there can be any just cause for the condition of things which I find recorded at present as existing between these plans. Ordinarily speaking, Sir, in the days when my hon. friend was Premier, there was a very material difference in favor of Toronto against the Chicago markets. I take the dates of the 11th September, 1878, and I find there, Sir, that in Toronto wheat stood higher than in Chicago from 10 cents to 13 cents, that the market stood higher for oats about 8 cents, and for rye 11 cents. I turn to the date of January, 1882, and I find that the 13 cents advance have shrunk up to 4 cents. That oats are positively 3 cents lower in Toronto than in Chicago, and I find that rye is 10 cents lower and barley is 27 cents lower. Now, Sir, I would not say—I never have said, that the hon. gentleman's policy was solely responsible for that, but I do say that the onus lies on these gentlemen who promised farmers better terms—who promised them better prices—that the onus lies on them to show how it is that the promises were so completely and totally reversed, and after three years' experience of the National Policy prices of cereals are absolutely lower in our own markets than in the markets of the United States. Now, the hon. gentleman has one advantage, when he talks of the way in which taxes affect farmers. Very few farmers—very few people in any class of life keep accurate accounts of their expenditure. I find it a matter of great difficulty to obtain any reliable statements from my farming friends as to the amount that they purchase of dutiable articles, and as to the way the Tariff affects them. Nevertheless I have succeeded in finding one or two, and with the permission of the House I will call their attention to the way in which the present taxation affects our farmers when carrying on operations on anything like a considerable scale. I have here a statement in detail from an extremely respectable farmer of my own acquaintance, having a family of nine, in which he states that he has expended in the last year for clothing, dry-goods, millinery of all kinds, about $180; for hardware, $58; for a variety of agricultural implements, $180; harness, $40; for tea and sugar, $53; and for miscellaneous dutiable goods about $60, making in all about $571. I do not mean to say that this man is an ordinary example; he is a farmer of more than ordinary intelligence and of more than ordinary income; but I say this, that it is quite clear, applying the Tariff to the various classes of articles I have enumerated, that this man is contributing far more than his fair proportion of that duties to the revenue. I should estimate the taxes which man has to pay, at certainly not less than $150 a year, and I am quite well aware that there are a great many farmers, at any rate, in that part of the world where he resides, who are obliged to pay quite as much, and some even a larger sum to our revenue. Sir, when I listen to the hon. gentleman's enumeration of his gifts by the Tariff to the farmer, and when I remember what the cost is, that these farmers had to pay, my mind reverts to a certain story of a famous American, which the hon. gentleman may perhaps have heard of. I will take the liberty Sir, of calling his attention to the anecdote in question. Once upon a time, so Mr. Barnum relates, he found himself in desperate straits—he had no money, no credit, his character even was under a cloud—some petty difficulty about a contract, I believe, I do not know what; at any rate, Mr. Barnum was morally and financially nearly dead beat. Well, Sir, he goes on to narrate how, in this hour of extremest need, a brilliant inspiration, a flash of genius struck across him, and he determined to start a lottery on an entirely new principle. His lottery was to have no blanks, all were to be prizes—all classes, farmers, mechanics, merchants, importers and manufacturers, all were to have prizes in Mr. Barnum's lottery; and he also goes on to relate with great gusto how a very long time elapsed before the men who obtained prizes in this lottery discovered that the prizes on the average were worth about one-tenth of the cost of the lottery ticket. Well, Sir, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman or his chief has ever heard the story; if they did not copy Mr. Barnum in this particular it would only be one of the numerous instances with which history is studded, which show us how great minds, when they find themselves in similar difficulties, are apt to resort to similar expedients in order to get out of them. The hon. gentleman, to-day, informed us that he was about to make a new departure in political economy in this country at least. He is going to give, so he tells us, a bounty of considerable amount to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. Now, Sir, knowing how grievously oppressive his Tariff has been to that most deserving class of the community, knowing how much they have suffered under it, knowing how utterly impossible it is for him to help them, I do not know, Sir, that I should feel disposed to criticise him so much for relieving them to some extent, although it is a very curious argument in favor of a policy to take money out of one pocket and put it into another and call that granting relief to the people. But, Sir, I submit that, if he be right in redressing the injustice which he has laid upon the fishermen by his Tariff, there are other classes in this community who have a right to the same justice at his hands. If the fishermen are to have bounties, other classes of the community have a right to bounties too. The lumberman has a right to be indemnified for the increased cost to which this Tariff has put him. Why should one man receive a privilege more than another? Why should the maker of cotton cloth, the maker of woollen cloth be allowed to receive from one-third to one-half more than the fair market value of his article when he comes into competition with other goods made in other markets; and why should my agricultural friend not be allowed to receive one-third to one-half, or whatever the proportion may be, more than the absolute market value of every bushel of grain and every pound of beef, cheese and butter, that he may bring to market. I should like to know what reason the hon. gentleman can advance why he should not give bounties to that and the other class I have enumerated. Does he dare to say that the farmers are less deserving? Does he not know that on our farmers, more than on any other class, the whole prosperity of this Dominion depends, that above all other classes, except possibly the one class of fishermen, farmers have to dread and have to contend with foreign competitors, and how does he propose to help them in their fight with foreign competitors? He has weighted them down in every possible manner. He has added to the price of every article that they require to use. He has increased the cost of production of the articles they sell, and has done nothing whatever to advantage them in any shape or way. Sir, I say that whatever the hon. gentleman may think, he will find that farmers know as well as I do—I was going to say as well as he does—that the price of all the great staples which they produce has been, is, and will be, for many years to come, ruled by the price in the English and European markets, and that their real competitor is the American producer in fighting against whom this Tariff puts them at the highest disadvantage. Then, Sir, I proceed to ask, following the line of the hon. gentleman's argument, what has he done for the lumberman? To whom does he owe the surplus of which he boasts? The lumber industry has increased its exports $12,000,000. It has enabled us to buy $12,000,000 more of imports. Upon these imports he has raised those four millions. To whom does he owe more than he does to the lumbermen? Here, again, I prefer to go to the fountain head. I have tried to find out for myself what the opinion of the lumbermen of Canada may happen to be as to the merits of the hon. gentleman's Tariff, and I received, but one week ago, a letter from the head of a leading lumbering firm which I shall take the liberty of reading to this House. This gentleman says:

"I know that our timber costs us from $1 to $1.50 per thousand more than it did four years ago. The larger portion of this may be attributable to increase of duties, yet some, unquestionably is due to the increased demand for labor, owing to the return of activity in the lumber business of the United States. During the past summer wages were about $2 per month higher, owing partly to increased expenditure of the men upon themselves and their families, owing to the ext a price of clothing, &c. The expenditure in the woods has been considerably higher, partly owing to the same cause, partly owing to the advance in the price of standing timbers. That the present Tariff presses very heavily upon the lumber trade, is a fact beyond dispute, while the profits derived from it are, on an average of years, much below a fair return on the capital invested. Everything the lumberman uses in his business, iron, steel, saws, woollens, cotton, pork, flour, oats, corn and lots of other things, are subject to an almost prohibited tax, although in many cases, you cannot obtain in Canada, articles of the quality you want. For instance, I sent the other day, an order for a few hundred dollars' worth of saws, on which I shall have to pay 36 per cent. duty, in order to build up one or two factories in Canada who cannot make the quality of saws I require."

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

Sir, I deem it unnecessary to add one word to that statement. It is made by a man of many years' experience in the trade, thoroughly familiar with its working, and to my certain knowledge, eminently capable of calculating what the Tariff actually does cost the lumber trade; and I ask again what will the hon. gentleman do to protect and encourage the lumberman, to whom, more than to any other class, he owes the surplus of which he and his friends boast so loudly. Then, Sir, what has the hon. gentleman done for the workingman. His vaunts are loud enough; but, let me ask, has the hon. gentleman taken any steps to protect the workingman? Has he tried to secure them from foreign competition? Are they less worthy, the workingmen of Canada, of being secured against foreign competition? Are Canadian men less worthy of protection than Canadian cotton and woollen goods? Why, Sir, these gentlemen will not condescend to take the least ordinary precautions to secure the health and safety of the workingmen. Sir, that was a most suggestive paragraph in the Speech from the Throne:

"The Report of a Royal Commission issued to enquire into the question of factory labor, and the best means of promoting the comfort and well-being of the workingman and his family, without undue interference with the development of our manufacturing industries, will be laid before you."

The paternal Government are to take pains to secure the comfort and happiness of the workingman and his family, always provided that it is not to be done by interfering with the profits of their masters—the manufacturers. Sir, one good thing these hon. gentlemen have done—late in the day, and I do not hold it by any means an excuse for their previous neglect—but they did issue a commission to enquire into the condition of factory children in the factories he has alluded to, and I am bound to say, that so far as I am able to perceive, these gentlemen to whom the duty was entrusted, have done it honestly and well. But, what do these gentlemen report to us? They tell us, Sir, in the first place, that they have found much inconvenience and delay in obtaining information, that in some instances they were told by manufacturers that they knew their own business, and that the Government should not dictate whom they should employ, or interfere in matters of trade. The Commissioners report states:

"The employment of children and young persons in mills and factories is extensive and largely on the increase, the supply being unequal to the demand, particularly in some localities, which may partially explain why those of such tender years are engaged. As to obtaining, with accuracy, the ages of the children employed, we found some difficulty, inasmuch as the employer has no record thereof, having no interest or obligation in so doing, consequently in order to ascertain their ages they were interrogated either by one of the Commissioners or some one in the factory. We are sorry to report that in very many instances the children having no education whatever, could not tell their ages; this applies more particularly to those from 12 years downwards, some being found as young as eight and nine years."

The Commissioners go on to describe a state of things in which

"the children invariably work as many hours as adults, and if not compelled are requested to work over-time when circumstances so demand, which has not been unusual of late in most lines of manufactures. The appearance and condition of the children, in the after part of the day, such as may be witnessed in the months of July and August, was anything but inviting or desirable."

Now, I say this, the Government has committed a great and grave fault, that they have been guilty of very serious laches in allowing such a state of things to exist without, till now, having made the faintest or remotest attempt to remedy it. They knew right well, because some of them at least are not ignorant of what has transpired in other countries, that when factory labor has been stimulated; as they proposed themselves to stimulate it under this Tariff, the greed of parents and employers has always resulted in cases of the grossest tyranny and oppression to the unfortunate young children employed in those factories; and yet knowing that, they have allowed three years and a-half to elapse since they undertook to inaugurate this policy before they have taken the smallest or slightest pains to protect the family of the workingman, guard his safety and protect him against dangers which the framers of this report say, and say justly, at present exist in a great many factories in the Dominion. And let me tell the hon. gentlemen this, that they are doubly bound to see that these children are well taken care of, that they are not oppressed and ill-treated in the case of specially protected manufacturers, because the specially protected manufacturers are neither more or less than subsidized pensioners of the State, and the State which pensions them ought to look to them and see that such grievous wrongs and oppressions as this report reveals are not permitted to be exercised on 2,000 or 3,000 children in Canada. I will take the case, as the hon. gentleman desires, of the great bulk of the manufacturers of Canada. Those of which I have just spoken were specially protected, but I come now to the great bulk of the manufacturers. I repudiate entirely the attacks which the hon. Minister and his friends have from time to time made on us. I say they have no right whatever, from any utterances of mine or any hon. gentleman on this side of the House, to say we entertained the faintest or slightest feeling of hostility towards the manufacturers of Canada. Sir, the causes of their prosperity, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has done for them, lie in the single fact that the profits of our great industries have increased to a very large extent, and when the great bulk of our people became better able to purchase their products they in turn received a considerable share of prosperity; but as far as this Tariff is concerned the fact of the matter is simply this, that with respect to most of the manufacturers the Tariff has either directly injured them, or it has left them exactly where they were. What interest have these manufacturers in seeing that wages are raised, and under this Tariff wages must be raised all over or else the condition of the workingmen must be sensibly deteriorated, because in spite of the Finance Minister's statement, it is a well-known fact that a dollar to-day will not purchase within 10 or 15 per cent. as much as a dollar would purchase two years ago. What interest have the manufacturers in there being dearer freights, or duties on raw material in the shape of iron, or motive power in the shape of coal. Sir, the hon. Minister spoke just now of the increase in the production of coal. That may be, or it may not be. It would be very natural and very reasonable that, when the general prosperity of the country increases, the consumption of any one of the leading articles should increase; but I find that a large portion of the increased production is due to causes with which the hon. gentleman cannot pretend to have had anything to do. I am informed by hon. gentlemen conversant with the trade, that a very large proportion of the increased production of which the hon. gentleman boasts, particularly in Cape Breton, arises from the fact that it has now become the custom for vessels from New Orleans and other Atlantic ports to take a very considerable quantity of coal on board at that point to enable them to prosecute their voyage. If that be the case, it is a very desirable trade, and one which should be fostered, if the Government could foster it; but I have yet to learn in what way the Government can cause ocean going steamers to visit Cape Breton. There is another case in which a valuable trade is springing up, which would spring up more rapidly if it were not hampered by the Tariff. It is an export trade in manufactured lumber, such as doors and window sashes. There is a trade which I conceive it to be exceedingly desirable to cultivate, as it is one which would give employment to many hundreds, perhaps thousands, of people here; and how did the Government help this trade? This is an export trade, one subject to severe foreign competition, and the Government helped it by imposing additional taxes, which amounted to about $1 per thousand on the production of the lumber, which is the raw material entering into this kind of manufactured goods. All the hon. Minister can say is, that he had not injured the trade to quite that extent, but only to the extent of about one-half of $1 per thousand. Speaking for myself, and in no way for anybody else on this side of the House, I may say this with respect to manufactures that I have always, when I was Minister of Finance, recognized as I do now, the plain and self-evident fact, that there must be heavy indirect taxation to produce a revenue; that while we are burdened with the obligations we are now burdened with, we cannot pretend to obtain that revenue without indirect taxation, but our policy was this: We desire to distribute that taxation justly. We held that that was best for the great bulk of the manufacturers that they had nothing then, as they have nothing now to fear from us; that they are far more likely to be injured by the Tariff exactions of the hon. gentlemen, and the domestic competition which he says rightly is the result in a great many cases. Our policy is to tax the people as lightly as we can, and when we are compelled to add to the taxes, to add to them justly and equally, avoiding all taxes which may press unduly on the poorer classes of the community, whom every statesman ought to guard, and from whom, especially when their incomes are small, you ought to avoid taking away any portion of that small wage they possess. Now to follow the hon. gentleman in this account of his expenditure and administration, we find that, practically, he has doubled our taxes. We know that he has doubled our expenditure since Confederation was inaugurated. We begin with 13½ millions of dollars, and find ourselves to-day with 27¼ million dollars demanded for the service of the coming year. Allow me to recall his statement that 22½ million dollars were sufficient for all reasonable purposes. Allow me to recall to your mind the innumerable denunciations with which this country rang, of the intolerable extravagances of my hon. friend, when he asked for $23,500,000 for the public services. I do not know whether it was from ignorance of the facts, which he ought to have known, or from a not unnatural desire to diminish the weight of the enormous expenditure which he confessed he incurred, that the hon. gentleman was so anxious to make it appear that this expenditure of $27,750,000, was really very little more than the expenditure of $23,500,000. But I will explain to that hon. gentleman that the only reason why my hon. friend beside me was compelled, in the first two years of the term of his office, to expend somewhat more than he did in 1878, was this, that when that hon. gentleman opposite left office he left behind him a legacy of three or four million dollars to be expended in the various public works which he had put under construction in 1873-74; and that of our total expenditure in 1875-76, chargeable to income, at least $1,250,000 is due to the works which had been put under contract, and for which votes had been taken by that hon. gentleman in 1873. That, and that only, is the reason why the expenditure of those two years was increased beyond the expenditure in 1878. The hon. gentleman will have to display a great deal more ingenuity than he has yet displayed before he will convince the people of Canada that an expenditure that has increased from $23,500,000 in 1878 to $27,750,000 in 1882, is an expenditure which can be justified, or which can be made consistent with his own declarations in 1878 before he obtained office. But the hon. gentleman talks of the percentage of taxes. I would like to call his attention to a few simple facts on that subject. I find that, in 1877, with a population of 3,250,000, we had a total taxation of $11,750,000, and the average per head about $3.60; in 1878, when our population was about 4,000,000, $17,841,000, consequently an average per head to $4.46. And even if he adds the $1,000,000 deficit which then existed he cannot bring it beyond $4.71 per head; and I find now, with a population of 4,250,000, we have a taxation of $23,912,000, in other words $5.61 per head; and if you take into consideration the enormous addition to the public burden caused by the oppressive character of his Tariff, we would pay $7 per head instead of $5.61. I doubt that this is even too favorable a view to take of the case, as there is too much reason to think that when we take the Census as our guide we are resting on a very uncertain basis. Canada, I think, of all civilized countries possesses alone a Census as to which only one certain part is known, and that is, that it is utterly unreliable, that it is not an enumeration of the people, that it does not give the number of Canadians in Canada, but the number that are in Canada, and a certain number of Canadians outside Canada, as to whom no one can say one-tenth or one-twentieth will return. I fear that the mode in which that Census was taken was with a deliberate fraudulent intent. I fear it was taken for the purpose of eluding the terms of the Confederation Act and depriving the Province of Ontario and the Province of Nova Scotia of a large part of the representation to which they are justly entitled. It is a very extraordinary fact that the Province of Quebec, a Province which was alleged to have been depopulated under my hon. friend, has increased under this Census twice as much as it had between 1861 and 1871, and the distribution of the population involves other circumstances which give the census a suspicious character. If that suspicion be unfounded, the hon. gentlemen have, at any rate, deliberately invited it by their barbarous manner of taking the Census—a system which I do not believe would have been tolerated by any other country calling itself civilized. Apart from the enormous amount to which the total expenditure has been swollen, we find on looking on the estimated returns a number of items enormously in excess of the sums expended by us in 1878; and what is very remarkable is this, that the items in which the largest figures appear are precisely those with respect to which these hon. gentlemen were wont to denounce my hon. friend and his colleagues for the display of the greatest extravagance. We find for Civil Government that in 1878 we expended $823,000; in 1883 the expenditure is estimated to be $973,000. We find that in the superannuation grants which were also most vehemently denounced, while we spent $106,000 those gentlemen ask for $155,000; and if the return lately laid on the table be an index, they are likely to spend $170,000 in the year 1883. We find that in the Post Office while we spent $1,724,000, they demand $2,018,000. We find that in Immigration we spent $180,000 and they demand $378,000, and that the total result is, as I said, that against our annual expenditure of $23,500,000, they demand $27,750,000 in 1883. Sir, although these cases are bad enough there are worse cases yet behind. When I come to consider the expenditure in some of the other departments, notably when I come to consider the expenditure in the Department of the Interior, I am, to quote a phrase from a colleague of the hon. gentleman, appalled at the extravagance and mismanagement which it discloses. Sir, within a few years, the Department of the Interior has become a very great spending department, perhaps the very greatest spending department in the hands of any Minister of the Government. We find that for the service of the future year, $909,000 are demanded for Indians; $413,000 for Mounted Police; $99,000 chargeable to income for Dominion lands; $450,000 chargeable to capital for the same purpose; and for the office at Ottawa, $86,000. Now, it will be interesting to compare these expenditures with those for the same purposes in 1878. Then the Indians cost us $421,000; our Mounted Police, $334,000; Dominion lands, $87,000; and the expenditure for the department here amounted to $44,000, without counting in either case the salary of the Minister. Our expenditure in 1878, under the administration of my hon. friend from Bothwell, for all these purposes, amounted to $888,000. The expenditure under the Minister of the Interior for the same purposes amounts to $1,957,000, being an excess of just $1,069,000. Now, Sir, this is virtually the largest spending department of the Government. It is true that nominally the Department of the Minister of Railways and perhaps the Department of the Post Office, spend larger sums; but, as is well known to the House, so much of the expenditure in these departments is absolutely fixed, that this has become to all intents and purposes the chief spending department. Here you have an enormous increase, and that is not the worst of it. To a very large extent, practically, these charges are fixed charges, are the increase of fixed charges; and when we find that from $400,000 the expenditure for Indians alone has risen to something like $1,000,000, and that when capitalized at 4 per cent. is equivalent to an addition of $15,000,000 to the national debt, we may well ask whither are we drifting? I ask, Sir, is it going to stop? All I can say is, that I fear instead of stopping it will increase. Now this is the department which of all the departments under the control of the Government needs the very closest supervision, needs the very closest personal attention. The difficulties of administering this department are no doubt very great; the distance at which the several officers are from headquarters is great; the temptations to which they are exposed are enormous, and, as everybody who has ever sat in the Cabinet knows, there is, and always will be, under the best circumstances a very great difficulty indeed in efficiently supervising it. It is incomparably the most important department of the Government at this moment, and I do not hesitate to say that it is incomparably the worst managed. Now, I am perfectly well aware that the gentleman who is its present head, is, in some respects, an able man. He is an able lawyer, he is an able politician, but I am bound to say—and it is the opinion which I and many of the older members of the House have always entertained of him—that when we come to the practical working of a department, the hon. gentleman will be found a very indifferent administrator; and here we have a proof, Sir. It was a very great mistake for the hon. gentleman to assume this important Department in addition to the onerous functions devolving upon him as Premier. If the hon. gentleman had been all he is not and all he ought to be, had he possessed the untiring zeal for public service, had he possessed the rigid integrity, had he possessed the powers of industry which my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mackenzie) possessed, even still I would say that the task would have been too much for his strength or the strength of any man. As it is, Sir, there has been a most complete failure in the administration of this department. We have seen that most enormous increase in the expenditure to which I have called attention. Sir, the state of that department is a by-word on the streets of Ottawa; it is a by-word all through the North-West Territory, from one end of the North-West to the other you hear one chorus of discontent at the inefficiency, at the difficulty of obtaining information, at the lack of courtesy on the part of the officials of the Canadian Government in all matters respecting the settlement of that country. I speak of what I have known. There is not a day that I do not receive communications from many of my own constituents, either in Huron or who have gone to Manitoba, all saying the same thing, all repeating the same charges, the same complaints against the administration; all giving information as to how the officers have abused their position; all repeating that you cannot obtain, in Canada, the most ordinary items of information that are supposed to be given and which ought to be given to settlers seeking their fortunes in the North-West. I will give you, out of a score of letters, an extract from a letter I received but four days ago, and the letter is to this effect:

"I am unable to obtain maps here of any practical use, and I have already applied to the Dominion Lands office at Ottawa, but with very poor results, as they appear there to have very little information to give to parties seeking it, or they are very careless about giving what they do possess. There are large numbers of others involved in the same difficulty. We can procure any number of maps of Dakota, but we are unable to obtain even a fairly good map of our own North-West."

What that man writes to me, I have heard from hundreds of other quarters within the past eighteen months. The contrast with the United States in that particular is most lamentable, is most distressing. Whatever other faults the United States officers may have, they are zealous and most active in giving all possible information with respect to the lands and the opportunity offered for settlement in their own territory. It is very much to be regretted that a similar state of things cannot be made to prevail in the Department which is nominally administered by the Minister of the Interior. Sir, these things are known to all. We know from day to day, from quarter to quarter, and from half-year to half-year, that there has been one continuous change in the regulations affecting the important interests over which that hon. gentleman presides. First of all we have squatters warned off with the result, as I found when I was in that region, that about 1,000 Canadians made homestead entries in the adjoining Land Office of Dakota. Then there came a ukase limiting the settler to 80 acres, but that was repealed owing to the universal discontent which it aroused. Then the terms under which the right of pre-emption might be obtained were altered, and next we had an arrangement that the land should be sold at one-tenth of the nominal value paid down, and then, but not till after the mischief had been done, no land is to be sold except for cash in full. Then we have a budget of so-called colonization schemes with all the clauses in the regulations compelling actual settlement carefully struck out. Then we had an arrangement that the settler should have each alternate section. Now, I see that whole counties will be sold en bloc without any forfeiture clauses allowing any person to purchase who may choose to do so. Had these things occurred under the administration of my hon. friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I can well understand how the House and the whole country would have rung with denunciations of his ignorance, his incompetence and his extravagance; and with the most unbridled accusations against him from one end of the Dominion to the other. I suppose, seeing that it is the hon. Minister of the Interior, who is responsible for the administration of the department, it is all right. But I tell him if he continues to be the head of the department that he cannot pretend to say from Ottawa what is best to be done for the settlers of the North-West, that neither he nor any other man, who has never visited the country nor has any personal knowledge of it can pretend to administer its important affairs in the interests of the people who are to settle it. There are departments and departments, Mr. Speaker, and I say that this is one of the departments which cannot be worked by shelving every troublesome question in pigeon-holes marked "masterly inactivity;" nor by telling good stories to people who come to interview the Minister on important matters of business. The proper administration requires more than that; and it is a misfortune of no ordinary character that its administration passed from the able and competent hands of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), into the hands of the right hon. Minister of the Interior. We see the result of the change in an expenditure double or nearly treble what it was; in the turning of the North-West into a gambling table; in the tens of thousands of honest settlers who have been driven away from the North-West to seek for homes on the American side of the border. If ever an impudent assertion was made on the floor of this House, if ever there was a case of effrontery in the world it was when that hon. gentleman rose in his place and dared to say that the Opposition were responsible for the fact that so many Canadians had gone to Minnesota and Dakota in place of going to the Canadian North-West. This was due above all and beyond all to his own gross blunderings, and if the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall), who I am sorry to see is not in his place, was able to say ten or eleven years ago, when he was afflicted with one of those periodical fits of truth-telling which sometimes attack him, when like Balaam he speaks sorely against his will—though I am bound to say that like Balaam he always takes an opportunity of recanting what he says on these rare occasions—I say, if that hon. gentleman spoke truly when he said that treason and imbecility reigned in every department, he might to-day, with infinitely greater reason, make the same declaration so far as the Department of the Interior is concerned. The plain fact of the matter is this: that the hon. gentleman has shown himself utterly unable to grasp the magnitude of the great interests involved in the present administration of this department. There is no one thing upon which the future of the Dominion more depends than upon the right conduct of that department, and the right administration of the great territory we have acquired; but the course of affairs since the right hon. gentleman undertook the charge of that department shows that he is treating it as nothing but a vast engine of political influence, and, I fear, a vast engine of political corruption. Now, Sir, although this is a subject on which, if time permitted, I could find a great deal more to say, I must pass on to the details of the administration of the hon. Minister of Finance; and I am bound to say that his administration will compare well with that of the colleague beside him, though even so I find it far from satisfactory. He laid great stress on the fact that large sums of money were coming into our hands on savings bank accounts, but he forgot to tell the country what the savings bank deposits cost and how he turned them to account. I find from returns brought down the other day, that while we are borrowing from the public with one hand something like $13,000,000 for which we pay interest at about four per cent. and for which we pay in expenses of management nearly one per cent. more—making in all about five per cent.—we are with the other expending it in this way: We have about $12,000,000 or thereabouts lying in the various banks, of which $5,000,000 or so bear interest at rates varying from 3 to 4 per cent. Consequently the advantage we get from these large deposits is this: That while we are paying something like $600,000 on these loans from the people, we receive in interest from the banks about $170,000 or $180,000, and so cost something like $400,000. Now I fail to see that this can be called a proof of very good management or very good banking. I approve, myself, of giving all possible facilities to depositors of small amounts; I would gladly see the hon. gentleman copy the example of Mr. Fawcett in England, and allow, as they do in England and in France, small amounts of Government securities to be taken by small depositors; but I do not think it is wise or prudent, or that it can be called good management, to pay 30 or 40 per cent. more than this money is worth in the open market. In ordinary banks at this moment, you will hardly get 3 per cent. on the deposits you make, and it is well known that the cost of managing these deposits is small indeed, while here we are paying 5 per cent. and receiving about 1½ per cent. The hon. gentleman is exposed to two dangers. In the first place while money is plenty, he receives a great deal he is not able to use profitably, and in the next place if there is a contraction he will run a great risk that a large amount of this money will be called in when it will be inconvenient to repay it. It is a source of no profit now, and of great risk hereafter, and there is considerable loss to the public in the meantime. And remembering, as I do, what censures the hon. gentleman's friends passed on the late

Government because they kept considerable sums on deposit while they had large public works going on, I think his friends, if they have any regard for their own reputation or consistency, should censure him as they used to censure us for the exhibit which his own figures show, and the amount which he is now unnecessarily holding on deposit. But, Sir, besides savings banks, the hon. gentleman must needs try his hand on the banks generally; and although he has not condescended to bring down the several circulars which he has issued, I have been able to obtain from the public prints a tolerably correct statement of the circular which he originally addressed to the several banks of Canada. Now, Sir, I do not doubt that the hon. gentleman's intentions were excellent. I do not doubt that the hon. gentleman wanted to obtain some information which he thought of value, and perhaps to check some practices which might have led to mischief. But the hon. gentleman resorted to a most extraordinary mode of obtaining it. One would have thought that he would have communicated in the first instance to one or more banking authorities before he issued a circular which threw the banks of the country into a state of confusion, well nigh of panic, as that circular did. The hon. gentleman makes it his boast that when he interferes with manufacturers, he is very particular to consult the manufacturers themselves. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman had any interest in promoting the operations of a few bears on the Montreal Stock Exchange; but the result of this act of his was to cause the stocks to fall in value in one day from 3 to 20 per cent. It was a mere accident that the hon. gentleman's action did not produce a serious panic, because if there had been at the same time any great disturbance in the markets of the world—and a serious disturbance did occur shortly afterwards—the hon. gentleman might have seen most unfortunate results from that step of his. I think hon. members ought to consider well whether they should entrust that hon. gentleman with powers which he has shown himself to be very little capable of using with discretion. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman has adopted, I am told, a rather extraordinary course with respect to promotions in his department. Well, we have all heard in the good old days, about a hundred years ago, that according to the renowned Sheridan:

"It's a mighty fine thing to be a father-in-law,
To a mighty magnificent three-tailed bashaw."

But in Canada, at any rate, it is a much finer thing to be brother-in-law to a Minister of Finance. I would like to know how many pensioners this hon. gentleman is going to put on the country. My hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Ross) made a remarkable statement the other day as to the number of pensioners one of the ministers had put on the country, and I forget whether he followed it up with a statement as to those belonging to the Minister of Finance. Then, the hon. gentleman, not content with meddling with the banks, must address a rather remarkable letter; and here, too, he has not favored us with a full correspondence between himself and the importers of tea and coffee. My object is not to discuss the principle of the remission of those duties, but to call attention to the very remarkable statement he made in explanation of his proposed remission. I find, Sir, in a letter signed S. L. Tilley, and addressed to one James H. Read, of Montreal, in which the hon. gentleman states that if it is the wish of the trade, the change will be delayed for a couple of months to enable parties to dispose of stock out of bond. It seems to me that is a remarkable view of public duty for a Minister of Finance to propound. I had always supposed that when a tax was remitted, that it was done in the interest of the public and the consumer; but, apparently, in the eyes of the Minister of Finance, the interest of the consumer has very little to do with it—it is only the convenience of the importer that is to be consulted. I remember only one similar instance of a Minister of Finance acting on the same plan, and that was when the hon. gentleman, in the plenitude of his good nature, enabled the importers of Canada to obtain money from the banks in order to enable them to import goods in advance of his own Tariff. I recommend him to peruse the remarks made by various newspapers of note at the time, on that remarkable feat of his. Now, Sir, it appears to me that the hon. gentleman is very likely to repeat in 1883 the very self-same errors, to indulge in the very self-same delusions, and to bring about the very self-same results which he did ten years ago. Then, as I warned him, he chose to mistake a temporary inflation for a permanent advance in prosperity, and although I agree with him that there is at present no such inflation as existed at that time; although I believe there are better chances of maintaining our present revenue, still I see him not availing much of his surplus to make any material reduction in the burdens of the people, but making it the excuse for plunging into additional expenditures. Let him remember that a double accident has happened to him. Not only have we had good harvests here, but there have been bad harvests on the other side of the Atlantic; and if these circumstances should be reversed, if we should have bad harvests here, and there should be plentiful harvests on the other side of the Atlantic, then I can tell the hon. gentleman that the pleasant delusions he has been indulging in this afternoon would be dissipated as ruthlessly as were those he indulged in in 1873. Sir, he has one point in his favor, I admit. The North-West is likely to become a very important factor in measuring the future commercial prospects of this country; and although it will continue to involve us in very heavy outlays, and although hon. gentlemen have done their very best to deprive Canada of the benefits which might be received from the development of that country, still, granting all that, I think there are sufficient chances of solid progress in the North-West to greatly neutralize the mischievous effects of their policy. But, Sir, I come to consider the hon. gentleman's proposed reductions of taxation. I am very glad to see any proposed reductions of taxation. I do not propose to quarrel with him for taking off taxes on tea and coffee and other articles. But I will point out that the taxes which he is taking off are precisely those which are most evenly distributed, which take least out of the pockets of the people in proportion to the sum they put into the Treasury. No taxes could be taken off which would do less to relieve the people than those particular taxes which he has selected. If he really wants to relieve the people, let him remove the taxes on breadstuffs and on coal, and those specific duties on various textile fabrics. These taxes are an abominable injustice, discriminating in favor of the wealthier consumer, and against the poorer.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. KILLAM. And to nobody's benefit.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman was good enough to tell us that cottons and woollens, and a variety of other articles, were selling as cheaply now as in 1878. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that if that were true it would prove nothing. The question is not, are these goods sold cheaper to-day than they were in 1878? but are these goods sold cheaper or as cheaply now as they can be obtained in other quarters? That is the true question, not as he put it. I have reason to believe the hon. gentleman is grievously misinformed as to the prices of goods in 1878. I have here, taken from invoices of a large dealer, the following statements, and I will give them in detail, not as he does, as mere vague general assertions, but I will give the actual facts and prices. Speaking of grey and unbleached cottons of a class largely used by the working classes, that gentleman tells me that in 1878 the prime cost was 6½ cents, while the selling price was 7¼ cents, that in 1881 the prime cost was 7½ cents, and the selling price $10\frac{1}{2}$ cents, or in other words, whereas under the old Tariff there was $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents difference between the cost and selling price, or 28 per cent., under the present Tariff the difference is $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents, or as nearly as possible 39 per cent., making 11 per cent. difference in the prices of this article, caused directly by the hon. gentleman's Tariff. Take the case of flannels, which the hon. gentleman knows are largely consumed by the masses of the people. They cost about 19 cents in 1878, and were sold over the counter for 28 cents; they cost now 18 cents and sell for 30 cents, being a difference of 10 per cent. on that article as against the present Tariff. As regards the heavy cloth used for overcoats by the working classes, and for warm winter clothes for women, there was bought for 2s. 6d. sterling in 1878, while the selling price was 92 cents, it now costs the same, 2s. 6d., but the selling price is \$1.07, being an increase of 15 cents per yard, caused directly by the hon. gentleman's Tariff. And, Sir, I also have letters from men who are largely engaged in trade in this country, and this is what one of them writes under date no longer ago than 20th January, 1882. He is talking about the relative prices of American and Canadian cottons:

"One of the best known and most saleable American cottons is branded Atlantic A. Its width is 36 inches. It sold in New York formerly for 8 cents, now for $8\frac{1}{2}$ cents. Canadian cotton of similar width and weight, but not quite so good, is sold at wholesale for $10\frac{1}{2}$ cents."

Are we to understand from the hon. gentleman that that extra two cents will form no tax upon the purchaser or producer of that cotton. The writer goes on to say:

"Lower priced cottons are sold in New York for $4\frac{1}{2}$ cents per yard, a similar quality of goods in Canada cost $6\frac{1}{2}$ cents; striped shirtings, largely used by workmen, the price in New York is $8\frac{1}{2}$ cents, but this class of goods being very heavily taxed under the hon. gentleman's Tariff it is sold over the counter here for 15 cents per yard, and even at that price is largely used and preferred by our own people."

It stands to reason, and I cannot see how the hon. gentleman can deem it worth his while to raise the question, where you have the same specific duties to pay on articles in cottons ranging from 4 cents or 5 cents a yard to 18 cents or 19 cents, that the cheap goods must pay an enormously heavy tax as compared with the more expensive ones, and in the case of woollens where you have the same specific duty on those costing 40 cents as on those costing \$2, the proportionate tax upon the poorer class of articles must of necessity be enormously heavy. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has certainly in the course of his four or five hour speech travelled over a great deal of ground, and I do not know that I would be justified in following him all through, but I would like, Sir, to say a few words on a question on which he laid a great deal of stress, that is, the question of the actual cost to the consumer under this Tariff of the sugar now consumed in Canada. Now, the hon. gentleman entered into a long and minute calculation to show that we were obtaining sugar under this Tariff as cheap, or cheaper—I think he said 7 cents a hundred cheaper—than we could obtain it under the preceding Tariff. Well, Sir, I say this: the measure of the tax on the people of Canada is the difference between the price at which they can obtain the sugar in Glasgow or New York and the price they have to pay to Mr. Redpath or anybody else in the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, I offer here the statement given me by one of the largest and best known wholesale dealers in the article in Canada, and I find from it that in the last six months, between the end of July and the end of December, the average price of granulated sugar in Montreal, less the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. discount usually allowed to the trade, was \$9.50 per hundred. In New York, with the usual discount, the cost, exclusive of duty, was about \$6.35. Therefore, it follows that we have paid on an average \$3, and a trifle upwards, per hundred on all the sugar that was consumed in Canada in a refined state. Now, Sir, what was the amount of sugar imported into Canada? The gross amount was 136,406,000 lbs. Of that all but about 16,000,000 lbs., or about 120,000,000 lbs., were imported exclusively for the use of the refiner. That would produce, at least, 110,000,000 lbs. of sugar, after making liberal allowance for the waste accruing in manufacture. What do we receive on that? From the hon. gentleman's own statement we receive \$2,459,000 duty; yet of that 110,000,000 lbs. we had to pay to Redpath & Co. \$3 and a fraction per hundred more than the price in New York and Glasgow. Had that money gone into the Treasury we would have received \$3,723,000 instead of \$2,459,000; and the result of this Tariff has been just what I told the hon. gentleman, that the people of Canada have paid \$3,750,000 more than they would have done if there had been no duty; and that \$2,500,000 have gone into the Treasury and \$1,250,000 have been paid to keep the thousand men he spoke of employed.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. That is the exact fact of the case, whatever the hon. gentleman may say to the contrary; and it was a most paltry quibble on the hon. gentleman's part to speak of receiving a revenue of $2,459,000 with an import of 136,000,000 lbs., as if that was equivalent to a duty of $2,600,000 on a total importation of about 108,000,000 or 110,000,000 lbs. When the people are better off they will undoubtedly buy more sugar and consume more than when they are not so well off. No thanks to the hon. gentleman or his policy for that. Had my Tariff been in existence we would have had $3,250,000 in the Treasury instead of $2,500,000, as the hon. gentleman or any of his clerks could easily have ascertained by a very simple computation. The amount of sugar consumed in Canada when refined is equivalent to about 126,000,000 lbs., and on that I say the old Tariff would have produced $3,250,000. The people of Canada, I repeat, have paid $3,750,000. Now, in the matter of ship-building, the hon. gentleman might have told us that the quantity of ship-building that is going on has been very considerably reduced under his Tariff. He might have told us that these direct imports of tea, these ships from China and Japan which were to come into the Dominion, have been conspicuous by their absence during the whole time of the hon. gentleman's administration. Now, Sir, as to diminishing our exports from Montreal, I think the Montreal Corn Exchange are likely to be quite as well informed as the hon. gentleman as to its causes, and I observe, in a recent report of theirs, they advocate strongly the abolition of duty on breadstuffs, and they do not hesitate to hint that there has been a great deal of fraud in connection with the alleged exportation of American flour ground in bond, to replace the American wheat brought into the country by certain millers. When we get down certain returns that have been moved for, we will be in a position to ascertain for ourselves more accurately how far the suspicions of that body are justified. Until then I do not propose to enlarge on that particular question. Now the hon. gentleman, in the course of his argument, advanced three claims on account of the National Policy, which appear to me to be specially deserving of attention. He has, first of all, claimed credit for the foreign demand which existed for our foreign exports as a result of that policy. Well, Sir, I fail to see how by any possibility the hon. gentleman can maintain that this policy could in the slightest degree ever contribute to the increase of exports of the articles I have referred to. Then I allege he is wrong when he claims that his policy has created an improved home market, that the men who produced these articles have obtained more money for all these manufactures through the operation of his policy and not through their own exertions or the prosperity of the farmers, the fishermen and the lumbermen of the country. Those have not been benefitted in many cases, they have been seriously injured, though looking at the general increase of our exports, there is no wonder that the great improvement in the home market, of which he speaks, has taken place. But, Sir, last of all, in talking of the cheapness of articles, the hon. gentleman has chosen to compare—whether correctly or not I am not in a position to say in all cases—the prices in 1878 and 1882. Now, Sir, that is wholly and entirely a false contention. The tendency of all textile manufactures, and of manufactures of all kinds, is to grow cheaper year by year. New inventions are being brought forward with the object of cheapening manufacture, and they would cheapen it if the hon. gentleman did not interpose with his coal taxes and other things calculated to destroy and interfere with the natural tendency of trade. All the time raw material ought to be getting cheaper, because the production is usually widening and cheapening, and new raw materials are constantly being brought into use. But all these facts the hon. gentleman entirely discards. He will not face the real question, which is not whether in this or that particular year things were cheaper, but whether things can be produced as cheaply here as they can be produced elsewhere; he entirely omits to take into account the pressure which his policy has produced on many of the most deserving classes of the community. He proposes, it is true, to relieve the fishermen of his native Province and of the Maritime Provinces, but what is he going to do for all those numerous class of people, such as clergymen, schoolmasters, clerks and others, whose incomes are in a great measure fixed. When he talks of the general prosperity I think that the hon. gentleman would do well occasionally to go through the streets of this very city. Then he would see that this general prosperity has not extended all over Canada as far as he could desire or we could desire. I think he will see many shops empty, many advertisements of properties for sale; and I can tell him that very recently, to my knowledge, some thirty properties were put up in this city for which a bid could not be obtained. Sir, we find too from the Census returns that the picture is not in all respects as the hon. gentleman would wish us to believe, although the information has in some cases been rather limited. I find that in the case of North Leeds the population has absolutely retrograded. I find the same in the case of Frontenac, of Lennox, East Hastings, West Northumberland, East Durham, West Durham, also of the good town of Niagara, which is becoming small by degrees and beautifully less under the fostering care of its honorable representative. I also find South Wentworth and Halton in the same condition, and an equal number of counties which are marked as almost absolutely stationary. I cannot speak of the state of things in St. John, but the member for the city and county of St. John, and other gentlemen who are well acquainted with that locality, tell me the state of things there is pretty much the same. In the west, in such towns as Belleville, Goderich, Mitchell, Stratford and Welland, I find the population is stationary or decreasing. I cannot say, therefore, that I entirely agree with the hon. gentleman that the result of his policy has been an universal and uniform improvement all over this country, and it is not to be wondered at when we will remember the amount of indirect taxes which is taken out of us as in the case of sugar, cotton and woollens, levied in one way or another, for the benefit of the favored few I have alluded to. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman in thinking those burdens light. I think the people of Canada can bear them, but not without serious inconvenience. In looking over the whole position I am forcibly reminded of the times these hon. gentlemen profess to admire, the good times which existed 120 years ago—those good times, Mr. Speaker, when settlements were looked upon as the natural fields of plunder for a few favorites, when Prince Edward Island was divided amongst some fourteen or fifteen families on certain conditions of settlement, which conditions of settlement, I believe, were never fairly fulfilled, and when Great Britain after a long struggle lost half this continent, and was nearly degraded to the position of a third-rate power. Now, Sir, when I look at these hon. gentlemen and remember their antecedents, when I recollect their past record and the consequences of their present acts, instead of feeling the glow of virtuous joy which that hon. gentleman the Minister of Finance experiences, I feel much more disposed to blush for the degradation of Canada now and to tremble for the consequences hereafter. I do not want to blame the hon. Minister too much, for after all he and his colleagues have only done what it is their nature to do, and we should not be too severe on their little weaknesses. My hon. friend was good enough to tell us our credit was high in England, that our securities ranked next to Consols. Have I quoted him aright?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Higher than any other colonial securities.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. He did not say that. He said next to Consols. I remember he used a similar statement before, which I took occasion to correct. No doubt Canadian securities rule high. That is a very satisfactory fact; but looking at the enormous sinking fund we employ purchasing our own securities, I am not so sure the prices are due to the causes the hon. gentleman assigns. I may remind him he would have done much better had he got rid of the sinking fund on the occasion of his last loan instead of adding to the very large amount we have occasion to employ in that way. Moreover, we have not been on the market of late, and when we come to employ $1,250,000 in purchasing our own securities year after year, it is not a matter of great astonishment our bonds should run up one or two per cent. higher than those of other colonies which are every year putting securities on the market.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They have sinking funds too.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Yes; but they are always raising loans, and their sinking funds are not as large as ours. The hon. gentleman took occasion to say that he was going to disprove most completely the charge that his Tariff had in any way interfered with the importation of dry goods into this country, and selected with some skill a year—I think 1876—in which the imports of Great Britain had sunk to about $40,000,000. I object altogether to the fallacious argument the hon. gentleman uses. His policy has been to compare years of extreme depression with years of rather remarkable prosperity. Now, I am willing to compare years of prosperity with years of prosperity and years of depression with years of depression and have nothing to fear in the comparison. Why could not the hon. gentleman have given us the imports from Great Britain in 1873-74-75 when our exports, though not as large as at present, were very considerable. He says he has not interfered in the slightest degree with our trade in Great Britain. Well, when our Tariff had some pretence to be a revenue Tariff and our exports were several millions less than they are to-day, I find that in 1873, we imported $68,000,000 worth of goods from Great Britain; in 1874, $63,000,000; in 1875, $60,000,000, against an import of about $43,000,000 the present year. He is very fond of having averages; let him carry his average a little further back; he will find the result will confirm what we have said. He will find that he has reduced the natural importation from Great Britain to the amount of something like $25,000,000, if we take the extreme points. The hon. gentleman stated that the old Customs Tariff would have failed to produce sufficient revenue, but failed to produce the smallest ground of argument for that assertion other than this, that our Tariff imposed burdens on the people without providing food and encouragement for them. I would like to know how he found food and encouragement for the bulk of the people when he taxed food, fuel, light and every other necessity. And when he talks of the people paying voluntarily into his treasury, I would like to know what option he gives or ever gave anyone of us in the matter of contributing to the revenue. As to the number of factories which the hon. gentleman alleges came into operation, all that he has the slightest ground to claim credit for are the 95 which he states, although he gave no details, had come into existence since March 1879, while as to the increase in the hands employed elsewhere, the majority of these are due wholly to the increased prosperity of the country arising from causes I have enumerated, over which the National Policy had no control whatever. And there is the explanation of the whole increase that has taken place. I might, were it worth my while to go into a discussion of that kind, point out to the hon. gentleman that although it may be true that in two or three isolated cases there has been an increase in value of city property, yet, that over a large portion of Western Canada, at any rate, there has been a positive decrease in the value of farming lands, and a very material decrease in the number of farmers inhabiting those counties. Sir, unhappily the mischief which the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have done is likely to remain. Those hon. gentlemen, in addition to inflicting other grievous burdens on the people seem to have busied themselves with all the industry that they possess to attempt to concentrate all the power of this country in their own hands. They are, from day to day, attempting to trample on our provincial rights. They are, from day to day, interfering with every liberty which we still continue to possess. They talk of Canada being a free country. Why, Sir, I tell them to-day that Canada is a country in which no man is free to buy or to sell, to eat or to drink, to travel or to stand still, without paying toll to some extortioner or another. That is the position to which they have reduced us. As to our provincial liberties they seem only to be occupied in devising means to curtail them at every point they can. Now, Sir, I do not mean to threaten, but most assuredly I do say—not perhaps to them, not perhaps to the men who support them, but to the people of Canada who sent them here and to whom they may shortly, perhaps very soon, have to appeal—I do say to them that if they persevere in this course, if they persevere in trampling on our provincial rights, they may find that Confederation will fall to pieces almost as soon as it was created; and if they persevere in particular in trampling on the plainest rights of the people of the North-West, then I warn them that so soon as that country begins to be filled up, so soon as settlement is crystalized there, so soon as the people begin to feel the pressure of the bonds they are imposing upon them, Canada will run very great risk of losing the North-West just as Great Britain lost the United States a century ago, and no men will be more directly responsible for it than the two hon. gentlemen I see immediately before me. Sir, these men may boast of their great majority here to-day, they may boast of their full Treasury, they may boast of their devoted supporters; but I can recollect some ten years ago, when these gentlemen were just as insolent, just as arrogant as they are to-day, when they had just as strong a majority behind them, just as full a Treasury, when they were prepared to be just as unscrupulous in maintaining their places as they were to-day; yet in twelve months after that time I saw them scattered and driven into deserved ignominy. The fate that befell them in 1873 may well befall them in 1883, and I see signs and tokens, not a few, that if they do not take care, and if they do not mend their ways, that fate will assuredly befall them again; and say that it will be a very fortunate day for this country when we will be able to put a stop to all the vexatious legislation with which they have burdened and harassed the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

STAMP DUTY.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD. I wish to make a statement which I think of such importance that I think it ought to go to the papers to-night. My hon. friend who sits near me has given notice for doing away with the stamp duty. That is a statutory enactment, and until the Act is itself repealed stamps must still be affixed on promissory notes and bills of exchange in order to make them legal. The fact that it is the intention of the Government to take off the duty does not prevent the legal necessity of still affixing stamps until the repeal of the Stamp Act.

House adjourned at 12:20 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 27th February, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 47) to extend and amend the Acts relating to the Canada Landed Credit Company. —(Mr. Beaty.)

Bill (No. 48) respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company.—(Mr. Arkell.)

Bill (No. 49) to amend the Act intituled: "An Act relating to interest on moneys secured by mortgage of real estate.—(Mr. Orton.)

Bill (No. 50) to enable any person charged with an indictable offence, to be admitted to give evidence on his behalf.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Synod of the Diocese of Saskatchewan; and for other purposes connected therewith.—(Mr. Mills.)

FREE TRANSMISSION OF NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. McCUAIG moved for leave to introduce a Bill to provide for the free transmission by mail of newspapers within the county in which the same are published.

Mr. KILLAM asked the Government to explain its policy on this question. He raised the point of order that this was a measure affecting public revenue, which a private member could not introduce.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, from the title of the Bill, it was one which should commence by resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

EVIDENCE IN CASES OF INDICTABLE OFFENCES.

Mr. McCARTHY, in introducing Bill (No. 50), to enable any person charged with an indictable offence to be admitted to give evidence on his own behalf, said: This Bill contains three short clauses, and is taken from the criminal code recently prepared in England by a Commission which the present Justice Stephens is the chief. The Bill provides that any person charged with an indictable offence may give evidence on his own behalf, but the limits of cross-examination are, to a certain extent, curtailed. He is not to be called as a witness for the prosecution, and if called on his own behalf, the cross-examination may, at the order of the Judge, be limited in matters of reputation or character as the Judge thinks proper. I do not propose, just now, to say anything more. Of course, this brings up the oft-discussed question as to the propriety of admitting criminals to give evidence, but that general question can, perhaps, be more properly discussed on the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. ANGLIN. Why do you limit the right of cross-examination?

Mr. McCARTHY. Because in cross-examining the accused in the ordinary way, as to his credibility, it might be very unfair towards him to investigate his whole life, and it is left to the discretionary power of the Judge as to where the examination should stop.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

Mr. MILLS, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 51) for the incorporation of the Synod of the Diocese of the Saskatchewan, and for other purposes connected therewith, said: It is not necessary that I should make any remarks on the introduction of a private Bill of this kind. Remarks in explanation in support of its provisions, can be more fitly made at a later stage. The provisions of the Bill are similar to those for the incorporation of the Synods of the churches at present existing in the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. This Bill will enable certain parties in the region mentioned, to form themselves into a local corporation, to transact business, to appoint the members of the Synod, and hold real estate for certain purposes.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time:—

Bill (No. 39) to incorporate the Rainy River Improvement Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 40) respecting the Dundee Land Investment Company (Limited).—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 41) to incorporate the Tecumseh Fire Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Macmillan.)

Bill (No. 43) to incorporate the Sault Ste. Marie Bridge Company.—(Mr. Williams.)

Bill (No. 44) to amend the Act incorporating the Napier-ville Junction Railway and Quarry Company.—(Mr. Coursol.)

Bill (No. 45) to reduce the capital stock of the Ontario Bank and to change the nominal value thereof and for other purposes.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Edison Electric Light Company of Canada.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

THE RICHELIEU BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. BAKER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 42) to incorporate "The Richelieu Bridge Company."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Is this a Railway Bill?

Mr. BAKER. No.

Mr. MILLS. I have not seen the Bill, but if it does not relate to the bridging of navigable streams it is not a measure within the jurisdiction of this Parliament—it belongs to the Local Legislature—I mean if it interferes with navigation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Richelieu is a navigable river.

Bill read the second time.

Mr. McCARTHY.

MARITIME JURISDICTION ACT.

Mr. WILLIAMS enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to so amend the Maritime Jurisdiction Act that a more speedy and less expensive method may be provided for the recovery of seamen's wages in Ontario?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would say that the matter is one which can be dealt with without any change in the Act constituting the Court. The Government has asked the Court, whether the Court will consider, in conjunction with the Surrogates in the counties where the chief business of the Court is being done, the existing rules of the Court, with a view to ascertain whether the expenses of proceedings in the Court may be reduced.

BOUNDARIES OF ONTARIO.

Mr. DAWSON enquired, Whether, in the document relating to the boundaries of Ontario, bearing date 18th February, and addressed, as appears by the newspapers, to the Secretary of State by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, the lecture of Sir Francis Hincks therein referred to, accompanies the said document as a part of the case for Ontario?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The lecture of Sir Francis Hincks does not accompany the document as part of the case.

BRIDGE CROSSING RIVIÈRE DU LOUP.

Mr. GRANDBOIS enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to replace, during the coming season, the wooden bridge on the line of the Intercolonial Railway, crossing Rivière du Loup, by an iron bridge?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not the intention of the Government, during the coming season, to replace the wooden bridge on the line of the Intercolonial Railway crossing Rivière du Loup.

POST OFFICE AT BRAMPTON.

Mr. ELLIOTT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates for the purpose of building a post office and Custom house in the town of Brampton, county of Peel?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The intention is not to place a sum in the Estimates for this purpose, but the matter will be investigated during the recess.

RESIDENT JUDGE AT GASPÉ.

Mr. FORTIN, in moving for copies of all letters, reports, and documents respecting the appointment of a Judge in the county of Gaspé, and the system of judicial decentralization in Canada, said: In making this motion, I think it is my duty to address a few remarks to this House on a question of importance which interests one of the first elements of society, that is to say, justice. I represent a county which forms, by itself, a judicial district. That district should have a resident Judge, as the law declared more than thirty years ago, but for more than ten years we have had no resident Judge. The Judge acting in that district has been itinerant; we see him a couple of times a year; he stays with us two or three days, and in consequence of this state of things, justice suffers. I may say that we have no administration of justice there, and, when I state that, I state the sentiment of the whole county. But, perhaps, Mr. Speaker, the question will be better understood if I am allowed to read part of a letter which I addressed to the Minister of Justice on that question:

"OTTAWA, 3rd February, 1882.

"SIR,—I think I would fail in my duty as representative of the county of Gaspé, if I were not to address you this letter in reference to the appointment of a Judge to replace the Judge of the district of Gaspé, who died recently.

"And it seems to me that I could not begin this letter more pertinent-ly than by citing the following words, pronounced by the illustrious and much regretted Sir George Cartier, in the House of Representatives of United Canada, when he proposed the second reading of the Bill for judiciary decentralization in Lower Canada in 1857; these extracts are taken from La Minerve of the 17th April, 1857.

"The cry that has resounded from one extremity of the Province to the other against the present system, must not be considered as a clamor, but, on the contrary, as the public expression of the necessity of a more extended judiciary decentralization.

"Now, that it is acknowledged that decentralization is a necessity, we must find out by what means we can obtain this object without burthening the consolidated fund with an expenditure larger than the present one.

"That Bill became law. It was nothing less than a system of judiciary decentralization with districts numerous enough to answer the wants of the large regions situate on the extremities of the country (and it is there only that the population in the Province of Quebec increases to a considerable extent, as proved by the Census) and resident judges, for that measure necessarily involved the residence of the judges, and all the judiciary personnel, at the chief towns of their respective districts. I took active proceedings with the Government on the occasion of the appointment of Judge Winter, in order that he would take his residence at Percé.

"I brought the matter before the House of Commons, and the Government led me to believe that Judge Winter would go and reside at Percé.

"But what happened? Judge Winter always resided at New Carlisle, until he was superannuated. Judge Caron resided at Quebec, and Judge Laframboise at Montreal.

"I am obliged to declare it—this system is condemned by all the population of Gaspesia, who finds that the judiciary decentralization promised, voted by the Legislature, and which was to have secured for Gaspesia a prompt and an effective system of justice, has not been put in practice for the last ten or twelve years, as regards the residence of the Judge at the chief town of the district, and that is one of the essential parts of the system of judiciary decentralization. Without that, this system is, so to speak, decapitated. Judiciary decentralization has always formed a part of the programme of the Conservative party, and also of the Liberal party.

"As for me, who have observed closely what has taken place in the county of Gaspé—I should say in all Gaspesia—since 1852, I must declare that justice is not administered there as it ought to be, to the great detriment of the interests of all classes of that region.

"Itinerant Judges do not suit that distant part of Canada, which, on the contrary, ought to have in its midst all the elements which constitute an important centre—I should say, a kind of autonomy.

"One might be tempted to say that, far from going ahead in the patriotic work of judiciary decentralization, we have retrograded.

"It is, however, the most powerful and fruitful factor in the work of colonization, and without active and efficacious colonization in the regions which form the outskirts of the Province of Quebec, where will the superabundant population of the old countries go? They must exile themselves in foreign lands.

"I pronounce myself now, as I have always done, in favor of a resident Judge in the judiciary district of Gaspé, and I beg you to be pleased to use your influence in the Privy Council so that the system of judiciary decentralization may be put in operation in the county of Gaspé in all its plenitude.

I have, etc., etc.,
(Signed) "P. FORTIN.

"Hon. Sir ALEX. CAMPBELL, K.C.M.G., C.B., Minister of Justice.

"P.S.—Population of the county of Gaspé in 1871, 18,729; in 1881, 25,001. Increase of the county of Gaspé during the last ten years, 34 per cent. Increase in the Province of Quebec during the same period, 14 per cent.

(Signed) "P. F."

That is the letter I addressed to the Minister of Justice, demanding redress for the people of the county of Gaspé. I know it has frequently been said, and especially by gentlemen connected with the legal profession: "What is the use of a Judge in those places? There are no cases to be tried." But when we find that the Judge, so far from remaining until the last day of the term, leaves before it is half through, after, perhaps, postponing indefinitely a number of cases, how can the merchants, the agriculturists, who may have occasion to go to law, get that justice which they have a right to expect? I wish to read a summary of a speech delivered in 1878 in the Legislative Assembly of Quebec, on the second reading of the Bill to remove one of the Judges of the district of Gaspé to Quebec. The Bill was conceived in that spirit of centralization, which we see, unfortunately for this country, so strongly manifested in our cities; but, fortunately for the administration of justice in Gaspé, the Government fell and the Bill fell with it. On the 30th March, 1868, I moved that an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General for a statement of the number of sittings of the Court held at Amherst, Magdalen Islands. I had made that motion on account of the complaints made by the people of these Islands, because the Judge had often failed to go and hold Court there, to the detriment of the people of that place and to the injury of its commerce and fisheries. I also then complained that the Judge did not reside at the capital town of the district, but at New Carlisle, a distance of 65 miles away. But nothing was done. My complaints made in the name of a large county and of a suffering people were in vain, and I need scarcely add that this was a great disappointment to the Gaspesians—this is a matter easily perceived. On the 4th April, 1860, I made another motion in this House, on the occasion of the absence of the Judge, during several terms of the Circuit Court of the Magdalen Islands. At the same time I complained that Judge Thompson had never resided at Percé, the capital of the county, and that neither did Judge Winter reside at the chief town of the district. The Government promised to compel him to take up his residence there, but nothing came of it. After a time the Administration changed, and we naturally expected the Reform party would grant us the measure we had asked, but nothing in the way of the reform asked was done by them, nevertheless. In short, all the Governments have shown, for the judiciary interests of that county, a heedlessness, a carelessness and disdain, which I am utterly at a loss to explain. No solicitude, no benevolence, and no pity, I may say, for the population who are colonizing these distant regions, amid all the kinds of difficulties and hardships which they undergo in making this country rich, by their being great consumers of the products of the manufacturers. This I can explain in only one of two ways: either we are thought by the Government to be an inferior people inhabiting an inferior country, and that anything is good enough for us; or else, the Government is returning to the old ideas of centralization—ideas which, if carried out, will be fatal to this country, which increases its population, only in the vast regions which lie at its extremities on the north, south, east and west. No pity for them! They must be worked and have nothing. No railways, no general improvements, not even a good administration of justice. But, Sir, the measure is full, and it overflows. The people are discontented. I will here read extracts from letters written to me in 1878, by leading gentlemen in the county, which demonstrate that our grounds of complaint are not exaggerated. The first is as follows:—

"The Judge came here to hold the January term, which has been appointed by proclamation to last from the 23rd to the 29th, inclusive; but, although there were several cases fixed for to-day—the 25th—and witnesses summoned in these cases from Cape Rosier, Grinn Cove, and Newport, the Judge closed the term on the 24th, in spite of the objections of the lawyers, and went away immediately. The reasons given were, that the cases were not important enough—being suits for from $20 to $30—and that there were more important cases to judge, viz: Kamouraska election case, and the Quebec term, which he had to attend at Quebec. Now, I do not know what you will think of these reasons, but the people of Gaspé did not find them very satisfactory."

The second is as follows:—

"The Judge receives a salary to act as a Judge; he either neglects to fulfil his duties or the Government gives him instruction to neglect his duties as Judge at Gaspé, to transfer them to Quebec, and this causes an additional expense to the country, while it is a refusal of justice to the people of Gaspé. As for me, I have important cases connected with the settlement of a succession which I cannot enter into Court, because I can never be sure of the presence of the Judge at any term, and I do not like the unnecessary expenses to commence pleading before a Judge who is in such great haste to return to Quebec or Montreal, and is liable to be replaced at the next term by another Judge before whom I would have to begin my pleadings anew."

The third is as follows:—

"The term was fixed for the 23rd. The Judge sat for the 29th days, and closed the proceedings on the 24th, without having done anything. Mr. St. Croix, from Jersey, Channel Islands, doing business at Fox River, had to remain in the county all winter to follow his case for this term, but his case has again been deferred. Witnesses had come from Newport, Fox River and Griffin Cove, but all that for nothing, as the Judge had gone before he arrived, and all the expenses of these witnesses fell on the poor clients. The fact is, many persons are afraid to proceed in Court, on account of the shameful and uncertain manner in which the terms are held. The Judge said he had to go and hold the February term at Quebec, and attend to some election case at Kamouraska. The witnesses that had been summoned arrived yesterday and this morning—the 24th and 25th—and I do not believe that they will praise much the administration of justice when they will have returned home. They find that, since the Government will not give us a resident Judge, the least we can expect is that, when a Judge comes down, he ought to hold the term to the end, or at least hear the cases fixed for the term, and in which the witnesses who are summoned, and who live at great distances from the chief town, were on their way to the Court. The people do not go to law, because they are never sure to have a Judge when the term comes, and that is the reason why there are so few cases on the roll."

One can judge, from these extracts, of the unfortunate position in which the people of Gaspé are placed, as regards the administration of justice. But the position of the people of the Magdalen Islands is still worse. Suppose an inhabitant of the Magdalen Islands has a case before the Court at Percé, he consults the Court Calendar and sees that the terms are fixed to certain dates. He leaves his home and embarks on board the steamer for Pictou, distant 120 miles, and from Pictou to Percé 370 miles, making the distance travelled to reach Percé 490 miles. He has arrived at Percé, where he is liable, under the present system, to find the Judge absent or away; he returns home, another 490 miles, making in all 980 miles travelled, and at an expense of from $50 to $60; added to which is his disappointment at finding no Court and damage to his case and his business, a process liable to be repeated many times over. I have proved, by these extracts, that the administration of justice in the county of Gaspé has been faulty to say the least. Many people believe that the county of Gaspé and its population are small and insignificant, and that there is no progress in that part of the country. I will read a few statistics to show that the county of Gaspé, notwithstanding the bad administration of justice, and notwithstanding that the Government has never done much for it, has increased in population as much as any other part of the country. The county of Gaspé is 4,584 square miles in extent, or 2,933,760 acres, while Prince Edward Island is 2,133 square miles in extent, or 1,365,400 acres, showing that Gaspé is twice as large as Prince Edward Island. The county of Bonaventure is 3,465 square miles in extent, or 2,217,600 acres, one-half as large again as Prince Edward Island. We find that the population of Gaspé, by the Census of 1871 was 18,729, and by the Census of 1881, 25,001, an increase of 33 per cent. The population of Bonaventure, in 1871, was 15,923, and, in 1881, 18,908. Rimouski had a population of 27,418 in 1871 and has increased to 33,791 in 1881. The three counties of Gaspé, Bonaventure and Rimouski, in 1871, had a population of 62,070, while in 1881 they have a population of 77,700, so that the increase of population in these three counties in ten years has been 15,630. Now, let us compare this with the increase of population in Prince Edward Island, which has a Governor, a Legislature, a bench of six Judges, a railroad, and many other things which go to make up a country. According to the Census of 1871 the population of Prince Edward Island was 94,021, and according to the last Census, 108,891, showing an increase of only 14,870, against an increase of 15,630 in Gaspé. This shows that Gaspé must have resources which have not been credited to it; and remember, that no immigration from Scotland, England, Ireland, Germany or France has occurred during the last thirty years that I have been there, to that country. It has increased of its own blood. Let us also compare it with Cape Breton. In 1871, the population of Cape Breton was 75,483, while in 1881 it was 84,500, an increase of 9,017. These comparisons which I have made, without any idea of belittling Prince Edward Island or Cape Breton, show that Gaspé is of sufficient importance to deserve more attention and solicitude on the part of the Government. Let them give us one-tenth of the consideration they give the west, and we will be contented. While I am speaking of judicial decentralization, I must say a word on the principle of decentralization itself. The principle of decentralization is the principle of a free country, the principle of a free man, the principle which people want to have established when they emigrate from one country to another, while the opposite principle, that of centralization, which is doing so much harm in the Province of Quebec, seeks to control everything directly from a common centre. Such a system tends to make the resident in the country like an inhabitant of the town, and subservient to him and to crush out thereby the liberty and spirit of the people. I am in favor of decentralization. Although I was educated in a city—and possibly if I had continued to live there I would have held their ideas—I changed my views when I went to reside in Gaspé, for I found that the French idea of centralization was wrong and the English idea of decentralization was right. Why should we oblige the people of Gaspé to go to Quebec for everything? Gaspé possesses natural resources such as would make a country. It is larger than many of the kingdoms of Europe, and if increased judicial and other advantages had been afforded, the increase of the population would not be 15,000 only, but 50,000. Providence has done a great deal for that portion of the country, although there were some drawbacks, such as the climate and its remoteness from the great centres of commerce. Its resources are manifold and extensive, but alluding to the fisheries alone, I may say that, there were left last year, on the beach, millions of pounds of cod-fish refuse which, if skilled industry had been developed there, might have been converted into valuable, fertilizing substances which would have brought a great deal of money. What I ask on behalf of Gaspé is, that its people be afforded what was promised them by the Conservative and by the Liberal parties respectively. What we want is decentralization; we want the right to live as independent men, and not be compelled to go to Quebec in order to obtain what we should have at home.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD There can be no objection to grant all those reports and documents respecting the appointment of a Judge for the county of Gaspé and the system of judicial decentralization in Canada. Of course any confidential communication must be excluded of necessity. Mr. Speaker, there can be no objection to this resolution being passed. I must admit that the hon. member for Gaspé has a rightful claim to what he asks. Gaspé has the same right as any other portion of Quebec to have a resident Judge. From a series of circumstances, I do not know how it happened, either the Governments of 1872, of 1874, or 1880 have not been able to secure a resident Judge in the full sense of the term. I think, however, that the view enunciated by the hon. member must be carried out, that in any appointment made as Judge of Gaspé it shall be made a condition that he shall reside there, and that he should not consider he had satisfied his duty by visiting the county occasionally when his services were required. That part of the Province of Quebec has, as I have said, the same right as any other part to have a resident Judge, so that lawyers and other persons can apply for summary procedure and conduct general business without being compelled to go either to Montreal or Quebec or elsewhere for the purpose of receiving the Judge's decision. I can assure my hon. friend that we fully understand the difficulties of the case, and we will see that the evil shall be remedied as far as it can be remedied, and that it shall be an understanding, if a Judge is appointed, that he shall be a resident Judge, and if he does not carry that out it shall be a sufficient cause for a motion in both Houses of Parliament to remove him. Perhaps, as my hon. friend is the great telegraphic authority in this country, he may think that by establishing telephonic or telegraphic communication, we may make a compromise, but unless he holds that opinion we will endeavor to insist on having a resident Judge for Gaspé.

Mr. MACKENZIE. My recollection is that when the late Judge was appointed, he was appointed on the distinct understanding that he would reside there. I also recollect that he at first declined the appointment on those terms, but afterwards accepted. I was not aware until very lately that he was not residing in the district. It is unfortunate that such is the case, but I am quite sure the late Government did everything in their power.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am quite sure also.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am sorry that, after the hon. gentleman has shown what the products of Gaspé are, there should be any desire manifested to live out of a district where men grow so stout and strong as its representative in this House.

Mr. LAURIER. The answer of the First Minister to the hon. member is very satisfactory, as regards the wants of the district of Gaspé, but I propose to call the attention of the Premier to the fact that there are many other districts in the Province of Quebec which have suffered just as severely as Gaspé. There are districts which have had Judges appointed to serve in the locality, and yet who reside in Quebec and Montreal. I do not want to specially blame the Governments any more than the Judges, because I know the tendency of centralization, to which the hon. member for Gaspé has referred, exists very generally in those cities, and persistent efforts are made to retain the Judges, who should reside in outside districts, to remain in Quebec and Montreal, in order that the Bench there may avail themselves of their services. I understand, from the language of the Premier, that he agrees with the proposition laid down by the member for Gaspé, that Judges who are appointed to administer justice in particular districts, shall reside in those districts. I would particularly call the attention of the Government to the fact that the law is not enforced in this respect, and this with the tolerance of the Government. It cannot be questioned that the rural districts largely suffer from the absence of the Judges. The duties of Judges are not confined simply to the Court House, and it is a serious grievance on outside districts that, when a Judge is required to administer the law at any time, he should be absent. I have no intention to criticize the Government, because I know that pressure has been brought on it to allow this state of things to exist, but I simply call the attention of the Government to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have heard no complaints from any other portion except Gaspé.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not file any complaint with the Government, but simply call their attention to a state of things which exist.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Not only does the state of things which exist stand in the way of that perfect decentralization that Sir George Cartier had in view, but there is a disposition among a certain section in Lower Canada to abolish the present system altogether, and bring about a system of centralization by having all the Judges reside in cities. Sir George Cartier was only induced to take the step he took in establishing the present system after a great deal of agitation in Lower Canada. The system of decentralization was one imposed on him almost unanimously by the people of Lower Canada, and there is danger now of our taking the retrograde step of centralizing judicial influences in the cities. The matter is in the hands of the people, and unless they make their opinion felt to-day they may find themselves deprived of this great boon, which was regarded as one of the most important reforms, and be again obliged to resort to agitation in order to secure its renewal. Whatever may be the views of some of the eminent members of the Bar, the system is a credit to the Province of Quebec, and ought to be preserved; but the people will require to keep their eyes open, or it may ultimately be taken from them.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. Last Session we had a very long debate on this same question, in which the hon. leader of the Opposition made a very long and effective speech against the system of administration of justice in our Province. One of his great points was, that the country Judges were becoming useless and ought to be transferred to the cities. I strongly protested against that at the time, and am glad that the hon. member for Quebec East, and the hon. member for Shefford, came to my support against the policy of their hon. leader.

Mr. LAURIER. I am aware that the hon. member for West Durham was opposed to having courts without Judges, and referred to the system of Ontario, where there are no courts without resident Judges, who are called County Court Judges.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. I recollect well what took place. The hon. leader of the Opposition made a regular indictment against our Judges in Quebec, but to-day our cause is vindicated by the hon. members who have just spoken.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I remember quite well the sense of the hon. member for Durham's remarks, and felt that they had been misunderstood by the hon. Minister at the time he made his reply.

Motion agreed to.

FERRIES BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex), in moving for a return of all Orders in Council regulating ferries between points in Canada and the United States, together with all correspondence as to the regulations affecting such ferries, said: The legislation with regard to the ferries on the frontier, to which my attention has been called, seems to be very confused. By 20 Victoria, chapter 7, it is enacted: that in order to encourage international ferries and in the interest of commerce, it is essential to place the control and management of these ferries in the hands of the municipalities interested; and it was with this object, apparently, that by the same statute the license is directed to be, in all cases affecting the international ferries, granted to the municipality. But, both before and subsequent to the passing of this statute, the power to regulate was given to the Governor in Council; so we have one authority managing and another regulating. Under these circumstances, it is difficult to settle what each was intended to do. By the Confederation Act this power was retained exclusively for the Dominion Government, but no action appears to have been taken. We find Orders in Council affecting inter-provincial ferries published with the Dominion Statutes of 1877-78-79, but I can find no Order in Council affecting international ferries. By the Dominion Act 33 Victoria, chapter 35, all such international ferries are made exclusively subject to the Parliament of Canada, and the 5th section of that Act authorizes the Governor in Council to make such regulations as he may deem expedient for various purposes connected with such ferries, such as establishing their extent and limit, defining the conditions under which licenses may be granted, determining the size and description of the vessels to be used, fixing the tolls which should be charged, the times and hours of crossing, and imposing penalties for the breach of such regulations. It would appear from this that all such ferries, since Confederation, are subject to regulations to be approved by the Dominion Government, and that the municipalities shall stand in the position of lessees, whose leases have not expired and are only empowered to sublet, being deprived of all authority for enforcing regulations for the conduct of such ferries. This is a matter seriously affecting my constituency as well as the western frontier, at such points as Sarnia, Windsor, Sandwich and Amherstberg, and also at Kingston, Brockville and Prescott on the St. Lawrence. It is very desirable that the Government should deal with this matter, and that such regulations should be put in force by the Governor in Council as would meet the necessities of the several municipalities interested. At Windsor we have a very superior line of iron ferry boats, running constantly between that port and Detroit, from six in the morning until midnight, and carrying a large number of passengers, and a great quantity of freight. It seems to me that it is the duty of the Government to deal with this matter without further delay. The municipal authorities should have full power given them to regulate and control these ferries, and also to enforce the penalties against them for any breach of the conditions of their licenses. It is now nearly twelve years since the passing of the Act referred to. So far, it seems to me to have been inoperative, and should any litigation arise it is doubtful whether a municipality could enforce its authority against the owners of the ferries. I hope the matter will receive the immediate attention of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY RATES.

Mr. MUTTART moved for a statement showing lists of articles on which freight rates had been lowered, with amount of reduction, on the Prince Edward Island Railway, since the year 1878; also, copies of all correspondence relating to further lowering of rates, including passenger fares charged on said railway. He said: In making this motion, I may say that, on a former occasion, during the Session of 1880, I introduced a motion somewhat similar to the one now submitted. At that time I ventured to assert that I believed, if freight rates were lowered on the Prince Edward Island Railway, on certain articles, especially agricultural produce, it would not only prove a great advantage and convenience to the people, but would also be a source of constantly increased revenue to the Government. Since then a small reduction has been effected in the Tariff rates on some articles. And what has been the result? In the report of the Minister of Railways, laid before Parliament the other day, we are told, by the superintendent of the Prince Edward Island Railway, that "very considerable reductions were made in freight rates during the year, notably on potatoes and on goods ex steamer Northern Light, nevertheless, the earnings have shown an increase." This is just the result that was anticipated. But, apart from the subject of the lowering of rates leading, in certain cases, to increased business, and consequently increased receipts, the people of the Island have a right to special consideration in the management of their railway. The Island is essentially agricultural, and, therefore, the first consideration should be to afford the utmost facilities to the farmers in transporting their produce to market. The Island Railway, it will be remembered, is a local road not connecting directly with the railway system of the mainland. Being a surface road, it is by no means a straight one. Consequently, a great distance is travelled in getting from one point to another than if there were fewer curvatures. Farmers are, therefore, charged, in having their produce carried by rail, for greater mileage than they would otherwise be if the road were straighter. Then again, the road only cost about $16,000 per mile. These, and various other reasons, might be urged in favor of still further reducing freight rates on this road. As regards passenger tariffs on the Island Railway, I certainly think the rates should be lowered. Instead of charging 3 cents per mile, as at present, for first class passenger fare, the charge should be only 2 cents a mile, and return second class tickets should be given, as in the case of first class return tickets. I feel confident that, if the passenger rates were lowered as I have indicated, that the next year's report of the superintendent would be able to say, in regard to passengers, what he has this year stated regarding the result of lowering of freight rates. During the recess, the hon. Minister of Railways, in his official capacity, inspected our Island Railway, and I hope, from his personal knowledge of the road and of the exceptional requirements of the people of the Island, he will endeavor to carry out their wishes in this respect, by lowering both the freight and passenger rates on the Prince Edward Island Railway.

Mr. HACKETT. In rising to second the motion of my hon. friend, I desire to say that this question of lowering the rates on the Island Railway is one of great importance to the whole Island. As is well known, and as my hon. friend has stated, the Island Railway cost but a small amount of money in its construction. The people of the Island had begun the construction of the railway before the Island entered the Confederation, and it was intended that the road should be a narrow gauge railway, a surface road, that many curves would be allowed, that the cost of construction would be small, and that consequently freight and passenger rates be over that road would also be small. Unfortunately, however, the Local Government had the fixing of the rates before the Island entered Confederation, after which the Dominion Government assumed the responsibility of running the whole of the road, and of fixing the rates the same as those charged on the Intercolonial Railway. This was considered by the people as very unjust, for the reason I have already stated, because the rates are very much greater on the Intercolonial Railway. There are many short curves on that road, and, fixing the rates on the Island road according to mileage, is very much in excess of what it would be on the Intercolonial Railway. This matter was brought to the notice of the Government in 1880, and I am glad to find that the hon. gentleman who now administers the Department of Railways has thought proper to make a reduction on the carriage of certain articles. The people of the Island are principally agriculturists, and the commodities which they require to send to market are of a bulky and weighty nature, having no very great value. The principal products of the Island are oats and potatoes. These cannot be conveyed over the road at present for more than fifty miles, because it is quite impossible for the farmers to sell their commodities at sufficient prices to enable them to pay the freight of their commodities over more than fifty miles of the railway. It is a well known fact that the fall season on the Island is very short, and that the harbors, with the exception of one or two, close very early, and it is of great importance that the people should move their produce during that short season. To do this they should be allowed to move them to the furthest point, 100 or 200 miles over the railway, but on account of the very high rates charged they are not able to send them more than fifty miles. The consequence is, that many of the products of the Island remain in the hands of the farmers and traders, and they send them by water in the spring. This is a matter that should be considered by the Government. The Island Railway has to compete with water, and carriage by water is much the cheaper, for no part of the Island is more than seventy miles from the water. The Government should lower the rates on these articles so that the farmers can send them over the whole length of the railway, particularly in the fall. With regard to the articles on which rates have been lowered, I have figures to show that an increase has taken place in the transportation of those articles as well as in the revenue. In 1880, when this matter was brought before Parliament, only 34,699 tons of potatoes and roots were sent over the railway. In 1881, after a reduction had been made by the hon. Minister, the very large quantity of 105,223 tons were sent over the road, being an increase of about 70,000 tons. Although the lowering of the rates was an experiment, still the revenue to the Government was increased by about $1,000 on that one item alone. Then, with regard to sawn lumber. Although lumber was not one of the commodities of the Island, still a very large quantity is sent over the railway. I was in conversation with a gentleman last summer who owns a large saw mill, and he told me that last year, for the first time in the history of the railway, he was able, in consequence of the lowering of the rates, to send his lumber 100 miles. I find that, in 1880, only 1,589,412 feet of sawn lumber were sent over the railway; while in 1881, in consequence of the reduction in rates made by the hon. Minister, there were sent over the railway 2,901,314 feet, or an increase of over 1,000,000 feet of lumber, giving an increased revenue to the Government of about $1,000 upon that item. Then, with regard to cordage and tan-bark: in 1880, 1,498 cords were sent over the road, but in 1881 an increase of 500 cords had taken place, giving an increased revenue of $400 or $500, thus establishing clearly the success of the experiment of lowering the rates, which would justify the Minister in making a still further reduction in the rates for other articles. The principal commodity of the Island is oats. The farmers almost exclusively raise oats, and these have to be sent over the railway late in the fall; but from 1880 down to the present time I regret to say that no reduction has been made in the rate for the carriage of oats. Last fall an attempt was made to increase the rates over a short distance of the railway, and I find that, notwithstanding the great increase of prosperity which has taken place, the quantity of oats carried over the railway has largely fallen off. In 1880, 575,441 bushels of oats were sent over the railway; in 1881, 412,526 bushels were sent over the road, showing a falling off of over 100,000 bushels, while other articles, notably roots, potatoes, lumber and cordage, have largely increased. This shows clearly that the farmers of the country are not able to send their oats over the railway with profit to themselves in consequence of the high rate, and, therefore, they resort to navigation. In 1880, the revenue arising from the carriage of oats was $12,422.64; in 1881, the revenue was $8,89.02, showing a falling off of $4,000 on that item alone. These facts show the necessity of a further reduction of the rates on oats. In fact, we cannot send oats over that railway with any profit for a distance of more than twelve miles. I think it is most important, not only to the people of the Island, but to the Government, to lower the rates. This will increase the revenue, undoubtedly, as has been clearly shown by the articles experimented upon. With regard to the carriage of passengers over the railway, I may say that the accommodation is of very poor description. The railway being a narrow gauge, the cars are quite contracted, and there is not sufficient room even for two passengers on each seat. Still we are charged on that piece of railway the same rates as are charged on the Intercolonial Railway. It is well known to all that, with steel rails and a solid road-bed, passengers are carried quite smoothly over the Intercolonial Railway; but on account of the sharp curves and steep grades on the Island Railway, passengers are very much shaken up and disturbed, and it is not very good for the health. I trust, therefore, that the Government will view this matter as I do, and will make such reductions in the passenger rates as will meet the views of the Island people. I think the result of the experiment already tried in lowering freight rates will justify the Minister in making further reductions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is, of course, no objection to this motion, and the papers moved for by the hon. gentleman will, as a matter of course, be brought down.

The subject of this motion will receive the careful consideration of the Government. I will be only too glad to find that, by reducing still further the rates on the Island Railway, the net results will be improved. If that can be shown, and if there is good reason to believe that by a reduction in the rates we can improve the net results, which I regret to say are still very unfavorable, it will be a matter of very great pleasure to me to recommend such a reduction. But it is a well known fact that the people of Prince Edward Island have perhaps a larger amount of railway accommodation in proportion to the population than any other people in the world. It is equally well known that it costs a large sum of money to give those railway facilities to the people of Prince Edward Island, and regardless altogether of the cost of the work, the operating expenses of the railway on the Island are still very largely in excess of the entire income. Still, of course, I believe the hon. gentleman is correct in saying that the reduction which has been made, has had the effect of decreasing the very large margin that previously existed between revenue and expenditure, and if it were found that by further reductions we could still more decrease the disparity between revenue and expenditure, I shall be only too glad to effect an improvement in the operations of the road by a measure of that kind.

Motion agreed to.

ADMINISTRATOR OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. KILLAM moved for copies of all correspondence, telegrams and cablegrams between the Government and any person or persons, and of any correspondence, telegrams and cablegrams between any persons, the originals or copies of which may be in possession of the Government, and of all Orders in Council, and of any documents or papers in possession of the Government relating to the appointment, or proposed appointment of an Administrator of the Government, or of a Deputy Governor, to act during His Excellency's absence from the Dominion in November last. He said: In moving for this correspondence, I am not charging the Government, as I might have done, with any dereliction of duty, or with any assumption of prerogative that does not belong to them. But I think it would be interesting to the public, and to members of this House, to know what took place last autumn, when His Excellency was about leaving for Europe, and the manner in which the gentleman on the Treasury benches treated him, compelling his remaining in the country for a fortnight. The reports which appeared in the press of the country in relation to the matter, are interesting, and are such as to excite the curiosity of any one who cares to look into the matter. I am not bringing the question up out of an idle spirit of enquiry, but simply to state the principle, that I do not think it is a proper thing for the Government of this country to assume powers which, I think, hon. gentlemen opposite assumed in this matter. If, however, they are clear of blame, the correspondence will, of course, show that fact distinctly. About the 20th of October last it was announced that His Excellency was about leaving on a visit to the Mother Country, and that a meeting of Council was to be held for the purpose of appointing an Administrator. On the next day it was announced that His Excellency was unwell, which we all regretted to hear, and unable to leave, as he had intended. This was officially contradicted, and it was stated that the matter had been entirely arranged, and that he was going on the next Friday. We heard soon after that his departure was still further delayed, that he would not leave for two weeks, and that General MacDougall was to come to this country to act as Governor. Now the letters patent are perfectly plain, and it seems odd that such occurrences should have taken place as those to which I refer.

We have a system of government which may be imperfect in itself, but which, it is clear, cannot at all be misunderstood. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have misunderstood it entirely. I do not say they did; I do not charge them with having done so; but I think they did, and that they attempted themselves to appoint an Administrator of the Government, practically to appoint their master, and in circumstances in which he might be their servant. I believe, with some others, that we live under a very good constitution; that we are well off in this country; that our system is a good one, and that while we have a Governor General appointed by the home authorities we are as happily situated perhaps as some republican countries which have the privilege of electing their own Presidents or Governors. There are those who, like my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos), think that we might grow our own Governors General, but while we are living under this constitution I think those who profess to enjoy the confidence of the people should observe the system under which they live, and should loyally carry out its provisions in letter as well as in spirit. I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite did so on the occasion to which I refer, and I believe that if the correspondence is brought down it will show that they placed themselves in a wrong position. I believe, with the hon. member for Victoria, that it is a proper thing for the people of this country to consider whether or not we should have greater privileges in this way, and I think the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin), who I regret to see is not in his seat, would agree with me in any steps we might take in the direction of securing additional liberties of that kind. I do not think, however, that it is proper for the Government of this country to assume the right to appoint their Governor General as hon. gentlemen opposite did on the occasion to which the motion refers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are no papers, and therefore we cannot bring any down.

Mr. KILLAM. Does the hon. gentleman deny that there was any correspondence on the subject with England, and that they were informed by the home Government that they could not take the course they proposed to take in relation to the appointment of an Administrator in His Excellency's absence?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I do.

Motion negatived on division.

REPORT OF INSPECTOR OF FISHERIES, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. DECOSMOS, in moving for the report of the Inspector of Fisheries for British Columbia for the calendar year, 1881, said: I understand that such a report has been received at the Department here, and as it contains important recommendations bearing upon the fisheries of British Columbia, I think it very desirable that it should be laid before the House at an early day, and afterwards referred to the Printing Committee, so that it may be printed and distributed among the members. The hon. Finance Minister, the other day, alluded to the take of the fish of Canada as amounting to $6,000,000. I have private information that the take of the fish and fur-bearing animals taken from the sea in British Columbia amounted last year to $1,500,000. At the eastern side of the continent some $80,000 or $90,000, I believe, are spent for the protection of the fisheries and for fish-breeding purposes, while at the western end of the Dominion some $2,000 or $3,000 only were spent last year. Without going into the necessity for spending a larger sum of money, I will at this time simply move for the return.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. KILLAM.

SHIPPING DISASTERS IN INLAND WATERS.

Mr. SPROULE moved for a return showing the name and number of all boats or sailing vessels lost on Canadian inland waters, since 1870, with the value of property, the number of lives lost, and the known or supposed causes of the losses. He said: I move for this return in order to bring before the Government and the country the subject of the great annual loss of life and property in our inland waters, with the hope that something may be devised to prevent these disasters. Year after year some very extensive losses are chronicled. In 1879, the Waubuno, which ran from Collingwood to Parry Sound, was lost, with all the passengers and crew; and at the litigation which took place in connection with the loss of that steamer, the fact was brought out that she was allowed to go to sea in an entirely unseaworthy condition. If the Act regulating the appointment of inspectors requires the inspector to examine the hulls of boats as well as the engines, probably a large portion of the loss of life and property might be avoided. The Chairman of the Board of Steamboat Inspection, in his last report, says:

"The loss of the steamer Waubuno on the 22nd of November last year, with all on board, led to the recommendation by me of the appointment of an inspector of hulls of steam vessels, such person to have supervision over their seaworthiness as well as over their construction. The loss of two steamers this year under, as far as we can judge, like circumstances, and about the same time of the year, the one on the 6th and the other on the 24th of November, draws attention again to the importance of such an appointment."

The propellor Zealand, one of the vessels alluded to, was lost off Long Point, Lake Ontario, with all on board. The propellor Simcoe was lost on the 24th of November, off Manitoulin Island, Lake Huron, on her way from Chicago, and twelve of the crew were lost. On the 24th May, 1881, the steamer Victoria was lost on the Thames. Those persons who had the privilege of being at all acquainted with the nature of the circumstances and who examined the hull afterwards, came to the conclusion that the loss was very largely due to the imperfect way in which the boat was built; and if inspectors were appointed with instructions to examine the construction of boats, not only their boilers but also their hulls and every part of them, and have some superintendence over their loading, many calamities would be averted. It is a well-known fact that, although the boiler of the boat might be all that could be desired, the strength of the boat must be measured by its weakest plank. In many of the other cases we have this result, and that when an examination was made it was found that vessels had been allowed to go to sea without proper protection to life, in the shape of life-boats, and had the inspection gone far enough this fact would have been disclosed. In regard to the Waubuno, witnesses had declared that some of its planks were rotten. On the 24th November last, the steamer Jane Millar was lost while proceeding from Beaverton, on the Georgian Bay, towards Manitoulin. In that instance it appeared that the disaster occurred owing to the vessel being overloaded on the top deck, having a large amount of water in the hull, and no ballast in the bottom to steady the boat. If inspectors were instructed to see that vessels were properly loaded, a large saving of life and property would annually be secured. After obtaining the returns for which I ask in this motion—and I desire to obtain them at an early day—I propose to again bring the subject before the attention of the Government, and offer, if possible, some suggestions as to what remedies ought to be devised for the purpose of preventing these annual losses. When the Government's attention has been called two or three years successively to these disasters, it is high time some steps were taken to amend the Steamboat Act, so that inspectors should be appointed, not only to inspect the boilers of vessels, but their hulls likewise; that inspectors' visits should be made more than once a year, as is the present practice; that a certificate should be given to vessels allowing them to run up to a certain time in the fall if they were properly equipped; that a fine be imposed on masters for allowing a larger number of persons on board than was consistent with safety; and that vessels, when leaving port, should be properly equipped with life-boats and life-saving apparatus.

Mr. LANE. In seconding this motion I desire to remind the House that last Session I moved that an investigation should be held into the loss of the steamer Waubuno. It was late in the Session when I proposed my resolution, and nothing was done. Of course an objection could be taken to my proposal, on the ground that it referred to a matter in litigation; at the same time I could not see any reason why an investigation should not be held, notwithstanding the fact that the matter was before the courts of law. This year we have had another disaster, occurring very near the port where I reside on Georgian Bay, in which about thirty lives were lost. Every year disasters, more or less numerous, take place on Georgian Bay, and I am fully satisfied that if the matter is properly looked into by the Government they may, to a large extent, be averted. It is the general impression that the Jane Millar was lost last fall simply because she was constructed on improper principles, added to which was the circumstance that she was overloaded. I think it is advisable that at all lake ports there should be a resident inspector, whose duty it should be to see that vessels are not allowed to leave port except in a proper condition, and not overloaded. I do not think there is any way of arriving at the true reason of these losses unless an investigation is held, under the auspices of the Government, by competent persons, who will take evidence and make a thorough enquiry. It certainly is a very serious matter that every year we should have reported unexpected losses—I say unexpected losses, because there is no reason why the Jane Millar, for example, should have been lost with twenty lives on board. The storm in which she went down was not one which would wreck a vessel which was in proper condition to withstand a moderate gale; she was not very far from land, not over a quarter of a mile, and we have it on the evidence that, unless there was something radically wrong, she would not have been lost. No doubt the Government will have observed the extent of the disasters that have occurred during the last two years; and to those particular instances to which attention has been called, will decide that it is necessary that the whole question shall be thoroughly examined, in order that life may be protected.

Mr. McCALLUM. Of course it is very desirable if the Steamboat Inspection Act can be improved, it should be improved; but I can tell the hon. mover of the resolution that we have a Steamboat Inspection Act, and I regret very much he has brought the subject before the House, particularly in regard to the Waubuno, because I believe that matter is yet before the court. I venture to assert, in contradiction to the hon. gentleman, that these very boats of which he speaks now were seaworthy. All the inspection possible—and it is desirable we should have all inspection possible—will not prevent such an occurrence taking place when a vessel goes out in a heavy sea, and gets caught in a gale or a heavy snow storm. Instead of the inspectors the master of the Victoria was to be blamed altogether, because the accident happened through his carelessness in allowing so many people to go on board. The boat had three times as many on board as she could safely carry. Had she the right number, she would have been safe enough. As to the accident to the Jane Millar at the time she was lost a very serious storm was raging. The hon. member suggested that the captain of a vessel should be fined when his vessel was not properly loaded. Was not the captain subject to a penalty right before his eyes? Was he not the proper judge; and if he went out with an overloaded vessel, did he not risk his own life? Surely that was penalty enough. I hope the Government will appoint a proper shipbuilder to inspect hulls. These should be inspected as well as the machinery. It may be said the present inspectors have had the inspection of hulls under their control as well as the inspection of machinery, but the hon. gentleman may find fault and say the present inspectors are not qualified to inspect the hulls of vessels. I know that, on the contrary, they have succeeded very well so far. If the hon. gentleman will look at the other side of the water, he will find that many vessels have been lost there the past season—even new iron boats, through collisions and other accidents. It is very advisable we should have all the restrictions possible, and do all we can to save life, but the loss of life will take place as long as we have men engaged in that business.

Mr. KILLAM. I take this opportunity to ask the hon. Minister of Railways if any material change is proposed in the system of inspecting steamers in the Maritime Provinces engaged in ocean navigation as separate from the lakes, and whether the Bill for the inspection of inland steamers is in an advanced state of preparation, so that we may shortly expect it down?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If my hon. friend will wait until the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is in his place, he will answer the question.

Mr. McCUAIG. I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Welland with reference to the inspection of vessels. The Government have to rely on the inspectors appointed by the insurance companies. I am aware the Government are considering the desirability of appointing some practical shipbuilder to inspect the hulls. I have no doubt the appointment of a man of skill will meet all the wants of the country in that direction.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION CANALS TENDERS.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for copies, 1st, of all tenders for the enlargement of the Welland Canal, the amount of each tender moneyed out, the bill of approximate quantities on which tenders have been computed; the names of all persons to whom contracts have been awarded, specifying whether awarded under a call for tenders or not, and, if not, the bill of quantities and schedule of prices on which such contracts based; the date of each contract, the date when stipulated to be finished, and if finished, the date of its actual completion; the amount paid each contractor, and the bill of quantities on which such payments have been made; and bill of quantities of the work in each case remaining unfinished; the amount and nature of the securities deposited by each contractor; the names of contractors who have failed in carrying out their contracts; and amounts of securities and drawbacks forfeited by each contractor so failing. 2nd. Copies of all tenders for the enlargement of the Lachine Canal and the like information in every particular as is asked above for the enlargement of the Welland Canal. 3rd. Copies of all tenders for the enlargement of the Ottawa River canals, and improvement of its navigation, and the like information in every particular as is asked above for the enlargement of the Welland Canal. 4th. Copies of all tenders for the construction of the Culbute Canal, and the improvement of the navigation of the Upper Ottawa River, and the like information in every particular as is asked above for the enlargement of the Welland Canal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER suggested that, as the returns asked for would entail a vast amount of work, and therefore probably not be furnished until very late in the Session, the hon. gentleman should move instead for information in regard to any specific point on which he desired to be enlightened.

Mr. COSTIGAN asked that the motion be allowed to stand.

Motion allowed to stand.

CLASSIFICATION OF IMPORTS.

Mr. BURPEE moved for a return of all circulars, memoranda and instructions issued by the Customs throughout the Dominion, relating to the interpretation of the several classes of goods imported and the duties to be levied thereon under the Tariff since March 14th, 1870, to 1st February, 1882.

Mr. BOWELL. I am quite sure my hon. friend desires a volume of very interesting reading, therefore I suggest that the time for which we should have the returns and memoranda should cover from the 1st of January, 1874. I think the House will see, and those members who take the trouble to read those papers, that the course pursued in the endeavor to equalize the values at which goods should be imported, under the present Government, is much the same as that pursued by the late Government. There may be a slight difference, though I do not say it as a fact, the general impression being in favor of the present Government, as having taken measures to carry out its orders, which the late Government did not do.

Mr. MILLS. I believe that the regulations or policy of the present Government, in this matter, has proved extremely unsatisfactory. I know many cases in which gentlemen have crossed from this side of the line to the other, to purchase what they could not obtain in this country, and of their having entered those goods at the prices at which they were bought in the States. The Custom House officers detained them as under-valued. Affidavits have been produced to the effect that the parties from whom, and the parties by whom those goods were purchased, setting forth the price actually paid. But, notwithstanding the testimony of both parties, Ministers have sent an appraiser to fix a higher valuation and tax the importers for larger sums than the goods were actually worth, sometimes compelling them to pay a fine besides. I can give some cases in point: the owner of a nursery at Windsor, Mr. Dougall, was suffering from some blight or disease that had attacked his pear trees, and he purchased in the States the trees necessary to complete his assortment. He purchased them at the prices at which they are universally sold at such nurseries, but they were retained at the border until many were worthless, on the plea that many were entered at a lower price than their actual valuation. Another value was fixed on them, and when Mr. Dougall wrote to the Department of Customs, to inform them that the prices fixed on this side were not those at which they were sold in the United States, no regard was paid to him. He assured them that the new values attached were higher than those fixed by the nursery to purchasers on both sides of the lines; but no redress was obtained. Again, many of the farmers in the south-western peninsula have been making experiments in the production of sorghum and other varieties of sugar cane, and have imported pans and other utensils from the United States for the manufacture of sugar. But when these articles and machinery purchased were landed at the Custom House at Amherstberg, they also were detained, on the charge that the farmers had entered them at less than their actual value. I know several instances where the buyers have shown to the Department that the prices at which the articles were entered were those actually paid for them, and affidavits have been produced from the sellers in support of this statement. Yet the Minister of Customs sent an appraiser who fixed another value than that of the manufacturers, and not only charged the Customs tax on these imports but fined the parties because they did not enter the machinery at other prices than those at which they were really purchased. I would like to know when a farmer goes from Canada to the United States to purchase machinery for the manufacture of sorghum, what other valuation can he attach than that which he has been called on to pay? How is he to know whether the prices given are too much or too little—how is he to fix a valuation except by the price which he actually paid. He comes forward and produces his invoice. He says: "This is the price I paid for this article." The hon. gentleman says you must pay more, and if he objects to that and the price is insisted upon he is subjected to a fine. This is the way the hon. gentleman seeks to encourage skilled agriculture in the western portion of the peninsula. I can tell him there is a great amount of dissatisfaction at the manner in which the law is being administered. I think I have with me the correspondence in some of these cases, and it is perfectly obvious that the spirit of the law, at all events, has been violated in the manner in which it is being administered, and serious vexations have been caused to a very considerable number of the agricultural population.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) prior to the House rising, made some complaints against the administration of the Customs Department, which are not justified, either in the law or in the practice of the administration of the affairs of that Department. The hon. gentleman said there was great dissatisfaction in the western section of the country as to the administration of the Customs Department with respect to the ruling of the value of articles for duty. He also informed the House that certain fruit trees, purchased at a nursery in the United States by a Mr. Dougall, in the county of Essex, had been refused entry at the prices he paid. I am not prepared to say that such is not the fact. On the contrary, I am aware that much difficulty has arisen in arriving at a fair and equitable valuation of that class of articles entered for duty. It arises from the fact that many of the nurseries in the United States sell to the Canadian purchasers at a much lower price than they sell to the purchasers in the United States. It may also be true that they produced affidavits to that effect, and these affidavits may have been quite correct as to the prices paid for the article. But the House will remember that the hon. member for Bothwell stated—and he was very particular in the manner in which he put the point before the House—that the trees were entered at the price at which the nurseries in the United States sell to all Canadian purchasers. That is a point we do not dispute. He also stated that, in the case of machinery, affidavits from the persons who purchased and who sold the machinery in the United States, were presented to the Customs Department, stating that the price at which the machinery was entered for duty was the price which they had paid for it in the United States. That I am not prepared to dispute either. In the administration of that part of the Department, and particularly in ruling the value of articles for duty, we find that these articles are sold in the United States to the Canadian purchaser, at a much lower rate than they are sold to the American purchaser; in other words, articles which are sold in the United States, and go into consumption in the United States, are sold at a higher rate than the same articles are sold to the Canadian purchaser when to be brought into this country. There are many reasons why that is done—particularly in the case of machinery and all the manufactures from iron and like material—in the United States. When they are sold by the manufacturer for export they receive a drawback, which reduces the price at which the article is sold in the United States. In other cases they make special rates for the trade in Canada, in order to retain the market at the expense of manufacturers in this country. The argument of the hon. member for Bothwell is simply this: That all goods purchased in the United States, or any foreign market, should be entered for duty at the price at which they are purchased. The hon. gentleman ought to know, if he does not know, that such is not the law. He ought to know that in the consolidation of the Customs Act by his own colleague, the late hon. Minister of Customs, the case is particularly provided for, and I will read the two sections of the Act which provide the mode, and the manner, and the value at which all articles shall be entered for duty. I am sure if he had applied to his late hon. leader who sits beside him, and more particularly to his late colleague, who was Minister of Customs, for their opinion on that point, he never would have made the speech he did. If you turn to the 31st clause of the Customs Act, you will find it reads as follows:—

"In all cases where any duty is imposed on any goods imported into Canada, ad valorem, or according to the value of such goods, such value shall be understood to be the fair market value thereof in the principal markets of the country whence the same were exported directly to Canada; and every appraiser, and every collector, when acting as such, shall by all reasonable ways and means in his power, ascertain the fair market value, as aforesaid, of any goods to be appraised by him, and estimate and appraise the value for duty of such goods at the fair market value, as aforesaid."

The 32nd clause points out what shall be considered a fair market value, and reads thus:

"The fair market value for duty, of goods imported into Canada shall be the fair market value of such goods in the usual and ordinary acceptance of the term, at the usual and ordinary credit, and not the cash value of such goods, except in cases in which the article imported is by universal usage, considered and known to be a cash article, and so bonâ fide paid for in all transactions in relation to such article; and all invoices representing cash values, except in the special cases hereinabove referred to, shall be subject to such additions as to the Collector or appraiser of the port at which they are presented may appear just and reasonable, to bring up to the amount to the true and fair market value, as required by this section."

Now, the House will see that, by their own statute, for which he himself is responsible, as a member of the late Cabinet, the only course that could be pursued in honestly administering that law was to take every article which is imported into this country, and ascertain whether the price at which it is entered for duty is the fair market value in the country whence it was imported directly to Canada. Now, that is all that the appraiser, the collector, the Commissioner or myself—when it was referred to me—had ever ruled in matters of this kind. I know that difficulties have arisen in reference particularly to fruit trees, and in order to avoid that, the House will see, on referring to the proposed changes which are now before the House, that we have, after a good deal of consideration and after having compared the nurserymen's prices in the United States with the prices at which they have been entered for duty, we have concluded in future to charge a specific duty, and thereby do away with the difficulties that have arisen in the past in the entry of that class of goods at a very much lower rate than they are sold in the United States. The case with machinery is precisely the same. I will give you an illustration upon this point. I have had locomotive engines imported that have been entered at a price less the profit of manufacture, less the freight of bringing it to the frontier; and then declared to be the fair market value. Now, any one reading that statute would know that that is not the law, and that any Customs officer allowing an article to pass which was entered in that manner, would be doing a gross injustice to the honest man who was making a fair entry at a fair price. I thought it advisable that the House and the country, at least those who do not know what the law is, should have this matter placed fully and fairly before them. It is a great difficulty—I frankly admit it is one of the greatest difficulties—in administering the Customs law, to regulate entries so that one importer shall not have an advantage over another importer; and had the law been strictly enforced from the time of its enactment, as it has been during the past three years, I do not think we should have had the difficulties that have arisen during the last two or three years in particular. Another difficulty that often presents itself is the fluctuation of the market: articles may rise in value to-day and fall again in the market in a month hence. Complaints often arise from the fact that an importer may have purchased at one time a particular article and given a certain price for it, while another importer may have purchased the same article two months afterwards and entered it, and may have paid 10, 20 or 25 per cent. higher. In other cases, the invoices are made out and the entry made at the prices which ruled in the market, perhaps two or three months previous to the time of the purchase. Then it becomes the duty of the appraiser at once to raise the face of the invoice, and if he can show that there has been an attempt at fraud, it becomes his duty not only to raise the value for duty, but to impose the penalty which is inflicted by the 46th section of the Act. I am surprised that a member of the late Government, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), should have risen in his place and taken exception to the administration of the law on points of this kind. If he had shown any case where the law had been administered in such a way to the injustice of the importer—that is, by reason of the value of the article being raised higher than that at which it is sold in the market in which it is purchased for home consumption—then he would have had a case against the Government; but in all the cases to which he referred—and I was particular to notice the language he used—he stated that the prices at which the goods were entered for duty were the prices at which they were sold to all Canadian purchasers. He did not say to all purchasers, or that they were sold at the same price to Canadian purchasers as to the purchasers in the United States for home consumption; but, on the contrary, that the prices at which they were entered were the prices at which they were sold by the American manufacturers or American nurserymen to the Canadian purchaser. I have shown that no other course could have been taken under the law than the one we have adopted.

Mr. MACKENZIE. My hon. friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), as well as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Barpee), is unfortunately absent.

Mr. BOWELL. That is not our fault.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I know it is not, nor is it the fault of the hon. gentlemen themselves, and the matter must come up again on some other motion when these hon. gentlemen will have an opportunity of replying to the remarks of the Minister of Customs. I may say, however, that I understood the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to say distinctly that the price at which Mr. Dougall brought in his fruit trees was the ordinary price charged at the nursery in Michigan.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes, to all Canadian purchasers.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I did not so understand him.

Mr. BOWELL. I was careful to note his language, and those were the words he used.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not dispute the hon. gentleman's accuracy; but the hon. member for Bothwell said that he had papers showing the unjust working of the law in two or three cases, and particularly that in a certain case—after the goods were appraised at a higher price than that at which they were bought in the United States—the importer was obliged to pay not only the higher duties, but a fine besides.

Mr. BOWELL. That is the law.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not think the law can be so interpreted.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. gentleman will read the 46th section of his own Act, he will find that the appraisers had no option.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If the hon. gentleman will read the clause he will find it is not open to the construction he has placed upon it.

Mr. BOWELL. I will read it for the hon. gentleman, but before doing so I may tell him that, not only had the appraiser no option, but the Minister himself was equally restricted. This is the clause :

"If, in any case, the actual value for duty on any goods, as finally determined by the appraiser, or the Collector acting as such, or under the next preceding section—

Which, I may say, provides for the appointment of merchants as experts to value the goods if the importer should be dissatisfied with the ordinary appraisement. The clause proceeds :

"In the case therein mentioned by 20 per centum or more, the value for duty as it would appear by the invoice or bill of entry thereof, then, in addition to the duty otherwise payable on such goods when properly valued, there shall be levied and collected upon the same a further duty equal to one-half of the duty so payable on such goods when properly valued."

The last clause, I may say, was an amendment made by myself, but I shall read it as it was when the hon. gentleman passed it :

"And the value of any goods for duty shall never be appraised at less than the value for duty as it would appear by the invoice and bill of entry."

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not understand the clause as the hon. gentleman understands it. It seems to me that these proceedings have reference only to fraudulent entries.

Mr. BOWELL. No ; I do not think so.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It would be impossible that an entry could be made at all, under the hon. gentleman's interpretation. The whole reading of the clause shows that the object is to prevent the making of fraudulent entries. In the cases referred to by the hon. member for Bothwell, the ordinary prices were paid and were objected to. The prices were appraised at a higher value, and not only was the duty paid at this higher value but a fine was imposed in addition. What possible protection would there be for the purchaser, however honest, against being fined, if the hon. gentleman's interpretation of the law was carried out? It is quite clear that any person could be fined at the discretion of the hon. gentleman or his appraisers.

Mr. BOWELL. The memoranda and orders from the Department, moved for by the late hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Burpee), will show that, not only did the hon. gentleman's Government so interpret the law, but that they carried out that interpretation precisely as I have carried it out. It is the interpretation placed upon it by the law officers of the Crown ; it is the interpretation which has prevailed since I have been in the Department, and it is the one which, as I am informed, was adopted by those who preceded me. The deductions which the hon. gentleman has drawn are not borne out by the facts. He says that no one can make an entry under my interpretation of the law ; all that any one has to do in order to avoid the penalties of the clause is to make the entry at the fair market value of the goods in the country where they were purchased. Supposing an importer goes to the State of New York and buys a bankrupt stock at 10 cents on the dollar, does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that these goods should be entered in the Customs of Canada at that rate?

Mr. MACKENZIE. Certainly not.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. BOWELL. The importer could say, and could swear that they were bought for that price, but no one in his senses will say that that should be their value for duty. What the Department would have to do would be to ascertain the fair market value of the goods in the country where they were purchased and have the entry made accordingly. If goods are purchased at a sacrifice sale, or if they are a free gift to the person who imports them, it would be absurd for him to expect in the one case that the duty would be collected on the price at which the goods were purchased, or that, in the other, they should be entered free of duty altogether.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Certainly.

Mr. BOWELL. Still that would be the case if the face of the invoice were taken to determine the value for duty. Supposing that a man is presented with a horse at Rochester and that his value in Rochester is $100, that would be the price at which it would have to be entered for duty, if it appeared that its value exceeded by 20 per cent. or more the amount for which it was entered, the importer would be subject to the penalties of the law.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That would be a case proving exactly what I have said—that the clause applies to fraudulent entry. I am only speaking of cases in which the goods are bought in a legitimate way, and in a legitimate market, in which the purchaser goes into a wholesale house and buys at the regular trade price, and I do not think that in such cases he should be subject to the fine.

Mr. BOWELL. I do. The price should be the market value in the country where the goods are purchased.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman cited a number of cases in which the law was designed to prevent fraud ; but those referred to by the hon. member for Bothwell were those in which the purchases were made from the first parties at the regular market price and in the regular manner.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ROLLING STOCK.

Mr. ANGLIN, in moving for a return showing the number of locomotives and cars of all descriptions, and of snow ploughs and flangers, belonging to the Intercolonial Railroad, now undergoing repairs at the several workshops of the Intercolonial Railroad or elsewhere, and the number of locomotives, cars of all descriptions, flangers and snow ploughs belonging to the Intercolonial Railroad awaiting repairs in any workshops or at any station of Intercolonial Railroad, or elsewhere, said:—I thought of asking for a return to cover all rolling stock on the Intercolonial requiring repair, but I thought that would be rather unreasonable. My impression is that a very large portion of the cars and other rolling stock now actually in use on the Intercolonial requires considerable repairs. Last year we found no less than 21 locomotives lying idle waiting for repairs, in workshops and other places, at the time the hon. Minister stated he found it necessary to hire locomotives—of a very inferior description, I believe—of a company in order to do the additional work imposed on the rolling stock by taking over the Riviere du Loup Branch. This year the hon. Minister has been fortunate in not having had very many severe snow storms, and the rolling stock should be in a very much better condition. It has had, however, another year's wear and tear, and I am strongly of the impression, notwithstanding the very favorable report on this point given in general terms by the Superintendent and other officials of the road, that the rolling stock has suffered very much in the meantime, and very much of it is in a very bad condition. The return will give some insight into the actual condition of the rolling stock, and I am of the opinion that some such information should appear in the annual report so that it might not be necessary for any hon. member to move for it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no objection to the adoption of this motion, but I take objection very strongly to the hon. gentleman giving impressions without having any data on which to found them. No hon. gentleman has a right to abuse his privilege as a member of this House, to call in question the accuracy of the statements of independent and impartial officers, who, in the discharge of their duty, holding high and responsible and important positions, place their signatures deliberately to statements laid on the Table of the House. Until some satisfactory ground is found for challenging the accuracy of the statements of officers who have enjoyed the confidence of the late, as well as the present Government, it is most improper, I think, for any hon. member to state that, in his opinion, the reports to which the officers have appended their names, are false, for it amounts to that. The hon. gentleman ought not to make such a statement without possessing some data to offer to the House. Does he suppose that a railway employing 100 locomotives and a corresponding number of cars for its operations, should not at all times have a very large number in shops for repairs? If the hon. gentleman is under this impression, he will find, by enquiry from any railway corporation or authorities, that it is utterly impossible to operate a great line of railway, with so large a number of engines and amount of rolling stock, without constantly having in the shops for repair a great number of locomotives and cars. The question is, whether the rolling stock of the Intercolonial locomotives and cars are kept in an efficient condition—as to whether they are good. You have charged to capital account a certain number of locomotives and a certain number of cars; and what the road is bound to do is to keep that number of locomotives and cars in a thoroughly efficient condition. If a locomotive is destroyed it must be replaced, and the cars must be kept good, and in a thoroughly efficient condition, in order to present a fair, honest, and just statement to the House. In connection with the operation of the Intercolonial, I have taken all pains and trouble that a Minister can take who must largely depend upon reports of the officers in his Department for correct information, and I have personally visited every shop, examined every locomotive, and personally gone over the road, and so thus verified by personal observation the accuracy of official statements. I do think, under these circumstances, hon. gentlemen ought not to venture to challenge the accuracy of the officers of the Government in the mode in which that hon. gentleman has done. The hon. gentleman says he is aware there have been very few snowstorms. Here that has been the case, but the hon. gentleman should know that in no year since 1872 have the snowstorms in the Maritime Provinces been so intense, and created so much difficulty in working the Intercolonial Railroad. Therefore, the hon. gentleman has a rather incorrect foundation for the return he asks for; but I shall have much pleasure in bringing it down, and challenge the closest scrutiny into the statement made regarding the rolling stock.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. Minister says my hon. friend from Gloucester abuses his privileges as a member, in asking questions of this kind. Surely, the hon. Minister abuses his position when he makes such a charge.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman should not put words into my mouth that I never uttered. I found no fault with the hon. gentleman for asking for the return. It is a perfectly proper return to move for. But, in moving for it, he ought not to say that, in his judgment, the rolling stock is not in the condition in which it is reported to be by the officers of the Department.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman has a right to say he has reason to believe—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He ought to give grounds for his statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is because the hon. gentleman has information on that subject that he makes the motion. The hon. Minister forgets that, when on this side, he spent half his time doing the same thing year after year and day after day, even to the extent of abusing public servants by name. Now, it seems no one must open his mouth to assert the contrary of what any engineer or officer may state over his signature. I saw a return this afternoon signed by a departmental officer, which I have no doubt is wrong, and I will in due time challenge the correctness of his statement. If we were to adopt the hon. Minister's view of our public duty, we might as well go home, having no right to make any enquiries unless with positive evidence to back them up. I refuse to be bound by such a rule. I shall always endeavor to protect public officers but not to the length of requiring every hon. member to believe every statement made by a subordinate of the Government.

Mr. PLUMB. No doubt the House will feel gratified to find the hon. member for Lambton, in his position of deputy leader of the Opposition, assume again the same old tone with which we are all acquainted. No doubt the hon. gentleman's interposition was needed to protect his hon. friend from Gloucester. I noticed that hon. gentleman, in moving for his return, made statements calculated to damage the Intercolonial Railway with reference to its management. The hon. gentleman said that, according to his information, there were twenty locomotives disabled.

Mr. ANGLIN. I did not say that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that last year there twenty-one disabled.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman, from the manner in which he spoke, intended to throw discredit on the management as regarded the rolling stock. It is well known that, under the present management, the road has been made a success, and is no longer a burden on the country, which it was fated to be so long when under the management of hon. gentlemen opposite; and that they are galled by the contrast is evident by the wry faces they are compelled to make every time this question comes up.

Mr. ANGLIN. I am sure we are all obliged to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, for the exceeding kindness with which he came to the help of the hon. Minister of Railways, who, I thought, was quite able to take care of himself. I did not say I am aware there are now twenty-one locomotives waiting repairs. What I said was, that last year, when I moved for a return similar to this, that return showed that out of 100 locomotives, twenty-one were actually in the repair shops, and many of those actually at work ought also to have been in the shops, being entirely unfit for work. To that statement many hon. gentlemen here will bear testimony. The evidence brought out by that return last year is in itself sufficient justification for what I have said on this occasion; for then, as to-day, the rolling stock was reported in excellent condition. I do not accuse the officials of falsehood; that is a very strong expression. They may have their own ideas as to the efficient and proper condition of the rolling stock, but their ideas are not mine nor, I think, are they those of the majority of right thinking men. I am not satisfied with the very meagre report submitted this year, and believe, from the experience of last year, that there are strong grounds for questioning its accuracy. The hon. Minister seems to think that before I am prepared to make any such statement, I should bring evidence to support it. Let me just mention one or two facts in my county with reference to the rolling stock of that road. Last winter, I had occasion to go to Halifax, and chose to go by night, feeling satisfied that I could get a Pullman. But no Pullman was to be had, and I had to take an ordinary first-class passenger car. During the night it was intensely cold, and towards morning, after we left Moncton, all of the passengers, some eighteen or twenty, woke up shuddering with the cold. We were all extremely cold, though the brakeman did put on more fire; indeed, I think it was creditable to this man that he did his very best to warm the car, though utterly in vain. By-and-bye, notwithstanding all the efforts made to maintain something like comfort, it was found impossible to keep us warm, any more than if the car were made of mere brown paper. In this wretched and most uncomfortable condition passengers continued all night, though unable to discover where the real cause of the difficulty lay. Towards morning, however, I found the whole secret of our trouble and our suffering. The floor had been patched, on the economical principle of the Minister of Railways, in such a manner that the old and new boards did not meet, leaving wide open spaces, through which the cold night air, then at the point of zero, was freely rushing. It was thus easily seen how absolutely impossible it was to warm the car. I could easily have found two parties able to corroborate the assertions made on this subject. There is abundant evidence that the rolling stock is running in the opposite of first-class condition. I am satisfied the return will show, on its very face, that this rolling stock is not what it should be. The hon. gentleman said, some time ago, that he told me I was very much mistaken as to the state of the road and rolling stock, that in a railroad of several hundred miles, with many hundred cars, there must be always a certain number of engines and cars, more or less worn down. He did not need to give me any such information, for every one knows that such a state of things is to be expected, but when 49 locomotives out of 110, and a large number of cars appear very much used up, there is great reason to question the style of the management of that railway. Then the hon. member tells me we have had most severe snowstorms this winter. Did he say how many, or in what places they occurred? The fact is that until little over three weeks ago, we have had no snow along that railroad, and latterly but a few snow storms, some of them subsequent to the date of this notice. Take it all in all as regards the railroad this winter the weather has been the most favorable known since the Government undertook the management of the road. I deny that the railroad is in an admirable condition; and, without accusing them of wilful mis-statements, I believe they have not correctly represented the condition of the rolling stock and road bed. I am quite satisfied that it will be admitted my statements have been justified, in moving for this return, immediately on its production.

THE CORVETTE CHARYBDIS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving for copies of all correspondence and reports relating to the Charybdis, and a detailed statement of all expenditure incurred in connection with said vessel; also a statement in detail of the number of men employed thereon since said vessel arrived in Canada, and the capacity in which each man was or is employed, the amount paid to each; also a detailed statement of any damages done by said vessel since the 1st May, 1881, and of any claims preferred for such damages, said: On turning to the Sessional Papers of 1881, there will be found a voluminous correspondence between the Canadian and Imperial Governments, between the Canadian Government and the Lords of the Admiralty, England, upon the subject of the acquisition of this vessel. I commend the perusal of this correspondence to those who take an interest in literature of this kind. They will find it exceedingly valuable and instructive. I do not know—the papers are not very clear on the subject—where the idea arose of the purchase or acquisition of the Charybdis. I am not quite sure—the papers throw very little light on the subject—where the flash of genius originated that suggested the propriety of the acquisition of this valuable piece of property now in the possession, I assume, of the Canadian Government—whether, with the hon. Minister of Agriculture, who is occasionally struck with “sudden flashes of genius” or with our Canadian High Lords of the Admiralty—I know not. The papers are somewhat silent on the subject; but I gather from a communication dated the 8th of October, 1880, addressed by a person in the service of Her Majesty to the Lords of the Admiralty, that the idea of the acquisition of this valuable piece of property must have originated on this side of the water, because I find in that communication that the Dominion Government desired to have the vessel handed over to them, all standing, and that a few days afterwards a communication was addressed by the Canadian Government to the Imperial Government, in which it is stated: “The Dominion Government, while expressing their gratitude (I suppose their well-founded gratitude) for the munificent gift they were about to receive from the Imperial Government, enquire “whether the guns on board will be transferred with the vessel itself.” That struck me, upon reading that correspondence, as exhibiting an extraordinary amount of ingratitude. They were to get a vessel, all standing, and furnished with ammunition and provisions, and yet they coolly suggest the propriety of the Imperial Government giving them something more. They wanted the armaments on board to be included in the valuable gift. The correspondence goes on, a number of letters pass between the Imperial authorities and the Canadian Government and the Lords of the Admiralty, with respect to the transference of this vessel to the Canadian Government; and on the 25th October, 1880, our Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of St. James, telegraphs thus to the Canadian Government:

“The Admiralty say that the Charybdis has arrived at Davenport, and they are ready to transfer the ship, and ask you to send an agent to receive her.”

So far the negotiations appear to have progressed satisfactorily, and I find the Minister of War in Canada, in response to this telegram, under date 26th October, 1880, thus telegraphs back:

“Make arrangements with the Admiralty with regard to some agent being sent from Canada to receive the Charybdis and take charge of her, and say that Captain Scott of our service would be sent to bring her over.”

You see, Sir, that Capt. Scott of our service—of our naval service, I suppose—had been instructed by the Canadian Government to go over to England and take possession of this vessel of war, and a telegram was sent from our Minister of War here to the Imperial Government, notifying them of that fact. Well, subsequently, and before the property was transferred to us, there was a good deal of haggling—I think, very unworthy of hon. gentlemen opposite—who appear to have been so grateful for the great gift that the Imperial Government had conferred upon them. There was a good deal of haggling as to whether the guns of the vessel should pass with the vessel itself, and whether the provisions, the salt pork, and the meat, and the sea biscuit, and a large quantity of provisions that she had brought back from her seven and a-half years’ cruise in the Chinese seas, and which was just the thing to feed our sailors upon—as to whether those provisions should be handed over to the Canadian Government, and also as to whether the Canadian Government was to undertake the repairs of this vessel. However, the haggling ended peaceably, I am glad to say, and the Imperial authorities then decided that this vessel should be transferred to the Canadian Government; with her fittings and fixtures and unconsumable stores. I do not know whether that means stores that could not be consumed or stores that had not been consumed; I apprehend it meant stores that could not be consumed, and we were to get all that. Our Government agreed to accept this valuable acquisition upon these liberal terms, and a communication was sent to the Government stating:

"The ship will be delivered to you all standing as she came from the sea, and you may probably find in her a quantity of coal, salt meat and other provisions."

This was addressed by our Minister of Marine to Capt. Scott of "our service." Now, Sir, that was very satisfactory so far; but, unfortunately, when Capt. Scott made the investigation, it was found there was no salt meat, no provision and no coal. So anxious were our friends on the other side to acquire this property and become possessed of a vessel of war, that they were willing to take the property without the usual preliminary investigation as to whether the vessel was fit for the service for which she was intended. I suppose, acting upon the principle that you should never look a gift horse in the mouth, our Minister of Marine at once jumped at the conclusion that this was an exceedingly favorable offer, and he, on the 22nd November, 1880, directs our Ambassador to thank the Imperial Government for this valuable gift. Why, Sir, a valuable gift; they knew nothing about it at the time, had never inspected her, had never seen her, and knew nothing about her fitness for the service for which she was intended; they had no idea whether she was properly equipped or not. Yet they appear to have been delighted, in ecstasies, intoxicated with joy at the very idea of the acquisition of this valuable man-of-war. Sir, it looked to me very much as if they were about as well pleased and tickled with the gift as the King of Siam is, as you know, Mr. Speaker, when he becomes the fortunate donee of a white elephant. You know he rejoices with exceeding great joy. The whole court becomes intoxicated with gladness. The moment the presentation is made, the dancing girls are brought in and the tom-toms are set to work to discourse music to the assembled multitude. So with our friends on the other side; they appear to have been so delighted, so full of ecstasy, so enchanted with this acquisition, that they thought it was not worth while, or proper, or prudent, to make any enquiries as to the condition of the vessel. But permit me to remind you that the King of Siam, when he acquires the valuable gift of a white elephant does one thing that I am going to recommend the gentlemen opposite to do in this case. You know, Sir, being thoroughly conversant with the history of that noted country, and its forms and ceremonies, that when the king becomes possessed of this white elephant he at once erects a pavillion for the animal, and then he sends out all over the country; and, if possible, secures a white monkey. The white monkey is put in the pavillion for the purpose of keeping off evil spirits. I say here to our Canadian High Admiral, get a white monkey and send him down to the harbor of St. John to prevent the Charybdis from dying of dry rot. Now, after having done all this, after having this property partially transferred to them, our hon. friends on the other side, especially the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, through his representative on the other side of the water, does what he ought to have done at the outset, he makes enquiries as to the character of the vessel; he goes on board and inspects her, and what is the result of that investigation? Now, I ask the hon. the Minister of War sitting opposite me, to take up this interesting correspondence that, perhaps, in the multiplicity of the business that engages his attention from morning till night, he has had no opportunity to examine. I ask him to take up the report of the correspondence in the Sessional Papers of 1881, and see exactly the character of this valuable acquisition with which the Canadian Government and people are saddled—not, I hope, for all time to come. In going over that correspondence I find this state of facts existing with respect to that vessel. This vessel of war, recollect, that was going to be a terror to the Queen's enemies, and of dread, I fear to the Queen's subjects, this magnificent vessel of war that was going to astonish the Canadian natives, let us hear the description given of it in the correspondence to which I briefly alluded. First, she is described as an old type of corvette. Seamen will know what that means. She was said to have been seven and a-half years in the Chinese seas, not much improved, one would naturally imagine, by that service. She was twenty years old, far past the bloom of maidenhood, and was verging upon the sear and yellow leaf. She was of a type, say the Lords of the Admiralty, that was not worth the cost of repairing, so that it was necessary to dry dock her, as the boilers would not last two years. It turned out that the boilers would not last two days, that she was utterly unfit for any service when the inspection was made, that she had no provisions nor coal on board, and that it was necessary to buy a heavy anchor for safety in the harbor of St. John, where they were taking her to. I do not know whether they got the heavy anchor—I believe they did from the accounts submitted to the House. I am told that the heavy anchor did not save the people of St. John from this terrible monster; that her speed under steam at high pressure was seven knots per hour; that it required 180 men to work her. When testing the boilers it was discovered that they were in a very unsatisfactory condition, in fact that they were very old and useless. And on the 2nd of December, 1880, it was stated that the estimated cost of the repairs of the vessel amounted to £2,000 sterling. That was the kind of vessel we got, and that is the information I got here from the papers submitted last year. Having made this inspection, and having made some improvements, they spent nearly, if not altogether, £2,000 upon this vessel, when another difficulty arose. It became a question among the high authorities sent to England whether the vessel could cross the ocean at all or not. It was quite clear, from the report we have heard, that it would not be safe for her to undertake a sea voyage in the winter. Whether she should take the southerly or northerly route was not certain; a council of war was held, and the conclusion arrived at was that at one season of the year was the voyage safe, and the captain decided that he should leave for the other side of the Atlantic in April, and then take a northerly course; and then it was said that it might be possible to accomplish the voyage in forty days. Even after the inspection was made by himself, and after a council of war was held, Capt. Scott decided that the vessel was not quite satisfactory. His life was not insured, nor could he get seamen whose lives were insured, he did not feel safe in launching his precious body on board of this valuable corvette even in April, and with the wisdom which characterized him—and which, I suppose, generally characterizes seamen—he concluded that he would have a further inspection. He calls in an expert, Mr. Barber, who reports to him on the 5th January, 1881. The substance of his report appears in the following letter:—"Mr. Barber, as you will see, has made a report condemning the boiler. He says that in bad weather we might be caught in a lee shore, and then to have poor boilers would cost us our lives. "Such arguments," says Capt. Scott, "are unanswerable;" and I should say they were. With bad boilers, with only a pressure of ten pounds on the safety valve, with a tub of a vessel that was twenty years old, seven years of which were spent in the Chinese seas, a vessel that was not well equipped, I agree with Capt. Scott that the "arguments were unanswerable"—and the captain acted on the belief that the arguments were unanswerable. What does he do further? He goes again with Mr. Barber on the vessel, Another examination is made of the boilers. Scott says further the ship is a handsome corvette, but the boilers are fearful. She is a thing of beauty, but not a joy for ever. She is a thing of beauty, but not a thing of safety, so far as Capt. Scott was concerned. The boilers were fearful, he says, and, of course, he would not risk his valuable life on board such a vessel. However, after spending this large sum of money on this beautiful corvette, he finally sailed across the stormy ocean and landed in the port of St. John. But the trouble did not end there. In fact, it was merely beginning. There was trouble on the other side of the water, there was trouble on the water, and there was a great deal more trouble when the boat arrived in St. John. The vessel was moored in that beautiful harbor, amid the shipping of St. John, but the old thing would not stay moored. True to her instincts, she was bound to engage in the strife, and, like the war-horse, she smelt the battle from afar. She would not stay moored; she would not obey her commander, she would not obey the commands of the Lord High Admiral. She broke loose, had a serious commission round the harbor of St. John, to the terror and consternation of the peaceful citizens of that place and of the shipping within the harbor. How much damage this terror of the ocean committed upon the Queen's enemies I know not; how much damage this terrible monster did upon Her Majesty's subjects, I know not; how many lives were lost by the freaks of this wonderful vessel, which would not stay moored, I know not; but I am told that at least two peaceful citizens of St. John lost their lives in attempting to get aboard her, for the gang plank, like the rest of the old tub, was rotten, and they broke through and were drowned. What damage she committed in the harbor of St. John I cannot say, but suppose when the returns are brought down, we will have ample information on that interesting and important subject. But there is a grim side to this question. It is ridiculous and absurd to find our Government getting, even as a gift, a vessel which could serve no useful purpose, and was good for nothing; but the matter, as I said before, has a serious as well as an absurd side. The Prime Minister, in discussing an item in the Estimates last year, said that she might be used for a training ship, or to defend the approaches to the St. John's harbor. She has not been used as a training ship; and if you read the papers of St. John, Mr. Speaker, as I have no doubt you do, you will have noticed that she has not been a source of safety to the people of that city or the shipping of that harbor. On the 16th of March, 1881, the Prime Minister stated that this vessel cost about £400 stg., Why, Sir, four months before that utterance was made, viz., on the 2nd of November previous, we find that £1,000 sterling had been placed to the credit of Capt. Scott, at the Bank of Montreal in London, for the purpose of repairing her, that Capt. Scott wanted another thousand, and that this would not be enough to put her in sufficient repair to cross the ocean. On reference to the Public Accounts of last year I find an item of $9,040.37, expended on this beautiful corvette, whose boilers were dangerous to the lives of those on board her; and find in the Supplementary Estimates of this year that hon. gentlemen opposite ask a vote of $12,000 more. How much more has been expended on her, and how it has been expended, no man in the House knows, nor will we know, until the detailed accounts come down. But the fact remains that upon this beautiful but utterly useless vessel we have so far spent over $20,000. How much more we have to pay no mortal man can tell. It is absurd that we should have acquired a vessel of that kind at all, and that such an enormous sum of money should be expended in connection with her. I am told that there is no knowing the day or the hour when she may break away from her moorings and seriously endanger the property and lives of the people of St. John. I advise the Government to send her back to England, as she is of no use to the people of Canada.

MALT AND MALT LIQUORS.

Mr. ORTON, in moving for a return of the various modes which have been hitherto adopted by Canada for collecting duties from malt and malt liquors, and also for any information which may be in possession of the Government in reference to the mode in vogue for collecting such Excise duties in the United States and Great Britain, said: The question which this motion involves has two aspects—one, the agricultural, and the other in connection with the interest of those engaged in brewing malt liquors. I had the honor the other day of presenting a petition signed by the whole County Council of Wellington—one of the largest agricultural counties in Ontario—and by a very large number of influential agriculturists, praying that the duty be removed from malt and placed on malt liquors, as is done in the United States. Experience in Great Britain and other countries has shown that animals can be fattened much more rapidly and successfully with grain when malted than when in an unmalted condition. It is well known to medical men that extract of malt is highly nutritious, in fact, it is used for debilitated constitutions when other foods cannot be assimilated. The same principle has been applied to the feeding of cattle, and as this House is aware, an agitation for many years in England in favor of the abolition of the duty on malt and the placing of the duty on malt liquors, has at last resulted in the adoption of that principle, to the great benefit of the agriculturists of that country. Grain when malted is in fact partially digested, so that less grain in that condition is required for feeding cattle than when it is in the ordinary state; and the agriculturists in my county, who are largely engaged in fattening cattle for the foreign market, desire to be placed on an equal footing with the agriculturists of the United States and Great Britain. This is the agricultural view of the question. The other view has reference to those engaged in the manufacture of malt liquors. The present mode of collecting the duties is both very expensive and very annoying. If the duty was collected by a stamp duty on malt liquors, a very large expenditure would be saved. I believe the mode adopted in the United States is to issue stamps of different values according to the size of the package; the stamp is placed on the hole of the barrel, so that when the malt liquor is used, the stamp is erased. That plan is very simple, and under it the duty would be much more easily and cheaply collected than under the present mode. The obstruction to business which results from the present mode is very serious. The maltsters of Canada are a large body, and they have a large amount of capital invested in malting for exportation to the United States, and it is important that this industry should be encouraged in this country, as there are many lands which will grow barley in Canada, but which are not fitted for other classes of grain. Barley of a superior quality than is grown in the United States is produced in Canada, and it is important we should have the manufacturing of that barley into malt, conducted in our own country, as far as possible. By encouraging that business a large amount of employment is given to the people, and money expended is now retained in our own country. I will give the House one instance coming within my own knowledge, to show the annoyance and expense involved to the manufacturer of malt by the present arrangement. Last autumn a maltster, in my section of the country, who was engaged in producing malt for export as well as for his own use, had sold a large quantity for exportation, when he found he had arrived nearly at the end of the quantity in the bonded warehouse, there were 400 or 500 bushels unfit either for exportation or manufacturing into malt liquors. He had newly-spread malt ready to place on the kiln, and he desired to obtain information to re-dry those 400 bushels so that he would be able to sell them, as they had only been partially damaged with having become damp. A permit was telegraphed for to the Collector of Customs, but he did not happen to be at home. In the meantime the malt was ready to be placed in the kiln, and the brewer and maltster went to the Excise officer and asked him to make a bonded warehouse of the kiln—they adjoined each other—and he, after great persuasion, agreed to do so, locked up the kiln, allowed the malt to be re-dried and placed in the bonded warehouse. By this means 400 bushels of malt were saved and duties were afterwards paid on them to the Government. Had that not been done this quantity of malt would have been destroyed, great loss would have occurred to the maltster, and a loss of revenue would have accrued to the Government. But that was not the end of the matter. The Excise officer was not allowed any discretion, and in consequence of the irregularity in not receiving a permit owing to the Collector being absent from home—it was never attempted to be shown there was the slightest possibility of any fraud being committed—he was suspended. This is only one of a number of instances daily occurring to those engaged in this business in Canada day after day; they have fifteen or twenty men remaining idle until the Excise officer chooses to come to his post. By a change in the regulations much labor, expense and annoyance will be saved to those engaged in the business, and I believe the Government will derive a very much larger revenue from that source than at present. There is not a brewer in Canada who will not be willing to have as large a penalty, as possible, imposed rather than be subject to the delay, loss and annoyance occurring under the present regulations. If it were thought proper by Parliament to make a change it would be found that we would derive a larger revenue and effect a great saving, not only to the large class of brewers, but also to those engaged in agriculture especially in exporting barley to foreign markets.

Mr. KRANTZ. I hardly endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Centre Wellington in respect to the duties on malt. I believe it would be a great advantage to the agriculturists of this country if they could malt barley, and such other grains as are not fitted to be malted for brewing purposes. In the Old World, in Germany, from which I come, I know that on large farms the malting of grain is carried on to a large extent for the purpose not only of fattening cattle, but also for producing milk wholesome, and there is no better food for producing a plentiful supply of milk than barley malt. Not only from the farmers' point of view is it advantageous that the duty should be removed from malt and placed on malt liquor, but it is in the interests of the manufacturers of malt liquors—in the interests of the brewers. The present mode of collecting the revenue from beer is most inconvenient and annoying to the manufacturer, and I believe a larger amount of revenue at less cost will be obtained by taking the duty off malt and placing it on malt liquor in the shape of stamp duty, as is done in the United States. The production of beer is very large in the United States, and the revenue derived therefrom is enormous, and the mode of collecting the revenue is quite applicable to Canada. I hope the Government will take the matter into consideration at their earliest convenience and seek to apply a better system of collecting duty than that which now prevails.

Motion agreed to.

POSTAL COMMUNICATION WITH THE COUNTY OF SAGUENAY.

Mr. CIMON, in moving for copies of all petitions and correspondence addressed to the Government concerning postal communication on that part of the north shore of the St. Lawrence comprised in the county of Saguenay, said: In presenting this motion I wish, in a few words, to call the attention of the Government to the importance of the county of Saguenay, which is one of the two counties I represent. This county comprises the whole of the north shore of the St. Lawrence from the Saguenay to the eastern extremity of the Province of Quebec, at Blanc Sablon, or a length of 600 miles, including, moreover, the Island of Anticosti. The resident population of this coast and of the Island of Anticosti numbers 8,879 souls; to this must be added 3,000 to 4,000 souls more, who spend their time there in fishing when navigation is open, thus giving a population, a total population, of about 12,000 souls, or a larger population than the respective population of the counties of Chambly, Laprairie, Napierville, Soulanges, Vaudreuil, Three Rivers, and Laval. Now, Mr. Speaker, in order to give you an idea of the wealth of the fisheries of the county of Saguenay, I beg leave to refer you to a Blue-book entitled "A Statement of the Fisheries for the year 1880," which is an official Report of the Government, and which shows that they represent an annual value of $1,467,435.50 for the year 1880, as per following details:—

77½ brls. pickled salmon at $12.00.....	$	9,270 00
148,155 lbs. fresh salmon, packed in ice, at 10c		14,815 50
275,125 cwt. codfish (summer fishing) at $4 00		1,100,580 00
14,589 cwt. codfish (autumn fishing) at $4 00		58,356 00
193 brs. flounders at $6 00		1,158 00
146 brs. haddock at $6.00		876 00
5,493 brs. herring at $5.00		27,465 00
516 brs. mackerel at $5.00		2,730 00
58 brs. trout at $3 00		464 00
10 brs. sardines at $3.00		30 00
10½ brs. cod tongues and sounds at $9.00		94 50
13 brs. eels at $7.00		91 00
26,198 sealskins at $1.00		26,198 00
111,216 galls. seal oil at 50c		55,608 00
5,460 galls. whale oil at 40c		2,160 00
166 galls. porpoise oil at 50c		83 00
237,269 cod liver oil.....		118,634 50
11,000 lbs. of lobster		1,650 00
4,401 lbs. fish for local consumption at $4		17,604 00
29,568 brs. fish used for manure and bait		29,568 00
Total for 1880	$1,467,435 50

The total annual value of the fisheries of that division of the Gulf comprising the counties of Saguenay, Gaspé and Bonaventure, is $2,357,220.20; and since the county of Saguenay is represented in that amount by $1,467,435.50, it must be conceded that its fisheries are more extensive and more important than those of the whole of Gaspesia, including the Magdalen Islands. But more remains to be told. The county has engaged in the fisheries: 67 vessels, representing a tonnage of 2,235 tons, a value of $64,220, and employing 315 hands; 1,067 fishing vessels, valued at $41,457; 694 flat-bottomed boats, valued at $9,068; 2,174 fishermen and 1,098 shoremen; 381 salmon nets, representing 33,393 yards of netting, and valued at $14,365; 29 cod seines, representing 4,980 yards of netting, and valued at $5,798; 24 herring seines, representing 13,385 yards of netting, and valued at $6,988. I must add that the Government derives annually, from the letting of various rivers in the county of Saguenay, the sum of $5,561, and from salmon-fishing licenses a further sum of $636. So much for the fisheries. A large lumber business is also done on that part of the north shore, which is estimated annually at at least $1,000,000. Well, notwithstanding the importance of the county of Saguenay, what has the various Governments done for it in the matter of public improvements? I dare not say, so little has it been. I must, nevertheless, congratulate the hon. Minister of Public Works for causing a telegraph line to be constructed on that part of the North Shore, for it will be of great service to that part of the country. But with that one exception, nothing has been done; there is neither railway, nor quay, nor any kind of public work. But, it will be said, the Government have surely established a rapid and easy postal service? Nothing of the kind. The hon. Postmaster General has taken good care not to think of the north shore and of that industrious and important population. Postal communication is in a most primitive state in these localities. It is by the merest accident that a mail is sent thither overland once a month, very often only every two or three months. I claim that a little more attention should be shown to the north shore, which contributes every year several hundreds of thousands of dollars to the public Treasury. We ask for a subsidy of $4,000 a year—but a paltry sum you will perceive—which will enable the Government to have the mails transported fortnightly by a steamer which will stop at all points on the North Shore where there is a post office. By means of this subsidy the Government will, moreover, contribute towards establishing a regular line of steamers plying fortnightly between Quebec and Esquimaux Point, stopping where required, thus affording rapid and easy transit to the population of the county of Saguenay, and contributing to the rapid development of those localities. The owners of these steamers have sent in offers concerning this to the hon. Postmaster General. All the residents of the North Shore have signed and sent to the Government petitions to that effect, and these petitions are endorsed by the merchants and Board of Trade of Quebec. Why should not the Government of Canada do for the North Shore that which the Government of Newfoundland has done for the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador? I hold in my hand a public notice of the Postmaster General of Newfoundland, showing that he despatches a special steamer to carry and distribute the mails on the whole of the Newfoundland and Labrador coasts, wherever there are fishermen, thus giving fishermen an easy method of transport. Here is this notice:

“ROUTE OF THE LABRADOR MAIL STEAMER, 1880.”

“JOHN DELANEY,

“Postmaster General.

“St. John's, 2nd July, 1880.”

I trust, therefore, that the Government will accede to my legitimate request, especially when it is taken into consideration that it is the North Shore which provides, to a great extent, food for the city of Quebec. I hope that the Government will take prompt steps in the matter.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to granting the documents asked for by the hon. member, but I would merely ask him to remember that, although it may be possible that the improvements that he asks for the county of Saguenay are absolutely required, yet the Government cannot do everything at once. We have already begun making considerable improvements in the county of Chicoutimi, whilst on the North Shore, as he has himself observed, the Government has, on a vote of the House, granted a telegraph line which is extending from year to year, until it shall have reached the extreme limits of the Province of Quebec and of the Dominion of Canada in that direction. I feel sure that the hon. member will, through the energy that characterizes his demands to the Government, obtain in years to come the other improvements which are necessary to the county of Saguenay.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS.

Mr. ORTON, in moving for a Select Committee to enquire into and report upon the effects of the present Tariff upon the agricultural interests of the Dominion, said: It will be within the recollection of many that a similar committee was asked for, and granted, in 1876, and proceeded to perform its duties under circumstances that do not exist to-day. The result was, it brought down, not in the ordinary manner, but in a round-about way—the only one in which it could then be brought down—a report on the question of agriculture in relation to our Tariff. The report, in consequence of the opposition of the Government supporters on the committee, had to be made by moving the adjournment of the House. To-day a different state of affairs exists. Any member, whether on the Government or Opposition side, could move for a committee in the interests of agriculture without meeting opposition. The result of the elections of 1878 fully endorsed the report of the committee of 1876. Many hon. gentlemen, who did not agree with the then Opposition, still gave their evidence in favor of protecting the agricultural industry, and prominent among those was the leader of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec. He candidly and honorably stated his views in a letter which became celebrated at the General Elections of 1878. The evidence given by leading agriculturists, the answers given to questions sent to reeves, deputy reeves and presidents of agricultural societies, showed that they were four to one in favor of the policy brought into operation by this Government. Notwithstanding this overwhelming evidence, the Opposition to-day contend with as much energy as they did in the past, that this policy is not in the interests of agriculture, and I know it is highly important we should have every fact and feature of this question brought fairly and clearly before the country. The Opposition contend that no protection can be given to the agriculturist. Their hon. leader, in various speeches last summer, more especially that one at Cobourg, foreshadowed, rather faintly, what would be the possible policy—for no policy has yet been clearly defined by them—of the Opposition, should it come into power. He said it was utterly impossible to protect the agriculturists of Canada. Still, he said, no Government would take off at once all the protection on manufactures. The hon. member for Lambton, in a speech to his constituents, gave expression to similar sentiments, both agreeing that, as far as agriculture was concerned, the protection must be removed. It was stated by them that not only was our agriculture not benefitted by that, but that the traffic by our railways and canals was seriously injured. I need not refer to that point at length, because, I think, the other day the Finance Minister very ably and conclusively showed, that so far as that contention was concerned, there was really no truth in the allegation. But the Government side of the House refutes that idea, and contends that it is as essential to agriculture that this interest should be protected as it is that protection should be extended to our manufacturing industries. It was shown by the Finance Minister, also, that the market of the Canadian farmers had been increased to an enormous extent, that in consequence of the adoption of the National Policy the home market had been greatly extended last year, there being no less than seven million bushels of additional Canadian grain sold in our own market, which large amount was formerly taken by the farmers of the United States. A large market in this country formerly lay open to the farmers of the United States, who had by competition taken from them a large portion of their own market. It is very strange when hon. gentlemen in Opposition state that it is an evil to our farmers to have a large market at their hearths, and that notwithstanding this market, they derived no good from it. Is there a single business man in the House who would say it would be an injury to him to have a large additional number of customers? But what will hold good as regards those engaged in other industries will hold good as respects our farmers. I think we shall be able to show conclusively by the committee that not only have they obtained a large market for their produce, but large additional prices. With regard to the classes of grain grown in this country, and other produce and cattle, I shall not go into that subject particularly to-night. The Government has already referred, by the Finance Minister, to that subject on the Tariff discussion; but I may call attention to a few important points as regards which our farmers have experienced most striking benefits. In the North-West market our Ontario farmers now enjoy a valuable trade in horses and cattle and the higher classes of stock. The result has been highly beneficial to the agricultural interests of this country. Horses which were formerly a drag in the markets of the older Provinces are now rapidly bought up for the North-West at large prices; the same applies to other kinds of stock. As our Ontario farmers have become large cattle graziers and are going extensively into the higher kinds of stock, it must be plain to every man who looks candidly at the question, that they will enjoy hereafter a large and profitable market in the North-West—and one not open to foreign countries. I might refer to other articles of farm produce, such as wool, but shall defer any reflections on that subject for the present. There is another point I wish to refer to, and that is the fact of the National Policy, in making money cheap, has resulted in great benefit to agriculture in this country. In consequence of the introduction of the National Policy to Canada, money has been kept in this country which used to be sent to foreign countries. The money which our farmers obtained for their grain which they sold in foreign markets was left there to buy the manufactures of those foreign markets, and the result was a stringency in the money market of Canada; but in consequence of the benefit which has accrued through the operation of this policy, we find money plentiful and cheap in Canada. Confidence is established in the British money markets, in Canadian securities, from the effect of the National Policy and the judicious management of the present Government in bringing about a system of surpluses, instead of the former system of deficits. The result has been to give confidence to British capitalists, and money is cheap in the Canadian market. Even the other day we saw in the Bank of England the rate of money was much increased; it went up one day, I think, to 7 per cent. Is it not strange that this did not effect the money market in Canada? The simple explanation is this: that British capitalists feel more confidence in Canadian securities, than they do in British securities, because of the troubles that exist in the British Empire. The result of the cheap money in Canada has been to give greater stimulus to the production of agricultural products; and this year we find a very much larger amount has been supplied to our own people, and also a larger amount to Great Britain. Our exports have largely increased, in consequence of which many of our farmers have made improvements in their farms, and consequently have been enabled to raise more; in other words they have been enabled to produce two blades of grass where only one grew before. I need not refer to the benefit which has been derived by the large market for the perishable products of the farmer; but I will just refer to one point which I think conclusively shows that the price of grain has risen in Canada. Never before was spring wheat higher than fall wheat. Fall wheat does not continue to be affected so much by the National Policy as spring wheat. Why? Simply because spring wheat is used by our own millers, and our own people to make strong bakers flour; and the result is that spring wheat has risen in price and is now higher than fall wheat, through the inauguration of the National Policy. I think this conclusively proves that the effect of the National Policy, on that kind of wheat at any rate, has been highly beneficial to the Canadian farmer. Now, Sir, it is strange that hon. gentlemen opposite will continue to maintain that it is better for us to buy our manufactured goods in Great Britain and in the United States than in Canada. I would like to know why it is that Great Britain and other manufacturing nations in Europe have so high a market for agricultural products? Is it not because they have a large accumulation of artisans and laborers employed in manufacturing goods? Why, then, should we not endeavor, if possible, to transfer the artisans of Europe and Great Britain to this country in order to manufacture for our own people and thus provide for the increased population that will come into this country through the development of our great North-West. We have regions yet to be developed whose importance we can hardly realize. We see that the iron industry of the United States has increased to an enormous extent within the last twenty years. In 1860 the iron industries of the United States produced $24,000,000 worth. In 1880 those industries in that country had increased their products to the value of $450,000,000. Now, Sir, with our resources of iron and coal and our other facilities for entering into the manufacture of various classes of ironware, it is evident to all who will look to their country's interest, that there is a great future before us in the development of that industry, and that the development of that industry will be beneficial to the farmers, none can deny. If such high prices for farm products in Great Britain is caused by the large manufacturing centres there, the development of those manufacturing centres in this country will have a similar result. There is no reason why we should not have a higher and continually increasing market for the farm produce in our own country. The object of the committee will be to gather all the information they can and place it in as clear a light as possible before this House and before the farmers of this country, so as to enable them to express their views in a manner similar to that in which they did so before the former committee. Hon. gentlemen may, perhaps, then be able to put into some sort of comprehensible shape the policy which they have been seeking to lay before the country. I think it will be thought a great benefit to hon. gentlemen opposite, and also satisfactory to those on this side, when the report of that committee is brought before the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman to replace the name of Mr. Allison by that of Mr. Plumb.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it is important that such a committee should be appointed, if it is within the province of this House to do so, and I understand it is. Of the nearly four and a-half millions of people of the Dominion of Canada, nearly two-thirds are to-day engaged in agricultural pursuits. We have two classes of political theorists in the country who hold different views with respect to this question; and a great many people are inclined honestly to support what they believe to be in the interest of the agricultural class, if they were able to ascertain that it really would be to their interest that the National Policy should be continued. Representing, as I do, an agricultural district where a large majority of the people are engaged in these pursuits; and finding, as I have done, that one class strongly contend that no benefit is derived by the farming community from the National Policy, while another class just as strongly maintain that great benefit is resulting from it, I say it is most important that we should have some report from an authoritative source on this subject when we go back to the country again. Any information that may be laid before the committee, and any report that may come from it, will be accepted with greater confidence by the people, and will appeal to their honest, unbiassed judgment, with greater force than it would if coming from representatives of either of the political parties. Again, this committee would be enabled to send for persons and papers and get information that could not be obtained through other channels. They will be able to put it in such a shape as that the agriculturists can easily judge for themselves as to whether it would be for their interest to continue the National Policy. If it does nothing else than to establish the fact as to whether it is or is not advantageous, and if it is, how far; and if not, what different plan could be adopted that would be in their interest—if it does nothing else, it will be of great interest to the farming community and the country in general. I believe that a very large majority of the farmers believe that the National Policy is benefitting them; still there are a great many others who do not think so, some of whom are not opposed to the Government. Many others are unsettled in their opinion, reading as they do journals supporting opposite views on the subject. If you can enable those parties to decide either one way or the other, I think it will be in the interest of this country. I deem it therefore to be my duty to support the appointment of that committee. The sooner it is appointed the better. The sooner the information is obtained and the report is made in such a shape that it can be laid before the agriculturists, the better for them, and the better for the establishment of the principle as to whether the National Policy is or is not in the interest of that large and extensive class.

Mr. TROW. I was approached to-day by the hon. mover of this resolution, asking me whether I would serve as a member of that committee. I think it quite important that a committee should be selected for that purpose. It is a matter of vital interest to this great country of ours. But I think it is essential that a much more practical committee should be selected. For instance, I have not heard all the names, but it seems to me that there should be some practical agriculturists placed on that committee. I understood from the mover to-day that he intended to put on Mr. Bain and Mr. Charlton. But I object, in the first place, that notice ought to be given of the names of the committee, which has not been done. I object to the formation of the committee, in consequence of the proper notice not having been given.

Mr. ORTON. In reference to Mr. Bain, I spoke to him to-day and he told me he was afraid he could not act, that he was going home.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). I think the names should have been put in the motion. We do not know who they are. It has been observed by my hon. friend on this side of the House that gentlemen holding different opinions with regard to protection should be placed on that committee. I have one objection to make: it is that there are only two members from the Maritime Provinces on that committee, and they are both on the same side of politics. I think that both shades of politics from the Lower Provinces should be represented on that committee. I believe Mr. Girouard (Kent) is on the committee for New Brunswick, and I think there is no one on the Liberal side of politics from Nova Scotia. I think the complexion of the committee is not fair to the House or to the country. Moreover, I believe the objection has been made that the names have not been placed on the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is usual that the names of a committee should be given in the notice, and that has not been done in this case.

Mr. GAULT. I think the prices obtained for farm produce throughout the Dominion show sufficiently that the farmers are satisfied with the National Policy. If this committee desires to know the price obtained by farmers for their produce, it will be easy to do so by consulting the market reports. I am sure the prices are thoroughly satisfactory to the farmers. They are saving money rapidly. When I have entered the Savings Bank at Montreal, I have observed that out of thirty or forty people in the bank, twenty of them were farmers who were making deposits in the banks. And throughout this whole country, east and west, wherever I have been I have found the farmers depositing their money in the banks at three per cent. and paying off their debts to the loan societies. They have been doing so very largely during the past year. I cannot see the object of this committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would suggest to my hon. friend that it would be very desirable to instruct the committee to enquire what benefits there have been to owners of cotton mills.

Mr. GAULT. I can tell the hon. gentleman that I am a stockholder in the Hudon Cotton Mills—probably the largest in Canada—and that my stock has not paid me three per cent. The time may come when it will be more profitable, but the time has not come yet.

Mr. SPEAKER. I rule the motion out of order on the ground that notice was not given of the composition of the proposed committee.

PRAYERS.

SALE OF PROPERTY ON SUSSEX STREET.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would like to ask the hon. the First Minister if he is prepared to answer the question he was to answer to-day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes. The first question was, whether the Government sold recently any land on the corner of Rideau and Sussex streets, in the city of Ottawa. The sale is authorized, but not completed. The sale is authorized to be made under Act 19 Victoria, chapter 45.

Mr. MACKENZIE. A private arrangement?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A private arrangement. The land was valued by Mr. H. V. Noel. It consists of 155 feet on Rideau street, and 50 feet on Sussex street. The Order in Council authorizes the sale of it to the assignee of the Church of England, for the sum of $1,550.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DREW moved that the time for receiving petitions for private Bills be extended ten days from to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 52) to incorporate the Planters' Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 53) to amend the Act incorporating the North American Mutual Life Insurance Company.—(Mr. Mackenzie.)

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Ontario Investment Association.—(Mr. Carling.)

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, in continuing the important discussion which was opened here on Friday last, and which dealt with the great question at issue between the two parties in this country, I desire to say, as I have always said, that I have no intention of discussing the question of Free Trade and Protection as an abstract question. I would be quite prepared to admit that, even if in England, the policy adopted long since, and now in force, of Free Trade, was the best policy that could be adopted for the country, it would in no way affect the issue between the parties here. I hold that, notwithstanding the very striking evidence that we have that many of the ablest and most intelligent minds in that great country are seriously considering this important question, and are entertaining very grave doubts as to the wisdom of the policy of Free Trade for the Empire.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says hear, hear; but I would like to ask him if there is no significance in such a result as was recently witnessed in the great constituency of the North Riding of Yorkshire—

Mr. MACKENZIE. No; there is not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Where this question was made a battle ground of party, and where one of the most important and influential constituencies in the Empire reversed its verdict and pronounced unequivocally in favor of a policy of Protection, even to the extent of a duty on corn? Well, Sir, as I said before, if I were quite prepared to admit that the policy of Free Trade was the best to be adopted in the British Empire and by Great Britain, I should, at the same time, maintain that, situated as Canada is, we have no alternative but to adopt the policy now in force in this country. It is impossible, Sir, and any one must admit it who takes the trouble to look at the position Canada occupies, with a comparatively small population of between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000 of people, and lying alongside the great country to the south of us, now numbering 50,000,000; it is impossible, Sir, I say, for any public man to examine this question and arrive at any other conclusion than that the policy of Canada must be greatly influenced by the fiscal policy of the great country to the south of us. And, Sir, I think it would be wise to adopt the sentiment of Carlyle, that history is philosophy, teaching by experience, and, looking at the question in the light of that important axiom, ask ourselves what the result of fourteen years experience in relation to this question has been for Canada, what inference has been drawn from the policy of the two great parties in this country by the experience gained in relation to these questions for the last fifteen years? It is well known, Sir, that the party who now have the confidence of the people of this country adopted, from the first, a policy of protecting Canadian industries.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. An hon. member on the other side of the House questions that statement; but, Sir, I think I shall be able to show that hon. gentleman that the low Tariff of 1867, adopted by the party now in power, was as protective a policy as was required in the interests of Canada in that day. Hon. gentlemen may say that the Tariff of Canada had been reduced in 1866. Why reduced? Because the reduced Tariff of 1866, adopted before Confederation, was a Tariff found to be all that was necessary in order to give the protection required for Canadian industries. It is well known, Sir, that the great war, which existed from 1861 to 1865, in the United States, so completely disorganized the labor markets of that country as to afford for many subsequent years quite as full and as abundant a protection to Canadian industries as under the present Tariff. The hon. gentleman knows right well that, although a low Tariff was adopted at the first Session of the first Parliament of this Dominion, the policy was then adopted of fostering and protecting Canadian industries. Hon. gentlemen know right well that, although a low Tariff was adopted, it was accompanied by measures calculated to foster these industries. Look at the free list, and you will find that the policy was to provide for the introduction of articles required to be consumed and to be used in manufacturing industries to a much larger extent than was subsequently the case. Then taking the great interest, especially the shipbuilding, and the policy was adopted of fostering that great and important industry by making articles that entered into the construction of shipping and that had to be imported into this country free of duty. Then the industry of sailing these ships that were built was also fostered by adopting a policy of making the light dues which rested on the vessel a Government charge. So with regard to all other industries, every effort was made to give such protection as industries of the country at that period required. Take the question of machinery. At that time it is well known that within Canada you could obtain but a very small amount of machinery, owing to the absence of any manufactory of machinery. The policy of the first Parliament, and of the first Tariff that was enacted in this Dominion, was a policy of allowing all machinery that could not be manufactured in the country to be admitted free of duty for the purpose of fostering the establishment of new industries within the borders of Canada. Then, Sir, we had the question of the fisheries, one of the largest and most important industries in this country. What was done for this industry? In the first instance, every person knows that, with the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty, the market which had been open to our fishermen had been closed. What did we do? The Government of Canada decided to foster and protect our own fishermen, and to prevent encroachment upon our fishing grounds by fishermen from the United States, and this gave all the advantage to our fishermen that they could receive. Every person remembers the taunts and ridicule that were thrown from the other side of the House at our efforts in that respect. Every person remembers the taunts with reference to Mr. Mitchell's fleet used for the purpose of protecting that industry. Not only did we do that, but we imposed a tonnage license upon American fishermen coming into our waters, and when a license of 50 cents a ton was found not to be adequate protection we raised it to $2. Having thus shown a firm resolve to protect the undoubted rights of our fishermen in our waters the United States were brought to the conclusion that it was desirable to have that question arranged by a treaty; and it is well known, Sir, that the result of the Washington Treaty was not only to re-open the American markets to the fishermen of this country—under the policy of Protection we had adopted—but it was agreed, under that Treaty, that means should be taken to ascertain what amount of money should be paid by the United States Government to Canada for the enjoyment of our fisheries. Every person who was present in this House at the time remembers the taunts and sneers flung across the floor of the House by hon. gentlemen opposite in relation to that matter, and we were told that nothing would be obtained. But, Sir, as an outcome of that Washington Treaty, and of the efforts of hon. gentlemen then and now on this side of the House to protect the interests of our fishermen, no less a sum than $4,500,000 was awarded to be paid to this country; and, to-day, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, true to the policy of protecting that great and important Canadian industry, is in a position to come down and ask justly from this House that no less than $150,000 per annum shall be contributed by this Parliament from the public funds as a bounty to the fishermen, whose fishing grounds have been, to a certain extent surrendered, under the Washington Treaty, to the fishermen of another country. I mention this in order to show that the policy which animates gentlemen on this side of the House is a policy that was adopted in 1867, on the first formation of the Canadian Government, and has continued until the present time. Well, Sir, it will also be remembered by gentlemen opposite that we made a very strong endeavor to secure protection for the great coal mining interests of this country and for the great agricultural industry. It will be remembered that the Government of that day—the first of this Confederation—brought down a policy imposing a duty upon coal coming from the United States into this country, and accompanied it by a proposition to impose a duty upon grain and breadstuffs brought from the adjoining Republic into Canada. It will be remembered that, notwithstanding that that policy was maintained for a year, we were obliged ultimately to succumb to the united hostility of hon. gentlemen opposite, and some of our own friends who were less advanced on this important question at that time than I am happy to say, they are to-day. Now, Sir, it is very well known to the House that I have always been—from the first hour I entered this House—an advocate for a duty on coal. I never could see, and I cannot now, why coal should be exempt from duty, even as a pure question of revenue, any more than any other article found in the Tariff. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House join issue with us in that respect, and the ex-Minister of Finance calls a duty on coal an odious tax, while the hon. leader of the Opposition maintains here, as elsewhere, that it is a sectional tax. Well Sir, I can only say that I fail to see any foundation for the statement that it is an odious tax, or for the view that it is a sectional tax. What makes it an odious tax? Why, these hon. gentlemen say coal is a necessary of life! Yet the Tariff they propounded and maintained, provided for the imposition of duties upon other articles which are just as much necessities of life as coal. In this cold country, hats, boots and shoes, and clothing of all kinds, are necessities of life. It is not a matter of choice as to whether any individual in this country will wear these articles or not; they are articles of prime necessity, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite never discovered that, because these articles are absolutely necessary to maintain life in this country, they should be struck from the list of dutiable goods and put on the free list. Hon. gentlemen know right well that coal oil is as much a necessity of life in Canada as coal, and yet what was their policy with regard to it? Why, my hon. friend from Stanstead (Mr. Colby)—I beg to be excused for mentioning him by name—aided by all the Conservative strength that at that time was to be found in this House, was two years fighting the battle to bring down the duty on coal oil to a figure below 150 per cent. The hon. the ex-Finance Minister, although now so anxious about articles which are necessities of life, was prepared to maintain then an odious tax of 150 per cent. on the article of coal oil, and was only compelled to surrender at discretion when he found he was being pushed to the wall and that outside opinion overwhelmingly supported his opponents. Was the duty on coal oil a sectional tax? I would like to ask the hon. and learned leader of the Opposition if a tax on coal oil is not as much a sectional tax as a tax on coal. There is no coal oil to be found outside of Ontario. Whatever advantage was enjoyed by the industry, in consequence of the duty, inured to Ontario where the oil was to be found. Yet the duty was not called an odious or a sectional tax because oil was an Ontario product, and these gentlemen feel that it is quite right to denounce the tax on coal found in Nova Scotia as odious and sectional, while, at the same time, they resisted a fair and legitimate reduction on coal oil, the duty on which was, as I said before, not only equally odious but equally sectional, being four times as great as the duty on coal, as the hon. gentleman knows. I say, too, that these gentlemen have never been able to show, here or elsewhere, any reason why a duty should not be imposed on coal, the same as upon any other necessary of life. I may mention, as another evidence of our desire to foster and protect the industries of this country, that between 1867 and 1873, when we found we had more revenue than we required to maintain the public service in efficiency, we abolished the duties upon tea and coffee; and we did that essentially in the interests of the industries of this country, and with a view to fostering those industries, because it cheapened the cost of living, and in that way permitted the carrying on of the industries in a better and easier mode than otherwise was the case. Well, Sir, in an unhappy hour for the interests of Canada, gentlemen opposite came into power—not in virtue of the express sentiment of the country, not in virtue of a decision of the people at a time when the issues between the two parties were laid before them—because in the General Election of 1872, the policy that had animated the Conservative party, the policy that had been so eminently successful in the promotion of the prosperity of Canada, was heartily endorsed by the people at the polls. But, Sir, these hon. gentlemen failed to meet the people at the polls on a policy of their own, and they adopted a system which is a favorite mode of operating with them—intrigue; and thus they succeeded in obtaining power. I say, Sir, that this was an unhappy hour in the interests of Canada, for I need not remind the House, Sir, that from that hour down to the time when they were dismissed from the positions for which they proved so thoroughly unequal, the fortunes of Canada were surrendered to hands utterly unworthy of the charge. They succeeded to power with an overflowing revenue; they succeeded to power with the trade, the business and the revenue of the country in the highest possible state of efficiency, and I need not tell the House, Sir, what the lamentable record of that five years of misrule was, during which they supplanted the protectionist policy which had been the policy of Canada down to that time, and introduced a policy of what they called out-and-out Free Trade—at least, to as large an extent as they could adopt it. Well, Sir, they have said on more than one occasion—I do not know, however, that the matter is very important—that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and myself, as well as other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, were formerly Free Traders. They have said, Sir—and they have endeavored to establish on various platforms and occasionally in this House the fact—that formerly my hon. friend and myself held different sentiments in reference to this great issue from those which we now entertain. I say, Sir, that the history of the past will fail to establish any such proposition. I do not, for a moment, hesitate to avow that when I was in the Government of Nova Scotia, and when I had the honor of occupying a position in the Legislature of that Province, I was a Free Trader. My policy was that of Free Trade, and why? Because it was utterly impossible for a small community of less than 400,000 people, situated as we were, without the means of obtaining a market outside of our own borders, even among Canadians, for any but a Free Trade policy to be adopted; but, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite know little of the discussions of the past if they do not know that my hon. friend and myself took our ground in our respective Legislatures of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick strongly and clearly on the advantage of having all these Provinces united together in one great Confederation, and that one of the leading grounds on which we urged this change was, that it would enable a policy that would protect the industries of the country, to be adopted, and which otherwise was impossible. I say, Sir, that when the Reciprocity Treaty was abolished by the United States, as leader of the Government at that time. I went down to the Legislature of Nova Scotia and asked the Legislature to re-impose all the duties that were in operation previous to the treaty, and which had been suspended during the continuance of the treaty, and to adopt the same system in this relation, which had before existed; and, Sir, as I have said before, I, on all occasions pointed out to my countrymen, that while nature had given to Nova Scotia great natural resources, and such as had made other countries great manufacturing centres, and had built up flourishing and immense industries, it was utterly impossible for any such result to follow, unless we became part of a great Confederation, opening up an extensive market within ourselves, by which such industries could be fostered. I am told, Sir, that some remark which I made on the occasion of the introduction of the Tariff of the ex-Finance Minister, gave evidence that I was an out-and-out Free-Trader. Well, Sir, all I can say to this is, that if hon. gentlemen opposite will refer to the files of the Globe newspaper, they will find that I attacked the hon. gentleman's Tariff on that occasion on the ground that it took away the protection—the fostering protection—which was given by the Tariff that had previously existed, to Canadian industries. Hon. gentlemen will discover that on that occasion I joined issue with the ex-Minister of Finance on the question of the proposed imports on shipbuilding, and I said: "Here is a great Canadian industry. It is in a position that will not bear tampering with, and yet I find that one of your first moves is to take away the protection which this industry has enjoyed, owing to the freedom from duty upon articles which go into the construction of ships, and are imported into this country." And I was able to fight the battle so sharply on that occasion, with the aid of my friends on this side of the House, that we compelled the hon. gentleman to take back his Tariff, readjust it, and make it much less obnoxious than it was before. I told the hon. gentleman in that debate—as will be found in the report to which I refer—that he was attacking the industries of Canada by imposing a duty on machinery which was brought into this country, and this, too, when there was no corresponding aid given to the manufacturers, who were to bring such machinery into this country, so that, from the beginning to the end, Sir, I took the ground that that hon. gentleman was striking a fatal blow at Canadian industries in his Tariff, and defended the policy of fostering the industries of Canada as far as it was in my power to do so on that occasion. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman was successful, and what was his first move? The leader of the Opposition at Cobourg said that what they proposed to do was to foster industries by taking the duties off all articles which went into manufacturing, and by increasing the free list. But what did the Government of which the hon. gentleman and the ex-Minister of Finance were members do when they had the power? Did they promote the industries of Canada by taking the duties off articles such as I have mentioned, and by enlarging the free list? No, Sir, but they struck a heavy blow at the industries of Canada by imposing duties on a large number of articles which entered into the consumption of manufactures in this country, taking them out of the free list and imposing duties on them. Then, Sir, I need not say that another step of these hon. gentlemen in the same direction was the reimposition of the duties on tea and coffee. These hon. gentlemen now profess—as hon. gentlemen on that side of the House are very apt to profess when they have not any power to deal with the subject—a deep anxiety for the poor man; but who does not remember, when they brought down a measure to levy duties on tea and coffee, that they banded themselves together to a man and voted down the resolution which was proposed by my hon. friend, who then and now represents Montreal, with the view of having these duties so adjusted as to lighten the tax on the poor man. Under their Tariff the rich man, who is able to drink tea that costs 90 cents or $1 a pound, had to pay no larger tax into the revenue, and had to contribute no more to the revenue, than did the poor man, who was only able to drink tea worth 25 cents a pound. These gentlemen were then deaf to the claims and difficulties of the poor man, and without compunction voted down the resolution that would have modified the unfairness of the Tariff, which was putting a heavy duty on tea and coffee. Well, Sir, they then imposed taxes on articles which were in the free list, and they burthened the industries of the country with exactions; and at the very time when all was changed, and when all was changing, these hon. gentlemen imposed duties on the shipbuilding industry, and they imposed duties on the great bulk of our industrial community by the levying of a tax on tea and coffee, and struck off the protection which had existed with reference to Canadian trade in tea, by removing the differential duty which had hitherto enabled this trade to be carried on in Canada. Everything that these hon. gentlemen could do to make Boston and New York the commercial capitals of Canada they did do, and with what result? With the result, as I have said before, that during the five years that these hon. gentlemen were in power, and that this policy of taking away the protection which had been given by their predecessors to Canadian industries prevailed, of making the poor man poorer, and of bringing this country into a condition such as every Canadian, of whatever stripe of politics he might be, earnestly deplored, and such as every patriotic Canadian can never wish again to see in this country. I defended the duty upon coal when we were in power in the first instance. We maintained that principle as long as we could; and when we returned to power we reverted to our original policy—the same policy of fostering Canadian industries that had animated us from the first. We returned to it, and publicly proclaimed, as we did years before, that it was a proper principle, when we urged upon them the vital importance, in the interest of the country, of changing that policy in this respect. We did all that men could who were in a minority to induce them to adopt a policy which we believed would be successful in changing the financial condition of the country. I had pointed out repeatedly the experience of that great nation to the south of us, which had adopted the policy of protection to foster the industries of the country, with the result of relieving it from the disastrous consequences of its great Civil War. I talked, however, to deaf ears. But, having received the mandate of the people to deal with the great question of the financial policy of the country—having declared, with no uncertain sound, what the policy was which animated us, and would inspire us if again entrusted with power, the result of our appeal to the country was to sustain the policy we had adopted here, and which we had pledged ourselves to carry out if once more entrusted with power. Well, we reimposed the duty on coal—that odious tax which hon. gentlemen opposite had succeeded in striking down, but which I have shown here is a pure question of revenue, and which can be defended on that ground as successfully as any question that can be discussed. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, dealt with this subject, and that is perhaps the only part of his speech with which I was inclined to differ—he stated that one-half the duty on coal was paid in the United States. On the other hand, the ex-Finance Minister, the other day, quoted from a speech of my colleague, the Speaker of the Senate, in reference to the imposition of the duty on coal; and I am quite aware that, years ago, that hon. gentleman and a number of other hon. gentlemen associated with the Conservative party were not so advanced as they are to-day in regard to this subject. I am glad, however, that the hon. gentleman opposite has quoted a part of the argument which he deemed conclusive in reference to this public question. By-and-bye, however, I shall invite him to pay the same respect to the views of the Speaker of the Senate on another point which will come under consideration, which he has shown in relation to this question. Now, when I was down in Picton, I made a speech to which the hon. gentleman opposite did me the honor of alluding. He said I stated I had placed a duty on coal which fell mainly upon 1,500,000 people of Ontario. My opponent questioned the right to have a sectional tax, but I pointed to the fact that the ex-Finance Minister had set an example of supporting and sustaining a sectional tax. I pointed to the fact that that hon. gentleman had placed a duty on petroleum of 150 per cent. on an article that was solely the product of Ontario, and which was largely paid by the other Provinces. Then again, duties were placed on the 100,000 tons of shipping in the Maritime Provinces, that would have produced $100,000 under the Tariff which the hon. gentleman brought down.

While 600,000 people in the Maritime Provinces would have to contribute $100,000 of revenue under the hon. gentleman's Tariff, 1,500,000 people in Ontario were asked to contribute a little over $7,000 under his adjustment of that duty. But that did not prevent the hon. gentleman from proceeding further in the same direction. He showed no objection to the adoption of a sectional tax, provided it fell on the shoulders of the Maritime Provinces, saying, in effect, that supposing such duties were not paid in Ontario, the arrangement was all right. But under our policy we provided for legitimate protection to all the industries of all the Provinces; and while hon. gentlemen ask for the imposition of some burdens in matters in which Ontario is more interested, there is another instance in which, according to their own showing, the tax is not paid by them but by the people of the Lower Provinces—is certainly not paid by the people of Ontario. Now, we maintain a principle—I have advocated it from the moment I had a seat in Parliament, I have never ceased to uphold it. I defy any man who has read the discussion of this question, in the Mail newspaper, which has been going on for the last three or four months, who has candidly and dispassionately weighed the arguments published in that journal, I defy any man who will approach this subject in a fair and candid spirit, to arrive at any other conclusion than that the coal tax is not paid by the people of Ontario, although paid in Ontario. I venture to state, and have sufficient grounds for the statement, that the imposition of the coal duty has not cost the people of Canada one farthing, either in Ontario or out of it. I take this position, and shall give the House my grounds for it, that, instead of the duty on coal having increased the price to the people of Ontario, it has reduced it. I hold that, from the hour of the imposition of that duty down to this hour, Canadians have paid less duty on this article than formerly. It is on this point I differ slightly from my hon. friend the Finance Minister, who seemed to think that, perhaps, half the duty might be paid in the United States and half in Ontario. I am satisfied my hon. friend had not given that branch of the subject the close and exhaustive examination which I have felt it my duty to give it, or he would have arrived at the opinion I now unhesitatingly state, that the imposition of the duty has not cost the people of this country anything, but the reverse. Now, Sir, my first position is that the price of coal from the United States is fixed and governed by the competition that coal has to meet with. There is not an hon. gentleman in this House who does not know, from the practical experience of every day, that the tariff in a railway changes with different seasons of the year, being governed and largely caused by the amount of competition that the tariff meets with. If you are carrying freight to a competitive point, if you are carrying freight to an open port where you have to compete with water carriage, you put your freight down in order to get the business that you would otherwise lose. If the railway is carrying freight to an inland portion of the country, where there is no such competition, you impose such a charge as you think the work performed is fairly entitled to. Now, I maintain that a close examination of this question will prove beyond controversy that, looking at it in the light of experience, which is, as I have said before, the test to which I propose to subject this matter, the House will be driven—I say, with reference to this side of the House, willingly driven, because we are open to conviction in a clear and strong case, but unwillingly driven on the other side of the House—to come to the conclusion at which I have arrived. The moment that the duty was imposed upon coal going into Ontario, it became a competitive point, because they were threatened with the fact of their coal being displaced by the introduction of Nova Scotia coal. The hon. member for Lambton, the other night, seemed to think that the whole question was as to whether we had succeeded in displacing the coal. It is not necessary to the success of our policy to displace the coal at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Nothing is necessary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will examine this question a little further, he will find that—provided you stimulate the production, provided you succeed in giving work to the miners and employment to the twelve or fifteen million dollars of capital that have been invested in the mining operations of this country, and employment to the miner in raising the coal—it matters little where it is consumed, provided that policy has led to this increased consumption. But, Sir, I may say that, after the most careful examination of this question, it has been found that no coal is superior to that produced in the Province of Nova Scotia. My hon. friend from London (Mr. Carling) was at one time Minister of Public Works for Ontario, and his Department caused a careful and exhaustive analysis to be made of the comparative values of the different kinds of bituminous coal. It was then found, as a result of that analysis, that the cheapest coal that could be purchased for the use of the public buildings in the city of Toronto, was Nova Scotia coal. It is well known, although I do not consider it necessary to the argument, that some 284,000 tons of additional coal has been sent into the Upper Provinces under the influence of this Tariff. Before that a very large amount of coal was displaced, but the result, as I said before, could be obtained without displacing necessarily the coal in Ontario. Now, I quote from the Trade Returns of home consumption, showing the imports of anthracite into the several Provinces from the United States, and the average cost per ton. What do these tables show? Why, Sir, they show that, in Ontario, in 1877, there were 261,895 tons imported, costing $1,163,944, or $4.45 per ton—that was before the imposition of any duty; in 1878, there were 266,434 tons imported, at a cost of $1,022,816, or $3.85 per ton; in 1880, there were 335,794 tons imported, costing $1,022,055, or $3.04 per ton; in 1881, there were 357,524 tons imported, costing $1,522,375, or $4.25 per ton. So that we have never reached, down to the present time, the cost per ton of anthracite coal coming into the city of Toronto; it has never reached the price that was placed upon that article before there was the imposition of one cent of duty. In Quebec, in 1877, there were imported 117,124 tons, costing $468,759, or $4 per ton,—mark, Sir, that Quebec, though much further from the point of production, was a point of sharp competition, and the result was that, instead of having to pay in Quebec $4.45 a ton, as they paid in Toronto, they only paid $4 a ton; in 1878, $3.15; in 1880, $2.65, when the 50 cents duty was imposed; and in 1881, $3.77. In Nova Scotia competition was still greater, and the distance was much greater also. The anthracite coal mines of Pennsylvania as you will observe, are at the furthest point, and yet the cost of the anthracite coal of Nova Scotia was far lower than either in Ontario or Quebec, both of which were much nearer to the point of production. In 1877, the importation was 11,887 tons, costing $44,560, or $3.74 per ton; in 1878, the average cost was $2.93 per ton; in 1880, $2.58; in 1881, $3.70. In New Brunswick it cost $4 per ton, the same as in Quebec in 1877; $3.46 in 1878; $2.81 in 1880, when the duty was imposed; and $3.70 in 1881. So that here you have the fact clearly established that the very moment the duty was imposed the parties who shipped their coals to Toronto and Quebec, put these places into a different category from what they were before, they made them competitive points and reduced the cost of coal to a larger extent than the amount of duty paid. It is impossible for any impartial mind to arrive at any other conclusion than that the imposition of a duty of 50 cents a ton has not only not increased the cost to the consumer, but it has lowered the cost to the consumer in Ontario. The following is the table from which I have been quoting :

Province.	Year.	Tons.	Total Cost.		Cost per Ton.
Ontario.....	1877	261,895	1,163,944	4 45
	1878	266,434	1,022,816	3 85
	1880	335,794	1,022,055	3 04
	1881	357,524	1,522,375	4 25
Quebec.....	1877	117,124	468,759	4 00
	1878	105,384	333,836	3 15
	1880	142,239	378,150	2 65
	1881	161,449	608,813	3 77
Nova Scotia.....	1877	11,877	44,560	3 74
	1878	10,592	31,169	2 93
	1880	12,513	32,467	2 58
	1881	15,909	54,661	3 70
New Brunswick.....	1877	23,223	92,823	4 00
	1878	21,240	73,555	3 46
	1880	24,232	63,095	2 81
	1881	28,243	104,807	3 70

It will be at once apparent that the price of coal in 1880 was less than in 1878, the first named year being the year after the imposition of the duty, and the second named year being the year immediately preceding it. So you here have that additional fact; in other words, there was a drop in the price as invoiced to Canadian dealers immediately after the National Policy was adopted, just as the Grand Trunk Railway puts its fare up when the St. Lawrence is closed, and puts its fare down when the St. Lawrence is open, simply because in one case they have to meet competition, and, in the other case, they have no competition. Bituminous coal followed the same rule, and the United States practically ceased sending any into the Dominion, with the exception of Ontario, where the invoiced prices, as per Customs returns, show an average of $3. 3 per ton for 1881, as against $3.67 for 1877. That shows the United States coal owners feared less the competition with Nova Scotia, because they found that it had not been sent forward to the extent they feared it would be, and they increased the price to a certain extent. Now, Sir, I think I have shown that the price of coal varies in the United States according to the degree of competition experienced by it from the coal from Nova Scotia and Great Britain; otherwise you would not have coal sent to Quebec at a lower price, you would not have coal sent a longer distance than it is to Toronto from the Pennsylvania coal fields. In Boston, a sea-board city of the United States, the price of coal is $6.50. In the inland city of Chicago the price is $8.50. How do hon. gentlemen account for that? The cost of carrying to the city of Boston, and the cost of carrying to Chicago is the same. I have under my hand a periodical published in New York, called Coal, and if the hon. gentleman wishes to verify the statement, he will find that the cost of carriage to Chicago and to Boston is the same—$2 in each case—yet the price of coal in Boston is $6.50, while in Chicago it is $8.50, showing that the price of coal is fixed by the coal dealers and by the amount of competition. In Chicago there is no competition with British or Nova Scotia coal, and the consequence is that the price is put up to just the highest point the coal dealers can place it; showing again, Sir, as I have stated, that this question of its being placed on the competitive, or the non-competitive position, affects the price of coal. My authority for the statement I have made as to the freight rate to Boston is the Boston Herald's commercial report, and a periodical published in New York called Coal, and dated the 25th of January. The receipts of Nova Scotia and English coal into Boston, in 1880, were 54,781 tons. In 1881, somewhat more; and a large proportion of the coal import in 1881 was from Nova Scotia, as Cape Breton coal owners endeavored to force it into that market at $3.50 per ton. No coal was supplied to Chicago from others than the Pennsylvania coal fields. I think, under these circumstances, the House will have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the several ports of Canada (and of Ontario especially) were, by reason of the duty imposed upon foreign coal, removed by the Pennsylvania coal owners from the list of non-competitive points to the list of competitive points. The proof of this is the fact that the Boston wholesale price, to dealers of anthracite, in 1881, was $4.20, while the wholesale price in Toronto, of the same kind of coal, was, in 1881, $4.20. The authority in this case is the Boston Herald's commercial article for the Boston price, and, for the Toronto price, the Customs returns and the following table, which gives the total import of coal into Ontario, and the price of anthracite, compared with Philadelphia—a non-competitive point:—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Year.	Quantity.	Cost of market of purchase.	Price per ton.	Philadelphia	Philadelphia	Philadelphia
				wholesale price.	more than Ontario.	less than Ontario.
	Tons.	$	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
1877.....	420,010	1,793,407	4.27	2 59	1.68
1878.....	406,971	1,476,022	3.62	3.22	1.00
1879 to March 15.....	322,528	1,252,703	3.88	2.89	1.00
1879 after March 15.....	93,895	245,255	2.71	2.37
1880.....	516,729	1,509,960	2.92	4 53	1 61
1881.....	344,833	1,499,143	4.34	4 90	1 00

This table shows, first, that prior to the 15th of March, 1879, the Philadelphia dealer purchased his coal at a cheaper rate than the Ontario coal dealer; second, that after the imposition of the duty, the average price of the Ontario coal dealers was less than that of Philadelphia in 1880, by $1.61, and in the fiscal year of 1881, by 56 cents. If we compare Toronto with Philadelphia, we find that Toronto coal dealers obtained their supply during the calendar year 1881, at $4.20 per ton against Philadelphia at $4.90, or 70 cents less than Philadelphia; and if the duty were added to the price of the coal, there would still be a large margin in favor of Toronto against Philadelphia. Further evidence is to be found in the fact that coal sold at Ogdensburg, in the winter of 1880-81, for $5.90, while at Prescott the retail price was $6 per ton; the cost of freight to Prescott, harbor dues and unloading is 68 cents. If the duty were added to the cost of the coal, it ought to have sold at $5.90 plus 68 cents plus 50 cents, or in all $7.08. At Oswego, coal sold during the present year, at $5.75; freight, from Oswego to Belleville, 40 cents; harbor dues and unloading, 28 cents; if duty were added to cost, 50 cents, the coal ought to sell at $6.93, while the price at Belleville was $6.50, showing that the result of the duty has been to decrease and not to increase the price of coal. At Buffalo, coal sells the present winter for $5.70; the freight to Toronto is $1; cartage 30 cents, or equal to $7. The freight in this case is given on the authority of railway companies, that being the rate from the Bridge to Toronto for all quantities of coal under 10,000 tons. In summer rates are lower, Mr. Nairn, a coal dealer of Toronto, placing the freight at 70 cents during the summer. The price of coal then was $6.50, in Toronto. During the present month the price of coal, in Toronto, was advertised at $6.50, by P. Burns, a leading coal dealer. At that price, with winter rates of freight, coal is obtained by consumers at 50 cents less than the consumers of Buffalo pay for it. At Chicago, coal retails at from $8 to $8.50, or an average of $8.25. The rail freight from Buffalo is $2 the difference in freight is 70 cents in favor of Toronto. If Toronto paid as much as Chicago it ought to pay $8.25 minus 70 cents, or $7.55; if the duty is added to the cost to the consumer, Toronto, to have its coal at the same proportionate rate as Chicago, would have to pay $7.55 and duty 50 cents, or $8.05. It actually pays $6.50 to $7. At Detroit coal sells at retail for $6.25; freight from Buffalo 50 cents. The price at Toronto is $6.50, with freight $1, ought to be $6.70, to be proportionately as dear as Detroit. In further proof that the duty is not paid by the people of Ontario see following table of the retail prices in Toronto at the several dates mentioned:—

" 25, 1881.....	6.50.....	5.50

In 1881, with the duty of 50 cents in operation, the cost at Toronto of hard coal was $6.50, and soft coal $5.50, the lowest price at which this table shows it to have been purchased since 1872.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What was it in 1884?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This table does not give it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Then it is a very convenient table.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am taking the figures in this table from the prices furnished by the Toronto Globe—a table which shows that in no year between 1872 and 1875 inclusive, when there was no duty on coal, was coal as cheap in Toronto as it has been in 1881, with the duty fully established; so that the hon. gentleman will have to work at that table a good deal before he will be able to invalidate the conclusive argument which I have adduced therefrom—that the imposition of the duty on coal has been in favor of the Ontario consumer, so far as the price of coal is concerned. The Philadelphia Ledger, in December, said:

“Coal demand has been in excess of the ability of the companies to furnish it. It is really just cause for apprehension for the future, should the trouble of want of water or other causes continue to limit production.”

This was said because of the drought of last season; nevertheless, Toronto coal supply was cheaper to it than in full production years. Now, Sir, I have another table to which I wish to invite the attention of hon. gentlemen, as showing what the effect of the National Policy has been on this great and important industry. It is a comparative statement of the coal sales, labor, &c., in Nova Scotia, for 1873, the last year of the Macdonald Government; 1878, the last year of the Mackenzie rule; and, 1879 to 1881, three years under the National Policy. It shows the decrease under the Mackenzie Administration and the increase under the National Policy:

Coal sales from Nova Scotia mines.....	881,106	693,511	187,595	1,034,800	341,289
The number of men employed	4,362	3,135	1,227	3,600	465
Number of days worked at coal.....	995,153	663,850	331,303	847,595	183,705
Tons of coal shipped from Nova Scotia to Montreal and Quebec	187,059	83,710	103,349	263,628	184,918

I give to hon. gentlemen opposite these facts and figures, which establish beyond question the fact that, so far from the people of Ontario having suffered from the imposition of a coal duty, the very reverse has been the case.

Mr. ANGLIN. By the Upper Provinces, I presume the hon. gentleman means Quebec and Ontario.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I mean Quebec and Ontario. At Cobourg, where I had the pleasure, at no very remote period, of discussing before the people—if not in the presence of the hon. leader of the Opposition—this very important question, I was able to deal with a very remarkable argument which he gave in favor of reducing the duty on coal. And what do hon. gentlemen suppose it was? And, Sir, I may say, while referring to that, that the ex-Finance Minister, the other night, gave us the same reason. He said, what a frightful injustice to railways. It was not the poor man then on whose behalf he complained—because I may say that these “shivering wretches” with whom the hon. ex-Finance Minister is so familiar, are not known to us. I may tell the hon. gentleman that the day is not remote when there were shivering wretches suffering from want of employment, and without the comforts of life. But I am happy to know that, under the policy now in operation in this country, all that is changed. Where there was misery and cold there is now comfort and happiness. But I say that coal is not the fuel of the poor man in Canada. I say that to nineteen-twentieths of the poor people of Canada wood is their fuel, and the price of coal does not touch the question at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does the hon. gentleman say that of Toronto, where the great consumption of coal is?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say it of Canada. There are other places in this country besides Toronto, although the hon. gentleman does make it his home.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman knows that in the country districts the people have not the necessity nor the means of getting coal; but where coal is consumed, is it consumed by the rich or the poor?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I thought I made it plain to the hon. gentleman that it is a matter of no moment to them, because I have shown that the poor man of Toronto gets his coal cheaper under the National Policy than he did before. But I say that, taking this whole Dominion, wood is the fuel of the poor man, and therefore it is a delusion for these hon. gentlemen to dwell on the price of coal as a hardship to the poor. I have shown that it is not a hardship but a benefit to the poor. The hon. gentlemen were greatly alarmed for two classes, and who were they? Why, Sir, they were the railways and the manufacturers. I thought these manufacturers were bloated aristocrats, that you could not take too much out of. But, Sir, it appears that these hon. gentlemen as the day approaches when they have to be put in the balance and weighed, are becoming very sensitive in regard to the manufacturers, and they want coal put on the free list in order to increase the enormous profits to these manufacturers. Suppose the manufacturer had to pay an addition of 50 cents a ton on coal, he was able to pay it, because we had given him an increased production. We had provided for fostering and protecting his industry against the slaughtering from the neighboring country that formerly crushed it out, and thus enabled him to pay this additional 50 cents a ton without feeling it. But, Sir, what about the railways? Have the railways any ground for complaint? How was the hon. the ex-Finance Minister able to make a case in respect to the railway? By quoting the speech of Sir Henry Tyler? No; but by misquoting the speech of Sir Henry Tyler. The hon. gentleman put words in the mouth of Sir Henry Tyler which he never uttered. I challenge him on this point. I say more. I say the hon. gentleman, who entertains such a very low estimate of human nature as his speech the other night led us to believe he holds, ought to be careful how he places words in the mouth of any man that the man never uttered, because it is open to the imputation that the hon. gentleman's knowledge was not at fault. Now, Sir, I tell him, if he did not know it, he ought to have known it; and I tell you why. This subject had been a matter of public discussion. The Globe newspaper had falsified the report of Sir Henry Tyler's speech. Either the Globe's correspondent in London, or the persons at the Globe office in Toronto, falsified Sir Henry Tyler's language and made him say that which he never had said. That became a subject of discussion, and the Globe was challenged with the production of Sir Henry Tyler's speech, which proved the statement I have made, namely, that either the correspondent in London or the parties in the office at Toronto were so driven to the wall to sustain their untenable position on this question, that they had to do what the hon. ex-Finance Minister, after this has been a matter of public discussion, ought not to have done,—put words in the mouth of Sir Henry Tyler which he never uttered.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Produce the speech.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have got it here, and I think the hon. gentleman will find that not only does it not say what he has stated that it said, but the very reverse. Sir Henry Tyler, of course, like all gentlemen in his position, was anxious to show why he had not a larger net balance in favor of the railway, and he would have been only too glad if he could have shown that the imposition of the duty of 50 cents per ton on coal had compelled him to take that 50 cents out of the earnings of the railway in order to adjust his balance, but he did not venture to say so; he could not say so, because I happen to know that the Grand Trunk had purchased coal cheaper than the company had purchased it before, and therefore Sir Henry Tyler was not in a position to make such a statement. He said:

"He gives us all the reasons for the excess in the expenditure of the present half year, which you will see on page 12—increased consumption of fuel caused by much severer weather during the past winter. 2nd. Advance in prices of fuel, wages, and materials. 3rd. Outlay in working the extra traffic, which, of course, requires extra fuel; and so on. As regards fuel, I should like to tell you what we are doing in that respect. We are gradually economizing, and using more coal and less wood."

Sir Henry Tyler was made to say that his company was suffering, that the Grand Trunk and all the railways were suffering to the extent of the duty on coal. He tells the people that, although he had not got as large a balance as he desired, he was increasing it, because the company was using more coal and less wood. He said:

"In the half-year ending June, 1880, we used 60,000 cords of wood and in the half-year ending June, 1881, only 48,000 cords. Per contra, we used in the half-year ending June, 1880, 109,000 tons of coal; so that we had a decrease of 12,000 cords of wood and an increase of 34,000 tons of coal. As wood becomes more scarce, and there are extra facilities for getting coal, we shall hope, in working our traffic, to effect further economy in this respect."

The hon. the ex-Finance Minister put language in Sir Henry Tyler's mouth which he never uttered.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Is that all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is that not enough to show that Sir Henry Tyler did not say what has been reported? Is it not quite enough to show that there is no foundation for that which Hansard shows the ex-Finance Minister stated, and the words he put in Sir Henry Tyler's mouth? Is it not enough that Sir Henry Tyler, instead of saying they are suffering from the increased cost of coal, owing to the duty, and that it was increased by the amount of the duty, which the ex-Finance Minister made him say, the company are economizing by using more coal and abandoning the use of wood? If the hon. member for Lambton does not think that enough, I am afraid it will be very hard for any one to satisfy him.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman knows it is not enough as well as I do.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it will not be necessary to occupy the attention of the House much longer in respect to the question of coal. I think I have disposed once and for ever of any foundation whatever for the imputation that the duty upon coal has increased the cost to the consumer in any part of the whole Dominion. I have shown that whereas poverty and suffering existed before, now all is comfort and prosperity. I have shown hon. gentlemen that the great coal-mining industry, which was languishing and dying, and would have been crushed out, has revived; we would, under the late policy, have been in the position that Ontario would have had no protection, for there would have been no Canadian coal-mines that would have been brought into requisition. But all that had been changed, and now we found not only industries springing up in every direction, but, at the same time, it can be clearly established that this has been accomplished without either manufacturers or railways or any persons being called upon to pay a single additional farthing. But suppose it had cost the railways something? What have we done for the railways under our policy? Does the hon. gentleman know how those railways have progressed under the National Policy that he and the leader of the Opposition are so exceedingly anxious about—those great corporations which cannot be said to be so very poor? The hon. gentleman has only to look at the returns, and he will find they are of a very striking and interesting character, like all other statistics relating to the National Policy. Those prove beyond controversy the interesting growth, prosperity, advancement and progress of this country. There is no barometer you can apply that will give you a clearer test as to the public weal than the railway receipts of the country. The railways stretch through the country in every direction, and just in proportion as the country flourishes the receipts advance, and as the country suffers they decline. Let me invite the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to what the railway returns show, and then they will see whether there was any cause for expressing sympathy for the railway companies, even if they paid a coal duty. The following is a comparative statement of the tons of freight carried and of receipts:—

—	1876-77.	1877-78.	1878-79.	1879-80.	1880-81.
Number of tons of freight carried.....	6,859,796	7,863,472	8,348,810	9,938,858	12,102,245
	$	$	$	$	$
Receipts from passengers.....	6,458,493	6,386,325	6,459,598	7,076,340	8,198,274
Receipts from freight	11,321,264	13,129,191	12,509,094	15,506,935	18,616,517
Receipts from mails and express.....	744,741	795,797	789,926	851,288	942,671
Receipts from other sources.....	217,554	208,764	166,448	102,076	150,257
	18,742,052	20,520,077	19,925,066	23,536,639	27,907,719

Thus we have a total of $18,742,052 in 1876-77, against $19,925,066 in 1878-79; and when the hon. gentleman's policy was changed, we have $27,907,719 received from railways in this country, or an increase in 1880-81, from the year the hon. gentleman received permission to retire from the management of public affairs, of no less than $8,082,453. So that, if the railways had to pay a few cents duty a ton on coal, they could very well afford to pay it, considering the position in which they are placed to-day under the National Policy, compared with that in which they were placed before. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to carry his attention back to the occasion on which he introduced his first Budget Speech. What was the prospect he held out then with reference to the Intercolonial Railway? He led the House to believe that they might be prepared for a deficit of $1,250,000 in the working of that railway. Well, the year that they retired from the management of public affairs, the deficit went up to nearly $750,000, and, had the hon. gentleman remained long enough in power, I think he would have been able to prove himself a correct prophet by running the deficit up to the amount he estimated, $1,250,000. To-day, however, we are able to say that we have increased the carriage of freight 42 per cent., and instead of having to face a deficit of $750,000, as the account stood in 1878-79, when the policy of the hon. gentleman opposite was changed, we had a small balance it is true, but a balance on the right side of the books. The hon. gentleman may say that we increased freight 42 per cent. So we did, but what effect would that have had if they remained in power? If it had cost as much to carry a ton of freight as when they were in power, the deficits would have enormously increased, and the hon. gentleman would have been able to show triumphantly how accurate he made his estimate when he estimated that it would reach $1,250,000. Turn which way you like, and what do you find? You find, just as the railroad barometer shows, an enormous increase of traffic, progress, prosperity and comfort, taking the place of poverty and retrogression. That is what you find all over this country. My hon. friend the Finance Minister had the proud satisfaction of standing here, the other night, and presenting a picture of the condition of this country, such as might well fill with just pride the breast of every patriotic Canadian. It did not seem to have quite that effect upon some hon. gentlemen who are not a hundred miles away. One would have supposed he was unfolding a record of the most disastrous woe that could befall a country, if one were to judge from the lengthened visage of the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance. Perhaps no man ever suffered more than he, while it was his painful duty to see the hon. Finance Minister place in bold relief, though without any allusion to it, the successful results of his policy in contradistinction to the failure of the policy of the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance. I need not remind you of the fact that when we adopted our policy, when the issue was joined, when the question was practically for this country whether we should have direct taxation or adopt the National Policy of protecting Canadian industries on Canadian soil. The hon. gentleman smiles when I refer to direct taxation. Does he forget that he himself stood here and admitted that he was at the end of his tether, that all his resources were exhausted, that he knew of no means of wringing any more taxation out of the impoverished people of this country except by direct taxation?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No; I did not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman forgets that when a number of the members from Lower Canada were urging a policy that would favor the growth of Canadian tobacco, he met that proposition, not by saying that it was a bad one, but by saying that it would take $500,000 out of the revenue, and that he knew no mode of replacing it except by direct taxation. The hon. gentleman referred the other night to memories. There is no one thing that he has so much reason to dread as the memory of the members of this House. His Budget Speeches have been fyled away, and have become musty, because no person wishes to turn up such unprofitable and unwholesome reading. If he could only wipe out the recollection of those speeches, and the positions that he assumed when he was feebly attempting to grapple with what he was unable to deal with—the financial interests of this country—it would be, indeed, a fortunate thing for him. We can well recollect when the hon. gentleman brought down his Tariff in 1874 and imposed $3,000,000 additional taxes, and came back two years later with another deficit, and asked for an additional $500,000 taxes, he told us we had reached the limit of indirect taxation, and that if he had any convenient mode of collecting an income tax he would be disposed to propound it. I say that, when the right hon. the leader of the Government came to the rescue, when the people themselves came to the rescue and saved the country from the incompetent hands of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues, we stood on the threshold of direct taxation; and if we have it not now it is because these hon. gentlemen were deprived of the position for which they had shown their utter unfitness. But what did they say when our policy was adopted, when we compelled them to admit that we had fairly and faithfully redeemed the pledges on which we had been elected, that we had carried out manfully the assurances we had given the people? Does the hon. gentleman suppose that the memories of hon. members of this House have enabled them to forget that the ground he took was that it would fail as a revenue Tariff?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. So it was.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman forget that he took the ground, on the floor of this Parliament, that the depression would be intensified instead of decreased? Does he forget that for six long months, he and all his followers, in and out of this House, and the Globe newspaper, endeavored to show that the depression was deepening, and that the country was irretrievably ruined; and it was only when right and left, before and behind, everywhere in fact, evidence presented itself so overwhelming of the progress and prosperity of the country that it could be no longer concealed, that the hon. gentlemen harked back on their prophecies and tried to discover something besides the National Policy to which our great progress might be attributed? But, Sir, that door is not open to them. It was closed by themselves. Here, on the floor of Parliament, when discussing this great issue of the fiscal policy of Canada, they declared the adoption of the policy of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would fail as a source of revenue, because it would so tax the imports coming into this country that no one could import anything. We tried, in our feeble way, to convince them that they were wrong. We tried to show them that, if we fostered and protected the interests of Canada as they should be, the purchasing power of the people would be increased, and that the imports would increase in a corresponding ratio. Hon. gentlemen had other objections. What were they? They said: "The credit of the country is gone; your policy is such an attack upon Imperial interests that it will close the money market of the world, and your loss of revenue will deprive you still further of the means of paying the indebtedness of the country." That was the hon. gentleman's ground. Where do we stand to-day? When my hon. friend was able to stand up and tell us the revenue had shown such buoyancy, and reached the position it had never shown before, did my hon. friend attempt to show that the credit of the country had suffered? Why, Sir, let me invite the hon. ex-Minister's attention for a few moments to the figures that I have here. If he has any doubt about the credit of the country, they will set his doubts at rest at once and for ever. What did he do when he was entrusted with the power of negotiating the bonds of Canada in the money markets of the world—before he required any money—the hon. gentleman rushed with hot haste into the money market, and by a process to which we shall perhaps refer more at length by-and-by, put the securities of Canada on the market—as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance did upon an open market, with free competition, in order that Canada might get what they were worth? No; he fixed the price, he fixed the interest, he fixed the period of the bonds, and fixed the price away below what the bonds were selling for in England at the time on the open market, and what was the result? The result is one that will for ever close that hon. gentleman's mouth on the question of the credit of the country. Who are the happy possessors of the four millions sterling worth of bonds that the hon. gentleman took across the Atlantic, in 1874 and disposed of among his friends—

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Who were my friends.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That, Sir, is more than I can tell. The hon. gentleman has refused us that information. If the hon. gentleman is impervious to every kind of evidence, he cannot be impervious to the fact that the men to whom he gave those bonds are, to-day, £600,000 sterling richer than they were before they saw him; that the men to whom he gave the £4,000,000 worth of debentures are, at this moment, the happy possessors of $2,920,000 more than they paid him for the bonds. I do not wonder the hon. gentleman is getting very uneasy, but there is more to come. What does the hon. gentleman say of 1876? He went back again there when he did not require money, and sold his bonds at a ruinous discount—4 or 5 per cent. below what they were bringing in the market. The happy possessors of those bonds, amounting to £2,500,000 sterling are $1,825,000 richer than when they purchased those bonds at the price fixed by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance. That, I think, will settle at once and for ever, any question as to the credit of Canada. I do not say that our present position is all due to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, I doubt it very much. I do not say it is all due to the National Policy, because had our bonds on that occasion got fair play in the money markets of the world, they would not have been sold at these ruinous figures, however satisfactory the arrangements may be for the happy parties with whom the Finance Minister made them. Well, Sir, what was my hon. friend the Finance Minister able to show? He was able to show, instead of being in the unhappy position of the ex-Finance Minister, who accumulated a deficit of $7,500,000 in three years—

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I repeat it, Sir. I say, but for the fact that these hon. gentlemen were dismissed from power by the overwhelming fiat of the great majority of independent electors of this country; but for the fact that the hon. gentleman was deprived of the opportunity of continuing his mad and senseless policy, on July 1st, 1879, he would have had a deficit to face, in the three years, of $7,500,000. What is the position of the hon. Minister of Finance? He stands in the proud position of being able to show, not only remarkable progress, prosperity, happiness, comfort, and everything that a country can desire to see within its borders, but, under this Tariff, in 1881, a surplus of $4,139,000; in 1882, a surplus of $4,450,000, and, in 1883, he has the best reason for estimating an additional $3,000,000 of surplus. Notwithstanding that he gives back $1,500,000 taxes to the people, he is able to meet the country with the best evidence that any Finance Minister can desire: that, instead of a deficit of $7,500,000 in three years, he will have a surplus of $11,500,000. But, Sir, these hon. gentlemen do not like surpluses. When did they discover that a surplus was such a deplorable thing? Why, Sir, we have never ceased to hear them praising the position of the great Republic to the south of us. Do they say a surplus is a bad thing, that it is very bad statesmanship to wipe off the debts of the country by hundreds of millions—$250,000,000 the year before last was wiped off of the debt of the United States.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

And yet these hon. gentlemen think a surplus is very bad. Well, Sir, they took the best means to convince the country of their sincerity, for they abhorred a surplus as the greatest pestilence that could invade a country, and they were successful in showing the reverse of a surplus to an extent that would satisfy the most exacting mind. But what more does my hon. friend show? He shows that we have a decreased interest—notwithstanding the great expenditure on the public service of the country—in the year of $90,000, or an absolute decrease, in the charge on interest, of $25,000. The hon. the leader of the Opposition has exhibited great anxiety about the indebtedness of Canada. Well, he may thank God and take courage while the management of the financial affairs of the country is in the hands of the present Minister of Finance, because the Minister has shown that we can carry on the public works without increasing the public indebtedness or the charge for interest. Then, hon. gentlemen opposite have been greatly exercised, and have perambulated the country with doleful statements about the enormously increasing expenditure; but we have been able to carry on the public business at an expenditure of actually 23 cents less per capita of the estimated population than the amount expended by hon. gentlemen opposite. But, Sir, I say that the ex-Finance Minister failed, utterly failed, to grapple with this question. It is true he talked here for three hours, and he talked—I was going to say to very unwilling ears; but I will not, as there were not many ears here to listen to him. Most of them were conspicuous by their absence, and at that I was not at all surprised. After listening to the hon. gentleman for a weary half-hour, and finding him going over and over the same old story that he seems to have got by rote, and is evidently unable to get out of his mind, I was reminded of a witty expression of Lawrence O'Connor Doyle in the Nova Scotia Legislature. There was an exciting discussion there on the subject of pickled fish, and a great deal of acerbity had been thrown into the debate. Presently the debate toned down and it was being carried on in a subdued way, when Larry Doyle rose in his place and said: "We had better take to the question for the pickle has run out and there is nothing but tongues and sounds left." Now, for the first hour of the hon. gentleman's speech we had the pickle, but after the pickle ran out we had nothing but tongues and sounds left; and I am sure it was a relief to the House when the hon. gentleman resumed his seat. Well, the hon. Finance Minister has not only done what I have already described, but he is able to show $1,000,000 of reduction in the controllable expenditure of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite want to know where the surplus comes from, and they say: "Did not it come out of the people's pockets?" I say in reply, no; $750,000 come out of the savings in the management of the Intercolonial Railway—the saving of money you wasted before, of money you would waste again if you had the opportunity. The ex-Finance Minister made a point of the Post Office expenditure. But what do the Post Office expenditures show? They show that we spent more money on the Post Office service, and yet that it cost Canada less than it did during the term of office of our predecessors, because, notwithstanding the enormous extension of the service in the North-West and the improvement of facilities generally, the deficiency between our revenue and expenditure is greatly less than when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in charge. The hon. the Finance Minister was also able to show that we could carry our economies into effect when we came into power, an illustration of which was found in the saving of $671 per mile in the running of the Intercolonial, meaning, in all, a half or three-quarters of a million dollars. He was also in the proud position to show that, notwithstanding the large capital expenditure that has been made, notwithstanding the fact that from the time of the Union until 1878-79 the per capita debt increased from $29 to $34—the per capita debt has only been increased $1 over and above the amount at which it stood when hon. gentlemen opposite left power. The hon. gentleman was also able to show that, when the great Canadian Pacific Railway is completed, and every dollar of expenditure is provided for, the debt of this country—including the canal expenditure and everything else—would only be $203,000,000; and that the surpluses—the money the country can afford to pay, as they do in the United States, to the reduction or diminution of the debt—would, up to that period, bring the amount down to $175,000,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. With the sinking fund?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; the surpluses, with the sinking fund, would bring it down to $175,000,000. So I think the anxiety of the leader of the Opposition, on the score of the debt, will be very much relieved. The hon. the Finance Minister also drew attention to the fact—a fact which hon. gentlemen opposite will not dispute—that if we sell one-half of the rich, fertile lands we have for sale in the great North-West, at $1 per acre—and hon. gentlemen opposite are hardly likely to question that calculation—the debt of Canada will be reduced down to $100,000,000, or to a figure, after the great national work has been provided for, far below what it is at this moment. The hon. gentleman has shown that such was the improved condition of the people that, while these hon. gentlemen are talking about the pressure upon the poor man, and while the hon. gentleman says that the fiscal policy of the country has degraded the poor man, while the hon. gentleman has endeavored to show that his comfort has been less, my hon. friend the hon. Minister of Finance meets him with conclusive testimony as to the fact that, in three years and four months, these poor suffering operatives have deposited no less than $13,000,000 in the savings banks of this country; and this, too, notwithstanding the regulation which shut out and closed these savings banks against the wealthier class of the community, and the class of deposits which used to be received. And not only was there an increase of $13,000,000 in the savings, but also increased deposits in the other banks of no less than $23,000,000, or an increase of $36,000,000 in all in money deposited in the banks of Canada in three years and four months; and this is indisputable evidence of the position which this country to-day occupies, notwithstanding the fact which is patent to every hon. gentleman, that, during these three years and four months, more money and more capital has been invested by the capitalists of Canada in fostering, promoting, and building up our industries than ever occurred before in Canada during the same period. The hon. gentleman is, moreover, able to extend the free list; the hon. gentleman is able to take the duties off tea and coffee; the hon. gentleman is able to meet the desire of our friends in Lower Canada with reference to home-grown tobacco; the hon. gentleman is able to strike off the Stamp duties to the amount of $200,000 a year; the hon. gentleman is able to give the fishermen of this country a bounty of $150,000 a year, and well we may do so. What do they do? Why, Sir, these hardy sons of toil, these men who have to take their lives in their hands in building up the industries of the country, have created exports for Canada of no less than $6,000,000 per annum. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that the estimates have been increased. So they have. Naturally they have been increased; and my hon. friend pointed out the reasons why they have not been increased with regard to the controllable expenditure, for that we have decreased—but merely in order that the hon. the Finance Minister might properly discharge his duty to the country. Now, Sir, I think we have given pretty conclusive evidence as to the position which the country occupies. I think that the statements made by my hon. friend the hon. Minister of Finance will carry the conviction to the mind of every intelligent man in this country, that no country on which the sun shines, was ever in a position to claim greater advance in the progress that has been made in the same time, or was in a happier and more prosperous state than Canada is in to-day. I have had myself the opportunity of seeing more of Canada during the last six months than probably any Canadian ever saw of the country during the same time. I have travelled away up the Pacific coast, and I have gone 300 or 400 miles into the interior of British Columbia, returning through the North-West, Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. I passed through Prince Edward Island from end to end, and with regard to every section of the country which I visited, I am here to add my testimony to that which the hon. Finance Minister gave in such a conclusive manner, and to declare that a more united, a more happy, a more prosperous, and more progressive people are not to be found in any part of the world than are to be found in Canada to-day. This, Sir, is the proud position which my hon. friend occupies; and he was enabled to show that all this enormous increase has been given, and all this change in the trade policy of our country has been accomplished, without exposing ourselves to one jot or tittle of the danger which the ex-Minister of Finance predicted when this policy was introduced. It was said it was going to be inimical to Great Britain. But, Sir, the fact is now ascertained from the Trade Returns that, so far from this being the case, the very reverse has been the result. Instead of a policy, such as was in operation before, and which was eminently in the interest of our friends across the border, when no Canadian could look forward to any future, except the hope that he might continue to occupy the position to which we were reduced by hon. gentlemen opposite, of being the hewers of wood and drawers of water to our neighbors across the line, and instead of the trade of Canada being steadily withdrawn from Great Britain to whom we owe so much, and transferred to the foreign country to the south of us, building up that great and populous Republic, the result has been what my hon. friend said it would be, and the Trade Returns establish the fact that the average imports from the Mother Country are increased, while the average imports from the Republic to the south of us have been largely decreased. My hon. friend, moreover, has been able to show that not only is this the case, but also with increasing the price of all those products and articles which, owing to the high prices, were going to cause so much suffering and destitution throughout the country provided this policy was adopted. Competition between our home industries has been such that we occupy the vantage ground of being able to demonstrate that never were necessaries of life and the things which are incidental to the comfort and happiness of the poor man to be obtained in Canada at a cheaper rate than is now the case. And the hon. gentleman did not venture to question this.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Yes, I did.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I did so, very strongly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman merely said that: "Assuming it to be true, the question was not whether all these articles were to-day cheaper than they were in 1878 in Canada under my Tariff, but whether we can buy them cheaper to-day in Canada than in New York," and if so, he says: "You are injuring the poor man." Let me tell the hon. gentleman that he must be hard-pressed, when he is endeavoring to controvert the fiscal policy which is calculated to foster and protect the industries of Canada, and can only say, that the way in which the poor man is injured, is not because we have not reduced the cost of goods below what they were in 1878, under his Tariff, but because prices are not as low as they are in a country where the Tariff is twice as high as ours. But let the hon. gentleman take courage and take heart. If, in a country where the duties imposed are doubly as heavy as they are in this country, you can buy cheaper, and if, under our policy, you can buy goods cheaper than was the case under his Tariff in 1878, how long will it be before you can get goods in Canada at prices greatly below those now paid for them? And the hon. gentleman will find that, while the Treasury is six millions better off, there is no industry in this country which is also not better off. He said—and I was not surprised to hear it—that he labored under very great difficulties in getting up a case against this policy. He says: "I cannot get the farmers to give me any information." The farmers are so rich and happy, and contented, and comfortable, that they would not talk to, or look at, the hon. the ex-Finance Minister at all, and I am not surprised at it. He says that the farmers were deceived. Sir, there is not a class of our people more difficult to deceive than our farmers. It is because he could not deceive the farmers of this country that the hon. gentleman is sitting where he is now. They felt that, under the hon. gentleman's policy, they did not get fair play in Canada, and they exercised their independent influence at the polls to place the hon. gentleman where he is, and to bring back into power the party who said they were determined to foster and protect and maintain Canadian interests on Canadian soil. Well, Sir, what else was my hon. friend able to show? These hon. gentlemen were very anxious about the amount paid to Sir Alexander Galt a little while ago. They said it was a terrible thing to have a High Commissioner, and consequently I was glad to learn, from the remarks made on the opening day of the Session, that the hon. leader of the Opposition had changed his mind on this point, and suggested that Canada had attained to so dignified a position that she ought to have a Minister at every civilized court in the world. But, Sir, Sir Alexander Galt, in conjunction with the Minister of Finance and the leader of the Government, have effected a financial arrangement, and what does it save? Why, Sir, we save $15,000 a year in the payments which we are now required to make to Messrs. Glyn and Baring, under the system which was under operation when hon. gentlemen opposite went out of office; and not only that, but when $35,000,000 are to be redeemed in 1885, the country will save in this one transaction, under this new arrangement, no less than $350,000. I, therefore, say that if ever there was a Finance Minister who had reason to be satisfied, and who was able to point to every industry in the country, and show that new life and vitality were given to it, and to the position of every artisan and operative in this country, and demonstrate that his position was immensely improved over what it was before, it is my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. The ex-Minister of Finance wants to know what we have done for the workmen. I have shown what we have done for the shipbuilders; I have shown what we have done for the miner, and I have shown what we have done for the farmer. It has been shown that the prices of the farmer's products have been better than ever before, and the hon. gentleman opposite (the ex-Finance Minister) impaled himself on the horns of this dilemma the other night. He said you cannot improve the price of wheat because that is regulated in Mark Lane; and yet the hon. gentleman denounced the tax in breadstuffs, including wheat, as an odious tax. I want him to establish the assertion that it is an odious tax, and that under the National Policy there is no improvement in the price of the products of the farm. Let me ask him this question: he says we have increased the farmers' burdens, and he has gone before the farmer with tears in his eyes to condemn our policy with this result: that the farmers have simply laughed at him. They have laughed at him because they knew that he had said here before, and would say here again if in power as he said the other night, that the laborer's burdens had been increased by the price of living—that everything he used he had to pay more for it. How can you increase the cost of everything consumed by the laborer, mainly consisting of farm products, without benefitting the farmer? It is just such questions we had put to him. We told him we would benefit all classes of industries in the country. We told him we would improve the condition of the farmer by a better home market. But the hon. gentleman could not understand. But now when the farmer laughs at him on account of his theories, he will know that the people hold that his former statements were baseless; that the farmer to-day gets more for every product, that is more for every product of the soil than he could have got if the policy of the late Government, of making Canadians hewers of wood and drawers of water for any other country, had been carried out as he would still have carried it out.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It will become my duty to make a few further observations in relation to the remarks made by the ex-Finance Minister in reply to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance on Friday evening last. But before I do so I have a still more painful task to perform, of referring to the mode in which the hon. gentleman replied to my hon. friend the Finance Minister. I am in the judgment of the House when I say that the gratuitous and unprovoked insult offered to my hon. friend who propounded the policy of the Government in the Budget Speech, excited the common disgust of both sides of the House. I say it to the credit of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who I believe felt as keenly the insult offered to my hon. friend, and the still greater insult offered to the dignity of Parliament, as the hon. gentlemen of this side of the House. My hon. friend the Finance Minister at a very early age engaged in commercial pursuits, and having, by industry, by integrity, by everything that men value, attained the confidence of all classes of the community in which he lived, he had the honor at a very early age to be elected the representative of the chief city of the Province of New Brunswick. That hon. gentleman so discharged his duty as to be elevated to the high and honorable position of Prime Minister of that Province, and he came to this Parliament in 1867 enjoying the respect of all classes of the Province in which he was born. In this great arena he was able to take such a high position as warranted his being advanced to the elevated position he now occupies, and, at a later period, he entered upon the highest social position in New Brunswick, amid the hearty applause of both sides in that Province, who vied with each other in terms of friendly reception upon its being announced that he was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick. The colleagues of the hon. gentleman opposite in public declared that had they had the selection of a gentleman to fill that high office, there was no man they would have rather asked to occupy that position than my hon. friend. Well, at the close of his period of action as Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, he was invited by hon. gentlemen opposite to accept a second term.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No, he was not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It would require better authority of contradiction than the ex-Finance Minister enjoys in this House or out of it, to cast doubt on my statement. I say again that the colleagues of the ex-Finance Minister, when he was Finance Minister, approached my hon. friend to induce him to accept the second term of the Governorship of that Province at their hands. What did he do? Why it was a position of ease; it was a position worthy of any gentleman in this House, or out of it, to occupy. But he looked at his country, and saw the condition of public affairs; he saw the prostration of this country; he saw the lamentable position to which his successor had brought the financial affairs of the country; and, regardless of his own ease and comfort, he threw himself back into the political field and was again sent to this Parliament by the chief city of New Brunswick. Well, having been clothed with the important duties he now discharges, he returned to that constituency, and, by acclamation, was again sent back here to deal with the public affairs of this country. How has he dealt with them? Handling the most important questions that could be confided to any member of any administration, at a time the most critical in the history in Canada, he has been so enabled to deal with those great questions as to empower him to stand in the proud and triumphant position he now occupies, and to show the House that no Government in the country, or out of it, ever occupied a position more triumphant in relation to the questions of public policy which he has propounded. And, Sir, that speech, one which I need not say to the hon. gentlemen who heard it, was of transcendent ability—a speech that would have done honor to any representative assembly in the world—that speech, I say, the courtesy of which only equalled the ability with which it was delivered, was received by the ex-Finance Minister—how? Why, Sir, in a manner that, I have no hesitation in saying, caused his supporters and the hon. gentlemen who sit around him, to blush with shame.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now, Sir, suppose that, instead of the record that my hon. friend possesses; suppose that he had stood in this House in the position of a man who, unable to make his own way, born in the lap of luxury, had had all the advantage that wealth can bestow, and had been sent to a great University on the other side of the water; and suppose that he had come back without high honors and distinction that such a man, if there was anything in him, ought to have come back with, had come back without either honor or distinction; supposing that having returned he had undertaken to qualify himself to practice in a learned profession, and after years of struggling was obliged to abandon it because he was not able to reach the Bar, and suppose, making use of his wealth, he had been able to obtain a constituency, and finding that the party with which he was associated knew him too well to entrust him with high and responsible duties, he had abandoned his party, turned his back upon his friends and went over to the enemy and made common cause with them, and by his political tergiversation obtained a position amongst his opponents of a life time that he had never been able to acquire among his friends; suppose that had been the position of my hon. friend, and suppose that having obtained the lofty position of Minister of Finance, instead of discharging the high duties that devolved upon him in the way my hon. friend has done, his first act was to put into the mouth of the Governor General a statement that was devoid of truth—

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Suppose that for political and party purposes he had asked the representative of Her Majesty in Parliament assembled to declare that the financial condition of this country was such from the inability of the revenue to meet the expenditure, that a serious deficit was inevitable—

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. So it was.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That a serious deficit would follow unless increased taxation was laid upon the shoulders of the people—

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. So it was.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Suppose that after that hon. gentleman had ventured to make that statement, he had supported it, by attempting to force a balance in the Public Accounts, to the extent of half a million of money; suppose that my hon. friend stood convicted—and I use the term deliberately—stood convicted before this Parliament, of having put chargeable to revenue $545,000 that was voted by Parliament for capital account, spent by Parliament for capital account, was transferred by the late Finance Minister to force a balance on the other side; suppose that after all that was done my hon. friend had been unable to accomplish his object, and that it had remained clear as noon day that after this half million had been carried over, he still stood in the position of having a proved and established surplus at the time he had declared there would be a deficit; suppose that would be the position—

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I deny every word of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does he deny having declared that the ordinary expenditure of the country demanded a large increase in the volume of taxation to be put upon the people of this country? I have, under my hand here, the hon. gentleman's own testimony, and there was not a word of truth in it. The same hon. gentleman that declared that there had been $1,500,000 deficit on the 1st July, 1874, the same hon. gentleman that declared that, in 1875, the ordinary expenditure of the country would have involved a deficit of $2,000,000, committed himself to this statement which I will read, and then I will leave the House to judge how far that hon. gentleman's statement will be regarded as a contradiction to any statement that any hon. gentleman may make in this House. I read from an Order in Council. What does it say? That that $3,000,000 of taxes was imposed to meet a deficit.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. You should say, were imposed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am much obliged to my hon. friend. I am afraid I shall be charged with being ungrammatical. Does it say these $3,000,000 of taxes were imposed for the purpose of meeting a prospective deficit in the ordinary expenditure? No, Sir, but the hon. gentleman here stands committed, with every colleague that he had in the Government, to the statement that every dollar of that was imposed for another and a different purpose, and that was to meet the expenditure that would be involved by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I will read from an Order in Council, to the truth of which every one of those gentlemen is pledged, of the 8th July, 1874, after the close of this very year in which the hon. gentleman declared that it was necessary to impose high additional taxation in order to enable the revenue to cover the expenditure. On that day, this Minute of Council is signed and sent to the same Governor General that had been asked to declare, in his place in Parliament, that a large taxation was required to meet the ordinary expenditure of the country. It says:

"In order to enable the Government to carry out the proposals which it was hoped British Columbia would have accepted, the average rate of taxation was raised, at the late Session, about 15 per cent.; Customs duties being raised from 15 to 17½ per cent., and the Excise duties on spirits and tobacco, a corresponding rate, both involving additional taxation exceeding $3,000,000 in the transactions of the year."

Now, the hon. gentleman ventured the statement that this taxation was required to meet an impending deficit, and yet he declares that more than $3,000,000—$3,000,000 was all he asked the House to vote for the purpose he then stated—and more than $3,000,000 was voted by this Parliament for the express purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No; it is no such thing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now, suppose that my hon. friend, after placing himself in that position, had gone a step further, and suppose he had been entrusted with the public debentures of the country for the purpose of floating a loan in the Imperial market, and suppose my hon. friend, instead of placing the debentures of Canada in the most favorable position he could, and by public competition obtaining the very highest price they would command, and bringing back to this country $500,000 more than the hon. gentleman obtained for a like amount of debentures—I say, suppose, instead of doing that, he had gone there and quietly sat down and fixed a price, set a fixed term of years, and had sold these debentures to parties who, as I have stated before on the two occasions on which the hon. gentleman made this secret loan he had sold them to his friends, and had enabled them to stand in the position to-day of being richer to the extent of $4,745,000, than they would have been before making the hon. gentleman's acquaintance—

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Now, I say if my hon. friend, instead of occupying the position he occupies in this House and country, had his reputation tarnished with transactions such as this—

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that then there might have been some excuse for the arrogant and insolent tone which the hon. gentleman ventured to use toward my hon. friend. Now, he holds that the Speaker of the Senate, my hon. friend's colleague, is a very high authority, and he quoted him the other night as a great authority, as if the opinion of the Speaker of the Senate was to be accepted as conclusive, and he puts him in the Hansard as having settled that question by his ipse dixit. Now, Sir, I will quote the authority to which he pays such deference, and I will see what that hon. gentleman, known to the members of this House and the country at large as a man of the highest standing and character—known to be a man thoroughly versed in all these banking, mercantile and monetary transactions—has to say of the ex-Minister of Finance, and we will see whether that hon. gentleman is as ready to accept the authority of the hon. Speaker of the Senate as he was when he quoted him against me the other night:

"In the increase of the debt stated above, $42,811,202.32, of course is included the sum of $1,520,833, that being substantially the portion of the loan of 1876 ($12,166,666) which Sir Richard Cartwright allowed as discount to the lenders, and paid for brokerage, &c."

I may say that my hon. friend, the Speaker of the Senate, in using this language, is only dealing with the smaller loan of £2,500,000 sterling, and not with the larger loan of £4,000,000, which was still worse. He goes on:

"While the Dominion did not receive this sum of $1,520,833, or any part of it, yet interest, sinking fund, &c., have to be paid thereon, amounting to about $70,000 a year, till the maturity of the loan in 1906. (The interest alone at 4 per cent. exceeds $60,000 a year). To have to pay $70,000 a year for 30 years for that which the Dominion did not receive, seems a grievous hardship, but Sir Richard maintains that it was a model loan."

An hon. MEMBER. A muddled loan.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, perhaps it is a misprint for that. He goes on to say:

"But, in the opinion of men who do not belong to their model school of finance, it was an improvident and mysterious loan."

Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell us what a mysterious loan is?

"I say mysterious, because it was sold without competition, on terms which reduced the net proceeds which Canada received to about 87½ cents on the dollar, and, further, because Mr. Mackenzie's Administration refused to make public the names of the allottees or beneficiaries."

And now we find that the allottees or beneficiaries are only a trifle under one million pounds sterling better off for these two loans, which they negotiated with the hon. the ex-Finance Minister of the Dominion. Now, suppose my hon. friend stood in that position, there might be some slight ground, some show of reason, why any hon. gentleman in this House might feel that he need not be too choice in the language he was throwing across the floor when dealing with such a man and under such circumstances. But, I say, Sir, and I say it advisedly, that there is not a man in Canada who has the bad eminence that the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance has, as one who has lowered the tone of debate in this House and out of it, without the slightest cause; there is not a man in Canada, and I say it advisedly, who has placed himself in a position of more unenviable notoriety than has that hon. gentleman by the coarse, insulting and ungentlemanly language which he uses in this House and out of it, and I will prove the truth of what I say. And, Sir, the hon. gentleman is not particular to a shade as to the occasion on which he uses such language. What would he have thought of my hon. friend if he had gone to London and over his own signature committed himself solemnly to the statement that all the expenditure which the Government of this country had undertaken was wise and legitimate expenditure—an expenditure in the public interest; that it had all been admirably calculated to promote the best interests of Canada, and had then come back with the ink barely dry on his record, on the solemn record to which he had committed himself, had gone on a public platform and denounced the men who had incurred that expenditure, which he solemnly declared was a wise and judicious expenditure, and one which was in the interests of the country?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Not a bit.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not a bit? Then I shall read the hon. gentleman's own language, for I have it here:

"This entire debt has been incurred for legitimate objects of public utility."

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. But not wisely or judiciously.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not done with the hon. gentleman yet:

"The indirect advantage from these public works has been found in the remarkable rapidity with which the commerce and the material prosperity of the Dominion have been developed. The revenue has shown a continuous surplus during each year since Confederation."

Now, what will be said of a gentleman, who having signed with his own hand as the hon. Finance Minister of Canada, stating to the people of England that they could rely on that as being an honest and a true statement of the affairs of this country—what shall be said of him when he comes back to Canada, and on a public platform uses the foul language that the men who incurred that expenditure had exhibited brutal ignorance, or that their conduct was that of a drunken crew scuttling the ship they were about to leave? And what was his excuse when he was charged with such conduct? As I have described, he says that the exigencies of a public man are very great.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I said nothing of the kind.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He said that sometimes we have to exhibit a silver shield and sometimes a brazen one. I think most of the hon. members of this House, who have heard the hon. gentleman, will have come to the conclusion that he mostly relies on the brazen shield, for a more brazen transaction or a transaction which, to use the words which he is so ready to use himself, stamps the man who was guilty of it with undying ignominy in the eyes of every honorable and high-minded man, was never perpetrated in this country. And what does the hon. gentleman venture to say in the very speech which he delivered the other evening? He says that the statements of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture—his published official statements—are utterly unreliable. And what more does he venture to say of a man who, he knows, stands as high as a man of honor and character in this House as any man that can be found in the wide domain of Canada? He uses the term in reference to the conduct of that gentleman—“deliberate and fraudulent intent.” What shall be said of a man who ventures to use such language as that, of any hon. gentleman of this House, and especially by a man who has such a record as the hon. gentleman himself? What shall be said of a man who applies to a Minister of the Crown, my right hon. friend who sits beside me (Sir John A. Macdonald), such language as that he was “insolent and unscrupulous,” or applies to him the term “deserved ignominy?” He said that the right hon. gentleman was driven from power in deserved ignominy.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no man in this House who should blush more to make such a statement than the hon. gentleman. What did he do? He spent five long years standing in the position of a Minister of the Crown, denouncing my right hon. friend in the foulest and most unworthy terms that our language supplies. He went from platform to platform outside of this House, and fairly out-Heroded Herod in relation to the language he used inside the House; and with what result? With the result that when the great electorate—the great, independent, intelligent electorate of Canada—were called upon to decide between my right hon. friend and the man who traduced him, they consigned one to the ignominy which he deserved, and gave to the other the highest and proudest position that a Prime Minister of Canada ever occupied. If the hon. gentleman was capable of learning anything—which I regret to say, I find he is too obtuse to do—he would have learned that his declarations of opinion are utterly discredited by the people of Canada. He would have learned, Sir, that he had it thrown back in his teeth that all the foul language he had used had recoiled upon his own head, and that he had sunk, while my hon. friend had become elevated to the proud position he now occupies. If only for its uselessness, one would suppose that he would have learned by this time the folly of giving vent to such utterances. The hon. gentleman says—and it is a very striking illustration of the bent of his mind—that it may be all very well for the Minister of Finance to place under obligation these millionaires, that the money may be found very convenient at times of a general election. That shows the bent of the hon. gentleman's mind. Suppose, Sir, that my hon. friend had stood convicted, as that hon. gentleman stands convicted—and I use the term again advisedly—of having in the teeth of the statute abused his position in the absence of the hon. Minister of Customs, by taking surreptitiously from the public Treasury $59,000 before a general election, and giving it to a great corporation. Is it any wonder, Sir, that men should come to the conclusion that Ministers of the Crown may forget the high position they occupy to such an extent as to become the beneficiaries—not to the tune of $5,000,000 to friends abroad, but here in Canada, to lay a great corporation under the obligation of having received, in the teeth of the statute, $59,000 of public money. Now, Sir, I am glad that the painful task of showing that hon. gentleman what my hon. friend has not done—what his record is not—is ended, and that the insult, the gross, unpardonable insult flung across the House by the hon. gentleman, was as undeserved as it was gratuitous; and, Sir, I will now pass on to notice a few more of the very remarkable observations made by the hon. gentleman in reply to my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman, with his very stilted phraseology, and his wheeling around and throwing himself into a great variety of attitudes, brought to my recollection a circumstance that occurred on the occasion of his first Budget Speech. I confess that the hon. gentleman has improved a little in his style of public address since then. There were some comments in the lobby on that occasion; and, as you will remember, the hon. gentleman was not only very stilted, but very mechanical; and one gentleman said to another in the lobby: “He seemed to bounce around and jerk around like one of Mitchell's revolving lighthouses.” “Yes,” said the other, “but without the light.” When I saw the hon. gentleman wheeling around to his supporters, it reminded me of that occasion; and when I tried to follow him, I saw that the hon. gentleman had no argument to address to the House, and I found that it was the revolving lighthouse without the light. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, in the outset, took my hon. friend to task for want of economy in preparing his estimates. Want of economy in preparing his estimates! What did the hon. gentleman mean? Does he forget that the estimated expenditures of the first year that he was Finance Minister are now recorded on the public records of this country, and that he asked this Parliament to vote no less than $26,600,000? And yet, in the year 1882, he wants to know why his economy was not followed. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman asked for no less than $1,300,000 more than the largest expenditure that Canada had ever had. I know that the Public Accounts state that the expenditure of 1873-74 was $23,316,316; but it is not true. That is the statement in which the hon. gentleman forced the balance. That is the statement which contains half a million of money, transferred by the hon. gentleman's right hand from capital account to the charges on revenue, contrary to the manner in which it was voted by Parliament, for the purpose of swelling the balance and making the excuse for his statement that there would be a deficit on the first of the following July. And that matter, Sir, stands on record, under the pen of one of the officers in the hon. gentleman's own Department, the accountant. And what else? There are $59,000 of Customs refunds of the former year, and, if that had been an honest charge, it could not have gone in there as an expenditure of that year, which the hon. gentleman knows right well. It was a statement of an amount of money drawn in the teeth of the statute out of the Treasury of Canada, and handed over to a wealthy corporation on the eve of an election, and the hon. gentleman seems to understand all the weight and importance of such a transaction as that. Well, Sir, the next fault he has to find with my hon. friend, is this—he wants to know if being two or three million dollars astray in the estimated revenue he is to receive is not evidence of the want of ability in the hon. the Finance Minister. What does the hon. gentleman say? He says my hon. friend took a leap in the dark. Well, he came out the right side up. The hon. gentleman took a leap in the dark, but he came out in the ditch—that is the difference. My hon. friend knows that it would be impossible—not in the case of an ordinary change, but in a revolution in the Tariff, such as was the change my hon. friend made—to estimate exactly what he would receive. But he came out with the balance on the right side—he came out with a surplus. The hon. gentleman took his leap in the dark, and he came out, at the end of three years, with a deficit of $7,500,000. That is the difference. The hon. gentleman talks about leaps in the dark. Why, the hon. gentleman, with the Tariff, and with the Trade Returns in his hands, and with the experience of the past, brought down his Estimates here—and what were they? His estimated expenditure was $26,600,000, and he was only $2,987,000 astray. The hon. gentleman declared that he would receive from that Tariff of his own concoction $25,250,000, and he received $22,507,000, or $2,642,000 less. And yet he stands up here, with the brazen shield as usual, and taunts my hon. friend with errors in his estimate, and with having got more money by his leap in the dark than he expected. The hon. gentleman's next charge is that the expenditure had swollen double—from $13,500,000 to $26,600,000. Well, Sir, what has the hon. gentleman to say to that? The expenditure had swollen from $13,500,000 to $23,500,000 at the time the hon. gentleman came into power, according to his own statement on Friday night. Yet, what was his first step? Did he say that was enough for him? Big as it was swollen it was too small for him. Big as it was swollen his first step was to come down and ask the House for $3,000,000 more in order to carry on the ordinary government of the country. Under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman would act wisely if he said little about it. He declared in England that the increased expenditure was of such a character that it had greatly advanced the best interests of the Dominion, yet the hon. gentleman now declared that such increase was unnecessary; because if it does not mean that it means nothing, for if the increase was necessary for public purposes, then the Minister of Finance would not be warranted, if he failed to bring down such estimates to Parliament; if, on the other hand, they were beyond what they should have been, then the Finance Minister should defend himself for coming to Parliament in 1874 and asking for $26,600,000. The hon. gentleman's first estimate was only $400,000 less than the statement now on the Table of the House; yet he charges us with extravagance. I now desire to direct the attention of the House to a very important statement made by the hon. member on Friday night. He said:

"Immediately on the introduction of that policy, as every one acquainted with western Canada knows, there was a large and lamentable exodus of many of the best farmers of the western region, not, I am sorry to say, to our own North-West, but to Dakota, Minnesota, and other portions of the United States."

Who is to blame for that? The hon. gentleman bows his head: he is. I am glad to see that the hon. gentleman is quite conscious who is to blame.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. You are to blame.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will show the hon. gentleman who is responsible for it. I will direct attention, while on this point, to another remark made by the hon. gentleman, as it relates to the same subject. He said:

"If ever an impudent assertion was made on the floor of this House, if ever there was a case of effrontery in this world, it was when that hon. gentleman rose in his place and dared to say that the Opposition were responsible for the fact that so many Canadians had gone to Minnesota and Dakota, in place of going to the Canadian North-West."

I am in the judgment of the House as to whether hon. gentlemen opposite for years have not been decrying and denouncing everything Canadian.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am in the judgment of the House, of both sides of it, as to whether those hon. gentlemen have not, both in their places in Parliament and on the public platform, done all that men could do to cause men to turn their backs on Canada and take up their residence in the United States. I will read a statement made by the ex-Finance Minister, and if he can find any advertisement published in the United States more calculated to draw people from Canada to that country, where the hon. gentleman is not known but only has the reputation of having been a Finance Minister, then I should like to see it. What did the hon. gentleman say here in his place in Parliament on Friday night? He ventured to use such language as this with respect to his country:

"Why, Sir, I tell them to-day that Canada is a country in which no man is free to buy or to sell, to eat or to drink, to travel or to stand still, without paying toll to some extortioner or other."

Is that calculated to draw immigrants to Canada. That is the language that he and his friends have used in expressing their opinions of this country. I say there is no intelligent man who places confidence in, or believes in the statements of

hon. gentlemen opposite, who would not turn his back at the first opportunity on this country and remove to any other country in the world. That is the position which the hon. gentleman occupies, and that is the kind of work that he and those around him have been engaged in doing for years in the interest of Canada. Despite all their efforts, they have worked in vain. Under the financial policy of my hon. friend the Finance Minister, enacted into law by Parliament, all the efforts of the hon. gentlemen opposite have proved to be futile, and to have only recoiled on themselves, and they will only have the result of teaching an intelligent people, keenly alive to their own interests, who are the men in this country upon whose statements they may place reliance, and who are the men upon whose management of public affairs they may wisely depend. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman entertained us with his novel theory respecting the balance of trade. We have been accustomed to hear a great deal from hon. gentlemen opposite about the United States and the statesmen of that great country, who have proved themselves to be about as successful in the management of financial affairs as those of any country in the world. I know of no instance in which the financial management of the Government has been crowned with such remarkable results as in the United States. What did President Grant say on the question of balance of trade? Did he say that the more the balance of trade was against the United States the better? President Grant, in his Message of the 6th of December, 1876, said:

"Taxes have been reduced, within the last seven years, nearly three hundred millions of dollars, and the National Debt has been reduced, in the same time, over four hundred and thirty-five millions of dollars. By refunding the six per cent. bonded debt for bonds bearing 5 and 4½ per cent. interest, respectively, the annual interest has been reduced from over one hundred and thirty millions of dollars, in 1869, to but little over one hundred millions of dollars in 1876."

President Grant then adds the boast that the balance of trade has been changed from $130,000,000 against the United States in 1869, to $120,000,000 in their favor in 1876. The hon. gentleman says that it is perfectly obvious, if you send $60,000 or $70,000 away and receive back $90,000, you make money by the exchange. He forgets that the balance has to be paid in certain cases. I need not say, with respect to England, that no comparison can be drawn, because it is the great money centre of the world, and occupies an entirely different position from countries generally. The hon. gentleman says we have increased the cost of living, and gives the reason "that on every yard of coarse tweed the poor man uses, the Tariff compels him to pay 25 or 30 or 40 per cent. and perhaps more, than in 1878." Well, did the hon. gentleman not notice the statement made by the hon. the Finance Minister with respect to the wool trade of this country; did he fail to perceive that the amount of wool imported was reduced and a less quantity exported, while, at the same time, a greater quantity was used in this country, and the consumption of wool was increased by nearly $3,000,000 during the year? What does that mean? Why, it means that the wise policy of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance gives such encouragement to the manufacture of these coarser cloths which the poor men require, that the amount of wool consumed in their manufacture is 3,000,000 lbs. over and above that of any previous year. That ought to be an explanation to the hon. gentleman, that it is quite possible for a tariff to be so constructed, in relation to the industries of a country, as to foster the manufacture of these articles within the country, so as, by competition, to furnish the people with them, as my hon. friend showed they had been furnished, at a lower cost, while giving profitable employment to our operators and consuming the wool grown in the country. The hon. gentleman is very anxious about the lumberman; he wants to know why we do not give the lumberman a bounty. I have passed over a great deal of what the hon. gentleman said, because it seems to require no remark. There may be a point in it, but his sentences are so involved that it is difficult to discover any point. He wants to know if the fisherman has bounties why not the lumberman as well. Yet the lumber trade, according to his own showing, was never in a more flourishing condition than it is to-day, and the hon. gentleman will find it as difficult to get information from the lumbermen as from the farmers. The reason is, they have no such information to give as he is looking for. There is a lumberman behind me of high standing and character who is as well acquainted with the lumber trade as any man in the country. Let the hon. gentleman look at his books and he will find no cause of complaint. He will find that the lumbermen are suffering from no reverse. On the contrary, so flourishing has been the lumber trade in the past year that $12,000,000 worth were actually exported over the previous year. As for the farmers, he has admitted that they are so prosperous, owing to the prices of everything they raise that it is quite unnecessary to refer to them. That hon. gentleman must have another personal fling at my hon. friend. He is very anxious there should be no nepotism in this country, that Ministers of the Crown should show an utter disregard of their own relatives, that when they make friends they should make them abroad. That when they wanted support of the great companies that was all right, but no Minister of the Crown should pay any attention to his own connections. I think, if the hon. gentleman would look into the Public Accounts, he will find a few pensioners of his own name and connections entered in them. It is, therefore, not very safe for him to fling a stone in that direction. He complains also of the mode in which the Civil Service has been dealt with in making improper promotions. I ask the hon. gentleman to take up the record of this Government and find one case analogous to the mode in which promotion was abused and the introduction of parties into the public service abused under his Government. Let him refer to the Post Office Department, and he will find the case of a stranger, not belonging to the country at all, who was brought in and appointed over the heads of civil servants, men of character, standing and intelligence, and able to teach that gentleman his duty. Yet this stranger was forced in over their heads at a salary which they could not acquire after twenty years service. Let the hon. gentleman then go to the Customs Department, and he will find that for a supporter of one of his hon. colleagues the same operation was performed; and gentlemen who had served long years in the public service were taught the melancholy lesson that no matter how well they performed their duties they were to remain in the back ground whenever a Minister had a friend or favorite to push over their heads. In the Public Works Department a still more flagrant and notorious instance of political favoritism occurred. A man brought in from the outside was pushed from pillar to post until he was landed, after three or four years service, in the position of Deputy Minister, when these hon. gentlemen went out of power. When the hon. gentleman finds three cases under this Administration to compare with those I have mentioned, he may fairly venture to throw his taunts across the floor of this House at the mode in which promotions are made under this Government. The hon. gentleman taunted my hon. friend with having framed a Tariff most disastrous to the shipbuilding industry. Where did the hon. gentleman get his authority? Does he not know that there has been a keen competition going on between iron and wooden ships, in which the latter have been worsted? Does he not know that all he could do himself to strike down the shipbuilding industry he did; and that although we did succeed in staying his arm to some extent, it was not until we came back to power, that, by our giving a drawback to the extent of the duty imposed on the materials used in shipbuilding, that industry had any fair play.

Let me read the hon. gentleman a statement from the Wind sor Mail, County of Hants, Province of Nova Scotia. That statement reads:

"During the year just closed Hants County built twenty-six vessels measuring 19,044 tons. Never but once in the history of the county was there such a large amount of shipping built as during the past year. The total number of vessels on our list is 252, measuring 163,144 tons. More than half of these are barques and ships, nearly all of which are engaged in the foreign trade. The amount of capital invested in this country during the past year alone is not far short of $600,000, and the total value of the shipping of the county amounts to considerably over $4,000,000. There was built last year in this county nearly one ton of shipping for every inhabitant, and the total amount of shipping on the list would average seven tons for every man, woman and child in the county."

Yet the hon. gentleman says the shipbuilding industry is suffering. He wants to know why we are going to relieve the fishermen. He cannot get this bounty for the fishermen out of his mind. It seems to disturb the hon. gentleman. But I can tell him there will be no such difficulty with the poor and hardy fishermen. They will not whine over this bounty as the hon. gentleman is inclined to do. He says the Minister of Finance proposes to relieve the fishermen of his native Province and of the Maritime Provinces. But what is he going to do with all these numerous classes of people such as clergymen, schoolmasters, clerks and others, whose income is to a certain extent fixed? Let him go to any clergyman, and he will find the same difficulty as to the information he wants as he finds with the farmers. But, Sir, the clergyman will tell him that, under this fiscal policy, the congregation that was struggling, unable to do as they wished to do, to sustain the church to which they belonged, they have now ample means to give their clergyman the comforts he and his family requires. When he goes to the schoolmaster, the schoolmaster will tell him: "Why, Sir, you have mistaken me if you think I am an object of sympathy. The number of children who can be sent to school now—whose parents formerly were struggling with poverty, unable to clothe them—is such as to give me ample reward." The demand for teachers, like the demand for knowledge, like the demand for luxuries, has grown just as the revenue of the country has grown, grown just as the industries have grown, and just as everything that is in the interest of Canada has grown from the time the hon. gentleman was deprived of the power of longer throwing his blight over all the industries of this country from end to end. In the matter of clerks, before, while the hon. gentleman was in power every third man you met wanted to know if you could not give him some little office that would give him $200 or $300 a year. He would say, I am an accomplished accountant, a good writer, and have a thorough knowledge of grammar, which the hon. ex-Finance Minister honors so highly, but I can get no employment. If you want a man possessing these attainments to-day you have to search for him, because the demand for that kind of labor, created by the industries that have grown up, has made it almost impossible to get such men who previously searched in vain for employment. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman made a very remarkable admission the other day. He said: "I feel much more disposed to blush for the degradation of Canada"—that is the language with which the hon. gentleman invites people to come to this country—"and to tremble for the consequences hereafter." Sir, I do not wonder the hon. gentleman trembles. I should be greatly surprised to see him blush. He is much more in the brazen shield line than in the blushing line. What is the dread hereafter he trembles to meet? It is the next election, Sir. I am told already, that not only is there a revolt among the hon. gentleman's supporters in this House—and I am not surprised that they should be anxious for him to relinquish the position of financial spokesman of the party—but that his constituents are equally willing to let him make his bow and give them an opportunity of being better represented. I am not surprised that the outlook in his old constituency, where he is best known and from which he was dismissed by the verdict of the people at the last election—notwithstanding his boasted wealth he was compelled to abandon that constituency, and he trembles now lest he may not find it easy to get back into the House at all. The hon. gentleman may find the electors of this country share the sentiment he uttered the other night, that a Minister—and, of course, he who aims at being a Minister—should be like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion. The hon. gentleman told us that he prays sometimes. Let me recommend him when he does so to use that model and best of prayers in which he will find: "Lead us not into temptation;" a prayer that he may never again be Finance Minister, and never have the chance of repeating his operation on the money markets of the world. That is a prayer in which the intelligent electors of this country will most devoutly join. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman concluded his somewhat vague and stilted address with the following statement:—

"For those men may boast of their great majority here to-day, they may boast of their full Treasury, they may boast of their devoted supporters, but I can recollect some ten years ago when these gentlemen were just as insolent, just as arrogant as they are to-day, when they had just as strong a majority behind them, just as full a Treasury, when they were prepared to be just as unscrupulous in maintaining their places as they are to-day, yet in twelve months after that time I saw them scattered and driven into deserved ignominy. The fate that befel them in 1873 may well befall them in 1883, and I see signs and tokens, not a few, that if they do not take care, and if they do not mend their ways, that fate will assuredly befall them again."

Now, Sir, does the hon. gentleman not see that, just in proportion as he can sustain the charge of our being dismissed from power with deserved ignominy, he is heaping a greater amount of it upon himself. Does the hon. gentleman not see that it is bad enough for a party, strong in power, with a great majority in this House behind them, as they had in 1878, to go to the people against a high-minded honorable set of gentlemen on the other side, and sustain an overwhelming defeat? But, Sir, what shall be said of men who, after the people of this country have had an opportunity of weighing them in the balance, say of them: "For heaven's sake give us back anything rather than let them again have control of the Government." If we are open to those charges, what was the hon. gentleman's conduct to induce the people of this country, by an overwhelming majority, to say: "Get you gone, and let better men take your places." If we are bad, what must you be, who, by the verdict of the intelligent electors of this country on September 18th, 1878, were consigned to the humiliating position you occupy now, and placed in your position my right hon. friend and his colleagues whose services to the country were known. I would, therefore, recommend the hon. gentleman not to venture upon that line of argument again. I would like the hon. gentleman to tell me what signs of the times he sees. I am afraid they are visions; and I think the hon. gentleman must be asleep when these visions come over him. I do not see how any waking man can see any such signs or tokens. As I said before, history is philosophy, teaching by experience; and what does the history of that day and of this teach the people. Why, Sir, when a change of Government is imminent, when the public mind is on the waver, when a Ministry are shaken in the public confidence, there are signs of the times. There are tokens, and they are unmistakable. Do you see them now? Let me draw the hon. gentleman's attention to portentous signs of the times that point with unerring fidelity, in free countries such as ours, to the direction the public mind is taking. What was the position of the hon. gentlemen opposite when they had been in power for three years and four months? It is true they went to the country with a great majority; but we told them it would be swept from their feet, and I gave them the reasons

why. They were plain and distinctive reasons which, under parliamentary forms of Government, have been found to be conclusive upon such a question as this. I said: "Look abroad over the face of the country; remember the great majority you had and tell me where it is now." I showed them that, out of sixty-one Government seats that had become vacant, they had only been enabled, including the Ministerial elections—a dozen of them or something like it—to elect forty-seven supporters. I showed them with reference to the twenty-six seats of the Opposition that had become vacant, that we had been able to elect out of them, and out of the seats which had become vacant on the Government side, no less than forty. So that at the end of four years we stood in this House twenty-eight votes on a division better than when the Government was formed. These were the signs of the times—the unmistakable signs of the times; and, Sir, when the then Government went to the country we realized them to the fullest extent, the overwhelming verdict of the people confirming the verdict of the by-elections as it almost invariably does. But what is the position of gentlemen opposite to-day? Thirty-four seats have been vacant on the Government side, and out of those thirty-four how many have we won? Thirty-two, Sir, and hon. gentlemen opposite, out of thirty-four seats and in three years and four months have taken exactly two seats from us. What more? Twelve seats on the Opposition side have been vacant. Of course a great many could not become vacant because the Opposition is so small numerically. But twelve seats on that side have been vacant, and out of those twelve we have taken six. So that we stand, to-day, giving them the benefit of the two seats they carried out of the thirty-four that became vacant on our side, eight votes stronger on a division, in consequence of the by-elections, than we were on the day that the General Election was over. I ask the hon. gentleman what, under these circumstances, he thinks the signs of the times point to? I tell the hon. gentleman this—and I have said it elsewhere as well as here—that so long as the people of Canada are compelled to look forward to the administration of its financial affairs by the ex-Minister of Finance of this country, we are safe. I tell the hon. gentleman that the worst sign of the times for us would be his retirement into private life, because it would give his party an opportunity it does not at present possess. I trust he will not do anything so much at variance with our interests. But, as I remarked, at the end of three years and four months we have a majority of ninety members in this House, at our back—a majority strengthened, as I have said, by the free will of the sovereign, independent people of this country; and we are sustained, to an extent that no Government can expect to be sustained, because there are a variety of things—for instance, disappointed parties looking for a great deal from a Government, who naturally cannot have their expectations realized—which cause Governments to suffer occasional defeats. We, however, stand in this position: that we have the assurance, not only that the sovereign electors endorse, from end to end of Canada, the policy of this Administration, but that they recognise that, under that wise and judicious policy, the blight that fell upon the country under the Administration of the hon. gentlemen opposite has been removed, and that the true interests of every class of the population is involved in maintaining that great policy to which this Government has committed itself, and which has proved so eminently beneficial to the people of Canada.

Mr. CAMERON (South Huron), moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Before that motion is pressed—and I beg pardon of the hon. gentlemen for speaking to the motion of adjournment, though it is my right to do so—I wish to say something with respect to some remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. Now, I do not hold it worth my while though the rules of the House would permit it, to follow that hon. gentleman. I am not going to contradict him, but I am going to expose him. In the hearing of the House a very short time ago, that hon. gentleman took upon himself to say that I had misquoted Sir Henry Tyler with regard to the coal duty. Now, I have here the veritable words used by that gentleman at the meeting of the Grand Trunk Railway shareholders on the 6th of October, in the city of London. We will see what Sir Henry Tyler did say with respect to this same coal duty :

“ There was also a considerable rise in the cost of materials, of labor and of fuel ; and I am sorry to say that this was very much in consequence of the fiscal policy of the Dominion Government. That policy makes everything which a poor man requires dearer for him to purchase, and in consequence of that policy he requires higher wages in order to be enabled to exist. I have repeatedly spoken in this room as to the duty which is placed upon fuel. I cannot conceive anything more unwise in a nation like Canada, that has to import a great part of its fuel, and wishes to encourage its manufactures and to encourage its railways, than to place a duty upon the article of coal.”

Does the House, the press, and the country, want any better evidence than the statement I have just read, that in no possible circumstance in which the Minister of Railways can be placed is he able to adhere to the facts of the case. There is a sample ; there is proof that he is not. Every gentleman heard him say I had misquoted Sir Henry Tyler. There are Sir Henry Tyler's own words in reply. I do not expect to see the hon. gentleman blush, but I think that his friends, followers and leaders will blush—not for the discredit in which he is involved, but for the inconceivable stupidity which has enabled me to make such an exposure of his error. I forgot to say that in that same document I found a quotation from the report of superintendent on fuel ; and the hon. gentleman used the passage showing he had seen the speech, had examined it in detail, and deliberately suppressed the portion to which I alluded. I quote from Herepath's Railway News, the best authority on all railway subjects. Now, I come to the question which the hon. gentleman alluded to, in regard to which he made some surprising assertions, which he dare not put in plainer language, as to the mode in which I administered these several loans I was charged with negotiating in England. With respect to the mode in which the loans were placed on the market, the course followed was this : in the first place, I adopted the mode pursued by Sir Alexander Galt, Sir Francis Hincks and Sir John Rose, one and all infinitely better authorities as to the wisdom of the course I adopted than the Minister of Railways, the Minister of Finance, and all their colleagues and supporters put together. As to the result it is perfectly well known, to the House and hon. gentlemen, that Sir Francis Hincks, at any rate, may be depended upon as an impartial judge in my case. It is known that I took grievous objection to his entering into the Ministry of the Department of the Interior, therefore I may appeal to the publicly expressed testimony of Sir Francis Hincks—a very good judge on those subjects—as to the manner in which I placed those loans on the market. I obtained as high a price as possible, and any gentleman who wishes to see Sir Francis Hincks statements can find them in detail in the Journal of Commerce for the last several years. I may remark that when I first went into the London market I found our Canadian securities at 5 per cent. I was the first man who succeeded in floating a loan at 4 per cent., and I rendered a considerable service to the public of Canada by so doing. But I say more : the hon. gentleman insinuates there was something mysterious about these loans—that there was some illicit advantage to some or other persons in regard to them. I tell him this—that every farthing of the money paid in or about those loans passed, not through my hands, but through the hands of the financial agents of this country, Messrs. Glyn, Baring and Rose ; that if there was any unfair or illicit advantage to any one it was given by those gentlemen. And if the Minister of Railways, or any of his colleagues, asserts that I betrayed the interests of Canada in these matters, they will have to make the same humble apology to those gentlemen which they had to make to my friend the Hon. Donald A. Smith. The House has not forgotten the charges those hon. gentlemen hurled at the head of Mr. Smith, nor have they forgotten the look of the Minister of Railways when thirteen months ago I gave him the opportunity of retracting those slanders.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not retract anything.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I am not speaking of the Finance Minister ; I spoke of two other hon. gentlemen.

An hon. MEMBER. You said the Minister of Finance.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It was not the Minister, but other hon. gentlemen beside and around him. Now, as to the loans. The hon. gentleman attacks the prices at which my loans were sold in 1874 and 1876, and contrasts them with the prices obtained to-day, and he has the audacity to tell the people of the country and the members of this House that by some mysterious practices amounts of £600,000 sterling in one case and £300,000 or £400,000 in the other were put in the hands of some mysterious parties on the other side of the Atlantic. Let us contrast the loans made by the Finance Minister in 1879 and 1880. In 1879 he floated a loan of £3,500,000 which enjoyed the Imperial guarantee at 4 per cent. ; they were floated at an average of 96. For that loan he got something like £2,860,000 sterling. That loan to-day would be worth, at the current market quotations, not less than £3,250,000. Has the hon. Minister of Finance taken £400,000, by some mysterious means, out of the pockets of the people of this country, and put them into the pockets of the parties who negotiated the loan of 1879 ? I see the hon. Minister laugh, and well he may, at the profound ignorance displayed by his hon. colleague beside him. Now, Sir, when in 1880, I think it was, the hon. Minister floated another loan of £3,000,000 sterling, at 95 or thereabouts, are we to understand that because those securities now range at 105, the Minister of Finance, by some mysterious means, took £300,000 sterling, or say $1,500,000 out of the pockets of the people, and put it into some private friend's pocket ? Sir, I have been in the habit during many years of listening to the hon. Minister of Railways, and I think he knows by this time how much value I attach to the tornado of words he occasionally lets loose in this chamber. It comes, and blows, and goes ; it has about as much effect on me as a hail storm is likely to have on a hill-top. Sir, before I dread the censure of that hon. gentleman and his colleagues, I must learn to respect them, and it is because of their past record that I neither dread their censure nor the utmost they can do.

Motion withdrawn by leave of the House.

Mr. ANGLIN. The long personal attack made by the hon. Minister of Railways upon the member for Centre Huron has, perhaps, served to distract the attention of the House from the question we have now under consideration. It is not my purpose to take any part in the contest between these two gentlemen. I feel that the hon. member for Centre Huron is abundantly able to take care of himself in matters of that kind, and I am quite willing to leave it to him to defend his reputation against the charges made by the hon. Minister of Railways. I think, on the whole, it would be better that we should address ourselves to the subject-matter before the House. If we were to accept the statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways and the hon. Minister of Finance as unquestionable—and I remember that only a short time ago it was said to be something quite improper for any member on this side of the House to question statements made by these hon. gentlemen or their subordinates—if we were to allow them to state our case as they pleased, and as they have chosen to do in more than one instance; if we were to accept as unquestionable, promises that we regard as absolutely false, we would then be compelled to accept also the deductions at which they have chosen to arrive. But we, on our side of the House, question almost every statement they have made, either as utterly inaccurate, or as a very skilful perversion of what we regard as true. The hon. Minister of Railways chose to commence his speech this afternoon by declaring that neither he nor the Minister of Finance was ever truly regarded as Free Traders, that nothing could be found to prove that they had ever taken, in the Governments of the Provinces to which they both belong, a course as Free Traders, or advocated a policy that could be fairly called a Free Trade policy. Yet, a few minutes afterwards, with an inaccuracy, an inconsistency, a reckless disregard of self-contradiction, which distinguished that hon. gentleman this afternoon more than in any speech I ever heard him deliver, he told us distinctly that he had always advocated Free Trade in Nova Scotia as far as it could be carried out there, because in the peculiar circumstances of that Province Free Trade was a necessity. He told us, furthermore, that for many years before Confederation he was an advocate of a Union of the Provinces, and in that he told us what is correct; but when he proceeded to tell us that, in adopting a 15 per cent. Tariff after Confederation the hon. gentlemen who sit on that side of the House did not mean to adopt a policy of Free Trade, but rather a protectionist policy, and that in framing that Tariff they had acted strictly upon the principle of Protection, he asked this House to believe what is impossible for us to accept. A 15 per cent. policy was adopted, I believe by the Parliament of old Canada, and that 15 per cent. became the Tariff after Confederation, avowedly for the reason that the people of the Maritime Provinces were known to be Free Traders; that it would not do to offend their Free Trade principle by asking them to accept even the old Tariff, but that the old Tariff must be modified in the direction of Free Trade in order to reconcile the people to Confederation, to which it was known a great majority was strongly opposed. That was the true reason why the rate of taxation on the great part of our imports was reduced to 15 per cent. But they placed upon the free list a large number of articles, and he claims that as a measure of protection. I ask, Mr. Speaker, if it was a measure of Protection, in 1868-69, to place a large number of articles upon the free list, how has it come to pass to-day that it is a measure of Protection to take off that free list so large a number of articles and reduce it to such insignificant proportions? How is it that the hon. the Minister of Finance has found it necessary, even this Session, to come down and add some of the articles to the free list, which, a short time ago, according to his principle of Protection, he took off that list? No, Sir, it was not acting upon any principle of Protection; it was acting upon a principle which has always guided the advocates of a revenue Tariff policy, that that large free list was adopted in 1868-69, and was maintained from that time till the unhappy year of 1879. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman, after having contradicted himself in that extraordinary way, after having made those extraordinary statements, and placed himself in that strange position, proceeded to speak on the question of the coal duties. He told us truly that for many years he has been an advocate of a duty upon coal, and he told us, as we have heard from him often before, that for his part he could see no good reason why, for revenue purposes alone, a duty should not be imposed on coal. He added that one of the strongest objections against the duty on coal was the fact that it was a partial and a sectional impost and this he seemed to admit. But, he strove to contend that, although in some senses the duty is a sectional impost, nevertheless, it does not bear largely on the poorer classes in any part of the country, because, forsooth, the poorer people used wood for domestic purposes rather than coal; and, when asked by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) what he thought of the duty as it affected Toronto, he scouted the very idea of having any regard for the working classes of even so large a city as Toronto, and overlooked the fact, that if the working classes of Toronto alone were affected by this duty on coal, there would be a sufficiently strong reason why it should not be imposed. But, we all know that coal has been taking the place of wood in all our large cities and towns for many years past; that every day it is becoming more and more the fuel of the working classes—I will not particularly say of the poorer classes, because the hon. gentleman repudiates the idea that we have now any poor class in Canada. He speaks of those who were in want, several years ago, as shivering wretches. That is the language employed by these patrons of the poor—not the brothers or the protectors—but the patrons of the working classes, and he speaks of those who, owing to circumstances over which they had no control, owing to the will of Providence, who so directed the affairs of this country and of the whole world, that a few years ago we had generally wide-spread distress, so that many shivered for want of fuel—speaks of them not as men having the same feelings as himself—men as respectable as he would be if every charge made against him were proved as calumny; he speaks of them as an inferior order, as shivering wretches.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will, probably, allow me to correct him. I suppose he does not intend, personally or unintentionally, to do me an injustice, but when he says that I used the expression "shivering wretches," he is mistaken, for I used that expression as a quotation from a speech of the ex-Finance Minister. I did not use the expression myself, so that the reproof falls upon his friend and not upon me.

Mr. ANGLIN. Then it is only to be regretted that the hon. gentleman, to whom I listened with great attention, did not use this expression so that we could understand it. Well, Sir, the coal duty is a sectional duty. It is true that a very large portion of the coal imported into the country, as well as produced in our own mines, is used for manufacturing and railway purposes; but it is also true that a very large portion of it is used for domestic purposes, and that a large number of the people of this country feel very severely and sensibly the burden which is imposed upon them by the tax on coal, unless, indeed, they can be persuaded, and they never have been persuaded yet, that the Americans pay the duty instead of their having to pay it themselves. I believe that the statement made to that effect by the hon. gentleman is one which will startle the country as much as any he ever made. He has never shown himself deficient in that quality which Danton has said is so necessary to those who would carry their purposes by means of strong assertions; but I do not think he has ever ventured to go much further in the way of assertion than he did when he said that the Americans pay the whole duty on coal. The Finance Minister went so far as to say that the Americans pay at least one half the duty on coal; and I think we were a little startled in this House, and I think the business people throughout Canada were startled by that statement of the hon. gentleman, but the hon. gentleman is not advanced enough with regard to this coal duty to suit the views of his hon. colleague. The hon. gentleman told us, in the early part of his speech, that some time ago one of his colleagues, a gentleman who took a prominent position in discussing these trade questions, entertained the opinion that the tax on coal, and, I think, the tax on flour, as being sectional and oppressive in their nature, would lead to much trouble if imposed; but he says that that gentleman, like many others in his party, was not sufficiently advanced to know that the tax on coal, instead of being an injury to the poorer classes or to those who use coal for any purpose, would be a benefit and would enable us to take money out of the pockets of the Americans for our own service and purposes. But, Sir, he has himself undergone a very material change of opinion upon that point, and within a very short time. I heard him make that remarkable statement in regard to coal in the campaign in Pictou. He had not then reached that advanced state in which the wonderful fact dawned upon his mind that the Americans pay the tax on coal, for he used something like this language in addressing the people of Pictou, as one good reason why they should oppose the repeal of the tax on coal, and as a reason why they should not vote for Mr. Carmichael. He said: "See how this thing works. The people of Ontario pay $400,000 a year into the Treasury of the Dominion, and you Nova Scotians get your full share of the benefit of the expenditure of that money for public purposes, without contributing a single dollar towards it." He went on to speak on the advantages which that county affords for manufacturers, and the benefit which was conferred on an establishment for the manufacture of railway wheels and axles; and in pointing to the success of that concern he attributed it not merely to the energy and skill and industry of the gentlemen connected with it—though he gave them credit for these business qualities—but he went on to say that the cheap coal which they had at their doors, which they got without any additional cost for production, would be an important factor in the success of their business. More than that, he said that the tax of 50 cents per ton on coal has this effect: that it handicaps—that was not the word he used, for I do not pretend to quote his words, but it was to that effect—the effect of the duty on coal is to handicap the manufacturers of Ontario to such an extent as to give an additional protection to the manufacturers of New Glasgow when they come in competition with the manufacturers of Ontario, when they come into competition with their products in the far West. It struck me, when he made his statement to-day, that he does not intend to face Pictou on the eve of next election, for if he did he would have to unsay what he said at the last election, and tell them that the duty on coal affords them no advantage, because the people of Ontario do not pay this duty, because they get coal as cheaply, and even more cheaply, than they did before, and instead of its being a benefit to the manufacturers of the town of New Glasgow, as giving them an advantage in the competition with the manufacturers of Ontario, it is in fact a loss and an injury. More than that—if what the hon. Minister has stated is true—what is to be done in the case of one of the Government's prominent supporters who, it is said, receives a return of duty paid on the coal which he brings from the United States for use in his tug boats and steamers? That hon. gentleman listened to his leader this afternoon, and of course could not question the accuracy of his statements or the potency of his reasoning or the soundness of his conclusions; therefore he must know that he has been wrongfully receiving that money from the Americans, and as an honest man he will, no doubt, make it a matter of conscience, and make retribution as soon as possible.

Mr. BOWELL. Does the hon. gentleman say that such a rebate has been made, or is he speaking from rumor?

Mr. ANGLIN. I say that it is reported that he got coal from the United States for the use of his steamers without paying the duty.

Mr. BOWELL. Any person can do that if he likes.

Mr. ANGLIN. And bring it into Canadian waters, and use it in Canadian waters?

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman knows that nothing is liable to duty until it is landed.

Mr. ANGLIN. It is well to get an explanation on this point, and it is well for the tug owners in other parts of the country to know this fact, of which some of them have been woefully ignorant.

Mr. BOWELL. I suppose they have been seeking information from you.

Mr. ANGLIN. They have been getting their information in a very telling way—through their own pockets—they have been paying the duty. Why, I notice that the tug owners of Quebec have been in the strange belief that the duties paid have been coming out of their pockets and not out of those of the Americans, and have sent a memorial to this House stating that this tax is a burden and interferes with their business, and that altogether it has been an injury and a serious detriment and loss to them.

Mr. BOWELL. Do these gentlemen go to the United States for their coal?

Mr. ANGLIN. They can get it without landing it, I suppose.

Mr. BOWELL. If they do, it would not be dutiable until landed or sold in the country.

Mr. ANGLIN. Then I suppose these gentlemen will be very much obliged to me for obtaining this information for them. The hon. Minister of Customs has come to the relief of the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum), who wants to get his coal in free for the use of his tugs; and after the explanation of the hon. Minister, that hon. gentleman, I suppose, will not find it necessary to pay that money over to the Treasury, to which, according to the teachings of the hon. Minister of Railways, it most unquestionably belongs. The hon. Minister of Railways says that in a few months he has learned a great deal on this subject—new light has dawned on that wonderful understanding of his. I remember how, five or six years ago, when he was talking on this question of coal duty, it seemed impossible for him to know any more of it than he knew then. But he has received new light since, and this afternoon he read to us some most elaborate calculations and statements, which he says prove most conclusively—though I could not see the proof—that the Americans pay this duty on coal. I understood the hon. Minister to make this statement—that some years before the imposition of this duty on coal, the price in Toronto was very much higher than the price in Philadelphia, but that immediately after the imposition of the duty the price in Toronto not only fell to the price in Philadelphia, but the price in Toronto actually fell to $1.64 a ton lower than the price in Philadelphia; and he asks the people of this country to believe that the imposition of 50 cents a ton on coal has led to that extraordinary change. Well, Sir, if the imposition of 50 cents a ton on coal has that extraordinary effect, why does not the hon. gentleman prove himself logically consistent for once, and ask this House to vote the imposition of another 50 cents on coal? If the Americans pay the duty, why should we spare them? Why should we be satisfied with taking a paltry 50 cents out of them if we can get a dollar or two? Besides, according to the hon. gentleman's reasoning, it will reduce the price to a lower point than it has ever touched before. In reply to what he knew would be the answer to that, he used most extraordinary arguments in the hope of bringing the people of this country to believe that they do not suffer anything from the National Policy, because many staple articles can be purchased to-day at lower prices than they brought four or five years ago.

He thought that very conclusive and very convincing. It may be to those who are superficial enough to be led by the old post hoc propter hoc style of argument; but to the thinking business people of this country, arguments of that kind will not carry the weight which the hon. gentleman seems to imagine. The real question with respect to coal, as with respect to every other article, is this: is it or is it not to-day dearer because of the imposition of these additional taxes? If, by reason of the additional taxation, prices have been increased 5, 10 or 20 per cent. to that extent, is the National Policy a burden and grievance to the people? The hon. the Minister of Railways spoke about the price of coal in Chicago, and told us that railway competition reduces the cost of freight and sometimes even prices at the place of purchase, at the same time pointing out that there are competing points to which freight comes at lower rates than are charged for shorter distances. That is, no doubt, the fact, but competition between water and rail routes existed before the National Policy came into force. Probably there have been some developments in American railways, which have tended to cheapen coal at particular points; but competition has not been increased in the slightest degree by reason of the adoption of the National Policy by the people of Canada. The hon. the Minister of Railways has mentioned that the people of Chicago have to pay very much higher for their coal than those of Boston, because, he says, there is some competition in Boston and none in Chicago. The only competition at Boston is the little that comes from Nova Scotia, and perhaps a few cargoes come from England, but I do not understand that coal is received there in sufficiently large quantities to compete with the coal from American mines. The competition to-day is less than it was a few years ago when coal was admitted duty free. No doubt, in the present state of things in the United States, if a higher protective duty on coal were asked, Congress would be willing to grant it; they got all the protection they chose to ask in the past. The hon. Minister has compared the prices at Chicago with those on this side of the line, and has declared that prices have changed since the National Policy was introduced, not merely to an extent equal to the 50 cents duty, but to a very much larger extent. The operation of the National Policy, if we are to accept the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite, are of the most extraordinary character, not merely mysterious and miraculous, but actually taking the place of Providence itself. Providence, according to those hon. gentlemen, is now but a minor influence in the affairs of the world. Indeed, since the great National Policy has come into force, there is no longer, if we may believe them, a Providential controlling power over nations, producing abundant harvests in some countries when the harvests in others are deficient, and making peoples feel they are dependent on each other. Providence is now a minor power, and the National Policy of Canada is that which regulates the state of the crops in the Dominion, the United States and Europe, and regulates the commerce of the world. Hon. gentlemen opposite have gone so far as to claim that every commercial change which happens to prove advantageous to the Canadian people is the result, not of the action and control of an over-ruling Providence, but of the National Policy of which they boast so much. The hon. Minister of Railways spoke afterwards of the prices of coal at Prescott and Ogdensburg. If I apprehend correctly his remarks, they are to this effect: To bring coal from Ogdensburg to Prescott costs 67½ cents per ton for freight, and more for port and other charges; but the price at Prescott is much less than the price at Ogdensburg, with the duty, the freight and other charges added. It is well known, however, that it costs less to bring coal to Prescott and land it there in the first instance than to take it to Ogdensburg.

Mr. ANGLIN.

In that way the hon. gentleman and those who have labored for him have endeavored to make a case in his behalf. Those assertions are so wide of the mark that they must have seemed absurd to hon. gentlemen opposite, although they were ready to cheer the hon. gentleman. They watched every opportunity to encourage their leader; no strong assertion was allowed to pass without its cheer, nothing that could be called a bon mot passed without a redoubled cheer. There was some little joke passed which we on this side of the House could scarcely understand, over which hon. gentlemen opposite went into ecstasies; but while the hon. Minister was reading his long, elaborate calculations to prove that the Americans paid the duty on coal imported into Canada, his followers were silent. The calculations did not go down. They knew too well that these statements were not only incredible, but that the people would not be misled by them, that the Minister in making that statement was damaging their case before the intelligent constituencies of the Dominion, and they were silent because they were apprehensive. Glances were exchanged which indicated to us that they would very much prefer that the hon. Minister had not dwelt so long on that subject, and had not gone so far as he did. While the hon. Minister was talking an hon. member was prompted to send a telegram to ascertain the prices of coal at Detroit and Windsor, which are a mile apart. I did not think that it was necessary to send such a telegram. When I saw statements similar to those read by the Minister appear in some of the newspapers of the Tory party, I confess I was perfectly astounded to find that any person could write any such articles and hope they would be received with favor by any portion of the people. They were so palpably absurd, so utterly unwarrantable, and so intensely ridiculous, that I never could imagine that the man who wrote them really believed they would be accepted by any large number of people. Perhaps they thought they could calculate largely on the credulity of the people, and indeed they showed this, day after day, by the manner in which they dealt with this question. Therefore, I was not surprised to find hon. gentlemen opposite stunned by the course taken by the hon. Minister of Railways, nor was I much surprised to find the hon. Minister of Railways himself, who often owed his success to the audacity of his assertions, take such a course. It seemed infatuation, it is true. It seemed to be one of those cases which prompted an ancient writer to say that, "whom the Gods wish to destroy, they first make mad." Some demon must have taken away from the hon. gentleman that acuteness of intellect, that power of vision, that capacity for understanding how far he can traffic on the credulity of his audience, not in this House alone, but throughout the country, when he ventured on such statements as those. They will be published broadcast throughout the country, and I hope every business man will get a copy, so that he may be able to judge of the character of the statements, on which hon. gentlemen opposite rely as a means to carry the elections, about which they have begun to talk so much lately. Here is a statement of prices in Detroit and Windsor, telegraphed while the Minister was speaking, by a gentleman whose authority is undoubted. The difference in price between Windsor and Detroit is 75 cents. At Windsor coal sells at $7.50, which, in Detroit, can be bought at from $6.50 to $6.75. Twenty-five cents, I presume, will bring it across the river and the duty is fifty cents. But I am told that a vessel could as easily turn into the harbor of Windsor as Detroit, so that in that case the carriage would add nothing to the cost.

Mr. McCALLUM. Will the hon. gentleman name his authority.

Mr. ANGLIN. He is Mr. A. A. Bartlett.

Mr. MILLS. Perfectly reliable.

Mr. BOWELL. Is he Police Magistrate at Windsor?

Mr. ANGLIN. Yes.

Mr. BOWELL. All right, he is a very respectable Grit.

Mr. ANGLIN. All Grits are respectable. When they cease to be respectable they cease to be Grits. But the hon. gentleman said that after the imposition of the 50 cent duty, Toronto, Montreal and Quebec became competing points; and the dealers on the other side determined to sell to parties at those points so low as to enable them to pay the duty and compete with the home produced article. He did not tell us much about the prices of bituminous coal, but dealt with the anthracite rather than the bituminous, part of which comes from Nova Scotia and Cape Breton. At all events, Quebec and Montreal and places between were points at which our coal competed with coal brought from the United States long before the National Policy was imposed. On former occasions when this question was discussed in this House, it was stated that coal could be brought up the Gulf of St. Lawrence at a considerable profit to Quebec and at a fair profit to Montreal, where it could fairly compete with the bituminous coal from the United States. I remember well that Mr. Mitchell, who then, I think, was interested in a line of steamers running to and from the Gulf, made that statement, which was also made by many other business men, so that Quebec and Montreal and intermediate places were as much competing points as they are to-day. In the Lower Provinces, it is said, we are still further from the coal-fields of the United States, than Quebec or Montreal. I do not know whether it costs much or anything more to bring coal to St. John or Halifax than to Montreal or Quebec, but judging from prices I think coal can be imported as cheaply to the former as to the latter points. According to the theory advanced by the hon. Minister of Railways there must be an understanding among the coal dealers of the United States to sell for export to Canada, for the sake of the small quantity they do sell here, at lower prices than they accept for coal to be used in the United States. Business people will not credit that. For my part, I have to burn a considerable quantity of anthracite coal every year, and I find that the duty adds 50 cents to the price of the coal besides the 5 or 10 cents more additional profit charged by the dealer. The hon. gentleman compared the output of coal from 1873-4 to 1878 with the output from 1878 to 1881, and showed that the output is much larger at present than it was during the late Administration, attributing the increase, of course, entirely to the National Policy. Now, it is always well, when we are discussing matters of this kind, to ascertain what causes are in operation to bring about the results we are all agreed on. We know that of late years there has been a wonderful change in the carrying trade in the various countries of the world. We know that a very large number of steamers now go to harbors in Nova Scotia to procure an additional supply of coal, finding it profitable to go a little out of the way to get this new supply of coal rather than set out with a full supply, since, by taking the former course, they are enabled to start with a larger quantity of cargo. During the last year we had in the harbor of St. John, for the first time in my recollection, as many as fifteen or sixteen English steamers coming to take cargoes or deals, which had to procure additional coal. This is a portion of the additional output which is attributed to the National Policy. We might as well attribute to the National Policy the fact that they came to St. John to take deals and thereby did serious injury to the trade of wooden ships. We do not resort to any means of that kind in order to establish our case. We do not choose to be inconsistent, to be inaccurate, or to deal in incongruities, false deductions or false premises. What we seek to establish is the truth. We leave the public themselves, in most cases, to infer from what is known to be true what the natural and proper deduction ought to be. Other causes brought those steamers to our ports, not the National Policy. But there were in our ports sixteen large steamers to be supplied with coal for the transatlantic voyage. And the output again was increased in another way. The hon. the Minister of Railways himself, talking of the Grand Trunk management, showed us that they are abandoning the use of wood to a large extent and substituting for it coal. He read what he thought was a contradiction of the statement of the hon. member for Huron but, of course, it was nothing of the kind; it did not throw the slightest doubt on that statement. But it did show that for that and other causes there is a large demand for coal, either foreign or domestic. We know that on the Intercolonial also there has been a very large quantity of coal used of late years, and less wood than formerly; and then the revival of business and the opening of new establishments, including two sugar refineries in the Lower Provinces, has increased the demand for coal. But, except the sugar refineries, I do not know any case in which this increased demand should be credited directly or indirectly by the public to the National Policy. My impression is that the quantity of coal taken out of the mines was not very much, if at all, in excess of the quantity taken out a few years ago. The hon. gentleman would prefer, of course, to take in his arguments the average of the periods of greatest depression; or, as the Ministerialists sometimes do, one year of great depression compared with a year of prosperity. But I believe that the output of coal is not very much larger now than it was six or seven years ago. The Minister of Railways made another extraordinary statement—perhaps it was a lapsus lingue—that from the year 1878 to 1881, while the output was diminishing year by year, the number of people employed diminished to the extent of 1,200, and that since the increase commenced the number employed had increased, not by 1,200, but 400. My impression is, that there must be some mistake—that there must be as many men employed to-day taking out coal as there was some years ago. That, at all events, was the statement of the Minister of Railways. He did not show that any considerable quantity of coal ever reached the Ontario market. The great object of the imposition of the duty on coal was to give the miners of Nova Scotia control of the principal markets of Ontario. Ministers are now compelled to admit that it has not done that and will not do it. The Minister of Railways told us of some analysis of Nova Scotia coal made some years ago by the member for London, when a member of the Ontario Government, and of the admirable results of that analysis, as showing that this coal was very much better than any other. But we do not find that it is imported by Ontario, and the people of Toronto are so stupid, so regardless of their own interests, as to import an inferior coal at a higher price instead of a superior coal at a lower. There is a contradiction of facts here to be explained by the hon. Minister. It is amusing to hear of experiments made in the good city of Ottawa by persons who desired to introduce the Nova Scotia coal and encourage its use by the people generally, but who themselves chose afterwards for some reason to use American coal. But it is a remarkable fact that not very long ago, in advertisements, I presume coming from the Department of Public Works, calling for tenders for coal, I think for the use of these buildings and Rideau Hall, it was expressly stipulated that the coal must be American.

An hon. MEMBER. Patriotism.

Mr. ANGLIN. Patriotism of the purest water. While it is a fact that Nova Scotia coal does not find its way to Ontario, it is also a fact that it is coming more largely into use elsewhere—for instance, the railway from St. John to Shediac, which formerly used wood, is now using coal. But we do deny that the increase is attributable to the National Policy. The hon. gentleman made some broad assertions as usual. He asserted very lately, as the Finance Minister did before him, that this country is to-day enjoying a degree of unprecedented prosperity. I have heard him say that it enjoys an amount of prosperity such as no other country in the world ever enjoyed; he declared this from a balcony in front of an hotel, standing on which he looked into a block of buildings on the best business street in St. John, and if it were not dark at the time, he must have observed that two-thirds of the whole block was actually unoccupied, and that the ugly words "to let," which the Finance Minister says have disappeared, might have been seen on much of that big block of buildings. Late as is the hour, I do not wish to allow all of the Finance Minister's statements to go unanswered. Of him personally, I do not wish to say anything; his colleague, the Minister of Railways, has lauded him this evening in a manner which, to say the least, was very extravagant, but not so much to please his colleague, as to hit the member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) over his shoulder. I am willing to let that matter pass on the grounds that all said of his public career and conduct, need not or ought not to be contradicted. But in reference to his statements in this speech, I must say that while they are less bold than the statements regarding coal, made by the Minister of Railways, they are nevertheless statements which, I believe, no Finance Minister who had a proper regard for his position, as a public man, or a due regard for his reputation as a Finance Minister, ought to have made. He taunted us on this side of the House with having indulged in predictions which he said have all failed. Well, Sir, we claim that all we anticipated has been more than fulfilled. All our anticipations have been fully realized in every instance. Why, he said, you asserted on the other side of the House that this Tariff would not be a revenue Tariff because it would discourage importation. Now, see what it has proved to be. It has proved to be not only a good protective Tariff, but a great revenue Tariff; it has not only brought us in the $2,000,000 we anticipated, but put $6,000,000 into our coffers over and above what our predecessors collected; therefore he would have us conclude that what we said upon that point was erroneous. What we said was this: that in so far as that Tariff proved to be a protective Tariff, in so far and to fully the same extent would it diminish the revenue; and that if the protection were as successful as the hon. gentlemen opposite anticipated, then the revenue must necessarily be reduced below the amount required for the public service of the country. We doubted much whether even this high Tariff would be the success as a measure of Protection they asserted. We always contended that it would not; but we did say that if we were to admit what they said, the conclusion was inevitable that the revenue must be reduced below the point at which the interests of the country required it should be maintained. What does the hon. gentleman himself say in this very speech? He says, the reduction of revenue which will be caused by the operation of his policy, that is one of the reasons for not reducing the surplus further, for not removing taxation. He tells us we have 180,000 spindles in operation, and next year we may have 400,000, and as that number will produce more cotton cloth, our revenue will suffer proportionately—the very thing we said last year; the very thing we repeat now, that so far as this Tariff is protectionist, so far does it tend to diminish the revenue. It is because it has failed as a protectionist Tariff, to a great extent, that it has been successful as a revenue Tariff. It has been successful in extorting from the working-people of this country, an amount of money greater than was ever expended in this country in any year before, and $1,000,000 in addition to the amount expended. It has been successful in wrong-doing, successful in injustice, successful in grinding the faces of the working-people of this country. The hon. ex-Minister of Customs made a statement last year, and having asserted that that statement has proved fallacious, the Finance Minister proceeded to tell the House what that statement was, but his memory was certainly at fault. Some how or other, by accident or design—I will not accuse the hon. gentleman of wilfully misinterpreting another, the habit is so strong with him that it is almost excusable—but in this case he certainly grossly mis-stated the position taken by the late Minister of Customs. He told this House that the late Minister of Customs said that the National Policy Tariff would increase the taxation by $7,000,000, and that only $2,000,000 of that would go into the Treasury, while the other $5,000,000 would go into the pockets of the manufacturers; and the hon. gentleman says to-night, "See what the result is, instead of $2,000,000 we have $6,000,000 in the Treasury," and the ex-Minister of Customs is proved to have made a statement utterly incorrect. Why, he just managed to turn the statement so as to make it suit his purpose, and so as to enable him to say it was incorrect. If the ex-Minister had made that statement he would have been subject to the charge of having made a great mistake in his calculation. His calculation was simply an arithmetical application of the new Tariff to the imports for the year 1878, as they appear in the official returns. Item by item was taken as far as the new Tariff could be applied to them, and the result was that the new Tariff would increase the taxation over the amount actually collected in 1878 by nearly $7,000,000. It was the hon. Finance Minister himself who said that by the operation of this Tariff he would get $2,000,000 more, and then the late Minister of Customs said: "Well, if you do put into the Treasury only $2,000,000 more, then the other $5,000,000 must go into the pockets of the manufacturers, for it will certainly be taken out of the pockets of the people." Well, Sir, the imports, I believe, are somewhat in excess of the imports of 1878, and consequently he has $6,000,000 in his Treasury, and the manufacturers, or some of them, have a very considerable addition to their profits. One of them declared in this House, two or three evenings ago, that on his cotton stocks he has never yet earned more than three per cent. A singularly unfortunate gentleman that must be. If you go into the city of Montreal you will not find a business man in it who will not tell you a different story with regard to that gentleman's position and his income from his stocks.

Mr. MACKENZIE. One gentleman told me he got 18 per cent.

Mr. ANGLIN. Others got that in cash and a great deal more in another shape. People in Montreal say about the Hudon factory that the original stock was $100 a share. Some time after the National Policy went into operation, the $100 was converted into $200 without any money having been paid up, very considerable cash dividends having been paid out. From that time it has gone on, increasing, the factory has put in new machinery, making it more valuable than it was, and still they are paying large dividends on the stock so watered, so that to-day you cannot buy that stock in the market for less than $250 on the $100, and without paying a single additional dollar, by the simple process of accretion, that stock is worth five times as much as it was in the beginning. The hon. gentleman is a most respectable man, a man whose word I would take as soon as his bond in any commercial transaction, and his bond is known to be a very valuable security. But here is an extraordinary contradiction between the statements of two gentlemen. But, Sir, the hon. Prime Minister would have us believe that our taxation has not increased by reason of this National Policy, that we pay less per capita than we paid a year ago. Those who have been acquainted with the hon. gentleman for some years, who have heard him speak on the subject from time to time, are aware that the use of averages and the working out a per capita is a favorite mode indeed of meeting objections to any particular project or theory of his. If you add so much here and take off so much there, you get a certain divisor, and if you add to that divisor a certain amount, your quotient will be so much less. That is the process by which he gets the results which he wishes to obtain. Let me refer for a moment to one or two of his statements. In order to prove that the tax on imports now is less actually than it was some years ago, he takes up an average of years. He will not compare his present income with the income of any one of those years of depression of which we hear so much, but he chooses to make an average of all the years under the Mackenzie Administration, and in making that average he is careful to take those years which would diminish the side of the account which he wishes diminished. He chooses to date the beginning of the Mackenzie Government from the first of July, 1874, whereas they came into power early in November, 1873, and had control of public affairs during the spending portion of that time, and succeeded, notwithstanding all the Minister of Railways has said on that point, and notwithstanding that they did add to the annual expenditure a sum which he wished to charge to capital account. That hon. gentlemen are very fond of capital account. We had any number of charges to capital account last year, and they appear this year in the Estimates for the Intercolonial Railway and other places. As I said, the hon. Minister of Railways wished a certain amount charged to capital, but when the new Administration came in they thought, and thought properly, that it should be charged to revenue. They so charged it, and Parliament, notwithstanding all the hon. gentleman could say, approved of their course. Oh, but the hon. gentleman will say: "It was a hostile Parliament." When a vote in Parliament or in a constituency goes in his favor, the fact is sufficient, in the hon. gentleman's eyes, to clear a character, no matter how badly it is stained, or to brighten a reputation, no matter how dark it may be, but when a election happens to go against him, or a vote in the House, its decision is of no value at all. But though that amount was added to the annual expenditure—so careful were the Ministers of that day in their control over their expenditures, that they kept them largely under the income, and then came the addition derived from the increase in the Tariff. I will not stop to argue whether that increase was a necessity or not; it was alleged to be a necessity at the time, and the Parliament of that day, by a majority of some eighty votes, declared it to be a necessity in order to save the country from the deficit with which it was then threatened, thanks to the extravagance and the improvidence of hon. gentlemen opposite. But the hon gentleman does not choose to take that first year and give gentlemen on this side credit for the surplus they succeeded in securing by economy on the one hand and by the imposition of this additional taxation on the other. He wants, if possible, to make up a deficit by-and-bye, and he has also another object in view, and so he takes the years 1874-75, 1875-76 and 1876-77. He strikes an average of the whole and says the population was so-and-so—a purely fanciful figure—and then makes this division and says: "the quotient is $4.88 per capita." Then he goes to the other side of the account and takes 1878-79 as a year of his own. This is the first time I heard them claim that year as one of theirs, for they have always repudiated it. I find that 1879-80 and 1880-81 are the two years on which he calculated as their own. It was upon these two years that I wanted to contrast two calculations of the hon. gentleman, in one of which he claimed 1879, and in the other he changed the late Administration with that year. I find, however, in taking up the paper, I have substituted the one year for the other, but the contrast between the two will remain the same. In calculating the amount per capita, he takes it in this way. He takes 1874-75, 1875-76, 1876-77, 1877-78 and 1878-79. He takes the population at 4,050,000, a fanciful figure, but probably nearly correct. On the one side he adds what he calls the deficit and from the other he subtracts a surplus, and the deficits he wants to make out as $5,491,000. His colleague the Minister of Railways has told us over and over again that that deficit was $7,500,000; and I think these two hon. gentlemen should contrive to agree on so important a matter instead of contradicting themselves so materially. If we take the actual time during which the Mackenzie Government had control of public affairs—only the time which can be legitimately calculated—the deficit would not be quite $2,000,000, but by working the calculation out as I have described one of these hon. gentlemen makes it $7,500,000, and the other $5,500,000. The Minister of Railways makes the amount per capita $4.88, while he says that in the present condition of things it is only $4.65. Let me contrast this with the calculation of exports, by which the hon. gentleman endeavors to show that the prosperity of Canada is due to a very small extent to the increase of the exports. Instead of taking the figures for the last year or two of the season of depression and contrasting them with the present two years, he goes back to a period when, in point of fact, there was little or no commercial depression or suffering in this country, when there were no people out of employment, although depression prevailed in the United States, which was then in possession of the panacea which these gentlemen prescribe for all such evils—namely, a high Tariff. During these years Canada was enjoying a fair degree of prosperity, but the hon. gentleman does not compare the returns for the last two years with those for the two previous years. He calculates on the five years previous to 1879, and charges hon. gentlemen on this side—or rather he does not really charge them, because it is really an admission—that there was not a depression at the time, but only for a short period in the latter portion of their Administration. But on the other side he adds in the year 1879, claiming that as their year, because in that year the whole exports were a little over $60,000,000—$8,500,000 less than in 1878, and very much less than they were in our previous years. He then takes the years 1879, 1880 and 1881, and strikes an average from these, and by means so improper he succeeds in reducing his own average exportation, saying: "My exports only exceed yours on the average by about $1,700,000 a year, and therefore the increased prosperity cannot be due to the increased value of the exports;" whereas, if he had compared 1881 with 1878 and 1879, he would have found an enormous difference in the exports. In 1878 they were but $68,000,000, in 1879 $60,000,000, in 1880 over $70,000,000, in 1881 they were $80,923,379—$150,000,000 in round numbers in the two latter years, against $128,000,000, or an increase of over $22,000,000 in the exports of those two years as compared with the exports of the two years which were the real years of depression. Sir, I state that is not a fair mode for a Finance Minister to adopt, as it does not represent the true state of things in this country. That $20,000,000 has come into the country and created that purchasing power which the hon. gentleman attributed to the National Policy, and, increasing the purchasing power, has stimulated all industries in this country, manufacturing as well as importing. The hon. gentleman took another way of proving that the people of the Dominion pay less than they did years ago. He says the Maritime Provinces imported more and paid more per head some years ago than they do now. Sixteen years ago the Province of New Brunswick imported $10,000,000 worth of goods. After Confederation the imports declined for some years, because the times which these gentlemen say were times of prosperity, were really times of depression and suffering. After Confederation the item of flour coming into Canada disappeared from our accounts, and for that item about a million dollars ought to be allowed. Deducting that million, $9,000,000 would be left as our imports in 1866. They rose again in 1872 to over $10,000,000; but in 1879-80 the imports of New Brunswick, as they appeared in the Public Accounts, were less than $4,000,000, and last year our whole imports are put at only about $6,000,000. If we were to take our average population, we would find, if our imports were to go on progressively, that we ought to have credit for $12,000,000 or $12,500,000, instead of about half that amount. This is not caused by the substitution in our markets of the manufactures of Canada for imported goods. A great inter-provincial trade has grown up; but I must say that it is a very one-sided trade. We import into the Lower Provinces to-day a vast amount of goods from the Upper Provinces—some of them Canadian manufactures, and some of them importations from the old country—part of these clothing made up in these Provinces. The articles imported into our Province from the Upper Provinces have displaced, not the articles which we imported from other countries, but the articles manufactured in our own Province; and to-day the manufacturers of New Brunswick are less prosperous than they were ten or twelve years ago. In the city of St. John there are fewer hands employed in skilled labor than there were ten or twelve years ago, as a result of this competition with the manufacturers of the Upper Provinces. The few articles they send down which take the place of those we formerly imported are coarse woollen goods, and lately some of the coarser cottons. The value of those I cannot fix exactly, but if you put it at $1,000,000 or $1,500,000, that will be the outside figure. Beyond that, a very large quantity of the goods we consume must be imported goods; and the change produced by the Tariff is this, that the merchants of Quebec, Montreal and other parts of the Upper Provinces, supply the people of the Lower Provinces with imported goods as well as manufactured goods; and on these imported goods we pay the duties, not into our own Custom houses, but into the Custom houses of the Upper Provinces. On the face of the accounts we do not get credit for this, but the person who ought to be most familiar with this condition of things is the gentleman, who himself, as Provincial Secretary in 1866, collected the duty on $10,000,000 of imported goods. It is the nature of things in all these new countries of ours that the purchasing power of the people should increase faster than the population; and the purchasing power has on the whole increased in the Lower Provinces, so that we must be purchasing more of those imported goods than we did eight or nine years ago. Therefore I say that when the Finance Minister asserts on the basis of these accounts that the people of the Maritime Provinces are paying considerably less taxes than they paid some years ago, he makes a statement which no Finance Minister, knowing of what he spoke, should have made. I must protest as strongly as I can in courteous, civil and parliamentary language, against such a perversion of the facts, such an attempt to mislead by stating the facts as they appear merely on the face of the Public Accounts, without adding other facts, which qualify those statements and which would enable Parliament and the country to form an accurate opinion on the subject. We in the Lower Provinces are paying more taxation than ever before. There is another way of estimating it and it is this: In 1866 our imports were $10,000,000, and we paid but an average duty of 10 per cent., although the duties were raised just before we entered the Confederation. The Minister of Railways claims credit for being a protectionist and for having raised the duties in his Province. The duties were increased in the Maritime Provinces and reduced in Lower Canada. On these $10,000,000 we collected about $1,000,000. The Dominion Tariff adopted in 1868-69 made the average duty on imports 12 per cent., and to-day it is 21 per cent. Yet the Finance Minister, by his per capita shuffling, averaging and estimating, managed to cut down the per capita so as to make it smaller, when we are paying 21 per cent. on all goods dutiable and free, than it actually was under the 10 or 12 per cent Tariff. But the hon. gentleman will say, the imports are less than formerly, because to-day a large portion of the goods required and which were formerly imported is now manufactured in the country. That is a very broad assertion. We in the Lower Provinces believe that we pay more into the revenue, and that when, by reason of the Tariff, we are compelled to buy goods manufactured in Canada, we are paying additional duties, perhaps not into the Treasury, but into the pockets of the manufacturer, and are, therefore, worse off, because if they were paid directly into the Treasury we would expect to obtain a return of a portion in some form or other. I do not think the Minister of Finance has succeeded in establishing the truth of his assertion that the rate of taxation has been reduced. Another mode which he has taken to arrive at this conclusion is by assuming that the present Census figures are correct and reliable. I suppose there is no man in Canada knowing anything of the circumstances under which the Census was taken, and the mode in which it was taken, who entertains any such opinion. We know even in our part of the country that very, very many persons are made to appear in that Census as residents of Canada who left years ago and have no intention to return. The system in which this Census was taken is called the de jure system, because it has nothing in it of just and right as lucus a non lucendo. This system has been so worked that hundreds of thousands have been added to the Census of Canada, and my impression is, from all I can learn, that instead of our population being 4,300,000, we have scarcely more than 4,000,000. The Minister of Railways will doubtless say that I am making an attack on Canada, injuring the country and destroying its reputation, but in Parliament it is our duty to speak what we believe to be the truth; and if the country cannot progress when the truth is known it cannot progress at all. Truth may be concealed for a time, but it will make itself known in spite of all opposition. On this side of the House we act on the principle that, in discussing these questions we should ascertain as far as possible what the truth is, and base our arguments not on what we wish the population and trade to be, but on the facts themselves. I feel bound to say that I do not believe we have as many people as the Census represents this country to have, because the Census has not been taken in the proper sense of the word de jure, but for some reason or other on an utterly fallacious system, one calculated under all the circumstances to create the impression that we have a great many more people than we have. I have heard, within a few hours that, one of the counties of my Province, not a large county, which was considered some years ago under the Mackenzie régime to be one of the most flourishing and prosperous, and which increased from 6,000 or 7,000 to 14,000 or 15,000 has declined in population within the last eighteen months at least 12 per cent. I know that the population of St. John is to-day less than it was ten years ago. I know from an examination of even those false Census reports, that the population driven out of St. John by the fire did not establish themselves anywhere in the neighboring districts, and that as the rate of increase in those districts had not been equal to the old rate of increase in the country, and that therefore the decline in St. John cannot be ascribed, as it will be attempted to be ascribed, to the effects of the great fire. From St. John we have lost not merely the 2,800 people which the Census shows to be the decline of population as compared with ten years ago, but we have lost also the large natural increase which took place there during some seven or eight of those years. I believe that within two years we have lost from St. John and the immediate neighborhood 5,000 or 6,000 or perhaps 7,000 or 8,000. The city of Halifax, which has complained of a large loss of population, has, nevertheless, according to the Census, increased as compared with 1871, while St. John has decreased, the meaning being not that Halifax has done well but that St. John has done much worse. Let us take the city of Ottawa. The Finance Minister, in that triumphant tone which he knows well how to assume, and which some time borders almost on insolence, declared that to-day there are no laborers in Canada out of employment, and that no workmen gather round the Parliament or Departmental buildings clamoring for employment. The Minister of Railways made the similar assertion, that to-day there was ample employment, because the National Policy had stimulated all industries, and had not merely stimulated industries but had created wealth and resources that had never before existed. The hon. Minister of Finance said that to-day you could not find any of those placards "to let" in any of the windows of the towns of Canada, that the houses were everywhere occupied, that new establishments were everywhere going up, and signs of prosperity and abundance were everywhere visible. A bright picture, but is it a correct one? Would that it were correct, but how could any man walk through the streets of this town and have that opinion? Let him go through Sussex street and he will find "to let" staring him from almost every window, shops closed, and others doing a business that can hardly be a paying one. I am told that in Ottawa to-day there are 600 or 700 houses of one kind or another absolutely unoccupied, and that a few years ago there was not a single unoccupied house to be had. Where are the people that clamored around this building some years ago demanding employment from the Government, and who were led to believe that the Government could find them employment, and that it was the special province of the Government to see that the seasons were what they ought to be, the harvests abundant, and business prosperous? That was the teaching of the hon. gentlemen opposite. They had the Workingmen's Association in this city, and gathered a number of those people together, telling them that if the Tories returned to power a brighter day would dawn, that all would find employment at high wages and be happy and contented. Where are those people to-day? Do they and their families present the cheerful and happy appearance predicted? They have all disappeared. They remained in the country until the National Policy came into operation, when finding it did not give them the employment expected they left the country.

Mr. PLUMB. Where have they gone?

Mr. ANGLIN. To the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. They have a high Tariff there.

Mr. ANGLIN. But they left here after we got the high Tariff. They left because, notwithstanding the Tariff, there was more depression felt in Ottawa than ever.

Mr. PLUMB. How could they live in the United States?

Mr. ANGLIN. The change of times for the better in the United States, as times have changed in Free Trade England, brought about additional employment.

Mr. PLUMB. But the United States had a high Tariff.

Mr. ANGLIN. Prosperity had commenced in the United States and it has continued to the present day. That prosperity is reflected in this country, and it is to it that Ottawa especially owes what prosperity she now enjoys, because of the higher value of lumber. But this prosperity was not due to any change of Tariff. There was a change of Tariff in the United States and England as well as in Canada, and if the change of Tariff in Canada has done such wonders here, the change in the United States and England should have had a similar effect in those countries. We know that under the Tory Administration of Disraeli, depression was felt throughout England. We know that in the iron districts of Cleveland one furnace after another went out of blast, and the people were in great misery. If it were not a too contemptuous term to use they might have been called shivering wretches, so much did they suffer. Other districts in England were in as bad a condition although those wonderful Tories were in power, and notwithstanding the glorious foreign policy of the Tory jingoes. Mr. Gladstone returned to power and proposed a change of Tariff—an important change, as the hon. member for Centre Wellington would say. He took the duty off malt and substituted for it a duty on beer by the barrel. Immediately after things began to improve, and where formerly there was distress there is now abundance of employment and prosperity. According to the reasoning of hon. gentlemen opposite, the change was due entirely to the change of Tariff taking the duty off malt and placing it on beer. There was also a change of Tariff in the United States about that time. Just as the years of adversity were fading away, the duty was taken off quinine, and the country immediately became prosperous. For no other reason, as far as the Tariff or fiscal policy was concerned, did the depression disappear and a change for the better take place, except that the duty was taken off quinine. This may be the reductio ad absurdum of the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, but it is just as justifiable to attribute the change for the better in England and the United States to the changes in their Tariff as it is to attribute the improved condition of Canada to our National Policy. But to return to the workingmen of this city—to such a depth of poverty were many of them reduced, that when they were driven in despair to leave the country, some had not the means to do so, and they had to apply to the Corporation for assistance. In 1879, when the Tory Government were in power, when the Tory sun was high in the heavens, and hope beat strongly in every breast, and a new stimulus was given to trade, the city of Ottawa paid $2,050 to assist these citizens to go to some other place where they could get employment. It was necessary to give $1,150 in the year 1880 to help the very poor of Ottawa to go elsewhere to seek employment, and in the year after another sum. In 1881, that blessed year in which the country was so prosperous, if we believe the hon. gentlemen opposite, in which there were no shivering, suffering, ill-clad people—in that year Ottawa was forced to pay $760 more to enable the poverty stricken to go away to earn a living elsewhere. In all, since the accession of the Tories to office, $3,960 has been paid to those who were so poor that they could no longer get bread enough and had they not been so aided would have had to crawl out of the country. It has been said that there are no poor at Montreal—that it is a great, prosperous city, and that the National Policy has done wonders for it—that thousands additional of men are employed,—and we are told that Montreal ought to be prosperous above all other places. It was my misfortune to be compelled, some time ago, to spend six or seven weeks in Montreal, and being what the Minister of Railways would call of an enquiring turn of mind, passing up and down the streets I looked for evidences of the wonderful prosperity of which all the Tory papers and Tory orators had been telling us. There is always in that city a busy multitude to be seen on the main streets; but walking through the back streets, I observed in many a house the placard "to let," although the Finance Minister stated all such had disappeared. In the districts where the workingmen dwell, I saw many empty houses, and in the more fashionable quarters, including Prince of Wales Terrace, St. Catherine Street, I also saw "house to let" in more than one place. Elsewhere, everywhere I turned, appeared similar evidences of the same kind. On enquiry I found that houses recently let were bringing astonishingly low rents, and the owners reducing them to get tenants.

Coming to the business streets I found even there the same evidence that prosperity was not so very extraordinary, and the hum not so loud as had been asserted. I found on going through Notre Dame street, the old Recollet House, which was a very few years ago a fashionable dry-goods establishment, built and fitted up in a most expensive style, now occupied by an auctioneer, with a few dusty old traps in the window. Elsewhere I found properties occupied in such a way, that it was evidently impossible they could pay interest on the money invested on them, and I have seen statements in the papers which I believe true, that property, to-day, at Montreal is very, very far short in value of what it was in 1875, 1876 and 1877. And not merely has the market value of the property decreased, but the Assessors have had to reduce the value as assessed, and it remains down to this day, they not feeling justified in making any considerable increase this last year or two, notwithstanding the National Policy, and although the Tories are in power and they assert that everything is prospering and booming. A somewhat similar story might be told of Quebec.

Mr. PLUMB. Is property in Montreal lower than in 1875?

Mr. ANGLIN. I believe that the population of Montreal, besides, is not as large as four years ago. In 1878, 1879 and 1880, a very much larger number of people left Montreal to seek employment and remain elsewhere in employment, than the new arrivals and the natural increase would amount to. The Finance Minister says that there are no laborers to-day in Montreal wanting employment. Only a few weeks ago in answer to an advertisement, in the Montreal paper, calling for 50 or 60 laborers at a dollar a day, the doors of the building, where application was to be made, were broken in by the pressure of the hundreds who sought for work. I ask what would be a fair day's wages for a fair day's work? Hon. gentlemen opposite, who have professed themselves great patrons of the workingmen, but who desire to see them employed for the benefit of the employer, should tell us what is a fair day's wages for a fair day's work at any season. It has been said that the purchasing power of money has been gradually diminished of late years, and we have seen pastorals issued on high authority, of no less than two Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church, asserting that the purchasing power of money has been so greatly diminished that ministers can no longer be expected to live on their old stipends, and that their congregations should increase those stipends to enable those ministers to live as they did a few years ago. The same remark applies, in a very much stronger degree, to the workingmen. The Tariff presses with greater weight and severity on the workingmen who paid the higher duties on their coarse heavy clothing. It is they especially who most largely contribute to swell the revenue so as to enable the Government to spend all they do and boast of a large surplus. Would one dollar a day be a fair day's wages for a fair day's work?

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I would like to see any hon. gentleman engage Canadian laborers for a dollar a day in Ontario.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. gentleman will understand that only a very short time ago the wages of the laborers on the North Shore Railroad, in the Province of Quebec, were reduced to 80 cents.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). The wages of men on the Canada Central Railroad have been $1.20.

Mr. ANGLIN. I am not guessing or speculating, but speak of an actual occurrence and reduction on a road almost in sight of our Parliament windows.

Mr. PLUMB. They went away to get $1.10.

Mr. ANGLIN.

Mr. ANGLIN. Where?

Mr. MACKENZIE. To Niagara, perhaps.

Mr. PLUMB. You cannot hire a man there for less than $1.10.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Niagara is interrupting the hon. gentleman who has the floor, in a contumacious manner, which is highly discreditable to him.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. member for West Durham is interrupting and making statements in regard to me which, in a parliamentary sense, are not founded on fact.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Niagara will have the courtesy to listen to the hon. member.

Mr. ANGLIN. Whenever the hon. member for Niagara becomes restless, I know I am making a good point, and I do not want him stopped. Now, Sir, in my own town I caused enquiries to be made as to the rate of wages there, in the various kinds of employment, because I knew we would have to deal with this question. I know myself that in the town and city supposed to be represented by the Finance Minister there are to-day many hundreds of laborers without employment. I employed a young man to go through the city and investigate the matter. His report was this: Of late years it has become the custom in St. John to lay the keels of vessels in the early part of the winter, and to prosecute work on them during the winter, for the reason that employers can dictate terms to the men they employ. The highest wages paid to skilled workmen in the shipyards was one dollar a day for the time they could work; and in the winter season they do not average more than four days a week. Wages range from a dollar down to 80 cents a day. The majority of the men receive 80 or 90 cents; only a few earn a dollar. Whoever else has been benefited by this National Policy I think it cannot be shown that the laboring man, the artisan or mechanic has had his condition materially improved. The Finance Minister himself admitted that in 200 factories of the Dominion there has been no increase of wages, and the only benefit that he claims for the workmen is that employment is more steady; well, that is not to be attributed to the National Policy, but arises from other causes. He admits, at all events, that the rate of wages is not increased in a number of these factories. In others he says it is increased by the munificent sum of ten cents a day. Now, I think when he makes a statement such as this he ought to pay this House the compliment of laying full details on the Table, showing us where these factories are, the number of men employed in them and the rate of wages paid at present, and for the last three or four years. I think we were all surprised to hear there are as many as ninety new factories in the whole Dominion. I would be astonished at it were I not aware that since the National Policy came into operation there can hardly be a shingle mill or a cheese factory put up that is not announced as a new industry, the result of the National Policy. I hope that the Finance Minister will do the people the justice of making a full and complete statement, so that we can all judge of its exact value. He says that there was some increase in the rate of wages. I heard of one case of some stove makers up in Hamilton or Toronto, who were very earnest advocates of the National Policy, and who were amongst those who clamored most loudly for increased protection in order that their men may have increased employment and increased wages—I heard that their employers resisted the demands of their men for increased wages until a large number of them had gone to the United States and the others were threatening to go, and then there was an increase of 10 per cent. which was proclaimed all over the country as a result of the National Policy, but it turned out afterwards that it was merely a return to the wages paid by the same firm under the Mackenzie Administration. I heard of another interesting case where I was almost personally acquainted with the facts. In looking for the boom the Finance Minister visited Almonte, where there are a great many woollen mills, and where the owners have displayed much energy, which would deserve the admiration of all their fellow-citizens, were it not that they joined in the effort to impose upon their fellow-subjects those increased burdens. The hon. gentleman was shown through the largest of the mills, and by-and-bye, after he had made his hurried survey in which, with an eagle glance he took in at once the process of manufacture, the employes were all gathered in some large room to be addressed by the Finance Minister and to cheer him and present him with an address. On the walls was written in large letters: "On and after the 1st of December next, wages in this mill will be increased 10 per cent." Here, at least, was a case where the National Policy had brought great advantage to the workingmen, a case in which the Ministry might triumph ever more. After the National Policy had gone into operation, I learned from Mr. Galbraith, the late representative for that district, whose loss we all deplore, that some weeks after the National Policy went into operation, the men demanded an increase of wages, but instead of receiving it they were told they must either work one hour every day additional or consent to a reduction of ten per cent., and they consented to the reduction of ten per cent. That continued for some time until they found it necessary to increase the rate of wages, but they only went back to the rate in force during the Mackenzie Administration. Such has been the effect on the rate of wages and on the laboring men, and I have never yet heard of an instance of any increase, and I doubt if any hon. member in this House has heard of an instance where any one of these manufacturers, after the National Policy had gone into operation, or even after he had begun to experience its benefits, of his own will and motion and out of a sense of justice, called his men together and said: "I am making more profit to-day by reason of the National Policy, the cost of your living has increased, and as a matter of justice I think I will admit you to a share of these profits and increase your wages. If any such instance as that has occurred in any part of this Dominion, I think it would be well for the sake of humanity, and especially for the sake of such humanity as exists amongst manufacturers of the class we find described by the Commissioners appointed by the Government, that it should be widely known, that it should be known that there is something to redeem the dark and gloomy features of this hideous policy, something to show that the working people of the country are deriving some benefit from the National Policy. The hon. Finance Minister says that all trades and manufactures have been improved. He declares that the manufacturers did not want to increase the prices, that they never meant to increase the prices, that all they wanted was the market secured to them—and they, high minded, honorable and patriotic men that they are—they would take care that the people had not to pay more for their productions than they would have to pay for the imported article. We are told that everything is now cheaper than it was before, and we are asked to infer that this is due to the magnanimous manner in which the manufacturers are dealing with the people whom they might fleece, but would not because they are so honest and just. The hon. gentleman speaks of the manufactures of boots and shoes, and he states that to-day hand-made boots and shoes are about 15 per cent. dearer than they were. On what basis he made that calculation I do not know, I never heard that they were 15 per cent. dearer. My impression was that the price was about the same, but I suppose he had some data for his conclusion. He said that factory made boots and shoes are cheaper, and he would have us infer that they are cheaper because the National Policy gives the manufacturers the market all to themselves. But they had the market all to themselves before the National Policy. Look at the returns of two or three years ago and you will find that the whole importation of boots and shoes into the Dominion, including British Columbia—to which in those days you could not get boots and shoes from Canada without much trouble—and including baby shoes and so on, which are manufactured at but a few places in the United States—the large factories not troubling about them—were something like $240,000. And to-day we are importing notwithstanding the National Policy, and the importations this year are larger than last year, showing that the National Policy has had no effect because it was in operation last year and it is in operation to-day. Why, then, attempt to mislead the people of the country? The Finance Minister must have known—he cannot help knowing—that the boot and shoe makers had the market to themselves years ago, and that if there was any depression in that trade it was not because of any slaughtering of foreign boots and shoes in the country, but because the purchasing power of the people was diminished at the time, and they could not buy as many boots and shoes as they could a few years before, or as they can at the present time. Some may say that a man must wear boots and shoes, at any rate; but it will happen that a man who is in distress will wear a pair of boots with rents in them which, under better circumstances, he would throw aside. Another article to which the hon. gentleman referred was agricultural implements; but the manufacturers of these implements had the market to themselves before the National Policy, and exported, as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) conclusively showed, a great deal more than they are exporting now. Some of these makers, I believe, were rather annoyed because the Americans for a time sent these implements to Manitoba, when it was almost impossible for our men to send them there at a reasonable cost; but when communication with that country was opened up our manufacturers found themselves able to send agricultural implements there, and as they were able to keep the Americans out of the markets of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, they would have been able to keep them out of Manitoba and the North-West without any change in the policy of the country, other than opening up the territory and rendering it accessible to them as it previously was to the American manufacturers. The Finance Minister said that they are manufacturing more than they were before, though he was forced to admit that the duty on the raw materials presses heavily on those manufacturers, taking out of some of them, as was shown by an hon. gentleman on this side, something like $12,000 a year; and yet, Sir, because they manufacture so many more and send out so many more they are, he said, making greater profits and enjoying a larger income. For the increase, which is a natural increase under the circumstances of the country—an increase which comes from the increase of the arable land brought into cultivation in this country—he would claim credit for his National Policy. The hon. gentleman has spoken of carriages, but I can assure him that carriage makers to whom I have spoken regard the National Policy as purely oppressive in their case, and the hon. gentleman has shown by his own statement that it is so. He says that carriages a few years ago were worth $10, $20, $30 or $40 more than they sell for now, and he says, see what the National Policy is doing for the country. Why, Sir, the carriage makers had the country to themselves before the National Policy. Look at the old returns and you will find that something like $70,000 worth were imported each year, and these mostly consisted of fancy carriages. Ninety-nine per cent. of the work was done in the country and by the people of this country, and they were able to charge higher prices in those days, although now many articles of the raw material are heavily taxed. Some of them, indeed, did clamor for Protection. They thought that the few carriages that were coming into the country should be excluded and that they would get higher prices, but instead of that they are getting lower prices, the cost of the raw material is increased, the production is smaller in our part of the country at least, and the carriage makers complain bitterly of the National Policy. I can assure hon. gentlemen that if they expect the support of many carriage makers at the next election, they will find themselves as woefully mistaken as I hope they will be in other predictions they make. Then the hon. gentleman referred to hats and caps, and to felt hats, and he read a letter from Mr. Green, of Montreal, to show that felt hats are sold more cheaply than they could be imported. It seems to me that that gentleman learned his lesson from the Minister of Finance or from the Minister of Railways. Perhaps he did not know that he was learning a lesson, for some people take in knowledge and imbibe ideas without knowing exactly how they get them, and then imagine they are their own. But his ideas are the ideas of hon. gentlemen opposite, who argue, not that any article is sold as cheaply in Canada to-day as it could be imported under the old Tariff, but that it is cheaper to-day than it was seven or eight years ago. When the hon. gentleman came to cottons he admitted that some particular cottons are a little dearer, but you must remember, he says, that the cost of the raw material has increased while the price of the manufactured article is no more in any case than the increase of the price of the raw material, and in some cases it is less. He very conveniently forgot to say anything about the raw material when he came to talk of woollens. When he tells us that the woollen cloth is cheaper than it was ever before in Canada, and puts that forward as a proof that the National Policy does not increase the cost of such articles, he does not tell us that the price of wool has fallen some 20 cents a pound or thereabouts, or that the price of those goods has fallen so low in other countries that the manufacturers, though so highly protected, cannot charge any more than they are doing. I would like to know how many cases there are in which the manufacturers charge less than the cost of importation plus the duty. I believe that where the articles are at all of equal quality there are scarcely any such cases. The only case which the hon. Minister of Finance put in such a light is the case of the knitting yarn of Mr. Parks, of the city of St. John. We had that case talked about all through the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman told us that horse shoe nails were at first sold very cheaply, because the persons manufacturing them wished to introduce them, and as soon as the market was created they could raise their price. He did not tell the House that the manufacture of this knitting yarn is a very new manufacture in New Brunswick, introduced only within a year or two, and that it is quite possible Mr. Park is trying to follow the example of those horse shoe nails manufacturers, introducing it into the country, and that then, if the National Policy continues to exist, he will advance his price. There is, however, a question as to the possibility of importing these articles, which was very fully discussed in the Lower Provinces; but no rational man, no impartial, intelligent man, who will examine all the evidence on this subject, can have the slightest doubt that the price of warps has advanced in this country to just the point at which the imported article, plus the duty would be sold. That was the only argument by which the hon. gentleman attempted to show that the manufactured article was sold any cheaper than the imported article could be sold. Now, Mr. Speaker, these are the evidences we have of the prosperity of this country. We would like to hear where the ninety new factories are. It would be gratifying for us to know that these new factories have gone up, and that there is a prospect of their securing sufficient support under a revenue

Mr. ANGLIN.

Tariff—because I think it will hardly be contended by any gentleman on the opposite side of the House that for all time to come these industries should be treated as infant industries, and treated as though a Tariff of 17 or 20 per cent., or whatever the necessities of this country may require, would not be sufficient protection for them. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think it a very fine thing that a large number of our people should be converted into servants of that great class which they are building up, who, they boast, spend their money in silks and satins, fine paintings, and all kinds of luxuries—wealth not created by their own skill or industry, but extracted from the hard earnings of the masses of the people. Just see, the hon. gentleman says, what these wealthy men have spent during the past year; and he actually attempted to lead to the inference that because a larger amount is paid in duty to-day than was paid two or three years ago on the finer cloths and silks, therefore the rate of taxation on these articles is more than it was before. He scarcely had the hardihood to put the conclusion in so many words. Now, Sir, where is all the benefit of the National Policy? Who are so wonderfully prosperous in this country? Hon. gentlemen opposite cry continually: oh, the great prosperity of the country—the great contentment of the people of this country—the wonderful progress of the country—the happiness and the surprising growth in wealth of the people of this country. Sir, we are, I suppose, as a whole, better off than we were some years ago; although, unfortunately for the city I come from, we have not felt very much prosperity there. We did a little more business last year than we did the year before, but we were foolish enough to attribute that to the fact that there was in England and in the United States an increased demand for lumber, which gave our ships and our men more employment. We cannot see how the National Policy has anything to do with it, or how it has increased the business of the city. Many a house in the town has the placard “to let” on its windows. The prosperity is not to be found there. It is scarcely to be found in the city of Quebec. I assert as the result of my own observations, that though there may be more employment and greater prosperity in Montreal, and probably a better state of things than in 1879—about which hon. gentlemen opposite talk—yet the condition of affairs to-day is not so good as it was six or seven years ago. There are not so many men employed in that city, nor are there so many living there, the wages are not so good and property is not of equal value. But the hon. gentleman says: “Look at the bank stocks.” Why, the bank stocks, he says, have at present such market prices that to-day they are worth $20,000,000 more than they were worth—when? When Mr. Mackenzie and his associates left office? Not at all. At any time when the hon. member for South Huron administered the affairs of the country? Not at all. But the $20,000,000 was the increase over 1879. Hon. gentlemen opposite promised that the National Policy would increase the value of stocks; but when they got into power, stocks within a few days declined in value $6,000,000. It is with the prices at that point reached after hon. gentlemen opposite assumed office that the Minister of Finance compares the price of to-day, and he claims as a result of the National Policy, an improvement in the prices of stocks. That improvement is caused by the fact that there is to-day, throughout the civilized world, for some reason or other, a superabundance of capital seeking employment. If you look at the stock markets in another way you will form the conclusion that instead of stocks being in a better position now than four, five or six years ago, they are in a very much worse position. Take the favorite stocks in Canada, and you will find that in no instance is the investor receiving more than 5 or 5½ per cent. for his money. The Finance Minister does not care, perhaps, to look at that aspect of the case, but it is an important aspect. Bank stocks are a risky investment. There is no bank in this Dominion or in any other country, no matter how highly esteemed or how well managed, in which the money invested is not, to a certain extent, risked. We every day see banks supposed to be strong and solvent coming to the ground, and men placing their money in bank stocks ought to receive even in the present state of the money market, a return of 7 or 8 per cent.; but these investments in Canada scarcely pay 5 or 5½ per cent. Therefore the estimated improvement in prices is not the only way to test the question as to whether there has been a real improvement in that particular. While on this point let me say that the statement with respect to investments in Government savings banks, as proof of the prosperity of the working classes, is the most fallacious and contradictory of the whole fallacious and contradictory statements made by the Finance Minister. The hon. gentleman speaks of these deposits as if they were all made by the working classes, but he admits that the limit of deposits is placed at $3,000. I suppose there are very few workmen in this country who have $3,000 to spare, but I know there are many large depositors who could not be classed as workmen at all. Only a short time ago I was asked by a friend of mine to advise him about taking $3,000 or $4,000 out of one of the banks that is paying 3 per cent. and transferring it to the savings bank which pays 4 per cent., and I advised him as to the means by which he could effect this exchange. For some time past the banks have had more money than they could profitably lend out, and some time ago they informed their customers that interest on their deposits must be reduced to 3 per cent., and in many cases they refuse to take deposits at all on interest. That is the case with some banks in the city where I reside, and I think it is the case with many banks in the Dominion. The consequence is that people who do not want to invest money in any of those wonderful factories that nobody sees, deposit their money in the savings banks. It may be said that the bank deposits have not diminished but increased. The cause for that it would be exceedingly difficult to determine. Why capital just now is so abundant all over the world, it is not easy to explain; but one reason why it is so abundant, or rather why a great deal of it is idle, is that as yet we have not so far recovered from depression as to have entered into enterprises which would absorb the capital saved during the years of depression, when the people found it necessary to economize, and were taught habits of economy which they have not yet quite forgotten. At all events, as far as the savings banks are concerned, it is absurd to say that deposits are those of working people exclusively. The farmers, we are told, are particularly benefitted by the National Policy, and the reason, according to the Finance Minister, is that they have a much larger home market for their products. The general improvement in business causes an improvement in prices of produce, and enables the people to buy more articles and at somewhat higher prices. I do not think there has been a very material advance in prices. In my own town I know that the prices of lamb, poultry and game have been kept up, or advanced on account of the demand in those same United States which are absorbing a great part of our labor also. Under my own eyes my townsmen are sending away car loads of lamb and turkeys by the ten thousand to the United States market, and, therefore, by reducing the supply here the prices are raised. Probably a similar result appears in other articles and places also. I think it will be found that the increase must be attributed particularly to this cause. I will not deny that the larger amount of money afloat also enables our own people to buy more freely; but I have never heard that our markets have improved very materially in this respect. The hon. gentleman treated us the other day to a calculation, made up of guess-work estimates, as to the increased number of hands employed by reason of the National Policy.

He visited some factories, and in some found additional hands, and calculated somehow that the average increase was 17 per cent.; then he calculated there would be 17 per cent. increase in all the large factories, and coolly assumed the increase would be about 17,000 persons. Then there are 7,000 more employed in the new factories of which we know so little. We do not know half-a-dozen of them in fact; he told us also that in the factories to be established, there would be some 3,000 more employed, making altogether 27,000. And though he has under his own eyes the report of the Commissioners appointed by the Government to enquire into the condition of the same factories, and might have learned from it, if not from personal observation, that a very large number of the employes in the larger factories are girls and boys of very tender age, and that in manufacturing towns, when the father is employed in one kind of factory work the children are employed in another, thus two-thirds or three-fourths of the members of some families being employed. So when it was calculated that each employe represented four persons at least, giving an aggregate of over 100,000, that peculiar process of calculation was such as only the present Finance Minister could employ.

An hon. MEMBER. Captain Bobadil's.

Mr. ANGLIN. Perhaps so. It is so long since I have read of Captain Bobadil's exploits I am not very clear as to their character, but I think he disposed of whole brigades by challenging one after another. Now, Sir, will any living man really come to the conclusion that 100,000 additional people have been brought into our cities and towns because of the National Policy. We have not got them in any city or town in New Brunswick. Even Moncton, of which they have been bragging so much as illustrating the benefits of the National Policy, I believe has not so many inhabitants to-day as it had the year those hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. St. John has not as many by thousands. Quebec, I believe, has not as many by thousands, though it shows an increase in the last Census. Montreal has not as many by thousands. We were told wonderful things about the growth of Hamilton. I hope they are true, but my impression in the first place was that the authority was of a very questionable character, and that the whole thing was got up for a partizan purpose. Then this report makes the condition of Hamilton, the character of its factories, the amount of money invested in them and the number of men employed before the National Policy, very much worse or less than they actually were; and I believe it makes the number of men employed to-day and the amount of money invested to-day much larger than they actually are. It would require a great deal of proof to convince me that the products of the factories of Hamilton had increased from $3,000,000 to $7,000,000 in the time stated—though I hope it is true. We know that Toronto is a growing town, but I think the hon. member for Centre Huron read from papers to show that in many districts in the Province of Ontario the population has actually diminished within ten years, the diminution having taken place within the last two or three years at the outside. Then people began to go out. To-day they are going out in numbers, not as large perhaps as a year or two ago: they continue to go from all parts of the Eastern Provinces, and in many cases they go, not to the Canadian North-West, but to the United States. So much for the increased population and the increased home market for the farmer, for which the hon. gentleman takes credit in his speech. My impression is that to-day the population of all the towns of the Dominion is no larger than it was before the National Policy, while in many towns it is much smaller. Has the National Policy increased the price of wheat, barley or rye to the farmer? These are all taxed. We have protective duties on articles of which we have a large surplus to export, the prices of which must necessarily be regulated by the prices in the markets to which we send our surplus of these articles. Where do we get the increased price? The Minister of Finance told us that circumstances may arise which would lead to an enhancement of the price of Canadian wheat and flour in the Canadian market. Either we may have a short crop, or what is more likely to be the case, we may have shipped at a particular season of the year so much that what is left will be insufficient for the needs of the people; and when we reach that point he admits that the price will go up, perhaps as much as the equivalent to the duty. He admits that, although the increase will be confined to a particular season in the whole year it will amount to ten cents a barrel on all the flour used in Canada during the year. Now, that is a considerable tax, it means a large sum of money in the year on all the flour used in Canada. But he says this increased price goes into the pockets of the farmers. Does that hon. gentleman know so little of the course of trade in this country and all other countries as not to be aware that by the time that state of things comes to pass in any year nearly all the grain is out of the hands of the farmers? Do the farmers of Ontario hold their wheat on speculation until the next spring? I think not. So far as my enquiries have gone the farmers sell nearly all their wheat within a few months, as fast indeed as they can thresh it. There is another point the force of which will be perceived by any man acquainted with the course of trade. If any considerable quantity of grain remains in the hands of the farmers, the price will not advance. But it is not the farmers who receive the benefit of any such advance as that. In the Maritime Provinces the people have to pay an enhanced price for their food, but that enhanced price does not accrue to the profit of the farmer but to the profit of the trader and the speculator, who are of the class of men particularly favored by the present Tory Administration. Now, what else? He says there is more demand for rye, as distillers now use it more largely. He does not say they pay a higher price for the rye. He does not pretend to say that they absorb all the rye of the country, which would be the case if the Tariff had added to its value; but can any man in his senses imagine that it is of the slightest moment to a farmer whether he sells his rye to a man who distills whiskey in Toronto or elsewhere, or to a man who intends to export it if the price be the same. Where is the benefit of the home market in that case? Did not the Minister in making such a statement attempt to cajole and deceive the people, whom to-day the Minister of Railways described as the intelligent and independent farmers of Canada? Does he suppose that the intelligent and independent farmers of Canada are to be misled by such sophistries and fallacies as have been propounded to them by hon. gentlemen opposite? It is true that some of them were deceived once and misled by men whom they had never trusted before, by men in whom they had no confidence when they voted for them. They said, we will try what will be the results of a change; we cannot be much worse. They made the trial very much in the same way that a sick person, who has been told by his physician that he will recover, but that his recovery will be slow, tries a quack, in whom he has no confidence even when he tries him. Some of the people in the country tried hon. gentlemen opposite whom I have no idea of insulting when I call them quacks—I mean that they are political quacks—charlatans of the worst description—but they will never trust them again as they never trusted them before. Farmers as a class are intelligent and sensible men. They never trusted in the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite, but the man who has been fooled once and knows it is not likely to be fooled again. The Minister of Railways, as well as the Minister of Finance, says: "We have not only imported a larger quantity of foreign wool, but the exportation of Canadian wool has been reduced by over 1,000,000 lbs.—just see what a large home market we are creating." But the farmers suffer if they are only getting half the price for wool that they got before, while the prices of sugar, woollen and cotton cloth, and many other articles are higher than they were before. If the National Policy regulates the price of these articles and makes them higher, why does it not give the farmers a higher price for their wool? Men do not go on producing any article which they find it unprofitable to produce; and although wool may be profitable at 40 cents a pound, it may be a losing business to grow it at 20 cents a pound. If these hon. gentlemen had the interest of the farmers so deeply at heart, why did they not put a duty on wool? Why did they leave it on the free list the first year, and last year, when they found it necessary to please or to delude the farmers a little, impose a duty on the wool we do not use in the country, and put no duty on the wool we import? The wool used by the manufacturers comes in free. They are not bound by any provision of this National Policy—they are not forced to use the wool produced by the people of Canada. We were told, when that objection was first taken to the Tariff, that the farmers would have their home market, and the price would be kept up, so that they would have no need of any protection. Duties are imposed on wheat, barley, rye, and other things which are not imported at all. Hides come in in large quantities, and why are hides not taxed? Forty or fifty per cent. on hides would add very materially to the value of every hoof on a farm in this country. But that would not do; the farmers are to be humbugged and cajoled, but the farmers are not to be protected. Cheese sells very well now, but since the National Policy went into operation the best cheese could be bought at five or six cents per pound; for a whole season it was a drug in the market.

Mr. BOWELL. This year?

Mr. ANGLIN. No, I did not say this year, I said since the National Policy came into operation.

Mr. BOWELL. What year?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In 1879.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). In 1850.

Mr. ANGLIN. I say that since the National Policy came into operation it was a drug in the market. The National Policy did nothing for cheese, it left the duty where it was before. I do not know that it could do anything for cheese, but hon. gentlemen might have tried to do something. The omnipotent National Policy they say can do anything. Talk of asking for bread and getting a stone; it can convert the stone into bread. The limits of the power of the National Policy are inconceivable and incalculable. It extends beyond space, it controls the heavens. The dew that falls from heaven falls as the National Policy directs; the rain drops as the National Policy directs; the sun shines as the National Policy directs, and what the fields yield the National Policy controls and directs. Why, then, should it not control the cheese market and give farmers a good price for their cheese? Will hon. gentlemen opposite tell us seriously that in regard to a single article the farmers of this country get a cent more than they would have received if the National Policy had never been heard of: got more even for their cabbages, their turnips, their poultry, their lambs and their veal as the Finance Minister asserts? Now, Sir, we say that the National Policy, instead of being a benefit to the people of this country as a whole, or to any large class of the people, is the greatest curse that could befall them. Look through the whole country, and find if you can, what industry is benefitted by it. They say our anticipations have been falsified; that our calculations all failed. We said the very day that this policy was introduced that it would have this effect: it would encourage the production of cottons, it would stimulate the making of woollens of a certain class; it would probably lead to the establishment of refineries sufficient to refine all the sugar we want in the country, and would enable the proprietors of establishments of that kind—unless they are greater fools than people generally take them to be—to take out of the pockets of the people, not legitimate prices for their productions, not a fair profit on their capital, on their enterprise, on their labor, but to realize profits beyond all conception. Forty, fifty, and sixty per cent. is freely talked of as dividends actually earned by some of those establishments to-day. The fact that such enormous amounts of money have been taken out of the pockets of the poor people, for it is mainly they who pay the heavy taxes, is heralded as a matter for triumph. They say, look at our surplus and our great factories? Did they say, look how the surplus is obtained? They talk eloquently of the great buildings, such as the Hudon Factory, where children of eight or ten years of age, are kept working eleven long hours a day for four days in the week, and if I remember rightly thirteen hours a day for the other two days in the week. Those magnanimous men, those great patriotic men, those men who desire to increase the welfare of the working classes and think nothing of dividends, were yet willing to grind the sweat and blood of the poor children into hard cash, to rob the people and pay children $1 or $1.50 a week for eleven long hours of toil every day. We have to day a reduced population, a people forced to be content with wages lower than they received seven or eight years ago. And in proof of that let me say, in regard to those very coal mines in question, that strikes are in existence, the miners demanding additional wages. A newspaper published in their interest in Halifax states, and I believe truly, that the wages paid to-day are lower than those paid 20 years ago, while the purchasing power of $1 is scarcely equal to that of 50 cts. at that time. If we take the statement of the hon. member for Montreal West, it appears that even the proprietors of factories are not making money, 3 per cent. being about the average rate. Nevertheless the profits are enormous. They pay most miserable wages and some of them grind down the poor people in a shameful way, as is described in the Government report. The manufacturers of agricultural implements, harness, boots and shoes and furniture are suffering from the operation of the Tariff. There may be one or two exceptions, cases in which the duties have been regulated so as to afford the manufacturers protection, and enable them to charge higher prices; but, except these, all the manufacturers are suffering and the farmers are gaining nothing, though, of course, they are doing well in Ontario and the western country, because they have enjoyed abundant crops and obtained large prices by exporting to Europe. For these reasons are they able to go into the cities and towns and buy largely in the shops and elsewhere, the products of home and foreign manufactures, and thus enable the people in these towns, that are prosperous in the west, to live better than in the years just past. Thus the revenue is swelled, and, in addition, we have an enormous taxation to bear, notwithstanding the abolition of duties on tea and coffee and tin, which, according to the hon. Minister of Finance, amount to $1,250,000. We will still have an enormous burden to bear, a burden rendered intolerable from the fact that it is the pride and glory of the Government to boast of a surplus and invest the money in improvements for the benefit of people who are going into the North-West—improvements the cost of which the hon. gentlemen tell us will come back again to our children or our children's children—when they know that neither ourselves, nor our children, nor our children's children will ever see it back. By that expenditure we have an immense monopoly created in the North-

West, and we see that and other monopolies—monopolies small and large—controlling the Government of this country, directing what the Government must do in their interest, changing the line of railway as they choose, and directing what duties shall be imposed, for their benefit, on the people. This is the condition which they describe as glorious, but from which the intelligence and patriotism of the people will relieve this country when they get the opportunity.

Mr. McCALLUM. I have been informed by some of my friends that the hon. gentleman said I had received favors from the Government in the shape of getting my coal free from duty. Did the hon. gentleman make such a statement?

Mr. ANGLIN. I stated that I heard it said repeatedly that the hon. gentleman was allowed to bring coal from the United States free of duty for use on the steamers he employs in the western waters, or something to that effect.

Mr. McCALLUM. I can tell the hon. gentleman that I have neither received nor asked any favors from the Government. As for my conscience, I do not want anybody to be responsible for my conscience. I do not wish to make any remarks before the House at this time of night, but it is a wonder to me that hon. gentlemen opposite do not learn from experience. Here they are the same as they were four years ago. They say that we promised everything. We have said—we must pay the interest of our national debt as honest men, that we wanted money to make improvements in the interest of the country and to pay for legislation, and also that the money should be collected in such a way as to assist the industries of the country as far as possible. I ask every member within the hearing of my voice, is not this Tariff accomplishing these results? Is it not collecting a revenue, paying expenses of the Government, meeting the interest of our debt and assisting the industries of our country at the same time. But hon. gentlemen opposite will not learn; they are still going on with the same old story. The hon. gentleman who just sat down said the country is in a worse state than in 1879. Why, there was one industry that prospered during the time that hon. gentlemen opposite were in power—the soup kitchen—yes, and another, the sheriff's office. I say distinctly if any man can show that I received any favor in any shape from the Government, I will resign my seat in this House—anything in the shape of a coal duty or printing either. It ill becomes that hon. gentleman who, when sitting in your chair, Mr. Speaker, received favors from the Government. I say he should be the last man in the House to accuse me of getting favors, for he must know the statement is not correct. If he did not know he ought to have known it. If he had asked me I would have told him as an honest man that I received no favors from the Government. Do hon. gentlemen opposite want to go back to where we were in 1874 and 1879? Do they want one-sided Free Trade, with no corresponding benefits to Canadians; to give the American farmers the Canadian market, with Canadians shut out from the United States market by their Tariff—a stone wall of 30 per cent. If so, let them speak out plainly. Those hon. gentlemen are very strong in assertions, and while they stick to such as they make, they may expect to come back to the House after the next election with a smaller number than ever, which is now small enough. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down talked of the effect of the Tariff on agricultural implements. I know by experience they are now cheaper than they used to be, and are becoming cheaper and better year by year. There is the same good change in many other articles, including waggons and carriages. We have now got a market in the North-West, a better home for artisans and farmers, and if you keep out competition, you can keep our own people fully employed. What we promised the poor men was to give them full employment if the Tariff was raised to a certain figure, so as to prevent slaughtering goods. It has that effect; and when gentlemen speak in this House about a fair day's wages for a fair day's work, I feel happy in saying that in this country wages are much better than they used to be. I do not say for a moment that the workman is getting too well paid yet, because I would like to see him having all the comforts that it is possible for any man to have; and there is no doubt the day is coming. But I will say this, that they are much more comfortable and prosperous now than they were under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, because they are now fully employed. Even if we admit that the articles they have to purchase cost them a little more, we must remember they are fully employed, and have more money to purchase with, whereas under the Administration of the hon. gentlemen opposite they had neither work nor money, but were starving. But, say they, Providence has done all that; we have had good crops. Well, it is a strange thing that these gentlemen are so unlucky when they come into office. I remember in a former case, when they were in power, we had the weevil in the wheat; and whenever they come into power we have poor crops. We never have any evils in legislation. Now those gentlemen have got to change their tactics; they have got to adopt this policy if they ever expect to succeed in this country and come over to the Ministerial side of the house. I do not say they will do it, though whether any man living to-day will see it or not I do not know. But they must change their tactics; they must work in the interests of Canada; must stop running down their own country; they must stop praising up the adjoining nation, before the good, loyal people of Canada will trust them with the management of their affairs.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would like to know if you obtained the coal for your steamers from the United States free of duty?

Mr. McCALLUM. I tell the hon. gentleman that I did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman should be obliged to me for getting the matter straightened.

Mr. McCALLUM. The matter was straightened before, as the hon. gentleman would have known if he understood plain English, and I always endeavor to speak plainly.

Mr. BOULTBEE moved the adjournment of the debate. Motion agreed to.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 56) to amend the Act 43 Victoria, chapter 69, respecting the Anchor Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Beatty.)

Bill (No. 57) to incorporate the Chignecto Marine Transport and Cape Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. THOMPSON, in moving for leave to introduce Bill (No. 58) to provide that railway passenger tickets shall be available to the holder thereof until used, said: This is a short Bill and explains itself. It provides that all railway tickets issued by all railways over which this Bill has control shall be good until used; in other words, that a person shall receive value for his money. The Bill will be printed in a few days, and then hon. gentlemen will be able to make themselves fully acquainted with it.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

STAMP ACTS REPEAL BILL.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I call the attention of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, to a Bill (No. 63) to repeal the duty on Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange. I was so successful in carrying a Bill the other day without much interruption, that I am emboldened to try it on again, with the assistance of my hon. friend. It is to carry the Act for the repeal of the Stamp Acts. They must be repealed, otherwise the legal obligation of affixing stamps still exists. On consulting with the Law Clerk, and his opinion is endorsed by Mr. Todd, the Bill can be introduced without resolution; and if you agree with those authorities, I shall move, with the unanimous consent of the House, to have the Bill carried. The special reason for which I ask the House to do so, is this: His Excellency the Governor General will be asked to come down and give assent to the Prince Edward Island Bank Bill, and I would like that he be asked to give assent to the two Bills at the same time. I, therefore, move, seconded by Mr. Blake, for leave to introduce a Bill to repeal the stamps on promissory notes. The Bill reads as follows:—

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. No duty shall be payable on any promissory note, draft or bill of exchange, made, drawn or accepted in Canada, after the fourth day of March, in the present year, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two; and from and after the said day the Act passed in the forty-second year of Her Majesty's Reign, and intitled: "An Act to amend and consolidate the laws respecting duties imposed on promissory notes and bills of exchange," shall be repealed: Provided always that all Acts or enactments repealed by the said Act shall remain repealed, and that all things lawfully done, and all rights acquired under the said Act or any Act repealed by it, shall remain valid, and all penalties incurred under them or any of them, may be enforced and recovered, and all proceedings commenced under them or any of them may be continued and completed, as if this had not been passed: And provided also, that all unused stamps lawfully issued under the said Acts or any of them for the payments of any duty hereby repealed, shall after the said day and until the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-two, be received at their face value in payment of any money payable to Her Majesty for the public uses of Canada, or in exchange for postage stamps of like face value.

Mr. BLAKE. I would ask my hon. friend kindly to relieve me from the position of seconder of this motion. I do not at all object to the proposal that we should dispense with all notices and proceed at once to legislate in the direction which the House now intends to legislate; but unless it would embarrass him very much indeed, to find a seconder, I would prefer not to act in that capacity.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would then suggest Sir Charles Tupper, if that will relieve my hon. friend's embarrassment.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite agree that it will be the inevitable result of the proposal of the Minister that this measure should become law at the earliest moment. The announcement of the fact that such a change is in contemplation, and the suggestion in some leading organs of public opinion that it had already taken place, is likely to produce considerable confusion and difficulty unless we legislate according to the intention which has been announced; and, therefore, I quite concur in the view that, whatever is to be the decision of the House, it should be proceeded with immediately, so far as I am individually concerned. I do not know, however, whether the Finance Minister has consulted persons who hold stamps, with a view of ascertaining whether they would not like to retain them for two months or so longer, or whether it would be any advantage to the trade that they should do so.

Mr. MILLS. I do not rise for the purpose of making any objection to the measure. It is one which has, perhaps, been on the whole more inconvenient than unjust; but the First Minister, over and over again, told Parliament, ever since the tax was imposed, that he knew no tax more fair or more justly imposed than this. Now, the hon. gentleman proposes to repeal it, and I think we should have a statement from him why he has changed his views on this particular subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not changed my opinion at all. I think that, for the purposes of revenue, there can be no better means than the Stamp Act. I think that commercial transactions should contribute, and commercial men should contribute, to the revenue as well as the farmers, the mechanics, the manufacturers, and my hon. friend and myself, who are working men; but such is the happy state of Canada, and such is the flourishing state of the revenue, that we have been able to assist various industries and take off various burthens. And we might have gone still further, perhaps, but we could not well have gone much further in the direction of the reduction of taxation without affecting the principle of the protection of the industries of Canada and the encouragement of their development. We have laid that down as a fixed principle, and no attempt will be made to affect or alter the Tariff of Canada if it can be supposed in any way whatever to affect the great principle which was established by the adoption of the National Policy. As we have relieved various classes of men, and as, happily for us, we are in a position to relieve every class of some burthen or other, I think the commercial world has the same right to have a share of the benefits so generally distributed amongst the people of Canada.

Bill introduced and read the first, second and third times and passed.

COLONIZATION SOCIETIES.

Mr. SCOTT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to rescind that clause of the land regulations which provides for the disposal of tracts of lands to colonization societies?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY RATES.

Mr. SCOTT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to arrange, at an early date, the rates to be chargeable for freight and passengers, by the Canadian Pacific Railway, between Emerson and Rat Portage, Winnipeg and Brandon, and intermediate points?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That matter is now being arranged.

WINNIPEG DRILL SHED.

Mr. SCOTT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place, in the further Supplementary Estimates, a sum to assist in the erection of a drill shed in the city of Winnipeg?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The matter is now engaging the attention of the Government.

IMPROVEMENT OF RED RIVER.

Mr. SCOTT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the further Supplementary Estimates to improve that portion of Red River called "The Rapids," between Winnipeg and Selkirk, so that lake vessels can reach the former place at any time during the season of navigation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have no information in the Department relative to the obstructions which exist in the locality mentioned in the question. Their nature and extent can only be ascertained by an examination which I hope will be made during next season.

WATER HEN RIVER NAVIGATION.

Mr. SCOTT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the further Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of improving the navigation of Water Hen River, so that barges and tugs can run between Lakes Manitoba and Winnipegosis?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. To answer this question I would have to enter into more details than I can do now; but when the Estimates come down I shall, perhaps, be able to enter into the question. The intention is, at all events, to have an examination made of that river, which is connected with Lake Winnipegosis as well as Lake Manitoba, and when the Estimates come down I hope the hon. gentleman may find something which may give him an opportunity to enlarge on this subject.

WORKS IN LITTLE RIVER ST. LOUIS.

Mr. BERGERON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to have work done in Little River St. Louis, in the County of Beauharnois, in order to furnish water to manufactories of the city of that name; and if so, when do the Government propose to have the said work done?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I am enabled to state, in reply to the hon. member, that the River St. Louis has been surveyed, but that the Engineer-in-Chief of the Department does not consider that he has sufficient information to enable him to make any report or recommendation to the Department. He has the intention of visiting the locality in person during the coming season, and perhaps the Department will be obliged to employ yet another engineer to see how far the proposed works would affect those on the canal.

BRIGADE CAMPS.

Mr. MACDONELL (Lanark) enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to have brigade camps formed this year; and if so, what proportion of the force do they intend having drill?

Mr. CARON. It is the intention of the Government to have brigade camps this year. We hope to drill about 20,000 men. The camps will be similar to those held last summer.

BREAKWATER AT RED POINT, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. MUTTART enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates, this Session, for the construction of a breakwater at Red Point, in King's County, Prince Edward Island, in compliance with a petition presented to the Department of Public Works?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Department is not in possession of the necessary information to be able to say whether they would recommend the construction of a break-water there; but, most likely, we shall be able, next season, to cause an examination to be made, and to have a report made to the Department.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SOREL.

Mr. MASSUE enquired, Whether the Government proposes to construct, this year, in the town of Sorel, a public building for the purpose of bringing together therein all the public offices?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government has not yet taken into consideration the question of erecting a public building in the town of Sorel, but it has the intention of having the matter looked into during recess, and will send some one to Sorel to report in what state are the buildings occupied by public departments in that town.

SUPREME COURT APPEALS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving that it is expedient that in appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada, the printed records in the Courts below should be accepted for the purpose of the appeal without requiring the reprint of the same matter, said: In this matter it is to be observed that the appeals from the two larger Provinces—the Province of Ontario and the Province of Quebec—to the Supreme Court are from Provincial Courts of Appeal, which Provincial Courts of Appeal, according to their regulations, require the printing of the matter necessary to the determination of the appeal, and the effect of the system at present adopted by the Supreme Court is to impose upon the suitor a wholly unnecessary and very heavy expense. I regret to be obliged to bring this matter under the consideration of the House, but it will be remembered that this is not done hastily, because some years ago the subject was brought to the attention of the Court itself, and subsequently it was discussed in Parliament, and still after that, upon the occasion of the debate with reference to the abolition of the Supreme Court, two years ago, I referred to the same subject in these words:

"There are some points in regard to which discussion has been had formally in this House by which expenses have been reduced. I believe, for example, it would be a proper thing to provide in regard to all cases in which the Court below required that the proceedings shall be printed, that the Supreme Court should accept the printed books and papers. That would involve a very considerable saving."

Notwithstanding these various suggestions, to which I believe there was no dissent, and to which I believe the concurrence and support of the profession in the two Provinces was given, there has not been any action, and the result as I have said, have been cases involving very considerable expense. The system of printing is one which, as those conversant with it well know, involves an enormous expense for a few extra copies of the printed documents. If you order, as in the Court below they usually order thirty or forty copies in excess of the required number, and the printer will supply fifty or sixty copies for the same price, as I am informed by professional persons, whose duty it is to obtain these prints, and under any circumstances, the extra price is but the cost of the white paper and press work, a mere nominal cost. The cost is $1.50 a page according to the usual tariff charges, and, therefore, if you assume that the printed matter in the Court below in an ordinary appeal case is about thirty pages, which I fancy will not be an unreasonable assumption, though I do not speak with authority on that point, there is involved an expense of $45 for reprinting, which is utterly unnecessary. But that is not all, nor is it the larger part of the expense, because the tariff of fees which is prescribed by the Court includes a charge of 30 cents for every 100 words to the lawyer, for the consideration of and settlement and work of his in connection with the printing of the case. If his work were, as it ought to be, to shorten the case, it is not a very good way to pay by the page, because it is no work at all to leave the case as it was, and for every page he shortens it you take about $2 from his remuneration. Human nature will tell you that, under those circumstances, the cases are not shortened, and that what happens—if not invariably, almost invariably, I believe invariably—is, that we have a reprint of the appeal case below, with a certain small addition, a title page, the judgment of the Court below, and a few little et ceteras of that kind added, which of course are necessary and must be paid for. The extra expense to the suitor, in addition to the cost per page, amounts to something close upon $2 more per page, or for an appeal case of thirty pages in the Court below, to $100, which is literally thrown away. There is no useful purpose whatever secured by the expenditure of that $100. My attention was particularly called to the injustice worked by this system, by a large example of it which recently occurred. There was a very heavy case tried in the Court of Appeals of Ontario, which came to the Supreme Court. The book in that case numbers no less than 912 pages, the printing of which cost $1,368, in the Ontario Court of Appeals. It would have cost no more to have brought that case to the Supreme Court if the books had been accepted, than the price of twenty-six extra pages, which, with fees and charges, would amount to $50 or $60. What did it cost? A contract, at a reduced rate, was made for the printing, owing to exceptional circumstances, so that the modest sum, not of $1,368, but of $912 was thrown away in printing. But that is a thing, I am informed, that cannot be repeated, and for the future, if this system continues, we must expect to pay $1.50 per page, or a total sum of $1,378. But the tariff allows, as I have said, $1.93 per page for those 912 pages, the average number of words on a page being 645; and that would add about $1,730 more for the printing of that case, or an aggregate expense of $2,645, to hand into the Supreme Court a fresh print of the matter which had been already printed. Now, it seems to me a disgrace that such a transaction should occur, and most outrageous that suitors should be called upon to pay those large sums for no useful purpose whatever. We ought to agree, I think, that every expenditure, for which there is a reason, should be wholly cut away, and that for those expenditures and services which are useful, reasonable remuneration should be paid; but to continue a system under which there is to be a reprint, the cost of reprinting and of lawyer's expenses in connection with it, amount to $3.50 for every page, seems to me, as I have observed, nothing less than monstrous. It is for these reasons I move this resolution.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I do not think there is any difference of opinion regarding the adoption of the motion of my hon. friend; but, perhaps, there may be a difference of opinion as to whether it is within our functions, and worthy of the dignity of this House, to go into matters of detail such as this is, the subject-matter of which is within the control of the Supreme Court, which can itself order and accomplish the whole object that the hon. member seeks to obtain. All the Supreme Court has to do is to pass an order to the effect that the books printed for the Court below will be received by them, as far as they are good, and that it is unnecessary to reprint them. I hope it is hardly necessary for this House, I venture to doubt whether it is quite consistent with its dignity, to enter into a discussion of this subject and dictate to the learned Judges of the Supreme Court what they should do on what is really an insignificant matter of practice. There is another way I wish the difficulty could be obviated, and it is adopted by the leading practitioners having business in that Court, namely, when printing books for the Court of Appeal of Ontario they strike off a double number; instead of fifty they print 100 in all important cases in which there is a reasonable probability that they will go to the Supreme Court, the simple result being that they have to pay for the paper and press work for the extra fifty copies, and when the cases go to the Supreme Court a title page, the reasons of appeal and the requisite additional matter is added. While no hon. member will object to this resolution being adopted, I venture to doubt whether it is either expedient, or our duty, to waste the time of the House in discussing it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When this motion was up the other day, I mentioned that the hon. the Minister of Justice had called the attention of the Judges of the Supreme Court to the subject. I hold in my hand a memorandum from the Chief Justice and the Judges on the matter, in which they state that the Court has had frequently to call attention to the unnecessary amount of printing matter not required by the rules, and has been compelled in several cases to direct the Registrar to refuse to allow such printing to be taxed as costs, I will not detain the House by reading this memorandum, but will hand it to my hon. friend for perusal.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very glad that the hon. leader of this House and the hon. Minister of Justice in the other House, consider that the matter is not so unworthy the attention of Parliament as to be set aside. I always have been of opinion that it is unfortunate we should have to notice these questions, and agree with the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron), that it is quite within the competence of the Supreme Court to remedy this grievance; but I stated that several years ago the attention of the Court was called to it, and it was brought up in Parliament two years ago, as well as three or four years ago. If, therefore, nothing has been done after a lapse of four years, and in the meantime money is being expended uselessly, I do not think it is too early now to bring this subject again before the House and spend ten minutes of time in saving an expenditure of several thousand dollars to the suitors of this country.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Halton). I agree very much in the opinion of my hon. friend behind me, that it is not the business of this House to concern itself about the internal management of any particular high court in the procedure which may take place before it. If any abuses occur there is a means of applying the remedy without the necessity of discussing them in this House, where very few of us can have any considerable amount of knowledge respecting the details involved. I have made enquiries, as well as my hon. friend opposite, regarding the printing of material for the Supreme Court, because I had also observed the very ponderous volumes printed in that Court in connection with the case shortly to be argued and decided there; but I ascertained that the rules of the Court were not in fault at all. If any fault existed, it belonged to the solicitors in the case, because it was for them to say what matter they wished to be printed and used there. There is no rule of that Court requiring that anything but the case should be printed at all. Exhibits may be brought in manuscript, and there is no rule, at all events, against the use of printed cases from the Courts below. It is necessary that the judgments of those Courts should be before the Supreme Court, which has to reverse or confirm those judgments, as it is necessary it should be in possession of the reasons for and against the appeal; but it is not the fault of the rules of the Court if it results from our own statute that the Supreme Court must have before it the cases from which appeal is taken. The whole matter is in the hands of the counsel engaged, and the question is whether it is any particular grievance with which Parliament should interfere that the parties in litigation should make more expense than is necessary. There is another view from our standpoint that may be well considered. It is not desirable that all the cases which arise in the inferior courts should be appealed, and I think it is no great disadvantage that there should be some obstacles in the way of such appeals; and if parties will carry these cases to the court of last resort, I do not think the general public will be much concerned should they have to incur considerable costs in securing their object.

Motion agreed to.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement of the number of persons in each electoral district counted in the Census, &c., though absent from the place at which they were counted, said: On a former occasion, during last Session, I indicated my opinion that it was extremely important that the arrangements for taking the Census should be such that there would be some statement of the persons who were counted, although absent from the place where they were counted. It was known that very considerable difficulty existed in ensuring any measurable degree of accuracy in the application of the de jure system to such a statement. So much difficulty exists in informing the minds, guiding the judgment, and ensuring accuracy of understanding when matters of discretion and opinion are involved, that that was granted. I believe from what I have been able to learn from information communicated to me in various parts of the country, that all sorts of opinions have prevailed in the minds of enumerators as to the mode in which they should count the population. In some cases they have counted every person who belonged to a house, even although that person had been a very long time resident in foreign parts, unless the head of the household would say he was quite sure the person was not coming back. In other instances, men who have been absent eight, ten, or twenty years, have, as I have been informed by persons in the locality who were familiar with the circumstances, been counted. It is not unnatural that such results should occur, because it is impossible, with such a vast army of enumerators to be instructed, that mistakes and misinterpretations of directions should not take place. But a corrective element would have been, and I hope has been, introduced, if the Census has been taken on the principle that each enumerator noted in a separate column every person who was counted although absent; because with that protection we could understand in any particular locality when there was an abnormal counting of the persons not present; and well understood laws of average, as applied to the ordinary circumstances of the country, would point to the cases in which it was likely there was a misinterpretation of instructions, thus affording ground for further enquiry and the correction of errors of this description. I hope, therefore, that steps have been taken of this kind, and that the hon. gentleman will be able to bring down that for which I ask—a statement of the number of persons in each electoral district counted in the Census, though absent from the place at which they are counted.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I do not remember the circumstance the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) has spoken of in alluding to this matter last year. When the schedules were laid on the Table, all were produced, and the hon. gentleman did not propose any amendment. It is true, it was most unpopular, and that no unnecessary questions were given—no more were put than were thought necessary for the country. With that principle in view, I cut down the question as much as possible—enough to do away with one whole schedule, almost all dispensed with, failed to elicit answers that amounted to anything. For that reason, I must say, it is quite impossible to bring down the information asked for. There was no column for the purpose in question; I may say, and without answering all the remarks of the hon. gentleman at present, that the Census of Canada was taken from 1841 to 1861, by taking all the people found. All strangers were admitted as well as those absent. Consequently, you found, in 1871, the public disappointed at the number of people reported in Canada. Necessarily there could not have been so much of an increase in 1871, since we adopted the principle of leaving strangers out. From 1871 to 1881, there was as large an increase as any one could have expected.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says he has not got the information. You cannot at all tell how many persons were counted absent?

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. BLAKE. I am very sorry for this; I understood that the Censuses prior to 1871 were on the de facto principle.

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. BLAKE. Were on the de jure principle?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. It is entirely uncertain then, under the circumstances, what our population numbers. Nobody can tell by this mode of taking the Census the actual number of our Canadian population. I know an instance of a near relative of my own, whose case will throw some light on this point. He was the son of a family, who, at the age of three, was adopted by another person, and was removed 120 miles; and from the age of three to the age of twenty-one he lived 120 miles away in the family of his adopted parents. But the Census taker who went to his parents' family, insisted on counting him there. Of course, he was also counted in the other place.

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes. He was an inmate of the house of his adopted parent, and had been a resident for eighteen years; he was a grown up man at the time, and my friend objected to the young man being counted there, and said: "Why, you will be counting in your Census so-and-so at that rate, including many who have gone to the States ten or fifteen years and settled in the west." "Why, of course," replied the Census taker, "I have counted them."

Mr. POPE. If the hon. gentleman will give me the name of this worthy individual, I will find out whether he was counted in both places. The system of Census taking we adopted is the only true one. What do you want to arrive at? What is the object of a Census at all? It is to give the true population of the country; the people who would befriend its strength if invaded; who really belong to it. If we were to take the de facto principle, injustice would be done. My hon. friend said, the other day, there was no Federal country in the world where the de jure system prevails. It prevails in most countries, including the United States and Germany, which take the Census as we do. Supposing an exhibition was going on in Toronto or Montreal, and 5,000 people from either city happened to be visiting the other, would you follow the de facto system? If so, an injustice might be done either city. Where you have such a revenue and provincial system as ours, you can properly follow no other than the de jure system. As a general rule it is the best. My hon. friend said, the other night, I intended to do injustice to Ontario as regards Nova Scotia. If you took the Census on the other principle you would do a very great injustice to Nova Scotia. Ontario had, in 1871, out of a population of 1,600,000, but 3,865 fishermen and mariners, while Nova Scotia, with a population of less than 400,000, had 18,636 fishermen, who are a good deal of the time away from home. If you took the de facto system, you would lose those people altogether, and deprive the Province of one constituency.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a detailed statement of all deposits of money made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, with the date of such deposit and the terms wherein the same was made, and the rate of interest payable thereon. Also for a detailed statement of any purchases made by the Company from the Government, with prices and terms. He said: I wish to state that this motion includes very specially purchases of lands, stores and supplies which were agreed to under the original contract.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This return, or a part of it, applies to a matter in the Finance Department, and another belongs to the Railway Department. There is no objection in bringing down the information asked for.

Motion agreed to.

LONDON POST OFFICE CLERKS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for all correspondence, reports, and Orders in Council, relating to J. J. Ross and J. Gordon, late clerks in the London post office, and to their superannuation, said: I may observe that the hon. Postmaster General promised me, the other day, that the return I moved for would be brought down, but a considerable time has elapsed without that being done. The papers I now move for have connection with the same transaction. They involve the superannuation of the officers, accomplished about the same time as the superannuation of the late postmaster, and I should like them brought down as rapidly as possible; also the other papers to which I alluded.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. These papers are being prepared with all despatch.

Motion agreed to.

WINTER TERMINUS OF THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for copies of petitions, memorials, letters and telegrams in respect to measures being taken to ensure to the Maritime Provinces the winter terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said: I intended to move this resolution the other day, but I let it stand over on account of the absence of the hon. Minister of Finance, who had had some communications with regard to the subject. I am sorry he is not here to-day either, but this is too important a matter for us to allow it to remain without getting some information. In the Lower Provinces we have always looked forward to becoming, at some day, the winter terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway; but we suddenly found ourselves, the other day, in a position to expect that such would not be the case. The members of the Syndicate, or some parties connected with them, have held some preliminary meeting in Portland in regard to the matter, and, of course, this naturally puts everybody on the qui vive to know what was the intention of those interested. Finally, our people in New Brunswick, having been endorsed by the press of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, took the matter up, and memorialized the Dominion authorities with respect to this matter. This subject is taken up by myself in the most unselfish manner, because it is a matter of indifference to us where the winter terminus is, whether in Nova Scotia or in New Brunswick, so long as it is a port of the Maritime Provinces. If it is in Nova Scotia, naturally New Brunswick gets her share of the business and vice versa. But for us to be left in a state of suspense is damaging to trade in the Lower Provinces. I cannot for a moment believe, that the result we fear will actually take place, namely, that the trade of the North-West will be diverted from the Lower Provinces after we have spent so much money to build up that great country under the National Policy. I, therefore, feel it my duty, in the meanwhile, to move for these papers, in order that we may have before us all the information in the possession of the Government and elicit from the proper quarter some details as to what is likely to be the final determination in the matter. As I stated before, I do not believe for one moment that it is the intention of the Government to allow the Lower Provinces to be cut off from all benefit from the trade of the North-West; because we were led to believe, when we entered Confederation, that our towns in the Lower Provinces should become the Liverpool's of the Dominion, and that our seaports would receive the trade coming over the great inter-provincial line from British Columbia. Therefore, without saying anything else, and without knowing exactly what may have passed between the petitioners and the Government, I beg to move for these papers.

Motion agreed to.

PROVINCIAL CONSTITUTIONS.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved for charters or constitutions granted by the Crown or the Imperial Parliament to the Provinces of Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, British Columbia and Vancouver Island; also, copies of all Acts, charters, royal instructions, commissions, Orders in Council or despatches, altering or amending the same, as originally granted, or conferring or withdrawing any political rights or privileges before or after the granting of such charters. He said: My object in moving for these documents is to endeavor to obtain, in some comprehensive form, copies of all such documents relating to the early history of the country as are mentioned in the motion. It is, at present, I believe, impossible to obtain in the Library here, copies of many of those original documents, which should be accessible to every one. I have consulted the Librarian in regard to the matter since putting the notice on the paper, and he informs me that some of the documents may be amongst the archives in one of the other Departments; and, if so, I think they should be lodged with the Librarian or put in his charge. Some of the privileges conferred on these colonies were conferred simply by a despatch. In several cases the original Local Assemblies were only convened on the authority of a despatch. That despatch, of course, conferred certain political rights, which will not be found in the particular charter respecting that Province. It appears to me that it would be exceedingly desirable to have all such documents bound in one volume together, and if the hon. gentleman opposite would give his attention to the matter, as I think he will, such a volume would be a welcome addition to the historical documents in the possession of Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I was under the impression that all such documents were in some part or other of the numerous publications we have in the Library; but I find that the hon. gentleman has ascertained that that is not the case. Of course the object of the motion is one which I think of very great importance indeed, and the only thing to be considered is the best way of collecting these documents. Might not the best means of getting them be through the Library Committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE. It might be.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Those who make collations of these documents will know how many there are and what ones are wanting, and I have no doubt they can be procured from the different colonies, from England, or perhaps from the Departments here, or in Toronto. I quite agree that the object is one of sufficient importance to warrant the hon. gentleman in making the motion, and I shall be glad to give him every assistance in carrying it out.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved for copies of all statements, showing approximate quantities of the several classes of work, which were submitted to any parties tendering for the construction of the railway between Port Moody and Yale; also copies of any conditions imposed upon tenderers other than those asserted in any public advertisement asking for tenders. He said: I have observed, in some of the public newspapers, statements to the effect that the hon. the Minister of Railways had procured an approximate estimate of the work on the Port Moody and Emory's Bar section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, subsequent to the publishing to intending tenderers, of the one upon which the tenders were supposed to have been made. I make no charge of the kind myself, but I have seen the statement published broadly in the newspapers, and I have moved for copies of all such approximate estimates in order to ascertain whether any such documents exist, and whether, if such calculations were made, any of the contractors received information from them which others did not receive. The tenders were accepted in a lump sum, and therefore, information of this kind would be of the utmost value to all intending contractors, and if any one obtained possession of information which was not in the possession of every one of the parties tendering, the only thing that can be done, and ought to be done, is to cancel the whole contract and ask for tenders afresh. I will not touch on other points connected with the letting of this contract, because I intend to do that at a subsequent period and in another way.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, in reference to this matter, that the hon. gentleman will require to change his motion in order to obtain any of the papers, because there are no such papers as the motion refers to. There are no "statements showing approximate quantities submitted to any parties tendering." The Department distinctly avoided submitting quantities of work to any parties, and all parties were alike authorized to obtain any information that was in the possession of the Department by looking at the statement of estimates and quantity of work made by the engineers. If the hon. gentleman will strike out the words "submitted to any parties, &c.," I will have great pleasure in bringing down all the papers to which the motion refers. But as no papers were submitted to any parties tendering it would be impossible to bring them down. The papers containing all the information in the possession of the engineer in charge of this work were at the service and disposal of any intending contractor, and he could have access to them, and could see them in the Department. All the tenderers were informed to that effect, and all were treated, as I need not tell the hon. gentleman, in precisely the same manner.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am willing that the motion should be changed as the Minister suggests.

Mr. BLAKE. Were the papers seen by the parties?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; by all intending tenderers. They were all informed of the plans, estimates and profiles; everything showing the quantities of the work as ascertained by the surveyors was at the disposal of every one of them, but no quantities were submitted to them, because they were informed that they must make the tender on their own information. We would not, of course, be responsible for a statement of quantities; otherwise a great number of questions would arise when the work came to be performed as to whether the work were greater or less, &c.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says that all the contractors were told that they might see whatever was there, and if that were so they were placed upon an equal footing. I am anxious to know whether, as a matter of fact, all the tenderers did look at the papers in the Department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I presume so.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman is not aware?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Some tenders were signed by parties in British Columbia who were not here, and perhaps were not represented here; but all parties had an equal opportunity, as the papers were equally accessible to all.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

METEOROLOGICAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex), in moving for a detailed statement showing the amounts paid for the Meteorological Service of Canada during the years 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880 and 1881, said: I do not make this motion with any desire to find fault with the very moderate amount which has been expended for this important service during these years, but rather with the view of suggesting that certain improvements might be made which would render the service more effective. These improvements would involve a certain amount of expenditure, which, however, would be more than compensated for by the advantages which would result. The first and most important of these improvements would be to have the forecasts issued at midnight. At present these forecasts only reach the Maritime Provinces after half the day is over, at about one o'clock in the afternoon. The bulletins are only posted in Ontario between ten and eleven o'clock, long after the parties interested, especially shipping men, have started on their day's work. If the forecasts were printed at midnight there would be a little more expenditure for telegraphing, but they could be sent throughout the whole Dominion and published in every morning paper, while the bulletins could be posted at every telegraph office and railway station as soon as they were opened in the morning. This would be a great benefit, not only to our shipping interests, but to our agricultural, forwarding, and commission interests. I have a letter here from a friend who tells me that, in conversation with a large commission merchant in Toronto, largely interested in shipping, he was assured by that gentleman that the public had no idea of the large amount of property annually saved to the country by this system of storm warnings, and he mentioned several instances in which he considered his vessels had been saved by paying proper attention to the storm signals. I think also that the system of coast telegraphy might be extended to our lake regions. If cables were extended to Manitoulin Island, the storm signals would be available for our shipping at the head of Lake Huron, and if telegraph lines were run to the lighthouses at Point Pelée and Long Point, on Lake Erie, and to those at South Bay and Presqu'Isle, on Lake Ontario, so that the storm signals might be displayed to passing vessels, it would be a great benefit to the shipping interests. Not only would disasters be averted by the warnings of approaching storms, but if loss did occur, more prompt means would be used for securing assistance, and thereby the actual loss sustained would be greatly lessened. A great deal of money has been spent on our gulf telegraph system; and if the small amount I suggest were expended—only a small amount would be required—it would be of great practical benefit to the shipping interests on our inland waters. I would draw the attention of the Government to the remarks made by the late Superintendent of the Meteorological Service in the last report that gentleman laid before the Department of Marine. He says:

“Although, owing to the limited funds placed at my disposal, it is impossible to do all that is desirable in the way of placing information and conclusions regarding the weather immediately before the public, I trust that the efforts already made in this direction will be appreciated.

“The great interests which the country has at stake in its shipping has led me in the past to pay as much attention as possible to the prompt issue and publication of storm warnings. There is still, however, much to be accomplished in this branch of the service. The accuracy of the warnings has, as already stated, gradually increased, and the time has now come when it would be advisable to make this information available at all points of the coast at which there is any shipping. Dr. Fortin's scheme will do much in this direction, but there are still many points which are not reached. Were only two or three vessels saved it would more than pay for the cost of the whole service.

“To increase our knowledge of meteorology, and especially of the laws of the formation and progress of storms, it is necessary that we should obtain observations taken at sea. Other countries have paid special attention to the subject of maritime meteorology; but in Canada nothing has been done, the time and energies of the office being taken up in other directions. Considering, however, that the shipping interest occupies such a prominent position among the interests of the country, and now that our storm warnings and probabilities are an assured success, an effort might be made to obtain information from parts of the ocean which few except Canadian vessels traverse—particularly between Nova Scotia and the West Indies. In England there is a special department of the meteorological office presided over by a superintendent who devotes his sole attention to this work, and which, in addition to discussing general questions of ocean meteorology, publishes from time to time instructions for aiding mariners in their navigation, and also for avoiding severe storms. Charts are also issued showing the prevalent winds in different parts of the ocean during each month in the year. Similar information is collected by the ships of European and other countries, and also by those of the United States.

“Before it was thought possible to predict the weather with any certainty, the agricultural interests received most attention; but in Canada agricultural meteorology has unfortunately fallen somewhat into the background, much reliable information, which would have been of very great value for disseminating among intended immigrants, might have been collected, and would have aided greatly in the settlement of the North-West.

“To collect information available for agricultural purposes we require a very large increase in the number of stations at which observations are taken of the rainfall and general weather, and a smaller number at which temperature observations are also taken. The study of the influence of the weather on crops should prove of great interest to the farming population of Canada.”

In the part of the country where I reside, the weather bulletins have proved very satisfactory. American vessel owners and master mariners are in the habit, in the Detroit and St. Clair rivers, of crossing over to Sarnia and Windsor to ascertain what the reports from the Toronto Observatory are, apparently placing more reliance on our reports than on those found at Port Huron or Detroit, which come from Washington. At an interview with leading mariners, interested in our inland shipping, I was requested to bring this matter under the notice of the hon. the Minister of Marine and the Government, and to urge upon them the necessity of establishing telegraph lines and storm signals at the points I have mentioned on Lake Ontario and Lake Erie. The expense of running wires to the lighthouses on Long Point and Point Pelée would be very small, and the establishment of storm signals would do very much to protect vessels traversing our inland waters.

Mr. PLUMB. Living as I do on the border of Lake Ontario, and knowing as I do something of the great importance of this work, I wish to add my voice to what has been said by my hon. friend in favor of extending this service so far as the Government think it possible to do so. I have an intimate acquaintance with the gentleman who now so ably presides over that Department. I believe him to be thoroughly conversant with the work, and I trust that the Government will see their way to deal liberally with him, and to extend the service of which he has charge, with advantage both to the agricultural and the commercial interests of the country. The great difficulty under which that gentleman labors has been referred to by my hon. friend—that of the want of the means necessary to establish an efficient night service by getting information from all parts of the country. This is a point which has been strongly urged by Mr. Carpmael himself, and it is obvious to every one that, if it is worth while to do the work at all, it is worth while to do it thoroughly, even if it is somewhat more expensive to the country. Of the predictions which had been made by this service more than 80 per cent. had been verified. The modern improvements by telegraph, their acquaintance with the law of storms, and knowledge of the course pursued, of the storm movements, which are heralded by the difference in the atmospheric pressure, enable these gentlemen to predict with great certainty, for at least twenty-four hours in advance, any great atmospheric change. We are so accustomed to see these predictions, that we make our calculations accordingly, and seldom find they are wrong. The gentleman who is in charge of the Observatory put into my hands last year a memorandum showing the exact course of the great storm in which the steamer Waubano was wrecked in Georgian Bay. The course of that storm was predicted, and the prediction proved accurate in almost every essential particular. If the information could have been transmitted at an earlier hour to the point from which that steamer started, the lamentable loss of life and destruction of property that resulted would have been avoided, as well as other destruction of property which occurred in the vicinity during the storm. That loss would have compensated for any additional expense to which the Government would have been subjected in making the service as efficient as it could be made. I cannot dwell too strongly on the fact that this is a matter which has not yet claimed the amount of public attention and favor to which it is entitled. It is not only a matter of great importance to the commercial interests, but to every farmer, especially during the harvest time. If these reports were posted at the village post office, or other special points to which the farmer is daily accustomed to go, thousands of dollars would be saved to our agricultural community, during the time of gathering in the harvest, through the mere fact of knowing, six, ten or twenty hours in advance, that any change of weather was going to take place. The information given by this service should be disseminated everywhere. Up to last year the sum at the control of the Superintendent of the Observatory was insufficient to enable him to use the information in his power in the most effective manner. It seems to me that a small addition in the yearly Estimates would probably effect so advantageous a change in the system, by enabling the Superintendent to get out his reports in time, that it would be one of the most effective and essential services that the Government could do; not only to the commercial but to the farming interests of the country. I trust the few feeble words with which I have endeavored to back up my hon. friend's application, and enforce the arguments he has used, will be of some avail in calling the attention of the Government and this House, and through this House the public, to the great use of that work and the great necessity which devolves upon us, now that we have the means in our hands, to make the most effective use of that means.

Mr. McLELLAN. The information asked for, will be found in the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The object the hon. gentleman had in view was to call the attention of the House to the value of this service. I am satisfied this service is of great value to the country, and as the public learn to be guided by the warnings issued by that branch of the Department, the Government will be called on to pay more attention to the service and render it more efficient. A very large expenditure is incurred by telegraphic messages, but I am satisfied that something in addition in the direction indicated might be of value.

Mr. PLUMB. Simply to get the night service, that is all we want.

Mr. McLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. BUNSTER. It affords me much pleasure to hear the hon. Minister say the Government will give more attention in the future, to the motion before the House, and I hope in so doing he will not neglect British Columbia.

Motion agreed to.

COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving for all correspondence between the Government and the County Court Judges of the Dominion and others respecting the resolution submitted to the House during the last Session of Parliament, by the late Minister of Justice, on the subject of the proposed increase of the salary of such Judges, said: Last Session the hon. Minister of Justice submitted to the House, a resolution in the following words:—

"To the Judge of the County Court of each County, Union of Counties or District in Ontario, of which the population exceeds fifty thousand, $2,000 per year, for the first three years; $2,400 per year for the second three years, and $3,000 per year thereafter. The period of service of a Judge now in office to be counted, but the increase of salary not to take effect retrospectively."

That resolution remained on the Notice Paper of the House for a period of nearly two months, and just at the close of the Session the then Minister of Justice withdrew the resolution without assigning any reason, except that at that period of the Session it was too late to deal with the matter exhaustively and intelligently. Now, there is no doubt in the world that the Government did propose making some additional arrangements with respect to the salaries of the Judges of the County Courts by way of increasing them. The Government withdrew that resolution without any reason that I am aware of for that course. I assume that, when the Government submitted that resolution to the House, they must have concluded there was a necessity for it—must have had some reason for it. It was not acted upon, however, I assume, after due and careful consideration; and if the Government gave it such consideration, then I would like to know why it was the resolution was withdrawn, and that, so far, this Session it has not been re-introduced. I am aware these Judges naturally take a deep interest in this question. I believe that, at a meeting of the Judges, a deputation was appointed to wait on the Government, and that it did so within the last few days, with a view of ascertaining whether or not the Government now intends to make the increase proposed by the resolution I have just read. Of course I know not what answer the Government gave or course it proposes to take; but I trust that, having submitted the resolution I read to the House last Session, the Government will not allow the matter to drop now. Now, why did the Government abandon those resolutions? Was it because the additional sum it was proposed to give the Judges would necessarily add to the people's burden? If so, there is a very simple way by which this difficulty can be overcome, and the Judges of the Court get the increased salary without, in my judgment, adding to these burdens. I observe the Government have introduced, through the Minister of Justice in another branch, a Bill with respect to the County Court Judges, and it provides that no junior County Court Judges shall be appointed in any county with a population less than 70,000. I think that a step in the right direction. It does appear absurd that junior Judges should be appointed in some counties with under 40,000 inhabitants, while others, with a population of over 60,000, are without them, and where, of course, business is larger than in the less densely peopled counties. As the matter now stands there are some six or seven junior Judges in counties where the population is under 70,000. If the hon. gentleman in his Bill will drop the junior County Court Judges as the offices fall in, and not make appointments hereafter, he will save about $15,000. That sum distributed among the present thirty-five or forty Judges would give them a salary of nearly $3,000 each, which, in my judgment, would be a fair one. It appeared to me always unreasonable that the Minister of Justice should expect to get men qualified for the position of a Judge in a large county, where there is much litigation and no little of it complicated—to get them from the first or second ranks of the profession, at $2,000 a year for the first three years, and $2,400 subsequently. I trust the hon. gentleman will revise the whole scheme of paying the County Court Judges, and not put them on probation or make them do penance for three years. If fit at all, a Judge is entitled to $2,400 or $3,000, or whatever the amount may be at the outset. Another point I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to is this—and it is only repeating the statement the First Minister himself made to the House eight or ten years ago when this subject was under consideration—that is, that the junior Judges should be placed on a better footing; that there should be no distinction in point of salary between junior and senior. Both have precisely the same functions, the same responsibilities, the same work; and, therefore, I cannot understand the reason why the salary of the junior should be less than that of the senior. Besides, I have been always of the opinion, and think the hon. the First Minister was of the same opinion, that there should be a sliding scale in the salaries of those Judges. There is no reason why the Judge of the County Court in Peel, for instance, with a population of some 16,000, should get precisely the same salary as the Judge in Perth who has to administer justice to a population of 54,000; nor why the Judge at Halton, with a population of under 20,000 should receive precisely the same amount as the Judge in Wentworth, who deals out justice to a population of over 66,000. In my judgment a sliding scale should be adopted to meet these inequalities. But, in any event, I have been always of opinion, which I believe the Government held last year when the resolutions I submitted were tabled by the late Minister of Justice, that the salary of the County Court Judges, taking them all round, is not sufficient, and that the Prime Minister should not expect to get leading men in the first or second ranks of the profession to accept a position at a salary of only $2,000 a year for the first three years.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to the motion. I was unfortunately out of the House when the hon. gentleman commenced his remarks, of which I only heard the conclusion. I do not think it would answer any good purpose to discuss now the question of the salaries of the County Court Judges, as there is a prospect of the measure on this subject before the other House passing and coming here, when we shall have an opportunity of discussing it fully. No doubt both sides will approach the subject with a desire to meet the interests of the public in the efficient administration of justice in the Province of Ontario.

Motion agreed to.

RETIREMENT OF LIEUT.-COL. FLETCHER.

Mr. HOUDE, in moving for copies of all correspondence with the Department of Militia and Defence in relation to the retirement of Lieut.-Col. John Fletcher, late Assistant Adjutant-General of Military District No. 5, and to the bonus granted to him on his retirement, said: In making this motion I wish to call the attention of the Government to what seems to me both an anomaly and an injustice. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, that there has been in existence for many years a system of pensions for superannuated employes of the Civil Service. I cannot say that I am a great admirer of that system, but I am not going to discuss it at the present moment. What I wish to point out is the fact that those public servants who have the strongest claim on the gratitude of the country are precisely those who receive no pension when old age or ill-health compel them to withdraw from the service—I am alluding to salaried commanding officers in our active militia. Those men have greater responsibilities than most civil servants. They expose their lives for the country and yet they receive less pay than ordinary civil servants, and have no compensation at all. Take, for instance, the case of Col. Fletcher. He has been in the service of the country, as a faithful and competent officer, for over thirty years. He has exposed his life twice in meeting foreign invasions of our territory, and on two other occasions in upholding law and order in the presence of domestic riots. He has also done much for the organization of the militia in his Province, being all the time poorly remunerated, while civil servants, having far less responsible duties, were receiving fat salaries. Now, having left the service in his old age, he is offered a small bonus which, at best, cannot secure him a yearly revenue of more than $200 for the support of himself and family. I cannot call that an equitable treatment of public servants according to their respective merits. It is to be remarked that Deputy Adjutants-General and Brigade Majors, though receiving the meagre salaries of second and third class civil servants, have to obey orders which take them from one place to another, and sometimes from one Province to another, to the great inconvenience of their families and to the great detriment of their private interests. I know that the present Government is acting under a law that has long been on our Statute books; but I think it is time to change it, and I think it is desirable that the Government, either this Session or early at another Session, should introduce a system of more equitable remuneration to those who serve the country in a military capacity, and give them salaries more in accordance with the importance of the duties with which they are entrusted, and more in harmony with the scale of salaries paid to other public servants. As long as civil servants receive pensions, I see no reason why retired Deputy Adjutants-General and Brigade Majors should not, a fortiori, enjoy the same privilege. Such a policy, I have no doubt, would be approved by this Parliament and the people generally, for it would be only too logical and just; at least, that is my humble opinion.

Mr. CARON. I shall have very much pleasure in bringing down all the papers and all the correspondence which my hon. friend has asked for in his motion. I must say that I believe that no class of public servants are more deserving of pensions or of retiring allowances than those who act upon the military force of Canada. I believe that men like Col. Fletcher, who have given their time and energies for a number of years, to the service of their country in that branch, should be treated on a footing of equality with others who serve their country in the civil branch. I think it is but just that militia officers, when forced to retire from infirmity or old age, should receive a retiring pension. However, in the present case when the papers are brought down, my hon. friend will see that Col. Fletcher has been treated as well under the law as it now stands, as the most favored who receive retiring allowances from the Government. It was previous to the time that I became head of the Department of Militia and Defence that Lieut.-Col. Fletcher was retired. He received on his retirement two years' salary amounting to $3,400. That allowance, which was accorded to very few, was granted in consideration of the long services which he had rendered, and the manner in which he had always behaved in the different positions that he occupied in the Department of Militia and Defence.

When the papers come down I think my hon. friend will find that Col. Fletcher has been treated as well as it was possible to treat him under the existing law. I have no doubt, if it were possible later to make a change in the law which would allow the different Brigade Majors and Deputy Adjutants-General, upon retiring after a certain number of years' service to receive a pension than when it was submitted to Parliament, knowing how Parliament always shows its liberality on votes required for militia purposes, the measure would meet with the approval of this House.

Mr. SCRIVER. I am very glad that the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Houde) has called the attention of the House and the Government to this case of what I consider peculiar hardship. I have not a word to say in criticism of the action of the Government with regard to it. I do not doubt, as the hon. Minister has said, that the Government has dealt with the case under the law, as it now stands, perhaps as liberally as it was possible for them to do; but as the law stands the case is certainly one of great hardship. Col. Fletcher has been for many years, first as Brigade Major and then as Deputy Adjutant-General, in charge of the district where I reside. I have had an opportunity of observing the manner in which that officer discharged his duty, and without having any desire to institute a comparison between him and other officers holding similar positions, I must express the opinion that there has not been an officer attached to the militia service of this country who has more thoroughly and more actively discharged the duties entrusted to his care than has Col. Fletcher. He has never been satisfied with the mere perfunctory discharge of those duties, but he has shown an energy and ability quite unusual in men holding such a position which he filled. To Col. Fletcher, more than to any other officer, is due the success which has attended rifle associations, especially in the frontier counties of the Province of Quebec. He was very active in organizing those rifle associations; he was always present at the meetings, and gave those in charge of the association the benefit of his great experience; and even since Colonel Fletcher has been retired from active service he has continued to manifest the interest which he formerly displayed in those associations, and he also attended, last summer, as I have reason to know, all the meetings which took place on the frontier. As the hon. member for Maskinongé has stated, the retiring allowance, which though it seems somewhat large, would furnish, if funded, only the beggarly income of $200 a year. He is now a comparatively old man, having a pretty large family dependent on him, and is too old to engage in any other occupation. I trust it will be possible in some way to take measures for his relief.

Mr. STRANGE. I know nothing whatever of the circumstances of Deputy Adjutant-General Fletcher's retirement; but, as the hon. the Minister of Militia has called him a civil servant, I think superannuation should be made available to Deputy Adjutants-General and officers in similar positions. Whatever may be said respecting Col. Fletcher, I think, if he is to be called a civil servant, the proper course would be to qualify himself in order to avail himself of the superannuation fund of this Dominion.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I do not want to occupy the attention of the House, or prolong the discussion, but I desire to add, to what has been said by hon. members in regard to Col. Fletcher, my testimony as to his efficiency as a public officer. I know the difficulties which the hon. the Minister of Militia will find in meeting the views of those who would like to superannuate Col. Fletcher handsomely; but perhaps this extraordinary case may call the attention of the Government to the embarrassing position which officers occupy, and, at all events, if they could see their way to deal with this case in a more liberal spirit than the hon. the Minister has been able to do, I am sure, from personal knowledge, though I am not a military man, that no men would be more pleased that something has been done than would be the volunteers with whom he has served, and who have come to regard him, not only as a good officer, but look upon him with the affection of a friend.

WINDSOR AND ANNAPOLIS RAILWAY.

Mr. KILLAM, in moving for a statement showing separately the gross earnings on local and on through traffic on the lines of railway worked by the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, between Annapolis and Windsor and Halifax respectively, and the mode of division of receipts from through traffic between the said railways by which the sum of $21,216, stated in the report of the hon. Minister of Railways, as the one-third earnings of the Windsor Branch Railway payable to the Government, is arrived at, said: It appears in the Public Accounts that, last year, the receipts from the road did not exceed $60,000; my remembrance of the matter is that, under a previous management, they were about $90,000 per annum. I desire to obtain information on this point, and I am prepared to change the wording of the resolution if it is not acceptable.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the motion will cover the case, and I see no objection to bringing down the information.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATION OF FISHERIES.

Mr. WELDON moved for a copy of all Orders in Council issued, relating to the regulation of fisheries since first of January, A.D., 1879, and of all circulars and instructions issued since that date to the Fishery Inspectors and Wardens in the Provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick; also, of all licenses to fish for salmon in the rivers or portions of rivers in New Brunswick, granted by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, the Inspector of Fisheries, and the Fishery Wardens, under the Order in Council, dated the eleventh day of June, A. D., 1879; also all applications for such licenses which were not complied with, and the names of the several applicants. He said: In making a few remarks upon the motion, I do not wish to refer to the streams, as the question of whether the exclusive right of fishing existed is now before the Courts, but as to streams which are private and non-navigable, upon which there is no doubt the riparian proprietors make the exclusive right to fish. By an Order in Council, dated June 14th, 1879, fly-fishing for salmon was prohibited without the lease or license of the Department, and then the Department practically claimed the right of property in the fisheries. Parties who had the exclusive right in those waters have been refused a license, though they expressed their willingness to conform to the rules and regulations of the Department, while other parties were granted licenses. Owners of land, fishing thereon, have had their rods and fishing gear seized, and they have been treated in an arbitrary manner, brought up before justices and treated as ordinary criminals. While I do not deny the right of the Department to prohibit fishing in a river to enable the fisheries to be recuperated, I protest against this exercise of refusing or granting licenses, either for the purposes of revenue, or, at the pleasure of the Department, permitting one owner to fish and prohibiting the other. Such authority is not either within the British North America Act nor the Act relating to fisheries, and certainly was never intended to be granted to the Dominion Government by the power given to regulate sea coast and inland fisheries.

Mr. McLELLAN. The hon. gentleman is no doubt aware that the main portion of this question is now before the Courts, and that pending the decision of the Courts any discussion of it is out of place. He seems to think the regulations made by the Department are unjust in some respects. I can only say that since I have been in the Department, any arrangements made have been only temporary, pending the decision of the question by the Courts, which decision we hope to have in a short time. I do not know of any objection to bring down such papers in the meantime as are not dependent upon that decision.

Mr. WELDON. I was speaking entirely of rivers above navigation, which are not touched by the question before the Courts.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER announced that he had received from the Returning Officer of the Electoral District of South Simcoe a certificate that Richard Tyrwhitt, Esq., had been duly elected to represent that District in this House.

The hon. member was introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald and Mr. Strange, and took his seat.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved :

That in admitting Richard Tyrwhitt, Esq., elected to represent the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Simcoe, to take his seat, upon the certificate of the Returning Officer, this House still recommends a strict adherence to the practice of requiring the production of the usual certificate of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, of the return of the writ of election.

DEPOSITS OF BENEFIT SOCIETIES.

Mr. GAULT enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to legislate, this Session, towards compelling benefit or co-operative societies, doing a life business, to make deposits with the Government for the benefit of Canadian policy holders.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is under the consideration of the Government.

WORKS ON THE RIVER PETITE NATION.

Mr. ROUTHIER enquired, Whether the Government proposes to assist in the completion of the works commenced in the River Petite Nation, Prescott County, in order to facilitate the descent of timber down that river;— and if not, whether it is the intention of the Government to fix a manner of paying a toll upon the timber which passes through it, in order to indemnify the proper person for completing these works.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to inform the hon. member that the Government has not yet come to any decision on this subject which it still has under consideration.

COURT OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. McCARTHY, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 3) for constituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, I do not propose to add very much to what I had the honor to address to the House last Session, the Bill now presented being substantially the same as that which was introduced, not only then but the Session before. The most material alteration is that it does away with that which in the opinion of a great number was an objectionable feature, namely, the right of appeal to the Supreme Court from the decision of the Railway Commissioners. As the Bill now stands there is no absolute right of appeal, the decision of the Commissioners being final and conclusive; but the Commissioners may, if they think proper, upon the application of any of the parties to the litigation, or may without any such application, state a case in a matter of law for the opinion of the Supreme Court. That a measure of this kind is necessary is probably the opinion of the great majority of the members of this House, and I think that conclusion is arrived at from a knowledge of the fact that under the law as it at present stands there is practically no means of compelling railways to obey the law or carry out the objects for which they were incorporated. There are, to-day, in this Dominion, over 8,000 miles of railway already constructed. That railway system has cost the country, over and above the amount that may have been contributed by those interested in it and by those who own the roads, about $100,000,000, and the earnings of the road amount to almost as much as the total amount that is raised from the people of this country annually for the purpose of carrying on the Government of the country. When I state these facts, I think I show that it is a matter of very great importance that there should be some means of forcing the railways to do justice to all their customers, and to carry out the intention of the law, which is that one railway should not be independent of another in the sense of being a carrier, but that they should be aids and adjuncts one to another. This subject has engaged the consideration of the Parliament of Great Britain on very many occasions. Although railways were known only as early as 1832, I find that, in 1840, the House of Commons referred the subject to a Committee; that, in 1844, the matter was again referred to a Committee, and again in 1865; and the result of the report made by these various Committees was that, in 1872, a Railway Commission was constituted for Great Britain, which has existed from that day to this. It has been said by those opposed to legislation in this direction that the Commission in England has not been a success. Well, Sir, I suppose nothing can be more decisive on that point than the interim report which was made by the Select Committee in England to which this matter was referred during the last Session of Parliament. The Committee met early in the year, and sat until the Session was at an end; and the result arrived at was, in the first place, that they thought the matter was so important that the Committee should be reappointed at the Session now going on in England. The Committee further stated that there were a few points connected with the matter submitted to them upon which they found themselves enabled to arrive at definite conclusions, one of which was that it was necessary to maintain some special tribunal to which should be referred questions arising as to the rights and duties of railway companies in relation to the trade and traffic of the country; that the operations of such tribunal should be simple, cheap and expeditious; that this tribunal should have jurisdiction to enforce the provisions of the special acts of railway companies in any cases of illegal charges; and that a locus standi should be given to it in branches of the Chamber of Commerce and other similar associations of trade and agriculture. I think that is a conclusive answer to the statements made that the Railway Commission in England has not been a success. It is true that a great number of cases has not been dealt with by that Commission; but why? Because the decision in one case determines the point not only for the parties then litigating, but for all parties interested in the question involved, and also because there are not many litigants, a railway company being necessarily one party to any case. The result has been that, after eight or ten years experience, a large Committee of the House of Commons universally resolved that the tribunal should be continued, and, if possible, made more efficient, speedy, and cheap in its operation. Now I do not pretend that this Bill ensures all the requirements of this subject; all I hope is that, if the principle of this measure commends itself to the House, some sort of an Act will be passed which will rectify to some extent the grievances the people of this country labor under in connection with railway companies. I would say to my friends who are in favor of what is called the National Policy, that the railways can in a great measure defeat the objects which the National Policy was intended to serve. By a reduction of their rates, they can so enable parties to import into Canada goods, and sell them cheaper than goods can be manufactured in Canada and transmitted from one part of Canada to another, or even from one part of a Province to another part. I have a statement here with regard to a quantity of oil cake which was to be taken from Chicago to the western part of Ontario; and the freight from Chicago to Belleville, where the intending purchaser resided, was absolutely less than from a point in the Province of Ontario itself. The result is that the outside manufacturer may be enabled to defeat the Tariff arrangements which have been made to protect the home manufacturers. In other respects we labor under very great disadvantages. The railway companies, by raising their rates, if there is no competition, and by lowering their rates if there is competition, have power to work great hardships to people living along the line of the road. They may charge more for carrying goods fifty miles than for carrying the same class of goods a hundred miles. In any view, I think I am warranted in introducing this measure. I gather from a speech of Mr. Charles Francis Adams, which was sent to me by a friend, that a Committee of Congress has been appointed to prepare a Bill on this subject; and there is also a Bill on the same subject before the Legislature of the State of New York, where the railway companies have almost absolute control, and where it is difficult to carry any such measures; and for several years past there has been a Railway Commission in existence in the State of Massachusetts. The plan followed in Massachusetts seems to answer there, according to Mr. Adams' statements. I do not know whether it might not act here as well. There the tribunal is not a court. There is a Commission, clothed with executive power—it is true, but a Commission of Enquiry—with power to investigate and report, and it is their duty to report annually to the Legislative body; and, by the public opinion which is thus brought to bear upon offending railway companies, it has been found that much good has been done. Mr. Adams has prepared a short Bill, which he asks Congress to pass, and it is pretty much in the same direction,

Whether the railway managers of this Dominion are sufficiently open to public opinion to be acted upon in that way, or not, I am not prepared to say. It has not been found efficient in other places, though it does appear to act in Massachusetts, and to meet with the approval of Mr. Adams, who has been for many years one of the Commissioners. I do not know that I need say anything more; a good deal might be said on the subject. The difficulty is, to what particular point to direct one's attention; but I venture to think that to most hon. members the necessity of compelling railway companies to obey the law, and carry out the purposes and objects for which they were incorporated, is sufficiently obvious. If that be so, the next question is, what is the means to obtain that desired end? I venture to think there is no other means except a tribunal such as this, because, as it is stated, the railway problem itself is an anomaly, and can only be dealt with in a manner different from all other subjects. It has to be dealt with in a different sense because of its peculiarities. Then the objection is made that we have already sufficient courts in existence, and the expense of these courts is as much as the people are able to endure. Well, as to that, all I can say is, that this Bill would certainly not make litigation more expensive than it is. It would not promote litigation, but it would have a tendency in the opposite direction, and the expense, of course, is a matter which I cannot deal with as a private member, and which must ultimately, if the House pass this Bill, be dealt with by the Government. In most of the States of the Union, I believe, though I am not positive on that point, the expense is borne by the railway companies, and there is no reason why, to a certain extent at all events, the expense should not be borne by the railway companies here. I, therefore, move that the Bill be read the second time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not propose, at this stage of the Bill, to detain the House with any very lengthened remarks; but it will be naturally expected that, in relation to a matter of such great importance as this, some notice will be taken of the speech which has just been addressed to the House by my hon. friend, who has again brought forward this measure. There can be no doubt whatever as to the great importance of the subject which he has brought before us. There cannot possibly be any question as to the great importance of the railway interests of this country, and of those interests receiving such attention at the hands of this Parliament as will lead it to do all that it is possible Parliament can do to promote the interests of the people, and, at the same time, to avoid such interference with railway interests as might be prejudicial to those interests themselves. The hon. gentleman has not, I think, dealt with two of the very important difficulties to which I drew his attention when he submitted his Bill to the House on a former occasion. One of those was the want of power on the part of this Parliament to deal with the railway questions of this country in the manner which he proposes. It is known to the House that, under our Constitution, the powers of Parliament are confined to a certain class of railways, and that over a great many of the railways we have no jurisdiction whatever. They obtained their charters, they operate them under laws passed by the various Local Legislatures of the Dominion; and I think the hon. gentleman should provide some means by which that difficulty would be obviated, and by which it would become practicable to deal with this question as a whole, as otherwise it is perfectly apparent that, to a very large extent, the very important objects he has in view—and no one questions their importance—will entirely fail to be attained. The hon. gentleman has stated there are over 8,000 miles of railways in Canada, and the bare statement of that fact is quite sufficient to show the enormous interest that is at stake; and I think he might have gone further, and have stated that never was there an amount of capital

Mr. McCARTHY.

—the enormous amount of capital that has been required to be invested in the construction of these 8,000 miles of railway—that has proved more productive for the benefit of the whole of this country from end to end. Every one who knows anything of the value of railway accommodation, and what it has accomplished for the people, must recognize the fact that to these railway companies and capitalists who invested their money in the construction of those 8,000 miles of railway which we have in Canada to-day, we are more deeply indebted for our progress and prosperity than to any other cause.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend, at this moment, to be diverted from the very important question under consideration in order to enter into a discussion of the National Policy with the hon. gentleman who favored us, on a recent occasion, with his views at very great length. The proper time will, no doubt, arrive to deal with the opinions of that hon. gentleman; but I have no hesitation in saying, in relation to the National Policy, that these 8,000 miles of railway have proved one of the great factors of the progress and prosperity of this country. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) knows I drew his attention to another important point in connection with this matter, that is, not only the difficulty which exists owing to part of the railways being under local jurisdiction and the remainder under Federal jurisdiction, but the fact that we occupy a very different position in this country from that of the country from which the hon. gentleman has taken his Bill, that is, Great Britain. Great Britain is isolated, and the country being insular it has no connection with any other country. What is our position? I may, however, say, before leaving the point of the enormous amount of capital that has been invested in Canadian railways, that not only has it been productive of incalculable benefit to the development of this country, but there has never been a corresponding amount of capital invested that has been, at the same time, so advantageous to this country in which it was invested and so little profitable to the parties who furnished the money and invested it. There is no country which has benefitted more than Canada by the construction of railways, and there are no capitalists who have benefitted less than those who have invested their money in Canadian railways. Therefore, it is of great importance, while recognizing fully the value of the measure proposed, to bear in mind the magnitude of the railway interest, and the claim that it has on our most favorable consideration. Unlike the railways in England, Scotland, and Ireland, the railways of Canada are, many of them, lying in close proximity to the railways of another country—the United States—over whose legislation and the management of whose railways we have no control. It, therefore, becomes very evident that we should deal with this matter in such a way as not, by hampering and interfering with the free action and operation of our railways, direct the traffic and trade which they now control out of our country into the neighboring Republic. It is very well known that the Grand Trunk Railway, through almost its entire extent, is in close, keen competition with the railways of the United States, and that a very slight thing will transfer the traffic from one side of the St. Lawrence to the other, and thus deprive Canada of the expenditure of millions of dollars per annum now expended here. While every one must admit the importance of the views expressed by the hon. gentleman, we must not forget that—in our anxiety to meet every emergency, protect every interest, and establish what we believe to be a just and legitimate control over the management of these railways—we may so hamper and embarrass these railways as to prevent them competing in the race between our own roads and those of the adjoining country, and thus inflict an irparable and great evil on our country instead of doing it a benefit. I do not intend to discuss this question at any very great length; but I must say that I do not myself favor the organization of any more courts in Canada than are found to be absolutely necessary. It is only the other day that our hon. friends opposite, when in power, organized the Supreme Court, with the result of taxing the people $50,000 a year for its maintenance, and it is now proposed, as I understand by this Bill, to have another Supreme Court in Canada. My hon. friend asks for the appointment of three Judges. They will have to be very highly paid. If this court is to be of any value at all, it must, under this Act, be composed of three Commissioners who deserve and obtain the confidence of the people. The hon. gentleman says one of them must be a lawyer. I want to know what salary we would be obliged to give the hon. gentleman himself, who undoubtedly is eminently qualified for the position, in order to obtain his services. I say that we could not obtain that hon. gentleman's services for the position of Commissioner—to give up his emoluments at the Bar and become a railway Judge—at less than between $10,000 or $20,000 per year. I suppose it would be possible to find a lawyer in this country who would accept a smaller amount; but you do not simply want a lawyer who will accept an insignificant emolument. You want a man whose legal standing, character and position in this country would command that respect and confidence which alone would make such a court valuable. Then the hon. gentleman says the next Commissioner must be a railway man. I know something about railway men, and what is the fact? The fact is, the late Government were obliged to pay $8,000 per year to obtain the services of Mr. Bydges, formerly manager of the Grand Trunk Railway, and when the Government no longer required his services, the Hudson's Bay Company were very glad to secure them at $10,000 per year. It is also well known that the manager of the Grand Trunk Railway is getting a much larger salary than that. The third Commissioner will have to be in a position to compare favorably with his two colleagues. Under this Bill, we are therefore to have another Supreme Court established to accomplish the objects in view. I draw attention to the fact as one not unworthy the consideration of the House at the outset. The hon. gentleman has said that the Committee in England arrived at the conclusion that there must be some simple, cheap and expedient mode of dealing with this subject. If the hon. gentleman can devise such a mode, by which the admitted evils—for there are a great many things susceptible of improvement in relation to railway management—can be dealt with, and dealt with in such a way as not to unduly hamper the great railway interests of this country, I would be extremely glad. No doubt it is the hon. gentleman's intention to refer this Bill to the Railway Committee, in order that it may receive all the consideration and examination to which a matter of such great moment is entitled; and I would be very glad should the Committee arrive at any conclusion by which it will be found this Parliament can legislate on this important question, in such a way as to attain the object the hon. gentleman has in view, without involving injustice in some of the cases to which I have drawn attention.

Mr. HAGGART. The question of legislation in reference to railways is one which is exciting considerable attention in every country in which there are railways; and, for the consideration of the subject, it may be as well to glance at the position the Governments of different countries have taken towards railways in the past. When the first railways were run in England, the Government insisted upon fixing the rates, both passenger and freight. That was found not to work very well, and then the system grew up in England of what was called "free trade in railways;" that is, competition by different railways for the traffic in different parts of the country. That system worked just as it is found to work in Canada at present. One railway purchased the stock of a rival and competition ended. There is another system in vogue in some continental countries—a portion of the railways being Government railways, and the balance being owned by private individuals. The Government fixed the rates, amenable, of course, to the legislature, and influenced by public opinion through the press, and this system proved very acceptable in those countries. In fact, I think the best system of railway organization in the world is the system in Belgium, which is being adopted in some other countries where a portion of the main line of railway is owned by the Government and a rate of freight is so fixed, which is acceptable to the great majority of the people. A system of Railway Commission is exciting also considerable interest in the United States. Several different States have appointed Railway Commissions, after a desperate struggle, the measure having been forced upon them by the united action of the rural population through the Granges. There is no very great agitation in this country in favor of a Federal Commission. The Minister of Railways says that the objection here is that a portion of the legislation in reference to this question should belong properly to the Provincial Governments. But as to all railways which interchange trade between different countries and different Provinces, the legislation properly belongs to the general Government, it should be held that legislation properly belongs to the Federal Government, and that the legislation in reference to these railroads, so far as this country is concerned, should initiate in this House; and the different Provincial Legislatures may follow afterwards, passing legislation for purely local railways. This is a question which cannot be shirked any longer. There is a feeling in certain sections of the country that if a person happens to be placed in a particular locality he is handicapped by being obliged to pay heavier rates to the sea-board than a farmer, merchant or other person somewhere else. The feeling is now well grown that there should be some legislation in reference to this matter. The Bill, to be effective, and to meet the wishes of the community should, besides, have a clause giving the Commissioners the means, by publishing the manner in which the different rates are collected, or some other suitable machinery, with the power of preventing extortionate rates in particular localities. Another thing I should like provided for—that is, some way of forcing railway companies to keep a certain form of account open to the supervision of those Railway Commissioners, and by publicity, by bringing an enlightened public opinion to bear upon them, keep them from entering transactions, perhaps very questionable. I hope that in another Session there will be some legislation added to the Bill which, in a manner, will regulate the freights of the different companies. The Bill at present is only an instalment of the needed legislation. This is a question which must be settled, and the opinion is gaining ground—it is a fixed opinion in all countries now—that the Legislature should control the freights of railway companies. We grant them charters in the different Provinces, giving their roads the character of public highways, and have the right of regulating the charges thereon. There is no Commission which would fix the charges at rates to be injurious to the companies; or compel them to abide by rates that would prevent them declaring dividends. But they should exercise such a control over railways as to prevent exceptional rates. In my section of the country we have the Kingston and Pembroke Railway, of which my hon. friend is a director, running into a mining district north of Kingston. But some of the parties connected with it receive exceptionally favorable rates in the sending of their iron to market, while others competing with them are obliged to sell out their properties to the railway company, because unable to pay the freights charged. In other cases parties on long routes get exceptional freights. Why has one person a right to get exceptional advantageous rates over his neighbor? The Commissioners should enquire into matters of that kind and prevent such evils as exceptional freights. No man has a right to get his stuff carried to market more cheaply than his neighbor's. No man should be handicapped in the operations of business. A railway company should charge equal rates to all parties. I have much pleasure in supporting the Bill as an instalment of the legislation that should be on our Statute books.

Mr. PLUMB. The question which has been suggested by the Bill has agitated the public mind for a great many years, in fact ever since railways were constructed. My hon. friend who brought in the Bill (Mr. McCarthy) stated in his argument in favor of its passage, that in England the question, very soon after railways were chartered, arose in Parliament. A Committee was appointed in 1840, and another in 1841, and another in 1865, and the results of those Committees were not found satisfactory, even as late as 1872; that twenty-two years results of the examinations of those Committees and of their reports were not found satisfactory, and that in a country where the railway system is entirely isolated, and where difficulties such as disturb the railway business of this country do not exist, and where the roads yield a fairer return. Under all these circumstances the hon. gentleman says that, in 1872, it was reported the Railway Commission was not a success.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not say the Railway Commission was not a success, but that the reports of the different Committees had not suggested an improvement up to this time. It was only in 1872 the Railway Commission was appointed.

Mr. PLUMB. That was what I was trying to say, but my remarks were not so clear, perhaps, as my hon. friend's. I meant to say that after eighteen years' experiments this Railway Commission had been successful, and that railway matters were now comparatively within its control, resembling the conclusion which the hon. gentleman proposes to reach by his Bill, presented to this House for almost the first time. He then stated that there had been Commissions appointed in the United States. The only one working in the United States is, as he stated himself, in Massachusetts—an Advisory Commission which has not power to do anything—no power to decide, no power to take the law into its hands, but merely to make recommendations, and those recommendations to be accepted by the Legislature or not, as the Legislature chooses. It must be remembered that, in the United States, the whole railway system is a continuous one, that there can be no such thing as legislating for separate railway systems. The great question of railway traffic from the west to the sea-board is not one, I venture to say, which can be dealt with by a measure such as the hon. gentleman proposes, and the railway companies, in order to retain their traffic, it is well known, with the constant competition, the constant change, the constant fluctuation, if they were hampered by being compelled to refer to a Commission for powers to alter or to change their rates, would be handicapped in such a way that the traffic which passes through Canada would be driven out of it altogether; for the railway managers of other countries would very soon find out that it was impossible for our railways to compete with them if there was any such disturbing causes the hon. gentleman proposes. The question as to whether there should be a discrimination in rates, is one that has been discussed on more than one occasion in this House and elsewhere. That it is an evil, that it often inflicts injustice, cannot be denied. The only question is how it can be practically dealt with; and, in view of the railway legislation, I wish it to be put on record on every occasion in which I have an opportunity of publicly announcing my views on the subject, as of the opinion that it becomes us always to deal with these great corporations, in view of the great benefits that have resulted to this country—greater benefits in the aggregate than any of those minor matters to which the hon. gentleman has referred—and that those who have opened up the country by means of their enterprise and capital have, almost in every case, failed to reap any return for the moneys invested. It is a well known fact that there is no railway in Canada, at this moment, that pays any dividend whatever, except the very small dividend that may have been declared by the Great Western, which, I believe, has been at the rate of about $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum. The shareholders of that company, mostly English capitalists, have put their money into it, and I believe it will be a serious injury to this country if it is found that we are tampering with the business by means of such a Commission as has been proposed by my hon. friend—that we are tampering with the railway business, which so far, in many instances, has scarcely paid more than its running expenses. It is perfectly well known that in the Grand Trunk Railway millions of capital have been lost. No matter what the original management might be, no matter whether there were mistakes made in its construction, it has wrought for the people of Canada a benefit which has been perfectly immeasurable, and, for one, I am always ready to consider this benefit in any legislation proposed to this House that is of a hostile nature to that company. I have no railway interests whatever; I stand in this House entirely free; and I believe we shall be true to our interests when we admit that invested capital here has its rights, and that it behooves us not to imperil those rights, or interfere by legislation with them in such a way as seriously to hamper or injure them. My hon. friend proposes that the complicated questions which concern particularly railway companies themselves, and the large competition which has already been created by legislation—I think most unfairly to the railway companies that have already invested their money here—my hon. friend suggests that those rights, and the absolute control and management of those companies shall by this means be taken out of their hands and be virtually vested—how? Vested in a Commission of gentlemen who may or may not be practical men. They are very likely not to be, because such men would demand salaries which would preclude the Government of Canada from being able to employ them. The manager of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I believe, has a salary of \$50,000 a year. This Commission would require a man of great skill and of ability to take these vast and complicated interests into his hands and so regulate them as to do perfect justice to all parties. It is not for the purpose of favoring any class that a Bill of this kind should be drawn; it is for the purpose of protecting railway interests just as much as protecting the interests of the people; and I think it requires skill, ability, judgment, experience and impartiality, such as in the very outset it would be almost impossible to obtain. The hon. gentleman says railways are not amenable to the law. I do not know why. It appears to be certain, however, that those existing by virtue of Provincial charters can hardly be reached by any legislation such as this, unless we provoke further that conflict of jurisdiction that we desire to avoid. The hon. gentleman says it is possible for combinations of railways to defeat the policy which has been inaugurated by the present Government. Well, I am not aware of any case where any such injury has been inflicted. There may be, there always will be in the management of railways, special cases where discriminations will be made. It is absolutely necessary in some cases, in order to retain the through traffic, that special rates should be made. Without such an arrangement even the Grand Trunk Railway, and the railways competing with it for through traffic, would be third-class railways; they would not be able to keep up their rolling stock. The receipts which those railways are able to make by going out of the country and receiving through traffic which otherwise would not go over their lines, would be altogether lost to them. It is well known that within the last two or three years the Grand Trunk Railway has laid a new track, it has secured an excellent combination for passenger traffic, and has put on Pullman carriages which greatly promote the comfort of the travelling public. The whole community are to be considered, and not the interests of any special class. Railways are institutions for the benefit of the public, and everything should be done which, within reasonable limits, will give them the means of keeping up their business, and of securing to the public the best accommodation for passengers and freight. The lives of passengers, and the speedy transit of passengers, are of quite as much importance as the carriage of freight. I regret exceedingly that there has been nothing suggested in the speech of my hon. friend in introducing his Bill, which has changed my mind in any way upon the impracticability of reaching even the desirable parts of the policy which he desires to enforce by means of this Bill. So far as I can see, it has not been shown that this Bill will meet any of the great and grave objections which have been urged against the abuses of the railway system. The system here is in its infancy, and we are endeavoring, as far as we can, to encourage capital to come here. I am not afraid that any very large profits will be made by these companies; I am not afraid that the bloated capitalist will be puffed out larger because he holds shares of railway stock that do not pay dividends; and, while companies are in that position, we are bound to deal with them with all possible fairness, and give them, so far as we can, at least our forbearance. There have been no successful railway Commissions created in the United States. Considering that the railways exist by separate State charters, it is impossible for any comprehensive Commission to be created by the United States Government without interfering with State rights, and no such Commission has been attempted. There are, of course, general railway Statutes in the United States, but a year or two ago a Commission was appointed to investigate the working of railways in the State of New York. It is pretty well known why that Commission was created and what its objects were, and I am apprehensive that it would be a dangerous power to put in the hands of any two or three men to regulate the traffic of this Dominion. I fear it would be scarcely possible to find men who would not represent too strongly either one or the other of the two sides, which might be antagonistic to each other, and when a competition of interests occurred it is easy to see which would be likely to get the advantage. On the whole, I do not think the time has come—I do not think our experience has been great enough in such matters to deal intelligently and fairly with the questions which come up in this Bill. For myself, I confess I do not think there is any pressing necessity for such a measure, and while I regret to differ from my esteemed and hon. friend, who has introduced the Bill, I have done so frankly and fairly, and shall continue to do so until I see a better reason for sustaining his measure than is apparent at present.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk). I am not prepared to say that the measure before the House is the best that could be adopted for the regulation of railways; but I am clear that, after Government ownership of railways has been done away with, we must have Government supervision of some kind over these roads. I cannot agree with the proposition of the Minister of Railways, who says that Canada has been much indebted to railway companies. I know that Canada has been deeply indebted to railways, but that she has been indebted to railway companies, I very much doubt. Take for instance the Grand Trunk. The people of this country, some twenty-five years ago, gave $15,000,000 to aid in the construction of that road, and yet I believe it is a fact that that railway is carrying the produce of the farmers in the neighborhood of Chicago more cheaply to the seaboard than the produce of the Canadian farmers. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Plumb), says that the railway companies are bound by the law; but I would like to know what individual can go into court and fight with a railway, for the company can carry the case from court to court until, if their opponent is a man of fortune, his fortune would be exhausted. He says that interest has not been paid on the capital which has been invested in railways. I admit it, and this is one of the reasons why I think railways should be the property of the Canadian people and not of English stockholders. It is not to the people of Canada that our progress in connection with railways is due, but to the widows and orphans and the capitalists of England, and I think that if there is a benefit from railway investments Canadians should receive it, and if there is a loss they should sustain it. The hon. the Minister of Railways said that he was doubtful if a lawyer could be got for less than $15,000 or $20,000, in whom the people of this country would have confidence as a Railway Commissioner. I mention the name of the Hon. Mr. Justice Cameron, who sits on the Bench, and does not get anything like $20,000, and there is no man in this country but would have the most implicit confidence in any judgment which he might render. Some hon. members have spoken of competition, but competition cannot be obtained, for the simple reason that the railway companies pool their earnings and sell out to each other. We have had illustrations of that fact—perhaps not very numerous—but we have had some. The people living along the line of the Credit Valley Railway, aided it for the purpose of getting competition with the Great Western and Grand Trunk, and they taxed themselves heavily for its construction. The Credit Valley was built, and now we find that that road is said to have been leased to the Great Western, one of the roads against which, to secure competition, the people subscribed their money and built the railway. Then again, we have the positive injustice with which these roads deal with the people. I do not blame the railway companies—I blame this Parliament and this Government for giving them power to do injustice. I hold that it would be the best thing that could be done in the interests of the country, if the people would authorize Parliament or the Government to buy up the whole of the railways and run them in the interests of the people, instead of their being run as they are now in the interests of the shareholders. I do not blame the shareholders, because if I was one I would very likely do as they do. Every man looks to his own interests, and when the interests of a body of men are against the interests of a community, the interests of the community are likely to go to the wall. At present railroads have the power—and they exercise it—of giving discriminating rates of freight, and this discrimination results in the injury and ruin of some men and some places. For instance, suppose I am doing business in a town, and another man beside me gets preferential rates, what is the effect but to destroy my business? In places which are competing points special rates are given against those where there is no competition, and the result is an injustice to the property of those in the non-competing points. I am pleased that my hon. friend has brought in this measure, and, although it may not be adopted in its entirety—although some other measure may be substituted for it—I trust the House will see that a measure will be passed putting railways in the country under the control of the Government, and under strict governmental supervision. I think that this country was not made for the railways, or the people of this country made for the railways, but that the railways were made for the convenience and accommodation of the people and for the benefit of Canada. I doubt exceedingly whether Canada has ever derived any benefit from railway companies.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to find that the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill adheres to his determination to secure some legislation on this subject. I agree with the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) and the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that some legislation is necessary. There is no doubt that railway companies, which have received special powers from Parliament for the purposes of the convenience of the people, should, to a great extent, come under the control of the people, or of some body appointed by them. The case is even stronger where railways, as is now so generally the case, have received aid from the Government or the municipalities interested in their construction. In this case, there is no doubt that the public interest should take precedence to the interests of the shareholders in any arrangements connected with the running of those lines. These roads have received their charters and large assistance for the very purpose of affording accommodation to the people, and if the shareholders attempt to set the interests of the people at defiance, or manage the lines purely for their own profit, I think it would be proper that Parliament should step in, and protect the rights of those who invested in them. I am very sorry that the hon. Minister of Railways seems to take the opposite view—that he seems to consider that the interests of the railways should be set above the interest of the public. In the objections he has raised against the Bill, he has referred almost entirely to the injury that might possibly be done to the railways by interfering in any way with their traffic. He says that our railways are not isolated—that they have to compete with American railways, and that they should not be handicapped by our putting any restrictions on their traffic arrangements. It is true, they have to compete to a certain extent with American railways, but there is no necessity for these railways competing beyond a point at which it is profitable for them to do so. They have done so, however, and I believe if a Railway Commission were in existence which would sometimes restrict our Canadian lines from engaging in that cut-throat competition, the shareholders of these railways, as well as the public in general, would be benefitted. The hon. member for Niagara tells us that it would be a great injury, not only to the railways, but to our people, if we prevented the railways from getting all the freight they can from across the line. I do not say that it might not be an injury if they did not get some of it; but I say that the carrying of through freight from the west to the sea-board is injurious to the public as well as to themselves—injurious to themselves because they do it at rates that do not pay; and injurious to the people of Canada because, in order to keep down the rates for through freight, they have to charge higher local rates, often to people who have aided in the construction of these same roads. I say that, in such cases, the restriction laid on with the firm hand with which the hon. Minister of Railways would, no doubt, lay it on, would be very beneficial. Discrimination of a very objectionable form also arises sometimes between neighborhoods in Canada, sometimes because certain railways have favored points, and sometimes because they have to compete at certain points with rival lines. We have monopolies in Canada itself—monopolies created by law, as in the case of the great monopoly which controls the entire trade of the North-West, and will probably yet control the entire trade of Canada. We have monopolies created by circumstances, as when one railway only exists in a neighborhood, and will not allow another to go through it. We have monopolies created by amalgamations, where lines created to compete with each other afterwards amalgamate—and this is not one of the least objectionable cases that arise. In fact, in my own county, as well as in neighboring counties, we are feeling, at the present moment, some of the effects of an amalgamation of this sort. The people of St. Thomas, a little more than a year ago, gave a very large bonus to the Credit Valley Railway Company to enable them to complete their line to that city, hoping thus to get competition eastward with the Great Western Railway, which formerly controlled all traffic to the eastward; but, Sir, the bonus was scarcely given and the railway scarcely completed when it appeared that negotiations were in progress for the consolidation of the Credit Valley Railway with the Great Western, with which it was intended to compete, so that the people of St. Thomas found, after giving a bonus of $50,000 to secure a competing line, that they had only secured another branch of the railway which controlled the traffic of the town. Of course it might be impossible to prevent arrangements which might amount to an amalgamation; but if a Commission existed as provided by this Bill, they could very easily provide that the city which had subscribed so largely for the purpose of securing competition should not be defeated in that object. I have no doubt other sections of the country are suffering in the same way, and that the evil will, in a few years, become greater than it is now. There is no doubt that the two greatest railway corporations in the country are competing with each other to buy up existing lines. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is acquiring all the lines it can get. It has acquired the provincial railway extending from this city to Montreal; and it is said it has acquired, or is trying to acquire, this very Great Western Railway, together with the link between Ottawa and Toronto which is to form part of its through line. We know that the Grand Trunk Railway is also trying to obtain all the side lines it can get; and it is not improbable that, before long, we shall find the entire railway trade of Canada in the hands of those two great companies, which, by their competition, may reduce through rates, but will make up their losses in that respect by the exorbitant rates which they will charge for local traffic. I think the creation of this vast company last year, and the fact of such competition going on between it and the Grand Trunk, are weighty reasons for the passage of some such measure as that introduced by the hon. member for North Simcoe. I do not pretend to have gone through the provisions of that Bill in detail. There are provisions in it, the operation of which I do not quite understand, and provisions which may be objectionable; but I think the House would only be doing an act of simple justice to the people of this country, who have subscribed largely to different lines of railways, in passing the Bill through its second reading, and giving the hon. gentleman an opportunity in Committee of perfecting it, and making it something thoroughly practical and useful. The objection has been made that we cannot do anything to regulate provincial lines. I see the hon. gentleman provides a possible solution of that difficulty by allowing our Commissioners to sit with provincial Commissioners; but that difficulty is disappearing gradually by the absorption of the provincial lines by the two great railway lines of the Dominion. I am glad to see the support which this Bill has received from both sides of the House, although the hon. Minister of Railways appears to be against it. The arguments advanced in its favor are such as occurred to many of us a year ago, when we were discussing the great railway scheme of the Government. We then urged the great danger to the country arising from the creation of a railway monopoly, and I am glad to see that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House feel the force of those arguments more keenly this year than they did last year, and I trust that, by the passage of this measure, we shall be able to do away with some of the evils which this monopoly may bring upon us.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). This Bill has attracted a good deal of attention during the past two or three years in the Province of Ontario. There have been numerous discussions upon it in the press and at public meetings, and it has been looked forward to as a panacea for some of the evils under which the public are laboring, especially discriminating rates between competitive and non-competitive points, the amalgamations of companies, and the creation of monopolies. I have glanced through the Bill now before the House, and I fail to find anything in it likely to work a cure for these various grievances. The Bill seems to me to be confined to two classes of provisions: one for settling disputes between railway companies and municipalities as to right of way, crossings, and so on, and the other for settling disputes between railway companies as to their traffic arrangements and their crossings, and the few other points of that kind; but I only find one clause containing the slightest reference to those various questions of a public character to which the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, and some others on this side of the House, have referred. There is only one clause which touches the grievances under which the public may be supposed to be laboring at the hands of railway companies, and that is the 27th clause of the Bill, which recites that doubts have arisen as to the validity of what is known as a joint purse arrangement, or the working of different lines by a joint committee, and declares that arrangements of this kind shall not be allowed, and makes some other provisions which, as I understand them, amount to nothing, and would not in any way remedy the grievances, or prevent, if the Bill went into practical effect, the accomplishment of the joint purse arrangement, if two companies sought to enter into it. There is not one word to prevent the amalgamation of companies for the best of all reasons, for the hon. gentleman is too experienced not to know that all our legislation in this direction cannot possibly prevent amalgamation in fact. We may prevent amalgamation in name, but to prevent amalgamation in fact, or one company acquiring control of the stock or bonds of another, none of our legislation can possibly reach so long as companies are controlled by the holders of the stock and bonds, which is the case, as is well known, of every railway company in existence unless they are Government railways. I think, therefore, this so-called Railway Commission Bill, about which much has been said, would turn out to be empty thunder, as far as the railway companies are concerned, and would give no relief to the public, but would utterly fail to attain the object for which the public sought for and hope to obtain at the hands of Parliament. But there are a great many difficulties which environ the way to legislation on this subject, as the Minister of Railways pointed out, and no doubt the hon. member when drafting this Bill—and when expunging, if I recollect rightly, some of the clauses in the Bill of last Session,—met with these difficulties. He doubtless felt the subject was one very difficult to deal with, and that it was utterly impossible to draw a Bill that this Parliament would pass, which would effectually reach the objects which, no doubt, he had in view. I doubt if he carries any other cure for those evils under which the public or some portion of the public in some places suffer than that proposed by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Wallace), that the Government buy out the railways of the country and run them themselves. I confess I am not prepared to adopt that policy; I think the country is not prepared to adopt it, but that the people would far rather labor under the comparatively trifling grievances that now exist, than enter into the wholesale business of buying up and running railways from one end of the country to the other. There is another difficulty to which the Minister of Railways did not refer, and it is especially applicable to Canada. What I refer to is this: the Government still own the Intercolonial. Are the Government prepared to submit the Intercolonial, a Government work, to the operation of the Bill and bring it under the control of the proposed Railway Commission;

and if not, is that road to be excluded and excepted from the control of the Commission, while every other road is to be subject to it? That railway carries on competition with other railways in different parts of the Dominion, and is it proposed to exclude it from the jurisdiction of the Commissioners while all other railways are to be placed under them? Of course the hon. member has endeavored to touch this point of provincial railways. He has only touched it. He proposed when any disputes arise between a Dominion and provincial railway, that, with the consent, of course, of the provincial railway or the Legislature governing it, two of the Dominion Railway Commissioners should be allowed to sit with one representing the provincial railway. I do not think any provincial railway will ever be willing to go into an arbitration of that kind with two of the Judges representing in fact, and appointed by the other interested, and the provincial road nominating only one. That mode of dealing with the difficulty will be found to be utterly impracticable, as in fact the whole of the Bill will be found to be. The Bill proposed to settle difficulties between railways—a matter in which the public took no interest—and difficulties between companies and municipalities, which have really no existence. None of the latter have ever been worthy of discussion, or in regard to which the slightest difficulty has been experienced in settling them, with the exception of that respecting the frontage in Toronto and the right of way down to the city. That was a matter of dispute between railway companies, and the city of Toronto took a very secondary interest in the matter; but the dispute was settled in as satisfactory a manner by the tribunal now established, the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, as it could have possibly been decided by the Railway Commission to be named under this Bill. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) talked a good deal about the Credit Valley road, as did other hon. gentlemen, but instead of declaring that this House should legislate in regard to that road, and prevent it being amalgamated with the Great Western, I think it would have been better if he had given his suggestions to another parliamentary tribunal, over which, perhaps, he has more influence and control, and in which he certainly has more political allies than in this House. The Credit Valley is entirely under the control of the Ontario Legislature; it has no power to amalgamate with the Great Western, and it is not likely to obtain such power from the Ontario Legislature at present; so any amalgamation between it and the Great Western is utterly impossible as the law stands, and, at all events, it is a matter over which we have no control whatever. If the shareholders in another company thought fit to acquire bonds or stocks of the Credit Valley, I suppose they could do so, and we could not legislate to prevent them. We cannot prevent capitalists buying stock or bonds of any company, and, so far as our legislative power goes, we are without any power whatever with regard to the Credit Valley Railway, and, as a matter of fact, there has been no amalgamation, and the Great Western does not possess any control over that road. While speaking of the Ontario Legislature, I would suggest that that tribunal does not always deal with these questions in the same spirit. If the Credit Valley wanted amalgamation they could not secure it, but when, strange to say, an application is made by the Grand Trunk for amalgamation or anything else, they get it at once by a sweeping majority. There is no opposition to anything the Grand Trunk wants. When a few days ago the Great Western and capitalists applied unitedly for the incorporation of the company to build a central station, which every one knows is an absolute necessity in Toronto, the Grand Trunk came forward and said: "You must not have a charter as it will interfere with our Union station." The Railway Committee declared the preamble not proved by a majority of thirty.

After a day or two had elapsed they passed a Bill amalgamating the whole of the railroads now composing the Midland system, and when called upon, in the interests of some of my constituents who had given bonuses, and by those of the hon. member for West Elgin, who had also given bonuses, to some of these roads being amalgamated, that Legislature refused to order these companies to give back the bonuses or make some provision that would give the municipalities some of the benefits, for which they had subscribed their money. The Legislature refused, on the ground that this amalgamation should be sanctioned whether the local companies were bonused or not; and the amalgamation was completed, the Grand Trunk Company having, notoriously, the control of the Legislature. That just shows that we cannot always look to the Legislature to prevent amalgamation. At the same time, I confess, that I do not see that any beneficial result to the public at large, can follow from going further with this Bill, or letting it go to the Railway Committee. If my hon. friend thinks further discussion would enable him to elaborate something that would attain the objects the public have in view, which are not attained by this Bill, or if he thinks that the Bill could be so amended or re-drafted in Committee, as to meet the objects sought to be attained, I have no objection to acquiesce in its being referred to the Railway Committee; but I am convinced it will be found these objects are very difficult, if not impossible of attainment, by the Bill before the House. That Bill does not in the slightest degree reach the object sought for.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). It is very clear that the hon. member for North Simcoe, in endeavoring to make his Bill law, need not expect any sympathy or support from any person connected with the railway companies. The object of the Bill is to put the railway companies under the control, if not of Parliament, at all events of a Commission; and he need not expect to get assistance in the slightest degree from any person connected with railway companies. The companies want no controlling check by the Legislature. They want to have everything in their own hands, as they have now practically. I think this is the third time the hon. member for North Simcoe has introduced this Bill. I may say when it was first introduced in Parliament I felt disposed to oppose it. I was inclined to entertain the opinion that perhaps the less we interfered with corporations of this kind the better in the public interests; but a careful examination of the subject has convinced me that it is the imperative duty of Parliament to interfere in this matter. The experience in the Mother Country, the difficult problems that have been solved there through the instrumentality of a Railway Commission, the experience of the great public, the United States, extending over a number of years, the report of the Committee appointed, I think, by the State of New York, in 1850, which had under review and consideration the whole railway traffic in that State and the adjoining States, the mass of valuable evidence obtained on the subject, and the valuable report that was submitted by, I think, what was called the Hepburn Committee,—all this convinced me thoroughly that it was the absolute imperative duty of the Legislature to interfere in some way. Now, my hon. friend has introduced his Bill three times, in 1880, 1881 and now in 1882. In 1881, the Bill only reached its first reading, and, for some reason best known to the hon. member for North Simcoe, the Bill was not pressed. I advised my hon. friend to press the Bill and take the sense of the House on the question, because I felt satisfied that, with our experience in the last few years and notably the last year or two, the majority of the House would pronounce in favor of the principle set forth on the Bill. I am perfectly satisfied that the vast mass of the people is in favor of some legislation in the direction indicated in the Bill of my hon. friend. I am not going to make a speech on the question just now, because, as I understood from the remarks of the hon. Minister of Railways, he is not opposed to the principle of the Bill.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I understand he has not, at all events, used any argument in opposition to the principle of the Bill, but is willing to let it be referred to the Railway Committee. I advise my hon. friend from North Simcoe not to refer this Bill to the Railway Committee, but rather to have it referred to a Select Committee, who will take the trouble to put into shape what I believe my hon. friend is attempting to arrive at, but which, perhaps, is not exactly comprised in the Bill submitted. The hon. Minister of Railways though not opposed to the principle of the Bill, suggested one or two difficulties. I think these difficulties, especially one of them, were greatly exaggerated. The hon. Minister stated we have now too many Courts in the Dominion; that we created a Supreme Court; that there are some serious objections to the existence and continuance of that Court, and that it costs the country $50,000 a year. It appears to me that has nothing to do with the question. The real point is, whether the people desire it. If they do, there should be some tribunal created for the purpose of carrying into effect these provisions. The hon. Minister of Railways exaggerated, in my humble judgment, the difficulties.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Not unusual.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Perhaps it is not unusual. On this occasion, however, the hon. Minister has exaggerated the difficulties very considerably. No man has a higher respect for the eminent abilities of the hon. member who has introduced this Bill than I have, and it is quite possible he would not withdraw from the practice of his profession for the small sum of $20,000 a year. But the hon. Minister must recollect that there are in Canada men just as eminent in the legal profession as the hon. member for North Simcoe. We must recollect that the Judges of our Courts of Appeal in Ontario and Quebec, are men selected from the best ranks of the profession on account of their eminent abilities, and these men are willing to take these positions at a salary of $5,000 per year; yet the hon. Minister thinks we cannot get men able to deal with the questions likely to come up under this Bill at a salary under $10,000 or $20,000 a year. The hon. Minister knows well that we can get first-class lawyers, both in Ontario and Quebec, to occupy positions in the Supreme Court or Court of Appeal, at $5,000 per year. The Judges in the Supreme Court here are only paid $7,000, and surely better men than they are could not be desired to sit on the Commission provided for by this Bill. The hon. gentleman knows well that the three Judges or Commissioners could be obtained at a salary of not exceeding $15,000 or $20,000 a year altogether. But my hon. friend, in his Bill, does not propose there shall be a fixed salary, but provides for payment by fees. To that I am opposed. If the Judges are to be independent and above suspicion they should be paid a fixed salary, as in England, and should not be open to the suspicion even that they might be influenced by the railway companies, as they would be if paid by fees from the railway companies. It may be quite true that the Bill does not provide for some of the difficulties to which objection is taken—the difficult problems that are constantly cropping up with respect to the carrying trade and traffic over our Dominion Railways—but it is a very simple matter, if the Bill is not perfect in that respect, to make it perfect; it is an easy matter, if the Bill gets a second reading, and is referred to a Special Committee, to give that Committee full authority to deal with every possible class of cases that can arise between railway companies and individuals, or between railway companies themselves. The hon. member for Niagara has said that the experience in the Mother Country, where they have had eighteen years experience, of a law like this, has not been satisfactory. The hon. gentleman ought to know quite well that the law in England has only been in existence eight or nine years; that, up to 1854, the Board of Trade dealt with this subject, and so difficult was it to obtain anything like justice from the Board of Trade, or so difficult was it to set the Board of Trade in motion, when any question arose that should come before it, that Parliament interfered in the matter, and took it out of the hands of the Board of Trade, and handed it over to one of the Superior Courts there, the Court of Common Pleas. From 1854 to 1873, dealing with questions of this kind was entirely in the hands of the Court of Common Pleas in England. Anybody who has taken the trouble to examine this question, to read the reports of the various Commissions appointed with the view of enquiring into questions of this kind, knows perfectly well that transferring such questions to the Court of Common Pleas was wholly useless. During the whole period, from 1854 to 1873, I do not think there was a single case that ever came before the Court of Common Pleas, where the difficult problems continually cropping up with respect to traffic, freights, rebates, unequal rates, monopolies and all such embarrassing questions, was ever submitted to the Court of Common Pleas. So satisfied were the representatives of the people in Parliament, that as my hon. friend has stated, a Committee was appointed by Parliament to make enquiries on the whole question. They took evidence and the measure underwent a thorough investigation, and the result was that the Committee reported that the Board of Trade was not a sufficiently judicial body to deal with questions of this kind; that the Court of Common Pleas was not sufficiently informed on such questions, and that a Committee of Parliament was not sufficiently permanent to regulate such matters. Two of these tribunals had been in existence and failed to grapple with the questions, now a third was proposed. That Committee made their report, and as a result a Bill was introduced in 1873, the 36 and 37 Victoria, chapter 48, after which the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe, (Mr. McCarthy) is modelled. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) says the law would be a failure here as it is a failure in England. I deny that statement; it has been eminently successful in England. True, for a few years, it was a failure, as all new experiments, especially in the establishment of a new procedure, and the creation of new courts, usually are. Parties generally are reluctant to commit their cases to a newly constituted tribunal. In addition to that, it is well known that such a tribunal would have the whole power of the railway corporations enlisted against them, and for a considerable number of years for these reasons it was practically a failure in England. For a whole year no case came before the Commission, but, as people became acquainted with its beneficial working, cases of difficulty were committed to it, and as time went on the Court became eminently popular. If the hon. member for Niagara referred to the report of the Board of Commissioners issued in 1881, he would have seen ample proof of its satisfactory working in England. If it worked satisfactorily there, I see nothing to prevent its working satisfactorily here. The hon. the Minister of Railways says it does not follow that it will work well in Canada—that we are differently situated. In England railways are isolated from the continental system; we are beside the great Republic with whose railways we have great competition. Apart from the general question as to how we should clothe the Committee with the power of dealing with freights and other matters necessarily arising on our through lines of railway, there are many questions constantly arising on our local roads that should be committed to the proposed Board. Does the hon. gentleman know, during the last eight or ten years, of a question relating to any of these matters having been brought before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, or of its dealing with or disposing of it—such as unequal rates, rebates, monopolies, giving a preference to one individual or to one locality over another? I venture to say no such question has ever come before that Committee. And yet these are leading questions, constantly cropping up in the carrying trade of this country. The hon. gentleman says it has been a failure in the United States; that, with their gigantic system of railways only one State has established a Commission. But he ought to know perfectly well that, although they have adopted it in but few States, in almost every State laws have been passed so stringent that it is almost impossible for a railway company to evade them. In Massachusetts and one or two other States, they have laws prohibiting rebates, drawbacks or special rates for any party; and if they are violated in the interest of any individual or locality it is followed with exceedingly heavy penalties. In some cases the offending company would be liable to imprisonment for three years and to a fine of $20,000. Although in no State have they a Railway Commission, as I have stated, yet their laws are much more stringent in regard to such acts than ours. In addition, the hon. gentleman ought to know that this very question has occupied a very prominent position for the last year or two—in public discussions in the carrying trade of the United States—that in almost every State a Special Commission to make enquiries into the best mode of checking undue preferences and monopolies has been appointed; and that last year a Bill was submitted by an eminent member of Congress to that body to create a Board of Railway Commissioners that might have power and authority over the United States. Now, Sir, it is said, by the hon. member for Victoria, that this Bill does not contain provisions that will meet the difficulties which have been suggested by the hon. gentlemen who are in favor of this Bill. That may be quite true to some extent, but not altogether. I believe that the Bill is an eminently proper one, and I believe that additional provisions can be grafted on it that will make it still more satisfactory to those who are engaged in the trade of the country. The hon. member for Victoria argued that there was no occasion for legislation of this kind. Sir, that strikes me as being an extraordinary argument for any member of Parliament to use who has taken the trouble to enquire into this question. It seems extraordinary that he should argue that there is no necessity for legislation of this kind, that there is no necessity for the creation of a Board of Railway Commissioners, or for some authority having an independent existence, that will be above the control of these huge and gigantic corporations that we have created, are now creating, and will go on creating, I suppose, till the whole Dominion is interlaced with railways. It does appear to me that, if there ever was a time in the history of this country when we ought to deal with that question in a practical manner, now is the time. This Parliament created a gigantic corporation not long ago. We see, by the applications that have been made to the Legislature of Ontario and to this Parliament, that there is now an attempt to extend the power, the influence, and the greatness of these corporations. Why, Sir, one or two railway companies are, practically, gobbling up the whole of the minor railways, and, I venture to say, that, within two or three years, the entire railway system of this Dominion will, practically, be in the hands of two gigantic railway corporations, they will be above Parliament, above the power of the Government; and to say that the farmers of the country, the traders of the country, can get justice from the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, with the power and the influence those railway companies possess over members of Parliament and over the Government—I care not which party is in power—is, in my variable judgment, so much arrant nonsense. The same thing was stated in the United States. What did Vanderbilt and Gould say? Why, that even with respect to the Commission which they proposed to establish, either the railways would own the Commissioners, or the Commissioners would own the railways. The same thing might be said with respect to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. The only way by which we can secure justice to all parties, I think, is by the establishment of a Board of Railway Commissioners. It is said there is no necessity for it. Why the experience of everyday life shows the necessity for it. Let me give you one or two instances. The same thing was said in England. Now, if any one will take the trouble of turning to a valuable little work upon Railway Corporations, published by Mr. Parsloe, in England, he will find just the very argument that has been adduced now against this Bill fully answered. The author points out the absolute injustice to localities and to individuals, of the preferences that were allowed there before the establishment of this Court of Railway Commissioners. My hon. friend has referred to an instance that also came under my notice last year, when the Grand Trunk Railway carried a car of oil cake from Baden to Belleville, a distance of 185 miles, and charged $52. They carried the same cargo from Chicago to Belleville, a distance of 628 miles, and charged $50; in other words, they charged $2 less for carrying it 443 miles further. Now, Sir, I ask you, is that a state of things that ought to continue? It is all very well for us to say that men who have invested their capital in these companies ought to be protected. So they should, fairly and honestly; but there is somebody else that ought to be protected as well as they. We invested in the Grand Trunk Railway, if I remember aright, something like $16,000,000 of the people's money, and think that while we are protecting the interests of the English capitalists, who have invested their money in this and other railways, we ought not to forget the people of this country who contributed largely to the construction and equipment of that road. It was stated in a Toronto paper, on the 20th February, 1881, and has not been denied, that the Grand Trunk Railway charged $75 a car for coal oil from the city of London to the city of Ottawa, to all the manufacturers and refiners there, except to one man to whom they gave a drawback of $38 per car. Now, it is quite manifest that if they charge $75 a car to every refiner and manufacturer of coal oil, who had his oil shipped from London to Ottawa, and gave one man a drawback of $38 a car, that one man had the advantage in the market to the extent of $38 per car. Why, Sir, some manufacturers send their coal oil from London to Ottawa via the Suspension Bridge, and over the New York Central and the Rome, Watertown, and Ogdensburg Railways, and they get their oil carried by that roundabout way from London to Ottawa for $56 per car. Still the man who got the rebate, or the preference, or the drawback, had an advantage of $19 per car even over those who sent their oil via the United States. Is that a state of things that ought to continue? It is quite clear the Railway Committee of the Privy Council cannot deal with it; they would not deal with it; and it is quite clear that it ought to be dealt with by some tribunal. Now, here is a case that happened not long ago—a gross case, an outrageous case, if it be correct. It was stated openly in the press of Toronto, and has not been contradicted. The correspondent of a Stratford paper stated not long ago that a car load of flour is carried from London to Montreal for $15 less than from Stratford to Montreal. Is that so? Because, if it is, it is a gross outrage, and one that ought not to be tolerated by a free Parliament for a single day. Although we may have every sympathy with the unfortunates—if they have been unfortunate—who invested their money in this undertaking, still, as I said before, we ought to protect the interests of our people. It is further stated that the Grand

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

Trunk Railway carried a car load of flour from Brantford to Montreal via the Grand Trunk, 39 miles further than from Stratford to Montreal, at a much less rate than from Stratford. Now, Sir, if that be true, I say that it is an outrage that ought not to be tolerated. It is further stated that freight on a barrel of pork from Chicago to Brockville is 80 cents, and from Brockville to McKay's Station, a distance of 100 miles, is 95 cents. They carried a barrel of flour 100 miles and charged 8 cents more for carrying it that distance than they charged for carrying it 723 miles. I know an instance that occurred in my own neighborhood a few days before I came here. A gentleman wanted to ship some stuff to Winnipeg. He found that the freight upon mutton from Goderich to Winnipeg, distance of 1,333 miles, was $3 per 100 pounds; while from Clinton to Winnipeg, though 12 miles nearer Winnipeg than Goderich, the freight was only $1.61 per 100 pounds, so that the man was paying, $1.39 from Goderich to Clinton, a distance of 12 miles. Now is that a thing Parliament ought to tolerate a single moment, if a free Parliament can check it? So, with respect to passengers, you can get a ticket from Boston to Chicago much cheaper than you can from Montreal or Ottawa to Chicago. It may be difficult to check these things, but I think that Parliament ought, at all events, to make an attempt to check them. Let me—in answer to my hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb), and my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Cameron), who appear to think that the proposition submitted by my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has proved a practical failure when submitted elsewhere—read the opinion of the New York Chamber of Commerce, as expressed by their spokesman, Mr. Simon Stern, on the propriety of legislative interference. That gentleman says:

"Gross inequalities arise from this condition of affairs. Individuals and communities are put at the mercy of these great corporations, who have it in their power to make one man rich and keep others poor, and they actually exercise that power in an arbitrary manner, without rule, without consistency, and seemingly without reason.

It may be said that this is all true enough, but the Board of Commissioners which the hon. gentleman proposes to create by this Bill will not cure the evil we complain of. I say, Sir, that we have already tried the experiment of having these matters disposed of by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and that it has been a failure. In England they tried to solve the problem through the Board of Trade, but that experiment proved a failure; they tried it through the intervention of the common law courts, but that plan, too, was found unsuccessful. Let us at all events make the experiment proposed in the Bill, and see whether or not we can check what I cannot look upon otherwise than as a most iniquitous state of affairs, viz., that these railway companies should have unlimited and unrestricted powers to discriminate against individuals or localities, and make one man rich, as Mr. Stern says, and another poor—to destroy one locality and build up another. The experiment is worth trying at all events, and if the hon. Minister of Railways has no other objection to the Bill, except that it will necessitate the creation of a new court, and the appointment and payment of new Judges, I humbly submit that that is not a sufficient argument against the Bill. The hon. gentleman did advance another argument, viz., as to our right to attempt to interfere with railways that obtained their corporate existence through the Local Legislatures. But, Sir, it is not necessary to discuss that subject at any length, or, indeed, to discuss, it at all just now, because, as I understand the hon. Minister of Railways, he is willing that the Bill should be referred either to the Railway Committee or to a Select Committee. I wish to remind the hon. gentleman, however, that that question has practically passed beyond the region of discussion in the United States at least. The State of Pennsylvania undertook to deal—not exactly in the same way as the hon. gentleman proposes by this Bill, but in an analogous way—with the traffic of railways by the imposition of a tax for State purposes of $2 per ton on all freight passing over railways, both local and inter-state, which passed through the State of Pennsylvania. It was contended that the State tax was illegal. The Supreme Court of the State held that it was not illegal. The appeal was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, which held that it was an illegal imposition, because the State had no power or control over traffic of this kind—that traffic meant commerce, and that commerce was a matter within the purview and jurisdiction of the Federal authority. And I believe the same rule will apply here. If freight or traffic be commerce—and according to this authority it is—then I say the Parliament of Canada, and the Parliament of Canada alone, will have power to deal with this subject. I shall give this Bill my most cordial support. I hope it will be referred to a Special Committee, who will have power to deal with it intelligently and carefully, and take sufficient time to submit to Parliament a measure which will commend itself to the public and to those engaged in the trade with which my hon. friend proposes to deal.

Mr. ORTON. I would not be doing my duty to those who sent me to this House if I did not rise to express my warm approval of the object which this Bill has in view. I think, Sir, the feeling is very general in the community—I know in my own constituency it is very intense—in reference to the grasping power of railways, and the disregard they show to the public feelings, the public convenience, and the public welfare. I happen to represent a constituency which, like the county of Elgin, contributed very largely to the Credit Valley Railway for the purpose of obtaining competition with the Great Western, and after a great deal of effort on the part of the people of that county, and the expenditure of a very liberal amount of money by the various municipalities, the road was constructed, and the people have, so far, derived a great deal of benefit by the construction of a competing line. But, like many others in my neighborhood, we find ourselves face to face with the fact that the Great Western have made a proposition for amalgamation which appears to have been favorably received, and, in fact, so far as the public are aware, the amalgamation has occurred. At any rate it is quite evident to those who send traffic over these railways, that there is an understanding between the companies that they shall not look to the convenience of the public, or the general advantage of trade. As the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) has stated, the Government and the people of this country have contributed largely to all our Dominion railways, to the Great Western and Grand Trunk Railways more especially; but we find these railways constantly pursuing a policy which is dangerous to the best interests of the people. We find them setting aside local traffic in favor of through traffic. When our people wish to send their grain to a foreign market, not only do they not get as favorable rates of freight as the people of a foreign country, but they do not receive the same consideration in the way of car accommodation, and it is this grievance which they feel the most severely. I hope this Bill will go before the proper Committee and receive the careful attention it deserves.

THE STAMP DUTY.

Mr. SPEAKER reported that the Senate had passed Bill (No. 63) to repeal the duty on Promissory Notes, Drafts and Bills of Exchange, with one amendment.

Amendment read the first and second time.

ATTEMPT ON THE QUEEN'S LIFE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said an announcement had just been made in the other House, which it was well he should make here, and which would afford cause for rejoicing to hon. members at the ill-success of the dastardly attempt to take the life of Her Majesty. He then read the following Message:—

“Her Majesty the Queen has been shot at at Windsor this afternoon but has not been injured.”

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

COURT OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Halton). Mr. Speaker, I desire, in the first place, to compliment the hon. member for South Huron for the very able and informing speech which he has delivered on this subject. When the subject was before Parliament last Session I had very grave doubts, and expressed them, as to whether the circumstances and necessities of the case required the remedy which my hon. friend from North Simcoe proposed. It seemed to me, Sir, that with the Supreme Court, with the Committee of the Privy Council, and with the other means which were at the disposal of parties who might feel themselves aggrieved, sufficient opportunity was afforded for the redress of any injuries that might be sustained. But further reflection and further observation, and the change which has taken place since then in our railway system, convince me that it is absolutely necessary in the public interest, and in the interest of individuals composing the public, in their dealings with railway companies, that some better remedy should be provided for the redress of evils than those which now exist. The Bill submitted for our consideration seems to me to be open to some very serious objections. At the same time I think it is expedient, and I think we will be discharging our duty to the public—for I believe there is a strong public opinion on this question to-day—by taking such steps as the case requires for considering, and, if need be, amending the Bill. I would very much prefer if my hon. friend would consent that his Bill should be referred to a Select Committee of the House, composed of gentlemen distinguished by their knowledge of the law and of the railway business to consider its various details. I would call my hon. friend's attention to one point which has occurred to me as a constitutional objection to his measure. I question very much whether it is in the power of this Parliament to adopt a measure giving such powers as are proposed to be given to this Railway Commission. This Parliament is a Parliament of limited powers, as much as the Local Legislatures of this Dominion. It has very much larger powers, of course; its range of jurisdiction is very much larger; but, at the same time, it is restrained within constitutional limits, and I do not find in our Constitution any authority given to us to establish a tribunal of this kind, and to give it compulsory powers which it may exercise affecting the rights and privileges and property of the subjects of this Dominion. It must be in the character of a Court if it exercises these powers at all. It is a judicial body if it is anything. It may recommend to Parliament, it may inquire, it may investigate, it may report; but if its judgments or decisions are to have any legal or binding force or effect, they must emanate from a judicial tribunal. It must be a Court—a court of law; and we know what a court of law is, and how it is regulated. Appeals may be made from it to the Privy Council of England. The railway corporations have their ramifications extending very widely; the larger portion of the railways, as has been stated, are owned, or have been contributed to by parties living under a foreign jurisdiction, and it does seem to me that beside the question of the expenses, the investigations, and the decisions of such a tribunal, we must see that we have the power, the constitutional right, to arm this tribunal with authority to enforce its decrees. I see by the 14th section of this Bill that my learned friend proposes to transfer the judgments of this Commission to the Exchequer Court, and to make them decrees or orders, or equivalent to decrees or orders, of the Court of Exchequer. I question very much whether we can thus draw, as it were, on the constitutional power of an existing Court—which undoubtedly we had the power to establish—to support the judgments and decisions of this tribunal. I think that would be straining very much the power we possess. Section 101 of the Act under which, I suppose, any authority of this kind may be inferred, is very short and explicit:

“The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, provide from time to time for the constitution and maintenance of a general Court of Appeal for Canada.”

It was under that authority that the Supreme Court was established:

“And for the establishment of any additional Courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.”

Now, is this tribunal, which my hon. friend proposes to constitute, a Court in the sense of this Act? Is it a Court for the better administration of the laws of Canada, or a Court for the administration of a particular department or a particular class of the laws of Canada? Because it is clear to me that we must provide, by positive enactments, for the subjects upon which it shall adjudicate. To give a case by way of illustration: one of the objects for which it will be appointed will be to deal with questions arising from unfair discrimination between places and individuals in the charges made for freight by railway companies. That is an abuse. That, I should say, speaking off-hand, is against the common law of the land. I do not see on what principle a quasi-public company, performing the duties of a public carrier, can undertake to discriminate between different freighters, and to charge one person a large sum and another person a lesser sum for the same work. It seems to me that, under the principles of the common law that must be objectionable. But if any difficulty occurs in applying the common law in such a case, we should make it—if it is not already made—positive law. We should do as has been done in many cases in the United States, declare what can be and what cannot be done by these railway companies; and if the existing courts cannot deal with the case we can constitute courts for that purpose. But I have very great doubts that the Board of Railway Commissioners proposed by this Bill will come within the spirit and meaning of the authority which is given to us in the 101st section of the B.N.A. Act. I merely point that out as an impression produced on my mind on reading this Bill. But if the Bill is referred, as I have said, to a Select Committee of this House, and if that Committee will make use of the information which has been obtained by members of this House on this matter, and apply that information, first to finding out whether a remedy cannot be provided by enforcing the principles of the common law, and then provide some easy, simple, prompt, cheap machinery by which offenders may be brought under the tribunals of the country, I think that is as far as we can go, and will be found to be a sufficient remedy. If not, we shall come here again, and continue to come, for the purpose of amending defective laws, and applying effective remedies. I trust that my hon. friend will make the selection of a good Committee and let this matter be considered by it. I confess my opinion has greatly changed as to the necessity of some adequate remedy for those abuses which are beginning to show themselves in all parts of the Dominion.

Mr. CURRIER. I agree with those who have spoken in favor of this Bill. I think the time has come when legislation should take place in the direction which the Bill proposes. I think the Commissioners ought to be clothed with power and authority to settle all matters of complaint between individuals and railroads—to regulate passenger fares and freight charges, and all matters concerning railway traffic generally. I hope the Bill will become law this Session. I believe that gentlemen well qualified to fill the position of these Commissioners can be found for a very much less sum than has been indicated by the hon. Minister of Railways. I think, for $4,000 a year, gentlemen could be found who could administer these matters to the satisfaction of the country. I hope this Bill will become law this Session.

Mr. McCUAIG. Whatever necessities may have arisen in other countries for the establishment of a court of this nature, I have arrived at the conclusion that the conduct of the railway companies of this country do not justify such a law. I have had some forty years experience of railway matters in this country, and I am somewhat familiar with its trade, and I have yet to learn from an authoritative source, that the Grand Trunk Railway, which has given us many advantages, has, in any instance, extorted from the people. I feel, as a Canadian, that we invited years ago foreign capitalists—English capitalists particularly,—to embark their money in this enterprise, and that the Government of the country were, to a certain extent, committed by a prospectus issued when the public were invited to take stock with reasonable probability of a profit arising from their investments; and from that day to this those people who embarked their money in good faith have not received one shilling of dividend. Under such circumstances, I am prepared to admit that they have a right to make a reasonable and sufficient charge to cover all necessary expenses, and to secure them in addition a fair and equitable dividend on the money they have invested. I am not prepared to place the entire railway interests of this country in the hands of any three men, however able they may be. Those interests are too great, and those organizations too powerful, to be submitted to the authority of any three men. I believe we have on the Bench in this country men of undoubted integrity, who are familiar with the laws of the country, and if you wish to give them more power to deal with these questions, I am willing that you should give it to them; but let us avoid establishing any additional courts, especially such a court as this, in which you propose to hand over interests so large to three men. Now, Sir, it has been argued, and properly argued, by the hon. the Minister of Railways that, to secure men of eminent ability, great financial skill, and skill in the management of railways, you would have to pay enormous salaries. It is well known that the banks are paying $25,000 a year to the managers of these institutions, and it is also well known that the employment of these men of ability and financial skill has proved a large source of profit to the banks; and if you can only secure such men by the payment of large salaries, then I say, by the establishment of this court, you will be adding $200,000 a year to the expenses of this country, and I am opposed to any additional expense of that kind. My hon. friend opposite spoke about the influence of these large companies upon Parliament. If, Sir, the Parliament of this country, composed of the House of Commons containing 208 members, and the Senate, composed of some eighty members, could be influenced in its action by these large institutions, how much more unsafe would such interests be in the hands of three men. But I do not believe it possible for the railway companies to influence this Parliament. I believe the patriotism for which the hon. members of this House are distinguished, will rise above anything of that kind, and I regard it as an insult to the hon. members of this House, to say that they can be influenced by any influences of that

Mr. McCUAIG. If, Sir, the Parliament of this country, composed of the House of Commons containing 208 members, and the Senate, composed of some eighty members, could be influenced in its action by these large institutions, how much more unsafe would such interests be in the hands of three men. But I do not believe it possible for the railway companies to influence this Parliament. I believe the patriotism for which the hon. members of this House are distinguished, will rise above anything of that kind, and I regard it as an insult to the hon. members of this House, to say that they can be influenced by any influences of that kind, however powerful. In accordance with these views, I move, seconded by Mr. Hackett:

That this Bill be not read now the second time, but be read the second time this day six months.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I am not prepared to say whether the Bill is a remedy for all the evils that now exist in relation to the management of railway companies; but I confess I am not a little surprised to hear an hon. gentleman of the large business experience of the hon. member for Prince Edward take the ground that there are no causes of objection to the way in which railways are managed in this country. My experience is that these railway companies are made the means of discriminating between individuals and localities, and some remedy is required in this respect. My own opinion is, this Bill does not go far enough; but I am quite satisfied that some remedy should be applied in the way of restricting railway companies from conducting their business in a manner that is beneficial to some and prejudicial to others. I am satisfied that the discussion which has arisen on this subject, whatever may be its fate, will be of much benefit in the way of directing attention to the question as it stands at present. It may be said that the common law of this country provides a remedy for discriminating rates by railway companies between individuals and localities. But we must remember that, up to the present time, at all events, the law has been inoperative in that respect. If the law can be put into operation by our courts and tribunals as they stand at present, and if it is a sufficient remedy some method should be devised of applying the law so as to make it reach the railway companies. Any person who knows anything about the power of railway corporations, must know that no individual desires to enter a suit against a great railway corporation for the purpose of obtaining justice with regard to the exactions made by such company. We all know that the power of these great companies is such that it is almost impossible for any individual to cope with them single-handed in the courts of this country. It seems to me that if some tribunal, some court of immediate resort was organized to which cases of discrimination on the part of railway companies might be referred without going through the process of law as it now stands, it would be very desirable to have such a court. It may be that a court of this kind might be unconstitutional, as the hon. member for Halton has suggested; but it seems to me that a body of men might be appointed to enquire summarily into cases referred to them, and if it was not deemed advisable to clothe them with the power of deciding the questions at issue, they might be charged with deciding whether the cases referred to them were such that they ought to be brought into the courts. For instance, if it be a fraud on the public that discriminating rates exist by which one individual may be able to obtain rates over a certain portion of the line on more favorable terms than those given to other individuals, as mentioned by the hon. member for Centre Huron, this tribunal proposed to be organized under this Bill might be charged with the duty of dealing with cases of that kind. I am strongly in favor of the adoption of some means by which those cases can be reached by some swift remedy, and for that reason I shall support the Bill and vote against the amendment.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I am very glad, indeed, that the hon. member for North Simcoe has introduced this Bill. It is decidedly in the interest of the smaller towns of Ontario, and perhaps all over the Dominion. I am quite aware that railway companies have done a great deal to promote the trade of this country and develop its resources, but they have done all this on commercial principles, and as they are now managed, it is clear to everybody that, unless competition exists at certain points, the trade of smaller places may be sacrificed for the building up of larger places. Now, although a Bill like this may tend to increase rates at competing points, the effect no doubt would be to reduce rates at other points, so that the railway corporations on the whole might not suffer much. Everybody can see how places like Toronto, London, &c., where there are competing lines of railways, people doing business at these points have material advantage over those doing business at smaller points. It is not the interest of the country to centralize wealth too largely at two or three particular places. Smaller towns all over the Dominion have burdened themselves for railway competition; and sometimes, when they got what they expected, they are deprived of this by combinations formed between rival companies. If there was a Court of Commissioners such as the hon. member for North Simcoe has referred to, we would get a better distribution of justice from railway corporations than is conferred by those preferential rates. I fancy that smaller towns and men of smaller means would have a better chance to maintain their position, and I feel satisfied that smaller towns, which are now being deprived of natural facilities for development, would grow more rapidly. I could state instances where smaller towns have been kept in the background by rates imposed against them. If the hon. member for North Simcoe could break down these differential rates and give advantages to people who are deprived of these advantages in their ordinary business, it would be a great boon to this country. I hope the House, therefore, will reject the amendment and adopt the motion, so that we may be enabled to follow in the course in which the more advanced States of the American Union have gone, as well as England, and thus relieve ourselves to a certain extent of the bondage imposed on us by the railway corporations.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I hope my hon. friend will not persist in his motion to delay the Bill for three months. This Bill is now before the House. It has been amended by my hon. friend since last year, and now he brings it in in a shape which he thinks entitles it to receive the sanction of Parliament. It is only fair we should refer the Bill to a Committee. I should prefer the Railway Committee, because it is much larger, but if the House is of opinion that a separate Committee would give better attention to the matter, I would not oppose the selection of a Committee. I think the Committee will have a very important duty to perform, which will be to examine the matter thoroughly, to hear witnesses, and obtain all the data required to enable them to report a good Bill. When the Bill comes before the House it will be reprinted and we shall be in a position to judge whether the Bill so reported is one that should receive the sanction of the House; but up to this moment we can hardly say we should not consider this matter at all. There may be exaggerations on one side or the other, but all this will be examined by the Committee, and it would report how the matter stood. I really believe the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig), would do well to reserve this motion for another stage of the Bill, should the Bill, after it had been considered by the Committee, meet with his disapproval.

Mr. McCUAIG. My experience is, that most of the railways through Ontario have not been constructed in the interests of the people, but to oblige political partisans in the Ontario House. I believe there has been no regular system laid down on which those railways were to be built, and no doubt railways have been built which have brought ruin on those building them, owing to the action of political parties. We cannot expect that every man should have a railway at his own door, and it is time that the House took into its own keeping the large sum of money granted in aid of railways. My resolution was not submitted with a view to its being offensive to the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill, of whose ability I am perfectly sensible; but from the temper of the House and of the people, I believe the Bill was not one which would meet general concurrence. However, at the suggestion of the hon. the Minister of Public Works, I am perfectly willing to withdraw my motion.

Motion withdrawn.

Bill read the second time.

Mr. McCARTHY moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, composed of Messrs. Cameron (Huron), Colby, Daly, Girouard (Jacques Cartier), Houde, Jones, McDougall, McLennan, White (Cardwell), White (Renfrew), Trow, Weldon and the mover. He said: In making this motion, I beg to refer, and I do so very briefly, to some of the criticisms that have been made in the debate which has just taken place on the second reading. Most of the adverse criticisms have been very fully and completely answered and there is very little left for me to say. I regret very much that the hon. the Minister of Railways is not in his place, because, from him a very large portion of the opposition to the measure has proceeded, and it would have afforded me much pleasure to have replied in his own hearing and presence. I understood the hon. the Minister of Railways to object on one ground, which I thought I had explained last Session, and which I can explain in a very few words this Session. One point the hon. Minister made was, that it was impossible for us, in this House, to deal with local railways, and that the measure, therefore, must be, to a certain extent, incomplete. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that is so, and remembering that, out of 8,000 miles of railway in this Dominion, probably two-thirds, or 6,000 miles, are under the control of this Parliament, I fail to see any very great force in the argument that, because we cannot deal with 8,000 miles, we should not deal with 6,000 miles. But I entirely deny that this Parliament is not competent to deal with this matter of railways, notwithstanding that the companies may be chartered by the Local House. I believe the Constitution under which this House sits—as the hon. member for Huron has told us, and he cited American authorities—gives this House the power to deal with all matters affecting trade and commerce—and the matter of traffic is a matter of commerce—and is therefore within the purview of the Parliament of Canada. I think these reasons are sufficient to answer that objection. Then the promoters say—and it has been urged more than once, not merely here, but elsewhere, and not merely on this occasion, but whenever the Bill has been mentioned—that the appointment of a Railway Commission would have the effect of hampering Canadian railways, and give the advantage of through trade to American systems. If the Bill were laying down any cast-iron rule, and saying that Canadian railways should charge so much per mile, or so much per ton for freight carried by them, I could understand the force of that objection; but the very fact that the Commission is to be composed—and the appointments will rest very largely with the hon. the Minister of Railways—of competent men who will understand the interests of the country as well as of the railways, I think, answers the question, as they would not unnecessarily interfere with through traffic so long as it did not interfere with local traffic. But we must remember that the people have, practically, built the railways of this country. In that respect, perhaps, the railway system of Canada differs from that of any other country, at all events nominally one-third, but I believe actually one-half, of the cost has come directly out the pockets of the people; and if the people are going to have their own railways used against them, so that the foreigner may be able to use them against our people, it is an injustice which the representatives of the people should endeavor in some way to prevent. I disclaim all hostility to railways. Believing that honesty is the true policy, not merely for people generally but also for railways, I see no possible objection to railways conducting business honestly and fairly, and charging fair rates, but not attempting to control the business and rights of our people in the interests of railway managers. I think that it will be found that this frequent conduct of railway managers in discriminating in favor of capitalists and against towns, and endeavoring to crush rival routes, is really of more injury to the railways themselves than of benefit to the particular corporations. The result, at all events, is that they destroy their rivals in business, crush them down effectually, and by-and-bye gain, by amalgamations, that which this system of injustice has first brought about. My hon. friend the member for Halton (Mr. McDougall), seems to doubt whether the law is constitutional or not. I must confess, though I say it with great deference, before a parliamentarian of my hon. friend's experience, that I entertain no such doubt. It seems to me the section of the Act, to which he refers, confers on this Parliament power to constitute a court for this purpose, for the whole country. The words of the law say so, and I see nothing in the language of the Act to lead me to suppose it expresses any other than its apparent meaning. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Cameron), who has criticised the measure on another ground, objects to it because he thinks it practically amounts to nothing. Well, I will not say—perhaps I might say—that if it did not amount to anything, perhaps it would not receive the opposition of my hon. friend. But I think he cannot have read it with very great care when he forms the opinion that there is no provision in the Bill calculated to meet the wants of the country. Clause 24 reads:

The Commissioners, in addition to the powers conferred on the Governor in Council by the Railway Act, respecting the approval and revision of tolls, and which powers and authority are hereby vested in them, shall have power to fix the maximum rates of charges for the conveyance of passengers with a due amount of baggage, and of animals and goods, on the railway; and such rates of charges shall include the tolls and the cost of locomotive power and every other expense connected with the conveyance of passengers and with a due amount of baggage, and of animals and goods, upon the railway.

I want to know whether my hon. friend and the House thinks that it is not important to invest in a judicial body, such as the Railway Commissioners would be, the power to fix a fair toll for the carriage of passengers and freight. Practically there is no such law on the Statute book now, or if there is any such law, it cannot be enforced. I was amazed the other day though not surprised, to find—on a motion made in the Local House of Ontario for a return of the different by-laws of the railway companies that had been submitted to the Lieutenant-Governor, or approved of by Order in Council, by the member for North Huron, I think (Mr. Creighton)—that Mr. Pardee announced to the House that, from 1867 down to the present day, not one of the local railways had ever submitted their by-laws for the imposition of tolls to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. Consequently, there was not one by-law for the collection of tolls practically legal at the time. The railways had presumed on the ignorance of the people—had assumed that nobody would question their right, and never put them in the position of having their tolls legalized by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. I venture to assert that if an Order of this House were carried for a return of the tolls imposed by the railways of the country, the same result would be found. I do not believe that any of those railways has submitted its by-laws for the fixing of the tolls and rates for the sanction of the Governor General in Council, which the law of the land requires. There might be a practical injustice done under the Bill sometimes, but there would be the means of a remedy within the hands of everybody. But the Bill does not stop there. If my hon. friend would read the 26th section of the Act, and also the 31st, he would find that, although perhaps it does not go far enough, there is very great power conferred on the Commissioners, and in a direction which, if

I do not misinterpret the opinion of the great majority of the members of the House, it is desired by the House it should be, namely, the enforcement of the law by some legal tribunal. I am exceedingly obliged to my hon. friends on both sides, who have addressed the House, for the courteous manner in which the Bill has been received; for the very great attention they have given to its discussion, and for the light many of them have thrown upon its provisions. I trust now that the motion has been placed in your hands it will receive the assent of the House. If the Bill were referred to the Railway Committee it would be at least doubtful whether it could become law, owing to the amount of business which must take precedence of it with that body. I am not wedded to any particular word or phrase of the measure; but I do not desire that a Railway Commission should be constituted, which should be qualified to enforce against the railway companies the laws placed on the Statute book. It would be wrong to send the Bill to the Railway Committee, as they have a great number of Bills on their orders already, and, as I have said before, its fate might be doubtful. This being a public Bill, it should be dealt with by the House or a Select Committee, and when that Committee's report is presented, it could receive the consideration of the House and the Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to.

PREVENTION OF FRAUD IN RELATION TO CONTRACTS.

Mr. CASGRAIN, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 7) for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys, said: The Bill, is the same that I brought forward last year. It was then referred to a Select Committee of the House, one of the members of which was the late Minister of Justice, now Chief Justice of Nova Scotia. It received the careful attention of that Committee, and was reported to this House in consequence. I, last year, suggested that the Government should take this measure in hand, because it is one in which the Government is very much interested. The suggestion not having been accepted, I intend, myself, urging the measure upon the House to the best of my ability: I leave those aside for the present, and merely state that I do not believe there is a member in this House who does not feel that a measure of some kind in this direction is needed at present. Certain events that occurred immediately prior to last Session became so notorious that I could not help taking notice of them at the time, and introduced a measure to prevent their recurrence. It was then made evident that in some of the Public Departments the influence and favor of public officials was used in order to further the interests of private individuals in obtaining contracts. In the present Bill I propose to make a misdemeanor of such offences and to punish them. Not only does it propose to punish the guilty party with a penalty but to inflict such a punishment as will deter such persons from committing the same offence again. Hon. gentlemen must have observed that the mere payment of a small sum of money as a fine will not deter individuals from making large profits out of contracts if they can do so by spending a few hundreds or a few thousands of dollars. On the contrary, if you begin by trying to bribe some officials, they will willingly pay a small fine in order to secure a large advantage. Therefore, I make this offence a misdemeanor, and leave to the tribunal the imposition of a fine or a sentence of imprisonment for a certain number of months at the discretion of the court. Now, Sir, there is another class what we call middlemen, who come between the Government and contractors. These men have become, what I may term contract brokers, whose influence must have a very baneful effect upon the public interest in the letting of contracts. The Bill provides that such persons shall also be punished by a fine and imprisonment. I need not remark that abuses which this measure seeks to prevent have already occurred. I know by long experience myself that they occurred in the old Province of Quebec. I know they have happened since, and last year we had still other instances. If this Bill becomes law it will provide in future for the punishment of persons guilty of fraud against the Government. It has been said that this measure is too severe, and that in consequence of being impracticable it will be useless. I do not think those objections are sound, because there is no doubt that parties guilty of fraud, will take every means to conceal it, and that is no reason why a strong attempt should not be made to detect and punish it by law. To this effect I would invite the attention of hon. members to the consideration of this Bill, in order to make it as perfect as possible. I am well aware that a measure of this kind cannot cover all cases; I am well aware it is not perfect as it now stands, though it has passed the test of a Select Committee when it was in the hands of an able lawyer, who now honors the bench of Nova Scotia. If any hon. gentleman can suggest any useful amendment it will gladly be accepted on my part. Now, there is another class of offences for which this Bill provides, that is, those in which officials receive a bonus or a reward from contractors in order to facilitate their operations with the Departments. This is an abuse that ought to be rigorously suppressed, and not only the person who receives a bribe ought to be punished but the person who offers it ought to be punished as well, and the former, at least, should be dismissed from the employ of the Government. In connection with this part of the subject is the use which contractors make of the money which they unjustly get from the Government by the means I have just mentioned, in paying heavy subscriptions for electioneering expenses. It is unnecessary for me to refer to any well known instances in the past where successful contractors have used their ill-gotten gains for electioneering purposes; but if these things have occurred once they may occur again, and I think we ought to provide by legislation against their repetition. I may add that when I proposed this measure last year the hon. leader of the Government said he was contemplating such a measure himself. On that occasion he said:

"There is now a measure of a very drastic and severe character before the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of preventing fraud. The Government propose to see that measure before dealing with the whole subject, and extend the provisions of the present Election Law, which in some respects are so severe as to be inoperative and in other respects are too lax."

I am sorry to see that such a measure has not been brought down this year. I think the one I now propose ought to receive the support of the Government, and I therefore move its second reading.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is the Bill which the hon. gentleman brought before the House last year, and he says the leader of the Government last year spoke of a Bill which was before the House of Commons in England on a similar subject, and wished to see the measure which was passed in England before dealing with an analogous measure in this House. The English Parliament, however, did not pass the Bill, owing, as the hon. gentleman knows, to the fact that other great measures were then engaging their attention. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) knows that a similar measure is now being brought before the House of Commons in England, and I think it would only be fair that we should await the result of whatever legislation may take place there, in order that we might have the benefit of their experience on this subject, and the discussions which take place in the English House of Commons. I would, therefore, suggest to the hon. gentleman that he should delay the consideration of this Bill for a few weeks, so that we may be able to pass a Bill which will be a credit to our Parliament, by having the advantage of the discussions which take place in the English Parliament.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I do not think that we wish the Parliament of England absolutely to make our laws. I do not doubt we might receive a great deal of information from them, but we waited last year and nothing was done, and the same thing may occur this year. If I understand the current of events, if we are to have any legislation upon this Election Law this year, this is the proper time to proceed with it. Under the circumstances, I regret to say that I am unable to accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN: The hon. gentleman is sorry not to be able to agree to my suggestion, and I am sorry to be obliged to move

That this Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time thirty days hence.

Mr. BLAKE. When the Bill, which the member for L'Islet introduced last year on this subject, was brought to the second reading, the leader of the House, instead of receiving it in the way in which the Minister of Public Works receives it now, said that it contained many commendable provisions, although of its precise details he would not commit himself; but he agreed that the measure should go to a Select Committee to have it properly considered and a measure matured. It went to a Select Committee, and was brought down to the House at so late a period that it could not be proceeded with. The Select Committee comprised, amongst others, a member of the Government not now in the House, and, I believe, the report of the Committee was unanimous on the measure. Of course the House was not then, and is not now, committed by that result, but it is fit that the fact should be stated. The hon. gentleman has introduced this Session the measure as the Committee reported it, so it is in effect that which received their endorsement. Now we know perfectly well what is the English of the hon. gentleman's proposition. It is this: first, that at the expiration of a month it is impossible that the measure introduced into the English Parliament shall have been considered, or that we shall have the matured, definite, and decided opinion of the English Parliament upon the subject within that time. Secondly, that if we had it, such will be the state of the order paper that a Bill in the hands of a private member, the second reading of which is not to take place for a month from this time, cannot go through this Session. The proposition then, in plain English is, as the House understands, that the Bill shall not become law this Session.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I regret very much that the hon. the Minister of Public Works should have taken this course. There is no earthly reason for it. As the hon. member for West Durham has said, there were no objections taken to the Bill of the hon. member for L'Islet by the First Minister last Session. On the contrary, if I am not mistaken, it was suggested by him that it should be referred to a Select Committee, and among the members of that Committee were no less than four or five supporters of the Government, among them being the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Brooks), the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), and the Minister of Justice of that time. The Committee had at least seven or eight meetings, and the Bill was gone over very carefully. The Minister of Justice was present at every meeting at which the Committee did anything, and the provisions of the Bill, as it is now introduced, met with the approval and sanction of the late Minister of Jus-tee. Many of the amendments made in it were made at his suggestion, so that the Bill now before the House is virtually the Bill of the late Minister of Justice. Why, then, Sir, should the hon. gentleman seek, by a sort of side wind like this, to defeat the measure altogether? Surely he does not object to the principle of the Bill? There is not a single provision of the Bill that is not an eminently proper one, and the hon. gentleman does not say that there is. He simply says that we should wait to hear the discussions in the English Parliament, but surely we are not going to tie ourselves to what the English Parliament does. It may reject the Bill. The circumstances there may be such as not to justify its passage, and therefore I do not see any reason the Minister could have for the motion he now makes, except to defeat the Bill, and surely he is not prepared to take that course. If the hon. gentleman asked for a delay of a week or two I would advise the hon. member for L'Islet to accede to his request, but a delay of a month is practically to defeat the Bill, and for that defeat the hon. gentleman must take the responsibility.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Mr. MILLS. The Minister of Public Works by his motion, I think, proceeds on the assumption that the members of this House consist of a number of flies on the wheel; that we are wholly unable to originate or carry any legislation that may be required to meet the wants of the people. The hon. gentleman has for many years looked to Washington as an example for his legislation on financial questions; and on minor questions of this sort we are now asked to look to the Parliament of England. Now, I had supposed that 200 gentlemen, elected to this House by the various constituencies of this Dominion, ought to be capable of originating and carrying through such legislation as might be required for the good of the country. I do not object to profiting by the experience of the people of England or of any other country, but on questions of this sort, in which we know, from our own experience, what the evils and defects are which we are anxious to meet, it does seem to me an insult to the capacity of this House to say that we should not legislate on such a question, but wait to see what the people may do in England under, perhaps, a wholly different state of circumstances, and that we are here servilely to copy the legislation of the English Parliament. We should not be here as representatives of the people at all if we have only to do what the hon. gentleman proposes. All we need to do is to elect a Committee to watch what is done elsewhere and declare that what originates in some other Parliament 3,000 miles away shall be copied and made the law of the people of this country. If the hon. gentleman thinks that is the proper course to pursue he should abolish representative government here altogether and return to the condition of a Crown Colony, where we would have a Governor General sent from England with authority from England to legislate for the people of this country.

PAWNBROKERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. ORTON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 24) to amend the Act respecting pawnbrokers.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I imagine this is a Bill outside our jurisdiction.

Mr. ORTON. I will explain the object of the Bill. The Pawnbrokers Act now in force is an old Act which existed, I believe, previous to Confederation, and there is an Act in force in every Province. But the regulations with respect to pawnbrokers cannot be enforced, simply because it is ultra vires for a Local Legislature to pass any penal clause. It is simply to supply a penal clause so as to enforce the Acts in operation in the various Provinces that the Bill is drawn, and it was prepared at the suggestion of the County Crown Attorney at York. In towns and cities very great cruelties are perpetrated by pawnbrokers charging 120, and even higher, per cent. for loans of money on chattels and goods of the poorest class of the community, and the object of the Bill is simply to enforce the regulations in regard to pawnbrokers.

Mr. BLAKE. I trust the hon. gentlemen who are responsible for the legislation of the House will look at this Bill. It seems to be, in principle, wholly objectionable. It may be, it is quite possible, that the law with respect to pawnbroking may require amendment, and stricter provisions may be necessary with respect to that particular kind of trade; but what the hon. gentleman proposes by the Bill is this: that any pawnbroker who takes more than by the local law he is authorized to take, shall, in respect to which violation no other punishment is provided, be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor. The hon. gentleman no doubt aware that it is competent for each Province pass a law which will prescribe the punishment of imprisonment for a breach of this law, if it thinks fit. If a provincial law is thought by the Provincial Legislature to be of such a character that its provisions should be enforced by imprisonment for their breach, it has full authority to so enforce them; but this proposal, which, so far as my recollection goes, is entirely novel, is to create a breach of a provincial law, which breach the Provincial Legislature has not said shall not be punished by imprisonment, to be a misdemeanor. Surely it is rather wholesale legislation to ask this Parliament to declare that whatever laws about pawnbroking Local Legislatures may from time to time make, shall be, if no other penalty is prescribed, punishable by imprisonment. I think if the local law is not observed and if its non-observance should be punished by imprisonment, the Local Legislature, having full authority, might make an application to this Parliament, and it will be a mistake to take up civil rights and civil questions which are wholly within the competency of Local Legislatures and make breaches of provincial laws on those subjects criminal offences under some very extraordinary state of facts which does not appear to exist here.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just spoken on this point, that in matters which are within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature we should not interfere, even should we have power to do so, except in very rare cases. I do not think the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) has stated that Local Legislatures had not a right to interfere in matters of this kind. On the contrary, I think the contents of the Bill show that the mover admits that Local Legislatures have a right to interfere in this matter, so much so that the object of the Bill is to declare that the violation of Provincial Acts on this subject shall be punishable in the manner prescribed by the Bill. I think the hon. gentleman would do well not to press the Bill, but withdraw it, and give us time to report the matter to the Minister of Justice, in order that we may, the next time the Bill comes up, tell him exactly whether the hon. the Minister of Justice agrees with the views I have expressed. I am not here to give advice legally to the House, but I express the opinion that this is a matter in which this Parliament should not interfere, but leave it to the Local Legislatures. The fact is, if there is a cry in the country about anything, it is about interference on the part of the Central Legislature with the jurisdiction of Local Legislatures. Of course we avoid these interferences, but they will happen sometimes, and we should try to avoid them as much as possible.

Mr. McCALLUM moved the adjournment of the Debate.
Motion agreed to.

DRAWBACKS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Paterson (South Brant) for a return of all claims presented for drawbacks on goods manufactured for export since January 22nd, 1881, &c.

Mr. CHARLTON said he would reserve the remarks he intended to make on this motion until the Budget came up again for discussion, as the same questions were treated in both.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYES.

Mr. ANGLIN, in moving for a return of the names of all persons employed on the Intercolonial Railway whose salaries have been reduced or increased in the year ending December 31st, 1879, the year ending December 31st, 1880, and the year ending December 31st, 1881; the amount of such reduction or increase, and the salaries or wages now paid; giving also, the names and salaries of all persons displaced or removed, or who have resigned, and of all persons who have been employed during the same three years, said: I observe that in the railway report of this year the amount charged for station expenses is very much larger than in former years. I presume that the hon. Minister of Railways has found it necessary in many cases to increase the salaries of the persons employed in the various railway stations, and I presume he has found it necessary to appoint additional employes. The hon. Minister will have no objection to the motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no objection to this motion passing if the mover will introduce the words "increased charges and the year ending 31st December, 1878," to the motion as it stands. But I would say to the hon. gentlemen it will be in his recollection that when I drew the attention of the House to the necessity for reducing the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway to the lowest possible point, that he expressed the greatest sympathy with a number of the parties whose salaries were thus reduced, and that I stated very frankly that it was with a great deal of pain that the position of the service made it indispensable to perform the work at the smallest possible cost. But I stated, at the same time, the great pleasure it would give me when the time arrived, when the revenue would balance the expenditure, to take into the most favorable consideration the claims of the officers whose salaries had thus been reduced. The hon. gentleman will be very glad to learn that the time has arrived when it is in our power to fulfil the pledge that was then given to Parliament, and the hon. gentleman will not be surprised to learn one thing, that on a railway where the traffic has increased 42 per cent., there should be some further expenditure in performing that work. He will hardly expect the traffic of the road to be increased to the extent of nearly 50 per cent., and the service to be maintained at the same cost. Every person who knows anything of railways is aware that the expenditure on a railway bears an immediate and direct relation to the traffic. The return will be brought down as early as possible. I shall be only too glad to lay all the information asked for before the House.

Mr. ANGLIN. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the hon. member, whose purpose is obviously to institute a comparison with the management of his predecessor. I should expect the increase of traffic to lead to some increase of expenditure. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that when those reductions were made I did express sympathy with the number of persons whose salaries were reduced, and, as I thought, very unreasonably. I pointed out that there might have been some cases where a reduction might have been legitimate and necessary. Very many salaries of men were reduced who could barely live upon them, reduction in such cases involving a great deal of suffering; and I do not think that a country like this, under even the pressure of temporary difficulties, should have treated some of their employes in the way witnessed. I have heard also, and will try to ascertain whether it is correct, that, during the last year or two, very many of the most competent employes on the road, of themselves, quitted the service, because the compensation they received was inadequate to the services rendered, and insufficient for the supply of their absolute necessities, and that they are among the number that sought employment in a foreign country. It should be seen how many of the valuable employes in the stations resigned within the last year or two—on this point we should certainly have information.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope I may be permitted as the hon. gentleman has introduced an entirely new subject, to say a word in reply. He said that a large number within the last year or two, of valuable servants of the road, had sought employment in a foreign country, in consequence of a reduction in their salaries. I am glad to be able to say that I am not aware of a single valuable officer having left the road for such a cause. There have been some instances—and it is only right I should take this opportunity, the first offered, of acknowledging—notwithstanding the suggestions of hon. gentlemen opposite, and which suggestions are characteristic of the remarks made by them on all occasions—the wonderful readiness with which the employes of the Intercolonial Railway met the exigencies of the case, and the zeal that they still exhibit in the public service, notwithstanding the reduction in their salaries. It is due to them to say that I was scarcely prepared for the manner in which that measure—a very painful one to me—was met by the great mass of the employes. I stated at the time that, in most of the instances in which persons left the service of the road and sought employment in foreign countries, they, after a time, applied to be taken back, showing that they had not benefitted their position by quitting the service, notwithstanding the reduction of their salaries. I am also very glad to be able to say that, notwithstanding the great efficiency of the road and its successful management, I have not lost, to this moment, a single officer holding an important position on the road when I became Minister of Public Works and Railways.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTS OF FLANNELS.

Mr. BUNTING moved for a return showing the number of yards of canton flannel, bleached and unbleached, with the price per yard, and the amount of duties collected on the same, which have been entered for consumption in the Dominion from the 30th June, 1880, to 1st February, 1882.

Mr. BOWELL. The adoption of the motion would be useless. There is no such classification as the motion asks for, and, consequently, it would be impossible to comply with it if passed.

Motion withdrawn.

MAJOR RIDOUT'S REMOVAL FROM MILITARY COLLEGE STAFF.

Mr. BUNTING moved for correspondence between the Commandant of the Royal Military College at Kingston, the Major General commanding the Militia, and the Minister of Militia, relating to the removal of Major Ridout from the Royal Military College Staff.

Mr. CARON. I shall be very happy to bring down the fullest possible information that the Department possesses. Still, I must say that I would not like it to be looked upon as a matter of precedent, because it is a matter of discipline; but, as it is a question of considerable importance, the Department will produce the fullest information.

Motion agreed to.

THE CASE OF MAJOR RIDOUT.

Mr. BUNTING, in moving for a return of a copy of the charges preferred against Major Ridout, for a copy of the instructions to the Court of Enquiry, and the evidence taken before the Court, said: My object in moving for this information is simply to get it with a view to discuss the subject at a later period of the Session. Much has been said in the papers during the last twelve months, on the subject of the removal of Major Ridout from the College. A good deal has been also said with regard to the utility of this institution, and it is with a view of discussing the whole question that I move for the papers.

Motion agreed to.

CADETS IN THE MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. STRANGE moved for a return showing the number of cadets who have been admitted to the Royal Military College since its opening, on the 1st of June, 1876; the number who have graduated, the number who have left the institution without graduating, the number now on the strength of the College, and the greatest number attending the College at any one time, and the date; also, so far as can be ascertained, the place of residence and occupation of the cadets who have graduated, with the detailed arrangements, if any, by which graduates may be called upon to serve in Canada if required. He said: I make this motion in order to lay the information before the people in Western Ontario, who are somewhat disappointed, both in the College and in the results. When it was organized by the late Administration in 1875, it was considered then by a great many members of the militia force of Canada to be an establishment far in advance of the times or of the necessities of the country. It was felt that the Canadian militia force was a force of citizen soldiery, who might be called upon to serve in case any attempted foreign invasion was made into the Dominion. It was felt, also, that the militia of Canada had to rely for their effective strength upon the number of efficient rifles they could count in the force, and the highly scientific branch of military knowledge provided by the College of Kings' on was looked upon as rather extraneous and rather in advance of the military spirit of Canada. It has also been conceded, I think, that the militia of Canada are merely an adjunct of the militia force of Great Britain, of which country, I need not remind the House, Canada forms at present so important an appanage. In case a war of any importance took place in Canada we should necessarily have to look to the Mother Country for scientifically educated officers, which we cannot at present supply. That being the case, a great many of the friends of the military force in Ontario, for whom I speak at the present moment, have felt that the presence of a Military College was scarcely necessary, and that the money expended in founding it would have been better expended in maintaining the force as it at present exists. So far as the staff of the Royal Military College at Kingston is concerned, I have not one word to say. I know that every gentleman there is a man illustrious both in arms and in that scientific education which is necessary for gentlemen who hold such positions. Nor shall I refer to the recent quarrel which took place between them, because I believe it is purely a question of military discipline upon which this House should have nothing to say. At the same time, I have always felt that the College is receiving funds to which the active militia of Canada is entitled. I trust, when the details are brought down, it will be seen that the continuance of this College is not necessary for Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. I am glad that these returns have been asked for, because I believe the feeling is pretty general throughout Canada that this College is a useless luxury. We find that, after the money is voted for its maintenance, that it turns out a class of men on the community for whom our next duty is to find a place where they may earn a living. We provide a useless education for these young men, an education which takes many of them away from the pursuits of industry and afterwards they become a burden on the country; and if we do not find them situations, we are told that they leave the country, and therefore they do not add to the strength of our militia. I think it would be much better if the money voted for the support of this College was applied to keeping up the efficiency of our volunteers. Another difficulty is, that the recruits who come here from the Old Country appear to be on terms of antagonism with those of our own people; feuds arise between them over which, perhaps, we have no control, and the result is, that the institution is brought into discredit. Altogether, I think the money spent upon the institution might be devoted to much more useful purposes.

Mr. CARON. I can assure my hon. friends that I am most desirous that every possible information may be placed before the country relative to the Military School. It may be a debatable question—and it certainly is one into which I shall not venture to enquire at this moment—whether the establishment of the Military School was premature or not; but it is now an institution of the country, and I think that when the information is brought down possibly some of the objections which my hon. friend has spoken of will disappear—at least, I hope so. My hon. friends should remember that it should be possible to find positions for these cadets, from the fact that they are receiving a very high education in the College. Owing to that fact I may say that we have already availed ourselves of the services of some of the cadets by giving them positions in the institution itself. Others have been given positions in the Mounted Police. I hope that the very high education they are receiving—and which I hope can hardly be considered an obstacle to obtaining a position in any country—will be the means of obtaining them positions, which I have no doubt they will fill to the honor and credit of the institution from which they come. I shall lay every information before the House, and I think when it is brought down the House will be in a better position to discuss the matter than it is at the present moment.

Mr. McCUAIG. I would like to remind my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that when an officer of the British Service accepts a position such as he has referred to, he does so at a very great sacrifice. I am of opinion, however, that the material for the highest positions in our service can be found here as well as in the Old Country. I believe that the Military College has been a success; and I hope that it will be liberally sustained by Parliament.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. McCuaig.

Mr. BOULTBEE. Mr. Speaker, I moved the adjournment of the debate, because I felt unwilling that such a speech, involving such propositions, as that made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), should go without being answered or contradicted. But before dealing with him, I should like to make a few remarks with regard to some statements made by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) on the motion to adjourn, which was made for the purpose of allowing him to make those statements. It will be recollected that the hon. the Minister of Railways had charged that the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) had misquoted Sir Henry Tyler's speech in London, with respect to Grand Trunk Railway fares, and the hon. gentleman had a motion to adjourn moved so that he could make some statement. In that statement he charged the hon. Minister of Railways with having said that which was, in fact, untrue, and he added a good many remarks in his usual sarcastic manner. I will read the remarks that were made in his original speech by the hon. member for Centre Huron, and which the hon. Minister of Railways said was a misquotation:

"Here is what the president of the largest railway at present existing in Canada has to say: 'Materials of all kinds,' says Sir Henry Tyler, 'are dearer than they were ever before, and in particular the price of coal has increased to the extent of the duty imposed.'"

This was what the hon. Minister of Railways stated was a misquotation, that it was incorrect and untrue, and that Sir Henry Tyler never said anything of the sort; and it will be remembered by those hon. members who were present, that the hon. member for Centre Huron rose and stated that his original position was correct, and he read from this very speech, from the speech of Sir Henry Tyler on the occasion referred to, some remarks to show he was correct. I will read those to the House, and then hon. members will see how correct he was. Here is what was read by the hon. member for Centre Huron in showing that the hon. Minister of Railways was incorrect:

"There was also a considerable rise in the cost of materials, of labor and of fuel; and I am sorry to say that this was very much in consequence of the fiscal policy of the Dominion Government. That policy makes everything which a poor man requires dearer for him to purchase, and in consequence of that policy he requires higher wages in order to be enabled to exist. I have repeatedly spoken in this room as to the duty which is placed upon fuel. I cannot conceive anything more unwise in a nation like Canada, that has to import a great part of its fuel, and wishes to encourage its manufactures and to encourage its railways, than to place a duty upon the article of coal."

That is the extract which the hon. member for Centre Huron read to show that the hon. Minister of Railways had misquoted Sir Henry Tyler, and yet it will be seen that he adds to the remarks made by Sir Henry Tyler as reported in the very speech which he quotes himself:

"And in particular the price of coal has increased to the extent of the duty imposed."

Now, I will ask this House to consider whether that is a fair and proper way of treating this House, whether that is the way the intelligence of hon. members and the people should be treated, in attempting to get a snap verdict, by reading two quotations apparently from the same report and adding a sentence to one which never was spoken. This was not done in ignorance, because, when the question first arose, it was thoroughly discussed in the newspapers; and it was declared by the Mail and other papers supporting the Government, that Sir Henry Tyler never made use of that remark, that it was a forgery, and that it was added in a certain newspaper, and when the full report was received it was found to be incorrect. I must confess, I think, I never saw human effrontery go much further than in taking this very speech in which the refutation appeared, and quoting it to show he was correct. It is not often we see such a thing done. Before dealing as best I may with the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), I wish to pay a little attention to some other remarks made by the hon. member for Centre Huron when he had the motion to adjourn made. It had been asserted by the hon. Minister of Railways, when addressing this House, that the hon. member for Centre Huron when Minister of Finance, in 1876, in making a loan and selling the debentures of the Dominion of Canada in England in November, 1876, fixed an arbitrary price at which to sell those debentures, and at a price below their market value; that he had not sold them after throwing them open to public competition, and that he had always refused to disclose to whom he sold them. I understood, when the motion to adjourn was made, that the hon. member for Centre Huron was to explain this, but he made no explanation of it whatever, and it remained apparent that the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Railways were correct. I have in my hand the return showing what the terms of that loan were and how it was made, and I think when once that is shown in this House, and when the manner in which that loan was made is fully understood by the country, the universal verdict of the people, given after due consideration, will ask that an hon. gentleman who can conduct the financial affairs of the country so unfortunately, shall not be again entrusted with their management. I find this loan was issued, as it was said, under the authority of an Act of Parliament; it is a loan at 4 per cent. payable in thirty years, and the arbitrary price fixed was 91 per cent.; and besides that 9 per cent. discount, there are charges and commissions, and rebates of interest allowed to purchasers. The only result of that loan was this: that out of £2,500,000 sterling, amounting, at $4.87 to the pound, to $12,166,000, we lost something like $1,500,000; that is, the hon. gentleman brought back to this country less than the amount of the debentures he sold by $1,500,000, and he left us to pay, for thirty years, the interest upon that $1,500,000 which the people of this country did not get. I assert that that is a bad and ruinous principle on which to do business. In making a loan, the great object to be sought is this: that we get as much of the money to be used in this country as we can. It is sufficient for us that we should pay the interest on that money, in the London market, without leaving both principle and interest there, as was done in this case. That is, perhaps, only a matter of taste or judgment; but when a Finance Minister who, unlike the treasurer of any ordinary financial corporation or municipality, is entrusted with the power of dealing with the finances of the country, without giving any security therefor, beyond the honor of a statesman, and the confidence reposed in him by the people, takes our securities into the English market and does not submit them to public competition, but fixes an arbitrary rate, 3 or 4 per cent. lower than our debentures in that market at the time, then, I say, he abuses the trust that was reposed in him. The debentures were to be sold at 91 per cent., 9 per cent. discount, and were not even submitted to public competition, because there was in his terms that which enabled the hon. gentleman to allot that loan to anybody he pleased. I do not know that this was dishonesty, but it permitted dishonesty. The following is the clause:—

"The allotment will be made as early as possible, and in cases where it has not been practicable to make any allotment, the deposit will be returned."

So desirable an investment did the loan seem to be that many millions were asked for; and the effect of this clause was to put it in the power of the hon. member for Centre Huron, in his capacity as Finance Minister, to choose to whom he should allot that loan. Up to this day, the Canadian people do not know who got that loan, who made this $1,500,000, with accrued interest for twenty-nine years. The hon. gentleman refused to tell, and I challenge him now on behalf of the people of Canada, whose trust he betrayed and whose money he squandered, to give to the House the names of those who got that money. I do not say that the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance did what was dishonest and wrong; but I say that, had he desired to make money out of his position, it was in his power to go to his friend, Mr. King, or any other man and say: "This loan is going to be put on the market; there are, under the terms, hundreds of thousands in it; make application and I will see that it is allotted to you." We do not know whether that was done or not, because we do not know to whom the loan was allotted. Supposing the treasurer of a municipality in Ontario was deputed by the town or village council to go to Montreal or some other financial centre, as is often done, and sell the municipal debentures for the purpose of obtaining money to build a bridge or town hall or something of that sort, and then come back with $15,000 instead of the $20,000 expected, and supposing he refused to tell to whom he sold these debentures below the market rate, what would be the fate of such treasurer if he were sued the next day to make good the deficiency? It is rather unfortunate that hon. gentlemen opposite are addicted to making transactions of this kind. We had at one time a treasurer in our Ontario Legislature, who went to England to dispose of about $1,500,000 worth of local debentures. The price he obtained was not satisfactory to our people, and they looked into it. The treasurer had not been careful enough to cover his tracks, so that it was ascertained he had sold them to a company of which he was director and solicitor. The Mail published these facts, and the hon. treasurer brought an action against it for libel. As usual, in Courts of law, when the case reached a certain point, the Treasurer, Mr. Brooks, was examined, and it was found that he had sold the debentures to this company. When that fact was elicited, Mr. Brooks simply dropped the action, and it has never been renewed until this day. Our late Finance Minister, who is a wise man in some respects, saw the trouble the poor Treasurer of Ontario got into by admitting to whom he sold his debentures, and refused to tell with whom he did business. Therefore, we cannot tell whether he sold our debentures to his own friends or not. Perhaps I have dwelt longer on this than I intended, but I feel the enormity of the issue involved, because when this House will be dissolved and we go to the country within the next twelve or eighteen months, the people will be called on to decide whether they will trust the management of their affairs to hon. gentlemen opposite, who approve of the system carried out by the hon. member for Centre Huron in floating our debentures, or whether they will support an administration which has sounder views of finance and do not countenance any such system. If there is anything that marks the line of distinction between the statesman and the ordinary politician, it is the ability to discriminate and choose the best men as associates in the management of public affairs, and it is notorious that, though pressed to do so, the right hon. the leader of the Government refused to retain the services of the hon. member for Centre Huron, by making him his Finance Minister. I think when the country considers the way this hon. gentleman has conducted our affairs, they will join with me in coming to the conclusion that he is by no means a fit man to be entrusted with their administration; that must be their universal determination, and I believe it is the decision the people will come to. I make this application against the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), on the grounds I have given, because of the way in which he disposed of that loan. But I know he is not a fit man to be entrusted with the affairs of this country; I have shown that his judgment is erroneous, and is not to be depended upon; that he is not a man able to forecast the future, able to gather together the ordinary probabilities occurring to the minds of all men, and to form from them a policy of judicious arrangements to carry on the people's affairs. I find a reference to his Budget Speech of 1874, that he estimated the revenue at $25,000,000, and estimated the same amount for each of the two following years—that is, for the three, $75,000,000. I find, on looking into our Blue-Books, that the revenue for those years reached but $69,000,000; so he made a mistake to the extent of $6,000,000 in estimating his means for carrying on the people's affairs. But, in his Budget Speech immediately following, he went still further wrong; he did not know, apparently, how far wrong he was going, because he estimated, not that he would be wrong to the extent of $6,000,000, but would have a surplus of $1,000,000 a year for the same three years. But, instead, he had a deficit of $2,680,000. If you add that to the $6,000,000, he makes a mistake to the extent of $10,000,000 in three years. I submit then, that if this gentleman were, as his associates claim him to be, not only the most honest man among the whole people of Canada—if he were as honest as he and his colleagues represent him to be—yet these facts prove he is not a man of business, a man of good sense, a safe man to entrust with the affairs of the people. As a means of showing how erroneous that judgment was, I looked again at the same Budget Speech of February, 1875, where I found he estimated the increase in the deposits in the Government savings bank at $1,000,000 a year for each of the three years, 1875, 1876, and 1877. In a young country like this, thriving and progressive, with our male population active and intelligent, that was a very moderate estimate to make, and there would have been a result far beyond that amount if the affairs of the country had been conducted with efficiency and wisdom. But what was found to be the result of his judgment in that instance, instead of $1,000,000 a year, that he had expected, or $3,000,000 altogether, there was a decrease each year, amounting, in the whole, to $1,460,000. The country was going to the bad. I think I have answered the remarks that he somewhat unadvisedly made on the motion to adjourn, to obtain an opportunity of making them. I think he would have done better to have left them unspoken. As I said before, I moved the adjournment of the debate because I was unwilling that here, on the floor of the House, hearing it and knowing it would be transmitted by the press to every avenue of the land, there should go through the minds of men statements so damaging to the country, and so discreditable, I think, as those of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). I went through his speech this morning, taking an hour to see whether any principle was involved in it, any line of argument laid down, any strong position set forth, which I could try to controvert. I could find nothing of the kind. Through the melancholy meandering of thirty or forty columns of Hansard, dreary iterations and anecdotes, appeared no general principle, nor discussion of any useful question. There was nothing you could get hold of on which to ground an argument. In the first three or four columns there is absolutely nothing at all but quotations in English, in our own vernacular tongue, and other matter of little interest. He repeats the quotation of the old Latin author: "Whom the Gods wished to destroy they first make mad." My own opinion is, if that principle be true, as regards representative and legislative bodies like this House, it would seem, from the utterances of this hon. gentleman, that destruction has threatened—not our party, but the Opposition. For, certainly, if we treat their own utterances as illustrating any position they wish to bring themselves into, we may well say: "That they whom the Gods wish to destroy they first make mad." The very first point the hon. member for Gloucester tried to make, and it was received with additional enthusiasm by his friends behind him, affected the coal duty. He said:

"Well, if the imposition of 50 cents a ton on coal produced the extraordinary effect of making it cheaper and procuring more revenue, why does not the hon. the Finance Minister ask for the imposition of another 50 cents? If the Americans pay the duty now, why should we spare them? Why should we be satisfied with taking from them a paltry 50 cents? According to the hon. gentleman's theory, that duty reduces the price."

Any practical business man in the country knows the utter absurdity of the argument of the hon. member for Gloucester. It is a well recognized principle of commerce and business, as I understand it, that active competition invariably lowers prices, but it would be absurd to suppose it would lower them beyond a living limit. At the end of the first seven or eight columns of his speech, after dealing with the coal question, the hon. member for Gloucester says that he hopes that the line of argument adopted by the hon. the Minister of Railways would be scattered broadcast through the country; and that treatment of the coal question, thus adopted, would be understood by the whole country. The hon. member for Gloucester must know very little of what is going on in the country and quite misunderstands the avenues for news that we have in Ontario, in uttering a remark of that kind. I suppose that, when talking in this House, he fancies the sound of his voice and that of his friends would not reach a long distance or influence a larger circle than the newspaper of which he is himself the editor, possessing a circulation of only some ten or eleven hundred. There is the rock on which he splits. He does not know that one of the newspapers we have in Ontario enjoys a circulation of 200,000, by which means every town and hamlet is made acquainted with the nonsense he utters, as well as the remarks made by his unpatriotic friends also. His desire is to destroy the country, to ruin her credit, to show that we are a miserable people. That is published in the Mail newspaper and in other papers having an enormous circulation throughout the length and breadth of the land. Do not let the hon. gentleman think that his utterances are united to the little paper which he edits himself. The people of Ontario, if they have had the patience to wade through his melancholy speech, will see, from the principles he enunciates, whether he is a safe man to have their interests in his charge. There are three positions with regard to this coal duty. Now, Sir, I treat this coal duty, perhaps, at greater length than I should, because it has been a sore question in Ontario. We have been worried by every witty demagogue throughout the land ever since this duty was imposed, trying to inflame the minds of the people, trying to raise in their minds a hostility against the people of the Maritime Provinces, trying to anger them and make a sore feeling, trying to create a feeling that in the end the destruction of this Confederation will take place, of which all loyal and true men are so proud. Sir, it has been fully established, beyond contradiction in the Mail newspaper, that this duty of 50 cents a ton on coal has not increased the price, that is one position, and I think it has never been controverted. Then there is another position: supposing it does increase the price by 50 cents per ton, then I say—and it is a belief and a conviction indulged in by every patriotic son of Ontario—that if the imposition of that 50 cents a ton in coal enables us to bind together more closely the Provinces of this Dominion, and knit to us more closely the men of the Maritime Provinces by affording them this scanty measure of justice and sympathy, they are willing that it should be done. That is the feeling. As the avenues and the means for the transmission of this commodity become more adapted to trade than we shall see Nova Scotia coal creeping up mile after mile in the Province of Ontario, and the return ship laden with freight going to increase the volume of inter-provincial trade between us, and thus consolidating the nation. Now, even in the inception of the trade, what do we find? We heard the other day, from a gentleman on the floor of this House, that they are using 150 tons a month of Nova Scotia coal at Kingston. I know that large quantities are being used at Cobourg, and as we go on to double this trade and to send our commodities down to the Maritime Provinces, we shall knit more closely together these Provinces in these strong bonds of union which alone can make us a strong nation, and we are only deterred from doing so now—we are only kept back by men like the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), who, in the narrow circle of his miserable party prejudice, would sacrifice all the future of this country, and who has endeavored, on the floor of this House, to create dissension between the Maritime Provinces and Ontario. Disposing of both those points, suppose now we created no inter-provincial trade, suppose the 50 cents does become added to the price of coal, then I take the position that it is a fair and proper tax to impose. It is a good revenue producing tax. Who does it bear upon? It does not bear upon the poor man; it bears upon the rich. The poor man buys his three tons of coal in the year; the rich man buys his fifteen, twenty, thirty, or more, and he pays a per capita of $4 or $5, while the poor man pays $1.50. But I can give to this House—and I am sure they will receive it with pleasure—the utterances of one of these men on this very point. In the East Riding of York—which I have the honor to represent—and I may say it is one of the metropolitan counties, being contiguous to the city of Toronto, and its people are not less intelligent than any other people of Canada—I think a very large proportion of the electors are laboring men and mechanics who work in the city and live just outside its limits. We had a meeting the other day in the East Riding of York, where political questions were discussed at some length; and there, in that meeting, held some eight or ten days ago, a mechanic was called upon to speak—a big, broad shouldered, hard headed and hard handed man, too—and he spoke in a way that was highly interesting to the men around him, and he spoke, I may say—and I say it for the satisfaction of the sensitive feelings of the elegant scholar from Centre Huron—he spoke with grammatical accuracy; he pronounced his language, I think, about as well as the hon. member for Centre Huron; I only wish I could have done as well, but then he, like myself, unlike the member for Centre Huron, had never any opportunity of going to school, because there were no schools where we were living when we were boys. What did this man say? He said, honestly and fairly, I cannot discuss these questions exhaustively; I do not understand them sufficiently to go into all the details; but this I know, he said, that when the late Government were in power I only got four days' work in the week on the average, and that at low wages, and the little family suffered rather; but now I get six days' work in the week, at high wages, and the wife and children are all comfortable. Then he went on and took up this question of coal, and he said: I do not know whether the 50 cents duty becomes added to the price or not, but I am getting it just as cheap, or even cheaper, than before. I do not care whether it is added or not; it is a mere trifle to me to pay $1.50 a year extra on the three tons of coal I use, when I get more than one hundred extra days of work in the year, at high wages, compared with what I did when those gentlemen were in power. And he also said—he was a pretty intelligent man, and very naturally so, because he supports me; he is chairman of one of my Committees—he said also about cotton: They say cotton has raised a half cent a yard; well, I don't know, even if cotton is half a cent dearer a yard it won't make much difference; I can wear my shirt as long as I like and have as many of them as I wish, and I was not even able to do that before. Now, I may say that there was also on that same platform one of our foremost farmers, known out of his own county as a scientific agriculturist—I refer to John Gibson, of Markham, a farmer known all through this country as one of the most upright men who ever lived. He was quite unlike some gentlemen I know, the names of whose constituencies I will not mention, because I do not believe he could tell a lie. Well, he got up and said that, some objection was taken to this protection policy on the ground that it militated against the farmer. Well, now, he said: I do not think there is any class of men, so far as I know, who are so much benefitted by the creation and extension of manufacturers, as farmers, because it gives them the market not only for their grains which we can always sell, and which go to Europe or elsewhere, but we have a chicken, or a dozen eggs, or a sucking pig, or any other luxury of life—because sucking pigs are luxuries—we can sell them at once and get the cash for them and take it home. So the farmer was satisfied. Not only were the farmer and the mechanic satisfied, but there were three or four Reformers present who never gave a Conservative vote in their life, and they said they were satisfied—they were going to support the National Policy; they said they could not do otherwise, because the country was flourishing. In taking his position as to the action of the Reform party with regard to the National Policy, the hon. member for Gloucester said that what his friends contended for was that to the extent the Tariff proved protective it would prove a fallacy in working up a revenue, and a little further down he seems to roll the morsel round his mouth again, and revert to the same thing after having touched on something else in the middle. The hon. gentleman says that the National Policy has failed as a protective Tariff, and that it has also failed as a revenue Tariff. I would like to ask him, if it has failed as a protective Tariff, why it is that, throughout the length and breadth of this land, from one end to the other, we have the hum of industry, and the utterances of a happy, contented and prosperous people? If that state of things is not due to the Tariff, I would like to ask him and his friends to what they impute the prosperity we are enjoying. Taking up his other position, that it has not succeeded as a revenue Tariff, I would just ask him if any one can look at the happy, smiling and contented countenance of the hon. Finance Minister, who is rejoicing at present in the possession of a very large pouch well filled, and say that his Tariff has failed as a revenue Tariff. The people are being paid good wages, they are prospering, they are getting rich, and we have a surplus revenue, so, I think, that for the present, we may dismiss that point. The member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) argued at very great length to show that the cotton and woollen manufacturers and others are making enormous profits. It was demonstrated by the hon. Finance Minister, and his arguments have not been controverted—I do not think they will be controverted, although I dare say they will be denied, because we have gentlemen on the other side who are always ready to deny what they cannot disprove—I say it was proved by the hon. Finance Minister that the cost of cottons and those other goods has not increased. If that be the case, and even if it can be shown that these manufacturers have made enormous profits and large fortunes, it only shows that we are creating wealth within our own borders instead of sending it abroad. Money is abundant, the rate of interest is low; money can be had for 5 per cent. interest instead of 10 as it was before, and I say that better marks of the prosperity of the country cannot be found than the ability to obtain money at a fair rate of interest. We do not find men going around shaving notes or lending their money at exorbitant rates; but instead of that, they are investing it in business and manufactories, and the result is that our wealth is increasing, our population is growing, and we are improving in every respect. I may say that I waded through the long, dreary, melancholy speech of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), and tried to find some legitimate position taken by him—some position on which he could stand. He took one position which would have been a good one if it had been borne out by the facts, but it seems to have no foundation. He takes the position that the reason of the great prosperity of the country is that we have been having a large export trade; that we have been sending large quantities of timber, cattle and other goods out of the country, and that this prosperity is not due to the management of this Government—the skill of the hon. Finance Minister or the effects of the National Policy. I wish to call the attention of the late hon. Finance Minister (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) to the fact—and I may say that I have looked into the matter and believe I am correct—that the exports in 1871-72-73 were less than those for 1876-77-78 by $16,000,000. Yet, all the time that these exports were increasing we were getting poorer and more miserable, so that I do not think there is much in that argument. Going a little further into the hon. gentleman's speech, we get into a long diatribe, in which there is little except this: that he inveighs bitterly against the fate of the Maritime Provinces for having to pay duty on the goods which they buy from Ontario. He thinks they might buy somewhere else; that it is a hardship that, through the imposition of duties, they should be obliged to buy in Ontario, when, as he says, Ontario makes money out of them. He then takes up the case of Ontario, and inveighs, with equal earnestness on behalf of the determination of the people of that Province, because they have to pay duty on coal. I do not think any member of Parliament could possibly take a much more incendiary position than this. When we consider the struggles we have gone through, and the enormous efforts which have been made to bind together a lot of small scattered Provinces into one great Confederation, in connection with our old motherland, I think he is no true patriot, no true friend of his country, no true son of Canada, who comes here, where his utterances have the weight that attach to an old and respected hon. member of Parliament, and endeavors to create a dissension between the various Provinces which, if continued, can end in nothing but the disruption and destruction of the Confederation. He then goes into a lot of statistics for something like half an hour—as near as I can measure its length from the columns of Hansard—and then coming back, he launches into some old topic, his troubles about inter-provincial trade, his troubles about the Maritime Provinces buying their goods in Ontario, etc. As I said before, in doing this I think the hon. gentleman has taken a wrong course, and one which he should not have filled. He goes further, and seems determined, if he cannot find facts upon which to base his arguments, he will make the facts for himself, and how does he do it? The Census has just been taken, at great expense, with great care, and under the most skilful superintendence, the whole business being done as well as any Census taken on the face of the earth, and everybody seems satisfied with it except the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), and he says it is all untrue. He says that, instead of our population increasing it is decreasing, that our people are fleeing out of the country—literally starved out of it. In fact, as was most pathetically expressed in some beautiful lines by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Bunting) which recently appeared in his paper:

“They've fled for bread to other lands.”

The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), says that he thinks he may possibly be condemned for saying this. He feels, himself, that he has taken a course so unstatesmanlike, so unpatriotic, so unfair, that he will be condemned in the eyes of every right-thinking man, but he says the truth must be told. Truth is great, and must prevail. I would like to ask the hon. members of this House, and the people of this country, whether we are to say that all those sworn Commissioners of the Census are wrong, and none but the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) right. The evidence is against him. We cannot believe that these gentlemen are wrong, that they have wilfully foresworn and misconducted themselves, and that the only man in Canada who dared to speak the truth is the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). The people of this country will believe no such thing, and I think that he who thus inveighs against his country, not only against its status and its credit, but also against the honesty of its officials, is no true friend of Canada. He goes on further to speak of Montreal. Upon that point I do not pretend to have the facts myself, but I have asked a number of gentlemen here from Montreal, who aver that it is utterly false that that city is in a very bad state, that its population is leaving, that its property is of less value than before, and that everything is in a very bad condition. They say that the hon. gentleman dare not stop in Montreal on his way through it. Now, I warn him to go there at night, and not to expose his person to those irritated people of Montreal, who, he says, have not money enough to buy eggs of an impure character; but they say they have, and they will very likely be after him in that sort of shape. Then the hon. Minister of Finance, in his speech, said that he had new factories all through the country. Well, I thought we had myself. I thought I had seen them, knew of them, and seen them mentioned in the newspapers. The hon. member for Gloucester tells us that they have got no such things as new factories. Well, I got two or three people to make a list of the new factories for me, and it fills the whole side of a sheet of foolscap. In Toronto, there are thirteen or fourteen new factories, employing 1,473 hands. But then there are a number of factories in which the labor employed has been increased. In the city of Toronto, previous to this National Policy, there were 841 hands employed where there are now more than double that number of new hands, and the total amount of wages paid in one year for additional hands is $729,000. I also find that in the small town of Dundas seven or eight new factories have been established, employing 903 hands; in Galt, about a dozen, employing 734 hands; in Hespeler, where, previous to the National Policy, there were two or three miserable factories, employing 105 hands, there are now 627 hands employed. Here is a statement regarding cotton factories, showing that previous to the National Policy they were employing 2,150 hands, they are now employing 8,600; and a man told me in the lobby just now that in the Acton Glove Factory, a factory that was languishing under the late Tariff, the wages paid have increased 15 per cent., and they are employing 140 hands instead of 40. I hope that answers the question of the hon. member for Gloucester as to whether there are any new factories or not. Well, the hon. member for Gloucester is a very sympathetic man too. He thinks that if this National Policy has done any good to the laboring man, whose face, he says, it has ground, and whose means of living it has taken away, he should like to see it. Here are his own words:

“I doubt if any hon. member of this House has heard of an instance where any one of these manufacturers, after the National Policy had gone into operation, or even after he had begun to experience its benefits, had, of his own will and motion and out of a sense of justice, called his men together and said: ‘I am making more profit to-day by reason of the National Policy, the cost of your living has increased, and, as a matter of justice, I think I will admit you to a share of these profits and increase your wages.’ If any such instance as that has occurred in any part of this Dominion, I think it would be well for the sake of humanity, and especially for the sake of such humanity as exists amongst manufacturers of the class we find mentioned by the Commissioners appointed by the Government, that it should be widely known.”

Well, Sir, I just looked around and I found in a newspaper in the reading room this small local paragraph, relating to an iron founder in Guelph, belonging to Mr. John Crowe:

“Advance in Wages.—Mr. John Crowe called the moulders of his establishment in a body into his office the other day, and informed them that he had decided to make an increase of 25 cents a day in their wages. Several of the employes expressed their satisfaction to Mr. Crowe for the liberal increase paid. The wages now range from $2.00 to $2.25 per day.”

I hope that will satisfy the hon. gentleman. The next position he takes is, that without the National Policy the market could be kept for agricultural implements, waggons, carriages, etc., in the Provinces, and also in Manitoba and the North-West, by opening up the territory and rendering it accessible to them as it was previously to the American manufacturers. What does the hon. member for Gloucester mean by that? Does he mean that, without this protective policy, we would have kept the market of the North-West for our own people? If he does, I can answer him also on that point. The real policy of hon. gentlemen on the other side was to let the wealth of the old Provinces be poured out to create that magnificent new country, and then to furnish it as a market to the American people. The policy of the Government is that, while we are spending our wealth to open up this magnificent territory, it should be retained for those who created it, and not be given away to add to the wealth of the neighboring Republic; and it is a good and sound policy, and one that will commend itself to the good sense of the people of this country. In his tour in the east, at two or three places, the hon. member for West Durham stated openly that the natural market of the people of the Maritime Provinces was not with Ontario, but with the United States. The hon. member for Gloucester, I think, denied this the other day, but it is true nevertheless, because I have the papers here, supporting hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, which reported it. The hon. member for Gloucester will not deny it now, I fancy. That was stated in a speech at New Glasgow, and in another at Prince Edward Island; and that shows conclusively that the policy of the other side of the House is, that we should create that magnificent territory in the west, and then hand it over, lock, stock and barrel, to the United States. But the hon. member for Gloucester goes a little further than that. He says:

"I can assure hon. gentlemen that if they expect the support of many carriage makers they will find themselves as woefully mistaken as I hope they will be in other predictions they make."

well, I had a conversation the other day with Mr. Speight, the great carriage maker of Markham, who has the highest reputation for that kind of work in the Dominion of Canada. In fact, I think I am right in saying that the Government, in asking for tenders for carriages, require them to be made up to the standard of the Speight waggons. He has also the contract for making Herdic coaches for Canada. He has been a Reformer all his life. He had been telling me how he was able to sell his waggons and carriages cheaper than before, and he said: "The country under this National Policy is so much more prosperous that I get better pay and do not make so many bad debts, and I get large orders from the North-West mostly, and I know exactly what I am making; and I would sooner do business in that way than peddle my waggons around the country." I asked him: "Could you have retained that trade in the North-West if you had not this protective policy?" "No," he said, "the Yankees would have run us out of the land." He did not tell me himself, but a number of gentlemen told me, that after I had been talking to Mr. Speight on this subject, he announced before a large number of people that so important did he consider the National Policy to this country that, as a duty to himself, to his country and to those invested in manufactures and to the number of workmen he employed, he was determined to support the National Policy at the next election; and, therefore, I am able to tell the hon. member for Gloucester that one carriage-maker, and one of the most important in the Dominion, is going to support me and the Government at the next election, because he considers it to be his duty to support the National Policy. The hon. member for Gloucester goes on for a certain time longer and again returns, and says over again substantially the same thing he said about the factories, and wants to know where the new factories and new industries are. I have answered the hon. member once before when he made that portion of his speech before. There was no necessity to duplicate the speech, and I do not see any necessity for duplicating the answer and again reading the list of factories. The hon. gentleman, as he, running out of topics, again returns to his attack on Montreal, and declares that the value of property is depressed, the people are poor and miserable and unhappy, and are leaving the country, and in fact they are in a very bad condition altogether, I have asked substantial citizens of Montreal whether the hon. gentleman is correct in this aspersion on the character of the city, and they reply that it is utterly false and untrue, that the people are more prosperous, more money is being made, more houses are rented, and business generally is more active and prosperous than it has been for a decade; and they further say that the citizens are more thankful and more prayerful than before; they are thankful that hon. gentlemen opposite were turned out of office, and they pray every day and night it may be long before they return again. Then, the hon. gentleman's speech covers a couple of columns on the low rate of interest. I referred to that before, but it is a subject so important that I may be excused for referring to it for a moment. I will be borne out by every business man that there is nothing which marks so much the prosperity of Canada as when money is plentiful and rates of interest low. If that be not correct, I know nothing of these things whatever; that is the way I have been taught. So I say we now find that, instead of money being used in buying mortgages and in shaving and discounting notes, it is used in manufactures which are intensifying and creating the wealth of the country. He says:

"The general improvement in business has caused an improvement in prices of produce, which enables the people to buy more articles and more dearly."

In this utterance, made in a loose sort of way, the hon. gentleman gives away the whole position, when he concedes that the farmers are receiving good prices, that the people have more money and can buy food at higher prices. That is what we want, that is what the people were hungering for—for the time when they would be able to buy, without feeling injured, the comforts and even some of the ordinary luxuries of life. The hon. gentleman goes on a little further, and again returns to the attack on Montreal. When I see this triple attack on Montreal, I cannot help thinking that at some time or other the citizens must have refused to hear some such a speech as the hon. gentleman made the other night, and if they did refuse they ought to be forgiven. Then he says that the National Policy, this creation of more money which has enabled the people to buy more goods at better prices and make themselves more comfortable, has only operated in favor of the farmer and speculation. I do not know what he means by that. If he means the ordinary trader, I conceive it has improved the position of farmers and manufacturers. If he means by speculators, men who are ready to go into legitimate avenues of business, I admit it has favored the speculator; but if he means by that term one who tries to live without working, but by shaving notes, then, on the contrary, the reduced rates of interest and the increased amount of money in the country have injured his position. The hon. gentleman, towards the close of his long harangue, became very feeling for the farmers. I think, here, at the end, I have got the key to the whole speech, the key to the action of his lifetime, and to the action of his political friends. They have been misled, I think, by his powerful brain, because he says that, at the last election, we cajoled and deceived the farmers of Canada; they have often cajoled me, but I cannot say I ever cajoled them, and if the hon. gentleman builds up his political future on his ability to cajole the people, he will find the farmers cannot be deceived, either by him or by his friends. The saying, "that whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad," I have shown applies to himself. Here is another point which the hon. gentleman turned to himself. He says:

"They never trusted in the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite, but the man who has been fooled once and knows it is not likely to be fooled again."

After long days and years of active agitation, the hon. gentlemen opposite got into power; the hon. member for Gloucester occupied the Speaker's chair, and, if report speaks truly, he did not lose by it. They succeeded in obtaining a large majority on account of the large and wide professions they made. They had stated, from every stump in Ontario and even from the shores of the Pacific down to the boundaries of the Maritime Provinces, that they were the most honest men on the face of the earth; that they were true Reformers, and if they got into power they would, like Jack Cade, put a towel in every man's pot. Well, the people of this country trusted in the promises of these gentlemen and will never put trust in them again; but will again confide the administration of public affairs to the present Government, which has fulfilled its pledge and brought the country into its present prosperous and happy condition. The last remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester, who was careful not to point out any particular places as an illustration of his statements, were that our Census were all wrong, that the people are leaving the country, that manufacturers are suffering and everything going to the bad, and that nothing would save the country from destruction but the restoration to power of himself and his hon. friends. I will, in a very few words, try to show the converse of these statements. At the last election, the people looked forward to those who were seeking their suffrages to devise some remedial legislation which would put the country in a better condition than it was in then, and the right hon. leader of the Government and his supporters promised that, if placed in power, they would endeavor to change the aspect of affairs. I ask you again whether this promise has not been fulfilled, whether, in the history of any nation, at any rate under institutions like ours, you have ever seen in so few years so great a change in the condition of the country, so marvelous a bringing about of a state of prosperity, happiness and contentment. It might be said of the hon. Finance Minister, as it was said of a statesman in a neighboring country: "He struck the rock of the national credit, and an abundant stream flowed forth." Under the management of the hon. member for Centre Huron, the public credit became a corpse, which he could not galvanize, much less get it on its feet, that it might walk. Yet, after all the success which has attended the efforts of this Government, these hon. gentlemen opposite ask to be again placed in office, in order that they may do away with the National Policy. I have that confidence in the common sense of the people, that I believe when the next elections come, come when they may, the Government will be returned to power with as large a majority as they have at present.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). We have been very much interested on this side of the House in the remarks made by the hon. member for East York. In fact, it is hard for me to say whether we are most impressed by the forcible argument which he presented to us, or the chaste and moderate language in which he couched his arguments, or the melodious tones of his voice. In fact, it is always a pleasure to listen to the hon. member for East York. He excels all other members of this House in his anxiety to take care of the Opposition. He sometimes singles out one member, sometimes another. This afternoon he has taken charge of two or three. The hon. gentleman first devoted his attention to the hon. member for Centre Huron, and was very much annoyed because that hon. member chose, acting on his own judgment, to change his political associates some years ago. The hon. member for East York, himself changed his political associates. I think the hon. gentleman was a Liberal at one time, though now working with Conservative party, and I think the hon. gentleman ought to have a little charity towards those who change their political opinions. I think if he claimed the liberty of deserting his friends and going over to the Conservative party, he should concede the same liberty to the hon. member for Centre Huron, and allow him to join the Liberal party. I am, however, quite satisfied with the exchange. I think we have benefited by it. I would be quite willing to exchange—should there be any more of the hon. member's stripe in our party, and I do not think there is another left—but admitting for the moment that there are any, I would be willing to exchange them by the dozen for gentlemen of the stamp of the hon. member for Centre Huron. The hon. member has found great fault with the hon. member for Centre Huron on account of The hon. gentleman seems to be a great authority on loans. He insinuated that the hon. member for Centre Huron put himself in a position to be personally benefited by the loan which he made in 1873-74. I cannot say that he directly insinuated that the hon. member for Centre Huron did benefit by that loan, personally, but he implied as much as he would dare to imply on that point, on the floor of the House. Such an insinuation is unworthy of the hon. member for East York.

An hon. MEMBER. Not unworthy.

Mr. ROSS. My hon. friend behind me says it is not unworthy. I will leave it so. Does he not know that the loan floated by the hon. member for Centre Huron, was floated in the same way as those floated by previous Finance Ministers? Does he not know that every insinuation and inuendo which he made in connection with that loan would apply equally as well to those made by Sir A. T. Galt, Sir John Rose and Sir Francis Hincks? Does he not know that these gentlemen, in floating loans, placed them on the English market at a fixed minimum rate, and no hon. members on this side of this House, to my knowledge, ever insinuated that these gentlemen were personally benefited by any loan they had made. Does he not know further that Sir Francis Hincks approved most cordially and in the strongest terms, of the loan made by the hon. member for Centre Huron, a few years ago. If the hon. member will allow me, I will read from the Journal of Commerce a quotation from an article written by Sir Francis Hincks, on that loan, it is dated the 25th July, 1879. Sir Francis Hincks said:

"It is about as unreasonable to attribute the success of the loan to the favorable influence of the National Policy, as it would have been to have attributed the failure to that cause. We confess that we are unable to discover the ground on which the Gazette infers that "the credit of Canada stands higher to-day in the London market than ever before." The test of the correctness of this opinion would be the comparative value of Canadian 4 per cents. and Imperial guaranteed 4 per cents., on the 4 per cent. debentures of New South Wales, Queensland, South Australia, Victoria, and Tasmania at the present, and at some previous fixed time. All the Colonies mentioned have 4 per cent. bonds in the market, and it will be found that, while they are generally higher than those of Canada, they have all shared the improvement in price caused, not by the National Policy, but by the abundance of money in the English market, consequent on depressed trade and want of confidence."

Here is the opinion of a gentleman who occupied the position held by the present hon. Finance Minister, who floated a loan in the English market on precisely the same conditions as the loans floated by the hon. member for Centre Huron, and who holds that that was the best way in which that Canadian loan could have been floated. He ought to know that the allotment of the shares when a loan is floated at a fixed price, is made entirely by the financial agents of the Government, in London, and that the hon. the Finance Minister has nothing to do with the shares allotted to those who may take the loan; and he might know, further, that the present Government has for ten years appointed the

Baring Brothers financial agents of Canada, in England, without power of revocation. So that, if any charge is made against the financial agents, in London, in connection with the loans floated by the late hon. Finance Minister, we have a complete answer in the fact that these men stand so high in the good opinion of the present Government, that they have been appointed our financial agents for ten years. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) has indulged in some very chaste and polished phrases, in the speech just concluded. I jotted down just a few of them, to which I will call his attention, though, perhaps, they were uttered in haste. In referring to the member for Centre Huron, he spoke of his conduct as almost exceeding that of "human effrontery." In alluding to the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), he spoke of the "incendiary position" which that hon. gentleman occupied. I think we have had enough of such language from the member for East York, and I will therefore dismiss the hon. gentleman from further consideration; I know any reference made to him is unnecessary. The position in which he stands, in the estimation of members on both sides of the House, does not even call for the reference I have made; but I thought it necessary thus to allude to him in brief. We have entered upon a very important discussion. The question before the House at present is, practically, shall the policy of the present Administration, in regard to the financial affairs of this country and its fiscal policy be sustained. The hon. Finance Minister explained, the other night, his Budget at great length. He spoke of our revenues and expenditures, and was followed later by the hon. Minister of Railways, who also discussed at considerable length a number of questions, to a few of which I will refer. First, he charged the member for Centre Huron with bringing down estimates in 1874 for $4,000,000 more than the largest expenditure of the late Government. The hon. Minister of Finance will remember that by the obligations which he had incurred in 1873, instead of bringing down an estimate for $20,900,000 he should have brought down an estimate for $23,368,000. He will also remember that the ex-Minister of Finance, in the expenditure for 1873-74, kept within the estimate of his predecessor, and that the present Minister of Finance, exceeded the estimate of his predecessor. He will remember that, in that estimate of 1873-74, we had to provide for the very heavy obligations which were undertaken by our predecessors; we had the Intercolonial Railway in course of construction; we had the enlargement of the canals on hand; we had the obligations incurred in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Prince Edward Island Railway, heavy obligations which it was necessary to meet in order to maintain the credit of the country. The hon. Minister of Railways, in dealing with the expenditure of this country, touched the question very gingerly. It will be within the recollection of many members of this House, how vigorously the hon. Minister of Railways denounced the expenditure of the previous Administration in 1878, how he took up item after item of our Estimates and charged us with extravagance, because, in some instances, there were increases. I will make a short quotation from his speech delivered on the 22nd February, 1878, when he said:

"Inasmuch as we governed the country with a small taxation, and inasmuch as we are prepared to govern the country again without those extravagant expenditures made by the present Government since they have been entrusted with power, all we ask is, not that the taxation shall be increased, because we do not require so much money as the hon. gentlemen opposite, as we have shown by our economy in the past, and which we are prepared to practice in the future."

This was the platform upon which the hon. Minister of Railways went to the country in 1878, and I was not surprised that, when he came to discuss the Estimates of his colleague, a few evenings ago, he touched the items of expenditure so gingerly. We had before us his promise, made in 1878, and we had the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance in the city of St. John, when he declared that he believed $22,500,000 were all that would be necessary with which to carry on the affairs of this country. I am not surprised, then, that when the hon. gentleman came to deal with the expenditure, he touched the matter so very carefully; and, if we just revert to the facts of this increased expenditure, this position will be made very clear. Let us look, first, at the entire expenditure, as contained in the Public Accounts during the last few years, and compare them with the expenditure of the last Administration, and with the Estimates proposed for 1882-83. The hon. Minister of Finance delights this Session in averages, not only averages in the matter of expenditure, but in the matter of trade. I will give him a few averages in the matter of expenditure. If the hon. gentleman will notice the expenditure for the Dominion of Canada, he will find that the average during the last two years of the last Administration, was $23,511,229, and that the average expenditure of his own Administration during the last two years, was $25,176,594, or an excess in the last two years over our average expenditure of $1,665,365, or an excess over our last year of nearly $2,000,000. Now, we can understand, from that simple fact, why the hon. Minister of Railways was so careful, in discussing the public finances, not to touch on the expenditure of this country. No doubt when he looked at the Estimates he was completely appalled, for these Estimates proposed, when the Supplementary Estimates are brought down, as indicated by the Minister of Finance, an expenditure of $27,600,000, or an expenditure of $4,000,000 over the highest expenditure of the late Reform Administration. We pointed out in 1878 that during the first seven years of Confederation the Conservative party increased the expenditure $10,000,000. They were upon the stool of repentance during the five years they sat in the cold shades of Opposition, and nobody suffered more during that time than my distinguished friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb). While in that position they promised reform, they cried peccavi. Place us in power again and we will reform the finances of this country, we will reduce the expenditure. From every platform, as well as from their places in this House, they declared loud and strong their allegiance to economy and to a careful financial management. Circumstances placed them in power, and we see now how much their promises were worth. From an expenditure of about $23,500,000, such as we required in 1878, the expenditure of this country has leaped up to $27,600,000, and hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for this increase. Let us go into detail. The hon. Minister of Finance boasts that he was able to reduce the interest account, I think, something like $50,000 or $59,000. He boasts of that as an astounding feat of financial ability. The interests of this country now are in very safe keeping, because we have paid this year $59,000 less for interest than we paid the previous year. How did he accomplish this feat of financial ability? Was it by negotiating a favorable loan in the English market? Was it by raising the credit of this country until it exceeds the credit of the other British colonies? No; not at all, but because he was able to buy up a few 6 per cents. and substitute 5 per cents. in their places. He had not to go to the English markets to negotiate a loan; he had the money in the Post Office Savings Bank, and he used that money, and all there is to boast of in this financial feat is that he saves $59,000. But let us look at the averages, for that is a favorite doctrine of my hon. friend, and it is a new doctrine, a new plank in the Conservative platform. This doctrine of averages simply proves that the hon. gentlemen opposite required on an average, during the last two years, $760,981 more for interest than was required during the late Reform Administration. They required $750,000 to be drawn annually from the pockets of the people to meet public expenditure more than the late Reform Administration required, as a result of the hon. gentleman's management of public affairs. When we come down to the controllable expenditure—the expenditure which is particularly under the control of the Ministers—you will see how apparent the extravagance of the present Administration becomes. In speaking of controllable expenditure, the Hon. Senator Macpherson, in his pamphlet, says:

"This expenditure is as much under the control of the Ministers as the expenditure of your respective households is under your control."

Now, if this proposition is sound—and coming from a colleague of the hon. gentleman opposite, we must take it as of high authority—what follows? It follows that, these hon. gentlemen are particularly to blame for any increase in the controllable expenditure. It may be possible that, in the matter of interest and the matter of the collection of revenues, they might find some extenuating circumstances, but here their own colleague says that the controllable expenditure of this country is as much under their control—I use his own words—as the expenditures of their own households. Well, we find that these hon. gentlemen, during the last three years, have increased the controllable expenditure of this country by $750,000. There is an expenditure that they might have prevented—so their colleague says—and is yet in their power, and yet it goes on in precisely the same line as the other expenditures of the country go on. Let us apply the doctrine of averages and what do we find? We find that the average controllable expenditure for the last two years is greater by $439,913 than it was under the late Administration. And you will find this remarkable fact in connection with this point, that, whereas, under the late Administration, we were able to reduce controllable expenditure by $1,750,000 in five years, and brought it down to the lowest point it had reached since 1875, the hon. gentlemen have gone on increasing it year by year, increasing it at a very rapid ratio, until now, as I have already said, the controllable expenditure is greater by $750,000 than it was in 1878. Let us look at a few items of that controllable expenditure. Let me take the first item in the list, that of Civil Government, and what do you find under that head? In 1878, we required $23,369 for Civil Government; the hon. gentleman required, in 1881, $915,958, or an increase of $92,589 in that single item. Perhaps they will say that the requirements of this country are such as to necessitate an increase under that head. Every hon. member of this House knows what are the expenses under that head. They are principally expenses of the Civil Service. When we read the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite in which they denounce the extravagant salaries paid the Civil Service during our Administration, and the increase in the number of officers in all the Departments, and when, in the face of these statements, we notice that in three years they have increased the salaries of the Civil Service—under the head of Civil Government—$92,589, what are we to say of the pledges these hon. gentlemen made in the matter of economy? Take the averages, and you will find that averaging our last two years and averaging their last two years, the expenditure is $89,000 greater during the present Administration than it was during the late Administration. And if we look a little further and ascertain the cause of this increase, we find that the expenditure for the service of several of the Departments has gone on increasing at a rapid rate. I wish to call the attention of the House to the increased appointments made by the present Administration in detail. Let us take, in the first place, the Department of Justice. In the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Railways in 1878, I notice that he denounces in very strong terms the expenditure under this head. In 1878, under the late Administration, there were thirteen persons in the Department of Justice, and in 1881, there were seventeen persons. In 1878, we paid $14,860 for salaries, while, in 1881, they paid $19,451, an increase of about $5,000 in that single Department. Take next the Department of the Interior, including the management of Indian Lands. In that Department forty men were employed in 1878, and, in 1881, the number was fifty-nine. In 1878, $44,380 were paid in salaries, while last year there were paid $63,515, an increase of nearly $19,000 in that Department alone. Then take the Department of Inland Revenue. In 1878, there were on the civil list of that Department twenty-seven persons; in 1881 the number was thirty. In 1878, $28,571 were paid in salaries; in 1881 the salaries were $32,025. Then, in the Department of Public Works and Railways, over which presides the economical Minister of Railways, who said, in 1878, that they did not want as much money as hon. gentlemen opposite, because they did not require as much to carry on the affairs of this country. In that Department, with a single head, in 1878 there were thirty-one officers. In 1881, there were forty-nine persons. In 1878, their salaries were $44,325, while, in 1881, they were $65,722. Take, next, the Post Office Department, a Department which has had as many heads during the past year as some of the fabled characters of old of which we read.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that the Senate had passed an Address to Her Majesty the Queen.

The Address was read as follows:—

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, desire most earnestly, in our own name and on behalf of the people whom we represent, to renew the expression of our unswerving loyalty and devotion to Your Majesty's person and Government. We were profoundly shocked, may it please Your Majesty, by the intelligence which was received by telegraph yesterday that an attempt had been made on Your Majesty's most honored and valuable life. We take the earliest opportunity of adding our congratulations to those which we are persuaded will come from our fellow-subjects in all parts of Your Empire, at Your Providential escape from so grave a peril.

We are deeply grateful to the Author of all Good for averting a dire calamity from Your Majesty's people, and thankful to Him that Your Majesty's life may still be counted among the precious possessions of Your devoted subjects. We pray that the blessings of Your Majesty's reign may long be continued.

D. L. MACPHERSON, Speaker.

THE SENATE,
Friday, 3rd March, 1882.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Address which has just been read from the other branch of the Legislature, will, I have no doubt, be unanimously concurred in by this House. It is not requisite, I think, for us in this House to expatiate on this subject. The feelings that pervades every portion of this House are the same that exists in every part of the Dominion of Canada—the most devoted loyalty to Her Majesty, the greatest respect for her virtues, domestic and public, the horror with which we have heard the news, and the great pleasure and delight with which we have learned that she has suffered no injury from the atrocious attack. It has been her fate, like other illustrious public persons, to have been the object of attack—some from a desire of notoriety, some from insanity; but I am glad to say, and we are all glad to know, that no political reason, no political cause of discontent, has been the moving cause for these outrages. Sir, without further remarks, and seconded by my hon. friend the member for Lambton, who, I have no doubt, will have the greatest pleasure in joining me in this matter, I move that this Address be now taken into consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I regret that the hon. gentleman has not asked the hon. leader of the Opposition to second this motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand that the hon. leader of the Opposition is absent from a cause which we all regret.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I thought he was in the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am informed that he is absent in consequence of a family affliction, or I would have asked him.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Of course, I could not refuse, under any circumstances, to second a motion of this kind. Our loyalty here is not merely in relation to our political connection, but it is to a great extent a sentiment. With every one who has had the pleasure of knowing anything of the virtues, high character and political wisdom, generally speaking, of Her Majesty the Queen, I could conceive of no greater disaster that could happen than a fatal issue of such an attempt as the one referred to in the Address, and which now has been made for the fourth or fifth time in her life. I am sure nothing would give Her Majesty greater pleasure than to know that every attempt of that kind has excited the horror and indignation of the people on this side of the Atlantic quite as much as amongst those who immediately surround her throne. Her Majesty's character has been such as greatly to elevate the whole tone of society in Great Britain; and apart altogether from the virtues which she possesses as a Sovereign, her personal virtues are such as to commend her as the first woman in the world to all who love an exhibition of the highest phase of domestic virtues. I have great pleasure in seconding the motion which the hon. Premier has made.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that the whole House will second the address to be presented to Her Majesty the Queen. In the name of all French Canadians, I may say, that although our religious faith differs from that of our gracious Sovereign, yet we are second to none in our loyalty towards her. We have always looked upon our gracious Sovereign as an example to be held up for admiration, whether as woman, mother or Queen; and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in the Province of Quebec and in the Dominion of Canada, wherever the French language is spoken, there is in unity with men of other nationalities, but one common feeling of horror on hearing of the attempt on the life of our Sovereign. I will not add a single word, but content myself with saying that I fully concur in the remarks that have fallen from the lips of the hon. Premier, and from those of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), whilst addressing this House.

Mr. Fiset. Mr. Speaker, I regret that our leader is not present to unite with the hon. Minister of Public Works, (Sir Hector Langevin), but he will permit me to say, in his absence, that we fully endorse the sentiments expressed by the hon. Minister and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie).

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that this House do concur in the Address of the Senate to Her Most Gracious Majesty, and that the blank therein be filled up by the words "House of Commons."

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency be pleased to transmit, in the first place by telegraphic message, the joint Address of both Houses to Her Most Gracious Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The following Bills were read the second time:—

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the Niagara Peninsula Bridge Company.—(Mr. Rykert.)

THE BUDGET.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). When I was interrupted before six o'clock to enable the House to express its thankfulness for the happy deliverance of Her Majesty from bodily harm, I was discussing the expenditures under the head of Civil Government, and I was attempting to show that the tendency of the present Administration was to increase the expenditure of our Civil Service—not only to increase the number of officers, but the salaries as well. I was about to show that in the Post Office Department, the number of officers had increased from 109 in 1878, to 140 in 1881, and that the salaries had increased from $90,704 in 1878 to $110,990 in 1881. I might further show that this increase is not confined to the Departments already named. For instance, I find that in the Department of Marine and Fisheries the number of officers had increased from twenty to twenty-five, and the salaries from $27,897 to $30,597; being a total of 469 in all the Departments in 1878, against 537 in 1881, or an increase of sixty-eight officers, and a total of salaries, in 1878, of $510,925, and, in 1881, of $574,240, or an increase of $63,685.

Mr. FARROW. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he takes into consideration the extra clerks?

Mr. ROSS. I assure the hon. gentleman that I have taken into consideration the extra clerks and all the extra services, and if the hon. gentleman knows better, he will have an opportunity to show what he knows on the subject. I was going to say that one of the charges brought against us in 1878—in fact during the whole continuance of our Administration—was, that in the Civil Service there was an enormous increase, both in the number of officers and the salaries paid to them. A distinguished Senator in speaking of the salaries of officers under the late administration said:

"We have evidence in the statement I have read, of waste—corrupt waste—because I fear the increased expenditure is owing to the unnecessary employment of favorites—the sons, nephews, and cousins of political supporters at the public expense."

Sir, if I chose to retaliate, if I chose to examine the Public Accounts, and select from the host of names that are to be found over the various pages of those accounts, I think I could show that that charge, so far as we were concerned, was entirely unfounded, but that, in the present instance, any hon. member who desired to make a charge of that character could make it with perfect safety, for there is scarcely a Minister on the Treasury Benches but has various friends of various degrees of relationship occupying important, influential and lucrative positions in the public service. I could give instances if it were necessary—instances where Ministers have three or eight, or even as high as twelve of their nearest and dearest in the public service, enjoying the advantages of those positions; and while those things are well known to every enquirer in to matters of this kind, still we were told by hon. gentlemen opposite that we filled the public offices with friends and relatives. I need not pursue this matter further. I have answered the challenge that we were not responsible for the increase in the Civil Service; I have answered that challenge and have made another—that hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible. I have furnished them with the facts and we will wait in patience for their denial. I take up the next Department of Government, Administration of Justice. Now, Sir, this was a Department that was very closely criticised by our opponents. They charged us with extravagance here as elsewhere. What do we find? The annual expenditure during the last two years of the late Government averaged $565,285; the average for the two last years of the present Administration was $579,134, an increase of about $14,000 over our average, and the Estimates call this year for $613,519. The same applies to the Immigration Department. We have an enormous increase, an increase of $70,000 over our last year, and we were told by hon. gentlemen opposite that when the Pacific Railway was under way, and when the vast territory of the North-West was handed over to the Syndicate, the Government of the Dominion would be relieved from the expense previously involved in the encouragement of immigration. The Syndicate has control of the North-West, full, free and ample control of our vast domain on this side of the Rocky Mountains; yet we find, in the face of these declarations, with these words fresh on the pages of the Official Debates, that the expense under the head of immigration is largely increased, and the Government is going to promote immigration, not for the settlement of their own lands, but for the lands of the Syndicate. Then pensions come under our view; we find a large increase in them also, over $8,000 beyond our average for our two last years. Under the head of superannuations we find another increase; and let me call the attention of the Government to a fact or two in connection with superannuation. It is quite clear the system of superannuation needs consideration. I am not going to charge hon. gentlemen opposite with abusing the privileges of the Superannuation Act. I am not prepared to prove they have abused their privileges, I do not know whether they have or not; but this is an established fact on the face of the record, that the late Administration were able to manage the affairs of the country, and were able to maintain the efficiency of the Civil Service by superannuating only thirty-eight officers in 1878, and now we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite, in the last report, that they could not maintain the efficiency of the Civil Service in 1881 without superannuating seventy officials. The allowances which were made because of superannuation in 1878 amounted to $16,857. Those hon. gentlemen opposite have charged the country with an allowance in connection with the superannuation to the extent of $29,927. Sir, there must be something wrong in this enormous increase. I see by the Estimates that $155,000 is asked for superannuation next year, an increase of nearly $40,000 over the amount asked for in the last year of the late Administration. Why this anxiety to get rid of officers in the Civil Service? Do you remember, Sir, how the hon. Minister of Railways denounced the late Administration for superannuating some officers who had attained sixty years of age? Look over the superannuation tables of the present Administration, and you will find men superannuated at a much earlier age than sixty. I have great fear that the privileges and powers conferred on the Government by the Superannuation Act are abused, and the attention of the House should be seriously directed towards providing a remedy in this particular. What is true of superannuation is also true of the militia service. I am not prepared to say that we are able, in this young country, to maintain ourselves in perfect safety without incurring a large expenditure under the head of militia. I have great doubts, however, as to the propriety of this House and country expending annually from $600,000 to $700,000 on this service. If it could be shown that this large expenditure was made for the special purpose of making our young men efficient in the militia service of the country, then there would be some justification for that expense; but we find that, out of a total expenditure of something like $690,000, only $157,125 were expended on the drill of our Canadian volunteers, the remaining sum of almost $500,000 being expended in various other departments of the service. It is true this expenditure may be necessary as the service is now conducted, but it is to be deplored that, while the House votes $700,000 in order to maintain the efficiency of the volunteer force, only about one-fifth goes directly into the pockets of those who give their time and energy in order that the force may be maintained efficient. I notice the hon. the Minister asks this year for a still larger estimate, I believe for $750,500. This is an enormous amount, in the face of the expenditure made in that service by the late Administration. As with the militia, so with the Military College. An agitation has sprung up in the country recently for the abolition of that College. If the College was properly managed it should not be abolished, for I believe it serves a very important purpose in the Militia Department. I believe it can be said that it is exceedingly useful, and I know of no way of maintaining the militia force efficiently than by training thoroughly a number of our young men early to the militia service. But what do we notice in connection with the expenditure of the Military College. In 1878, it amounted to $30,113, and, in 1881, to $58,690; so that the cost of this institution—I do not speak slightly of it when I call it a little institution—has nearly doubled in the last three years.

Mr. BOWELL. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the Bill establishing that College provided for an increase?

Mr. ROSS. Then, why do you ask the House to vote that increase?

Mr. BOWELL. The Bill provides for an increase in the number of the staff and other additional expenses which it is necessary to vote every year.

Mr. ROSS. Even admitting that, and I am not prepared to admit what the hon. gentleman says, because I do not know whether he is correct or not, that does not justify the increased expenditure.

Mr. BOWELL. Who established the College?

Mr. ROSS. We admit the establishment of the College, and that it was a wise act. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to repeal the law establishing it? If not, he is responsible for its existence and maintenance equally with us.

Mr. BOWELL. The Government is bound to maintain that College provided by the Bill introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. ROSS. I defy the hon. gentleman to show by the Bill any reason for doubling the expenditure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You have not read the Bill.

Mr. ROSS. I have not seen it since it passed the House, but I will stand corrected if the hon. gentleman can show me any clause justifying the increase. Does the Bill require that in three years we should increase the expenditure to $30,000. In 1873, the staff of the Military College were paid $13,946. I suppose the hon. gentleman will tell me that the Bill provides for the payment of $30,751 to the officers and staff in 1881. Does the Bill provide for that? I wait for an answer and cannot get any. I find that, in 1878, we paid for non-commissioned officers, $2,591. I suppose the Bill provides that, in 1881, we should pay $5,579. We will see when this estimate is voted whether the Bill so provides or not. I say that expense requires to be justified. If we have established this institution in order to foster a military spirit among our young men so that they may, when required, be able to do efficient service for their country, we want it to be so managed that it will secure the moral support of the people. But, if the people find it is made an excuse for largely increasing expenditure or supplying places for officers that may not be required, the people will not look so kindly on a Military College as they do. In the inspection of insurance companies there is also an increase. In 1878, the late Administration were able to conduct this service with two clerks at an expenditure of $3,412. Now it requires three clerks at an expenditure of $4,424. I suppose this expenditure was also provided for in the Bill creating that inspection.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who pays for that?

Mr. ROSS. The Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is the insurance companies.

Mr. ROSS. The money is voted by this House, yet I suppose the hon. gentleman will justify it from his place. Let us take up the Department of Public Works. I find an enormous increase proposed in this Department. I see by the Estimates, that for this year the large sum of $1,684,865 is asked, or an increase over last year of $610,000. Now, I am free to admit that, when we can afford it, it is desirable for us to provide for the service in the various parts of the Dominion such buildings and conveniences as may be necessary, but there is something slightly suspicious in this item. I remember the hon. Minister of Railways the other night denounced the late Finance Minister very strongly for his anxiety to vote the sum of $59,000 to a large corporation on the eve of the general elections. True, if voted for any political purpose it certainly was an outrage; but why this anxiety just now—on the eve of general elections, when the air is full of rumors that hon. gentlemen opposite are going to the country—to provide post offices, public buildings, Customs houses and such conveniences in small cities and towns all over the country. Look at the statements made in some of the towns visited by the hon. Minister of Public Works during his peregrinations through Ontario last autumn. But to return to the Military College, the Act for the establishment of which I have now in my hand. What is the clause in the Act to which the hon. Minister of Customs refers. The clause reads as follows:—

"The College shall be conducted under the superintendence of a military officer having special qualifications with regard to the instructions to be given, and discipline, whose title and designation shall be that of Commandant. There shall also be two other professors and instructors and such assistants as may be found necessary, and as may be authorized by Parliament. The salary of the Commandant to be not more than $3,000 and of the other professors not more than $2,000 each, all the staff of the College to be appointed by the Governor in Council and to hold office during pleasure."

I suppose the hon. gentleman will argue from that, that the Bill provides for the increased expenditure, when it dis-tingently states these officers are to be appointed by the Governor in Council. I was going on to show how the hon. Minister of Public Works was regarded in some of the towns of Ontario, which he visited during his peregrinations. I noticed he paid a visit to the town of St. Thomas, that he was banquetted there, and that they had a very high personal regard for him. In fact, I think the hon. gentleman was banquetted in almost all our little towns and cities in Ontario, and in each he took occasion to speak very frequently of the compliment paid him by Her Majesty in making him a Knight of St. Michael and St. George. Here is what Mr. Charles Rowe said at the banquet.

"He said he wanted Sir Hector Langevin to understand that St. Thomas was the exact spot for a $75,000 post office. He said that the people of St. Thomas supported the Conservative Government, but they wanted a quid pro quo, and suggested that a fine post office and Custom's office would fill the Bill."

Personally, the city had a high opinion of Sir Hector, but they wanted a post office and Customs' office out of him. The high personal opinion they had of the hon. Minister of Public Works was evidently a small matter compared with the quid pro quo, a $75,000 post office and a Customs' office. Now, I think that is a quid pro quo which the hon. gentleman understood very well, and I think it will be seen that he understood how to make the best of his opportunities. One thing I understand quite well, and that is that the Estimates are exceedingly large. There is scarcely a little town or city at which he was banquetted but which receives an appropriation of from $10,000 to $15,000 for public works of various kinds. I am not prepared to charge the hon. the Minister of Public Works with having made use of his position in order to strengthen his friends politically; but these peregrinations and appropriations have a very significant look at the present juncture. The hon. gentleman's estimates seem to be got up upon the principle, that wherever he thought it necessary that appropriations should be made, for what reason I am not prepared to say, the appropriation is made accordingly, and the Estimates tell the tale. Let me take up another Department—expenditure on behalf of the Indians of the North-West. I cannot understand how that expenditure has increased so enormously. The average during the two years of the last Administration, was $361,549, and the average during the two years of the present Administration, is $799,800, an increase of nearly $500,000 in three years; and now the hon. the Minister of the Interior asks $909,309, an increase of 300 per cent. over the expenditure of the late Administration. Then we come to canals, under the Department of the Minister, who takes a very great interest in public works. The late Minister of Public Works was charged with mismanaging our canals, and what do we find in looking into the Public Accounts? Just this: that under his management they yielded a profit of $31,252 over and above all expenses. But under the magnificent management of the Minister of Railways they are now conducted at a loss of $5,180, or a margin of $30,000 odd on the wrong side in three years. You will notice still further that this increase of expense is largely in the matter of salaries. I find there is an increase in salaries on all the Canals—on the Welland, St. Lawrence, Chambly, and Ottawa and Rideau. The total paid for salaries in 1878 reached but $29,880, and, in 1881, $31,092; and this was the outcome—not with an increased trade, but with a reduced traffic on the Canals. There would be some justification for this increased expenditure had there been increased labor; but there was a reduced amount of labor, so that the enlarged expenditure cannot be justified on any ground. In the Excise Department the same increase, the same extravagance, appears. In 1878, the late Administration were able to manage this Department with but 191 employees, while, in 1881, the present Government required 199. In 1878, the salaries paid were $174,272, while, in 1881, the amount reached $189,529, or an increase of $15,257. And this increase, which extends to the service as a whole, extends to it in detail. I will give but one other instance: Take the Inspection of Gas—not an expensive Department of the Inland Revenue Department, but one that has been peculiarly managed. In 1878, the salaries came to $7,000; in 1881, $8,797, or an increase of $1,700 in that Department alone. In 1871, it required seven officers to conduct the inspection; in 1881, fourteen were wanted. In 1878, something like 4,454 meters were inspected; in 1881, but 2,895, so that you see there again a large increase of expenditure with a reduction of the amount of work to be done. I must also investigate in the same line the Post Office expenditure, the outside service; and I am free to say that any reasonable expenditure in that line would be readily supported by members on this side. We are anxious that all parts of the Dominion should be favored with the greatest facilities for communication in that way. Let us see where the increase took place. Here is a fact which cannot be gainsayed: The increase in the cost of the conveyance of the mails last year amounted to $43,792; increase in salaries and allowance, $110,788; and the Estimates this year is for over $2,018,900. If this increase had taken place in affording better facilities for the people, nobody would object. The people of the country must have their mails, and must pay for them. But the increase for affording postal facilities was very small, indeed, compared with the enormous increase in salaries and allowances. Nor can it be argued that it took place for the extension of mail facilities in the North-West. For the extension of mail facilities only $24,693 more were absorbed than in 1878; and we are willing to allow every additional increase for mail facilities, as I have already remarked. Yet here we have an enormous increase in the Post Office Department which cannot be justified. Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite will claim that the revenue has increased. If it has, who deserves the credit? Have they done anything to increase it? Is this not a natural increase arising from the increased number of newspapers published in the country—arising from increased facilities for the dissemination of information and so forth. We have here the plainest evidence of extravagance in the Post Office Department, under the head of salaries and allowances—of an expenditure increasing far more rapidly than that affording increased mail facilities for the people. I have now gone over, not only the gross expenditure for the Dominion since 1878, but have looked over its details in some departments, and I am bound to say no party ever attained power, having made such strong pledges of economy, that violated their pledges more persistently than the hon. gentlemen opposite. Where the late Administration were able to manage the affairs of the country for $23,500,000, the present Government asked $27,600,000; and where the controllable expenditure was reduced by the last Government $2,000,000 in five years, the present Ministers have increased it already $750,000. Where the late Administration were able to conduct the Civil Service with a certain number of officers, these hon. gentlemen have increased that number; as also the amount of salaries. So that, on the whole or in detail, the service shows extravagance prevails in every department. The country will hold the hon. gentleman opposite responsible when the day of reckoning comes, and the sooner the better, and the verdict ought to be one of condemnation against them. I come now to another subject, the coal question, and, respecting it, permit me to say that I never heard the hon. Minister of Railways address his own followers with so many evidences, on their faces, of the feeling that they discredited every word he said. His remarks had little or no effect on this side of the House, but I think that they had even less effect, if possible, on his supporters on his own side. Why? Because the hon. gentleman was inconsistent with himself and his colleagues in every stage of his argument. Does not the hon. gentleman know that one of the distinguished colleagues with whom he is associated was opposed entirely to the duty on coal? Why was that gentleman opposed to the coal duty? Because he knew that the people of Ontario had to pay this duty on coal. Then there was another hon. gentleman, a colleague of the hon. Minister of Railways, who was a little more modest than the acting Minister of the Interior, who was not prepared to say that the people of Ontario paid the whole duty on coal, but he believed, in his modesty, that the people of the United States paid about half of it, and that the people of Ontario paid the other half. It remained for the hon. Minister of Railways, who is prepared to rush in on every emergency, to make the bold assertion that the people of the United States pay the whole duty on coal. The hon. gentleman was inconsistent with his colleagues, and he was inconsistent with himself. A few months ago, in Pictou, he said that 1,500,000 of Ontarians paid $400,000 of a duty on coal. And that, by the payment of that duty the people of the Maritime Provinces were relieved, to that extent, of the burden of taxation. He said, as his colleague stated the other night, that by reason of the duty the manufacturers of Ontario were placed at a disadvantage as compared with the manufacturers of the Maritime Provinces. So the hon. gentleman is inconsistent with himself in this matter of the coal duty. He stated in a meeting in San Francisco that the duty upon coal was imposed contrary to the laws of nature, contrary to the free interchange of products between the two countries, and it was a duty that ought to be abolished. The argument of the hon. gentleman amounted to this, that we paid no duty upon coal, because at competing points the Americans, in order to get the Canadian trade, reduced the price of American coal, and consequently, we got coal the extent of the duty lower. Now, if this argument be true, what advantage is the coal duty to the people of the Maritime Provinces? The duty was placed upon coal in order that the coal of the Maritime Provinces might reach the Province of Ontario. But if the people of Ontario get the coal less the duty, then the people of the Maritime Provinces have no advantage because of the coal duty, and consequently it is a fraud on the face of it, and the hon. gentleman was himself the first man in this House to point out distinctly to the people the character of the fraud he had perpetrated upon them when he proposed that duty. Let me take another line of argument. If that line of argument applies to the duty on coal, it will also apply to the duty on breadstuffs. Now, the producers of Ontario send breadstuffs to the competing markets of the Maritime Provinces, markets that compete with the breadstuffs imported by dealers at Halifax and St. John; yet the hon. gentleman tells the people of Ontario that, because of the duty on breadstuffs, the Canadian farmer gets a higher price for his breadstuffs in the markets of the Maritime Provinces. But here again the argument based upon the principle of competition comes in. When we send our breadstuffs to competing points such as St. John and Halifax, the Americans, on the same principle as they deal with us in the matter of coal, will deal with us in the matter of flour, and they will send their flour to these competing points in the Maritime Provinces and sell it there, less the price of duty, and then the advantage which we derive from the duty on breadstuffs is thrown to the winds. That is the line of argument the hon. gentleman pursues. So, not only is the coal tax valueless as a protection to the coal producers of Nova Scotia, but the bread tax is equally valueless, in the line of reasoning taken by the hon. gentleman himself, as a protection to the producers of breadstuffs in Ontario. But the hon. gentleman says that the Americans, in sending their coal to the Canadian market, sell their coal to the Canadian consumers cheaper than to their own consumers. I have here a letter from the agent of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railway Company, in which he says :

"When prices are fixed for Canada, no reference whatever is made to your duty, nor is it talked about or thought about."

So the American coal dealers, in sending their coal into Canada, neither think nor talk about this wonderful coal duty of which the hon. gentleman has made so much—or, I should say, so little. Then the hon. gentleman said that the duty does not increase the price of coal. Hear what the Treasurer of Ontario said upon this question a few days ago in his Budget Speech :

"It is well known to this House that the Province of Ontario requires a large quantity of coal for her public buildings such as the Parliament buildings and the various charitable institutions of the Province. The average price paid for soft coal by the Government of Ontario in 1874 to 1879 was $4.25 per ton; in 1880 and 1881 the average paid was $5.09 per ton, or an increase on soft coal of 84 cents per ton.

Now, I do not say that the duty on coal has increased the price 84 cents a ton; but there is the fact that the Province of Ontario, who purchases large quantities of coal, and generally by contract and getting it at bottom prices, is paying from 84 cents per ton more for their soft coal than in 1874 or subsequent years. For hard coal the price paid from 1874 to 1879 was $5.12 per ton; in 1880 and 1881, the price paid was $5.81 per ton, or an increase of 69 cents per ton. There we have again the fact that both for hard and soft coal Ontario is paying to-day a higher price than before the duty was imposed; and the taxpayers of that Province, as distinct from the taxpayers of the Dominion of Canada, are burdened with that additional expense. So much for the remarks of the hon. Minister of Railways. I wish now to call attention to two or three remarkable statements made by the hon. the Minister of Finance. The first statement to which I wish to call your attention, is the pride with which the hon. gentleman introduced his Budget, the gush in which he indulged over the prosperity of the country. How it warmed his patriotic heart. He looked all over Canada from the Pacific slopes to Prince Edward Island, and he saw prosperity throughout all our borders. All our homes were happy. Happy, why? Because Providence had smiled upon us? No; but because the Minister of Finance had smiled upon us, because of the National Policy which he, with the assistance of five or six others, had incubated a few years ago, was introduced. All this happiness arose from the National Policy. Sir, I had the honor to sit in this House in 1873; we had the same gentleman for Minister of Finance but we had no National Policy then—it was not heard of then—and yet the same Minister of Finance indulged in precisely the same sort of gush, only, if anything, a little more gushing. Let me read what he said then :

"Looking at the history of the country during the last five years with reference to its trade and commerce, its navigation, its banking institutions, its tonnage and exports and imports, I find that every aspect from which I view it I rise from the enquiry feeling the greatest possible encouragement, not only with reference to the past but with reference to the future."

Then we had no National Policy, the duties were 15 per cent. "But we had the same Minister of Finance," I imagine I hear him say. He goes on :

"First, let me draw your attention to the marvelous and wonderful increase in the capital invested in the banking institutions of the country during that period; and next, to the extraordinary increase in the deposits in the banks of the Dominion."

Are not those the same sentiments that rang so eloquently through this House a few hours ago?

"Nothing could show more satisfactorily the increase in the wealth of our people than the facts to which I am about to direct attention. Let me first refer to the paid-up capital of the banks for 1867, and, as I do not desire to weary the House, I will not give the figures for the intermediate period. The paid-up capital of the bank in February, 1867, was $28,692,980; and at the same period in 1873, it was $49,189,969;

the deposits in 1867 were $26,103,004; and, in 1873, $59,560,003, thus showing a net increase in the ordinary banks of the country, including savings banks, of nearly $37,000,000 within the space of five years; and an increase of paid up capital of the Banks of Ontario and Quebec alone (the banks in the other Provinces not being included as they have not sent in their returns) of $20,497,000."

The same gush, the same basis for gush, the same prosperity without the National Policy, with a Tariff of 15 per cent., brought about by natural causes. Why was not the hon. gentleman candid enough to tell the House that the causes of the country's prosperity and the abundance within our borders was the same in 1881 and 1882 as it was in 1873, viz., the productiveness of our farms and the products of our forests and our fields which we were able to send to foreign markets? There is another remarkable statement which the hon. gentleman did not make, and that is, he made no allusion to the balance of trade. Last year this was the principle stock in trade of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman boasted that by means of the National Policy he had brought about the balance of trade. Who killed Cock Robin? was about the language of the hon. gentleman last year, in the matter of the balance of trade; but we are not asked this year, who killed Cock Robin. This year he is not dead. We have a different state of affairs altogether. Not only did the hon. gentleman boast, in this House, of bringing about an equilibrium between the exports and imports last year, but he boasted of it in the country. When surrounded by his friends and enthusiastic admirers—and I don't wonder that they admire him, because he is exceedingly ingenious—at the great Conservative Convention in Toronto, in November, he stated, amid the cheers and applause of his associates :

"For the last few years we had imports averaging $20,000,000 a year, over and above exports. During the last two years we have nearly equalized our exports with our imports. Whatever people may say our people cannot understand the theory that the larger the excess of our imports over our exports, the more prosperous is the country. We say that as with the individual so with the nation, that if he expends more than he receives, poverty stares him in the face."

Now, "our people" cannot understand it, and I do not think the hon. Minister of Finance understands it. I do not know that I understand it myself, I frankly confess. The hon. gentleman, however, seems to agree with both sides, because he sometimes speaks on both sides. "With the individual so with the nation, that if he expends more than he receives, poverty stares him in the face." This is the outlook. We spent eight millions more than we received last year, and therefore, to use the hon. gentleman's words, "poverty stares us in the face." "I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word." But that is not the only time when the hon. gentleman expressed views on this question of the balance of trade different from those he holds now. His views change according to circumstances. He had views on this question in 1873. I have his Budget Speech here, and this is an exceedingly valuable and interesting deliverance, from which I will read a word or two :

"Let us for a moment look back to the history of the past five or six years and it will be found that during the first five years of Confederation there appears to have been an excess of imports over and above exports of $60,000,000, or $12,000,000 a year. I know it is very natural for persons looking at this subject cursorily to suppose that this cannot but lead to financial embarrassment, but let us examine into the matter. Here we have something like $12,000,000 a year excess of imports over exports. Add to that the debt of the Dominion, payable in London, $4,000,000 more, and we have $16,000,000 a year to be provided for, which our exports do not appear to cover. But if we look into the matter more carefully we will arrive at the conclusion, and the just conclusion, that there are no good grounds for apprehension."

That was the condition of the hon. gentleman's mind in 1873 when, as he says himself, he examined into the thing very carefully, when he examined it not cursorily; and he found there was no ground for apprehension, although he found a balance of $12,000,000 against us. So we have here a distinct contradiction between the hon.

gentleman's views in 1873 and his views at the present moment. We heard nothing about the balance of trade this year, probably because the hon. gentleman examined the matter more carefully, and no doubt by this time he has come to the conclusion that the balance of trade is not of such serious consequence after all. But not only was the hon. gentleman alarmed about the balance of trade in 1878, but a colleague of his, a Senator, was also alarmed, and he told the people of Ontario, in the course of his perambulations through the country—for these hon. gentlemen moved about a good deal—that the balance of trade was a very serious thing. He said, in speaking of this matter in the county of Bruce:

"Under present circumstances, our importations are so large that all we produce and export is insufficient to pay for them, and for the interest on the Public Debt of the Dominion, and on other indebtedness—loans, provincial, municipal, and individual. The amount of obligations for which the country has to provide is greater than its value in products are sufficient in value to meet. The consequence is, we are going heavier into debt every year. The balance of trade against us—that is, the value of our imports over the value of our exports—for the ten years between 1868 and 1877 amounted to the enormous aggregate sum of $236,000,000. Now, gentlemen, it is surprising that the country is not more depressed than it is to day under these circumstances. * * * * * The day of settlement has to come; it is inevitable. The individual indebtedness is largely extinguished through the Insolvency Courts, and a deplorable way it is of extinguishing debts. We know to what an extent it has been the case in the country of late years, and that a system of honeycombing is still going on."

These were the views of the present Acting Minister of the Interior, who was alarmed that the balance of trade was against us. I want to ask the hon. gentleman if there is anything serious in this balance of trade after all. I will not discuss this question, but it is well known that the balance of trade, in favor of the United States, last year, was large—greater than for many years back—that it exceeded, by $90,000,000, the average for the last six years; consequently, I see no cause of apprehension on this score. We know, further, that the balance of trade has been largely against Great Britain for many years, and yet, notwithstanding this fact, Great Britain has been exceedingly prosperous. There was another statement made by the hon. gentleman which I must not overlook, and that is, that all the predictions which we made in regard to the National Policy had failed. That statement is frequently made; I have heard it before in this House; and I intend to examine it somewhat minutely, and see how much truth it contains. Now, what was our position in connection with the trade question in 1878? We admitted, in the first place, that there was a great depression; it was present to the minds of every one of us. But we knew that that depression prevailed not only in Canada under the 15 per cent. Tariff, but in the United States under a 45 per cent. Tariff; and that it also prevailed in England, in Germany, and in France; and our contention was that that depression would pass away as a matter of course. We held that it could not be on account of the low Tariff, because it prevailed under both high and low Tariffs; and we pointed out that the failures which we so much deplored in 1876, 1877, 1878, and 1879 were not among manufacturers mainly, but among traders. We pointed out, for instance, that in 1878 there were 112 failures among manufacturers, and 745 among traders; that the aggregate liabilities of the manufacturers who failed amounted to $1,428,000; and the aggregate liabilities of the traders who failed amounted to $14,737,000; so that the depression which prevailed in the country at the time did not press so heavily on the manufacturers as it did on the traders and other classes in the community. We pointed out further that under a 15 per cent. Tariff the manufacturers had been exceedingly prosperous. We had been able to quote the Minister of Finance that the country was prosperous in 1873, when a 15 per cent. Tariff prevailed, and we contended that in the natural order of things, when depression departed from other countries, it would pass away from Canada likewise.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

Sir, were we deceived in that prediction? Has not the depression passed away in the United States, and yet the Tariff has not been changed one farthing? Has it not passed away in England and France, and yet no changes were made in the Tariffs of those countries? Depression or prosperity, as hon. gentlemen would admit if they had the candor, does not depend on Tariffs, but on causes entirely beyond the control of Ministers or Parliaments. We predicted further in 1878, that protection would damage the manufacturers themselves in the long run; and I am prepared to show that the Tariff which hon. gentlemen opposite introduced in 1879 is damaging the manufacturers. Our contention was first, that that Tariff would produce over-competition; and we will see if it does not in a short time. The indications are pretty clear that in the matter of cottons there will be over-competition. We contended that the home market would be over-crowded, because industries would be unduly stimulated as they were in the United States, and would overload the home market, and naturally bring about depression. We contended also that the protective Tariff would create monopolies. We shall soon see whether that is the case or not. It has been and is the case in the United States in very many instances, and the effect of this Tariff in Canada will also be in some instances to create monopolies, as well as to centralize wealth. But our great contention was that by a protective Tariff you would make production dear, and thus disable the manufacturers from competing in the markets of the world. Now, Sir, we have the most striking proof of the fulfilment of this prediction in the Trade and Navigation Returns which have been brought down by the Minister of Customs. What are the facts? In 1878 the exports of manufactured goods amounted to $4,127,000, and in 1881 to $3,075,000 a reduction of 25 per cent. in the exports of our manufactured goods in three years. To what is that owing? Hon. gentlemen will say that it is owing to the fact that the demand at home is so great that manufacturers have no time to export. But we find that this is a law of a protective Tariff—that in every instance in which the protective Tariff is introduced, its tendency is to diminish the amount of exports in the line of manufactured goods; and this is particularly striking in our case when we notice the form which this reduction has taken. For instance, in 1878 we exported to the markets of the world—that is, other markets than those of Great Britain or the United States—$990,000, while last year we exported to the markets of the world, $552,000, a reduction of 60 per cent.; and it is to be noticed that during the same time the value of the manufactured goods exported to Great Britain was reduced by $1,000,000. Why was it that in 1881 we could not export as much manufactured goods to Great Britain as we could in 1878? Why, simply because the manufacturer of Great Britain was not handicapped by excessive duties on his raw material, while the manufacturer of Canada was. And this is true, as I have said, in every instance where a protective Tariff has been introduced. Take the United States, for example. In 1871, 77 per cent. only of the exports of the United States were agricultural produce, while, in 1881, 82½ per cent. were agricultural produce; that is to say, in 1871, before the manufacturers of the United States began to feel the full effect of a protective Tariff, they were able to export 23 per cent. of their total exports to the markets of the world, while, in 1881, under this fostering protection which was introduced in 1860, they were able to export only 18½ per cent. of their entire exports in the shape of manufactured goods.

Mr. PLUMB. I suppose they used them at home.

Mr. ROSS. And if you compare the effect of a protective Tariff in the United States with the effect of a revenue Tariff in England on the production of manufactured goods, what will you find? Let me state a fact or two, for the amusement, if not for the instruction of the hon. member for Niagara. In 1880, the United States exported $9,418,000 worth of manufactured cotton goods, although they produced the raw cotton within their own domain, and within a few hundred miles of the factories of Massachusetts; while England, although it had to import the raw cotton from India and the United States, was able to export $337,000,000 worth. In the face of that fact I ask, which is the more advantageous, a revenue or a protective Tariff?

Mr. PLUMB. I refer you to the hon. member for North Norfolk.

Mr. ROSS. The hon. member for North Norfolk can take care of himself as well as the hon. member for Niagara, and I will have great pleasure in handing the hon. member for Niagara over to the tender mercies of the hon. member for North Norfolk. Now, take the matter of woollen goods. Surely the facilities for the manufacture of woollen goods in the United States are equal to those in Great Britain. The entire export of woollen goods from the United States in 1880 amounted to $216,573, while from England, under a revenue Tariff, which hon. gentlemen opposite denounce as unfair and unreasonable, there were exported $86,300,000 worth of manufactured woollen goods. I might go over the whole list of manufactured goods and find the same result. Take copper goods: there were $180,000 exported from the United States, $6,200,000 from England; earthenware, $82,000, from the United States, $9,900,000, from England; glass, $730,000, from the United States, with a very large protection, and from England, $4,600,000. Pig-iron, with all facilities for mining, and the advantage of coal being near iron mines, the Americans were able to export only $65,000, whereas England exported $26,000,000. Take bar-iron, $25,000 from the United States; $11,500,000, from England. Railroad iron, with a protection of 128 per cent. was exported by the Americans, to the value of $643,000, and by England to $25,900,000. Of refined sugar, the United States exported $1,700,000 worth, and England, $5,600,000 worth. And the force of this argument will be still more apparent when it is remembered that a large supply of the imports of the United States, came from Great Britain. It was said that Canada, under a protective Tariff, would be able to manufacture goods more cheaply than similar goods can be manufactured under a revenue Tariff. But what is the evidence of the United States on that point? Last year the Americans imported, notwithstanding their protective Tariff of 38 per cent., $25,723,000 worth of cotton goods, and of that quantity $16,552,000 was from Great Britain. There we have the fact again that, notwithstanding the advantage which this so-called protection is capable of providing—notwithstanding, it is said, it will reduce the cost of production and cheaper goods to the consumer, England, under a revenue Tariff, was able to send over $16,000,000 worth of manufactured cottons, into the markets of the United States, being $6,000,000 more than the United States were able to export to all the markets of the world. The same is true of woollen goods. The United States last year imported $37,250,000, of which $19,338,000 were from English manufacturers. In the same way, out of the total imports of $47,000,000 last year of manufactured iron and steel, $40,000,000 were the product of English manufacture. If protection could do anything for an industry surely it could do something for the iron industry, when the protective Tariff ranges as high as 41 per cent. In the matter of leather manufactures, earthenware, glass, carpet and silk, the same holds good, although those various industries are protected, some of them as high as 59 per cent. Let me take the imports from Great Britain of two or three particular articles. From England the United States imported $5,906,000 worth of cloths and cassimeres, and the Americans exported to England not a single dollar's worth, although this industry is protected by about 58 per cent. In shawls, protected by 53 per cent., the imports from Great Britain last year amount to $704,000, and not one dollar's worth was exported to England. Take dress goods: these were imported from England to the amount of $8,719,000 worth, and yet the Americans were not able, with a protection of 58 per cent., to send a single yard of American dress goods into the English markets. Take carpets, with a very large protection, I suppose equal to that on other woollen manufactures, equal to 58 per cent.: they imported $1,414,000 worth and yet the Americans were not able to send one dollar's worth of carpet into the English market. The same is true of iron goods. Take steel rails, with a protection, as I have said, of 128 per cent. The United States imported last year $1,576,000 worth and $2,223,000 of iron rails, and yet with that protection they were unable to send a dollar's worth of steel or iron rails into the markets of England. The quantity that was exported by the United States was sent to Brazil and other markets. Of cutlery, on which the protection is equal to 45 or 50 per cent., they imported from England $1,076,000 worth, and were able to send to England the paltry quantity equal in value to $1,286. These facts prove conclusively that the policy of the Opposition, a revenue Tariff policy for this country, is the true one. The evidence is strong, taking Great Britain as an illustration, that under that Tariff alone can manufacturers compete in the markets of the world. Why, the Americans boast of the rapid development of their country—boast especially of the vast development of their various industries; but in spite of the protection imposed on these industries in order to protect them, they are unable to compete in their own markets, or in the markets of the world, with what they call the pauper-labor of England, under a revenue Tariff. We also predicted that under a system of protection it would be impossible to distribute the burden of taxation fairly. The hon. Finance Minister, with the assistance of five or six others, incubated a Tariff which was submitted to the House, and announced it as a measure which would distribute the burden of taxation fairly. It was on the Statute-book one year, and was hailed by his friends as the most wonderful Tariff ever framed. It was in many respects wonderfully and fearfully made. But it did not remain in that form. Next year eighty-four alterations were made in the Tariff, and then it was a thing of rare beauty. Next year fifty or sixty alterations were made, and, I think, when this year's Budget was brought down there were something like 109 more alterations more; it being still more wonderfully and fearfully made. But does it yet distribute the burden of taxation fairly? I hold that it does not. I hold it is impossible for the wisdom of man to design a protective Tariff that will distribute the burden of taxation fairly. It cannot be done in the very nature of things; it is impossible. Why? Who were the men who assisted to frame that Tariff. Was it the consumers? No; but the producers. And while I do not charge one of them with selfishness, but yet being producers, they laid their claim before the hon. Minister of Finance, who, with his usual suavity, considered them. But were the consumers called into court? Not one; their case was never placed before the Finance Minister. We find in the Public Accounts an item of $400 or $500 to one Mr. Dunstan for advising the Minister of Finance as to the duties to be placed on sugar. But out of the 4,000,000 people in Canada who consume sugar, was there a single instance in which one of them was consulted as to how he should like the imposition of such a Tariff as would suit Mr. Dunstan. We know, from the history of the protective Tariff in the United States, that the burdens of taxation under their Tariff do not fall equally on the consumer. In the matter of wages alone, we find that since the protective Tariff in the United States, they have only increased 60 per cent., though the cost of living has increased 92 per cent., being a difference of 32 per cent. against the laboring man on that item alone. If the burdens of taxation under our Tariff fell evenly and fairly on all the consumers, why this clamor from all parts of the country for increased salaries? Why is there such a vigorous appeal made to this House by our Civil Service for a bonus? Why did the Civil Service of Toronto memorialize the Government for increased salaries? Why did the Bishop of Niagara issue a pastoral letter to his Diocese advising an additional remuneration to his clergymen? If the hon. member for Niagara, were the Bishop of that Diocese, I have no doubt that he, in the kindness and generosity of his heart, would issue a similar pastoral letter. The ground on which the Bishop's letter is based is that the cost of living has materially increased. Thus we have an illustration from the very district in which the hon. member for Niagara resides, of the uneven distribution of the burdens under this Tariff. We predicted, as one of the incidents of this Tariff, that the burden of taxation would fall unequally on the farmers, who are one of the great consuming classes of this country. We said that it was impossible to protect the farmer, that any Tariff framed for his protection would fail in that object. Let us see if that proposition is not fully borne out. The answer made to it is that the National Policy will give the farmer a home market. Even if it did, I doubt if that would be a quid pro quo—to use the language of a friend of the hon. Minister of Public Works—for the burdens which it imposes. To give the farmer a home market, would necessitate a large increase in our population. If you look into the Trade and Navigation Returns, you will observe that the farmer had a home market in 1878, or, shall I say, a certain portion of it as he has in 1881. But for a surplus, the farmer in 1878 had to look to the foreign market for the consumption of his products. Well, the exports of agricultural produce, animals and their products have increased between 1878 and 1881, 52 per cent; that is to say, we had to find a foreign market in 1878 for $14,019,857 worth of animals and the products, and, in 1881, for $21,340,290. In 1878, we had to find a market for $18,605,754 of agricultural products, and in 1881, for $21,268,327. In that time, making all allowances for the increase of population, one would suppose that the National Policy, if it was going to produce its promised effects, would have given the farmer a home market in 1881. But what are the facts. Our population increased 5 per cent. during that time, yet the surplus we had to send to the foreign market increased 68½ per cent.; so that now we are sending 6½ per cent. more of our produce to the foreign market than we sent in 1878. Where, then, is the home market that was promised by hon. gentlemen in 1878. The hon. Finance Minister boasted the other night that he had added 24,000 operatives to our population. Did he say that he added them as immigrants or accessions from foreign countries? Had he done so he would have added something to the consuming capacity of our people. But they were not so added. I do not know that 10 per cent. of them were so added, so that, practically, we have had very little more added to the consuming population of this country in 1881, than the natural increase of the population would give, and the home market, therefore, supplied us, is practically valueless as a means for consuming our surplus produce. And supposing these 24,000 operatives had been imported—I do not use the term offensively—for the working of our manufactures, would they consume the surplus products of our farmers? Just fancy 24,000 individuals in addition to our population of 4,000,000 consuming the products of all the agricultural industries of this country. Here we have a magnificent illustration of what the farmer has received by the home market which was promised him. He has received the additional consumption of 24,000 individuals. But if you look into this matter in detail you will find this argument yet stronger. In 1878, we had to find a foreign market for 14,000 horses, in 1881, for 21,000 horses. In 1878, we had to find a foreign market for 29,000 horned cattle; in 1881, for 62,000. Where are the operatives that were to swarm through this land and consume the farmer's productions? In 1878, we had to find a foreign market for 242,000 sheep; in 1881, 354,000. Where are the mutton-eating consumers that were to be introduced into the country to consume the farmer's mutton, beef, and other produce? We were told that the farmer would certainly get a market for his smaller produce. I think the hon. member for East York referred to the farmer going to market with a chicken and getting ready money for it now—something he could not do in 1878? Where was my hon. friend in 1878? Were there no chickens where he resided at that time? We have given him a new revelation which he thought worthy of recording on the floor of this House, namely, that through the National Policy a farmer, in 1882, can go to a Canadian market and find a ready sale for a Canadian chicken. Such is the full fruition of this National Policy of which the hon. member boasted so largely this afternoon. In 1878 we had to find a market for $67,000 worth of poultry, and, in 1881, for $133,000 worth of poultry—twice as much sold abroad, notwithstanding these operatives were coming to eat up all the chickens, not of the hon. member for East York, for he no doubt can do that himself—but the chickens of the Canadian farmers.

Mr. PLUMB. Is that "cackillation" right?

Mr. ROSS. I leave the hon. member to do the "cackillation," as I pursue this enquiry a little further. In 1878, where the people had to find a foreign market for $13,000,000 of Canadian butter; in 1881, they had to find one for $17,000,000. In 1878, a foreign market had to be found for 5,262,000 dozen of Canadian eggs; in 1881, for 9,000,000 dozen. I invite attention to these facts in order to show that the home market, that was to be supplied the Canadian farmers by the National Policy is a failure. Let us consider the question as to agricultural products. In 1878, we had to find a foreign market for 7,000,000 bushels of barley; in 1881, for 8,800,000 bushels. In 1878, a foreign market for 2,340,000 bushels of oats; in 1881, for 2,900,000. The same difference may be noticed in the item of peas, and almost the same with flour and in nearly all the other agricultural products of the farm. So that, in the matter of animals and agricultural products, and these, too, cover the produce of our Canadian farms, we find the National Policy has been so far a failure; that it has not supplied the Canadian farmer with a home market, but that now, as before, the Canadian farmer has to go into the markets of the world to sell his produce. We were also told that the National Policy would give the farmer a better price for his produce—that he would be able to sell it at an advance. The Minister of Finance, in 1881, I think, said that after investigating that matter very closely he could not see that the Canadian farmer got much of an advance for his wheat at certain periods of the year; but he believed, however, that in June and July it was very probable he would receive a small advance, but that when he had a surplus he did not believe the Canadian farmer got any advance. Last year we had a surplus to export of nearly 3,000,000 bushels, so that then he got no advance. In 1881, we had a surplus also, and exported 2,500,000 bushels. So that, in 1881, inasmuch as we had a surplus, on the reasoning and showing of the hon. Minister of Finance, the farmer could not have received any advance. Perhaps, however, there is something in the idea that the farmer would receive an advance in June and July, and for the reason that the Canadian farmers are nearly sold out during those months; and that if the millers of Canada had easy access to the American market, they could import grain without any difficulty, and pay such prices as the pleased in the home market. But if, as was done by hon. gentlemen opposite—if obstacles were placed in the way of the Canadian millers importing grain, this would account for the advance during June and July. Let us take the average price of wheat during June and July for a number of years—the middle period, the 30th of June, the point between the two extremes for 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, during the five years of the late Administration—and strike an average and compare that with the average price during the three years of the present Administration. I take figures from the Monetary Times. Take No. 1 fall wheat: f.o.b.c., average price paid during the five years of the late Administration, was $1.25 per bushel; during the last three years, $1.13. No. 1 spring wheat, during the previous period, $1.15; last three years, $1.13, showing a decline. Barley, 72½ cents during the late Administration, 70 cents last three years; oats, 41 cents the five years, 37½ cents for three years; peas, 76 cents the five years, 71 cents for three years; wool, 30 cents the five years, 24 cents for three years. And this was an industry under the particular care of hon. gentlemen opposite. Butter, five years, 16½ cents; three years, 14 cents. Cheese, five years, 11½ cents; three years, 9½ cents. Now, as I have said before, these were the months of the hon. Finance Minister's own choosing. I have appealed to the record, and the evidence is against him. I do not know that it makes any difference whether it is against or in his favor. I do not believe it is sound reasoning to assume that the Tariff affects the price of Canadian wheat, because its price is regulated by the prices in Liverpool; but it shows the utter absurdity of his line of reasoning. Let me take the 1st of October during the same period, and show you the results. During October everybody knows that no American grain comes into Canadian markets. It would be absurd to suppose such a thing, as our granaries are full of Canadian grain, and our millers can get all they want at their doors. Yet, strange to say, the average price paid in October, when foreign grain cannot come here, was greater during the last three than during the previous five years. That establishes the point, if anything were necessary for that purpose, that the Tariff does not affect the price of grain, for at the very time it could affect it we found it was higher on an average during the five years when we were without a protective Tariff; and at the time it should affect the price grain was not higher, but was higher in autumn. Let me next refer to the price of grain in the American market, my few quotations being taken from the report of the Secretary of the Bureau of Statistics, Washington. In 1856, wheat sold in the American market, on an average during the whole year, at $1.85 per bushel—that was at a time when there was no duty on imported wheat; and let it be said that that was the highest price paid for wheat from that year down to the present time, except in two instances, 1865 and 1868. Corn was sold in 1855 for 89 cents a bushel, and only five times since that year was it sold higher. In 1879, corn sold, notwithstanding the high duty on imported corn, at 47 cents. Beef sold in 1856 for 8½ cents per pound, and this price was only exceeded six times since; in 1880, it was sold as low as 6¼ cents, the same with butter and the same with pork. In 1856 pork was sold for $9.70 per hundred, in 1874 it was as low as $5.70, thus showing that tariffs do not regulate the price of produce, which is alone regulated by the price in the markets of the world. I think I have shown that the home market promised the farmer has been a failure, that the farmer has to send his products to the English market now as before. I think I have also proved that the price promised the Canadian farmer for his produce has not been realized, and that in every particular the farmer has to content himself with the results of competition in the markets of the world, or, rather, with the results which follow from the lowness of supply and demand, and that the Tariff will give him an increased price or improve the extent of his productiveness. We said again, in 1878, that even if the farmer got the protection promised him it would be no equivalent for the burdens which it would impose upon him. Let me put this in a nutshell, if I can. You will see that, last year, we collected in Customs duties altogether $18,500,000, and that $123,000 were collected on farm produce. Now, it is the law of trade—shall I say, a law of political economy, that, as a rule, duties imposed on any article add that much to the cost of the article to the consumer. Assuming that proposition to be correct, the manufacturers of Canada have profited to the extent of $18,000,000; for duties to that extent were levied on manufactured goods, while the farmers of Canada have only profited to the extent of the duties on bread-stuffs $123,000. That is the reward they have received for supporting the National Policy, and, on the other hand, they have paid for manufactured goods some $18,000,000 on the enhanced price, because the duty must be added, notwithstanding the logic of the hon. Minister of Railways, in the matter of coal, to the price of the imported article. The manufacturers, then, are protected to the extent of $18,000,000 in the goods which they sell, and the farmers are protected by less than $500,000; that is, for every dollar which the farmer receives in the form of protection he gives $37 protection to others.

Mr. ROCHESTER. Would the hon. gentleman give us the average price of rye during the late Administration?

Mr. ROSS. I have not taken the quotations of rye.

Mr. PLUMB. He makes a wry face at that.

Mr. ROSS. The hon. gentlemen can discuss that question with rye himself. Our next prediction was—for I am following the predictions to which the hon. Minister of Finance refers—that any special advantage given to the producer would be a tax upon the consumer. Now, it is quite clear that the consumers, in every instance, have to maintain the burden of taxation. While that can be done under a revenue Tariff, and still justice be done to all, the proposition we put forth is that any special advantage—and that is the basis of a protective Tariff—given to the producer, is an undue burden to the consumer. I will give a fact or two in confirmation of that: in 1878, we imported \$7,000,000 worth of cotton, and paid \$1,250,000 in duties on those cottons; in 1881, we imported \$10,000,000 of cotton, and paid in duties, \$2,225,000 on these importations; that is to say, the consumers of cotton goods in Canada last year paid \$500,000 more for their cottons, than they paid under the Tariff of 1878. In the matter of books, we imported the same quantity in 1881, that we imported in 1878, and we paid \$67,000 additional duty. Is that no burden upon the consumer? In the matter of woollens we paid \$832,324 more of duties upon woollens we consumed in 1881, than we would have paid on the same woollens imported under the Tariff of 1878. This becomes still more conspicuous when you observe the rate of this duty. In the matter of blankets, the duty last year was 45 per cent., or an average of \$1.34 on every blanket imported into the Dominion of Canada. In the matter of flannels, the duty averaged 29 per cent.; hosiery, 27 per cent.; clothing, 35 per cent.; Brussels carpets, the average duty was 11 cents per yard; on carpets all wool, of a different grade altogether, the average duty was 22 cents per yard; in carpets partly wool, the average duty was 14 cents per yard; on unbleached cotton sheetings the average duty was 2½ cents per yard; ginghams and plaids, 3½ cents; denhams, drillings and ducks, 4 cents per yard. Now, who pays these increased duties? Evidently, the consumer. The whole tendency of this taxation, unfairly distributed as it is, is to impose unfair burdens on the consumer, and give special advantages to the producer. Now, we are willing to see, as we always have been, a large production of manufactured goods in this country, but we know that under a 15 per cent. Tariff, manufacturers prospered, and many of them made their fortunes. Not a word need be said to disparage the manufacturing industries of this country. They are exceedingly important, as hon. gentlemen know right well. But we have two classes to consider, and while we consider what is fair to the manufacturer—we urge that we do consider what is fair to the manufacturer—we want at the same time to distribute the burdens of taxation fairly and honestly among the great consuming class. Another prediction we made in regard to this Tariff was, that it would discriminate unfairly against Great Britain; and I hold that prediction is fulfilled. Let us see. The average duties last year paid upon goods imported from Great Britain, was $24\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; the average duties imposed on goods imported from the United States, was $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Does not that discriminate against Great Britain? Is there not an increased duty of 2 per cent., on the average, on the goods imported from Great Britain as compared with goods from the United States?

Mr. BOWELL. Tell the House the excessive imports from Great Britain over those from the United States.

Mr. ROSS. I will leave the hon. gentleman to tell that. The average duty on dutiable or free goods from Great Britain was $20\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I have got here the fact the hon. gentleman wants. I call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Customs to this fact, that the average duty paid on all the goods, dutiable and free, imported from Great Britain last year, was $20\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and the average duty on dutiable and free goods imported from the United States, was $15\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; so that we have the same discrimination on goods imported from Great Britain, whether dutiable or whether dutiable and free.

Mr. BOWELL. If you import double the quantity from Great Britain that you do from the United States, of course the duty would increase, would it not?

Mr. ROSS. I made a statement; the hon. gentleman may correct it if it is wrong. The hon. gentleman can understand the difference between 20 per cent. upon dutiable and upon free goods from England and 15 per cent. upon dutiable and free goods from the United States, and if he cannot understand that it is a discrimination, then I cannot help it. I am simply making a statement, believing it to be correct. It remains for the hon. gentleman to disprove it when the proper time comes. We contend further, that the manufacturers under this protective Tariff are not as well off as under the Tariff of 1878. We proved that in the matter of their ability to export manufactured goods, and we can prove it more clearly in another form. Take this statement, and let the Minister of Customs notice its bearing. In 1878 we gave the manufacturers of Canada, $31,000,000 worth of imported goods—principally raw materials; and we took from the manufacturers of Canada, the home market for $53,000,000 worth of manufactured goods.

Mr. PLUMB. What were the said materials?

Mr. ROSS. I do not know whether they came from Niagara or not; but I state the fact, and I will repeat it for the benefit of the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). I say that we gave the manufacturers the benefit of \$31,000,000 worth of raw materials free of duty; and we took from the manufacturers of Canada, the home market for \$53,000,000 worth of manufactured goods. Now, what do these hon. gentlemen do? They gave to the manufacturers of Canada, in 1881, \$19,000,000 worth of said material, duty free—or, \$12,000,000 less than we gave them in 1878. And so, under their protective Tariff, they have taken from the Canadian farmers, the home market to the extent of \$63,000,000 worth of manufactured goods. So that both in the question of raw material furnished the manufacturer, and in the relief of his home market, they would be better under the Tariff of 1878 than the Tariff of 1881. Besides, under this Tariff you burden the manufacturer with \$641,000 in the shape of duties on his coal, which is a raw material to him. You burdened him with \$420,000 on breadstuffs last year; with \$87,000 on pig iron; with \$12,000 on the copper which he uses as a raw material; with \$14,000 on lead as a raw material, and you tax his unmanufactured marble, his paints, oils and varnishes—all his raw materials—while, at the same time, you have taken the home market to a greater extent. Why, Sir, the quantity of manufactured goods sold on the Canadian market to-day is greater by about \$12,000,000 than it was in 1878, so that the manufacturer has to pay more duty on his raw material, he is furnished with a less quantity, and he has more importations of manufactured goods to compete against. If that is not a disadvantage to the manufacturer, let the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) rise and explain. True, we can put a duty on the manufactured articles; true, we can impose difficulties in the way of their introduction into the country, but we have shown that, in the matter of promoting the introduction of raw material in order to facilitate the operations of the manufacturer, we have been much more liberal than hon. gentlemen opposite. Again, we predicted that the National Policy would damage our foreign trade, and our predictions in that regard have been realized. It is a fact, which hon. gentlemen cannot deny, that Canadian shipping is vanishing from our seas. Take the returns for 1878, and compare them with those for 1881. In 1878, we sold to other countries, ninety-three ships; in 1881, we sold only sixty-one. In 1878, we sold \$1,218,000 worth of ships built by Canadians; but in 1881, we sold only \$348,000 worth of Canadian-built ships; so that this industry is languishing. We were told, before the National Policy was introduced, that all the industries of Canada were languishing, but we have here an instance of hon. gentlemen trying to protect an industry, and the result has been to throw it into a decline. I think that under such a condition of things we must displace our Finance Minister, and that the hon. and able member for Niagara must put his hands to the helm and see if he cannot resuscitate this drooping industry. From 1873 down to 1878 the tonnage of Canadian vessels represented an increase every year—an increase in six years of 11 per cent., or 636 vessels and 259,297 tons. How has it been since? Every year a decline—a decline in three years of $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or 22,193 tons. This is an industry to which the hon. gentleman should devote his attention—an industry which requires his fostering care. In the United States protection has had the same results. We find that last year 82 per cent. of the whole foreign trade of the United States was carried on by foreign shipping, and only 18 per cent. in American ships. If protection could foster the commerce of that country, it has certainly had an opportunity, and as certainly has it failed. We warned hon. gentlemen opposite that by the introduction of this policy they would damage the commercial interests of the country. We warned them that if they interfered with our shipping they would interfere with our commercial and industrial prosperity. What can this country become unless we develop our commerce? We occupy a strong position on this continent, and it is only by fostering our foreign trade and improving the condition of our commercial marine that we can hope to take our true position amongst the nations of the world. We predicted also that the National Policy would not tend to the increase of our wealth, and I wish here to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to a fact which is worthy of their careful consideration. It is contained in the last report of the Bureau of Statistics at Washington. Between 1850 and 1860—that is, before the protective Tariff was adopted in the United States—the wealth of the United States increased 126 per cent., while between 1860 and 1880 the aggregate wealth of the United States increased only 31 per cent. From 1850 to 1860 the American people added \$226 to the wealth of each person, while from 1870 down to 1880 they lost 30 cents per head taking into consideration the increase of population. The United States furnish us with the best example of what a protective Tariff can or cannot do. Their example was a warning to us in the matter of shipping. It showed us that the shipping of the United States declined very rapidly under a protective Tariff, that every year it was reduced until now they do but a small portion of their own trading and carry on but a small portion of their own commerce. In Great Britain, on the other hand, under a revenue Tariff the commerce has been constantly increasing, year by year, until, as Gladstone said the other day at Leeds, England to day does 55 per cent. of the whole trade of the world, civilized and uncivilized. Surely, Sir, we have in this fact itself conclusive evidence of the comparative merits of the two policies. Now, Sir, what are the comparative positions of the two parties in this issue? We are charged with being enemies to the manufacturers of this country. Sir, we repudiate such a charge. We have evidence in the prosperity of the manufacturers under a revenue Tariff, that under a revenue Tariff prosperity is possible to our Canadian manufacturers. We have evidence under a revenue Tariff in England, that prosperity is possible without a protective Tariff. We have evidence in the rapid development of this country, and in the rapid rise of manufactories previous to 1879 that it is quite possible for this country to prosper under a very low Tariff. On the other hand, we have evidence that this Tariff is already doing its mischievous work, decreasing the capacity of our manufacturers to compete in the markets of the world, increasing the cost of production, and adding to the burdens of consumers. The Liberal party are prepared to do justice to all classes of the community. They do not pretend, like their opponents, to dispense peculiar nostrums, but on broad principles of fairness and equality they are prepared to dispense to every class of the community the justice they should receive under a fair fiscal policy, and prepared to extend to every class of the community such protection as a fair fiscal policy will enable them to extend. Hon. gentlemen opposite intend to go to the people of this country representing, as I have said, that we are hostile to the manufacturers. They will go to the country probably representing that the great prosperity which this country enjoys at the present moment is due to the National Policy. I have no fear, Sir, that these representations will be believed. I have no fears that the intelligent yeomanry of this country will be carried away by representations in regard to increased prices and increased advantages which they know they have not received through the National Policy. I believe the people of this country can look beyond the present, and can take a broad view of all the interests of the Dominion, and that they will support that party which is supposed to deal as fairly with one Province of the Dominion as another, disposed to support that party which will develop the commercial prosperity of this country, and not be carried with these partizan representations which lead men sometimes to tamper with industrial difficulties for which they are not capable of providing an efficient remedy. I am satisfied, Sir, that when this debate has closed, the country will be thoroughly informed of this matter, and that the Liberal party, true to their desire to develop the interests of Canada, as a whole, will see that the affairs of this country are entrusted to the hands of those men who never shrink from dealing fairly with all classes of the community, and standing by the interests of every Province of this great Confederation.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

Mr. McLENNAN. The saying is attributed to Mr. Canning that nothing is more delusive than facts, except figures. I think we can improve upon the maxim. Prophecies, I think, we may say, are still more delusive; and I am rather surprised at the temerity of hon. gentlemen opposite, and yet it is not new. They remind one of a story that is told of a witness who was severely tested by counsel upon entering the witness-box—a female witness. She was asked if she were not afraid to hear false witness. "Never a fear," said the old lady. The picture that has been delineated before us to-night, the utter misery of this country, is very touching, that is to say, it would be if it were true. Among the unhappy victims it is hard to tell who are most miserable, the producers or the consumers. But there is a gleam of hope for them. There is another class, a small class, fortunately for the people of Canada—the shipowners are greater sufferers than all others put together. Well, this is a gleam of hope. I do not propose to follow the hon. gentleman who has just sat down in all his massive figures, for the reason I have stated. But I would like to know, whilst all this evidence is to the fore, whether, in this difference in favor of the United States between an average of 15 per cent. duty and the duty of 20 per cent. upon goods from the United Kingdom—whether free goods and goods entered in bond that pay no duty are included; because, if they are, there is really no test, and it is one of the instances that go to prove how utterly delusive figures may be in a statement of this kind. You will remember, Sir, that the course which this debate has taken has been rather unusual. Hon. gentlemen of the Opposition were so determined that the Budget of my hon. friend, the Finance Minister, should be killed dead as a door nail, that it was attacked before its birth. My hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Paterson) made a motion the other day, for fear that this Budget should not be brought down in the course of the Session; but I am glad to see that the Minister of Finance has survived and has brought down his document—and a very good one it proves to be. Among the items which were discussed then was one upon which the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) has dwelt with a good deal of unctious, to-night, and that is the item of pig iron; and we were reminded of the difference of the exports of pig iron between one year and another. Well, it turns out that the export of Canadian pig iron amounts to the magnificent sum of $179. But there is a feature in this question of pig iron that illustrates the difficulty of dealing with figures, and that proves that now, as in former times, two and two do not always make four—for the purposes of argument, I mean. The imports of pig iron in 1881 were $716,000, and the consumption was $715,000, leaving a difference of $1,000; and yet we exported to the United States foreign pig iron to the value of $321,000, so that, if figures were always accurate, for the purposes of argument, $716,000 of imports have produced $715,000 for consumption and $321,000 for export. If anybody takes the trouble to look into the matter it is very easily explained, but these are the figures on the face of them. The value of the imports is the cost of the pig iron on which it pays duty; the value in its export is the value at the place at which it is shipped, and the whole question in regard to pig iron is merely one of carriage, a very important one to this country and to those unfortunate ships about which I may have something to say. There is really no pig iron manufactured in Canada for export. The manufacture at Londonderry has taken another form—it all goes into rolled iron—and no quantity has ever yet been manufactured for export. The small quantity of pig iron, amounting to $179, was from Three Rivers, where charcoal iron has been manufactured for a good number of years, but it is a quality of iron that cannot be exported because the duty is too high, and the competition in the United States prevents it flowing in there. As to the question of ships, the sale of Canadian ships and the use of Canadian ships have declined for a very good reason. The commerce of the sea has come to be done in iron ships chiefly, and in steamers. I find, by returns of the Harbor Commission of Montreal, giving a comparison from 1878 to 1881, that the proportion of tonnage in steamers had risen in those four years from 67 to 83 per cent., while in sailing vessels it declined from 32 to 16 per cent. And this does not represent all the difference. There is no full statement here of the number of wooden vessels, but everybody who has anything to do with shipping knows very well that wooden ships on the ocean are everywhere giving place to iron ships, and it is just as well known that we have not yet in this country reached the ability to manufacture iron ships, which is the simple reason for this decline in Canadian vessels. It is true our friends in the Eastern Provinces were told by some of the prophets who went about the country that there was yet hope of their wooden ships being again brought into use under certain circumstances. The fact is, that in this case the hopeful had to do with a matter as circumstantial as the waves of the Atlantic that, unfortunately for them, do not change. They had to deal with the change going on in the shipping trade of the world, and I am afraid it will be a very long time before our friends in the Eastern Provinces will see a change in the circumstances that will enable them to return to the building of wooden ships. I think there is more hope for them in the proposal which the hon. Finance Minister has made, of occupying their small vessels in the fishing trade. That is a field in which there is some room for them to extend, and it is one of the differences between a theory that has no base and that does not yield to circumstances, the system of hon. gentlemen opposite and the practical system of the hon. Minister of Finance. We have had a great deal of argument, and, I think, of unnecessary argument, as to what was said by Sir Henry Tyler on the subject of coal. I think this is very easily explained, and all Sir Henry Tyler said may be very fairly admitted without prejudice to any party concerned, because Sir Henry Tyler made a statement of fact connected with the consumption of his company, and the fact was this—I believe nobody disputes it—that in the half year ending June, 1880, the company had used 60,000 cords of wood, and during the half year ending June, 1881, only 48,000 cords; that the company used in the half year ending June, 1880, 109,000 tons of coal, so they had a decrease of 12,000 cords of wood and an increase of 34,000 tons of coal. And Sir Henry Tyler goes on to say:

"As wood becomes more scarce, and there are extra facilities for getting coal, we shall hope, in working our traffic, to effect further economy in this respect."

This is a question quite with the competency of Sir Henry Tyler, his argument is specific and clear that the company had economized by the use of coal. Sir Henry Tyler has not, however, contented himself with stating this fact. He has gone on to express an opinion as to the fiscal policy of Canada, and here he gets upon very different ground and debatable ground. The other statement is that the policy of Canada makes everything a poor man requires dearer for him to purchase, and in consequence of that policy he requires higher wages in order to be able to exist. And he adds:

"I cannot conceive anything more unwise in a nation like Canada, that has to import a great part of its fuel, and wishes to encourage its manufactures and to encourage its railways, than to place a duty upon the article of coal."

If we admit that Sir Henry Tyler is an authority upon finance, perhaps there is something in this statement; but I really do not know that Sir Henry Tyler proves before us an authority on finance. I think, if I were looking at the situation, I might find something else to explain the position in which Sir Henry Tyler found himself. He was endeavoring to explain to the shareholders the reason why there was so little money as the result of so much work, and he enters into an explanation involving this reference to the financial policy of Canada. I do not know what Sir Henry Tyler's information is with respect to Canada. I do not know whether his opinion is worth more than that of the hon. gentleman who repeated it in this House with so much emphasis and determination. I do not know that Sir Henry Tyler's authority is greater than that of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), in a statement made on his own authority. It is quite possible that hon. members going out of the field of the financial policy of Canada into the position in which Sir Henry Tyler found himself, might say that the reason the shareholders of the Grand Trunk had not more money for their work was because they did too much work for too little money. I think that to be a simple explanation of it, and I have heard people say that the Grand Trunk Railway is very much in the habit of carrying too much freight, and carrying it too far for too little money, to the prejudice of this country. Sir Henry Tyler had entered into, perhaps, a very foolish contest with a man named Vanderbilt, who happened to have more money and a larger clientèle than the Grand Trunk Railway, and I think the authority of members of this House on the question of railway carriage, might be just as good, perhaps a little better, as we are in the country, than that of Sir Henry Tyler on the fiscal policy of Canada. I am sorry the hon. member for South Brant is not in his place. We all think a good deal of him. He is very full of figures, and is like that "Uncle Jack" in the story of the "Caxtons," who was a very complete character. Anything in him that was not arithmetic was philanthropy, and what was not philanthropy was arithmetic. My hon. friend went with a great deal of good humor into the subject, reminding one very much of a very big boy with an apple dumpling, but he got his mouth rather too full. He set about blowing up the hon. Finance Minister, and what did he bring to the work? It is difficult to blow anything up without fire. My hon. friend had certainly one element for his work, but the spark happened to be wanting and there was no fuel to burn. The old tinder-box had got wet, the flint had been worn to pieces, and the old jack-knife, I suppose, had been rubbed until there was no more steel upon it. But he brought to the work an immense pair of bellows. Well, I believe that the Government of Canada cannot be blown up by a pair of bellows alone without the vital element. My hon. friend for Middlesex dwelt upon some questions connected with our trade in what he conceived to be the fulfilment of his role of prophet. I notice that the prophets from Vennor downwards—or, need I say, down to Vennor—usually adopt the same method of maintaining that everything that is, is as they predicted. I am very glad, for the future of this country, that we are able to see a little daylight on the situation and that things are not what they seem to him; under the circumstances it is very satisfactory to know that the hon. gentleman stuck to his predictions. My hon. friend was very eloquent on the subject of chickens. I thought he was going to tell us something about that little hen we heard of last summer. What has become of that hen? Are its eggs hatched, or are they addled? Is there no hope that they will ever bring forth a reform pullet. We have listened, so far in vain, for the flutter of its wings in the House. Is it a fact that no pullet of mortal incubation will ever bring relief? Must we wait until a Phoenix arises from the ashes of the Reform party? A great deal of argument has been used to show that there is really no relation between this country, under its present Government, and the protection of Providence. I do not know whether gentlemen opposite have ever heard of the old maxim that "Providence helps those who help themselves." We have always maintained on this side of the House, that that was the hope of the Conservative party, and when we advocated a change of policy a few years ago, we did so for the reason that we proposed to use our own judgment and experience in adapting ourselves to the circumstances in which we found ourselves. We have been accused, to-night, of changing with circumstances. That is the very thing we boast of doing. One of the first principles we have maintained is, that no law of political economy has ever been established to show how this necessary evil of taxation must be imposed, and to show that it must be imposed absolutely in one way and no other. We have always maintained that it is a question of circumstances, and we adapt ourselves to circumstances. That is just the difference between our theory and that of hon. gentlemen opposite, who are perpetually endeavoring to force an idea of law in connection with this operation of taxation. We maintain that there is no law on the subject, or, if there is, no one has ever discovered it. The hon. gentleman was very strong on the subject of our having had to export some things last year. That is just what we proposed to do, and we were very glad to find a market for our commodities in foreign countries. We never said we were going to control the markets of the world, as to the prices of our products. What we wanted was to keep our own market for our own people to the extent to which they could supply it, and I think that has been accomplished. Among the many authorities that have been thrown across the House at us, is that of the Treasurer of Ontario. Now, that is rather a good joke. We all value Ontario. The representatives of Ontario are a very important body in this House, but we believe the Government and Province of Ontario have nothing particular to do with the fiscal policy of this country. We believe that the Government of Ontario went very much out of its way in the initial business of the Legislature, when that Legislature met, in taking up for the first time the discussion of the fiscal policy of the Dominion. Our opinion on this side of the House is, that it was pure impertinence on the part of the Treasurer of Ontario to meet the Legislature with the idea of discussing the fiscal policy of the Dominion. Now, Sir, coming from this little discussion across the House to the actual Budget of my hon. friend, I think there is a little more hope for us, and we do not see that disastrous condition of things to which the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) drew our attention. I think the statement of the Minister was a very good one, and that he dealt very wisely with the position as it fell into his hands. With an accumulated surplus of something over $4,000,000, and a prospect for the coming year of $3,000,000 more, I think he is acting very wisely in doing what any farmer in the country would do under the same circumstances—that is, when he finds himself with a pocketful of money, he does not withdraw his energy in creation, but pays off a part of the debt; and if my hon. friend can follow the example of the United States in this matter as he has done in so many others, I think he will find the same reward on this as on other occasions. That I believe he proposes to do—that is, to keep down the debt rather than keep down the taxes, of which nobody complains, if I exclude our friends opposite. My hon. friend has made some reductions, and, I think, for very good reasons: the removal of the tax on bills and promissory notes, for the best of all reasons, because the tax in its operation appeared to be unequal and vexatious and led to a great deal of litigation. All taxes are liable to difficulty in collection; but when a tax is marked in that respect beyond all others it is very wise to abolish it. He knows very well that the true policy is to collect the taxes with the smallest possible amount of friction, and he has reduced that friction very much by this change. My hon. friend has taken another step that has been from time to time open to controversy—the removal of the duty on tea and coffee. I do not propose to complain because they are free. I believe, and think it is the opinion of a good many members, that whilst the tax existed all the old women of both sexes in the country could fill themselves with tea, without knowing that they paid duty upon it. I think, very likely, the grocers and importers of tea will get a very great part of the difference in this reduction. We must not be misled by the paradox of a free breakfast table. If the removal of the duty on tea and coffee would give every man, woman and child a free breakfast, we should all go for it most heartily, and say it was a thing to be desired more than any fiscal policy we ever heard of. But I hope my hon. friend has not been misled by any idea of this kind. The indulgence in paradox ought to be left to the other side of the House. We have heard of 4,000,000 of freemen that were not free, and we know the great paradox of free trade has been utterly burst and broken—the greatest paradox of all, which reminds us of the saying of old Sam Johnson, in his introduction to Shakespeare—"that some old men (a good many men) who are determined to be notorious, when they find they can add nothing to truth, indulge in paradox." I do not know that there are any men in bondage in this country, unless the trifling bondage to which they subject themselves, in listening to my hon. friend opposite occasionally. If they do that they may get very much off the track; they may make a great mistake as to suppose they are suffering poverty, "disaster" and "fraud" I think was one of the mildest terms used by the member for Middlesex, (Mr. Ross,) this evening, in relation to the duty on coal. It is a very bad habit to indulge in terms of this kind, when they have no meaning. If there was anything in the idea of a free breakfast table, I should favor it. I am sorry my hon. friend did not go a little further with his reductions, because, I think, among the large number of medical men in this House, it will be universally conceded that a very useful thing, according to their present practice is the lighter wines, and particularly the sparkling wines, commonly administered to patients, in a state of convalescence. These, unfortunately, are subjected to the highest duty in the whole Tariff. The value of the sparkling wines imported last year was $100,000, and the duty amounted to $55,000. I know that my hon. friend imposed a portion of it 30 per cent., under the impression that we could take it off under certain circumstances. Well, the world is drawing so strongly in favor of protection, that I see very little chance for the French admitting our ships free. I think the next time my hon. friend deals with the Tariff, he will let the convalescent have a free pint of champagne, as well as allow the old ladies a free breakfast table, which is not free. The matter with our friends opposite is that they have not got a policy, and are rather disappointed that anyone else should have one. The effect in the country is that the farmers have their barns full and favorable markets for anything they choose to sell, including the chickens and eggs, not added, that we have heard of. The manufacturer has his warehouses full, and his shops are fully employed, and the laborer has his pockets full and that chicken in the pot we have so often heard about. The country is not given over to occult science. The people do not go abroad like the prophets to look for reasons, being quite content to take the reasons that appear on the surface. They know that, in 1878, they were groaning under every form of poverty and depletion which, they were convinced, the Government could do something to remedy, and that the incidence of taxation under any circumstances had something to do with the prosperity of a country. They were willing to accept these reasons and results; and whilst we may regret very much that our friends opposite cannot find a policy, I believe, and will not venture to make a prediction. I will not enter into competition with the member for Middlesex in this work, but will say that whilst the country sympathizes very much with the melancholy condition of the gentlemen on the other side of the House, under the circumstances, it is willing to accept things as they are. Whilst all classes find themselves in those comfortable circumstances they are certainly not disposed to wear sackcloth.

Mr. RINFRET. Mr. Speaker, hon. members on the Ministerial side have repeatedly told us, in their speeches, that various industries were springing into new life, that commerce was flourishing with renewed strength; in a word, that the country was prosperous. The word prosperity is the apology tendered us by hon. gentlemen when we venture to attack the errors which swarm throughout the Tariff. When we point out the injustice of the so-called National Policy, we are ever met with the same answer; they flaunt in our faces that the Treasury is full, and that the country is prosperous. I am not at all surprised to see to-day hon. members on the Ministerial side make political capital of the return of commercial activity in Canada, which return is in reality but the natural sequence of the return of commercial activity throughout the entire world. Hon. gentlemen opposite have accustomed us to this system of making political capital for some years past, when endeavoring to hold the Liberal party responsible for the commercial depression which reigned in our time, and which was merely the natural result of a universal crisis. There is not a single member in this honorable House who will seriously pretend that we could by any legislation, whatever have counteracted that mysterious influence which was upsetting in all parts of the world the most solidly established financial institutions. There is not a single member who is really convinced to-day that if this crisis has disappeared from the face of the globe, it is due to the National Policy of a country like Canada, which numbers but a few millions of a population. I do not hesitate in saying, Mr. Speaker, that it was an improbability that Canada alone should escape that crisis, and I will add that it is equally impossible for it not to enjoy its share of the now universal renewal of business. The hon. Minister of Finance has really developed but a single idea, from which he has deduced all the facts and arguments of his speech, and this idea is that his Tariff must be good as the country is prosperous. I shall take the liberty to present to the House a few facts and arguments, with a view of establishing the fact that the Tariff has nothing to do with the prosperity which we are enjoying to-day; that the National Policy embodies several unjust laws which should be swept away, and that it has in reality retarded the natural development of the resources of the country. There are a certain number of important points which must not be lost sight of in passing judgment on the policy of the Government, viz.: the resources of the country, the nature of its products, its geographical position, and its population. We must also remember that the true way of fostering the people, the real means of protecting them, is to develop the industries of the country for the good of the greater number. It seems to me that Free Trade is the right principle which should preside over the establishment of a Tariff in England, for that country, by its inexhaustible iron and coal mines, as well as by its geographical situation, is destined to be par excellence the greatest commercial and manufacturing centre of the world. The free entry of grain and of agricultural products from foreign sources, the free entry of all the necessaries of life, fosters the exportation of the products of the manufactures of that great country by enabling them to turn them out at the lowest possible figures. Now, if we institute a comparison with the United States, we see that our neighbors, who are able up to certain points to meet their demands themselves, owing to the great variety of what they produce, and their mines of all kinds, have, perhaps, suffered less from their protective Tariff than any other country would have done. For, if their protective Tariff has given the death-blow to their general trade with the other nations of the globe, they have an important local market in their population of 50,000,000. And everyone knows that there exists, as an antidote to the protection enforced against foreign countries, the most absolute free trade between the various States. It would, however, be erroneous to expect for Canada England's high commercial prosperity, under an absolute system of Free Trade; no one is in doubt on that point. On the other hand, we have not, like the neighboring Republic, a population large enough to have a local market so as to save us from the disaster brought about by the protective Tariff imposed on us by hon. gentlemen of the Treasury benches. Moreover, we have not a different variety of productions to supply our wants. We are without the raw material; we do not produce any cotton; our climate is not favorable to producing the quality of wool used in our manufactures; our coal and iron mines are but few, and are hard and expensive to work, in comparison with those in England. From these facts I conclude that, notwithstanding our high protective Tariff, it will be a difficult task for us to convert Canada into a manufacturing country, and that many years will elapse ere we send our manufactures to foreign markets. But if Canada is lacking in this raw material, and in the productions of a manufacturing country, it has, on the other hand, inexhaustible forests, magnificent water stretches, the finest in the world, and besides a rich and fertile soil. It would be to my mind a wise policy, a truly national policy, that which would develop the resources of our forests, encourage navigation, and foster by all possible means the agricultural resources of the country. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches have not taken into account the facts I have mentioned; they have reckoned too much on purely artificial means, favored the creating of certain artificial products unsuited to the geographical situation of the country or to the nature of its resources. I am speaking of certain manufactured articles. I do not pretend that we should withhold all encouragement from manufactures; but I maintain that a policy which, under the pretence of protecting manufacturing industries, would injure the important industries I have just spoken of, would be a false and irrational one. I am one of those who think that the high duties imposed by the hon. Minister of Finance, with the object of giving protection, are of a kind to be injurious to navigation, to the lumber trade and to agriculture. That is what I am about to prove. It is an undeniable fact that wherever protection granted to manufactures has been in vogue, that the decay of the mercantile navy has followed, as a matter of course. This wall of China built between a protected country and adjoining ones, can but have one result sooner or later, and that is to diminish the general trade of that particular country with the neighboring ones, and to injure its navigation considerably. The United States and France are there to prove what I state. No comparison can be drawn between the mercantile marine of these two countries and that of England, the country of Free Trade par excellence. In Canada, notwithstanding the return of trade, we notice that there has been, for some time past, a considerable decrease in the grain carrying trade which used to pass through our canals. A large quantity of the grain which formerly took that route, has gone to Boston and New York. It is true that the National Policy has not prevented trade from finding a transit as formerly between England and the United States; it is true that there is not any duty on grain consigned from one of these countries to the other; but there was a trade carried on formerly between Canada and the United States on the one hand, and Canada and Great Britain on the other. By means of this trade we used to consume here the grain and flour coming from the United States, and we used to export our own products. We had everything to gain by this transaction, inasmuch as the consumers in this country could buy from the nearest seller and take advantage of all circumstances of time and place. Our shipowners and merchants in large cities used to derive considerable profits therefrom. The National Policy has brought about a decrease in this trade, to the detriment of our canal revenue and the general interests of navigation. The National Policy is also, in a certain measure, injurious to our lumber merchants, in forcing them to pay a higher price for what they import from foreign ports as furnishings for the shanties and for all tools used in cutting and preparing wood for the purposes of trade, without giving them any counterbalancing benefits. But the important industry which suffers in a more direct fashion from the effects of the Tariff is agriculture. Those who are really affected and unjustly treated by it are the farmers and workingmen, who constitute the great mass of consumers, or, in other words, nearly the whole of the population. The result of the Tariff, as far as they are concerned, has simply been to make them pay a higher price for what they purchase, without giving them any advantage whatever in the matter of what they sell. They are the real victims of the favoritism shown to a certain number of individuals, at the expense of the rest of society. In order to prove what I state, we have but to look over the list of the various articles for which the people pay a high price in order to give manufacturers an unjust protection. Our cotton factories are a striking example of this favoritism. In 1879, when the National Policy was inaugurated in this country, we had six or seven cotton factories. One of them, the Hudon Cotton Manufacturing Company, could be said to be flourishing, even in those days of commercial depression; four or five went through the crisis without suspending; one only failed, according to the information I have been able to procure. And this happened at a time when, in the United States, that paradise of protection, a number of manufactures of the same kind failed in succession. It is evident that since they have been able to face the crisis, that there was but one thing lacking to enable these manufactures to make money, and that was an increase in the general consumption; in other words, the means of acquiring consumers, and this could not but happen when the crisis came to an end, and trade once more looked up. No one can reasonably doubt to-day, that in ordinary times the Tariff of the ex-Minister of Finance was entirely sufficient to guarantee the existence of these factories, and even to enable them to earn large profits. But there is not a single man of business who, on seeing the enormous profits realized to-day by our cotton factories, will not say that they are illegitimate, and that they constitute a real extortion from the Canadian people. If we consult the Montreal market reports for the last few months, it will be seen that the Canada Cotton Manufacturing Company had its shares quoted in November or December last, at from 165 to 170, and the Montreal Cotton Manufacturing Company at from 185 to 200 per cent. It would be a difficult thing to-day to obtain Hudon Cotton Company's shares. This company paid last year a dividend of 10 per cent., and a further bonus of 33½ per cent. These enormous profits were merely realized because the present Tariff forces the people of Canada to pay for each square yard of cotton goods, a cent or two more than they ought to pay, or than they would pay if the former Tariff was in force. The Conservative press and hon. gentlemen opposite have sought to establish that the National Policy has not had the effect of increasing the price of cotton. It is an easy task to prove the contrary. These hon. gentlemen cannot but admit that on imported cotton the consumer has to pay, besides the whole of the duties imposed, the actual value of the cotton, which may vary considerably, and the manufacturer's profit. Under the former Tariff, those duties were on an average 17½ per cent.; to-day they represent from 30 to 50 per cent. No one can deny that the people paid those enormous duties on cotton goods imported since the new Tariff was established. Those imports amounted to about \$8,000,000 in 1879-80 (\$7,825,164), and to over \$10,000,000 in 1880-81. Now, Mr. Speaker, if we enquire of any important firm, the answer will be that imported cotton goods have been sold at precisely the same price as those manufactured in the country. Thus the people have paid, in excess of the value of the article, a tax of 30 to 50 per cent. on all cotton goods purchased either from abroad or from our manufacturers. The hon. leader of the Opposition, in his speech at Charlotte-town, gave a striking example of what I have just stated. The price of cotton yarn spun in the celebrated Park's factory was at the time \$1.25 a bundle, or \$1.15½ under discount. On the same day the price of a similar article was 92½ cents in Boston, New York and Philadelphia, or 85 cents under discount. The duties on that article amount to 15 per cent. and 2 cents per pound—altogether over 30 per cent.—and represent the exact difference between the Canadian and the United States prices. Part of that duty is legitimate, and no one in this honorable House can be opposed to reasonable duties on cotton goods; but what renders the tax an unjust one is that it is too high, and that it favors excessively certain individuals at the expense of the mass of the people. I say certain individuals advisedly; for, Mr. Speaker, no one else but the manufacturers has derived any advantage therefrom. At the elections in 1878, the hon. leader of the present Government said, I think in his speech at Toronto: "Manufacturers will be enriched and you (the workingmen) will have your share of their prosperity; you will earn better wages, &c., &c." Well, Mr. Speaker, is there a single one of these companies which realize large profits so much above the usual profits of trade, which shares these profits with its hands by increasing their wages? Enquire of the hands and you will find that they do not get a half-penny more than the current price of labor. The hon. leader of the present Government added that were the National Policy established, "capital and labor would walk hand in hand together, and that there would exist between them a community of action and interests." We perceive, to-day, that the favoritism is extended to capital alone and not to labor. The high duties levied on woollen manufactured goods constitute another glaring injustice towards Canadian consumers. The duties on woollens are 7½ cents, 10 cents per pound and 22½ per cent. ad valorem on an average, or adding together these two duties, an average of from 35 to 40 per cent. on the value of the article. But, through a peculiar scale of the duties, certain woollen articles pay from 20 to 25 cents per dollar, whilst on others the duty reaches as high as 60 per cent. The protection on woollen goods was, according to the framers of the National Policy, to have had the effect of creating a large number of manufactures and to diminish the amount of foreign importations; and the farmers of Canada, by way of compensation for the surplus to be paid on cloth, tweeds, flannels and alpacas, in a word, on all woollens they purchased, were to receive higher prices for their wool through the establishing of a national market for that article, and by the placing of certain duties on wool coming from abroad. Let us examine up to what point these promises have been fulfilled. The Liberal party has ever been opposed to protective duties on manufactured woollens; it has never had any faith in the possibility of success for such a policy; but really, notwithstanding our little faith in it, we could never have anticipated the complete fiasco which was in store for the Government. We see, to-day, that not only have the imports of woollens not decreased from year to year, but that they have, on the contrary, increased in the enormous ratio of 35 per cent. during the past fiscal year. The imports amounted to \$6,292,699 in 1879-80 and to \$8,554,397 in 1880-81. The crude wool, for which farmers were to receive a higher price, has decreased in value about 30 per cent. It is sold at about 10 cents less than in 1878, according to market reports, since the inauguration of the National Policy. During the last General Elections, it was promised from all the hustings that duties should be placed on crude wool, so as to specially protect the farmers. And we did, during the Session of 1880, impose a duty of 3 cents on a certain grade of wool; but this duty is farcical and a mockery, as there is not a single pound of wool of that grade imported from abroad. If we glance at the Trade and Navigation Returns, it will be seen that not a single cent of duty has been paid on that article during the past fiscal year. The hon. Minister of Finance had reckoned on the rapid increase in the manufacture of woollens. Up to the present time this kind of industry seems to meet with but scant success, and the result of the National Policy has been but to increase the price of woollens without increasing in any tangible manner the number of woollen manufactures. I do not fear to say that, do what we will, impose whatever duties we may, we shall never manufacture woollens in Canada with any degree of profit. The United States are there to prove what I advance; it will be seen that there, in spite of the highest Tariff it is possible to possess, the neighboring Republic exported, in 1880, woollens to the value of \$216,576 only, whereas its imports of that article still reach the enormous figure of \$33,911,093. Last year, England alone sent into the United States for \$13,000,000 worth of woollens. Our exports of woollens amounted to \$55,000 in 1878, and \$48,000 in 1880, or a decrease of \$7,000; they amounted to but \$30,000 in 1881. As to the national market for crude wool, it exists less than ever; imports continue, and as I have already said, the price of wool is still exceedingly low. Thus it will be seen, Mr Speaker, that the National Policy has merely had the effect of raising the price of woollens, whilst reducing considerably the price of wool. It has done much harm to the consumer; it has been doubly injurious to the farmers in order to favor a few privileged individuals, and has in no way contributed to the general prosperity of the country. The protection granted to refined sugar has brought about the same result as that on cotton and woollens, to wit: to increase the price of that article and to make refiners earn large fortunes at the expense of other classes of society. The duty levied on sugar, according to the Tariff of the hon. ex-Minister of Finance, brought us a large revenue to the Treasury, whilst imposing a less heavy load on the people's shoulders than the present one. Since the coming into force of this Tariff, the consumer has paid, on an average, on every pound of sugar 1 cent more than he would have paid had the hon. ex-Minister of Finance's Tariff been in existence. To convince one's self of this fact, one has but to compare the prices of refined sugar at New York with that on the Montreal market for the last three years. One will perceive therefrom that, even adding the duties levied under the old Tariff as well as freight and commission, the wholesale price of sugar in Montreal exceeds that of New York by from 75 cents to \$1 per 100 lbs. We consume every year from 100,000,000 to 120,000,000 lbs. of sugar. According to the two market reports which I have just mentioned, I do not think it to be an exaggeration to estimate at \$1,000,000 the surplus paid by the consumer for the purchase of his sugar, taking the average of the three last years. If to this be added the loss incurred by the public Treasury to benefit the refiners, we must conclude that the people of Canada, through the unjust Tariff they possess to-day, lose every year from \$1,250,000 to \$1,500,000, in order to enrich and favor a few refiners. Now, what is the advantage derived therefrom by the country? The great advantage, we are told by our political adversaries, is that sugar is refined in this country, and that thereby work is given to our workingmen. Very well; we employ a few more men than we did under the preceding Tariff; no one can deny this fact. But the number is of little importance, when compared with the immense sacrifice imposed on the mass of consumers. Some time ago I saw in a newspaper a suggestion on this very point to which the hon. Minister of Finance has alluded, which suggestion seemed a fair one to me; it was, that the country would gain several thousands of dollars a year, were it to board these few workingmen in the best hotels in the country, and keep them there doing nothing, provided that we should re-establish the old Tariff on sugar, which enabled the people of Canada to buy it at a lower figure, whilst increasing the receipts of the public Treasury. No favoritism is shown to the workingmen who are merely paid the current wages of labor. The only ones favored, the only ones reaping unjust profits through the monopoly ensured to them by the Tariff, are the refiners. But sugar is not the only article of grocery protected by the Tariff. The so-called National Policy has increased the price of all articles in that line, with the exception of tea and coffee, on which the duties have just been cancelled; there is a duty on raisins, on starch, on spices of all kinds and on corn starch, which is generally the food of invalids and children. The duties on vinegar are now 60 per cent. instead of 17½ per cent. as formerly. It would be no exaggeration to say that the price of all these groceries has increased on an average from 10 to 15 cents on the dollar. I shall content myself with a passing mention of the duties which weigh heavily on manufactured articles from leather, the duty on coal and on hardware, and all articles manufactured from china or glass, these points having been fully handled by hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me. I will merely say that the duties levied on agricultural implements and carpenters' tools are too high, and that these articles should have found a place in the free list. You will excuse me, Mr. Speaker, if I have enumerated a few of the articles on which the duties have been increased in an unjust fashion. It would take too long to review all the errors and iniquities with which the Tariff abounds; it will suffice that I should add that the so-called National Policy has increased the duties on imported goods in such a ratio, as to represent an increase of \$10 to \$15 per family of ten persons. If we add thereto the surplus paid on articles manufactured in the country, the price of which has risen, owing to the monopolies established by the present protective Tariff of the Government, we can but conclude that it is no exaggeration to reckon on an average at \$25 per family, as the increase of expenses brought about through the policy of the Government, which amount represents the surplus of taxes which the present Tariff compels us to pay. A part of these imports goes into the public Treasury, and a considerable part goes to enrich those whom the National Policy takes under its special protection. Let us now examine, Mr. Speaker, what the farmers receive in return for the enormous load which the policy of the Government imposes on them. I say, without hesitation, that they are in no way compensated, and I am going to prove it with certain facts. The National Policy has not raised, and cannot raise, by a solitary cent the price of the articles which the farmers have for sale. I regret to say that the promises of protection made to agriculturists in 1878 have not been kept. Protection had been promised to crude wool, as a compensation for the duties on woollens. I established just now that this promise was a mockery and a farce performed to the detriment of the farmers of this country. We had been promised duties on our hides by way of compensation for those levied on manufactured leather. As a matter of fact, these duties have not yet been imposed. I am not going to decide as to the intrinsic merits of these two imports; but I blame the Government for having made promises to the farmers when they could not keep them. Last Session the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) asked, as a special protection to agriculture, the placing on the free list of all articles employed in the manufacture of beet root sugar. He showed that beet root sugar will never be manufactured in Canada unless Government granted it some practical advantages. If the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches admit a general system of protection, we have a right to ask if it is through antipathy to the agricultural classes that the Government will not do for beet root sugar that which it has so willingly done for sugar refining, cotton goods, woollens, and a number of other industries? I voted for that special protection on beet root sugar, but as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the request of the member for Stanstead was not granted. Last year we also asked, in order to secure the farmers their share of protection, that the duties on Canadian tobacco should be abolished. These duties on Canadian tobacco have been in existence for a number of years; they were established by the Conservative party and kept in force by the Liberal party for the purposes of revenue. The people suffered less from these duties at that time, as compared with what they have suffered during the last two or three years; at any rate, the increase was a necessary one as there was not a sufficient revenue. But now that the Treasury is overflowing, owing to the enormous taxes on manufactured articles, the Government would be doing a politic act in abolishing this duty completely. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made a good step in this direction, but have not, I think, gone far enough to satisfy the people of the Province of Quebec, who are entirely opposed to this duty. In 1878, in order to cause the farmers of Canada to agree to the National Policy, they were promised an increase in the price of grain through the levying of special duties on grain coming from abroad. We said then, and we repeat it to-day, that the price of all kinds of grain, excepting Indian corn, is regulated by the price on the English market, for we have a surplus of all kinds of grain, and the only channel we possess to divert it through is the English market. The price of grain varies greatly according to the demand. It was very high in 1873, 1874 and 1875, and everyone knows that we did not have any protection during those years. It decreased in the years following, during the crisis which swept the whole world, diminishing everywhere the capacity to purchase, and as a sequence the general consumption. In the United States, that elysium of protection, the price of grain was lower than in this country; but the price of grain never fell as low as it did during the year that immediately followed the adoption of the Tariff; it was during that year that oats sold at a cent per pound on the Quebec market. To-day the price of grain in Canada is a good one, because grain is selling well throughout the world, but the Tariff has absolutely nothing to do with this rise in the price. If we follow the quotations of the grain trade in Liverpool and in Canada during the past years, before and after the inauguration of the National Policy, it will be seen that the price of grain in Liverpool is the same as here, plus freight and cost of transport, or a difference varying between 25 and 30 cents. This fact alone proves clearly that our market quotations are entirely ruled by the English market. But the important point to look into is a comparison drawn between the Canadian and American markets. It was pretended in 1878 that by the levying of certain duties we should have a difference of a few cents in our favor over the price of grains in the neighboring Republic. Let us see what happened during the last few years. In 1878, during the last months of the Mackenzie Administration, oats were from eight to ten cents dearer in Montreal and Toronto than in Chicago. This fact was admitted by our political adversaries who were complaining at the time that oats from the United States were being sold on our markets; these oats would have been sold on their own market had it not been that our prices were higher. In 1881, from the beginning of September to the end of December, the price of oats was always from 1 to 3 cents higher on the Chicago markets than on those of Montreal and Toronto. Notwithstanding the greater distance of the English market, the same thing took place with rye; its price was higher here than in the United States in 1878, and lower in 1881. The price of graded wheat has varied much; on the whole, it was about as high here as in the United States. It would be difficult for me to give the cause of this decrease in the price of oats and rye on our markets as compared with that in the United States. If I have placed these facts before this hon. House, Mr. Speaker, it is only with the view of establishing that they constitute the most complete contradiction of what was said by our political adversaries, when they promised that the result of the Tariff would be to create a national market through which grains would command a higher price than in the neighboring Republic. I have, therefore, established: 1st. That the price of grain on our markets is determined by the English market, because we have a surplus of agricultural products which we are compelled to sell—this fact cannot be denied, and I think I have proved it absolutely; 2nd. The price of grain, compared with that of the United States, instead of increasing, has diminished by a few cents; 3rd. That the National Policy has no influence over the price of breadstuffs. If it has actually done anything, if it has had any result in the present case, as some of our political adversaries pretend, it has been in direct opposition to the interests of the farmers, as is clearly shown by the facts I have brought forward. Thus, under whichever aspect we look at the Tariff, we arrive at the conclusion that it enriches a few favored ones at the expense of the mass of the people, and that it increases by a sum of \$25 the expense of every farmer's family, without giving him anything as compensation. I sincerely regret that the Government should have shown itself so unjust towards the agricultural class as to refuse everything that has been asked for it as its legitimate share of the general system of protection. There exists still another kind of favoritism which the National Policy has established, and which is still more particularly odious. The Tariff favors the well-to-do classes of society, and falls heavier on the working classes. I will now establish this by facts. Let us first take manufactured woollens: A cheap tweed, valued in England at 20 cents, and which the poor man buys to clothe himself, has to pay besides the 20 per cent. ad valorem, the same price of $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound as the cloth of good quality bought by the rich man and which costs \$4 in England. Thus does the poor man pay 41 to 42 cents per dollar of duty on the value of the article, whereas the rich man is paying only from 20 to 21 cents per dollar. All manufactured woollens used in clothing both sexes exhibit the same unjust distinction. Whilst farmers and the working classes generally pay from 40 to 50 cents per dollar of a tax, the well-to-do class of society which buys dear and fine goods pays on an average but 20 to 30 cents per dollar. The same injustice is repeated with regard to cotton goods. Low-priced cotton goods pay the same duty per square yard as high-priced goods and the poor man pays nearly double the amount paid by the rich man on these articles. There are a number of other articles of minor importance which it would be too long to enumerate here. Let us take tobacco, for instance: the duties are about 75 cents per dollar on tobacco priced at 50 cents which the poor man buys, whereas they amount but to from 25 to 35 cents on tobacco costing \$1 to \$1.50 which is bought by the rich man. The tax on Canadian tobacco really falls on the farmers and the working classes alone. But the tax that falls heavily on the working classes in our cities and on the farmers, and on those classes only, is that on coal oil. The well-to-do classes in towns consume gas, on which the tax is almost nil, amounting to about one cent in the dollar through the tax on coal; but coal oil, which is used by the working classes in our cities, and by the farmers, has to bear the load of several taxes; it is charged with the cost of inspection as to its safety, and must be refined to a high degree of specific gravity; besides that, there are protective duties on crude and refined oil coming from foreign parts; all these imposts, when added to the special legislation of the National Policy, which favors monopoly in the refining of coal oil, have had the result of increasing from 40 to 50 per cent. the price of that article.

If to that be added the duties on lamps, on lamp globes, one can but conclude that, whereas the rich man does not pay any tax on light, workingmen and farmers pay the enormous tax of from 30 to 35 cents per dollar. And the most unpopular tax, and which falls heavily on the poorer classes, is the tax on flour.

Mr. BOLDUC. No; the price of wheat is determined by the English market.

Mr. RINFRET. It is quite true, as the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Bolduc) states that the price of wheat is regulated by the English market; but the hon. member can but admit the following facts, viz.: that the duty of 50 cents on flour has not had the result of increasing the price of that article during the winter and spring seasons, but that it certainly has had that effect during a few of the summer and autumn months since the Tariff is in force. In my opinion, the people of the Province of Quebec have paid entirely this duty of 50 cents, because at that time of the year we always import for home consumption a large quantity of flour from the United States, whilst awaiting the harvesting of the fall crop in the Province of Ontario. The tax is an odious one, because it falls on an article which is one of the primary necessities of life, because it was imposed notwithstanding all the solemn promises made by Conservative candidates at the last elections in all the counties of the Province of Quebec and of the Maritime Provinces. I will not go into further details, for I think I have satisfactorily proved that the present Tariff distributes taxes in the most unjust fashion, and that the weight of these taxes falls more heavily on the working classes and on the farmers than on the well-to-do classes of society. I have to add that it is a serious mistake, considering the large revenue we enjoy to-day, the maintaining of taxes on articles of primary necessity such as bread, light and fuel. It was with some surprise that I heard the hon. Minister of Finance, when announcing his surplus for the past year and the still more considerable surplus for the year ending next June, attributes the merit of it to himself and congratulates the Government thereon. I fail to see any wonder worked in this instance by the hon. Minister. Mr. Gladstone has been highly lauded because he had found the means of increasing the revenue whilst diminishing the taxation; but the hon. Minister has discovered quite a different recipe, for, in his case, if the revenue has increased, so have the taxes, and in a far more considerable ratio. His surpluses have been obtained by imposing on the people of Canada the heaviest taxes they have ever had to bear. This extraordinary revenue has, moreover, completely upset the provisions of the hon. Minister himself, and constitutes a complete contradiction of what he stated in 1880. It will be remembered that at that time the hon. Minister of Finance told the electors of his county that the taxes would not be increased, and that to govern the country, $18,000,000 of Excise and Customs' duties were enough. Well, Mr. Speaker, the revenue from those two sources has attained over $22,000,000 for the year which has just ended, and consumers have paid $4,000,000 in excess of the amount the hon. Minister of Finance said he would impose on the people of Canada. For the year which is to end in June next, the taxes will again be $4,000,000 more than for the year which has just ended. It is most unjust to levy such a taxation on the people of Canada, and to make them pay several millions more taxes than are necessary to govern the country. I will now take the liberty, Mr. Speaker, of reminding the House that one of the effects of the National Policy was to be, according to our political adversaries, a decrease in our imports. Now, the enormous increase in the public revenue simply exists through the considerable increase in our imports. Thus, to attribute to himself the merit of his surpluses, and to be able to congratulate his Government, the hon. Minister is compelled to contradict the opinions he expressed during the Session of 1880. It will be remembered that he then triumphantly announced that the general trade of the country was at last fairly balanced, and in truth, in 1879-80 our exports exceeded our imports by about $100,000. He almost rejoiced at that time over our deficit of $1,700,000, "for," said he, "the famous problem of the balance of trade had been solved for the first time in our favor." He attributed, somewhat naively, to the National Policy what was simply due to the crisis. But what is strange is that the hon. Minister of Finance rejoices to-day over our surpluses, in the face of an increase of $20,000,000 of imports, and when the balance of trade is against us by a sum exceeding $7,000,000. In 1880, the hon. Minister extolled his policy because it had turned the balance of trade in our favor, whilst saddling us with an enormous deficit; this Session he again praises his policy because it has brought about the contrary, because it gives us surpluses, whilst turning the balance of trade against us. These contradictions go to show the complete absence of principles in those occupying, to-day, the Treasury benches, and the facts I have enumerated are the strict proof of what we told the electors in 1878, viz., that the balance of trade is against us in years of prosperity, and that the contrary takes place during the years when a crisis and commercial depression govern. The hon. Minister of Finance, ever modest, attributes to his policy a great part of the credit due for the considerable exports of 1880 and 1881, which are the true causes of the return of trade. There is a fact, however, which no one can call into doubt, and that is that the present Tariff merely influences, from the point of view of general trade, the manufactured articles which have received special protection. Now, the exports of these articles have diminished from year to year, since the inauguration of the National Policy. There is no real increase, except in the exports of lumber and agricultural products. Our political adversaries have, I hope, too great a confidence in the good sense of the people to try to make them believe that the return of the lumber trade is due to the National Policy. For if you question any lumber merchant, he will tell you that the only effect of the Tariff on his trade has been to increase the price of the articles employed by him in preparing the wood for the market; consequently the National Policy, instead of assisting him, has done him injury. The sole cause of commercial activity in that line of trade to-day, is the revival of trade in England and the United States, which revival has increased the consumption in those countries, and the purchasing capacity of those who are our natural customers and whose purchases had fallen off during the crisis. The revival of trade in Europe has had the same effect on our grain and live cattle trade, by increasing the consumption and the purchasing capacity of larger quantities in those countries. But that is not the only reason, inasmuch as our agricultural products are concerned; another important factor was the failing of the crops in Europe, whereas we had a plentiful harvest in Canada. This failing of the crops could but have the effect of increasing the price of our agricultural products. The whole of these causes, the revival of business in Europe, the failing of the crops in that country, and the three good harvests which we have had in succession in Canada, are sufficient to explain the considerable exports and the rise in price of our agricultural products. But I am not afraid of saying that the National Policy has nothing to do with it, unless our political adversaries are prepared to prove that protection, that our Tariff, has caused the crisis to cease throughout the whole world, and has given us good crops whilst causing the crops in Europe to fail at the same time. I have established, therefore, that the National Policy has not brought about the promised result of decreasing our imports and of turning in our favor the balance of trade; that it has not done, and cannot do, anything for our export trade. I have also, I think, established that the extraordinary revenue from which the hon.

Minister of Finance derives so much pride, exists only because the people of Canada are paying exorbitant taxes. The Government has been wise in reducing these taxes somewhat, having evidently understood that its system of taxation was becoming exceedingly unpopular. I hope I have said enough on this subject, Mr. Speaker, to show that the National Policy is a farce throughout, and a mockery of the people of Canada. I will say a few words only about the Estimates which are presented to us for the carrying out of the general administration of public affairs. I merely wish to oppose to these Estimates the pompous promises made to the people during the last General Elections. During the elections of 1878, the Mackenzie Government was accused of extravagance, because its whole annual expenditure was in all \$23,500,000. The present hon. Minister of Finance asserted, in his speech to the electors of his county, that the country could be governed with an expenditure of \$22,500,000. The future Minister's utterings on this point became the programme of every Conservative candidate. The accusation of extravagance brought against the Mackenzie Administration was a bit of effrontery coming from those who had increased the public expenditure from \$13,000,000 that it was in 1867, to \$23,316,000 in 1873, or an average increase of $1\frac{1}{2}$ millions a year. During its five years in power, the Liberal party brought this expenditure up to \$23,500,000 only, and we may say that there was a practical decrease in the expenditure, if we take into account the surplus of population and the considerable engagements willed to us by preceding Administrations. These engagements added enormous amounts to the debt of the country, as I am about to prove presently. I will show for the moment up to what degree the present Administration has endeavored to redeem the solemn pledges made in 1878, to the effect that it would do its best to reduce public expenditure. During the very first year that they were in power, the Ministers increased our expenditure to \$24,850,000, and it has reached \$25,500,000 for the year ending June 30th, 1881. The Estimates for the year ending June, 1882, are ahead in excess of the sum of \$26,000,000; those for the present year, to which it will probably be necessary to add supplements, amounting to one or two millions, amount to \$27,600,000. Thus does the present Government spend, after a three years' administration, about \$4,000,000 more than the Mackenzie Government and about \$5,000,000 more than the amount which, according to the Minister of Finance himself, would have been sufficient to govern the country. I will not enter into details, so as not to engage for too long a time the attention of this honorable House. These figures are quite sufficient to show that there is in the administration of the public funds an unwarrantable extravagance. Let us now pass on to the public debt. During the elections of 1878, we were accused of having increased the public debt to a too considerable extent. We proved then beyond doubt that the Liberal party was not responsible for these additions to our indebtedness, and that we had merely contracted loans to meet the engagements willed to us by preceding Administrations. I will resume these engagements in a few words, and for that purpose I will quote the speech of the present hon. Minister of Finance. The following is a passage of his speech on the Budget in 1873:—

"We are entering upon new engagements involving a very large sum of money, and which will require a very large increase of our debt. We have $10,000,000 to expend on the Intercolonial Railway. We have $30,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific, and the canal system will involve an expenditure of at least $20,000,000. These are serious matters, inasmuch as they add $60,000,000 to our national debt. Let us now see what is the annual charge involved in this matter. For the sinking fund we require $600,000, for commission and interest $2,764,000, making a total annual charge, when these works are completed, of $3,367,400."

Thus, according to the hon. Minister, these works were to bring our debt up to about $170,000,000. Let us examine now what were the burdens imposed on the country by the Mackenzie Administration. On the 1st of July, 1874, our public debt amounted to $109,000,000 in round figures; in 1878, it had reached $141,000,000, or an increase of $32,000,000 for the period during which the Liberal party was in power. This is $28,000,000 less than the Estimates of the hon. Minister for 1873; it is $28,000,000 less than he would have spent had he been in power during these few years. Now, Mr. Speaker, the public charges for interest and the sinking fund, instead of being increased for a sum of $3,367,400, were merely increased from $1,500,000 to $1,700,000, being a saving of 50 per cent. on those same charges as compared with the Estimates of 1873, which I have just mentioned. The Liberal party saved on the ordinary expenditure an amount almost sufficient to compensate for this increase of charges relating to our debt. Each and every loan contracted by the Mackenzie Government was debited to works and public undertakings determined upon by law, and to the carrying out of which the country was formally bound. Several millions were spent on the Intercolonial, the canal system and the finishing of the Parliament Buildings. I do not speak here of the enormous amounts expended on the Canadian Pacific Railway, as every one knows who is responsible for this gigantic undertaking. I have established that the Liberal party could not but increase the public debt, as it could not withdraw from the engagements willed to it by preceding Administrations. I have likewise shown that this increase would have been far more considerable, had the Conservative party been in power during these past few years. Let us now see if the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches have kept their promises in this important matter of the public debt. According to the latest Public Accounts submitted to us, our debt amounts at present to $155,000,000, and will probably attain $200,000,000 in a few years, when all the undertakings of the Government will have been carried out. I call the special attention of this honorable House to this rapid increase of our public debt and of our general expenditure. In years of commercial prosperity, with a high Tariff like the one we have to-day, our revenue is more than sufficient to meet public expenditure and the interest on our debt; but it was proved beyond doubt in 1879-80, by that year's deficit, that in years of commercial crisis our expenditure may be equal to our revenue, even with our actual Tariff. In 1880, our expenditure reached, nevertheless, $24,850,000 only; and were we to experience, in 1883, a commercial depression, together with an increase of about $3,000,000 in our public expenditure, taking 1880 for the sake of comparison, our deficit would, instead of reaching $2,000,000, reach about $5,000,000. It is a fact that our public charges have since a few years increased far more rapidly than the resources of the country; and if we have a surplus to-day, it is because the hon. Minister of Finance has not yet reached the utmost limits of taxation. Let us bear in mind that there occur crises from time to time, and that prudence teaches us not to depend too much on years of plenty. I will not any longer occupy the attention of the House. I think, Mr. Speaker, that all the hon. members of this House should do their utmost to prevent the increase of our public debt, and to strike off from our public expenditure all that is not necessary to the good administration of the country. It is by means of a wise and economical policy and a just and equitable distribution of taxes that we shall render ourselves worthy of the trust placed in us by the electors of Canada.

Mr. PLUMB moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:35 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time :—

Bill (No. 72) to amend the Act incorporating the Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—(Mr. Strange.)

PROMISSORY NOTES.

Mr. MACDONELL (Lanark), in introducing Bill (No. 73) relating to promissory notes and other negotiable instruments, said: The object of the Bill is that where a promissory note or other negotiable instrument is given in consideration for a patent right, or for an invention which may hereafter be patented, it shall be written or printed, that it is given "for a patent right." Each instrument in the hands of any purchaser or holder shall be subject to the same defences, as it would be in the hands of the original holder or owner; and any person who purchases or becomes the holder of a promissory note, knowing it to have been given for the consideration aforesaid, shall hold the same subject to such defences, although the words "for a patent right" are not written or printed on its face. And in case any one induces another person to make a note for such purpose, and does not have the words "for patent right" entered on the note, it shall be held to be a criminal offence and misdemeanor, and the offender shall be liable to imprisonment for two years.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

ELECTION BY ELECTRICITY.

Mr. FORTIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 74) respecting the voting at elections of members of the House of Commons of Canada, in the Magdalen Islands in the Electoral District of Gaspé, and the Island of Anticosti in the Electoral District of Saguenay, under certain circumstances. He said: This is a new kind of law and I ask the indulgence of the House while I explain its operation. It is well known that the Magdalen Islands are during the winter season completely isolated from the rest of the world. It is no use to talk about the winter navigation of the Gulf of the St. Lawrence. I have never pronounced myself publicly on that question, because I have never had a suitable opportunity of doing so; but, after thirty years of study, and after consulting residents on the shores of the Gulf, and the fishermen of the Magdalen

Mr. PLUMB.

Islands and of the North Shore, who go sealing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence during the months of March and April, I have come to believe that winter navigation of the Gulf is an impossibility. Yes! I am fully convinced that winter navigation is an impossibility in a commercial sense; you cannot get through the ice when packed, but may when the ice is broken or disintegrated by winds or currents. You have an illustration of the fact: Look at the vessel of whom some people so much boast, and that cost so much—the Northern Light—a great name for a small thing; look at her caught in the ice about a month ago, and remaining fast in it, though the ice does not pack at that point so closely as in some other parts of the Gulf. I am very glad the passengers did not suffer much, and were rescued. Look again at a vessel built for Arctic navigation, provided with everything desirable for the purpose, owned by that spirited and liberal man, Mr. Bennett, of New York; she had not been a month in the ice till she was caught and bound in it for a year and a-half. And was finally broken to pieces, three-fourths of the crew dying of starvation. Let us confine ourselves to the possible, and not attempt impossible or visionary undertakings. One of the greatest proofs that winter navigation is impossible is that the people of the Magdalen Islands never asked me to try to get them a vessel to run to them in winter. You know that electors are very much in the habit of asking all they can possibly hope to get; yet these people, though separated from the rest of the world, including Canada, during winter, have never asked for winter navigation. At present these people cannot vote during the winter, and the law provides that even if they do not vote then the election is legal. Now, thanks to the good will of the Government, this House and the country, the Magdalen Islands are provided with a system of telegraph, capable of competing with any in the world, in perfect operation, and possessing nine working stations. You can now telegraph to any station, and receive an answer within a couple of hours. When you have this sure means of communication—especially when the telegraph belongs to the Government and is under its management—why should those people be disfranchised any longer, by not getting the chance to vote in winter as well as in summer? When we know that the most difficult diplomatic negotiations and treaties and the greatest financial schemes are carried on and accomplished through the telegraph, why can we not use it for an election? I believe we can, and therefore I wish to introduce this Bill, which can effect the object without violating any essential in the general election law. The following is the text of the Bill :—

Whereas means of certain and uninterrupted communication between the Magdalen Islands, in the electoral district of Gaspé, and the Island of Anticosti, in the electoral district of Saguenay, and the mainland, by means of the electric telegraph now in operation between the points above mentioned, exist and are available for use during seasons of the year when navigation is closed; Whereas, by means of such electric telegraph, the telegraphic system upon the Mainland is placed in connection with the telegraphic system of the Islands aforesaid, which latter system is under the direct control of the Government of Canada; and whereas it is expedient to employ the said telegraphic communication for the purpose of allowing the votes of the electors of the electoral districts aforesaid, residents respectively in said Islands to be counted in elections for the House of Commons of Canada taking place when communication other than telegraphic is interrupted by the closing of the navigation; Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. Whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor General of Canada at the time when an election of a member to represent either in the electoral districts aforesaid in the House of Commons of Canada is about to be held, that communication by water between the Islands hereinbefore mentioned and the mainland is, or is about to be, interrupted by the severity of the season, all necessary instructions may be transmitted to the proper officer, and all returns may be transmitted by him by means of the electric telegraph; and the Governor in Council may make such order as to the details of such election, so far as respects the said Islands, as he may deem expedient.

The clause respecting writs means that on the eve of an election the order or commission will be sent by telegraph instead of writing. The returning officers and all other officers will to be appointed by telegraph. The ballot boxes and voting bulletins will be prepared on the Islands. Every proceeding will be carried on as in other parts of the country, and when the election is finished, the result will be reported by telegraph. The Bill is very simple, and, I think, can be carried out without violating the secrecy of election or any other portion of the law. By accident there were added to the title of the Bill the words, "voting by telegraph." It is not voting by telegraph, it is "carrying on the election by means of the telegraph."

Mr. BRECKEN. It is not my intention to offer any opposition to my hon. friend's Bill, but knowing, as I do, that the hon. gentleman from Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) is looked upon as a very high authority upon all questions affecting the navigation of the Gulf of St. Lawrence in winter or summer, I was disappointed at the reference he made to that celebrated vessel known as the Northern Light. I am sure that if my hon. friend thinks it necessary to introduce a Bill to enable the free and independent electors of the Magdalen Islands to vote upon the mainland by means of electricity, it is quite as important and as essential that the inhabitants of Prince Edward Island should have the means of voting in the same manner from the Island to the mainland. I was a little uneasy, I might say alarmed, when I heard the hon. member for Gaspé speaking in a slighting manner of the Northern Light. I think the Northern Light has proved the possibility of navigating the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and I hope to have the assistance of my hon. friend from Gaspé when I bring this matter before the notice of the House at a future time. With regard to the Northern Light, the people of Prince Edward Island, while they are not altogether satisfied, highly appreciate the advantages which she has conferred on the country. It is true that she has been icebound in the Straits of Northumberland for four or five weeks, but if that proves anything at all it only proves that more ought to be done than has been done yet. It is an experiment, and as such it merits legislative action as much as the insular position of the free and independent electors of the Magdalen Islands.

Mr. KILLAM. I think it is an extraordinary confession for the hon. member for Gaspé to make when he says that he never formed an opinion on the question of the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence. I regret that, because, if he had given his attention to it with the same success he gives to other questions of a kindred nature, probably he would have rendered the Government great assistance in solving the problem of the communication between Prince Edward and the mainland.

Mr. FORTIN. In my opinion the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence as a commercial enterprise, is an impossibility, and that is also the opinion of everybody practically acquainted with the Gulf of St. Lawrence whom I have consulted. I do not say that if you had an Arctic vessel you could not go through the Gulf by winding your way in every direction; but I would like to know who would insure the cargoes in those vessels, and who would be so foolish as to take passage in them when they might be caught in the ice and remain locked up for weeks and even months? This is an important question, and if the House will allow me I will cite an instance showing the difficulty of winter navigation. I speak on the authority of Sir Hugh Allan, who related me the fact. Many years ago a sailing vessel was coming up the Gulf in the beginning of May, she took a tack northward and got into a pack of ice. The wind came from the south-west and she became packed in ice off the Straits of Belle Isle, and there remained fast until about the middle of June. What happened then may happen again to any vessel trying to go through the St.

Lawrence in winter. When I spoke before I did not mention the ferry between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, that is quite a different thing. With regard to the Northern Light, I did not want to belittle the vessel too much; but almost every person who has seen the vessel says she is not constructed for that kind of work. Now, let me tell you what has taken place during the voyages of that vessel. She can pass through the ice when it is loosened up by the winds and tides, but when the ice is closely packed against the shores by the wind or the current, she cannot pass through, nor can any other vessel. In order for a vessel to go through thickly packed ice, she must be able to displace the ice, and where is the ice to go to? Is the ice to go up, or down, or sideways? Can a vessel remove packed ice a number of feet each side of her during a distance of many miles? I have been myself through the ice, and I have seen the Straits of Belle Isle completely packed on the 28th of June, 1861, when not even an Arctic vessel could have made her way through, but on the next day the wind and the current had made a passage through the ice about ten miles long? With regard to the inland ferry between Prince Edward Island and Pictou, they will be able to cross most of the time, but when the ice is closely packed along the shore, it is quite impossible for them to pass through.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

SHELBURNE HARBOR, N.S.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to erect a fog whistle at the entrance to Shelburne Harbor, N.S., during the present year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of my colleague, I have the honor to answer the hon. gentleman that the Hon. Mr. White has communicated with the Department about this matter, which has been taken into consideration, and the intention of the Department is to erect a fog whistle at the entrance to Shelburne Harbor.

BARRINGTON HARBOR, N.S.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide, in the Supplementary Estimates for the erection of a lighthouse upon West Head Cape, Sable Island, at the western entrance to Barrington Harbor, N.S.?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter is under consideration.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH, for Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to provide for the inspection of factories; if so, when?

Mr. GAULT enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to put into circulation bills of the denomination of four (4) dollars; and if so, when?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Such is the intention. The plate is now being prepared, and will be issued probably in a month or two.

CAPE TORMENTINE RAILWAY.

Mr. CROUTER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That subject is now under the consideration of the Government.

SUPERANNUATION ALLOWANCES IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. HOUDE enquired, Whether the Government proposes to introduce any measure to the effect of abolishing the system of superannuation allowances granted to the employes in the Civil Service? If not, whether it intends to apply this system, or an analogous one to the salaried officers in the Militia Service?

Mr. CARON. It is not the intention of the Government to abolish the system of superannuation allowances granted to the employes in the Civil Service, or to apply this system to the salaried officers in the Militia Service.

SALARIES OF DEPUTY ADJUTANTS-GENERAL AND BRIGADE MAJORS.

Mr. HOUDE enquired, Whether the Government considers the salaries now paid to the Deputy Adjutants-General and to the Brigade Majors in the Militia, as proportionally fair as those ordinarily paid to the employes in the Civil Service? If not, whether it proposes to increase the salaries of the above named militia officers?

Mr. CARON. It is not the intention of the Government to increase the salaries of militia officers.

LIGHTHOUSE ON ISLE PERROT.

Mr. MONGENAIS enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to rebuild the lighthouse at Isle Perrot, opposite Ste. Anne's, destroyed by fire during the summer of 1880?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the intention of the Government to ask for an appropriation for that purpose.

THE REPORT OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Before you pass to the next Order I wish to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to an article in the Mail of Saturday, in which it is stated that a bulky Blue book was laid on the Table of the House, containing over 400 pages, being the report of the Department of Indian Affairs. I have not had the pleasure of seeing that Blue book. I wonder if it is possible that it has reached the organ of the party before it reached the members of this House, or has it been laid on the Table of the House, as reported in this paper? I just call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the matter; may be he will explain it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I saw that article. The hon. gentleman says he has not seen the report, if it has been laid on the Table. Neither have I, Mr. Speaker. But I hope to be able to lay it on the Table tomorrow or the next day. How the advance sheets got to the organ at Toronto I am not at present in a position to tell my hon. friend, because I do not know.

Mr. ANGLIN. The dignity of Parliament in this case seems to be very seriously hurt.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad my hon. friend from Middlesex has taken to reading the Mail. I have no doubt that if he continues to do so he will be a much better member of society, and of this House.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS AT BELLE CREEK, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. BRECKEN, in moving for copies of correspondence, reports of engineers, and all other papers relating to harbor improvements at Belle Creek, in Queen's county, Prince Edward Island, said: It is not my intention to occupy the time of the House, but to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works to this very necessary work. Belle Creek empties itself into the Straits of Northumberland, and is situated from the capital of the Island about twenty-five miles. It is a thickly settled part of the country and is well cultivated, but I suppose there is no part of the Dominion where the people suffer so severely from the want of railway and steam communication. They have to travel in autumn, when they ship agricultural produce, a distance of from twelve to twenty miles to avail themselves of markets. The harbor is shallow and requires dredging, and if a few thousand dollars were spent on it a great benefit would be conferred upon the inhabitants of the locality. I doubt very much if there is an equally intelligent or industrious body of settlers who have made an equal advance and are still suffering from want of the commonest means of transportation, than the people at the bay in question. I know the Minister of Public Works has a great many claims upon him, but I hope he and his colleagues will take this matter into earnest consideration, and do something to enable these people to participate in the benefits now so liberally extended to inhabitants in the other parts of the Dominion. When these people living in Prince Edward Island, hear of the millions that are spent for the purpose of opening up communication, and when they know the advanced policy of this and all Governments is to give means of access to and transport from all parts of the country, they feel they are laboring under a very serious disadvantage. I hope the Minister of Public Works and his colleagues will see their way to mete out common justice to those people, and remedy the evils I have attempted to describe.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The correspondence will be brought down. I may say to my hon. friend that I would be most happy to be able to recommend grants for this work as well as for many others, but we cannot do everything in one year. We do what we can this year, and I hope we shall see the hon. gentleman here next year, and in the next Parliament, and indeed, until he has become very old, and, no doubt, during that time, we shall be in a position to recommend to Parliament all the improvements he desires in his county.

Motion agreed to.

GRAND JURIES.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, in the absence of Mr. MACDONELL (Lanark), moved for correspondence between the Ontario Government and the Dominion Government, relating to an Act, intitled: "An Act respecting Grand Juries," being Chapter 13, 42nd Victoria (Ontario Statutes), which Act was not to come in force until a day to be named by the Lieutenant-Governor by his Proclamation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would inform the hon. gentleman that there is no necessity for this motion. The papers included in it are now in course of preparation on a previous motion for a return, and they will be brought down in a day or two.

Motion withdrawn.

EXTENSION OF THE BOUNDARIES OF MANITOBA.

Mr. SCOTT, in moving for a copy of the Proclamation bringing into force the Act extending the boundaries of the Province of Manitoba, said: The Province had experienced great enlargement. According to the Manitoba Act, passed in 1870, the Province was assigned four representatives in the House of Commons, and two in the Senate; and it was provided that when the next Census of 1881 should be taken, the Province would receive an additional member in the Senate, and as to representatives in the Commons the number was to be entirely guided by the 51st section of the British North America Act. By its provisions we cannot obtain a larger representation than four members, although at the time it was passed the Province possessed a very insignificant population. When the Act for enlarging the Province was passed, it enjoyed an area of only 14,000 square miles. To-day, its extent is 150,000 square miles, or more than ten times as large; and yet, according to the British North America Act, we are denied a larger representation than the smaller area possessed. This amounts to a very great injustice to a fast growing young Province like Manitoba. I believe, however, it is not the desire of Government or this House to deal unfairly with the Province. The clause in the British North America Act referring to this subject reads thus:

There shall be assigned to each of the other Provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such Census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained).

By the Manitoba Act, section 4, it is provided that:

The said Province shall be represented, in the first instance, in the House of Commons of Canada, by four members, and for that purpose shall be divided, by Proclamation of the Governor General, into four electoral districts, each of which shall be represented by one member: Provided, that on the completion of the Census, in the year 1881, and of each decennial Census afterwards, the representation of the said Province shall be re-adjusted according to the provisions of the 51st section of the British North America Act, 1867.

By the Boundaries Act, 44 Victoria, section 2, it is provided that:

All the enactments and provisions of all the Acts of Parliament of Canada, which have, since the creation of the Province of Manitoba, been extended into and made to apply to the said Province, shall extend and apply to the territory, by this Act added thereto, as fully and effectually as if the same had originally formed part of the Province, and the boundaries thereof had, in the first instance, been fixed and defined, as is done by this Act—subject, however, to the provisions of section 3 of this Act."

It appears, then, by this clause, we have no legal claim on the Government for increased representation, and, therefore, I bring this motion before their attention to secure that improvement. We hold that the Province is now so much enlarged, being the second largest in the Dominion, that we have a strong claim to increased representation. The area of Quebec is 193,000 miles; Manitoba, 150,000, and Ontario, 109,000, and I believe that within the ten years, what with the rapid construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and branch connecting lines from the south and north; with the great attention now directed towards that country, not only by the people of Canada and by the people of the northern tier of States adjoining, but by the people of Europe; with the fair and judicious arrangements and satisfactory policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway in reference to land settlement; with the wise and judicious management of the affairs of the Dominion by the present Government; with everything secured of a tendency to build up the country, we may reasonably hope that within the next ten years our population will be little less than half a million. If our anticipations are realized, it must be considered by all as most unjust that Manitoba should be deprived of a fair representation. True, we have lost some settlers, who, owing to a clause in the Land Regulations preventing second homesteading, left us and settled in Dakota. But we have more than counterbalanced that loss—a few dozen settlers—by the accession of a number of settlers from the south-western States. We have received upwards of 100 families from Missouri, who are now contented and comfortable, and we have had last season a large immigration from Dakota and Minnesota, which there is no doubt will continue. Only last week I received a letter from a Methodist clergyman, settled in the town of Brainard, Minnesota, desirous of obtaining six townships in the North West, who states he is confident he can settle them within a year by Canadians from Minnesota. Doubtless, emigrants will pour into the country as lively as we expect, therefore I think the House should endeavor to take good care of her Big Infant in the North-West, and give her a fair representation. All that we ask is British fair play and no favor.

Motion agreed to.

CONGRATULATIONS UPON HER MAJESTY'S ESCAPE.

Mr. SPEAKER read the following Message from the Senate, acquainting the House, that they have agreed to the Address to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that he will be pleased to transmit the Joint Address of both Houses to Her Most Gracious Majesty's Providential escape, without injury, from the attempt made on her life on Thursday last,—by filling up the blank with the words "Senate and" and that such Joint Address of both Houses be transmitted to Her Majesty, in the first place with the utmost dispatch by cable message, and in such other manner as His Excellency may see fit, in order that the same may be laid at the foot of the Throne.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This resolution, I believe, has been sent down in the order in which it appears in the Journals. But I believe the Address should be presented to Her Majesty at once, and the earlier the better.

WINTER COMMUNICATION BETWEEN THE PROVINCE OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND THE MAINLAND.

Mr. BRECKEN moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and any other parties having reference to the improvement of the winter communication between the Province of Prince Edward Island and the mainland, with a view to keeping up daily steam communication for the conveyance of mails and passengers, as stipulated in the terms of Union. He said: In making this motion I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to the very important bearing of this question to the inhabitants of Prince Edward Island, from which Province I have the honor to come. When we entered Confederation in 1873, one of the terms agreed upon was continuous communication, winter and summer, with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion. Now, it may, perhaps, be urged with some reason that it is impossible to literally fulfil that condition. Such has been our experience with the Northern Light, which has been locked up a mile or two from Pictou during four weeks, and since last Friday she has been knocking about the Straits, and has not yet succeeded in reaching Prince Edward Island. But while we admit that during certain portions of the year, in January and February, it is almost impossible to construct a boat that will keep up continuous communication with anything like regularity, still there are other matters that ought to be considered, and there is a mode of communication still open to us that might be very vastly improved. Now, Sir, after we went into the Union, and during the years 1874, 1875 and 1876, they gave us a wooden boat called the Albert. She was placed on the route between Pictou, Nova Scotia, and Georgetown, Prince Edward Island. But she was utterly incompetent to do the work, so much so that she was never entrusted even with the carriage of the mails. After that we were given the steamer Northern Light, but the communication she gives us is so uncertain that we do not even send the mails by her. The most reliable mode of communication we still have is the old fashioned mode we have had for more than half a century, that between Cape Traverse in Prince Edward Island and Cape Tormentine on the mainland. Now this route, under the efficient and able management of the men who have charge of it, is tolerably secure, though the exposure and risk are very great. I venture to say there is not, in the most obscure corner of the Dominion, a more primitive mode of travelling than that we are compelled to adopt in Prince Edward Island. The nearest point in the Island Railway to Cape Traverse is eleven or twelve miles away. At the Cape you get into one of these canoes or boats, and then, going in a direct line of nine miles exposed in the open Gulf, you land at Cape Tormentine, and then you have to travel some thirty-six or forty miles before you reach the Intercolonial Railway. Now, Sir, I submit, with all respect to the hon. Ministers who comprise the Government, that that is not a fulfilment of one of the terms upon which we entered into Confederation. Doubtless the first consideration with us at that time was an anxiety to see these separate Provinces form one great Confederation, thereby strengthening the bonds that unite us with the Mother Country; but after that, one of the strongest inducements offered us to come into the Union was the promise of an efficient and continuous winter communication. Now, Sir, when you look at the mode of travelling in most countries in these civilized times, you must be struck with the contrast which it offers to the mode of communication to which we are confined—a mode so uncertain and offering so much exposure and hardship, that people only leave that Island now from an imperious sense of duty, such as impel hon. gentlemen who represent that Island to come up to Ottawa to attend their parliamentary duties, or pressing business interests; but under no other circumstances will people consent to leave the Island. The hardships and exposure to which travellers are subjected are so great that none but those of the most robust constitutions will undertake the journey. I am not drawing upon my imagination; I have had three or four years experience of it, and I do not hesitate to say that, compared with the facilities and comforts afforded in more fortunate parts of the Dominion, the mode of travelling to which the people of Prince Edward Island are confined is not fit for an Indian; but I mean to say that that term of the Union has not been carried out so far as we are concerned. I think we should have, at least, railway communication between Cape Traverse and the Island Railway on Cape Tormentine and the Intercolonial Railway. The service of the Northern Light we do not consider sufficient. There is not a man on the Island, from the most obscure to the most intelligent, who believes that the terms of the contract have been carried out. It is most desirable that any feeling of dissatisfaction should be allayed as far as possible, and I do hope that some improvement will be made on the present tedious and unsafe mode of travelling. The matter is one of far greater importance to us than possibly can be realized by hon. gentlemen living on the mainland. We were told when we entered the Confederation that our insular position would not operate prejudicially to us, and more—that whatever natural disadvantages we might labor under would, as far as possible, be removed. I think we have a strong claim founded on the terms of the contract on going into the Union, and founded on the principles of justice, for some such improvement as I have suggested; and I hope the position we occupy will engage the serious attention, not only of the Government, but of the members of this House. We are spending millions of money in other parts of the country in opening up means of communication, and we all recognize the fact that, if we wish to open up the country, we must have these means of communication. Some great historian—I think Macaulay—has said that, if you wish to learn of a country's advancement, you need not look at its paintings, its sculpture, or its poetry, but look at its roads, look at the facilities which it affords for men meeting together and exchanging thought and opinion with one another. His opinion is very true in this day, and in this country, for you can judge very safely of a country's advancement by the extent to which it enjoys these facilities. If you apply the rule to the mainland you must apply it to Prince Edward Island, and I would say that I think it will be a cloud, I would not say a blot, on the escutcheon of the hon. Minister of Railways, who has done so much in the way of opening up communication and affording facilities for travel on the mainland, if he makes the case of Prince Edward Island an exception to his general policy. He, himself, is from the Lower Provinces, his home is by the sea, and I hope he will see the necessity of doing something to help us in that matter. When the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin) spoke this afternoon about voting by electricity, I thought he rather depreciated our means of communication, but I was happy to find out that I had misunderstood him, because I know that he is a gentleman of great experience in these matters. I think there is no part of the Dominion which, at this moment, suffers greater natural disadvantages than our little Island, and I hope the hon. Minister of Railways and his colleagues will see the propriety of fulfilling the terms of the contract made with us at Confederation. In 1878, the Government, which was then led by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), sent down an experienced engineer, Mr. McLeod, who made surveys, and in the Sessional Papers of the House will be found valuable information collected by him. He strongly recommends something in the same direction as I am now suggesting, and his recommendations have the greater weight because he is an engineer and a scientific man, and cannot be open to the suspicion of political bias.

Mr. MUTTART. To the large majority of the members of this House this subject, I have no doubt, is of very trifling importance; but to Prince Edward Island representatives, and the people whom they represent, no question can be of greater importance than the question of continuous and efficient steam service between the Island and mainland both summer and winter. It is unnecessary for me to add anything to what has been already said as to the attempts which have been made towards navigating the Straits in the winter season. The old steamer Albert and the Northern Light have paid so many visits to Parliament, that there is no need of my introducing them on this occasion. It is not my intention to refer so much to what has been done as to what has not been done in the way of carrying out the terms on which we entered the Union. Fearing that the Government, as well as hon. members of this House, may have forgotten the exact wording of the bond, let me refresh their memories by reciting the exact words:

"Efficient steam service between this Island and the mainland, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the railway system of the Dominion."

Has this agreement been fulfilled, I would ask? I answer it has not. Now, one of the chief inducements held out to Prince Edward Islanders at the time of entering the Union was the promise that they were to have efficient steam service, winter as well as summer, between the Island and the railway system of the Dominion. I believe, if it were even suspected at that time that the Dominion Government would neglect or refuse to carry out every part of the agreement, especially that in reference to winter steam service, the people of the Island would never have consented to join the Union. They did join, however, and now I ask, is it right, is it just, to treat them with indifference because the Island happens to be the smallest Province of the Dominion. I appeal to the Government and to hon. members of this House for justice in this matter. This is not a party question; it is simply a question of fulfilment of contract between the Island and the Dominion Government. Whichever party may be in power the obligations remain the same. The late Government gave us the Northern Light as a sort of experiment, it is now said; and although, with no less a personage on board than our worthy Superintendent of Penitentiaries, she has been stuck in the ice for the last few weeks, she has nevertheless already proved the feasibility of navigating the Straits in winter, or for a portion of the winter at least. But, as I said, it is not my purpose to discuss at present the Northern Light, or the eastern route with an additional steamer, nor the branch railways in connection with the capes route. I merely wish to point out that the winter service between the Island and the mainland is neither continuous nor efficient. This state of affairs has continued already too long, and the people of the Island consider that they have waited about long enough to have this matter attended to. British Columbia entered the Union with the understanding that the Pacific Railway should be built within a given time; millions of dollars have been expended in keeping faith with British Columbia. Of this I do not complain, as the Government is bound to carry out their engagement with British Columbia, but not any more bound than they are to fulfil their agreement with Prince Edward Island. I only wish the members of the Government could be induced to take a trip to the Island at the present time. By the time they would travel from Amherst to Cape Tormentine and from Cape Tormentine across the Straits of Northumberland, by means of an ice boat, to Cape Traverse, and from there to the nearest point on the Island Railway, they would exclaim: "Our experience is more than sufficient. We will give the Islanders safer and easier communication with the railway system of the Dominion, regardless of cost."

Mr. HACKETT. This question is one of very great importance, not only to the people of Prince Edward Island but to the whole Dominion of Canada, that I consider I would not be fulfilling my duty if I remained silent at this time. It is my opinion that Prince Edward Island cannot be considered an integral part of the Dominion until the natural difficulties we labor under there are overcome. Although we may be a part of the Dominion on paper, I care not what Government may be in power, unless we have direct and continuous communication with the mainland, we cannot participate in the prosperity of the country. So important was this question considered at the time of Confederation, that the Government of the Island insisted on having a clause inserted in the Terms of Union, stating that direct and continuous steam communication between the Island and the mainland should be kept up at the expense of the Dominion Government. I say these terms have not been carried out. We have now been about eight years in Confederation, and yet we have still to resort to the old mode of crossing from the Island to the mainland in the winter. First, we had the old wooden boat Albert, which, in 1875, kept up communication for fifteen or twenty days after the close of navigation. Then we had the Northern Light, which, in the first year, proved a complete failure. In 1877, she did better, and latterly she has been crossing during the winter season with more or less regularity. But from January to April she is unable to keep up her trips regularly, and the old mode of carrying the mails has to be adopted; and but for the brave men who cross the ice, we would be cut off entirely. These men are very poorly paid; while large sums of money are spent in other parts of the country to keep up communication, these men who are engaged in crossing the Northumberland Straits in winter are the most poorly paid of any in the Dominion. They have to cross nine miles on the roughest description of ice, and were it not for their skill in this work, it would be quite impossible for us to keep up communication in the winter time. What we complain of is that nothing at all has been done to improve this route. I myself, about a month ago, crossed by that route. On leaving Prince Edward Island, we were about nine hours in the ice, dragging the boat with us, and on reaching the other side we had to put up with the hospitality of the people on the shore. There is nothing at all on that route for the accommodation of the public. I think this is very unfair. A very small amount of money, one or two thousand dollars, expended for building boat houses, in which the boats could be sheltered, and for affording accommodation to the public, would be a very great boon. Apart from the question of steam communication, I think the Government should improve the crossing at the Straits. When you reach the Straits, from the Intercolonial Railway to the Island Railway, you have to travel some forty miles. This could be overcome by building a branch line of railway, which would not cost more than from $500,000 to $1,000,000 and the interest on that would not be large. I hope the Government will not allow any time to elapse before they take action on this matter. The people of the Island have waited patiently while other claims were presented. While the members from British Columbia pressed their claims we kept silent, hoping that after they were settled the Terms of Union with the Province of Prince Edward Island would be carried out; and now that the question of a railway extending from the old Provinces of Canada to British Columbia is settled, we hope the Government will turn their attention to the improvement of winter communication with Prince Edward Island. The Terms of Union are not altogether confined, moreover, to the question of winter communication. Part of the agreement was that communication should be kept in summer time also. At the time we entered into Confederation, an Island company had the carrying of the mails from the Island to the mainland. From that time they received a subsidy from the Dominion Government. But as the wants of the country are increasing, so the accommodation should increase. The boats which run in the summer time are not now found sufficient, and as their contract will expire within a short time, it is very desirable that something should be done towards putting better boats on the route. It is well known, from the peculiar position of Prince Edward Island, that the whole of the Dominion, with the exception of a small portion of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, lies west and north of Summerside. Summerside is the point from which direct communication in the summer time should be kept up with the mainland. If good and strongly made screw steam vessels, having ample carrying capacity and accommodation for passengers, were placed on that route, they would prove a paying speculation not only to the owners but also as tending to develop the resources of the country. I hope before a long time elapses we shall find boats of that character doing that service. While I do not want to throw any blame on the Prince Edward Island Steam Navigation Company, as I believe they do the best they can, and that their captains are prudent and careful seamen, yet it does appear that the wants of the country have overdrawn the accommodation, while, in the meantime the boats have grown older and inadequate to meet the wants of the service. In October last year, while sailing vessels were putting out to sea from Summerside, the boats of the company were tied up, and for several days while there was open water the people were detained from receiving their mails. Looking at the fact that the Dominion Government undertook, at the time Prince Edward Island entered the Confederation, to provide efficient steam communication between the Island and the mainland, we, as representatives of the Island, are only doing our duty in urging this matter on the earnest attention of the Government. The people of the Island have waited long and patiently, and they believe the time has now arrived when this part of the compact shall be carried out; they insist on it, they look at it as part of their rights, and there should be no beating about the bush. This is a grievance under which the people are laboring, and they urge upon us, as their representatives, to urge upon the Government in Parliament to see that this portion of the Confederation Terms are carried out. I trust before any lengthened period has elapsed, and this year, during the present Session, some proposition will be made for the carrying out of this important part of the terms of the Confederation, and thus, to a very large extent, benefit the people of the Island, and also increase its trade with the older Provinces of the Dominion, because we are large consumers of the commodities of the older Provinces. We are an agricultural population; manufacturing has not developed to any great extent, and if it is desired that we shall be consumers of the manufactures of the older Provinces, and receive those goods as cheaply as possible and promote trade, the Government should, this Session, see that this important stipulation of Confederation shall be carried out.

THE CENSUS IN THE COUNTY OF ST. JOHN.

Mr. BOURASSA moved for a statement showing: 1st. The names of all officers and enumerators employed in taking the Census in 1881, in the County of St. John; 2nd. The amounts paid to each of them for fees, emoluments and travelling expenses; 3rd. The number of miles certified as having been travelled by each of them. He said: Mr. Speaker, in making this motion I must call the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to the fact that there have been some deplorable omissions on the part of the Census takers in certain parishes of the County of St. John. They have omitted taking notice of some of the finest, and I may add, most valuable properties in the county, on which somewhat numerous families have resided for a period of fifty years. I do not understand how such omissions have taken place, but, at any rate, such is the case. I would not like to say much of all the other parishes of the county, for I am aware that the Census was correctly taken in some parishes, as I personally know the enumerator employed in so doing, but in the parish of St. John inconceivable omissions have taken place.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to the motion just made by the hon. member. With regard to the omission of certain names or properties, I feel sure that such is the case, since the hon. member says so, but the fact has not come to the knowledge of the Department; and I hope the hon. member will be good enough to give to the Department the names of persons whose properties have not been taken in the Census, so that the Department may make enquiries of the enumerators employed in that county, in order to ascertain how it is that these omissions occurred. I am, nevertheless, certain that on the whole the Census was well taken; there may have been a few omissions on the part of the Census taker, and it is to be hoped that the hon. member will communicate the names that he knows to have been omitted to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BOURASSA. Mr. Speaker, I called at the Department of Agriculture, and on enquiry I found that the names of whole families were omitted from the Census sheet, so I gave those names to the Deputy Minister of the Department. But again, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the property omitted is one of the finest in the parish of St. John.

EXPORT OF COAL FROM NOVA SCOTIA.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH, in the absence of Mr. MACKENZIE, moved for a statement showing the quantity of coal exported from the ports of Nova Scotia, during the years 1877-78 and 1880-81, and the countries to which such coal was exported; also, the quantity of coal carried upwards through the St. Lawrence Canals and through Ste. Ann's Lock on the Ottawa River.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Suppose you amend the motion, so as to include 1879 also?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I have no objection.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

RAILWAY CROSSINGS—QUEEN AND DUFFERIN STREETS, TORONTO.

Mr. WALLACE (York), in moving for a return of all correspondence, petitions and reports of Government Engineers relative to the different railway crossings at Queen street and Dufferin street, on the western limit of the city of Toronto, said: There are four different railroads crossing those streets; and, owing to the want of repairs to the tracks, as well as neglect of proper precautions, a number of lives have been lost, and many persons maimed for life. I believe a report by a Dominion and an Ontario engineer have been made on this subject, and I hope we shall soon see that proper measures have been taken to protect at those points the lives and limbs of the public. I understand the report recommends gates, which are thought likely by the people of the neighborhood to prove a useful protection. In accordance with the opinion of the Common Council, it is considered that gateways would not be a sufficient protection; but that a sub-way or a bridge should be constructed. I hope the Government will take this important subject into consideration, so that by this time next year there will exist a suitable protection, either in the form of a sub-way or bridge, at this particular point.

Motion agreed to.

MAPS OF MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. HESSON moved for copies of all maps of Manitoba, the North-West, and British Columbia, published by authority of the Department of the Interior, for the year ending December 31st, 1881, and up to the present date. He said: My object in bringing this motion before the House is to explain the impossibility of members here supplying constituents with all the maps of this region asked for in consequence of the limited number furnished. This matter was brought before the Committee of Immigration and Colonization last year, and, I believe, then the member for North Huron pressed strongly the necessity of having a large supply of good reliable maps for the information of the people who take an interest in that great country. It was pointed out there is a desire to ascertain all that can be known about the North-West, and that the success of settling the United States north-western region was largely attributable to the extensive distribution of maps by land and railway companies. We have a railway corporation now, which is also desirous of settling our North-West, and, in conjunction with the Government, it might well issue a sufficient number of maps to meet the demands of the members of this House. Within the past week I have received at least fifty or sixty letters asking for maps, and on one day three telegrams. True, a very large supply was issued by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, which contained the land regulations. Still I consider the map is too small, and when you send such an article to one constituent, and a very superior map to comparatively few, much dissatisfaction is created. The small map is so small as to be almost valueless, and only seems to give offence where a member, too, intends to confer a compliment by it. If it is not in the power of the Government to furnish members with a sufficient supply of good maps, or at least a good one for the Post Office in each county, where it might be consulted by all interested in the country, I would suggest, as it is not a very expensive production, that a map be issued, having the imprint of the Department of the Interior, which would be likely to be considered correct, and give satisfaction to enterprising individuals thinking of the North-West. Those maps might be distributed on the authority as well as with the imprint of the Department, and placed in the bookstores, where they might be sold for actual cost to the Government. The large maps should be printed and placed where the people could have easy access to them. I know it is announced that a few more will be distributed to the members, but an hon. gentleman says the supply is run out, and even the paper is not to be had. I hope the Government will remedy this, and afford the people all the information possible. I believe good maps would be more valuable than a great number of these pamphlets now circulated at the expense of the Government, and at great expense to the Post Office Department in particular. Many of those pamphlets are thrown away, while a valuable map would be preserved. I think 12½ cents would cover the cost of the colored maps, while giving the most gratifying information with regard to the North-West.

Mr. ARKELL. I second the resolution, and fully agree with the remarks just made. I believe the North-West is now becoming a very important part of the Dominion, and that all the information obtainable by the Government should be furnished to the people. I believe that there is no better medium of communicating information to the people than through a large number of good reliable maps of that territory. My hon. friend only asked for four maps for each member of the House. The hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) suggests that the Government should furnish each member of this House with forty maps. I am not here to advocate a large expenditure, but I believe it would meet with general favor for the Government to issue a reasonable lot of maps, and supply, first the members, and then the people at large, in so far as the Government might think advisable.

Mr. McCUAIG. This system will involve a large expense to the country. I think it would be better for the Government to supply each clerk of the various township councils with a map, and it would be the duty of the clerk to keep it exposed in his office so that every one could go there and inspect it. My county is sixty miles square, and in the general intelligence of its people, I think, it will bear favorable comparison with any other county. I have been asked for maps by thirty or forty individuals living in different lots, and because I could not supply all of them with maps some of them were annoyed. It seems to me that if the Government would furnish three or four maps to each clerk of a township who should keep them exposed for the use of the farmers, that is all the Government should be called upon to do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This matter, of course, has occupied the attention of the Government. Hon. gentlemen must know that these maps are not made for nothing, and if all the demands were granted I think it would cost a good many townships to pay for the maps at the selling price of the land. About twenty-five thousand of the maps of a late issue, have been published, and a great many have been sent home to the Old Country and to Europe. Of course, it is more important to the Dominion as a whole, that the maps should go across to the Old Country than merely be the means of transferring a portion of the population from one part of the Dominion to another. There has been a large issue of these maps, and, as hon. members know, they are very complete; and I believe they are exceedingly accurate, but they are not inexpensive. At first, not thinking the demand was so great, maps were issued to people as they were asked for, but the demand for them was so great, the rush was so great—people were getting them, and I dare say some people were selling them for all we know—that the whole supply was exhausted. There has been a new edition issued, and it is proposed by the Government to issue a considerable number to each member of each House for distribution among his constituents; and then arrangements are to be made with the publisher of the maps to sell them at cost price and to place them in every booksellers' shop in every place in the Dominion. That is the plan of the Government, which, I hope, meets with the general assent of the House.

Mr. BUNSTER. I would ask the hon. leader of the Government what is being done for British Columbia. Not one map has been issued for British Columbia, while the hon. leader of the Government admits that 25,000 are being issued for Manitoba. I think British Columbia is not included in the North-West. I think great injustice is being done to British Columbia, and it is to be hoped the Government will not continue to do such injustice as not to have maps published of that Province. Even the maps of British Columbia that have been issued by the Government have not done that Province justice, and I hope the Government will remedy that injustice in any future map they may publish. The map ought to show the resources of that country, and I am satisfied our resources are such that every Canadian will be proud of them when they are represented on the map. A great injustice has been done to British Columbia through not having maps, through not having proper representations made of her resources. Through the neglect of the Government in locking up the land of British Columbia, and asking our Provincial Government to keep them in reserve, immigration has been prevented from coming in there, and hence we are not able to show that we have made as much progress as the North-West in consequence of the Government locking up the public domain.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am obliged to my hon. friend for his suggestion, as we both come from the same Province and represent the people. I will, however, point out a little difference between our Province and the North-West. The lands in the North-West all belong to the Dominion Government, and as they want to sell those lands they must prepare maps for that purpose of all the lands, except the railway belts which belong to the Provincial Government, and it is for the Provincial Government to prepare maps of all those portions of the great Province of British Columbia, except such as are not included in the lands to be conveyed as a subsidy for the Canadian Pacific Railway. The limits of those lands have not been settled yet; I hope they will be shortly, and then as the railway works up to Kamloops and opens up that very fine country, maps will be prepared by the Dominion Government and the lands will be put into the market, and I have no doubt my hon. friend will go to speculating there and make as much money as some of our hon. friends have made at Winnipeg.

Motion agreed to.

TELEGRAPH EXTENSION IN VANCOUVER ISLAND.

Mr. BUNSTER, in moving for all papers asking that the telegraph line on the east coast of Vancouver Island from Nanaimo be extended to Comox, so as to accommodate the communication of the farmers, merchants and traders of Comox with the outer world, said: This is a question of greater importance than the Government are aware of. There are at least 300 or 400 at Comox, and there would be a great many more only for the reserve to which the hon. leader of the Government has referred. There is no reason why the Government should not extend the telegraph line, inasmuch as they have not built the railway which they should have built years ago, particularly according to the Carnarvon Award. I hope the Minister of Public Works will take the matter into consideration and have the line extended, as I believe it will be a paying institution from the time it is built. In fact it should have been built years ago.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I take leave to read a communication I have just received from the Governor
Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

General's Office, conveying a telegraphic Message dated 6th March, 1882. The Message is as follows:—

LONDON, 6th March, 1882.

Message 3rd March, laid before Queen. Her Majesty much gratified by congratulations of Legislature and people of Canada for escape and by assurances of loyalty and devotion.

KIMBERLY.

READJUSTMENT OF THE REPRESENTATION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MILLS. Before the motion is put, I wish to ask the leader of the Government when he intends to bring down the Bill relating to the distribution of seats on the Census, which was recently taken. The measure is a most important one, and as four weeks have elapsed since the Session opened, members of the House are, naturally, anxious to know what the hon. gentleman proposes; and this, of course, we cannot know until the Bill is before us.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is true; but it is early in the Session yet. This is only the fourth week of the Session, but I may say that the measure is now being considered. It is a matter of great importance constitutionally, and we have, necessarily, to legislate in the matter. We will bring down the Bill in due season, so as to give the hon. gentleman, and every member of the House, an opportunity of expressing his views and considering the measure when it comes before the House. I may say, at once, that this measure excites a great deal of interest. I find that much correspondence has taken place, as every one wishes to have a constituency or two in his immediate vicinity. The Government will consider the matter with a desire to prepare a measure satisfactory to the House, and will bring the Bill down in due season, so that it may have the full consideration of hon. members.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it is proper, in commencing a discussion which affects, in every way, the great interests of the Dominion, that I may, as a member of this House, as a loyal subject of the Queen, refer to the terrible occurrence with which we were shocked a few days ago. I may say, and I think I express the feelings not only of this House, but of the whole Dominion, without exception—for I believe no more loyal people exist, owing allegiance to the British Crown, than the people of Canada—that we heard, with the greatest grief and indignation, of the wicked attempt on the life of Her Majesty the Queen, and rejoice that the assassin has been powerless to inflict the slightest injury; and that in this, as in previous instances, a merciful Providence has interposed to protect and shield our beloved Sovereign, and to spare her to the faithful and loyal millions over whom she exercises, under the Divine blessing, a just and beneficent rule. Mr. Speaker, when the debate closed on Friday evening, we had been listening for long time to a speech of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). The skill with which that hon. gentleman presents his side of the argument is well known to the House, and it is also well known to those audiences whom he has addressed in various parts of the country during the recess of Parliament. He is, Sir, I believe, one of the prominent leaders of the Opposition party, and we are to accept his statements as being authorized by the leader of the Opposition, and generally sanctioned and endorsed by those hon. gentlemen who sit beside him. That hon. gentleman, after a rambling discussion of the Tariff and its effects, came down to facts, as he is pleased to call them, and treated us, for a long time, to certain figures taken from the Public Accounts in which he claims to be an expert. Now, Sir, after a long experience in the tactics of that hon. gentleman, I may say—I think I may say it without offence to him—that whenever he makes a statement with particular precision and a good deal of vehemence, without ever presuming to doubt, in a parliamentary sense, that the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in everything he says, I always go back to the record for the purpose, of course, of ascertaining, as I expect to ascertain, and as I hope always to ascertain, that the hon. gentleman is quite within the limits of what may be called parliamentary truth. When the hon. gentleman's speech was put into my hands, I ventured to take up the Public Accounts, the Tables of Trade and Navigation, and other material from which the hon. gentleman drew a large portion of his speech; as I wished by this means to ascertain the general accuracy of the hon. gentleman's statements; and, as I always like to dispose of figures as soon as possible, I will venture to go over some of the main parts of his speech and compare part of his figures with others which I have ascertained to be official, which every hon. gentleman in this House may verify for himself. It may fairly be claimed that if, in a great number of instances, he has given figures which can be shown, whether through accident or design, manifestly wrong, great credit should not be attached to the laborious effort of the hon. gentleman. I will now take up the hon. gentleman's speech and go over portions of it point by point; it will be a little tedious to do so, but I hope I shall not be quite as tedious as he was. In speaking of the hon. Finance Minister's address new under discussion, he says: "The hon. Minister of Finance will remember that by the obligations he incurred in 1873, instead of bringing down an estimate of $20,900,000, he should have brought one down of $23,368,000. This must be specially noted." He says, also, that the average expenditure for the last two years of the late Government was $23,511,229. This is the beginning of his statement of figures. Now, I wish to show that, in regard to the $23,368,000 which he asserts was the expenditure for which the Government of 1873 is wholly responsible, we have made statements which have been uncontradicted in this House year after year, showing that the expenditure of 1873-74, after all the Supplementary Estimates were brought in, for which my hon. friend who now occupies the place of Finance Minister can possibly be held responsible, amounted to $22,300,000. That hon. gentleman has stated, on the floor of this House, that in order to swell the expenditure of that year, and to cast obloquy on his predecessor, the late hon. Minister of Finance took $567,000, which should have been charged to the capital account and put to the operating account of the Intercolonial Railway; that there was another item of about $200,000 for election expenses which is chargeable to the hon. gentlemen opposite; there were refunds and other items swelling the amount to $922,000, which were added to the expenditure for 1873-74, some of which ought not to have gone into expenditure chargeable against revenue at all, while for other items of the $922,000 the Government succeeding the Government of 1873 were clearly responsible. My hon. friend, when he makes statements of this kind, is very apt to look only on one side of the account. He asserts that the average expenditure on Consolidated Fund account of the late Government was $23,511,229, for its last two years. Now, mark how plain a tale shall put him down. Its expenditure the last year but one was $23,503,158; its expenditure the next year was $24,455,381, making altogether $47,958,539, the average of which is $23,979,269, instead of $23,511,000. There is a little difference of $468,000, to begin with.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Will the hon. gentleman—

Mr. PLUMB. I do not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. ROSS. The hon. gentleman is talking about 1878-79, when I spoke of the last four years of the Government.

Mr. PLUMB. I call the hon. gentleman to order. The expenditure for our two years, 1879-80, and 1880-81 were respectively $24,850,624 and $23,502,550, in all, $50,365,188, or an average of $25,176,594. The average increase is $1,197,325, instead of $1,625,365, as the hon. gentleman asserts, and the increase of our average expenditure for those two years is $718,000 and not $2,000,000 as the hon. gentleman asserted. I knew the hon. gentleman would wince when caught in that misstatement. How long has the hon. gentleman assured the country that we were responsible for the expenditure of 1873-74; but his party came in power in October, 1873, precisely as our friends did, in October, 1878, but his friends were not long in power before they began to increase the expenditure. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the expenditure of 1878-79 was made on the estimates of the late Finance Minister, and he knows perfectly well that he is attempting to steal a verdict by falsely stating—in a parliamentary sense I mean, and I say so with apologies—by knowingly stating that the expenditure of 1877-78 was the expenditure for the last year of their period. We know better than that, and we will prove it before we get through. He said that the highest expenditure of the late Administration was $3,600,000. I suppose he says so now.

Mr. ROSS. I did not say so then.

Mr. PLUMB. The statement is in the Hansard, and I will read it.

Mr. ROSS. Read it.

Mr. PLUMB. He says the average expenditure during the last two years was $23,511,229, and, in another place, which I shall come to directly, he says that from an expenditure of $23,500,000, such as they required in 1877-78, the expenditure has leaped up to $27,600,000, and that we are responsible for the increase. He also says that the Estimates proposed now with the Supplementary Estimates brought down amount to $27,600,000 or $4,000,000 more than the highest expenditure of the Reform Administration. This means an assertion that the Reform Administration did not spend more than $23,600,000 in any year, but in fact they spent $24,448,372 in 1875-76, and $22,345,381 in 1878-79; and the expenditure was only kept down in the two intermediate years, by cutting down the militia expenditure $400,000 and odd, and taking from Public Works chargeable to income nearly $500,000 more. There was an increase in every item of what is called controllable expenditures and that by a Government which claimed to be specially a Reform and an economical Government. It is quite easy to see how the expenditure was brought down below $24,000,000; and it is equally easy to see how the hon. gentlemen opposite dodged those items altogether. He says that this extravagant Government increased the expenditure $10,000,000 between 1867 and 1873-74. Well, I have heard that before. In fact, none of the hon. gentleman opposite ever get up to make a financial speech without repeating that old charge. I have often asked what they mean. Do they intend to say that that increased expenditure of $10,000,000 was improper in any way; that the interests of the country did not require it? Do they intend to say that when they were sitting in Opposition, year after year, the late Finance Minister or any of his new friends ever seriously challenged that expenditure till 1873, when, for the first time, he criticised adversely the Budget brought down by my hon. friend, the present Finance Minister? I never yet have heard any hon. gentleman on the other side say here, where he could be met face to face and answered, that a single item of this expenditure was unnecessary. It necessarily grew out of the cementing together of the Provinces into the Union; it was indispensable for the purpose of creating Courts of Justice, for the opening up of the North-West, and the bringing in of other Provinces to the Confederation, the establishment of lighthouses, the improvement of harbors, and other expenditures of that kind. All these items have been defended over and over again on this side of the House, and yet every time an hon. gentleman on the other side begins a financial speech, he goes back to the same old cry; but, to use a very vulgar expression, it is a cry that is "played out." I shall now begin in further answering the member for South Brants figures at the very head of the items of controllable expenditure, but before doing so, I wish to say one word with respect to controllable expenditure itself. The hon. gentleman is very careful on this point. With that ingeniousness which is his peculiar forte, and which is so well understood by those who have heard him, he indicates but very vaguely what he regards a controllable expenditure. He does not say precisely what it is, but he says that the items of controllable expenditure there have been large increases. Now, I will undertake to define, as nearly as I can, what controllable expenditure is. First, I say that when we take up the Public Accounts or the balance sheet of the year, there are certain items which, in the present condition of things, must be regarded as not controllable. These items are among others Charges upon debt—Interest and Sinking Fund—which are voted by Parliament. Subsidies to Provinces may also be numbered among them. Then, I say that the expenditure for the North-West Territories are largely a charge which must be made—a charge which we must expect to increase every year if we intend to gain anything by our possession of these Territories, and it is a charge which will necessarily increase year by year so long as prosperity increases, and so long as immigrants are going into that vast country. Whenever that expenditure is diminishing, it is a sign that we have failed in our attempt to colonize that great domain, and that our predictions in regard to it have not been fulfilled. Now, Sir, the charges for interest on Debt and Sinking Fund, charges of management and subsidies to Provinces, for the past eight years have been as follows: In 1873-74, $10,255,000; in 1874-75, $11,124,000; in 1875-76, $11,122,000; in 1876-77, $11,480,000; in 1877-78, $11,659,000; 1878-79, $11,952,000, in 1879-80, owing to the necessity of negotiating loans for the purpose of constructing the Pacific Railway, it was increased to $12,659,000; and, in 1880-81, it was reduced again to $12,525,000, instead of being increased as the hon. gentleman has asserted. The ordinary expenditure of 1873-74—and I wish to have particular note taken of this—owing to the improper items to which I have referred having been included in that expenditure of that year, amounted to $8,324,000; in 1874-75, it amounted to $7,868,000; in 1875-76—under that economical Government that promised us reform in every direction, that came into power face to face with the greatest financial crisis of this century, that promised reductions on all hands, under the authority of a gentleman who was one year a mixer and muddler and the next year a heaven-born financier—the expenditure was $8,569,774; in 1876-77, by starving the militia and public works, they reduced it to $6,835,000; in 1877-78, it was $6,542,000; in 1878-79, it was $6,941,000; in 1879-80, it was $6,963,000; and, in 1880-81, it was $7,293,000. Now, the charges on revenue, in 1873-74, amounted to $4,736,000; in 1874-75, $4,719,654; in 1875-76, $4,796,238; in 1876-77, in which year began the period of deficits, and of a falling off in the revenue and an increase in the cost of collecting of it, which signalized the Administration of the party of my hon. friend from Middlesex, the charges on revenue amounted to $5,194,896; in 1877-78 they amounted to $5,301,124, with a still declining revenue; in 1878-79, they amounted to $5,561,162—and that was the culminating crisis, and in that year an indignant people requested the hon. gentleman and his friends to take the opposite side of the House. In 1879-80, under a conservative Government, they amounted to but $5,227,113, with an advancing revenue; and, in 1880-81, the last year of which we have the Public Accounts, they amounted to $5,683,153, on a revenue of over $18,400,000 from Customs' duties $5,343,000 from excise, an increase of revenue of $5,500,000 over the last year of the late Administration with an increase of charge for collecting this additional amount of only $120,000, producing a surplus over expenditure of more than $4,000,000. The total expenditure in 1873-74, for which hon. gentlemen opposite declare we were responsible, less the items which I have just stated, amounting to $959,000, was $22,316,000. In 1874-75 it was $24,713,071, to which is fairly chargeable the $959,000 also; if as hon. gentlemen opposite contend the whole of it is chargeable to revenue at all, this would make the expenditure of 1873-74, $22,762,701; it stands $23,713,071; the expenditure for 1875-76, $24,488,327; in 1876-77, $23,519,301; in 1877-78, $23,503,158; in 1878-79, $22,455,381; in 1879-80, $24,850,634; and, in 1880-81, $25,502,554. Now, if we deduct from this the charges for interest on debt and sinking fund, the subsidies to the Provinces, and the expenditure of the North-West Territories, on the principle I have stated—which I am sure the majority of the members of this House will agree with me is the only correct principle—the controllable expenditure of the Dominion will be, for 1873-74, $12,128,534; for 1874-75, $11,593,969; for 1875-76, $12,207,902; for 1876-77, $11,235,139; for 1877-78, $10,944,640; for 1878-79, $11,567,816; and for 1879-80, $11,015,797. Thus the controllable expenditure for 1879-80, was $1,112,737 less than the controllable expenditure of 1873-74, notwithstanding the improper addition to the expenditure of that year which I have noted; it was $577,000 less than the controllable expenditure of 1874-75; it was $1,192,105 less than the controllable expenditure of 1875-76; it was $239,342 less than the controllable expenditure of 1876-77; it was $71,000 more than the controllable expenditure of 1877-78; and it was $561,019 less than the controllable expenditure of 1878-79, for which hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible in every possible way, far more so than we were for the controllable expenditure of 1873-74. Now, Sir, that is a specimen of the reasoning of the hon. gentleman who has sought to prove that his party decreased the controllable expenditure between 1874 and 1879 to the extent of $2,000,000. The hon. gentleman is very fond of averaging. The total controllable expenditure from 1874 to 1879, inclusive, amounted to $69,706,449, or an average of $11,617,740 for each year. Our expenditure for 1877-80 and for 1880-81, to which the hon. gentleman called attention, make altogether, $22,702,826; the average of that is $11,351,413. The comparison between their average from 1874 to 1879 and our average from 1879 to 1881 shows that they spent in controllable expenditure an average each year of $11,716,749, while we spent $11,351,403 in 1879-80 and 1880-81, those extravagant years to which the hon. gentlemen opposite are constantly referring, and, therefore, that our average yearly expenditure in those years was less than theirs by $365,337.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to call his attention to a point.

Mr. PLUMB. I will allow the hon. gentleman to speak when the proper time comes.

Mr. ROSS. The average cannot come higher than the greatest expenditure during any one year.

Mr. PLUMB. There will be time enough for the hon. gentleman to speak. In the course of his speech he stated that we required on an average $760,951 more for interest than was required during the late Reform Administration. This does not prove anything in this particular connection, and can only have reference to an improper increase of the debt, but I only want to show the general incorrectness of the hon. gentleman's figures, and I take that point. The whole interest paid in 1875-76-77-78-79 amounted to $31,470,000, being an average of $6,294,000. In 1879-80 and 1880-81, it was $13,786,000, or $6,893,000 annually. The hon. gentleman has made a statement under this head which is incorrect, and not borne out by the figures. They increased the expenditure $952,000 between 1877-78 and 1878-79, the next year we increased it $394,000, and the increase for the last year over 1878-79 is $1,047,000. Taking the controllable expenditure for our two years, he says the increase is $750,000. I have, however, shown that the average decrease in the controllable expenditure is $365,337. The hon. gentleman is about $385,000 wrong there. The hon. gentleman said:

"I take up the next Department of Government, Administration of Justice. Now, Sir, this was a Department that was very closely criticized by our opponents. They charged us with extravagance here as elsewhere. What do we find? The average expenditure during the last two years of the late Government averaged $563,260; the average for the two last years of the Administration was $579,314, an increase of about $14,000 over our average, and the Estimates call for this year, $613,519."

The hon. gentleman is wrong there, his average should be $571,608, while ours is $579,034, an increase of $7,400 instead of $14,000. The hon. gentleman further said:

"The same applies to the Immigration Department. We have an enormous increase, an increase of $70,000 over our last year."

Now, let us look at the Immigration Department. The expenditure for the six years that I charge against hon. gentlemen opposite, was $1,704,033; the average expenditure those years was $292,342 or $41,530 more, by averages, than our expenditures for the last two years, 79-80 and 80-81, which amounted to $250,812. The hon. gentleman is wrong here as usual. The hon. gentleman next stated that there had been a great increase under the head of Pensions. He used these words:

"Then pensions came under our view; we find a large increase in them also, over $8,000 beyond our average for our two last years."

We will take up Pensions. The amount expended during the six years of the late Administration reached $556,478, the average being $92,746. Our Pensions for 1880-81 were $96,388, but for the two years 1877-78-78-79 their average was $106,819, while for the two succeeding years ours was but $99,618, so the hon. gentleman got on the wrong track again. The Superannuations to which the hon. gentleman refers must necessarily increase. It is impossible that, in a service like ours, men will not be growing older and must be placed on the superannuation fund. The increase is a small one, but it is one that will grow, and I will not take exception to it in regard to the hon. gentleman, if the country is ever so unfortunate as to have him on this side of the House, so long as hon. gentlemen do not make superannuations for the purpose of making places for favorites who are older than the officers they superannuate. We now come to the item of Militia and Defence. The hon. gentleman said :

"I have great doubts, however, as to the propriety of this House and country expending annually from $600,000 to $700,000 on this service. I notice the hon. the Minister asks this year for a still larger estimate, I believe for $750,500. This is an enormous amount, and in the face of the expenditure made in that service by the late Administration."

Let us look at the Militia Service. That service, for the years which I have taken up, and during which hon. gentlemen opposite managed the affairs of the country, cost $4,916,134; that is an average of $819,355. Yet, the hon. gentleman deplors the fact that $750,000 are asked for by the hon. Minister this year, in view of our growing population, and the increased need of military drill and volunteer organization. This is a criticism of the estimates. It is not money spent, but asked for. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about estimates as if they were expenditures; they mix up the two, and whenever they find it most convenient to their purposes to quote one or the other they do so indiscriminately. They never adhere strictly to the Public Accounts, for they find them fraught with danger to their arguments. The expenditure under the Militia head for the last two years amounted to $690,019, and $667,000, making an average of $678,509, against an average yearly expenditure by hon. gentlemen opposite of $819,355, a reduction of $140,000 in our favor. I do not state this because I consider it true economy to cut down the Militia expenditure; on the contrary, I am very willing to support a liberal expenditure; and I am well pleased my hon. friend who holds the position of Minister of Militia has entered earnestly into his work, and does not, as a loyal Canadian, stand exactly in the position that some gentlemen occupied who held the office when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. Then comes an attack, a gross attack, on our Minister of Public Works—an attack which the hon. gentleman went out of his way to make, in scarcely parliamentary terms. But we are so accustomed to that kind of tactics with hon. gentlemen on the other side, that it is scarcely noticed by us except when some gross breach of propriety compels hon. gentlemen on this side to rise up and denounce it. Let us look at the Department of Public Works, said the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), and contemplate the monstrous and extravagant increase in its expenditure! Of course, we perfectly well understand that public works are matters which, unless we have all the details of the various building and other operations, cannot be fairly criticized by looking at any lump sum. But as the hon. gentleman is fond of averages, we will give him an average in this case. The entire expenditure on Public Works and Buildings chargeable to income, during the year for which the hon. gentlemen opposite were responsible, was $8,807,091, giving an average of $1,467,849 a year, and we know how suddenly and suspiciously it was reduced in 1876-77 and 1877-78. The entire expenditure of the present Government under that head during the last two years was $2,190,091, or an average of $1,045,345 per annum, showing that the late Government spent on a yearly average just $572,525 more than the present Government. He also spoke of Indian grants, saying that the average for the last two years reached $361,549; but it really rose to $455,415. The hon. gentleman knows that those grants are not properly subject to the kind of criticism he practised in this House. He knows the exigencies of this country—the necessity for preserving the peace between the Whites and the Indians and keeping open the North-West—a necessity upon which the future fortunes of Canada largely depend, and that our treatment of the Indians must be in a liberal and kindly spirit—the poor men who were the original owners of the soil. The hon. gentleman will do well to contrast—when he is so fond of making contrasts between the Government on this and the southern side of the frontier—our policy with the spirit in which those unhappy aborigines have been treated by our neighbors to the south, and there is no more commendable item in the Public Accounts than that which shows we have endeavored to deal justly—aye, and more than justly—honestly, liberally, fairly, and in a kindly spirit, with those helpless beings to whom the Dominion Parliament is both guardian and trustee. This is not an item for the kind of criticism which the hon. gentleman has indulged in. Now, he says, the late Administration were able to manage the affairs of the country for $23,500,000 a year—I told him, I would come to that statement which he has just now denied, and that the present Administration asks $26,600,000—Estimates again, instead of ascertained expenditure—and that where the late Government reduced the controllable expenditure $2,000,000 in four years, the present Government have increased it already $750,000. I would like the hon. gentleman to show me the items of expenditure reduced in the four years of their term mentioned. They are not in the Public Accounts. The hon. gentleman must have some secret plan of making up his sums, and I would like to see his method of putting statements together. I say those statements are utterly garbled, or utterly without foundation. The average annual expenditure of the late Government was $23,875,876—upon a declining revenue and yearly increasing deficits—with a condition of the country previously unknown, with failure and disasters staring the late hon. Ministers in the face, and with a Finance Minister who constantly refused to look at the public necessities—who spurned the people who came to him asking, imploring him that he would try to do something for their aid—a man who refused to hear a delegation of the business men of the country who came to seek relief, when he was mixing, muddling and meddling with the Tariff—who produced a Tariff on the 14th of April, 1874, withdrew it and brought one down entirely different on the 29th of the same month, having harassed, unsettled and disturbed every interest in the country. Dealing with that period of depression, he expected to get $3,000,000 by increasing the taxation, and he increased the expenditure to put the people's money into the pockets of those of his followers who had helped to get himself and colleagues into power. We had yearly deficits, amounting in all to nearly $7,000,000, with the public credit so paralysed, that our 4 per cents. sold at 87½, I believe, or less. Our factories were closed, our business was prostrated, bankrupt stocks of merchandise destroyed the business of the honest trader, and yet the stream of expenditure swelled and grew larger and wholly exhausted the public Treasury. The late Finance Minister, in his first speech, after he took the responsibility of office, when the commercial disasters of that period were impending, stated that he could not be expected to attempt to cut down the expenditure on public works, then under the control of the leader of the so-called Reform Government. Oh! no! He could inflict $3,000,000 of taxation upon the people which did not produce any adequate revenue for the Treasury, and he was compelled to do so, because those who had helped these hon. gentlemen into power demanded their pound of flesh from the people, and they got it. Remembering these facts, and holding the hon. gentleman from West Middlesex responsible as an accessory, it seems very strange to me that he should have ventured to make to the House the statement we heard last Friday. I knew that it was impossible they could have been made from the Public Accounts. After charging us with the whole expenditure for 1873 and 1874, he was cunning enough to attempt to hold us responsible for what could not be laid to our door, thinking he could get a small advantage in making up his statement on that basis. I believe I can appeal to any fair-minded man to sustain me in the endeavor to put the position taken by him fairly before this House, and through the House before the country. The truth is, that when one hears statements made by the hon. gentleman with his pleasant flow of language, and his captivating eloquence—an eloquence learned in a different school from the Parliament of Canada, but which still gives him an advantage over many of us, who do not hold the quasi-official position that he does—we are almost led for a moment to pay grave attention to it; just as we are led very often, when we find in the newspapers a taking heading, with the relation of some attractive incident in a great society, something that catches our eye, following it till we find we have been entrapped into reading an advertisement of a patent medicine. It is exactly so with the hon. gentleman; his speech may take us in for the moment but we know it is a puff of the men who led the country into trouble—a quack nostrum, after all, like St. Joshua's Ointment, or some other take in of that kind. We never hear one of his speeches without feeling, when we get to the end, we had been sold or disappointed by it. It is not very easy to find out the trick, but when we once know it we are not likely to be caught again. The hon. gentleman manifests the same rabid antipathy to the manufacturing interests which characterizes all the gentlemen of his school. He forgets nothing, and he learns nothing from the condition of the times at present. The first utterance I made in this House this Session was made in order to fix the attention of the House upon the fact that, after witnessing the unexampled prosperity of the country, after seeing that we were rising out of the great depression for which hon. gentlemen on the opposite side were in some degree responsible, when there were cheering signs of prosperity everywhere, when there was no doubt that success had largely attended the efforts of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to do something for the struggling industries of the country—that hon. gentleman came back to this House with the same bitterness that characterizes him and his party in their attacks upon these industries. I have noticed, to be sure, that there are gentlemen on the other side who are trying to hedge just now when they find the tide turning so swiftly against them. But those who are prominent in that are too well known; it is too thin; nobody will believe in the sincerity of any man in regard to Protection who can argue as well on one side as the other, and whose arguments in favor of a protective policy have been equally convincing with his arguments against it. The hon. member for West Middlesex has a great deal to say about the unfortunate position of the consumer in this country. He also has a good deal to say about the unfortunate position of the producer. He says we are handicapping the manufacturers, and he says, at the same time, that the consumers are suffering from our policy. We have been told that the manufacturing interest was to be destroyed by the protective policy; that the burdens we were throwing upon the manufacturers would break them up, or else that those who were prosperous would engage in such reckless competition that prices would decline so far as to ruin them. Well, if prices are kept down by competition—and I believe they will be—the home market will be secured and the consumers will get the benefit; and I am sure that it is on record that almost every hon. gentleman on the other side of the House has asserted that such will be the inevitable effect of the Tariff. We say that we are not here for the purpose of preventing that kind of competition. We are very glad to see it. If, by the competition of five or six refiners, the price of sugar goes down—and if the price of sugar has gone down so far that the Halifax refinery is unable to sustain itself, it is not favorable to the hon. gentleman's argument. The hon. leader of the Opposition asserted in Toronto, with his usual humor, that "Redpath had a sweet thing." It looks as if some hon. gentlemen had rather a sour thing in their attempt at such a line of argument as that brought forward by the hon. member for Middlesex, because, in respect to sugar refining, upon which they always attack us, if the business is done on so small a margin and requires such close management and so much capital that there is no profit in it except for men who have large means and large business experience, and understand exactly the workings of the market, I think that is as strong an argument against the hon. gentleman's outcry in respect to the sugar monopoly, of which we have heard in every speech that has been made by them, either inside or outside the House, since the sugar duties were modified, as can possibly be adduced. The hon. gentleman is very much concerned about our export trade. He is very anxious that our manufacturers should be compelled to go to some slaughter market or other to get rid of their productions. He expresses the greatest sympathy with them because the trade returns do not show that they are exporting largely. Well, I always thought that the first object of a manufacturer was to secure a home market for his goods. I always thought it was not desirable that goods should be exported if they could be consumed at home. I always thought it was a note of a decline of prosperity when there were large amounts of goods forced upon foreign markets. We are living and learning every day, and even the member for West Middlesex may learn something perhaps from an authority endorsed by the Cobden Club (Mr. Medley). That club has published a pamphlet lately written by Mr. Medley, in which he says that he does not think it desirable for England to increase her exports; he does not think it would be desirable for the ports of other countries to be opened to receive English goods free of duty. It was the necessity of the case that forced that argument upon him. Those gentlemen will turn like weather-cocks. While was supposed that the example of England would compel other countries to open their ports and to receive her exports free, that was the great cry which was used by all the earlier Free Trade advocates. Now, those gentlemen, finding that the nations of the world are resolved to take care of themselves, and that the spirit of Free Trade is not to be enthroned on a bale of cotton and rule the world in favor of Manchester manufacturing interests, find that they must take a new tack. They now say, through Mr. Medley: "We do not want other nations to follow our example; it would create an excitement among our manufacturers, which would excessively stimulate production; there would be a drop in prices owing to excess in competition, and the manufacturing interests would all go to ruin altogether." Mr. Medley says it is a matter for grave question whether it is desirable for England to have the export trade of the world freely open to her or not. I commend that pamphlet and its ingenious reasoning to those hon. gentlemen who have opened a parallel discussion running cheek by jowl with the Budget debate, and who could not wait for the usual financial explanations before they attacked the Tariff. Those hon. gentlemen, and particularly the late Minister of Finance, are never weary of showing into what a terrible condition a protective Tariff has brought the United States. I used to listen to their arguments, and I was always strengthened in my belief that the United States were not rushing to ruin, by the eloquent pictures of the benefit of a protective system which were drawn by the hon.

member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He prevented me from wholly despairing of the Republic. And now we are told by the hon. gentleman from West Middlesex—who, I hope, submitted his arguments to his friend sitting behind him (Mr. Charlton) before he gave them to the House—that one of the most terrible consequences of the American protective system is the decline in their shipping trade. I remember when the Tariff discussion arose in the House in 1876, my hon. friend from North Norfolk, with that eloquence with which he is so largely gifted, told us what effect a protective Tariff had had on the United States. At that time the hon. gentleman was expecting there would be an increase of 2½ per cent. in the Tariff, and he has acknowledged since, that he was in favor of such an increase upon the 17½ per cent. list, and his argument was so well urged that he took the House almost by storm. But he failed in his conclusions. After having delivered one of the most effective protectionist speeches which had been made in the House up to that time, while his arguments were still fresh in our minds, the hon. gentleman reached the last three or four sentences and then he suddenly went back on himself, and tried to take the other side of the argument. But he had done too well; he had convinced us by those admirable statements he had enunciated with such confidence, and at times—not always—with such accuracy. The hon. gentleman argued in 1876 that decline in the foreign shipping and commerce of the United States was nothing serious when compared with her internal trade, which had prospered to an incredible extent, and her domestic commerce had reached two hundred million tons a year valued at ten thousand million dollars. He enquired: "What is foreign commerce to a people who have a home trade of such enormous proportions, the result of their protective policy?" Why, he argued, they can afford to let their foreign commerce decline, they can afford to be isolated from other nations when they are so enormously prosperous, under a protective system, a system that gives the farmers a home market. The hon. gentleman was particularly eloquent in urging that every farmer should have a market at his own door, although now it suits him to decry what he is pleased contemptuously to call the 'garden-sass' theory, which is that every farmer shall have a market at home, not only for cereals but for perishable products. Then the hon. gentleman at once and for all disposed of all such flimsy arguments as are made by his hon. friend from West Middlesex, and it is unfortunate that those hon. gentlemen are not at one with themselves. The hon. gentleman from Lambton says so far as the Tariff is concerned, there are vested interests. He says, if you are kind enough to let us come back to power we beg to remind you that vested interests have been created, that we shall deal with the industries quietly and gently, that we shall not crush them all at once, but kill them inch by inch, so that they will have time to prepare for their fate—time to make their last will and testament, and settle their family affairs. On the other hand the hon. gentleman from Centre Huron, with noble rage, says we will have nothing to do with them; the manufacturers are bloated monopolists, and he denounces them with all that fury which seizes him when cannot by any other means answer the arguments with which he is met by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), endeavors to persuade the manufacturing fly that if he will but come into the Free Trade spider's web which he has prepared for him, nothing shall hurt him. But the fly knows the voice too well; he has "been there before," and is not to be persuaded to venture himself in the meshes again. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), is also one of those who give no quarter. In season and out of season, he rises to his feet, and, almost inarticulate with anger, denounces the manufacturers, who, he says, are fattening upon an unfortunate public. The hon. leader of the Opposition has probably learned something, from his tour in the Maritime Provinces, and is therefore not quite as rabid in his utterances in respect to protected industries as he was when he began to gain experience among the coal miners. Later on we may take occasion to deal with these various views, but, in the meantime, I propose to read a few words, spoken by my hon. friend for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) when he was posing as a Protectionist, in order to give the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who sits beside him, an opportunity of weighing well what he says before he places himself in opposition to the hon. member for Norfolk. That hon. gentleman said:

"It may be safely assumed that no country has attained to greatness in manufactures without having in the course of its history imposed exactions and restrictions. This has been notably the case with Great Britain herself; and I think the assertion that the development of various industries is necessary to the cultivation of self-defensive power of a nation is incontrovertible."

That is a beautiful sentence—the case is remarkably well put; indeed, it could not have been much better expressed had the hon. gentleman been a leading member of the Cobden Club. He goes on to say:

"We have an illustration of this in the United States. * * * I believe that the agricultural interests of the Dominion would be promoted by Protection, and that the manufactures being brought to the door of the farmer would afford a market for a great many articles of produce that would not be saleable if the market were 3,000 miles away. With a home market of this kind established by protection to manufactures, the agriculturist can benefit his soil by producing a rotation of crops * * * We have at our own doors all the illustrations and experience of Protection and its benefits required for our government and guidance. The United States have adopted a protective policy under which their industries have been fostered and promoted, until, in 1870, their products reached $4,253,000,000, giving employment to 2,000,000 operatives, and disbursing over $775,000,000 in wages."

Three years later he delivered himself on the same subject, and here is what he said:

"This celebrated National Policy is what? Where shall we look for its source? It is a servile imitation of the American system."

Sir, I believe that the system of Protection is one which develops the industries of the country. I believe that we have an abundance of talent and genius, which should not be restricted in their development to a single kind of industry. I believe that we have no right to say to the Canadian people: "If you want to exercise your ingenuity, your inventive faculties, your commercial intelligence, and your gifts other than those necessary to the pursuits of agriculture, you shall go away from your own country, for we intend, so far as we can, to make you hewers of wood and drawers of water to other countries." The late hon. Finance Minister has been eloquent in season and out of season in denouncing the gathering together of people in towns. 'Stay at home,' he screams, 'like your fathers before you; let the children subdivide the farm, until by-and-by we shall get into some such condition as the Irish population are in at the present moment. Your young men shall have no other than farm work; no varied opportunities of developing their powers; and if there is a skillful mechanic or an inventive genius among you he must seek an appreciation and employment in some other country.' How was it with us before the National Policy was introduced? We were dealing with the United States—buying from them from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 worth of goods; buying from them, in fact, everything from a jews-harp to a melodeon that required skilled and highly paid labor. We gave employment to such labor and paid for it with the products of our soil and labor, representing 80 cents or $1 a day. One half of our annual balance was paid in that way and the remainder in hard gold, and that was the system which hon. gentlemen opposite insisted on continuing. They denounced us when we proposed to change it, and said we would incur the displeasure of the great nation alongside of us if we attempted what they called a retaliatory policy. I know many gentlemen of standing and influence in that country, and when I said to them that we were thinking of adopting a policy such as theirs, although not so high a Tariff, they replied that that was the sincerest form of compliment to their system to imitate it, and wondered that we had been so blind as not to have done so before, that they were not surprised to learn that we were tired of a one-sided and juggled system of Free Trade. Hon. gentlemen opposite predicted dire results which were to come from our Tariff against the manufactures of our friends across the border. Among them would be, they asserted, the abrogation of the railway bonding system. When I mentioned that to leading men in the United States they said we need not fear. They wanted our carrying trade and did not intend to cut off their noses to spite their faces. It was absolutely necessary for us, Mr. Speaker, to raise the Tariff on account of the extravagance of our predecessors—who had failed to adjust their revenues to suit their expenditure—who had incurred a succession of deficits—who had incurred the public debt, without providing additional revenue to meet the charges it imposed. We unreservedly pledged ourselves to the country while in Opposition nearly two years before the fatal 17th of September, which was the Ides of March for our hon. friends opposite, that if we came into power we would deal with the fiscal policy of the country exactly as my hon. friend, then as now, Minister of Finance, pledged himself to deal with it in 1873. What did that hon. gentleman say then? He said:

“Our 15 per cent. Tariff gives us an abundant revenue, and it gives us protection, inasmuch as the Americans, owing to their high prices at the close of the war, buy everything from us and can sell us nothing. We do not want any more protection yet, and we do not want any additional revenue. But when the time comes—as it will come, for assuming the provincial debts, for giving a new subsidy to Nova Scotia, for taking in Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, and for opening up the North-West—when that time comes, we shall deal with the fiscal questions, with reference to the protection and fostering of our industries.”

My hon. friend from South Brant, (Mr. Paterson) then, as now, in Opposition, could not wait. He rose and begged the hon. Minister to bring in a protective Tariff without delay, he was loud—as he always is—in expressing his disappointment that the Conservative Government of 1873 did not introduce a protective Tariff. The hon. gentleman was posing then—honestly, I think—as a Protectionist; and as he is posing now as an anti-Protectionist, I leave the inference to be drawn from my statement that he was honest in both attitudes. We have been charged with having stolen a verdict in 1878. We have been charged with having deluded the people. We have been charged with having obtained their suffrages under false pretences. If there ever was a straight issue, it was made in the first instance by Sir John A. Macdonald's resolution in this House, in favor of a protective Policy for all our industries, which was discussed at great length and was finally voted down by a majority of forty or fifty. The hon. gentlemen who sit opposite, and who then administered the Government and seemed so secure in their places, sealed their doom and ensured our our triumph. Upon that issue, fully accepted by our opponents, we went to the country. Hon. gentlemen who say that a verdict was stolen from the people in 1878, show very little confidence in the intelligence of the electors of Canada. It is the habit of hon. gentlemen on the other side, when the popular will is not in accord with them, to abuse the people, whom they so loudly extol at other times. Such is the habit also of the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite; and I tell them that the greatest misfortune which I think can befall any party is to have the support of such an organ, except the misfortune of having its finances administered by the gentleman who administered them for five years. In a so called reply to a speech of the hon. Minister of Railways, we had a Budget speech from the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). Well Sir, I have endeavored, in preparing to address the House—and I do not like to do so without examining the arguments which have been made on the other side—to follow that hon. gentleman's speech. I know the hon. gentleman has a most remarkable verbal memory. I know it was formerly possible for him to listen to a speech, and report it almost word for word. But this sometimes leads him into error. The hon. gentleman's speech was a melange without beginning or end. It was a jumble of words which I could hardly follow; yet there was running through it all a misconception and consequent misrepresentation of fact—if one may so speak—which is one of the peculiarities of that hon. gentleman, and makes it very difficult to follow his argument. It is very much like trying to watch the motion of a water-spider jumping about on the surface of a stagnant pool. But there is one prevailing idea through it all, and the hon. gentleman has uttered that idea so long and so persistently that I will give him the credit of now being perfectly sincere in believing it. The hon. gentleman reminds me very much of a story I heard many years ago—a very pertinent one, I think, not only to his own mental attitude, but to that of several other gentlemen on the opposite side. Many years ago an officer of the American navy, hailing from Baltimore, a very venerable gentleman, high in command, had been in the constant habit of telling a favorite story at his mess table. He said he was out on the Chesapeake Bay in his boat, shooting canvas-back ducks, when he saw two beautiful swans flying towards him. He fired one barrel, brought them both down from an enormous height, and they both fell into his boat. The story was a very big one, but no one ventured to question it, and he continued to tell it, year after year, until an old friend with whom he was to dine one evening, said to him: “Commodore, excuse me, but I know you will let me take the liberty of speaking about that swan story. It pains me to see some of the younger officers wink at each other when you tell it. Couldn't you tone it down somewhat?” The Commodore took the hint, and that night he modified the story so far as to say that he killed but one swan and picked it up in the water where it fell. His friend congratulated him after dinner and the old Commodore replied, “My good friend, I am greatly indebted to you, for do you know, sometimes on my lonely couch at night, and in moments of gloom and deep dependency, I fancy I missed both those birds.” I do not know whether my hon. friend from Gloucester has a similar feeling, or whether on his lonely couch at night he ever thinks he has missed both of his birds and feels an impulse to modify some of his wild statements, which are like the Commodore's swan story. The hon. gentleman is very fierce in his denunciations of gentlemen on this side of the House, and he has been particularly severe on my hon. friend the Minister of Finance; and I now wish to say that there never has been an occasion, since I have been in public life, when I have had more pleasure in listening to a financial statement than I had in listening to that of my hon. friend on Friday last. When he came into power we were undoubtedly face to face with great difficulties. We were face to face, in the first place, with an implacably hostile opposition which threatened, as it did, as it does, as it will, to interfere with the policy which we might adopt, no matter what it might be—pre-judge it, distort it, misrepresent it in every possible way—denouncing those who might act under it—putting themselves in such a position that they were a constant menace to capital, which is always sensitive—always slow to move. It is a great gratification to know that, in spite of all these obstacles, my hon. friend has been able, from the public records, from his own personal observation, from that painstaking, intelligent examination which he has made into the results of the policy we have adopted, to bring down to the House such assuring evidence that what he promised has largely come to pass, and that if there is any want of success anywhere, it has arisen from the fact that those who are hesitating whether they shall embark their capital or not, owe that hesitation to the remote possibility that their interests may be interfered with. I do not think there is the slightest danger. I do not think hon. gentlemen who sit on the Opposition Benches are likely to come out of that position; I do not think that if they did they would be quite as sanguinary as they promise to be; and I know perfectly well that the business men are not going to trust the horo of deficits and his confreres. They will not again trust those who falsified, during the five years they were in power, every promise and every pledge they made before they came into office, but we shall have to wait for the full fruition of the present hon. Finance Minister's policy until another election has assured by another triumph the position of the leader of the Conservative party, and of those gentlemen who have so ably seconded and supported him, and I cannot doubt that the vote of the people will again return those faithful servants to this House with an undiminished majority to complete the good work they have so successfully begun. When we were labouring to convince the people that we would not be false to our promises, and that if we came into power we would endeavor to do something, feeble though it might be, for the development of the overborne and perishing interests of the country, the people were warned a day or two before the elections to remember that the vote of those who should support our party at the polls would be in direct approval of the following:

"The Pacific scandal, the Intercolonial Railway villainy, the North-West blundering the Northern Railway scandal, the Nova Scotia bribe, the British Columbia terms, fraught with evil consequences to Canada, the payment of $4,000 to get Riel out of the country, the Moylan scandal, the Secret Service robbery, the lavish policy which increased the public expenditure from $13,000,000 in 1867 to $23,658,000 in 1872-73, and increased the public debt $96,000,000 for public works, and altogether by $131,000,000; and of an unprincipled party which has pledged itself to carry out the 'National Policy,' which is to impose taxes on raw material, food, and clothing as follows: $2 per ton on all coal, $7 per ton on pig iron, a tax on wheat, a tax on flour, a tax on meal, a tax on salt, a tax on beef and pork, a tax of 46 to 60 per cent. on cotton yarn, a tax of 41 to 81 per cent. on thread, a tax of 50 to 60 per cent. on silks, etc., a tax of 35 per cent. on machinery, a tax of 30 per cent. on stoves, a tax of 70 per cent. on wool and woollen goods, a tax of 85 per cent. on flannels and blankets, a tax of 40 per cent. on ready-made clothing, a tax of 50 to 84 per cent. on carpets, a tax of 85 per cent. on alpaca goods, a tax of 40 per cent. on heavy cottons, a tax of 70 per cent. on lighter cottons, a tax of 40 per cent. on linens, a tax of 35 per cent. on boots and shoes, a tax of 35 per cent. on rubber and leather goods, glass bottles, lamp chimneys, clocks, furniture, carriages, envelopes, writing paper, felt hats, guns, rifles, pistols, umbrellas, parasols, and a whole host of articles used in every family. In a word, those who vote for the Tory party vote to grind the consumer and the poor man beneath a millstone of taxation."

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). From what paper are you quoting?

Mr. PLUMB. From the Toronto Globe. The Globe is the friend of the poor man. Like the hon. leader of the Opposition, that journal is so fond of the poor man that it is striving to keep him always poor, it cannot afford to lose him, and if hon. gentlemen opposite came into power to-day they would adopt a policy to make the poor man poorer, as past events have shown. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ross), to whose speech I have been largely addressing myself, and who is so fond of the law of averages, told us at various places during the summer campaign that there had been a large mortgage placed upon the farms of the unfortunate people of this country by the Conservative Government. The public debt, he asserted, was wholly created by our party and formed an incumbrance or mortgage of $7 an acre upon every acre of improved land in the Dominion. The hon. member for North Norfolk made the same assertion in a speech in Niagara a few months ago, and the only person who seemed alarmed was a sympathetic Grit who did not own an acre.

Mr. ROSS. By $9.

Mr. PLUMB. No; I find it was $7 an acre. I cannot admit that there is such a mortgage on the lands of our agricultural population. They need not lie awake at nights for fear of it, for so long as the surplus is rolling up to four or five millions a year there can be no danger of foreclosure, which was not the case when deficits were increasing and the credit of the Dominion declining. If the farmers, who have listened to such silly stuff, desire to be safe, they had better beware of the party of deficits, and of a policy which did so much between 1873 and 1878 to lower the credit of Canada. So long as Dominion 4 per cents. are worth 104 in the market and our securities keep up in value, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the hon. the ex-Finance Minister, our agricultural friends need not be at all alarmed. The time they have to fear will be when those who mismanaged public affairs from 1873 to 1878, come back into power, and then it may be possible that the imaginary mortgage may become a real one in danger of foreclosure. Now, however, they are tolerably safe, notwithstanding the disasters pictured by the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) and the groans heard from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who, in my own district, repeated the same terrible story; I do not, however, believe there was a farmer, who heard him, who would have sold his farm for 25 cents per acre less, although my hon. friend endeavored to persuade him that he was in the condition of an involuntary mortgagee. But it is one of the tricks of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is cognate to the means they use for the purpose of persuading the people that the country is in a suffering and feeble condition. Unfortunately for them, within the last two years the remorseless logic of events has compelled them in great measure to give up the argument adverse to the future of the manufacturing interests and that based upon the theory of a general decline of business. We heard nothing else for nearly two years. There was no hon. member opposite who did not endeavor to say something worse than his friend who preceded him about the condition of the country, and the more extravagant the statements the more they were applauded. I remember when a gentleman rose and said that St. Catharines that was in great business trouble and distress; it was the hon. member for Elgin, (Mr. Casey.) His friends loudly cheered him as he drew the dismal picture, it was a good story until another was told. The more extravagant, the more terrible the tale of distress that came from that town, the more it seemed to delight our hon. friends in Opposition. But two or three days afterwards the opposite side of the story was presented. My friend, the hon. member for Lincoln, (Mr. Rykert,) received a statement contradicting the mournful stories of the hon. gentlemen from West Elgin, (Mr. Casey,) and the lugubrious faces of these hon. gentlemen showed how terribly they were disappointed on finding St. Catharines, after all, was not ruined, but still possessed life and encouraging hopes and prospects. I saw in the Globe the other day, an account of the utter destruction, in a business way, of the Village of Welland, which seemed to give the Editor much satisfaction. It was the most doleful narrative possible; the town was utterly ruined and destroyed; yet the very next day, in another paper, there was a statement that the town of Wellandport, a neighboring place, had increased its population in three or four years by 400 per cent. One town had gone down, the other had gone up. What the cause was I do not know, but the paper that copied stories of the destruction of Welland took very good care not to put the companion picture alongside. That reminds me that sometimes even the great Globe itself is caught napping, and is compelled to acknowledge that there has been a great increase in the prosperity of the country. Here, in this copy, I find four pages devoted entirely to a description of Toronto, with many startling head-lines, describing the various subjects—of its growth and prosperity; the great increase of wealth and population. The story is told almost as attractively as if the gentleman who made up the paper had lots to sell in that thriving city. It is headed Trade Review of 1881, which we are told was the most active and prosperous year in the history of the city. Then we have the striking head-lines, such as "Toronto as a Business City;" "Large Increase in the Wholesale Trade;" "Lively Condition of the Retail Business;" "Great Crops of Wheat and Barley;" "Small Export of Flour and Wheat;" "Provision Trade Somewhat Restricted, but Healthy;" "Prosperity of the Lumber Trade;" "Larger Receipts and High Prices;" "The Retail Trade Producing $36,000,000, and the Produce Trade $33,000,000;" "The Gain on this Twelve per cent.;" "Total Trade of the City for 1881, $85,257,000." It really looks as if the statement had been issued from the Mail office, and I am surprised that the Globe should have published an article so damaging to its party views. The review of the whole trade of the city is extensive and interesting. We used to hear a great deal about the bankruptcies that were said not to diminish when we came to this side of the House; the hon. gentlemen opposite were fond of bringing out statistics to show that even in 1879 the number and volume of commercial disasters had not lessened. But such disasters do not usually occur from sudden causes. They result from years of declining trade, depression and adversity; men do not fail on account of their losses in the previous six months, but because their business has suffered from a long dry rot, which compels them at last to break up when revival of trade seems hopeless, and that was the state of things that existed in this country. But let us look at the results of the six years in this respect: in 1873 the amount involved in failures was $12,354,000; 1874, $7,000,000; 1875, —, who was in power then? Methinks I see a peculiar expression on the face of the hon. gentleman who was the leader of the opposite party then; and the total for this year was $28,843,000. In 1876, $25,517,000; and for 1877, a year when hon. gentlemen opposite were still in power, $25,510,000; in 1878, $23,132,000; in 1879, after struggling through years of gloom and hoping against hope, many could not sustain themselves longer, and sunk in sight of land, and $29,000,000 were involved in those business failures of that year; and we heard it charged by hon. gentlemen opposite that this disastrous sum furnished an evidence that the present Administration had not brought about the prosperity they promised. An hon. member beside me mentions the prospective repeal of the Insolvency Law as a principal cause of the failures of 1879; we knew that when it was threatened, everybody, that year, rushed in to take advantage of it as far as possible. What happened the next year? If I remember aright, my hon. friend the present Finance Minister then presided over the Treasury. It began to recover from its depletion, business revived, the people became more hopeful. There arose a general belief that business men might venture upon further investments. The rate of discount, instead of remaining at 1 or 2 per cent., began to appreciate, and people everywhere became more hopeful. And why? Because they saw men in power who were inclined to look to the interests of the country and protect them if they could—at any rate men willing to make some effort in that direction, and not to acknowledge that they were entirely helpless as regards the promotion of the general welfare. Well, in 1880, the failures reached only $7,000,000, against $29,000,000 the year previous, and, in 1881, the total was but $6,000,000, against $28,000,000 in 1875. If there is anything in this argument, we have a right to use it, because similar arguments were employed by hon. gentlemen opposite, who have endeavored to fasten upon us the responsibility for the disasters of 1879, with which we had no sort of connection. Every business man knows that those disasters were due to complications which originated long before my hon. friends took their seats on the Treasury benches. I have not had, until now, an opportunity of thanking my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) for coming to enlighten the little constituency that I represent. He gave me a short time for reply to the opening part of his speech, and no opportunity to reply to several statements which he made in the second part of his address on that occasion. I shall take the opportunity, before sitting down, to refer to a few of the hon. gentleman's points. As he, like the hon. member for West Middlesex, is an aspirant to the financial office in a future Liberal Cabinet, his utterances are considered, by his own side, of much importance. On this point, I may say, there is a sort of financial duel going on between the hon. member for North Norfolk, the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) and the hon. member for West Middlesex, to show which can make the biggest bid on the floor of the House and elsewhere, to win the favor of the present leader of the Opposition, though how long he may continue to lead I do not know. Therefore, the utterances of the hon. member for North Norfolk, viewed in this light, possesses very considerable significance. He has, within a short time, I believe, constructed a platform for his party, which I have seen in the press, but as it has not been accepted generally by his party I will not now refer to it. The hon. gentleman made a very calm and temperate statement during the time that preceded the time he had given me to speak. He made no remarks then which called for special answer, but spoke in the courteous tone and manner which often characterizes him. I had reason to suppose that he would continue in the same way after I had availed myself of the brief opportunity he gave me to address my constituents. But no sooner had I sat down than the hon. gentleman seemed to lose his temper. I had said nothing to provoke him, but he proceeded in a manner so entirely different from anything I had ever heard from him that I was grieved and surprised. He began with a tirade against the Tariff, eating his own words at every sentence, contradicting himself flatly in every possible manner, denouncing what he himself had advocated on the floor of this House with as great eloquence as any man that ever defended a protective policy. Some of his statements at Niagara were of a most extraordinary character. He stated that the Tariff had increased the price of cotton 35 per cent. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the average increase in the Tariff was from 5 to 5½ per cent. He knows that there was a Tariff of 17½ per cent. then existing, and he himself was in favor of raising it to 20 per cent. Now, suppose there was an addition of 10 per cent.—though nobody pretended that the average Tariff upon cottons is over 25 per cent, altogether it could only raise the price 10 per cent.—and it has not raised the price at all, because it is well understood that these goods are sold as cheaply now as they were before the Tariff was put upon them, so that no argument can be based upon that. But the hon. gentleman must know, though he studiously concealed it in his argument, that an addition of 2½ per cent., which he favored, would have raised the Tariff to 20 per cent., and only what was added to that was an addition to the Tariff of 20 per cent. that he himself desired and advocated. Hon. gentlemen opposite habitually deal with the Tariff in the same way; they always assume in their arguments that the whole of the present Tariff was put in by the present Government. The hon. gentleman attempted to mislead those whom he was addressing. He said, also, that it was impossible for the farmers to receive any benefit whatever from the Tariff. But he was so unfortunate as to have for his chairman a gentleman who had been benefited to the extent of $700 or $800 that year by protection in peaches, as he was one of the largest peach growers in Canada. When I asked that gentleman if he would like to have the Tariff taken off farm products, fruit, etc., he was silent and never made response, although he is an ardent member of the hon. gentleman's party. My hon. friend also stated that our Government had increased the public debt to an enormous figure, and that the late administration were only responsible for $80,000 of the whole, which was spent on one of the canals. Of course he was trifling with the intelligence of his auditors, every one of whom knew better. He said the increase of the public debt was from $75,728,000 in 1876, to $157,000,000 in 1881, and was wholly chargeable to the Conservative Government. He generously acknowledged afterwards, however, that the aforesaid $80,000 of the $81,000,000 of increase had been incurred by Mr. Mackenzie. I made up the account afterwards and tell my hon. friend that the nett public debt had been increased mainly by the assumption of the Provincial debts, by the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, and the purchase of the North-West, from $76,000,000, in 1867, to $99,848,482 in July, 1873. Under the rule of our hon. friends opposite it swelled up to $139,362,069, on June 30, 1878, with liabilities incurred by the Mackenzie Administration for $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 more, and the loan of December, 1878, which increased the debt to $146,481,071, June 30, 1879, should have been made by the late Finance Minister before the elections. In round numbers, the increase made by hon. gentlemen opposite might be fairly stated at $50,000,000. When the late hon. Minister of Finance came into power he said that liabilities amounting to $130,000,000 to be provided for were left upon him by his predecessors. Somehow or other he managed to get through with them by expending about $22,000,000, and the remainder was spent for works inaugurated by the hon. gentlemen themselves. They were not bound to build the Canadian Pacific Railway as a public work; there was no obligation resting upon them to rush into the scheme, which they took up before they had the survey of a responsible engineer. There was no obligation on them to make the addition to the public debt which that wild adventure cost them—an adventure which was, as they left it, practically useless, which, so far as the North-West is concerned gave that country a railway into a wilderness which never was explored, and when there was scarcely a line blazed by the pioneer's axe—a line which ran from Fort William to English River on one side and from Red River to Rat Portage on the other and left a gap of one hundred and seventy-eight miles. And my hon. friend the leader of the late Government, said he did not intend to hurry the construction of the intermediate line! He attempted to utilize what he was pleased to call the "water stretches," over which there could only be transported two ship loads of grain during the whole navigable season, after harvest, and he put under contract 112 miles on one side of those water stretches and 113 on the other, costing, at least, $8,000,000, and all this for a perfectly useless service, which never would have paid for the greasing of the wheels of the railway carriages, employed upon it, until the gap between the two sections had been built.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. PLUMB. When the House rose for Recess, I had followed the hon. member for Lambton to the heart of the wilderness, which will be celebrated in the history of the achievement of the late Minister of Public Works as the Lake Mille Lacs route with its seven impracticable portages, the Fort Francis Lock that never was opened, and the utter waste of money connected with the most frantic scheme that has ever been attempted by a public officer of Canada. I shall not be uncharitable enough to leave him there with no outlet for escape except a circuitous route which has never been used for any practical purpose. In concluding my reference to that portion of the hon. gentleman's career, I would simply say that his whole policy is fairly illustrated by what was done in connection with railway construction, and the attempt to make a thoroughfare in that direction. I do not wish, and I do not intend, to press this matter as I might upon the hon. gentleman, although, if I felt so disposed, I might almost be excused for doing so, when I remember the long years, during which he tyrannized over me and over other members of the opposite side of the House from himself, and especially over those who, like me, happened to have less parliamentary experience than he had. Although during his whole parliamentary career I cannot remember an instance in which he ever showed me the slightest courtesy, or extended a helping hand to me, though he knew I was unused to Parliamentary and parliamentary procedure—although, on the contrary, I believe that from the time I entered Parliament until I was called to come back here, after a contest which was brought about by the hon. gentleman and a gentleman who was then his adviser, but is now no more, I do not think I ever received a kind or encouraging word from him—still I am not disposed to recall to-night, in anything like an unforgiving spirit, his conduct towards me, however much reason I may have had to complain of him. I am not of the spirit of those who, in the hour of a man's depression or humiliation, would add one word to increase them. I have only to say, however, that those who occupy public positions, such as I occupy, should hold it a duty to call public attention again and again to the mismanagement, to the reckless waste, to the stupid blundering, which characterized the hon. gentleman's administration of the Public Works, in connection with the railway system from Fort William to Red River. I may say, too, that it is in evidence that Mr. Fleming commenced the construction of that work by running the railway line towards Shebandowan from Fort William, until it was practically found that no road could be made, that it was abandoned after proceeding westward with the work thirty-six miles, and after he had settled with the contractors, by giving them the option of going by another line. There were no surveys, no quantities, no estimates, no proper regard for the money of the country; but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) and his colleagues, for some reason or other, either in the interests of the contractors, or in some interests which I will not attempt to characterize, it thought desirable to proceed with the work without the slightest preparation. It was thought proper, also, to begin at the Red River as well as at Fort William, when there were no means of carrying supplies there except by a most circuitous and expensive route. There was no survey there and no line laid out. The engineers went on fumbling for a line on both sides, and on one side a demurrage of three or four thousand dollars was paid to the contractor, while his men were idle and while the engineers were looking for a line on which his work should begin. And yet it was made the ground of an appeal to the country in the interests of economy, forsooth and careful management; that these hon. gentlemen should be permitted to retain the confidence of the country, because as they boasted they were building those lines of railway for $24,000 a mile, but the estimated cost was made on imaginary quantities; on an imaginary line; in an imaginary direction, to an imaginary termination; through an imaginary survey. When the real facts came to be found out—and they were, or ought to have been, in the possession of the gentleman who had control of the Public Works when he made that appeal—it was discovered that the quantities which had been estimated were far exceeded; in some cases 30, 40, 70 and even 100 per cent.; and that the cost of the road was to be enhanced to nearly $40,000 a mile. Notwithstanding all this, the hon. gentleman persisted in his mis-statements to the electors; persisted in boasting of his economy and good management. But for our investigations and our close enquiry into the whole matter, the public would have been deceived into the idea that their claim to economy was well founded that it was not founded on a pretence which it would be parliamentary, I presume, to call mistaken, but which, I think, it would be honest to say was false. If we can show, as we can show, that that was one of the principal claims put forward for the support of the public, in Ontario mainly, but elsewhere as well; we have a right to say that those who brought it forward have no right again to claim the confidence of the people. But that is not all. We were persistently told at the time that we were said to be snatching a verdict from the people by false pretences, that we had loaded the country with responsibilities so enormous that its resources could not meet them. We were told that we had left upon the predecessor of my hon. friend the Finance Minister responsibilities variously estimated at from $96,000,000 to $130,000,000; and a list of these responsibilities was paraded before the public. We were taunted with our recklessness, our extravagance, as if we had no interest in our own country—as if we were not Canadians—as if we did not seek to benefit the country and do the best we could for it—as if we were a set of reckless political adventurers; or, in the language of the hon. gentleman who made the statement (Sir Richard Cartwright), as if, after wrecking the ship on the rocks, we scuttled her, and broke into the spirit-room and, in drunken desperation, destroyed the cargo. That was the way in which we were characterized by the hon. gentleman from Centrs Huron, who has had his lesson, and will have his lesson again. What is the fact, Sir? The fact is that the claim to economy in respect to the building of the Pacific Railway was as unfounded and baseless as the claim that we had loaded the country down with liabilities which it was impossible to meet. There are no evidences that any particular change was made in the general policy of the country, except one of extravagance, and except the assumption of the construction of the Pacific Railway as a Government work, a work which certainly gave rise to a good many scandals which I will refer to by-and-bye. I find the true statement of the case, as tested by the Public Accounts, is simply this: The public debt of the country at the time of the consolidation of the Union of the Provinces was net $75,629,641. The next year it was reported, net, $75,757,131; in 1869, $75,859,269; 1870, $78,204,744; 1871, $77,706,517; 1872, $82,189,072; 1873, $99,848,462. There we will pause. At the time of bringing into the Union the Provinces that had not joined it at the time Confederation was established, there was, upon a fair statement of accounts, a debt of about $100,000,000. Then, by arrangements which I presume the last people to question will be gentlemen of the Maritime Provinces, who are usually appealed to for support of my hon. friends on the opposite side and as having been particularly burdened by the taxation which it is claimed has been put upon them, certain obligations were incurred. These were Assumption of Provincial debts, Subsidy to New Brunswick in lieu of certain timber dues, Admission of Prince Edward Island, Opening of the North-West, and other measures for the general welfare, benefit and harmony—additions by which the net debt was increased to $108,224,465 on 30th June, 1874. Up to, and including 1873, the debt was $99,848,462, showing an increase from 1867 to 1873 for legitimate purposes—for purposes that have not been questioned—for purposes that cannot be questioned—for purposes which were absolutely indispensable to the prosperity and union and harmony of the country and the consolidation of Confederation—of $22,595,000. Now, in that year, and with these additions—with a debt of $99,848,462—the gentlemen upon the opposite benches assumed power. They assumed power, as I have often stated, under pledges which confined them to very narrow limits. They had taken on themselves while in opposition, obligations that we had never considered our party bound by; they had undertaken to reduce the public expenditure; they had undertaken to limit the public debt; and they had undertaken to curtail the progress of the country—the last two things cannot be done the one without the other, because the true indication of the progress of a country like this is the gradual and judicious increase of the public debt and public expenditure, without which the country cannot be developed. They had undertaken to do all this. Now let us see what was the fulfilment of that undertaking, in the matter of the public debt my hon. friend the member for North Norfolk said generously he would acknowledge that they had increased it $80,000, but that was for some canal or other to which his hon. friend and former leader had been committed; in fact, he threw the whole responsibility of the increase of the public debt during the five years of the late Administration upon the gentlemen now on the Treasury benches. The debt, up to 1873, increased $22,595,000, and, in 1873, our hon. friends opposite succeeded to the Treasury benches, came into power by tactics which I will not attempt to characterize, by a false issue on which they obtained a judgment from the people, a judgment which the people were very glad to reverse when they had had an opportunity of testing the hon. gentlemen's performances. They came into power with $99,848,462 of debt, increased to $108,224,965 on 30th June, 1874, and they left it, in 1878, with that debt increased to $139,362,000, and with obligations, by contracts and otherwise, which compelled their successors to borrow, at least, $8,000,000 or $9,000,000, with deficits of $6,500,000, which had to be provided for, making an absolute increase of $46,500,000, with whatever further sum would be required to meet their contracts for railway construction, in an undertaking to which they were not bound on taking office, an undertaking which they had commenced by a law passed in the Parliament of 1874, abrogating all the old contracts, abrogating the policy of the former Government, and taking upon themselves, as a Government, the construction of the Pacific Railway as a public work, involving, as everybody knows who has had any experience in public works, conditions and considerations which those hon. gentlemen ought to have shrunk from, for it placed them constantly in such a position, with regard to public contractors, that we will be glad, on our side, when we have relieved the country from such an onerous responsibility. The amount of the increase of the public debt, between 1873 and 1877, has been $46,532,508. Now, Sir, there is no question but that some part of that is due to previous engagements. Every incoming Government must be bound to a certain extent by the engagements of its predecessors, and there is nothing so foolish, there is nothing so unpatriotic, there is nothing so improper, as for an incoming Administration to attempt in any way to shirk a fair or proper responsibility that has been thrown upon them by their predecessors; but we have had every possible reason for returning to the hon. gentlemen opposite the measure that was meted out to us in 1874. Why, Sir, on my first appearance in public life when I took my seat here in that year I heard and never shall forget the Budget Seech which was delivered to this House by the hon. Finance Minister then in power. I shall never forget the shriek and the howl, and the aggravated, piled up, heaped up vituperation which that hon. gentleman poured out on his predecessors. Why, Sir, a financial statement is supposed to be a calm, deliberate effort. It involves considerations which ought to forbid expressions of passion; it involves the public credit, which should constrain a Finance Minister, I think, to take the same line that would be taken by a judicial officer, otherwise damage must be done to it. Violent harangues by hon. gentlemen entrusted with the public funds should not be tolerated, and yet there has not passed a Session since I came into Parliament, in which the hon. gentleman who held the position of Finance Minister in the late Government, the gentleman who was afterwards dismissed from the control of the public treasury, has not indulged in harangues that would disgrace a political stump speaker. This state of things almost compels us to resort to meeting argument of that kind with similar argument. I regret very much that the debates in this House, particularly those which have reference to the credit of the Dominion, have been brought, by the example set by the hon. gentleman who held the public purse strings during five disastrous years, down to the position to which they have been brought, and, Sir, the responsibility rests only in one place, and we will enforce the responsibility there. Since we came into power in 1878, the net debt has been increased from $140,362,069 to $155,395,780, exclusive of deficits. The loan of December, 1878, should be added to the $140,362,069—by so much as it increased the gross debt—say nearly $5,000,000. It ought to have been made in the summer of 1878. The net interest, in 1878, was $6,533,000; in 1881, it was $6,918,000, when, although there was an increase of $15,000,000 of net debt, there was only an increase of $386,000 of net interest. Our friends on the opposite side increased the gross debt up to 1878, $35,213,834, and the gross interest charges, $1,850,659. The increase of the gross debt since 1878 has been $25,904,379; increase of gross interest charges only $558,752. The comparative saving between the two financial managements is, as may be readily seen, $593,248 a year in our favor, for at the same rate of charge as is shown on that $35,213,834, our $25,904,379 would have involved an interest charge of $1,152,000. In accounting for the increase of the public debt, which is often thrown in our faces, it may be very well occasionally to look back and see what are the items that compose that increase. The debt of 1867, was $75,629,641 net, was represented the assumption by the Dominion Government of the main portion of the debt of the Confederated Provinces. Part of the remainder was afterwards assumed, and properly assumed, in 1873, by my hon. friend the Finance Minister under authority of Parliament. Now, Sir, we assumed debts of the Provinces to the amount, after 1868, and prior to 1874, of $15,525,274. We spent during that period upon Public Works chargeable to capital, $2,145,843; upon surveys and expenses connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway, $1,081,394; upon the Intercolonial Railway, $14,520,000; on the North-West, $2,919,000—making altogether, $36,192,000. But, Sir, we did not increase the public debt to that amount. All these were expenditures properly chargeable to capital, we had a right to borrow $13,000,000. But, Sir, we took out of the surplus revenues of the country a large portion of that sum, because during those periods, while my hon. friends who are now in office held power, we had, as we have now, a period not of deficits but of surpluses, and we had money to spare from income account. Instead of squandering it by increasing the public expenditure we put it into public works chargeable to capital, and that we have done well and wisely, we have an authority which the hon. gentlemen on the other side can never question. We have a circular issued by the late Finance Minister in 1876, in which he states that a large sum—I believe he said somewhere between $11,000,000 and $12,000,000—accurately speaking it is $11,973,579—had been expended in public works chargeable to capital, and that the whole public debt had been invested—judiciously invested—in public works for the benefit of the Dominion of Canada, and for the benefit of the Empire as well. With that statement in his hand he went to England to make that famous negotiation in which he sold our public securities at 87½ or less, and we never found out to whom he sold them; or who has made the normous profit of nearly 17 per cent. or nearly $2,125,000 on that cloudy transaction, and when he was charged with having made a statement so favorable to his predecessors, he said he presented the silver side of the shield to the capitalists of England, and intended to present the brazen side (I thank him for teaching me that word) to the electors of Ontario whom he was then addressing. I now come to the increase of the public debt under the hon. gentlemen opposite, and I admit that with a good deal of that increase we are chargeable, though I do not come down to $80,000 as the extent of the responsibility of the late Government therefor, as my hon. friend from

Mr. PLUMB.

North Norfolk has done. I will relieve him from the idea that I intended to charge against those gentlemen as reckless expenditure the increase under their Administration. I do not intend to deal with hon. gentlemen opposite in that spirit, but will treat the subject fairly, because it is only a temporary advantage for gentlemen to get up unfair statistics and make misstatements and garble accounts and twist them, as has been done, I am sorry to say, by some members of the Opposition, whose names I could mention. The increase was as follows:—From $108,224,965, June 30, 1874, to $146,481,070, June 30, 1879, amounting to $38,256,115. The principal items causing the increase are, Debts of the Provinces, $4,947,000; Public Works, $16,091,000; Pacific Railway, including the Foster contract, Fort William purchase, and Fort Francis Lock, $9,122,564—and the greater part of that is absolutely due to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite; the Intercolonial Railway $8,534,985—charging upon the country during the Administration of those gentlemen annually large deficits. Now, I am happy to say, under the Administration of the present Minister of Railways which cannot be too highly commended and complimented, and which cannot be too generally understood, that great work, instead of being a heavy charge on the country, for the first time in the history of its existence, shows a balance of receipts over expenses, and promises to yield a revenue which will do something towards relieving the burden of its construction. To-day, our financial position may be stated thus: we owe a general debt of $199,000,000, but we have of assets that are of good character—a sinking fund in the first place of nearly $11,000,000, and bank deposits and other available securities amounting to nearly $33,000,000, leaving the public debt, less cash assets, $155,395,780, of which $19,900,000 is for deposits in the savings banks, for Dominion notes. My hon. friend the Finance Minister has shown that Canada has ample means to meet all her obligations if she pursues the policy which has been so successfully inaugurated by him. He can also show that Canada has a treasure far beyond anything which grows out of the taxation of her people, a treasure far beyond anything which any other country that I know of in the world possesses, in proportion to her population and necessities, in the Great North-West, an acquisition which was made by the far-seeing statesmanship of my right hon. friend who leads this Government, an acquisition which has been held and developed in opposition to the fiercest contention on the part of the Opposition, an acquisition as to which it is now evident that even the most sanguine estimate formed in respect to it will be far more than realized. Sir, it was painful to see, three years ago, on the eve of a general election, the efforts that were made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to deprive the country of whatever advantage might have accrued to it from the possession of that great and splendid possessions. Sir, I remember on one occasion during the Session of 1880, an hon. gentleman who now confronts me spent an hour reading from Blue Books extracts which were calculated to damage and to depreciate the value of our North-West Territory. These extracts are not now to be found in the Hansard, they have been suppressed in the Official Reports. I remember also that another hon. gentleman, who then aspired to the leadership of his shattered party, and has since obtained the doubtful prize, took pains to tell us that there was no value there, that we should abandon the policy of progress, and that we should go back to the policy of 1872, that we were not able to complete the undertakings which we were assuming, that we should withdraw from them, and, as to our neighbors upon the other side, that we should not disturb the policy by which we were made their hewers of wood and drawers of water, that we should recede from our Tariff and deal with them on their own terms that we give up the idea of connecting the great west and the Pacific coast with the Atlantic sea-board, drop everything like political ambition, and crawl humbly into our shell. Yet that hon. gentleman, on more than one occasion, posed as the champion of young Canada, posed as one who was leading young Canada to have something like a national existence. I think young Canada is now convinced that they made their idol, but have found him clay. Sir, we believe that we have a right to say to the country that we on this side of the House have endeavored in every way fairly and honestly to protect its interests, and I do not desire to attribute to hon. gentlemen opposite any intention to do otherwise, but I do say that the logical consequence of the position they have been compelled as our opponents to assume, places them in an attitude of hostility to interests important to the growth and progress of the Dominion. They are about to go before the country again, to ask that they shall have a renewal of that confidence which they betrayed between 1873 and 1878; they are about to go to the country with the record which I have given—and, unless they falsify it, there is no other record for them—to ask that the people of Canada shall again entrust them with the reins of power. I think I see those hon. gentlemen taking the platform, and endeavoring to make a case for themselves. I followed through the press the career of the leader of those hon. gentlemen in the Maritime Provinces when he was struggling against adverse fate, and attempting to urge the claims of his party upon his unwilling and unsympathizing hearers. It was a melancholy spectacle, it was one which we shall never forget; we shall always recall the halfhearted support which he received from the party organ in Ontario; we shall always remember the meagre audiences that collected to meet him, the feeble excuses for the marked absence of the mass of the people, and we shall remember more than all what we believe to be the great disappointment of the hon. gentleman, and the greater disappointment of his friends, when he had finished that tour and came back to his constituents in Ontario. Sir, I believe, nothing has happened which could be of more advantage to the Conservative party than the visit of the hon. the leader of the Opposition to the Maritime Provinces, in respect to our political interests there. With that eloquence of which he is master, and that ability for special pleading, which is his own, he put before the people of those Provinces the strongest side of his case, and if he did not win their favorable judgment, it is certain nobody else of his party can do so. We shall see, as we did in 1877 in Ontario, and as we did in the Maritime Provinces last summer, the hon. gentleman for Shefford pleading for himself and his colleagues, he who, I find,—on looking at an extract from one of the newspapers there, amused the people by giving them a facetious account of the scandals that attached to the Conservative party. Well, my hon. friend was a proper person to address an audience of the Maritime Provinces upon the scandals that attached to the Conservative party. I do not envy him his role, and I cannot suppose that the people of that country took much interest in his bankrupt stock of exploded scandals. But, Sir, we heard that the hon. the leader of the Reform party, when he was in the Maritime Provinces, talked a good deal about the legitimate channels of trade for those Provinces; he gently patted on the back those gentlemen who were in the first place opposed to the union of the Provinces—those gentlemen who were over-ruled and over-borne and who had not the instinct to see that they were wrong. Many of them still clung to that exploded idea, and refused to be comforted when they saw those who led the Provinces into Confederation holding power and controlling the political destinies of their several Provinces. He suggested that the proper ally for those Provinces, the natural place for their trade, was the great Republic alongside of them. The hon. member for Gloucester indignantly denied that any such statement had ever been made. Why, all the newspapers which have given his leading speeches, notably the one delivered at Summerside, show that that was the tenor of his argument. The hon. leader of the Opposition was absent from his seat at the time, but I do not think he will thank his super-serviceable friend from Gloucester for taking up the cudgels in his defence and endeavoring to put him in a false position. Where, I may add, in view of the financial position of this country, in view of its prosperity, in view of the opening up of the great North-West, in view of the contract which has been made for carrying immigrants into that country, in view of that Pacific Railway Syndicate, which it has been attempted to use as a weapon against us, but which will be a boomerang to hon. gentlemen when they throw it out—where, I say, after the statement made by my hon. friend the Finance Minister, to attempt to criticize which would be entirely supererogatory on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite—where have they any expectation that they can appeal with hope of success to the people whom they once defrauded? Why, I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman who leads the party proved himself to be neither a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, when he said in Quebec on the eve of the last local election that he expected that there would be large Liberal gains in that Province. I am afraid that in a short time he found the truth of that adage of Sam Slick or Hosea Biglow: "Don't never prophecy unless you know." I do not see much hope for the hon. gentlemen in the Maritime Provinces, and in the other Provinces I see nothing to encourage them. But the chief battle-ground will be Ontario; and, judging from the circular which has been issued by the hon. gentleman who now leads the opposite party, we may fancy he hopes he may do something with the voters' lists and the assessment rolls that will aid him there—and I hope every friend of mine who hears my voice to-night will remember that in making up those lists and rolls the battle will begin, and there for the most part the battle will be won. I know something of this, because on one occasion I purged my constituency of forty-two fraudulent votes belonging to what is called the Reform party, and by that means I got a majority four times as large after I was unseated and went back again for re-election as I had before. We know that an agitation has been commenced in Ontario which, if carried to its logical conclusion, would almost lead to a disunion of these Provinces. We have heard the wild harangues; we have seen the audacious statements; we have seen the attempt to bulldoze this Parliament for the purpose of gaining a temporary triumph for unscrupulous and desperate partisans in the Province of Ontario. But I can tell hon. gentlemen that I know that public opinion is not so easily thrown off its balance; and I trust that in any discussions which may arise in the Dominion House of Commons upon the Boundary Question or the Streams Bill, the very opposite course will be pursued by the hon. gentlemen here who have been so foully attacked and misrepresented from that pursued in a place where a mischievous attempt at agitation has failed to gain even a temporary triumph. Sir, last year when I had the honor of addressing this House on the Budget, while speaking of the Dominion and its resources, and of the development which is so rapidly going on—the greater portion of which, I honestly believe, is due, not to the statesmanship and forecast of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, but to the patriotic policy adopted by those with whom I have the honor to act—I took occasion to compare the trade position of the great country alongside of us, with that of the Dominion. That country has often been referred to as taking enormous strides in material prosperity, and its progress in wealth enterprise and population can scarcely be over-stated. It must not be forgotten that it has advanced most rapidly since it adopted a very high protective Tariff, and we have been informed by one of those gentlemen who seem impelled to write about things they do not understand very clearly, that Canada is a sort of slack water between two systems—England on the one side illustrating the extreme Free Trade principle, and the United States on the other side illustrating Protection. We will assume the population of the United States to be 50,000,000 people, that of Canada 4,350,000. According to the latest authentic trade returns, we find that the imports of the United States, in 1880, amounted to $38 a head, or $761,000,000, while Canada's imports at the same time were $39,000,000, or $40 a head, showing that we had a larger import trade in proportion to our population than the great nation beside us, and that we had not built up a Chinese wall to exclude foreign manufactures. The exports of the United States, in 1880, when they had an enormously redundant crop, including their cotton, which is a specialty, were $851,000,000, or $42 50 a head; while the exports by Canada, in spite of the arguments of my hon. friend who tries to prove that we are ruined because we cannot export anything, were $39,600,000, or $38 a head.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). What were they before the National Policy was introduced?

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman can look up the trade returns, and he has a very ingenious way of falsifying them when he likes.

Mr. BLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to order. The hon. gentleman says my hon. friend has a very ingenious way of falsifying the returns.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not say he falsified them.

Mr. BLAKE. I submit to you that is not parliamentary.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not. I hope the hon. gentleman will keep himself to the proper ground of the discussion.

Mr. PLUMB. If I have unguardedly transgressed the rules, I beg to apologize to this House and to the hon. gentleman. I wished to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to a peculiar state of things in the United States which I think will go very far towards strengthening our case in a certain argument which is now proceeding, and it struck me it was desirable to see whether, as is alleged, the exports of the United States have been absolutely throttled by their fiscal policy. It was desirable to see whether the United States could continue, under a policy which has doubled their Tariff, to export manufactured produce. Therefore, it was desirable to know the relative proportions between the exports of the agricultural produce of the United States and their exports of the manufactured products in a certain period, when that Tariff was not established and between the exports of their agricultural and manufactured products, during the periods when the Tariff laid its greatest stress upon the country. I have taken pains to tabulate a statement on this subject, and will commend it to the hon. member for West Middlesex to test it, if he likes. During a period of low Tariffs, before the imposition of the Morrill Tariff—which was enacted in 1861, after the secession of the Confederate States made it possible for a policy of that kind to be adopted—from 1850 to 1860, of the total exports, 79½ per cent. was agricultural products, and but 20½ per cent. manufactures. From 1861 to 1871, during a period of war and inflation—a period when the United States were absorbing everything—when the Tariff was at its highest point, agricultural exports were only 72·36 per cent. of the total, and exports of manufactures were 27·64 per cent. From 1871 to 1880, after the civil war, the agricultural products reached 78·44 in proportion to 21·66 of manufactured goods.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Hear, hear.

Mr. PLUMB. Now, those figures show conclusively that during two periods when a protective Tariff prevailed—

a Tariff so high that the hon. member for North Norfolk, while he praised it as highly as he could praise any fiscal policy, and recommended it generally to our adoption, by an argument which, I say, he never has equalled since, in this House—the proportion of exports of manufactures to agricultural products average 1 from 1861 till 1871, 27·64 per cent.; for the next ten years, 21·66 per cent, and for the ten years of low Tariff—from 1850 till 1860—but 20·50 per cent. I believe these figures will show the hon. gentleman that there has been no decrease of manufactured exports under a high Tariff of the United States; on the contrary, they have largely increased. I have taken an average for ten years in each case, as the hon. gentleman is very fond of averages, which he thinks prove everything, though I do not always agree with him. We are told that our policy is working very badly in the Maritime Provinces, of whose sufferings we are constantly hearing; but I think we have sometimes a little evidence to the contrary. I do not know whether the extract I am about to read will be considered authoritative on the subject, but I will give it for what it is worth. I quote the following article from the St. John, (N.B.) Sun :

"It is said that Messrs. Blake, Burpee and Huntington (accompanied, of course, by Mr. Elder, M.P.P.,) will visit the St. John factories to-day and see for themselves what is being done by our manufacturers—those people whom the Telegraph referred to as 'a few struggling manufacturers,' the protection of whose business against foreign competition Sir Richard Cartwright described 'as legalized robbery.' We hope they will take a good look at our workshops, in many of which the number of operatives has been doubled and trebled since 1878, notwithstanding the National Policy and in the face of Mr. Weldon's allegations of universal mercantile bankruptcy. As an aid to those gentlemen in estimating the difficulties which surrounded manufacturing in St. John while Messrs. Blake, Huntington and Burpee were in power, and when the Telegraph was their oracle and most obedient servant, we offer a few figures for them to ponder at their leisure.

"In 1874, when the Mackenzie-Blake Government took control of public affairs, the condition of manufactures in St. John was as follows:—

Capital invested in manufactures	$7,968,000
Annual wages paid	3,605,640
Males employed in manufactures	8,428 }
Females employed in do	1,769 }
	10,197

Annual wages paid	1,709,875
Males employed	5,003 }
Females do	1,281 }
	6,284

"The change produced, therefore, is represented by the following:—

FALLING OFF.

Reduction of capital invested	$2,731,300
Reduction of annual wages	1,806,955
Reduction of males employed	3,425 }
Reduction of females do	488 }
	3,913

"It is, therefore, true that during four years rule of the Mackenzie Government, St. John and Portland manufactures suffered to the extent, in round numbers, of a loss of nearly three millions of dollars of invested capital; about two millions of dollars of annual wages paid; about four thousand people driven out of employment.

"And this, notwithstanding the enormous expenditure and the employment afforded during the rebuilding of the burnt district.

In that connection it was very distressing to hear that, on one occasion, when my hon. friend the Finance Minister was travelling in that country, there were nineteen unfortunate persons who were supposed to be kicking their heels in a cold baggage car, and who, owing to the terrible effects of the policy which he had inaugurated, were about to leave the country. Well that statement was published all over western Ontario and the country generally; those unfortunate men were pictured as being in great distress, while my hon. friend was lolling at his ease on the sofa of a special carriage of the Intercolonial Railway. They all had their little carpet-bags with them, they were all going out of the country, by so much reducing its stock of bone and sinew, and adding to what my hon. friend on the other side once called the ex-odus. But one story was good until another was told. The following letter was soon after addressed to the Sun :

"GENTS,—I have had my attention drawn to a statement in the St. John Globe, that on the train that took Sir Leonard and party to St. John on the 23rd, there were a number of laboring men who were fleeing the country. The object of the Globe in drawing attention to this matter was, no doubt, to try and injure Sir Leonard, and, at the same time, have a hit at the N.P.

Now, I think I can throw some light on this 'exodus' question, for it so happened that J. Winslow Jones & Co. (limited) of Portland, Maine, U.S., for whom I have packed lobsters for many years, required a number of men skilled in making and sealing cans, and they requested me, as soon as our packing season closed, to arrange for a number of my men, who understood the business, to go and work for them during the corn packing; and on the 23rd inst., which I believe is the day in question, I took twelve men from here to Shediac, and saw them off in the train, after giving them a letter to Messrs. Jones & Co., and I have no doubt but these are the men spoken of.

"They are all to return in October or November.

Then the paper goes on to say :

"The nineteen tearful men with nineteen small valises have been heard from. They did not go out of Canada at all. They found work in the St. Croix cotton factory, which has been built solely under the stimulus of the N.P. The N.P., therefore, stopped them on the border, as it has already stopped hundreds, and will, when in full operation, stop thousands from going out of Canada, by providing them with varied and remunerative work in the Dominion."

Well, Sir, we were told by a witty writer not long ago that you might as well try to get a mule by the hind leg as to reconcile a Grit to a national enterprise. I do not know whether that is true or not, but it looks to me very much as if the whole course of the leaders of that party is hostile to the industrial movement of the country, and, considering the tone which from first to last has characterized the utterances of hon. gentlemen on the other side in respect to our fiscal policy, which is characterizing their policy in respect to settling and developing the North-West, it looks as if it were quite true that you might as well try to get a mule by the hind leg as to get one of those hon. gentlemen to join with us fairly, heartily, honestly, to strike hands with us in an endeavor to go forward for the purpose of promoting the interests of our common country. It is a different thing in the United States. I never heard a man there attempt to decry his country. However widely they may differ in opinion, however bitter may be their party strifes, when the question comes up as to the interests of their common country, you will see that they are as one. They believe they have—and they have—a great destiny to carry out. They started in an entirely different way from us. Their inauguration was one which was commenced in blood. Their Constitution insured to the several States all the rights which were not surrendered in terms strictly defined to the general Government. They started with a jealousy of Federal power; they started with the intention that the States should hold their autonomies and their reserved rights. Out of that grew those unfortunate discussions which at last led to a vast outlay of treasure and of blood, and to consequences which no man yet living can foresee. But notwithstanding all that, they think, and they have reason to think, that they have solved some of the most difficult problems of political liberty. Knowing it as I do, and wishing, from my former allegiance to it, always to speak with the tenderest respect of the land which gave me birth—and never did I in any way join in any hostile criticisms upon it—I do not agree with the opinion that in the Constitution of the States is to be found the true essence of political perfection, but I believe that the most perfect freedom that exists in any Government in the world is to be found in the palladium which is furnished to us by the British Constitution. I believe that it is to be found in British liberty as obtained by concession after concession from the Crown by the Parliament of England, which is the true Government of England. I believe that our policy with regard to that great country south of us is to proceed in lines parallel to its course, and the true definition of parallel lines is that they never shall meet; but, Sir, I do not care how closely they may come together. We are to work out on this side of the continent our great destiny; they are to work out, also on theirs, a commensurate destiny; and I trust that, while we may be enabled, without entangling alliances, to keep always in sympathy with them, we may never, by any machinations on this side or any seductions on the other, be tempted for one moment to swerve from the position that we have held, of undying loyalty to the British Throne. Sir, I believe that Canada has a great destiny; and I believe that we shall be indebted largely for the fulfilment of that destiny, under God, to those now at the Helm of State, and notably to the leader of the great Liberal Conservative party. I believe that in the great North-West we are to find the principal elements of Canada's future greatness. I believe that, if we are true to ourselves, if we do not waste ourselves in low party bickering and small party differences, if we are willing, as patriotic men, to strike hands together and to go forward, each endeavoring to do his best for the good of the country, that we shall be doing a noble work, and shall be rewarded by seeing our pathless wilderness blossom as the rose. I believe the North-West has possibilities which no man has yet imagined; I believe also that those possibilities are to be worked out by the policy which we have adopted; and I believe no greater misfortune could happen to Canada to-day than that that policy should be reversed, than that it should be possible for the work which we have commenced to be interrupted in its great progress, than that it should be possible for men to come into power who would embarrass this country in its forward movement. Our friends opposite, I believe, would take such a course if the destinies of this Dominion were again committed to their hands, because they feel bound to do so for consistency's sake, and by the inexorable law which governs men who have made rash promises when in Opposition which they try to fulfil when they succeed to power. No greater misfortune could happen to Canada than that there should be any desire on the part of her people to take away the authority they have given to those who now rule their destiny and relegate them back to opposition to make room for those who now sit on the other side of this House—those who have done what? Who ruled Canada for five years to the yearly detriment of her people; who saw Canada sinking and would not stretch a hand to save her; those of whom it may be said, as it was said of a party on the other side of the border: "When the country sinks their party rises; when the country rises their party sinks." I pray—as one having no party prejudice in the matter—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. PLUMB. Hon. gentlemen may take that position if they choose. They know that their course towards me has been as unfair, perhaps, as was ever pursued towards any public man in Canada; but I lay that aside. I desire to meet my opponents on common ground where each may do what he can for the good of the country; and I pray, for the sake of Canada, that the era of misrule and blundering, and maladministration may never again return to blight and blast the hopes of the people of this Dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Before a vote is taken upon the proposition before you, I propose, as briefly as I can, to address some remarks to the House upon the object which we have in view in going into committee. Usually, Sir, in a deliberative assembly in countries where parliamentary government prevails, the presenting of the Budget is an occasion which Ministers take advantage of in order to lay an exposition of the affairs of the state before the country, and to give the assembled representatives of the people some idea of the exact position of their commercial and financial affairs. No one could have listened to this debate from the beginning without feeling painfully conscious that the chief object of hon. gentlemen opposite was not to give this exposition in the calm and deliberate manner which it requires, but simply to make it the occasion for attack upon their adversaries upon this side of the House. There was an acrimony and a violence in the tone of the hon. Minister of Finance—who usually looks as mild as a lamb—that was quite extraordinary. I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Railways is not in his seat, as I mean to say something regarding his attitude also. He set up as the second of the Minister of Finance, and actually spent two whole hours in abusing the members on this side of the House. The only alleged fault that brought such heavy punishment being the charge that the hon. Minister of Finance was occasionally in the habit of using indifferent grammar. And because of that charge we have these two hours of what I shall not dignify by calling invective, for it was not worthy of the name, but what I can only designate as one long, bitter, coarse, scold, which may best be described by a couplet from Bret Harte:

"He quoted no hymn and he uttered no psalm,
He opened his mouth and he roughly said damn."

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance was good enough to go out of his way, in rather an undignified fashion I must say, in order to attack myself and some other hon. members of the late Administration. Now, Sir, I am disposed, to-night, to defend my Administration, and show that the policy I adopted was one which I believe to be for the interests of the country. We have been told, to-night, with fearful iteration by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down—he repeated it at least twenty times—that our very existence was inimical to the progress of the country; that we never made a speech or uttered a word but what was in condemnation of something of a great national character, and that, instead of being patriotic like hon. gentlemen opposite, we were earnestly devoting ourselves to the destruction of the country. And yet, Sir, the hon. gentleman ventured to say that we were driven from office ignominiously in 1878. This phrase was also used by the hon. the Minister of Railways, and we were reminded of our great defeat in 1878 by the hon. the Minister of Finance, on two or three occasions, in the course of his speech. Sir, I deny that there was any ignominy attending my defeat and that of my colleagues. We took our stand on a certain principle on that occasion, and if we risked our political reputation, if we risked our places as Ministers and our positions as representatives of the people, in order to carry out a principle practically into action, is there any ignominy in that? Is there not more ignominy in the case of hon. gentlemen who sold their country for a sum of money?—who were not able even to attend the House long enough to have a direct vote taken on the subject, but walked out of the House one evening resolved never to come back. The hon. gentlemen who thus accuses us were both in the Ministry when they had the celebrated negotiations with Sir Hugh Allan, and yet they venture to speak to us of ignominy because we took our stand on a well-known political principle. Sir, the hon. gentleman who has just sat down talked of striking hands as parties, of striking hands with the Mother Country and the neighboring Republic and marching on parallel lines, but never to meet. What was our policy in 1878, one that was in harmony with the professions and practices of the Mother Country? Was not it our desire as Liberals—following the example of the great English Liberal party, who have made England great and glorious—to follow those principles of trade which England and all her colonies, with no solitary exceptions, have given effect to in our own day; and if the people of this country, misled in a time of deep depression, gave their votes against our continuing to keep our position, I feel rather proud of having sacrificed myself and my position to the vindication of a principle which I believe to be the root of all political prosperity. Sir, when we assumed office in 1873 we did so with a firm determination to use the possession of office only to give effect to the principles we professed in Opposition, and I am prepared to maintain, on every occasion, that we did so give effect to our principles, that we endeavored to restore peace and harmony to the disturbed districts of the country; that we endeavored to bring the entire population of the Confederated Provinces, some of which had been confederated rather against their will, into a harmonious union on all political issues. It was our duty, also, Sir, and our desire particularly, to extend the domain of civilization in the North-West. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) said, in the course of his closing remarks, that we had invariably shown a malicious desire to prevent the acquisition of the North-West and throw every possible obstacle in the way of its settlement. Sir, it is almost laughable to find this hon. gentleman, who has not been very long in Canada, venturing to lecture to Canadians who have been here all their lives, about the North-West. Every one who knows Canadian history knows that for the last twenty-five years there has been a steady fight on the part of the Liberal party of Ontario and Quebec to obtain possession of that territory. Who does not remember the discussions that took place at the various conventions in the west, and particularly the one in 1859? Who does not remember the advocacy by the chief political organ of the Liberal party and the chief organ of public opinion in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes, yes. The hon. gentleman thinks so himself for he reads the Globe the first thing every morning to see what it has to say, and he is in mortal terror of what may appear in that organ. Hon. gentlemen opposite are always ready to denounce the Globe, but when they find anything in it tending to support, in the slightest degree their own opinions, it is quoted as an authority not to be despised. Now, Sir, it was, as I said, a determined effort on the part of the Liberal party that brought that country first into public notice; it was that party that promoted its settlement, that promoted its purchase, and all who are acquainted with the internal history of the last twenty years knows that Sir George Cartier and some of his friends were the only opponents that policy had, their action being taken on the miserable plea that that policy might extend too rapidly and too far the political power possessed by the larger Province. I am glad his successors in this House now in power do not appear to act upon that narrow ground, but are willing to join with the Liberals in settling that magnificent country. But they say we decry the merits of that territory. When did we do so? We have invariably on this and every other occasion in respect to this and every other subject, sought to make plain the exact truth respecting the position of that country, and, no matter what hon. gentlemen opposite may say, I prefer being in Opposition, and being able to say, that no person has been misled through any utterance of mine in respect to the state of matters in that country. I have observed, also, in the course of the debate, that hon. gentlemen opposite are not at all ashamed of the proceeding of last Session; that they are still prepared to defend, as the best possible thing that could be done, or that ever was done, the rejection of the lower offer of one company and the acceptance of the higher offer of another for the building of the Pacific Railway. We are actually charged by the hon. member for Niagara with having needlessly and recklessly, when not called upon to do so, commenced the construction of the Pacific Railway. We are charged with having made ourselves responsible for a considerable portion of the debt, on the ground that we commenced the railway when we should not have commenced it. We were charged a few evenings ago, on the other hand, by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), if the report in a newspaper be true, with having done nothing at all to build the railway up to the time of our leaving office. The fact is, both hon. gentlemen are wrong. The policy of the late Administration was this: we believed the bargain entered into with British Columbia was a most improvident and unwise one; that it was one impossible of execution; that, even if it were possible to execute it, it would not be fair to the other Provinces to do so at that time and in that manner; and we endeavored honestly and faithfully to get the terms reduced, and we succeeded in getting them reduced. But, in the meantime, we held and believed that it was exceedingly desirable, though not absolutely necessary, to obtain as early an entrance into the country as possible by rail, and we lost no time, after acceding to office, in getting work commenced at two points between Fort William and Red River. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), with that accuracy which distinguishes all his utterances respecting his political opponents, was good enough, on several occasions lately, to say that when we left office, after having been five years in power, there was not one mile located, according to one speech, and not one mile built, according to another speech.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. I made no such statement anywhere as that the late Government left office without having a mile of the Pacific Railway located. What I said was this: that they left office without having one mile located west of Red River. That is the statement I made.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have seen the report, and it is stated as I have said. I have a letter here from a gentleman who was at the meeting in Almonte. He says:

"Mr. White also stated that, when the late Government went out of office, after five years incumbency, not one mile of railway was built on which an engine could run."

Is that correct?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Not only was there one mile built, but 200 miles were built; and if the hon. gentleman will consult the report of the Minister of Public Works in the year following my leave of office, he will find it there stated that the track was laid for some thirty or forty miles west of Fort William, and that engines were running over 102 miles, the balance of the track to English River being ready for the rails. It is there also stated that, on the Selkirk Branch, extending over twenty-three miles, there were trains running and the track laid from Winnipeg to Emerson, and had been so for months before that time. Yet the hon. gentleman ventured to make such a statement. But it is difficult to believe hon. gentlemen opposite. Their only policy appears to be abuse of their opponents. They do not discuss measures; they do not discuss the state of the country; but they say, if you can, throw mud at your opponents until some of it sticks. I say in regard to the Pacific Railway that we located the line entirely to Red River from Fort William, and we located the line entirely from Selkirk westward to the mouth of the Fraser at Port Moody, and except what the Syndicate has set aside, our location has been entirely followed. All through British Columbia the exact line surveyed by us has been accepted by the present Administration. The other part we had ready for them to begin upon is accepted and finished, that is, between Rat Portage and English River; so instead of our policy being barren, it was most productive, and was carried out with much regard to economy, that no one can at this moment charge us with wantonly and uselessly spending a single dollar of the public money. Speaking of the acquisition of the North-West country, as early as 1852 the late Mr. Brown, during the first session of Parliament, and when he was giving his leadership of the Reform party, proposed the resolution in the House for the acquisition of that Territory, thus showing most conclusively with whom rested the glory—if it be a glory, and I think it is—of having banished an odious monopoly from the face of the continent, and made the country fit to be occupied by a civilized people. My hon. friend beside me says the country has now got into the hands of another monopoly. That is very true, and it is a matter deeply to be regretted. But I do not intend to discuss that subject to-night, but will confine myself to the discussion of the policy of the two Governments in regard to financial and trade affairs, and limit myself to such references as are absolutely necessary to statements made from time to time during this debate. With respect to our policy, as contrasted with the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, let me say this: During the elections of September, 1878—I am sure there was no lack of abundant declarations of policy on our part to indicate precisely what is the line we intended to follow—we declined to accept anything looking in the direction of Protection. We said we had a revenue Tariff of 17½ per cent. which afforded a very large protection to manufacturers, and I knew then, and I know now, that that did afford a sufficient protection to nearly every legitimate interest. I was very much astonished, a few nights ago, when the hon. member for West Montreal assured me and the House that he had not obtained 3 per cent. upon his investments in cotton manufactories since the present Government came into office. As my information on this point is very different from the hon. gentleman's experience, I shall propose, in the course of a few days, to ask the House to allow me to get a Committee of Enquiry into the distressed condition of the cotton manufacturers, and in that Committee I hope we will obtain the evidence that the hon. gentleman is prepared to give, to show the wretched condition in which the trade is, even now, and the fatality of those people who are going on building cotton factories all over the country as fast as it is possible to invest money in brick and lime. But the hon. Minister of Finance, who is so censorious upon us, was not a Protectionist in September, 1878. At that time he denied, explicitly and categorically, questions addressed to him in that sense at St. John, when his dear friend, Senator Boyd, who is a sort of wet nurse to the hon. gentleman—I beg his pardon, a dry nurse I should say—telegraphed to the leader of the hon. gentleman to ask if it were true that a Protectionist Policy was proposed; if it were true that 35 per cent. of duties were proposed to be added; and he replied that there was no such thing intended, but only a readjustment of duties. Now, Sir, none of us would object, for one moment, to a readjustment of duties. There must be a readjustment of duties every two or three years with every Administration, and the hon. gentleman himself has come down, and I think he is right, with a proposition to readjust his own Tariff this Session. In fact, there will be a readjustment every Session, and it will be readjusted out of existence before the hon. gentleman is very much older.

Several hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, several hon. members say no, but we will see how that will be. But, supposing that the hon. gentleman did adopt Protection as a principle—he did not certainly on that occasion—but now if he does adopt it, let us see what that principle is. The hon. gentleman claims that the vast amount of money which he possesses as Finance Minister, has been the result of his Protectionist Policy. Now, I am delighted that we are able to congratulate the Finance Minister and each other on the prosperous state of the country. I am glad to be able to say that I have seen abundant evidence of the prosperity myself in all parts of the country. I am proud to say that throughout the country districts where there was a good deal of suffering in previous years, that that is almost entirely removed. I am glad to say a considerable portion of the indebtedness of farmers has been paid. But, Sir, I am also bound to say, and every hon. gentleman opposite will be bound in his heart to acknowledge, that we owe all that prosperity, not to the machination or the tricks of a politician, but to the abundant resources provided by an all-powerful Providence. We all know what a revival of the industry of farming means. We know that during the last three or four years, at least, there was a succession of bad harvests in England, the great consuming country of the world. We know that during these same years, three of them at least, there was a more than usually abundant harvest reaped in Canada. We know that during the previous year, while my Administration was in power, there was an almost total cessation of enterprise in the lumbering interests of the country. The two great staples of this country for exportation sale are the cereals and animal products of the farm, and the products of the forest, and when there was a revival in the sale of the products of the forest equal at least to the abundance of the harvest that was reaped, how could we escape prosperity, no matter how bad the Government was that held the reins of power? If the hon. gentleman claimed that he is entitled to any merit for this, he is claiming that he is in the position of Providence, the arbiter of national prosperity. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman must know that no money is to be made by taxing a class of the community. Protection means protection to some particular industry, to some particular class of the community, and if one class is protected it must at the expense of all the other classes and if all classes of the country are protected alike, then all are made poorer by the cost of enforcing that protection on the country. That is the theory of Protection, and I defy any person to give it any other color. The theory of Free Trade, on the contrary, is that all restrictions should be removed from the purchase or sale of products or commodities, so far as that can possibly be done consistent with the local circumstances which have always to be considered. One hon. gentleman opposite—I think it was the Minister of Customs—said the other day, that he observed from a speech of mine, that I was prepared to kill the manufacturers off by inches. Sir, I said in my speech delivered at Lambton, a few weeks ago, that we were accused of a determination, if we should succeed at the coming elections, of returning at once to the Tariff which we ourselves had in operation. What I said was that no politician, no statesman, no Minister could honestly disregard the interests that may have been created, and that while there must of necessity be a return at some time to sound principles of fiscal legislation, that that return would have to be considered in connection with the interests so created. But, Sir, if the hon. gentleman will look back, he will find declarations of mine of a similar character years before. In my address to the electors of Hamilton in January, 1874, I took precisely the same ground. In my speech which is published—delivered, I think, at Brampton in 1877—the same ground is again taken. There is nothing inconsistent in that position. It is perfectly just in itself, and it is, in my opinion, wise statesmanship to take that ground. We have a firm belief that the Tariff that is in existence now, or any protective Tariff, must necessarily be ultimately a serious mischief to the country. Protection can legislate money out of one set of pockets into another set of pockets, but how is capital created except by industry? Were there no labor in the world there would be no capital, and were there no labor in Canada there would be no money to distribute. Protection proposes to take the money from those who earn it and put it into the pockets of a few individuals. I think I recollect a speech of the

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Minister of Finance—I may not be correct in attributing it to him, but it was a speech of some hon. gentleman opposite—where he claimed it to be a great benefit to the country to create a few millionaires in Montreal and elsewhere who would have large sums of money to expend for benevolent purposes—I am not able to give the authority, but my impression is that it was my hon. friend opposite (Sir Leonard Tilley). The principle upon which the late Administration desired to conduct the affairs of the country, was to remove restrictions of all kinds from trade; to enable every one to buy and sell in the cheapest market without restriction, so far as it was possible for us to do this with the necessity resting upon us of raising a revenue from the Customs duties. This was the course, Sir, which the Government pursued, and in defence of that principle the Government went to the country. We were badly beaten. I regret that extremely for the sake of the principle involved; but I have no reason to regret it on personal grounds, I have no reason, Sir, to regret the reverse which relieved me from an immense responsibility, enough to weigh down the energies of any man, if continued for years; and while I do not at all desire to say, or pretend to think that an honorable politician shall not desire to get office, I desire at the same time to say, and I hope, Sir, that gentlemen opposite know that I have given proof of that in my political career—that rather than accept office when I could not carry my principles with me, I have declined it. I admit, Sir, for all that, my entire responsibility, as well as that of my colleagues, for the policy of the late Administration, and I am prepared to defend it at all times and under all circumstances. We endeavored to do the best we could for the country, and I believe we did the best that could be done; and we endeavored to carry out a policy which I believed would be not only the source of prosperity to the country, but would place us in the proud position of marching in line with the Mother Country, and the great Australian colony pushing forward those principles of freedom, for they are intimately connected with the doctrine of Free Trade. Protection as a system is a relic of barbarism. There should be free trade in goods as well as in land. How would hon. gentlemen like restrictions on the sale of their lands or on any other thing they have? Everyone knows perfectly well that the principle of free trade is one that cannot be abandoned without causing suffering in some quarter; but, Sir, gentlemen opposite say that our policy caused heavy deficits to occur in the revenue of the country, and they claim great credit for having remedied those deficits. Now, Sir, have they created wealth? Had they put their hands in their pockets and filled the public Treasury with money, I could understand that they should get credit for removing the deficit, but they simply imposed more taxes—one of the most vulgar of all remedies for removing a deficit; and if it were criminal in us to have a deficit, I would like to know if it is less criminal for other parties to have a deficit? We will see what the deficits were during the period the hon. gentlemen were in office, before Confederation, in the old Province of Canada. In 1858, they had a deficit of $3,375,377; in 1859, they had a deficit of $1,494,744; in 1860, a deficit of $1,973,999; in 1862, a deficit of $1,999,000; and, in 1862-3, under the Sandfield Macdonald Government, a deficit of $2,064,331. The deficit in the first year was 39 per cent. of the revenue; in the second year, 18 per cent.; in the next year, 20 per cent., and in the fourth year, 20 per cent. Now, Sir, with this record of deficit, we never, on our side of the House at that time, charged the Government with being responsible for that deficit because they did not impose fresh taxation. If the deficit could have been removed without taxation, no doubt the late Administration would have done it, but they did not believe that the method of giving relief during a period of deep depression and deficiency of crop was to tax the people. The hon. gentlemen opposite were not able to remove this deep depression immediately on coming into office, as they promised. Sir John A. Macdonald, while in Middlesex, declared that if he and his friends triumphed, not a day would be lost without bringing relief to the country.

Mr. STEPHENSON. That was figuratively speaking.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman will find a good deal around him that is figurative. The promise was that stocks would immediately raise, manufacturers would employ more hands, and life would be given to the country all over. Well, Sir, as one hon. gentleman proved, there were more failures during the year in which they succeeded to office than many previous years in Canada. Bank stocks fell until there was a loss in a few months of over $12,000,000. Every part of the country showed the deepest depression, but, Sir, an immediate good crop relieved the difficulty to a great extent, and there was a gradual revival in the state of the country as a whole. For periods of depression come and pass away almost without being sufficiently capable of explanation by political economists. That, Sir, added to the revival of the lumber trade, alone enabled hon. gentlemen opposite to show a better record in the second year of their Administration; and had the depression not passed away in England and in the United States as well as here, and had they obtained only the same kind of crops that prevailed during our period, and were subject to the same losses in the lumbering business we were subject to, their record would have been worse than ours, very much worse, because the depression was growing deeper and deeper. Now, Sir, the circumstances of the country after the accession of the hon. gentlemen opposite, were favorable to any Government, and no Government can possibly provide a remedy for bad crops, and no Government can destroy the beneficial influences of good crops. Besides that, Sir, there was this additional circumstance: we all knew that throughout the Province of Ontario—I am not so intimately acquainted with other Provinces, but I believe it is more or less the same there—that there was a very considerable amount of money borrowed by farmers. I know that many farmers were indebted to country storekeepers; I know that during two or three years every family throughout the country were compelled—whether in affluent circumstances or poor circumstances—to economize their means largely in order to make their revenue meet their expenditure; but, immediately after obtaining a good crop and the revival of the lumber business, money circulated more freely, the storekeepers were able to sell an abnormal quantity of goods and an unusual amount of money came through their hands into those of the wholesale dealers, and thence to the coffers of the Government, from the importation of new goods. This, Sir, is the real source of the prosperity the hon. gentlemen boast of as being the result of their policy. It is true, Sir, that some branches of trade were not beneficially affected by the tide of prosperity that has come, for from the time of their accession to office to this hour the shipping interests of the country have suffered, and are suffering, a greater depression than they ever did before, and the export of vessels which formerly was a very considerable item has decreased now very seriously, and this is quite natural, Sir, as a result of Protection. We can never purchase goods unless we sell goods—we must exchange one kind of goods for another—our purchases are not made in gold. A very small portion indeed of the purchases of the world are made in gold. They are made in commercial exchanges of one commodity for another, and if our people take the ground which hon. gentlemen opposite have done, and done successfully, that it is a mistake to import anything for sale, they cannot expect that the imports will continue long. And if they take the ground that we ought to make everything we consume ourselves, they will simply destroy the foreign trade and get into the position the United States is in at the present moment, of having almost their entire carrying trade in the hands of foreign competitors. This is the inevitable result of a false policy, and it is a result which hon. gentlemen opposite are rapidly bringing about in this country. It will not take many years, Sir, until it is fully developed in all branches of industry. Inordinately protected industries will multiply over the land as they are multiplying now; notwithstanding the wretched pittance which cotton manufacturers are getting as profits, they are multiplying fast now, and when these reach the producing capacity of the country for consumption—when they reach the amount of goods that we are able to consume, then they will at once come into active competition with each other, and the result will be as it was at one time in the iron industry in the United States, that the trade was almost destroyed; that then a combination of ironmasters and founders took place, by which an effort was made to keep up prices by combination. Then resulted a general demoralization in the Legislature. Log-rolling committees were formed to endeavor to get industries benefitted at the expense of the nation. This will be the result that will be reached by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite within a very few years. The hon. Finance Minister, however, says that his policy has given bread to the workingman—that his policy has given abundant work to the workingman. It is true, Sir, that we see in one quarter that the workingmen are striking to get the same wages they got in 1877-78. It is true, the hon. gentleman, in his list of new factories mentioned a few days ago and finally laid on the Table of the House, includes manufacturing factories that are not new at all. The moment I looked at the list I saw one put down as a new manufactory in Toronto with 200 hands employed, although it was only one moved from the village of Newcastle, because they believed they could carry on their business more profitably in that city. I notice three others in the same position, and I am satisfied that if that list is closely examined, as I presume the newspapers will do, it will be found that not one-half of the ninety-five are new factories. I enquired yesterday in Montreal, and no person could tell me, amongst the number of merchants I met, where that factory was with 550 hands employed.

Mr. PLUMB. You are in rather bad company.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, I am with the majority in the House, but I must endeavor to put up with it for a time.

Mr. PLUMB. You will have to put up with it for a long time.

Mr. MACKENZIE. A good deal of time was taken up in discussing the relative expenditures of the two Governments, and the hon. member for Niagara—I hope he will not go off singing at present—was good enough to adopt a new method of balancing books. He is evidently a most dangerous book-keeper for any establishment to have, for he managed to balance his account by simply subtracting $900,000 from one side in order to make it equal to the other side. There was no attempt to make the items agree, but there was a most simple method of obtaining a balance by deducting as he did $900,000 from the expenditures of the North-West. Now, I have taken another method of obtaining an exact comparison of the expenditure of certain years. I give the items from the Public Accounts, and the hon. gentlemen can take them down if they like. In 1873-74, the interest payable upon the public debt was $5,724,436; in 1877-78, it was $7,048,883, or an increase of $1,324,447. Payments into the sinking fund, in 1873-74, amounted to $573,920; in 1877-78, to $945,716, an increase of $431,826. In the Administration of Justice, in 1873-74, there was a payment made of $459,037; in 1877-78, of $564,920, or an increase of $105,883. Indians, $146,068, in 1873-74; in 1877-78, $421,503, an increase of $275,435. North-West Mounted Police, in 1873-74, $199,599; in 1877-78, $334,748, an increase of $135,149. Weights and Measures, no payment in 1873-74; in 1877-78, $96,484, or a total increase upon the items I have given, which were items beyond the control of the Administration, of $2,369,224. The total expenditure for 1877-78, was $23,503,158, and deducting the increases in these seven articles, it left a net expenditure for the same purposes that $23,316,000 were spent for in 1873-74, of $21,133,124, from which a further amount of increase in pensions of $49,399 has to be deducted, leaving the actual net expenditure $21,083,535 in room of $-3,316,316, the last year of hon. gentlemen opposite, or an actual decrease of, as nearly as possible, $2,500,000 from the time we took office to that period. But we will take another year to show that this was continuous. We will take the previous year of 1876-77. I will not weary the House with more than the one statement, but I think it is important that the statement should go upon record. In 1873-74, as before, the interest was $5,724,436; in 1876-77, $6,797,226, or an increase of $1,072,791. Sinking fund, an increase of $314,453, the figures being: 1873-74, $513,920, against $283,373 in 1876-77. Administration of Justice, 1873-74, $459,037; 1876-77, $565,597, or an increase of $106,560. Pensions, $56,453 in 1873-74; in 1876-77, $112,531, an increase of $56,000. Indians, $146,000 in 1873-74; in 1876-77, $301,596, or an increase of $155,528. Mounted Police, $199,599 in 1873-74, against $352,749 in 1876-77, or an increase of $153,150. Weights and Measures, none in 1873-74; in 1876-77, $111,085, an increase of $96,484; or a total increased expenditure, in these several items, of $1,955,044, the expenditure for the year being $23,510,307, leaving a net expenditure, after deducting items similar to those spent in 1873, of $21,555,257. Now, Sir, I will take a year altogether of the period of administration of the hon. gentleman opposite. I will contrast his own last year, 1873-74 with the year 1880-81. The interest in 1873-74 is $5,734,436; in 1880-81, it was $7,594,144, or an increase of $1,869,708; the Sinking Fund, $513,920, in 1873-74, and $1,250,731 in 1880-81, or an increase of $636,811; Administration of Justice, $459,037, against $583,597, an increase of $124,920; Pensions, $56,463, against $96,388, an increase of $39,935; Indians, $146,000, against $305,097, or an increase of $168,988; Mounted Police, $199,599, against $289,845, or an increase of $90,246; Weights and Measures, $74,170 in 1880-81. Now, the total increase for 1880-81 over 1873-74 was $3,494,779, while the hon. gentleman's total expenditures in the Public Accounts was $25,502,554, leaving as a net expenditure, $2,007,775, or a difference of $1,000,000 higher than ours in the years 1877-78. There is no controverting these figures.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman laughs, but I defy him to do it unless he declares his own statement to be wrong.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No, no; we do not own ourselves responsible for $73,500,000 in 1873-74.

Mr. MACKENZIE. But besides that, hon. gentlemen opposite have been in the habit for two or three years back, of charging to capital account what we always charged to revenue account. Last year the hon. gentleman took $300,000 and charged it to capital account. The hon. gentlemen—both of them who spoke during this debate—boasted of their success in reducing the expenses of the Intercolonial Railway and of having revenue to meet expenditure. When we come to discuss that, Sir, we know what sort of revenue this is—a good deal of it; we know how much of it is Government freight; we will know, also, how much has been spent on capital account after the late Government had closed the capital account.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

We find that there is at present before the House—they are asking votes or accounting for votes, a sum of about $100,000, that is charged to capital account, that the late Administration would have charged to revenue account. It is a very easy matter, almost as easy as the method of the hon. gentleman from Niagara, of striking a balance when the sum gets too large for capital account. The increase in the Indian subsidies seems to me to be most alarming. There are large sums asked in the Supplementary Estimates of this year—I forget how much, but something nearly half a million altogether—without any statement as to what it was spent for, except one item, and it is impossible that we can accept that as a normal expenditure in that country. There must have been some extraordinary expenditure that the House is not yet aware of, and while I am not at all unwilling to vote for the Government to do what is necessary and right, for the Indians, I am not in favor of voting money to keep a horde of servants attending the Indians in that quarter with doubtful results, indeed, and I believe there is an excessive expenditure in connection with this service which the Public Accounts Committee ought to look into. With regard to the Post Office income, all I have to say is that a colleague of the hon. Ministers opposite, Mr. Macpherson, devoted himself in two pamphlets which are crammed with falsehoods from the first page to the last, to attacking the late Administration upon every possible item of expenditure, and one of the items of expenditure was the Post Office expenditure, for which we were severely attacked as being most improvident; but gentlemen who have spoken during this debate have stated that the expenditure has been heavy; no doubt, but it has been incurred in opening up routes in the North-West, part of it, as part of our expenditure, has been devoted to the same purpose. I do not attack the hon. gentlemen opposite about the expenditure, because I have not looked into it, but I think I can say this: that while the expenditure of the late Government increased at the rate of $50,000 per annum, the increase in expenditure before we took office reached $115,000 per annum, and it has reverted to the same figure now, and it has increased about $300,000 since we left office, showing that hon. gentlemen opposite have not at all—some of the number, at all events—succeeded in keeping down the expenditure for what they attacked us, although it was very much less than theirs. The hon. Minister of Railways is not in his place, and I will defer some remarks which I propose to make about another branch of the public service until he is in his place. I should say, in reference to these comparative expenditures, that there is one word of explanation I forgot to make. There were two or three items that hon. gentlemen opposite would have been entitled to take credit for, as abnormal, in 1873-74. They will remember it when I mention it: the expenditure on the boundary line between the United States and ourselves, for which they paid somewhere about $61,000 in their last year, and $146,000 being a balance paid in military stores that was due to the Imperial Government. I have not counted the cost in our own expenditures for the years I have mentioned. But we had to incur an expenditure of something about $200,000 for exhibitions at Philadelphia, Paris, and Sydney, which I have not counted on the other side. The hon. the First Minister and one or two other gentlemen made some reference to the coming policy of the country guided by them, and as to our relations with foreign countries. They have taken larger votes of money for the purpose of keeping up a quasi-ambassadorial establishment in London, and they have sent an Ambassador to Paris. No results came from his visits and those enormous expenditures, yet I argue in the policy announced to this extent, that we ought, in all matters concerning our own trade, to do our own business; that honor is not a new thing with us as some hon. gentlemen opposite seem to think. He took that ground in this House many years ago, and in 1870 we had a long debate upon that subject. With that as with other matters when we assumed office we assumed the responsibility of carrying this practically into effect, and at the time that the Fishery Arbitration was about to be proceeded with, and when the Imperial Government desired us to take an Imperial Commissioner to manage the affair, we took the ground that the Commissioner must be a Canadian appointed by ourselves, and that the arbitration should be under the control and management of the Canadian Government. This was ultimately conceded, and my hon. friend beside me (Sir Albert J. Smith) as Minister, and Sir Alexander Galt as Commissioner, are entitled to the entire credit which the hon. Minister of Railways took to the Government on the Treasury benches of securing that amount of money. Had that negotiation been left, as former negotiations concerning the United States were left, in the hands of some gentlemen from England who did not know the manner of conducting business in the United States, or the blustering character of the proposals made sometimes, I believe we would not have received one dollar for our fishery compensation. Again, Sir, when, in 1874, it was proposed by some gentlemen at Washington to have an attempt made to revive the Reciprocity Treaty, we made representations to the Imperial Government that it was desirable that such negotiations should be opened; but we took the ground also that they must be opened and carried on by the Government here; though nominally, in the concluding parts, by the Government at home. The result of that negotiation was that the late Mr. Brown was appointed and commissioned by the Imperial Government as a joint Plenipotentiary with Sir Edward Thornton to conduct these negotiations. They were not successful, as the United States did not carry it out, although their Congress agreed to the arrangement made; but such were the facts of the case, and I mention it to show that the policy for which credit is claimed now, is simply our policy which the hon. gentlemen opposite have tardily agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE. My hon. friend for Niagara cries hear, hear. Let me read to him what his leader said in the debate in 1870. Sir John Macdonald said:

"Why should they pass resolutions asking for power to negotiate treaties by their own Ambassadors? Why should they throw away the great advantages they now have of the assistance of England in negotiating treaties? How much better to have the powerful influence of Great Britain than to go with bated breath and humble tone pleading in forma pauperis with foreign countries to make a treaty with them. Their answer would be we don't know you, who are you? A Province of England. 'Then send England to us, we will treat with her.' That would be the deserved answer we would get."

This was the language of the hon. gentleman a few years ago, and now he takes credit to himself for introducing a new system, which in fact has been in operation for years. In 1871, he was himself sent, not as a joint Plenipotentiary but as a High Commissioner to Washington; but his success on that occasion in upholding Canadian interests in the payment of the Fenian claims and other matters, was not such as would induce any people or any Government to place him on a similar commission a second time.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Hon. gentlemen say hear, hear, but let them look at the records and see what that success was. If ever there was a humiliating position presented by a people it was that of the British Commissioners and the Canadian Commissioners among them, agreeing to pay all the claims of United States citizens that were raised in connection with the ravages of cruisers at sea, and refusing even to consider the claims of our own people in Canada for the expenses connected with the Fenian raid. Yet that, Sir, was the result of his first negotiation as an Ambassador, and say it was not such as would induce any Government to trust him with the same thing again.

An hon. MEMBER. Well, we got what we wanted.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes, we did, but you did not.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). We laid the foundation to stand on.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes, and the superstructure would never have been built by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman whether he does not know that, at the beginning of these negotiations at Washington, it was understood that they should not be held unless it was understood there should be no allusion to the Fenian raid?

Mr. MACKENZIE. No such thing. If the hon. gentleman will allow me I will apply the plummet rule to him and see if he is plumb on this matter or not. I recollect very well, Sir, all that passed in this House when the then member for Sherbrooke (Sir Alexander Galt), who knew more of the coming Commissioner than any other person in this House, was unwilling to trust him without specific instructions. He moved a resolution in this House giving those specific instructions; and I might here tell my hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb) that I had more confidence in his leader than Sir Alexander Galt had, and I thought it was a mistake to give those specific instructions from this House. I, therefore, opposed the resolution, but I found out my great mistake, and I should have acknowledged that the then member for Sherbrooke knew better what he was doing in that matter than I possibly could. I am quite willing though for all that, and notwithstanding these strictures that I am compelled to make upon what took place, I am prepared to support the principle of giving to Canada every power of that kind consistent with our allegiance to the Mother Country and our political connection with it. It is quite evident, Sir, that this country cannot go on and submit to negotiations—on this continent, at all events—being conducted by people who know nothing whatever of the country. I regret that owing to an affection which I have in the throat, I am unable to speak much longer to-night, or to refer to some matters which I shall have to postpone to a future occasion; but before sitting down I have to say this: that while hon. gentlemen opposite will obtain from me every fair play in every matter connected with the Estimates, I shall criticise closely and carefully the various expenditures which I deem to be inconsistent with the ground they have taken or the promises they have made to the country. The hon. member for Niagara referred to the expenditure on capital account, and to the question as to who were responsible for the increase in the debt. Now, my hon. friend behind me was as nearly as possible absolutely correct. The expenditure on capital account made by us was entirely, with the exception of the St. Peter's Canal, on account of obligations entered into by the previous Administration. The hon. member for Niagara said that we rushed into the construction of the Pacific Railway when we were not called on to do it. I take no such views of the obligations we were forced into in connection with the Columbia bargain. That bargain was made by the Government, and although imprudently made, I felt, as a Minister sworn to do what was right for the country, that I was bound—and my colleagues felt the same—to give effect to that treaty as far as it was possible for us to do so consistent with the burden of taxation that was to be imposed on the people. The contracts on the whole of the canals were let when we entered office—that is, on the Welland Canal, the Lachine Canal, and the canals on the Ottawa River. These embraced an immense expenditure of money—no less than $43,800,000 for canals, between $10,000,000 and $12,000,000 for the Intercolonial Railway, no less than $30,000,000 for the Pacific Railway, $2,000,000 for finishing the railways in the Lower Provinces,

$2,500,000 for the Prince Edward Island Railway, $4,500,000 for minor works, $2,500,000 for improvements on the St. Lawrence where there were no locks, and $1,000,000 for advances. All these obligations had to be met. We might be called to account for proceeding with any of them too fast, but we did not proceed with any of them—that is, the canals—faster than we believed the public interests required. I am not at all certain now that the policy was a wise one of entering on a great enlargement of the Welland Canal. It was not our policy, but we followed it up. The plan was the plan of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I take my full share of responsibility for that as a simple member of the Legislature, although not supporting the Government at the time. We find, Sir, that although the Welland Canal is constructed with locks 270 feet long and 45 feet wide, there is not at this moment one single vessel building for traffic through that canal, though it is about finished. So much is freight being carried on railways that it becomes exceedingly doubtful whether any of the canals of the country will ever pay any revenue again.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). What does the Fort Frances Lock do?

Mr. MACKENZIE. The Fort Frances Lock was never finished, and, therefore, there is no traffic there.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). It ought never to have been commenced.

Mr. MACKENZIE. My hon. friend is too wise altogether. He looks wiser than any man ought to be. His remark was an original one, but I think I heard it before. I am seriously discussing the commercial effect on the country of these works.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Well, this is a commercial work.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No, I am afraid not now; hon. gentlemen opposite have placed it out of that category.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). You should not have begun it, that is the reason.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, Sir, I am not here to bandy words with the hon. members for Hastings, either west or north; if I were, I would have only to go up to Shaw's Canal, where I will show them twice as much money was spent in a hole they can see to-day,

Mr. PLUMB. It was done by your party.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No; it was done long before I was in power.

Mr. PLUMB. The Reformers were in office.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No; it was done by hon. gentlemen opposite. I desire now, Sir, to refer to one charge made by hon. gentlemen opposite—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is only right, considering the condition of the hon. gentleman's health, that if he feels that it is inconvenient for him to continue the discussion to-night—

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am exceedingly obliged to my hon. friend, but I will not avail myself of his offer to-night. I shall only refer to-night to the charge made that we are inimical—hostile—to manufacturers. The charge is one not merely without foundation, but it is an absurd charge. Why should we be inimical to manufacturers? Are not many of us interested in manufactures? Have not many of us friends who are manufacturers? Are not the majority of manufacturers political friends of ours?

An hon. MEMBER. They were; they are not now.

Another hon. MEMBER. They have always been.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have stated that I believe the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has worked injuriously to manufacturers. Hon. gentlemen seem to think that agriculture is not a manufacture. I hold it to be a manufacture of the largest kind, without which our country could not exist. It is one which involves a large amount of capital and manual labor, and produces more than any other manufacture in the country. And what we are not willing to do is this: we are not willing that farming interests should be subordinated to manufacturing interests; but we contend that one should be placed on as good a footing as another, and that to assert that the farmers have benefited anything from the National Policy, is to go against the plain indication which the market prices and the history of the last two or three years discloses. Let us endeavor by our policy to adopt such a course as will do justice to the farmers as well as to the manufacturers. While I am not disposed at all to continue an excessive protection to any class, whether farmers or manufacturers, I am only desirous of obtaining sufficient revenue from the Customs and Inland Revenue sources as will meet the wants of the Government, and we must remember that we have no other source of revenue to look to, and that if we create classes by our legislation we will have difficulties in after years in separating those classes into their usual normal condition. We will set one class at war against another, and we will produce that feeling of disaster which has prevailed in Germany and in France for the last two years in consequence of their protective policy. I intended to refer to the condition of these two countries, two of the most highly protected countries in the world, except the United States. The state of Germany is such at present in consequence of Protection—as authorities show—that the people are flocking in hundreds of thousands from her shores and seeking homes across the Atlantic. Hon. gentlemen opposite will say, I have no doubt, that these parties are seeking shelter in the United States, where protection also prevails.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is the paradox.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No. There is no paradox in it. If the hon. gentleman has candidly made an enquiry he will find this: That the United States is a small world in itself. It has every variety of climate, it produces every variety of fruit, cereals, and productions of every kind; they have mines of almost every kind available in the country, and they have an immense population of their own, but with all that they are not able to export any considerable quantity of manufactured goods.

An hon. MEMBER. They have their home market.

Mr. MACKENZIE. They are simply able to keep their own markets—not quite that, as an hon. friend behind me remarks; but that is the utmost they pretend to do. It is perfectly well known that their export trade is destroyed by the protection they have, and it is equally well known that our export trade is gradually being destroyed too. Short as the time is, it has already had a very serious effect upon our exports of manufactured articles. I desire simply to say this, that so far as I am concerned—and I believe hon. gentlemen on this side of the House share the opinion—we are friends alike of farmers and manufacturers, but we hold that no class of persons or occupations should have anything more than a fair opportunity to develop their energies and their productions to the utmost extent that can be done consistent with the welfare and interests of others.

Mr. COURSOL moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think my hon. friend is under a misapprehension. I understand he thinks that the hon. member for Lambton intends to continue his remarks on the next occasion when this matter comes up again. I am under the impression, however, that he said he would take another opportunity of adding the few remarks he would have made this evening had his health allowed him to do so. In that case, perhaps, my hon. friend had better not move the adjournment of the debate, but to make now the remarks he intended to make.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. COURSOL. Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that the predictions of politicians and financiers are realized; they are in the habit of predicting wonders which are not justified in the course of events. Twenty years ago, the promoters of the Grand Trunk Railway predicted that that enterprise would yield 12 per cent. to its shareholders, yet those who trusted in these promises are still awaiting a first dividend. The Government which preceded the present one, had promised Canada a return of the golden age, and instead of that we had an era of deficits and failures. But there has been a remarkable exception to the almost general rule laid down by me. In 1878 and 1879, we predicted—we, the men of the Conservative party—that if the Government changed the basis of its fiscal policy, the country would once more see the first days of its prosperity; our predictions have come literally true, and even those who are opposed to our policy must fairly admit that a most desirable change has taken place throughout the country, and that prosperity and the public fortune have made immense strides in progress. The hon. leader of the late Government (Mr. Mackenzie) has said this evening—and I am glad to record his words—that everywhere had prosperity increased, that it was rapidly progressing, and that the whole country was feeling its effects. Last year, Mr. Speaker, on a similar occasion, I gave to this House a summary of the progress that had taken place in Montreal, since the bringing into play of the National Policy. I had the intention of doing the same this year, but after having heard the remarkable speech of the hon. Minister of Finance, after having read attentively this interesting exposé of the resources, the progress and the hopes of the country, I immediately abandoned the idea, for, as has been so aptly said by one of the newspapers: "The speech tells all, explains all, comprises all." Moreover, Mr. Speaker, why should I have taken so much trouble? No one seriously disputes the progress made; even the opponents of protection are compelled to admit it; issue is joined on but one point: the free traders differ with us as to the causes of this return of prosperity. They go as far as to pretend that this return has taken place in spite of the National Policy, and that without that policy our prosperity would be still more considerable. In the face of such an assertion, it is evident that the question is one we might discuss without ever coming to an understanding. One must despair of convincing such opponents. I even think that we have obtained a good deal in making them admit that times are better. But at the time of the electoral contest, these gentlemen did not go so far; they did not say then that protection was hurtful; on the contrary the majority of those who, to-day, hoist the Free Trade flag, then said that protection was a good thing. I had a proof of this in the elections of 1878. My opponent in the electoral division of Montreal East, Mr. Archambault, who was supported by members of the Quebec Government and several Federal members, was, himself, compelled to proclaim protectionist principles, although he was a free trader, as he was convinced that such was the only way to obtain any votes. Since that time, these gentlemen have not changed; they have remained such as they were; they take care to be protectionists at public meetings, and become free traders in the House only. They have two sets of weights and measures: one for the people, and one for the House. These gentlemen content themselves with the idea that the House sees the Hansard only, and they forget that their speeches are published in the press and that the people remember them in due time. It is true that all of them have not yet reached that point of good faith which is forced from them; there are still a few obstinate ones who deny the progress made with as much audacity as they would deny the sun's light, so true is the adage that those are the most blind who will not see. But there is a simple method, and within reach of all, of settling the question. Let them consult our manufacturers, our merchants, and ask them if they would have opened new factories without the National Policy, if they would have risked their capital in Canadian undertakings without the protection that we asked for, and that we obtained from the Government which is in power to-day, from the wise, prudent and far-seeing men who lead the country. All these manufacturers, all these merchants will give the same answer; all will proclaim the benefits derived from the fiscal policy inaugurated by us in 1878, and we find this testimony even on the lips of those whose political ideas differ from ours. It is true that there is a small number of people unacquainted with the truth, who will cry out against what I say, but whose actions belie their utterances. In 1879, we saw in Montreal some of our political opponents, who were engaged in trade, await the inauguration of the Tariff to establish new manufactures on the day following its introduction, or to increase in size those that were in existence; they would never have ventured to do this a day earlier, for our industries were at death's door and could not compete with the Americans, who were, for the time being, selling their goods at starvation prices on our markets, reserving to themselves the right of selling them at a higher figure later on. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that never did any Canadian Minister of Finance rise under more favorable circumstances, if one bears in mind the position of his predecessor, the gallant knight who sits opposite (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), who, formerly, in his speech on the Budget, had nothing to announce but deficits and an increase of taxation. He had promised us the golden age, and instead he gave us an era of deficits. What a difference there is this year! The present Finance Minister announces a surplus of $4,000,000 and a decrease of $1,000,000 in the taxation; a judicious policy has evidently resulted in our excellent state of the finances. "Give me a good policy," said an eminent French financier, "and I will manage money matters the better for it." During the regime of Free Trade, the country held nearly the same language. When capitalists were blamed for not engaging in trade, they replied: "Give us a good policy, and we will engage in large enterprises." Well, Sir, under the management of the Conservative Government we have inaugurated a good policy, and who is there to deny that since then the country has done a good business? Who is there of good faith who will deny that this policy has been productive of good results both for the Government and the country? The same policy has resulted in increasing from 10 to 20 millions the deposits in the Government savings banks. This represents the savings of the country and the accumulation of national wealth. It is one more result of that policy which has increased the value of all public stock, and has raised the banks' capital from 60 to 74 millions in a few years. But why should I recall all the astounding changes wrought in the country? Amongst our most bitter opponents are men from Ontario who, four years ago, loudly cried for a protective Tariff. The hon. gentlemen of the Province of Ontario, of whom I have just spoken, were in good company when, with the Liberals of our own Province—for we also have much pleasure in counting in our ranks former protectionists who became converted to Free Trade—it is not known why, or, rather, it is too well known; but, at any rate, converted to Free Trade at a time when the National Policy, that very policy which they asked for formerly, was going to revolutionize the fiscal state of Canada. It is interesting to read to-day the speeches of these converts to Free Trade, and the reading of those speeches is a dangerous thing for them, as their speeches and conversion are of so recent a date. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are a few statements, made the other day by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret), which I wish to refute. The hon. member ran amuck through the National Policy, and I must congratulate him upon the style of his speech, which was most carefully prepared. But what would his colleague, who represents the county of Lotbinière in Quebec, and his political leader in our Province, have said, had he heard him? Assuredly, either one of two things would have happened; either Mr. Joly would have blamed his friend, or the hon. member would have had to deny his chief. The hon. member is, no doubt, aware that Mr. Joly called for protection more loudly than we have, if that could be.

Mr. RINFRET. Will the hon. member allow me to make a remark? The hon. Mr. Joly, who represents the county of Lotbinière in the Local House, did really declare himself in favor of a protective Tariff in 1872, but the Tariff proposed at that time was not the Tariff of the present Minister of Finance.

Mr. COURSOL. The hon. member and colleague of the member in this House never could explain what kind of a Tariff he desired.

Mr. RINFRET. At any rate, I defy the hon. member for Montreal East to prove that Mr. Joly at any time declared himself in favor of the present Tariff.

Mr. COURSOL. It is evident that the hon. leader of the Opposition in Quebec could never have declared himself in favor of the present Tariff in the Quebec House, as that question never came before it that I am aware of.

Mr. RINFRET. Or on the hustings.

Mr. COURSOL. But I know that the colleague of the hon. member for Lotbinière in this House, has declared himself in favor of Protection. I know that he came, accompanied by his friends, and even by the Attorney-General, to make a speech in the division of Montreal East, and that in those days he was in favor of Protection. It is time now that those two hon. gentlemen should come to an understanding, for they must either agree or differ; one of them must submit to the opinion of the other, or the other must abandon his opinion. But this is, however, a difference which they may possibly be able to settle when in the presence of their constituents. I am glad to see that matters can so easily be arranged in a county like Lotbinière, to wit: that it is possible to elect a protectionist member for the Local House and a free trade member for the Federal House. Well, I just said that the leader of the Quebec Government had spoken in favor of Protection. This is what I find in a document and in a letter published in 1872:

"It has been proposed to give to the party that is to undertake that task the name of 'National Party.' (Applause.) I will tell you why that name has been chosen. You will have seen from the discussion in the House as well as in the papers, that to attract a large emigration that is to be advantageous to the country, it is necessary to encourage manufactures by all possible means. Every one understands that our young men would not leave the country if they could find in it sufficient, not to live in luxury, but to earn enough to feed and clothe themselves. In order, therefore, to stop this exodus of the population, a party is required that will encourage industries of all kinds, a party that shall be national before all, and which is from the beginning to obtain favors, not political but commercial independence. To that effect we require a National Policy, if we wish to bring back our fellow countrymen to their homes, to encourage foreign emigration and establish a market with other countries. (Applause.) Instead of building up theories and utopian systems, I think it is better to adopt a platform, as the English say, a national, commercial and manufacturing platform."

The hon. leader of the Opposition said, later on in 1876, he had not yet changed his opinions at the time, as is shown by the following letter addressed to our colleague, Dr. Orton:—

"MY DEAR DOCTOR,—I have received to-day only a series of printed questions coming from your Commission, in whose work I am deeply interested, and I hasten to forward you my answers. I fear that they will be found somewhat long; but I must say that I feel a certain satisfaction of being enabled to put my ideas on the subject into shape, whatever may be their worth. It is for me a kind of a protest against the accusation brought against me during the present Session, both in the House of Commons and in the press of having abandoned the principal article of the programme of our national party. We claim everywhere a national, commercial policy. My friends have been accused of forsaking this policy, and as chief of the national party, my name has been dragged in among those of the parties accused; but I never did abandon that policy.

Here we have the leader of the Opposition in the Province of Quebec who, in 1876, declared himself to be a protectionist, and his friend sitting to-day in this House a free trader. But the hon. member for Lotbinière is not the only one; he has some boon companions in Ontario. We know the hon. members from Ontario, eloquent men whose burning words have rivetted the attention of the House, who, a few years ago sang the praises of Protection; who said that if we did not get Protection, the Americans would invade our markets; that if we did not get Protection, we should cease to exist as a nation; that the only means of saving us was to encourage manufactures which would give a livelihood to our workmen and bread to those that now lacked it. That was what our hon. friends from Ontario told us. And hon. gentlemen of the Province of Quebec spoke in the same strain. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) has said the same, and, as ever, his eloquent utterances reached the hearts of his electors and his hearers when he spoke of Protection, when he pointed out to them the destitution of the country, when he showed them how prosperous they would become if they but encouraged Protection. But these hon. gentlemen have forsaken such ideas; their opinions have altered. It is for them to explain why they have done so. They have not done so yet, and as long as they do not, all the praises they make to-day and all their utterances will be of no value. The hon. member also touched upon the question of cotton. It is a subject which he treated at some length, and it appears that he obtained his information from good sources, but, in my opinion, his opinions are wrong both logically and as to facts. I am not going to take up all the errors and exaggerations of the hon. member, but I will content myself with pointing out that he complains that the Tariff does not sufficiently protect the manufacturers.

Mr. RINFRET. What I said was quite the reverse. I claim that the present Tariff favors cotton manufacturers to too great an extent.

Mr. COURSOL. I request the hon. member to allow me to close my sentence. These are his words: "The Tariff favors the manufacturers, at the expense of the consumer." He instances the Hudon Cotton Company, which paid 10 per cent. to its shareholders with a bonus of 33 per cent. Moreover, he maintains that the Cartwright Tariff gave all the encouragement that manufacturers needed. His judgment is erroneous on at least two points in that part of his speech. It is true, that like many others the Hudon factory has done an excellent business, but the hon. member forgets to tell us that with many others this factory devotes its profits to enlarging its buildings, and to employing a larger number of hands; this factory, which employed but 400 to 500 hands under the Liberal regime, gave work to 1,000 hands at the present time, and would in about two months employ some 1,600. When manufacturers get rich in such a manner, every one benefits by it. The Tariff of the ex-Minister of Finance was not sufficient, as the stock of most manufacturers was quoted at ten cents on the dollar; those are the times which the hon. member regrets. Again, the hon. member spoke of the Parks manufactory, and he has told us that it has not increased salaries. The contrary is true, for it had increased the salaries of its employes 25 per cent., and a good many young girls who formerly did not earn anything as they could not find employment, now earn $7 to $8 a week. The hon. member has blamed the National Policy because imports have increased. It is true, but it proves merely that consumption has increased owing to a better state of affairs, the consumption of products of local manufactures having increased. How is it that the hon. member did not see that his argument would recoil upon him? For if the Tariff could not prevent foreign imports from coming in, it must at least prevent manufacturers from raising prices above the nominal value of their products. "Competition," says the hon. member, "still flourishes." Now, according to Free Trade, competition is necessary to check monopoly and abnormally high prices. According to his own words, we enjoy such a competition. What is he complaining of, or what reason has he to complain? With regard to woollens, the hon. member says the prices of woollens have increased. Woollen manufactures have multiplied throughout the country and cannot meet the demand. A better quality of woollens are manufactured than are imported. I think this fact is universally admitted. I will quote the following article which I notice in the Toronto World concerning the duties on wool:—

"The wool hat manufacturers of Eastern Pennsylvania held a meeting in Reading yesterday. Among those present were Messrs. Hendel Brothers & Sons, John R. Miller & Co., J. G. Mohn & Brothers, William H. Reinhoel & Co., J. N. Levan & Sons., Hendel, Robst & Co., George Hendel & Co., and many others. They passed resolutions protesting against the Government's proposed admission of foreign made wool and fur hats without the customary duty of 50 cents per pound and 35 per cent. Heretofore Canada was supplied with American made wool hats, but manufactories are established along the border, and the American market is being flooded. Canada gets her wool free of duty, and if the 50 cents per pound is taken off the foreign hats the difference will be at least $2 per dozen, which will close the forty-one manufactories in the East entirely. Australia is also desirous of sending a large quantity of wool here. A very strong letter, fully setting forth all the facts, was prepared and sent to Washington, and it is likely that the Pennsylvania and New England manufacturers will send a full delegation to the national capital."

This proves that woollens are manufactured in this country greatly to our advantage. No doubt the imports of wool, and especially those of raw wool used as primary matter, had also increased. The hon. member complains that the price of Canadian wool has decreased 30 per cent. It is a mistake; wool is sold here as high as in England. Were it otherwise it would, according to the laws of trade, be exported to Great Britain; but what is true is that our exports of woollens have diminished by one-half because it is used up in our own factories. The hon. member also complained that the Government had not placed a high enough duty on wool imported as a primary matter, and that the duty of 3 per cent. is insufficient. He called it farcical; but is it not a farce to see him on the one hand ask for an increase of taxation on primary matter, and, on the other hand, complain of the high prices of native manufactures. The hon. member did not take into account our peculiar position opposite the United States. There is no Free Trade theory that will hold against the hard fact that our neighbors in the United States close their markets to us and try to dispose of their products on ours. We have had, therefore, to protect ourselves, and we did so to the advantage of the country. If in the future Americans wish for another system—if they wish to return to reciprocity, arrangements may possibly be entered into between the two Governments, Canadian and American, to promote the interests of both countries; but until that time comes, I maintain that the National Policy is the only one that can do any good to Canada. The hon. member handled the coal oil question. He told us—I presume it is in his county—that people complained of the high price of coal oil, that it was their only means of getting light, and that the duties levied were such as to cause suffering; and he told us that owing to the duties on this article and on woollens, every family was burdened with the amount of $25. As to coal oil, he said the effects of the duty were less felt in cities, because gas was used there. That argument will not hold good, for were the hon. member to reside in Montreal or in any other Canadian city, and were he to see the rapidity with which that instrument called a gasometer marks the quantity consumed, and find out to his cost what the use of gas costs every six months, he would soon be of a different opinion. But the hon. member forgets that it was the Government he supported which imposed a tax on coal oil, and which refused to reduce it. It is only owing to the influence and experience of the member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) that this tax was reduced from 15 to 4 cents. The tax amounted to 15 cents including the Excise, which had been remitted by the Conservative Government. Now, if the hon. member is so desirous of giving good and cheap light to his electors, he has but to give them the electric light, and I feel sure that those gentlemen will do so by-and-bye. The hon. member has also spoken of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He told us he would not speak of the enormous sums asked for that road, and that every one knows who is responsible for that gigantic enterprise. And, truly, Mr. Speaker, we are all acquainted with the discussion that took place on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I, as a member of the Conservative party, wish to have my share of credit in this matter. I see with pleasure that the whole country learnt with joy that the Government had settled the question in England once for all. The Conservative party ratified by a large majority the treaty concluded between Sir John A. Macdonald and the Syndicate; every one was interested in that affair and was glad to see it settled, as it was as embarrassing for the Liberal as for the Conservative party. It was a political as well as a commercial necessity. A political necessity, because all Governments were bound to England in the carrying out of that enterprise. It was a commercial necessity, as we were desirous of creating a new nation; we wished to create a new nation in the North-West, a nation that would soon number millions of children. The only way of attaining this object was to have a railway which could unite the extremities to the centre, and which could give easy communication from one end of the country to the other, failing which it was impossible to enjoy a communion of ideas, of interests, of sentiments and of ambition, such as it was necessary to have between the people of the North-West and those of the East. Touching the commercial question, we knew that the United States being closer to that part of Canada than we were ourselves, had we not laid a railway to transport our merchandize, trade would have taken the road of the United States. The reports that we receive from the Canadian Pacific Railway show that the road is progressing rapidly, and that in a few years we shall see travellers, freight and baggage leave the shores of the Pacific to reach East Montreal, which I represent. It was the plan of Sir George E. Cartier in 1872; it is now nearly carried out, and this Pacific Railway, after leaving part of its freight in Montreal, will go to Quebec, and joining the St. Charles Branch of the Intercolonial, will enable the men of the far West to see the beautiful city of Champlain so pregnant with reminiscences. I know, Mr. Speaker, that opinions are divided in the House on this question. The number of our opponents is not considerable, but their opinions ever ensure respect. The Liberals approved our policy at the outset; they condemn it now; that is their concern, but none of them have explained their change of opinion; the task would be too difficult a one, but it is a necessary one, without which their condemnation of to-day is sans significance. Such is not the only homage rendered to the National Policy by interested parties. During the last year's Session of the United States' Congress, an American representative said to his colleagues: "You must hasten to grant reciprocity to Canadians or the protection they have given their manufacturers will teach them to do without us." The prophecy of that American has been realized, for we can do without them. We purchase from our manufacturers a portion of the goods sold to us by Americans, ere the introduction of the National Policy, without the price of these goods having increased. The enormous sum which we had to pay them has remained in the country; it is paid to our thousands of workmen who were formerly unemployed, and as I said just now, that money finds its way into the savings' banks. It is similar facts which explode the sophistries of Free Trade, and which confound those who pretend that the National Policy ruins the country. Yes; the country is prosperous, the breeze of progress blows in all directions; on all sides does one hear of new commercial ventures, of projected railways; in a few months has been built a road from Montreal to Sorel; another is to be built from Ottawa to Montreal, besides new roads from the west running towards Montreal and the east. A good policy has borne good fruit. The country has willingly seconded the efforts of the Government, which differing in this from its predecessor, thought that it could do some good for the country and that its role was not merely that of a fly on the wheel. But the most advantageous situations have always their dangers; ours is no exception. The abundance of money, the desire of making a rapid fortune often prompts to hazardous enterprises and speculations. It is not so long ago that several cities and thousands of individuals were ruined in that respect, and they have seriously suffered. These lessons are liable to be too easily forgotten and it is good to recall them from time to time, for it is seldom that fortunes acquired at one stroke do not disappear as quickly as they come. Let us rather take advantage of the good policy which the Government has given us, and slowly but surely engage in profitable affairs.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:35 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 8th March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 82) to amend the Act 43 Victoria, respecting the navigation of Canadian waters.—(Mr. McCallum).

THE SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACT.

Mr. LANDRY moved for leave to introduce a Bill to repeal the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act and the Acts amending it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would ask my hon. friend to be kind enough to delay the introduction of his Bill until he has seen the Bill promised by the Government, and which will be laid before the House soon. I think it will be the proper thing for him to wait till then.

Mr. LANDRY. In answer to the hon. Minister of Public Works, I have to say that this Bill is on the Orders of the Day since the 24th February. Previous to that date I asked the Government if it was its intention to amend, within a short delay, the Supreme Court Act. As I fear that my Bill will not pass if it does not at once take its place among the Orders of the Day, I think it is in the interests of the public that it should be presented at this date so that each one may study it; at any rate, if the Government is going to hasten the introduction of its measures, I have no objection to postponing for a few days the introduction of my Bill.

Mr. COURSOL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN; Mr. Speaker, the thing rests entirely with the hon. member; if he insists on introducing his Bill, let him do so, but I thought the hon. member would consider it an act of courtesy towards the Government to wait for the Bill which it intends bringing before the House.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend will observe that if, after the introduction of the Bill of the Government, he is disposed to think that that Bill will be amended by the insertion of a clause abolishing the Supreme Court, he can introduce that as an amendment to the Government Bill, so that he will have every opportunity of pressing his opinions if the Government Bill goes on at all. If my hon. friend has sufficient confidence in the Government to believe in their pledges that they will give us a Supreme Court Bill, this Session, he will be quite sure to have an opportunity of having a vote on his own measure.

Motion withdrawn.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.
