to a silent voting down of principles that stand recorded in the Journals of the House, placed there by members of the Opposition, he had not influence then to cause them to open their mouths to defend the votes they gave, and following their course of last Session not one of them has attempted a defence of the act perpetrated last Session. The appeal of the hon. gentleman has been in vain. Not one of them has dared to rise in his place to utter one word in justification of the iniquitous bargain made at that time, in marked contrast with the seven members who have spoken from the Opposition side. If the hon. gentleman desires it there is not one of that little band but is ready to rise, and every one of them affirm that every resolution they voted for before they would re-affirm to-day. There is not one member of that band who is not ready to re-affirm to-day that every event that has transpired from that day to this has strengthened the position he took at that time. Sir, what was the debate? The Canadian Pacific Railway debate will long be remembered. It is written in the annals of the history of this country, it is printed upon the Journals of the year. Sir, after the Minister of Railways ceases to be Minister of Railways, after the members of this House cease to be members of this House, after we have all passed off this stage, there will be found recorded the votes of hon. members composing the Parliament of 1881; and, Sir, I for myself say that I am glad, if I leave any posterity behind me, that not one of these shall have to blush to find their father's name recorded in favor of a bargain while the men who voted for it dare not rise and defend. Sir, what was the nature of the bargain? The Government came down to the House and put a statement into the mouth of His Excellency which was not correct. They came down to us at the commencement of last Session and told us they had entered into a private contract with certain capitalists to build the Canadian Pacific Railway and take it off our shoulders. That is not true, as I understand it to-day. It is not true, I believe, if the Journals of the House are to be taken for an authority. Was a contract made by the Government with certain contractors to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, I ask? If so, why the invitation for tenders, several of which were opened only a few days ago, to build a portion of it? If, so, why are we to be asked to vote millions of dollars to go on with that work? No, Sir, a contract was not made with certain capitalists to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, but a contract was made to build certain portions of a railway which, when completed, with other portions to be completed by the people of Canada, was to constitute the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, Sir, this is purely a question of business, and business men are not afraid to approach it and to consider it on a business basis. What was the estimate of the cost of the work the Syndicate was to construct, the Minister of Railways himself, giving the figures to the House; these figures were $48,500,000—$15,500,000 from Jasper to Kamloops, $13,000,000 from Selkirk to Jasper, and $20,000,000 from Thunder Bay to Callander. Those were the figures given to us by the hon. Minister, and if he dares to deny them I can refer him to the pages of the official Mansard—given to us only a few months before he set out in his negotiations with these very men to whom he gave this contract. The hon. Minister stated that he had taken Mr. Sandford Fleming's figures, a man whose ability was only exceeded by his caution, and however much those figures might be reduced he was sure they could not be exceeded. The hon. Minister came down fortified with the report of his engineer to that effect. Then we have the Minister of Railways fixing the price, the Chief Engineer under the Minister of Railways corroborating the price—the price, the cost of the work to be done by the Syndicate at $48,500,000. What did we give them for this work? $25,000,000 in cash—there is no trouble in arriving at that value—and 25,000,000 acres of land. What price should be put on the land? Not the price of the hon. member for Lambton, or the hon. member for West Durham, or myself, because, as opponents of the Government, we might be charged with dealing unfairly by them, but the price which the men who signed the contract on behalf of the people of Canada placed on it, $3 an acre, and that is greatly under the average as stated by the hon. leader of the Government, and I have Hansard under my hand in which I can turn up the page. When did the hon. gentleman put that price on the land? Only a few months before the hon. Minister of Railways attached his signature to that contract. You have the 25,000,000 acres which the man who made the bargain said was worth $3 per acre, giving $75,000,000 in land, which with $25,000,000 in cash, made $100,000,000 as the amount given to those men to build work estimated at $48,500,000. Do the hon. gentlemen say these figures are nonsensical? They dare not say it, as they would be declaring that the Minister of Railways, standing in his place in Parliament, and stating on his responsibility as a Minister of the Crown, talked nonsense, for they are his figures. Do hon. gentlemen opposite say the price is ridiculous? They dare not say that, because the hon. First Minister stood in his place and told the representatives of the people that this price was greatly under its value. There is $48,500,000 worth of work to do for which the Government give $100,000,000 in cash and land according to figures furnished by themselves. What more? Why, when they had done that they gave the Syndicate the road besides. Surely, when they gave the Company $51,500,000 more than the work would cost we might have owned the road, but the Government gave the Company the road. What more? They exempted the Company forever from all taxation. What more? The 406 miles of railway from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, passing through the Lake Superior region, is to be constructed and paid for with the money of the Canadian people at a cost of from $16,000,000 to $18,000,000, and when constructed it is to be handed over a free gift to the Syndicate, which has already $51,500,000 more than the whole work will cost them. Is that all? No. That portion of the road building in the canyons of the Rocky Mountains, from Yale to Kamloops, at an estimated cost of $10,000,000, is to be built and paid for out of the pockets of the Canadian people, and when completed it is to be handed over a free gift to the Syndicate. The ninety miles from Yale to Port Moody, for which tenders have just been received, and which will involve an outlay of $2,500,000 out of the pockets of the people, is, when constructed, to be handed over to that Company, to be theirs forever. The Pembina Branch already completed and in running order and paying great dividends, is also to be handed over to the Company as a free gift, although the Company receives $51,500,000 over and above the cost. This is the equivalent we gave them in money and land according to the price placed on it by the Government. Our position is stronger by the lapse of a year, because if hon. gentlemen were disposed to raise objections to the statement of the hon. First Minister, as regards the value of the land, we have now the fixed and determined value by the Syndicate. What is the price the Syndicate asks for these lands? The hon. Minister of Railways will agree that the first offer before there are many settlers in the country and the tide of immigration has set in will be the lowest price. The lowest price placed on it by the Syndicate is $2.50 per acre. The hon. the Minister of Railways has told the House that it is $1 and $1.25 per acre; but the price was $2.50, with a rebate of $1.25 per acre. Does that affect the price put on the land? No, because the hon. Minister of Railways forgot himself, and in one part of his speech he furnished a very important argument to the Opposition. He said the Syndicate understood their business too well to hold their lands at too high a price. Every acre of land put under cultivation was worth twice as much to them as if they had got $10 an acre for it at the end of ten years. By placing the lands under cultivation, the Company would make $20 per acre. The hon. Minister furnishes us with an argument of very great value. References have been made to certain amendments moved by hon. members on this side of the House, and the hon. the Minister of Railways declared we are afraid to allude to them. I allude to one amendment proposed. It was to the effect that in letting this contract there should be a clause inserted giving the Government the liberty at any time to buy back the work by paying the contractors 10 per cent. over and above the cost. Allusion has been made to the Act passed by the hon. member for Lambton, and it will be remembered that Act contained an express stipulation that any portion of the road would be bought back from the contractors, by paying 10 per cent. over and above what it cost them, they returning bonuses they received in land and money. We pressed that amendment, but the majority voted it down in silence without debate. What would have been the effect of the resolution, if passed, with respect to the central section? I have the figures at hand, and it is a calculation that every business man can make. It requires very little skill to determine it, because we have the figures supplied to us by the hon. Minister of Railways. It is 1,000 miles from Selkirk to Jasper. What is the estimated cost? Hansard is under my hand, in which the hon. gentleman is reported as having stated that the line could have been built and equipped for $13,000 per mile. In reply to a question of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) the hon. gentleman said, "Yes, that was it." He would be justified in saying $10,000, but as he wanted to give the outside figure he placed it at $13,000—1,000 miles at that rate would cost $13,000,000. What did we give the Company? $10,000,000 in cash and 12,500,000 acres of land, which, at $3 per acre, being the price given by the Finance Minister, made a total of $47,500,000. Then give them 10 per cent. on their $13,000,000, that would be $1,300,000. The Syndicate would give back to the people the money bonus we gave them, the land bonus we gave them, and we would give to them the cost of the road and 10 per cent. added. Had that clause been in the contract we could have got back from the Syndicate, if the figures of the leader of the Government and Minister of Railways were to be relied upon, the road constructed with our money, and $33,200,000 cash besides. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) laughs. His laugh is at the expense of the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways and of the Prime Minister. Hansard is here, and if any hon. gentleman denies it I will read the figures and statements to the House. Take now the actual price of the lands, the price at which they are being held by the Syndicate, $2.50 per acre, besides owning the road we would have $26,950,000. Yet the hon. gentleman says that when we meet the electors we will be afraid to mention to them that we had moved an amendment intended to secure that result. But the hon. Minister of Railways says: "How about the running of the road? We don't want to own the road. It would ruin us to own it." Let us see what the hon. Minister said about the running of the road. I have it here in Hansard. It is worth while to notice what he says. It is to be found on page 1422 of Hansard, 1880.

An hon. MEMBER. Dispense.

Mr. PATERSON. No, I will not dispense. It may be all very well for the hon. gentleman who, I have no doubt, is an opponent of the Minister of Railways to want me to dispense with the reading of the words of wisdom of the hon. gentleman, but I am too great an admirer of the hon. Minister to accede to that wish. In the speech to which I have referred he says:

"I dare say I will be told by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake): 'Granted that your figures are correct, assuming that you can build this railway for even less money than you have estimated, you have only encountered the first difficulty; you have then to operate the line, and the cost of that will be so greatly beyond anything you can hope to obtain from it, that you will place an intolerable burthen upon the people of this country.' I must address myself for a few moments to that question.

Then after giving a statement of the Pembina Branch he proceeds:

"By July, 1882, we will have about 700 miles of this road in operation; we will have 85 miles from Selkirk to Emerson or St. Vincent; we will have 200 miles in operation west of the Red River, which, with the branch of 16 miles to Winnipeg, will give us some 700 miles in operation, without reference at all to this section in British Columbia. I have every reason to believe that every mile of that road, from the day it is opened, will make an ample return for all the expenditure incurred in its operation. I think it is safe to say that in every succeeding year, as we extend gradually this road towards the Rocky Mountains, it will furnish such an additional volume of traffic from Red River to Thunder Bay, which will become the great entrepot of that country, as will prevent it from burthening the people, and give us some fair return for the interest on the money used in its construction."

There, Sir, is the declaration of the hon. Minister of Railways that every mile that was opened would pay the interest on the money expended. That is the road we have given away. It is no longer the heritage of the people of Canada. Paid for out of the people's money—$50,000,000, and on top of that $28,000,000 of finished road all going into their hands besides a dividend-earning road from the very moment it is built, if the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways is to be taken. Yet the hon. gentleman says that we will be afraid to call attention to this matter before the electors. Sir, there is only one thing that would make us hesitate to do so; if any one came before the electors and told them the real facts they would think that he was drawing upon his imagination and that what he said could not be true. Knowing that, Sir, I always appear before them with the official documents of the House in my hand, so that if any one is skeptical of the truth of what I say I invite him to the platform there to read of the business done in this House, as I invite now the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) to read that on the pages of Parliament which even a member with the audacity of the member for East York dare not contradict, and cannot successfully controvert. Well, Sir, the hon. Minister of Railways did me the honor to allude to a motion of mine objecting to the bargain because it did not secure finality in the liability of the Government. I had a right to move that resolution. The Government came down to the House and put into the mouth of His Excellency a statement that they had made a contract for the construction, maintenance and working of that road with a body of capitalists, but when we opened the contract we found it was not so. There was no finality in the Government liability. Canada was to be burdened with the building of some of the most expensive portions of the work extending over a period of years. I declared the contract was objectionable on that ground. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) declared that it was peculiarly objectionable on that account, when addressing his constituents. The hon. gentleman knew it was objectionable, yet I secured only about fifty votes to my motion stating so. The hon. Minister of Railways succeeded in inducing his supporters to vote against it, but with all his persuasive powers he was unable to draw one of his supporters to his feet, to explain why he voted as he did. Another resolution was moved against the exemption from taxation of the lands of the Company. The hon. Minister of Railways referred to that very little. He referred to the exemption of stations and road-bed and buildings and grounds, but said nothing about the land. They told us that it was nothing, that the Syndicate should hold their lands free, while the settler on the adjoining lot, with a Syndicate lot on either side, should have to pay for roads, for erecting school houses and all municipal expenses. Hon. gentlemen think that we will be afraid to mention that before the electors. The electors in many cases have read this contract, and others will hear of it when we have an opportunity to go to them with the official documents in our hands, and then we will be prepared to take the verdict of the people which we were anxious to secure before the contract was passed upon, and which the Government decided should not be appealed to, the Prime Minister stating that no more imperfect tribunal for the trial of such questions could be found than the people. The Reform party have faith in the intelligence of the people. They hold that the expenditure of the people's money is a thing that vitally concerns the people, and that it is a thing upon which the people ought to be consulted. It was denied to them at that time; but thanks to the constitutional safeguard which we enjoy, the people will yet have the opportunity, if they cannot prevent that bargain, at least to declare that the men who were instrumental in making that bargain shall no longer represent them. Sir, we shrink not from the conflict or from the presentation of this question as one of the main features of that conflict. Speaking for myself, one of the chief charges that I shall bring against the Government will be their having entered into this contract. Some constituencies in Ontario have had an opportunity to pronounce upon it, and the result has been a loss to the Government of 50 per cent. in those elections. This carried out in the next election will show the hon. gentlemen opposite, who in their mighty force thought they could bear down men struggling for the rights of the people, that the people are faithful and that they will support those who truly represent them in Parliament. Sir, if there be this great confidence that we hear so much of from hon. gentlemen opposite, in an appeal to the people, why all this talk about legislating us out of this House? Why all this talk about cutting up our counties in order that the verdict may not be given by the same people who gave it in 1878? How bold these hon. gentlemen are, who dare not take the verdict from the same constituencies that gave it in 1878, who dare not wait till another year shows more clearly the effect of their policy, but who wish to bring on their election now. But bring on your election when you like, and we can stand up in the consciousness of our integrity, and ask the people of this country to say whether we are right or wrong. Why, in the face of all these advantages, do we find the rumor in the papers that no less than nineteen hon. gentlemen, supporters of the Government in their Ontario contingent alone, decline to face the music at another contest? Why do we find them stepping aside that new men may take their places? Why, except perhaps that it may be alleged by them—as it was alleged by some of the new candidates in 1874, when a certain matter was under discussion that would not bear investigation—"I did not sanction that; I know that was wrong." So, perchance, we shall have new candidates who may say of the Pacific Railway contract: "I was not in the House when that was submitted, or I would have voted against it." But let the statements be what they may, the Minister of Railways has found out that no less than seven members of the Opposition have met his challenge, while not one of his own supporters has stood up yet; and he will find that seven members more, or three times seven are ready to take up this discussion and denounce that contract as soon as any of his supporters venture to defend it. Hon. gentlemen opposite are always kind to me. They know that if I do have to find fault with their policy, that I do so with evident pain—that only the oath which I have taken as a true representative makes me mention some things which I would rather not mention. But I would say here, that while

I would not take from the hon. Minister of Railways one iota of the glory that is his, while I would not detract from the credit he deserves for the amount of work he has to do—for I believe the labor he is engaged in is telling on his own health, and he brings a great deal of energy to his own department.—I cannot withhold the praise due to the hon. gentleman who preceded him, and who today gave evidence that in the honest fulfilment of his duties in that office, he had so impaired his health that he could not address the House to the length that he desired or that the House desired. Therefore, I think the hon. Minister was unfair when he sought to take to himself all the glory of the prosperity we see in the North-West and the progress of the Pacific Railway. Grant that thousands have gone in and that hundreds of thousands are going into that country, grant the increased value of property there, how do the immigrants who have raised the value of lands go in? Upon one mile of railway built by the present Minister of Railways? No, Sir; every man who has gone into that territory passed over not one foot of railway built by the present Minister of Railways, but every man found his way over the road built by his hon. predecessor; and if there is any development in that country, it is due to the gentleman who promoted the railway and successfully built it, and that is the hon. member for Lambton, who sits there to-day, a man honored by the people above the man who seeks to share his honors.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It is not my intention to occupy very long the time of this House, nor would I have spoken at all but for the course taken by the hon. Minister of Railways. It was fair and reasonable that he should have made an exposition of the progress of that work, and when he did so during the first hour of his speech I was very much interested; but in the last portion, when he showed an intention to revive the whole discussion, and assailed the resolution which I moved, and the resolutions moved by other members on this side, and thereby challenged the discussion of this subject at this stage of the Session, after we have been in session for seventy days, it seemed to me that he had not thought of the economy of time, and that he did not wish to shorten the Session, as we on this side are desirous of doing. Now, I think it was imprudent and unwise for that hon. gentleman to revive that question. I do not think any hon. member would have spoken on this side, except perhaps the leader of the Opposition, but for his action; and if two or three weeks are not consumed in this discussion, it is only due to the forbearance of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman referred to the Act of 1874. He said that Act offered greater advantages to a company to construct this railroad than has been granted to this Company by the contract which has been made. Now, let me say that in 1874, that country was a comparatively unknown country; and when my hon. friend acceded to power he found that this country rested under an obligation to British Columbia to construct that railway within a time in which it was absolutely impossible to accomplish it, and he passed the Act of 1874, by which he offered certain facilities for the construction of that road. The country had up to that time been very slightly surveyed, and it was very little known. We find in that Act one clause which particularly guards and protects the people of this country, and which is absent from the contract of which the hon. Minister of Railways boasts. The subsidies to be given were large, but the Government reserved to itself the right to resume possession of the road, and pay the contractors the amount they had expended, with 10 per cent. profit for themselves. This provision is so important that I will read it:

"In every contract for the construction of the said railway, or of any section or sub-section thereof, the Government of Canada shall reserve the right to purchase, under the authority of Parliament, the said railway or such section or sub-section thereof, on payment of a sum equal to the actual cost of the said railway, section or sub-section, and 10 per cent. in addition thereto. The subsidies in land and money granted or paid by the Government for the construction of the said railway being just returned or deducted from the amount to be paid, the lands sold being valued at the full amount the contractors may have received from the sale of such lands as may have been sold."

Suppose, under that Act, the Government had given contracts, 20,000 acres of land and also a subsidy, and reserved the right to retake that road by remunerating those contractors, by guaranteeing 10 per cent. profits. Have we any such provision in this contract? Let us weigh this provision in the Act under consideration. Let us say the Government had the right, having had the same regard to the public interest, when they prepared this measure, they would have retained powers to acquire the road. What would have been the position of the matter? What is this Company called on to expend under this Act? My hon. friend behind me stated it clearly; the present contractors are to expend $48,500,000 to complete their contract. What, under the provisions of this section, would the position of the Government have been? They would have had the right to assume this work on paying that amount, with 10 per cent. added, or less than $53,000,000. But what is the condition of things under the present contract? The hon. Minister of Railways said last year that everything was let by public tender and competition, and that the contract was issued under the provisions of the Act of 1874, when it was shown and clearly proved that not a single provision of that Act had been regarded in the making of the contract. What did he say then? That it was made under the Act of 1872. Then we produced evidence to show that the Statute of 1872 had been repealed, so his assertion was baseless. The present Syndicate are obliged to expend $48,500,000 and no more. What is the Government giving them for that expenditure? A subsidy of $25,000,000, 25,000,000 acres, of land, $28,000,000 expended in the construction of the road, and $3,000,000 spent in surveys, besides exemption from taxation of their property forever, and a monopoly of this country. And what is this worth? I was astonished when the hon. Minister of Railways portrayed the great glory achieved by his Government in this matter, and particularly by himself—and that the letting of this contract had achieved the present marvellous prosperity. It has been made manifest that this Government has really done nothing in this direction. They had undertaken to build 100 miles of the railway west of Winnipeg, which it seems had been located wrong, and from which the rails had to be taken. They simply carried on the work initiated by my hon. friend the member for Lambton, until this contract was made for which the hon. Minister of Railways takes so much credit to himself in the most egotistical fashion. When the hon. gentleman talked about the boom in the North-West, and the great enhancement of the value of its lands, he did not tell us how the Syndicate had participated in that advantage. The contract last year was based on the assumption that the lands were worth $1 an acre. He says nothing now about their value. How has the great rush of immigration affected the value of those lands? Will the hon. gentleman deny they are to-day worth more than $3 an acre? If so, what becomes of the position he took last year that the lands were worth only $1 an acre? Being worth $3 an acre, how much does that give the Syndicate? Fully $132,000,000 in money, railway and public property for an expenditure, by it, of $48,500,000. This is no fiction; this proposition can not be controverted by hon. gentlemen on the other side. He did not tell us how much the Syndicate made by the sale of their lands at Brandon and other stations along the line, where I understand they made hundreds of thousands of dollars. Does not the light of experience show the unwisdom, folly and unpatriotism of having made this contract, and giving this Syndicate so many millions of public property which, had we had the same provision favored by hon. gentlemen on this side, might have been got for $50,000,000. The hon. gentleman says this contract was let by public tender and competition. That is a statement wholly baseless. There is a principle regarded as sacred in every country that public contracts should be put up to public competition and tender. To ignore that principle is to inaugurate a system of corruption and favoritism. The Statute of 1867 requires that all public works shall be put up to public tender. It is the Act relating to the Public Works of Canada. Clause 20 reads as follows:—

“It shall be the duty of the Minister to invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of all works except in cases of pressing emergency, where delay would be injurious to the public interests or where from the nature of the work it could be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the Department.”

There is a provision inserted in the first Act passed after Confederation relating to the Public Works. What did the hon. Minister of Railways, in 1874, do? He had regard to that principle and had it enacted that any section or sub-section of work should not be given out except by tenders. Here we find by the Act of 1874 the Government inserting a provision which required that the railway should be built only after tenders and competition. There is no other safe principle for the public protection. The hon. gentleman says that this work was put up to competition. I challenge him to point out any legal authority which he or his Government had in making this contract. I affirm that he has violated every provision of the Act of 1874 which was the only Statute relating to the Pacific Railway. What do we find? We find that not only was this contract not put up to public tender, but that the public mind of this country was lulled into a false security by the undisguised declaration of the Government in 1880, that their policy was to construct the road as a Government work, and not put it in the hands of individuals. The statement of the hon. member was this:

“What the policy of the late Government would have been, we do not know, but when we came into office, we decided to undertake it as a public work.”

What changed that policy? There seems to be a mystery surrounding this transaction that has never been elucidated. What did the hon. Minister of Railways say in that connection? He said:

“I had no hesitation in saying that the whole sentiment of the country is changed on this question. I am not at all ashamed to say my own opinions are changed in relation to the character of this great work. I remember when the First Minister brought in his Act in 1874, for the construction of this as a Government work, I felt we were incurring too great a responsibility. I believed it was unsafe for the Government to undertake the construction of this great work from end to end; but I do not hesitate to express my opinion that the whole condition of Canada has changed since that time.”

These were the utterances of the hon. Minister of Railways in 1880. When the hon. member for Niagara comes to speak, he, being in the confidence of the Government, will explain, no doubt, how it is and why it is they changed their policy. They changed their policy in secret. They did not at the next Session declare their change of policy before Parliament; but they changed it in the interim without giving any previous notice. The hon. Minister of Railways says the Government advertised for public tenders. In what newspaper? Was it the Canada Gazette. What conditions were prescribed? As I have shown, the Government violated every provision of the Act of 1874. If the hon. Minister wanted honestly to advertise for tenders, would he have not said: We propose to give the railway already constructed and to build other portions of the railway; we propose to exempt this railway from taxation and to give a monopoly of railway traffic in that country for twenty years. Now, how much will you take to construct the balance of the railway? That would have been an honest notice to give to the public, and nothing less should have been given. On what principle can the hon. Minister of Railway say tenders were asked for this work? If he can, I pause for a reply, because I am anxious to know. The strong point we advanced in opposition to the Syndicate last Session was that the Government had changed their policy without giving any notice to the country. The hon. Minister of Railways says that the hon. First Minister at some pic-nic—they say it was a religious pic-nic—I did not know that he was in the habit of attending them—declared that the Government were then negotiating with some parties to build the railway. That the hon. gentleman said was equivalent to a notice to the public and an advertisement for tenders. Such a statement as that is an insult to the intelligence of the House. What did the Government do? They went to England and entered into communication with individuals there, and it was announced on their return that a contract firm had been made, but no contract was made at all. The contract was made only after they came to this country, and it was made behind the backs of the people. I believe that the sentiments advanced by the Government in 1880 was a sentiment of which the people approved. I felt myself that in view of the light and additional information we had, and I think it was the general feeling of the country, that that railway would be better built by the Government than if it were in the hands of private individuals. We have now a contract with the Syndicate involving hundreds of millions of dollars and no information given as to who tendered. The details were not given to the public. We sought to get the information, but it was absolutely refused, and we do not know that any persons excepting those persons constituting the Syndicate ever tendered for the work. Never was a Government contract in any country, as great as this contract, let without public competition. Take the policy of England or the policy of the United States; in the latter case the population by twelve times greater than ours. The contract would involve $1,200,000,000 yet the Parliament of that country would not be consulted before letting it. This Parliament was called, as a mere matter of form, to approve of what had been done by the Government, and unless the House approved the action of the Government a dissolution would take place. The people of this country were coerced into approving of this contract. As I said before, I do not intend to protract this discussion, but I felt it my duty to repudiate the assertion of the hon. Minister of Railways that he had let this contract by tender. The contract is not based on a single provision of the Act of 1874, but is in direct conflict and direct violation of the Statute. He said last Session it was on the Statute of 1874. He then shifted his ground and said it was on the Statute of 1872, but he showed that that Statute had been repealed altogether. I think I have shown beyond question that this contract was let without any public competition or tender; that it was in direct violation of the law of the land, in violation of that principle which every one of us regards as sacred if we want to preserve the purity of the administration of this country. The Government ignored that principle, and I charge them that they stand convicted before the people of this country with having let a contract involving a $100,000,000 without giving the people an opportunity of tendering for the work.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say he was in favor of doing it as a Government work?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I mean to say that the Act of 1874 makes a double provision, it authorizes the Government to conduct it as a public work or to construct it through the instrumentality of a company. All the light and all the information we have now go conclusively to show that it would be wise and patriotic if this country had built the Canadian Pacific Railway as a public work instead of giving it to a company.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then I would like the hon. gentleman to state why he was not in favor of doing this as a Government work. After having carried it on as a Government work for four years he advertised for tenders all over this country for a company to take it off his hands.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. We advertised for tenders to carry it on as a public work. Now, I would like to ask the hon. Minister at what time, in what manner, he changed his mind which he expressed fully here in 1880. He changed his mind and ignored his utterances on that occasion and came to the conclusion that it should not be built as a private enterprise.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I dare say the hon. gentleman has heard that sometimes it is easier to ask questions than to answer them.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I see that is your case.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I ask the hon. gentleman why, if he considered it was wise on the part of the Government to construct the Canada Pacific Railway as a Government work and not transfer it to a private company, why, after carrying it on as a Government work for four years, he closed his career as a Minister, and the Government of which he was a member, at the end of their four years experience, advertised all over the country for a private company to come and take over the whole of this work.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I will tell the hon. Minister what I will do. I think I have already answered the question satisfactorily, but I will answer it more fully, provided he will answer the question I have just put to him.

Mr. RYMAL. I presume that the second reading of this measure in relation to which the hon. gentleman has reopened the discussion on the Canadian Pacific Railway, will be acceded to, and think it is almost useless to present any piece of legislation to the House that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company desire, because it is a foregone conclusion that whatever they ask they will receive. I said last year when this matter was under discussion, that I thought the most dangerous feature of the whole thing as it then presented itself to my mind, was the absolute bondage in which the Syndicate held the Government, and as time has elapsed we have plenty of evidence that the Syndicate have only to express their desire, no matter what that desire may be, and it is immediately acceded to by the Government. If they wish to change the location of the line, that is acceded to; if they wish the legislation of a province to be ignored all they have to do is to instruct their secretary so as to intimate their wish to the Government and the legislation of a province is ignored at once, the autonomy of a province is destroyed; and I believe that this one thing will tend to a disruption of the whole Confederacy. I think there is pretty strong evidence that the Syndicate have only to ask that they may receive. Last night I saw their paid Secretary on the floor of this House, pompous and conscious of the strength that he possessed as a representative of that great Company, inflated with wine and infuriated with strong drink.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh, oh!

Mr. RYMAL. After having bulldozed the Government, after having, as a representative of the Syndicate, demanded from them what they should not have acceded to; standing here, I say, conscious of his strength, after having bulldozed the Government, insulting Parliament by insulting one of the most prominent members of the Parliament of Canada, telling him his utterances were false, false, false; that it is not so, that it is bosh, bosh! What shall we come to if the paid Secretary of that Company, who is so conscious of the strength he possesses by being its servant, can come here with impunity and insult Parliament after having bulldozed the Government? I do not wonder much at the Government being bulldozed if my suspicions are correct, and I venture to say that the man is now living who will learn of some fearful disclo-

tures in the near or remote future, which will show that the hold which the Syndicate have upon the Government is what compels them to yield to every demand that the Syndicate may make. What is our country coming to when the representative of that Company may come on the floor of Parliament and insult the most prominent member of the whole House by giving him the lie direct, if not in so many words. I say it is a shame and a disgrace, and the Syndicate should be taught that their servants, at least, may not enter the people's House and insult the members when they are speaking upon a public question. The Government should blush to think that the representative of their masters had no better manners than that, and they should blush to think that they had sold the heritage of the people of Canada to a company who can so far forget, through its servants, what is due to the representatives of the people. But having robbed the people through the Government of their heritage I suppose they may add insult to injury. This is the first fruits of the infamous bargain they entered into last year, and when the full fruition of this bargain may be reached remains to be seen. I venture to predict that the time is not far distant when the country from one end to the other will shake off the insatiate grasp of this grinding monopoly. Now, Mr. Speaker, I was not intending to say anything, but I wished more particularly to bring up the conduct of one of the servants of the Company on the floor of this House, in order that public attention might be called to the impudent and insolent manner which this Syndicate assumes towards the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled. If the Government has been bulldozed I have no doubt there was good reason. I said a moment ago that I believe the time will come when disclosures will be made which will bring a blush of shame to the cheek of every man who has been connected with the concoction and carrying out of this infamous robbery of the Canadian people. How soon that may come remains to be seen. We know a few years ago things were going on smoothly, and the Tory party was so strong that they fancied they would have a long lease of power, but Providence, I trust it was, sent a stroke of lightning, and in a few months they were obliged to retire from the positions they had disgraced. I hope and trust that Providence, on behalf of the Canadian people, may send another stroke of lightning that will reveal some of the dark doings which I believe have taken place in connection with this transaction, for I believe the Government have done more to bring reproach upon the Canadian people and to rob them of their heritage than all other Governments combined. I asked a year ago of the hon. Minister of Railways the same question which has been put to him by the member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith), why it was that a sudden change in the Government policy took place. When that is successfully explained to me, perhaps it will remove some of the ugly suggestions that have taken possession of my mind. I do not wish to leave Parliament and public life with the impression on my mind that any of our public men have been engaged in transactions which they are ashamed to explain. I think they should have taken Parliament into their confidence and told it why this sudden change of opinion took place. The hon. Minister of Railways will ease my mind by telling me why it was that he so suddenly changed his opinion as to the propriety of carrying on the construction of the Pacific Railway, as a Government work and giving it to a private company, and he will do much to remove some ugly impressions which have taken possession of me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I rise, for the purpose not of discussing the question which has been asked of me by the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith), and repeated by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, but for the purpose of explaining to the House that I am unable to answer the question. The question asked is to state the time when and the reason why it was I changed my opinion from being in favor of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway as a Government work and reverted to its policy of having it carried on by a private company, aided by the Government. The reason I am unable to state when that change in my opinion occurred is because no change ever did occur in my opinion. The reason I am not able to say why it occurred is because I have never held such an opinion. More than that I stated a year ago, when submitting the policy of the Canadian Government to the House, that it had been the invariable policy from the commencement down to that time of all parties in this House and country, that this work should be constructed as a private work aided by the Government. I may recall to the recollection of the hon. member for Westmoreland the fact that the Government of which he was a member gave the most conclusive testimony they could give that that was their opinion at the time, but I have only to turn up the speeches of the leader of the late Government to show that from the very inception of the work he declared he was compelled to deal with the Canadian Pacific Railway as a Government work, not because he desired to do so, but because all attempts to get it done by capitalists, aided by Government, had entirely failed, and the hon. gentleman consistently maintained the position and said again and again in this House that while compelled to proceed with it ex necessitate rei as a work in the hands of the Government, he would be prepared to revert to the policy of handing the work over to a private company. True to that policy the hon. gentleman as one of his last public acts published advertisements broadcast over the country inviting tenders and endeavoring to ascertain if a company of capitalists would undertake to carry out the work, take it out of the hands of the Government; finish the construction of the road and operate it. I will give to the House the most conclusive proof it is possible to give of the statement, but I never changed my opinion because I never entertained any other opinion than that it was most desirable that this work should be carried on by and in the hands of a private company aided by the Government. When I found myself in precisely the same position as the hon. member for Lambton was in when leading the Government, when I found as Minister of Public Works there was no possibility of proceeding with the work by any other mode than as a Government work and carrying it on as such, I was compelled to adopt that policy; but I will read to the House as the most complete answer to the questions of hon. members opposite the statement I made when I came down and asked the House to place 100,000,000 acres at the disposal of the Government to assure the carrying on of that work.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. That was in 1879.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In 1879. I am now stating the view I held, and it is the one I still maintain, was that when dealing with it as a Government work, and when asking the House to carry it on as a public work, I never changed my opinion. I said—I am reading from page 1894 of the 2nd volume of the Hansard of 1879:

"Exception may be taken to the appropriation of such a large extent of land for the building of this road, as exception was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite to the appropriation of 50,000,000 acres of land, to be under the control of a company. We do not propose here to put the land under the control of a company, although I confess, so far as I am concerned, I would be glad, did the condition of things permit of it, if a company, liberally aided, could be found to take this work up, and, at their own responsibility and risk, carry it to completion. But, in the absence of that means of attaining our object, we believe we are right in placing in the hands of a Commission—in which the Imperial Government shall be with us, jointly represented—100,000,000 acres of land for the construction of the work."

I trust that the hon. member for Westmoreland has the fullest and most complete answer I can make to the question he has asked. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat will feel that it is not in my power to explain why I changed my opinion, for the best of all reasons that I never had but one opinion.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I suppose it will be admitted that the leader of the Government propounds and settles the Government's policy, and that the utterances of the leader will overshadow the private opinion of the Minister of Railways. Does the Minister of Railways mean to say that he repudiates the policy which was announced by his leader, who said:

"What the policy of the late Government would have been, we do not know * * * but when we came into office we decided to indicate it as a public work."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have explained to the hon. gentleman that there was no alternative but to take it up as a public work and carry it on as we were doing.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. But the First Minister said: "when we came into office we decided to undertake it as a public work."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly, because nothing else could be done. The hon. member for Lambton did the same thing but he did not change his opinion.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. What I mean to say is that we must look to the announcement of the leader of the Government. The opinion of an individual member cannot be taken. The policy of the Government must be taken from the leader of the Government. The Minister has not undertaken to make any announcement that the policy was changed. He may have had an individual opinion as to the policy of the Government but that could not affect the announcement as made by the leader.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. Minister of Railways yesterday undertook most unnecessarily to run amuck in this House, to take hon. gentlemen on this side to task who had taken a prominent position in the debate on the Pacific Railway question last Session. I am sure, Sir, that on this side of the House the attack was entirely unexpected, but however we may regret that so much time has been so unexpectedly occupied we feel that our thanks are due to the Minister for having afforded us this unexpected opportunity to declare before the House and the country what our views upon this question were and what they are to-day. Why the hon. Minister said that we were afraid to repeat what we had formerly stated, why he imagined that we would willingly recede from the position we had occupied, why he chose to speak of the resolutions of last year as forgotten literature, it will be for him to explain; but the hon. gentleman knew that throughout the Lower Provinces of this Dominion, at all events, during the whole summer we called upon the people in every important centre to come and hear what the leaders of our party had to say upon the National Policy and upon the question of the Pacific Railway contract, and he must know well, Sir, because he undertook to reply to what the leader of the Opposition and other members said—what the topics discussed before the people of this country were. So long as the state of the weather permitted public meetings to be held we went in amongst the people. I will not say we went down amongst the people, because we are always down amongst the people, on this side of the House—and asked them to hear our explanations of the nature and character of this contract, and unless we were greatly mistaken in the impression of popular opinion, the people throughout all these Provinces, with scarcely an exception, joined in the condemnation of that contract which we asked them to censure and condemn. Mr. Speaker, a more extraordinary charge even the hon. Minister of Railways never chose to make against hon. members on this side of the House, than that they had forgotten or wished to forget or would shrink from bringing before the public their conduct on this question. He chose to say that I as one who moved a resolution on this matter must have seen reason to believe that I was, at least, entirely mistaken in the resolution I proposed. That resolution was a very plain and simple one, and so far as I can judge of the effects of what has transpired during the past year the truth of the statements made and the value of the objections then urged have been very much strengthened and confirmed by what has taken place. I moved in effect, I believe, that in giving so large an amount in money and lands for the construction of the central portion of the Pacific Railway the Government was acting injudiciously and improperly. The amount given, as I find from the contract already referred to—and I shall not dwell upon it at length—was, for the 900 miles of the prairie section, $10,000 a mile in cash. And I believe the hon. Minister referred to what had actually taken place and to the cost of construction of 100 miles through the swamps selected for the purpose, which was $10,000 per mile, and this he said was allowance enough for the construction of the road through the prairie country. All that we have heard of the work in that part of the country goes to show that $10,000 a mile is a very liberal allowance indeed. It is said the Syndicate is building a much better road than they were bound to do under the terms of this bargain or than the hon. Minister intended to construct when he degraded the character of the whole line, declaring that he would build a new colonization road, but still it is by no means an expensive road. I have been told by those who seem to be familiar with the manner in which the work is done on the prairies that it is of the simplest possible kind. A furrow or two is run on one side, and a furrow or two on the other side of the proposed road and then by means of a machine called a scraper the earth or gravel is thrown up into the centre and forms the road-bed, and that is in fact the mode of grading the whole of the road along the prairie section, except in some spots where it is more difficult. This may be an effectual process, but it is by no means an expensive one, and $10,000 per mile for a railway so constructed is ample. But in addition to that we propose to give them 12,500 acres per mile of choice lands, the Syndicate having power to select it themselves, and laying right along the line of railway. For other parts of the country they might have to choose their lands some distance from the line, but in the prairie section they have it on either side of the road and if the land throughout the country is worth $2 or $3 an acre surely this must be worth $3, $4, $5, in some cases even $10, per acre. The hon. Minister of Railways told us that the land would sell at the nominal price of $2.50; but owing to the liberal rebate allowed by the Syndicate, the real price to the actual settler will be $1.25, that a rebate of one-half the price is allowed on conditions under which, however, in the opinion of nine out of ten of the practical men of this country it will be impossible for the settlers to become entitled to their land. It is said that it will be utterly impossible for a man going out there with the amount of capital that ordinary immigrants possess, to settle on the land, build a house for himself and shelter for his cattle, break up and cultivate his land, raise food for himself and family and for his cattle and bring eighty acres into actual cultivation within the time prescribed. By the modification of these terms lately made, it is said something will be allowed for the house the settler will build and that this will be taken into account in the calculation which will determine whether or not he is entitled to his lands; but in nine cases out of ten the settler will be unable to fulfil the conditions. There is another very important point which the hon. Minister of Railways, I suppose, chose not to speak of. It is this: that so far as we can ascertain, the Syndicate does not put all their lands upon the market. They withhold all town sites, all mill sites, and all timber and mineral lands, and when the settler goes in to select land for settlement, he finds that his area for selection is very much narrowed, and that the Company retain so much valuable land subject to their own control, that it is absurd to estimate the value of the lands on the basis of the price the settler has to pay. The value of the lands, we know, is very much greater. We hear of enormous sums paid to the Syndicate themselves for town lots in the paper towns along the line of the railway, and we hear a good deal of the enormous sums which are extorted from some of the towns and cities by the extraordinary powers the Company possess under their charter, and the still more extraordinary powers they possess by their influence over the Government of this country. The hon. gentleman actually boasted that the Company had obtained $200,000 from the city of Winnipeg, and $60,000 from some other town. Why do the Syndicate extort these moneys from these people, who find themselves suddenly at their mercy, compelled to accept any terms the Syndicate like to impose, and compelled to pay money bonuses or surrender one-half or two-thirds of the lots in the town or city where the station is to be placed? Entirely because of this—that while the Syndicate are nominally subject, in the selection of their line of railway, to the control of the Governor in Council, they possess the absolute power of going where they please, and of saying to the people: "If you do not choose to submit to our terms, we will not carry the line of railway through your property, but ten or fifteen or twenty miles away." Why, Sir, it is impossible to calculate, at this moment, what the value of that land really is. Should the present extraordinary excitement continue, should the tide of population into that country go on as is anticipated, these lands will become very valuable. They are vastly more valuable to-day than they were when I spoke last year, they are vastly more valuable than they were two or three or five years ago, and some will be vastly more valuable four or five years hence, long before the Syndicate will have disposed of all of their lands. Well, Sir, were this a Government road, were these lands under the control of the Government still, were they to be disposed of by the Government on fair terms to actual settlers, the Government would obtain a large portion of the expenditure on this road, and we would have a people free and independent, and therefore able to contribute more largely to the revenue of the country than it is probable they will be able to do. Sir, the history of the last year has proved all this. If, as has been announced by the Minister of Railways, some 24,000 or 25,000 people have already this year gone into that country, the greater portion, I suppose, to settle in the country, all this goes to show that instead of over estimating the value of the lands last year, and the value of the bargain to the Syndicate, I entirely underestimated the value of the lands, and I did not put as strongly as I might have put the extraordinary character of this arrangement—an arrangement which gives to that Company a total of 11,250,000 acres of land over and above all that the road will actually cost them, all that it would have cost the Government if the Government had chosen to build it. It was said last year that this was given to them for two reasons. First, in order to furnish them with a basis of credit, and so enable them to carry on the work. The Minister of Railways did not take that position; that was the position taken by the First Minister. The Minister of Railways is fond of boasting of the ample means of the gentlemen who form the Syndicate. He is fond of telling us that the capital furnished by them is raised by themselves or on their own credit, and that they may go on expending untold millions in the same way; but we find that these gentlemen have not been very slow in getting $25,000,000 of their land bonds placed on the market, and they are able to draw from the Government their share of the cost as the work progresses; so that without calling at all on their own resources or their own credit, they have ample means not only to carry on this work, but also to purchase other roads in the country. They have become possessed of the Canada Central road, not by any payment of cash, but by a subscription of stock; and we heard lately of their purchasing the road on the other side of the river; and all this is pointed to by the hon. gentleman as evidence of their unlimited resources and their great credit. The people of this country have furnished them with means enough to do all they have yet done, and the probability is that as the work progresses they will have money enough to do all they have to do. Like a huge spider they are spreading all over this country. They are men of great energy, no doubt, who thoroughly understand the position of the country and their own position, and who are doing no more than they are perfectly justified in doing; but whether that is consistent with the well-being of this country, whether it is a state of things which the Government and the Parliament of this country should promote and foster is another question altogether. So much in defence of the position I took last year. I do not wish to speak at any length, but really, after the challenge the Minister of Railways chose to hurl at each one of us, he scarcely could have expected that we could do anything else than hurl defiance back and tell him that we are prepared to meet him on this question, or any other question, either before this House or before the electors of this country. It is amusing to hear the hon. Minister brag and boast as he did of his own wonderful achievements, and of all his policy had effected. You would suppose by that policy the whole of the North-West had been almost brought into existence, and had ceased to be a wilderness; that his restoration to office vivified that vast territory and inspired the whole people of the country to go in and possess themselves of the land. According to him Winnipeg was dead when the late Government was in office, and Winnipeg became alive, active and bustling when he returned to power. Winnipeg might have been hurt by the selection of Selkirk as the crossing place of the railroad and by the running of the line north of Winnipeg; but Winnipeg is not the whole North-West, and to the country as a whole it may not have mattered whether the chief town was at Winnipeg or Selkirk. For Winnipeg the present state of things is very much better. But, really, what ground is there for all this boasting in the hon. gentleman? Why does he seek in this manner to challenge enquiry into his whole conduct? Did he think his boasting would be allowed to go forth to the people as something the Opposition dare not contradict, knowing it to be well founded—boasting in his own grandiloquent way? We are not prepared to admit the truth of one-half or one-quarter of what he asserts, or that the late Government were lacking in energy, and failed to do all they should have done to open up the great North-West. We certainly admit he and his colleagues did do much towards opening it up. But what have the hon. gentlemen opposite done for the North-West? What is there to justify all their boasting and self-glorification? Years ago, on that side of the House, when the hon. Minister of Railways had no seat there, during the time of the Parliament of old Canada, if I have read the history of that time aright, the Liberal party were the party continually clamoring for the opening up of the North-West. They adopted the patriotic view that it should belong to the Provinces of North America, that the Hudson's Bay Company were usurpers, whose claims should not be recognized and that the country should be thrown open at once. I think they created that demand for that territory which finally effected so much. But I never heard of any Tory joining in that demand, or taking any special energetic steps towards opening up the North-West. It was only after Confederation, only when the Imperial Government desired, for purposes of its own policy, to see all those countries formed into one confederacy, that the Tories suddenly awoke to the importance of the great North-West, which they then determined, for the first time, should be opened up. But they took a very extraordinary way of opening it up: instead of insisting, as they should have done, that the North-West did not belong to the Hudson's Bay Company, and that the British Government only had proprietary rights, and should compensate that Company for its claims, and hand over the territory without price to the people of Canada—and more than that that the Imperial Government should assist Canada, then struggling and not wealthy, in opening up and governing the North-West. That was the position taken by the late Mr. Howe, when the proposal was first brought up, and it was one in which he had the support of most Liberals. But hon. gentlemen opposite took a different course; they bought out the claim of the Hudson's Bay Company for £300,000 sterling. I said then, as now, that it was a mistake to pay that amount, but a greater mistake to allow them to retain 5 per cent. of all the lands in that territory. Next, those hon. gentlemen went to work and commenced the Dawson road. We do not hear them boast much of that work, though we hear something of the Fort Frances Lock. Nor do we hear much of the steamboats built up there, at that lock, which, I am told, are now nearly rotted, though they might have been very useful in opening that part of the territory, as might also have been the lock if properly looked after. What next did they do? They granted a Constitution to the North-West which recognized no rights on the part of the people, and which treated them as more worthless than the buffalo. It did not recognize in them rights in property possessed by themselves and fathers for generations; and hon. gentlemen opposite selected a Governor for them whom the people up there had learned to fear. The people were thus goaded into rebellion. Is that something of which hon. gentlemen opposite are proud? Will they recall the memory of those times with all the self-satisfaction and glorification which the hon. Minister of Railways likes to engage in? We had a rebellion and sent up an army to subdue the rebels. We had all the cost and glory, and we found the people there quailed before our armed force and showing a desire to be peaceable. I do not know that we treated them very well; they lost a large portion of their independence and were branded as rebels and outlaws; and it was not till the successors of hon. gentlemen opposite had time to deal with the subject, some time after, that peace was finally restored. Then they made with British Columbia this extraordinary bargain that we were to commence within a certain time and to complete within ten years a railway from the existing system of Canadian railways across the whole continent to the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. PLUMB. The Americans did it in six years.

Mr. ANGLIN. If all the Americans were like the hon. gentleman they would build it in less time. We never thought that it was a thing we could do in six years, and hon. gentlemen opposite have been in office for more than six years since the day the bargain was made, and the road is not yet completed. They made that extraordinary bargain, and many times since they have endeavored to draw public attention from the nature of that bargain, because the hon. member for Lambton consented to the Carnarvon Terms. The hon. First Minister has said over and over again that by consenting to those terms, the hon. member for Lambton increased enormously the obligations of the country, seeking to excuse his policy by repeating that assertion—an assertion which is entirely contrary to the fact. Well, they made that bargain, and introduced a Bill to provide for the construction of this railway. As we found out afterwards they passed also about the same time charters for rival lines. Their proposal then was, as it is now, to build, though on different terms, by means of a private company assisted by a subsidy of money and lands. They chartered a company which undertook the construction of that road, but failed. What then did they do to show this extreme energy, their great zeal for opening up the North-West. They had their surveying parties out it is true, and spent $1,500,000 to $1,750,000 in a work of surveying the North-West. During all the twenty odd months they were in power those men of unbounded energy and great ability did not locate a single mile of that railway. Nothing but the most scanty information was obtained by them. When the hon. member for Lambton was called upon to form a Government he had to meet this heavy obligation, and what support did he receive from hon. gentlemen on the other side? How was it that the very policy since pursued by the hon. gentlemen themselves, as the only policy under the circumstances, was attacked and derided by them. We all know how year after year the hon. Minister of Railways denounced the policy of the hon. member for Lambton, laughed to scorn his proposal to use water stretches, and demanded that an all-rail route should be commenced and completed from Nipissing to Nepigon and from Nepigon away across the prairie to the Pacific Ocean. Hon. gentlemen complain because we sometimes object to their policy. We are obstructionists, traitors to Canada, because we do not choose to agree with every thing they do. But during those years the hon. Minister of Railways never ceased to find fault with the policy of the hon. member for Lambton, never ceased to hold it up to the ridicule of the country. The hon. member for Lambton proceeded with his work, and as he came to the end of his term he was denounced for having done so little. The hon. gentlemen succeeded. What have they done? When the hon. member for Lambton went out of office he left the line between Thunder Bay and Winnipeg almost completed at both ends. He had surveys made over and over again so as to obtain the best possible route, through one of the most difficult countries in the world. There were difficulties to be encountered that perhaps might have been obviated. The railway was not completed as cheaply perhaps as it might have been, after some time had been devoted to the work of survey and examination, but it is very easy to be wise after the event. What did the hon. member for Lambton do then that he ought not to have done; where was he wanting in ability or energy? Did he not push this work forward in all directions? He put those sections under contract. It is now said he did so too soon. Perhaps he did. At all events we had not sufficient information. One of the results of the Commission of hon. gentlemen opposite which has acted as a boomerang in retorting upon themselves is that it has exposed their mode of doing business and defended in every possible respect the policy of the hon. member for Lambton.

Mr. BOWELL. You have not read the report.

Mr. ANGLIN. I have devoted a great many hours to the report, and I find that with every disposition manifest upon the part of those selected to bring in the hon. member for Lambton guilty of some dreadful malfeasance, they have not been able to do so. Every one of those old charges were revived; they fished for evidence in the endeavor to find something that would tell against the hon. member, but in vain. They are now making charges against the chief engineer, Mr. Fleming's mode of conducting the work, which was not at all to their satisfaction. They find great fault with him and all employed under him with regard to the work along those particular sections, and with the mode of letting those sections. Mr. Fleming has always maintained before Committees of this House that letting the work by schedule rates, as was done, it made no difference in reality whether the actual quantities were ascertained nearly or not. They do not pretend to argue that the hon. member for Lambton, as Minister, was guilty of any improper conduct in acting upon the advice of his chief engineer in the matter, or that he wilfully did anything wrong, and their opinion as against that of the chief engineer, must just go for what it is worth. But this much was ascertained, that the quantities were not properly ascertained before the work was done; that the amount of work to be done, and actually done since, was largely in excess of their estimates; but as Mr. Fleming says, it does not matter much if it had been correctly ascertained what were the original sums calculated on the schedule rates. They would have been very much larger than they were, but the country has actually paid no more. But the hon. member for Lambton is now charged with having been too precipitate in letting these contracts, though at the time the charge was that he was not going fast enough. The continual cry in those days was that he was not going fast enough. But the hon. member for Lambton, when Minister of Railways, proved that he was in earnest. He pushed that work as fast as possible. When he had proof that the original surveys were defective he had new ones made. When he found it was necessary to alter the location of portions of the road that were let, he did not hesitate to alter them to points where the water-stretches might be utilized. He had surveyors all through that region and beyond the Rocky Mountains, to find out the most passable pass. No man in the Dominion has done more than the then Minister of Railways to secure a passage to the Pacific coast as far north as possible. The Minister of Railways was never tired of dwelling upon the value, extent and fertility of the Peace River district; he never tried upon the Ministry of that day the importance of constructing the road so as to open up that district. Well, the hon. member for Lambton seems to have had the same view; he appears, at all events, to have thought that the view might be well founded, for I find he surveyed the pass and made the greatest efforts to find a passage to the Pacific coast north of the Yellow Head Pass. Everything in fact was done that the Minister could do, whatever might have been the faults of the engineers employed on the works, to ascertain the best possible route to the Pacific coast, and to ascertain it as quickly as possible. Meantime the policy of the Government then, like the policy of the present time, was that it was desirable to open up the prairie region as soon as possible, that the first work to be done was to build as good a road as could be built with the easiest possible gradients, running from west to east, between Thunder Bay and Red River. Another work, the importance of which could not be over-rated, was the Pembina Branch, as a means of opening up the North-West Territory. Why was that not constructed at once? Simply because there was no railway with which to connect. The Northern Pacific Railway, as we all know, had become a failure, other roads up there had broken down, and therefore it was useless to push the Pembina Branch. But just as soon as there was a probability of being able to get railway connection the construction of that branch was pushed forward. As the hon. member for Brant said a while ago, not a man, woman or child in the North-West to-day has reached that country over a part of any railway built by the present Minister of Railways. Every one of them has gone in over the branch built by the hon. member for Lambton. In the old times it required eighteen or twenty days to go merely from the frontier up to Winnipeg. Now, Sir, a few hours will carry an emigrant to the North-West over the same road. And because facilities are greater to-day, because there is a railway system to-day by which you can take a car in this city and be carried in that car to Winnipeg, is the reason why we see such a large number of emigrants going into that country. By whom were these facilities afforded, Mr. Speaker? Not by the Minister of Railways, who boasts that all the progress of the North-West is due to him and his colleagues, but by the hon. member for Lambton. Since then the depression which prevailed at that time has passed away, and it is not found possible to proceed with an all-rail route to Winnipeg. But, Sir, where are the grounds for all the boasting and the self-glorification to which we listened last night and at which the House was amused, and with which we might have been content to remain amused but for this, that we knew it was intended for the country, and there may be still some people in the country who, if these assertions had been allowed to pass unchallenged and uncontradicted, would have believed that the Minister of Railways had really some claims for their thanks for all that had been accomplished. But what has he really done? He found the sections between Thunder Bay and Red River completed and the railway located further on. He says he has made a further survey, that he has since obtained various improvements in the line. It is possible he has done all that, but the same thing was done precisely under his predecessor. But he had not the letting of these contracts. Now, the letting of these contracts, especially contract B, has caused more talk than the letting of all the contracts under the late Administration. There has been more said about it, whether rightly or wrongly, than about the contracts that have been let for the Canadian Pacific Railway. However, the contract was let and a way has to be provided for the expeditious completion of the work. Even this has not been quite successful, although he tells us that he intends to propose that the contractors shall be paid as they finish their work within the time they stipulate, provided the work be completed in the other time stipulated. Still, so far, the work has not been carried on as the Minister of Railways intended. But he has now been nearly four years in office. He took office when one of these sections was completed, another one nearly completed, and when facilities were afforded them for carrying on the work, when there was nothing more to be done but to let the works out to tenderers. Nearly four years have elapsed, and though he over and over again charged the hon. member for Lambton with delaying it, because he had not within five years succeeded in building the road from Lake Superior to Red River, the hon. gentleman himself, four years afterwards, finds it matter for boasting that he has succeeded in doing what my hon. friend had done five years previous. He takes all that has been done in five years, and he requires four years more to complete the work which he says should have been commenced and completed within five years. Such is the boasting of the hon. Minister of Railways. What else has he done towards opening up the North-West? Nothing as yet. Not an immigrant has yet passed over any section of the railway. But the hon. gentleman says: "Look at a contract let on the Rocky Mountains." Has that anything to do with opening up the North-West. Does any one imagine that that contract has brought a single settler into the North-West? But the crowning glory of the hon. Minister of Railways, is the making of the Syndicate contract, which he claims has changed the whole face of things, not only in the North-West but throughout Canada; and has altered the position of Canada in the eyes of the world and is the means of attracting here a flood of immigrants, of which we have seen not much as yet. We say that the contract is calculated to inflict incalculable injury on the people; that it is a contract which should never have been entered into; that it has not one good redeeming quality, and that it is irremediably and absolutely bad and objectionable. The Syndicate put their hands on the material and sold some of them, they have built 100 miles of railway through one swamp in order to avoid another swamp, and some 150 or 180 miles on the prairie after the manner I have described. Was that the cause of all the prosperity we hear of? Has that done much towards carrying the people to the North-West? Would they not have been more willing to go if the policy of the hon. member for Lambton had been carried out, if the railroad had been carried, as it was intended it should be, not where it would prove the most profitable to the Company having the contract and having their own interests only in view, but where it would be most profitable to the people of the whole Dominion, and where it would open up most of the lands of the fertile region to settlement? If the railway had been built just as rapidly as was necessary, keeping not merely abreast of settlement, but far in advance, leading settlers into the wilderness, would not the people, knowing they had to deal with the Government, who were responsible to them as well as to the other portion of the people of the Dominion for the management of the road, knowing it would be free from monopoly, have been more ready to have gone into the country when it became opened as it now is rather than when they know that the road has been handed over to a Company which locates the line where it promises to be most profitable, which holds the best region under lock and key, the members of the Government being merely the jailors for the people of that country, refusing them the right to come out of it by any other means than the Syndicate choose to provide. We know that a much larger number of settlers, who will become the strength of the country, would, under those conditions, have entered the country than have done so under the present system. Hon. members who came to look at the matter from a common-sense standpoint, and people who have enquired, will agree with us on that point. Thus it appears that the glorification of the Minister of Railways, instead of being something respecting which they can boast, is, in reality, an act which they must really deplore, for the hon. gentleman has done nothing and the Syndicate has done very little. The Syndicate was to have commenced the Lake Superior section, but nothing has been done, the difficulties having been too great, and although it was supposed that the road would run along the Lake Shore rather than into the interior, that is now a matter entirely unsettled and undetermined. Carrying the line along the Lake Shore was, according to the Prime Minister, the very best thing which the Syndicate desired; but when the Company proposed to pass through the interior then the same hon. gentleman told the people of Ontario that one of the great advantages they would derive from the railway was the opening up of the vast timber region in that portion of the Province. Hon. gentlemen opposite vary their story from day to day, they take up our ideas one day and the next day claim them as their own. This was notable; the case in regard to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). Hon. gentlemen opposite also took credit for the change made in the standard of the railway; but they hardly knew what was meant at the outset, and our agitation of that point had the effect of producing a change in the policy propounded by the Company. The character of the undertaking had been altered somewhat, but as yet very slightly. I cannot resume my seat without entering my protest against the position taken by the hon. Minister of Railways with respect to the employment of Canadians on public works of the country. If 25 years ago, before we had any considerable experience of railways, objection had been taken to the introduction, not to one or two, but to a whole State of American officials, the Act might be held to be justifiable, but I can hardly imagine that the Minister of Railways himself understood how far he was carried away by excess of zeal on behalf of the Syndicate in this respect. He perhaps did intend to imply that we have not in Canada men acquainted with the management of railways, and yet nothing else can be inferred from what the hon. gentleman said. He said: "Where in Canada is there a man having a salary as large as Mr. Vanhorn is getting." Mr. Vanhorn gets $15,000 a year, and is, perhaps, worth it in the position he occupies. Perhaps there is nobody else in Canada getting so much, but can no man in Canada discharge the duties so well as Mr. Vanhorn does?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think there is a man in Canada with the experience and ability necessary for that position, and that is the reason the authorities who required the services of such a man go to the United States and pay $15,000 to secure the one they want.

Mr. ANGLIN. That is prima facie evidence that he is a good man in the position he occupies, but it does not prove that the people of Canada are different in experience, intelligence, education or energy, or any of the qualities that would fit a man to fill such a position as creditably as does Mr. Vanhorn, and the hon. Minister holding the position he does ought not to insinuate that it does. He talks about our being unpatriotic. If we object to a single statement made on the other side, we are unpatriotic; if we doubt that there were so many millions of acres of fertile land in the North-West, we are accused of being unpatriotic; if, while we admit that we have a vast and fertile region in the North-West, we fail to accept the same exaggerated statements made with regard to it, we are told that we are unpatriotic. Yet, at the same time that the hon. gentlemen were crying "Canada for the Canadians," they believed in no Canadians except themselves and that Canada was all for them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say that he is very much mistaken if he supposes that the Canadian Pacific Railway have not been desirous of obtaining the services of Canadian engineers. I may say that there is not an engineer of ability in my service I have not found it difficult to retain, in consequence of the greater inducements offered by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Mr. Smellie, who was the chief in the office here, was receiving $3,000; they gave him $4,000. Mr. Duncan, the division engineer in one of the most important sections, has been taken out of my hands—a Nova Scotia engineer, a man of ability and standing—because they are able to give him a much higher salary than I could offer.

Mr. ANGLIN. I was not at all finding fault with the Company. They are doing what they think best in their own interests. They give high pay for the services of those men they believe will serve them most efficiently; but what I am finding fault with is the way the hon. Minister replied to the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), that on this work a very large proportion of Americans are being employed. The hon. gentleman quoted a telegraphic despatch, that a number of conductors had been dismissed lately. The hon. Minister surely does not imagine that we have not men in Canada fit to be conductors; that we have not men in Canada with enough of brains and experience to fit them for such positions; that we turned out of positions the conductors, and Americans were put in their places, and the hon. Minister at once jumped to his feet—to defend the action of the Company, by saying that they had to procure the services of the best men wherever they could be found.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman seems to forget that the gentleman whom Mr. Vanhorn succeeded when they gave him this inducement to leave a road in the United States was an American, Mr. Stickney.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. gentleman, I am glad to see, tries to recede a little from the position to which he was hurried by his zeal. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) was pointing out the fact that under the control of the American influences that are paramount in the road to-day Americans are being put into the places from which Canadians are removed, and he spoke in general terms of the principal positions being held by Americans, and the hon. Minister of Railways defended the conduct of the Company.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. ANGLIN. And more than that, he attributed to us Canadians the want of intelligence, ability and other qualities to fit men for these positions, and then he took the very extraordinary position that many of us are not Canadians at all, that those who have come here within five or ten or twenty or thirty years to throw in their lot with the people of this country, were no more Canadians than men who had crossed the line to accept employment and who would go back to the United States as soon as they could get better positions. He would have none Canadians except those who are born Canadians, and perhaps he would make it necessary that their parents should be Canadians also. It is not a matter of great importance, but I object to the statement made by the hon. Minister, after the long experience he has had in public life, after the experience he has had at the head of railway affairs in this country, that he is of opinion that we have not in Canada men to be trusted in such positions as that of Mr. Vanhorn. If he holds this opinion why does he not give this gentleman control of the very difficult portions of the road in his own hands. Why are Canadians put at the head of these most difficult parts of the road, if the plea is to be urged that we have no men to fill the easier ones under the Syndicate? He, as Minister of Railways, is carrying on the work in the infinitely more difficult portions of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I do not think that any one of us has ever asserted that he had not ability to fill the position which he holds, though a Canadian; and I do not know, Sir, that we are inclined to charge any gentleman employed under him with want of ability, though they are Canadians, one of them I believe, however, being an Englishman who came here ten or fifteen years ago, hoping to become a Canadian. The real hard part of the work, the contract through the Rocky Mountains and the Cascade Range, is entrusted to Canadians, but it seems that no one has the ability to carry on the work on the prairie section. We object also very strongly to the extraordinary power possessed by the Syndicate over the Government, and through the Government over the Parliament of this country. The complaint made by the hon. member for Wentworth was a well-founded one. The man who so misconducted himself here last night would never, twelve months or two years ago, no matter how full of wine, have displayed the gross malevolence which he did towards the leader of the Opposition. He was inflated, not merely with wine, but with his sense of power. He who had to convey the will of his masters to the Government on the opposite side, naturally thought, when he was a little elevated, that he was at liberty to come into this Parliament and attempt to browbeat the leader of the Opposition while engaged in the discharge of his duties to the people of this country. It was an exhibition that we all deplored, and I have no doubt hon. gentlemen opposite deplored it as much as we did, but they did not resent it, not as servants against their masters, but as the manifestation of the power which to-day controls the legislation of this country. How does their Secretary, writing to the leader of the Government, express himself? He says:

"In the negotiations which preceded the contract, your Government at once conceded the principle that the same protection which it would have claimed for itself in respect of lines on the interest of United States railways, if it had built the Canadian Pacific Railway, should be granted to this Company."

He goes on to say, with reference to the railways which were chartered in Manitoba:

"They are directly in conflict with the declared policy of the Government, with the conditions of the contract of the Company with the Government, and with the terms of the charter which had been granted to it."

Well, Sir, I find that after this letter goes through the ordinary routine of being reported upon by Mr. Schreiber, and in turn by the Minister of Railways, the charter is disallowed; but before it is disallowed, the question goes before the Minister of Justice, and I think the statement made by the Minister of Justice on behalf of the Government, should be held up as soon as possible and as strongly as possible to the reprobation of the people of this country. He says that in an Order in Council previously passed and forwarded to the Government of Manitoba, this extraordinary principle was propounded:

"The Government think it very desirable that all railway legislation shall originate here, and that no charter for a line exclusively within the Province of Manitoba should be granted by its Legislature, without the Dominion Government first assenting thereto."

If that is good doctrine for the Province of Manitoba, it is good constitutional doctrine for Ontario and Quebec, and it lays down the broad principle that we have seen so much of lately, in attempts to tighten the control of the Federal over the Provincial Governments. If this doctrine is laid down, then hereafter no Provincial Legislature must venture to legislate on any important railway matter without first obtaining the assent of the Dominion. This is almost equal to what was known in the old time as Poyning's Act—an Act which required that every Bill presented to the old Irish Parliament should emanate from the English Government, or first go to the English Government for its consent. Another letter from the Secretary of the Company has been placed in my hands, in which he requests the Government to consent to a change of the location of the line of railway from Portage la Prairie to the crossing of the Assiniboine River. They simply intimate to the Government that a particular change of location, made entirely for their own benefit, is necessary to be sanctioned, and forthwith the Government of this country ratify the decision of the Syndicate. Taking all these things into consideration, I do think, Sir, that we are placed in an extraordinary position; but I have this consolation, that I think the hon. Minister of Railways probably wishes in his heart by this time that he had confined himself to his statement with regard to the progress of the work on the Pacific Railway, and that he had not attempted to slash and cut down, right and left, hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I wonder if he fancied that we were afraid to discuss this matter. I wonder if he thought that we would allow his criticisms of these resolutions to pass, so that by-and-by he might stand up at public meetings and say: "I said so-and-so in the Parliament of Canada, before these hon. gentlemen, and they did not contradict me." If the hon. gentleman made any calculation of that kind, he finds himself greatly mistaken. We have dared to contradict him, and we tell him that we denounce this contract as injurious to Canada, subversive of the interests and the liberties of the people of Canada, and we will be delighted to go before the people of this country and ask them to condemn the men who imposed this bargain upon them. The people will condemn them, and hon. gentlemen know that amongst their own friends, who for other reasons support them, this charter is not approved of—that it was not approved of by many hon. gentlemen opposite who were induced to support it last year; but the remonstrances and the censures of the people of this country will not so easily be set aside or suppressed. I trust the people will soon speak, and speak loudly, plainly, intelligently and honestly—speak as people who love their country, who are true-hearted and truly intelligent—people who detest mismanagement and who will never be willing to become the tools of a policy which is calculated to involve their country in such difficulties and misfortunes. The country will speak, and we, on our side, have no doubt as to what its utterance may be. Hon. gentlemen opposite may hope they will take the country by surprise and snatch a verdict in their favor. But I believe they will not be able to snatch a verdict or to come back and boast of a majority. Some of them will come back, but when they do we shall not hear any such boasting and glorification and great distortion of facts such as we have listened to last evening, and such as we were compelled to occupy nearly all this day in refuting and rebutting.

Mr. CASEY. I think, like the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that the Minister of Railways is perhaps rather sorry for having excited this discussion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. How can you think he is sorry?

Mr. CASEY. Considering the amount of the hon. gentleman's shortcomings it would be hard to say when he could be sorry enough. The words, devilish ingenuity, was used by him in describing the manner in which this amendment was drawn, and that word may become after his use of it, a proper parliamentary expression, but I do not impute that phrase to the policy of the hon. member in challenging this discussion. But I think, on the other hand, his intention was excellent, perhaps, to carry off a triumph by challenging a discussion that he thought would not come on; but the contrary has been the result and his plan has miscarried. I think it was the duty of everyone who attached his name to any of the amendments of last year to meet the hon. gentleman's challenge, and show whether he held to his sentiments and was prepared to meet his constituents on the motion to which he set his name. During this discussion it has been plainly shown that many of the evils then foretold have come to pass. The hon. gentleman claims great credit, because some of these evils have not yet come to pass; but the fulness of time has not yet arrived for the culmination of those evils. He has not told us, however, that a single evil we then predicted has been shown to be impossible, or improbable. That being the case the balance of the whole discussion is in our favor and against the policy of the Minister of Railways. If part of our predictions have come true, the rest is likely to be realized, which casts the balance in our favor. Take the question of monopoly in the North-West; it has been clearly shown that monopoly has existed, and in a sense that nobody anticipated when the Syndicate contract was before the House, and which the leader of the Government said could not exist. In that respect our predictions of evil have been more than verified. The Minister of Railways attempted to do away with the force of an objection with regard to this monopoly by showing that the local rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway was in some cases the rates of other roads owned by private parties. He admitted, of course, that those rates were higher than they would have been if this had been a Government road. He let us take the case without considering the question of what the rates would have been on a Government road, and for the sake of his comparison with other railroads he gave us only local rates of roads whose length was only 145 miles, in other words, the whole completed line of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Emerson to Brandon. But he forgot to tell us what is really the fact that while other railways give through invoices at vastly reduced rates, the Canadian Pacific Railway, for the simple reason that it has no competitor gives through rates very little less, if anything less, than local rates. The local rates are also the through rates and are vastly higher than those of any other railway of the same length. Of course through rates as a rule are very much lower than local rates, and for what reason? Simply because on through traffic railroads have competition. In this case the railway has no competition, and has no object in charging a lower rate for a car of wheat from Brandon for Montreal than from Brandon for Emerson. It must go over their line to Emerson, in any case. Therefore, the exporter of grain from Manitoba and the Manitoba importer of merchandise have to pay as much for their freight over these 145 miles as they would have if only using the line from Emerson, instead of going 100 miles further. The hon. gentleman's comparison is utterly fallacious and should not have been brought up in serious discussion. Then he discussed the price we are paying for this road. He enlarged at very great length and with his usual verbosity and eloquence, with that vigor and force and fire which he puts into everything he utters on the vast prosperity of that country, and I am bound to say, from what I personally know of it, that he has scarcely spoken in too high terms of its prosperity. It would be almost impossible to overrate the prospects of a country that is having railroads built through at an extraordinary rate, and which contains the most fertile lands in America, if not in the entire world. I quite concur in these praises; it would be unpatriotic to deny these facts. But he ascribes this vast prosperity, this sudden and wonderful increase in the value of the lands of the North-West to the fact that the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was let to the present Syndicate. Hon. gentlemen then tell us that it was in consequence of the Syndicate bargain that prices of land had so gone up. He must know that in such a statement he was misleading the House. It is not the bargain with the Syndicate which has caused the tide of prosperity to flow in there; that had begun and was already progressing at a very rapid rate while the Government had control of the road. It had begun when the hon. gentleman's predecessors had let the contract for the road from Emerson to Winnipeg, and grown in volume every year with increasing knowledge of the country; and when the Government declared their policy of building a line across the prairies, at the rate of 100 miles a year or more which was then considered a very rapid rate, this boom certainly took a new impetus. If the hon. gentleman had gone on building the road as a Government road, the boom would have been as great and as enduring and have reached as high a culminating point as it now seems likely to do. But there would have been one grand difference, the profits arising out of the enhanced value of the lands sold would have inured to the Government instead of to this private Company, and the settlers would have had to deal with the Government, whose interest it is to get the country settled, instead of with a company which is only a land speculating company. Let us look for a moment at the enhanced value of the lands caused by the building of the railway. The hon. Minister must know that farm lands close to the railway are now held by private parties at $8 or $10 an acre. The land sales at Birtle in the early part of this month, averaged nearly $4 an acre cash, and the choice lands sold at from $4 to $7, and this at a distance of 60 or 70 miles from the track of the railway. The hon. First Minister referred to those sales the other night in congratulatory accents, and said the Opposition would be surprised to hear what prices these lands had brought; the Opposition were not surprised, but gratified to know that their predictions of last year had proved true as to the prices the Government could have got for the 25,000,000 of acres, had they kept them in their own hands. If we take the Birtle lands alone at an average of $3.50 an acre, we have eighty or ninety million dollars for the 25,000,000 acres of land, but if we take the higher prices which lands close to the railway are worth, say $6 an acre, we have $150,000,000 as the price for that land grant; and this does not include the enormous sums that the Canadian Pacific Railway have been receiving from the sales of town sites. The plot of Brandon alone, with the additions made to it, must have netted the Syndicate more than $1,000,000. This boom which is taking place in land, instead of being a cause of congratulation to hon. gentlemen opposite, is a standing disgrace to their power of foresight in making the contract. There is no doubt that one feeling which urged supporters of the Government to accept the Syndicate bargain was that they would thereby have something like finality in this contract, that they would know what they were going to pay for the railway. This expectation has been destroyed, there is no finality under the terms of the contract. Instead of the finality we were to have we have been landed in a wider sea of uncertainty than we were before, because while the construction of this road was in our hands his conduct was noticed more closely, more closely watched by his supporters and by the country, than when he is simply acting as the adviser of the Government in making a private arrangement and giving knowledge which he is authorized to give by the terms of this contract. In fact, Sir, the manner in which the Government have acted towards this Company is the most disheartening thing in connection with the whole contract. So far from Government acting as a controlling power over the Company, we find the Company acting as a controlling power over the Government. Instead of the actions of the Company being watched by the Government in the interests of the country, the actions of the Government are carefully watched by the Directors of the Company in their own interests. Even on the Railway Committee, when private Bills with regard to other railways are up, we have seen the solicitor of that Company sitting beside the Minister of Railways and dictating to him from time to time what policy the Government should assume with regard to other private railways. We have seen the result of that domination in the disallowance of those local charters about which so much has been said. We have seen in the grants of timber which have been made in territory which we do not yet know whether it belongs to this Dominion or not. We have seen it in the proposal to allow the Company to shorten its route in order to diminish the subsidy it will have to pay. We have seen it in a hundred instances, and as challenges are in order I must challenge the Minister of Railways to name one instance in which this railway have asked anything of any importance and had it refused to them. If such has been the case we will all be glad to hear of it. In fact the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) was too limited in the scope of his remarks when he called the hon. gentleman who was at your left last night the servant of his masters, meaning the Railway Company. I think those masters have many servants, and the opinion is certainly borne out by the whole course of the Government since last year, showing as it does that the most obedient of their servants are the members of the Government of this country. In fact, they are extending their influence over the whole railway business of Canada. They are constantly using their influence to make themselves more wealthy and more powerful than we ever imagined they could be, and tending to make themselves the dictators of this country. The real power behind the Throne, which regulates the action of the Government in connection with all railway business, appears to be the influence, of whatever nature it may be, if it is not political influence, of this gigantic cry of railway men and land speculators.

99. Public Buildings in Prince Edward Island.....$3,600

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,
Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The $600 asked for the Charlottetown Marine Hospital is to meet a balance on the contract that has been given.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. Minister explain about this $5,000 asked for the Summerside public buildings?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. For a Custom House and Post Office in place of the present old building. We pay over $300 per annum rent., and the buildings, which are very old, do not belong to the Government. I think the new building will be brick.

100. Public Buildings, N.B.....$84,000

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). $10,000 were voted last year to the St. John Marine Hospital; $15,000 additional were asked. Will that gross amount complete the building?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The estimate is $25,000 for the whole. The ground is the property of the Government. It is proposed to go on with the work this summer.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The cost of the building for the Woodstock Post Office and Custom House will not exceed $10,000, and that of the land $3,000.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Woodstock, I believe, is an inland port, and it is somewhat unusual in some cases to erect special buildings for Custom House purposes.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The value of the exports is $65,000, imports $58,000.

Mr. IRVINE. Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the work this summer, and what kind of building is it proposed to erect?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The intention is to go on this summer as soon as the plans are prepared. The building is intended to be all stone. With respect to St. Stephen's Post Office and Custom House, $15,000, I may state that the population is a little less than 3,000; Postal revenue, last year, $12,000; Customs, $46,000; exports, $96,000; imports, $368,000; value of goods entered for consumption, $320,000. With respect to Sussex Post Office and Custom House, the population is 3,584; the Postal revenue about $1,500. The intention of the Government is to proceed with the building as soon as the vote is obtained.

Mr. CASEY. Has the hon. gentleman a return of collections made at this port?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Not in the surrounding country. I have only a statement for Sussex; the amount is $3,000.

Mr. CASEY. But as the hon. Minister proposes to put up a building costing $12,000 for a population of 1,000, and to collect a Customs revenue of $3,000 it certainly seems a very extravagant estimate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not think so. It is a place that is increasing and will increase. It is an important place, and will yield a large revenue.

100. Moncton Post Office and Custom House..... $15,000

Mr. SNOWBALL. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the necessity for Post Office accommodation at Newcastle. The trade of the port is very largely increasing. The town is a very thriving one, and with the benefits of railway communication and the increasing lumber trade it is growing very rapidly. The hon. Minister visited the place last summer, and I have no doubt his attention was called to the need of Post Office accommodation.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I suppose the $15,000 does not represent the whole amount of the expenditure. Property is very dear on the main street, and it will cost considerable to get a good site.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I know that the place is a thriving one and will increase largely. It is calculated that $2,000 will pay for the site, and the balance of the vote is to be expended on the building. That will be enough, it is expected, to finish the building.

Mr. ANGLIN. Bathurst had the honor last year of a visit from the hon. Minister. He found the town not a very large, but a thriving one, a great deal of business being done at the port. The Post Office and Custom House are very much separated, and I have no doubt the hon. Minister's attention was called to this.

Mr. KILLAM. I would like to ask whether, in cases where new post offices are to be built, it is the intention to pay the postmasters by salary?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman. If he will renew his question when the hon. the Postmaster-General is here, he will, no doubt, receive an answer.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think that the postmasters in all these places are paid by salary.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I would like to ask whether there is any change in the contractors?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The original contractors were four brothers named McManus, but one of them died, one, I believe, left the country, and one lost his health so that he could not continue the work. The one who remained, the active partner, asked to be recognized as the contractor, and the Governor in Council agreed to that.

100. Dorchester Penitentiary $25,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask the total expenditure upon this penitentiary?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There were $270,000 besides this $25,000. The total amount will be $380,000.

Mr. CASEY. Will this vote be used for enclosing the grounds so as to do away with the necessity of keeping so large a number of guards?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; a separate vote will have to be taken for that in another year.

101. Public Buildings, Quebec.

Lévis Fortifications and Military Buildings.....	$ 2,500 00
Quebec Fortifications	15,000 00
Dufferin Terrace—To complete.....	6,000 00
Quebec Citadel	15,000 00
Quebec Examining Warehouse	20,000 00
Securing cliff under Citadel, &c., Quebec—To complete.....	2,500 00
Cartridge Factory for Small Arms, Quebec.....	2,300 00
Three Rivers—Fitting up old Barracks for Public Offices	4,900 00
Sherbrooke Post Office, Custom House, &c	20,000 00
Montreal Inland Revenue Building—To complete additions to and alterations of	9,800 00
St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary	8,750 00
Hull Post Office and Inland Revenue Offices.....	9,000 00
St. Helen's Island Military Buildings.....	2,000 00

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The $2,500 for Lévis Fortifications and Military Buildings is for repairs. The vote of $15,000 for Quebec Fortifications is to continue the renewal of the walls that was begun some years ago. The sum of $6,000 is asked to complete the Dufferin Terrace. We have not rebuilt the whole, but the lower portion of the wall between the buttresses has been filled in with timber painted the same color as the stone, which was done to save expense, and when we have more money we will replace some of that timber work with stone.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Is the work on these fortifications done by public tender, or by day labor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We began by calling for public tenders and by giving the work to the lowest tenderers; but the work was delayed a good deal by strikes, and for a time we tried to keep up the work ourselves, but it cost us much more than if we gave it to a good contractor and paid him well for it. So we finally adopted the system of calling for tenders from ten or twelve of the best masons, and giving the work to the lowest tenderer. The next vote is for the Quebec Examining Warehouse.

Mr. CASEY. Does the vote for the Citadel include anything for armament?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; only the walls. We would require $25,000 for that purpose; but we propose $10,000 for next year.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Will that put them in thorough good order?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think another $10,000 will. As to the Quebec Examining Warehouse, we have no Government building. We have a number rented from the town, old and unsafe. We think it better to have a Government building on Government land, and I think we will require $10,000 more. The next item as to secure the cliff under the Citadel, $15,000.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I observe this is to complete the work; what has been its total cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $35,000. With regard to the item of small arms, $2,300, we had a previous vote of $2,000 for heating apparatus, for additional machinery, repairs in the central section, &c.

Mr. CASEY. Will that finish the building to be used as a cartridge factory?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $6,000 will be wanted. The vote for Three Rivers public offices is to repair and make the buildings complete.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Are these works done by tender?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Does the item of $10,000 for the Sherbrooke Custom House complete that work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think it will complete the old building, including the fittings and furniture.

Mr. CASEY. The cost will be $35,000.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It will be nearly $40,000. We have a balance in hand of $14,000, and there is required to complete $24,000. We are asking $20,000, leaving over $5,000 to next year.

Mr. CASEY. Will the hon. gentleman give some explanation as to the population of Sherbrooke, and the collections at Sherbrooke.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The population is 7,227; Postal revenue, $7,220; Customs $46,678; Excise, $49,600; Weights and Measures, over $1,000; total exports, $154,000; imports, $779,000; entered for consumption, $778,000. With regard to the Montreal Inland Revenue building, to complete additions and alterations, we had two votes, $9,000 in 1881, and $10,000 in 1882, and we need $8,800; the total will be a little over $24,000. With regard to the item St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, $1,000 will go towards providing offices for the stores, and $500 for tools for the carpenters, &c.; repairs to prison and buildings, $600; cast-iron fence and gates, $350; temporary wooden building for storehouse, $600; salaries to clerks, keepers and trade instructors, $3,000. With regard to the Hull

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Post Office and Inland Revenue Office, $9,000 will be wanted. A site has been donated. It will require a little more to complete the work, probably $2,500.

Mr. ANGLIN. What is the population of Hull?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Not quite 7,000. The vote for St. Helen's Island is for repairing the military buildings—this completes the work.

102. To defray expenses in connection with public buildings in Ontario $196,025

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I would have been glad if the hon. gentleman would have allowed that to stand till the member for West Durham was present, as he wanted to speak on it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He will have abundant opportunities.

Mr. BROWN. I am glad to see the Government are allowing $20,000 for the Belleville Post Office and Custom House. I think the lot there is a suitable place, and there is a decided want felt for the construction of the building in which the Post Office, Customs, Inland Revenue and Weights and Measures may be all combined. I have no doubt the hon. Minister of Customs will see that the building is suitably put up and is worthy of the city which he hails from, a city which, I think, will compare favorably with any other in the Province.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total cost will be $48,000, of which $5,500 will be for the land. I am now asking for $20,000 of that sum, and next year we will have to ask for $15,000 more. The land was purchased last year for $37,000. The $40,000 will be towards the erection of the building, which will cost, when finished, over $200,000. That will include the Post Office, Custom House, Inland Revenue and Weights and Measures. The Stratford Custom House will require $13,500, and we may have to ask for two or three thousand more next year. St. Thomas, $20,000—this is for the Post Office and Custom House. The whole amount required will be $40,500. The land alone cost $7,000.

Mr. CASEY. I notice that this is exactly the sum which is put down to Cornwall and Brockville and a number of smaller places. Now, St. Thomas is a city of over 20,000 inhabitants, and is growing much faster than some of these smaller towns. Now, we must come to one of two conclusions, either Cornwall with its population of 4,300 is getting too much, or St. Thomas of twice the size is getting much too little. St. Thomas is a place more strictly comparable to Belleville and ought to have a sum corresponding to the allocation for Belleville. If $40,000 is too much for Cornwall I think you ought to give $90,000 to St. Thomas.

Mr. ARKELL. I give credit to the hon. member for West Elgin for being so solicitous for St. Thomas. I have been working this to-night pretty well, and I am quite willing to leave it in the hands of the Government.

Mr. CASEY. I suppose by working it up the hon. member must refer to those little transactions which took place last summer, although I do not for a moment suppose those reasons could have influenced the hon. Minister.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As the hon. gentleman has seen fit to make another allusion to the matter which came before the Committee at a previous meeting in regard to my trip to Ontario last summer having been made at the expense of the country, I will now take the opportunity to reply to the insinuations then made. The hon. gentleman stated that I was travelling in a special car and was attended by a man with gold lace, and that I had a steamer at my disposal. I may say now that it was so late the other evening that I could not answer the hon. gentleman, and I did not desire to prolong the debate. But I am bound to inform this Committee now and the hon. member who made the accusation, and who, I regret to say, is not present, that the special car was placed at my disposal by the Great Western Railway Company free of charge, that it did so in compliment to myself as a representative of my Province and of my race and a member of the Government. I need not speak of the steamer, because the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) truly stated that all the cost of that excursion on the river was paid by my friends, Reformers and Conservatives, in that region. I may add now that the Grand Trunk Railway Company also placed their special car at my disposal under the same circumstances; and that none of these cars in which I travelled in Ontario cost the country a single cent. The journey cost no one anything, but myself in the work, anxiety and fatigue which I experienced. I think that even the most robust of the hon. gentlemen opposite would have been considerably fatigued had they been obliged to undergo the same journey. Now we come to the next item, the St. Catharines Post Office and Custom House, $16,500. The total amount voted for St. Catharines in 1881 was $6,000; in 1882, $15,000; and $16,000 is now asked for, making a total of $37,500. $16,000 will be required. At Chatham the work would cost $40,000. We have $8,000, and $20,000 is now asked for. London Post Office would require for minor improvements, $7,500.

Mr. KILLAM. On what principle are applications for Custom Houses and Post Offices granted? In many cases Custom Houses and Post Offices are being provided in towns which are not so important as others which are entirely neglected. In regard to the salaries of postmasters, it may not be known that the Post Office Act fixes the salaries of postmasters in different towns on a certain fixed principle, that is they are paid 40 per cent. of the receipts, taking the average receipts for a number of years. In some towns allowances are made for fuel and light, but in certain cities where buildings are provided by the Government, fixed salaries are paid to the postmasters.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When the attention of the Department is called to a want of public buildings at any place, I send an officer to examine the facts or I go myself. Last summer I visited Ontario, Quebec, and the Maritime Provinces, especially such points as were stated to require public buildings. I informed myself about the wants of the different localities. When I found public buildings were required I reported the fact to my colleagues, and the result is seen in the Estimates before the Committee.

Mr. KILLAM. Then no comprehensive system has been adopted by the Government, but only such places as the hon. Minister has seen fit to visit received the benefit of his attention. He has not taken the trouble to look at large over the Dominion and has visited some places of minor importance to others that have been omitted.

103. Public Building in Manitoba..... $87,500

Mr. HOOPER. The Immigration Office at Emerson is not worth $400 or $200, but I observe that last year $400 were voted to complete it. The immigration shed is altogether too small, and a further sum should be placed in the Estimates for buildings for the accommodation of immigrants and an immigration office.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not expect the hon. gentleman to put a question about the Estimates of last year. If he wishes the information, I shall be happy to give it to him on concurrence. So far as I am informed there is an officer there maintained by the Department and one agent, and the shed has been enlarged.

103. Manitoba Penitentiary..... $32,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is for the heating apparatus and for alterations in the cells and the roof and blinds and charges. Authorized but not paid for, $3,000.

103. Parliament Buildings, Winnipeg..... $30,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is to continue the contract given last year. $90,000 was stated as the expected cost, but I think we will have to ask a thousand and more on account of the increase in labor and material.

Mr. CASGRAIN. How is it that we are obliged to build Parliament Buildings for Manitoba.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When the other Provinces came into Confederation they had their Parliament Buildings and these were allowed by the Federal Government to be used by the Province. As Manitoba was a new Province and had no buildings, Parliament last year voted a sum for the purpose of constructing public buildings and a residence for the Lieut.-Governor.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The cost of the Lieut.-Governor's residence was expected to be $55,000, including furniture, but I think we shall have to have more owing to the increase to which I have referred in labor and material.

Mr. CASEY. There is no vote this year for the Post Office in Winnipeg. We know by bitter experience that the Post Office accommodation there is not good and that letters are much delayed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We intend doubling the Post Office, and putting in two doors so as to allow a separate exit and entrance. The Government has also under consideration the project of building an entirely new building.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. There seems to be a very serious deficiency in the accommodation for immigrants, and some of the hardships suffered by people going into that country have, no doubt, resulted from this. I would like to know if any improvements are to be made.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government is increasing the accommodation of the immigrant sheds throughout the West, and we will have in the Supplementary Estimates a sum of money voted for that purpose.

Mr. CASEY. I would like to call the attention of the Government to the fact that by following the example of enterprising hotel proprietors in Winnipeg and erecting large tents they could accommodate immigrants perfectly well for the summer, and avoid the delay that would be caused by putting up buildings.

Mr. TROW. I would like to ask if there are any regulations as to the time when immigrants shall remain in the sheds.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman will see that that is a matter that can best be regulated on the spot. Immigrants are sent on with the land guides as soon as they have ascertained definitely where their lots are.

Mr. TROW. I spoke of this because I know of cases of persons remaining in the immigrant sheds while the head of the family was off working, the people occupying rooms in the immigrant sheds to the detriment of others more deserving.

104. Public Buildings, North-West Territories..... $15,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is to keep up the buildings and prevent them from being destroyed. There is $10,000 re-vote for the lunatic asylum.

105. Public Buildings, British Columbia..... $38,000

In reply to Mr. BUNSTER,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. For a quarantine station, at Victoria $5,000 is asked by the Minister of Agriculture, in order that the Province of British Columbia may have the same facilities in this respect as the other Provinces. The vote of $16,500 for British Columbia Penitentiary is for general repairs, including a new flooring, a heating apparatus and an hospital for contagious diseases. For a Post Office and Custom House at New Westminster $11,500 is asked, and $4,000 or perhaps $5,000 more will be required.

Mr. CASEY. It does not seem prudent to spend such a large sum at New Westminster in view of the size of the place, and also in view of the fact that the great-city of that district will be a few miles from that point, at Port Moody, the terminus of the railway.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There was a contract last year for the work.

107. Public buildings, repairs, furniture, heating,
&c..... $255,300

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The increased number of buildings in the Dominion makes the claims on this vote greater every year, and therefore we have to ask for $165,000 this year for outside buildings, though hon. gentlemen will remember that when we had the workshops this vote amounted to $225,000, and sometimes more; so that there is a saving now of $55,000 or $60,000. We ask for $6,000 for the Parliament grounds, as $4,000 was not sufficient, the expenditure last year having been $5,924.

Mr. ANGLIN. What is to be done with the beautiful fountain in front of the main building.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is a question whether that basin should be there, or whether it would not be better to have two fountains, one at each side, and leave the place where the present fountain stands as open ground. Until that is decided, I think it better not to purchase a fountain.

108. To defray expenses in connection with the harbors and rivers in Nova Scotia..... $583,000

Mr. BORDEN. I would like to make one or two observations before the hon. member makes his explanations, as I want to refer to a few matters not mentioned before, and perhaps he will be able to answer me. Is there any general principle of public policy upon which these grants are given for wharves and breakwaters; are engineers sent impartially to the different parts of the Province in reference to these expenditures of the public money, or are they sent, and is money voted to those counties that happen to send representatives here to support the Administration? At the time of Confederation there was a question as to whether these piers should receive grants from the Dominion Government at all or not. Most of them have been constructed by grants from the Government of Nova Scotia, and the people conjointly. They were situated in districts inhabited by fishermen and seafaring people not able to keep them up. I think, in 1871 or 1872, the policy was adopted to give grants for the maintenance of those breakwaters, and in some instances for the construction of new ones. I, myself, during the previous Administration was able to get a number of grants for work of this kind in my county. Since I have made application, by petition and otherwise, to the present Administration, but never have been able to get any. I think it is proper the enquiry should be made, upon what principle these votes are given—whether the Government is justified and whether the public expects it to use the public money for the purpose of influencing the different counties in the Dominion favorably towards them or in the case where a county is represented by a member opposed to them, in attempting to punish those people for not having sent a representative to support the Administration? I think I can give a case in point. Previous to the election of 1878, in my own constituency, I had succeeded in getting the Minister of that day to set apart, out of the general sums voted for breakwaters, two amounts for two places in my constituency.

Mr. BOWELL. Was that just before the elections of 1878?

Mr. BORDEN. I said before that it was. That will prove the position I am now taking.

Mr. BOWELL. It proves that is the principle on which your friends acted.

Mr. BORDEN. Two sums of $500 each was set apart for two harbors—Baxter's Harbor and Pickets Harbor, and the engineer had recommended the expenditure, having visited the localities, but after the election, as soon as the change of Government took place, I was informed that the grant had been cancelled. Now, I think there is a case in point. Those expenditures were justifiable and they should have been carried out. But it seems because there was a change of Government, because my constituents happened to elect me opposed to the present Administration, they were to be punished by striking out these grants. At that time I called the attention of the hon. Minister to the fact, not the present hon. Minister, but the member for Cumberland, but he gave me very little satisfaction. In the early part of this Session I sent a petition to the present hon. Minister and addressed a letter to him, calling his attention to Baxter's Harbor but could get no satisfaction. I have not received even an acknowledgment of the receipt of that petition. I have made similar applications for other places in my county, but without avail. Now, my constituency is paying a very much larger amount into the revenue to-day than under the previous Administration, because taxation is higher. I think it is not fair or in the public interest, and not contemplated by our system of Government, that we should be entirely cut off from public grants because I oppose the Ministry of the day. The Ministry will find that pursuing a course of that kind will not bring about what they might desire—a change of sentiment in that constituency. I will simply call the attention of the Minister further to two applications I made the other day for surveys in that county, and I respectfully ask him to grant them during the coming summer. They will not cost much and I think it would be in the public interest to have them made.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman's petition has not received any acknowledgment it must have been an oversight of my Department, because as a rule all letters and documents are immediately acknowledged.

Mr. BORDEN. I never received any.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry; the hon. gentleman may be sure it is not intentional. I remember receiving two letters last week, when I gave orders to acknowledge them. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has received the acknowledgment.

Mr. BORDEN. Not yet.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is a great pressure of business in that Department, but he may be sure they will be acknowledged and considered by myself as soon as I can do so.

Mr. BORDEN. Favorably?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will do my best, but I am now so busy in Committees all morning that I cannot spend more than ten minutes in my office every day. Then we remain in this House a little late. As to the principle of these votes, the hon. gentleman must see he is entirely mistaken if he thinks we make distinctions in favor or against a county, according to its representation. Just a minute ago we passed a vote for Moncton, which I do not think sends a member to this side of the House. It was the same thing with regard to West Hastings.

Mr. BORDEN. Is the pier at Annapolis to be a public pier? Will there be a Dominion official appointed to take charge of it, and will other vessels that come into that port besides this particular line of steamers be allowed the use of it? Also, will it be used in the public interest and not simply in the interest of this particular steamship company?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It will be a public pier for the public in general, and I suppose it will be under the same regulations as other piers in the Dominion.

Mr. ANGLIN. This is the introduction of a very important innovation, the policy of the Government in regard to public piers and harbors. Hitherto, so far as I know, all Governments have acted on the policy of only voting public money for the erection of harbors of refuge and for breakwaters to make them safe, but they have always refused to spend public money in providing accommodation within the harbor for the benefit of trade and commerce. Hitherto, in my own county, when I have been asked to apply for aid for piers of this kind, I have replied that it was contrary to the policy of the Government to appropriate public money for the accommodation of trade and commerce within a harbor.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is a special case. There is here a line of steamers that is doing a great deal towards encouraging trade. This county has expended a large sum of money. I was there last summer, and they have changed the appearance of the place altogether. The other day a steamer sailed from Annapolis carrying 9,000 barrels of apples and 400 barrels of herring, and another steamer was to sail shortly after.

Mr. KILLAM. The hon. member for Gloucester is right in saying that this raises an entirely new principle in the construction of piers by the Government. Now, this is a splendid wharf and it suits the purposes of the Company exactly. It furnishes facilities to the counties on the Windsor and Annapolis Railway to ship their productions easily and cheaply. However, the real question is, whether it is the business of the Government to build the pier in a particular harbor to accommodate a certain business. The Canadian Steamship Company was incorporated last year, and everybody wished it success. They intended at that time to purchase or build steamships and run a line. Up to this time they have not done so, but they have chartered a number of steamers and have carried on, I believe, a successful trade. But the point is, whether the Government are justified in establishing a precedent which will enable them hereafter to assist any other harbors along the shore where it is necessary to have an outlet. For this reason I moved for returns concerning this pier early in the Session. I have the returns and I am quite satisfied the representations to the Government made by the individuals concerned are perfectly correct. They are no doubt patriotic individuals who are working for the country and making their own fortunes at the same time. The principle still remains to be decided whether it is in the public interest to build a pier of that sort in a particular harbor, as the hon. the Minister of Public Works says, to recoup the Company for the expenditure they have incurred, and thus serve a private company at the public expense. I have no objection to the expenditure, but let it be under certain restrictions. The hon. gentleman must remember that in consequence of this vote other places will be asking for similar favors, and no doubt will be getting them under some future regime.

Mr. HADDOW. Two years ago a petition came to the Government from a district called Charlo, in my county, asking the hon. Minister to build a pier in that neighborhood. I called upon the hon. Minister and he gave me to understand the terms on which they would build such works were that the people in the locality would be required to contribute half the sum necessary for the construction. He told me that was the principle upon which they were building one in Bonaventure county, just opposite the county of Restigouche and on the other side of the bay. Last year I put the question to the hon. Minister and found that nothing was granted to us. In the county opposite, on the north side, two wharves have been made during the last year, and surveys have been made for five wharves altogether in that county, while in my county there has only been one survey made, which the hon. Minister ordered two years ago, but no money has been granted. Charlo is a station on the Intercolonial Railway, and while it would be an accommodation to the people in that neighborhood it would be an equal or greater accommodation to the people of Bonaventure, and I think the hon. Minister will find in his Department a petition from the people of Bonaventure asking that this wharf should be built at Charlo for their accommodation also. It is a matter worthy of the consideration of the hon. Minister of Railways, as well as of the hon. Minister of Public Works, to have a pier at that place which would, as I have shown, accommodate the people of two or three counties. There are also two other stations, New Mills and Jacquet River, on the Intercolonial in Restigouche, fronting on the Baie des Chaleurs, at which it is desirable in the interests of the railways and the public, to have piers erected. The distance across the Bay is but a very few miles, and the residents in Carleton, Maria, New Richmond and New Carlisle find it very inconvenient to cross the Bay in their boats to ship and receive supplies by the railway. The Minister explained to my hon. friend that the Government makes no distinction in favor of or against a county according to its representative. Bonaventure county, on the opposite side of the Bay, whose representative supports the Government, has had grants for three wharves and five surveys, while my county has had only one survey and no money granted, although it was surveyed two years ago. People can draw their own inferences from these facts.

Mr. ANGLIN. It is important to promote trade between the two sides of the Bay, and this could be largely promoted by establishing small piers at some points.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The item would be creating a very strange precedent, as I understand the wharf belongs to a private company.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I took care that when payment was made to the Company the wharf should not be an exclusive one for the Company but for the benefit of the country at large.

Mr. LONGLEY. I am very glad to find there seems an almost unanimous feeling in favor of the grant, and I am well assured the Minister has fully satisfied himself that the Company is deserving of it. In addition to the wharf it has nearly a mile of substantial railway, and the expenditure up to a certain period is $30,442. The wharf in question has been thrown open to the public already. An iron steamer belonging to another line has already loaded there, and two vessels could have been loaded if the wharf had been prepared in time. Yesterday I read a telegram to the effect that a steamer is loading 9,000 barrels of apples for the English market. The trade which is likely to be opened out through the instrumentality of the Acadia Steamship Company will be worth thousands of dollars to the western part of the Province.

110. Harbors and Rivers, N.B. $49,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $35,000 was placed in the Estimates for a breakwater at Negro Point, which has cost since 1874 $280,000. At Port Hood there is to be a breakwater on the western side of the harbor, 300 feet in length and twenty feet in width, at a total cost of $15,000.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to call the attention of the Minister to a work at Anderson's Hollow, in my county, to which I called attention two sessions ago. The former Government made an expenditure, and the work was commenced of building a harbor of refuge. I would like to have a further amount voted, but I notice there is nothing in the Estimates.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. My attention had not been called to the matter.

Mr. ANGLIN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he intends to go on with the Charlo Harbor work.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Supplementary Estimates not having been approved in Council, I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). I would like to enquire with regard to the work at Oromocto, and to ask if it would be gone on with. Certain recommendations were made by the Chief Engineer for the improvement of the River St. John at that point by the erection of another breakwater to deepen the channel.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When the plans were shown to me last year, I found that the breakwater had not been constructed according to the plan, that it leaked very much. I ordered the necessary repairs to be made, but I must say I have not been able to recommend to my colleagues the construction of any large pier on the other side of the river in order to still further confine the current and give greater depth of water.

112. Harbors and Rivers, Quebec..... $137,000

Mr. Fiset. Before this sum of $137,000 is voted, I hope that the hon. Minister of Public Works will allow me to ask him if of the item of $10,000 set aside for repairs and improvements of ports and rivers in the Province of Quebec, a portion is to be applied to the improvement of the harbors and breakwaters in the county of Rimouski? I speak of this particular item, because in the preceding items I do not see any sum set aside for the county of Rimouski, which I have the honor to represent. The hon. Minister knows as well as I do that the harbor of Matane needs improving, and that the works, begun under the late Administration, are insufficient for the general wants of navigation. The breakwater at Rivière Blanche, although of great service, such as it is, cannot be considered complete until it has been connected with the mainland. The quay at Rimouski requires to have its height increased and to be widened; in its present state, especially since rails have been laid on it, to allow the running of cars on it, it does not meet the requirements of trade. I may also mention Bic Harbor, so favored by nature, and which requires but slight improvements to become the safest harbor of the south shore of the St. Lawrence. The hon. Minister will therefore greatly oblige me if he will let me know whether he intends to apply a portion of that item to the improvements which I have mentioned, and concerning which petitions have, at different times, been forwarded.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. With regard to the quay at Rimouski, I have to state that it is not under my control. The hon. Minister of Railways, under whose control it is, and to whom I spoke about it some time ago, seemed to me to think that the quay was sufficient for the requirements of the railway. With regard to the quay at Matane and the one at Rivière Blanche, I will ask the hon. member not to press for an answer. I have received petitions from these two places, which are now being taken into consideration by the Council. When the Supplementary Estimates are presented, I am certain that if the hon. member sees an item allotted to these works he will be content; in the contrary case, I shall be glad to explain the reason why.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

In reply to Mr. KILLAM and Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT, Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The vote of $20,000 for harbor of refuge at Nicolet is a continuation of the vote of last year. There will still be required between $35,000 and $39,000 to complete the works, which will cost altogether between $55,000 and $59,000. The work at Yamaska will cost about $55,000 altogether, and about $7,000 more will be required to complete it. We are building a lock and a dam there. At Three Rivers, $25,000 is asked to deepen the river and remove boulders, so that large ocean vessels may have sufficient space to swing round. The vote of $1,000 for Philipsburgh Harbor is for the construction of a pier, of which the locality will furnish the same amount. The total cost of the work will be about $19,000.

113. Harbors and Rivers, Ontario..... $159,000

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We are progressing with the works in the Cobourg Harbor. We had difficulties with the contractor, and had to take the work off his hands. We have had very unsatisfactory contractors there.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Did the hon. gentleman pay the workmen?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When the contractor failed we took possession of the plant and there was a drawback and a deposit of money in our hands, and we used as much of that as was safe in paying the workmen and persons who had furnished them with materials and supplies. The Government may have had a deficiency of $500 or $700 to do this.

Mr. BROWN. I think the item for Belleville, $5,000, is not sufficient for the work. The work was not completed, and the dredge is there now. A very little more would complete it, and clear the west side of the harbor of earth and debris, so it would be of great advantage to have it completed now, as it would cost less than at any other time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The $5,000 has not been expended altogether there.

Mr. BROWN. Not quite.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. My idea was, after the 1st of July, should the amount not be quite sufficient and should $500 or $600 be required, to take it out of the general vote for the work. I did not think it worth while asking a special vote.

Mr. TROW. What is the expenditure on Toronto Harbor for?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This vote of $12,500 was set down before Captain Eade's report came in, for the dredging of the harbor. But since I have recommended an additional amount, which will be made known to the Committee by a Message soon. It will take a little time to complete the harbor work. I will give explanations when the messages are received.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What about Goderich, —is the vote for repairs or for new works.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. To complete the works contracted for by the lowest tenderer; to make repairs; to dredge the shoal at the entrance, and open the mouth of the Maitland River; and construct crib-work on its north side. We shall have cribwork built on the north side of the Maitland to catch the sand, make a new beach and relieve the Maitland. With regard to Wireton, a railroad has been built to it, and Government intend to build a pier in connection with the railway, which will complete the works. This $35,000 will be our contribution and sufficient.

No. 114. Harbor and river expenses Manitoba.. $13,000

Mr. TROW. Are the Government in a position to dredge the mouth of Red River.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have set down a larger sum to induce some contractor to put a dredge on that river, on account of the amount before not being sufficient. There may be some cribwork to be constructed to close some of the mouths of the river and throw all the water into one course to scour the entrance.

No. 115. North West Territories Rivers..... $20,000

Mr. TROW. Will the hon. gentleman explain this item?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We had so many works in hand last Session that we could not attend to the Saskatchewan. But an engineer is going to that river this season to remove boulders and set dams.

Mr. TROW. The principle obstruction will be at the junction of the North and South Saskatchewan, at Coal Flats.

Mr. ANGLIN. When may we expect the dredges to commence operations. The hon. gentleman, I believe, made some promises.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. My promises were very few. They only amounted to this, that I would consider the matter, see whether it could be done, and submit it to my colleagues. Otherwise I would be binding my colleagues.

Mr. KING. Is it the intention of the Government to do anything in Grand Lake or Washademaak the coming season?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not call my attention to Grand Lake before; this is the first time I heard of it.

Mr. KING. I hope, when the hon. gentleman does come down, he will favor us with a visit. Application was made for a dredge at McMahon's Cove two years ago, and received a reply that a survey would be made. Nothing has been done since. Very great difficulties are experienced at certain seasons of the year in consequence of the shoals at McMahon's Cove and Janiseg. I hope the hon. gentleman will look into the matter, and have the channels dredged.

Mr. KILLAM. I think we ought to have some general explanation of the operation of the dredges during the coming season. I would like also to call attention to some localities which required dredging and have been neglected since the hon. gentleman came into power. At Yarmouth and Pubnico dredging requires to be done. In Pubnico, a large harbor and settlement composed of people of the hon. gentleman's nationality, some consideration should be paid to its wants. One of the dredges should be sent there to enable the people on the west side to get a better approach to the place where they have to bring their vessels up and land their fish.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN read a statement of the different places where the dredges were employed.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). The New Dominion was not at work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. She was laid up for repairs. She will be in repair to work this season.

Mr. BURPEE. Last year she was to be employed at a port in Sunbury.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is true, but she was out of repair.

Mr. BURPEE. She was sent to another place, and if I am not mistaken, the hon. Minister of Public Works himself gave orders that she be sent to Marble Cove.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I remember that. I was visiting the place myself and a deputation waited upon me. The deputation wanted to dredge the channel to get to the public landing, and the people said they had been waiting several years to get it done, but the Minister of Public Works had not been able to visit them. I thought their request was a reasonable one and accordingly ordered the dredge to be there the next day, and the work so performed was a public benefit.

Mr. BURPEE. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman state that he was entirely impartial in the expenditure of public money, and I felt quite indignant when some of his supporters meanly said that no public work should be undertaken in any county that did not support the hon. gentleman. I was fully aware at the time that they were misrepresenting the hon. gentleman. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman dredging this Marble Cove, which is a private place, but I would remark that he leaves uncared for the river St. John, where many vessels pass every day and have to unload their cargoes to get over a shoal. I think I have some reason to complain of that. Then with reference to the point of which the hon. member for Queens has spoken, in reference to the shipping of coal. It is an important point. At a certain period in the year it is impossible for boats carrying coal to get up to the wharf and the coal has to be shipped in scows. Although this is in the county of Queens, some of my constituents are much interested in these desired improvements, as there are coal mines in the county of Snabury, and it would be a great relief to them if this dredge could be sent there for a few days.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am very sorry that any of our supporters should have circulated statements that caused so much indignation to the hon. gentleman. I hope they will never do it again. As to the Oromocto shoals the hon. gentleman must remember that we have expended a large sum of money there already, and there was no complaint about them when I was there last summer. However, this matter will be looked into again. The hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in supposing that the Government will construct public works in whatever county the public interest may require them, whether the county supports the Government or not.

Resolutions ordered to be reported: and (at 4 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 20th April.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the third reading of Bill (No. 144) to authorize the construction on certain conditions of the Canadian Pacific Railway through some other pass than the Yellow Head Pass.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think the hon. gentleman should insert a proviso in the Bill that a change shall only be sanctioned upon obtaining grades equal to those upon the Yellow Head Pass route.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say to the hon. gentleman that I think that would be fatal to the Bill. I do not expect it will be possible to obtain grades equally favorable to those of the Yellow Head Pass.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am sure the hon. gentleman sees the extreme disadvantage of having such high grades as he mentioned. It would be no advantage to the Company in the running of the road. It seems to me it would be far better to take a route seventy-nine miles longer and have easier grades.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I entirely concur with the hon. gentleman that every foot that is added to the grade is extremely objectionable. Of course, it will become a matter for the most careful consideration of the Government if they find a practicable pass there, to go thoroughly into the question of grades obtainable, and how far we would be justified in increasing somewhat the severity of the grade in order to obtain the important object of shortening the distance. That matter will, of course, receive the most careful consideration, but I think it would not be right to put it in the Bill because it is not in the least degree probable that we shall get a grade equally favorable to that of the Yellow Head Pass. I fully entertain, however, the principle the hon. gentleman has laid down as to the desirability of having easy grades.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I will not put the hon. gentleman to the trouble of dividing upon the question, and as this conversation will be reported I shall ask it to be passed on a division, because, as far as I am concerned, I am entirely opposed to the Bill.

Bill read the third time and passed.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT FOR IRELAND.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BLAKE. It was understood that the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan) had some motion to make upon the House being asked to go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I beg leave to move an amendment to the motion now made by the hon. the Minister of Finance, that this House do now go into Committee of Supply. Before placing that motion in your hands, it is my duty to trespass upon the time of the House in order to explain the reasons why I invite the attention of the House to the subject of the motion which I intend to move. At an early period of this Session my attention was called to this subject. I was consulted by friends who sympathize with our fellow-countrymen who are suffering in Ireland, and who have been, for a long series of years past, seeking relief from what they consider the unsatisfactory system of Government under which they now live. I felt, Mr. Speaker, that this was a question, the introduction of which into this Parliament was of very great importance. I felt that to invite the consideration of this Parliament, and to ask this Parliament to express an opinion, was to ask it to take a very serious step. I have given the question all the consideration that I could, with a desire to discharge my duty faithfully towards my fellow-countrymen, and also towards the people of Canada. When I was approached on the subject, I stated at once that, so far as I was personally concerned, I would not hesitate at any time to undertake the duty of moving a resolution similar to the one of which I gave notice some time ago, in favor of reform in Ireland; but I would much prefer that the proposal should come from the people outside the House, and not be made subject to the mere desires or opinions of any individual members of this House. After a very short period I received such indications as led me to believe that a very large portion of the people of this country would view with very deep satisfaction a movement of this kind in order to obtain from Parliament an expression of opinion on this very grave subject. Believing that I was fully justified in undertaking the discharge of this important duty I at once took the steps necessary in order to bring it about; not only did I take the steps necessary to bring about the moving of the resolution, but also to secure the harmonious adoption of the principle by this House. I feel that to invite the House of Commons of Canada to express an opinion, to ask anything that the representatives of the people here in Parliament assembled might consider unreasonable, would be not to advance the interests of those whose case I seek to advocate, and in whose favor I ask an expression of the House. In consultation with friends, it was decided that in regard to the form of the resolution which should be moved in Parliament it would be well to consult those hon. members who might be expected more particularly to sympathize with us on that question. Those gentlemen from both Houses, the Senate as well as this House, were invited to attend a meeting to take the subject into consideration. A meeting was held and the subject discussed. A special Committee was formed at that meeting with a view of preparing resolutions which might cover the ground as expressed by resolution passed in the different cities and towns in Canada. I am glad to say that that duty was performed without any great difficulty; that those gentlemen gave their assistance cheerfully, and that there was on the part of those who did attend and took part in the work, an earnest and honest desire to frame such a resolution as the Parliament of Canada might be asked to adopt. The gentlemen present were equally anxious with myself that the sympathy of Parliament should be enlisted with the people of Ireland, and I am sure they felt they would not be justified in the discharge of the duty they owed to Canada to ask the Canadian Parliament or its members to pronounce in favor of a resolution which might be inconsistent with the position this Parliament occupies towards the Mother Country. I felt from the first that perhaps no motion which was brought before Parliament would obtain more real sympathy from the members than a motion of this kind. It would be well, perhaps, at this stage of my speech to say that after several drafts of resolutions had been prepared and submitted, after they had been carefully considered, many changes were made, all with a view of avoiding difficulties which we knew we had to contend against. When the resolutions of which a copy stands on the notice paper, had been before the House for some time, when hon. members had become familiar with the terms of those resolutions, I had occasion to feel my way among hon. members on both sides. I may say that I did not make a particular canvass, I did not make an individual canvass, either of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House or on this side; I trusted to the honesty of the cause, I trusted to the resolutions themselves, I trusted to the history of Ireland and its government, I trusted to the sense of fair-play and justice which every man representing a Canadian constituency must feel and be influenced by, and it is in full confidence of the existence of that sentiment that I introduce the resolutions to-day, and ask for them the sympathy and support of hon. members of this House. But I found that even though all our caution and tact were used in framing the resolutions so as to avoid objectionable features, they were still objected to by some hon. members on both sides of the House; therefore it is that in moving the resolutions to-day I hope the House will not be surprised if the wording of the resolutions has been modified, not interfering, however, with the principles involved, from that which I gave notice I would move. In moving these resolutions I cannot call it a difficult duty I have to perform, because I can say it sincerely and honestly that the difficulty appeared trifling to me. The importance of the duty I have to discharge, the conviction I entertain of the right I have to discharge that duty, are sufficient justification for my rising in this Parliament and taking advantage of the position I now hold and have for some time held, to move resolutions which I believe every fair-minded man in this country admit to be unobjectionable and unassailable. It is because I feel in the Canadian Parliament, where the liberties and rights of the people are so safe and so well secured—it is because I believe in the Canadian Parliament that we have rights and liberties not enjoyed by the people in Ireland, that I think the people here, feeling and enjoying those blessings, having had experience of a wise Government, and a wise system of government, will readily extend their sympathies to those less fortunate in that respect. I believe the force of the old maxim will be admitted by hon. members of this House, and they will be willing to do to others as they would wish to be done by. I am satisfied there is a feeling in the House, and it is shared by the people of this country, that Ireland stands alone among countries; where hardship has existed, where harsh treatment has been used towards its people, where we in Canada and this Government under which we live—the British Government—have not been foremost in expressing not only a sentiment of sympathy in favor of oppressed people in all parts of the globe, but in taking active steps to carry relief to those people; and it will be hard to convince me that, in the opinion of any public man or intelligent man, Ireland alone should remain mis-governed and have no hope of a better state of things. It will not be my place to attack the policy of different Governments that have ruled Ireland in times past; it will not be my place to show to what an extent the mis-government of that country has been carried. I might create a hostile feeling if I were to attack the Government of any particular party; but I say this, without fear of contradiction, that I need not make any accusation against any Government, in order to establish that point, but I need only quote the opinions of leading Ministers themselves, to prove that it has been admitted by all parties that Ireland has not been wisely and well governed. We find recently that on Mr. Forster visiting Ireland; he was the first, on meeting with the people of Ireland, to declare that they were mis-governed, that they were rendered unhappy by mis-government, and that he would do every thing he could to give them that good government which they had not had before, and he trusted that they would be as happy and prosperous as the people of England were. These, Sir, are admissions which prove, beyond a doubt, that there is a necessity for some change in Ireland, and in the resolutions I shall ask this House to express its sympathy in favor of some measure of self-government for Ireland. I hope I will not be accused of interfering with the rights of the British Parliament. I hope I will not be accused of attacking the policy of that Government because I move in this direction, authorized by the leader of the Government of the day and by his public expression when he announced that the time had come when the self-government of Ireland was a debatable question. It being admitted by the leader of the Government that it is a debatable subject, that is one reason why we, to-day, ought to feel that we have a right to approach it. That is one of the reasons why we offer the long experience we have had as a people of self-government and the happy results of it, should respectfully represent that a like system in Ireland would produce a like favorable result in that country. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that a great change has come over the public mind, and that that change is going on from day to day, and that the time is not far distant when men will not say it is too soon to grant this reform, and the wonder will be that it has not been granted many years ago. We all admit that the question of governing Ireland is a very difficult one, that there are difficulties almost insurmountable; but it appears to me, Mr. Speaker, and I think it appears to the majority of reasonable men in Canada, that if some experiment were made in the way of extending to the people of Ireland a system by which they could legislate for their own local wants, leaving Imperial matters to the Imperial Parliament, that would find the solution of that difficulty that has puzzled them for so many years. There is, Mr. Speaker, another point to which I may be allowed to allude. I know how difficult and dangerous it is to deal with questions sometimes, which, either in the past or present or possibly in the future, might give rise to discussions of a religious character. Sir, there is no one in the Dominion of Canada who would regret the expression of any word in this debate that would tend to wound the feelings or excite the hostility of any special body of people in the country more than I. I intend, Sir, to make some few allusions, and in the allusions it will not be to decry the minority of our countrymen in Ireland, but to disabuse the mind of some who cling to the fear, more often expressed in the past than the present—but I trust these expressions will disappear in the future—that if Home Rule were granted to Ireland, the minority would suffer persecution at the hands of the majority. At this day that fear is not entertained by a large number of people either in Ireland or out of it. I would be sorry to think, and I have no reason to believe, that there was ground for that fear. The facts of history are all against it. Many men who have laid down their lives and have sacrificed liberty and all they held dear for the rights which they believed Ireland ought to have, many influential men who have ranked among the greatest of Irish patriots have been those who were not Roman Catholics. I will not, however, rely upon my own views or ask you to consider what may be my own opinion upon this important question, but I will quote the words used by a man who was not a Roman Catholic, of a Protestant who took a very active part in the politics of Ireland, and who did a great deal to remove the prejudices that existed in that country, and to secure harmony between the different elements of the people. Sir, I allude to the expressions made use of by Mr. Butt, a prominent man in the history of Ireland:

“Immediately on the fall of the Irish Church, he saw what was coming in Ireland. He knew the feelings—the fears, the hopes, the questionings—that surged in the breasts of his fellow Protestants. He determined to use the great power which now rested with him in an endeavor to close forever the era of revolt and bloodshed; to unite in the common work of patriotism Irishmen long divided by class and creed distinctions, and to establish between Ireland and England a union of friendship and justice which might defy the shocks of time. At this Bilton Hotel Conference he listened long to the utterances of his fellow-Protestants, many of them the familiar associates of his college days. He marked their fears, their apprehensions that the Fenians and the Romanists would be content with nothing less than separation. He rose to his feet and spoke with great earnestness. ‘It is we—it is our inaction, our desertion of the people and the country, the abdication of our position and duties—that have cast these men into the eddies and whirlpools of rebellion.’ He said: ‘If you are but ready to lead them by constitutional courses to their legitimate national rights they are ready to follow you. Trust me, we have all grievously wronged the Irish Catholics, priests and laymen. As for the men whom mis-government has driven into revolt, I say for them that if they cannot aid you they will not throw out your experiment. Arise! behold! have faith; have confidence and you will save Ireland; not Ireland only, but England also.’”

He concluded by proposing:

“That it is the opinion of this meeting, that the true remedy for the evils of Ireland is the establishment of an Irish Parliament, with full control over our domestic affairs. The chairman put the resolution to the meeting, ‘As many as are of opinion that this resolution do pass say, ‘Aye.’ A shout of ‘Aye’ rang through the room. ‘The contrary will say, ‘No.’ Not a dissentient voice was heard. Then every one, greatly astonished, burst into a cheer; the first heard that evening, so grave, and earnest, and almost solemn had been the tone of the deliberations.”

“That was the birth of the Irish Home Rule movement.”

This expression of such sentiments as this must do much to pacify conflicting passion and to bring about in Ireland that state of harmony and good feeling without which, good government is impossible in any country. Doubts have been expressed whether it would be expedient, even if it were possible to give to Ireland a system of self-government. I have been asked during the present Session, since this question came before the attention of the House, what guarantee, what reason had I to believe that if Ireland had Home Rule, it would be more prosperous than it is at present. Well, I will not take up the time of the House, by dwelling upon details, I will not give my own opinion, but what may be accepted as facts by this House. In order that the House may judge whether a system of self-government for Ireland would prove beneficial to the Irish people, I will give them the true record of the past, when the Irish people possessed the rights which they want to have once more :

"Self-government had not been an idle toy, but an efficient weapon in the hands of Ireland. After 1782 her commerce was extended, her manufactures fostered, wages rose, and the value of land increased. The bankers and merchants of Dublin, naturally a cautious and conservative class, declared in petitions against the Union, that the prosperity of the Kingdom had wonderfully grown under the care of a native Parliament. But statistics spoke with more stringent force. During the period of parliamentary independence, when the use of tea increased 45 per cent. in England, it increased 84 per cent. in Ireland; the use of wine increased in England 22 per cent. in Ireland 75 per cent.; coffee increased in England 79 per cent., in Ireland 600 per cent.; and so of the other taxable articles, the consumption of which measures the rise of prosperity. After the Union the proportions were reversed; in some cases, notwithstanding the growth of population, an actual decrease of consumption followed the loss of independence."

Sir, at the same time, we all know, the population of Ireland was much larger than it is now. We have been told that the true remedy for the evils of Ireland is to find an outlet for the population, to tell the people to pack up their traps, and come and find a home on this continent. But, Sir, where a national dissatisfaction exists, this is no remedy. If there is any people on the face of the earth who love their own land, who are attached to the soil on which they were born and brought up, it is the Irish people; and to tell them that their liberties are to be fettered, that their system of government is more stringent and oppressive than any other system of government in the world, and still tell them that the only hope for them is to pull up stakes and come to our North-West or the north-west of the neighboring republic, is to add insult to injury. Sir, I would like to see any of our people come and take up their homes amongst us: I would like to see those who leave Ireland come and settle in our North-West, where I know, by their industry and toil, they would soon become independent, happy and prosperous, establishing comfortable homes for themselves, and contributing to the prosperity of Canada in which they would become citizens. But still I do not think that is really a true and generous way of meeting the grievances of the Irish people. I had hoped for a better feeling; and if there is any people in the world whom I would like to see exhibit that better feeling, it is the Canadian people; if there is any people in the world who ought to prize the rights and liberties they enjoy, it is the people of Canada, who are living under a form of the most perfect self-government in the world. Sir, I will not appeal to the warm sentiments which might arise in the breast of every man in this Parliament, by asking him what he would do in the same circumstances; but I will ask them, when the wire flashes accounts of outrages in Ireland across the Atlantic, not to be hasty in their judgments; I will ask them not to be too severe against the Irish people. I will go half-way and tell them that I blush at some of the crimes committed in Ireland; I will tell them that the great body of the Irish people condemn any indefensible acts perpetrated in Ireland as strongly as any people in the world condemn them. We are told also that these agitators are responsible for all these acts. Sir, I take a very different ground. It is my solemn conviction that if the leaders who are imprisoned in Ireland to-day were still at liberty to use what they believe to be constitutional means to advocate the cause they have at heart, there would be more order among the people than there is to-day. I believe that the fact that the outrages, of which the telegraph wires tell us from day to day—though I believe they have been exaggerated in many cases—have not been more numerous, is largely attributable to the fact that the men who are imprisoned from the time they first headed this movement to the time they were imprisoned, confined themselves to constitutional means of agitation. On this point, I admit there is a difference of opinion. There are many who claim that Parnell and his associates did use means that were not constitutional; but even to these men I will say, will you criticise with so much nicety and so much severity men who are striving and struggling to bring about reform, men who are seeking the redress of grievances that have been endured century after century? Sir, I think it would be only fair to say that the Government themselves are responsible for a great deal that has taken place in Ireland. I do not ask the members of this House to hold the Government of that country responsible; but in asking the House, in judging of the merits of this question, not to be too severe in their estimation of the men at the head of this movement, I may use this argument in order to show that a good deal of consideration ought to be allowed for the circumstances of these men who are found battling for what they call their rights in Ireland, and for what are generally conceded to be their rights. We, Mr. Speaker, are not the only people who are influenced by a desire for Home Rule. The very proposition itself, independent of the claims of the Irish people or the Scotch people, is on the face of it one that ought to be well considered by the people of Canada. Our own experience of the system of government we live under shows us, and many able writers are beginning to express the same view, that the time must soon come when the system of legislation in England must be changed. Suppose that, to-morrow, the House of Commons, in England, were relieved of that portion of legislation which might fairly be distributed among the different portions of the Empire; it would certainly be in a better position. We can imagine the difficulty we would labor under in this country, if we had to legislate for all the Provinces in this Dominion; and, how much more difficult it must be for the House of Commons, in England, to legislate for the whole country, on subjects which, in this country, are settled by the municipal council. Sir, we find that the people of Scotland are also awake to the idea of a measure of self-government. I am aware that many who have admitted the necessity of self-government for Ireland, believe that it would be a prelude to separation from England. I think that the majority of Irishmen, who have suffered in their own country and fought for it, are not open to such a suspicion. But, while Irishmen have suffered, more than any other portion of the Empire, I say that they have not been behind any other element that constitutes the British Empire, in the defence of the country, and in building up that power, of which Englishmen, to-day, are so proud. I do not, for this reason, think that Irishmen have a right to ask what is unreasonable, unconstitutional, or what is inconsistent to the rights, liberties and freedom of their neighbors; but they have a right to ask the same measure of freedom and liberty freely conceded to other elements in the Empire. My own opinion is that the more you relax the bonds which now fetter Ireland, the more strongly you bind her to England. I believe, and will appeal to the experience of hon. members in this House and to that of the old Provinces of Canada, as well as the experiences of those other Provinces now constituting the Dominion, which did not always enjoy that measure of freedom and responsible government that we are now so proud of, to say if the concessions that have been made to these Provinces by the Imperial Government have weakened the tie between them and the Mother Country? I say no. Nothing has tended more to strengthen that feeling of loyalty and attachment to the Mother Country now prevailing than the fact that she was willing to extend to this country those liberties which every free man has a right to expect. The same results would follow concessions to Ireland. You can make Ireland faithful. Irishmen have been as faithful as Englishmen in every great battle and in every great undertaking for adding glory and lustre to the British flag. If you deal with Irishmen as with other intelligent beings—if you admit that they are created by the same God, and are entitled to the same rights as other men, and give them a measure of self-government—give them the rights that every man has a right to expect, you will find them, like Canadians, loyal and true, ready and willing to support that Empire which would shelter and not crush them. I think that argument is one that will shortly disappear. I am satisfied it has no great force. I am not one of those who generally feel angry at expressions that I may consider declared by prejudice to my country or creed. I entertain a very different feeling when any such attack is made. I experience a sense of pain rather than anger—a sense of pain to know that any fellow man who should treat me as a brother, should refuse to concede to me the same rights and liberties that I would concede to him. And I am a firm believer in that broad principle that actuates every right thinking man, in every country, that we are all necessary to one another, and that we cannot do too much to discharge the duties we owe each other, and that every thing we can do to promote the harmony and well-being of that society of which we are all component parts, we should do, to discharge our duty as fellow citizens. I might turn to the pages of history, and suit the ear and taste of any man in this audience by selecting different authors to show the cruelty and oppression that has been dealt out to the people of Ireland under the land system that exists and has existed for centuries. But I will not undertake that. I do not appear here to-day with the view of making a brilliant and effective speech. I think hon. gentlemen who have sat in this House for fifteen years will acquit me of any vanity of that kind. I have never troubled the House except when I felt it my duty to speak, and then I have felt how weak I was and how far short I fell in discharging the duty I desired. But my only desire is, if I can in my humble way, with my humble abilities, state my case in such a way as it may recommend itself to the hon. members of this House, and enlist the aid of those of our friends who are more eloquent, to give me the benefit of their eloquence. Should I succeed, I shall feel that I have discharged my duty in a humble manner. I will not read the reports or call the attention of the House to facts and pictures which members have often seen respecting the harsh and cruel tragedies often enacted in Ireland, in the turning out of their little huts, or if you will call them homes, men and women who have in them reared their families and earned their humble livelihood. In many cases it is a painful and dreary livelihood they have earned; but the places wear the sacred character of home, and if you could go with me in imagination and see the landlord with his bailiffs and police turn out from those little huts an aged father or grandfather, on his dying bed, to leave him on the roadside to die without shelter and without covering, your deepest feelings of pity would be stirred. This is no fancy, but a true picture, and one of the results of the land system against which the people of Ireland have long cried aloud. I will say what has been often said of the Irish people, that neither poverty nor oppression could beat them down nor crush out those feelings of nationality by which they have been so long animated. They feel they have the rights; but it has taken a long time to convince their rulers that a better and wiser policy should be adopted towards them. Let me give you the words of a British statesman, spoken in the House of Commons, with reference to landlordism in Ireland:

“Sir Robert Peel had a general horror of exterminating landlords, though he had not adequate courage to restrain them by law. A few years later, speaking in Parliament of the extermination in Clare, he said: ‘I must say, I do not think the records of any country, civilized or barbarous, ever presented such a statement as that which has been presented to the House in a letter by Mr. Kennedy. This gentleman—an officer, I believe, in Her Majesty’s service—I presume of unquestionable veracity, states this fact, that in one union, at a time of famine, within one year 1,500 persons have been driven from their homes; and that within the last month, 1,200 more persons have had their houses levelled to the ground. I know not, Sir, if it be possible for the law to apply a remedy to that system, but in the House of Commons, at least, it provokes the expression of our deepest indignation.’”

I would like to call the attention of the House to the opinion of a Protestant writer, who has written an extended history of the difficulties in Ireland, on this question. With regard to the cry raised in Ireland to divide and separate the Irish people, he says:

“The dread that the Catholics would usurp all the power of the State were concessions made to them is a phantom. No such danger exists. An increase of their power is much more to be apprehended from a continuance of their restraints. Their accumulation of numbers alone must in time render them formidable; but, before that period arrives the voice of wisdom will be heard, and we shall then see in what consists our danger. How often was it repeated in the House of Commons, during the discussions on the slave trade, that the suppression of the slave trade, that the suppression of that detestable traffic, would sign the death warrant of the few white inhabitants in our West Indian Islands? Events have falsified the predictions. And are not the negro slaves as tractable and obedient as before that memorable Act, which has shown them that the British Legislature is alive to humanity and justice? If the prophecies of interested men, respecting the West Indian negroes, have been falsified by events, is there not the same reason to believe that the pretended dread, that the Roman Catholics, if admitted to a full enjoyment of their rights, would seek an undue superiority over the Protestants, and in their turn become the oppressors, is entirely void of foundation.”

In moving this resolution at this stage of the Session, to trespass one moment longer on the patience of the House than I might be justified in doing, would, I think, be committing a great mistake. I know, perhaps, how disappointed many of my friends may feel. I know what those hon. gentlemen who sympathize with me in this movement may think, that I might have done more in the discharge of my duty in introducing these resolutions. But if I am deficient in those qualities which constitute an able applicant in introducing a measure to the attention of an intelligent body like this, it is my fault, and it is their misfortune. But I hope that any deficiency in the arguments I have tried to use in the feeble manner I have introduced these resolutions, may be supplied by the good will of those hon. gentlemen with whom I have sat so long, though I am far from asking that they should decide as a mere question of sympathy with myself or my friends. No; I ask them to decide on this question on higher considerations, but I ask them to give me any favor in the discharge of my duty, which this sympathy will prompt. I mention this, because, in moving my resolutions, as I am forced to do at a time when, if the ordinary rules of debate were strictly applied, I would not be allowed to move it. I feel that I am under an obligation to the House and knowing the anxiety of hon. members to get through with the labors of a long Session, I will bring my remarks, at present, to a close, and ask their indulgence for a few words at the close of the debate. I thank the House for the attention they have given my remarks, and beg to move the following resolutions:—

That an humble Address be presented to the Queen’s Most Excellent Majesty, in the following words:—

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, desire most earnestly, in our own name, and on behalf of the people whom we represent, to renew the expression of our unswerving loyalty and devotion to Your Majesty’s person and Government.

1. We have observed, may it please Your Majesty, with feelings of profound regret and concern, the distress and discontent which have prevailed for some time among Your Majesty’s subjects in Ireland.

2. We would respectfully represent to Your Majesty that your Irish subjects in the Dominion of Canada are among the most loyal, most prosperous, and most contented of Your Majesty’s subjects.

3. We would further respectfully represent to Your Majesty that the Dominion of Canada, while offering the greatest advantages and attractions for those of our fellow-subjects who may desire to make their homes amongst us, does not receive that proportion of emigrants from Ireland which might reasonably be expected, and that this is due, in a great measure, in the case of many of our Irish fellow-subjects who have sought foreign homes, to their feelings of estrangement towards the Imperial Government.

4. We would further most respectfully represent to Your Majesty, that in the interests of this, your loyal Dominion and of the entire Empire, it is extremely to be desired that Your Majesty may not be deprived in the development of Your Majesty's possessions on this continent of the valuable aid of those of Your Majesty's Irish subjects who may feel disposed to leave their native land to seek more prosperous homes.

5. We desire respectfully to suggest to Your Majesty, that Canada and its inhabitants have prospered exceedingly under a Federal system, allowing to each Province of the Dominion considerable powers of self-government, and would venture to express a hope that if consistent with the integrity and well being of the Empire, and if the rights and status of the minority are fully protected and secured, sure means may be found of meeting the expressed desire of so many of Your Irish subjects in that regard, so that Ireland may become a source of strength to Your Majesty's Empire, and that Your Majesty's Irish subjects at home and abroad may feel the same pride in the greatness of Your Majesty's Empire, the same veneration for the justice of Your Majesty's rule, and the same devotion to, and affection for, our common flag, as are now felt by all classes of Your Majesty's loyal subjects in this Dominion.

6. We would further express a hope that the time has come when Your Majesty's clemency may without injury to the interests of the United Kingdom be extended to those persons, who are now imprisoned in Ireland charged with political offences only, and the inestimable blessing of personal liberty restored to them.

We pray that the blessings of Your Majesty's Reign may, for Your people's sake, be long continued.

Mr. BLAKE. If no other hon. member proposes to address the House on the subject, I do not, for my part, feel disposed to give a silent vote upon it. It is now two years ago since, in the course of a very important discussion here, I ventured to suggest in my place in Parliament that the accession to power which had then recently taken place of the Liberal Administration in England, would lead very shortly to the concession of some measure of Home Rule to the Irish people. I believed, as I said, that such a solution as could be obtained of the land question, such a solution as had been from time to time reached of other questions, would, after all, not settle the Irish question, and that unless the dictates of prudence and of justice alike were observed and fulfilled by the granting of some measure of control over their local affairs, we would see that which has been the disgrace and the humiliation of the British Empire for many years still continued. I also observed, as the hon. gentleman in his speech and in his motion has observed, that we had one amongst many material interests here, in Canada, in the solution of that question, in the change which might be expected from it in the attitude of the great bulk of the Irish people towards the Empire, that we had a material—although I regard that as a much lesser interest than the interest which has been mainly discussed—we had a material interest of a serious character with reference to the chances and the opportunity of immigration to our soil so long as the present state of feeling continued. Now, I propose to justify the attitude which I took upon that occasion and which did not then meet with any very animated response in the House or in the country; I propose to justify it by a reference to some obvious historical facts which it appears to me can lead to only one inevitable conclusion. In order that we may understand the grounds upon which, as I conceive, some action in this direction is demonstrably necessary, it is by no means needful to go further back than to the time of the Union. It is not needful here to recur in detail to the more ancient events in connection with Irish history, to the history of the conquest, to the history of the confiscations, to the history of the proscriptions, to the history of the penal laws, directed at one time against Protestants, and at one time against Catholics, to the history of these penal laws of the most serious and terrible description, laws and events to which I have briefly alluded, but which ought to make us all, when we recur to them, blush with shame, and which had left the marks of human error and of human crime almost indelible, and enhancing, there can be no doubt, even to-day, the difficulties of the situation. I say it is needless for the purposes of this discussion that we should revert to them in detail, for I am willing that this question should be tried not upon the history of the past eighty years, but upon the history of the government of Ireland under the present constitution of the United Kingdom. That history begins with the Union Act—an Act secured, as you all know, by means of the basest corruption. However beneficial the public men who carried that measure may have believed it to be, I do not suppose it will be urged to day that the end justified the means, and I have myself a strong belief that the nefarious means by which that measure was carried, operated very largely to increase the difficulties of its working and produced a state of feeling which gave it a poor chance of being satisfactory to the people of the country which was by such means brought into more intimate connection with the Empire. But, Sir, since that period, for a little more than eighty years has Ireland been managed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom and I do not hesitate to say that the result of that management has been a dreadful failure. There has been time enough to try the question out. Eighty years in the history of a country, and such eighty years as Ireland has experienced, is surely time enough to try the question out. Now, let us apply some obvious, plain and palpable tests as to whether there has been a good and successful administration of Irish affairs under the existing system. The population of Ireland in 1726 was 2,300,000, in 1805 it was 5,400,000, and that increase, more than doubling, occurred during a time of difficulty, of religious proscription and of emigration. In 1841, the population had abnormally increased under circumstances which it is not necessary to discuss, but it had increased to the number of 8,200,000. But since 1841 the history of Ireland has been a history of periodical distress, of famine and of emigration, and the result is that the population, which at the time I have stated stood at 8,200,000, stands to-day at 5,160,000 only, or 235,000 less than eighty years ago at the time of the Union, and 3,000,000 less than it was forty years ago. In the last thirty years, from 1851 to 1881, there has been an emigration from that country of no less than 2,750,000. Now, it may be said that Ireland is over-crowded. I deny that Ireland, as a whole, is over-crowded. There are parts of Ireland in which the distribution of the population is probably too dense; but I maintain that, judging by all the tests which we can reasonably apply to it, Ireland, as a country, is not an over-crowded country. The number of inhabitants to the square mile in France is 180; Italy, 225; Belgium, 421; Flanders, 718; England and Wales, 442; in the whole of Great Britain, 333; in Ireland, 161. The acreage of Ireland is 20,325,000 acres, of which there is at present arable 13,465,000 acres and an additional acreage easily made available for tillage of 4,000,000 acres more, making a total of land actually arable and available for tillage of 17,465,000 acres. How many acres are cultivated at this time—only 5,200,000; and this is the case with respect to a country of which the soil is indubitably very fertile, which has raised in times past enormous crops, comparing favorably in past times with crops at the same time raised in England, of wheat, rye, barley, peas, beans, potatoes and turnips, and no one doubts the capacity of Ireland for raising cattle. It has very great advantages. It has great quantities of bog land from which is produced a very cheap fuel, and which lands when reclaimed are inferior to none in the world whether as wheat or as pasture land. It has splendid coal fields, although these are hardly used at all. It has magnificent, perhaps unequalled fisheries in regard to the quantities of fish caught and harbor and other facilities in connection with the industry. It is possessed of valuable mines of gypsum, gold, silver, lead, copper and zinc. It has, besides, great facilities for manufacturing both as regards facilities for the transport of manufactured goods, for the supply of raw material, and for the cheapness of the labor to be employed. It has, moreover, great water power, encouraging the manufacture of the raw material into the perfected article. It has a people confessedly very free from crime of the ordinary kind; a people which, whatever their prospects and chances and capacities may have been demonstrated to be in their own country, have shown in every other country than Ireland, that they possess the capacity to rise, and, by their industry, their ability and their force of character to take their own place in the world, wherever their lot may be cast. They are also a people confessedly affectionate, and grateful; and possessing, in a large degree, the organ of veneration, are easily impressed by any act of kindness shown towards them. With such a people, with such a soil, with such natural advantages, how does it come that we have such a result, with respect to population, as I have mentioned? How does it come to pass that the population of Ireland should have diminished instead of increased, that the emigration should have been so great, and that the condition of the country should be such as we know it to be? The whole is due to the chronically wretched state of Ireland—its miseries, social, material and political. That is the reason why. Although there may be, although there has been, as we all rejoice to know, some improvement in the physical condition of some portion of the population during the last few years, this is to-day a pressing question, and no man holds that the condition of Ireland is satisfactory when viewed in those aspects to which I have referred. The condition of the people materially, in this as well as in other respects, is one which ought to create in all of us who call ourselves British subjects a feeling of shame. I say that the condition of Ireland to-day is due largely to the want of security and contentment, to the want of identification with the soil and attachment to the Constitution, to the want of hope of improvement and of bettering their condition, which is really the most essential thing to induce men to labor. I say that it is due to a feeling that their grievances are not redressed, to the lack of a feeling that their Government is conducted according to their needs and wishes, and to the lack of any machinery for the management of their local affairs. There can be no doubt that Ireland, at and before the time of Union, was subject to some great political grievances. There can be no doubt that those grievances were not of a sentimental character, but were such as to a large extent are to-day, acknowledged to be grievances which demand the attention of legislators, and should be redressed by legislation. If you go back over the history of the parliamentary government of Ireland for the last eighty years, and if you begin your enquiry by a reference to those great and important land marks or grievances, and should enquire as to the time when, and the circumstances under which, those grievances have been, so far as they have been, redressed, you will find a very good reason there, if you sought no further, for a deep-seated and justifiable dissatisfaction in the parliamentary government of Ireland, by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. There was the question—at that time as much a question of justice and of right as it was at any later time—of Roman Catholic emancipation. There was the question—at that time as much a question of justice and of right as at any later time—the disestablishment of the nominal church of the minority. There was the question—at that time as much a question of what was called here the lamentable question, but still in the condition of the country none the less a pressing question—of a proper measure for the relief of the poor, required because of the unnatural conditions that ruled distribution. There was a question of reform of the land laws, by the creation of proper interest in the soil by those who occupied the soil. There was the question of creating local institutions to manage local affairs, and rendered very important because of the abrogation of the rights of the Parliament of Ireland and the transfer to Westminster of the management of those minute affairs which, up to that time, was under the control of the Legislature which sat in the capital city of Ireland. These leading questions, to which I have referred, have been in part—all but the last one, and that one has never been substantially dealt with—disposed of, and it may be asked, since such is the fact, why do I refer to them. I refer to them, because I see that the circumstances under which, and the time under which, those questions were dealt with, demonstrate more clearly than anything else can do, the unsatisfactory character of the Government of Ireland by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. When was the question of Roman Catholic emancipation dealt with? It was not dealt with until nearly thirty years after the time of the Union. Thirty years is about a generation, and it required about a generation for the Parliament of the United Kingdom to nerve itself to the task of dealing with that question. And how was it then granted? Was it granted them as the boon of a cheerful giver? No, Sir. It was granted grudgingly and of necessity. It was granted, avowedly granted by the Ministry because they were forced to do it, not because it was just, because they had been proclaiming to the ends of the earth that it was not just. Not because it was right, because they had been proclaiming that it was wrong. It was granted, because, as they themselves stated in Parliament, the question was between granting that concession and civil war. The condition of things had come to that pass that there was to be an immediate outbreak, a civil war, unless Roman Catholic emancipation was granted. Well, Sir, did that do good? Of course, you could not remove, even under such circumstances, a monstrous injustice of that description without some good being done; but I say the good was minimized by the delay which took place, and the attitude which was assumed by those who received and by those who gave that Act. The Irish people were taught that dreadful lesson, so far as the Administration of the Parliament of the United Kingdom could teach them it, that England's difficulty was Ireland's opportunity. They were taught this by the delay, and by the disposition with which those Ministers acceded to the grant. They were taught not to rely upon that constitutional agitation which is the proud basis of our system, and which every one is free to engage in, but upon other and worse methods of accomplishing by unconstitutional revolt. I say that no doubt something was done by the removal, even under those circumstances, of that great blemish, yet nothing was done towards relieving, or conciliating the feeling of the Irish people, towards leading them to believe that they had a right to expect from the unconstrained sense of justice of the British Parliament the relief which they had a right to have; or towards obtaining those golden fruits which might have been reaped from a great act of justice cheerfully performed, in sufficient season. The next great measures of relief for Ireland—and I am dealing now only with remedial legislation—I am dealing with those measures to which the English Parliament may point with the greatest pride as marks of its parliamentary government with reference to Ireland—the next great measures of remedial legislation occurred, how long after? Nearly twenty years after. It was not until nearly twenty years had elapsed that we had the measure for the relief of the poor to which I have referred, followed shortly by, and intended at the time to be followed as soon as possible by an Act for the sale of encumbered estates. The years, 1846 and 1849, are, I think, the years in which those two measures were passed; one fully twenty years after, the Emancipation Bill, and the other a few years earlier. These Acts, as I have said, were not of a late date, they were not the offspring of fresh institutions lately developed. They were the approach by the English Parliament, the Parliament of the United Kingdom, to dealing with old difficulties, and how again was it that they were brought about? How was it, that the public opinion of the British people and the opinion of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, was aroused to action, such action as was then taken in these two particulars? Sir, it was not the hand of the insurgent upon that occasion, it was not the hand of the agitator, so much as the hand of famine and of pestilence. It was not until the direst calamity which has beset the modern Christian world came upon us, and until a famine took place in which more human lives were lost than in all the wars with which England has reddened the soil of Europe or the world, it was not until that had happened, that the public opinion to which the House referred was sufficiently aroused to deal with this question. Such was the unhappy condition of Ireland, and the measure passed for the relief of the poor was a great boon to them. The Encumbered Estates Act, too, was greatly needed. It was hoped, however, that that Act would have had an indirect effect very beneficial to the tenants, but that hope failed. The condition of the tenants as a whole from the practical operation of the Act was not mitigated, because it happened that the sales of many of the lands that were sold under the Encumbered Estates Act were made to persons entirely new to the country, and who, in a great many instances, were wholly neglectful of and defiant of those customary—I cannot call them rights—but those customary favors which were granted by the former proprietors to the tenants, and the system of rack-renting and the other difficulties which might naturally be expected to grow from such an unnatural system as existed, were aggravated and intensified by the new proprietary; and so it happened that the demand for the tenant right became more—pressing as it was before—became still more pressing by reason of the practical operation of the Encumbered Estates Act. Well, Sir, about twenty years more elapsed before the next great remedial measure for Ireland was carried through the British Parliament. It was, I think, in 1868 the law for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church was passed, nearly fifty years after the Union took place. Now, who can pretend that that act of justice was not as much an act of justice at the time of the Union as it was at the date it became law. The principle on which the disestablishment was carried is immutable, eternal, and the question had been raised, as we all know, generations before. Public men in advance of public opinion of the United Kingdom and of Parliament—intelligent men, statesmen, had raised it, had pointed out that it was impossible that that establishment could be defended and maintained—had proposed that an act of justice should be performed, but it was utterly impossible to make progress in that direction. An old, old grievance, a grievance so old as to be almost out of date, a grievance of the most pressing character—how, I ask, was redress to that grievance obtained? Now, Sir, I shall give you an authentic account of how it came that Parliament and the people of the United Kingdom decided to remove that ancient grievance. I shall give you the account which the author of that great measure for Ireland himself gave in 1878 in the Midlothian campaign. These are the words Mr. Gladstone used in explaining how it came about that the Irish Church was in 1868 disestablished and disendowed:

“Down to the year 1865, and the dissolution of that year, the whole question of the Irish Church was dead. Nobody cared for it. Nobody paid any attention to it in England.

Mr. BLAKE.

“That is the nobody in England and Scotland, not the nobody in Ireland, nobody paid any attention to it in England. Then circumstances occurred which drew the attention of the people to the Irish Church. I said myself, in 1865, and I believe that it was out of the range of practical politics, that is the politics of the coming elections.”

Now, what was it that brought it within the range of practical politics; what was it made it possible to carry that measure of reform? Some new events, some new chain of reasoning that led to conviction on the part of the people that it was a just measure? I will read you what it was:

“When it came to this, that a great jail in the heart of the metropolis was broken open under circumstances which drew the attention of the English people to the State of Ireland; and when in Manchester policemen were murdered in the execution of their duty, at once the whole country became alive to Irish questions, and the question of the Irish Church revived. It came within the range of practical politics.”

That is the reason in this great measure of legislation by which the people and politicians of the United Kingdom were led to the belief that the question was within the range of practical politics, and led to see what was their duty to the people of Ireland. Once again there was the same moving cause to the remedy. Once again there was the same long heart-breaking delay, and once again English and Scotch opinion would not act until compelled to do so. Once again, therefore, there was no need of grace in the measure so obtained. It was forced from the British Parliament, and was so acknowledged, and therefore if it did remove the grievance it did not—as timely and cheerful legislation would have done, as any consideration of justice would have done—contain the element of grace and did not excite a feeling of gratitude in the hearts of those to whom the benefit was granted. Sir, that measure was a great measure in two distinct aspects. First of all it destroyed the pre-eminence of the church of the minority. It removed a crying injustice; it changed a condition which had combined the religion of the majority with their patriotism, a patriotism which, so long as it was the policy of the Parliament and people of the United Kingdom to maintain the church of the minority, was necessarily an anti-national patriotism. Besides that, there was the material gain that Irish funds to the amount of many millions were set free for legitimate and proper Irish purposes, not denominational, not sectarian, not for the minority, not for the majority, but for the whole people. Besides all this, the practical results of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, it had the indirect effect hardly less important. It was the first effective measure for giving to the occupiers of the Irish soil a great and tangible interest in the soil, and for increasing the number of Irish proprietors. The just provision which gave to the tenants, on church lands the pre-emption right to purchase those lands on moderate terms, a very small sum being payable down, and the residue being spread over instalments for thirty-two years, compounding principle and interest at a low rate, which made the annual payment not materially more than the accustomed rent, gave the tenants of church lands an opportunity of which they gladly availed themselves of becoming the owners of the lands they occupied. And thus it added no less than 5,000 to the number of Irish proprietors of the soil. With our notions, having regard to the figures I have given as to the population, you may say that 5,000 Irish proprietors is a trifle. What is the use of saying so much about 5,000 Irish proprietors? I admit that it is a drop in the bucket, but then the bucket had very little more than a drop in it at the time. The total number of Irish proprietors at that time was but 16,000; so that this measure in its operation added no less than 5,000, or very nearly one-third, to the number of Irish proprietors, and a measure which has such an effect cannot but be regarded as a very important measure of relief. Now, Sir, Ireland is a country of small agricultural holdings, and in considering this question, we must not forget that circumstance. There are in Ireland no less than 533,000 distinct farm tenancies, of which no less than 450,000 are under 50 acres, and no less than 50,000 more are between 50 and 100 acres, showing that the great bulk are under fifty acres, and no less than 500,000 out of the total 533,000 are under 100 acres. Although there are exceptions, as we know, principally in one of the provinces of Ireland, but also in the case of many estates scattered through other parts of that country, yet the bulk of those 533,000 holdings are yearly, and they are yearly in a country in which the custom has been that the tenant shall make the improvements, a custom which is wholly incompatible with the conditions of yearly tenancy. Now, Sir, while that is the number of Irish farm tenancies, let us see to what extent the ownership of farm lands prevails. In Ireland, one in every 257 persons, owns farm lands, while in France one in every eight persons owns farm lands; in central and northern Europe, the tenure of land is widely diffused; and while we have seen a very gradual growth and a very imperfect development, in the continental countries of Europe, of the principles of popular and responsible government—while in that regard they are far behind the United Kingdom, yet we have seen, since the days of the French revolution and the Napoleonic age, large advances made—much larger advances than have been ever dreamed of in England towards diffusion of the tenure of land, and the abolition of that most objectionable portion of the feudal system. In the Rhine Provinces, including Westphalia, there are 11,000,000 acres of cultivable land—and how many proprietors? 1,157,000 proprietors, or one to every ten acres of land; and if you read the history of the contentment and comfort, the work and labor, the energy and industry—the indomitable industry—that is displayed in many of these countries by the proprietors of these small areas, you must be convinced that the only thing that enables the Government of these countries to be carried on at all, burdened as they are with enormous expenses, with an imperfect development of constitutional government, with great military armaments, and with an oppressive system of conscription and military service—the only thing that gives the people heart and hope, and enables them to struggle on at all, is that wide diffusion of the ownership of land than which there is nothing better calculated to promote the stability of the people, to whom the land belongs. Take the State of New York, in which there are 22,200,000 acres of farm lands, and in which the holdings are large, as is natural in a new country, where there is so much land undisposed of as there is on this continent. There the owners of the land, in 1870, were 216,000, against 21,000 in Ireland, including the owners of church lands. Look at two portions of Ireland, which may be selected as examples: take the agricultural counties of West Meath and Cavan, which comprise 1,360,000 acres, and in which there are 612 owners of less than 50 acres in that whole district; in the counties of Galway and Mayo there are 2,760,000 acres, and there are only 225 owners of less than 50 acres. The number of small owners is insignificant in England, but that number is computed to be about ten times as large in proportion as the number is in Ireland, and that in a country of which I believe the greatest practical blemish to-day is its own land laws. I believe there can be no doubt that the greatest blemish in England and Scotland to-day is the condition of the ownership of land; but even there that difficulty was diminished relatively to the condition of things in Ireland. Now, Sir, there can be no doubt that the old penal laws, which among other relics of barbarity prohibited for a long time Roman Catholics either from owning or inheriting lands, had much to do with the creation of the present state of things as to the landholding in Ireland, and that state of things being once created and marked deeply upon the country, it became of course proportionately difficult to obliterate it. The result was a practical serfdom; the people who cultivated the lands were only left with enough to subsist on in a miserable manner. All concede that there were many landlords in Ireland who granted proper leases, and behaved with propriety towards their tenantry; yet in the main, the practical result was that the whole profit of the lands, with the exception of a poor, miserable subsistence to the tenant who worked them, went to the landlord, and also that where improvements were made, an early opportunity was taken to increase the rental of the lands to the extent to which they had become capable of producing, by virtue of the improvements which the tenant and his family had made. This was a state of things which of course did not merely diminish, but destroyed, that hope of bettering himself, which is the spur by which you can expect men to rise, and under the influence of which you can expect happiness and contentment to be diffused. The first or one of the earliest writers on the subject of land holding—Young, I think—says: "Give a man but nine years' lease of a garden, and he will turn it into a desert; give him a freehold of the naked rock, and he will turn it into a garden;" and I believe that not untruly represents the relative condition of things between the short holder under the customs that prevail in Ireland, and the proprietor. Now that situation would have been bad enough, if the rents so exacted from the tenantry were rents in any proper sense of the term; but the whole produce of the soil goes, not to enable the unfortunate people to clothe themselves, but to live in rags, not to feed themselves, but to keep starvation from them, and above that, the whole of the produce of the soil is taken by landlords who do not live in the country, because a certain measure of improvement and prosperity would necessarily have arisen from the expenditure on the soil by those enormous rents. But to make a condition miserable enough, God knows without it, still more miserable, the bulk of those who received these rents were absentee landlords; and so it happened that, speaking once again in the main, not merely a fair share and increment of the production of the soil, but the whole produce of the soil of Ireland, with but wretched livings for those who raised it, went away from Ireland—was rather a tribute paid by Ireland to foreign countries, than legitimately applied within the land itself, and which would have occasioned the development of trade and manufactures, which would have given more employment, agriculturally as well as otherwise, and produced some mitigating circumstances at any rate to relieve the darkness of the picture to which I have referred. I say it happened there was luxury for the absentee landlords, misery for the resident tenant, as the rule, and that in a country of which it has been said, not I believe rhetorically, but in sober truth, that if you wiped out the tenant's improvements you would convert nine-tenths of Ireland into a desert again. I have said enough to show that the question of the land is at the core of the Irish question, and to show how great was the importance of any measure, such as the Irish Church Act, which should have tended even in a moderate degree to unite the diverse interests of the occupant and of the land he occupied, and to create a land proprietary in Ireland. That measure was followed within a year or two by the Land Act of 1870, an Act which was, no doubt, a useful Act, and which was, probably, in effect, I have no doubt, quite as strong and sweeping a measure as the public opinion to whom I have referred, and the people of the United Kingdom would suffer to be passed at that day, but which in consequence of that public opinion not being sufficiently appreciative of the situation, was far behind what the necessities of the situation called for, and both the Church and Land Act were brought about, not from a sense of the need of either or both measures—were brought within the domain of practical politics, not because interested or selfish landlords or wealthy tenants had come to the conclusion, from some new turn of reasoning, that the condition of Ireland was one of injustice that required amelioration, but because a great gaol in the heart of London was broken open, and some policemen in Manchester were killed. That it was this that aroused England's attention to Irish affairs and rendered possible those measures of reform is beyond doubt, and again the same fatal error, and again justice and measures of propriety and prudence too long delayed, and again those lessons taught the Irish people, has borne for so many years such fatal fruits which as those to which Mr. Gladstone referred. That Land Act was useful in its way but it was not wide enough; the land clauses most hopeful in theory, which struck largely at the root of the question, turned out in practice not so useful as the land clauses with reference to the Irish Church owing to difference of condition. The truth was that in other respects the land laws of Ireland, as of England and Scotland were grievously defective, and the expense of a voluntary transfer of land in small parcels was almost prohibitory. The search for titles, and copies and conveyances and conveyancing itself were such that whatever price you might fix for those moderate portions of land, which were the utmost aspiration of the occupant would in many cases fail to meet the expenses of conveyancing. That was one difficulty with which legislation was unable to grapple. There was another, in the want of sympathy on the part of the Treasury and other departments of the Government with those classes which savoured a little too much, in the then public opinion of the country, with a feeling of interfering with the sacred property in land—which looked a little too much towards a denial of the divine right of landlordism, which looked a little too much like a practical recognition of the motto that property has its duties as well as its rights, and it so happened in practice that there were but 160 sales a year on the average, or a total of 800, by the last return I have been able to obtain under the provisions of the land clauses of the Act of 1870. So, therefore, you will observe that the Act was wholly defective as a remedy for the evils complained of, and, which by experience, was proved to be wholly inadequate. Then, in 1880, the last Land Act was passed, under continual pressure, under similar pressure increased and aggravated by events; a great measure, but in itself not likely to settle the great question. I will not discuss the complicated details of that measure; but I will say that a measure which is based upon the ground and founded upon the reason upon which that measure depends, and which makes no provision at all for dealing with cases of arrears of rents—cannot be regarded as a final or satisfactory measure, if there were no other defect. If you look at the history of the ills which preceded that measure, and at the circumstances of the country, as stated by others, you will see that such a measure must be to a large extent wholly inadequate and entirely beyond practical application towards many, or most of the grievous cases that can be supposed to exist under it, unless it deals with arrears. The most grievous cases will be those of parties unable to pay their rents. However, no one can doubt but that that measure was an immense active relief—that it was a measure that gave more than was expected by many, or thought possible to be obtained from the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and nobody can doubt that it was obtained also from Parliament only by continued difficulties. The state of Ireland, as it had been, was becoming more aggravated still. Things were growing worse and worse before the adoption of the last remedial measure, and the conviction at length impressed itself on the United Kingdom that something more must be done to remedy those evils. But the same fatal errors which attended the agitation for the introduction of the previous remedial measures, attended this. It came so late that a large portion of the benefit, so far as feeling was concerned, and so far as the conviction that Ireland could depend on the justice of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, that there was any prospects of an ending to their sufferings, that this last remedial measure had wholly lost its grace. I say it is as plain as the day that true statesmanship pointed to earlier action, to action under other and different circumstances when a measure, even less thorough going than this one, would have produced an amelioration in the condition and temper of the people of this country, much greater than could be expected from the measure brought in and carried at the time, and under the circumstances and under the pressure which attended its being carried. That is the record of eighty years of remedial legislation for Ireland. These are the important landmarks of the acts for the remedy of wrongs, and the delay of justice that have distinguished British legislation in the past eighty years. There are others, no doubt, subsidiary acts; it did not take quite so long—I forget whether more than a couple of Parliaments—to induce the Parliament of the United Kingdom to pass a Sunday closing Act, which was demanded by the unanimous voice of the Irish population, and was applicable to them only, but which did not agree with the sentiments of the British publican, and which, therefore, it was thought wrong to give to the Irish people. But, it came at last, and minor measures of this description have come to Ireland from time to time, but the large and important measures of statesmanship which had agitated the public mind are those to which I have referred, and which have been accomplished only after the delays and under the circumstances I have briefly stated. Can anybody wonder then that there should have grown up early, and that there should continue with an ever increasing volume and urgency, a cry for a measure of Home Rule. Put the question to ourselves. If we had been for eighty years in the position that these people have been in for that time; if we had to agitate for one generation for one measure of justice, for three-quarters of a generation for the next measure, and two-thirds of a generation for the third; if as each of these measures had been obtained, it was due not to the recognition of the justness of our cause, but to the recognition of the danger of further delay, what would have been our feelings and how earnestly we would have demanded some portion of control over our affairs. But there is a darker side to the picture than that. While remedies were refused, force was at the same time constantly applied. While you have the miserable record of remedial Acts to which I have referred, you have the record of Arms Acts, Coercion Acts, Restraint of the Press Acts, Suspension of Habeas Corpus Acts, and all those legislative means of coercing the people passed from time to time with the utmost freedom by the same Parliament which was denying and delaying what is now admitted to have been only justice to the people. I do not mean to say that the conduct of the Irish people—a large portion of it—under these circumstances was justifiable. Far from it, I do not mean to say that it might not have been necessary sometimes to pass these Acts. True friends of Ireland have, from time to time, concurred in their passage, but I do mean to say that the condition of things lasting for eighty years, with such a record on its brighter side of remedial legislation and such a record on its darker side of coercive legislation, is a record that proves that the experiment of Local Government for Ireland by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, has been a disastrous failure. Besides, legislative coercion, there were other methods of coercion employed. There is an army under the guise of a constabulary, of 12,000 or 13,000 of, I suppose, the best troops in the world, the Irish Constabulary, and we have had from time to time large portions of the military forces of the Empire quartered in Ireland. From time to time not less than 50,000 men—I believe to-day not less than 50,000 men of the British army are stationed in Ireland to keep the people down, and large detachments of the British fleet frequent Irish harbors for the same purpose. Whether right or wrong in this controversy it cannot be contended that the Government of Ireland for eighty years has been a Government by constitutional means, but it must be admitted that it is a Government by force. That is the large result of the whole business. Now it is acknowledged—as the hon. member for Victoria has said—freely and frankly acknowledged—that Ireland was being misgoverned all these years. What a humiliating condition is that which the mother of Parliaments, the mother of constitutional freedom throughout the world, occupies on this question. Which of us did not feel with a pang of humiliation the keen shaft of the satirist, who forged, so to speak, the letter from the Sultan of Turkey, not long since calling, in response to some calls that had been made in England on him to remedy some grievances of his subjects, on the British Government to remedy the condition of the Irish people. Who did not feel that such a letter might have been fairly written, that such a complaint might have been fairly made, and that the argument sometimes urged in this House of tu quoque might have been fairly used. Of these resolutions it is needless to speak. No doubt Ireland is largely in a state of anarchy, ruled as far as the Kingdom is concerned, mainly by force, mainly by, so far as a large portion of the people is concerned, an organization without and beyond the control of the law, and I mention that it is the delays which have taken place in their passage and the circumstances under which these measures of pressing justice and importance have been at length gradual, which are responsible for the distressed condition of that country. There were, for these delays, two reasons: Reformers, and I do not use the word in a party sense, or as defining wholesale the Reform party of England, as compared with the Conservative party, though I might so use it—but still there have been honorable exceptions in the Conservative party—Reformers, in the larger sense of the term, have from time to time pressed upon the public and upon Parliament, long before these reforms were granted, their justice and necessity; but the great body of public opinion was unquestionably hostile to Ireland. By a Parliament of the United Kingdom, in which the opinion of the majority must rule—it was impossible, under the constitutional system, that that justice or expediency, by which the majority were not alive, could be pushed forward. I believe that long ago many of these measures would have been carried by far-sighted statesmen, except that they felt it was impossible to carry them, except that they were, as Mr. Gladstone has put it, beyond the realm of practical politics, because the aristocratic, the large land holding interest, the Conservative interest, and many other interests were entirely too strong to enable the relatively small band of advanced Reformers free to carry them at all. In a word the public opinion of the United Kingdom did not recognize the importance of it, and was not sufficiently advanced to discharge the duties of efficiently managing Irish affairs. The second difficulty was the want of time. Parliament was overweighed with its concerns, it had to deal with large imperial concerns it had to deal with local concerns which were supposed to be more pressing, and it was unequal to its task. We know that for a great many years Parliament has been unequal to its task in that regard. We know that measures have been brought in by strong Governments Session after Session and have been just crushed out by the pressure of other affairs, have not been reached. It takes years as a rule before that which is deemed sufficiently ripe for legislation to be actually brought into Parliament by a Government on its responsibility, can reach that stage of discussion, unless there be some extraordinary reason of urgency such as lately attended the discussion of the Irish question. It has so happened that men have been too apt to say with reference to the large questions to which I have referred, and which have been settled: "Oh, that question is not yet within the range of practical politics," just as Mr. Gladstone said on the Irish question in 1865, and so they say of these questions until gunpowder, murder, assassination explosions, a condition of chronic disaffection breaking out in some particular manner, brings them to the conclusion forthwith that the question is within the range of practical politics and has got to be dealt with. Now, I say that even if Parliament could now take up what it ought long ago to have taken up, we might hope it would be dealt with, but it also was dealt with so late as to obviate all chance of its settlement being concurrent with a resolution of better feeling between the people of the two countries, and thus it is that I am brought to the conclusion that it is the duty of every man who entertains a strong feeling for the Empire, who entertains a feeling of pride in its glories and of shame in its failures and its faults, to do what he can in his sphere towards pressing forward this Irish question to a solution while there yet be time. Now, so long ago as 1878 the statesman to whom I referred a while ago, Mr. Gladstone, spoke in this manner, prior to the General Election which took place at that time:

"In the matter of Local Government there may be a solution of some national and even Imperial difficulties. * * * If you ask me what I think of Home Rule I must tell you that I will only answer you when you tell me how Home Rule is related to Local Government. I am friendly to Local Government, I am friendly to large local privileges and power, and desire, I may almost say, I intensely desire to see Parliament relieved of some portion of its duties. I see the efficiency of Parliament interfered with, not only by obstruction from Irish members, but even more grossly by the enormous weight which is placed upon the time and minds of those whom you have sent to represent you. We have got an overweighed Parliament, and if Ireland or any other portion of the country is desirous and able to arrange its affairs, that by taking the local part or part of its transactions off the hands of Parliament, it can liberate and strengthen Parliament for Imperial concerns, I say I will not only accord a reluctant assent, but I will give a generous support to any such scheme.

"One limit, gentlemen, one limit only, I know to the extension of colonial Government, it is this, nothing can be done in my opinion by any wise statesman or right-minded Briton to weaken the authority of the Imperial Parliament. Because the Imperial Parliament must be Imperial in the three Kingdoms, nothing that creates a doubt upon that supremacy can be tolerated by any intelligent and patriotic man. But subject to that limitation if we can make arrangements under which Ireland, Scotland, Wales and a portion of England, can deal with questions of local and special interest to themselves more effectually than Parliament now can, that, I say, will be the attainment of a great national good. The Scotch members who always show in Parliament—I must say, speaking of them as an average, and perhaps it is all the more true because the majority of them are Liberal—who always show in the transaction of Scotch business remarkable shrewdness and efficiency, yet all find cause to complain and complain seriously and gravely, that they cannot get the Scotch business properly transacted.

"The Parliament is over-weighted. The Parliament is almost overwhelmed. If we could take off its shoulders that superfluous weight by the constitution of secondary and subordinate authorities. I am not going to be frightened out of a wise measure of this kind by being told that I am condescending to the prejudices of the Home Rulers. I will condescend to no such prejudices. I will consent to give to Ireland upon principle nothing that is not upon equal terms offered to Scotland and to the different portions of the United Kingdom. But I say that the man who starts to devise a machinery by which some portion of the excessive and impossible task, now laid upon the House of Commons, shall be shifted to the more free and therefore more efficient hands of secondary and local authority will confer a blessing upon this country, that will entitle him to be ranked among the prominent benefactors of the land."

I think Sir, having regard to that speech, I was justified in hailing the accession to power of the Liberal party, as I did in the year 1880, as giving an omen of some measure of redress for Ireland in this particular. But Sir, another speech was delivered by that same statesman, under the responsibility of office, in the Imperial House of Commons, not very long ago, in which he once again recurred to this subject and said:

"We attach great value," said Mr. Gladstone, "to the extension, perhaps I should say to the establishment—(hear, hear)—of the principles of Local Government in Ireland. We believe that one of the great evils under which Ireland labors is the want of local administration, and a more central system of authority. We believe that the state of Ireland never can be satisfactory until its people have acquired and learned by tradition and practice to exercise those powers of Local Government which were so beneficial in other portions of the Empire. Moreover, we believe that where the Irish people had the opportunity within a limited range of giving proof of their powers and qualities and capabilities for Local Government, as they have done under the Poor Law Acts and through some other channels, they have administered well. Indeed, no one can doubt that, or their perfect capacity for such a duty. But this is speaking on the question of purely local administration. The motion of my honorable friend embraces matters of wider scope. I wish to point out to those honorable gentlemen that neither they, nor so far as I know Mr. Butt before them, nor so far as I know Mr. O'Connell before him, ever distinctly explained in an intelligent and practical form the manner in which the real knot of this question was to be untied. The principle on which they profess to proceed is that purely Irish matters are to be dealt with by a purely Irish authority, Imperial matters to be left to the Imperial authority of a Chamber in which Ireland is to be represented. But they have not told us by what authority it is to be determined which matters taken one by one are Irish, and which matters are Imperial. Until they lay before the House a plan in which they go to the very bottom of the question, and give us to understand in what manner that division is to be accomplished, the practical consideration of this subject cannot really be arrived at, and I know not how any effective judgment upon it can be pronounced. I am well convinced that neither this Parliament nor any other House of Commons will at any time assent to any measure by which the one paramount centre of authority necessary for holding together in perfect unanimity and compactness this great Empire can possibly be in the slightest degree impaired. (Ministerial and Opposition cheers.) We are entitled and bound to ask a clear and explicit explanation as to the mode in which that vital matter is to be determined. Who is to say what purposes are Imperial? Who is to determine the circumscription within which the Irish authority is to have a final voice? Quotations have been made in reference to the positions of other countries—for example, Finland in relation to Russia. But this affords no practical illustration of the matter. It would be just as rational for those gentlemen to quote the case of the Channel Islands. With regard to the Isle of Man, we have sometimes interfered in the matter of Custom duties, but not in my recollection have we interfered in the legislation of the Channel Islands. We have left it entirely to their own authority, and we have not felt any inconvenience flow from that arrangement. Thus while some development is given to the principle of Local Government without any practical inconvenience, I think the case of Finland and Russia is not different from the case presented by England and the Channel Islands. The case of Austria and Hungary has also been cited. I fully grant that the magnitude of that case is such that if you can, by the development of that case, show it affords a precedent for us, you certainly make out a strong case. I have heard of the alleged and the great and paramount difficulty of this question to which I have just referred, namely, the establishment of a dividing and a divided authority—as in the case of the Austro-Hungarian Empire—by a reference of the matter to the personal authority of the Sovereign. If that be so, am I really to understand that it is the proposal of those members of this House who take the view I am now referring to that the personal authority of a Sovereign in this country is to decide the question of what subjects are to be referred to the Parliament of Ireland and what subjects are to be referred to the Imperial Parliament of this country. If that is the doctrine held, then I say you are immediately involved in a dilemma more hopeless than any that has presented itself to you, because on the one hand the subjects are to be decided on the authority of responsible Ministers, or on the other hand by a personal will or whim. If the decision is to be determined on the authority of responsible Ministers—the responsible Ministers of Great Britain or the responsible Ministers of Ireland who are to exist under the plan that is now proposed (hear, hear), evidently you can't refer to the responsible Ministers of Great Britain the power of drawing a distinction which involves the most vital, delicate and practical parts of the subject. Then, if in the highest and nicest matter of Government you are going again to set up the personal responsibility of the Sovereign apart from the advice of responsible Ministers, you are at once proposing a revolution in this country more profound than you need bring about by the establishment of any form of Government whatever. (Hear, hear.) I express for myself, and I am sure for my colleagues, that we are most favorable to the introduction of a rightly understood principle of Local Government in Ireland, and most desirous to promote it. For the first of the purposes they have in view they cannot take the first step, they cannot establish one foot of ground upon which and from which to address their arguments to the House of Commons, until they have proposed a plan in which it shall be clearly set forth by what authority, by what machinery, they mean to divide Imperial and local questions, and so to give satisfaction to the members of this House upon its first and most paramount duty, namely, the maintaining of the supremacy of the Imperial authority for every practical purpose relating to the interests and the purposes of this great Empire." (Cheers.)

Now, Sir, in that speech, while announcing once again his adhesion to the principle of Local Government, that great statesman has endeavored to shift from the shoulders of the responsible Government of the Empire to the shoulders of those who are in a hopeless minority, a question which belongs to that Government to solve. I say that it belongs to those who are responsible for the good government of the Empire, who have the majority, who have the power, who can initiate legislation themselves to grapple with the difficulty. I say that those who admit that the present system is unjust, who admit that the present condition of Ireland cannot be satisfactory without some change, who acknowledge that a change can be made, are in an untenable position when they tell the minority: "Gentlemen, come forward, propound some plan, solve every difficulty, tell us how you would settle this question, and until you do that we are not called upon to act." That is not, in my opinion, language worthy of any statesman, be he Conservative or Reformer. It is not upon such statements that the Irish question can be settled. It would be folly to blink the consideration that any measure that Mr. Gladstone may propose on this question would be unsatisfactory to many, and at any rate it would not be accepted by the Irish people as a final settlement of the question. But I maintain that the longer you delay, the greater the difficulties, and I maintain that though the proposition you are able to propose may not be satisfactory to all, it is no ground whatever for declining to do that which you yourself acknowledged it is just should be done. True justice will do that which is right, and will give that measure for relief which it knows is just, and which believe it will give that added measure of safety and security which will result from the changed state of affairs. What is the state of affairs? The Prime Minister of England says the condition of Ireland is unsatisfactory, because the Irish people have not the measure of Local Government which they ought to have, and he says: "I will not give that measure of Local Government to you; I will not stir hand or foot in the matter until the Irish members in the House of Commons, who are in the minority, and are powerless to do anything, shall propose a measure which shall be satisfactory to themselves, and that they will undertake to deal with this complicated and exacerbated question, so full of difficulties and in the light of all the errors and circumstances of the past.

After Recess.

Mr. BLAKE. I will not engage in a discussion of the various hypothetical cases and somewhat strained difficulties which it seems to me are dealt with in that speech on that question. I frankly admit that the division power, local and federal is one of them; but how there can be a difficulty in deciding how that is to be regulated and in determining how it is to be regulated by a general Act of justice, I cannot at all see. There can be no doubt whatever that the difficulty which occurred to the Prime Minister on this occasion, was the view which he has entertained and expressed so freely and which is that same difficulty which has prevented justice being done to Ireland in former years and under other circumstances; it is the difficulty of having to deal with a recalcitrant and inert mass of public opinion not sufficiently advanced to enable him to grapple with the subject. To him I believe the words of the great poet of the adjoining republic apply when he says:

"His statecraft was the golden rule,
His right of vote a sacred trust,
Clear above threat and ridicule,
All heard his challenge 'Is it just?'"

I believe that a love of justice and of generous and liberal treatment is an instinct I might say of that statesman's nature; but he must be sustained, his hands must be held up in order to give him the power to accomplish the task which, though advanced in years, remains for him to do in order to crown a life spent in the service of his country. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution (Mr. Costigan) said that Scotland was also moving on the subject. Within the last ten days a very important meeting was held which came to the conclusion to ask for a Local Legislature for Scotland with triennial elective Parliaments; and there can be no doubt, notwithstanding the remarkable business tact and talent by which the Scotch business has been managed in Parliament, there have been great and injurious effects in the management of that business. What has been accomplished, has been accomplished by a sort of imperfect federation in that regard. We know that, in regard to all parliamentary measures, the Scotch members have met together and agreed as to what was wanted for the country, and what was agreed upon has been passed through Parliament, unless it trench upon the prejudices and views of others almost without debate. They have not succeeded in all things—they have not succeeded in many important things. They have had strong fights when questions came up which involved the interests of other parts of the United Kingdom; but this agitation in Scotland cannot fail to have an important influence in maturing public opinion on the Irish question. I maintain that the English Parliament cannot deal efficiently with these questions, that from lack of knowledge and sympathy, in consequence of being, as Mr. Gladstone has said, wholly over-weighted, it is not competent, and its incompetency has been proved and confessed by the present Premier, to deal satisfactorily with these questions. Let the British people then give to the Irish people this legitimate vent for their somewhat restless energies, and utilize them in the legitimate occupation of dealing with their own concerns. I have once again to trouble the House with another extract from a still later speech by Mr. Gladstone. Speaking of Parliament the hon. gentleman said:

"Sir, this a subject on which I have very distinct and clear opinions, which I have never scrupled to declare. They are not shared by many gentlemen; probably in this House they may be considered of a speculative character, and it is highly unlikely that I shall ever be called upon to take a practical part in any matter relating to these opinions, but I have the very strongest opinions, upon the advantages of Local Government, and I have the strongest objections to the tendency which I see constantly prevailing to centralization. Not for Ireland merely, but for England, I would take and profess it at all points a cardinal rule of policy, so far as I can with safety to the general structure of the Empire, to decentralise Parliament. We believe that the institution of secondary and local authorities in a country is a great source of strength, and that in principle the only necessary limit to these powers is an adequate and necessary provision for the supremacy of the central authority. (Hear, hear.) I believe that when the demand is made from Ireland for bringing purely Irish affairs more specially or more largely under Irish control outside the walls of Parliament the wise way to meet that demand will not be the method recommended by the member for the University of Dublin, who, if I understood him aright, said that anything recognising purely Irish control for purely Irish affairs must be necessarily a step towards separation, and must therefore be fraught with danger. (Opposition cheers.) That I do not believe to be either a wise or a just method of dealing with that demand. In my opinion the wise and the just method is to require that before any such plan can be dealt with or can be examined with the view of being dealt with on its merits, we must ask those who propose it; and this is the question I have invariably put—"What are the provisions which you propose to make for the supremacy of Parliament." That has been my course, and that is the course I intend to pursue. I am bound to say I have not received an answer to that question. I have never heard in the time of Mr. Butt or from the mouth of any other gentleman any adequate or satisfactory explanation upon that subject. To this declaration I have only one limitation more to add, and that is I am not prepared to give to Ireland anything which in point of principle it would be wrong to give to Scotland if Scotland ask for it. (Home Rule cheers.) That is, I apprehend, what Irish members, those members of the most popular classes, will be ready to accept. (Cheers.) The right hon. gentleman was determined to make out that these declarations on my part were a formidable novelty and he said he believed that I had in Mid-Lothian—the scene of so many misdeeds—(laughter)—and likewise at the Guildhall, which might have been considered a more consecrated precinct—delivered opinions of this kind. Well, I cannot recall all the speeches I have delivered on the subject, but I have taken the pains to recall six of them—(laughter)—which seems to me a very tolerable allowance. One was made in 1872 at Aberdeen, when I was Prime Minister. The next was in 1879 in Mid-Lothian, and another was made in the Guildhall in 1881. But the three speeches made out of Parliament were balanced by three made in Parliament, for in 1872 as Prime Minister I made a reply to Mr. Butt precisely in the same spirit of the declarations I have now made, and in the spirit of the sentences I uttered last week. I did the same in 1874, when I was not Prime Minister, but leader of the Opposition, and I did the same thing in 1880, when I sat on these benches as an independent member. Perhaps I may be allowed to read a few words of that speech. My hon. friend the member for Cork (Mr. Shaw), in the beginning of 1880, on the 27th of February, made a remarkable speech upon this question. He made a proposition which I could not accept any more than I could accept the proposition of my hon. friend the member for Tipperary (Mr. P. J. Smyth) the other night, and, professing himself an advocate of what I think he termed Home Rule, argued for it and pleaded for it in a spirit I own won my sympathy and regard, and I did not hesitate, as I do not which now, to use these words. (The hon. gentlemen then quoted the words in which he said that from the tone of the hon. member's remarks, if the relations between England and Ireland were to become satisfactory, the most important contribution to that essential end would have been made by Mr. Shaw.) That was the spirit in which I received the declaration made by the hon. member as leader, for he then was leader of the party from Ireland, and every one of the speeches to which I have referred is, I believe, in complete and exact conformity with the brief outline of my opinions upon this question."

Now, Sir, I have read that speech for two or three reasons. First of all, because you will observe that the hon. the Prime Minister, after an interval of reflection, comment and criticism reiterates the demand as an essential condition preliminary to any action on this subject, that a satisfactory solution of all these difficulties should be propounded by those who ask for it on the Home Rule benches. Therefore we find the suggestion that it stand until a day which may never come. Secondly, there is a declaration which he says he has made for ten years, and therefore we find no advance in his views upon this question. Lastly, and most importantly, we find him using these same fatal words with which Irish questions, as I have proved, have been always postponed until the day of grace and utility were passed. This is a practical question. I do not expect to be called upon to deal with it. I care nothing for these speculations. I say it is a practical, a burning question. It is the most practical and burning question we can conceive, and when the Minister has stated that the results are not satisfactory as they stand, that there ought to be a change, that there ought to be a grant of local rights and privileges, that justice demands it, and that it cannot be expected that they will be satisfied if the Parliament of the United Kingdom does not discharge that duty, justice demands that those who have the power and the responsibility should propound that legislation. Now, Sir, I come to the consideration of another branch of this question, and that is whether we have any interest in this question calling upon us to interfere in it, and I deal with that branch of the question now, partly because the hon. gentleman has alluded to it, and partly because it is not the first occasion on which a great Irish question has come under the consideration of this House and has been treated by this House in one way or another. I alluded a while ago to the question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church as one of vast importance both in its direct and indirect relations to the condition of Ireland, and it happened that while that question was under debate a late respected member of this House, the hon. Mr. Holton, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie, moved on the 31st of May, 1869:

"That this House do immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the following proposed resolutions:—

"1. That in the opinion of this House the measure now pending before the Imperial Parliament for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church will, if it becomes law, by the removal of one of the chief causes of the deeply rooted discontents which have long existed among a numerous body of Her Majesty's subjects, promote the tranquillity, increase the prosperity and add unmeasurably to the strength as well as the just renown of the great Empire of which this Dominion forms no inconsiderable part.

"2. That this opinion is strengthened and supported by the recent experience of the late Province of Canada; for the controversies which had during many years disturbed that Province and retarded its progress were finally and happily terminated in 1854 by an Act of the Provincial Legislature, bearing a close resemblance in its essential features to the measure now before the Imperial Parliament.

"3. That a royal and dutiful address, founded on the foregoing resolutions, be presented to Her Majesty the Queen, and that a Special Committee of Members be appointed to prepare an Address and report the same."

To this the hon. gentleman moved, seconded by Sir George Cartier, the previous question, and the previous question was upon that occasion carried by the hon. gentleman with the assistance of his supporters, against the vote of the Liberal party. The hon. gentleman supported his motion for the previous question by a speech. He said:

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD replied that he did not doubt that the hon. gentleman was influenced by patriotic motives, but it was quite certain that his object was just as mischievous as his mode of bringing it up. The hon. member appeared to give up the whole case when he admitted that, as a matter of legislation, we had no right to deal with it. The Parliament of the Dominion, he acknowledged, was only authorized to pass laws for the good order and peace of Canada. Therefore, the hon. member said that all we could do was to give a simple expression of opinion—nay, more, that we should not do so ordinarily, except on important occasions, or in respect to a matter of supreme necessity. Now, the question immediately suggested itself—Where was the necessity for the present motion? The measure has been approved by the public opinion of Great Britain—it had been sanctioned by an overwhelming majority of the House of Commons, and the hon. gentleman himself had been certain that the House of Lords, in due submission to the popular sentiment, would agree to its passage. Now, surely, it was an extraordinary course on the part of the hon. member to ask the House to deal with a matter with which it had no concern, and render itself amenable to the answers that 'it should mind its own business.' The hon. member acknowledges that our Parliament should not deal with such a matter except in a case of supreme necessity.

"Hon. Mr. HOLTON. I said on a question of supreme importance to the Empire.

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There was no supreme necessity for the motion—it was not of supreme importance to the Empire what our opinions on such a question might be—whether we were favorable or opposed to the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland. The hon. member had asserted that we were in the habit of passing addresses to the Sovereign on matters of interest, affecting herself or family. Now, the Queen of England was the Sovereign of Canada, every one had an interest in herself and family. In the very Act of Confederation, the first clause (sanctioned by the British Parliament), declared that the Sovereign of Great Britain and Ireland shall be our own Sovereign for all time to come; and, therefore, it was quite within the limits of our jurisdiction and propriety to refer to matters connected with the propriety and happiness of Her family. The hon. member had also said that we had expressed an opinion respecting peace and war; but every one would see that the moment such a state of things arose, every section of the Empire was virtually affected. Therefore, as loyal and devoted subjects, it was our duty and interest to sympathize with the heart of the Empire. But in the case of the present question, neither our loyalty nor our interest was at stake. He for one would not go into the discussion of the merits of the measure—he would not say whether it was good or not, for it was not the place to debate it. The hon. member had no right to force an expression of opinion in the Canadian Parliament, and he must have known that there was a very considerable and respectable minority in the country immediately affected, who received the Bill with heartburning and the deepest dissatisfaction. The people of Canada lived in harmony and peace—or had no religious or other antipathies to excite us; and yet the hon. gentlemen wished to transfer to the Dominion the heart-burnings and animosities of the Old World. If the policy of the hon. member were sanctioned, then we should see the sad spectacle of different religious sects in this country coming forward, embodying their respective feelings on this vexed question. The hon. member had not even assumed to discuss even the merits of the question—to go into details, and show that it was worthy of the support of the House. Yes, he was calling upon the House to express a decided opinion on a question respecting which it had only a general idea. There could only be one object in such a motion, and that was, to create an ill-feeling between the Protestants and Catholics, to bring discord into this now happy country. It was quite obvious, that if the cause of the course of the hon. member was legitimate, then it would be within the province of the Legislature to deal with the Reform Bill, and other questions of equal importance affecting Great Britain. On the same principle, the House would be found interfering in the affairs of Spain, and referring to her ecclesiastical establishments. Nay more, the Parliament of the Dominion, with equal justice, might be called upon to give a strong expression of sentiment respecting separate schools, or church endowing, or other matter of interest to the people of Lower Canada. In whatsoever light he viewed the question, he could not avoid seeing the impropriety of the motion brought forward by the hon. member for Chateaugay, and was convinced that the House would deal with it promptly and effectually, so as to prevent the introduction of similar resolutions in the future. In conclusion, he would move the previous question in amendment to the motion before the House."

Mr. BLAKE.

Now, Sir, I maintain that the hon. gentleman was on that occasion mistaken as to the real feelings and sentiments of the great majority of the Canadian people. I believe that, so far from that motion being, as the hon. gentleman said, calculated to excite discord, heart-burnings and religious difficulties, we would have all agreed—had he but seen the question in another light—in favor of that solution of that question, just as we had, in the old Province of Canada, lively though were the feelings of religious difference in that old Province, when we settled a somewhat similar question. I refer, Sir, to this statement, because I wish to express the hope that in the interval between 1869 and 1882, the hon. gentleman has advanced in his views, has observed the current of events, and will now be disposed to take a different line, and instead of arguing on the precedent which he himself created by moving the previous question on that occasion, as he stated there would be an effectual barrier to similar resolutions in the future, he may be disposed to admit our right to tender some advice on this occasion, and give his support to the motion before the House. I say we have an interest, as a part of the great Empire—as sharers in its prosperity, as sharers in its shame; we have an interest in everything which will tend to develop the strength and the unity of that Empire; we have an interest in every great and important question affecting the general constitution and organization of the Empire at large. Nobody can doubt that, through chaos and without any formal system, the gradual tendency of the constitution of the Empire has been more and more—perhaps through drifting, perhaps otherwise—towards the adoption of the federative form. We ourselves are the out-crop of that idea. Our present position is due to its partial, unsymmetrical, unreasoned, but practical development; and I say, Sir, we must consider that, without power effectually to interfere, without power of legislation, we yet have a right, as members of the Empire, to express an opinion upon this subject. As a part of the Empire largely peopled by old country men—by Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen—we have a deep interest in a question which must materially affect the prosperity and happiness of our countrymen in the old land. As a country wanting immigrants, as the hon. gentleman has said, we have a material interest of a very great degree. We all know where the Irish immigration goes; we all know that those who cross the sea and land upon the shores of America, go almost wholly, particularly those of the Roman Catholic faith, to the United States instead of to Canada; we know that our share of the Irish immigration is insignificant, and that our share of Irish Roman Catholic immigration is but a very small proportion in these latter days of even our share of Irish immigration. We know, on the other hand, that enormous numbers of that people have gone to the United States. When I said two years ago that that was due largely to the difficulties to which I referred, and hoped that a better feeling might be engendered by remedial measures applied to the state of Ireland, hon. gentlemen opposite did not seem to sympathize with that remark. I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman repeat it to-day, and I hope it has become, to a large extent, the accepted sentiment of the people of this country. We are interested materially in another sense in this question. We and our neighbors have a common frontier of 3,000 miles long. That country is, and must always be, a country in our cordial and friendly relations with which, must lie a great part of our own prosperity; and no man can doubt that the existence of the Irish question is a main feature of the difficulties between the United Kingdom and the United States, and cannot but react most unfavorably upon us. We recollect what has happened in former days; we recollect when our peace was broken, our territory invaded more than once, expense was incurred and blood shed; we recollect that such a state of things existed in the United States, that redress, whether by expression of regret or by pecuniary compensation, was absolutely denied, on the score, I presume, that the state of feeling in that country rendered it impossible for any such concession to be made. If you look at some of the figures of the recent Census, you will see how directly and indirectly—directly, as wanting immigrants ourselves, indirectly as those with whom the people of the United States should be on friendly terms—we are interested in this question. Take the State of Massachusetts in which out of a population of 1,625,000, the foreign-born people, if I remember rightly, number some 420,000 souls, and of these no less than about 240,000 were born in Ireland; so that more than one-half of the foreign-born population of the State of Massachusetts is of Irish birth, while if you add to those the number who are the descendants of Irishmen in that State, you will see what a powerful factor in the prosperity and the progress of that country is the Irish immigration. Of that immigration we want a share for ourselves and we want still more earnestly that those who choose the Republic instead of the Dominion, shall not choose the Republic with feelings of animosity and disaffection towards the Empire of which we form a part, but with those friendly feelings which animate the Englishmen and Scotchmen who also happen to prefer, for material reasons, the republic to the Dominion. Now, Sir, there is another reason why we should interfere—we can speak with authority on this subject; we are federalists ourselves; we are experienced in the benefits of Home Rule; we know what it means; we know that it is our most precious possession; we know that there is nothing that we will part with with greater reluctance or more difficulty than our portion of Home Rule; we know that there is nothing that we would sacrifice more to retain than our portion of Home Rule, whether you revert to that portion which the Dominion has in relation to the Empire, or that portion which the Provinces have in relation to the Dominion. In reference to the important Federation which exists between Canada and the United Kingdom, or the more perfect form of federation which exists between the Dominion and the Provinces, if any people in the wide world can speak of the difficulties engendered from the want of Home Rule, and the benefits to be secured by the grant of Home Rule, it is the people in whose name and for whose interests we sit and deliberate in this hall this night. Now, Sir, the descendant of Irishmen myself—my grandfather by the father's side a rector of the church to which I have referred, and sleeping in his churchyard, and my ancestor by my mother's side slain in conflict with insurgents, while it might have been my misfortune, had I been born and bred in the old land, to adopt from prejudice views very different from those I hold this night, yet, it having been my good fortune to have been born and bred in the free air of Canada, and to have learned those better, those wiser, those more Christian and just notions which here prevail, upon the subjects of civil and religious liberty, class legislation, and Home Rule itself, I have always entertained ever since I have had the opportunity of thinking on this subject, the sentiments to which I have given feeble utterance this evening. I believe that these are the sentiments native to our own sense of freedom and justice, of forbearance and toleration, and a desire to deal in this subject, as the hon. gentleman said who moved it, in that spirit which says: "Do unto others as you would they should do unto you." I had been anxious that this discussion should be raised, and had myself prepared a motion on the subject when private circumstances called me from my desk here. On my return I learnt that the same hon. gentleman to whom the hon. member for Victoria has alluded had taken the matter in hand, and it was thought better not to meddle with them, or with the course that they, under his leadership, might propose. But although I remained silent I felt that it would be doing but a scant justice to the feeling of Canadians, French, Scotch, English or Irish to suppose that there is any material difference in the intensity of their feelings on this subject from those whom the hon. gentleman who brought forward the motion more particularly seems to represent. I believe our sentiments are based on the general principle of political action to which we have been educated and which has advanced our prosperity and our intellectual and moral standing in the world. Now, I heard the hon. gentleman's resolution with some regret, for one reason that I find it emasculated. I find it very much weaker than the resolution which he put on the paper in the first instance. In some particulars it does not legislatively suit my view. He has fallen into something like the error ascribed to Mr. Gladstone, and not willing myself to repeat that error, I would prefer to vote for the best resolution we can get. Yet I will vote with reluctance for the measure which hypothetically refers to the grant of a measure of self-government to Ireland. The hon. gentleman says in the altered resolution:

"And we would venture to express a hope that if consistent with the integrity and well-being of the Empire, and if the rights and status of the minority are fully protected and secured, sure means may be found of meeting the expressed desire of so many of your Irish subjects in that regard."

"6. We would further express a hope that the time has come when Your Majesty's clemency may, without injury to the interests of the United Kingdom, be extended to those persons who are now imprisoned in Ireland charged with political offences only, and the inestimable blessing of personal liberty restored to them."

We have no idea that the rights and interests of the minority will be other than fully protected and secured. I believe that its best security is to be found in a united Irish people, managing their own affairs. I say that the possession of such a measure is essential to the maintenance of the Empire. There ought to be no ifs or ands in the expression of the views of the 'Canadian' people upon this most important subject. It is only upon the theory, only upon the strong view that the possession of such a law is essential to the integrity of the Empire that we can agitate or act with the effect in dealing with this matter. I am not disposed to act hypothetically. I am not disposed to deal with this question with ifs and and's. I am willing to advise conciliatory measures and ample justice to Ireland. I should like the Canadian people, through their representatives in Parliament, to say to the Imperial Government, politely, that, in their opinion, as 4,000,000 of British subjects, they believe that, the integrity of the Empire demands self government for Ireland. So with reference to the clause that speaks of those men deprived of constitutional right of trial by jury, I do not understand them to invite the clemency of the Crown. I do not understand them to be charged with political offences. I understand them to be imprisoned under a law which does not call on the Government to charge them with any crime whatever. What we ought to have asked for those gentlemen is the restoration of the habeas corpus and a trial by their peers of any charge which the Government of England may think fit to make against them. It is not an application for clemency and mercy that they demand and that we should express, but a hope that the ordinary constitutional right of every British subject may be extended to these particular British subjects—namely, the right of habeas corpus and of trial by their peers for any offense with which they may be charged against the law of the land to which they belong. I hope that the resolution, weak as it is, unsatisfactory as it is—failing, as in my opinion it does in those two points, in a manner which I do not myself admire, will yet pass; because it is not amendable, and it is infinitely better that it should pass than be rejected because some may think it too weak and others too strong. In this question I have shown we are interested in many ways, although we have no direct voice in the legislation of Great Britain, notwithstanding we have a right to venture our counsel and express our views. We have a right respectfully to approach our Sovereign and strengthen the hands of Her Prime Minister whose sentiments are not hostile to reform. We have a right to give the influence of 4,000,000 of British subjects to the redress of grievances too long maintained, to attainment of rights too long denied, and so to enlarge the strength and increase the unity of the mighty Empire of which we form a part.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think I can congratulate my hon. friend from Victoria, on the manner in which he introduced the resolution now under consideration. His tone and manner were unexceptionable. With his usual modesty he disclaimed the idea of using any rhetorical artifice. No rhetoric can be so effective in this House or country, as plain, unvarnished statements, such as made by my hon. friend, in the fullness of his heart and in the exercise of his reason; and notwithstanding his overflowing sympathy with his countrymen in Ireland, his speech clearly, loyally and logically forced itself effectively upon the calm consideration of every member. It must have in the House and out of the House, a greater influence than if he had adopted a different and a stronger tone, but this he has always followed in taking up a question of any kind, showing sincerity in his advocacy of any question. He had no sinister object, political or otherwise. But his object, his sole reason for addressing the House was that his proposition, sincerely offered, should be carried out. How different is the appeal, the carefully prepared, the elaborate address of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, spoken, or rather read with great vigor and energy to this House. The object of the one hon. gentleman was quite different from the other. The one wanted to secure the object of his resolution, and the other wished to make political capital. When this resolution was first placed on the notice paper, I am free to confess I looked at them with considerable apprehension of the consequences that might arise from the discussion in this House and Parliament. But in carefully looking at the resolutions even as they were originally prepared, and still more as they have been modified by my hon. friend, I can see no objection in the world, but much good, from an expression of the opinion of this House of Parliament. The hon. member for West Durham speaks disapprovingly, almost sneeringly at the emasculated resolutions—of the changes that have been made in them by my hon. friend. Then again you can see the difference in the objects of the two hon. gentlemen. The mover of these resolutions wished to draw them in such a manner as to attract the strongest, the most united vote of the House, a unanimous vote to secure for them the greatest influence on the converts of England. What does the hon. gentleman opposite care whether Home Rule is carried in Ireland or not? What does he care whether the suspects are kept in gaol for this, or next, or for many years? He would rather there should be a crying grievance that he might address, as he has done to-night, a speech to the Irish Catholics of the Dominion, to produce an effect on their minds, without the most distant care or consideration of the mischievous effects his speech would have in England and with the British Government. What was the object of my hon. friend for Victoria? He knew that he was powerless to force the matter in this Address upon Her Majesty's Government or the Parliament of England, so he desired in the first place that we should, by a moderate, calm statement of the fact that we had good, prosperous Home Rule in Canada, and by the statement that we hoped that as Her Majesty would find it opposed to the disintegration of the Empire, she would grant the same mode of self-government to Ireland as similar to ours as the different circumstances would permit. He asked that as the notion of force with the British Government is out of the question, that we should pass a resolution praying the British Government and Parliament to adopt a somewhat similar system to that which happily prevails in Canada. For that purpose language of presumption must not be used, but language of approbation so far as we could approve of the course of Her Majesty's Government in that direction—but not language of disapprobation. While the hon. gentleman spoke with great laudation of the ability of Mr. Gladstone—an opinion in which every one shares—he has told us that he has withdrawn his confidence from Mr. Gladstone, although two years ago he was the greatest statesman in the world, and now the hon. gentleman tells us that every one of his measures was ineffectual, from one cause or another—one, the Land Act of 1870, being too late, the other, the disendowment of the Irish Church, being inadequate; and last of all, the present land system on which Mr. Gladstone has pledged the standing and status of his Government by a perfunctory measure, which is destined to be as unsuccessful as every other measure has been for the relief of Ireland, and must be followed by more drastic measures. That hon. gentleman holds a position too high in Canada, and holds it deservedly from his great ability, not to warrant us in believing that the words which have fallen from his mouth will be read by the members of the British Government and the House of Commons and generally in England. Mr. Gladstone is human, and, like every leader, is strong in his opinions, and does not receive kindly anything like disapprobation of his measures. When, therefore, this measure goes to England, if it does go, as I hope it will, the commentary will be that all Mr. Gladstone's measures will be failures, because in that one instance they were too late and in the other imperfect; and Mr. Gladstone's Government will not meet with much favor resolutions propounded and carried in that spirit. But they are not and will not be carried in that spirit. The moderate tone, the loyal tone, the beseeching tone of my hon. friend asking for sympathy for his fellow-countrymen, asking for what he considers to be for the good of his country, will be contrasted with the mischief that would be caused by that strong disapprobatory speech of the leader of the Opposition, of all that has been done by English statesmen. It will do much to neutralize it, and I believe that the good sense and moderation and the generous tone that will be adopted in this discussion, will wipe out to a great extent the mischievous and improper language of the hon. gentleman. Suppose that the hon. gentleman had moved these resolutions in the place of my hon. friend from Victoria; suppose that no other person had spoken on that debate but he, and these resolutions had gone home with the hon. gentleman's speech as a commentary, what chance would there be that any attention would be paid to an Address based upon and supported by the one support of a speech like that of the hon. gentleman. Why, they would have been thrown at once to one side, because, on reading through the lines of the hon. gentleman's speech, its object appears to be solely to secure political advantage by keeping up distractions in Canada. The hon. gentleman quoted some portion of my speech in 1869 in sympathy with the motion for the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and says he hopes that since then I have learned something. I approve of every word of my speech, and under the same circumstances, on the same measure, I would take the same course I did in 1869. The measure for the disestablishment of the Anglican Church in Ireland was safe. It had, in effect, passed. It was known it was safe. It required no expression of approbation or sympathy from the people of Canada. That measure was destined for good or evil to become the law of the land. Therefore, the late Sir George Cartier and I objected to the motion because its object was to throw the apple of discord among the people of Canada. It was moved, simply, for the sake of trying to get a vote that would either irritate the Irish Protestants or the Irish Catholics. The object was so clear that the lamented Sir George Cartier and I joined in saying, by moving the previous question, that we should not express any opinion on that subject, as it could only do mischief by increasing dissensions on a religious question, and could do no possible good. The hon. gentleman says that the conclusion the House came to on that motion that the question be not now put, was not in accordance with the feelings of the majority of the people of Canada. No man is more mistaken than he. You know that the disestablishment of the Anglican Church involved the deprivation of the Anglican Church of all its property, of all its endowments. The two went together, and the whole of the Roman Catholic population of Lower Canada, the whole body of French Canadians who were yet a quasi-established church under the Treaty of Paris, who have got legal rights that cannot be affected, who have got large estates and endowments that are secured to them by the Treaty of Paris, and the arrangements between France and England when this became a British colony, the whole Catholic hierarchy felt that if the representatives voted for a measure of this kind, the next thing they might expect was their disestablishment and disendowment, the taking away of their own property. The whole of the hierarchy and the priesthood of the Roman Catholic laity felt that if they voted for a measure of this kind, praying for the disestablishment and the deprivation of the property of an established church, that if their representatives did that in the Parliament of Canada they might next expect their own disestablishment and disendowment, the robbing and taking away of their own property as a consequence. And so I say now with the same confidence that the people of Canada would say, if a similar question of this kind arose in England, we cannot and ought not to allow this question to be brought up in Canada. That is the ground Sir George Cartier and I took, the plainly sensible ground, and it met with the cordial approval of Parliament; and, Sir, the attempt failed—the wretched attempt to introduce religious dissension amongst us, and God knows we have enough of it, even in this free country—and we heard no more about it. But, Sir, while I say that if that same question, involving the same consequences and the same disturbance of public opinion, were brought up now, I would take the same ground. The question in these resolutions is not a question of that nature. I said a little while ago that the hon. gentleman has voted want of confidence in Mr. Gladstone, certainly he has no want of confidence in himself. The hon. gentleman says that he disapproves altogether of what Mr. Gladstone did. He read a paragraph of his speech made the other day, and said he was wrong, that it was a fatal error—unhappy man that he was in not having the hon. gentleman opposite at his elbow to advise him—when Mr. Gladstone said, and he still adheres to that opinion—that when parties proclaim they have a grievance and desire to have it redressed, the grievance being admitted, the answer is this: “Well, you claim you have been aggrieved, what remedy do you propose?” That is what Mr. Gladstone said, and what any man of common sense would say. But it does not meet the views of the hon. gentleman, and he pooh-poohs, he sneers at the weakness, the folly, the want of statesmanlike wisdom in Mr. Gladstone, because he says: “Well, if you want a thing tell us what you do want.” Sir, I said before that at first I looked with apprehension upon the consequences of these resolutions, but I think they can do no harm—they may do much good. In the first place, they are based on the one single object of doing good to Ireland by their effect on the British Government in legislation for Ireland, and that is a businesslike foundation. The hon.

gentleman is kind enough to approve the motion. It says, and truly, that we do not get a fair proportion of the emigration from Ireland. That is an unfortunate fact. It states that these fellow-subjects of ours, the strength of the Empire, are going to a foreign nation, and it may be, in the course of events, a hostile nation. It states that fact, and it regrets it, it regrets it on the best grounds, because while we can improve the condition of the distressed who come to this country, at the same time it adds to the strength of the Dominion, and if it adds to the strength of the Dominion it pro tanto adds to the strength of the Empire. This is a proper ground, the ground of self-interest, the interest we have in having peace, prosperity and satisfaction restored to Ireland, and a position of unity and affection restored between Her Majesty and Her advisers and the population of Ireland. Then, that basis being laid down, the resolution goes on and asks a favor of the British Government. The hon. gentleman who moves the resolution has no selfish object, he does not desire to raise himself at the expense of the Irish people in Ireland, to raise himself up as a great leader among the Irish in the Dominion, not desiring to make political capital out of it, not desiring to place himself at the head of a popular movement amongst his countrymen here, nor with a single mind to carry out the object of his address. Above all things he assures Her Majesty and the people of Ireland, that the Irish people in Canada are happy, contented and loyal subjects of Her Majesty, as desirous, as we are, to remain under Her beneficent rule, as ready as we are and others are, not of that race, to shed our blood in defence of the old flag which is alluded to expressly in the resolution, and if need be on our soil in Canada, in America, to renew the glories which Irishmen have earned on every field of battle where Englishmen have been martialled against a foreign foe. The hon. gentleman might have made himself a popular demagogue, he might have pursued the same political objects which moved the hon. gentleman opposite with scarcely a disguise, not a thin veil to hide the nakedness of that object—he might have raised himself up as a demagogue and might have ranged his countrymen under him to take extreme measures in the politics of Canada. But my hon. friend desired that one thing, and Sir, he will succeed, notwithstanding the speech of the hon. gentleman which, I dare say, may have disinclined many hon. gentlemen in this House who have heard him to vote for this resolution, who without that speech, might perhaps have had no hesitation. I hope and believe that these resolutions will be adopted by this House; I hope that Ireland will in some way be advantaged. How we cannot see, how we do not venture to dictate, how it would be folly in us to dictate, not having the same infallible confidence in our own opinion as the hon. gentleman, not having the same ability to settle the whole question. But we hope it will be settled in some way to the benefit of Ireland, and consistent with the integrity of the British Empire, but so that the Irish people may be governed according to their own wishes, and governed by Irishmen so far as is consistent with our common good and the integrity of the whole Empire. It is easy to see the difference between a demagogic speech and a patriotic speech. My hon. friend, in his resolution, asks for Home Rule in Ireland in so far as is consistent with the interests and well-being of the Empire, that the rights of the minority shall be fully protected and secured. My hon. friend is an Irish Catholic. From his great ability and long parliamentary experience, and from the general sense of his political and personal honesty he stands high among his countrymen, and yet he knows he is more than an Irish Catholic; he is an Irishman and he desires the happiness and peace of all Ireland. He knows that there is a powerful and wealthy and intelligent minority, and he, a Catholic, asks that the Protestant minority, as Gladstone asks, that the rights of his Protestant countrymen shall be protected. This is the language of a man rising above everything like being a demi-god, it is the language of a man who rises above sectional or religious differences, it is the language of a man who seeks the prosperity, not of the Celts or Catholics, but of all Ireland; and by the wording of the resolution, by the care with which it has been drawn, after consulting, as he told us he had done, with members on both sides of the House, he has a reasonable hope that if adopted it may meet with the favor of the Government and Parliament of England. The hon. leader of the Opposition has delivered a lecture against landlordism. Well, landlordism may be bad. We have none of it here; every man is his own landlord, as we say in this country.

Mr. CASEY. Except in the North-West.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. An hon. member says except in the North-West. We have homesteads there for every Irishman and every Irish family. If the whole population of Ireland, man, woman and child, Catholic and Protestant, Jew and Gentile, were brought here by Her Majesty's fleet and every transport and steam vessel belonging to the Empire, there is room for them and for thousands besides. Every man in this country is his own landlord. Landlordism may, however, be good or bad, the ownership of property may be good or bad. I dare say the hon. leader of the Opposition would like to have a large estate even in Ireland. Some hon. gentlemen beside him have large estates now in the North-West and are landlords, speculators, and they have been described by a gentleman, who ought to know the feeling on that side of the House, as harpies. But this Home Rule, if granted at all, must be granted by a Parliament of landlords. It can only be carried in the House of Commons and afterwards in the House of Lords, through the votes of landlords in those Houses. They have a predominant interest and an overwhelming influence in the House of Lords, as well as very large power and influence in the House of Commons; and yet, in order that our humble request for Home Rule may be granted by the landlord Parliament of England, we tell the landlords that we are doing it for the purpose of removing them, for the purpose of letting Ireland be governed by Irish ideas; that a process should be adopted by which landlords would be exterminated, and the Land Act of last year extended and followed up by legislation both in England and Ireland, so that landlords would be swept away altogether. This is a specimen of the gentle tone in which the hon. member for West Durham wishes us to tell the Lords and Commons of England that we want to destroy and take away their property and crush out the landlords and reduce them to a position of operative laborers. With respect to the release of political prisoners, it is well known that this is a question of the greatest importance and one which is agitating the United States and Ireland. It is a burning question in every sense of the word; it is a question on which much must depend, and regarding which the Parliament of Canada must exercise the utmost caution. Therefore, my hon. friend who moved the resolution was well advised when he used these terms: "We venture to hope when the time has come when Her Majesty's clemency may be exercised in the cases of those persons who are now suffering imprisonment in Ireland charged with political offences." In regard to men who are in gaol for committing murder or outrage of any kind, the hon. member for West Durham would ask that they should be released. The hon. gentleman takes this action in order to have an effect upon extreme men who sympathise with the most extreme parties which unhappily are existing in Ireland. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Costigan) is well aware that it would be worse than useless to seek for the release of such persons. Already some good has been effected in regard to the release of persons charged with political offences only. I have Celtic blood running in my veins. I have always had great sympathy with the people of Ireland, who have suffered from the centuries of misrule inflicted upon them. The hon. mover of the resolution is not so violent as hon. gentlemen opposite would like him to be. He is not so unwise as to make a request which would lead to our resolution being returned to us with a reproof which we would richly deserve. The hon. member for Victoria expresses the hope that the time has come when persons charged with political offences, whether rightly or wrongly, may be released, enjoying the estimable blessings of personal freedom. The hon. gentleman will, I hope, succeed in having his resolutions adopted by the House; I hope they will receive the votes of a majority of the House. This is not a Government question, although it was moved as an amendment to go into Committee of Supply. But it is certainly not a Government question, and I, as First Minister, and I believe speaking with some influence, would ask all my hon. friends in this House who can conscientiously do so—I ask no man to vote against his conscience—to support the resolutions. And it is only by the support of the Ministerial majority in this House that this resolution can be carried. Hon. gentlemen I dare say were disappointed that these resolutions were not brought up as substantive resolutions and dealt with by a motion of the previous question. They would then succeed in the object which they are opposing with so much effect, and the hon. gentleman with so much ability, of being the defenders of the wronged Irishmen, and then if an election should come on they would say these people on the other side voted for oppressing the people of Ireland. They are disappointed, I know, they are rightly disappointed. I say distinctly that the stand taken by the hon. gentleman shows that he wants only to make an appeal to the Irish Catholics of Canada, that he is regardless of the prejudicial effects upon Irish people in the Old World; but I hope a majority of this House will be able conscientiously to vote for this Address and send it to Her Majesty. And I hope the Hansard going home to England will be delayed by the printer to such a late day that Mr. Gladstone will have assented to the principle of this Address before he gets the speech of the hon. gentleman, for if that comes into his hands the Address will surely be rejected. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for these resolutions with every pleasure and with some hope that they will have some influence with Her Majesty's Government.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on this question, but first, Sir, I wish to correct as gross a misrepresentation as in the course of my parliamentary experience I have ever heard. I appeal to you and to the members of this House, I appeal to every man within the sound of my voice, was ever anything more grossly incorrect—and that is far too mild a word—than the words put by the leader of the House in the mouth of his opponent than those placed by the Minister of the Interior into the mouth of my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake)? He said my hon. friend proposed to let loose on demand—that the English Government should let loose—criminals guilty of certain offences upon the country. He asked nothing of the kind, but this only: that men charged with certain offences should have the right of trial. Could there be a more just or fairer or more reasonable demand than that? and yet, said the hon. the First Minister, he proposed to let loose upon society men guilty of the worst offences men could commit on their fellows. I desire, as I said, to make a few remarks upon this question. I have been long and intimately connected with Ireland. On the mother's side I am an Irishman myself, and I have reasonably well proved it. I have spent not a few years in Ireland; I may say I know the Irish people well. I have had the opportunity of seeing how they live, how they are treated, and of seeing and dealing with all classes of society in Ireland; and I may venture to say, Sir, if the hon. the First Minister himself had ever resided in Ireland but for a few weeks, if he had seen anything of the condition of the Irish people, he would not have used the language he has seen fit to use on this present occasion. Sir, that hon. gentleman talked of the contrast between the hon. member who introduced this resolution and the speech of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). I think, Sir, every member who listened to him must have been drawing a contrast between the statesmanlike mode in which my hon. friend beside me handled the question and the evasions to which the hon. gentleman had recourse. Sir, that hon. gentleman dared to charge my hon. friend with insincerity. He talked of his being a popular demagogue, and of his taking up this question for political effect—that he held no honest and true motive in it. Who is the man who makes this charge of insincerity, when dealing with questions of this kind, against my hon. friend? Why, Sir, it is not so many years ago that there was a burning question in this country, when all classes of people were irritated to a very great degree by reason of troubles in the North-West, and I can recollect the hon. gentleman after expressing a wish to his Maker that he might succeed in capturing Mr. Riel, deliberately turned round and charged my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) with having induced that person to leave the country, to the great danger of Canada. That is one reason. I have the record here, but I will not mar the occasion by referring to the facts, but I will remind the man who talks of insincerity on the part of my hon. friend that eighteen months had barely elapsed before he, before a Committee of the House, was obliged to confess that he had furnished Riel with money to enable him to leave the country. That is the man who talks of insincerity, who talks of being influenced by a desire to make political capital. Sir, he alleged that my hon. friend had lost confidence in Mr. Gladstone. He told us that my hon. friend thought poorly of Mr. Gladstone's statesmanship; but the whole argument he addressed to this House was intended to show how powerless Mr. Gladstone was to carry out his desires for the benefit of the Irish people, by reason of the fact that their affairs had to be dealt with in the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, and he showed conclusively, I think, how it was that proper attention was never paid to the affairs of Ireland until they had passed a stage at which it was almost impossible to remove the evils complained of. Is that my hon. friend's opinion alone? Is it not the opinion of every man who has written with any degree of care on the affairs of Ireland for the past thirty years at least. He threatens us with the displeasure of Mr. Gladstone if we presume in our capacity of Canadian legislators to deal with a subject which affects the interests as well as the sentiments of a very large number of the people of Canada. The hon. Minister paid an involuntary compliment to my hon. friend when he mentioned that he would not likely be swayed from the path of his duty when he thought anything was to be done which the interest of Canada required him to do, by the desire to propitiate the Ministers of Great Britain. That has not always, I fear, been the course pursued by that hon. gentleman himself. I think I could name more than one instance in which he has sacrificed our interests, and in sacrificing our interest, has sacrificed the highest interest of the Empire itself, for the purpose of currying favor for a time with Mr. Gladstone or some of Mr. Gladstone's colleagues. Sir, he talks of the eloquent language of my hon. friend as mischievous and improper. I would like to know is there one Irishman in this House, is there one man of Irish parentage or Irish descent in Canada who, when he peruses those words, will echo the sentiments of the hon. gentleman; and if there is,

I would like to know that man's name, and I think the Irishmen of Canada would like to know it too. He talks, Sir, of the disestablishment of the Irish Church as an act of spoliation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say so.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It meant nothing else.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I said nothing of the kind.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The language used by the hon. gentleman could have no other meaning. He used language which implied that he meant that the Irish Church, by being disestablished, were deprived of the property which properly belonged to them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I said nothing of the kind. I said it involved this endowment as well; I neither expressed an opinion for or against the disestablishment, but I said the two went together.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman's language went further and meant more. If he simply means that they ceased to be an established church, he said the truth; but if he means that they were improperly deprived of any property, then I say no church was ever more liberally dealt with than the Irish Church when it ceased to be the nominal church of the nation—a thing which the hon. gentleman well knows it never was really; and we know that a very large proportion of the funds that belonged to it were assigned to the individual members of it. Sir, I do not believe there ever has been found a case in which, under similar circumstances, the members of any church were more liberally dealt with than the members of the Irish Church; and any man who has seen the mode in which the services of that church was administered, and the mode in which that establishment was kept up, knows that it was a crying shame and injustice to the majority of the people of Ireland that that course had not been taken long before. He tells us, Sir, that he looked with apprehension on the resolutions as they were originally framed, and he goes on to tell us that no doubt the hon. member member for Victoria was well advised when he amended them. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman makes that statement with cause; I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman, when he calls them well advised, speaks with proper respect to the advice which he himself gave; I have no doubt that they were carefully and well considered over by the hon. gentleman and the hon. member for Victoria, and although I do not question the motives of that hon. gentleman, still I say that in the main I agree with my hon. friend beside me, that the resolutions as he originally proposed them were better adapted to his purpose, and likely to have more effect than the weaker ones which he has subsequently submitted. The hon. gentleman tells us that my hon. friend beside me had no business whatever to make any attack on the land system of Ireland or on the landlords who ruled Ireland; and he tells us, with a certain amount of truth, that it may be ill-advised to do so, because the Parliament of Great Britain is almost entirely dominated in both branches by the landlord interest. Sir, could there be a stronger argument advanced than the argument used by that hon. gentleman in favor of the proposition of Home Rule for Ireland? Does he not know that at this present moment the landlords are on one side and the vast majority of the Irish people on the other? Does he not know that of the 108 Irish representatives on the floor of Parliament, a large portion are not landlords or representatives of landlords, and are pledged to Home Rule? And if he be correct, although I do not think he is, in saying that the landlord interest is paramount in the House of Commons, he supplies, I repeat, the strongest argument that could possibly be supplied, why the destinies of the Irish people should not be left to depend entirely on the caprice or the decisions of such an assemblage. Sir, the hon. gentleman tells us that he desires that none of his friends should in this matter vote against their consciences. Well, Sir, unless the hon. gentleman has been much misrepresented, but a few months have elapsed since at a meeting which he attended in the city of Toronto, he was good enough to tell his followers that he did not want them to support the Government when they were right but when they were wrong; and this is the man who first attacks my hon. friend for insincerity, and then tells his followers that he does not want them to vote against their consciences when he does not particularly desire or want them to do so. Now, as I understand, there are two questions in these resolutions. One is a question of fact. I agree with the mover, with my hon. friend beside me, and with the hon. Minister himself, in thinking that only in circumstances of an extreme character would we be justified in offering any formal expression of opinion to the British people; but, Sir, no man who knows anything of the state of Ireland for the past thirty years at least, no man who has paid any attention to the way in which that country has, from decade to decade, been depopulated, no man who knows anything of the condition in which the vast mass of the Irish people live, can pretend to say that the condition of Ireland does not warrant every man in the British dominions who has any connection with Ireland in expressing his opinion—and that is all we propose to do—that that condition is eminently unsatisfactory, that the condition of the Irish people is one to which no civilized people before have ever been reduced, and that no exertion is too great, no measure too stringent or too drastic, if it will give relief and satisfaction to the Irish people. My hon. friend alluded to the extraordinary depopulation which had taken place in Ireland. That, Sir, will bear a few words of further remark. It is well known that prior to the Irish famine the population of Ireland approached 9,000,000 of people; 8,750,000—I speak from memory—was, I believe, the estimated population of Ireland by the Census in the year 1846. Five years from that time that population had fallen to 6,500,000, in ten years to 5,750,000, in ten years more to 5,400,000, and in thirty-five years it had fallen to 5,159,000. Now, Sir, no man who has paid any attention to the way in which population moves can fail to know that these figures in themselves alone reveal a tale of depression, a tale of distress, a tale of misgovernment, such as no other country in Europe can show. It is well known that men of the most opposite opinions, men as wide apart as Mr. Carlyle and Mr. Lecky, who differ in all other points almost, agree in this, that the whole condition, the whole Government of Ireland, not for the time my hon. friend speaks of, but for centuries back, has been such as to call for the reprobation of the whole civilized world. And though I would deprecate as much as any man acts committed by many of those people within the last few years—although I am not a friend of anarchy, or of communism—still I am bound to say that nothing the law can do ought to be omitted to provide a better means of existence, greater means of comfort, and of leading a reasonable Christian-like life than have recently been within the power of the Irish people. But I will not waste words on a point which the universal concurrence of all impartial observers bears out. From my own knowledge of the condition of the people of Ireland, I can say it has been such as to deprive any Irishman of bettering his condition so long as he remained in Ireland. I shall proceed to consider what is perhaps more pertinent to our present purpose, our rights as subjects of the Dominion to express our opinion on this point. In the first place the whole composition of our people, which is to a large extent an Irish-Scotch colony rather than an English one, gives us a very large interest indeed in this Irish question. It is well known that we have not succeeded in obtaining as large a proportion as could be desired of Irish immigration, probably one-fourth of the English-speaking part of our inhabitants are Irish by birth or descent. It is only too well known what that great mass of Irishmen must bring with their descendants. Several millions who have gone to the United States have been unfortunately, I am sorry to say, but not unnaturally, imbued with a feeling of very bitter hostility to the English people and the English institutions. Now, how has that reacted upon us? Does not every man know that the whole position of Canada has been jeopardized, not once, but again and again, by reason of the animosity felt toward us by Irish Americans? Must I recall to the memory of hon. members the fact that for five or six years together we were obliged to stand in arms against attempted inroads on the part of these people, and that hundreds of thousands of dollars of the people of Canada, and many valuable lives, were sacrificed to repel those invasions. And must I, in the last place, recall to mind this unfortunate disgraceful fact that the Government of England proved themselves quite unable either to exact any reparation for those inroads. I am willing to make all reasonable concessions for the sake of peace. I know how deeply our interests are involved in maintaining friendly relations with the great people opposite; so I am always desirous to speak of them with the utmost possible consideration, but no such consideration should warrant the British Government in consenting, as they did, at the time of that ignominious capitulation, to forego our just right to have satisfaction for the outrages committed on us by the Fenians, and at the same time to consent to reparation for injuries inflicted on American commerce by cruisers fitted out in British ports. I believe it is not one of the least reproaches against the hon. Premier that he is the first Minister of Canada who put his signature to a treaty which practically deprived us of all right, or power at any rate, of enforcing our just rights in that matter, or of obtaining any satisfaction. We stand in a position such as no other colony of England does or can occupy. We have experienced in our proper person the bitter fruits of the English misgovernment of Ireland for many years; and we therefore have the right which belongs to men who have suffered injuries to lend our advice to the Throne in this matter, if in no other. Moreover, as was observed justly by the hon. member for West Durham, we have special grounds for saying that we ourselves having tried the experiment for nearly fifty years, having previously had a different form of Government, are able to speak with knowledge and experience of the advantages of a local form of Government for Provinces of widely different character. No man, I think, at any rate no man who really desires the welfare of his country, will desire to see the old Legislative Union brought about. Therefore, having so far, with reasonable success, carried out this project, which the best statesmen are admitting would be a very desirable thing to carry out in England and in Ireland, we are able to speak with some authority on that branch of the subject. It is no secret, it has been no secret for many years, that English statesmen of the highest rank—Mr. Gladstone himself and a great many others of equal note—have been obliged to point out again and again that the attempt to carry on the enormous affairs of the British Empire in a Parliament charged with the pettiest local details as well as the most important issues, was, from the very multitude of affairs thrust upon their hands, becoming a failure. What is it, at this moment, the British Parliament are engaged in doing? They have got great questions to decide. They have this burning question before them, yet almost their whole time until now has been taken up in devising some means whereby the very cumbrous procedure may be simplified and they may be able to carry on their ordinary business. I cannot but regret that the right hon. the First Minister should have taken the line he did towards my hon. friends. My hon. friend had a right to speak as he did.

This is a subject on which he has thought long and thought well. He, if not an Irishman born, is so closely connected with Irishmen and Irish interests that he may be pardoned for feeling warmly and expressing himself warmly. I can well believe, as the right hon. the First Minister has stated, that my hon. friend's speech will be read and pondered on and quoted largely by many men in England, but I differ entirely from the views taken by the hon. gentleman that Mr. Gladstone will be so small minded as to take umbrage at the expressions my hon. friend has used. I say the fact that this House will pass, as I hope it will, by an overwhelming majority, these resolutions, will have the effect of showing Mr. Gladstone and the people of England that this question of the right of settlement of the wrongs of Ireland is much more than a mere question affecting the British Isles, that it affects in the largest and highest degree the British Empire, and we still believe that until the wrongs of Ireland are fully redressed, the British Empire will be shorn of a very large part of the strength, not to speak of the honor and dignity that properly belongs to it.

Mr. WRIGHT. It appears to me that the resolutions introduced by the hon. member for Victoria, are couched in such loyal, liberal and appropriate terms, as to merit the favorable consideration of every member of this House. That a state of things exist in Ireland discreditable to the Empire, and discreditable to the civilization of the nineteenth century, must be admitted by every one. If this evil is to become chronic, if this deadly canker is to eat up and destroy the Irish body politic, then we must mourn the destruction of a gallant and generous people. Connected with us by the closest tie of consanguinity, and whose history is bound up with many of the brightest and some of the darkest portions of that of the Empire, I think that, under the circumstances, the Canadian Parliament might with propriety suggest that a great political problem which has received a favorable solution in Canada, might, by the application of the same methods, produce the same results in Ireland; that the concession of a system of self-government similar to our own, and an amelioration of the landed system, might make Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland as happy, contented, prosperous and loyal, as are Her Majesty's subjects in Canada. It may be said that we have nothing to do with this matter, and that this Parliament has no right to discuss the condition of things which exist in another part of the Empire. We might be told that it is ultra vires, and that the inferior cannot advise or dictate to the superior Legislature; but I would submit that what touches the honor and well-being of one part of the Empire touches the honor of all. At any rate, we are free men, in a free Parliament, and from time immemorial every British subject has had the right to lay his petitions and remonstrances at the foot of the Throne. Only the other day when Her Majesty's life was attacked by a vile assassin, it was thought right and proper that the Canadian Parliament should give expression to the feelings of loyalty and devotion which animated the whole Canadian people. If this was fitting in a case affecting Her Majesty's life, it cannot, surely, be improper in a case affecting Her Majesty's honor, for Her Majesty's honor is intimately concerned with whatever affects the well-being and good government of every portion of Her Dominions. We have a great destiny before us. It has fallen to our lot to build up and maintain a great Dominion for Her Majesty in the northern part of this continent. We are bound to hold against all odds, this outpost of the Empire. It is, therefore, of the greatest importance to us that every ship that crosses the Atlantic should be freighted with gallant and generous defenders, and not with deadly and dangerous foes. It is of the greatest importance to us that the men who come to aid us in this great work should honor and revere British institutions, and not be imbued with feelings of hatred and horror of the English name.

Contrast the condition of things which exists in Ireland with what exists in Canada to-day. Every one must have read with feelings of pain the reports of the progress of Her Majesty's Secretary, Mr. Forster, through Ireland. In his visit that gentleman was protected by an army of soldiers and policemen. It was regarded as a most daring act that Her Majesty's representative was able to pass through that portion of Her Dominions with safety. These reports remind us of Russian, and not English life. One can fancy such things occurring under the sway of the Czar, but not under the rule of the noblest monarch and the most loving woman that ever the sun shone upon. In Canada Her Majesty's representative is protected only by his own nobility of nature, and by the love, loyalty and respect of the entire body of the Canadian people. It will be a happy day for Ireland and the Empire when her people are as happy and contented as the people of Canada. The history of Ireland is a sad one. All historians and statesmen agree as to this. Mr. Goldwin Smith tells us: "that during one period of the reign of Queen Elizabeth the eagles took wing and flew to the Spanish main while the vultures swooped down on unhappy Ireland. And from that day to this they have never left her. With sharp beaks and cruel claws they have tugged at the heart-strings of these unhappy people." All classes, Protestant and Catholic, have become the victims of these birds of prey. The race of Valentine McClutchey, the vulture tribe, fattened and still fatten on this unholy feast. It has been one long saturnalia of the landlord, the middleman, the informer, the process-server, and the Sheriff. Ireland, like a caged eagle, has beaten its wings against the bars in a vain attempt to escape from the talons of its tormentors. The best and the proudest of her sons were forced to seek in foreign lands that prosperity and position denied in their own. We are told that a like fate befel the Jewish people, and that on a dark night Jerusalem agonized and died. The great city was lost to the Jewish people, but they took the world in exchange. The Irish land was lost to the Irish people, but practically they took the world in exchange. By dint of dauntless valor and patient perseverance, they succeeded in obtaining that position in foreign lands which was denied them in their own. Only in Ireland were Irishmen outlawed from human reason and justice. In the face of what Lord Beaconsfield calls this great misgovernment, it will be well to consider what has been suggested as a remedy for these evils. The main object of every Government is the greatest good for the greatest number, and in almost every country in Europe this has been observed, except in England and Ireland. The rule has been to give the land to the many instead of to the few. The most practical suggestion for the relief of the Irish has been resolved into three propositions: 1st. A local system of self-government similar to that which exists in Canada. 2nd. A re-arrangement of the landed system, so that the land may be divided among the Irish people, the landlords to be paid in full for their property, and the land resold to the Irish people. 3rd. In sections which are over-populated, emigration is the remedy proposed. Some years ago, I was introduced by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to an English gentleman, of the name of Tukey, who had given much attention to this subject. He had, I believe, been Commissioner for Mr. Gladstone for the sale of the glebe lands belonging to the Disestablished Church. He informed me that the lands had been sold in small parcels to the peasantry. I understood him to say that sales had been made to ten thousand people, and in every case the payments had been promptly met. The result being that some of the most disorderly districts in Ireland had been converted into the most peaceable and law-abiding. His remedy for the existing evils was the elimination of the landlords, and the establishment of a peasant proprietary, self-rule and emigration from over-populated districts to Canada. He asked me as to the condition of the Irish people who settled in Canada. I was happy to be able to inform him that they were just as happy, contented, prosperous and loyal as any other portion of Her Majesty's subjects. That the Irish people were men of marked ability, energy, and enterprise. They had secured by their sterling qualities some of the finest positions in the country. They have become Ministers of the Crown, Members of Parliament, Judges, eminent Lawyers, Wardens and Mayors, and are prominent as successful agriculturists. These men were succeeded by another class of emigrants, the survivors of the Irish famine. These also have been successful under discouraging circumstances. I recollect a visit I made to a newly-settled township. Our meeting was in the open air, in the very heart of the forest. I was much struck by the appearance of the settlers as they came to the place of meeting; some were suffering with fever and privation, and were most unhappy. They looked as if they had escaped from some beleaguered city, where plague, pestilence, and famine had done their deadly work. They were imbued with an awful hatred of the English name, and every man had his tale of wrong oppression, misrule and outrage to tell. A few years after I revisited this scene; it was transformed as if by magic. The dauntless valor, the patient perseverance of the exiles had done their work. The forest had been replaced by broad fields covered with waving grain. The tall pines had given place to pleasant farm-houses. The pallid looks and wasted forms had been replaced by the hues of health and the strength of manhood. Stalwart sons and blooming daughters gathered about the hearthstone, and altogether they were as contented and happy a population as ever the sun shone on. If to-day Her Majesty's throne was attacked, among the first to rally round the English flag would be the gallant exiles and their descendants. We have been told that the Irish are malcontent, and will never be satisfied, we have been told that they are unable to govern themselves, and we are pointed to the outrages so frequently occurring that disgrace a noble cause, and a gallant and generous people. It is admitted by every right-thinking man that these outrages should be sternly suppressed. No country is worth living in where life and property are not protected. It is a proof of what Lord Beaconsfield calls the great misgovernment, that life and property are not protected in Ireland. It is likewise a proof that there is something radically wrong when a Government is unable to perform its natural and legitimate functions. I think that Lord Macaulay has considered a similar state of things in terms which are singularly applicable to the Ireland of to-day. He refers to the outrages that occurred during the great English rebellion:

"We are not careful to answer in this matter. These charges, were they infinitely more important, would not alter our opinion of an event which makes us to differ from the serfs who crouch beneath despotic sceptres. Many evils are, no doubt, produced by civil war, they are the price of liberty. Is the acquisition worth the sacrifice; it is the nature of the devil of tyranny to tear and rend the body which it leaves. Are the miseries of continued possession less terrible than the struggles of the tremendous exertion. If it were possible that a people brought up under an intolerant and arbitrary system could subvert that system without acts of cruelty, half the objections to despotic power would be removed; we should in that case be compelled to acknowledge that it produced no pernicious effects. We deplore the outrages which accompany revolution, but the more violent the outrages, the more we feel that a revolution was necessary; the violence of those outrages will be proportioned to the ferocity and ignorance of the people, and the ferocity and ignorance of the people will be proportioned to the oppression and degradation under which they have been accustomed to live. The Government had prohibited free discussion and had done its best to keep the people unacquainted with their duties and their rights. The retribution was only natural. If the rulers suffered from popular ignorance it was because they had taken away the key of knowledge, if they were assailed with a blind fury it was because they had exacted an equally blind submission; there is only one cure for the evils which acquired freedom produces, and that cure is freedom. When a prisoner first leaves his cell he cannot bear the light of day. The remedy is not to remand him to his dungeon, but to accustom him to the rays of the sun. The blaze of liberty may at first dazzle and bewilder the nations accustomed to the house of bondage, let them gaze on and they will be soon able to bear it. In a few years men learn to reason, the extreme violence of opinion subsides, hostile theories correct each other, the scattered elements of truth cease to contend and begin to coalesce, at length a system of justice and order is educed out of chaos. Many politicians of our time are in the habit of setting it down as a self-evident proposition, that no people ought to be free till they are fit to use their freedom. The maxim is worthy of the fool in the old story who would not go into the water until he had learned to swim. If nations are to wait for liberty until they grow wise and good in slavery they may well wait for ever."

I think there are unmistakable signs that the dark night for Ireland is passed and that the hour of deliverance is at hand. It appears to me that English statesmen and people are at last aroused to the necessities of the situation. Lord Beaconsfield said that while they had not listened to earthquake and lightning, that the still small voice would reach the conscience of England. I think that before long the English Parliament and the English people will concede those rights which they claim for themselves. It may be said that this is a question which will create dissensions among our people. I do not believe that this is the case. Protestants and Catholics alike are interested in the solution of this great problem. I am assured that Irishmen and their descendants all over the world would like to see the same rights given to Ireland which are enjoyed by other portions of Her Majesty's dominions. Mr. Forster, at the close of a long and eloquent speech which he delivered in Ireland, concluded by making use of the form of words appended to all revolutionary documents, namely, "God Save Ireland," and I am certain that every generous heart throughout the world will earnestly and devoutly repeat that prayer. We trust that the prostrate form so long bowed in the dust may at last stand erect in all the dignity of freedom; that the people of Ireland may be as happy and prosperous in the future as they have been unfortunate in the past; that there may be the most perfect union among all classes of her people and that they may be guided by wise counsels and just judgment; that they may be saved from their own fierce passions and those outrages which disgrace a noble cause and a gallant and generous people; that they may be saved from the wiles of desperate demagogues, and that at no distant period Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland be as happy, loyal and contented as Her Majesty's subjects in Canada. And that the Irish land may belong to the Irish people, and that with her own free Parliament she may prove the glory and pride, the strength and bulwark of England, instead of being, as she now is, the weakness, the menace, and the abomination of desolation of the Empire.

Mr. COURSOL. It will be my pleasing duty to vote for the resolutions which have been submitted to this House. This duty will be the more pleasant to me as I have had in the course of my life to express on many occasions the sentiments contained in those resolutions. I have lived in a city where the Irish population is numerous, and where we have had ample opportunity to appreciate the qualities of that noble race. On many occasions they have proved themselves worthy citizens, and loyal to their Queen and country. Notwithstanding the grievances of which they have had to complain in Ireland, they have nobly done their duty in this country in circumstances where a different course on their part would not have been surprising. But I sympathise with the Irish people in their desire for a greater share of self-government. I speak from the standpoint of the experience of my own countrymen; no people can be subjugated by measures of coercion. They may be temporarily subdued by the force of arms, but only temporarily; we have had an example of this in Lower Canada. The French Canadians claimed a right of self-government, which claim was resisted by the Imperial authorities, and many of my countrymen were shot down, imprisoned and exiled, but they persisted in their demand, and finally a sense of justice of the Imperial Government granted them what they asked for. Great Britain has granted responsible government to this country, and the French Canadians have proved themselves well worthy of the trust, and on all occasions have been loyal and true subjects of the Queen. They have proved themselves just as capable for self-government as the people in any other portion of the Empire. Now, why should we not grant to Ireland the same rights that we have in this country? Why not restore once more to the Irish people the longed-for Parliament of their own choosing at College Green? I am not referring to past history, but I am speaking of the present position. I remember the words used by that great statesman, Mr. Disraeli, when he said: "It is the business of the English statesmen to confer upon Ireland by policy what, if she were strong, she would gain for herself by revolution." Those are noble words, and fitly expressed. Yes, I think England, at the present moment, could do a great service to itself, to humanity and to Ireland. If Mr. Gladstone, who is now guiding the destinies of the British Empire, really desires, as I believe he does, that Ireland should become happy, he can do so by adopting a bold and straightforward policy. Nothing else can save Ireland and nothing else can relieve England from its present embarrassing position. It is an embarrassment to any Government, strong as it may be, to have a part of the Empire disturbed, to be obliged to keep on a war footing thousands of soldiers and to expend millions of pounds to maintain the peace in a country like Ireland, or indeed any portion of the Empire. Let England, noble as she is, come to the rescue; let her pass laws which the Irish desire; let Ireland have a Government, and see what it can do. Let the Irish people be able to discuss their own affairs, and we shall then see whether they will not prove themselves equal to the task. They have done so everywhere, they have done so in this country, and they do so now. Surely when I see myself surrounded by so many hon. gentlemen of Irish descent, when I see the hon. leader of the Opposition, who has made a magnificent oration on Ireland, I cannot fail to feel that the Irish in Ireland will be the same as here, and I hope the day is not far distant when that extension of Irish privileges will be accomplished. Let England, instead of paying money to keep the peace in Ireland, spend it as it has been done in this country. Did not Canada, a few years ago, pay three or four millions to abolish seigniorial tenure, although it was not a great burden on the country. Did not that measure relieve Canada of great difficulty and increase the contentment of the people? We want to live in peace here, and Irishmen will feel when they land on our shores that they are as happy here as at home. I am satisfied and convinced that no part of the British Empire will be more loyal than the Emerald Isle, if the Government could be made satisfactory to her. I am satisfied that Ireland would prove equal to any part of the Empire if that were done. Irishmen have added much glory to the British flag, because in every sphere of life we find Irishmen prominent: on the battle-field, adorning the Bench, and in every possible position where science and art are displayed, you find Irish names everywhere. Marshal McMahon, the famous general, is descended from an Irish family, like Marshal O'Donnell in Spain. Most distinguished citizens of Irish descent are to be found in all provinces of Canada and in all the other British colonies. The Imperial Government is contemplating at the present time to extend representative institutions to her newly acquired colony of Cyprus. Is not Ireland hundreds of times more entitled to Home Rule than these new members of the British Empire? Let England give Ireland Home Rule and change a tenure of land which is the most backward of all Europe and more oppressive than slavery; for with this system slaves are sure to have a home whilst Irish tenants are not. Let those facts be remembered.

I shall be glad to see the resolution unanimously adopted, and that we determine to set aside in this discussion party politics in deciding to make representations to the British Government, and I am sure that when the interest we manifest here is observed, that our resolutions will not be the only resolutions adopted by colonies of the British Empire.

Mr. CASEY. It is pleasant to an Irishman to hear such words as have fallen from the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol), an hon. gentleman of a different nationality, but entertaining deep sympathy with the Irish race. If anything were wanting to add to the force of the arguments addressed in favor of the resolution it is furnished in the experience of his compatriots in this country. No stronger arguments could be urged in favor of the claim to Home Rule for Ireland than is that furnished by the French Canadians in the Province of Quebec, that a large majority differing from the minority in race and religion have been able to manage the local affairs of the Province, including property and civil rights, without trampling on the rights of individuals. It must go far to remove the prejudices of many a Protestant throughout Canada and the Mother Country to know that a Catholic majority of a foreign race in the Province of Quebec have not hitherto shown any inclinations to oppress, injure, or wrongly use the Protestant minority. Why is it? That majority is placed upon its honor. They have the power in their hands to do right or wrong, and they act honorably. If that majority had been for a long period ground down and oppressed by the minority, as the hon. gentleman says they were for a short time, the result might have been different. Oppression makes tyrants, and if the French Canadians had been compelled to bear a long series of oppressive acts, they would not have been quite so temperate in the use of their present power. But we feel it is not too late for Ireland in that respect. We feel that if a power was placed in the hands of the Irish to govern their local affairs, perhaps gradually and with restrictions, it would be exercised as temperately and as well as it is exercised by the Roman Catholic French majority of Quebec. So much for the valuable contribution which the hon. member for Montreal East has given to this discussion. But I must say a few words in regard to the extraordinary speech which has been delivered by the leader of the Government. The hon. gentleman began by eulogising the temper and tone of the speech in which the resolutions were proposed by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan). We are all aware that that hon. member has the faculty of treating delicate questions in a tone calculated to prevent the trouble that might naturally arise from the nature of the questions themselves. It is not the first time the hon. gentleman has done so, and I hope it will not be the last. It is with strong feelings of satisfaction that I heard one of the hot-blooded race of Irishmen discussing political affairs with calm impartiality and with complete control of temper when he has an object to obtain. And, Sir, I think this speech not only stands on its own merits as a good speech upon this question, but it gains very much by comparison with that of the leader of the Government on the same question. The Prime Minister has told us in effect why the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan) was so quiet and restrained in his manner of dealing with this question. He has pointed out to us that without the support of the Ministerial majority in this House these resolutions could not be carried. He has let us see rather clearly by the tone of his speech that he himself has some prejudices upon this question, and has allowed us to infer that his supporters may have prejudices also, and it must be that the member for Victoria was less passionate in urging the evils under which Ireland suffers than he would otherwise have been did he not fear to arouse those prejudices and so prevent the passing of the resolutions. I think he did wisely, and I hope his fellow-countrymen will feel that it is not from any fear of irritating the English or Irish landlords, or of hurting the feelings of Mr. Gladstone, that my hon. friend was so self-restrained in his advocacy of these resolutions. The hon. leader of the Government says that we ought to take a beseeching tone in approaching the Parliament of England, many of the members of which are Irish landlords; that we ought to go to them very much in the attitude of a poor tenant who is a year or two behind with his rent and begs not to be evicted. That is not the tone natural to an Irishman in conducting a discussion of this great national importance. They are not apt to take a beseeching tone when discussing something which they believe to be due to them, as a matter of right, and I hope that no Irishman will so far forget his dignity as to take such tone on any such question as this. I do not say that we should take a bullying tone. There is a medium between the two. We feel that we are asking something that belongs to us as a matter of right and justice. We should demand it firmly on grounds of principle and on grounds of principle alone, and it is just because the hon. leader of the Opposition has taken that tone and expressed that demand firmly and strongly, backed by the facts of history and by arguments drawn therefrom, that the hon. leader of the Government affects to find fault with his tone—because he did not adopt the beseeching tone, because he was not humble enough. He complains that the hon. leader of the Opposition has found fault with the whole of British legislation on the subject, and pointed out how utterly some of their measures had failed and how others came too late to be of any real value. If those measures had not failed, if all the evils which exist in Ireland had been overcome by wise legislation, there would have been no grounds for those resolutions, and no reason to demand Home Rule. But, Sir, if the right hon. leader of the Government had merely criticized the effectiveness with this House and with the Home Government, of the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition, his remarks would have been unobjectionable, for that would have been within his right. But he went further. He imputed motives which I do not think occurred to any other hon. member of this House. He was the first to import into this discussion that feeling which it was the object of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan) to exclude from it and which every other hon. member wished to exclude. He tried to do so, but I am glad to say without effect—because I notice in the discussion that two of his supporters have alluded to the speech of my hon. friend in the terms which it deserved, which they could not have done had they believed it was a party speech made from party motives; and I, Sir, as a humble follower of the gentleman, repudiate, on behalf of myself and others with whom I have conversed in this House, any intent to import a party feeling into this discussion at all. I think, Sir, that if anything could injure the prospects of the success of this Address when it is presented to the Home Government, it would be the fact that the leader of the Government had attempted to make it appear, perhaps successfully with the Home Government, that the support this resolution had received in this House was due to an intention to secure the Irish Roman Catholic vote of the Dominion. But, Sir, the hon. leader of the Government, in dealing with the resolutions, adopted by no means the same aggressive, active, fiery tone that he did in speaking of the address of the leader on this side of the House. He did not speak heartily or warmly in favor of the resolutions. In fact he did what he himself referred to in the course of his remarks—he damned with faint praise. He “hoped it would do some good;” and in that faint hope he advised his followers to support it. And, Sir, was it because he thought it was going to do some good he advised his followers to adopt it, or was it because, as he hinted himself, the Opposition were not going to catch him advising his followers to oppose anything which was known to be so popular as this resolution? He said we were disappointed at their not opposing it. We were anxious to have this resolution passed. If we were disappointed it was an agreeable disappointment, because we knew, as the hon. leader said, that without the assistance of the Ministerial majority it could not be carried. I do not know that we were disappointed in any sense, because we knew, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has said, that public opinion of all shades in this country is distinctly favorable to the principle involved in these resolutions, to the principle of Home Rule for each part of the British Empire that has interests peculiar to itself. Now, Sir, as to the question before the House, I do not intend to go into the state of Ireland or the remedy therefor in any detail; that has been done more eloquently than I fancy can be done by any other member of this House. I simply wish to say in general terms that it was evident, from the fact that the measures which have been hitherto introduced have not corrected the state of affairs there existing, that some new cure must be tried. It is clear that the cause of these evils does not lie in the nature of the Irish people themselves, because we all know that Irishmen who have the opportunity become industrious and prosperous members of the community, and have as great an aptitude for politics and the different professions and occupations as men of any other nationality. If, therefore, the man who succeeds everywhere else, stagnates, falls into mischievous idleness, becomes the prey of agitators, becomes almost uncivilized, in the home of his race, it is clear that there must be some cause outside of himself for his condition. It has been stated that that cause is landlordism, and there is no doubt that is the chief factor in the degradation of so many Irishmen; but it is not landlordism in the abstract. The hon. leader of the Government asks why we should attack landlords, and says that when we attack them we attack the rights of property; yet there may be rights of property apart from landlords, by the expropriation of land and its resale to the peasants. But there are landlords and landlords. It is the peculiar kind of landlord that exists in Ireland that has made that feature of the case so fatal in that country. Landlordism prevails in England, Scotland and other places; and yet in no place are the results of that system so bad as in Ireland. This is partly because the landlords are absentees, partly because they are aliens in race and religion from their tenants, unable to sympathize with them or take that paternal care of them that other landlords do; but I think it is also due to the fact that these landlords are the governing body of Ireland in all local affairs, and politically, too, as members of the British House of Commons; it is because the landlord is not only the landlord but the ruler, and in many cases the despotic ruler of his tenants, that landlordism has wrought such evil in Ireland. That is the sort of landlordism that could be done away with by introducing Home Rule in Ireland—a system of local government, which would enable them to look after their own municipal and provincial affairs. If it should be found impossible for one body to manage those affairs, if the orange and green could not pull together, there are natural divisions in Ireland which have existed from time immemorial, and each of these might have its own governing body if one was not found to work. If that peculiar phase of landlordism were to disappear, I believe Ireland would be no worse off than any other country where individuals own large estates and rent them out to tenants; and if nothing else were produced but a change in the current of landlordism, even though landlordism itself were not obliterated, I think it would be worth the while of the British Government to try the experiment of Home Rule for Ireland. With regard to the second of these resolutions, which relates to the release of the suspects—the men who are not charged with anything, but who are held in prison under special legislation simply to keep them out of mischief—there is, possibly, some difference of opinion. It might be held, with some show of force, that it is out of our province to give advice to the Home Government in regard to the treatment of these men; but, I think, considering the peculiar and exceptional nature of the legislation under which they are imprisoned, considering the liberty of speech that ought to be allowed between a daughter country and a mother country, that we are quite justified in giving our opinion, and our not too pressing advice on this matter in the terms in which it is embodied in these resolutions. The hon. leader of the Opposition thinks they ought to be made stronger. I think perhaps it might have been better if the phraseology had been arranged so as to express the real state of the case more clearly—not to ask for clemency for these men, but to ask that they should have a trial, and that their offences should be established or they acquitted. As to the propriety of addressing the Home Government on that subject, I entertain no doubt. If I did, I would still desire to see the resolutions adopted by the House, because of the other things they contain; and as they cannot be amended in this particular, I would vote for them as they stand. The hon. leader of the Government referred to the Irish Roman Catholics as the only ones whose sympathy and votes he said were sought for in this connection by the leader of the Opposition. He seems to infer that nobody but Irish Roman Catholics take an interest in the affairs of that country. I can speak with perhaps some authority on this subject, as I am connected with both the Scotch Protestants of the North of Ireland and the Irish Roman Catholics of the South—and the Protestant Irishman of the North is as thorough an Irishman, I might even say as much a Fenian, in many of his views, as the Irishman of the South. It may seem strange to say so, but I know men of the most true blue North of Ireland blood just as thoroughly Irish, just as glad to see a little advantage taken of the British Government, who would glory just as much in acts of obstruction and home rule as any man in the South could do, and these men and their descendants, even of half Irish blood, take as much pleasure in laudable Irish movements as the Roman Catholics and pure Celts. I think every person who speaks in support of this motion, should say he has no sympathy with any of those crimes often, but I hope wrongly, imputed to the Land League. It is disgusting to every true Irishman that people who claim the name of Irishmen should so disgrace their nation and make it a byword. The assassination of fellow farmers and the mutilation of brute animals, are crimes which it is disgusting to see committed by men of Irish blood. We claim they are not true Irishmen, though perhaps of Irish birth and utterly unworthy of Irish sympathy. The member for Ottawa County wound up his remarks very appropriately by the well-known motto and prayer, "God save Ireland." We can all say that from our hearts, and do something more. We know that Providence makes use of human assistance in carrying out His ends. I think we may rejoice that we have on this occasion an opportunity of assisting Providence in His great and benevolent designs in regard to Ireland. If we can do anything tending to promote the salvation in a moral, material and political sense of that island, we may feel we have done something worthy of us as Canadian legislators.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex.) When the member for Victoria did me the honor, and I esteem it a great honor, of asking me to second his resolutions, I had not the slightest idea of the reception they would meet with in this House; and feeling that it might need some support, I addressed myself to the subject and prepared some notes. But I find from the unanimous tone from both sides of the House on this subject that much which I would have thought necessary to have said under different circumstances, can properly indeed be spared this hon. House. I had thought it possible it would be necessary to defend the right of the Canadian Parliament to address Her Majesty on a subject affecting the welfare of the Empire; and I had prepared myself to prove, by precedent, that we were within our right in passing the resolutions of my hon. friend. I think that this matter nearly and deeply touches the interests of Canada as well as the Empire as a whole, and I must congratulate myself, as an Irishman to-night on seeing so many men of Irish blood and descent cropping up in this House, even the honorable and gallant gentleman, the member for Central Huron, has pulled for us a sprig from his genealogical tree, and has informed the House of his Irish descent on the maternal side. I am sure in future we will bear with him "when that rash humor which his mother gave him makes him forgetful." I am free to accept him as a brave Irishman, for I, for one, have never failed to admire his courage in dealing with his foes in Parliament or elsewhere. I regret the passing allusion to local politics which marred the harmony, as a whole, of the speech of the member for West Durham; and I, for one, if disposed to be critical, might take advantage of some expressions in it; I might remind the hon. gentleman of a resolution similar to the one we are discussing to-night, still it would be unworthy of me, as an Irishman, to meet a brother Irishman in that fashion, after listening to the lengthy speech for the benefit of Ireland, which he has addressed to this assembly to-day. It is indeed most satisfactory to me to find that the House is a unit in sympathy with the resolutions of my hon. friend from Victoria. It is more than I had anticipated, because I was led to suppose that some hon. gentlemen had certain doubts as to our right to address the Crown on the subject at all, and that others differed from us as to the view that Home Rule was possible in Ireland, and as to the claims of the gentlemen, some of them members of the Imperial Parliament, who are now suffering imprisonment for political offences to an immediate release or an immediate trial by a jury of their countrymen. For my part, knowing as I do, the history of my country, while I listened with pleasure to the speech of the hon. gentleman for West Durham, I think he scarcely went far enough back and scarcely located the core of the disease. He might have shown what is among the greatest causes of Irish grievances the deprivation of the Irish peasant of the ownership of, or of tribal rights in Irish land. I was glad to notice lately a speech of the Marquis of Salisbury, leader of the Opposition in the House of Lords, in which he laid down as a policy for his party in case they attained power the purchase of the land rights of the landlords on the voluntary principle, and the sale of the land on reasonable terms as to price and time, to its peasant cultivators. That indeed would be a great remedy for such grievances. We, in this country often hear of Irish crimes, and I am satisfied there is often much exaggeration in the reports. I also believe we should make allowance for the people who suffered such wrongs so many hundreds of years. In speaking of them we are not speaking of a class of men who have had the education and the opportunity of the lowest class among us. We are dealing with a people who have been kept in a state of semi-serfdom for centuries, who have been deprived of the most common justice, and ground down under penal laws, such as will scarcely be believed by this House. Do we suppose that remedial legislation brought about in the 19th century can wipe out the wrongs of 700 years. The iron has sunk into the souls of the people. There is not a green hillside or sequestered valley that does not remind the Irish peasant of some wrong, some act of tyranny on the part of his oppressors. When we remember the wrongs they have treasured up in that unwritten history handed down from father to son and which is far more accurate than any published history of Irish affairs, we must make allowances for some of the outrages we all deplore. For my part, as regards the political prisoners, I would not have hesitated voting for these resolutions, even though more strongly couched. I think that to find a parallel to the imprisonment of Mr. Parnell and his colleagues, members of Parliament, we have to go back to the early days of Charles the First, and the sufferings and imprisonment and death in prison of Sir John Eliot, whose sole offence was defending in Parliament the constitutional right of the English people. I find no parallel in 250 years for the treatment accorded them. I do not agree with many of their sentiments. I disapprove of the "No rent" programme; I think that is injurious in its character and calculated to weaken that sense of moral obligation for which the Irish race are famous; but I think they have done much good to Ireland, and I believe had it not been for the agitation carried on by Mr. Parnell and his colleagues the measure of justice contained in the Land Law would not have been dealt out for years. In my humble opinion Mr. Parnell, Mr. John Dillon, and their fellow prisoners in Kilmainham are higher in the esteem not of men of Irish blood merely, but of all lovers of freedom, than are the so-called statesmen who have violated in their persons the rights and liberties of the subject. I believe with the hon. member for West Durham that what has been given has been given, not from a sense of justice, but from a sense of danger. I think it is a reflection on the civilization of the nineteenth century, that a nation which has aided every suffering race throughout the world could not afford to treat her sister Ireland as a sister should be treated, that she could not treat Ireland as an equal or give her the rights which she gave to Scotland or to Wales and the various colonies in her possession, but instead ground her down and made the Irish people feel from generation to generation that they were a conquered people. I have felt it to be a melancholy illustration of the inverse ratio which Radical promises bear to Radical performance that the first piece of legislation introduced by a Government in which Radicals hold the balance of power was a Coercion Act. The Coercion Act seems to be the first piece of legislation that a Liberal Government can for years offer to Ireland. It is really a repetition of the policy again and again condemned by O'Connell when he spoke of the base, bloody and brutal Whigs. They seem to be unable to comprehend the country with which they deal, and fail to recognize the differences of race, customs and situation. Reference has been made to the weakening of the force of these resolutions as now introduced, compared with those on the notice paper—as far as I am concerned it would not have made any difference had they been introduced as first moved. I will vote for them with pleasure and feel that in so doing we are only doing some small measure of justice to the cause which my hon. friend had at heart when he introduced those resolutions. But we must remember that we are sending these resolutions to men who understand very accurately all the niceties and refinements of the English language. We are dealing with English statesmen and diplomats who can read between the lines, who can as readily appreciate the point of the rapier as the stroke of the bludgeon, and my hon. friend's object was to have these resolutions worded in such a fashion as to gain unanimous approval; they are sufficiently plain to let the British Government know the sentiments of the Parliament and people of Canada as regards what would be doing justice to Ireland. I might, did I desire to dwell on this subject at greater length, quote, not from the writings of Irishmen, but from English historians, from Lord Macaulay, from Mr. Green in his recent history of the English people, from the speeches of Lord Beaconsfield and many others, to show what the opinion was of the manner in which Ireland has been mis-governed. But to come back to a subject more prosaic perhaps in its nature, that is the manner in which we are affected by the indifference of the English Government, the question of immigration, it cannot be denied that we are unfavorably affected as regards immigration from the older countries of Europe. With the possible exception of England and Scotland there is not a country in Europe where the emigrants do not prefer when leaving their homes to live under the flag of that so-called ideal Republic, to living under the flag of a country which is connected in any manner with monarchical institutions. While we cannot control that as far as foreign nations are concerned, had the policy of Great Britain towards Ireland been different in the past, we would not have labored under that disadvantage as far as the Irish immigrants are concerned. If I do not weary the House, I would like to quote here some remarks from the views of one who will not be accused of sentiments too favorable to Ireland. Mr. Froude, the English historian, says:

"During the last quarter of a century, nearly four millions of British subjects—English, Irish and Scots have become citizens, more or less prosperous, of the United States of America. We have no present quarrel with the Americans; we trust most heartily that we may never be involved in any quarrel with them; but undoubtedly from the day that they became independent of us, they became our rivals. They constitute the one great power whose interests and whose pretensions compete with our own, and in so far as the strength of nations depends on the number of their fighting men and women composing them, the United States have been made stronger, the English Empire weaker, to the extent of those millions and the children growing of them.

"The process is still continuing. Emigration remains the only practical remedy of the evils of Ireland."

I do not give them as my sentiments. I think there are other practical remedies for the evils of Ireland, but at the same time I am reading to you the sentiments of an English writer:

"England and Scotland contain as many people as in the present condition of industry they can hold. The annual increase of the population has to be drafted off and disposed of elsewhere, and while the vast proportion of it continues to be directed on the shores of the Republic, those who leave us leave us for the most part resenting the indifference with which their loss is regarded. They part from us as from a hard stepmother. They are exiles from a country which was the home of their birth, which they had no desire to leave, but which drives them from her at the alternative of starvation.

"England at the same time possesses dependencies of her own, not less extensive than the United States, not less rich in natural resources, not less able to provide for these expatriated swarms, where they would remain attached to her Crown, where their well-being would be our well-being, their brains and arms our brains and arms, every acre which they could reclaim from the wilderness so much added to English soil, and themselves and their families fresh additions to our national stability.

"And yet we are told by politicians—by some directly in words, by almost all in the apathy with which they stand by and look on—that the direction of our emigration is of not the slightest consequence to us, that there is no single point in which an emigrant who settles on the St. Lawrence is of more value to us than one who prefers the Mississippi. In either case if he does well for himself he becomes a purchaser of English goods, and in this capacity alone is he of use to us. Our interest in him, so far as we acknowledge an interest, is that he should go wherever he can better himself most rapidly, and consume the largest quantity of English calico and hardware in his household. It is even argued that our colonies are a burden to us, and that the sooner they are cut adrift from us the better.

"They are, or have been, demonstratively loyal. They are proud of their origin, unconscious of the value to themselves of being part of a great empire, and willing and eager to find a home for every industrious family that we can spare. We answer impatiently that they are welcome to our people. If our people choose to go to them, but whether they go to them or to America, whether the colonies themselves remain under our flag or proclaim their independence, or attach themselves to some other power, is a matter which concerns themselves entirely and to us of profound indifference.

"Such an attitude of a Government towards its subjects is so strange, so unexampled in the history of mankind, that the meaning of it deserves study if only as a political curiosity. The United States have spent six hundred millions of money and half a million lives in preserving their national unity. The Russians, when they find a pressure of population in Finland, load ships of war with as many as desire to emigrate and give them homes on the Amoor River. English subjects were once so precious in the eyes of our Government, that we did not allow them so much as a right to change their allegiance. When we look down the emigration tables we find only the Germans who are doing anything in the least resembling what we are doing, and the Germans cannot help themselves, for they have no colonies. America is not a rival of Germany, and the strengthening of America threatens no interest of any German State. Had Prussia settlements in one hemisphere and France in another, do we suppose the Court of Berlin would see the peasants from the Elbe and Oder denationalize themselves without an effort to reclaim them? No intelligent person will believe it. The Spaniards and French indeed parted with tens of thousands of artisans to England during the wars of religion, but they did not part with them willingly, nor was the result of the experiment such as to tempt a repetition of it. It used to be considered that the first of all duties in an English citizen was his duty to his country. His country, in return, was bound to preserve and care for him. What change has passed over us, that allegiance can now be shifted at pleasure like a suit of clothes? Is it from proud consciousness of a superabundant strength? Are our arms so irresistible that we have no longer any enemy to fear. Is our prosperity so overflowing and the continuance of it so certain, that we can now let it flow from us elsewhere because we can contain no more? Our national arrogance will scarcely presume so far! Is it that the great powers of the world have furled their battle flags? Is the Parliament of man on the way to be constituted, and is the rivalry of empires to be confined for the future to competition in the arts of peace? Never at any period in the world's history was so large a share of the profits of industry expended upon armies and arms. Is it so certain that we shall never be entangled again in the quarrels of the Continent?

"Is it that the experience of the results of the emigration to America so far has been so satisfactory as to convince us that we have no occasion to interfere with its direction? The Irish in Australia and New Zealand are as well-disposed towards us as the rest of the colonists. The Irish in America are our bitterest enemies. The Irish vote will be given un-animously for war with us if at any time any question between the two countries becomes critical, and their presence in America, and the influence which they are supposed to possess there, is the immediate cause of the present humor of Ireland itself. The millions who fled from the famine carried with them the belief that it was England, which, in one shape or other, was the cause of their misery; that it was England which was driving them from their homes. The land was theirs and we had taken it from them, and therefore they were starving.

"It was their belief then. It is their belief now. Nine parts of it may be absurd, but one part is reasonable. We had superseded the Irish law and Irish methods of management by English law and English methods of management. Landlords holding under our system had allowed the population to outgrow the legitimate resources of the country, because subdivision increased their rents without cost to themselves, and then when the change came, and the landlords' interest lay the other way, they said to their tenants, 'There is no room for you here; you are not wanted, you are an expense and a trouble to us; and you must go.' Their removal in itself was inevitable. In many instances, the cost of the removal was paid for them; but they identified the system under which they suffered with English tyranny, and they went away with hate in their hearts and curses on their lips. Those who went hated us, because they were obliged to go. Those who stayed behind hate us, because fathers have lost their sons and sisters, brothers and friends have been parted from their friends.

"In all ranks families have to learn to be separated. England suffers from it as much as Ireland, and does not complain. This is quite true. But if when the famine came we had said to the Irish peasants, 'Through no fault of yours, a terrible calamity has fallen upon you; there are more of you living on the land than the land will support, and we take blame to ourselves, for we ought (or those who by our means are placed above you ought) to have prevented the multiplication of you where the decay of a single root might be your destruction; when we look back upon our management of Ireland, we cannot acquit ourselves of being responsible for you; and therefore, as you must go away, we will give you land elsewhere; we will take you there and settle you, and help you to live till you can maintain yourselves.'—if we had said this, there would have been at least a consciousness that we had done our best to soften their misfortunes. The million that we might have sent to Canada or Australia would have drawn after them the millions that have followed.

"Our colonist would have doubled their population, and there would have been no Irish vote in America for party demagogues to flatter by threats of England, and no Fenianism at home.

"We are told that Government has no business with emigration; that emigration, like wages, prices and profits, must be left to settle itself according to laws of nature. Human things are as much governed by laws of nature as a farm or a garden, neither less nor more. If we cultivate a field it will yield us corn or green crops.

"The laws of nature will as assuredly overgrow it with docks and nettles if we leave it to govern itself. The removal of a million poor creatures to Canada and the establishment of them there, would have been under present circumstances considerably more easy. It was a question of money merely.

"To send them to Canada, might have cost, perhaps, as much as the Abyssinian war. Had we feared they might cross the border after all into the States, and had preferred Australia or the Cape for them, it might have cost a little more, and it would have probably turned out on the whole a profitable investment."

Perhaps in making quotations of this character I am wandering a little from the subject before us, but in one sense I do not think I am. When we allude to it as a grievance that Irishmen do not come to this country and help to build it up, but on the contrary go to a foreign country and live there in a spirit of hostility to the Empire, I think that the views entertained on the subject by an eminent English writer, like this writer, are well worthy of the attention of the House. I believe it to be the duty of the Government of the day to bring a matter of this kind under the notice of the Imperial Government, and even at this late hour we may yet succeed, with the aid of the Imperial Government, in securing a large immigration from Ireland. I desire to make some further quotations from the same writer, Mr. James A. Froude, the historian, who certainly is not prejudiced in favor of the Irish race. Relating again to this question of emigration to the colonies as against emigration to the United States, Mr. Froude says:

"The Pall Mall Gazette, the Times, and the Liberal press in general tell us that the English intending emigrant can earn half-a-crown in the United States where he can earn but a florin in Canada, and that it is therefore sentimental nonsense to expect or even desire him to prefer an English colony. The fact, in the first place, is not true. There is a better organization at New York for the reception and distribution of the emigrants, but the wages of labour in Canada are as high as they are in any part of the American continent except California, and the cost of living is less. If, however, the American wages were distinctly higher, it is the first time that the chief duty of man has been proclaimed so nakedly to lie in making money.

"Admiral Maury was offered rank and fortune if he would take charge of an observatory in Russia. He prefers a pittance as a schoolmaster in the crushed and still suffering confederacy. At the risk of being called sentimental, I declare that I would sooner myself earn reasonable wages in the English dominions than be a millionaire in New York. The working men themselves do not appreciate the kindness of their advocates. The Irish consider it the fault of the English Government that they cannot remain at home. Those who stay hate us. Those who go hate us. We have four millions of the bitterest enemies in the Irish Americans. We have Fenianism in Ireland itself, and the danger is growing steadily with every fresh ship load which is landed on the shores of the Union. The English and Scotch laborer or artisan has struggled hard hitherto to not fast his nationality. He has gone to Canada, to the Cape, to Australia, or to New Zealand. To the States, so far, he has gone sparingly and unwillingly. The tide is changing at last. The hundreds of a few years ago are now becoming thousands, but there is the same resentment among them which we see in the Irish.

"The English workman does not consider that he ought to be enabled to live at home, but he does not like to be flung aside as if he was of no value. The State, he thinks, ought to help him to go to one of its own dependencies. He, too, goes away bitter and savage with the old country. His friends at home are no better pleased. In a few years we may have, we indisputably shall have, a million or two of Anglo-American citizens with an equally agreeable disposition to do us all the harm they can, and the great mass of English workmen at home looking to America as their best friend.

"Yet, in the face of these phenomena, even the Prime Minister holds up the Irish emigration as an example to be imitated, as a splendid proof of the success of the voluntary principle, and as an argument against the interposition of the State. The emigrant believes himself the victim of injurious neglect. His one thought thenceforward is the hope of revenge. He is a citizen of the great rival nationality, and should so frightful a calamity as a war with America overtake us, he may be relied on to do his worst for our humiliation. The situation is so transparent that writers who still insist that the state shall remain passive cannot be blind to it."

I will not trouble the House with further quotations, possibly other hon. gentlemen desire to address it on this question; but I will say in conclusion that I, for one, consider it a subject far beyond the sphere of mere party politics in Canada, and I never would have seconded the resolutions had I not believed that the mover moved them in a spirit far removed from party politics, and I will not believe that hon. gentleman opposite in addressing the House, as some of them did with evident sincerity, were not as honest in their motives as the hon. mover and myself. With respect to the question of Home Rule I wish to touch one point. I am an Irish Protestant and the descendant of Irish Protestants; but while I am willing to support the resolutions as they stand, guaranteeing rights to the minority I would have been willing to support the resolutions had the rights of the minority not been specially protected. I have entire confidence in my fellow-countrymen. It is all a myth that danger may possibly arise in Ireland in consequence of the Irish Catholics having control of the local affairs of the country. To suppose such an event was to suppose that the Irish people were the only people who stood still for the last 240 years, and that because outrages occurred in 1641, when the state of civilization throughout the world was entirely different, we should have a repetition of such lamentable occurrences if local self-government were restored to Ireland to-day. No; I do not believe that a race so intelligent as to be capable of governing other countries with the most conspicuous ability is incapable of governing itself in the land of its birth, so I am confident that the Imperial Government might, with safety, leave the control of local Irish affairs in the hands of Irishmen. I am satisfied from what we see in Ireland to-day that Catholics and Protestants will harmonise together and seek to govern the country for the good of the whole. Have we not seen that in the most Catholic county in Ireland, a Presbyterian minister has been elected to represent the people in the Imperial Parliament? In resuming my seat I desire to express my conviction that as regards the position of Irish Catholics and Protestants in Ireland, it has been largely brought about by the tools of the Government, whose policy was to divide and conquer, and it was not due to the spirit prevailing among the Irish people themselves. The day was when the population of Ireland, as regards religion, was much more equal than it is at present. The trade policy of the English Government drove the Protestant nonconformists out of Ireland. Their fiscal policy, by which they crushed out the manufactures of the country, drove out those men, those intelligent mechanics and artzans—a policy, the consequences of which were seen at Bunker's Hill and Lexington. I am satisfied from my knowledge of Irish history, from information derived from friends and relatives in Ireland, that had it not been for the machinations of unscrupulous politicians—I speak now of a century ago—the unfortunate differences between Protestants and Roman Catholics in Ireland would never have been brought about. It is within my knowledge as a student of the history of my country, that up to that time and even to a later period the Presbyterians in the North of Ireland were in perfect harmony with their Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen as to the rights of the country and the reforms which were necessary. I do not desire to detain the House. The speech I might have made has been anticipated by gentlemen who preceded me. I am glad to notice the kind and brotherly feeling which hon. gentlemen opposite have shown to us on this side on this question; and that feeling I wish to reciprocate, and to thank them for. That brotherly feeling has enabled me to dispense with much that I might have said in vindicating the rights and exposing the wrongs under which my unfortunate country has suffered. It is my earnest hope that these resolutions which it has been my privilege to second may have some weight with the Imperial Government. That British statesmen may be aroused to deal with the Irish question, not grudgingly and of necessity, not in the old-time spirit of jealousy and of distrust, but in that broad spirit of British fair play which is claimed to be the mainspring of their constitutional system, and that the result may be a new order of things in Ireland, which in turn must most beneficially affect England, Canada, and the Empire as a whole.

Mr. BRECKEN. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House, and I am the more confirmed in that intention when I see the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) ready to tell his sentiments on this question; but being from a Province where, perhaps, Irishmen are more numerous than any other nationality and where we have had a taste in a milder form of absentee landlordism, perhaps you will pardon me if I make a few remarks. I must congratulate my hon. friend the member for Victoria, N. B., (Mr. Costigan), the mover of the resolutions. I must congratulate him, Sir, upon having made a very temperate, a very patriotic, and a very manly and judicious speech; and I must congratulate him, Sir, in presenting a cause before this honorable House that very often people look upon with a degree of sensitiveness; and I think the manly and temperate way in which he has introduced these resolutions has gone very far to win for him and for his cause the sympathy of every free man irrespective of nationality and irrespective of creed. I listened also with pleasure to the speech, or to that portion which I heard, delivered by the leader of the Opposition. It was a practical speech, and it was a resumé of the history of Ireland since 1880. I was not present when he attempted, if he did attempt, to turn it to a partizan purpose, but if he did, I think he made a mistake. This is a subject which ought to be approached above and beyond all partizan feeling. When I heard these resolutions, my first idea was as to how far we could interfere with matters which strictly belonged to the British Parliament and people. But the remarks which have fallen from the leader of the Opposition, in which he claimed that these reforms should be brought forward by the Government and not left to be propounded by the occupants of the Home Rule benches were justified, then I think the Parliament of Canada cannot be charged with officiousness or impertinence in entertaining these resolutions and discussing this important matter. Coming from an Island which has been redeemed from the forest and made a smiling garden by the strong arms of the sons of Erin, knowing them as I do and living among them as I have lived, and being most intimately acquainted with them, I cannot but feel that there is no privilege which any other nationality enjoys to which they have not as great a right. If the Government of their country has been unfortunate, it is time that that unfortunate state of things should be remedied. I am not going to detain you, because no doubt the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has something more philosophical and more original than I have. I may say that in the Island of Prince Edward we have had many thousands of immigrants from the Emerald Isle, and when they landed on our shores they were, in a money point of view, probably not worth $2 a head. They have made excellent pioneers; they have been successful farmers; they are contented and loyal people, and when the agitation against the system of absentee landlordism was going on, I believe they acted in as temperate and as restrained a manner as any other nationality could have done, and when the lands of absentee landlords were expropriated, while they stood up for their rights they did so in a dignified manner. Through the generosity of the Government led by my right hon. friend, a sum of money was granted which rendered us free from that disadvantage, I was about to say from that curse. A prominent member of the present Administration in England, a friend of Mr. Gladstone, was appointed by Lord Dufferin to occupy the position of arbitrator to settle our difficulties. The hardships that the tenantry of Prince Edward Island had to endure were nothing compared with the hardships of the tenantry of Ireland. The hon. leader of the Opposition told us of the hundreds of thousands of tenants in Ireland who held their farms from year to year, and he told us that the practice was that not only the temporary, but the permanent improvements were made by the tenants; and in Prince Edward Island, although speaking generally the leases were for 99 years, and the rent perhaps nothing for the first five years and gradually advancing to not more than a shilling an acre, still that was considered a grievance, and for this reason: The settlers when they first came to Prince Edward Island were poor, perhaps without money enough to buy a hoe or a spade, and they had to go into the forest and cut their homes out of the wilderness. The consequence was that the rents accumulated. The landlord, it is true, did not press them, and why? Because they were not worth the powder and shot. Like the men engaged in the seal fisheries of Newfoundland—who, when they find any young seals basking on the rocks, leave them because they are not worth taking, and return in two or three weeks and slaughter them when they are large enough to be slaughtered—the landlords of Prince Edward Island, while their tenants were toiling among the stumps, enduring all kinds of privations and obtaining hardly enough to clothe themselves and their families or to give them the scantiest support, did not press them; but after they had improved their farms, and were about to lay themselves in their graves after having spent a lifetime of toil, they had not the consolation to know that there was a stick or an implement on their farms that did not belong to the landlords. That is the reason that the uncongenial plant of absentee landlordism does not flourish in the neighboring republic. It has been rooted out of Prince Edward Island, and will soon, we trust, be rooted out of the Emerald Isle, and possibly out of every part of Great Britain. It is a matter that we ought to be thankful for, that when political questions, affecting Ireland, have come to a crisis, fortunately for that country we have had a Liberal Government in power—a Government led by the Right Hon. Mr. Gladstone, who has gone through all the phases of political life from the time he wrote his book on Church and State to the time he disestablished the church in Ireland. We have a Forster, a Bright, and a Chamberlain, men as broad and liberal in their views as the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Bothwell, or the hon. member for Gloucester. And those who call themselves Liberal-Conservatives may raise their hands and thank God that Toryism is not to be blamed for the policy that refuses to redress the grievances of Ireland, and that the howl cannot be raised that if a Liberal Government were in power everything would be done for her. As soon as the sons of Erin enjoy the same blessings of self-government as we do in this country, the sooner will peace, contentment and harmony return to Ireland. I believe with the hon. member for Victoria, that there is no desire among the masses in Ireland to sever their connection with the British Crown; and while we look with horror and detestation at those crimes of assassination, they are perhaps the natural outcome of misrule and mismanagement, and of a reluctance to grant to Ireland those privileges which on this side of the Atlantic we claim, not as a favor, but as the right of a free people.

Mr. MILLS. I was a little surprised at the violent condemnation of the hon. leader of the Opposition by the leader of the House. I did expect that when the First Minister made up his mind to support this resolution, he would rather have made a speech pointing in the direction of conciliation, than a speech seeking to excite party hostility upon a question which it is admittedly beyond our power to deal with directly and efficiently. It is well known to this House that the hon. leader of the Government is an advocate of a legislative union, that he opposed the introduction of the Federal system into this country, and that he has over and over again expressed his regret that the Federal system has been adopted; and I must say that on this ground alone, I was rather surprised not to find him opposing the proposition of the hon. member for Victoria. I thought, Sir, that an hon. gentleman who considered a Federal system of government a very defective one—one which he regretted we had adopted in this country—would not himself have become an earnest advocate of the Federal system for the people of another land. But the hon. gentleman has thought proper to support the motion of the member for Victoria, and I trust in future we shall have fewer attacks on the rights of the Provinces, seeing that he now thinks the Federal system well suited to Ireland. I have no doubt myself that it is of immense consequence to the peace and well being of the Empire that Home Rule should be granted the Irish people. I believe that the legislative union of the United Kingdom is wholly unsuited to a heterogeneous population. I do not believe that any such Government will ever prove satisfactory in a country where the people do not sympathize with it or its legislation. It is obvious that if a legislative union was a failure in this country, it could not be successful in a great country like the United Kingdom. My hon. friend has said that, the Irish and English legislative union has had a trial of eighty years, and has proved a great failure. No doubt of it. Wherever it has been tried it has proved unsuccessful. Austria sought to strengthen her Empire in 1848 when she undertook by revolutionary violence to take away the parliamentary rights of Hungary and to unite all portions of her Empire in one legislative union, and the experiment was tried for nearly 20 years, proved a disastrous failure, and the Austrian Government was obliged to restore to Hungary the rights she enjoyed before 1848. I have no doubt that the Parliament of the United Kingdom will be obliged to bestow on the people of Ireland, in part, those rights which were taken away by the Union of 1800. The people of Switzerland, composed of Germans, Frenchmen and Italians, of different languages and religions, have been a loyal united people for several centuries; and we find the people of the United States, some portions of them favoring universal freedom and others slavery were enabled to exist in one Federal Union, notwithstanding hostile interests for more than a century. We know there are serious difficulties connected with the Government of Ireland, with which the English people have never sympathized. In the first place there are two distinct races in Ireland, one the governed and the others the governors. Ireland has not merely suffered from the want of British sympathy, but from the system of justice administered by the dominant population. We have the testimony of Archbishop Whatley and others to the fact that the administration, as between landlord and tenant, has been most mischievous. In fact Arthur Young, to whom the member for West Durham referred, has told us that if a magistrate were to grant a warrant against a rich farmer or proprietor in the interest of a tenant, he would certainly be called out for it. While justice might be administered between one peasant and another and between one proprietor and another, there was no such thing as a proper administration of justice in many parts of Ireland between peasant and proprietor. The magistrates were, in many cases, the agents of the landlords, and they often issued warrants on their own behalf, in the name of the landlord, as against the tenants, who would be fined by the agent who had issued them. The great mass of the people of Ireland found the law simply an instrument in the hands of a dominant class, administered in their own interest and regardless of the rights of the masses. As a result, the people have been compelled to combine in self defence. So you have had in Ireland almost since the establishment of the union two governments—one the formal government administered from Dublin Castle, in the interest of the few, and the secret organizations which have everywhere existed throughout Ireland for the protection of the interests of the peasantry. That is a very unsatisfactory state of things. It necessarily leads to anarchy. No such thing could exist in a properly governed country. If there was a government in which the people had the slightest confidence, those secret organizations among the peasantry, would never have had an existence. My hon. friend from West Durham has referred to many important remedial measures that were carried through Parliament long after they were demanded by the interests and well-being of the country. Many other changes were required besides those to which he has referred. Many abuses have still to be dealt with, including the administration of justice by the ordinary magistracy of the country. There are many local wants that can only be dealt with by those possessing local knowledge, and to which the Imperial Parliament gives no attention. It is just as necessary in the interest of the Irish people that they should have a local Parliament as that we should have a local Parliament for Canada. What would be our condition if you were to abolish this Parliament and the Local Legislatures, and give the people of this country in proportion to their numbers representation in the Imperial Parliament. Our local interests would be wholly neglected. The important public questions which present themselves to the attention of the Imperial Parliament would be first considered. The external relations of the Empire or the relations between one foreign country and another which might affect the welfare of the Empire would be considered to the exclusion of our local interests. Such a consideration of things would cause the very same dissatisfaction here, that is exhibited by the people of Ireland. When we look at the subject of Federal organization we see that it grows out of the local circumstances of the population. I will venture to say that it would be impossible to establish a single Legislature for the Dominion of Canada that would give this country the satisfaction obtained under our present system. We have many distinct Provinces. How was it that the whole of British North America was not under our Government from the beginning? It was because such a Parliament could not properly deal with the local interests and wants of the population. What interest could we have in Ontario with the local wants of the people of British Columbia or Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick. Serious abuses might occur in the local administration of affairs for want of the necessary local legislation, which would not in the slightest degree affect other portions of the Dominion. We wisely, in my opinion, created local Legislatures to take charge of those local matters. In a country possessing upwards of 5,000,000 people, as Ireland does, there can be no doubt it is just as necessary that a local Parliament should exist for the purpose of dealing with local matters. I was rather surprised to hear the hon. First Minister speak in the manner he did with regard to the resolution submitted to this House by the hon. member for Victoria. It seems to me that that resolution is not at all so decided in the expression of opinion as it ought to be, coming from this Legislature. I do not, myself, feel disposed to ask the Imperial Parliament, as a matter of grace, to set free those who are confined in Ireland for political offences. This resolution does not refer to parties guilty of murder or who have gone about as midnight marauders destroying the property of their neighbors. This does not ask that Her Majesty shall extend her clemency towards them, but it asks that Her Majesty shall extend her clemency toward those who are guilty of differing in opinion from the Administration and from the ordinary Opposition in the two Houses of Parliament. I do not think that to say that the Land Act does not go far enough, or, to use the words of the hon. the First Minister, that it is not drastic enough, is to be guilty of an offence that should be punished by deprivation of liberty. They are not asking for clemency, they are asking for justice, and it seems to me that if this House is to speak on the subject at all, it is a pity it should ask for clemency for those who do not need it. If they are fairly dealt with they do not need the clemency of Her Majesty, but only the ordinary rights and privileges accorded to British subjects in other portions of the Empire. The hon. member for West Durham said the Land Act of last Session did not go as far as it ought to have gone. I think, in all probability, that it went as far as Mr. Gladstone felt he could safely go, and that if he had gone further he could not have succeeded in getting his measure through Parliament. We have a right to say, if we think so, that that measure was not sufficiently comprehensive. We know that for several years there has been a failure of the crops, and the Irish peasant was unable to pay his rent. We know that exorbitant rents were charged, and the consequence was that when his crops failed he was unable to pay his rent, and the measure of last year did not deal with the cases of thousands who were in this position and it left them to the tender mercies of the landlords. The hon. the First Minister said that he supported this motion and that he opposed the proposition relative to the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church because it was a mischievous proposition, calculated to set Irish Protestant against Irish Catholic. I believe the hon. gentleman is wholly mistaken. I believe that nine-tenths of the Irish Protestants who may have been in favor of the State Church have after residing in this country become satisfied that the Disestablishment and Disendowment Act was a beneficial one. There is no analogy between the position of the Roman Catholic Church in Quebec and the Protestant Church in Ireland. The latter was the church of the minority, and the former is that of the majority. The Protestant Church in Ireland was supported by those who are not members of it—by the poorest class of the population, who, in consequence of their zeal for their own church, supported it out of their poverty, and who were compelled besides to support the church of those who possessed the wealth of the entire country and were in a minority in that country. I do not know an instance where the Roman Catholic Church of the Province of Quebec has called upon the Protestants of that Province to contribute towards the support of that church. In what instances, under what circumstances, have the Roman Catholics of Quebec undertaken to deal with the minority as the Established Church in Ireland dealt with the great majority of the population? Sir, there was no danger to the Roman Catholic Church of the Province of Quebec, in consequence of any action that the Parliament of this country might have taken upon the proposition submitted to it some years ago by the late Mr. Holton. Now, the First Minister said that my hon. friend from West Durham was all wrong in what he said with reference to Mr. Gladstone's observations on Home Rule. But he misrepresented the position taken by the hon. member for West Durham. What is the position of Mr. Gladstone? Does he say it is a doubtful question? Does he say, "I do not know whether Home Rule is a proper measure or not, but when you submit your proposition I will consider it?" No, Sir, he says that he is convinced that a measure of Home Rule is necessary not only for Ireland, but for Scotland, England and Wales. He says Parliament is altogether overweighted, that there are many questions requiring to be dealt with that there is no time to deal with; that the country is suffering in consequence of a large accumulation of work in the Parliament of the United Kingdom. It seems to me, therefore, that the hon. member for West Durham took a consistent position in saying that if you admit that Home Rule is necessary, that Parliament is unequal to the work it has in hand; that when you are in power it is your business to provide a remedy; it is your business to give effect to the convictions you entertain and to grant the means of relief which you believe will remove the serious evils that exist at the present time. The hon. Premier says the hon. member for West Durham delivered a long lecture on the evils of landlordism. Now, he did nothing of the sort, but he did point out that serious evils grew out of absenteeism in Ireland, and there can be no doubt of that. Anyone who has read Mr. Taine's book on the ancient regime of France will remember that before the revolution he describes a condition of things existing in France almost precisely like that which has existed in Ireland for many years past. The landlords resided in Paris, there was famine and suffering, and the people were unable to pay their rents, and many abandoned their holdings and took to the wayside. According to his statement, in 1719 not fewer than five million people died of starvation. So they had there almost the same state of things, produced by the same causes, that you have had in Ireland since 1840. Well, Sir, we have, as the hon. member for West Durham has said, and as other hon. gentlemen have said in the observations they have addressed to the House this evening, the fact that this country is very detrimentally affected by this state of things in Ireland in consequence of the disaffection which exists there; and the Irishmen who leave that country do not come to this country, do not go to other portions of the British Empire, but they go to a foreign country and contribute to increase its wealth and become useful and important citizens of that country. Now, Sir, when we find that a people thrive in every country except their own, are prosperous, contented and law-abiding in every country except their own, it shows the evil is not with the race or the religion that race professes, but it is with the Government which produces that state of things—that poverty and discontent which we find existing in Ireland at the present time. It seems to me, therefore, that in the resolution which has been submitted to the House the opinion is not expressed in sufficiently pointed terms that, on account of Home Rule having been tried and found beneficial here, it would in our opinion be found to be beneficial in Ireland. We know what is the result of a Legislative Union here. There are some who think that a Government having a large amount of power is necessarily a strong Government, but that is not our experience. Our experience was that the attempt to establish a Legislative Union here and to weld dissimilar populations into one people had the effect to produce a conflict of races between one section of the Dominion and the other. Under a form of Legislative Union we had practically two Governments. We had an Attorney-General for Quebec and one for Ontario; we had two sets of Ministers, two systems of legislation and jurisprudence, we had one set of laws for Quebec and another for Ontario, one municipal system for Quebec and one for Ontario, one assessment of property for Quebec and a different system in Ontario, so that all those things which a Federal system exists to give effect to we had, in fact, under a Legislative Union. What was more we had the mischief that arises out of having measures distasteful in one Province forced upon it by the representatives of another Province of a different race and a different way of thinking. Now, Sir, it is a common notion among Englishmen that a system of government that is good for England must be good for all the world, and Ireland has been largely governed on this principle. The dissatisfaction existing in Ireland under English rule may be in a large degree a matter of prejudice, but it is necessary to the well-being and progress of a nation that some respect should be had to its prejudices as well as to its intelligent convictions. As far as Ireland is concerned, not only its prejudices have been disregarded, but its sentiments have been almost wholly overlooked. In fact, no important remedial measure, as the hon. member for West Durham has said, has been carried out for Ireland, unless it has been secured by threatened civil war or by a revolution. I know that a Government who will undertake to do justice has a very formidable task because its difficulty is that it has to overcome the prejudices of 25,000,000 of people who reside outside of Ireland, and whose opinions and prejudices in the Government of Ireland have to be consulted. Now let me call the attention of the House to the address that was issued by the late Lord Beaconsfield, when he went to the country in 1879. When he dissolved Parliament he knew that a large section of the Irish people were demanding Home Rule, and that the question would be made a very important issue in the elections in Ireland. Let me call the attention of the House to the view which he entertained of this question of Home Rule:

“Nevertheless, a danger, in its ultimate results scarcely less disastrous than pestilence and famine, and which now engages Your Excellency's anxious attention, distract that country. A portion of its population is attempting to sever the Constitutional tie which unites it to Great Britain in that bond which has favored the power and prosperity of both.

“It is to be hoped that all men of light and leading will resist this destructive doctrine. The strength of this nation depends on the unity of feeling which should pervade the United Kingdom and its widespread dependencies. The first duty of an English Minister should be to consolidate that cooperation which renders irresistible a community educated as our own, in an equal love of liberty and law.

“And yet there are some who challenge the expediency of the Imperial character of this realm. Having attempted, and failed, to enfeeble our colonies by their policy of decomposition, they may perhaps now recognize in the desintegration of the United Kingdom a mode which will not only accomplish, but precipitate their purpose.

“The immediate dissolution of Parliament will afford an opportunity to the nation to decide upon a course which will materially influence its future fortunes and shape its destiny.

“Rarely in this century has there been an occasion more critical. The power of England and the peace of Europe will largely depend on the verdict of the country.”

It is perfectly obvious from this letter which Lord Beaconsfield addressed to the Viceroy of Ireland, that he held that any demand for Home Rule meant disintegration, that you cannot confer on the people of Ireland the right of local self-government, without seriously weakening the bonds by which the Empire is held together. We know in this country that has not been our experience. The Legislative Union which existed between Upper and Lower Canada, instead of consolidating them into one people had the tendency of arraying or antagonizing the people of one section of the Province against the people of another section. It is well known that no such feeling exists at this moment between Ontario and Quebec. From the very moment each Province took charge of its own local affairs, the Union became stronger. So soon as certain portions of the executive power passed into the United Parliament, and other powers were vested in the Local Legislatures, it strengthened, and did not weaken the Union. The same effect will be produced by a federation of the United Kingdom. We believe that our experiment shows this fact, that if you give to a united body power to deal with questions in which only a portion of the community are interested, and geographical sections of the community are alone interested, you weaken instead of strengthening the bond between the people so united. This has been the case with the United Kingdom. If the people of Ireland had been allowed a measure of local self-government, and had been permitted to manage their local affairs in their own way, there would have been no standing ground for Fenianism—for those who advocated the disintegration of the Empire or the entire separation of Ireland from the United Kingdom. In my opinion this House would have been justified in going very much further in the expression of its opinion than it has done in the Address proposed by the hon. member for Victoria. We on this side of the House have no doubt that a Federal system of Government is the only one suited to a large country. We believe a Federal system would prove a great improvement if it were tried in the United Kingdom; we believe it would give contentment to Ireland; that in giving the people control of their own local affairs and the right to manage them in their own way, the sense of justice would save the minority from being dominated over by the majority. Holding these views and opinions, that men ought not to be incarcerated for political opinions expressed in a constitutional way, as many of the Home Rulers were doing, we were prepared to vote for resolutions in which those views are expressed in a much more clear and decided tone than that in which they are enunciated in the resolutions before the House.

Mr. BUNSTER. As the resolution asks for a simple act of justice to be done by Her Majesty's Government in the interest of Ireland, I do not understand why so much time has been occupied in the discussion. It should have been allowed to go to a vote after the hon. member for West Durham had made his able speech, which will not be soon forgotten, particularly by Irishmen. I am sorry to observe that hon. members do not take more interest in securing the release of my fellow-countrymen, who are incarcerated in felons' cells for exercising freedom of speech. Hon. members may laugh at the idea, but freedom of speech is just as pleasant to one British subject as to another. But I for one do not blame the British Government so much as I do the bailiff in Ireland, who has no interest further than to get his percentage for the collection of rents for absent landlords. When a corpse is brought back to Ireland to be interred in a coffin which happens to be a valuable one, the bailiff sells the coffin for rent, as he holds a plain wooden coffin will be sufficient. Hon. gentlemen may think such is not the fact, but I know to the contrary. Many people send corpses from Australia, and they do not send them in cheap coffins. Therefore, when the bailiff with his Jew's eye observes them, he removes them after the wake has been held. Would you blame any person for shooting the bailiff? I would not. If I could not make a good shot once I would shoot twice. I could go on to relate for one or two hours cases nearly as bad as that to which I have referred; but it is bad enough to show that the people of Ireland have a grievance. There has been a great deal said about the religious question in this debate. Where I was raised in the old country, as a matter of course, I was taught that it was wrong to have anything to do with Catholics; but since I have travelled and have had opportunities to form opinions of my own, I have seen a great deal of good that priests have done, particularly in British Columbia. In British Columbia, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you the priests, and they alone, have civilized our Indians, who are now a superior class, and our settlers and farmers are proud of them. There is a scheme, I understand, before the Parliament of Great Britain by which they intend to do justice to Ireland, a scheme to divide up the land of the absentee landlords and allow the tenantry to purchase it at a small rate of interest. I think that will be a great step in the right direction. The address, Mr. Speaker, is sufficiently mild, and I am glad to see it so ably drawn. There is nothing in it objectionable, and nothing but what I would like to see the Parliament of Canada endorse. It will probably have a good effect with the British Parliament in inducing them to grant the prayer of this House.

Mr. ANGLIN. Mr. Speaker, I find, Sir, that it is entirely unnecessary for me to make a speech on this subject. I retained my seat until this hour in the morning for two or three reasons. The first was that I desired to give way to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to express what seems to have been a universal feeling of sympathy for the people of Ireland in their present state of suffering and trial, every hon. gentleman who has spoken supporting the resolutions now before the House. I thought it possible that in the course of the debate, even those who meant well might fall into some errors with regard to the condition of affairs in Ireland which it might be well for me to correct. But I find there has been shown on the whole a knowledge of the condition of Ireland which it was scarcely possible or at least reasonable to expect. The errors have been so few that it is hardly worth while to take any notice of them. There were a few slight historical errors, and some created by the deliberate misrepresentations of the cablegrams to which we have all to resort for information regarding Ireland. I was sorry to find my hon. friend for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) fall into the very common error that the Land League is in some way responsible for such outrages as have unhappily been perpetrated in Ireland of late years. The Land League were not in any degree responsible for those outrages. The simple fact is since the Land League has been suppressed the number of outrages of a serious character, as well as those that owe their importance to the misrepresentations of the cablegrams, have greatly increased in number. The people, driven from the modes of a peaceful and constitutional agitation, have in far too many cases had resort to what has been called the wild justice of revenge; they have taken the law into their own hands, and in many deplorable instances crimes have been committed that have sent a thrill of horror throughout the civilized world. None have more deeply deplored these outrages than those belonging to the Irish people who have Irish blood in their veins, who sympathise most cordially with the people of Ireland in their struggles. But the number of these outrages has been deliberately exaggerated. We have had the most circumstantial accounts of murders which it has afterwards been found never were committed. We have had the full particulars of houses blown up, how they were entered, how undermined, and have afterwards found that nothing of the kind had ever taken place. We are aware, Mr. Speaker, that in England, in proportion to the population, the number of crimes of violence is vastly greater than in Ireland, which is reported to the rest of the world as steeped in crime, and almost reeking with the blood of its victims. In almost any great city of this continent more crimes are committed, sometimes in a week, than are committed in a whole year among the five millions in Ireland. All the crimes in late years have been attributed to the Land League, and were all set down as agrarian. There is no doubt that too many crimes have been committed; we must abhor bloodshed, no matter what the provocation is, but it is not right to saddle the Land League, nor any other league organized openly and fairly for the purpose of constitutional agitation, with all the crimes of violence committed in the whole country—crimes committed often under the greatest possible provocation, which would almost exculpate the unfortunate men who committed them. In that error I was sorry to see the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) fall. He did seem to exempt the leaders of the League, however. Other errors of the same character hon. gentlemen fell into in the course of the evening, but they were remarkably few indeed. I was sorry to observe the tone and manner in which the hon. leader of the Government replied to, or rather commented on, the very able and powerful speech of my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake). I, myself, would have some reason to complain with that speech if I had intended to put the case of Ireland before the House this evening, because he covered so much of what I would have had to deal with. There is still more to be said, but I will not call the attention of the House to a full argument upon the question. The hon. Prime Minister appeared provoked by the reference made by the hon. member for West Durham, to a speech the right hon. gentleman delivered in 1869, on a motion of the late Mr. Holton; but that reference was justifiable on this ground, that the hon. member for West Durham had no reason to know that the Premier had changed his views since that time as to the right of this Parliament to meddle in affairs not coming strictly within its purview. He had a right, in that view, to make that reference and the right to argue that in that case the right hon. gentleman was mistaken, and to anticipate as he did that the views of the right hon. gentleman had in the meantime changed. Perhaps, Sir, that reference was of a provoking character, though I thought not so intended. At all events, the hon. Premier chose to commence by charging the hon. member for West Durham with having made his speech and taken the position he did in a partizan spirit and for partizan purposes. Surely, after the statement made by that hon. gentleman that he had himself, in the early days of the Session, contemplated moving resolutions in this same direction, but going somewhat further, that he had been prevented from doing so by the calamity in his family, in his sorrow for which we all, I presume, sympathized, and that on his return, finding that some of the other Irish gentlemen in the House and the Senate were holding conference on this matter with the view of introducing a resolution, he forbore to move his resolution—surely after that statement, unless the hon. gentleman thought it was a fabrication, it must be clear to every hon. gentleman that the hon. member for West Durham had no party object in view. Had his able advocacy of this question been for the purpose of obtaining a greater amount of Irish Catholic votes in the next election, he would have taken quite another course; it was quite open to him to have put his resolution on the notice paper and to have brought it before the House; but instead of doing that, he chose in a spirit of fair play—shall I say of self-denial?—to withdraw from the position he held and await the action of those other gentlemen. The hon. member for West Durham said he preferred the first resolution to what he called the emasculated resolution now before us. Perhaps that phrase was also somewhat provoking; because no hon. member can doubt that the changes made in the resolution are the work of the right hon. leader of the Government himself. If he did not write them all, I think he wrote the greater part of the amended resolutions, or at all events dictated the changes that were made, his style is so familiar to the whole of us that there can be no doubt on that point. Well, the right hon. gentleman perhaps felt that when the hon. member for West Durham designated these as the emasculated resolutions, it was an attack upon his own pride of authorship or upon himself personally, and in the course of his speech he alluded to these resolutions in the highest possible terms. He also charged the hon. member for West Durham with having attacked Mr. Gladstone—with having said something calculated to give offence to Mr. Gladstone when Mr. Gladstone should, as he said, read that speech. I am glad to think that that speech will be read—that speech so well conceived and so well delivered, so eloquent, powerful and telling as it unquestionably was—a magnificent oration, as the hon. member for Montreal East described it; a powerful and convincing speech, as the hon. member for Essex described it—a speech not only of remarkable ability and great power, but delivered with all the evident earnestness and sincerity which was not only the outpouring of the intelligence and the historical knowledge of the hon. gentleman from his acquired stores, but also the swelling out of his affection for the land of his fathers—that speech, I have no doubt, will be read by the statesmen of England, and give force and efficacy to these resolutions we are about to pass, which they otherwise would not have. I am glad to think, too, Sir, that it will be read by all the Irish people throughout the world, that in every paper that circulates among Irishmen this speech will be republished, and that Irishmen everywhere will learn the gratifying fact that here in Canada they have a man holding a high and prominent position, a man of great ability, who sympathises thoroughly with them and with the people in the old fatherland. The right hon. gentleman also complained that the hon. member for West Durham had said that much of the remedial legislation of the British Parliament came too late—too late to be effective, too late to produce the good effects which it might have produced had it come at an earlier day, had it been the spontaneous offering from the English people, a desire to do justice, rather than something extorted from an unwilling Parliament. And that is the historical fact. Mr. Bright himself is reported to have said not very long ago, before the change of Government, that during the last fifty years the British Government had often done justice to Ireland, but was never known to do justice for justice sake. Every instalment of justice—and some of them were very small instalments indeed—was extorted by agitation, by threats of rebellion or insurrection, or by some other methods to which the people of Ireland should not have been compelled to resort. The result of every one of these struggles for justice was that the Irish people were taught that from the British Parliament they need never expect to receive spontaneous justice or fair play. The lesson was often taught to them that if they were to be well governed—governed according to Irish feeling, and for the promotion of Irish interests—they must be governed by an Irish Parliament sitting in Ireland. The hon. gentleman also said that the Land Act of 1870 proved to be a failure. The fact that Mr. Gladstone himself introduced another Land Act last year is evidence that the Act of 1878 proved a failure. I believe that he thought the Act of 1870 would effect a great and beneficial change in the land laws of Ireland—that thereafter the rights of tenants, at least to the property they had themselves created in the soil, by their industry, would be protected. But the fundamental weakness was regarding the freedom of contract as too sacred to be interfered with, when a short time the landlords found, to use O'Connell's phrase, that they could run a coach and four through the Act. In Ireland no real freedom of contract existed, men bid for and had to take land on such terms as the landlords chose to prescribe; for centuries they and their ancestors had occupied it, but now they had to contract themselves out of all benefits which the law was calculated to confer. In the Bill of 1880 there is no such thing as freedom of contract, and this Act is also defective. Some charge Mr. Gladstone with dishonesty of purpose and desiring rather to build up the landlord system than render justice to Ireland. I believe that opinion entirely unfounded. I believe Mr. Gladstone is actuated throughout by the most honest, conscientious and patriotic motives, desirous of doing the fullest justice to the tenantry and the whole people of Ireland, and I do not think him blameable for any failure. It has been said the present Land Act goes practically as far towards creating tenant propriety in the soil as was possible in any Act that he could hope to carry. I must confess, when he introduced his Bill, although it showed many defects to one so familiar with the condition of Irish affairs as I am, my first impression was that it was a Bill he never could get through the Commons, not to speak of the House of Lords. It was only by the condition of affairs in Ireland, by the height to which the agitation had reached and the formidable appearance of the combined tenantry, under the guide of the Land League, acting strictly within constitutional limits, but still wielding the powers they possessed so effectively as to render the collection of rack rents, but still more the arbitrary evictions of tenants, impossible in many cases and difficult in all, that the English Government was compelled to take the action which ended in the last Land Act. To the surprise of all who know the condition of things in the Old Country, it was a great surprise that the most earnest supporters of the Land Bill in the Commons, were those who represented the landlord interest of Ireland. They wanted to go much further. In some respects they assisted the powerful Act of Mr. Gladstone, and in some respects they rendered it less beneficial than it otherwise would have been. They introduced amendments and struck out some sections which impaired the usefulness of the measure; but on the whole they were willing to see the Act pass, and the fact of their eagerness helped the Act to pass so readily through the Lords. But even then the defects of the measure were manifested. Mr. Gladstone wished that when he established his land courts, and those courts had investigated some cases and determined the rates to establish a scale upon which the rents could be fairly fixed, that the landlords themselves would come forward and agree with the tenants on that subject. And it was reason ably said that after all there would be a few hundred or a few thousands to be disposed of; but those who know the landlords of Ireland and the agents of the absentee landlords felt they would do anything to facilitate a change beneficial to the tenantry, calculated to reduce their own incomes, or more than that, to remove the tenantry from a condition of bondage in which they were placed. It was not merely that the tenantry were intended to pay everything that could be abstracted from the land, save their own share of the coarsest of food, but landlords and agents would come into their families and prescribe how they should live and even the persons whom their children should marry. Even on the estate of the Marquis of Landsdown, who has been held up as a model landlord, it was absolutely the law that if a man allowed his son to get married without the permission of the agent he forfeited his right to the holding, and it is notorious that that penalty has been enforced. That was the condition from which it was hoped this Land Act would relieve the tenantry of Ireland. The hope, unfortunately, has proved unfounded. To-day there are 70,000 to 90,000 cases. The landlords are fighting those cases inch by inch and on the most trivial grounds appeal from the decisions of the Courts, and the tenants are absolutely unable to contest the appeals through lack of money to pay costs. Another point which the hon. member for West Durham pointed out was, this Act does not deal with the question of arrears. A year before it was introduced, the Government provided that no eviction should be permitted for arrears until the Act then in contemplation had been introduced and passed. The people, no matter how they sustained themselves, though in many cases they received relief from abroad, were unable to pay their rents, and arrears had accumulated which were not arrears of fair rents, as determined by the Courts, but arrears running forty to sixty per cent. above fair rents. In cases where an account was open for several years preceding, had a fair rent been charged the whole time, instead of the tenants being in arrears the landlords would be in their debt; yet although the House of Commons recognized the justice of such a provision and passed a Bill to that effect, dealing with arrears, which was rejected by the House of Lords, yet when the Land Act was passed it contained no provision whatever affecting those tenants. They could still be evicted for non-payment of those arrears. The right hon. First Minister should not find fault with anybody for simply saying that the Land Act had not proved beneficial. To-day that question is the burning question. There are many others that demand the attention of the Irish people and of the Government, but the land question overshadows them all. Last year the Parliament felt itself called on to vote $100,000 towards the Irish people. We felt then we had a right to interfere in the affairs of the Old Country by generously voting that handsome sum of money. We have a right to-day to interpose in this behalf also by asking for such remedial legislation as will put an end to their sufferings and trials. At the time this land agitation began to attain its enormous proportions, Home Rule was placed in abeyance by the more active spirits of that movement, because they felt if the people were to be saved and Ireland remain a nation it was absolutely essential this land question should be settled. This very attempt of the British Parliament to deal with this question, and its deplorable failure, has revived the feeling that Home Rule alone is the true remedy, the drastic remedy, to use the expression of the hon. the First Minister, for the situation. The people of Ireland feel they are able to legislate for themselves, they have shown in their management of such local affairs as are entrusted to them—the Poor-law Unions and corporate bodies—a capacity for self-government that has rather surprised those who were formerly disposed to treat them as a people to be ruled and unfit to rule themselves. Mr. Gladstone deserves the credit of being the first, holding the high position he holds, that Ireland ought to be ruled by Irish ideas and feelings. It cannot be through an Imperial Parliament. That Parliament is over-weighted with work and even with the best possible disposition there is a want of information and sympathy in it that renders sound legislation for Ireland almost impossible. We have unfortunately in Ireland a governing class and a governed class, and the former has to a very great extent the sympathy of the ruling class in England. We know also that many of the landlord class hold land in both England and Ireland, and the landlord classes of the two countries are so bound together by alliances and by interests that the Irish landlords in the enforcement of their peculiar ideas, have always had the sympathy and the support of the English landlord class who are still the most influential class in the Legislature of that country. The conviction is growing that Home Rule is the only remedy for the evils and misfortunes of Ireland, and that if the Irish people were allowed to govern themselves according to their own ideas of what is right they would succeed in obtaining such a measure of happiness and prosperity as other people governing themselves have generally succeeded in obtaining. I have gone more at length into this question than I intended when I rose. Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have, with great unanimity, with great earnestness that is most gratifying, and indeed somewhat surprising, accepted the broad proposition that Ireland has been sadly misgoverned and is still misgoverned; that it is to-day in a deplorable condition for itself and a dangerous condition when we look at its relations towards the Empire at large. They have also admitted that Home Rule, such as we enjoy in this country, is the true remedy for that state of things. I join in the regret that these resolutions are not more direct and positive. I expressed the wish from the first that the resolutions, no matter by whom presented, should be so drafted as to give not the slightest umbrage to any member of this House, or hurt the prejudices, if any prejudices existed, of anybody belonging to any nationality or religion. I felt it was of the highest importance, if we moved in this matter at all that we should succeed in carrying with us the unanimous, or nearly the unanimous opinion of this House, and I felt that in order to do that, the resolutions ought to be drawn in the mildest possible manner, and that we ought to ask what we desired in such a way as to meet with the concurrence and the approval of all the hon. gentlemen in this House. Therefore, I have not the slightest objection that the resolutions prepared by a number of members of both Houses of Parliament should have been modified afterwards by the Prime Minister or any other hon. gentleman in this House, provided the modifications were evidently calculated to render the resolutions more acceptable to the House, and provided, at the same time, that they did not give expression or suggest anything that would be in itself objectionable. But I think they ought to have been, so far as they went, direct. They do not deal with the land question, and that is quite proper, perhaps, because Home Rule embraces the land question. Give the Irish people Home Rule and it is to be presumed you give them at once every remedial measure that it is possible they could obtain, because they would then have in their own hands the power to deal with all those matters relating to their internal affairs. But I think that if we thought they were entitled to Home Rule we should have asked for it directly and plainly without the "ifs" and the "ands" and conditions I find in the resolution. I quite agree in saying that we desire respectfully to suggest to Her Majesty that Canada and its inhabitants have prospered exceedingly under the Federal System, leaving to each Province of the Dominion considerable powers of self-government. That is the recital of a simple fact in which we all agree. When Mr. Gladstone chose, in that extraorinary speech he made a short time ago, to admit that the question of self-government has become a practical question, but at the same time to demand from the Home Rulers that they should formulate their demands in such a shape as to be acceptable to the people of Great Britain, he certainly demanded what he had no right to ask, and by making that demand he seemed to wish to evade the responsibility which rested upon him as leader of the Government. If he believes the time has come when there must be a reconstruction of the parliamentary system of Great Britain, and when there must be a central and local Parliament, it was for him to frame such a system as would be applicable to the present state of things and which is best calculated to maintain intact the power and the interest of the Empire, and it was not for the forty or fifty gentlemen who represent the Home Rule party in Parliament, and who have no power to give effect to anything they may propose. I think the hon. member for West Durham offered no opposition to Mr. Gladstone in dissenting from his own views of what the duty in this particular is, and I think that Mr. Gladstone was mistaken as to what his duty is, and I think he was also mistaken when he argued as if he were not aware that there was in existence anywhere in the world a system which might form the model for the system he seemed to think was desirable. There was in the United States a Federal system which might have formed the groundwork of some such system. There is also here in Canada a Federal system which the Imperial Parliament itself has created and upon which he might have formed a scheme to suit the necessities of Great Britain. It is true that in our Federal system there is a considerable amount of friction which it is desirable to avoid, but even in that system he could find something worthy of imitation. It is not impossible to devise a system, and it was scarcely just to throw upon the Home Rulers the duty of formulating a scheme when, according to the English Constitution, it is the duty of the Imperial Parliament to provide for the proper legislation of every portion of the United Kingdom. We do not ask our Governor General to determine any question of the kind. There was a time in the history of the old Irish Parliament, when notwithstanding restrictive legislation that crippled it and really deprived it of all right of independent action, it certainly awakened to a sense of its own rights and without asking the sanction of the British Parliament, it simply declared its own power to renew and exercise its powers. But that was the case of an independent Parliament, having a separate existence, not one depending on the British Parliament, by its own right. To-day, however, there is nobody, certainly no one whose opinion possesses the slightest value or influence, who pretends to say that the Imperial Parliament is not absolutely sovereign and supreme in this matter and may pass just such laws regulating legislative action and creating new legislation or apportioning new legislative powers, as they see fit to pass. The Imperial Parliament has the right to pass such acts, and the Legislature passes such powers as the Act describes. There is therefore, no necessity of resorting to such a clumsy and unconstitutional manner to determine these matters, as Mr. Gladstone seems to think is the only course open for the Home Rulers to adopt. But while I believe all this, and while we are glad to see, notwithstanding our party differences, that we are in an eminent degree showing all the essential excellencies of the Federal system applied to a country grown too large for a single Legislature, we might have said very plainly that a similar system should be adopted in Ireland; that Ireland should be given the blessings of self-government of which we all cherish. Therefore, I do not like the words:

“We venture to express a hope that if consistent with the integrity and well being of the Empire, and if the rights and status of the minority are fully protected and secured, sure means may be found of meeting the expressed desire of so many of your Irish subjects in that regard, so that Ireland may become a source of strength to Your Majesty's Empire.”

I regard that as seriously objectionable and to be contrary to the opinion expressed by many hon. members who addressed the House. We have all declared that we believe Home Rule should be extended to Ireland, and that such extension is not unpatriotic with the safety of the Empire. Some have declared that it has become absolutely necessary for the maintenance of the Empire in its integrity and power. In this resolution we are raising considerable doubt on that point. We are also expressing doubts as to the good faith of the Irish people, for the resolution says: “if the rights of the minority are fully protected and received then we hope” certain things will be done. If there is a country in the world where the rights of the minority, and more than their rights almost their privileges have at all times been respected and held sacred, it is in Ireland. It will be impossible to point to a single instance where the rights of the minority have been disregarded by any body of Irishmen. There have been times in the history of Ireland since those religious differences have occurred, when Catholics were in the ascendancy, when they had control of the Government of the country. They had it in the reign of Queen Mary, and during those years there were prosecutions or persecutions of Protestants in England. Many fled from England to Ireland; they were received in Dublin hospitably and were maintained at the expense of the city; there was again another time when what was known as the Confederation of Kilkenny had control of Ireland, and in no one instance did the minority suffer the slightest injustice or injury at the hands of the majority. To-day what is the state of things? For years and years the corporations of Ireland have been close boroughs, Protestants only being admitted to a share in the Civil Government, and in some cases, Protestants were only permitted to be burgesses. One of the measures obtained by O'Connell was a change of the municipal law in Ireland. The Catholics possessed a large majority in many of the cities and towns. How did they treat the minority? In Dublin, to this day, it has become the rule that the mayor shall be one year a Catholic and one year a Protestant, although the Catholics are three to one in the Common Council which appoints the mayor and six to one in the city. The same is true of other cities and towns in Ireland. With regard to parliamentary representation, one of the most Conservative counties elected, a few years ago, a Presbyterian Minister, and we have every day Catholic constituencies preferring Protestant candidates. I never heard of a case in Ireland where the fact that the candidate was a Protestant was considered objectionable; on the contrary it is rather in the candidate's favor that he belongs to the religion of the minority. To-day the very leader of this great agitation, not the man to whom it owes its origin, but its parliamentary leader, Mr. Parnell, is himself a Protestant, as are many others of the same class, and they are not the less admired and esteemed because they happen to belong to the religion of the minority. Therefore I do not think it is desirable that the Canadian Parliament should, by adopting a resolution of this character, throw any doubt upon the liberality of the majority in Ireland. If I believed the results of Home Rule if obtained by the Irish people would be that the minority would be oppressed, wronged or aggrieved in any degree by the majority, I would never record my vote in its favor. And I believe, Sir, a very great number of Irish Catholics throughout the world are of the same belief. And then the extraordinary expression we find here, is “the rights and status of the minority protected.” What does he mean by status? One has to almost guess that. I am not aware, Sir, that legally the minority holds a different status from the majority, but as a matter of fact they hold a very different status indeed, inasmuch as the majority occupy all the lucrative appointments under the Crown. The law prohibits the appointment of a Catholic Lord Lieutenant. There has never been a Catholic Secretary, and at the Castle I have never known more than one or two Catholics in important offices. There are a few Catholic judges, and several Catholic lawyers have forced their way to the bench; but though the great majority of the lawyers are Catholics the great majority of judges are Protestants. Is that what he meant by the status of the minority? Are we to ask that they are to be put on an equal footing with the majority?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Lord Lieutenant is the only one.

Mr. ANGLIN. Does the hon. gentleman mean that for all time to come that that shall continue?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He is a representative of the Queen. The Constitution provides that the Sovereign must be a Protestant.

Mr. ANGLIN. I am aware of that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well, it is held by constitutional lawyers that the office of representative of the Sovereign there—the Lord Lieutenant is a Viceroy—must be a Protestant also.

Mr. ANGLIN. I am aware of that, but that is a matter that can be changed by due course of law.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes.

Mr. ANGLIN. Materially it was not a matter of much consequence, but considered as one of sentiment and believing it is a matter of very great consequence that we are by law prohibited from occupying that office.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think so. I would be glad to see it repealed.

Mr. ANGLIN. I am trying to find out what this means, "the status of the minority is to be protected and secured." That is the only case in which the law makes any difference. I think it would have been very much better if those words were omitted. I shall not propose that they be omitted, in fact under the rules I could not, but I do not want to do anything that would prevent the unanimous passage of these resolutions. I think it of the greatest possible importance that they should be passed unanimously and the people and Government of England should hear us with one voice ask that Home Rule be granted to Ireland. There is another point I object to in these resolutions, that is, with regard to those called suspects. The passage says:

"We would further express a hope that the time has come when Your Majesty's clemency may, without injury to the interests of the United Kingdom, be extended to those persons who are now imprisoned in Ireland charged with political offences only, and the inestimable blessing of personal liberty restored to them."

I hope the hon. leader of the Government misunderstood the remarks made, for if not he treated very unfairly what was said by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). He assumed that the hon. gentleman wished to ask that persons charged with the most serious offences should be set free, that the jail doors of Ireland should be thrown open, and that persons guilty of the most enormous offences be allowed to go out. The hon. member never stated anything of the kind, and I cannot understand how the leader of the Government could have misunderstood him. What he did say and what I am prepared to repeat is that men who have been arbitrarily arrested and who are arbitrarily held in prison on no charge whatever, but on the extraordinary charge that there are reasons of their being suspected of committing some crime, and this in a country supposed to enjoy the glorious privileges of a British constitution, surely, Sir, it is a monstrous state of things that the Government of the country should sweep over that country, and upon information furnished it, may be by the very members of that landlord class who are affected by this agitation, and have learned to hate the agitators, seize them and put them into prison, without trial or hearing of any kind, merely because it is said they are reasonably suspected of being guilty of some political crime. These men deny that they are offenders of any kind. I find that there are, according to a telegram we received a few days ago, 510 of these men now in prison throughout Ireland, some not charged with political offences at all. There are men imprisoned for being suspected of murder, of arson, of violence against the person, others of provoking, others to like crimes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The original resolutions which, I believe, the hon. gentleman saw and approved of, referred to the political prisoners in much the same terms as these.

Mr. ANGLIN. The original resolutions were defective in that respect, and I should probably have spoken of them in the same way that I am speaking of the present ones. Among these prisoners are such men as Mr. Parnell, a member of the British Parliament, a man of high character, of whom no one has ever been able to say that he has ever been guilty of any crime even the most venial; Mr. Dillon, another member of Parliament, as well as four or five others also members of the House, are also among the suspects accused of being suspected of the same treasonable practices. Mr. Arthur O'Connor, in Parliament, succeeded in extorting from the Irish Attorney-General an admission that a warrant was awaiting him should he ever set foot in Ireland, and yet he had the right to sit in Parliament the peer of any member there. He challenged the Government to put him on trial, that he was prepared to meet the charge against him openly, moving all plea of want of jurisdiction. That challenge was, of course, not accepted. That is a state of affairs that is, in my opinion, utterly unjustifiable and inadvisable. I have always deeply regretted, with my great regard for Mr. Gladstone and my high opinion of his ability and honesty of purpose, that he has allowed himself to be driven to resorting to means of this kind for the purpose of suppressing crime in Ireland. Some state, and not without some show of reason, that for the mere indulgence of personal spleen or pique he allowed himself to resort to measures which in history will attach to his name a stigma that I would gladly see removed from it. But we ought to ask for these men no clemency; when we ask for clemency, we place them in a position from which clemency only can relieve them. They would not ask clemency for themselves, Sir; they ask for justice and fair play; and only what they would ask for themselves should their friends ask for them. I would be ashamed, were I the mover of that resolution, to ask for clemency; I would ask for a trial and fair play. I know it has been said that it would be useless to put these men on their trial—that it is impossible to obtain the conviction of a political offender in Ireland; but for that there is no foundation whatever. A short time ago a number of persons were arrested charged with being members of a band of what are called "Moonlighters," charged with intimidating throughout the country, with seizing arms, and committing other illegal acts. The person who gave the information, as it turned out, was the person who organized these men. He was himself an old soldier, and when he was arrested by the police, on his person were found a watch and various other articles. That man's evidence was scarcely worth receiving against men charged with any serious offence; but in this case, which was tried in the City of Cork, which was said to be the very focus of discontent, there was no difficulty in obtaining a conviction of five of these men. That fact is conclusive proof that if these men were put on their trial, their would be no difficulty, if they were guilty, in convicting them. I have no hesitation in voting for the passing of these resolutions, but I wish it to be understood that I do not believe in asking for clemency for these men, because I do not wish to ask for clemency for men who have been convicted of no offence. These words were not in the resolutions originally agreed upon, and I am sorry they are used here. I am glad, on the other hand, to find that the resolutions are going to pass unanimously, and that they have been received in such a kind and sympathetic spirit by hon. gentlemen of various nationalities in this House. The hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Wright), I am glad to know, has always manifested a warm sympathy with the Irish people; one of the first speeches I heard from him some years ago was on a similar subject, and he spoke then with the same earnestness and ardor and generous feeling that we all admire in him. I am glad to find that a better sense of the condition of things in Ireland is prevailing; I am glad to find, as the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) said, that prejudices which came with the mother's milk are gradually disappearing. We are learning to appreciate and understand each other more thoroughly, and to find that if one man is a Protestant and another a Catholic, one an Episcopalian and another a Presbyterian, it matters little, that every man should act and think for himself, and that notwithstanding these differences we ought to combine in all that relates to us as a people, by having one heart, one mind, one thought, and one vote.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I am very glad that hon. gentlemen have discussed this resolution in such a calm, gentlemanly, courteous manner, which has removed a great deal of the opposition I had to it. The hon. member for West Durham certainly made a speech that was very creditable to him as an Irishman, and I was proud to hear him, though in some instances he went too far. He found fault with one of the best friends Ireland has ever had in the English Parliament, and that is Mr. Gladstone. But in the remarks made by the different speakers, not one has told how a great deal of Ireland's troubles could be remedied. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down speaks of Home Rule. Home Rule will not do it, unless the tenantry of Ireland own the land; and I would ask, how in the name of common sense, if they get Home Rule, are they to obtain the money to purchase the land from the Irish landlords?

Mr. WRIGHT. From the English Government.

Mr. WHITE. The hon. gentleman has struck the key note; the only way the Irish people can own the land is by the credit and capital of the English Government, which voted the people's money to liberate the slaves, and the world honored it for what was done. Home Rule means nothing without the people owning the land. It is said the late Land Act of Mr. Gladstone was very defective. But who did the most to make it defective? Parnell and his followers, its great enemies in the Commons. I say unhesitatingly that were there a Parliament in Dublin composed entirely of Irishmen, no such liberal bill would have been passed. The most tyrannical landlords in Ireland are those who belong to the Roman Catholic Church, and the most tyrannical agents and most unreasonable constables are Roman Catholics. No reform has ever been given to Ireland but the present Protestant minority has accepted and worked it out most industriously. I heard the words that fell from the member from Ottawa with which all will agree.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh, and interruptions.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to say that I have been a member of this House for thirteen sessions and have never interrupted anyone during that time by making noises on the desk. Mr. Vallée ought to be ashamed of his conduct.

Mr. VALLEE. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken; I am not disturbing him.

Mr. WHITE. If mistaken I beg pardon. I do not intend to say a word to offend any one. But what do these resolutions amount to? What will the English Parliament and Government say of them? The member who has just taken his seat knows well that the great difficulty the English Government has in regard to Home Rule is that a large portion of the people of Ireland are opposed to it. The minority fear it, convinced they would not enjoy the rights and privileges they now possess. I believe the day is not far distant when Mr. Gladstone and Lord Salisbury will find a solution for the great difficulty that now overshadows Ireland, and that if we did not pass this resolution it would be better for the Irish people and the English government. Why should we interfere and petition the Home Government as to how to govern Ireland? Do they not know better than we? How should we like their passing resolutions that we should impose a duty on this or that article or to manage in this and that way the different Provinces of the Dominion? We would deliberately tell them to mind their own business—that we could manage our own affairs. I am not going to divide the House on these resolutions, which can be carried on a division; but I think there is a good deal in them of a political nature. I believe one of the great political parties of this country is anxious to pull the wool over the eyes of the Catholic Irishmen of this country, by bidding for their votes. But a large majority of the Irishmen of the country are satisfied this motion will not benefit Ireland to the value of the paper. I may be wrong, but I think that if a large number of hon. members expressed their own convictions they would use the language I am employing. If we petitioned the Home Government to purchase the land from the landlords and give them to the poor, afterwards Home Rule would come, when the people would manage their own affairs well. I believe also the majority, if they held a stake in this country, would do justice to the minority. The remarks of the hon. member for West Durham as to the sufferings of the Irish people were very true—everything had to go to the landlords and tax collectors; but in many instances the landlords are not quite so much to blame. The people liked to live close to each other, and cut up their farms small and paid high rents for the purpose. Besides many good landlords were willing to spend their capital and live among the people, but they would take offence at them, shoot them and drive them out of the country. I believe these resolutions will do harm by encouraging parties in Ireland to do that which the good Irishman is ashamed of, and will discourage the friends of peace, prosperity and happiness. Trouble is largely maintained in Ireland by parties going from the States, for not treating whom more severely the Government is to blame. If those Irish Americans were kept out of Ireland a solution of this difficulty would soon come, and peace and harmony be quickly restored. I believe that the Land Bill passed by Mr. Gladstone could be so worked that much good would be derived from it, and I trust the day is not far distant when the remarks made by the Earl of Salisbury lately in Liverpool will become fact, that is that the Government will assist the Irish people to own the land, and then I believe peace and prosperity will come to that unhappy land, then the English Government could well afford to give to Ireland a system of Municipal Rule. The hon. member for Gloucester said that he objected to these resolutions because there was a clause in it that the minority should be protected. I believe that portion of the resolutions. It is the best part of them, and will show the minority in the old country that they have friends here who are willing that they should be shown justice and fair play. As a whole I am opposed to the resolutions. To interfere at the present time would only give more trouble to Mr. Gladstone in his anxiety to try and get over the Irish difficulty. Had the hon. gentleman not brought the resolutions before the House at all it would have been much better. What do they amount to? Not the paper they are written on. All that Mr. Gladstone can say, as the right hon. First Minister and the hon. leader of the Opposition know, is that he has done all that he could and must bide his time to see what the result is. I only rise to enter my protest against this House interfering directly or indirectly with the affairs of the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, if I take a part in the debate it is merely to protest against certain utterances of the preceding speaker. Answering the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. White) has attributed to the large Catholic landlords and their agents the acts of oppression complained of by the Irish people. I do not know whether he intended to convey thereby the idea that Catholics were more or less the cause of the oppression endured by the Irish people. If such be his intention, I have to protest, and I do so energetically against such an assertion. It may be that in a country where the majority are Catholics, that Catholics are accused of certain misdeeds, but from that it must not be concluded, in regard to those misdeeds that we are now dealing with, that it is because certain men are Catholics that they have committed the acts for which they are blamed. The hon. member has found but one feature to please him in the motion of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan), and that is to be found in that part which provides for the rights of the minority being respected. If the hon. member is of opinion that the rights of a minority should be respected, the first thing he should do would be to respect those of the minority in this House, to respect their religious belief. If, on the other hand, his words are not intended to convey the idea which they seem to imply at first sight, he should in all justice explain them and divest them of the acrimonious intent which are implied by them.

Mr. WALLACE (York). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the discussion which has taken place to-night on this important question. I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) and of the other members who have spoken in favor of Home Rule in Ireland, and I have still to learn definitely what these hon. gentlemen mean by Home Rule for Ireland. Are powers to be granted similar to those given to the Provinces of the Dominion? I do not think to-day that if Ireland got those local powers it would be any great advantage, unless she also got powers of concurrent legislation. What Ireland requires to-day is what Canada has—a protective policy. No policy could be more beneficial to Ireland than a protective policy. I disagree with the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester, when he objects to pressing the clause referring to the rights of the minority. That hon. gentleman was anxious a few years ago to have the rights of the minority respected in his Province. By the Act of Confederation the rights of the minority of Quebec were respected; and I am very much surprised that this clause should be objected to. I am not very much in favor of these resolutions, and I believe, with the hon. member for Hastings, they were introduced for political purposes. Though I object to a certain extent to the principles contained in them, and to what I believe to be the motives of the promoters, I agree in great part with what has been said, that Ireland has great grievances, and that they ought to be redressed; and that the English Government are not taking all the steps they should to redress them. If the passage of this resolution would have the effect of inducing Mr. Gladstone to pay more attention to Irish affairs, and introduce measures for the relief of Irish grievances nobody would be more gratified than the people of Canada.

Mr. COSTIGAN. At this late hour and after the manner in which the resolutions have been accepted I hope the House will not consider that I am abusing a privilege if I take the liberty of briefly closing the debate. I have re-son to feel proud that I have been the mover of these resolutions. I have reason to feel proud of this Parliament, and proud that I live in a country where these resolutions find such hearty and unanimous approval in a Parliament representing all classes, creeds and nationalities in this country. My object is accomplished, but I must discharge another duty. I must say in the first place that I listened with pride, as an Irishman, to the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition. It is not for me to thank that hon. gentleman for simply doing his duty as an Irishman and as a member of this House. In that respect he has done no more than myself. I think everyone will read that speech with pleasure and interest. But I have been more pained, I must say, by the remarks of the last speaker than by anything that has occurred during this debate. It is very painful to me that my motives should have been called in question as they have been by a charge that I have been actuated by a desire to make political capital out of a motion which I hold to be one of the most sacred, and to which I adhere with the most earnest conviction. I had no political motive to serve in this resolution. If my motive was to strengthen the party with which we are both connected it would ill-repay me by the remarks he made. I was only actuated by a sense of duty towards my people, and I feel proud to-night that I did not miscalculate the tone or temper of the Parliament of this country when I moved these resolutions. I think the tone in which this discussion has been carried on is most creditable to this Parliament. If an attempt were made to give this a political character, I should feel it my duty to do all in my power to prevent it. Objection has been taken to the reading of these resolutions. There is a little inconsistency in the argument of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). If he has proved anything in his able and lengthy speech on the merits of these resolutions he has proved that he was wanting in his duty as an Irishman in this regard. If the resolutions are not what they ought to be; if they do not contain principles which he cannot endorse, it comes with a bad grace from him to criticise them as he has done. I hope I shall not be accused at the close of a happy debate with an intention of wounding the hon. gentleman's feelings, but I must say that although we are not on speaking terms, and have not spoken to each other for many days—and that is not my fault, perhaps, more than his—I must say that I did take the necessary steps to have that hon. gentleman's co-operation. I invited him to attend the meeting, and through his friends, as well as personally, did all I could to obtain the benefit of his wise counsels in framing these resolutions. I think the hon. gentleman might join me, after this happy debate, in thanking this Parliament for having gone further—if these resolutions are adopted—than any legislative body have yet gone on a similar question in any colony under the British Crown. I will not delay the House any longer, but will thank the House for the kind manner in which they have listened to me.

Resolutions agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As these resolutions have now passed the House it will become the duty of the Government to present them to His Excellency for transmission to Her Majesty. I am not at this moment prepared to say what will be the best course for carrying out these resolutions, but the necessary steps shall be taken to have the address prepared and all the forms carried out when we send it to the Senate for their concurrence.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I hope that in my desire to return thanks to the House, which I do most sincerely, I shall not be charged with having forgotten another duty—that of thanking sincerely the leader of the House for the kind manner in which he has received the resolutions.

PRAYERS.

BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I beg leave to introduce Bill (No. 147) to annul unjust conditions in bills of lading. I may briefly explain that the object of the Bill is to declare that carriers shall be liable for the loss of or damage to goods resulting from their negligence or that of their servants, notwithstanding any condition to the contrary, in the bill of lading, or general notices of the company. The immediate occasion of bringing up the subject, I may mention, is that very serious losses have lately occurred in an important branch of the trade, namely: the exportation of live stock from Canada to the Mother Country. Shippers of live stock have lost in some cases as many as 100 cattle, and have had no redress from the steamship companies, but on examination of the bills of lading, by eminent counsel, it was found that they contained most extraordinary provisions. It was found, in fact, that the carrier was protected from claims by the shipper in every eventuality which could occur. It was found that the bill of lading entitled the carrier to full freight upon the live stock, irrespective of the number landed, and irrespective of whether or not the ship reached her destination. It was discovered also that the bill of lading empowered the carrier to throw every animal overboard and set aside the general law of average, which would enable the owner of the animals to compel contribution from the carrier; but, on the other hand, if any other part of the cargo was thrown overboard, the owner of the animals was compelled to contribute in general average to that loss. In fact, looking at the bill of lading as now used, it provides for the protection of the carrier, as I said before, from every claim for damages on the part of the shipper, no matter how those damages may have been caused. Now, the ordinary bill of lading in common use, as given in the latest works on the subject, is very short. It would not cover more than perhaps half a page of writing, and it only contains three or four exceptions, very reasonable ones, such as that the carrier shall not be liable for damage resulting from fire or from the perils of navigation; but the bills of lading in use by some of the steamship companies will cover six pages with various special conditions, and they are printed in such small type one almost requires a magnifying glass to read them, and they are drawn with such skill, and cover so many cases, that it is almost impossible for the shipper to recover for loss of his goods, even if the carrier has neglected his duty or been guilty of wilful misconduct. The principle I seek to incorporate in our law is not a new one. This is simply an endeavor to restore the old common law. Similar attempts have been made before, and in some cases successfully. For instance, in our Consolidated Railway Act of 1879 we provide that in an action for damages the company shall not be relieved by any notice, condition or declaration, if the damage arises from any negligence or omission on the part of the company or its servants. We have something of the same kind in the Act passed in 1874 respecting the law of carriers—I think myself that only applies to carriers upon inland waters—and we have in England the celebrated clauses in the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, which may be briefly described as embodying this principle: That no special condition in any notice or receipt will exempt the railway or canal company from liability for loss of goods resulting from negligence of the company or its servants. That is the principle I wish to see embodied in our laws in regard to carriers generally, and particularly in regard to carriers of goods from this country to England. I hope that, although it is late in the Session, something may be done to forward the passing of this Bill, because it will have an important effect upon one of the greatest branches of trade in this country, namely the trade in live stock from Canada to England.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BUNSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to an item in the Montreal Herald, personal to myself. It is there announced that I am not going to be a candidate at the forthcoming elections. I beg to announce that I am coming back here after next elections.

THE IRISH RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to an error which appears in the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday. I think it was distinctly understood that the motion introduced by the hon. member for Victoria, was carried on a division, whereas it would appear from the Votes and Proceedings that the motion was unanimously agreed to. I would only appeal to the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt) and other hon. members, to sustain me in what I have already said. Many of us were not wholly in favor of the resolutions introduced, but owing to the moderate tone of the debate, we thought the motion might be allowed to be carried on a division without taking any vote. We desire to have it understood that we did not approve of all that has been said in the debate on the motion. I think it will only be necessary to call your attention to the matter in order to have the mistake rectified.

Mr. BLAKE. No division was called, and the hon. leader of the House announced immediately after you, Mr. Speaker, declared the motion carried, that, as the House had unanimously agreed to the motion, he would take the necessary steps for a concurrent Address from the Senate.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I, myself, did not wish to enter into a discussion on this much vexed question, for the simple reason that I am not in the habit of ventilating my opinions as much as some other hon. members. I, however, raised my voice against the motion being carried unanimously, and the hon. member who sat directly in front of me (Mr. McCarthy) heard me.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for East Hastings and the hon. member for West York, said they were going to vote against the motion, but when I put the motion no one said "on a division."

Mr. TYRWHITT. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, I did.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). The hon. gentleman said "carried on a division," and you, Mr. Speaker, said "carried on a division." The hon. member for West Durham cannot contradict this statement.

Mr. BLAKE. I was quite prepared if any hon. member had called for a division to have given him an opportunity of recording his vote; but when no division was called for by any hon. member I allowed the motion to go.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). The hon. member for South Simcoe said in my hearing "carried on a division"—that was the remark he made, and I sat beside him. There were eight or ten members who asked for a division. We wish the motion to be entered as carried on a division, and it will not hurt any one if that is done. I hope the motion will be so recorded, because the hon. member for South Simcoe and the hon. member for East Durham both insisted that it should be carried on a division.

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not hear any such remark, and I waited long enough to give an opportunity to every member to express his opinion by his voice. If such a remark were uttered, it was said in such a low tone of voice that I did not hear it. I am afraid it is too late to alter the record now.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before proceeding with the Orders of the Day, I wish to call the attention of the Government to the fact that Bill (No. 25) to amend the Criminal Laws and extend the provisions of the Act respecting offences against the person by providing for the punishment of adultery, seduction, &c., stands at the head of the list of Public Bills on the Order Paper, and, in all probability, will not be reached this Session in the regular course. The hon. the First Minister was kind enough to promise me that an opportunity would be given to have the Bill taken into consideration, and I take the liberty of asking the Government at what time this promise of the hon. the First Minister will be redeemed.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If the hon. leader of the Government said an opportunity would be afforded the hon. member, he may depend upon it that it will be given.

RE-DISTRIBUTION OF SEATS' BILL.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to direct the attention of the Government to the fact that we are yet without the Bill for the re-distribution of Seats, which was promised in the Speech from the Throne, and which was repeatedly promised to be brought down early. The last occasion on which I asked the hon. leader of the House as to the intentions of the Government was just before the Easter recess, on which occasion he told us that it would be brought down immediately after the Easter recess, and it is quite indefensible that the Bill has not been laid before the House before this stage of the Session.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If the hon. leader of the Government were in his place, I think he would be able to state that the Bill will be down in a day or two.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BLAKE. Before this motion is adopted, I desire to call the attention of the House to a subject which appears to me to be of great and growing importance. I should have been glad to have taken this step earlier and in another form; but the circumstance to which allusion has been so frequently made this Session, that papers moved for are brought down late or not at all, has compelled me, in the first instance, to delay; in the second, to proceed in this form, which is the only form available; and, in the third, to proceed in the absence of papers which were ordered by the House at an early day; but which have not been brought down—I refer to the papers on the subject of our commercial relations with other countries. My belief is that such advances have taken place, such information has been obtained from other sources than those authentic papers to which I have referred, that the time has arrived for a definition of what the views of the representatives of the people of this country are on this subject; and for a definition, as I hope and trust, in the sense of a step in advance. Our constitution, as I ventured to observe to the House the other day, is in many of its features the British constitution. Some portions of that constitution which are embodied in our own are unwritten; and I repeat that with the disadvantages—disadvantages of vagueness, of uncertainty, of the absence of accurate definition—which are inseparable from an unwritten constitution, there are great, practical, countervailing advantages which we have experienced ourselves, and which the people of the United Kingdom have experienced, in the unwritten form of the constitution. The capacity for beneficial change, for development, for progress, without the difficulty which is involved in the change of something so rigid, so cast-iron as a written paper, is an important advantage, and one which has been made available on many occasions with the best results. There has been, as I have said before, and as I repeat, in reference to the British constitution in its application to the people of the United Kingdom itself, an almost continuous growth and development. The underlying principle and spirit of the constitution has been the development of the popular principle of government; and this has been continuously enforced and realized, to a greater and greater extent, as there existed and were made apparent, greater capacity in the people to exercise the powers of self-government, greater knowledge, greater information, greater training on the part of the people to take a larger share in their own government; and what applies to the constitution as it exists with reference to the internal organization of the United Kingdom, applies in quite as marked a manner, in later years, to the relations of the Empire to the colonies and to the political condition of the various dependencies of the Empire. There was a time in the early history of many of these dependencies when they were supposed to be governed by the prerogative of the sovereign, and not by the power of the Parliament. The Parliament absorbed that share of the kingly prerogative, and I am not at all certain that that absorption was an unmixed good, because my belief is that had the Executive power and Government continued in that which was even at that time the weaker branch of the Government of the whole country, many things would have been left undone, which the greater and more sovereign power of the Parliament dared to do; and the measure of self-government and freedom to which the colonies attained, would have been attained at an earlier day, and events on this side of the water, which we are all familiar with, could not have occurred. But, Sir, so it is, that at home and abroad, and particularly with regard to the relations of the Empire to the colonies, while there is no system, while our whole arrangements are full of anomalies, while you cannot discern any particular plan or system out of which you can logically evolve a series of propositions, you perceive a principle of growth, of vitality, of development, and of progress. It would be impossible that it should be otherwise, so vast are the dominions of the Empire, and so variously composed—composed of small military posts, of Crown colonies, of small dependencies inhabited by populations, scanty in number and untrained in representative government, of enormous dependencies also inhabited by persons wholly untrained and unfit for representative government, and also composed of those colonies which, in varying numbers, are filled with a population from the three Kingdoms, and from other countries instructed and trained in self-government, and to whom has been accorded, from time to time, as they demanded them and were deemed fit for them, a greater or less share of representative institutions, of freedom, of self-government. Indeed, no one can survey the condition of the British Empire in this particular regard, without being convinced, not merely that a cast-iron system, applicable to all the dependencies, is impossible, but that the various dependencies of the Empire present, in their conditions and circumstances, in the character as well as the number of their populations, a problem which must be a changing problem from day to day, or at any rate from decade to decade—that one community may in its circumstances and situation, be fit for a greater, another for a less, another, as yet, for no share of self-government at all; and, therefore, taken as a whole, the relation of the Empire to its dependencies must be one of flux, of change, of progress, just as in earlier days, in those days which preceded Confederation, the relation between United Canada and the two parts of United Canada, Upper and Lower Canada, though in form original, was, in its substance and its practical working, an approach and struggle towards the adoption of a federative system—under great difficulties, in a most imperfect form of development, contrary to the letter as well as contrary to what one would suppose to be the spirit of the constitution; but, Sir, the feelings and wishes of the people, their condition, and their sentiments overcame to a considerable extent all these difficulties. And if you look to the form, if you look to the question raised with reference to double majorities, if you look upon the system upon which matters peculiar, or thought to be peculiar, to the people of each Province were disposed of in the joint Legislature, you see a struggle however imperfect, in the days which preceded that Confederation, for that which was a more equitable condition of affairs than that of a legislative Union, the struggle towards the adoption of a Federal system. So here, with reference to the relation of the Empire to the colonies which are capable of self-government, you observe, not in terms, not written in a book, not declared in a formal Act of Government, but none the less substantial, none the less palpable, none the less plain, anomalous it may be, with defects, laxes, deficiencies, with excrescences, with many difficulties, but still you observe the struggle towards a federative system. In the essence of a federative system is the recognition in part of a great community which is for some purposes united—of the existence of separate rights and interests, political and otherwise in different parts of that political community to be disposed of, handled and controlled by the local bodies. And it is this application of that portion of the Federal system to which I refer, when I say that of late years it has witnessed, and in no case so markedly as in our own, a marked development. What in the case of our part of the Empire may be the exact range of the subjects committed to the charge of the local community—what may be the divisions of powers, what may be the limitations upon the rights of local government, these are questions which you cannot answer precisely. The answer varies from year to year, and from generation to generation, and to this question the same answer cannot be returned in the case, perhaps, of any two dependencies. A different answer will probably be returned at one part to that which would be fitly returned to another dependency. Applying these general propositions to the condition of the country, I say that this proves the existence of those conditions which indicate the conclusion that there is no dependency of the Empire entitled to such a proper measure of self-government as Canada. Take simply the question of our number. We number over 4,000,000, a very important number. We are counted only by the head, which is able to exert an important influence upon affairs abroad, and able to maintain itself in the vigorous state of self-government at home. But I count it not by the head only; but in the quality, and conditions which we fulfil, which in a certain sense enhance our actual number. This is no community such as that other great dependency of the Empire, Hindostan India, with its many millions, who are all of them incapable of and unaccustomed to self-government, who are governed still, for their own good it is true, despotically and as a conquered country. We are 4,000,000 of Frenchmen, Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen, and Germans, instructed in, trained in the right of self-control and of self-government. Educated with the system of primary education of which we have just cause to be proud; having learned through trials and difficulties, but, as we have good cause to know substantially, the great lesson which ought to be apprehended from the true consideration of civil and religious liberty; having struggled in the past for that measure of rights which we thought we were entitled to, and having won them, proved our capacity for the self-government accorded to. So with reference to territorial extension. The vastness of our area is such—even if it were wholly, as its in the largest part, unpeopled—as to attract the attention of the world. It is as yet, in its greatest expanse, unpeopled. But there is there a source of wealth, of strength, of power, of capacity, of progress and development which places us even with our number of 4,000,000, in a position infinitely superior to that which we would occupy had we 4,000,000 of people cribbed, cabined and confined, within some contracted sphere and without those possibilities of development and of enlisting additional strength from the world at large, which are due to the vast territories we control. So with reference to the form of our government, which, so far as it is a local government, presents an imperium in imperio, which shows here a state with its central part, dealing with those concerns common to the vast territory comprised in different Provinces and dependencies of the Dominion—which shows no less an exemplification of the Federal system in no less than seven Provinces of greater or lesser dimensions, already existing, and which exhibits one of the proudest attributes which can belong to a free people, the capacity and power of creating fresh Provinces from time to time out of the unpeopled territories of the North-West. So, again, with reference to the variety of our important interests—our agricultural, our lumbering, our fishing, our mining, our manufacturing, our commercial interests, all important, many of them largely developed now—our maritime interest, also largely developed now—many of them with a capacity for growth and extension. And so again with relation to our responsibility, including the development of our North-West Territories—responsibility especially great with reference to the circumstance that we are neighbors to the great republic to the south, with a frontier common to both countries of 3,000 miles—naturally involving us, whatever the form may be, practically in the responsibility of the conduct of those affairs, of the management of those affairs arising out of so close contact along such an extended line of two people having so many mutual relations—the true management of which may tend to the perpetuation of cordial relations—of relations of which it is of consequence, not merely to us, but to the people at large, should be, and continued to be, of the most cordial character. Our possibilities under these circumstances are great. The possibilities, not yet developed, the expectation which, we may fairly entertain, if only prudence, firmness, and wisdom should guide our relations, are such as we have a right to be proud of. But, Sir, our developments must be not merely material. It consists not merely in an addition to our territory, to our population, or to our wealth. It must consist also in the development of the moral, intellectual and political character of the community. And as it must, so it has been. We have from time to time received a greater measure and exercised a greater measure of power and control over affairs corresponding to our increased growth and increased capacity in the management of our affairs. We control now our trade, we establish our own trade relations, and we thus practically decide by legislation our commercial relations with other countries. It is quite true that is an imperfect mode of adjusting those relations, but it is none the less true that we had in that imperfect mode, by the practical absolute control we have over our Customs duties, decided largely, as far as action on one side alone can decide, the commercial relations which should subsist between the Dominion and all other countries including the United Kingdom. The last relic of exceptional subordination in this regard was swept away upon the instructions which, up to the time of the present commission, had required that Bills imposing differential duties should be reserved were altered by the elimination of all instructions with reference to the reservation of Bills. From that time it has become, as it ought to have become before, that we had our right to complete legislation upon all matters within the legislative control of the Parliament, to complete that legislation, make it valid, effectual and final, subject only to the reserved prerogative of disallowance. Thus, even, although we might decide to create a different tariff, that tariff would become the law and properly become the law in this country without reservation, subject, as of course all other Acts are, to the powers of disallowance. While such is our legislative power with reference to our commercial relations with foreign countries, I maintain that it is abundantly clear that our numbers, though as large as I have described them, are, comparatively to the the question, sparse. There are many classes of manufactured commodities capable of being produced in this country, which require, for their economical production, a large market. There is nothing clearer as to numerous classes of commodities, that, within certain limits which far transcend our population, the larger the market the cheaper the goods can be produced; and long ago, in some particular cases, we had supplied to the full the home market, created to some extent a foreign trade, and were dependent, for the further extension and growth of our manufacturing interest, upon the facilities that one might obtain by cheap productions and reasonable arrangements with foreign nations, in sending forward our goods into their countries. That development of manufacturing to which I have referred is one not interesting to the manufacturer alone, but of interest and importance to the whole community, to the consumer as well as to the producer, because it is based upon the theory that economy of production will ensue from the largeness of the production, and from that economized production, the consumer will obtain a portion of the benefit, so that if it may be argued that there are in other respects apparent or real divergencies of interests between the manufacturer and consumer, it cannot be said in this respect that there is even an apparent still less a real divergence of interest. A fair and reasonable arrangement by which foreign markets can be obtained for domestic products, whether natural or manufactured, must redound to the benefit and advantage of all classes of the community, and a gain to each class without being a loss to any. In this, I think, all parties would concur. We may differ about the means. We may be of opinion—some of us—that in order to obtain an effectual expansion of our manufactures, it is essential that the cost of production should be further reduced, and that some provisions of this Tariff are peculiarly hurtful to trade in that regard. I do not discuss the subject of the drawbacks because practical experience has shown us, that that is of no consequence in this matter, and if I were to enter into that subject I would have to discuss the question as well as to the domestic as the foreign consumer in that regard. I maintain that while there are serious differences of opinion as to the effect of the Tariff upon the manufacturing interest, in so far as it lightens the cost of the raw material, we are agreed about our ends, though we may differ about our means. We are agreed it is important to extend the trade of the country, to enlarge its commercial relations, whether in natural or manufactured products, as far as we possibly can. I have said, that we exercise to-day the right by legislation of completing, as far as can be done, our trade relations with other countries, nor is it necessary to do more in order to establish that proposition than to refer to three clauses of the Tariff of 1879, the sixth clause provides:

"6. Any or all of the following articles:—that is to say: animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted or smoked), and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada."

There you find a regulation by Act of Parliament which enables the Administration to alter the fiscal system with the express view of reciprocating Tariff arrangements hoped to be made and expected to be made by another country, to what end? Obviously in order to encourage under those circumstances freer commercial intercourse between the two countries, and we completed this ourselves, within ourselves, by an Act passed here which enables us, without reference to the authority of the United Kingdom at all, if by any means we can secure the adhesion to our views of the United States; which enables us, I say, to alter the fiscal system with a view to improving the commercial relations between the two countries, and rendering less restrictive the trade and commerce between them. So again, in another direction; but demonstrating once more the practical extent of our legislative powers exercised completely within ourselves by the seventh clause of the same Act it is provided that:

"If at any time any greater duty of Customs should be payable in the United States of America on tea or coffee imported from Canada, than on tea and coffee imported from any other country, then the Governor in Council may impose on tea or coffee imported into Canada from the said United States, an additional duty of Customs, equal to the duty payable in the United States on tea or coffee imported from Canada; Provided that tea or coffee imported into Canada from any country other than the said United States, but passing in bond through the United States, shall be taken and rated as a direct importation from the country in which the tea or coffee was purchased."

Once again, you find completed by ourselves legislation with a view to regulating the commerce and trade relations between ourselves and a foreign country in a particular article and under a particular circumstance. Lastly, by the 12th clause it is provided:

"That the whole or part of the duty of thirty per centum ad valorem, imposed by this Act upon wines imported into Canada, may be remitted upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction, that the Governments of France or Spain, or either of them, have made changes in their Tariffs of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada, in reduction or repeal of the duties now in force in the said countries."

There, again, you have another instance, the third in the same Act, designed to produce Free Trade relations between ourselves and the countries of France and Spain, if only the conditions which the wisdom of this Parliament thought fit to impose—the condition of a reduction of duties on their part—are acceded to by the Governments of those countries. Now while that is so, while we thus insist rightly and act upon our view that we have the right to regulate practically our commercial relations by the scale of duties we impose, by the conditions placed upon that imposition, by the relaxation of further imposition according as we deem the interests of the country in its relations to a foreign country may be advanced, it is equally obvious, and has been confessed by all parties for a long time, that more is wanted than put ting this clause in the Act, that more is wanted in order to accomplish the purpose which the clause would serve, that what is wanted is communication and negotiation with those powers and countries with which we desire to enter into freer commercial relations. We want communication, we want to give information, we want to enter into negotiation to give full information as to our position, to ask for full consideration of our mutual interests in order that satisfactory conclusions may be reached, and that effectual arrangements may be made to carry out the objects which are indicated in the clause to which I had referred, and which are indicated in a larger sense by the policy which those clauses foreshadow in this direction of procuring by negotiation and communication freer foreign markets and better trade. What has been done? What has been done since the period of the Reciprocity Treaty? Nothing effectual has been done since the abrogation of that treaty. England in her commercial treaties has not—speaking in the large—helped us. She has, as a rule, regarded in the making of these treaties her own trade only, her own interests only. She has negotiated only with reference to that trade and those interests. She has not, as a rule, invited information. She has not, as a rule, invited negotiation on the subject in the consideration of this and, I suppose, her other dependencies, and it is admitted that—from the circumstances that the French Treaty was of the limited character to which I had referred—disastrous results ensued at a period at which those unfavorable results could least of all have been fortunate for the ship-building trade of Canada, and particularly Quebec followed. We know that some twelve or thirteen years afterwards the Government of the French decided that it was a wrong interpretation of the French Treaty, on the assumption that it extended to the dependencies of the Empire, when in truth it did not extend beyond the United Kingdom. The duty was raised from 2 francs to 40 francs and the trade was thus impaired, and it languished, and we also proceeded to fortify ourselves, under those circumstances, by raising the duty upon an article which we have largely imported from France, the article of wine, and the consumption of that article was largely diminished; while in our export in ships, although there was some increase between 1874 and 1877 it was so trifling and disproportionate that it was quite obvious that the trade between the two countries suffered, and was impaired by the construction which was placed on the French Treaty, and upon the legislative action in making that change to which I have referred, our efforts have been futile. We have accomplished nothing. There has been much cry but little wool. There has really been nothing done except to make a stir and to pay some large bills. We have been unable as yet to make any efficient progress. All our efforts have been complicated and embarrassed by overshadowing English interests, and by that complicated system of diplomacy which prevails under the existing arrangements. I cannot do better perhaps in this connection than to quote the words of the present High Commissioner of Canada, Sir A. T. Galt, delivered in 1870, when this subject came up for discussion in this House. He said:

“There is another advantage that would arise from the adoption of the course indicated by these resolutions. It is the avoidance of repeated reference to the Imperial Departments in connection with negotiations for trade relations between other countries and Canada. If there is one thing that embarrasses such negotiations more than another, it is the fact that they have to go through so many hands. First, they have to be reported on by one Department, then referred to another, and still another before they can possibly come back to the Government of the people most interested in them.”

Now, it is said that great recent improvements have been effected. I deny it. I find no proof of any improvements having been effected since that time. I call for the results, for the proofs. I want to see what the change is that has taken place for the better. I say the results are nil, and I say that the fact that those results are nil is partly due to our being unreasonably embarrassed by supposed British interests. For example, we send our Commissioner to Spain, and we, ourselves, built some castles in that country in the expectation of the fortunate results of his mission. But like other castles in Spain they came to nothing, and why. He says he postponed negotiations in Spain because they might possibly interfere with and embarrass some trade negotiations of Her Majesty's Government for some better trade with Spain. Now, I have been unable to find, in the correspondence or by any examination of the question, what there could be of real complication or embarrassment if only the true fundamental and underlying principles were once clearly set out, and that is that circumstanced as we are, and as the United Kingdom is, our trade relations with these countries are separate and distinct, each to be managed and settled for on terms suitable to each different community, not one in the slightest degree dependent upon the other. The other day the hon. First Minister declared that he was proud to be able to inform the House that the British Government had graciously agreed that if and after the negotiations with the French Republic failed, we might be allowed to try our hand for Canada, after the negotiations for a larger trade had failed. Once, again, you find the complication of such a conjunction of these things which are really separate, which have not and cannot have any practical or substantial relation with each other. But there are other proofs than those that the circumstances still exist in our present system to which Sir Alexander T. Galt alluded in 1870, in the passage which I have read, and that difficulty has resulted disastrously to us. In explaining last Session the fruitless mission made shortly before to France, the hon. First Minister—I quote from the Hansard March 8th—used these words:

“When Sir A. T. Galt went first to France the Canadian Government were within an ace of obtaining an important result; if it had not been for a delay in the London Foreign Office of forty-eight hours we would have succeeded in obtaining a reduction of duty on Canadian vessels of from 4 francs to 2 francs per ton, but unfortunately the Government of Austria gave notice in the meantime to all the European nations that they withdrew from all their commercial treaties and at once prevented France, in consequence of the favored nation clause in several treaties, going on with the negotiations for a time, and solely over which Sir A. T. Galt had no control, the arrangement which was all but completed was thrown over.”

A little later the hon. gentleman substantially repeated the statement. He was in Paris waiting for official authority from London, and before that arrived the notice from Austria came. Now, what I say is that it is proved by this very example that the difficulties resulting from our not being allowed to manage what is exclusively our own business, it practically resulted in evil. You find here the hon. First Minister telling us that Sir A. T. Galt had made his arrangements, but official authority was wanting from London to enable them to be formal and binding. Why? Why should we not decide for ourselves our arrangements for the reduction of duties on wines imported into Canada, and in consideration of that get a reduction from 4 francs to 2 francs per ton on ships? What in the world has any Foreign Office to do with that? They have nothing at all to do with it. Any arrangements in that direction are in one sense British policy because they involve a reduction of duty, but this arrangement in spirit and substance had been communicated beforehand to them, and such is the diplomacy that burdens the system to which we are tied under present arrangements that we could not conclude a matter, however vital and essential to us, until the Foreign Office took its time to decide. Probably it was returned in the Board of Trade, and though we had the benefit of a telegraph and all the facilities for the quick despatch of business, we were forty-eight hours too late, the Austrian notice had arrived, and so the negotiations miscarried. I do not blame Sir Alexander Galt, but I maintain he ought to have had control over the question. I maintain he ought to have been able to conclude that arrangement, that the occasion for the delay ought not to have taken place, and that, in this most recent instance which is before us, it is proved that there is, not merely in theory but in practice also, a defect in our present arrangements. Now, Sir, there is a great deal of talk about the efforts of British diplomacy, and I want to point out to you the difficulties that beset negotiations for treaties arising out of that system. I wish to reinforce the position taken by Sir A. T. Galt in 1873, by reading you a few words from the private journal of Mr. Cobden, the Joint Plenipotentiary with Lord Cowley in the negotiation of a French Treaty some twenty years ago. He speaks thus of the result to him of the Foreign Office meddling in connection with the French Treaty:

"This convention was ready for signature, so far as the negotiation here was concerned, on the 18th September, and the delay which has taken place is attributable to our Foreign Office, to their habitual procrastination, the desire to meddle, and I fear also to the willingness on the part of some of the officials in that department, to find fault with my performance. My position is that of a poacher, and their feeling towards me is akin to that of a game-keeper towards a trespasser in search of game."

That is the view which, in the privacy and unconstrained circumstances in which a man writes in his private journal, he took of the situation. There is the true inwardness of Foreign Office management, as he conceived it. Now, there was the case of a gentleman, towards whom this jealousy was extended, though he was appointed at the express wish of the hon. the Prime Minister, and he was trained to the diplomatic service in England. If he was regarded as an interloper, how much more would that apply to a Canadian agent occupying a more qualified and subordinate position as our representative under the present circumstances? How much desire would there be to show that he was wrong, to show what difficulties there was in the way, to criticise, to delay, to create more difficulties, not on the part of the Government, but on the part of these subordinates, which in these matters are very powerful indeed? Once, again, the same eminent statesman spoke on the same subject:

"I am paraded at meetings of plenipotentiaries, with my hands tied, without the power of solving the merest question of detail. When I filled the post of commercial traveller at the age of twenty, I was entrusted with more discretionary power than is now shared by Lord Cowley and myself while filling the office of Her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries. The name might be more appropriately changed to that of multipotentiary, the points on which this delay is created by the Foreign Office are so trivial and unimportant as almost to defy comprehension."

Well, Sir, neither in the character of the transactions of the office, nor in that human nature which animates officials, is there I apprehend any very great change between the year 1860 and the year 1882. In the life of Mr. Cobden, from which I have taken these extracts, a few further words are used with reference to this policy, which may also fitly be brought under the attention of the House. I quote the substance only:

"From the proposed reference to the Foreign Office a most dangerous delay would take place. Lord Cowley did not feel that he could give way, and a copy of the Tariff was sent home. When the Tariff reached London, the Foreign Office hesitated to accept the figures without reference in detail to the Treasury, the Customs and the Board of Trade. The president of the Board of Trade was away on his yacht and nobody knew where to find him. Meanwhile, his Department advised that the Commissioners act should be adopted. The Board of Trade said one of its precedents is merely an opinion-giving Department and our advice is often disregarded, especially when it is right. It was disregarded now, and the Tariff was brought up in the most stubborn of all the circumlocution offices; the French Ministers were astonished at this unintelligible delay."

There, Sir, is, with reference to this treaty, a little practical exemplification of the difficulties which surround negotiations, even when the negotiation is by a British Plenipotentiary, and involving the interests of the United Kingdom. How much greater must these difficulties be when the negotiation is conducted in the manner and under the circumstances by which this treaty was conducted. English feeling is today just about the same as it was in 1865, and in that year the Foreign Office, through Mr. Hammond, now Lord Hammond, used these words:

"I am to request that you will state to Secretary Cardwell, that his Lordship concludes that, as regards foreign countries, the agents who are sent from the British North American Colonies will not approve of any independent character, or attempt to negotiate or conclude arrangements with the Governments of foreign countries, but will only, as proposed by the seventh resolution of the Council on Commercial Treaties, as regards negotiations with the United States, enclosed in Lord Monk's despatch of September 23rd, be authorized to confer with the British Minister in each foreign country, and to afford him information with respect to the interests of the British North American Provinces. A similar process has been adopted in various negotiations for commercial treaties, in which Her Majesty's Government have recently been engaged with foreign powers."

That was the idea in 1865. You are told to make no arrangement, you are not to conclude anything at all, but you may talk to the consular representative, you may give him information, and we will keep in our own hands the negotiation and the determination whether what you may deem reasonable, or what you may deem to be feasible, shall be adopted. Something of the same spirit appears to have pervaded the manner of the negotiations with respect to Sir Alexander Galt's appointment. The memorandum which was sent in by the hon. First Minister and two of his colleagues to the English Government upon the subject suggested:

"It is further submitted that the very large and rapidly augmenting commerce of Canada, and the increasing extent of her trade with foreign nations, is proving the absolute need of direct negotiation with them for the proper protection of her interests. In most of the treaties of commerce entered into by England, reference has only been had to their effect on the United Kingdom; and the colonies have been excluded from their operation, a fact which has been attended with most unfortunate results to Canada, as relates to France. This is, to a certain extent, unavoidable, in consequence of the control of all Customs having been granted to Canada; but a necessity has thus arisen for providing separate and distinct trade conventions with all foreign powers with whom Canada has distinct trade. With the differing views held by the Parliament of Canada on such subjects, from those of Her Majesty's Government, there is a manifest difficulty in asking the latter to become responsible for the representations required to be made, and foreign Governments find it difficult to understand our present system. The Canadian Government therefore submit that when occasion requires such negotiations to be undertaken, Her Majesty's Government should advise Her Majesty specially to accredit the representative of Canada to the foreign court, by association for the special object, with the resident Minister or other Imperial negotiator."

That was repudiating it in as far as this particular question is concerned by this statement, as to the position of the proposed officer:

"'He would therefore,' says Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, 'primarily communicate with this Department on the various subjects which might be entrusted to him, and while Her Majesty's Government would readily avail themselves of any information he might afford, and give the fullest consideration to any representation he might make on behalf of the Canadian Government, it would, of course, rest with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to determine in each case in what precise capacity his services might best be rendered in the event of any negotiations with a Foreign Court, on subjects affecting the interests of the Dominion. In some instances, for example, it might be desirable for him to remain in London and advise with Her Majesty's Government there, while in other cases he might, in accordance with the precedents which have been quoted, be more usefully engaged in assisting Her Majesty's Representatives abroad.'

Once, again, you find a position which is inconsistent with the position taken in the memorandum, indicating the terms of the proposed appointment—a condition of entire subservency. The Secretary of State for the Colonies is to decide as to the capacity in which the Canadian agent may be made most useful; he is to determine how the agent is to be used. Sometimes he will say to him go there and he goeth; sometimes he will say to him stay here and he stayeth; sometimes the Canadian agent will remain in London and give information to the Foreign Office; sometimes he will go abroad and advise with Her Majesty's representative. How was that answered? It was answered by declaring:

"The Committee would further respectfully submit, in elucidation of the views contained in the memorandum, that the Government of Canada, in respect of negotiations with foreign powers, in no respect desire to be placed in the position of independent negotiators. On the contrary, they are fully convinced that it is through the influence and support of Her Majesty's Government, and by the effective use of their carefully trained and thorough diplomatic service, that they can alone look for any measure of success. And it is with the view most thoroughly to satisfy foreign Governments of the identity of interests of Her Majesty with themselves that they have so strongly sought the most official recognition possible for the representative."

So we find an express declaration in accordance with the Colonial Secretary, that it is not a position for independent negotiation at all on this subject, but one simply of giving advice and availing ourselves of that Foreign Office, which has done so much for us, and so successfully in the past, and through which we are to continue to carry on our negotiations on trade questions in future, after the same manner, being a singular discordance with the view contained in the memorandum, which pointed out there was a difference in the interest, in the commercial economy, in the principles of negotiation, which referred to the difficulty of making Her Majesty responsible for the representations, whereas this memorandum is in order to show how thoroughly identified in interests the two Governments are. There is this mistake in my opinion: Her Majesty's Government, on those matters which are of local importance to this country and to this country alone, should act by the advice of Her Majesty's Privy Council in Canada, and negotiations should proceed direct, and if not, until we decide to make that request no effectual change will take place, no effectual removal from the groove and the rut in which we have been, I can hardly say travelling but standing still for so long a time in this matter, will take place. None are so fit to negotiate as our own people, who thoroughly understand our situation, our capabilities, our wants, our requirements, what we have to offer, what we want to attain. The very principle of the negotiation, as they observed in the memorandum which I have read, was different. The very principle of the regulation of trade relations as it is to be looked at in our country and as it is to be looked at in England, is different, is opposite. England endeavors to convince the nations which have high Tariffs that a high Tariff is injurious to the nation that imposes it, more injurious to the nation which imposes than to the foreigner upon whose exports it is imposed, and endeavors to establish, by reasoning, that proposition, with a view to throwing down Tariff rates in the sense that they are injurious to those who set them up. Some of us believe that Tariff rates are injurious to those who set them up; but Tariff rates have existed here in the past; they are made higher now; and they will exist, no doubt, for a long time to come, and, therefore, for a long time to come, we will be in a position which, whatever may be the relative merits of the one and of the other great commercial systems, is essentially different from and antagonistic to the English system, and one which unquestionably, although its advantages may far counterbalance the advantages of that system, whatever its advantages may be, gives this advantage in dealing with a protectionist nation, that you can meet them on equal grounds, and you can say: "I quite agree with you that your Tariff is a benefit; I say our Tariff is a benefit; but if you will pull down your wall a little we will do the same," and that which was a benefit under other circumstances by reductions made on the principles of mutual concession will become a greater benefit still. We have something to offer, we have set up a wall and offer to pull down a stone or two; that no doubt in view of those countries which have adopted a similar system is something deserving of attention. But there has been and is, as has been stated in this memorandum, a great practical difficulty in English diplomatists bringing forward any such arguments. They do not believe in them. They think they are mistaken. They think they are contrary to sound principles of political economy, and they have acted on that theory in their negotiations. A large school of them believe that commercial treaties themselves are an entire mistake because they are in violation of those principles. I do not, myself, share that view, but that is beside the question, because whether they be in violation of those principles as they exist in practical application in England, there can be no question that they are not in violation of the principles that have been, since we were confederated and before, in existence in this country. I say, Sir, that the circumstance of this difficulty has been called to our attention before to-day. In the negotiations with reference to the Treaty of Washington Lord Kimberley, in a despatch to the Canadian Government, in June, 1877, used these words:

"Her Majesty's Government are bound to add that whilst in reference to the strong wishes of the Dominion Government they used their best efforts to obtain a renewal in principles of the Reciprocity Treaty. They are convinced that the establishment of Free Trade between the Dominion and the United States is not likely to be promoted by making admission to the fisheries dependent upon the conclusion of such a treaty, and that the repeal by Congress of duties upon Canadian produce upon the ground that a protective Tariff is injurious to the country which imposes it would place the commercial relations of the two countries on a far more secure and lasting basis than the stipulations of a convention framed upon a system of reciprocity."

They, therefore, advised us, circumstanced as we were, having ourselves a very considerable Tariff, and our fiscal condition being, and necessarily being, founded upon a wholly different view, they advised us to abandon all the arguments which might fairly arise from our own state of circumstances as it practically stood, and to go on a basis of English commercial diplomacy, and to argue with the United States that their Tariff was injuring them and ought to be put down, instead of proposing a system of mutual concessions which it was in our power to carry out. The Tariff was there, and it would have been the height of pedantry not to take such advantages as were properly to be obtained from the existing fiscal conditions and Tariff of the country. Now, Sir, our system is wholly different, as I said. We do restrict. We restrict both for revenue and for protective purposes. We designedly restrict importations, and we are prepared to lower those restrictions if under particular circumstances with foreign countries we can obtain corresponding concessions which may be advantageous. We admit the great importance of improving our commercial relations with foreign countries. We admit the great importance, therefore, of successfully arranging conventions upon that subject; yet we make no progress in promoting them. Now, Sir, I say this can be done effectually only by altering our system, and by dealing with the subject through our own negotiators and according to our own views. But, Sir, objections are made to this. What are those objections? The first that occurs to me is the statement that our Envoy would not be treated with respect. I repudiate that suggestion. The Queen is the Queen of Canada as well as the Queen of England, and an Envoy sent by the Queen, through her representative in Canada, is the Queen's Envoy as much as if he would have been sent from the Court of St. James, and we need only ask that it should be so looked at, and that is the true constitutional view in which it is to be looked at. The authority is vested in Her Majesty; it is exercised by her representative here in her name, upon the advice of the Queen's Privy Council in Canada, and obtaining his power our Envoy would be received with all the respect due to the Queen's Envoy. Again, it is said we are a small country and that our interests are trifling. That, also, I entirely repudiate. I suppose they are trifling, but they will receive no more attention in consequence of the medium through which they are presented. In matters of trade, the magnitude of the interests involved measures the attention bestowed. The question in a matter of business is, what have you to sell and how much do you want from us.

Therefore, trifling interests will receive trifling attention, no matter by whom presented. It is not a question of influence, not a question of favor, not a question of affection, but a question of business; and the question between business people is what business can we do with you and on what terms can we do it, and even though our interests were trifling, which I deny, the respect paid would not be affected by the manner in which those interests were presented. Once again, it is said the United Kingdom would not go to war to enforce the provision of any treaty that might be made. I do not believe they would; I do not hope they would, and I think at this time, at this period in the world's history it is preposterous to think that sensible people would go to war in order to keep their trade. The smallest war would create a greater interruption of the most restricted relations between two civilized countries than the breach of any treaty, and we find applying more and more, at least to business matters, and I hope more and more, extending beyond business matters, and into those affairs which more arouse the feeling of pride and passion of the overpowering sense of importance, which still exists amongst States, though they have largely vanished amongst individuals—a better feeling, and that more and more we will scorn to believe that for such treaties as this at any rate, we have the best safeguard of their maintenance in the sense of honor and of justice of civilized nations, and general public opinion throughout the civilized and Christian world. I do not believe that for the breach of any commercial treaty made by England to France, or any other country in which her interests were involved, though that breach were wanton, that she would go to war. And further, it is suggested that we cannot have the guns and fleet of England to maintain amicable trade relations. I pass this point by as too ridiculous to demand further answer. It is said that we cannot have the benefit of the diplomatic service of England. Much good it has done us, Mr. Speaker. The history of the diplomatic service of England, as far as Canada is concerned, has been a history of error, blunder, wrong and concession. It is certainly not a history which would lead us to believe the service was specially valuable to us. The diplomatists of these modern times who have been most successful in matters of business have been those who were most conversant with the matter in hand, who knew best the needs, the wants, the capabilities, the resources of the country and the details of the question. Business men dealing with business questions are most successful. Mr. Cobden, who conducted the negotiations which resulted in the treaty between France and England, stepped into the position without the slightest previous training. The wisest, best and most acute of diplomatists, if only crammed sufficiently, will make a miserable failure, compared with a man of even less ability, born to the soil and thoroughly familiar with the details of the matter in which he is concerned. But we should not lose the benefit of the diplomatic service of England. We could ask for it when we want it, and when we think our interests are concerned. Again, it is said it would cost a great deal to maintain a useless staff of ambassadors and consuls. This is ridiculous, because our present system could be continued by which we would send an envoy where we want him, and when we think we are justified by the favorable result. As to having, in consequence of this, consuls and permanent ambassadors at foreign capitals, that is quite out of the question. It does not follow because you negotiate a treaty from time to time, a treaty which in its essence is one enduring for some years, that you should have any representative at a foreign capital pending the existence of the treaty; and if the arrangement be by mutual legislation, it is only when some proposals are made of change that the question of negotiation would arise. Then it is said that this is practically a separation from the Empire. I deny that with equal strength. To-day, as I have pointed out, we make laws to accomplish this result. To-day we have on the Statute-book a law which would enable us, to-morrow, if the United States Congress would pass a certain provision, to alter our fiscal system entirely by order of the Governor in Council, in order to get better trade relations with them. To-day we have laws which would enable us to reduce the duties on articles we import from France and Spain, if the French Government or the Spanish Government made laws or other provisions reducing the duties on certain other articles in which we trade with them. To-day, therefore, this latter is in such a position that all that is required is the intermediary, the negotiatory, to bring what we want into practical execution, by whom this foreign Government will be induced to do that thing which by our Statute we have said we would induce them to do, by which, without the intervention of the British Government at all, we could at once reduce our Customs duties. Then it is said the interests of England might be prejudiced by our acting. Not at all; I cannot see how that might be. Her interests are that the duties should be reduced; her advantages and interests are that we should arrange our fiscal system as best suits ourselves. If she has—which I do not believe—selfish interests, I deny that she has the right to judge between us and her on the subject of our selfish interests; I deny that she has the right to decide any more than we have the right to decide, and I maintain that by the law, by the constitution, by the amount of practical self-government which has been accorded to us, we have the right to decide for ourselves what our rate of duty shall be—and that is the whole of this question. We decide for what reason we shall lower duties or elevate duties, and our reasons do not concern any other people than ourselves. We determine to lower or to heighten—we determine to lower in order to attain a certain object, namely, to obtain concessions from other States as to the admission of our products; we determine to heighten for the protection of our products against theirs. We do this without the interference of England, maintaining our right to do so, although England may entirely differ from our policy, may deem it unjust and unfair, may deem that it operates harshly and injuriously on her trade with us. But it may be said that there will be a direct negotiation with a foreign power. Yes, but by the Queen of this country, and our Acts by the advice of the Privy Council of this country. But that is a mere question of form; the question of substance is the direct conduct of the negotiation; and I propose, as sound principle demands—as is done and as ought to be done I believe in all treaties, as is done in almost all commercial treaties, as was done in the Reciprocity Treaty, as was done in the Treaty of Washington, as is done in the Tariff arrangements with France, Spain, and Italy, as was proposed by the hon. Minister of Finance to be done in case Sir Alexander Galt succeeded in negotiating a treaty with France, the hon. Minister saying that the negotiation was necessarily subject to submission to and ratification by the Parliament of Canada—I propose that our commercial arrangements ought to be, in that sense, made subject either to the prior assent or the subsequent ratification of the Parliament of Canada by an Act. Such an Act would be, like all other Acts, subject to disallowance. There would be the safe measure of authority, whether substantial and real, or technical and formal, in respect to that matter as in respect to other matters in which we pass Acts of Parliament; and if it were thought fit by those in power to take the responsibility, they would have the power of nullifying the arrangements by disallowing the Act. I believe that by proceeding in this direction, we shall be taking a practical step towards obtaining that which the country wants—towards obtaining an extension of our commercial regulations; we shall be taking a practical business step in addition; we shall be doing matters of business in a business way. I believe that we shall be acting on these same principles of growth and development to which I referred a while ago—that we shall be evolving those principles of vitality and development upon which the continuous growth and expansion of the Empire really depend; that we shall be proceeding in the direction of accomplishing that on which the maintenance of the Empire really does depend—such an organization of its internal parts, such an arrangement of external regulations, such a system—unsymmetrical and full of anomalies, if you please, but partaking of the federative character—as will be calculated to make it continue and exist more and more, not indeed as the arrogant dominator over any power, but as the mighty moral force—proving, as well by its internal organization as by its external relations, the truth by precept and example of those principles of freedom, justice, and liberality, which should sway the modern Christian world. I move, under these circumstances, this resolution:

“That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, that Canada no longer occupies the position of an ordinary dependency of the Crown; she numbers four millions of free men trained in the principles of constitutional Government; she comprises one-half of the North America Continent, including seven Provinces federally united under an Imperial Charter, which recites that her Constitution is to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom; and that she possesses executive and legislative authority over vast areas in the North-West, out of which one Province has already been created, and in time others will be formed.

“That special and increasing responsibilities devolve upon the Government and Parliament of Canada in connection with the development of her resources, the improvement of her condition, her general progress in the scale of nations, and her geographical situation which renders her even more responsible than the Government of the United Kingdom for the maintenance of international relations with the United States.

“That having regard to these considerations, there is no possession of the Crown, beyond the limits of the United Kingdom, which is entitled to such an ample measure of self-government, or so full an application of the principles of constitutional freedom, as the Dominion of Canada.

“That it would be for the interest of Canada to obtain freer access to the markets of the world; and that a more extended interchange of commodities with other countries would augment the national prosperity.

“That in most of the treaties of commerce entered into by England, reference has only been had to their effect on the United Kingdom, and the Colonies have been excluded from their operation, a fact which has been attended with unfortunate results to Canada, especially as relates to France.

“That the condition of Canada, and the system on which her duties of Customs have been, and are now imposed, vary widely from those existent in the United Kingdom, and open to the basis and negotiation of commercial arrangements with other States or British possessions, views and considerations which do not apply to the case of, or harmonise with the policy of the United Kingdom; which it is difficult for the Government of the United Kingdom to advance; and which can be best realized and presented by the Government of Canada through a negotiator named by her for the purpose of providing separate trade conventions with countries, with which Canada has or may expect distinct trade.

“That the complications and delays involved in the reference to the Departments of the Government of the United Kingdom of points arising in the course of trade negotiations enhance the difficulties of the situation, and diminish the chances of success; and have already resulted in loss to Canada.

“That it is expedient to obtain all necessary powers to enable Her Majesty, through Her representative, the Governor General of Canada, acting by and with the advice of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, to enter by an agent or representative of Canada, into direct communication with any British possession or Foreign State, for the purpose of negotiating commercial arrangements, tending to the advantage of Canada, subject to the prior consent, or the subsequent approval of the Parliament of Canada signified by Act.”

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I suppose that the main proposition of this resolution or amendment is, in the first place, that it is expedient we should extend the trade relations of Canada with other nations. There can be no objection to that. It is for the advantage of Canada to have trade relations with every nation that will trade with us. The next proposition is that it is expedient—I do not know whether the resolution goes further, and says that it is absolutely necessary—that we should have direct communication by an envoy of our own with those foreign countries. If Her Majesty's Government, the Queen of England and the Queen of Canada as well, will extend our powers and enable us to send special envoys to foreign countries she will, as Queen of England and Canada, see to the enforcement of treaties we may make. That would be to our advantage. Nobody could object to it, and we should be grateful for it. But I think the hon. gentleman is far too sanguine in his expectation that Her Majesty's Government would agree to the proposition so long as we remained—however important we may be, and far be it from me to minimize the importance of Canada as regards its numbers and wealth—a colony of Great Britain. England is not likely to consent, so long as we remain a dependency, to our having separate ambassadors and envoys of our own; and more than that I think the motion betrays an absence of knowledge on the part of the hon. gentleman of the principles that actuate other Governments in dealing with Canada, so long as it is a dependency, and while the relation between nations are carried on by accredited ministers, several ranks are established. There is great jealousy between nations as to the rank of their envoys sent from one nation to another. If it is an important nation they have ministers, plenipotentiaries and ambassadors in the highest sense of the word. Then they have resident ministers; they have chargés d'affaires and secretaries of legation. And if England made a proposition to France or to Spain, that her colonies should have that power, both nations particularly would resolve, as history has shown, to maintain the dignity of the diplomatic service, and they would refuse, so long as we are a dependency of England. Nor could we expect consequently to be able to confer the necessary rank upon an officer who would be our envoy. No foreign nation would deal with it on these terms. We must remember that France and Spain, two nations to which the hon. gentleman especially alluded, have colonies; and they would not and could not according to the principles that govern their policy with regard to their several dependencies, accept the proposition. And we all know how important their colonies are. They could not and would not grant power to colonies of England which of necessity they would refuse to their own. Spain has continuously and deliberately refused to allow direct negotiations with the Chaplain-General or local authorities of Cuba or the Phillipian Islands. Cuba is her principal and wealthiest colony. France would not allow for a moment Algeria or the West Indies, or her colonies and dependencies in the east, to enter into direct communication with any foreign nation. They would say it was altogether inconsistent with the colonial relations and would refuse to their own colonies such a demand or such a request, if it was made; and, therefore, as they would refuse it to their own colonies, they certainly would not grant it to the colonies of England. The new born zeal of the hon. gentleman for Canada, in assuming this position, is rather amusing, when we look back for the last seven years. I am not aware that the hon. gentleman or those with whom he acted, ever considered that our commercial prosperity ever depended upon direct relations with foreign nations. I am not aware—my memory may be at fault—that those hon. gentlemen opposite ever made a single advance to any foreign nation or sought to develop the trade of Canada in any part of the civilized or uncivilized world. I believe it was in our time that the development and extension of our trade was commenced, and I am proud to say that our Mother Country is truly a Mother Country, in the best sense of the word, always assisting us, especially of late, in any attempt or any expressed desire of Canada for the development of her trade with any and every country in the world. England is an old country. She, of course, does not move with a revolutionary rapidity that the hon. gentleman would desire, therefore it is she marches with a steady and distinguished pace. Perhaps a querulous gentleman like Mr. Cobden would grumble because the various responsible departments in England carefully watched the progress and checked the untutored zeal with respect to the French Treaty, and I believe that had the French Treaty, if it had been left to his unaided exertions without the delays, restrictions, conditions and red-tapeism which the hon. gentleman complains of, would not have been so satisfactory to the people of England, and its renewal was earnestly desired. Those delays, although curbing the desires of Mr. Cobden to come back to England as a successful negotiator and thus annoying him, eventuated in a satisfactory treaty—satisfactory to England, though I am sorry to say not so satisfactory to France. Canada has been progressing rapidly in prestige, in population and in wealth, so that although I rather dislike the want of taste shown in these resolutions in saying that we are the most important of Her Majesty's colonies and entitled to have a different position from the others, yet we are, with a population of 4,000,000, rapidly approaching to 5,000,000, a people of sufficient importance to claim of the Mother Country the important advance in our position that we have a right to claim—additional assistance, greater energy and a larger meed of independence in our negotiations than when we were scattered, separate and feeble Provinces and colonies. I must say that, rapid as our progress has been, we never yet made an advance that England has not, after due consideration, met more than half way and assisted Canada in all the negotiations she has made. She is not a step-mother, she is as anxious to see Canada prosper as she is proud of Canada and her colonies, and if we look back we will see that Canada never desired assistance without obtaining it at her hands. Even in cases when the commercial policy of the Mother Country might vary from ours, she has always tried to carry out our wishes. The hon. gentleman read in contravention of that statement, a despatch of Lord Kimberley when he was Colonial Secretary, stating that while in obedience to the express wishes of the Canadian people, the British Government would do anything that they could to promote a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854; yet in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government—that Government which was then a Free Trade Government as it is now, and Lord Kimberley, a Free Trade doctrinaire of the most restricted and illiberal kind, if I may use the term—yet, neither he nor Her Majesty's Government, I am satisfied, by word or expression at Washington in the negotiations with the American Government, ever for one moment allowed their own opinions as to what would be best for Canada, to interfere with their pressing her claims and expressing our wishes. The whole correspondence will show that England did everything that persuasion, argument, ingenuity and pressure could produce to induce the United States to renew that treaty. The hon. gentleman says that we are exceedingly embarrassed, because England makes treaties, having reference to the Mother Country. Sir, whenever Canada or any of the colonies express a desire to be included in those treaties, I am satisfied that that wish will be granted. The reason why England of late years—I do not speak of old times—of a quarter of a century ago—had limited those treaties with foreign nations was this: It was to leave the trade of Canada and the colonies unrestricted by any of the conditions of those treaties. The "favoured nation clause" that England has until lately put in all her treaties is a clause that would operate greatly against the interests of Canada, because wherever Canada entered into a reciprocity treaty we would be obliged to grant to every nation the privileges we had granted to the country with whom we had made a special arrangement.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You do that now.

Mr. MILLS. There are many treaties in which this is applied to Canada.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is exceedingly mistaken, there are not many; there were one or two and there is one of these that works so prejudicially to Canada—a treaty with some of the German States—that it greatly hampers and would greatly hamper her in negotiation with other countries. As I have said before, it is useless to talk of asking the Queen to allow us to send our envoys to other countries unless those countries are willing to receive us. We have the example the other day of what France did. When M. Lefavre, the French Consul in Canada, opened an un-official correspondence with the best intentions—an officious correspondence they would call it in France—for the purpose of developing trade between France and Canada, the French Government were exceedingly annoyed at it, and M. Lefavre received a rebuke and a reproof at the hands of his own Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is because he was never authorized.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course he was never authorized. The hon. gentleman knows that the consular system of France is altogether different from that of England. Consular agents in England are merely commercial agents, holding no diplomatic character whatever, while in France they are a branch department, they rise from being consuls to being ambassadors, while in England the two services are entirely separate. And so M. Lafavre, as consul here, was not authorized to deal with any particular subject. We opened an unofficial correspondence for the purpose of seeing whether steps could not be taken so as to superinduce an official negotiation, and yet this act was repudiated. Sir, as matters stand now, I think Canada's position is as favorable as it well can be. The hon. gentleman has pointed out that we can, by legislation, without anything like a treaty, regulate our commercial principles and practices, and the hon. gentleman quoted three of the clauses of the Tariff of 1878, showing that we have exercised that power by legislation—in fact to make treaties according to those three clauses, with every nation who chooses to meet Canada on those terms. But the hon. gentleman says that is not sufficient. Well, what is sufficient? As we cannot have ambassadors he says we must have special agents of our own. Well, Sir, besides the impossibility of our agents being received in a foreign country, and the importance the language of the resolution would claim for them, I can see that, great as we are, powerful as we are going to be, when we have the prestige of England, the whole diplomatic service of England, however strong and able we may be, we are greatly strengthened and aided in advancing our interests and developing our trade. Now, Sir, I am not aware that before 1878, any step of any kind was taken by the Government to develop our trade. But the first thing we did was to attempt to develop our trade with foreign countries, and after the deliberate expression of the people of Canada in favor of the National Policy, we at once, as it was our duty to do, made a forecast of the future, and we had to discount posterity to a certain extent. We had to provide for an occasional over-production, we supposed there might be sometimes a plethora of manufactures, that our markets would be glutted, and so we commenced at once negotiations, pari passu with our National Policy, in order to make arrangements with foreign countries which would be likely to exchange commodities with us. I am not sure but that we got a great deal of sympathy from the hon. gentlemen opposite, though we did incur a good deal of ridicule, and I do not know but that before we get through this Session we may have a special vote charging us with our extravagant course in our first humble attempt to have an ambassador. We are told now that he is good for nothing, that we had better withdraw him, that our very first attempt to have commercial independence is costing us tens of thousands of dollars, and that it would be true economy to withdraw our ambassador altogether from England. Sir, that is not our policy. We commenced at once. In the first place, we went to a nation on this side of the Atlantic, and we have now got the official—the not ostentatious, but to a great extent the expressed assistance of Her Majesty's representative at the Court of Brazil, and we now have a line running monthly between Canada and Brazil, and although that trade is in its infancy, I think the indications are clear that one of our best markets in the future will be Brazil. The commodities of the two countries are of such diverse nature that we can profitably send our productions to Brazil and receive hers in exchange. Then, Sir, considering, in the language of these resolutions, that our interests are of greater volume and value than they were before, we took the step of appointing Sir A. T. Galt, a gentleman well known in Canada, a gentleman who has held a distinguished position in the Canadian Parliament, who has been a Minister of the Crown, and has administered the finances of Canada for a number of years. We sent that gentleman to England, notwithstanding the reproaches of the waste of money involved in the appointment. He has been there ever since, and, Sir, he has done good service, notwithstanding the remarks of the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, that all our negotiations have been unsuccessful whenever they have been opened with foreign countries. That is a mistake. The first thing we did was, through Sir A. T. Galt, to apply to Her Majesty's Government to strengthen his hands and authorize him to go to these countries. He first went to Spain, and Mr. West, now the very able ambassador at Washington, then ambassador at the Court of Madrid, was specially instructed to assist him in every possible way, and to put him in direct communication with the Government of Spain. Of course any official arrangement would have to be signed by the accredited Minister of England at Madrid. No other signature would give validity to a treaty, because treaties are not made between colonies and a foreign country, but between two nations. Any arrangement that Sir A. T. Galt as our agent might have made must have been countersigned and approved by the ambassador to give it validity and effect as a treaty, and of course it had to be ratified by the Government of the Mother Country who undertook the great responsibility of sanctioning it or disapproving it. Sir Alexander Galt, our agent, was in communication with the Spanish Government, and he made great progress there. Signor Camaras, then First Minister of Spain, and a great statesman, was in power at the opening of the negotiations. We did not think at first when the instructions were given to Sir Alexander Galt, that it would open so large a question as the establishment of trade between Spain, the Mother Country and Canada. We commenced more modestly and more practically by asking, through the British Government, with the consent of the Foreign Office and of the Imperial Government, for leave to enter into direct negotiations with Spain, in order to open up a trade with Cuba and Porto Rico and the Spanish colonies in America, and that was at once granted; but Signor Camaras stated that he would prefer, now that propositions had been made, that negotiations should be made wider and that the negotiating parties should deal not only with the Cuban trade but with the trade between European Spain and Canada. Negotiations were afterwards suspended not only with Canada but with England until the Cuban representatives had been elected. By the Spanish system, as well as by the French system, their colonies have direct representation in the Cortez and Chamber of Deputies of the two nations, and the Cuban representatives to the Cortez had not arrived, and the Minister said those Cuban representatives would be consulted on the various questions before direct negotiations would be entered upon. By the time the Cuban members arrived, or rather before it, one of those political revolutions which occur so frequently in Spain took place, and Signor Camaras was unseated, and a period of semi-anarchy, not in a warlike but a political sense, or rather not a period of anarchy but of paralysis occurred in the struggle between the contending parties, and Signor Camaras' successors were not at all in favor of enlarging commercial relations either with England or Canada. If Sir Alexander Galt failed in his praiseworthy and able attempts to secure an arrangement between Spain and her colonies and Canada, the failure was an equal failure on the part of England, because Spain refused to negotiate either with the Mother Country or with Canada. But we ought not to be discouraged by obstructions of that kind, and Sir Alexander Galt has closely watched the various political currents and especially the various changes of political disposition in Spain on economic questions, and he has lost no opportunity of pressing the subject on the attention of the Spanish Minister, because having once got the right to communicate with them, he keeps that up either by communications with Spain or more directly or more indirectly through the Spanish Minister, in London. Although I have not authority to state officially, because I have it not officially, Sir Alexander Galt stated in one of his letters to me that the Spanish Ambassador was exceedingly anxious—personally, of course—and when he speaks personally, he speaks in his representative as well as his personal character—to see the development of trade between the two countries, and he told him, not officially, that it was his intention at an early day to come to Canada in order to see this country, ascertain its production and resources, and aid us in obtaining a treaty. So we felt we must do as Lincoln said, keep pegging away until we succeed. So with respect to France. France is now an intensely protectionist country, and England cannot renew her commercial treaty with her. England's offers have been refused unless she makes concessions, which she declines to make. An unfortunate circumstance occurred which might have occurred with any Government or Department. Our request that the duty of 40 francs a ton on Canadian ships, should be reduced to 2 francs, would have been acceded to if it had not been that Austria gave notice to every nation with which it had commercial treaties that they were to be terminated, and on that account the whole negotiations failed. Now, however, France by a general law allows Canadian ships to enter at the same rate of duty per ton, namely, 2 francs, as ships built in England, the United States, or elsewhere. So we only suffered a short and temporary inconvenience in that sense. Sir Alexander Galt has several times gone to Paris for the purpose of carrying on direct negotiations, and as in Spain so in France, Lord Lyons was instructed to offer every aid, to give the whole force of any influence that England might be supposed to have with France, to carrying out the wishes of Canada for direct negotiations, and for the interchange of commodities under an arranged system of Tariff without reference to England; and Sir Alexander Galt as our agent was placed in direct communication with the various Ministers of Finance and of Trade and Commerce there, whether Mr. Girard, the great protectionist, or his successor or M. Gambetta, who is as great a Free Trader as he dare be without running counter to the general feelings of the Government and the people of France. Sir Alexander Galt has communicated with them, and we hope he will be able to make an arrangement, and a promising sign is that the Ministers of France have expressed themselves strongly in favor of adopting joint action, whereby we would have a line of steamers running between France and Canada, just as we have now between Canada and Brazil. And Sir Alexander Galt says, that he thinks that proposition will be carried out, and if carried out it will result in a trade which will so attract the attention of the French Government and French people so that we may hope that they will find that we can give them something by reducing our duties, and that they can give us something by reducing theirs, thus giving us reciprocity. So, Sir, during our short period of three years or a little more, we have not been idle. We have pressed the claims of Canada in England, to have her interests urged in all foreign ports. That has been granted in no stinted or restricted manner. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's despatch, which was read by the hon. gentleman, was the inception of the negotiations for giving a higher status to Canadian commerce and more direct means of communication with the various nations. Things have gone on rapidly since that time and we may hope, we know, experience shows, the manner in which Sir Alexander Galt has acted, that we are only in the beginning of a great enterprise of this kind. The despatch of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach was guarded as a despatch at the opening of negotiations and from the representative of England should have been. We have received, as I have already told you, perhaps at too great length, not only the assurances, but those assurances carried into action, as well as the earnest co-operation of the Mother Country to strengthen our hands. The hon. gentleman pooh, pooh's the idea of war arising out of the breach of commercial treaties. Sir, war may not break out, but what is nearly as bad, in a commercial point of view, a cessation of political intercourse may take place. At this very day, and for years and years there has been no diplomatic communication of any kind between England and Mexico in consequence of the action of Mexico in matters in which England thought she was injured. There is no communication now between them, considerably to the interruption of trade between the Mother Country and that nation. But, Mr. Speaker, commercial treaties do not signify merely the interchange of commodities. The Reciprocity Treaty was not only an arrangement, a convention, a bargain for the interchange of commodities, free or at a regulated duty, but it handed over for a consideration the rights of fishing in our waters. We know, Mr. Speaker, what trouble Canada has had respecting these same fisheries, what expense Great Britain has been put to to guard our rights, and that a serious and angry diplomatic correspondence with the United States occurred because she upheld the interests of Canada with respect to those fisheries, and we know that Her Majesty's ships and Her Majesty's seamen have been employed in guarding and protecting Canadian interests there without asking us to pay a single farthing of the cost. I think we would not be benefitted by becoming in effect an independent nation, making our own treaties and being obliged to enforce them or to submit to the breach of them without any means of protecting them. Now, Sir, we have England at our back. England, if a treaty is once made with her, whether it affects her Canadian subjects or her South African subjects, or the people of England, Ireland or Scotland, will use the whole force of the Empire—I do not say necessarily in war, but will bring the whole force of her national prestige to bear—in vindicating the rights sanctioned by those treaties. I think we would be penny wise and pound foolish if we—for the sake of a little immediate advantage and for the purpose of avoiding a few delays by the round-about-way of communicating by the Foreign Office or the Colonial Office, and in order to have more speedy communication, and the immediate advantage of having a treaty made for the benefit of Canada—threw away the advantage we now have in having all our treaties made between Great Britain and the nation, not between Canada and the nation. If this be so, Mr. Speaker, I think these resolutions will do no harm in England. Disguise it as you will, this means separation and independence. The hon. gentleman is moving on by slow degrees to that point. This is a commercial movement; by-and-bye we will have something else; until at last we take a step for political independence. I have said to the House before, that a British subject I was born, and a British subject I hope to die. The best interests of Canada are all involved in the connection between the Mother Country and her loving and loyal colony. I think the adoption of this resolution would do a great deal of harm. I think it would be calculated to frustrate and obstruct the kind assistance that we have received from England. England might say at once, if you are going to have ambassadors of your own, if you are going to make your own treaties, we will no longer trouble ourselves about you, fight your own battles, do your own business, and see what you will make of it. The people of this country do not want that. They desire the continuance of this connection, and they believe as they give a most loyal affection to the Mother Country, so they believe the results to Canada, morally, financially and in every way, will be to enhance the progress of the country, and that we will receive the strongly pledged and never forgotten promise of the Government of England that they will stand by us, that they will not treat us as strangers but as a portion of the great British Empire, bound by loving ties to the Mother Country though separated by miles of sea. I think this resolution is a boastful assertion of our coming strength discounting our future, containing an ill-concealed wish that this should be the stepping stone to something further, that in some way our independence should increase and our dependence and support decrease, and that we should, as soon as convenient, be cast upon our own resources. This, Sir, would be an injury, a destruction, a ruin to Canada.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 80) respecting the River St. Clair Railway Tunnel Company.—(Mr. Arkell.)

Bill No. (95) to amend the Act incorporating "The Bell Telephone Company of Canada."—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 97) to incorporate the Calais and St. Stephen's Railway Bridge Company.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Bill (No. 114) respecting the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway.—(Mr. Abbott.)

THE TRUST AND LOAN COMPANY.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 35) to amend the Acts relating to the Trust and Loan Company of Canada, and for enlarging the powers of the said Company.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Bill reported.

On the motion for third reading,

Mr. WALLACE moved, that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to Committee of the Whole for amendment, inserting the words "not exceeding 8 per cent. per annum." after the word "whatsoever," in the third clause. He said: I think 8 per cent. is a sufficient rate of interest for any loan company. It is said that by making a limitation of the rate of interest, we should prevent money from coming into the country. This Company has been doing business in the country for a very long time, and has been satisfied with 8 per cent. and I see no reason now why that rate should be increased. In fact I think it rather ought to be decreased. Money is lent the farmers at such a ruinous rate of interest as it is impossible to pay, which accounts for so many having been sold out. As it is, I do not believe it is beneficial to the country to draw foreign capital into it at such a rate; the more that this comes in the worse for the country, and therefore I move that resolution.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know that the sense of fairness which characterizes my hon. friend will prevent him, after a moment's reflection, to support that motion. If he thinks the law respecting the rate of interest should be changed, it is perfectly right that he should take such steps as he may deem proper for the purpose; but he will hardly say that one law should be applied to one loan company, and another to another. While the law remains as it is, nothing can be fairer than to allow companies to obtain in the various Provinces the rate allowed by the law.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). We are a just Parliament and ought to be generous. Why did we pass a law the other day limiting the rate of interest with a company only a short time in the country, and which in all sections of the country has done a great deal of good. There company has been in existence the last twenty-five years, possessing the reputation of being a good and fair company, and which has treated justly all borrowers. If they did well for the last twenty-five years at 8 per cent, why now ask an increased rate? We refused the other company a higher rate of interest, and should certainly refuse this application. Within the last twelve months the Trust and Loan Company have changed the interest on mortgages from 8 to 7 per cent., without solicitation. Why do they now ask more than 8? In order that they can lend their money in the North-West. So far as we are concerned the North-West has very few representatives to look after their interests in this House, but I believe the representatives from all over the Dominion will see that the people of the North-West should not pay too high a rate of interest. 8 per cent. is more than should be paid on mortgages of any kind in any part of the Dominion. I had hoped, after the hint thrown out by the hon. Minister of Railways, that the hon. gentleman who has taken so deep an interest in the financial matters in this country, the hon. member for South Norfolk, would bring in a Bill to limit the rate of interest to 7 per cent. in all parts of the Dominion. I believe, had he done so in the earlier part of the Session, it would have gone through both Houses and became law. We would then have less loan companies and less farms to be sold, because it is a fact that throughout the length and breadth of Ontario, go where you will, notices are posted up of farms for sale by those companies. They have charged interest as high as 10 and 15 per cent., and some even as high as 20 per cent. The time has come when this House should put a stop to this wholesale charge inflicted on parties who are ignorant of the amount of interest they pay. I hope the hon. gentleman will press his motion to a division and we will see whether those members who refused to allow the "Credit Foncier," which contributed so much to reduce the rate of interest during the year, to increase their rate, will now allow a company that has done business for a quarter of a century to charge what interest they please.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I do not see why we should deal more leniently with this company than we did with the "Credit Foncier." The latter appealed to this House, a week ago, to be authorized to loan money at a higher rate than its present rate; its application was refused. Here is a company claiming new powers, and among those that of lending money at any rate they please. I do not see why we should grant to this company what we refused to the other. I think the hon. member for South Perth is still too generous; he should ask that this company should be limited to 6 per cent., and if his amendment be not carried, I intend to move one, providing that the rate be limited to 6 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It will be remembered by hon. members of the Committee of Banking and Commerce, that the "Credit Foncier" was incorporated with extraordinary privileges not given to any other company incorporated in Canada, and their incorporation was agreed to because they agreed to furnish money at not over 5 per cent. under their charter.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. That was the local charter.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That company was given these privileges on account of that engagement. That they came to this House and asked that the rate be increased to 7 per cent., but their Bill was rejected on account of these privileges. The Bill now under discussion was referred to a special Committee of the Committee on Banking and Commerce, which reported the provisions of the Bill as now before the House.

Amendment (Mr. Wallace) agreed to on the following division:—

House resolved again itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS. I think the proposition now before the Committee is one they ought to consider with great care. We have had, for a number of years, Free Trade in money, and the result is, very large sums have been sent by English and French capitalists for investment in this country. The rate of interest is lower than it has ever been in the history of these colonies, even when we had laws against usury. It is neither in the interests of the lender or the borrower that restrictions of this sort should be imposed; no doubt the effect will be to induce capitalists to withdraw money from investment in this country, and the rate, instead of being reduced, will actually be increased. It is perfectly obvious if we introduce the restriction in one matter we can not stop then. We cannot impose restrictions on one class of lenders that we do not impose on others similarly situated. But here upon a measure that would be regarded by many a measure of subordinate consequence, we are about to lay down a principle which cannot be confined to this measure, but must be applied to the same thing, seeking to invest money in this country. I would therefore move that the Committee rise.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think the hon. member for Bothwell is right. If we have to-day a legal rate of interest of 6 per cent. for all debts that have accrued, on the worst kind of security, then I think that as you lessen the security you can afford to lower the rate of interest. Many storekeepers in the country are doing business on the strength of their accounts and they get no security at all for payment. If after a certain length of time these men come to collect their accounts they find that the law allows them only six per cent. If a company loans money to a farmer the principle is generally adopted that it does not loan for more than half the value of the farm. Landed security is the best security, and if we are to say that the legal rate of interest shall be 6 per cent. upon the worst security, then upon the best security why should we not say that it should be more?

Mr. GIGAULT. The hon. member for Bothwell, a few days ago, when the Bill affecting the Crédit Foncier Canadien was before the House, voted not to allow that institution to loan money at a higher rate than 6 per cent., but now he is opposing a reduction in the rate of interest. I voted to allow that company to lend money at a higher rate than 6 per cent., and I think we should adopt the same rule for all monetary institutions. I thought that on account of the crisis in France, we should allow that company some more latitude. If we had four or five millions more of French capital in this country to compete with British and Canadian capital, the rate of interest would be lowered. I think it was not fair to say to the Crédit Foncier Canadien: You shall lend your money at 6 per cent. or close your doors, while we allow other institutions to lend money at 7, 8, 9 and 10 per cent.

Bill reported.

On motion for the third reading,

Mr. BÉCHARD. I voted for the amendment because I thought it was preferable that the Bill should pass with the amendment than that it should pass in its original form. I repeat now that the rate of interest at 8 per cent. is too high, and I believe other hon. gentlemen in this House are of the same opinion. I therefore move that the Bill be remitted with instructions to amend it so that the rate of interest imposed by the company shall not exceed 6 per cent.

Mr. McCARTHY. There has been no notice given of this amendment, and therefore it is not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think, according to the 67th rule of the House, the amendment is not in order, because according to that rule there can be no important amendment to a Private Bill in Committee of the Whole, or at the third reading, unless one day's notice of the same shall have been given.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I have seen it done many times.

Mr. SPEAKER. Not with Private Bills, it may have been done with Public Bills.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. MILLS.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

House resumed the debate on Mr. Blake's proposed amendment to Sir Leonard Tilley's proposed motion for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MILLS. I propose to address the House briefly in reply to the observations made by the First Minister on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Durham. The right hon. gentleman, at the head of the Government, has laid down a number of propositions in reference to the motion of my hon. friend for West Durham, to which I cannot subscribe. I neither concur in the principles he has enunciated, nor in the line of argument he has adopted. The hon. gentleman said in the first place that England would not give her consent to the principles laid down in the resolution before the House, and that it was not our interest that she should do so. The hon. gentleman also stated that we were quietly feeling our way in precisely the same direction. The right hon. gentleman next contended that if the policy set out in this resolution were acted upon it would lead to the separation of Canada from the United Kingdom. Now, Sir, I do not concur with any of the statements which the right hon. gentleman has made. Let us consider for a moment what are the principles of the motion before us. Sir, the arguments which the hon. gentleman addressed to the House this afternoon were similar to those which were addressed to the old Legislature of Canada and to the people of England when we asked for responsible Government in this country. A good many members in this House no doubt will recollect a pamphlet that was issued many years ago by the late Chief Justice of Canada, Sir John Beverley Robinson, in which he argued that if local self-government were conferred upon the colonies it would lead to the separation of the colonies from the Mother Country. He said that the Governor of a Province was an Imperial officer acting under instructions from the Colonial Office, and he asked how he could possibly obey the instructions received from the Colonial Secretary and at the same time act upon the advice of responsible advisers in this country. He held that the necessities of his position rendered it impossible that responsible Government could be established in any of the colonies. That inference was denied by those who were friends to the introduction of responsible Government; it was combatted by Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Lafontaine and other gentlemen acting as leaders of the Reform party. Those hon. gentlemen said that it was perfectly consistent with loyalty to the Empire and with the continuance of the connection that the people of the colonies should exercise the rights of self-government, that so far from leading to the separation of the colonies from the Mother Country it would tend to strengthen the bond of union which existed between them. We had had almost a half century for the trial of this experiment, and we have little doubt as to who was right in the line of argument which they adopted. We find, instead of the bond between the colonies and the Mother Country being weakened by an extension to the colonies of the principles of self-government, it has been strengthened. The people instead of being dissatisfied are satisfied, their own opinions are respected, their own views are acted upon, and there has been no time in the history of the country when the bond of union between the British North America Provinces and the United Kingdom was stronger than it is at this moment. The same reasons which necessitated the adoption of responsible Government, which made it right and proper we should exercise control over our own local affairs, have made it necessary that we should seek for a wider sphere of government than that which we have enjoyed. We are not asking for the introduction of any new principle, we are simply asking for the extension of an old principle, to new circumstances; we are met by an old argument, applied to an altered condition of things. What were our circumstances when responsible Government was established in this country? We were simply great municipal corporations; we sought to build roads and bridges; to provide for internal improvement, and to furnish facilities of communication between one portion of the Province and another, and one settlement and another; and the result of those local improvements has been that the whole of British North America has been prepared for the establishment of this Federal Union. We have increased in wealth and in population, and we have at the present time a more extensive commerce than the United Kingdom had a hundred years ago. To-day the commerce of Canada amounts to $200,000,000; we carrying on trade with the West Indies, South America, the adjoining Republic, with Spain, to some extent with France and Germany, and to a very large extent with the United Kingdom. The question that presents itself to us is, should we direct the policy and control the operations of our people in the field of commerce as we have controlled them in ordinary local affairs? It is just as necessary to exercise the principle of self-government in the one case as in the other. It is not held, that before we possessed local self-government the United Kingdom desired to do us any harm. They desired to further our interests as far as they attracted their attention, their actions being such as they believed would be most beneficial to us; but we know they were not the best judges of our circumstances, that they did not take the same interest in this country as we felt ourselves, and every attempt to extend to us those kind attentions was felt to be an injury rather than a benefit. By the concession of the principles of self-government we were enabled to deal with those matters in the way in which the people desired. We have outgrown that condition. Our interests are no longer confined within the limits of the Dominion. Our relations with foreign countries are more extensive, as I have said, than were the relations of the United Kingdom with foreign countries a century ago, and we have just the same interest in promoting our external interests as any other people with the same wealth and commerce, in any other portion of the globe has in theirs, and the Government of the United Kingdom and its officers are no more competent to take charge of those external relations than of our internal and domestic affairs. This is a reasonable proposition. Why should we not seek to promote our own commercial well-being? Why should we entrust our external relations to other people who are pre-occupied with other affairs? Certainly we have more leisure, we have a greater interest in attending to what we believe the commercial well-being of this country than it is possible any other people can have, and it can no more interfere with the existing relations between Canada and the Mother Country, than can legislation upon the Tariff, upon property and civil rights, upon the ordinary domestic affairs of the country. I say that no people have so much interest in our well-being as ourselves. I was reminded, by an observation made by the right hon. leader of the House, of what came under my own notice some years ago at Buffalo. A Canadian vessel carrying a cargo of poles, was obliged to throw a large portion overboard. The result was that when the vessel reached port, duties were charged on what were shipped and not on what reached port. The owner brought the matter under the notice of the English Consul, but he not being responsible to the Government of Canada and not feeling specially interested in the subject of the complaint, paid no attention to it whatever; and I said then if we had had a consular agent at Buffalo, responsible to the Canadian Government, who might be removed for neglect of duty, his conduct would have been wholly different from the ambassadors and consuls of Great Britain. They are looking for promotion to the Government which appoints them. They look after the affairs which affect the well-being of the people of the United Kingdom. They know the Government of the United Kingdom is responsible to the Parliament that sits at Westminster, and not to the Parliament that sits at Ottawa, but if they do anything at all by way of promotion of commercial interests, they do it by looking after the interests of the people of the United Kingdom and not those of any dependency or colony. If we wish the Agents and Ambassadors residing at foreign ports to take a special interest in the commercial well-being of this country, we must have men whose positions are more or less affected by the attention which they give to the interests of the people of this country, and it is only in this way that these people will ever seek to promote our commerce and give our manufacturers, merchants and farmers that information regarding foreign markets which will stimulate industry at home and contribute to the well-being and prosperity of this country. The hon. the First Minister told us of the ranks of Ambassadors and the different ranks to which they are raised in proportion to the dignity and importance of the country they represent, and I could not but think from the observations he made that he was reading the condition of the diplomatic corps of foreign countries as it existed a century and a-half ago rather than as it exists at this moment. Hon. gentlemen will remember a description given by Macaulay of the difficulties of negotiating peace between England and Holland on the one side and France on the other, how the Ambassadors were afraid to approach each other for fear that they would seem to be making improper concessions, how they watched each other's legs for fear one would sacrifice the dignity of his country by taking the first step; and we know that at the Treaty of Onabruck, before negotiations could be entered into, a circular place of meeting had to be erected with as many doors as Ambassadors, as no one would consent to another taking precedence of him by entering first; and in order that all might be on a footing of equality a round table was made and placed in the centre of the room. Well, Sir, I did not know that in these days of common sense and commerce men wasted their time in that way, and I think the hon. leader of the Government must have been looking at the musty records of former periods rather than at the acts of living men of common sense in this day. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman told us on a former occasion, when a subject similar to this was brought before the House by Sir Alexander Galt, that if we were to appoint an Ambassador to negotiate a treaty with a foreign State the first question would be: Who are you, who do you represent, where do you come from; and it would be said: We do not know such a country as Canada; and that they would refuse to negotiate with us. The hon. gentleman said something very much like that to-day, but he also made statements of fact hardly consistent with this line of argument. He told us that Sir Alexander Galt had gone to Madrid, that he had been put into communication by the British Minister with the Premier or representative of Foreign Affairs in the Spanish Government, and that that hon. gentleman was most happy to enter into active negotiations with him, and the hon. gentleman assured us that Sir Alexander Galt was just on the point of succeeding when he failed to succeed. If the hon. gentleman's statement is correct the Government of Spain, at all events, made no objection to entering into negotiations with Sir Alexander Galt as the representative of Canada. I would like to call the attention of the House to this fact: Supposing Her Majesty, instead of sending Sir Alexander Galt there with letters to the British Minister, and the British Minister giving him an introduction to the representative of the Spanish Government, he had been appointed by the Queen a Plenipotentiary extraordinary to deal with this important question of the trade relations between Spain and Canada, will the hon. gentleman pretend that the Spanish Government would have refused to acknowledge or to receive him as Her Majesty's representative, because he was a native of Canada? What! is it the business of a foreign Court to ask a British Ambassador whence he comes, and if he is a native of England, Ireland or Scotland, or lives beyond the limits of the United Kingdom? They have no right to put such a question; such a supposition is preposterous. The only thing is, are you properly accredited in this business; are you properly accredited to this Court by the Queen. It is not the English Ministry, not the English Parliament, but Her Majesty that is known abroad. Negotiations are carried on in her name, and the man who goes to a foreign State to carry on negotiations for the United Kingdom or for any part of the Empire, has the right to deal with a foreign State and is subject to the instructions he has received from Her Majesty. As the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) said, the Queen is not merely the Queen of the United Kingdom, but the Sovereign of this Dominion, and if she appoints an Ambassador or Plenipotentiary or Agent to act on her behalf for the purpose of communication and treaty between this section of the Empire and any foreign State he is just as competent to act as the resident Ambassador. The hon. leader of the Government made the extraordinary statement that no treaty, no engagement, is binding, or can be made with a foreign State unless it is signed by the resident Ambassador. Now, I say this is a most preposterous statement. He could not have remembered the negotiations between the American representatives and those of the United Kingdom, in 1783, in Paris. All will remember the disputes between Mr. Fox and Lord Shelburne, as to whether the negotiations with the American representatives should be carried on by the Colonial Office or the Foreign Office. The American colonies had claimed their independence, and it had not been recognized; and there was a conflict between the two Departments as to which should carry on the negotiation; but there is no doubt about this, that whoever the Government appointed for the purpose of carrying on these negotiations was the properly accredited person for the purpose, no matter whether he wanted the authority of the Foreign Office or of the Colonial Department. Well, Sir, when you look at the treaty that was negotiated in 1855 by Lord John Russell, at Vienna, for the purpose of concluding the Crimean war, it is true it was not ratified by the House, but it is true also that it was not negotiated by the resident Minister, but by a Plenipotentiary extraordinary, a Minister of the Crown who was sent for the purpose of carrying on that negotiation on behalf of the British Government. It is therefore utterly preposterous for the hon. gentleman to stand here and undertake to mislead and misinform this House by making such a statement. There is no doubt that the representative residing at a foreign Court could conduct these negotiations as he is the accredited agent of his Sovereign. He is specially acquainted with the manners, customs and circumstances, having long resided on the spot, having in this respect an advantage over a person specially appointed for the purpose; but there is no doubt that, if the Sovereign chooses to confer upon a Plenipotentiary extraordinary the power to negotiate a treaty or to carry on any business with a foreign State, the Sovereign has the right to do so. It is perfectly clear, then, when we look at the facts, that if Her Majesty gave us the power, if the English Government consented that we should have the power asked for in the resolutions submitted by the hon. member for West Durham, we should have the right to advise Her Majesty to appoint some one from Canada to act on our behalf—to negotiate a treaty with a foreign State; and the person so appointed would be perfectly competent, and would act by the authority, not of the Government of Canada, but by the authority of Her Majesty, and it would be simply as Her Majesty's representative that he would be known at that foreign Court. The hon. gentleman has referred to the attempt at negotiation with France, but the hon. member for West Durham showed the roundabout and dilatory manner in which these negotiations were carried forward. The ancient rules and red-tapeism still adhered to in the Foreign Office, rendered it almost impossible that the negotiations should be carried to a speedy conclusion. It is perfectly obvious that Sir Alexander Galt failed to secure commercial relations with France because of the obstacles which this routine placed in his way. It is true, the right hon. gentleman said, he failed, but that we lost nothing by it; it is true, he said, at that time France was imposing a tax of 40 francs a ton on Canadian shipping offered for sale in the French markets, while only two francs a ton were charged on British shipping, but that now the tax was reduced to 2 francs on Canadian ships. But the hon. gentleman only stated half the truth, and his statement was therefore misleading. At this moment, although the duty on Canadian-built ships has been reduced from 40 francs a ton to 2 francs a ton, Canadian ships are in a worse position than they were when Sir Alexander Galt was carrying on these negotiations. What are the facts? Why, that France at this moment pays a bounty of 30 cents a ton on home-built ships for every thousand miles of sailing they do; she pays a bounty of $12 a ton for the construction of these ships, and a bounty of $22 a ton on the engines and machinery employed in ordinary steamships, so that these bounties today are a greater impediment to the sale of Canadian-built ships in the French markets than was the old tax of 40 francs a ton. The hon. gentleman has referred to a censure that he says was pronounced on the French Consul at Quebec, because he undertook to negotiate here without the authority of the French Government. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman misstated the fact. It was on the colleague of the right hon. gentleman that the censure was pronounced, not by the French Government, but by the Under-Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Sir Charles Dilke. If I am rightly informed, the British Minister asked the right hon. gentleman—for he was in England at the time—how this matter came about, and he asserted that his colleague had no authority for entering into any negotiations; and Sir Charles Dilke censured the hon. Minister of Public Works in Canada for entering into negotiations without any authority with the French Consul at Quebec. The right hon. gentleman says that we have begun by sending an Ambassador—where? Why, to the Government of the United Kingdom, to a Government with whom we are in the most intimate relations, to a Government who have a representative here to whom we can speak—sending a representative where we have least need of one. When Sir Alexander Galt was appointed, the right hon. gentleman did not represent that this was the principal object in appointing him; the principal object, he said, was to save a large expenditure to this country by the visits of Ministers to England for the transaction of business. We required to borrow money in the English market; we required to do something to promote emigration from the United Kingdom to this country, and it was said that Ministers would no longer require to visit the Capital of the United Kingdom, and Sir Alexander Galt was appointed for this purpose. But we learn that now Sir Alexander Galt was appointed not for this, but to act as our Ambassador, not only to the Court of St. James, but to the whole universe; he was to be our Ambassador to Madrid, to Paris, to Berlin, and to every other Court on the continent of Europe. We are also assured that he is to be our Plenipotentiary extraordinary to the Emperor of Brazil. The hon. gentleman has told us that we are opening up trade relations with the Empire of Brazil, that an extensive trade is growing up between the two countries, that the productions of the two countries are such that they are well adapted to trade with each other, that there is no rivalry or competition between them, but that one is supplying to a large degree the wants of the other. That we have subsidized steamers for that trade, but that while we are carrying on these trade relations, it would be snapping the tie that binds Canada to England if we were to deal directly with Brazil on our own behalf. I cannot see how it would sever Canada from the United Kingdom to appoint a representative to Brazil any more than it would if the Government of Great Britain appointed an Agent to act on our behalf. Is it not absurd to say, while we are carrying on an extensive trade with Brazil and are negotiating with the view of promoting that trade, that no one from Canada should go there to enquire into the natural products of the country and to ascertain how far these trade relations could be promoted and the trade augmented? We have no representative there now. The English Ambassador at Rio Janeiro and the English Consul at every port is interested in looking after the trade between Brazil and the United Kingdom; they are not to make any enquiry into the trade between Canada and Brazil; that is not a matter which interests them; they are not to receive any reward or promotion, or any recognition for what they may do on our behalf; we are not represented in the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and we have no power to bring to bear on their condition. Therefore it is not our interests that specially concern them; their interests point in a wholly different direction. They are acting properly and wisely; they are doing an essential service to the Government that appoints them; but they are not doing a service for us. We, Sir, must act on our own behalf if we are ever to promote our own commercial relations, or to secure to ourselves that share of the commerce of the world which our population and our wealth entitle us to expect. The hon. gentleman has told us that it is inconsistent with our position of dependence. Let me suppose that Sir Alexander Galt were sent by the Queen upon the advice of the Government of Canada as Plenipotentiary extraordinary to the Empire of Brazil for the purpose of reporting upon the prospects of establishing more intimate commercial relations between the two countries—would that in any way affect our relations with the United Kingdom or tend to sever the tie? On the contrary, if the Government of the United Kingdom offered us facilities for carrying on those enquiries, if it seconded our efforts, and we in consequence secured a more extensive commerce with Brazil, would it not, on the contrary, tend to strengthen the tie that binds us to England rather than to sever it? I can see no difference whatever between negotiating on our own behalf and being negotiated successfully for by the representative of the Government of Great Britain. That we are more likely to succeed, acting on our own behalf than by entrusting our business to others who have no special interest in the success of such negotiations, I have no doubt. I do not believe that if Sir Alexander Galt was commissioned by Her Majesty, at the instance of the Government here, to go to Brazil to negotiate a commercial treaty, that he would be asked: Where do you come from; are you a native of Canada?—and that if he were to say he was, that they would reply: We cannot negotiate with you—you have Her Majesty's commission, which shows that you are authorized to negotiate only for that portion of her Empire, called the Dominion, and therefore, we will not treat with you. It is preposterous to suppose that any such objection would be made. The hon. gentleman has said that the Government here has a National Policy, that they expected there would be over-production in consequence, and were anxious to secure commercial relations with foreign States, in order that a market might be found for the excess of our products. We have always had an excess in certain lines—in lumber, fish and agricultural products, for which we have needed a foreign market; and we have for years required the right to negotiate treaties with Foreign States in order that greater outlets for our trade might be found. If our foreign trade depended upon the surplus products flowing from the miscalled National Policy, I am inclined to think that it would be a long time before it would be necessary to submit to the House a motion like that of the hon. member for West Durham. The right hon. gentleman also referred to the case of Mexico, and spoke of the great inconvenience that exists at present in consequence of Great Britain having withdrawn her Ambassador from the Mexican capital, and he stated it was owing to the non-fulfilment of certain treaty obligations on the part of Mexico. That is not correct, I believe. The Mexican Government appropriated the property of English residents, it despoiled them of their rights, and refused to compensate or give any satisfaction, and the English Government withdrew its Ambassador, and broke off negotiations with the Mexican Government. The hon. gentleman has also said: Supposing you had power to negotiate treaties, how would you enforce your rights? If we make a treaty, it will be a voluntary compact between a foreign State and Canada; we shall have an interest in the treaty which we believe to our advantage, and the foreign State will be similarly placed and will act in good faith for the same reason; and it is absurd to suppose that each party, seeking to advance its own welfare, would put impediments in the way of the carrying out of engagements beneficial to both. The hon. gentleman has also expressed the fear that commercial independence, so to speak, or the power rather to enter into commercial relations with foreign States, would lead to the separation of Canada from the United Kingdom. The proposition of my hon. friend is that the Government of the United Kingdom shall have a veto, to be exercised in cases similar to its exercise upon our legislation. We do not ask for anything more, and believe that so far from the change asked for, tending to sever the ties that bind us to the United Kingdom, it would be the very means of promoting and strengthening those relations. You cannot govern the boy of seventeen or eighteen as you would the boy of five, or apply to him the same rules, or subject him to the same absolute commands. No more can you deal with a people of 5,000,000, who have extensive commercial interests, in the way in which you would deal with a new colony with no commercial relations whatever. If this country is going to continue an integral part of the Empire, the Government of the country must change, and be adjusted to the altered circumstance of the people of this country. Just as we required the right of self-government, for the purpose of dealing with our own domestic affairs, to the exclusion of Imperial interference, so now we require to extend the principle to our foreign commercial relations. They exist; we best understand them; we alone are specially interested in them, and we have the same right to deal with those interests, to protect and promote them as the people of the United Kingdom have to deal with theirs, and make such foreign engagements as those interests demand. So far, then, from the power asked for by this resolution, tending to the early severance of Canada from the Mother Country, I believe it will tend to prolong the existing relations which, certainly at an earlier day, would be terminated, if it was found that our foreign interests, which are daily becoming more important, were not regulated and directed by the mind of this country. It is rather extraordinary that the hon. gentleman should be so much afraid of the separation of Canada from the United Kingdom, when, during the elections of 1878 his organ—a newspaper published by the hon. member for Welland, acting under his direction, speaking his sentiments, and inspired by him, declared that if it was found the connection between Canada and the Mother Country was incompatible with the National Policy, it was so much more the worse for the connection. Those hon. gentlemen were ready to sever the connection between Canada and the Mother Country in the interest of that small class who have enjoyed the fostering care of the Minister of Finance. He at present is not prepared to run any such risk when it is to protect a commerce that amounts to upwards of $200,000,000 a year. I have no doubt upon this question that just as the recognition of the principle of local self-government tended to quiet the public mind, to allay dissatisfaction and to cultivate a spirit of contentment towards the Mother Country, so the promotion of the right to deal with and regulate treaties, to enter into commercial relations with foreign States when our interests demand that it will, instead of severing the tie which binds us to the Government of the United Kingdom only tends to make that tie more durable. We know that the people of this country are a progressive people; their circumstances are changing; they are every day becoming more and more a nationality, and we propose not a sham National Policy, which means class legislation, the promotion of the interests of one portion of the community at the expense of the rest, but a real National Policy that will promote the interests of a whole people, give them control over their own affairs, and enable them to manage those matters with which they are especially concerned, and which they best understand. It was said many years ago by Mr. Gladstone that the people of Canada ought to provide for their own defence, that the Imperial troops ought to be withdrawn from Canada, and he said no people could be any more than a dependent population unfit for self-government in the highest sense which did not provide for their own self-defence. I believe that that was true, and I never desired to see the burden of our ordinary defence thrown on the Imperial Treasury. For the same reason, I have no wish the Imperial Government should discharge a duty on our behalf, that we are well qualified to discharge for ourselves. I deny the proposition by the right hon. First Minister. I believe that if we ask for the power to negotiate commercial treaties, we shall have no difficulty in securing it, and so far from its severing the ties which bind us to the United Kingdom, it will tend to prolong the existing relations between Canada and the Mother Country.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have only a word to say for the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. It is about the correspondence alluded to between Mr. Lefebvre, the French Consul, and myself. The hon. gentleman said that Mr. Lefebvre had not been censured by his Government, or if he had, that at all events the Minister of Public Works of Canada had been censured by Mr. Dilke in England. Is that what the hon. gentleman said?

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I may say this to the hon. gentleman that, as a Minister of the Crown in Canada, I was not under Mr. Dilke in England. I had no responsibility to him or any one else then. I was responsible only to the Governor General of Canada and the people who have elected me, and the correspondence which took place between Mr. Lefebvre and myself, took place upon the responsibility of the Government in Canada, especially of the right hon. First Minister, and is a correspondence that can be defended anywhere. There has been no censure either in England or here of the Minister of Public Works. At all events, a censure in England I would not have accepted, because I had no responsibility in that direction.

Mr. DECOSMOS. I am glad that the hon. gentleman on my right has presented this resolution. It is a proof that on his part and on the part of his supporters, they believe the Imperial Government are unable to manage the trade affairs of Canada. We had a statement of a similar nature made by the right hon. leader of the Government when he said they had sent an Ambassador or a Chief Commissioner to England to attend to the affairs of Canada, and to Paris and to Madrid. It appears, therefore, to me that both parties in this House are not satisfied with the way our commercial affairs have been managed by England, and now the Opposition ask that some address or despatch, or Order in Council, or Minute of Council may be sent to England in order that Her Majesty may place this country in such a condition that we may be able to attend to our own commercial affairs. Although my hon. friend who has just sat down has labored to show this House all the minutiae of diplomatic affairs and to show us the history of the past hundred years, I think it matters little to us what was done in the respect to this matter. As the hon. gentleman has said to-day it did not require a first-class diplomat to attend to mere matters of business. I am one of those who believe that this country should have the right to negotiate its commercial treaties. I go a step further, I believe this country should have the right to negotiate every treaty. The tendency of this resolution is, as the right hon. First Minister pointed out, in the direction of independence. I see no reason why the people of Canada should not look forward to Canada becoming a sovereign and independent State. The right hon. gentleman stated that he was born a British subject and hoped to die one. Sir, I was a British colonist, but do not wish to die a tadpole British colonist. I do not wish to die without having all the rights, privileges and immunities of the citizen of a nation. The tendency of the right hon. gentleman's remarks is that we must still hang on to the Imperial Government. I believe it would be well for Canada if she would hang on for some considerable time longer, because I believe the Constitution of Canada is not adapted to well-working under Independence. Before this country can assume the position of an independent State its Constitution must be changed. I hold to the view that obtains on the American side, that each Province should be an independent State. As it is now, instead of the Provinces having similar rights to the reserved rights, the expressed rights, they have none. Holding these views I congratulate the hon. member for West Durham in bringing forward the resolution. I also congratulate the Government in sending Sir Alexander Galt to England, to France and to Madrid. Although his mission was very successful, it shows that public opinion in Canada is drifting in the direction pointed out by this resolution. If Canada is ever to become a separate and independent State without the shedding of blood, it will be by a union of the two great parties in this country. Sir, I am one of those who believe that this country is not in a condition to ask for Independence. In the first place, our territory is not complete, Newfoundland lies on the east, and British Columbia on the west, a Province that has been oppressed as much as ever Ireland has been.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DECOSMOS. Hon. gentlemen may sneer and laugh, but every word I state will prove to be truths of history, and when the time comes for the people of British Columbia to raise historical monuments, they will raise one to the perfidy of Canada; and it may be that some of those hon. gentlemen who haw-haw now and sneer will find their faces on the panel, and the children of the present generation of British Columbia will point to them with scorn. I repeat that I concur in the object of this resolution. I do not say I can concur in all its terms, but I do heartily concur in the spirit of it. I am one of those who believe that the Imperial Government is not capable of doing the foreign business of Canada, but that Canada ought to do her own foreign business, and I shall therefore vote for the resolution.

Mr. OUMET (in French). Mr. Speaker, without wishing to make a speech, I am desirous of stating in a few words the reasons for which I am about to record my vote in favor of the resolutions. All that is asked for by these resolutions now before the House, is that a humble address should be presented to Her Majesty, setting forth that it is in the interest of Canada to have the control of the commercial treaties which we may have to enter into with foreign countries, and this request is not an excessive one. So far, no one has ventured to say that such a request was not a legitimate one, or that it was not the natural crowning of the National Policy inaugurated by us in 1879. This request does not embody anything disloyal; it does not embody anything objectionable to the Mother Country if she wishes to treat us as a mother treats her children; she cannot take umbrage at it except in the case that she would wish to keep this country under the control of her own merchants, in contradiction to the interests of our common country. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am myself in favor of these resolutions, although my vote is not to be considered one of non-confidence in the Government on that question. On the contrary, I maintain that this proposition is not a vote of censure against the Government, for to the present day the Government, instead of being open to censure on this subject is deserving of praise for the fact that the policy that it inaugurated in 1879 is the policy upheld by the resolutions now moved. If we may control our own Tariff we may also and we should control our commercial relations with foreign countries. We ought to have control of those commercial treaties which will enable us to utilize and dispose of the surplus products of our manufactures in the near future. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that, as I said just now, these resolutions are injurious to our interests. I do not, moreover, think that they bring us directly towards political independence from the Mother Country. The Imperial Government is not obliged to grant them to us, and should it not see fit to do so it will not, to use popular language, give us a beating for making it; we shall simply be told that the Imperial Government does not feel inclined to grant us so great a latitude as that that would be given us by conceding to us our commercial independence. Possibly then the country may give vent to some expression of the popular feeling; it may happen that upon our request being refused the country will enquire if an injustice is not being done to it. Time will settle these matters, and when I speak of time, many years may go by until it does come, but with time will rest the settling of that important question of the independence of our country. We have a sufficient extent of territory, we have a sufficiently large population, our country is rich enough to aspire to a national existence. We have oftentimes been told in the course of the debates on the National Policy, that the object of that policy was to build up a country and to establish the basis of a great nation. I do not, therefore, see, Mr. Speaker, why we should not at once adopt the consequences of the principle which we have established, and I consequently fail to see why the resolutions now before the House should be charged with being disloyal. I repeat it—my intention in voting for these resolutions is not to show disloyalty to the Mother Country. She has granted us much already, and will probably grant us this new request, for the Mother Country apparently sees that our country is making too rapid strides; that this country is already too great a one for her to control its destinies in an arbitrary or despotic fashion. Thus, if our request be granted, so much the better; it will be a cause of rejoicing for the country. Since it has been considered advisable to spend such considerable amounts to obtain for us commercial treaties with France, Spain and the East Indies, there is no doubt that if the present request is granted to us, that we shall at once have obtained the object which we have had in view up to this day. Mr. Speaker, as I said just now, the vote that I propose to give on this question is not one of non-confidence. It is a vote expressive of an opinion which I have held long since, an opinion which I have expressed on other occasions before the electors and before the public and I do not think it is forbidden to give utterance to one's opinions on subjects of this importance in this Parliament, simply because we are told that it is inopportune to make such a request. I do not look at matters in that light, Mr. Speaker. I do not see that the matter implies an insult or that it is inopportune to make the request to the Mother Country. If she refuses, we will repeat our request; we will insist, and before the unanimous expression of that feeling by Canada she will have to give in some day, as she has already given in on many other points. That day will be a grand one for the country, and those who have to-day the courage of their opinions will be able to congratulate themselves later on for having rendered so great a service to their country. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I will vote in favor of the resolutions of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake).

Mr. COURSOL. I am prepared to express my approval of this resolution in the abstract. I have devoted a good deal of attention to this question, and after full deliberation I have come to the conclusion to give my assent to the proposition. It may appear at first sight to be a motion of non-confidence in the Government, but I do not view it in that light, if we are to believe the remarks made by the hon. mover in introducing the resolutions. Like the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, I do not consider that in voting for the resolution I am expressing a want of confidence in the Government, but I wish to affirm a principle which I believe to be correct. If the right of petition belongs to the humblest British subject it certainly belongs to this Parliament, and in this instance the resolution asks Her Majesty the Queen to take into consideration a certain request which we make. We ask the Government of Great Britain to consider whether it would not be advisable to grant us certain concessions which we believe will be for the benefit of this country. It may be said that this is not the proper way to approach Her Majesty, that in our present circumstances we cannot obtain such a power, and that it must necessarily be refused. Mr. Speaker, if the English Government were to refuse such a request, I, for one, would like to know the reason why. But if, because we are in the dependent position of colonists, we are refused this petition then, as loyal subjects of Her Majesty the Queen, we should accept the situation. I would have preferred that this resolution should have been made at another time and under other circumstances, also that it should have been expressed in clearer and plainer language. Nevertheless, their principle I approve; I see no impropriety in voting for this resolution. I declare again that it is not, in my opinion, a motion of want of confidence in the Government. We have already had two instances, this Session, of resolutions being moved in amendment to the motion to go into Supply, when the resolutions were moved by the friends of the Government. Last night we voted in favor of an Address to Her Majesty, asking her to accord certain political rights to Ireland. If we may pray for political rights for Ireland, why may we not pray for our own rights? Therefore, holding the views set forth in the conclusion of the resolutions—views which I have already expressed before my constituents—I feel it my duty to vote for the resolutions.

Mr. ROYAL (in French). Mr. Speaker, I will vote against the resolutions of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) for two reasons: First, because I look upon it as a vote of non-confidence in the Government, and, secondly, because I do not think that this method of discussing the independence of the country is the one which should be adopted. I believe in matters that are clearly defined. Place the question in a pure and simple form before the Parliament, divest it of all that can take away from the force of debate, and my opinion will not be an undecided one. Moreover, we have no complaints to make so far against the Government, for in its appointments of commercial agents abroad, by its National Policy inaugurated in 1879, by its several administrative measures since it is in power, consciously or unconsciously, its policy has tended towards independence. What really does the word National Policy mean if not a Tariff made by an independent nation, or one striving to become so. Mr. Speaker, I think it is but logical to vote against the resolution of the hon. member for West Durham, because it proposes an impossible method of attaining what he seeks, and, secondly, I repeat it, the policy of the Government itself tends towards national independence. Moreover, I think that the time is not far distant when that question will force itself upon the attention of the members of this House. I think the time is not far off when we shall have to take that question into consideration and pronounce the word independence without fear of being charged with disloyalty to the Crown or to the constitution of our country. But the question must come before us in a clear, precise and defined form, and then we will discuss it, but not in the shape in which it has been placed this evening before the House by the hon. member for West Durham. This question, which is already a theme for discussion in the household, in merchant's offices, in the press and in public, must ultimately come before the House and compel us to discuss it. But, Mr. Speaker, the present moment would be inopportune for its discussion, when Ontario, or at least an important portion of the Province of Ontario, is uttering threats which threaten to imperil our very constitution, and when we see the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) give utterance to a wail which bears a strong resemblance to a threat of secession. Consequently, I say and believe that at the present time it is the duty of all to vote against the resolution, because the affirming of it would be to cast a blame upon that policy which logically tends towards independence, a policy which has been approved of by all the members of the great party to which I have the honor to belong; to resume, because the method proposed by the resolution of the hon. member for Durham West is not the proper one according to which a question of this importance should be discussed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN (in French). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) finds that the motion of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) does not necessarily tend to the independence of this country. My hon. friend from Laval should nevertheless have remembered that the motion of the hon. member for West Durham must have, as a natural consequence, the political independence of the country, although it does not say so in so many words.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. member for West Durham, who thoroughly understands French, will permit me, and will give what I say a little of his attention, he will see what I want to say. The hon. member wishes us to go to the British Government and ask of it to allow us to appoint diplomatic agents abroad, and to conduct ourselves our diplomatic and commercial negotiations, with foreign powers. Now, let us suppose that the Mother Country allows us to appoint our agents abroad, the first thing we shall have to do will be to pay those agents, accredited to the various foreign Courts, provided always that those foreign Courts are willing to receive them; and then, when the time shall come for us to enter into negotiations with those powers, what additional strength can we bring to bear upon them to that which we enjoy to-day? We shall find ourselves alone, a country with a population of 4,000,000, possessing neither an army nor a navy to enforce our rights, and being consequently without any moral force in the eyes of those powers; and if these same powers enter into commercial treaties with us, what will there be to prevent them, the day following or the day following that, should their interests demand it, from violating those treaties. Thus will we find ourselves stranded, without the strength, without the power, without the authority to cause our rights to be respected; for we have neither army nor navy. Perhaps the hon. member will say: "But if we are placed in such a position, we shall necessarily have the necessary force to enforce our rights." That is where the question of the political independence of the country will at once come in, for England will, as a matter of course, say to us: "You have wished to conclude your commercial treaties by yourselves; those treaties are not in harmony with the policy of the Imperial Government, now defend yourselves." Such will be the necessary consequence, and the force of circumstances will compel us to have prematurely an army and a navy to defend us. And I would very much like to know who there is in our midst who could go before the electors of the country at the next election and say to them: "We are ready to incur the responsibility; we are desirous of enjoying commercial independence. We wish to have the right of concluding commercial treaties with foreign powers, but remember that this brings with it the obligation of having an army and a navy; millions will have to be spent to keep them up; but it is the necessary consequence of the policy which we have adopted." Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the country is ready to assume such a responsibility. We are but 4,000,000 of a population; we are now opening the country by railways and canals from one end to the other. We are calling thither a population from abroad to settle upon our soil and to people it, and it is not a suitable time for us to incur the responsibility of having an army and a navy, and to send our consuls and ambassadors abroad. Nevertheless, the hon. member cannot say that such is not the logical consequence of the position which the hon. member for West Durham wishes us to assume to-day. We saw a short time ago the junior member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) in conversation with the hon. member for West Durham; the hon. member for Victoria took special care to speak of his hon. friend on his right in order to countenance him and endorse his contention, and he told us that he supported that policy, because the natural consequence of it was the independence of the country, and that he himself was in favor of that independence. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is well that such a policy should reveal itself clearly before the House and the country; it is as well that we should know what we are to expect. If we are to have elections this summer, or next year, it is as well that the people should know by the vote we are about to record this evening if we are in favor of that independence, and if we are prepared to assume the responsibility of the expenditure which we should have to incur, were we to adopt the position which it is attempted to make us take. For my part I do not think that the population of Lower Canada, or of the Dominion, is in favor of the independence of the country. At present we enjoy, relatively speaking, a considerable amount of independence. We enjoy independence almost wholly, and the large cost of it is paid by the Mother Country. If we get into difficulties with a foreign power, who pays for the army and navy? Who comes to our defence? It is England which supplies the necessary funds, merely calling upon us to supply our pro rata share, as indeed we ought to do, to the expenditure of the Empire on our soil. But should we become independent to-morrow, we are left entirely to our own resources; we are left alongside a neighboring power which has a population ten or eleven times as numerous, and that will act as does every neighbor in politics; the big swallow the small and we shall find ourselves at his mercy. We are, to-day, the best of friends because England is there with her army, her fleet, her money, her prestige, and her flag to defend us, and hence it is that we are respected. It is not because we are strong of ourselves, but because England stands by us and guides us in the ways which we have adopted. It seems to me that the policy adopted by the country is wide enough; that we have enough to do within the limits of our attributions, without attempting to put on important airs which ill-becomes us, because we have neither the numbers nor the money, nor the necessary resources. All this will come later on; our population will increase and so will our resources, and if our descendants do not find that their position is the proper one, they will complain to the Mother Country. She will not raise any difficulty as to terms; she has already shown that on several occasions, and if in those days our descendants find that they are too grown up to be guided by England and to be protected by her, they will see what it is best for them to do; but in our day, I do not see that we have anything to gain in that direction; we have, on the contrary, everything to lose. We shall lose England's protection; we shall lose the resources afforded us by its revenues; we shall lose its fleet; we shall lose its army; we shall lose its flag, which in itself is a safeguard of our liberties. England does not meddle with our affairs in Canada; we are as free as a foreign power; we are simply told that we cannot negotiate our own treaties of commerce. Yet we have to-day in London our commercial agent, Sir A. T. Galt, and when we asked that he should be allowed to be present at the negotiations with France and with Spain, so that he might give advice in so far as our affairs were concerned, was this request refused? No; England assented. Now, what does that cost us? We have incurred no responsibility and such a position has not cost us anything. We reap all its advantages without having to bear its burdens. It is to be regretted, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Laval should have seen fit to separate himself from us on this question. I know that he is right when he says that the idea is not a new one with him, still I had hoped that he would have seen that the time has not come to develop it; that, on the contrary, that it is more opportune for us to remain in statu quo. We are growing in the shade of the British flag, let us continue to do so. Have we not made considerable progress during the past ten or fifteen years? We have been granted Confederation and the charter of our liberties, and it is a Confederation and a charter which many other nations would gladly enjoy. We have at times heard other nations tell us that they would be glad to possess our charter of liberties. We should not therefore change that position, for it is one worthy of ovation of 10,000,000 and even 20,000,000 of a population. We are not in the position of India which is simply governed by a Council, which I might call a Special Council and a Governor. Here it is the people who govern themselves through representatives freely elected by them; we have no other Council than that of the nation. We have our representatives of the various Provinces, not only chosen by the representatives of the Sovereign, but the organs of the great majority of the national representation in this House. It is consequently the people who govern the country, and what more can we desire? We wish to change our position simply to be able to say, that instead of obtaining a commercial treaty with France through a British ambassador in France, that we are going to obtain it direct through a Canadian commercial agent. I do not think that this position will be accepted by the House or by the country. On the contrary, I think that the position which we have accepted is the rational one, and that which the people desire to see maintained; the people wish for a long time to come to remain in the shade of the British flag, under the ægis of the British fleet. We and our children will grow up under such a condition, our country will become peopled, important and happy, and happier than it is to-day, for we are as happy as any nation of the globe, but a powerful country, a numerous people capable of deciding what we have to do. (The hon. gentleman continued in English): I regret that my hon. friend from Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) has taken the course he has adopted. The hon. gentleman does not believe that this is a vote of want of confidence against the Government, because if he thought so he would not cast his vote in that way, for he would not separate himself from his political friends. He says that the reason why he does not consider this a vote of non-confidence is because he has seen during this Session two motions proposed in amendment on the motion to go into Supply, and the Government did not take them as votes of non-confidence. The hon. gentleman forgot that those two motions were moved by friends of the Government and were accepted by the Government, and that they having been so moved and so accepted, could not be considered as votes of non-confidence. But this a different motion. It is a motion made by the leader of the Opposition, and he proposes therein a policy entirely contrary to the policy of the Government, and therefore we have to select between the policy of the leader of the Opposition and the policy of the leader of the Government. That is the position which the hon. member for West Durham has taken and that is the position he wants us to take. Well, we have no hesitation about it. We saw the hon. member for West Durham alongside of the junior member for Victoria. He was, no doubt, encouraging the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DECOSMOS. I rise to a point of order. I ask that the words of the hon. gentleman be taken down. I ask the hon. member for West Durham if I said a single word to him about this question or he to me.

Mr. BLAKE. Not a word passed between the hon member and myself in respect to this matter in the slightest degree.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The interruption is out of order. The hon. member had no right to interrupt me because I was stating this. I was saying that the hon. member for West Durham was alongside of the junior member for Victoria, and I said I had no doubt he was there encouraging the hon. gentleman. But the junior member for Victoria did not give me time to finish my sentence. He says: "I want those words taken down." "That he was encouraging the hon. gentleman." If that is not a parliamentary expression, I would say he was discouraging the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for West Durham was encouraging the hon. gentleman by his presence alongside of him, and the junior member for Victoria rose and assented to the proposal of the hon. member for West Durham. He said he was in favor of the motion and that he would vote for it, because he found that the principles advocated by the hon. member for West Durham would lead as a necessary consequence to the independence of the country. It is that point I want to bring out. The hon. gentleman is quite logical; he must not think I want to speak against his reasoning—these are his own ideas; but I want to have them out to show that the necessary consequence of the motion of the hon. member for West Durham, the leader of the Opposition, is the independence of the country. It is as well we should know it in this House; it is as well the electors of the country should know it. The House has to select between the principles of the leader of the Opposition and those of the Government as advocated by the First Minister. The leading principle of hon. gentlemen opposite is the independence of the country; we on this side wish to remain as we are, connected with Great Britain. When I so speak I speak as the representative of my Province, on behalf of the French Canadians of the Province of Quebec and of French Canadians all through the Dominion. We do not want a change, we are quite satisfied as we are. Our religion and language are different from those of the Mother Country, but that does not matter—that is not the question with us. It is whether we, as a body politic, are well off as we are or whether we are not. We find we are protected by the flag of England, by its navy, by its armies, and by its diplomatists, and we do not want to change that condition. Why should we ask England to have diplomatic agents of our own all through the world? Do we think we would gain anything by taking that position, that we would secure more authority, influence and respect at those Courts than we do to-day, were our affairs transacted by the Ambassadors and chargé d'affaires of England? No, we would be in this position; we would be a small people of 4,000,000 without any army or navy as we are to-day, begging those powers that they would do something for us. But when we are represented by the mighty Empire of Great Britain, then we have influence, power and authority. Our representatives, that is to say, the British Ambassadors, speak on equal terms with the men whom they address; but we could not be in such a position otherwise. The hon. gentleman will say: "If you are in that position and you have Ambassadors and Consuls all through the world you must take the consequence, and therefore you must have an army or navy in order to be respected," which means a very large sum of money annually to be added to our Budget. I wish to know from those hon. members who will vote for the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition, whether they will go to the electors of this country and tell them: "Gentlemen, our policy is changed since we came before you on the last occasion, our policy is now one of commercial independence which will involve political independence as well, and as we are now separating ourselves from the Mother Country we must have a navy and army, Ambassadors and Consuls, and as we shall have to tax the people to pay the expenses we must add so many more millions to the expenditure." I wish joy to the hon. gentlemen who go to the electors and tell them this, if they hope to receive their votes. We are content with the position we hold as a country, with the protection of England; her flag is there to protect us and her flag is a power that gives us safety. When we have required the help of Great Britain, when we have required the protection of her flag, of her navy, of her army, did they ever fail us? They never failed us, and they will never fail us. When we went in 1866 to England as the representatives of this country to ask England to give us a charter for our Confederation, to change our position in order that we might better serve the country and the Empire, did they refuse us? They took our charter, word for word, as we laid it in their hands and passed it so. And why should we change our position in order that we may have the pride and consolation of saying: "This man at Paris, this other man at Lisbon, this other man at Madrid, this other man at Berlin, these men are the Ambassadors of this great and mighty people of four millions." Well, Mr. Speaker, we do not wish that. At all events on this side of the House. We wish to speak of our British Ambassador at Berlin, at Paris or Madrid, and wish to be able to say that these gentlemen represent us as well as the rest of the Empire. We prefer to remain attached to England with all its power, authority and influence than to have the small satisfaction of saying: "We are independent." Independence may come perhaps, but it will not come in our days nor in the days of our children, nor, I believe, in the days of our grandchildren. When this country has a population of 40,000,000 or 50,000,000 of people, it will be for the people of that day to say whether it would be better to change the position they hold to-day, or, all being well, whether it would not be best to leave well enough alone and cling to the old flag of England under which their forefathers fought and under which they would fight as well. I regret exceedingly that my hon. friend from Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) should have taken the course he has, and separated himself from us on this question. He said there was no reason why this should be considered a want of confidence resolution, seeing that two other motions of amendment for a Committee of Supply were passed, and yet the Government did not withdraw. As I said in the first place those two motions were prepared by our own friends and in the second place the Government assented to them because they met with our approval. Having said so much, Mr. Speaker, I resume my seat, confident that the large majority of this House will vote against this resolution.

Mr. HOUDE. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to say more than a few words, and I shall not detain the House long. I wanted only to say that I approve of the principle involved in the motion which the hon. member for West Durham made, but I had decided not to vote for it, considering the way in which it was presented to this House. But the manner in which the hon. Minister of Public Works has put the question before this House and before the public obliges me to vote for the motion directly as it stands, for this reason, that I understand the motion of the hon. member for West Durham did not go so far as the Government intends to go on that question—that is to say, to put the question of the complete independence of Canada before the people. I understand that the hon. member intended only to put the question before this House and the country of obtaining greater facilities for negotiating treaties with foreign countries directly through our own representatives, but the Government say that we cannot follow such a course without going directly to the complete independence of Canada and her complete separation from the Mother Country. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. Minister of Public Works contended that we could not vote for the motion of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blaïke) without voting non-confidence in the Government. I just explained why I was obliged to vote for that resolution, yet, notwithstanding the position the hon. Minister takes, I do not intend to imply by that that I vote non-confidence in the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You cannot do that.

Mr. HOUDE. We had some instances of that during the present Session, and if we want other instances to justify such a vote, I can refer to the vote of this House in 1873, when it passed a similar motion, made in amendment to the motion to go into Supply, bearing on the policy of the Government, and the Government did not consider it a motion of non-confidence and did not resign. And I think I may congratulate myself and the country on this modification of the extraordinary and unreasonable interpretation of Ministerial responsibility which some would try to continue to this day, interpreting adversely to the Government a vote of this kind. We must not carry that idea of the responsibility of the Ministry so far as to leave to private members no opportunity of expressing their opinion on the merits of questions submitted to them. Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Public Works told us that we were going before the country either this year or next, and that we shall have to discuss this question before the people. I thought we were not to make that question an issue in the next general election; but of course the Government can make it a question of the day and oblige their friends and the Opposition to debate it before the electors. I can say this, it will not be the first time I shall have discussed this question before my own constituents. When, four years ago, I was discussing before them the National Policy, propounded by the hon. members of the present Government, I foreshadowed that the next step to be taken would be to look for more foreign markets, outlets for the products of the country, which products would be increased by the policy we advocated, and that opinion has been so far justified that no later than two years afterwards the Government themselves felt the necessity of looking for more extensive markets for this country and sent a delegate to England to be accredited to the different countries, especially France and Spain, purposely to open new markets there for Canada.

Mr. STEPHENSON. The substance for a shadow.

Mr. HOUDE. The hon. member asks me, why leave the reality for the shadow. I believe we are looking for the reality; I think that in our worthy representative in England we have only had the shadow for the reality. While I approved of that appointment and thought it was a step in the right direction, yet our representative has encountered so many difficulties that he has not had until now very great success—at least not as great success as we expected when we sent him across the Ocean. What do we ask by the resolution now before the House? We ask the power to negotiate commercial treaties with foreign countries. Well, I consider that step, Mr. Speaker, the crowning of the National Policy which we inaugurated three years ago, and I do not interpret it as a step in the direction of our complete independence of the Mother Country. I know there is in Canada a party, very few in number, who look after that complete independence; but shall we allow ourselves to be intimidated by the cries of those who say treason? No, Mr. Speaker. When responsible Government was asked for in this country, a party cried treason. Were they right? No, Mr. Speaker, they were wrong; experience has proved that when the Mother Country granted responsible Government to Canada, she only made closer the tie which united Canada to herself. And again, when the policy of the present Government—a policy which met with my sincere approval—was propounded, with such ability and talent and force by the present Government, we heard the party whose chief organ is the Toronto Globe cry treason, and try to make the people believe that if they adopted a policy of protection it would tend to our complete separation from the Mother Country. Well, we know that it had not that effect—that it will not have that effect; and I contend that the principle involved in the resolution of the hon. member for West Durham will not have that effect either. The hon. Prime Minister said that he was born a British subject, and that he hoped to die a British subject. I have no doubt that he will die a British subject, although I hope he will still live many long years, for the advantage of the country, and to see the benefits of the policy which he has helped to inaugurate. He said that in presenting that resolution, the hon. member for West Durham had an afterthought. I shall not defend the hon. member for West Durham, who is able to speak for himself; but I can say that my hon. friends the members for Laval and for Montreal East and myself have no afterthought; we go for the motion for what it contains only. I believe, Mr. Speaker, there is no danger of separation from the Mother Country, unless it be by the fault of England herself or by the fault of her statesmen. Some years ago, when Lord Lisgar was Governor General of this country, he tried to make us understand—and I suppose he was the mouthpiece of the then Government of England—that the Mother Country would be satisfied to let us go. Well, if the Mother Country has statesmen who do not wish Canada to be united closely to the Mother Country, it is not our fault; and I contend that those who seek for greater commercial liberties for Canada are just as loyal and attached to the Mother Country as those who believe differently. I should be very sorry, Mr. Speaker, if in the next general election, should I have the strength and health to solicit again the suffrages of my constituents, not to be among the supporters of the present Government; but it will be no fault of mine if I am not. They know, and the House knows, that I have been a firm and sincere supporter of that Government since I have been a member of this House; but apart from this particular question, upon which I am afraid the Government anticipate too much, and try by the voice of the hon. Minister of Public Works to carry us too far, and to make us pronounce upon a question which is not now, and ought not to be, before the public—the question of complete independence—if apart from that question, I cannot be counted as one of the supporters of the Government, I will be very sorry, and as I have just said, it will not be my fault. I approve of the intelligent, patriotic policy of that Government, and I still trust to be able to continue to support them, although on this particular question of commercial treaties, it is my misfortune not to be able to be convinced by the arguments they have advanced.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There is no man in Canada, Sir, who holds party obligations stronger than I do, and no one in Canada who would sooner reject party obligations than lift a hand or a finger, by motion or otherwise, to disturb the relations that exist between Britain and her Colonies; and although something very like threats may be used occasionally in order to compel an argument that is otherwise devoid of force to be presented to some persons' minds in a forcible way, we must look at the facts in the case, and consider for ourselves whether the policy propounded by my hon. friend from Durham is one that would have a tendency in the direction I have indicated. I have lived long enough, Sir, in Canada, to know that it has been the policy of the Tory party, almost from the beginning of our history, whenever a movement was made tending to expand the liberties of the people, to cry out that there was danger of the connection with Great Britain. I have found from the earliest period of our parliamentary history that this has been the case; and I am surprised and pained to find that, at this advanced period of our history, leading statesmen in the country can still resort to that paltry policy. I listened, Sir, to-day, with the greatest possible care, to every word that fell from the hon. leader of the Government in his somewhat impetuous declamatory reply to the member for Durham. I can only say he failed entirely to convince me that there was the slightest danger of what he pretended to fear. The hon. gentleman usually makes a much better appearance in argument than he did to-day. What position are we in? The Minister of Public Works spoke with great contempt of the number of our population, our paltry four or five millions, and asked were they to be compared with the interests of the Dominion? Why, I believe, on the other hand that everything that extends the liberties of Canadians, everything that accords to Canada and her statesmen greater breadth of view in the management of their own affairs is more likely to conduce to the advancement of Imperial interests and greatness than any curbing policy that keeps us down to the grindstone. It has been the policy of English statesmen who have had the management of our affairs from the first to consider colonists as inferior to themselves. I can recall the words even of such men as Lord Grey, Lord Russell and of Lord Metcalfe, everyone of whom had placed on record their belief that full responsible Government was not well suited to colonists, and I have read the despatches of Lord Russell and Lord Glenelg to the Governor General frequently warning him not to extend the principle of responsible Government to Canadians further than so far as might be consistent with the maintenance of the colonial relation. I believe we are really as capable of managing our own political affairs as the House of Commons in England. Some years ago when visiting England, I happened one day to be in the company of a leading statesman. He asked me in reference to a bill that had been passed through our legislature, if I thought it was just to a certain interest. I told him I thought it was. He enquired, did I not think there were interests involved. I replied, No; but if there are, we have provided means whereby they can be brought before and dealt with by the courts. "Oh yes," said he, "you mean Canadian judges." "Yes," I said, "I mean Canadian judges, and let me say to you that the judges that sit in our Canadian courts are quite as high in point of honor, if not of ability, as the judges in any English Court of Justice, and that the interests of any Englishman, in any company or society such as that you have mentioned, are just as safe in the custody of our officers of justice as they are in yours." There is an inevitable belief, a belief that cannot be dispelled from the minds of leading British statesmen of all parties, that there must be something inferior in the colonial relation. Now, I do not believe that. I recollect very well when Sir F. B. Head was Governor of Canada, that he thought the establishment of municipal institutions was sure to lead to our permanent separation, at a very early day, from the British nation; and he was pleased to characterise them as sucking republics which would gradually grow up until they became a great republic. At a later day another Governor occasionally was pleased to express an opinion of the same sort, and the late Lord Derby, in one of his speeches, so late, I think, as 1854 or 1855, expressed his opinion that if a measure then sought—that is a change in our relations as to the Upper House, if I recollect—a right became law, then we might say farewell to British connection with Canada. Such have been the opinions of leading men in Britain for many years, of which I have given some examples. But I am surprised to find the Premier of Canada countenancing such opinions at this time of day. Has not every measure passed for the extension of the franchise, for the consolidation of the Colonial Empire on this continent, tended to promote that connection and make it still stronger? If I believed the adoption of this resolution, and still more the adoption of the policy indicated by this resolution, was to have any permanent or immediate injurious effects on our relation to Britain, I for one should immediately oppose it. I look forward with great anxiety and great pleasure to the result. I anticipate no danger to the relations of the colonies to the Mother Country. I believe that Great Britain and her Australian Empire, and Canada and the other portions of that Empire will possess a growing influence which will make itself felt in every quarter of the globe. I believe our commercial and political relations are safer, giving the utmost possible latitude to Canadians, than they would be if a restrictive policy, conformed to the ideas that prevailed in former times, existed. As an example of what we may expect sometimes, from English statesmen, we heard Lord Kimberly eulogized very greatly to-day by the hon. gentleman opposite, on his liberality and breadth of view.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I spoke in a directly contrary sense. I stated he was a Free Trade doctrinaire of the most restricted, bigoted kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE. A doctrinaire in Free Trade, but a model of liberality otherwise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I said nothing of that kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He stated he did not say that and does not believe it—neither do I.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not express any opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Lord Kimberly, six or seven years ago, sent a dispatch to Earl Dufferin, stating that it was not necessary to consult his ministers except where it suited his purpose. That is a specimen of the modern whig statesman. I think it of the first importance that our statesmen should manage our own affairs. One thing is perfectly certain, that we can understand our own interests, and another thing is clearly certain, there would be a method contrived if we should reach that stage, by which the general assent of the English Crown could be obtained to any such negotiations. There could be no serious difficulty about that. Of course the right hon. gentleman, some ten years ago ridiculed a motion brought up for the same purpose. But I was glad to-day to find that even he had made some progress; because when denouncing the resolution of the member for West Durham, he afterwards glorified himself and his Administration for having made some progress, because they had appointed Sir Alexander Galt, as a sort of quasi-ambassador to Europe. He has been ambassador to France and Spain, and as proof of his status, has to sit in an outer room when the two ambassadors are discussing matters and if his opinion is thought to be worth anything, he is called in, and asked questions, and that is the position which the hon. gentleman desires to assign a Canadian ambassador. The excellency and usefulness of the position is such that it appears from the papers that he is not disposed to submit to it any longer. The hon. gentleman said that great progress had been made with Spain and France, and related to us with great gusto interviews with certain statesmen in both countries. We know that it has cost us some $20,000 or $30,000 a year, and not one step has been gained yet by Sir Alexander Galt or the Government he serves in the direction of trade and commerce with other countries. The establishment of a steam service once a month with Brazil, which has not yet begun to run, is not an ambassadorial function at all. It is a mere matter of business, which any merchant could arrange. As to the tendency of such a motion as this leading to a complete separation of this country from Great Britain, we need only consider the fact that there never has been a discussion on constitutional changes but what we have had the same threat presented to us. When we first began to advocate a Federal union of the Provinces, when in 1859 the Reform Convention of Ontario decided on some method of uniting the Provinces by a Federal compact, with some general authority for the management of general business, we were at once assailed by the Tory members, and if I recollect rightly by the right hon. gentleman, as taking part in a movement which had for its end the separation of the colonies from Great Britain. Yet, who does not know that the relations of Canada to the Empire when Lord Durham came out here were of the most delicate and tender kind; that the grievous political wrongs suffered by this country, the tyranny exercised by Governments and persons in authority and the nepotism and corruption which prevailed; who does not recollect the anxiety with which the people, especially in Lower Canada, entered into the consideration of those political grievances in 1839 and 1840, and who would have been surprised, looking at the history of that period, if those difficulties had culminated in the separation of the colonies from the Mother Country. But from that day to this the growth of public sentiment has been in one direction. The extension of the freedom and privileges of the people has gone on rapidly, almost uninterruptedly; and keeping pace with the progress of public opinion, actions and measures have shown the loyalty and devotion of the people of Canada to the Empire of which we form so important a part. I have no patience with that littleness of soul which instead of using argument threatens us with being vain reactionaries and revolutionists. Such efforts form no portion of my argument. Let us consider this measure on its merits. If the hon. gentleman could show one single argument or reason which could lead to the conclusion he maintained those resolutions would result in, I would join him with the greatest alacrity, for I prefer maintaining the existence of our relations with Great Britain, to obtaining a temporary triumph at the expense of that connection. I hold, therefore, that gradual action in relation to obtaining perfect freedom of commercial relations with other countries is entirely consistent with our duty to, and our present relations with, the British Empire. But assuming the hon. gentleman was as earnest as he was vigorous in his declamatory speech to-day what reason does he give for sending Sir Alexander Galt to England. Why should Sir Alexander Galt be sent there if it is much better to obtain all we want through the British ambassador? If a Canadian ambassador is to be sent there does the hon. gentleman always desire he shall enter at the back door while the other ambassador goes in by the front? This almost leads me to digress for a moment to enquire if Sir Alexander Galt was really sent to England because of a pressing necessity to have a quasi-ambassador residing in London. We remember that Sir Alexander Galt was the very champion of the principle embodied in the resolutions which are now before the House; he spoke for it and voted for it, and, if I recollect aright, he characterized the right hon. gentleman on that occasion as the "Pecksniff" of the House. Was it because Sir Alexander Galt was estranged until 1878, was it because he declined any relationship with the right hon. gentleman, was it because he could not be taken into the Government here that room was made for him in England, and an office created for him full of profit, full however of national degradation and productive of no benefit to the country. The hon. gentleman said also that no progress was made in regard to commercial treaties or our dealings with foreign nations up to 1878. That wonderful period ending on the 18th September, 1878, is an epoch in our history. On that day the right hon. gentleman came back to power and from that time onward to the present, he told us to-day, that great efforts had been made by himself and his colleagues in order to develop the growth of national traffic, and trade and commercial relations with other countries. I would like to know a single step that has been taken. To be sure no grievous error has been committed which will tend in the opposite direction. The hon. gentleman, by his National Policy, has deviated from the Imperial policy of Britain which characterizes the legislation of all her colonies but one and ourselves and has thereby dealt a blow at the Imperial relationship which it will not be very easy to make good by remedial legislation. And that is absolutely the only thing he has done. We find that during the last two years our foreign trade has declined under the pressure of the incubus he has placed upon it by his policy. He stated there was another method by which commercial relations could be carried on. There was nothing to prevent Canada presenting by an Act of its Parliament certain advantages in its relations to another country and having that country reciprocate by passing a similar Act. Both being put in force would enable the two to exchange products on equal terms. I object most seriously to any attempt to obtain commercial advantages by legislation of that kind. A legislative reciprocity is in my opinion not only impracticable but most mischievous. Suppose we pass a bill admitting certain products of the United States free on the condition that they should pass a bill admitting some of ours free. That would not bind us or them for any specific term of years and the next season might find circumstances so altered in their legislature as to lead to the repeal of the enactment, and the reconsideration of former relationships, while in the meantime commercial establishments would have been established which the change would greatly injure. There is nothing in my opinion more dangerous than to tamper needlessly and carelessly with commercial legislation. What our business men want is permanence of purpose and a reasonable consistency in our policy. That is that there should not be constant changes made. I would rather have a large measure of protection even than a constant change of policy and a constant change of duties in the legislation of the country. I deny the proposition of the hon. gentleman that nothing was done in the way of advancing commercial business of a colonial kind during my own Administration. We set on foot a negotiation at Washington in order to obtain if possible a new treaty; we succeeded in having that treaty negotiated, but failed in getting it implemented by the Congress of the United States. That was not our fault. We endeavored to do that, and we obtained from Her Majesty's Government a commission as plenipotentiary to our agent who went there, a thing unprecedented in the history of any colony. I do not think there was any instance where a colonist was appointed a joint plenipotentiary in order to negotiate a treaty. The right hon. gentleman was himself a joint high commissioner on one occasion in 1871 or 1872 at Washington. He had an opportunity to distinguish himself if he chose to do so, but he distinguished himself in a retrograde fashion by being a consenting party to a treaty which was one of the most shameful capitulations in English history in matters between nations. Everyone knows the humiliation that was experienced by almost every one in the country at the consent of the hon. gentleman to that legislation; and so far as I am concerned I can only say that I heard that opinion expressed by men of high standing in the old country when considering the results of that treaty in regard to the Fenian outrages on the frontier and the Alabama claims.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that one of his colleagues in the Government at his right and another one behind him voted for that shameful capitulation? Yet he took them into the Government of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have not forgotten it, Sir, but I dare say if my hon. friend had to give that vote now, he would not vote that way. I cannot at this moment recall a single treaty with the United States managed by British statesmen--and they were all managed by British statesmen--in which Canada and British America did not get the worst. Our boundaries were dealt with by English commissioners, and in their ignorance of the country and of the maps and of the people they had to deal with, we were deprived of a large extent of territory, and I believe that the only real diplomatic work that was ever done by Canadian statesmen was that of the arbitration at Halifax and managed by ourselves.

An hon. MEMBER. The Washington Treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The Washington Treaty had nothing to do with that. It provided that there should be an arbitration, and when that arbitration was delayed from day to day and from year to year by the American Government, we entered our protest and with some difficulty got the English Government to make a protest for us. At last when we obtained the requisite authority to enter upon the negotiations the English Government sent a gentleman out here to attend to the matter, whom we declined to act with, making a demand upon them that a Canadian should be appointed, whom we would nominate. We did nominate a Canadian and we managed the whole business ourselves, and the result was the obtaining of that large award--not any larger than it should be, but still an award that was on the whole reasonably satisfactory to all parties. Now, I do not desire to occupy any more of the time of the House. I rose for the simple purpose of explaining my own position and pointing out to the House the constant recurrence of accusations of the kind mentioned by the hon. gentleman opposite, having been so frequent in his history and the history of his colleagues that they should be treated very lightly by other people. I have sat, I think, two Sessions, opposite the hon. gentleman, and I am sure during that time I have heard the same threat many a time, and many a time have seen gentlemen like the hon. Minister of Public Works raising the British flag with the greatest enthusiasm in order to rally his dispirited followers. It is an easy matter to raise the flag, but let us raise the flag of common sense for a little while, and let us consider, not those high-flown sentiments of extreme devotion and loyalty which the hon. gentleman dealt in so greatly to-night, but let us consider soberly and reasonably what is best for Canada as Canada, and what is best for Canada as part of the British Empire. I have no doubt whatever our true policy is to obtain self action in almost everything which relates to our own business. Only one Act, I think, of this Parliament has been disallowed by Her Majesty, that was one relating to the Governor-General's salary, if I recollect aright. We have the most perfect freedom of action in legislation. Why, Sir, twenty or thirty years ago—certainly forty years ago—it would have been accounted extremely dangerous by all British statesmen, Whig and Tory alike, to have accorded to us the freedom we now possess, and to have trusted to us the legislation connected with half a continent under the British flag. Now, Sir, English statesmen know that British interests are just as safe in our own hands as they can possibly be in theirs. They know also, and must be taught if they don't know it, that a Canadian Privy Councillor is Her Majesty's Privy Councillor, and as such they occupy no inferior position, and although the position may not be precisely similar to that of Austria and Hungary with reference to the capital in each country, they discharge duties very much the same, and there may be other changes which may, perhaps, draw us quite as close as we are under our present relationship. But whatever may happen we know this as an established fact, that we now have perfect liberty of action in legislation, and that Great Britain trusts Her Majesty's Ministers and Her Majesty's Ministers trust us, and why should we not have the same freedom of action in negotiating business with other countries. The hon. gentleman spoke of the ambassadorial duties to-day as if they were something that required a training school, a college for training diplomats, whereas a business man, a statesman who has any knowledge of commercial affairs, knows tolerably well what will suit and what will not suit, and surely men enough can be found in our own country to discharge those duties with which we have hitherto trusted English statesmen, and generally greatly to our sorrow. I for one give my cordial support to anything that will extend our liberty of action and make us entirely equal in all respects to other Legislatures and the Ministers of the Mother Country itself.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I must repeat an observation I made on a previous occasion, that it is unfortunate, and inimical to the fair discussion or consideration of a great matter of public interest, that it should be presented to this Parliament under the circumstances in which this resolution comes before us. But, Sir, it is one of the privileges of an Opposition in Parliament, and it is availed of by them, and has been availed of by hon. gentlemen on this side when they sat on the other, to bring up their views, no matter how embarrassing it might be to the Government of the day, and the Government of the day in that case voted down, without any hesitation or difficulty, propositions which, perhaps, they approved, because they came up under such circumstances. And I have no doubt that a great many members of this House, without perhaps expressing otherwise their opinions with respect to this important matter, will find themselves in a position, politically, to take the same course on this occasion. But, Sir, for myself, occupying, perhaps, a peculiar position in this House and country as a public man, I cannot sit here as a member of Parliament and hear the views and statements made by responsible Ministers of the Crown with regard to the consequences which are likely to follow from the assertion on the part of this Parliament of its desire to have the control of its own commercial affairs and the settlement and management of commercial treaties with other countries without protest. Thirty-two years ago I had the honor—I consider it an honor to-day, when I look back upon that time and at what has since transpired—to propound a political platform, as the editor of a public journal. In looking over the various propositions, the opposition that was made to them, the ridicule that was heaped upon them, the opposition offered to them by hon. gentlemen in this House, some of whom are Ministers to-day, I take courage, for I can, in being able to look back upon that time and upon the events which have since occurred with respect to those propositions, and to-day I find every one has substantially been passed upon and adopted into the constitution and laws of my country, except one, which is embraced in the resolution moved by the hon. member for West Durham, viz.: That Canadians ought to have, and also should seek to have the right to make commercial arrangements with other countries suitable to our own condition and wishes. We have made a good advance in that direction. We have been permitted through communications which have passed between this Government and the Government of the Mother Country to send an ambassador, as he is called, with semi-plenipotentiary powers, and in connection with the English representative he has discussed various questions with France, Spain and other countries. But I do not know that our experience of that step in advance, so far as it goes, is calculated to give us very much confidence in its beneficial results, and I, for one, unable perhaps to understand all the delicate relations which exist between Canada to-day and the Mother Country, cannot see what damaging effect it would have upon the relations of the Mother Country with us, in what respect the tie which binds us to the Mother Country would be weakened, by simply agreeing to an arrangement by which Canada itself would, through its own agents, propose and make arrangements with any country which might be willing to make an arrangement with her, under the protection, under the supervision and with the support of the Mother Country. Why, what is the spectacle we have before us? We have here a Government representing what is called the Conservative party in this country, which claims, to be, and many of its friends claim it to be par excellence, the custodian and rightful heir of British principles. Yet we find them going as an opposition to the country at the last election and proclaiming a policy with respect to our Tariff which we all know was obnoxious to British statesmen of both political parties and by the British people, as being contrary to their policy, and objected to their views of what was for the interest of Canada itself, because Free Trade and Protection do not form a dividing line between English political parties. The present leader of the Conservative party, Sir Stafford Northcote, is as strong a free trader, if we may judge by his writings and speeches, as is to be found perhaps in the ranks of the Liberal party. English parties, I say, are not divided by any such line; and yet in this country we proposed, and I was one of those who concurred in the proposition to change our Tariff, to impose duties upon foreign commodities and upon the products and manufactures of the Mother Country herself so as to serve our own needs and purposes, to obtain revenue for the conduct of our own affairs and to afford protection to our manufacturers. We considered that those local and Canadian objects were of more importance than any consideration of what might be in accordance with the policy of the Mother Country or the political relations subsisting between Canada and the Mother Country. Hon. gentlemen opposite who took the platform against this policy resorted to the argument that it would tend to weaken the connection between Canada and the Mother Country, but this argument did not have very much effect even in the ranks of their own party. I take the decision of the people at the last election on that question as the strongest evidence we can have that the wishes of the people of Canada, that the rising aspirations of the young men of Canada, are in favor of our assuming our own Independence in the management of our own affairs, and especially in regard to all commercial matters. I believe that is the sentiment, and we have had here an exhibition of it in the speeches made by three or four hon. members on this question. Without regard to the effect it might have on their political friends on the Treasury Benches, they have asserted their determination to support the motion even when moved by the Opposition, which declares the right of Canada to be the arbiter of her own destinies in regard to her trade and commerce with other countries. I think hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, instead of endeavoring to put down opinions of that kind, or to prevent their expression on the floor of this House by holding up to the House the threat of evil consequences, or assuming that consequences of the kind indicated would flow from such expressions, would do well to look about and to ascertain what is the condition of the public mind, and as they have done on many former occasions take a step in advance. It will be a better policy to adopt in discussing this question, especially if we are now to have a general election, as it is rumored in and out of this Chamber. For my own part I do not know whether I shall offer my services to any constituency at the next election. I did feel on the occasion of the last contest that it was my duty as a Canadian to support the National Policy, as it is called; and one of the chief reasons probably in my mind was that it contained the principle which is embodied in the resolution moved by the leader of the Opposition—that it was a declaration of the right of the people of Canada to make their own Tariff and to regulate their own affairs. I do not know—but if this is to become a political question, if the Government of the day expect to rally their followers at the next election upon the cry of the flag, upon the declaration that we must not make any further advance on the road to nationality than it has pleased them to agree to, I do not know but that I may feel it to be my duty, though having spent as many years in parliamentary service as one man ought to be expected to do, and very fruitlessly in some respects, to take the field again; and I have no fear but I will be able to find a constituency. I do not think, Sir, there is any reason to fear, in the first place, that the Government of England—the present Government of England or even a Conservative Government, if one should succeed to power—will object for a moment to give Canada the authority she asks, if it follows in the track which was pointed out by the hon. gentleman opposite. I have had some little experience as a member of a Government, I have had communications with Ministers of the Crown in England of both political parties, and with respect to matters involved in this very question. It is known to those who have taken the trouble to look into the history of this country prior to Confederation that I was appointed chairman of a Commission that visited England and the West Indies and other countries, for the purpose of negotiating with and making better arrangements for commercial relations with those countries, and though it is not exactly proper, perhaps, to refer to the discussions which took place with Her Majesty's Ministers, that they may have regarded as confidential, yet I may say, in the first place, I did not find, and my colleagues did not find, that there was any disposition on the part of the Government of England at that time to encourage the attempt to establish new relations in commerce and trade with our own colonies. A very extraordinary doctrine was propounded by an English Minister at that time, he said it was contrary to the treaties with other countries, particularly those containing what is known as the "Favored nations clause," that the West India colonies should make any special arrangements with Canada, that we, portions of the same Empire, members of the same family, should make arrangements between ourselves by which commodities were to be interchanged at differential rates of duty. That doctrine was laid down in a formal correspondence. It was finally withdrawn, and we were allowed to make propositions to foreign countries and to the West Indies. But nothing came of it. I had a very strong suspicion—I shall not mention the particular facts upon which it was founded at the time—that the despatches which we carried were not the only despatches sent to those Governments and those colonies. If we had the power conceded to us of making such arrangements open and above board, I believe a very different result would follow from negotiations of this kind, but I will say as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) has said, that if any arrangements of that kind had the effect of loosening the tie between the Mother Country and Canada, or lessening the loyalty which we feel toward her, would make us less glad to be associated with England, to be subject to Canada so far as an independent colony ought to be, and must be subject, if it would have the effect of weakening the intense loyalty of the people of Canada to the British authority, I would say so far but no farther; we have gone as far as we can; by going a step further political consequences are likely to follow which will be injurious and oblige us to change our political relations. I believe it would be a relief to British statesmen if Canada were in a different position from the one she occupies. Consider the position of Canada with respect to the United States in regard to the late negotiations. Do you think it was not a subject of great embarrassment to England that England insisted upon the Imperial Government using its power for the purpose of securing to Canada compensation in money for the fisheries? We have only to look at the despatches. When I heard that this question had arisen—I did not hear the speech of the hon. mover of the resolution, nor did I hear the reply of the Prime Minister, though I heard of it—I referred to the despatches sent by the Imperial Government to the Canadian Government on the occasion of the Washington Treaty negotiations, and there was one despatch that struck me as being particularly pertinent to this question. Lord Kimberley in his despatch showed the reasons why Canada should accept the terms of the Washington Treaty. It was conceded to be our privilege to dissent from that Treaty and the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), I remember, moved a resolution which practically amounted to a refusal to agree to it and to pass the necessary Act for the purpose of carrying out that Treaty, and he was perfectly right in a constitutional point of view. I took the opposite course. I thought it to our advantage. I thought it was the duty of Canada, considering the results to the Mother Country and the difficulties that would arise between England and the United States with regard to this matter to agree to the terms of the Treaty. I have not changed that opinion, but still it was our right to disagree, and even the little Island of Prince Edward might have disagreed with the Treaty which the Mother Country had made with a great people like the United States. And in the argument intended to persuade us that it was our duty to concur in that Treaty, Earl Kimberley says:

"Canada could not reasonably expect that this country should for an indefinite period incur the constant risk of serious misunderstanding with the United States, imperilling perhaps the peace of the whole Empire, in order to endeavor to force the American Government to change its commercial policy; and Her Majesty's Government are confident that when the Treaty is considered as a whole, the Canadian people will see that their interests have been carefully borne in mind, and that the advantage which they will derive from its provisions are commensurate with the concessions which they are called upon to make."

And in another passage:

"Her Majesty's Government have no desire whatever to attempt to interfere with the entire right of the Colonial Legislatures to refuse to pass the Acts necessary to give effect to the Treaty, though they would deeply deplore that a course which they believe would be most impolitic, should be taken; but on the other hand they have too much confidence in the wisdom of those free assemblies to anticipate any such result; and they are confident that the Canadian Government would be as desirous as Her Majesty's Government that no untoward collision should occur during the present season which might prejudice the fair consideration of the Treaty."

Now, Sir, that shows us that even under the relations which existed at that time between these British North American colonies and the Mother Country that we had the right, and that we might exercise it of disagreeing with the policy of the Mother Country in her relations with the United States. Still our position was an embarrassment, for so long as this question was in dispute there was danger of collision between England and the United States. There was danger to the people of England, Ireland and Scotland, that they might be called upon to engage in a great national contest for the purpose of defending or protecting the interests and rights of the people of Canada in respect to their fisheries. Do you think it would not be a great relief to the Mother Country if all danger of any such consequences as these were removed? And therefore, if the proposition which is embodied in the resolution in your hands, or the policy which that proposition would necessarily lead to, were adopted, I think England might say, and England would say, that she was relieved of great dangers and great difficulties by Canada having to make these bargains and these arrangements herself. Well, Sir, suppose we were in that position, do you think there would be any great difficulty on our part? Do not we know, better than any one on the other side of the Atlantic, what will be for our advantage, understand better the character of our neighbors, their industries, their commercial operations? We know all about them, and they know all about us; and we can make better bargains for ourselves, if bargains are to be made, than anyone in England for us. We came near losing some of the advantages we had achieved in this fishery arrangement. I know there was a very strong disposition, of which we see evidences in this despatch, to restrain Canada in the demands she was making with respect to the Fishery Treaty. They thought we were asking too much, and pushing the matter too far; it was of no consequence to them; they were indifferent whether we got a million or half a million or nothing at all; and, therefore, it was only by pressure, by insisting on our right—not merely by the Government that finally concluded the negotiations, but by the preceding Government—that English statesmen, English diplomatists were pushed along, and almost compelled to take that high ground which ultimately resulted in so favorable an arrangement being made as was made. By the adoption of this principle, we would be relieved of all that difficulty, and England would be relieved; England would be disembarassed in all such relations between the great Dominion of Canada and the United States. I for one as a Canadian have no apprehension of the future. I believe we shall find Canadian statesmen, Canadian politicians, Canadian parliamentarians, sufficiently versed in the facts, sufficiently patriotic in their impulses and their determination, and sufficiently wise, to make proper and satisfactory arrangements in all commercial matters with our American neighbors; and I believe, Sir, if our position were recognized to be such as I have described, that our American neighbors would be better disposed to make favorable and friendly arrangements with us than they are at the present moment. It is not the people of Canada that they are dissatisfied with. When attacks were made upon us, as we all remember, a few years ago, it was not the people of Canada, it was the flag over our heads that excited animosity; but if Canada were practically independent, if she acknowledged but the Imperial Sovereignty, the Imperial Crown, and had the management of her own local affairs altogether, I have no doubt, in any commercial arrangements and transactions that might take place between the United States and Canada, that the most favorable arrangements would be made between us, for there would be no disturbing element to interfere with our negotiations. Now, Mr. Speaker, this question is brought before the House, as I said, in a way that is not calculated to give it a fair position. Several hon. members who have spoken on this side have expressed their approval of it, but one must see that they have done so under great difficulty, and we must see by the lecture they have received from the Minister of Public Works that others are inclined to take the same position. It is not giving the question itself fair play, and therefore I regret that it has been proposed in this manner. Yet we have had two examples of motions made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in amendment to going into Supply, not made with the view of expressing want of confidence in the Government, and not received by the Government in that sense; although, with respect to the important question raised last night, of which I may be allowed to say a word, not having had an opportunity to speak on it at the time, I think we were travelling a little out of the record. I think it would have been far better for the Parliament of Canada to concern itself about the affairs of Canada, to deal with matters over which we have constitutional control and personal knowledge, than to travel across the Atlantic and attempt to direct Mr. Gladstone how he should deal with the Irish question. I intended to say so much last night, and I say it now. At the same time, the terms in which the motion was proposed, and the unhappy circumstances of the case, perhaps may have justified a parliamentary expression of opinion; but I did not feel, as the representative of the county of Halton, that I was authorized to say what their views or opinions might be upon a question of that kind. It seemed to me that I ought to have information from them before voting on the subject; I had no petition, no letters, and the question was sufficiently long before the public for them to form an opinion—and I really believe the resolutions did not express the opinion of a majority of the electors of that constituency. I believe, when we go back to them, and have an opportunity of discussing this matter, that we shall be told that they did not take the same view of the causes of the evils which afflict that country, or the remedies best adapted to remove those evils, which the hon. gentleman expressed in his very eloquent speech. But reverting again to the resolution now before us, I am disposed to vote for that resolution, which I do not think expresses or is intended to express want of confidence in the Government. But I may remark that I have want of confidence, and strong want of confidence, in the doctrines announced by the hon. Minister of Public Works, and the position he takes with respect to the right of members of Parliament to express their opinions upon a question which so intimately concerns the best interests of Canada.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

68. Canada Central Subsidy..... $120,000

Mr. MACKENZIE. How much of that subsidy is unpaid?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This completes the payment of $1,440,000.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Was that used in the way of a grant, a sort of endorsement in the hands of the contractors, or paid in actual hard cash?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They adopted the alternative of using the moneys and raising the money.

69. Prince Arthur's Landing to Red River
(Pacific Railway)..... $1,567,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should like to amend that resolution by substituting the figures $1,067,000, which is all that is required for this service.

Mr. MACKENZIE. How is this to be spent? Is it altogether upon 41 and 42?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mainly upon these portions; a small amount will be required for all the contracts.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have heard that a considerable portion of the work at A and B is being constructed with a sort of tramway, upon trestles in the meantime.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is right so far that there was a considerable alteration made in the form of crossing a number of those ravines, and that trestles were substituted to a larger extent than originally intended. The work is being finished by the substitution of trestle bridges, where originally it was intended there should be mere embankments. It is to be a permanent mode of crossing those sections.

Mr. MACKENZIE. In that case, the saving in many cases the hon. gentleman referred a few days ago is largely connected with this change of structure.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The expenditure has been considerably reduced by the alteration of trestle work and bridges for the more permanent embankments.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am desirous of seeing the work proceed in every way, and would be glad to see it done well; but I have been told, on what seems very good authority, that those structures are anything but stable, and some are particularly dangerous.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They have been most carefully examined, and the work is of the most substantial description.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I am glad to hear they are going to be substantial; but I was an eye-witness of the modes of construction of some of them, and if a more disgraceful piece of work could be turned out by an engineer than some portions, I would like to see it. I was over some of the work from Thunder Bay to Red River and may refer to the piece at Muskrat Lake; and if there was ever an engineer who turned out a disgraceful piece of work it was the man at this place. The piles were running in every way, looking at one another. I do not blame the Minister, but think it right to bring the matter up.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend is entirely wrong in saying I am not responsible for the work. I have gone over it with engineers of the highest standing, and whose interest it was to criticise it, but all concurred in the opinion that it was of the most creditable character. And I am very much astonished that he, who is not an engineer, should utter an opinion so unfounded.

Mr. DOMVILLE. It is not the first time I have been criticised by the hon. member, and I am not prepared to take his censures on this occasion. I repeat the work is most disgraceful. I am not an engineer; but I know when a pile stands perpendicular in the water, and when a train is to cross over works at such places, they should have a proper foundation. I do not know that it reflects any credit on a Minister to pitch into a member for expressing his honest opinion. If the hon. members of this House are to be made mere voting machines it is time we knew it. I for one will not submit to it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will have to submit to the truth being told; and when he states this road has been constructed in the way described or that there has been any want of first-class engineering skill, he is making a statement unfounded on fact. The engineering work on those contracts is of the highest character, reflecting the greatest credit on its authors. I will not permit my hon. friend or any hon. member in this House to make such an unfounded statement, derogatory to the Department over which I have the honor to preside, without meeting it by an explicit denial. No doubt a great many of these places were crossed over by pile work for the purpose of carrying trains over and to enable permanent embankments to be more cheaply and easily constructed.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I am not going to take back one word I said. I am sorry that my remarks should have aroused the ire of the hon. Minister. I think it is too bad that representatives in this House should criticise anything; it is unfortunate that there are any members at all, that the counties could not vote by proxies and having passed the Supplies we might all congratulate ourselves on the happy event. I have a great deal more to say about that road, but I do not wish to say it now. I could point out where the rails were laid and became twisted and bent, because not looked after, but I will reserve my remarks, and may state that I do not blame the hon. Minister but the engineers.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. Minister tell us roughly what number of miles of trestle work was constructed on that road, and give us an idea of the average height? If I remember rightly, Mr. Sandford Fleming expressed a strong opinion adverse to the use of trestle-work, and mentioned among other things the extreme danger of a large portion being destroyed by fire in the dry season.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That referred to section 15 where embankment has been substituted. I cannot state the amount of trestle work that has been substituted, or the distance, but the trestle work has been reduced as much as possible. We went to great expense substituting a permanent embankment for trestle work. It was found greatly to the advantage of the road, both in point of time and in saving of expense to use a certain amount of trestle work.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman obtain the information I ask for?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Chief Engineer has just sent me word that there is about one and a-half miles of trestle work from fifteen to fifty feet in depth in the 410 miles.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. Minister of Railways stated that he had caused such alterations to be made in the plans of the railway between Lake Superior and Red River as to very materially reduce the cost. He admitted the character of the road was very considerably degraded.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not.

Mr. ANGLIN. If the hon. Minister did not use that statement exactly he made one to the effect that alterations were made which would reduce the expenditure—alterations in the grades, &c.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not. I stated that we had reduced the length of the road several miles by careful location.

Mr. ANGLIN. And that the road was to be inferior to what he had previously intended; and he found it desirable to reduce the expenditure by building a less expensive road. I feel it my duty to convey information to the hon. Minister, which I believe to be well founded and which corroborates the statement of the hon. member for Kings. I received it from a very high authority. I am informed that some of these trestle bridges of thirty or forty feet deep, did not rest on piles, but were driven not more than three or four feet in the soft mud. There is not the soft tenacious bottom that was supposed to be there, but merely a deposit of three or four feet of loose mud on a rocky substratum into which the piles have not penetrated. They are merely held in their places at most, and it is dangerous to use them for the purpose of running trains on them. That is the statement I have received from a person whom I do not feel at liberty to name, but he has a very intimate knowledge of the state of things in these sections. The Chief Engineer of the Department no doubt receives the report of his engineers and relies upon them, and the Minister receives the report of his Chief Engineer, and makes a statement which he believes to be strictly correct, but my information goes to show that both he and his Chief Engineer are mistaken with regard to the character of these trestle bridges. It is a serious matter if my information is correct, and it is strongly corroborated by the hon. member for Kings, (Mr. Domville).

Mr. HESSON. With reference to the statement that the hon. Minister spoke of degrading the character of the road I recollect well that he referred to the prairie section, and as I had a trip last season over the prairie section of the road I am aware that the portion the Government have been prosecuting until they let the contract, was of a very degraded character indeed. I remember distinctly that it was to be considered merely as a temporary means of sending emigrants into that country, and that something better might be substituted. The rails were laid upon the sod of the prairie without the slightest embankment whatever. That portion of the road, with the exception of a little piece that goes to Stonewall, is now of the very best character. I carefully observed the road while I was passing over it, because I expected that it would be made the subject of criticism in the House. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Kings, I know nothing of them. I have heard other gentlemen say who have gone over the road, that it was of a very substantial character and would do credit to the country.

Mr. DOMVILLE. We are not discussing the prairie section at all, but the section from Red River to Prince Arthur's Landing. There are no trestle work bridges over any lakes. I went over the prairie and did not see any trestle work, and I have no reason to find fault.

Mr. HESSON. The question was raised as to the character of the work that was being prosecuted, and the Minister was charged with having stated in the House last year that the portion the Government were constructing between Prince Arthur's Landing and Red River, was going to be deteriorated in its quality. My recollection is just the contrary. I did not misrepresent the hon. member for Kings at all. I said distinctly that I had not seen that part of the road, but that I heard no complaint made by gentlemen who had gone over it.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. In any case the Minister admitted that he had substituted an inferior class of work by reason of expense. I desire to ask him what amount he calculates was saved by the substitution of trestle for embankment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. About $650,000.

Mr. McCALLUM. In reference to this trestle work, it may not have been completed at the time the hon. member for Kings went over it. If the work was reduced and it is a cheaper road, that is the business of the Syndicate, and the hon. gentleman need not be uneasy about it. If we save money that way we think it will be all right. I am satisfied that the hon. member for Kings was mistaken in looking at the road.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Were any alterations made in the road?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The grades have been preserved in all respects both east and west.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I moved for returns some time ago asking information with regard to the amount of gross and net earnings on the railway built by the Government and handed over to the Syndicate on the 1st of May last. Why have we not those returns?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I told the hon. gentleman at the time that it would be difficult to comply with his request. He asked what had been received by the Government up to the time they handed it over. In making my statement I gave the hon. gentleman the exact amount received by the Government, but I did not expect to be able to tell him how much the Syndicate received for that portion of the road subsequently, because they do not keep a separate account. All I could get was what I had already stated. I have given the hon. gentleman the amount the Government received from the roads until they handed them over to the Syndicate, and the $603,000 received by the Syndicate for the operation of the roads was earned from the 1st of May to the 28th of February.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The Minister's return shows the amount they received up to the time they transferred the road to the Syndicate. I asked for the amount the Company had received from the Government since they had taken possession of the road—the gross and net earnings.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. At what time is the road likely to be completed throughout for traffic.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Under the contract the road is to be entirely completed from Thunder Bay to Red River on the 1st July, 1883; but I do not expect it will be completed at that date. I anticipate that it will take a large portion of the following season's work to finish the road. The contract time, as I have said, is July, 1883. In July, 1882, the track has to be laid by that time; but we expect it will be September or October, 1883, at the earliest, before the road is thoroughly completed.

70. Pacific Railway in British Columbia..... $4,400,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That amount covers $3,000,000 on the contract from Kamloops to Emory's Bar, and $1,500,000 from Emory's Bar to Port Moody.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What is the number of miles?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. 127 miles from Kamloops to Emory's Bar, and 86 miles from Emory's Bar to Port Moody.

Mr. MACKENZIE. How much has been spent on the section from Kamloops to Emory's Bar?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. $1,900,000 up to 1st March, which is the last return I have.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman expect to spend $4,500,000 on 200 miles of railway in one year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am assured by the contractors that they expect to require that amount. There may be a balance next year, but we must be prepared to meet whatever expenditure is made.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It is at the rate of $22,000 a mile on the whole; 200 miles. How long would the work last at such a rate?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I believe the contracts will be completed at the time stated, which is three years from 1st July next, 1885.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Could the hon. gentleman give an approximate cost of the railway over the prairie; 180 miles have been nearly completed from Winnipeg westward.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know what it cost me to build the portion I constructed, but I am not able to say what the cost is for the construction which is taking place at present. We expended $700,000 on the portion of the road we constructed from Winnipeg; we opened communication with Portage la Prairie, a distance of seventy-five miles, and laid the track in a very imperfect way for some thirty miles beyond that point.

Mr. DECOSMOS. Can the hon. gentleman inform the Committee when the contractor will commence the construction of what is called the Port Moody and Emory section of the railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As such an extensive work has to be executed and the time is so short for carrying it out, it will be attacked from every available point. Access can be had at Port Moody, and no doubt it will be attacked there, and also at Fraser River where the road runs near the water for a considerable distance, and it also can be approached at a short distance from New Westminster by a road that is being opened up there. I understand it is the intention of the contractor to attack the work at the various points at which access can be had in order to hasten the construction as much as possible.

Mr. DECOSMOS. I thank the hon. Minister for his information, but at the same time, Mr. Chairman, I take occasion to enter my protest against any money being spent at Port Moody. Every gentleman of any experience in that country, who knows the geography of that country, would not support the Minister in spending money at that point. Beyond the possibility of a doubt, Sir,—and I may parenthetically remark that it is not my intention to make a speech, as I propose to deal with this matter when it comes up in concurrence—the railway ought to proceed to English Bay and no other point, and any money expended at Port Moody, in my judgment, will be a mistake.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is thirteen miles away.

Mr. DECOSMOS. Fifteen miles according to Mr. Cambie's report. I remark that this gentleman, who was sent specially to examine the country, refers to Port Moody as the temporary terminus, but to English Bay as the permanent terminus. I may further remark, Sir, that the road by reaching English Bay, will enable a railway ferry to be put on to reach Vancouver Island within thirteen nautical miles, landing passengers within sixty miles of Victoria, so that we can have a through railway ferry across the Strait of Georgia that will carry freight trains and cars.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The question raised is a very important one and did not escape the attention of the Government. My hon. predecessor had located the road down the Fraser, from Kamloops to Port Moody, and the view presented by the hon. gentleman has been presented to me by gentlemen from British Columbia, and full investigation was made into the matter. With the reports of the best engineers and after the fullest investigation we concluded that the decision of the late Government to carry the line to Port Moody was best. I visited the place personally and found that to carry the road down to Coal Harbor or English Bay—and then we would only have reached an open roadstead—would increase the cost by something like half a million dollars. At Port Moody there was a safe and commodious harbor where easy access could be had to the road. After full investigation we confirmed the late Government's location.

Mr. DECOSMOS. My reading of the Orders in Council did not lead me to the belief that the late Government had settled definitely on Port Moody. The ex-Minister of Public Works is here, and I would like to hear him speak on the subject. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman (with all due respect to the Minister of Railways), from personal knowledge of the country, it is as certain as that the gas-light shines upon us that the road will run on to English Bay, and that the ferry will cross to Vancouver Island. Engineers say that in order to have a town at Port Moody, it will have to be built on terraces, like some of the villages on the Rhine. To make the terminus at English Bay would be much more in the interests of the country. I would like to hear from the ex-Minister of Public Works as to whether Port Moody was finally chosen as the terminus or not?

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not exactly remember. The Admiral for the coast looked upon English Bay as probably the best place for some purposes, but we found a good harbor at Port Moody, and that by going there we could reach the ocean in the meantime, and if in the future, it was thought desirable to extend to English Bay, it could be done.

Mr. DECOSMOS. Will the hon. gentleman say whether they looked upon Port Moody as a permanent or only a temporary terminus.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have no definite recollection of the matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was as far as you expected to go for some time.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes.

In reply to Mr. MACKENZIE,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The calculation made is that the 213 miles from Kamloops to Port Moody will cost $11,738,100, which gives an average of $55,100 per mile.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,
Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is a large amount of tunnelling. The longest tunnel will be 1,600 feet.

Mr. MACKENZIE. My recollection is that there will be about two miles of tunnelling to be done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. About that.

71. Telegraph Lines $35,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, Sir, that $35,000 is to pay Messrs. Oliver & Davidson, for maintaining the line from Prince Arthur's Landing to Selkirk which is still under contract, at the rate of $4,160 a year. For interest on drawback, $1,463; also in accordance with the express terms of the contract, cost of maintaining the line from Prince Arthur's Landing to Edmonton, $29,377.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The contractors get the receipts. As will be observed the telegraph from Selkirk to Edmonton can in no way now be considered as in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, as it is a source of considerable expense, and as several applications have been made to me by telegraph companies and other parties to take over that line and operate it, an Order in Council has been passed authorizing an advertisement, inviting tenders from parties who will take over the line from Selkirk to Edmonton, and maintain telegraphic communication from Winnipeg to Humboldt, Battleford and Edmonton, and asking them to specify the rate they would charge and the terms on which they would take it over.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Purchase or lease.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The terms on which they will assume it and operate it as their own property, so that it is practically a purchase. In that case, as hon. gentlemen will see, a considerable portion of this sum will not be required to be expended; but I thought it safer to take the vote.

72. Station accommodation, Pacific Railway.....$32,000

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Under the contract, we are obliged to provide stations on the portions of the line being constructed.

73. Subsidy, Canadian Pacific Railway Co.....$8,500,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand that the $4,000,000 voted last year have been paid over to them?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, only $1,610,000. The reason the balance is not put down as a revote is that it is retained for the purpose of meeting any expenditure before the 1st of July.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The two sums amount to $12,500,000, which is half of the whole subsidy. Half of the work will not be done before the 1st of July, 1883.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, there will be a considerable balance remaining; it does not really matter.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It does not matter very much, but it is desirable that the Company should know what the Government expect. As I understand, the Syndicate themselves hardly expect to construct more than five or six hundred miles additional by the 1st of July, 1883, and that certainly would not entitle them to anything like the sum of $12,500,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of course, having made the contract, we have to take the estimate largely from the persons engaged in the construction of the road, and their calculation furnished to me is that there will be 600 miles of the Western division constructed during the year, and 150 miles on the Eastern division, which would entitle them to a total of $8,307,691. They have 60 miles under contract from Algoma Mills, running easterly, and they expect to construct 50 miles running westerly from Callander Station during the present season. From Thunder Bay they expect to put under contract from 50 to 60 miles, running easterly, during the present season.

Mr. BUNSTER. The hon. Minister of Railways has made no provision whatever for the railway on Vancouver Island. The hon. Minister knows that, according to agreement, and according to the Order in Council that was passed, Esquimalt was to be the terminus and not Port Moody. This vote will bring the railway only as far as Port Moody; yet it will be found that commercial necessities will require it to be carried ultimately to Esquimalt. The hon. Minister would be the gainer by bringing the railway there, because the land that has been ceded to him by the British Columbia Government would build the whole road through British Columbia. The portion of the road that ought to have been commenced first was that at Esquimalt which to-day would have been a paying road. It would have yielded enough money to have built one-half of the Canada Pacific Railway, and probably more than enough to build the whole, taking the royalty they charge on coal and coal lands in British Columbia that the Government and people were willing to concede. In this matter great injustice has been done to British Columbia. The hon. Minister of Railways who has been out there and knows the value of those coal lands, will admit that injustice. American capitalists have offered to build the road from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, for the sake of the coal lands of the Island, that coal being the best on the Pacific coast. If they do us justice they will see the iron road completed early. They have now got the land ceded to them by the British Columbia Government, but by their neglect they have retarded the settlement of the Province at least ten years. The Government have been unjust to the commerce of the Dominion in nominating Port Moody as the terminus of the Pacific railroad, as will be seen when we have to compete with the Union and Central Pacific, at San Francisco, and the Northern Pacific at Puget Sound. They will have to bring the Canadian Pacific to Nanaimo yet. We were proud and independent enough not to take from the late Government $750,000, for the sale of our rights, and we are now entitled to demand from the present Government the fulfilment of their contract with British Columbia. We have a claim against Canada for the injustice done us, in not fulfilling the agreement entered into with British Columbia. So far as I am concerned I will see that we get justice and damages. The Premier got the best seat in our gift, and he should do his utmost to secure us the justice we are entitled to. I am aware that the Government has many difficulties, but when they see the value of the land, they should endeavor to turn it to proper account. I want to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to the great injustice that has been done our Province. No one knows it better than he, inasmuch as he has totally left out our Island railway from the Syndicate bargain.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The subject to which the hon. gentleman has alluded is of very great importance. At the request of the late Government a bill was passed by the Local Legislature of British Columbia reserving for the use of the Government for the construction of the railway a belt of land on each side from Victoria to Nanaimo. The present Government were very much in hopes that the Syndicate would have found it to their interest to construct the road. When I went to British Columbia, I conferred with the Government of that Province as to the land they would give, and an informal arrangement was made to appropriate in addition to that twenty miles a further concession of land running up the Seymour's Narrows, and I was very sanguine that the Syndicate would be induced, for the lands thus offered, to construct that portion of the road; they sent a very able contractor, Mr. Ross, to examine the country and report, but his report was not of a sufficiently favorable character to induce them to undertake the work. I am glad to learn however that a San Francisco Company are prepared to construct the road for the lands which the Government are prepared to give. I have a telegram from Mr. Trutch saying that the Government of British Columbia have given the charter to Mr. Clements and his associates, and have repealed the Act of 1875 reserving the lands for this Government. The difficulty, therefore, to which the hon. gentleman referred is removed and these lands are now in the hands of the Local Government free from the restrictions placed in the Act.

Mr. BUNSTER. Let me state the difference of opinion between the hon. gentleman and myself. We have made an agreement with Canada which they have not fulfilled. It is not right that this Government should let a San Francisco man make a contract with our Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will wait until concurrence we will be better able to discuss the subject, for then we will have full information.

Mr. ANGLIN. I have looked through the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways and find that his recollection was correct and mine incorrect with reference to the quality of the road. I hasten to make the correction. Will the hon. Minister state whether the Government has yet resolved what they will do in regard to the road to Hudson Bay?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member for South Renfrew will be able to give a great deal of valuable information in connection with that subject. I may say, in answer to the question of the hon. gentleman, that applications are before the Government, but no decision has been reached in reference to that matter as yet.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Have the Government had any communication at all with the Imperial Government in the matter? I have suggested more than once the desirability of endeavoring to have some of Her Majesty's ships explore the navigable waters.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not able to state definitely with reference to that. I shall ascertain and let the hon. gentleman know.

Mr. BANNERMAN. I shall be glad to give all the information I have got concerning it at any time. I think I have information that will satisfy the hon. gentleman that a route is practicable to take the year's crop out to greater advantage than by the St. Lawrence or by New York. Our Company have been at large expense during the last two or three years in that direction. At the present time the fur trade is of secondary importance for the Hudson's Bay Company to their interest in the land country in the North-West. I think I can show to this House that it is not a matter of six weeks, as was stated in the Railway Committee two years ago by Mr. D. A. Smith, but from the information I have we have six months of open navigation.

74. Increased accommodation at St. John, N. B., in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. $150,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is known to those who are at all acquainted with the subject that the accommodation at St. John has been of a very inferior character, in fact only of a temporary make-shift character. A large and important contract was entered upon there by my predecessor in the construction of the wharf which furnishes wharf accommodation for shipping. The station buildings, and everything connected with the St. John arrangements, are on a scale altogether inadequate to the interests of the city. The expenditure of $150,000 for the improvements is asked for to purchase additional land, renew buildings and complete sheds. Bonded warehouse, $20,000; flour sheds, $20,000; grading streets, sidings, &c., $20,000; building a branch service, $15,000. It is not proposed to go down nearer the water. We take more ground at the side.

In reply to Mr. BURPEE (St. John),

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The work will take up more space. The hon. gentleman knows it is entirely inadequate to the business of the place. No passenger station is provided in this. It was proposed to deal with the freight accommodation in the first place.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister to railway accommodation on the Intercolonial in the County of L'Islet. The road is in very good order, satisfactory to the public and well managed no doubt. Last Session I called his attention to Elgin Station, which is fed by the long road, going as far as the Townships. There is no accommodation there at all for freight or passengers, except what is afforded by a building belonging to a man named Bourdeau.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know the hon. gentleman takes a great interest in that, but it is impossible to meet all the demands for additional station accommodation. The business there, as the hon. gentleman knows, is very limited indeed. However, I will look into it and see what can be done.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I have no doubt some day or other it will have to be built, but I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister to it so that he will see the necessity of having something done there.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I call the attention of the hon. Minister to the fact that the employes on the Intercolonial receive very little remuneration for their services in proportion to the increased rate of wages other employes are receiving in other parts of Canada. If you can get good men to operate the railway, to work night and day and risk their lives and lose them, as one man did the other day from fatigue, they should be properly paid. It is true it is said that this man overworked himself at his own risk. In the interest of the public, men should not be allowed to work over hours, for in such cases justice cannot be done to the public, and loss of life and property is liable to ensue. The men should be adequately paid for their work. In some branches no fault can be found on this score. The heads of the Department and the engineers are well paid, and live in comparative ease, while those men who are seeking to earn a little more are overworked. I hope the hon. Minister will take into consideration the condition of the men and if possible try, in view of the increased prosperity of the country, to do something for them. I am glad the man did get something done for him. After bringing a great deal of influence to bear, and waiting on those under the hon. Minister who had charge of the subject, this person, who holds a position in St. John, received the munificent advance of five cents a day on his wages. I hope if the men are unable to obtain more they will be able to secure that amount.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sorry I am not able to agree with the hon. member on this occasion any more than on the other. I have no doubt he considers he has only discharged his duty in making this representation, and calling my attention to the alleged fact that the higher officers of the Department are being highly paid while their subordinates are being underpaid. It is the very reverse. I tell the hon. gentleman he is entirely mistaken. He cannot find me a railroad to compare with the Intercolonial, in point either of length or importance, on which the higher officials are so poorly paid as on the Intercolonial. He will find from the Chief Superintendent down through all the higher officers, that the average of their salaries is smaller than that of officials on any railway in this country. While as regards other employes we have been enabled to increase their pay, and the payment made to conductors and the various employes in connection with the road, from laborers upwards, will compare favorably with the rates paid on any railway in the country. From time to time, as we have increased the receipts and diminished the expenditure, we have been enabled to make these increases. When it was necessary to reduce the expenditure in order as far as possible to make the receipts and expenditure balance, I stated on the floor of Parliament that it was with great regret I was obliged to decrease the emoluments of those in the public service, especially those who were in a comparatively humble position, although as regards the laborers their wages have never been diminished but maintained at the same rate. From time to time wages on the Intercolonial have been increased until I think the payment made to officials on that road will compare very favorably with those paid on other roads. There are some cases in which it may be desirable still to extend the increase, and I shall be only too glad to do so when it is within my power. I travelled from one end of the railway to the other, and as far as possible came in contact with the employes, personally investigated the cases and their merits, and the manner in which they discharged their duties, and I endeavored by readjusting the payment to do justice to all.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Is it true that men worked forty-eight hours without rest.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If any person has been overworked it has been not because he has been required to do so, but because he sought it. As is well known, conductors on all railways are allowed extra pay for extra work. The conductors on the Intercolonial Railway, are as well paid or better than the conductors on the Grand Trunk, and the rank and file are better paid than on the Grand Trunk. It is quite impossible to maintain a staff of officials that will be equal to every emergency without drawing to a greater or less extent upon their energies. If there is a sufficiently large staff to meet all emergencies, and large and necessary expenditure is involved, the officials as far as possible are careful not to permit men to work to the injury of their health.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Did the hon. gentleman see a letter in the Halifax Chronicle, making certain statements and giving names and dates.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I sent it to the Superintendent for report, but I have not yet received any statement. I need not say to the hon. gentleman that it would be very unwise to accept the statement of disappointed officers or of those who have been dismissed from the service.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I admit that, but this letter gives names, dates and facts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It gives dates and names. I am not certain of the facts; those remain to be investigated. The matter is being investigated as is everything of the kind. You cannot work a railway without accidents happening occasionally.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No doubt; but we have had the same kind of accidents on other roads. There was one at Trenton, where the conductor being overworked was unable to keep awake. Then there is the case on the Intercolonial which has been mentioned. It is true that this man was forced to continue at work so long as is stated, some one must be blameable, and it becomes a very serious matter. I would like to ask if the statement is true?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not true. No person deploras his untimely death more than myself, but he was not compelled to perform the duties. It was entirely voluntary, and I suppose he fell asleep and the accident was the result. It is a source of gratification to me to state at the end of three years that notwithstanding the great number of persons carried such a long distance over the Intercolonial, not a single passenger has lost his life. The hon. gentleman knows the difficulty of avoiding accidents on a line of road of such length. The instructions of the Department have been not to overwork any official, and if any case of that kind should be brought to my notice it would be followed by a strong reprimand. I saw the letter the hon. gentleman refers to, but I do not attach much importance to it. It is very easy for discontented parties to write in that strain. I have called upon the Superintendent for a full report on the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He does not appear to have been dismissed. He appears to have left.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Any person knows that persons are sometimes unreasonable, and it is impossible to meet the demands always of those in one's service.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. Minister says that the officials were allowed to do extra work voluntarily, but if there was a proper number of officials on the road this would not be necessary. With regard to the pay of officials I do not object to the payment to the higher officials of proper salaries; but I have certainly heard that in many cases the lesser officials are underpaid. I am glad to hear from the hon. Minister that recently their salaries have been increased, because it is understood that when he first took charge of the Department the salaries were reduced and a large number of officials were dispensed with. Now, this matter leads to the consideration of two accidents which have recently occurred on the road, and which are exciting a great deal of attention among the people of the Maritime Provinces, and which may have a very serious effect upon the welfare of the railway. There is an impression that these accidents have been the result of overwork on the part of the officials. With regard to the first accident, the matter is certainly, at this moment, in a very unsatisfactory condition. A collision occurred somewhere near Windsor Junction, resulting in the death of one of the train hands, a man by the name of Cameron. An inquest was held to ascertain the cause of death. It appeared that there was a conflict in the evidence as between the train despatchers at Truro and the station masters at Windsor Junction. The train despatchers swore that they had telegraphed Harris, the station master at the junction, to stop No. 13 train. He distinctly swore that the instructions he received were to stop No. 15 train, and this misunderstanding or failure to act upon instructions resulted in the death of this unfortunate man. Now, the coroner's jury brought in a verdict which did not amount to very much or did not throw very much light upon the question, except a suggestion that letters should be used in transmitting messages instead of figures in future. The friends of the man who was killed had Harris, the station-master, arrested for manslaughter. Subsequently further investigation was held, and he was released. The books of the train despatcher at Truro, which, strange to say, were not produced at the inquest, on being examined, it is said, showed marks of being tampered with. Since that some of the officials at Truro have been dismissed. Now, I think it is of the highest importance to the country to know when that mistake occurred first, and I think the hon. Minister will not be discharging his duty to the friends of the unfortunate man and to society at large if he does not cause a further investigation to ascertain all the facts in connection with the accident. The second accident resulted in the death of conductor Geldert, which has been referred to already. There can be very little doubt that that accident resulted from two causes; first, that he had an engine too weak to carry the train it was required to carry; secondly, because he was over-worked and unable to perform his duty and fell asleep while on duty. These facts seem to be pretty well established. At any rate a letter written recently which has been referred to by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie)—written by an engine driver—makes that charge most specifically. This matter has been considered of sufficient importance in another place to be made the subject of a motion, and the hon. gentleman who made that motion said :

"In the first case the station master at Windsor Junction was committed for manslaughter, but the result of the enquiry was that the man was discharged and the fault seems to have been laid to the system not so much to the station master. In the second case there appears to have been no excuse except the same system that permits a train leaving one station before it is known that the track is clear and running on recklessly to another."

It is very clear to me that there must be something seriously wrong in its management to have induced that hon. gentleman, who lives in the county represented by the Minister of Railways, and is his strong personal and political friend, to make this a subject of a motion which was certainly a motion of want of confidence in the administration of the Intercolonial Railway. We have frequently heard the statement from the Government that the expenditure had been cut down very largely on this road, and that a wonderful system of economy had been inaugurated. It is well to have economy; but I doubt very much if the people of this country will justify any system of economy which results in a series of unfortunate and fatal accidents such as those that occurred lately. I hope the hon. Minister will take steps to enquire into the circumstances of the first accident I referred to, and ascertain where the cause of it lies.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In answer first to what the hon. gentleman said last, I may say that the safety of life and property on the Intercolonial Railway is not exceeded by that on any other railway in Canada, so that there is no ground for the imputation that any economy has had anything to do with the unfortunate accidents which have occurred. There is no road the hon. gentleman can point to where such a staff of officials is kept that extra demands are not sometimes made on their time; there are occasions when there is such a press of business that, unless you keep a large staff of men idle most of the time, a little extra exertion is required on the part of the officials, but, of course, that must be confined within narrow limits, and over-working must be avoided. With reference to the accident at Windsor Junction, the matter was enquired into by a coroner's inquest, and they attributed the collision to a mistake on the part of the station master, and the friends of the deceased man had the station master arrested on the charge of manslaughter. I had a full report sent up to me here which I went into closely, and I came to the conclusion that a serious oversight had taken place. The result was that the closest investigation was made, the evidence was submitted in court, the station master was honorably acquitted and discharged, and the investigation left no doubt on my mind as to the parties who were to blame, and one of them anticipated his dismissal by resigning, and the other was dismissed. As I say, it is quite impossible, while trains are moved by telegraphic communication between stations, that errors will not sometimes occur, that collisions will always be avoided. The motion referred to by the hon. gentleman, as having been proposed by an honorable gentleman in another place, that hon. gentleman holds a very strong opinion about the introduction of the system of warnings known as the Block system—a system which I examined a year ago and concluded that it would be entirely impracticable, while it would double the cost.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I was down to the Province the other day, and I found that a great many of our valuable men were leaving because they were getting better paid elsewhere, and that they could not be replaced by good men at the wages paid; and I only hope, if any accidents occur, on this account, that my warning may be remembered.

Mr. BORDEN. Has the suggestion contained in the verdict of the jury at the inquest, that letters or words should be used instead of figures, been adopted?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it has not. The work is not done by writing at all, but by sound.

Mr. HESSON. Along the whole line of the Grand Trunk, perhaps one of the most important on the continent, Stratford has the largest number of employes connected with the running department, something like 300. I have occasion to see many of those people, and am acquainted with their position and experiences. With regard to time and overwork, it is a matter of choice to do so. They like it as a favor to be granted. They are frequently required to lay off while their engines are in for repairs, and to make up that loss they desire to work overtime. Accidents will always occur, despite the utmost care. A good deal depends upon the management of the telegraph operators, in which some carelessness is occasionally shown. Perhaps it would be well that those men should be on duty only a certain number of hours by night and day. But the men in charge of the trains ought to be well protected between the telegraph stations. Then again, the effect of an accident on the Intercolonial is no proof either of carelessness or inefficiency on the part of the hands. Good men are always going away and other good men taking their places, but they must have an opportunity of getting the necessary experience.

75. To pay for Wharf and Elevator at the Halifax Terminus.....$125,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Is that the total cost?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is not more than has been found actually necessary to carry out the work in an efficient manner; to extend and build the wharf, with approaches, $36,000; elevator, $57,600; removing buildings, $5,700.

Mr. ANGLIN. What is the total cost of the work?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The expenditure last year was $130,000.

Mr. KILLAM. Is there likely to be, next winter, any grain trade to employ profitably this elevator and wharf extension, for the benefit of the port of Halifax?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We hope so.

Mr. KILLAM. On what ground has the hon. gentleman founded his hopes?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am assured by merchants in Halifax, that when we provided the proper facilities they would bring the business.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Where is the elevator to be built?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At West's Wharf.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Would it not be more convenient at Richmond.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. ANGLIN. What would be the whole expense of the extension of the railway, the purchase of property along the line and the improvement in the wharf?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Altogether about $146,271 has been expended, and the sum now asked will complete the work, and we shall have one of the finest deep water termini any railway could desire.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman say anything about Mr. Shanly's position at present.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have taken no vote for Mr. Shanly at present, because his services will terminate by the end of the fiscal year.

79. Rolling Stock.....$305,000

Mr. MACKENZIE. I call the attention of the Committee to the extraordinary increase on capital account of rolling stock.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have a detailed statement which I will lay on the Table of the House and it can be discussed on concurrence as the hour is too far advanced to discuss it now. The capital expenditure of the Intercolonial Railway, exclusive of the expenditure in connection with the Riviere du Loup Branch, is as follows: 1876-7, $314,295; 1877-8, $408,819; 1878-9, $226,829; 1881, $268,430.

80. Superannuation refund.....$986

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was the practice to have a large number on the superannuation list. That has been changed and those parties who are no longer on the list are entitled to have the money refunded which they paid into the fund, and this is the amount required to be repaid.

81. Surveys and Inspections ... $10,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is to meet expenditure entailed in consequence of our being called on frequently to make surveys in regard to projected roads, &c.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That same charge appears in three places. You cannot want this item of $10,000 for service on capital account.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I will not use it then.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Is there any refund from various railways for inspection.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. KILLAM. I would ask the hon. Minister of Railways when we are to get the returns to the motions that we moved some time ago for the tenders for materials furnished by the Intercolonial Railway and the prices generally.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have instructed the Department to use all possible despatch, and I hope to be able to place it in his hands before concurrence.

Resolutions ordered to be reported; and (at 3 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

OTTAWA, 21st April, 1882.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BUNSTER. I rise to make an explanation. Hansard attributes to me part of the speech of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) on the subject of the Irish resolutions, submitted to the House on Thursday last. Inasmuch as we are totally different in politics, and, I may say, in religion, I, of course, could have nothing to do with any such error. I suppose it was merely a clerical error on the part of the reporter, but I hope, when the proper time comes, it will be placed in its true light. I do not want to steal any hon. gentleman's—

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Thunder.

Mr. BUNSTER. Whatever you like to call it, I would say eloquence, because the hon. gentleman certainly did speak eloquently. I hope the House will accept this explanation in justice to both the hon. member for Gloucester and myself.

CHIGNECTO SHIP RAILWAY.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 57) to incorporate the Chignecto Marine Transport Railway Company, limited.

Motion agreed to and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 16,

Mr. MACKENZIE. We find resolutions placed on the paper by the Government which, practically, make this a Government work. The Railway Committee did not consider it to be a Government work at all, and I do not think it is treating this House fairly to allow it to go through the Committee, and before it could reach the House to announce the intention to grant a subsidy to it.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). It was stated in the Committee by the promoter of the Bill, Mr. Ketchum, that he hoped and expected to receive Government aid.

Mr. BLAKE. We all hope to receive Government aid.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hope was so near fruition at this time that it caused some surprise. Was this matter considered by the Government before it went to the Railway Committee?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was considered by the Government before.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does the hon. gentleman not think it would have been courteous to have announced that to the House before the Bill went to the Railway Committee?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think that at all.

Mr. KILLAM. We want to know distinctly what the policy of the Government is on this matter. My county is deeply interested in it, and I think the hon. the Minister of Railways ought to explain his views on the subject. Has the Government abandoned the policy of building the Baie Verte Canal?

Mr. CAMERON. I do not think this is the occasion to discuss the policy of the Government. The proper time will be when resolutions of the Government come up in the usual order.

Mr. MACKENZIE. This clause provides that the Company shall receive 10 per cent. in addition to the cost if the Government assume the work. The Government have undertaken to provide $3,000,000 of the capital, and the total cost, as estimated by the promoter, is $4,000,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman opposite has a little understated the cost of the canal, and overstated the amount of the proposed subsidy.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That depends on what you estimate the rate of interest at.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think so. I think my hon. friend will find that the amount of the subsidy proposed, capitalized at 4 per cent. for twenty-five years, is about $2,343,000. The hon. gentleman will see that, under these resolutions, the entire capital for this work, which is estimated to be over $4,000,000, requires to be raised by private enterprise, and the work must be completely finished and put in effective operation before a single dollar of the subsidy is given; and that the subsidy then stops at the moment the parties have constructed that work with a capital, raised in the first instance by themselves, or have failed effectively to operate it; so that the entire responsibility of the construction and the efficient operation of the road is placed in the hands of the Company. They are obliged to raise a capital of $4,000,000 for the purpose of accomplishing the work, and then to take the entire risk of it. The hon. gentleman knows that this work has been demonstrated to be practicable by the hydraulic lift, put in effective operation in the London Docks, where it raises vessels higher than it is proposed to raise them here, vessels of much greater weight, and that being raised and placed on the rails they can be managed without injury. In this case they will be moved over what is a dead level. The cost of the work is expected to exceed $4,000,000. Mr. Page, to whom the estimates were referred, thinks that is the minimum that can be set down. The work will require to be done in a substantial manner to avoid being ruinous to the Company. The lowest estimate at which it was proposed to construct a canal to do a similar work in this locality, was between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000, if I remember aright. The Chief Engineer of Canals thought that altogether an under-estimate. The cost was really found, according to his view, to approach something like $8,000,000 or $9,000,000. Therefore, it was the promoters of the Company who accomplished the object which they had in view, when they provided for the construction of the canal at that place, and at a cost which is only equivalent to $2,343,000, and which places the entire risk and responsibility upon the Company. I think it is a proposal that ought to commend itself to the very favorable consideration of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I was complaining that this Bill was discussed in the Railway Committee during the hon. gentleman's presence, and that not one word was said as to the intentions of the Government to do anything in the matter. The Railway Committee therefore discussed it in ignorance of the Government's proposals. What has been said now proves it as a Government Bill. The hon. gentleman is mistaken about the estimate of $2,340,000. The position of the matter is this: the promoter stated to the Committee that the cost was estimated at $4,000,000; and this grant of $150,000 would enable anybody to go into the London market at present and raise $3,750,000 at the same per cent., contingent upon the completion of this work. In other words, the $150,000 would pay 4 per cent. upon $3,750,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You are treating it as a permanent arrangement, instead of a twenty-five years experiment.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is a question for discussion—is it or it is not a Government work? What I complain of is, that we were not informed of that in sufficient time to influence the discussion. If I had known the Government proposed to do this, I would have asked for some time to look up the reports on the canal system formerly contemplated at that place. I never believed for an instant that such an enterprise could or would be carried on by private parties, and therefore gave comparatively little attention to the subject. The hon. gentleman also proposes to make the interest 10 per cent. instead of 5 per cent., should it assume the work, and that means the Government should pay 10 per cent. over and above the cost of the work, to the promoters after assuming it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may be wrong, but I think 10 per cent. was the amount stated in the Pacific Railway Bill of the hon. gentleman opposite that was to be paid the Company in addition to the cost should the Government assume the work. If so, we had a very good precedent.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not 10 per cent. interest only. The proposal is that the Government should add 10 per cent. to the cost. But I observe the hon. the Minister of Railways has rectified his views as to the mode of calculating an annual subsidy for a certain number of years. I recollect very well when it was the hon. gentleman's desire to ascertain the cost of the Georgian Bay Branch, he assumed an annual rate per mile was to be granted for a number of years for which it was granted; he funded the amount of the charge, stating that as a portion of the cost, and upon my arguing that that was not a true calculation, or a true way of ascertaining the true value of the subsidy, lasting a certain number of years, he pooh-poohed that idea. He does not take that mode of calculation to-day; but tells us the capitalized value is $2,343,000, I think, subject to the rate of interest at which it will be capitalized. I agree with him as to the treatment of the temporary subsidies. I am glad to see that he takes a juster view on this subject than he did formerly. There is no allusion to the position that any Government aid which may be granted shall be taken as part of their profits upon the work in the calculation of what should be due to the Company on its assumption by the Government. The next point is that no rate of interest is stated as what may be payable by the Government to the Company in case the work is assumed. It is material that the terms upon which this work may be assumed, should be settled upon proper principles, and this inasmuch as the Bill indicates the possibility of it actually being received. It seems right that any Government aid received should be accounted as part of the profits of the enterprise. And, second, that the rate of interest which is to be computed on the capital account in case of the assumption by the Government, ought also to be agreed upon. But at any rate there is nothing at all said as to the rates of interest at which the work is to be taken over, nor is anything said as to taking an account of the present value of the works. It may be the works would give a high degree of profit, but adequate attention not being paid to them might lead to their being given up; practically the repairs might absorb the annual profits, and when the public interests require the taking over of the work, they would, under this plan, be obliged to pay the whole of this principle although low profits should be realized by the Company, which were not in reality profits, because a portion was not devoted to repairs.

Mr. CAMERON. The Bill effectually provides for what my hon. friend has pointed out. As it went before the Committee of Railways and Canals it stipulates that the amount to be paid by the Government shall be a first charge and the interest also, and the profits received by the Company in working the project. Now, the profits manifestly must mean, the balance after giving credit for the amount of any subsidy received. But they will come under the Income Act with regard to any profits received. Inasmuch as a clause provides for arbitration, we may assume the arbitrators will not lose sight of the Government grant, which expressly requires them to give credit for the amount of the profits received by the Company on assuming the road.

Mr. BLAKE. I cannot see how the subsidy is to be dealt with as part of the profits on absorbing the road.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The remedy is obvious; the original figure is 6 per cent. You can add "that deducting the profits, including any Government subsidy." That will meet the case.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It will.

Mr. BLAKE. These two positions will make the first two points clear; that it is the intention of Parliament that the rate of interest shall be 6 per cent. Then remains the other point which demands attention. Suppose the Company builds a railway; suppose it is operated for six or eight years, the works being new and no repairs made, and that the whole sum granted by the Government is absorbed in profits over the running expenses; suppose the practical result to be that a profit exceeding 6 per cent., or a so-called profit of 6 per cent. is received, that then the Government think proper to take over the work, they will have to pay the whole cost and 10 per cent. over, though the works may have largely deteriorated by the management of the Company, who may have received a second profit from the annual wear and tear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the suggestion of the hon. gentleman for Westmoreland is a reasonable one, and will meet the difficulty raised by the hon. member for South Durham.

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me that the provisions of this Bill are wholly inadequate to such a measure, under the circumstances of the case—aid being received from the Government. There ought to be some provision by which the Government could ascertain the actual amount of money expended on this road at the time of completion, and care should be taken that the money subsequently expended to keep it in repairs should not be counted as capital. There ought to be some provision for the fixing of rates of tolls by the Governor in Council or Parliament. It would be better that the Committee should rise and the hon. Minister of Railways take time to consider what changes should be made to make the Bill meet the altered circumstances of the case. This Company stands in a wholly different position from what it would were it an ordinary business enterprise. It is perfectly obvious, from an examination of these clauses, that the measure will not at all meet the requirements of the case.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite right. I am certain the law provides that the tolls shall be approved by the Governor in Council.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that this clause be added to meet the views of the hon. member for Bothwell:

The tolls and charges to be levied and collected by the Company for the use of their said works shall be subject to the approval from time to time of the Governor in Council, and shall thereafter be collected by, and paid to, the Company.

Mr. BLAKE. The approval from time to time would refer to the approval of existing tolls which might, from time to time, be levied.

Mr. CAMERON. I think that is provided for by the words, "Shall thereafter be collected by the Company."

Mr. BLAKE. I am quite aware that after the Government have approved of one system of tolls, they might subsequently disapprove of it. We want a power of revision of the existing tariff by the Governor in Council.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria).

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH moved to amend the clause by adding the following words:—

Provided, however, that no tolls shall be exacted until a tariff of tolls shall have been submitted to, and sanctioned by, the Governor in Council, who may, if the public interest require it, revise the same from time to time.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADA LANDED CREDIT COMPANY.

Mr. BEATY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 47) to extend and amend the Acts relating to the Canada Credit Company.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BEATY. I propose to strike out the last four lines as printed and adding the words: "In the Province of Ontario, and in the same manner the same rights, powers, and privileges as are now possessed by the same Company in the said Province of Ontario." This is intended simply to extend the charter under which they can charge 8 per cent. to Manitoba and the North-West Territories. In the amendment suggested in Committee it was intended to allow the Company to charge the same rate of interest as could lawfully be taken by individuals, the same as the Joint Stock Companies' Act. In consequence of the vote the other night it was thought best to bring forward the amendment now proposed. This is to bring it within the charter and within the vote of the House.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk). No notice has been given, and I think I will have to object to this amendment.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. On that ground I must rule it out.

Mr. BEATY. I consent to the limitation of 8 per cent. in Manitoba and the North-West Territories; but I do not want the charter limited as it applies to Ontario.

Mr. BOWELL. If the rate in Ontario is now limited to 8 per cent., I see no objection to adopting the suggestion of the hon. member for South Norfolk.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I understood from the mover of this Bill that under their charter this Company are limited to 8 per cent. in Ontario, and, therefore, I did not see any objection to the amendment; but now it would appear that in Ontario they are unlimited.

Mr. BEATY. Not at all. The original charter limits the Company to 8 per cent.; but this Bill is simply intended to extend the powers of that charter to Manitoba and the North-West. The hon. member for South Norfolk wishes to insert the words: "not exceeding 8 per cent.," to which I agree; but if this is made applicable to Ontario the preamble must be changed and the whole Bill reconstructed.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. If the Government wished, it would be easy to amend the Act so as to cover the whole ground; the insertion of three words would secure a proper amendment.

Mr. HESSON. It must be evident that the feeling and experience of the House is against such legislation, as would enable corporations to collect a higher rate than 8 per cent. The feeling is that 7 per cent. would be enough, and by some that it excessive. I will support the amendment of the hon. member for South Norfolk with pleasure, although I would prefer 7 to 8 per cent. to be the limit.

Mr. BEATY. There need be no misapprehension on this subject. Under the charter of the Canada Landed Credit Company they have power to take only 8 per cent. This Bill desires to extend this power to Manitoba and the North-West. The Committee has reported this Bill according to the terms of the Joint Stock Companies' Act on which they were enabled to take such a rate of interest as they might lawfully take in the Province in which their transactions were carried on. Now, we abandon that in consequence of the decision of the House the other evening, and we say we will take the same rate in Manitoba and the North-West that we take in Ontario. I see no difficulty about this matter.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman is sincere it is very easy to provide that the rate of interest shall not exceed 8 per cent. Insert that limitation in the Bill, and strike out the last clause, and I shall withdraw my opposition.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The hon. member for South Norfolk should bring in a General Act, or the Government should do so, limiting the rate to 8 per cent. But 8 per cent. should not be allowed in one case and refused in another. The rate should be uniform.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The observations of the hon. member for Westmoreland raises a large question. I think the majority of the House would not fix an arbitrary rate of interest. I do not think that special provisions as to a special company, are reconcilable to the theory of legislation. I would prefer that the matter be left open, but as the promoters of the Bill assent to a limitation of 8 per cent., of course there can be no objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I suppose the hon. member for Westmoreland thinks there has been so much retrograde legislation the last three years that a little more would not make much difference. I hope the Government will not go wrong in this matter as in other commercial legislation. We are bad enough now, but to chase capital out of the country by restrictive laws is an act of folly we should not be guilty of.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We voted against that the other evening, but were defeated.

Mr. WALLACE. I think I heard the hon. member for Lambton say that it would be bad to restrict the interest of money and drive capital out of the country. I believe there has been no greater wrong done to the country than allowing a free rate of interest. It has brought in money, but at a rate that has ruined the people of Canada. I heard an hon. gentleman the other evening eloquently discourse about the wrongs inflicted upon Ireland, by high rents and otherwise. Now, what is the interest on farm mortgages but rent, and what more obnoxious landlordism could exist in any country than that. It has been well said that corporations have neither bodies to be kicked nor souls to be damned; they have no feeling whatever, though the worst wretch of a landlord has some shred of feeling. They say that absentee landlordism is wrong. What is this Company doing but borrowing money in England to loan in this country? Is not this absentee landlordism of the very worst kind? These hon. gentlemen speak of rack-renting and middlemen. What is this Company but a middleman, that borrows money in England and loans it out at a higher rate of interest to the people of this country, and rack-renting the people by taking all the interest they can? Hon. gentlemen will say that men have violated the law. That is true. But is it any reason, because men will extort that this House should legalize extortion; because men will steal that theft should be legalized; and because people will kill, that murder should be made lawful? That is the reasoning of these hon. gentlemen. Because a wrong is done you must give it the sanction of the law. They speak of evictions in Ireland. I ask them to look over this country for the last eight or ten years, and see the number of evictions made by these loan societies, growing out of extortion by lending money at a rate higher than it is possible for the farmers to pay.

Bill reported, read the third time, on a division, and passed.

QU'APPELLE LAND COMPANY.

Mr. Boulton moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 103) to incorporate the Qu'Appelle Land Company.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) moved that the second clause be amended by adding the words: "not exceeding 7 per cent." He said: With regard to the old charters, I could not limit the rates more than I did, because I thought it would be unjust to the shareholders to limit them to a lower rate of interest than they had invested their money at. This is a new Company, and I am convinced 7 per cent. on real estate is a high rate. I would have gladly made it lower if I thought there was any chance of its being carried.

Mr. PLUMB. I understand this clause enables this Company to furnish needy settlers with the material for carrying on their business. I think it would be against the interests of the settlers that the rate of interest should be limited as proposed by my hon. friend. It would simply prevent the poor man from being able to get farming material and supplies from this Company, which would be of great service to them. This is not like an ordinary land company. It does not and cannot have the same sort of security. It does not come within the same category at all, and I think my hon. friend who is probably opposing this through a principle which he has adopted in respect to all these companies, is quite mistaken, and is really, by his amendment, restricting this Company from doing what they propose to do. He is acting against the interests of the poor settlers who must be helped if we do not want to confine the settlement of the North-West to men who go there with a large amount of ready money in their pockets. That clause should be permitted to stand. In the western States, which have flourished tolerably well, in the State of Iowa, which has a population of 1,650,000, being an increase from 300,000 in 1860, the regular rate is 10 per cent., and nobody is hurt, the people can pay it more easily than people in England can pay 4 per cent. The land they buy doubles in price in a year or two. There is no hardship to the people; the lands are sold from $6 to $7 per acre, and the purchaser gives notes bearing 10 per cent. interest. They are free to take any rate they like, and it is not hindering the settlement of the country, nor has it wrought, in the slightest degree, any hardship on the people. This system means that the Government may supply material for the people who are going there to work, and if you take a man's note, you can sell it for whatever it happens to be worth. There will be plenty of rival companies, and if these gentlemen charge too high a rate, somebody else will come forward and loan money for less. I am sure the rates charged in the western States have been infinitely higher than these, and they have in no way worked any hardship, nor has their been any complaint nor any attempt to change the rates.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not think the hon. member for South Norfolk is consistent, because he has not fixed at what chattels, horses and other animals may be sold. Why not place a limit on the sales of other things as well as on the sales of money? If that is done there will be some consistency in it. There is as much competition in selling money as there is in selling grain and horses. At any rate, let us be consistent and fix the price of everything that people have to buy.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for Lambton has evidently given the matter very little thought, otherwise he would never say that money is like everything else that people have to sell. No man can make money; he can earn it, but only the Government can make it. There is nothing except money that is of no use to a man until he parts with it. There is nothing else a man can be compelled to take in payment of a debt, except money. It is because money has so much power, that that power ought to be restricted, and if the hon. gentleman thinks a little more he will know more about what he is talking.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am sorry that all the thinking of this House is confined to the hon. member for South Norfolk.

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He has thought to very little purpose when he is coming back to the dark ages with his legislation.

Mr. WALLACE. That is your opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Of course, it is everybody's opinion nearly. The hon. gentleman says we cannot make money; well, neither can he make oxen, I presume.

Mr. WALLACE. I can raise them.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There is nothing more absurd than to attempt to fix the price of one article without fixing the price of every article, because there is more extortion in selling goods than in selling money.

Mr. WALLACE. That shows still more clearly that the hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about. The price of money is fixed by law, and the money itself is a fixed quantity by law.

Mr. HESSON. I think it would be impossible to fix the profits to be derived from the sale of goods as the hon. member for Lambton suggests. We do know that money is restricted, not only in quantity but restricted in its production by the Government. Every man is at liberty to go into trade, to manufacture goods in the country, and therefore there is all the competition which can be afforded by fair play. But we have no occasion to complain of a limitation of interest when it is remembered that no less than $92,500,000 are lying in the banks, according to the bank reports of last March, and $47,500,000 of that is on demand, and therefore I presume not bearing interest. Now, it is said there is a disadvantage in restricting the rate of interest in this country, that it is going to shut out foreign capital. While we have $90,000,000 in our banks unused we have no right to say that interest shall be restricted. I feel satisfied the hon. member for South Norfolk is proceeding in the right direction. The incorporation of new companies here ought to be limited, and I am sure there is nothing in the state of the money market in this country to warrant an unlimited rate of interest on money. My own impression is that 7 per cent. is a very fair rate, when it is considered that banks are not attaining more than three, and that half the deposits in the banks to-day are not earning a cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. When this subject was under consideration, it was thought fair by the Committee that it should be left subject to the laws in force with reference to the rate of interest in the country where this Company was operating; but a majority of the Committee decided adversely to that principle, and fixed the maximum rate of interest at 8 per cent.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The rate of interest is uniform all over the Dominion.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. But it referred to the Provinces in which the operations are carried on. I have been looking at the Act of 1877, and I am under the impression that there was a company incorporated in England that are doing business in Manitoba and the North-West to-day, who are not limited in the rate of interest they shall charge. If that is the case, of course, a limitation of other companies might place them at a disadvantage as compared with the companies that are incorporated in England and doing business there. As the hon. member for Westmoreland said, we should have a uniform rate of interest, and that it may be a question for the Government to deal with. There may be something in what he says, and if the opinion of Parliament is that the rate of interest should be limited, then it would be a question whether we should allow parties to do business there without any limitation as to the rate of interest. It seems to me that, on Friday night last, we decided on 8 per cent., and to fix it at 7 now would be a new deviation from the principle of the Committee. However, I think we should have a uniform system so far as possible.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The legal rate of interest is 6 per cent. in every Province of the Dominion, when the rate is not specially fixed by the parties, and it is open to all parties to agree to any rate of interest they choose. There is no limitation whatever, but it does seem to me that if you limit one company you ought to limit them all.

Mr. WALLACE. I cannot quite agree with the hon. Minister of Finance when he says that if we limit the rate in this case it will give to the other companies an unfair advantage who have the right to lend without any limitation as to rates. I think if two or three respectable companies are loaning money for 8 per cent., the new company will not be likely to get any more. I apprehend the effect will be to bring the general rate of interest to 8 per cent. instead of allowing them to loan at a higher rate. If it were possible to bring in a Bill to limit the rate of interest to 6 per cent. or even a lower rate, I would bring it in and carry it through if possible. Knock usury on the head every time you can, that is my motto.

Mr. ROCHESTER. I propose the rate be made 8 per cent. I am of the opinion that it will be unjust to limit one company to 7 per cent. and another to 8. It is true the former company may be an older one and this is a new one, but why we should make a difference of 1 per cent. between them I cannot see. I move that the rate be 8 per cent.

Amendment agreed to, Bill reported and read the third time and passed.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 98) to incorporate the Canada Provident Association.—(Mr. Currier.)

Bill (No. 139) to incorporate the Rapid City Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Bannerman.)

Bill (No. 94) to incorporate the Great American and Short Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

Bill (No. 132) to incorporate the Montreal and Central Canada Railway Company.—(Mr. Fulton.)

MILITIA CLOTHING AND ACCOUTREMENTS.

Mr. THOMPSON enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to lay before this House, the report of militia officers recently made to the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence, on the clothing and accoutrements of the Militia, and when?

Mr. CARON. This question has been for several days on the paper, and I told the hon. member that although the report was incomplete, I was quite prepared to lay it on the Table of the House, and I hope to lay it on the Table to-morrow or the following day.

INFORMATION RESPECTING THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. HOOPER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to maintain permanently, at Ottawa, the office recently opened by the Department of the Interior, to afford Members of Parliament and others, facilities for obtaining official information from the Public Records respecting Dominion Lands in Manitoba and the North-West Territories?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All the facilities which are now offered will be continued, and I hope there will be additional facilities ere long.

ELGIN STATION, INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. GUTHRIE for Mr. CASGRAIN, enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to build some sort of station or shed for freight and passengers at Elgin Station on the Intercolonial Railway, County of L'Islet?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. My colleague has not yet decided this question. It is still under consideration.

LAND PURCHASES BY RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether arrangements have been made to permit the purchase by the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway Company of a large quantity of land? If so, at what price, and what is the estimated acreage?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Arrangements have been made to permit the purchase of 3,840 acres per mile at $1 per acre by Order in Council of the 5th of July, 1880. The area of the land cannot be given as it will depend on the mileage of the railway built. Application has also been made for an additional grant of 2,560 acres per mile. This application has not yet been complied with.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether arrangements have been made to permit the purchase by the Manitoba and South Western Colonization Railway Company of a large quantity of land? If so, at what price, and what is the estimated acreage?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. An arrangement has been made to grant to this Company, provided certain conditions described in the Order in Council authorizing the grant are complied with, 6,400 acres at $1 per acre. The quantity granted will depend on the number of miles constructed.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether arrangements have been made to permit the purchase by the South Saskatchewan Railway Company of a large quantity of land? If so, at what price, and what is the estimated acreage?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is one of the railway corporations to which by Order in Council of the 5th July, 1880, 3,840 acres per mile are to be granted at $1 per acre.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether arrangements have been made to permit the purchase by the Portage, Westbourne and North-Western Railway Company of a large quantity of land? If so, at what price, and what is the estimated acreage?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. By Order in Council of the 17th of February, 1881, this railway is to receive 3,840 acres per mile at $1 an acre, and a further grant of 2,560 acres per mile at $1 an acre, on such evidence being furnished that the Company has completed one-half of the line for which it has obtained its charter.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether arrangements have been made to permit the purchase by any other railway company than the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway Company, the Manitoba and South-Western Colonization Railway Company, the South Saskatchewan Railway Company, and the Portage, Westbourne and North-Western Railway Company, of a large quantity of land? If so, what Company and at what price, and what is the estimated acreage?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government has not made any arrangement with any other companies than those named.

PIER AT CRANE ISLAND.

Mr. LANDRY enquired whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the Supplementary Estimates a sum sufficient to complete the construction of the pier between the "block" and the shore at Crane Island, now in course of construction?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot answer this question either way to-day, as the Supplementary Estimates are still under consideration.

SURVEY OF THE BASIN OF MONTMAGNY.

Mr. LANDRY enquired whether it is the intention of the Government to cause a survey to be made, at a suitable period during the coming season, of the Basin of Montmagny, in order to ascertain the possibility and necessity of making it a harbor of refuge?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have received a request from the hon. member to that effect, and I have instructed the Engineer in Chief to study the question so as to enable one to decide it in the affirmative, if possible.

SEMAPHORE COMMUNICATION BETWEEN GROSSE ISLE AND MONTMAGNY.

Mr. LANDRY enquired whether the Government have decided to establish, this year, communication by means of Semaphores between the Quarantine Station at Grosse Isle and the Village of Montmagny, or any other place which may be found to be most suitable?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That question has not yet been decided.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY PRINTING.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether any printing work has been done for the Government in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or the Dominion Lands, or both, by the Company owning the Herald, of Halifax? If so, in what year, and to what amount, and whether under tender or contract, or not, and under what heads in the Public Accounts are the sums charged?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far as I am aware, the Halifax Herald has not done any work for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or the Dominion Lands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have certainly not done any for the Dominion Lands.

GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE.

Mr. ROGERS enquired, Whether the Government have abandoned the scheme of Government Life Insurance recommended to the consideration of Parliament in the Speech from the Throne in 1879, and outlined in the resolutions proposed by the hon. Minister of Finance in that Session? If the scheme has not been abandoned, when is it proposed to introduce it to Parliament?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government have not abandoned their intention of bringing this subject under the consideration of the House, but they do not propose doing so at the present Session.

CODIFICATION OF DOMINION LANDS.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether the Government have appointed a French Secretary to the Commissioners for the codification of the Dominion Laws; and if not, whether it is their intention to make such appointment?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is at present only some preparatory work to be done before the issue of the Commission for the codification of the Dominion Laws. When that Commission is issued there will be either a French Commissioner or a French Secretary.

FISH HATCHERIES IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. WELDON enquired, Whether the fish-hatcheries are to be continued on the St. John, Restigouche and Miramichi Rivers; and what quantity of salmon fry it is proposed to place in these rivers; and in what other rivers in New Brunswick during the coming season; and what quantity was placed during the past season in the rivers of that Province?

Mr. McLELAN. The fish-hatcheries are to be continued. There will be about 1,750,000 of salmon fry placed in these rivers. It is not yet determined how much will be placed in the other rivers in New Brunswick.

Mr. WELDON enquired, Whether a hatching or fish-breeding house is being erected at Indian House, on the Restigouche River, from whom was the site purchased, and the amount paid for the same; also, the probable cost of the building?

Mr. McLELAN. Some expenditure has been incurred in procuring material, but operations have been suspended, pending the selection of a site. The building will cost about $3,000.

FISHERY WARDEN MOWATT.

Mr. WELDON enquired, Whether any action has been taken upon the Report of the Commissioners appointed to investigate the charges against Fishery Warden Mowatt, and whether any other person, and who, has been appointed Fishery Warden in his place?

Mr. McLELAN. Mr. Burt has been appointed in his place.

THE POSTAL SAVINGS BANK SYSTEM.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) for Mr. JONES, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to assimilate our Postal Savings Bank system, as far as may be, to the system existing in England?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That subject is under consideration.

THE STEAMER RIMOUSKI.

Mr. Fiset enquired, For what purpose and for what reasons the Government have offered for sale the steamer Rimouski?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The steamer Rimouski has been pronounced unfitted for the service by the Post Office Department.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY TARIFF.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether the Government has received a classification sheet of the articles classed 1, 2, 3, 4, under the head merchandize in the Canadian Pacific Railway Tariff approved 29th April, 1881? If so, when such sheet was received, and will it be laid on the Table?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have received a duplicate of the classification sheet, which will be laid on the Table, I think, to-morrow. I cannot state the date when it was received.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether the Government has received an application from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the approval of a Tariff to come into force on 29th April instant? And whether such application and Tariff will be laid on the Table?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have not yet received it.

PRICES OF HARDWARE GOODS.

Mr. PLUMB for Mr. KIRKPATRICK, enquired, Whether the prices quoted in the Iron Age newspaper, are to be taken for Customs duties as the prices of hardware goods purchased in the United States? And if not, where the standard of prices or market values of hardware goods for the purpose of Customs entries can be from time to time ascertained?

Mr. BOWELL. The Iron Age is not accepted as the standard of price; the standard of price can be obtained in the markets in which the goods are purchased.

DAMAGE TO THE WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. ARKELL enquired, What was the extent of the damage done to Lock No. 1, on the Welland Canal, by a propellor belonging to S. Neelon, carrying away the gates in the fall of 1881; whether any and what amount was paid by the owner of the propellor; whether any security or bond was taken from the owner of the propellor before releasing it, and whether or not the lock has been properly and efficiently repaired, and at what cost, since the destruction of the gates?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The vessel Europe is now in St. Catharines in the dry dock undergoing repairs. Mr. Neelon, the owner, has been served with a bill of costs, amounting to $3,599, and a bond has been prepared with two sureties; the vessel, in the meantime, is held as security, and will not be released until the bond is executed.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

INSTRUCTIONS TO GOVERNORS GENERAL OF QUEBEC, &c.

Mr. MILLS moved for copies of the following papers:—

Instructions to all the Governors General of Quebec, of Upper Canada and of Lower Canada, from 1773 to 1847.

The proclamation of Lord Dochester, 24th July, 1788, wherein the District of Hesse is described.

The proclamation of Lieutenant-Governor Simcoe, 16th July, 1792, dividing Upper Canada into counties.

The Commission of Governor Simcoe, as first Governor of Upper Canada.

The correspondence between the Colonial Office and the Hudson Bay Company, relating to their territories in North America, between 1855 and 1870.

Correspondence between Canada and the Colonial Office, upon the same subject and for the same time.

The opinions of the law officers of the Crown, for the same period, upon the same subject, including the report of Sir Fitzroy Kelly and Sir Hugh Cairns, of the 30th of October, 1858.

All communications from Chief Justice Draper, during his mission to England, including that of 12th of June, 1857. Also, all instructions addressed to him upon the subject of his mission. Also, report of Hon. George Brown to Governor General, 1865. Also, all permits and licenses to cut timber west of the Provisional boundary line.

Also, copies of all grants, licenses, permits, regulations and papers, relating to transactions affecting the disputed territory.

Reports of grants to the Pacific Railway Company for the railway and for supplying timber.

All maps, field notes, &c., relating to surveys in the disputed territories.

Mr. DAWSON. As the return moved for by the hon. gentleman will require years for its preparation, I contend it should be made as complete as possible, and I therefore beg to move the following addition be added:—

Together with all documents and correspondence whatever relating to the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company, the evidence taken before the House of Commons of England in 1857, and the instructions to Lieutenant-Governors of Upper Canada from 1791 up to the date of the Union of the Provinces."

It is highly desirable, as this large volume will cover over 100 years, it should be made as full as possible, and the hon. member can have no objection to the addition.

Mr. MILLS. I have no objection to part of the addition, but I do not see the particular relevancy of the evidence taken before the House respecting the Hudson's Bay Company. My anxiety was to obtain certain Commissions and papers which are not in our possession, and perhaps it will be necessary to go to the Colonial Office for them. Some of these papers will prove exceedingly valuable in the discussion of this question, and are equally as important to the Dominion Government as to the Ontario Government. A few of these papers are, no doubt, in the office of the Secretary of State, but many of them will not be there, and it is very desirable we should get them. None of the evidence adduced before the English House of Commons Committee, in 1857 or 1858, has any particular bearing on the subject, except two papers put in by Chief Justice Draper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We might as well obtain all the papers possible. No delay will result from adding what the hon. member for Algoma wants, and in this way we shall obtain a full return.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

LEGAL TENDER NOTES.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk) moved the following resolutions:—

Resolved,—1. That all payments hereafter to be made by the Government of the Dominion for the construction and maintenance of Public Works in Canada, shall be made legal tender notes issued under the authority of Parliament, such notes to be a full legal tender within the Dominion for the payment of all debts, public and private, and to be convertible at the option of the holder thereof into either of the following securities:—

1st. A bond or bonds of the Dominion which shall be reconvertible at any time by any of the holders thereof into the legal tender notes, and which shall be payable by the Government at its option at any time after three years from the date of issue, such bond or bonds to bear interest at the rate of 4 per centum per annum, payable semi-annually on the first days of January and July, in each year.

2nd. A bond or bonds bearing interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum, the said bond or bonds to be receivable together with the accrued interest thereon, in payment for any lands sold or to be sold by the Dominion.

That the Government shall set aside out of the revenues of the Dominion, a sum equal to the total amount of land bonds issued in each year, and to all the net yearly proceeds of the sales of Dominion Lands, such sum to be used as a sinking fund to be applied to the payment of the foreign public debt of the Dominion.

He said: I regret, Sir, that some hon. gentleman possessing more ability than I do, and whose utterances would have more influence and weight in the country than mine possibly can have, has not undertaken the advocacy of what I believe is a great reform. But, Sir, while I say this I would not have it understood that I am either afraid or ashamed to advocate the principle of paper money as it is commonly called. I submit, Sir, two propositions which I think will not be gainsaid. One is, that it is a fact that the periodical panics or crises which sweep over the commercial world, bringing ruin and misery in their train, are caused by a defective monetary system; and the other fact that there is nothing without a cause. I ask what is the cause of these panics? I aver and shall endeavor to prove that they are the result of a false monetary system. Money is an invention which is a benefit to the world, but by a false system it is made the means of misery. I will now undertake to show what money is, what are its uses, and why it causes the panics to which I refer. Money is unlike anything else. It is not a natural product. There is no such thing among the productions of nature as money. Men cannot make money. They can earn it, but if a man makes money and puts more gold or silver into it than should be in the coin he is making, it is called a crime, and he is liable to punishment. What is money then? It is simply a creation of the law. And what are its uses? Its use is to measure values, and facilitate their exchange. I may be told, as I am often told: "Start a printing press and you can make money, and make men rich." That is not impossible, if money is wealth, because if the Parliament of this country were to start a printing press and create millions of legal tender notes, and give a grant of them to any individual, I apprehend that grant would make him rich. And if you were to start a printing press and make bonds and debentures, if they are wealth, you can make men rich by giving them these bonds and debentures. What is the value of money? It is not valuable because it is made of a commodity of value; its usefulness is its value. Then what is its usefulness? Its exchangeable quality; and what creates its exchangeable quality is its legal tender quality. Then money is a commodity created by the law, and it is a commodity of value, and like all commodities, it is subject to the law of supply and demand. Quantity regulates the selling price and marketable value of every commodity that has value. So it is with money; the quantity of money regulates its selling price, its marketable value, the same as any other commodity; but it does not regulate its money price, because that is a fixed quantity by law. A barrel of flour that costs $10 is no more valuable as an article of food than if it only cost one dollar. So it is with a dollar of money; a dollar of money that would buy twenty pounds of butter is no more valuable than a dollar that would buy ten pounds of butter. Its exchangeable quality is no greater; it will pay no more debt. A dollar of money that takes two days labor to earn it is no more valuable for the payment of debt than a dollar that is earned by one day's labor, because it is a fixed quantity by law. Then, again, it is said you cannot make value by law. Well, the law can take an article that is of no value, and by converting it into money, can give it a value. Paper or metal money will rise and fall in accordance with the law of supply and demand; but neither can get below the value of the commodity that is in it; and all that there is in a dollar is this: that a man who owns a dollar has the guarantee of the Government of the country that he has something that will buy or pay for an equal quantity of the production of some other man. No man can be compelled to sell anything for money, whether it is made of paper, gold, or silver; but, having sold, he can be compelled to take money in payment. The truest and most perfect money would be that which of itself had no value, because then it would not fluctuate as a commodity; it would only fluctuate in accordance with the law of supply and demand in the thing itself; but money being a double value, fluctuates both as money and as the commodity of which that money is made. Then I hold that gold or silver, or any other commodity of value, is not fitted for money, because money is a measure of value, and a measure to be of any value must be a fixed quantity; but this money, being made of a commodity of value, never can be a fixed quantity, because it is subject to the law of supply and demand. Money does not make value; it only measures, just like a yard or a pound weight. To attempt to make any commodity of value a standard, is an absurdity, because, being a value, it fluctuates. You may take a commodity of value, and a man may say he will give so many bushels of wheat for so many grains of gold; but neither is a standard or a measure of the other. The wheat is as much the measure of the value of the gold in that case as the gold is of the wheat. If that is not money, it simply becomes barter exchanging one commodity of value for another. Money should have no real value; because its increase in volume may so decrease the value of other articles that they cannot be produced at the price at which they would have to be exchanged into money, and their production would have to stop, because they would not pay for production. Money of value, that is, made of a commodity of value, should have no price, then it could rise or fall without increasing or depressing the price of the articles which you undertake to pay or exchange for it. Money they say is like everything else, but money earns nothing and produces nothing. If you put away $1 for one hundred years it will only be $1 at the end unless the value has been changed by law. Unlike other things in this respect, it is of no use to any man until he parts with it. A man might possibly have in his pockets all the money in the world, and yet it would be of no value until parted with. A man may make use of everything else while in his possession, but money to do anything for him must be parted with. The best money is that which is most convenient, and no hon. gentleman will say that paper money is not more convenient than silver or gold. It would be inconvenient to carry about a thousand dollars in gold or silver, but convenient enough to carry it in paper. The truest is paper money, because it has no value of itself; and therefore is the least subject to fluctuation from the law of supply and demand. A valueless money is a patriotic money, because every man who has a dollar knows it is of no value except for its use as money, and he has this in addition to his patriotism to induce him to sustain and support the governmental institutions of the country. If a man has $1,000 in paper money the value of which exists only in the country of its creation, while it may not be worth 10 cents outside that country, he has an incentive to support its institutions, in addition to his patriotism, because he knows if the country goes down his money will be valueless. But the man with a $1,000 of gold in the bank, which he knows will be taken in any part of the world, can readily withdraw it and leave his country if it should get into difficulty; he is not obliged to fight its battles. Therefore a valueless money, that is a money made of a commodity of little or no value, is a perfect money. We often hear hon. gentlemen speak of a limited money. Unless money is limited it will depreciate in value or become of no value. Money is the motor by which production and commerce are moved, and as they are a constantly increasing quantity, I ask why money should be a limited quantity? You might just as well say you will limit the number of railways, although the business of the country demands more, or limit the number of steam vessels or any other convenience for carrying on trade, as to say you will limit money, because it is simply a medium for stimulating the exchange of productions; and as production increases by inventions and the increase of mankind, therefore I hold that a limited money is a bad money. Money ought to be able to expand in accordance with the expanding commerce of a country; and if it cannot do this, it must be an insufficient and bad money—a depreciated money we hear so much about. Money, whether of gold, silver or paper, will decrease in purchasing power in accordance with its increasing quantity. But I do not believe that the history of the world can show an example of the money of a solvent country depreciating. I may be referred to the American greenback. What was the reason of its depreciation? The first $60,000,000 of Treasury notes the American Government issued were made a legal tender for Customs duties and all debts due the Government, and these notes never depreciated, always commanding as good a premium as gold. But I care not what money the American people might have had at that time, it would have depreciated in its purchasing power, because it was superabundant. If they had two or three thousand of millions of gold money to-day, without an increase of the goods to be bought, or the payments to be made, the tendency would be towards the depreciation of the purchasing or paying power of that money. Another reason for the depreciation of the American greenbacks: It was not money to be used everywhere; the American people issued it as payments between man and man, but not for the payments of debts owing by the nation to the Government. The Government would not take it in payment of debts due them which fact caused its depreciation, I do not propose to issue a promise to pay. A promise to pay may depreciate in accordance with the ability of the promisor to fulfil his promise. But I propose to issue a note that shall be a legal tender for its face value, and be receivable in Customs or other debts due the Government in the country. Then again hon. gentlemen will say: "This money may be all very well to carry on the internal trade of the country, but it will be of no value outside." This is incorrect; for instance, if it be a paying power in this country it would have value outside of it, the same as the American note had. The American greenback had always a value in this country because we knew we could always buy a dollar's worth of anything with it in the United States, although not so much as a dollar would purchase in our country. But labor was much higher in the United States, on account of the larger amount of money in circulation and its reduction in value. Hon. gentlemen will speak of an inconvertible currency. There can be no such thing; the very use of money is its convertibility. If it were incapable of being converted into anything, men could not use it. People also speak of irredeemable money, there is no such thing. Money is a finality—if I may be allowed the expression, it is the instrument of redemption. Every time you exchange money you redeem it. If the baker pays it to the miller or the miller to the farmer is it not redeemed. It is true I advocate a money that would not be convertible into a given quantity of gold; but it is a money that would be convertible into other things, and empowered by the law to be convertible into everything else, though not redeemable in any given article, but redeemable in everything. The worst money of all is a scarce money, because it being scarce stops commerce for the lack of a medium of exchange by which the productions of one man can be exchanged for those of another. Commerce is stopped and production ceases, this I hold is one of the causes of the depression through which we have passed. The scarcity of money prevented the exchange of productions at profitable rates, therefore production had to cease as no man could pay the rate of interest demanded for money. Scarce money, has begotten credit and usury, the two monsters, one of which creates debt which demoralizes and destroys a man, and the other eats up his substance. Scarcity of money has begotten credit in this way, that there not being enough money to carry on the business of the country, credit takes its place, and the expansion of credit carries on the industries of a country for a while, until, perhaps, some man overstrains his credit and fails. His failure brings down others, and through that cause we have all panics; and I believe that a scarce money and a fluctuating money are the causes of a panic. Scarcity of money begets usury. No man can deny that usury is to-day eating up more of the profits of the producer than anything else, and what does it do? It only keeps a lot of men living in idleness, who produce nothing, but eat the substance of those who work. How would it be if yard measures or pound weights were scarce. Would it not stop commerce to a great extent. It is just the same with scarce money. It stops production and commerce, puts back the trade of the country, and creates misery and ruin. Scarce money is always dear money and every man knows whenever money is dear everything else becomes cheap. We have had an illustration of this in this country during the last four or five years. Money was scarce and labor was low and the country was in a depressed condition. The result is different now. Money is now abundant and cheap, and men must employ their money to get a living. They therefore employ labor and make the country more prosperous. This is one of the great causes of the prosperity of this country to-day. The National Policy and the compelling of the people to manufacture more and buy less, was one of the causes, but one of the principal causes is the increased quantity of money in circulation. The increase has made it cheap and given an impetus to the business of the country, and any hon. gentleman can convince himself of this truth by comparing the bank returns of to-day with those of 1878. In 1878 our circulation was under $16,000,000; at the end of last month it was nearly $32,000,000. A fluctuating money is a bad money because as you increase the quantity you stimulate business, and as you decrease the quantity you decrease the quantity of business, and the value of every article; so that you see that a fluctuating money and a scarce money are the two great evils and causes of the panics that inflict the commercial world. I hold that if there was no credit, there could be no panics. A man might lose all he had in speculation but his loss would not create any disturbance. It would injure him but the money would have passed into the pocket of someone else. There would be no loss of money to carry on business with; but you take the failure of a man who is carrying on business at credit. His failure hurts someone else and thus disturbs the trade, and the disturbance creates a panic. If there was an abundance of money there would be no necessity for credit and this is the cause of depression and panics. These panics intensify themselves in this way: the men who have capital withdraw it from circulation, and that withdrawal intensifies and magnifies the difficulty. This is the experience we went through a few years ago. I do not believe that the wealth of this country from 1874 to 1878 was less than from 1870 to 1873 when the country was much more prosperous than it was in the three later years; but there was no credit to carry on business, and men with capital were afraid to invest because they did not know whom to trust. They would not invest because they could not sell what they produced at a profit, and men would not borrow capital to do business because they could not afford to pay the interest that owners of capital charged. This was the principal reason of the great depression that existed in this country from 1874 to 1878. It was not because there was less wealth in the country, not because the productions of men were less required, because there were as many men to feed, clothe and house as in previous years, but they could not get anything to eat, comparatively speaking. Their trade was destroyed and they had to stop consumption; the stoppage of consumption stopped the demand for goods and the stoppage of the demand stopped the production of them. Now, I hold that the way to preserve credit and to prevent these panics is to make money abundant, and how can that be done? I say by the Government making it, for the Government can alone make it, and paying it out for the public works we carry on, and for the services rendered to the Government, and supplies furnished to the Government, make it a public duty to pay for value received until money is, as it ought to be, the cheapest thing in the country, until a man could not live by loaning money but would have to go to work and earn his money as the toilers do. Then I ask why should Government make it necessary to pay a high price for the use of that which it can create and make cheap? It seems to me sometimes, as if this Parliament were in league with the usurers of the country to rob the people, but knowing the hon. members, I think this cannot be. Then again it seems to me that they ought to have intelligence enough to frame a system of money that would suit the requirements of the age. I think they are intelligent enough, and why do they not do it? Simply because they do not study the question, that they do not give the matter thought. They are willing to accept what is and go along in the old rut without undertaking to make any change. Then, Sir, I ask why should the Dominion borrow money and pay interest upon it when they can make it? When the Government go to Great Britain to borrow money what do they take? They take paper, they take bonds of this country over there and get the money for them. Now, why can they not issue smaller bonds, and let the people have the benefit of them, and save the interest upon them? There is no reason except that they will not undertake to do it. Again, Sir, I think the Government of this country can save to the people the interest on the $32,000,000 of bank circulation. I hold that if the Parliament did its duty in this respect, and saved to the people at any rate the interest on this $32,000,000, the Government would have the use of that money and pay it out for public works, and the people would have the use of it to do their business with and save nearly $2,000,000 interest at 6 per cent. that is paid on this money. The Government would also save to the people the losses on their notes that the banks now get the benefit of, if the Government did, as I think they ought to do, issue the circulating medium of this country. I hold it is wrong to allow any set of men to issue the circulating medium and make money out of it, when it is both the duty and the right of the Government to create money, or anything that passes as money. Then, I say that gold is not fit for money because money is the measure of value, and gold being a commodity of value cannot be a measure, because a measure to be of any value must be a fixed quantity and this no quantity of gold ever can be, because, being a commodity of value, it is subject to the law of supply and demand and must be regulated thereby. I say gold is not fit for money because it would make a fluctuating money. The moment that gold is of more value in any country than it is in this it would go there because it is a commodity of value, because it is not money out of the country in which it is created, but it is a commodity of value and would go out of the country where it is made money to another country where gold, as a commodity, was of more value than in that country, and therefore gold money must be always a fluctuating quantity and will go where it can buy more than it could in the country of its creation, and make money scarce in that country, changing the quantity of money in that country, therefore it is a fluctuating money, and a bad money. Gold is not a standard of value, as some hon. gentlemen say, because it does not measure its own value, it is measured by the labor it costs to find it; it is not a standard of value, nothing can be a standard of value. A man's necessities are the only standards of value. A man would give all the gold in the world, if he had it, for a loaf of bread when he was starving, or a drink of water when he was thirsty; so you see gold is not a standard of value. As I said before it does not measure its own value, it is determined by the labor it costs to find it. If gold is a standard of value, as hon. gentlemen contend, it would at all times buy the same quantities of every article, but it does not. We know that to-day flour may be $10 a barrel, and a week hence it may be only $8 or $6, and that shows you clearly that gold is not a standard of value, because these articles fluctuate. If they were regulated by the value of gold it would at all times buy the same quantity of all these articles, but every man knows that it does not, therefore gold is not a standard of value. Then, again, it is said that gold is valuable for money, because it is indestructible, but indestructibility does not make value. If an article is of no use it is of no value, and if an article is of no use indestructibility would make it a greater nuisance, because you could not get rid of it. Therefore, indestructibility does not create value at all. Usefulness is the only creator of value; if a thing is of no use it is of no value. Then, again, it is said that gold is suitable for money because it is divisible. This is another absurdity. You take an article that is a nuisance and divide it and you would only have a greater number of nuisances. Take a silver dollar and divide it into four parts; you have not four quarters and you have destroyed a dollar. You have four pieces of silver that will be worth so much, but you have destroyed the amount of money so far as that is concerned. Then scarcity does not create value. If an article was the only one of its kind in the world, but of no use, it would have no value. If an article is valuable its scarcity will regulate its selling price, but it will not create value, because an article that costs ten times as much is of no more real value although its selling price has increased. As I said before, take a barrel of flour costing $10, it is of no more intrinsic value, it will feed no more men; it will be of no more use as an article of food than if it only cost $1, but its price has increased. In this resolution I am about to submit to the House there is a guarantee that money can never become too plentiful, because the moment a man has more money than he can use at a profit paying him more than 4 per cent., he can invest in Government bonds and then draw off the superfluous quantity of money. On the other hand, it can never become too scarce, because the moment it becomes of a higher value than 4 per cent. the bonds will be converted into money again, and that will be a regulator preventing it becoming too scarce or too abundant; it will relieve an abundance of money by giving men the power to invest in Government bonds, and it will prevent a scarcity because if the interest becomes too high a man would convert these bonds into currency, being able to do better with the currency than by keeping the money in bonds. I see the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) laughs. I do not believe all the wisdom of the world lies in his little head, although he thinks a great deal lies there. It is not always wise men who laugh. It will be said if there is no interest for money how can men derive an income from it. There is another side to this question and perhaps the payment of interest on it makes it much harder for men to make a living, and when you take this fact into consideration and put it against the other of the payment of interest it will appear that the latter prevents more men and women from earning a comfortable living than there are of men who get a comfortable living from interest on money. It will be further said, how would women make a living if no interest is allowed on money. On the other side perhaps washerwomen and women of that class would make better livings if it were not for interest charged on money. If more people had to work in order to live instead of living on interest I believe it would be better for all classes of the community. Then, again, capital is only labor realized, and if labor realized, receives more than active labor, then the former is getting more than its share; and I apprehend there is no hon. member acquainted with the business of the country for the last fifteen years who does not know that capital has had more than its share when interest has ranged from 6, 8 or 10 per cent. Farmers have sold their farms and lived on the interest, because they could do better than by tilling the land. Business men retired from business and became money lenders, because they found it more profitable to lend money than to conduct an active business. I apprehend also that 4 per cent. is a high rate of interest, because the aggregate wealth of the nation has not exceeded 3 per cent., and in view of this fact 4 per cent. is an excessive amount. If the average wealth of countries has not increased more than 3 per cent., why should money bring more than that rate of interest? I know the difficulty of getting the rate reduced. The monetary institutions have such power that they almost compel men to vote for their interest as against the general interest of the public. I admit that a higher rate of interest on bonds payable in lands is justifiable because the country has plenty of lands and it is better to pay 5 per cent. on bonds secured on lands than to have 4 per cent. taken out of the earnings of the people. I think if this country is ever to get out of debt we ought to set apart the whole receipts from the sale of public lands in the North-West for the payment of that debt. It is the only possible way of doing it, because for three or four years past this country could not raise sufficient revenue to meet the current expenditure. We were absolutely borrowing money to pay the current expenditure.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. WALLACE. Was that not the case three or four years ago?

An hon. MEMBER. Not in our time.

Mr. WALLACE. We cannot tell how soon our circumstances may change and this country enter upon a period of adversity. We are liable to do so, and the more prosperous a country is the greater is the danger, because the more prosperous a country becomes the more quickly will it outgrow its money or gold basis, and the more it outgrows that basis the greater is the danger because more business is done on credit, and credit is the cause of the disaster. I am, therefore, an advocate of setting aside the product of the sales of all lands in the North-West for the payment of the present debt and the construction of the Pacific Railway, and I believe if this is not done Canada and the people of Canada will be heirs to a debt that will be upon them for all time to come, because after the lands are sold how are we going to pay the debt? Where are we going to get the money? It is a debt payable in gold amounting to $157,000,000. We have no gold, and where are they now going to get it? We may get it by selling the lands to people who bring gold with them, and as I have said the money thus realized should be set apart for payment of the debt and for the construction of the Pacific Railway, and for all other purposes we should not go beyond what we ourselves can pay. In this way we could convert a large share of the debt into a debt due to our own people. It will be held that there is no difference whether we owe the money to other countries or to our own people; but it is much more desirable to pay a debt within ourselves and give employment to our labor than to send our money to foreign countries, as has been done. Look at the condition of things at the present moment. This country is paying $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 in interest to foreign countries; it goes out every year and is lost to our people and that might have been avoided by a different mode of carrying on the public business. We are rich enough to hold the debt ourselves. It may be asked, is this impracticable? What has been done in the past may be done again. The Americans floated a loan among themselves of $476,000,000 to carry on a war, to destroy life, to waste property and to make a large portion of the country a wilderness. Out of that sum $346,000,000 is still in circulation. On that amount the country never had a cent of interest to pay. These notes were always at par with the bonds of the country which bore interest. If the American people could loan their Government $470,000,000, or, taking the population of the Northern States, about $15 per head in three or four years, the people of Canada can surely loan a sum of money sufficient to carry on the public works of the country and keep the interest within the country, if the Government had only courage enough, and if Parliament will only give them power, to adopt this system of carrying on the business of the country. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) says that $470,000,000 of paper currency were so discounted as to be only equal to $120,000,000, but he will remember that they only paid their soldiers $14 a month, and they could not have paid them much less than that in any case. But admitting that it was true that this amount of money was only worth $120,000,000 of gold, their bonds were equally depreciated and if they issued $470,000,000 they had the twenty years since the war discontinued to pay them. They would have paid twice that sum in interest, but they never paid a cent of interest on greenbacks which were issued and which have been in circulation since that time. Under this system the power of the people in this country to construct public works could only be limited in one way, and that would be until so much of their surplus production was invested in public works that they would not have enough to pay for the necessities of life which they could not produce. There will be no limit in this way, because the money invested would be given to the people, would circulate amongst them, would give employment to labor, would create more wealth, which would enable them to do more business to advance the interests and develop the resources of the country. There is no doubt that the American manufacturers started into business immediately after the war when there was abundance of money and men felt disposed to go into all sorts of enterprises. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that they started too many manufactures and that hence there was an over-production and ruin. But ruin was not caused by over-production, but by contraction of the currency in the United States as any hon. gentleman will see who takes the pains to trace the history of that depression. It was not over-production, but the fact that the consuming power of the people was stopped. They could not earn the wages they had formerly earned and they were thrown out of employment. But why were they thrown out of employment? It was because the currency was contracted and money was so high, that they could not use it in their business. Again, why is it that we who have more wealth in this country than England, have, however, to go to England to borrow money? Do not all our fertile lands, our forests, our minerals, constitute wealth? In only two respects is England more wealthy than we are. She has more labor, and consequently more labor realized. But we have the labor and we have the wealth. Were we only to utilize that wealth so as to enable us to use it within ourselves, we might, instead of borrowing money in England, use our own money and develop our own resources. Money itself can do no good; it must be labor which creates. Now what is the difference between the labor employed with the gold dollar, and the labor employed with the paper dollar? Would not a paper dollar earn that labor? Is it not as much a representative of the labor that earned it as the gold dollar is the representative of the labor that earned it? Would not one be as useful as the other for the purposes for which a man requires money? I hold that it would, and I say it is humiliating to see our hon. Finance Minister running to England to borrow money when we are more wealthy than the people of England. I say it is humiliating to see the hon. Finance Minister of this country going, hat in hand, to the Shylocks of Lombard street to beg a few millions to carry on the public works of this country. I say it is a degradation to any Canadian to hear their hon. Finance Minister saying that he had to show the silver side of the shield in order to get the financiers of Great Britain to lend him their money. What was that but getting money under false pretences? Has it come to this, that the people of Canada have to play the part of swindlers, as the late hon. Finance Minister said they had, in order to borrow money in England? I ask hon. gentlemen on both sides, not to think of the imperfect way to which I have been able to bring these propositions before them, but to throw aside their partizanship and do what they believe to be best in the interests of the country; and although this scheme may not be the best, let them see if there may not be evolved out of it something which may be for the benefit of the country. I believe there can. I believe it is wrong to compel the people of this country to borrow money and pay interest which can be avoided; and therefore I beseech hon. gentlemen, calmly and dispassionately to look at this question and see if they cannot devise some better plan of raising money than the one now adopted.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. mover of this resolution spoke at the close of his remarks of the imperfect manner, as he was pleased to say, in which he had presented his case. Now, it is perhaps doubtful if there is any other gentleman in the Dominion of Canada who has given this subject more consideration, who understands the subject better, or who could present it in a more forcible manner than the hon. gentleman himself. But Sir, notwithstanding that, I for one, am so obtuse that I have not been able to accept my hon. friend's proposition, nor am I prepared to say that I can give him my vote for it. The hon. member, in advocating it, makes use of this language: "Why borrow and pay interest for money when you can make it?" Now, that is a taking proposition; if we can make money for all the purposes for which we require it, by simply the authority of Parliament, it is a very cheap way of paying our debts and building our public works; but my hon. friend, in order to give a value and a currency to this very paper to which he refers, provides that we shall have to pay an interest on it practically, because he says that any person in Canada, holding $100 or $1,000 or $100,000 could go to the Government and obtain a 4 per cent. security for it—or a 5 per cent. security under certain circumstances, for which he could pay for Dominion Lands. Now, what is the practical effect of this? I admit that this proposition would give to the money a value that it would not possess under the ordinary proposition in favor of an irredeemable currency; but if my hon. friend were to succeed in obtaining an issue of $15,000,000 to pay for the public works for which Parliament will vote the supplies this Session, this paper would return to the Government, and we would have to pay 4 or 5 per cent. on it. Now, at present we do not require as much as this, and we get all the money we need from the working people of the Dominion to-day at 4 per cent.; and if we had to take this paper money and use it for public works, we would have to say to the industrial classes everywhere, whose money we are now receiving: "We cannot receive it from you at all, unless you buy 4 or 5 per cent. securities for it." We would be at the expense of printing the notes, besides having to pay 4 or 5 per cent. instead of 4 per cent. Supposing we paid to contractors and others $15,000,000 in these notes, in the first place would they take them—would they be bound to take them under their contract?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Pass a law to make them take them.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Suppose the law made them take them, and suppose they went to pay them into a bank from which they had obtained advances to enable them to carry on their work, and the banks would say: "We will take these at 20 per cent. discount."

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Make the banks take them also.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. You can do a good many things by law; but if a man wanted to pay these notes into a bank, and he found that he could not convert them into gold except at a discount, the result would be that, if he had to accept a discount of 10 or 20 per cent., he would come back to the Government and say: "You must pay us for what we lost on this circulation." It is quite clear that we could not issue circulation for any large amount, as is proposed by this resolution, to pay for public works chargeable to capital. We could not put into circulation, this year, $15,000,000 of this irredeemable paper without depreciating its value. The discount might be large or small, but still it would be a discount, and every man, woman and child, for every dollar we gave them of it, would only receive 90 cents, or whatever the discount would be, and would lose the balance. My hon. friend makes some provision against loss by saying that if the banks would not take these notes the Government would have to take them in payment of Excise and Customs duties; but when the Government wanted exchange to send to England in payment of interest, I doubt if we could get it for anything like what we can at present. The hon. gentleman's proposition that the proceeds from the sale of lands in the North-West shall be taken and used for the redemption of debt and the construction of public works, I am entirely in accord with. I may say that the Government have decided that the money we shall receive during the present year shall be so used, either for the redemption of debt or the construction of the Pacific Railway. Although the hon. gentleman has given a value to his notes by providing that they could be exchanged for 4 or 5 per cent. securities, that would not prevent them from depreciating.

Mr. McDougall. Would the interest be paid in the same note, or in other money?

Sir Leonard Tilley. There would be some little saving in that, but that would not make much difference, because if we paid the interest in them, we would have to take them for Customs and Excise duties. Under the circumstances, whenever the vote is taken, I cannot promise to support the proposition of my hon. friend, although the latter part of the motion is important and I am entirely at one with him on it. But on the circulation of notes, I will not be able to support him.

Mr. Charlton. There can be no doubt the member for South Norfolk deserves respect for the earnestness and honesty with which he advocates his views, but I cannot but regard them as radically wrong, and in the highest degree dangerous. He informs us that the truest money is paper, because it has the least value; and that the less value money has, the more properly it fulfils the functions of money. We have had several experiments in history with that money. Several nations have used money perfectly worthless, and in every case it has been found quite the reverse of good. Money of that character has invariably involved the nation in serious difficulties, and in almost every case in bankruptcies and ruin. The hon. gentleman tells us, that if a man has gold, he can take it to any part of the world and that is not true money; that we want a money kept at home and that will not circulate abroad—that cannot be exported. Well, there are various articles that cannot be exported that we do not consider of value. We cannot export rotten eggs, spoiled bacon, or anything worthless; and it is simply for the reason that paper money is valueless that it cannot be exported. Gold, on the contrary, is an article worth its nominal value in any part of the world; consequently it can be exported. But it is an article which, he informs us, is not money in his estimation. Then he tells us we ought to have a money that we can expand. Under our bank system, we can expand our money; the banks are always ready to extend the circulation, and the amount of circulation they can secure is actually in proportion to the demand for money. Scarce money creates usury, he says. Now, it is a singular fact attendant upon the issue of irredeemable and worthless money, that the rates of interest are always high. In the United States, during the greenback period, interest in New York ranged from 13 to 18 per cent. per annum. It is because the lender of money has an article that he is certain will return to his hands depreciated, that he requires a very high rate of interest, not only to afford legitimate rate of interest, but to cover the supposed depreciation between the time he lends and receives back that money. Consequently, it is a feature of depreciated money in all cases, that the rates of interest are extremely high. There is no country in the world that the rates of interest are lower than in England, which has the most stable currency, based in gold and the smallest amounts of money current in proportion to its business. Besides, the effect of paper money on labor is uniformly disastrous. When money begins to depreciate, it is always found that the price of food rises more rapidly than the price of labor. In the United States, while such articles of necessity, used by the laboring classes, advanced 100 per cent. in value, the advance in the price of labor was only a trifle over 50 per cent. The same state of things existed when the people of the United States attempted to return to specie payments—the fall in the price of labor was uniformly more rapid than the fall in the necessities of life—so in both cases labor was the principal sufferer. The hon. gentleman tells us also that a fluctuating money creates scarcity and is bad. At different seasons and in different years the demand for money varies. In the fall when the crop has to be moved a larger amount, of course, is required than in spring, when there is no unusual demand; and the most commendable feature of the present feature is that when money is not required it is drawn into the bank. When it is required it goes into circulation, and the amount in circulation conforms to the want of the public. When money is not redeemable it has to be kept afloat, and various serious evils result. The hon. gentleman seems to mean that he could create a state of things when we should have a perfect Utopia for the impecunious, for the improvident and the shiftless, when but little interest would be exacted. I think he is much mistaken; the experience of the world shows the exact reverse of the case. He tells us we have gold to pay our public debt with. What does he propose to do with that debt, exceeding $157,000,000. It is contracted on the condition that it shall be paid in gold or its equivalent? Does he propose we should repudiate that debt, when he succeeds in getting the country to adopt his theories; or how does he propose to dispose of it? He then proceeds to tell us that the American notes were always on a par with bonds. He is entirely mistaken. The American bonds almost immediately after the close of the war were at a premium, which have advanced since. These bonds were payable in gold, however. The notes issued by the Government were not received in Customs dues, which were payable in gold, and for that reason as soon as it became apparent that there was a prospect of the Government ultimately redeeming their bonds, they at once advanced beyond their par value in the currency. They are above the value of gold to-day, and have been above the par value of American notes ever since 1865. He also tells us that ruin in the United States was caused by the contraction of the currency. I will not deny that when attention was turned upon those notes, upon the vicious course in fiscal matters pursued by the Government, when the people considered the large amount of irredeemable currency, that when the time came for the Government to retrace its steps that the process was discovered to be an injurious and painful one. There will, in the course of the getting rid of the irredeemable currency and arriving at a specie basis, be some difficulty in the way, of course. That difficulty was experienced in the United States, but the fact that depression in the United States continued for five years up to the very moment that they resumed specie payment, 1st January, 1879, and from that moment a tide of prosperity set in that has continued to the present day, is conclusive evidence, in my opinion, that a currency basis of gold is a proper currency for a country. I do not intend to detain the House with this question at any length. I rose for the purpose of presenting a few plain facts that would set at rest forever in the mind of any intelligent man, all fine specie theories, such as those propounded by the hon. member for North Norfolk. The world has had a good deal of experience in this matter. It extends back many ages, and has uniformly been diametrically opposite to the theory of my hon. friend. As long ago as the ninth century Cluna anticipated my hon. friend by issuing fiat money and secured its circulation by making the penalty death to refuse it. Yet the fiat money, after entailing loss and ruin upon the country, finally passed away. The American Colonies, also thinking that they were wise above their day and generation, tried the same policy, and suffered serious distress in consequence of issuing money of this character. When the thirteen colonies revolted, they issued a large amount of "continental" money. That money fulfilled to the letter the requirements of my hon. friend. It being an abundant and a worthless money, some $250,000,000 of it were floated, and it was finally got rid of by repudiation and bankruptcy—three thousand dollars being purchasable before it passed finally out of circulation for one dollar specie. The French Republic also failing to profit by the experience of the George Law scheme, tried the same plan of issuing abundant money. It was issued to the extent of many billions of francs, and it is the testimony of history that the result entailed more disaster, more hardship upon that country than all the horrors of the revolution and all the wars that followed the revolution. That is the testimony of history, of every public man in France; and the experience that France has had in this matter was so salutary, that I venture to say ages will pass before that country will ever make a similar attempt. England, under the press of circumstances, was obliged to suspend specie payment, and England is one of the very few cases where a nation which once embarked on that principle returned to specie payment without going by the road of bankruptcy and ruin. At a great sacrifice she returned to specie payment, and her struggles lasted until specie payment was resumed. The Confederate States of America issued a currency almost exactly conformable to the requirements of my hon. friend. It was not redeemable. They did not profess it to be redeemable until after they achieved their independence. That currency was worth only three cents on the dollar, and finally was obliterated by bankruptcy and disaster. The United States issued greenbacks, and it is the testimony of men conversant with the subject that had the United States, at the time it required $275 in greenbacks to purchase $1.00 in silver, had a further issue been made the result would have been the utter prostration of credit, the utter ruin of the United States, and their inability to suppress the rebellion. They had the wisdom to refrain from a further issue, to decree that no further issue would be made and that the Government would resume specie payment at the earliest possible date. This declaration inspired a degree of confidence sufficient to carry the nation through its great crisis. At the present day we are able to point within a reasonable period to the fact that England, having tried the currency system, returned to the specie payment; that the United States having tried it also, returned to specie payment; that the Kingdom of Italy, after having tried an irredeemable currency for many years, is taking steps to return to specie payment, and will speedily do so. I repeat that the lessons taught us by history point uniformly to the fact that the adoption of this principle advocated by the hon. gentleman for South Norfolk has in every instance entailed great loss, and in the majority of instances bankruptcy and utter ruin upon the nation that adopted it. The greenback party in the United States has almost ceased to be a party. It has passed away before the stern and logic effects which have demonstrated that the theory is entirely wrong. I hope the day will be far distant when any but a few theorists will ever entertain any views such as those propounded by the hon. member for South Norfolk to-night.

Mr. McCALLUM. I may not go the length that the hon. member for South Norfolk goes, but I go this far: I hold that the Government should issue all bills for this reason, that a dollar would be good in all portions of the Dominion. I hold further that if the Government should issue all the money, and if the Government made currency in notes and bonds drawing 4 per cent. interest, the interest being payable in gold, semi-annually, and have the one convertible into the other at the option of the holder, it would give cheap money to this country, and cheap money is very desirable in the interests of the people. The hon. Minister of Finance says we can borrow all the money we want from our people at 4 per cent.; that is something new to me, and I hope hereafter we shall not go to England for any more money. If the Government had the issuing of all the money, whether notes or bonds, the one convertible into the other at the option of the holder, that money would keep up to par. Supposing we issued to the extent of $80,000,000, $10,000,000 bonds and $40,000,000 notes, that $80,000,000 would cost the people but 2 per cent. If the one was convertible into the other, at the option of the holder—if money become as dear as 6 or 7 per cent. in the country, a man holding bonds would get them converted into paper money and obtain the benefit of this increase of interest. When that money would go into circulation it would lower the rate of interest down to 5 per cent. If the value of interest fell below 5 per cent. a man would rather have Government security, and the money would come back for bonds, and these changes would take place according to the law of supply and demand. It would keep money cheap, and cheap money is very necessary because capital and labor jointly produce wealth, and whenever capital gets more than a fair share of course labor must suffer. I was surprised to-night to hear the hon. member for North Norfolk abusing the American greenback. Well, he must admit that the people of the United States tried to borrow money from the capitalists of New York, and all the money they could borrow amongst their own people was something like $20,000,000, for which they had to pay 10 or 14 per cent. Then they issued paper money and compelled people to take it. If our Government issued greenback money it would be for the purpose of paying public improvements, whereas the United States issued money to carry on their war. If we issued money it would come back here; certainly, the Government should take it for all debts due the Government. Of course it would not cost them anything but the printing; that is very little, and I say now that the Government of the country ought to use its credit in order to save the interest on the circulation. Then whatever is made in the circulation will belong to the people collectively and not to the banks as at present. The Government should not give the banks the power to issue money, but they should have kept that power in their own hands. The Minister of Finance says that the contractors would not take this money because it would depreciate and be below par. Now, I do not think that money issued by the Government of this country, backed by all the resources of the country, is going to depreciate. The Minister of Finance asks where we are going to get gold to pay our foreign indebtedness. Would you have any less gold than you have now if the Government were to issue paper money? You would not. How do you get gold now? By digging it out of the ground and by receiving it in exchange for our products. Now, if the Government issued paper money in order to save the interest on circulation, are we going to have less production in this country and less gold-mining out of the ground? I say no; but I say that we would have less use for it, and we would have the same facilities in making our exchanges with foreign countries. I believe if the Government of the country were to take the power for themselves it would be a good thing for this country. You may say it is a little too lute and that it ought to have been done before the bank charters were granted; but there is no harm in agitating this question and I think it will do good, and I think the time is coming when the Government will be called upon to take the issue of money into their own hands and make the profit on it for the benefit of the people.

Mr. HESSON. I rise to express my sympathy with the resolutions of the hon. member for South Norfolk. They may not be in a shape perfectly acceptable to the House and the country, but I think there is something in this proposition that would be in the interest of Canada. The hon. member for North Norfolk said a few minutes ago that the greenback issue had been an injury to the United States during their civil war. Sir, I hold that the greenback issue of that time by the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, saved the nation. Nothing else could have saved it but the issue of paper. It did depreciate for a time, owing to the gold brokers of the country. The necessities of the country required a very large issue just then, and the brokers naturally commenced to fix a value according to the gold basis; and it is no surprise to me, in looking back to that time, that the greenbacks should depreciate. I think the hon. member should not have instanced that as a case in point. The hon. member for South Norfolk does not propose to issue greenbacks to pay the national debt, to destroy trade and commerce by a war, but he proposes just the opposite of it. His purpose is to create wealth in the country by building up great arteries of commerce, railways and canals and other public works, and surely no purpose can be more directly opposed to the purpose designed by the United States Government. The wealth of the country does not consist in the gold and silver we possess, but it consists in our mines, our minerals, our forests, our lands and fisheries, and above all it consists in our labor. It takes all these to create wealth in the country. The greatest portion of the gold and silver in the country is held by the banks, and yet we find from the last returns that they held only $6,719,595. Sir, there is no gentleman in this House, and there is no intelligent man in the country, who will say to-day that that is a fair basis for the trade and commerce of this great country. We find that on the 31st of March last the paper circulation issued by the banks amounted to $32,124,142. Besides this liability they owe to depositors no less than $92,500,000, and they owe to the Government deposits of $5,726,118 payable on demand; they owe to the Government, payable on notice, $4,968,516; to the Provincial Governments, $2,444,082 of deposits; total deposits, including circulation, $144,619,988. Will the hon. gentleman say that $6,919,595 is a sufficient reserve and a fair proportion to hold against liabilities such as I have named, and I must confess they are liabilities in the true sense of the term. I refer to the deposits, and I will say nothing about paid-up stock and capital. On those two items alone we have an amount which would pay only five cents on the dollar, held in banks to-day in the shape of specie reserve. I know hon. gentlemen will say that the banks have large assets besides that sum. What are they? They are composed of promises to pay. Discounted notes amount to $129,165,593. I will ask any hon. member if that asset is equal to gold? If individual promises to pay are equal to Government promises to pay. It is a surprise to me that the hon. the Finance Minister has not affirmed that the notes issued by the Government are not better security than those issued by the banks; and I have proved from their own returns that the amount of specie in reserve is equivalent to not more than five cents on the dollar on all the liabilities of the banks, their deposits and circulation. I have another reason for supporting this resolution. I feel we have great public works to construct, and I know that unless the receipts from those sources on which the hon. Finance Minister is now depending, the Savings Banks deposits and the Post Office deposits, continue to come in to such an extent as will meet the expenditure there is but one other course to adopt, the Finance Minister again goes to England and borrows money. I will trouble the House for a few moments by reading a brief statement of the amount of interest this country has had to pay, not to our own population, not to circulate in Canada, but to go to foreigners and to increase their wealth. In 1867 we paid in interest, $4,851,710; in 1868, $4,974,279; in 1869, $5,188,641; in 1870, $5,355,614; in 1871, $5,371,082; in 1872, $5,435,599; in 1873, $5,549,374; in 1874, $6,122,844; in 1875, $6,340,056; in 1876, $6,753,171; in 1877, $7,132,408; in 1878, $7,100,038; in 1879, $7,281,018; in 1880, $7,625,065; in 1881, $7,703,735. The total debt in 1867 was $93,046,051. If hon. members will look at the figures and consider the rate of progress made from that time to this in the national expenditure, and remember that the interest has gone out of the country, it will no longer be a matter of surprise that the banks have such a small amount of gold in reserve. There is no hon. gentleman who will deny that the Government must meet this interest, and that it will be more prudent if the interest were paid to our own people instead of sending it abroad. Almost all the receipts rising from the labor of this great country have to be exported surplus, because after the products of the farm, the forest and the mine have gone to the Old Land, they have to be sold for gold to pay the foreigner interest, instead of being sent back here in gold. I hold we cannot have a gold basis under such circumstances, and if the Government do not alter this present arrangement in that respect and not allow the interest to continue as it has been, the increase in the last fifteen years averaging no less than $6,000,000 omitting fractions, a most alarming state of things will present itself; the Government has great works still to carry on, it has still to go abroad to increase our national indebtedness by borrowing, thereby increasing the interest we have to pay and exporting that back again to the Old Country in gold and silver, it is impossible we can ever reach that position in which we can reduce our foreign indebtedness. The issue of Dominion notes has not been as satisfactory, according to the hon. the Finance Minister, as he had a right to expect. I believe that any legal tender is redeemable if a Government will accept it and make it to be accepted by all parties. It is not necessary to have paper money that would be accepted for purposes of exportation; even if such were not the case, it might prove very beneficial in our own country. If I wanted to buy a sterling draft I would have to go to some bank or broker; I cannot export Bank of Montreal bills, but I must go and exchange them and pay the current rate. The Dominion notes, would occupy a better position because they would be employed all through the country. The dealers in cattle and farm products, fish, and other commodities, would gladly accept Dominion notes, and commercial men engaged in the exports of the products of the country would bring back here sterling bills or gold; and by that means the Government would be placed in a position to obtain what they required for the purpose of paying the foreign indebtedness, either the sinking fund or interest. Again, the Government requires an amount in the neighborhood of $26,000,000 a year for current expenses. The hon. Finance Minister says he will find it necessary during the present year to issue no less than $15,000,000 or obtain no less than that; he hopes to obtain that from the present deposits in the banks and borrowing further from the deposits. They require larger quantities of sterling exchange than any private individual possibly can require, and they can go into the market and get it on satisfactory terms. I think the Government will have no difficulty under such circumstances, especially with the energy which we possess, and also from the fact that we would not be creating a national debt and are to a large extent relieving ourselves of interest, and thereby placing ourselves in a better financial position than any country can hope to be placed in under other circumstances. Holding these views I feel that I am justified in supporting the resolution of my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace). I would go even further than he has suggested and would give the banks five or seven or ten years to redeem the circulation gradually. The banks have a paid-up capital of $59,702,637; their circulation is $32,524,142; their gold reserve is $6,719,595; their Dominion note reserve, and which they are compelled to hold by Act of Parliament is $9,598,431, making a total reserve of $16,318,026 lying idle to protect a circulation of $32,524,142, and beyond which they dare not issue without further locking up their capital by increasing the reserve required to be held under their charter. It will be seen then that the $32,524,142 circulating has to earn interest not only for itself but also for the reserve locked up and which they dare not circulate. Now, if their whole paid-up capital stock of $59,702,637 were in Government notes they would be at liberty to lend every dollar so long as they got good security, and thus a lower rate of interest would in the end prevail, possibly better for themselves, and most certainly for the borrowing public. No panic could be possible, nor would they be called upon to redeem these notes, or limit their loans as at present. On this basis I assume their own issue would be called in gradually and Government bills take their place. I say it is not in the interests of the people of this country that any private institution should have the advantage of issuing promises to pay to such an unlimited extent as the banks now possess that advantage. The Government as the representatives of the people should share in that advantage. Under the proposed plan the $32,000,000 required to do the business of the country would be paid out by the Government for labor. They would receive full value for it, it would circulate through the country in legal tender notes; and upon those notes there would not be a dollar of interest to pay. The laboring man and the mechanic or business man could go to the Government with his savings and say: "I will exchange the circulating medium for Dominion notes at 4 or 5 per cent," and it is only upon that that the hon. Finance Minister would be called upon to pay interest and that amount would be retained in the country instead of being exported as it is to-day. For these reasons and others I support the resolutions.

Mr. ROSS (Dundas). I think we should feel thankful to the hon. gentleman for the able manner in which he has placed his resolutions before the House. In my opinion they are a step in the right direction—they are in the direction of a measure which would meet with the hearty approval of the people. There is nothing that would be more popular with the people than a feeling that the Government are prepared to give them every opportunity to place their money at the disposal of the Government and receive for it a certain rate of interest, and this is a question which ought, it seems to me, to engage the earnest attention of the Government. We have great public works whose completion is necessary to the progress of this country, and we should, if possible, devise some means whereby to carry them on without going to foreign countries to borrow money. I do not believe it would be a popular movement for the Government to go to England to borrow fifteen or twenty millions to complete these great works, yet I believe the people will demand that these great works should be completed. It is well known that in the United States there are great railway monopolies, and we are getting the same thing in Canada, but we are in a position superior to that of the United States, because if we had our great water communications under way I defy the establishment of any great railway monopoly. I believe a scheme can be introduced by which these great public works may be proceeded with immediately and with rapidity, so that they may stand no longer in a half-finished state, in a state almost disgraceful, the two ends being finished while the middle is imperfect. It would be in the interests of the taxpayers to have these works completed, supposing there was not a toll collected on them, except sufficient to pay the cost of management; and it is not beyond possibility—it is within the reach of the Government—to devise a plan by which that work could be proceeded with at a rate and in a manner which would not be injurious to the financial condition of the country. Our national debt is a very large one, and we should be very careful of increasing it, and although the present may not be the best plan, still it is in the direction of a plan by which we could proceed with these works without exciting the people of this country with the idea that we are piling up a national debt which cannot be wiped out. With the great domain we have to sell and the other means we have at command by which money could be reproduced, there is no reason why money could not be put in circulation to wipe out this debt and to carry on our public works. I have no apprehension that our currency would be depreciated; I believe the people would be only too ready to make use of it. The only thing that stands in the way of the adoption of such a system is the great banking interests of the country, with which we seem afraid to interfere with. These banking people build beautiful and costly edifices; they become millionaires; they are almost above doing anything like work, but all their gains come out of the pockets of the people, and if our Government had the nerve to say to these people that the Government of the country would assume the circulation, the people would be the gainers. I do not intend to prolong the debate, but I think the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) deserves the thanks of the House and the country, for the earnest attention he has devoted to this subject, and I believe his resolutions are in the right direction. I hope he will live to see the day when the scheme he has initiated to-night will tell in his favor.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk). I cannot agree with the Finance Minister that it is necessary to make these notes convertible into bonds to make them current in this country. I think the fiat of the Government alone would be sufficient to do that. Let the Government create money and make it a legal tender, and every man will be glad to get it for the payment of debts. It is only for the payment of debt that money is of value, and it would not be a legal tender unless it had the fiat of the Government upon it. The hon. member for North Norfolk talks about fiat money. I would like him to tell me of any money that had not the fiat of the Government. Take a sovereign and melt it down and it would not be money, because it would cease to have the fiat of the Government on it; it would be value, but it would not be money. Then the hon. Finance Minister says these notes would return to the Government. I apprehend that many of them would be wanted for circulation. He says that this year we want $15,000,000. The difference between this year and 1878 in the circulation of the country is $16,000,000, and I do not believe there is a man in Canada who would say that we have too much circulation, or enough. What are the facts? To-day our circulation is equal to eight dollars a head of the population; that of the United States is twenty dollars, of England twenty nine dollars, of France forty-four dollars a head of the population. The hon. member for North Norfolk says the business of England is largely done in gold and silver. Why, Sir, I read that the business of the world—ninety transactions out of every hundred, are done upon credit. That hon. gentleman refers to the money of the United States Confederacy. Why, the Confederacy itself was swept out of existence; and the power of the Confederate money or of any money is only equal to the power that created it; when the nation ceased to exist, its money was of no value. It is true if its money was made of gold and silver, as a commodity of value, that would have value, but it would not be money. The hon. gentleman also refers to the assignats of France. They were promises to pay, and not money at all. But there was paper money in Venice, and for hundreds of years the paper money of that city was at par, and many times at a premium over gold, and they had to pass a law making it criminal to take a greater premium for it than 20 per cent. And the hon. gentleman cannot point to an instance in the world in which the paper money of a solvent country has depreciated. The promises to pay of a nation may depreciate, as those of an individual do. Look at the absurdity of a country or of a man promising to pay what they have not got. The Government of Canada are making promises to pay $100,000,000 with only $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 of gold to pay for it. The hon. Finance Minister asks where are we going to get gold to pay the public debt with? Well, I apprehend the only way is to sell our productions and get gold for them. As my hon. friend from Monck has said, would the paper money give us any less productions to sell, or bring any fewer people to this country to produce, than if there was no paper money? No; the increase of paper money would increase the employment of the people, and give us better facilities for getting gold than we have now. The hon. Finance Minister says that if we went to a bank and wanted to buy exchange on England, he apprehended that the bank would ask us a discount for exchange. If the balance of trade were against us exchange would be high, just as it is now. I do not believe there is a man in this Dominion who to-day would not rather have the money or the note of this Dominion than the note of any bank in it. I would like to know if the money issued by the Government of this country, backed by all the property of this country, is not better than any bank note backed by gold, when the gold is not there—as we have learned to our sorrow in many cases—in the case of the Bank of Upper Canada, the Commercial Bank, the Consolidated Bank, the Farmer's Bank and many others. Then my hon. friend says that paper money cannot be exported. To-day the American greenback is at a premium over gold in England because it is more easily transported to this country than gold. There is no trouble in exporting paper money. Supposing an English broker has a thousand dollars of Canadian money; he says: "That will buy so much wheat, so much butter, so many head of cattle, and these articles brought to this country, are worth so much, and therefore I will give that for it." As long as the country that issues the money is solvent, it has a value in every country with which that country trades, while gold might go to some country and never come back to us, our paper money would come back to pay for labor and to increase production in this country. The hon. member for North Norfolk says we have a system of money expansion now. Where is it? Bank notes are not money; they are promises to pay money; and all the money we have is the little quantity of gold, amounting to $6,000,000, which the hon. member for North Perth has mentioned. It is impossible to get gold enough to do the business of the world, and this is one of the causes, as I have said before, of the panics and disasters that accrue to business periodically. The hon. gentleman said this money was hard upon the laboring classes. I would like to ask him if there ever was a period in the history of the United States when the laboring classes were so well employed or had better times than during the abundant circulation of paper money. There was greater prosperity in that country at that time than there ever was before or has been since, and the decrease of the circulation was what caused misery and ruin in the country, and caused it to be filled with tramps a few years ago. And what to-day is making things better? It is the large amount of gold pouring into that country for the produce of the soil. The gold has given them an increased circulating medium to afford a stimulus to business. When England was in a state of ruin, with her trade paralyzed, what did her statesmen do? They suspended specie payments, and immediate relief was given to the depression. At another time they issued a large amount of Treasury notes which relieved the pressure of the people and increased their prosperity. You cannot show in the history of the world when money was abundant and labor not high, and the country prosperous; and, on the other hand, you cannot show you cannot give an instance of the scarcity of money unaccompanied by depression and ruin. My hon. friend opposite says the greenback party in the United States has past away. I think he is not a good observer of current events, because in 1876, when Peter Cooper ran for President, the greenback vote only amounted to 80,000. But last time, when General Weaver ran on that ticket he had nearly 500,000 votes—that does not show that the greenback vote has passed away; and the State of Maine elected a greenback Governor. But were it as stated, that would not alter the principle; because the Americans did not issue any money but promises to pay—a debased money that they would not take in payment of debts due them—but which they only made a legal tender as between individuals, and as to debts due by the Government to individuals. It could not be but expected that that money would depreciate under such circumstances. My hon. friend from South Perth has just given me a memorandum, which shows that in 1876 our national debt was $93,046,051, and since that period we have paid almost an equal amount in interest, namely, $92,791,690. The hon. the Finance Minister said he would not save anything in interest by my scheme. I believe, if a good paper currency was put in circulation, a large amount would be used by the people, and we should thus save the interest, which now goes to the banks as a profit on their circulation. Instead of having a bank circulation, we should have a Government circulation, thus saving that money to the people. In conclusion I must say that I spoke rather hastily to my hon. friend from Niagara, which I now regret; but I thought he was sneering at me. Perhaps I was over-sensitive and did him wrong, and therefore I apologize for it.

Mr. RYKERT. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. PLUMB. I accept the graceful apology of the member for South Norfolk. There could be no hostility or ill-feeling between two old friends like ourselves, who have stood side by side for years fighting the battles of the Conservative party. But I cannot agree with my hon. friend in those theories which he periodically puts before the House. I do not believe it is possible for any country to issue a paper currency, unless it is absolutely redeemable at par upon a gold standard and basis and to escape the disastrous consequences of its depreciation. I do not believe there is any power in any Government to stamp a piece of irredeemable paper and put it into circulation, and enable it to perform all the functions of gold, which is the recognized currency of the world, and to prevent its purchasing power from being reduced or lessened. That is the experience of the world everywhere. It is entirely beside the argument to talk about the product of labour or about the outlay of the Government upon public works which lead to the most dangerous temptations to spend easily created paper money. The truth is that every dollar expended by the Government, or by corporations or individuals, on public works, such as railways, canals, and the like, is so much money actually sunk, and the labor expended is absolutely, for the time being, unproductive, and unless these works pay returns upon the capital expended the money is absolutely lost. Labor, in the sense of producing that which will support the community, that which produces the necessaries of life. has a certain value, that labor put into railways or canals or anything of that kind is absolutely so much capital buried until the time comes, if it comes at all, when they yield returns. My hon. friend has uttered a fallacy, because he has made a general statement which is only true in one or two particulars, and has built an argument thereupon, and because he has not taken into consideration the fact that the world in general long ago, by common consent and necessity, adopted a certain measure of value. That measure is not theoretically perfect, but is the best we can get because it represents, as a general rule, the very lowest reward of labor in its production. It is said that all the gold of California, put together, only represented in the aggregate one dollar a day for the people engaged in mining it. Gold is chosen at a measure of value for several reasons: first, because it is indestructible; next, because it is ductile and easily divisible; and next, because it is everywhere diffused; next, because it contains great weight in a small bulk; and next, because it represents as nearly as possible the lowest reward of labor and is the scarcest of the generally diffused metals. No country can afford to depart from it as a measure of value, no country can make a standard of its own, no Government or country can issue a paper currency which is not redeemable in gold on demand, dollar for dollar, and by any enactment prevent it from fluctuating and declining in value. It can have no settled value unless it has some sort of absolutely permanent purchasing power, which is ascertainable by exchanging it for an equal sum in gold. There is no doubt that no device is so eminently calculated to defraud labor of its just reward as an irredeemable currency. The man who has to sell his day's labor each day in the market must accept what he can get for it, and take the risk of loss if he is paid in a currency which is not measured and fixed by a gold standard. The effect of depreciated paper fluctuating in purchasing power is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. Its evil effects fall upon those who by each day's labor gain each day's bread; and if at the end of the day they are compelled to take the paper dollar which will not bring more than 90 cents in gold they must bear the loss. I intend always to raise my voice against theories advocating an issue of practically irredeemable paper, which, though not nominally, must be really depreciated while it continues to be measured by the commonly accepted standard of the world. We have heard some very curious theories propounded about the difficulties we are under with respect to foreign debt. Why do we owe a foreign debt? Because we have not capital to loan at the same rate at which foreign capitalists are willing to lend. Our Finance Minister can borrow money at 4 per cent. in England; we in Canada cannot afford to lend it at that rate, we can make more profitable use of our money. To obtain money at that rate we must go to a country where there is a large amount of capital seeking investment. In a country like ours in prosperous times the demand for money for business purposes is too active to admit of low rates of interest. Such rates are an evidence of depression and stagnation. The late commercial disasters in England were accompanied and followed by a very low rate of interest. The first note of revival in trade was the increase in the rate of interest. I do not believe it is possible for the Government to issue paper money in any such way as my hon. friend earnestly proposes and keep it in circulation, at par with gold, even by the device urged by my hon. friend, of having it redeemable in 4 per cent. bonds. It would be absolutely a forced loan, if made a legal tender, and when he proposes to have the bonds paid in currency again he is simply reasoning in a vicious circle. I do not believe there is any possibility of that system being adopted in this country with the slightest degree of success. One can see the fallacy at once. If we want to lend money at 4 per cent. we can purchase the Government bonds at par. Look at the position of the Bank of Montreal. The transactions of that bank, from day to day and from year to year, are more than ten times as great as the whole financial transactions of the Canadian Treasury. It is their interest to keep in circulation just as much of their own bank notes payable on demand and redeemable in gold as the public will take. How much have they got in circulation? Five million dollars. That is the extent which, in these flourishing times, with the machinery which the Bank of Montreal has, beginning at Halifax and ending at Winnipeg, it can keep afloat. That suggests what the Government might do. The Government have a nominal circulation to-day of legal tenders to the amount of $14,000,000 or $15,000,000—at least three-fourths of that is in the vaults of the banks. If it is paid out to contractors and returned again, what machinery has the Government for re-issuing it and keeping it afloat? It must be redeemed, and if people do not want 4 per cent. bonds, what then? It is depreciated currency and the football of stock-jobbers, money-brokers and usury sharks, who fatten on the necessities of other men. I do not want to see any such system adopted here. There can be no objection to the Government making a moderate issue of paper based on a gold currency, redeemable absolutely in gold. The hon. member for North Perth seemed to think he was making a point when he said that the banks only held $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 in coin against their enormous liabilities. He did not take into account the fact that they had at least $18,000,000 or $20,000,000 which they could draw from their agencies in London. They had of Dominion notes, $9,800,000; specie, $6,719,000; at agencies, $22,234,000 more than enough in all to redeem their whole issues on demand, of which they had, on March 31, $32,000,000, and making with other assets $219,000,000, against total liabilities of $141,000,000. The hon. gentleman ought to know that it is impossible for the whole liabilities of banks to come in upon them at once. It is well understood by all bankers who live upon credit, deal upon credit and issue upon credit, about how far and how fast they will have to redeem their liabilities. If they are called upon to pay, the public will be called upon to pay them, for the public are in their debt, and their profit is made very largely, not in circulation, but in deposits which they hold. It would be exceedingly inconvenient if anything were done to affect the banks holding large amounts in deposit. If the people should withdraw such deposits or close up their banking capital, commercial lenders instead of going to banking institutions to make loans, would be compelled to make personal negotiations with individual lenders—a thing which would not be tolerable to the business men of any country. Nothing could be more injurious to Canada as a young and growing country, than to make a tilt against vested capital in the shape of our banking interests. There have been some instances of failures in those institutions, but the loss has fallen upon the shareholders and not upon the general public. I am not aware of any instance in which any except the shareholders have ever lost a shilling in the currency of Canada. The Bank of Upper Canada redeemed its notes, dollar for dollar; no man lost anything who chose to keep them. There has been no instance that I know of here where the issues have not been paid in full, but if there were any the loss would be paltry compared to that which would accrue to the people generally through a depreciated currency. The Northern States borrowed, upon their interest-bearing bonds, as long as they could sell them to carry on the war, until they ran up a debt of $2,200,000,000 or $2,300,000,000; finding they could borrow money no longer they made a forced loan on the people by compelling them to take legal tender notes which were issued to the amount of nearly $750,000,000. The public were compelled to receive them in payment of debts contracted upon a gold basis. The loss was almost incalculable in the payment of contracts previously made in a depreciated currency. There never was such a case known since the Mississippi scheme of John Law a hundred and fifty years ago, which ruined France. A legal tender or greenback dollar lost its purchasing power so largely, that compared with the gold standard it was worth only from 40 to 50 cents. I, myself, bought on one occasion, two thousand eight hundred dollars of greenbacks for one thousand dollars of gold, and the money I bought was legal tender for the payment of debts. The bonds that were issued for the war debt were bought up in immense sums by speculators. I know one case where a syndicate of Hamburg bankers bought $50,000,000 United States bonds bearing interest at the rate of seven and threethirds per cent. per year—the “seven-thirties,” as they were called, and they sold the gold with which they bought that enormous sum at a premium of 2-30, or, for each dollar in gold they paid for two dollars and thirty cents of bonds, so that in fact the United States received less than $22,000,000 for $50,000,000 of their bonds, which were redeemed at a premium afterwards in gold. But it is no argument at all, except against my hon. friend when he speaks of the United States. It is well known that no country has ever issued paper currency except under the greatest possible necessity, and I trust the time is far distant when we will be compelled to do the same thing. Russia, with all her power—a nation of 100,000,000 of people with vast resources, and, at that time, with unimpaired credit—issued only $400,000,000 of paper currency during the Crimean war, and yet the depreciation was nearly 40 per cent. During the twenty years that England was under the necessity, at the beginning of this century, of suspending specie payments, with all her great wealth, with the Government fiat, her currency, the legal tender notes of the Bank of England, suffered depreciation. So it always has been, and so it always will be. There can be no inflation of paper currency without disastrous consequences. My hon. friend seems to think that the mint stamp makes the value of the English sovereign, that the stamp makes the value of the American gold dollar. Why, I can tell my good friend that when a quantity of American coins are sent to England the first thing they do is to obliterate the stamp and recoin them. I can tell him, too, that gold in coin and bullion are precisely the same thing in value. The mint charge is less than one-tenth of one per cent. All the gold that goes into the mint in bars comes out again in coinage, with a very small percentage charged just enough to pay the expenses of the mint. It does not add to the value of the metal a single penny. You can pay your debts with a bar of gold and send it off to any foreign country just the same as if it had received the Government coinage. Gold and silver in enormous bars are simply weighed by the ounce, assayed and stamped with their weight, and held in the United States Treasury or in banks as bullion. All we have to do is to send them to the mint and, at a charge of one mill on the dollar, or less, have them turned into money. It is simply a quibble to say one is money and one is not money. The stamp does not make the money. No paper currency, unless it is promptly redeemable in coin, can perform the functions of coin. I did not intend to make such extended remarks on the subject, but I believe that a fallacy, which my hon. friend from South Norfolk has not been able to see, underlies the propositions which he urges so ingeniously, and I believe it is of the greatest importance that our currency should remain upon a sound basis, upon a basis of gold. Though it may be painful to differ with friends of my own while defending what I consider to be a sound system. I am impelled by a strong sense of duty to take issue with several of my hon. friends who have preceded me. I speak from a large range of personal experience, and because I have had occasion during that experience to study and examine those abstruse questions connected with systems of banking which are not easily understood by those who take a simply empirical view of the subject.

and which are less perfectly understood by those who have what is technically called the currency craze.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Before moving the adjournment I think it was understood that hon. members who were absent when the notices of motion were called before should have another opportunity of moving them now, provided no debate arises upon them.

Mr. KILLAM. Before six o'clock we were talking about moving a motion of which I had given notice and which was on the paper, and which we were talking about discussing at the time. The understanding was, I think, that at this stage of the proceedings I should have an opportunity of moving this motion and of discussing it at length.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. member will have an opportunity, because on Monday next his motion will stand fourth on the list and there will be no doubt of its being reached.

PRAYERS.

CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 36) respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. ROSS. Would the hon. gentleman give some information as to the qualification of the examiners? The Bill provides nothing as to their standing, though it is important that their standing should be sufficiently high to give general confidence in regard to the decision arrived at. We should have some guarantee as to the high standing of those examiners.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The intention of the Government is to appoint the best men we can find, and to make this measure a success. We wish the examination to be real and thorough, so that the certificates awarded may command the confidence both of the public and the Government.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Will the hon. gentleman provide in his Bill that a certain number of the examiners should be graduates of some University? In the Bill of Senator Pendleton of the United States, a penalty is proposed for any act of favoritism or any wrong conduct on the part of the examiners. There should be a penalty for any corrupt, partial or improper action on the part of Canadian examiners also. The Bill proposes no control over them, which I think a defect.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not believe in any penalty. The fact that the examiners will be men of good position and well qualified will be a guarantee of good conduct and efficient action in the discharge of their duties; and an additional guarantee will be the knowledge that the Governor in Council will have the right to remove them with a stigma attached to any misconduct. I do not think we should impose a penalty beyond a provision for their removal. Nor do I think that we should require graduates of a University; for though I have great faith in Universities and High Schools, I have known many who were not graduates, who were a credit to society, and learned men, every way able to compete with such graduates. I think the House should leave the matter in the hands of the Executive to select the best men.

Mr. BLAKE. I regret having been misled by the Ministerial statement as to what measure would be taken to-day. I have, therefore, not prepared myself by the study of certain papers and memoranda requisite to the satisfactory discussion of this measure. But the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill has made an observation which calls for some remark from my point of view. He stated the securities for the efficiency of those examiners and the high standing of the supposed nominees, and the circumstance that, at the pleasure of the Government, the examiners were susceptible of removal, would, he thought, afford a guarantee of the proper performance of the duty. Of course, the nominations should be in the hands of the Executive. The appointments to office is a responsibility which can be best discharged in that way; but as to the tenure of office, that is one of the difficulties of the measure. My opinion is, that the efficiency of this Bill and of those examiners, limited though their scope is to be, would be largely reduced by the circumstance that the persons are to hold office during the pleasure of the Government. I think, with the report of the Commissioners, that the officers ought to form an independent board. I think the tenure should be far superior to the pleasure of the Government. We know the difficulties by which they will be surrounded, and that their probable functions will be to examine persons who will be in fact, though not in form, designated for appointments, and to whom, through the influence of political supporters, the Government will be to a certain extent committed; and we know that if they did not accede to the wishes of those political supporters it would be a very great disappointment to those candidates who should be found unqualified. Under these circumstances, if you appoint examiners removable at the pleasure of the Government only, you run the risk of partial decisions in the passing of candidates known to be supported by friends of the Government, and in whose success the Government has an interest.

Mr. ROSS. I see that, in clause 3, we are to form regulations for the guidance of the Board of Examiners.

On clause 5,

Mr. BLAKE. This section appears to me to be out of order. It proposes a money payment, and it will be necessary that a resolution be introduced.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The clause can be allowed to stand and a resolution introduced later.

On clause 6,

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It would be of service to the public if an absolute time were fixed for the examinations once or twice a year.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That would be determined by the regulations enacted in clause four;

Mr. BLAKE. Is it intended that the Board of Examiners shall not examine a' all, but that all examinations shall be conducted by others.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Board cannot make all the examinations. They will conduct them within a certain radius; beyond that sub-examiners will be selected for the purpose.

Mr. ROSS. I understood that those who were to be employed at the different points named, were merely to superintend the writing of the papers, prescribed by the examiners, but that the examiners themselves should read the papers, as is the system followed in the High Schools of Ontario and the University of London, England. The hon. Minister will weaken the value of the examinations if he allows the sub-examiners to do this important work. In the first place, you appoint a Board, and that Board appoints sub-examiners, charged with similar responsibility. It is a case of a delegate appointing a delegate.

Mr. BLAKE. In connection with my hon. friend's remarks, will the hon. Minister explain, because the Bill does not explain, whether it is intended that the examinations should be in writing.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That will be determined by the rules and regulations adopted afterwards. No doubt the best mode will be adopted. As I said, it is impossible for these examiners to be at all those places, therefore they must have the assistance of sub-examiners in the different localities. The papers in the written examination will necessarily have to be sent to the Board to be adjudged by them, but there may be certain oral examinations in which case the result must be communicated to the Board by the assistant examiners.

Mr. ROSS. We must ask the hon. Minister to allow us to amend the Bill, so that it will state distinctly that the examinations shall be in writing. We have no examination in connection with our Ontario High Schools that are oral.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Some may require to be oral. The hon. gentleman must suppose that those entrusted with carrying into force this Bill, when it becomes law, will take care that the best mode will be selected in order that justice may be done to all. As a general rule these examinations will have to be made in writing, and in this case the Board will have to decide on the papers submitted.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it intended there shall be more than one assistant at each point?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is not decided. In the beginning it will be a trial, and experience will tell whether we should have one or two; but I suppose two will be required. The number will be limited as much as possible, consistent with efficiency.

Mr. BLAKE. Speaking from the experience of the Province of Ontario, which is not based upon pecuniary considerations, but on those of older and more advanced countries in educational matters, it is utterly impossible to establish any uniform standard through the medium of different examiners at different points by an oral examination. Now, as to deciding with reference to the competitors themselves. Where you have more than one to be examined, and where you have an oral examination, you must, of course, unless you are going to ask different questions of each one, call them into a room one after another, you cannot have them in the room together while the oral examination is going on. If you decide that these questions may be asked by different persons who may ask different questions, you practically apply a different standard to the candidates. Then, as to the replies, it is obvious that so far as the examination is oral we must take as official the report of the local examiners. You expect them to write down questions, but you cannot expect them to write down answers for report, that would be an utterly impossible thing, unless it was only one man that was going to be examined briefly. So it seems to me practically that the making of the measure, so far as it is designed to afford one test of competency for all persons who are candidates for admission to any particular branch of the Civil Service, will wholly fail unless it is based on this fundamental principle, that the examination is to be a written one, and that those who conduct these examinations, in the various localities are those who were recipients of papers sent to them by the Board of Examiners to be submitted with due precaution as to their previous divulgence to the parties to be examined, to be present while the answers are being recorded and to transmit them to the main Board. If you incorporate the element of oral examination, you will incorporate an element of complete uncertainty into the case. Though I admit that an oral examination is of some importance, yet I am satisfied that the basis of it must be in writing, or it will be one mass of uncertainty and dissatisfaction.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is right that the examination as a rule must be in writing, but he will see that in certain cases and for certain offices there must be an oral examination; for example, suppose a young man comes forward to be examined for the post of messenger. One of his qualifications should be an ability to speak both languages; of course, his examination on that point must be oral. Then he must be required to know a little arithmetic and other primary branches of that kind, as well as to write a fair hand, and in these particulars I admit that the examination must be in writing.

Mr. ROSS. I called the attention of the hon. Minister a little while ago to the necessity of securing a high standard on the part of the examiners, and I referred to the propriety of annexing a penalty to any malfeasance on their part. Now, these examiners may appoint assistants and these assistants may have the papers in their custody. They may dispose of them or allow them to be used by the candidates at an examination. But what precaution is he going to give to the next candidate that these assistants had not furnished other candidates surreptitiously with some of these papers? Is he going to provide that the assistant is to be of such high character as to be beyond any conduct of this kind, or is he going to annex some penalty to the misconduct of an assistant, so that we will have a reasonable guarantee of honesty in the conduct of these examinations?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would not attach a penalty, but would leave it as it is. The best guarantee will be the honor of the man himself. Confidence is reposed in clerks in commercial houses or in public offices, and a certain amount of confidence must necessarily be reposed in men in the position the hon. gentleman has referred to.

Mr. ROSS. You take a guarantee bond from these clerks?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, not from public officers; and they deal with much more important matters. Nevertheless, you rely on their honesty, and as a rule they discharge their duty honorably. We must not suppose that these officers so selected, men of position who have to examine several young men as candidates, will tamper with the answers given by the candidates to the great injustice of some of these young men. I admit that it is possible, but I do not think we had better attach penalties yet. It will be time enough to deal with the evil when it manifests itself. While I am on the subject of dismissals I may say that this Board of Examiners will be in the same position as all other Boards that are appointed by the Government. For example, there is the Board of Dominion Arbitrators, and they are appointed and are subject to dismissal for cause.

Mr. ROSS. Are they not sworn?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They may be sworn, but I rely more on a man's honor than upon his oath. If he is dishonorable he makes his oath as well. We must suppose that these men will be selected for their education and general high reputation and competency for their duties.

Mr. ROSS. I think the hon. gentleman's line of argument is hardly logical. I think he was Postmaster-General at one time, and took security from every postmaster in the Dominion for the faithful fulfilment of his duties. Why not in that case trust to the honor of the official? Why does not the Minister of Customs trust to the honor of his officials? Why do not the managers of banks trust to the honor of their clerks? I think for almost every responsible clerk there is either an official guarantee at the back of it, or else there is some obligation over and above the mere appointment to the office. I think the hon. gentleman is allowing this matter to be initiated in a very loose way. Unless better precautions are taken, the result of the first or second year's experience will be to vitiate the whole Bill, to disappoint the public, and we will have no security at all that the best man will get appointed. The whole system of competitive examinations will be of no value whatever, unless these precautions are carried out. I simply warn the hon. the Minister of Public Works that he is proceeding with all those dangers before him. We know in Ontario how many attempts have been made among the very honorable and respectable professions, to which I had the honor to belong myself, to obtain possession of examination papers in order that young men might receive certificates as Public School teachers. I think there is perhaps as much honor amongst that as any other profession. We know the attempt made in the Law Society to get possession of examination papers, and that at McGill College some of the young men got possession of the papers. If there is any collusion between the examiners and the candidates the whole examination is of no value, and there is no guarantee of the candidate's fitness. As we have an interest on this side of the House, as well as hon. gentlemen opposite, in seeing the service filled with competent men, and young men who wish to obtain a certificate honestly, we have also an interest in seeing that those not qualified do not obtain certificates. In the experience of this, as of all other countries, the safest course is the best course, and the same security against misconduct on the part of appointees is desirable in the interests of the public service; and the Bill which the hon. gentleman seems so anxious should be adopted, is one, although defective in many respects, which may conduce to the improvement of the Civil Service of the country. In Ontario school examinations we have another protection. The persons appointed to conduct the examinations are always teachers whose standing as such would be sacrificed if they were found guilty of any misconduct, and the Minister of Education has already cashiered one or two persons. Although that is a more powerful lever than any financial obligation could be, some irregularities have occurred.

Mr. BOWELL. There will be the same protection under this law in regard to the dismissal of any of the appointees in cases of irregularity. No doubt the hon. gentleman's experience in school matters has taught him the truth of the remarks; indeed, in many cases school teachers will attempt to bribe examiners, and it was thought that by amending the mode of examination and by appointing special inspectors instead of county inspectors, the difficulty would be obviated. In various High Schools I am aware, as I was one of the Board for thirteen or fourteen years, that attempts were made to obtain possession of the papers; but I never found that any member of the Board whose duty it was to defend the interests of the honest teacher, ever lent himself to an act of that kind. It seems to me, under this law, that if any examiners were guilty of any impropriety, the power resting in the hands of the Government would be a sufficient guarantee of the public interest, and no penalty, except a penal one, would be more effective.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Would the hon. Minister add the words, "the examinations as far as practicable shall be in writing?"

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I accept the amendment.

Mr. CASEY. No doubt it is the intention that the examination for the same class of appointment shall be uniform throughout the Dominion. If that is the case it should be stated in the clause.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The rules and regulations will be made by the Governor General in Council, and they will be framed with due regard to uniformity. There is no doubt these will be laid before Parliament at the proper time.

On clause 7,

Mr. BLAKE. Is it the intention that no promotion of any person at present in the service shall take place until after he passes the probationary examination prescribed by the Bill.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Bill applies to appointments which are to be made hereafter, and the hon. gentleman will see, by the subsequent clause, that his objection cannot apply.

Mr. CASEY. I understood it was the intention to confine the first appointments to the lowest grade in each Department, except under special circumstances. The Bill provides, as it must provide, for special cases of appointment to any grade in the discretion of the Governor General in Council. No doubt, cases might arise where it would be absolutely necessary to place some outsider in a high place in the service. I think that where you are laying down a general rule as in this section, it should be provided that all appointments should be made to the lowest grade in the Department.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That would not do. If a vacancy occurs in a first or second class office, and if the Head of the Department feels that there is no one in his Department that really can fill that office, you could not take one from a low office and put him in the vacant office just because he happens to be in the Department. You would have to look at the list of those who have passed the examinations, and ascertain if one of them is fit to fill the office, and then he could be appointed by the Governor General. It might be that the vacant office required a man of special qualifications, and in that case the Head of the Department would endeavor to find the man best qualified among those who have passed the examinations.

Mr. CASEY. Of course, there must be exceptions to every rule, but these exceptions are, as I understand, provided for in the body of the Bill further on. As the Bill stands the Governor in Council is in fact authorized to break all the general rules whenever it is considered that there may be special necessity for breaking them, and in this I quite agree. But this section is laying down a general rule as to first appointments, and I think the general rule should be here as it is in England and everywhere else, and as I conceive it was the intention of the Government to make it, that the first appointments should be made to the lowest grades of the service, and the upper grades filled afterwards by promotion. I hope I am not mistaken in supposing that that was the intention of the Government.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, you were not.

Mr. CASEY. It is a most important point, and one which will have a great deal to do with the efficiency of the officers who are in the service, that they know that they have a right prima facie to be promoted to the upper grades unless there are special circumstances which make it impossible to promote them. The hon. gentleman says that he would go back to the first list, but he would not be likely to get a better qualified man there, because in filling the lower offices in the first place he is supposed to have taken the very best men available.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. You take the best men on the list for a class for which you have a vacancy to fill; but if the vacancy to be filled, of the second or first-class, or if it requires special qualifications, then you would not go to the lowest grade, but you can take from that portion of the list which gives you the names of parties qualified specially for that particular office.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, of course, if special qualifications are required, as in the case, say of surveyors, but I am speaking of the ordinary run of officers in the Department. The rule, I think, should be and was, I believe, intended to be, that when a vacancy for a first-class clerk occurred the first choice should be amongst the second-class clerks, the second choice amongst the third, and last of all that you should have recourse to an outsider.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If there is a vacancy in the third class we look at the list and choose from amongst those who passed the examination for a third-class office. Nothing, of course, would prevent the Government from taking from the second list to fill a third-class office if they first thought the officer would be one that should pass through the third in order afterwards to be promoted, thereby preparing him for the higher grade, but the rule should be to take from the third-class list candidates to fill vacancies occurring in the third class in the Departments.

Mr. CASEY. That appears to be a new idea altogether, and it is not the one which we understood was the principle of the Bill. Does the hon. gentleman intend to have different examinations for the different grades?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is provided for further on as the hon. gentleman will see.

Mr. CASEY. I have not found it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is there.

Mr. CASEY. No, it only provides for one examination for men seeking to enter the service of this instance. There is no provision for first, second, or third-class primary examinations. The Bill provides that there shall be a preliminary examination for all men wishing to enter the service, that all applying for places shall be compelled to pass it, but out of that list there shall be chosen men to fill the office. If it is the intention of the Government to have a separate class of examinations, that is a totally new complication in the provisions of the Bill. There is no doubt that no system of reform is a reform at all unless it provides for a regular system of promotion from the lower grades upwards, except in any case where it is absolutely necessary to take an outsider, because there is no outsider competent for the office. What the service and the public have been complaining of all along is, that men were taken from outside and put over the heads of others who had acquired training and experience in the service. If the intention of the Bill is as the hon. gentleman has informed us, it is different from what the public have been led to expect, and it is a change which they will strongly and, I think, justly object to.

Mr. BLAKE. Though it is inconvenient to discuss the clauses of the Bill in anticipation, I certainly have understood the 29th clause to indicate that the examinations for admission were examinations for admission to the lowest grades. All that the clause says about anything more than that, is: "And to such other offices in the lower grades as may be determined by Order in Council." But, it would be giving an entirely different cast to the whole measure if it were understood to be the principle, that qualifying examinations were to be held for admission to the other grades. In that point of view I was assuming that the new admissions would be almost without exception to the lowest grades, for which, as I understood, the examinations were prescribed. I think it would be a most unfortunate thing, if the Head of a Department were to say: "If I find no one in the Department competent to be promoted to any office which falls vacant, I will look outside." I would give the same right to such promotion to any one in any other Department of the service, who may have passed the qualifying examination for a clerkship of that particular grade—I mean the same sort of right as any clerk in a Department has to promotion. In a word, I would make the prizes of the service open to the whole of the inside service; I would say to every third-class clerk in the service: "You have a chance to be considered for promotion to any one of the Departments, though first of all, those in the Department shall be considered to have the primary chance, but you will be considered before outsiders." That is the only change I have to suggest, in view of the general application of this clause. I understand its general application to be to make appointments to the first grade, and that it will only be in quite exceptional cases that appointments will be made to a higher class from outside. With regard to the clause providing that from eighteen to thirty-five shall be the limit of age, it seems to me that while it may be proper to permit appointments to higher grades in those exceptional cases in which you appoint from the outside, to range even as high as thirty-five years, yet it would be a great mistake to permit that range to be established as the rule. The whole system is based on getting men into the service very young, and though I think eighteen years is perhaps the right minimum, I think the maximum should not exceed twenty-two or twenty-five years. Your system is one with low salaries at the start, with an assurance of increment, which is very well for a young man of eighteen to begin with, but is not applicable to one who is somewhat advanced in life when he begins; therefore, while I would not object to appointments in the higher classes of persons of the age of thirty or thirty-five years, there can be no case in which the public service would be promoted by the appointment of a man nearly as old as thirty-five years to a third-class clerkship or messengership. I would say that you should begin young in all cases.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I agree with the hon. gentleman, and that is the intention. But if it is found necessary to appoint a person outside the service who is valuable for a certain position—it may be a second-class clerkship or a first-class clerkship—we must fix a limit, and therefore in that case we have said the candidate cannot be taken at a greater age than thirty-five years. But, as the hon. gentleman says, it is desirable that, in making appointments of messengers or first class clerks, we should take young men from eighteen to twenty-two to twenty-four years; they grow with the service, and we shall have the benefit of their experience for the higher offices. With regard to examinations, the hon. gentleman will see that the idea of the Bill is that they should be not only for third-class clerks. There could be no objection to a young man who had passed the third-class examination, also offering himself for the second-class, so that if at a future time a vacancy occurred for a second-class clerk, the Government might find one in the office fit to fill the position.

Mr. CASEY. I see the hon. gentleman has entirely abandoned the idea that I supposed he entertained of making a real reform in the service, by compelling people to enter at the bottom and work their way up. One of the crying evils in the service at present is that this is not done, and the same system is to be continued.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman misunderstands me. The object is that if there is a man already in the Department fit to fill the office of first-class clerk, he should be promoted from the second-class, or if there is one in the third-class, he should be promoted. If there is none in the Department, the hon. gentleman says that one in another Department might be selected, and should have the same chance as if he were in the first Department. I take it that the Governor in Council will have that power to take one from another Department; but in many cases, the effect of taking a clerk from one Department and promoting him in another Department might be to demoralize the whole Department from which you take him, because you would create a vacancy, and have to put a raw man in to take the place of that man. But where there is a vacancy in the Department, it is better that it should be filled from that Department than from outside, unless you find one in another Department who might properly be promoted. We should give them faith and courage in their position. They should be able to say: "Well, if we enter that service, it is not necessary we should languish in it for years without any expectation of promotion; but if we do our duty well, and improve ourselves, learn more than is requisite for our own class, we shall be promoted when a vacancy occurs." That is a proper system.

Mr. BLAKE. The observations of my hon. friend are encouraging, but the practical application is the very reverse. He says that certain Civil Servants will have a large chance, but also, that their chance of promotion is limited to the chance of rising in their own office. But there may be a man of iron frame, of strong constitution, and great powers of vitality above them so that they may have to stick in the same office all their lives. You have enlarged the area of their expectations, and certainly that is one of the greatest stimuli that you can give to good civil servants. But what does the hon. gentleman in effect say? Well, I admit, that in general your ability and superior qualification deserve practical recognition, but in practice he says that if the man whom he is giving that stimulus is specially valuable to the public administration by his great zeal, ability and capacity, it will never do to say to him: "You shall be promoted—you are too valuable to rise—you have shown yourself so valuable where you are that you must stick in the position of the second or third class till a good Providence shall have removed the superior officer in your own Department, when you may get a rise."

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. BLAKE. I object to that method of dealing with such officers. I think the more valuable an officer shows himself in his Department the more valuable would he be elsewhere, and the more entitled to promotion. This superior ability should secure his promotion instead of being his passport to a continuance in the lower grade to which the hon. gentleman would consign him.

Mr. CASEY. I agree with what has been said by the member for West Durham, that the hon. gentleman's practical application of his principles does not carry them out. He further said, that it is the intention of the Bill to make regular promotions. What he objected absolutely to was providing in the Bill that promotions should go in regular course. He wants to leave the matter open, not for promotions at all, but for importations from outside the service. Of course, it is necessary to have it in as a last resort. But he advanced no argument against making, as a general rule, appointments to the lowest grades of the service, and regular promotions thereafter. As to the age limit, I find that the Civil Service Commissioners agreed with the member for West Durham, and recommended that that limit should be from eighteen to twenty-five. No doubt it is a great mistake to leave the limit for the first appointments as high as thirty-five. It takes about twenty-five years to work up from the third up to the first class; and in ordinary cases that would bring a man appointed at thirty-five to the age of sixty before he obtained a first-class clerkship. It is in the first-class we should have men of the greatest vigor, mental and physical, men of great ability. Appointing men as old as thirty-five would fill the first-class clerkships with men in their decline instead of in their prime. A good many of those men are very efficient at an advanced age; but it is not to be expected that those men now filling the highest positions in the service, advanced in life, can devote as much energy to those duties as if they had come into the service young enough to reach first-class positions in the prime of life. You cannot expect as much from a man of sixty as from a man of forty-five. The hon. gentleman said that a candidate would be allowed to pass the first year his third class examination, and afterwards an examination for the second class. It is quite absurd to talk of letting any man who has never been in the Department before stand for an examination in the second class; because he could not have learned enough to qualify himself for the second class, or acquire information respecting it only to be learned by a considerable period of service in the Department.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman laughs at that, as if there was any difference between qualifications for such offices and ordinary office duties outside. Men can only learn Civil Service duties by service in the Department. It is a thing unheard of, qualifying a man for a second-class clerkship before he has learned the duties of the lower grades.

Mr. MILLS. Is it intended, when a vacancy occurs in the second-class, to promote a third-class clerk; and if so, will he have to undergo a second-class clerkship examination?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. MILLS. I think it would have been well to express that in the Bill. In many cases a man over thirty-five years might be taken to fill a second or first-class clerkship. It seems it would be proper to fix the different minimum for the different classes. While twenty-five or thirty might do for the second and first-class clerks, it seems that, to fix thirty-five for a third class is a high minimum, and which I do not think would contribute to the efficiency of the public service. It would be more satisfactory for the qualification of the different grades.

On clause 8,

Mr. BLAKE. What is the reason for giving the solemnity to the appointment and removal of the Deputy Heads, who are appointed by the Governor in Council, and hold office during pleasure, Parliament being informed of the reasons for that removal?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Deputy Heads are not to be appointed in the same way as other officers, but to rise upon the occurrence of vacancies, &c. The Deputy Head will, under this Bill, have very special powers, increased powers, so that he, in the absence of the Minister, will direct the Department, and when a change of Government takes place he is not to be removed without the reasons being made known at the beginning of the Session of Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not see any particular reason for it. It does not in the slightest degree affect the discussion of the Government. The removal is to be absolute, and all to be done is to state the reasons. It is to my mind one of the features of this Bill which is most objectionable, that an apparent position of authority is being given to Deputy Heads, which is not substantial. They are to make certain recommendations, and if these are concurred in by the Head of the Department, certain results will follow. My opinion is that the Deputy Heads will make the suggestions in accordance with the views of the Head of the Department. The whole system is one which presents an illusory appearance of independent action on the part of an officer who, from his situation, must necessarily be in accord with the Minister who is his chief. It is utterly impossible that the business of a Department can be effectually carried on unless there is a hearty concurrence of sentiment between the Deputy Head and the hon. Minister himself. If there exists that concurrence of sentiment, this formality in this Bill had better be thrown out, and we had better come down to the reality of the case. What is that? It is the hon. Minister who will do these things.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There are certain powers given to the Deputy Heads which it is necessary they should have. The hon gentleman seems to think that it might not be a very proper thing that the Deputy Heads should speak to the Heads of the Departments. In many cases the Deputy-Head will be a man of experience who has been fifteen or twenty years in the service, and a new Minister coming in will be glad to profit by his experience, and even have his attention to certain provisions of this law in order that they may be followed. It would not be extraordinary that the Deputy Head should try to fulfil his duty, and if he and the Head of the Department should not agree, that would not prevent him doing what he is authorized to do. In such a case the Head of the Department would take his own responsibility.

Mr. CASEY. While there is an appearance of independent action given to the Deputy Head it is not possible for him to exercise it. He must act in accordance with the views of the Minister, unless he is head of the service. Consequently all these things will be as directly under the control of the Minister as if there were no pretence of giving independent powers to the Deputy Head at all.

Mr. BOWELL. Would you suggest giving independent powers to a Deputy Head?

Mr. CASEY. That is not the question. The question is whether this Bill gives him independent powers or not? I say it does not. It provides to give him independent powers, but does not do so. If the hon. gentleman would read the Bill before he speaks, it would be better. It is admitted on all hands the Deputy Head would not exercise these powers except as he was told by the hon. Minister. My opinion is that a Deputy Head should have independent powers of action in certain matters of discipline. He would be a fairer arbitrator than the responsible Head, because he is supposed to have no political leanings. This particular clause should go a little further. Not only the dismissals of Deputy Heads, but all the proceedings of the Civil Service relative to appointments and dismissals should be laid before Parliament during the first fifteen days of the Session. That was provided in the Bill I had the honor to introduce. I think it is the practice in England to bring down the Civil Service report at an early day, which contains a full statement of what was done during the year. This would save a great many returns being asked for.

On clause 10,

Mr. CASEY. This clause is very vague. What are the other duties and powers referred to in it?

Mr. BLAKE. The only objection I see to that is that it might be interpreted to give a very high measure of authority by the Governor in Council to a Deputy Head. I would suggest that the word "powers" be struck out.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN agreed to the suggestion.

On clause 11,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I propose to amend this clause, by making it read thus: "In the absence of any Deputy Head, a chief clerk to be named by the Head of the Department shall perform the duties of such Deputy Head, unless the performance of such duties is otherwise provided for by Order in Council, and there shall be in the office of the Auditor General a chief clerk who shall at all times answer for the Auditor-General in his absence."

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the intention is to preserve the peculiar position of the Audit Office intact.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it proposed by the other portion of the Bill to prescribe by whom this first assistant clerk of the Auditor-General is to be appointed? It is possible there may be two chief clerks in the office of the Auditor-General. Who is to nominate the chief clerk, and who is to act for the Auditor General in his absence?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The officers are appointed by the Governor in Council.

Mr. BLAKE. Suppose there are two chief clerks in the office, is the Governor General in Council to promote the junior chief clerk, or have the power of doing so in the absence of the Auditor-General?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Bill provides there shall be one chief clerk in the office. If the Auditor-General found that a second one was required he would ask for another officer, and then, of course, the Government would ask Parliament for authority to create that new office. But the chief clerk, who was then in office, would be the one who should replace the Auditor-General in his absence.

On clause 12,

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman here says that the Deputy Head will be the Auditor-General. He calls the Auditor-General a Deputy Head, therefore the Auditor-General would report the propriety of the creation of a chief clerkship, then, secondly, ask the concurrence of the Head of the Department in such report. Now, who is the Head of the Department of the Auditor-General?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The intention is that the Auditor-General shall communicate with the Council, report under the Audit Act to the Minister of Finance, then the Minister of Finance comes to Council and makes his report.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course it is a matter of indifference through what member of the Government the Auditor-General shall communicate with the Government, but it is not a matter of indifference, having regard to the peculiar office of Auditor-General, that you should prescribe that anybody is the Head of this Department except himself. The whole efficacy and utility of the arrangement will be dependant upon his occupying an entirely independent position, not subject to the headship of anybody. He stands between the Government and Parliament, and is responsible to both Houses of Parliament; therefore it is that I feel a difficulty in agreeing to the suggestion which seems to indicate that some one of the Ministers of the Crown is the Head of the Department of the Auditor-General.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Under the Audit Act the Auditor-General is to communicate with the Government, and he must communicate through one of the Ministers; therefore, we say that he shall communicate through the Minister of Finance, then the Minister of Finance presents his communication to the Council.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman will see that the processes to be gone through would be these: That the Auditor-General, who is to be called the Head of the Department, is to report that he deems another office necessary, then there is to be concurrence of the Head of the Department in such report. Now, who is the Head of the Department of the Audit Office? The difficulty is not that some one Minister of the Crown is to be the Minister through whom the Auditor-General is to communicate with Council, but it is that there is to be somebody's concurrence as the Head of this Department.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman must understand that though the Auditor-General has certain powers under the Audit Act, yet when he requires a new officer he must apply to the Government, and it is for the Government to say whether they will grant it or not. Under these circumstances, we say that he shall communicate to the Council through the hon. Minister of Finance. The hon. Minister of Finance will see whether the office is required; he will then report to the Council, reporting the request of the Auditor-General, and his own enquiry into it, as to whether the request shall be granted or not. Some one of the Ministers must tell us whether the request should be assented to. That does not change the position of the Auditor. The Auditor-General has the power under the law; we cannot take it from him, and we do not wish to do so, but we desire to regulate the service, and in order to do so some Minister must communicate between the Auditor-General and the Council.

Mr. BLAKE. I admit there must be a vehicle between the Auditor-General and the Council, but I do not agree with the arguments of the hon. Minister of Public Works. The Auditor-General has to keep a watchful eye over the Minister of Finance more than any other Minister, and therefore he should be in no degree under his supervision.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I cannot understand why the Minister of Finance has to be particularly guarded, because the Auditor-General has to exercise a check over the spending department. My experience as Finance Minister is that I am not able to put my hand on a dollar of public money, and I repudiate the statement that the Department of Finance requires to be more carefully looked after than the other Departments.

Mr. CASEY. It should be provided that the Auditor-General should report his recommendations direct to the Governor in Council, and, in case of their being concurred in, they should be carried.

On clause 21,

Mr. CASEY. There is no provision that a Minister shall make himself responsible for the number of third-class clerks in his Department.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The first step in the service is to be made as third-class clerk. If a Minister requires such assistance he reports to the Council and obtains it, provided that the amount has been voted by Parliament.

Mr. CASEY. The object of making the restriction is to prevent a waste of public money, and to prevent the appointment of an unnecessarily large number of clerks; and whether an appointment involved a promotion or a first appointment the waste of public money would be equally great, if the clerk was unnecessary. No doubt, in usual cases when the Heads of Departments required additional clerks, they reported the case to the Privy Council and the appointment was made. In a great many cases, however, as the Commissioners stated, clerks were appointed by the Governor in Council although they were not required by the Head of the Department, but were simply placed in their position by the responsible Minister, or by him acting, at the request of his supporters. In this way a greater number of clerks than were needed were forced into the Department where they were not wanted. I think it is more necessary that there should be a limit to first appointments than to promotions, because promotions will at all events do some good to some one in the service, whereas in the other case outsiders would be benefitted at the cost of the public. Another difference is, that promotions are not nearly so likely to be made the subject of political pressure as appointments. It is much easier to induce the Government to put in a new man at, say $400, than to increase the salary of an officer from $600 to $1,000.

Clause amended so as to include third-class clerks, packers, sorters, &c.

On sub-section 2, clause 20,

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The sub-section reads: "The said increase may be suspended," &c. Does that include only the last increase, or the suspended increases?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Simply the last.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Then I think you should so state them.

Clause amended by inserting "for the then current year."

Mr. GUTHRIE. I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to this 20th section, which seems to me to conflict with the powers conferred upon the Auditor-General under the 15th section of the Audit Act. The latter gives the Auditor-General power to promote, suspend, or remove any officers or clerks employed in his Department, which power was considered at the time of the passing of that Act to be essential to that independence of action which it was thought that officer should possess. But this clause appears to deprive him of that power, and make his action subject to the concurrence of the Government.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I stated formerly that it was not intended to curtail the Audit Act.

On clause 22,

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose it is not intended to take any power to create any offices but those for which Parliament has provided.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; it is provided that no officers shall be appointed unless salaries are voted for them.

On clause 23,

Mr. CASEY. This is a clause that will probably give rise to some discussion, and I intend to put my views with regard to it on record in a permanent form, unless the leader of the Opposition does so. I object to the principle of a qualifying examination, conducted by a board of Civil Service examiners, appointed during pleasure, which I cannot think could be a thoroughly impartial examination. Besides, if there is to be a qualifying examination, why have a preliminary one before that? Will not one examination sufficiently show a man's knowledge of arithmetic, orthography, handwriting, and everything else required in him. It is not necessary to have a preliminary examination to settle whether a man is to go up to a qualifying examination or not.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This preliminary examination is required in order that if a man does not know the elements of arithmetic or orthography, or is unable to write, he should not be allowed to waste the examiner's time in examining him. This provision is necessary to weed out the number of applicants. If they have not the elementary qualifications they should not be presented to the higher examinations.

Mr. BLAKE. I confess myself utterly unable to see the policy of this preliminary examination. We have agreed that the examination should be in writing, which would show the knowledge of writing and orthography in the applicant. Now, what are you doing? In the first place, you require the attendance of all the candidates twice instead of once. Does the hon. gentleman intend the preliminary shall immediately precede the qualifying examination?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. BLAKE. If so, what is the sense of it, because it is quite obvious that a part of the examination will be in writing. If you decide that a candidate's knowledge of writing, orthography, or arithmetic, which are the elements, is defective, where is the use of proceeding any further? I am not aware of any case in which there is, for a qualifying examination, a preliminary examination to ascertain his knowledge of these elements. If he is deficient in those respects, that should at once dispose of his pretensions. This double examination would be a mere expense to the country. The ordinary course is, in these examinations, to test a man's knowledge by the state of his papers on such elementary subjects, and to notify him, if ignorant in regard to those cardinal requisites, that he need go no further. It seems necessary by this Bill to provide two separate sets of papers, one for the preliminary and the other for the qualifying examination. It is an entirely changed course as regards my experience. I would ask the hon. member for Middlesex, who has had a large experience in such matters, whether he knows of any precedent for it?

Mr. ROSS. I could not understand that provision in the Bill myself, and I intended making enquiries regarding it. I do not know what is meant by a qualifying examination, I see no necessity for it either. I know it is not required for Normal School work.

Mr. BLAKE. Nor in any University examinations.

Mr. ROSS. No. I hope the hon. Minister will eliminate that feature of the Bill, and allow candidates to go through for what they are worth. The examiners could soon see whether they were deficient in orthography, writing, &c., and govern themselves accordingly.

Mr. CASEY. I am sure the insertion of this clause has arisen from a confusion between this examination and the English system recommended by the Commissioners, who recommended a preliminary examination. I think, by an oversight, this preliminary examination clause has been copied into the Bill along with the qualifying examination. The qualifying examination is simply to see whether the man is fit for the office. There is no use in testing him twice. As to this clause saving time, the candidate will have to go through two examinations. With one they would save time, but not with two.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Our object is to save time and money. The examination will take place in Ottawa, when candidates will have to pass their preliminary examination, testing their orthography, writing and arithmetic, in regard to which, if they pass well, they will be subjected to a qualifying examination. Why, if those candidates are unfit, should you have them present to pass an examination with their papers and afterwards reject them? It is a great deal better to reject them at once if not able to pass a prior examination. I think the preliminary is required.

Mr. CASEY. The worst thing in the double examination would be the loss of time. The examiners would have to spend as much time over the preliminary as if there was no other examination. One paper showing ignorance of the elements, such as writing and arithmetic, should, with a single examination, decide the candidate's rejection. One examination would save the examiners trouble and the country great expense.

Mr. ROSS. How would the hon. Minister do in the case where preliminary examinations were to be held, say, in British Columbia or Prince Edward Island, to see who would be fit for the qualifying examination, which preliminary examinations would be held a month or two anterior to the qualifying, that the central Board might see how many candidates could pass the preliminary? A report would have to be sent from British Columbia or Prince Edward Island to prevent the unsuccessful from coming here for the qualifying examination. Under another system the whole work could be done at once. It is not necessary to hold this preliminary examination to weed out the stupid and ignorant candidates. Every Board should have a crucial test on one or two subjects, upon which the fate of the candidate is decided; if hopelessly bad, they read their papers no further. It would be a work of supererogation to do so. By this Bill the examiners are having additional and unnecessary labors imposed upon them. I know that in my experience, I would far rather entail the expense of doing this with one than two. I am quite satisfied that the work would be better done, and there would be less expense.

On clause 34,

Mr. CASEY. Why should the limit of thirty-five years of age be applied to the inside service only?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the outside service special qualification might be required as in the case of an appraiser, who must be a man of experience in business. By putting a minimum and a maximum age the idea was that for the lower grades of the service we would not take men younger than eighteen or older than thirty-five, but in cases where men in the Department are not available, special men who have passed examination may be taken, though thirty or thirty-five years of age.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister's answer in regard to appraisers is very satisfactory, but I cannot call to mind any other cases to which the same reason would apply. I think that the limit might be put at thirty-five years of age in the outside service, excepting for appraisers and a few others requiring special qualifications.

Progress reported.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills (from the Senate) were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 148) to amend the Acts respecting the Militia and Defence of the Dominion of Canada.—(Mr. Caron.)

Bill (No. 149) to remove certain doubts as to the effect of "The North-West Territories Act, 1880," and to amend the same.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Bill (No. 150) to incorporate the Royal Academy of Arts.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 102) further to amend "An Act to amend and consolidate the several enactments respecting the North-West Mounted Police Force."

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the Bill be amended by striking out clause 12.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that clause 13 be amended by inserting the following words:—

"Any member of the force other than a commissioned officer convicted of."

Amendment agreed to, and Bill reported.

On motion for third reading,

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not intend to divide the House on the Bill, but as I believe the increase of the force was not necessary, I must ask to have this Bill passed on a division.

Bill read the third time and passed on a division.

TRINITY HOUSE AND HARBOR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 126) to amend the Act respecting the Trinity House and Harbor Commissioners of Montreal.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the second clause, which provides that the Harbor Commissioners shall have power to make by-laws respecting certain portions of the River St. Lawrence, and for the use of those portions of the river by craft of a different character. It seems to me very considerable hardship might arise under the operation of that Bill as it stands at present, and I would suggest that some amendment to that clause be made.

Mr. McLELAN. To meet the views of the hon. gentleman, I move, in amendment, to insert the following words in the second clause at the end of the sixteenth line: "Except in case of accident or stress of weather."

Mr. WHITE. I am afraid that the amendment will hardly cover the whole of the difficulties which would arise under the operation of this clause of the Bill. I am informed that at a certain point on the River at Cap à la Roche, which is on that portion of the river between Batiscan and Cape Charles, a tug steamer tugging rafts finds it impossible at certain stages of the tide, owing to the strength of the current, to keep those rafts out of the deep water channel, and the result of an accident occurring to any large vessel through coming in collision with any raft would be exceedingly disastrous to the owner of the craft, which was improperly using those channels, even though using them under circumstances beyond the control of the owner of those crafts. I would suggest that after the 36th line the hon. Minister insert these words:

"Provided always that no such restrictive by-laws shall apply to any craft, barge or other vessels of light draught which may be carried into the deep water channels at the points above named upon the river St. Lawrence, by accident, stress of weather, or force of current."

If that addition was made to the clause I think there would be no objection to it; without it I think it would be very objectionable.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Have the Harbor Commissioners been consulted in regard to the Bill?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, it has been referred to the Harbor Commissioners and carefully considered by them.

On clause 2,

Mr. WHITE. It is a great hardship to declare by this Bill that owners of rafts carried into the deep water channel by the force of the current or by accident shall be liable. In that portion of the river between Batiscan and Cap à la Roche, it is impossible to keep vessels from entering into the deep water channel. It seems to me it would not be straining the clause if the hon. the Minister would allow the words "force of the current" to be added. I think when extraordinary powers like these are proposed to be given to the Harbor Commissioners, a concession might be made to prevent the possibility of people being rendered liable for damage from an act over which they had no control.

Mr. McCUAIG. It is of the utmost importance that the channel should be kept clear, as they are always difficult to manage, especially in currents. If the principles mentioned by the last speaker were applied, it would be found that small vessels would be getting in the way of larger ones, which would be towed up and down the river. I think the Bill is much preferable as it stands.

Mr. McLELAN. If it is found, when the regulations are submitted to Council, that exceptions of this kind should be made, they can be made by the regulations.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). If the hon. Minister refuses to add those words, I shall only have to give notice to add them on the third reading.

On clause 4,

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me that this clause grants powers with reference to railways, of a very extended character, and we should certainly have some explanations from the hon. Minister as to whether the by-laws providing for the enforcement of these arrangements with the railway companies are to be compulsory upon the railways with which all arrangements may be made. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council can give certain facilities to railways with regard to connections, and so on, but certainly it is unusual to attempt to enforce such arrangements by by-law. Are those arrangements voluntary or not?

Mr. McLELAN. It is intended that the Commissioners shall have power to arrange with the Grand Trunk and other railways for increased facilities for conveying and carrying by such railways to and from vessels in the harbor and for making connection between such railways eastward and westward. It is intended that such powers shall, of course, be voluntary and the by-laws for the purpose of carrying them out.

Mr. BLAKE. If these arrangements are to be voluntary they could be made between the different railway companies themselves, and I would like to know what powers it is proposed to give to the Harbor Commissioners. Is it power to compel any company to agree to anything? No, the hon. gentleman says. Have they not power at this time to allow any railway company they like to go down to their wharves?

Mr. McLELAN. They say not, and they want to make a general regulation with all the railway companies.

Mr. BLAKE. It does seem to me that the provision that the Harbor Commissioners, instead of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, shall have power to arrange for connections between the railway companies, to define terms, &c., is wholly unsymmetrical. Why should not the Railway Committee of the Privy Council dispose of these connections when no voluntary agreement can be made? What power is to be given to the Harbor Commissioners to enforce arrangements? The ordinary laws of the land are the usual resort for their enforcement; and if these are inadequate in this instance, in what particular are they so; and in that respect is it intended to empower this Harbor Commission to enforce these arrangements?

Mr. McLELAN. The Harbor Commissioners have the power to enforce regulations for the transmission of freight on all the wharves under their control. Draymen and all transport companies doing business in Montreal are under the control of the Harbor Commissioners, and they have power to adopt rules in relation to them, and they ask the same power to be given to them in respect to any regulation they may make with railway companies for the transmission of freight.

Mr. BLAKE. I move to insert in the second line of the 4th clause, between the word "make" and the word "arrangements," the word "voluntary," so that it may be made clear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman had better consider the effect of that. The object of this Bill is to empower the Harbor Commissioners to manage the business entrusted to them in an efficient way. They have no possible interest or object in view, except to make such arrangements with the persons doing business on the wharves, under their charge, as are essential to the public good, and I do not see why the hon. gentleman should wish to prevent them from making the necessary arrangements with railway companies who are permitted to lay tracks upon their wharves for the purpose of carrying on business in the harbor. It seems to me that the proposal is a perfectly reasonable one, and that the suggestion of the hon. gentleman is calculated entirely to defeat its object.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. Minister who has charge of the Bill tells us that these are only to be voluntary arrangements. I propose that what the hon. Minister in charge of the Bill assures us is intended, shall be embodied in the Bill, and the hon. the Minister of Railways tells us that to embody his colleague's proposal in the Bill will be entirely to defeat it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It may be intentional to have voluntary arrangements, but the putting of the word "voluntary" in the Bill is an invitation to any person who does not wish to make the arrangements to refuse, to make them.

Mr. ANGLIN. It is said that the Grand Trunk Company have already extended their rails along several of these wharves. There was some dispute as to their right to run their rails where they did. If that is the case this House will empower the Harbor Commissioners to compel the Grand Trunk, who have their rails there already, to enter into such arrangements as they choose to dictate. If at present there are no rails on the streets adjoining those wharves, and we are simply enabling the Commissioners to induce the Companies by some means or other to extend their lines along the wharves, that is a very different thing. It is a question whether there are not private rights involved in this matter, which we ought most carefully to guard and respect.

On clause 4,

Mr. ANGLIN. Would it not be well before the clause is carried, to require that the by-laws for the regulation of these matters and the enforcement of the provisions of the Bill, should receive the approval of the Governor in Council? I think they should.

Mr. McLELAN. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for Renfrew, as to the portion of the river mentioned, there may be some force in his objection; so I have no objection to adding the words he suggested.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SICK AND DISTRESSED MARINERS.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 121) to exempt vessels employed in fishing from the payment of duties for the relief of sick and distressed mariners.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In Committee.)

Mr. KILLAM. I suppose the hon. Minister can now give us explanations regarding this Bill. I am scarcely yet satisfied that there is any necessity for its introduction at all. He ought to be able to inform the House how much is spent upon the sick mariners of foreign vessels, and whether the larger amount of the fund is paid by the fishermen of our own vessels or the steamers that call at our ports.

Mr. McLELAN. Very little of the Sick Mariners' Fund is paid by the fishermen of the Dominion. All the small coasting vessels coasting from one part of the Province to another, are exempt from the payment of these dues, or contribute very little; and in any case they do not participate in the benefits of it unless they go beyond the Province in which they pay the dues which entitle them to that advantage. Our own vessels which fish one part of the year, and the other portions make voyages beyond the limits of one Province, will therefore be called upon to pay those dues, and will be entitled to the benefits of the fund. But foreign fishing vessels seldom enter our ports and pay any dues unless they have a sick mariner on board, in which case they enter the port, pay a few cents or dollars, and leave a sick seaman on our hands, causing large expense. In one or two cases when that has not happened, but when they have entered our ports for this purpose, and been called upon to pay the sick mariners' dues, their Government has represented to this Government that it was an infringement of the spirit of the fishing treaty. It is thought, therefore, that it would be simpler and better to abolish the dues for vessels exclusively engaged in fishing, or when upon a fishing voyage.

Mr. KILLAM. My information is that fishermen, as a general rule, are willing to pay the dues and receive the benefits. I am afraid the Bill will have an injurious effect. What is a fishing vessel? Just now, as he says, fishing vessels coasting about one province do not pay hospital dues; but if they go from one province to another, they do pay them. During the early part of the season a fishing vessel may be carrying oats, for instance, from Prince Edward Island to Halifax, in which case they are liable to pay these dues. Is she then a fishing vessel, and are the crew entitled to the benefits of the marine hospital? I think the owners, as a general rule, prefer to pay the dues, and get the benefits of the system now in force.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman will understand that if a vessel goes from one port to another, carrying produce other than fish, she is liable to pay the dues and participate in the benefits of the fund, and in almost all cases our own fishing vessels do not contribute to the fund. Our own fishing vessels do not contribute to the fund, because they are chiefly employed coasting within the province.

Mr. ANGLIN. A great many of our small vessels pass from the ports of one province to those of another, and many of them go to Montreal and Quebec with cargoes of oysters and fish.

Mr. McLELAN. That is not a fishing voyage, and would not exempt them from the dues.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). One of the leading firms in my constituency asked me to object to this measure, but if the explanation of the hon. member is correct, they will have no objection to it. Supposing a vessel is employed three or four months in fishing, and the remainder of the year in coasting trade, and paid during the latter portion hospital dues, would she have benefit of the fund during the whole year?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes. You cannot draw any other conclusion from the Bill.

Mr. FLYNN. As the Bill now stands it exempts fishing vessels from those dues. Our vessels commence fishing early in the spring and continue until October. During that time they are exempt from paying the dues. Frequently, however, after that, they make trips with produce to Halifax, and are then liable to pay into this fund. While they would not participate in the benefit during the summer, they would be compelled to pay the dues toward the end of the season.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FRENCH DOMINATION.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. TASSÉ. As we discussed the other day the Irish Question in a manner which I sincerely trust will be beneficial to the parties interested, I will take advantage of this motion to offer some remarks on a subject which concerns more directly a large portion of the Canadian community. I wish I could avoid bringing this subject under the notice of the House, but the responsibility of the action does not rest with me. This subject is pressed so unfairly and so persistently on the public mind; it has caused so much agitation and so many misrepresentations; it will become such a live issue during the approaching electoral campaign, that no alternative is left than to put the matter in its true light before this House and the country. The subject is undoubtedly a difficult and a delicate one, but having learned to respect those feelings in others, which are the dearest to a man—his national and religious feelings—and representing, as I do, one of the most mixed communities in the country, the Capital of Canada; having been returned by a French as well as by an English majority, by a Catholic as well as by a Protestant majority, I am confident that, while standing up in the cause of truth and justice, to defend the people of my race, I will say nothing that can hurt the feelings of, or that can be properly objected to by my hon. colleagues of other origins. For some time past you may have heard of the so-called French domination of this country. For some time past you may have read in the newspapers which exercise a great, a controlling influence sometimes on the other side of the House, that Frenchmen were the ruling power in this Dominion, that they were securing all the sweets of office, and had practically muzzled the British Lion. For some time past you may have read in the same paper that the hon. Prime Minister—although styled sometimes one man power—was but a pliant tool in their hands, and that this great Province of Ontario had to suffer once more the humiliating sway of her sister Province. Such is the temper of that press, that even the name of my hon. friend the Secretary of State has been cited lately by the Globe as a “conspicuous representative of the bleu interest”—these are the words of the paper—in order to scare the good people of Ontario—and why? Because my hon. friend had signed, in his capacity of Secretary of State, a document touching the much vexed boundary question of Ontario, which document emanated from His Excellency the Governor in Council. It is true this cry of French domination is not new in this country. During more than fifteen years it has been echoed and re-echoed on almost every stump, on almost every hustling from one end of this Province to the other, and in almost every Grit journal from the Globe down. It is questionable, if but for it the Grit party could have existed at all. In fact, that cry was put into its mouth as its war cry, as its watch-word on almost the very day of its birth. Hatred of the French Canadian seems to have been, I am very sorry to say, the first love of the Grits. No wonder that the French Canadian has been compelled sometimes most reluctantly to return the compliment. We all know that this cry of French domination has a most injurious effect in inflaming the passions of the people, in creating an ardent jealousy between the two Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and an intense rivalry between two races which have spent already too much of their vigor and energy in fruitless struggles. We all know that, owing to that agitation, the administration of public affairs became almost impossible in this country, and Confederation became a political necessity. We all know that, owing to that agitation, the Conservatives of Ontario had to suffer seriously, had to lose many an election, being branded as the enemies of their Province, as the enemies of their creed, as the enemies of their race. But, Sir, thanks to the sober second thought of the people the clouds of public prejudice have been dispelled, and we have seen the great Conservative leader recognized as the best champion, as the truest friend of the interests of Ontario. Although the hon. member for Lambton, when inebriated with power, predicted that the Conservatives of Ontario would never regain the confidence of this Province, we have seen the day when the hon. gentleman himself scarcely escaped defeat in the very county which he represents; we have seen the day when his party almost found a grave in that very Province in the great Liberal slaughter of 1878. When the Grits joined the Conservative party and established Confederation, and it is one of the very few acts in their history that commands my admiration, we heard no more of the cry of French domination. The French ghost vanished for a time in the pigeon-holes of the Globe office. When the Grits succeeded in capturing the Government in 1873, we did not hear of French domination, nor during the whole of their term of office. To speak of French domination in those days would have been indeed like a sneer and a farce. The French element was represented in the Cabinet by men who were not always creditable to their race, and whose sole ambition, in most instances, was to serve their country in the capacity of governors and judges, far, very far, from the verdict of their electors. Such men evidently could not possess that fair share of public influence which they should otherwise have exercised. Is it necessary to mention M. Antoine Aimé Dorion—a distinguished democrat fascinated by what the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) would call the “flummery of titles”—who was appointed Chief Justice of Quebec after having declared from his seat in this House that no such an appointment was contemplated; Mr. Letellier, who became Governor of Quebec, and who did, Sir, what Queen Victoria with all her might has never dared to do, thus inflicting what would have been a death blow on responsible government had such an act remained unpunished at our hands; Mr. Fournier, who became a member of the highest, if not the most popular, tribunal of the land; Mr. Cauchon, whose crime smelled to heaven, according to the Liberal organ, and who was then thought fit, in that capacity I suppose, by that very Government to represent Her Majesty in the Prairie Province, when my hon. friend from Quebec East, out of self-respect had refused to sit in the same Cabinet which made him Governor. It seems certain also that Mr. Laflamme would have been requested to adorn the Bench, but for the untimely transaction of the ballot box in Jacques Cartier, where our friends opposite showed to the people of this country how they could fabricate and manufacture votes in order to raise what they call the standard of public morality. Sir, as my opinion on the personnel of the late Cabinet might be supposed unfair or prejudiced, let me adduce some witnesses whose impartiality cannot be questioned. My hon. friends opposite will not deny that La Patrie is the recognized official organ of their party in the district of Montreal. Well let us see what La Patrie stated in an article of the 25th November, 1880:

“Mr. Dorion, although serving under the leadership of Mr. Mackenzie, was really the chief of the party. His withdrawal from office was soon after followed by that of Messrs. Fournier and Letellier. It is needless to recall the events which followed. Power was concentrated in the hands of Messrs. Mackenzie and Cartwright who had no one to checkmate them.”

I do not attach much importance to the Ottawa Free Press, but as it is the recognized organ in this city of my hon. friends opposite, I will quote the following opinion published on the 12th October, 1879:—

"Previous to the 17th of last month none were more obsequious than those who are now denouncing the late Premier as the marplot of the Liberal party, whose defeat they attributed to Mr. Mackenzie's tyranny, stubbornness and want of tact. Referring to the ingratitude thus expressed, the Montreal Gazette says:—'No baser kind of ingratitude can be imagined, than that of men willing to serve leaders when in power, and turning upon them when power passes from their hands. The Liberal party of Quebec added neither strength nor respectability to the Liberal party of the Dominion during the last five years.' Although we are far from including all the Quebec Liberals in the list of ingrates, yet there is much of truth, manfully spoken, in what our contemporary utters. That the Liberal party of Quebec added neither strength nor respectability to the Liberal party of the Dominion during the last five years, is too sweeping an assertion, as few will deny that the Hon. Mr. Dorion brought strength and respectability to the party. The Gazette's remark might apply to the situation during the last year or two, when the accessions to the Cabinet were not always accessions of strength or respectability."

Well, Mr. Speaker, there was no French domination in those days but there was French humiliation all around. Since the triumphant return of the Conservatives to power we have again heard the famous cry of French domination. The French ghost, which is more frightful than all the ghosts painted by Shakespeare, has re-appeared and is now haunting, agitating, disturbing, every Grit camp, every Grit meeting; that ghost even made its appearance the other day within the walls of the Chamber. Sir, I draw the attention of the House and country to the fact that this cry is always raised when it is thought proper by the Liberal party to excite and lead astray the public opinion of the country, especially in the Province of Ontario. Mr. Speaker, when the last campaign took place in Ontario during the year 1879 the same appeal was again made by the Liberal party, and a good many people caught the infection, and now that the day cannot be very far distant when both parties will have to give an account of their votes and conduct to our common judge, the people of this country, the same mean, disloyal and disreputable tactics are resorted to. So common is this practice that you can hardly open a Grit newspaper in the Province of Ontario, from the Globe downwards, without seeing articles against that so-threatening French domination. I will not worry the House by reading long extracts from these papers, but as that kind of evidence, I am sure, is familiar to many, if not most of hon. members, I will take the liberty to read a few lines which will give an idea, however imperfect it may be, of the work of misrepresentation and demagogism which is now so eagerly prosecuted by the Liberal party in the great Province of Ontario. The controlling organ of that party the Globe stated on 4th May, 1879:

"When Ontario joined the Confederation her supposition was by doing so she had escaped from Lower Canadian domination. The present subservience of the Government to Quebec Conservatives throws a doubt on this and our future position, and brings up the whole subject again. The Tories follow the lead of their precious chieftain, and would put Ontario, which Province they know they cannot either cheat or control, back again under the rule of the Frenchmen, whom Sir John can humbug and swindle if he cannot control."

In another article, 4th November, 1879, the Globe complained still more bitterly of the supposed French ascendancy:

"The old saying that Ontario is the milch cow for the remaining Provinces, was never more forcibly proven than it is by the action of the present Government in relation to the distribution of patronage. Ontario with nearly one-half of the population of the Dominion, and directly and indirectly contributing a larger proportion than that to the Dominion revenue only at the present time receives about one-fifth of the patronage. The Department of Finance, Justice, Railways and Canals, Marine and Fisheries, and of the Speaker of the Senate, are devoted to the three Maritime Provinces, while of the remaining Departments those of Public Works, Inland Revenue, Militia and Defence, and the House of Commons, are given to the Province of Quebec alone. In the Department of the Speaker of the Commons the French Canadians are receiving the lion's share of the patronage, and the English speaking employees are being plundered to satisfy them. Last Session of Parliament in this Department pages and messengers were employed who could not speak a word of English. These are specimens of the manner in which Speaker Blanchet is administering the affairs of his Department."

Let us see now what says another leading Grit paper which is understood to represent the hon. member for Bothwell, the London Advertiser, which fulminates almost every day against the French domination. The following article is very recent, being dated the 15th February last:—

"The French Tories envy the prosperity of Ontario, and they are determined to dismember her, if possible. Mr. Meredith and his followers are not representing Ontario, they are representing the Quebec Bleus—they have become their servile instruments—Ontario was for years subject to the annoyance of Quebec Toryism. They obtained local self-government to maintain their local independence, and they find a band of conspirators, who, for the sake of the support of the most narrow-minded and unprogressive party in all Christendom, are ready to betray them. Sir John Macdonald has upon this question surrendered himself to Sir Hector Langevin and his followers."

In an article still more fresh, on the 22nd February, the Ottawa Free Press used the following language:—

"The Dominion Ministry aim at nothing less than reducing this Province to a position subordinate to Quebec, in order to vest the Government of the country in the hands of a party which could not even exist without the aid of that most stupid, bigoted, retrogressive faction, the Quebec Bleus."

The French element ruled this Dominion to the detriment, prejudice and exclusion of our English fellow-citizens—at least such is the gist of these articles and of a great many other articles written in the same style and animated in the same spirit, but all calculated to stir up and revive the national feuds of former days. I know sufficient of the feelings of the people of the Province of Quebec to know that its members and its population do not wish to deprive or rob Ontario of a single inch of territory which properly, legally and constitutionally belongs to that Province. The unanimity with which the French members of this House voted the other day for the reference of the boundary question to the highest tribunal either in Canada or the Mother Country, is the best proof of the spirit of justice and fairness which animates them, and they were aided on that occasion by followers of the hon. member for Quebec East.

Mr. LAURIER. Your party could not show so much independence as that.

Mr. TASSÉ. No doubt I have a strong faith in the French Liberals of Quebec, although there are not many in this House. The hon. member, in speaking of the question of boundary the other day—

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member has no right to refer to a past debate.

Mr. TASSÉ. I am referring to a speech made by his hon. friend and supporter, as reported in the papers of the day, and I will make only a short quotation, which will be very agreeable to the hon. member for Quebec East. Here is what the hon. member said, when opposing the reference of that question to the Privy Council—

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. member is referring to a past debate.

Mr. TASSÉ. I quite understand why the leader of the Opposition is so anxious that the utterances of the hon. member for Quebec East should not be read in this House to-day. Have you, Mr. Speaker, decided that I have no right to read the extract.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has no right to refer to a past debate.

Mr. TASSE. I am only reading from a report of the speech.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member cannot read it.

Mr. TASSE. So the hon. leader of the Opposition does not wish to hear the reasons given by his colleague for opposing the reference of the boundary question to the Privy Council. We all know that the hon. member for Quebec East has been lauded by the Grit press for the exceptional broad-mindedness he displayed on this subject. Well, let me state that the great argument adduced by the hon. member for Quebec East was, that by allowing the question to be referred to the Privy Council it might add a great deal to the Province of Ontario, much more than was awarded.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TASSÉ. If you deny that such language has been used I will have to read the speech. Now, that the question of order is disposed of, and I hope satisfactorily to my hon. friends on the other side, I will say this: that the French Conservative members of this House are not responsible for the fact that the Ontario Government has refused, for electioneering purposes—for party purposes—to accept such a fair proposal as a reference of the question to the Privy Council or the Supreme Court, because that proposal, if I am well informed, was made by the present Premier as early as 1872, and for it the French members would have voted as they voted on a similar proposition the other day.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will be kind enough not to refer to a past debate.

Mr. TASSÉ. I am speaking of now 1872.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The rule is that no allusion shall be made to a previous debate in the same Session, but there is no rule preventing a reference to a debate in a previous Session.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has been referring to a debate of this Session.

Mr. TASSÉ. I was referring to 1872, and I said that the French Conservative members cannot be held responsible for the fact that the Ontario Government has refused for party purposes to accept the proposal which the present Premier made as early as 1872, and that we would have voted then for it as we voted for it the other day. Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as the public patronage mentioned in the Globe is concerned, a return for which I have given notice in the Orders of the Day will settle that point. I trust that it will be made as accurate and complete as possible. If such a grievance really exists, let us know it and let us remedy it. We ask no favors, and I think I am fairly echoing the sentiments of the mass of the French people of this country when I say that we only ask fair play, and equal rights with our fellow citizens of other creeds and origins. We ask nothing more but nothing less. A similar return was ordered last year by another Chamber but it has not been brought down. In the meantime, I have taken the trouble to collect a certain amount of statistics and other information, and while a portion of them may not be very complete or very fresh it will throw sufficient light on the matter to show that there is nothing like French domination in the shape of public patronage; that such domination exists, "figuratively speaking," only in the minds of the Grit press and their stump speakers. Nay, they fully demonstrate that not only have the French Canadians not been treated with favor or partiality, but that they do not receive even a fair share of the patronage if representation by origin is to be the determining basis. From the Public Accounts we may ascertain who are the French and English-speaking employees belonging to the inside service with the amounts of their salaries. Let me give the following statement for the year 1881:

It is impossible to find a similar return as far as the officers of the Parliament and those of the outside service are concerned, their names, for some unaccountable reason, not being given in the Public Accounts. But a return like that which I ask for was produced in 1872, and from it I will draw the following statement which probably has not been materially altered since that year:

This would give a proportion of French employés in those branches of the public service of 7 per cent. As those figures are partly from 1872, the number of officers has undoubtedly much increased since, but I do not think, I repeat, that the proportion of their relative origins has been notably altered. In connection with this statement, it may be properly asked what is the relative strength of the French population in Canada. The last Census puts it at 1,298,803 souls, apportioned as follows: Quebec, 1,073,820; Ontario, 102,147; New Brunswick, 56,635; Nova Scotia, 41,219; Prince Edward Island, 10,751; Manitoba, 9,949; North-West Territories, 2,771, and British Columbia, 915. As the French element represented an aggregate of 1,082,940 in 1871, we have thus an increase of more than 200,000 souls during the last decade—a result which is wonderful if we take into account the emigration to the United States and the fact that such an increase is due entirely to their prolific qualities, qualities unsurpassed in the history of mankind. The population of Canada being calculated at 4,324,810 souls, the French element is thus a little more than one-fourth while it receives but one-seventh of the patronage. In the face of these facts, I may well ask where is the French domination? Where is the ghost, the horrid ghost which is evoked every day by the Grit press to terrify the people of Ontario? French domination! Do you see it in the fact that if the French element has more than its share in a few branches of the Dominion service, it is not fairly represented in some while it is almost ignored in others? Do you see it in the fact that if you except Quebec, there are very few officers of French origin employed by the Local Governments of the other Provinces? French domination! French domination! Do you see it in the fact that there is not a minority treated as justly and as generously as that of the Province of Quebec—a treatment which I would like to see imitated in all the other Provinces, in order to show to the world that there is not a spot on the surface of the earth where the rights of every one are more carefully guarded than in the free and happy land of Canada. French domination! French domination! Do you see it in the most startling fact that in the very Province of Quebec—the very bulwark of our race—where the nine-twelfths of the people are of French origin, the minority has secured even the greatest number of the federal offices; that in 1872 there were in the Department of Customs, Post Office, Inland Revenue, Public Works, Marine and Fisheries, 431 English speaking officers receiving $220,474 50, against 321 French employés receiving $135,728 50—that is to say, there were 110 more English-speaking officers than French? French domination! Do you see it in the fact that French constituencies or constituencies with a French majority have elected, and are still electing men of another origin, of another creed, to represent them? At this very moment, the hon. member for the county of Ottawa—the King of the Gatineau,—the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, the hon. member for Gloucester, one of the lights of the Opposition, the hon. member for Chateauguay, the hon. member for Shefford, and the hon. member for Victoria, New Brunswick, all represent counties having a French majority. In the past, we have not been less generous, as it is fully exemplified by the following facts as related by the late lamented Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, the very man who predicted that the last gun for English supremacy on this continent would be fired by a French Canadian:

“That the people of Lower Canada always acted towards the English with liberality was best exemplified by facts. Before the Union, while the constituencies were almost exclusively French, English Protestant gentlemen were frequently returned to Parliament; and he had now opposite to him an hon. member who had for twenty years represented an entirely French and Roman Catholic county. He doubts that in the course of these twenty years, the hon. gentleman had ever been asked whether he were Scotch or Protestant. They took the man for his sterling worth. It was even a fact that the French had elected members with extraordinary names, and, as every body knows, there was sometimes a good deal in a name. Now, if there was one name which French Canadians disliked more than another, it was that of Luther. Yet they had elected a gentleman bearing that significant appellation. He was glad they had, and he had no doubt he had been elected because of his personal worth; but it unquestionably showed a great deal of liberal feeling on the part of the electors. But if an English Protestant was bad in the eyes of a French Canadian, a French Protestant was infinitely worse, and yet the county of Lotbinière had elected a French Canadian Protestant, without even questioning his religion. But again, quite lately in a division in Lower Canada, numbering only 50,000 souls, of which only 1,400 were English, an election of a member to this Chamber had taken place, the candidates being a French Roman Catholic gentleman, long and well known, and an English Protestant—and with what result? Why, that English Protestant had beaten the French Canadian Roman Catholic by 1,000 votes. Could any greater proof of a tolerant and liberal feeling be exhibited.”

French domination! Do you see it in the fact that the English minority, in the Province of Quebec, has five or six representatives in the other Chamber and in the Legislative Council of Quebec? Do you see it also in the fact that the last nominee to the Senate from the Province of Quebec is a gentleman, well and generally respected, but who has not a drop of French blood in his veins? French domination! Do you see it in the fact that while the English-speaking minority of Quebec is largely represented in the Upper Chamber—and I am glad to see a minority largely represented—the 102,743 Acadians, who differ from us French Canadians only in name, but who are the same as ourselves in language, religion, politics and historical associations—that they and the 108,605 French Canadians scattered throughout the Province of Ontario have not a single representative in the Senate—an injustice I sincerely trust the Government of the day will repair at an early opportunity. Those 211,345 Frenchmen scattered throughout Ontario and the Maritime Provinces will become, ere long, a very important factor in the Canadian community. And their claims are the more entitled to the consideration of the Government, that its hon. leader, at the time of the debates on Confederation, stated that the Senate had been established especially to protect sectional rights. His very words were:

"To the Upper House is to be confided the protection of sectional interests."

French domination! Do you see it in the fact that hundreds of thousands of dollars, if not millions, have been spent to attract a foreign emigration to our shores, which, however desirable and useful it may be to the country at large, cannot certainly increase the influence of French Canadians. Now the Government should spare neither pains nor expense to facilitate the return of Canadians from the neighboring Republic. Thousands of them have been induced to return to their native land, which they were compelled to desert under adverse circumstances. Let us do for them what we have done for the Mennonites and the Scandinavians. The other day several hundreds of French Canadians left New England to become settlers in our great North-West. Let us encourage that movement by all possible means, and we shall see ere long not only hundreds but thousands of Canadians of all origins returning to their country, which they love, to give it the benefit of their intelligence, labor and industry. In the face of these facts, it is quite evident there can be no sincerity in the cry of French domination. The Globe and its satellites know perfectly well, unless more ignorant than fanatical, and that would be saying a great deal, that such a cry has not the slightest foundation, that if any ascendancy exists, or is to be dreaded in this country, it is not certainly that of the French. Minorities can have no power or influence in a country like this, such as has been ascribed to the French; they cannot rule except in exceptional cases with our well balanced system of Government. How could the French minority rule when this Government is not only supported by a majority from Quebec, but by one still larger from the great Province of Ontario, and by a majority from Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and British Columbia? And this majority is not a "brute majority" as it was so styled by the courteous member for Centre Huron the other day, nor is it a majority of "slaves," as was described by the leader of the Opposition; but it is the majority of a House, which, according to old parliamentarians, constitutes one of the most intelligent and patriotic assemblies that ever sat in Canada. If ever the French minority had an occasional chance of ruling it would not abuse it. Its unsurpassed generosity towards other races, where it is the controlling power, constitutes an everlasting monument that no penny-a-liner can either deface or destroy. And were it disposed to be either unjust or intolerant, we know that no such temper would be tolerated by our English fellow-citizens, who, however divided by party lines and barriers, know of no division when the interests of John Bull are supposed to be imperilled. Why then is the Liberal party raising the cry of French domination? They raise it for mere electoral and political purposes? They raise it to wake up animosities that should have been buried for ever. They raise it to divert the public mind from the real issues of the day—to make the people forget, if possible, the great boon of the National Policy, and that they are now, instead of suffering from poverty and depression, enjoying unusual prosperity, and, instead of huge deficits, large surpluses—that they are ruled now by statesmen who are not mere muddlers of figures, nor mere flies on the wheel, but who are statesmen successfully working out the great and glorious destinies of Canada. Power is their sole object. Power is their magnetic pole. To reach power they will sacrifice everything. To reach power they deposed their former leader, and now they extol him to the skies. He may well exclaim: "Save me from such friends." To reach power they are prepared to sow the seeds of civil war, to set Province against Province, Creed against Creed, Englishmen against Frenchmen, to shake the very foundations of our political system, to break up the Union. The hon. leader of the Opposition will claim, perhaps, that he is not responsible for the utterances of the Globe and the Grit press. I know that before his promotion to that distinguished and responsible position—which I sincerely trust for the good of the country he will occupy for a great many years—he was accused by that very paper of delivering "disturbing speeches," one of which I presume was the Aurora speech; but I believe his views and those of that organ are now quite in accord. The hon. gentleman has been trumpeting his views over one-half the Dominion, the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and even the Atlantic coast have resounded with the echoes of his eloquence—but he never thought proper to state in his numberless harangues that he had no sympathy with that cry of French domination. The hon. gentleman visited Montreal before the last local elections of Quebec, to organize, or rather to reorganize a much disorganized and dispirited party, and I trust he is satisfied with the result of his labors. He then could exclaim at the end of a speech: Moi aussi, je suis Canadien, "I also am a Canadian;" but he did not dare to oppose the power behind the Throne and satisfy the legitimate anxiety of his French supporters in that Province, by stating that he had no sympathy with that anti-French policy. The hon. gentleman, who knows so well how to make prospective judges "speak now," could not find a word to say for the poor Frenchman. I will have to conclude that, though not willing to sow the wind he is desirous to reap the whirlwind, though he will not himself plant the bad tree of discord in our midst, he has not the slightest objection to gather the bad fruit. If the hon. leader of the Opposition has no sympathy with that cry of French domination, how is it that not only the Grit papers, but some of the most active members of his party have denounced from the hustings and in the Local Legislature, that so-called threatening French domination? How is it that the hon. the Secretary of State has been grossly insulted by a member of the Local Government on the sole account of his origin, that Mr. James Young, a former member of this House, and one of the most prominent supporters of the Government in the Local Legislature of Ontario, has used the following language in the debate on the Address on the 18th January last:—

"In the old Province of Canada Sir John kept office for fifteen years by denying the rights of Ontario to obtain a French Canadian majority, and his action on the boundary award was evidently dictated by the same motives. . . . The Government at Ottawa evidently hoped to ingratiate themselves into the confidence of other Provinces, and particularly Quebec, by dismembering Ontario and cutting it down to one-half its actual size."

If the hon. leader of the Opposition has no sympathy with that cry, how is it that the hon. member for Centre Huron has qualified the French Conservative party in this House as a small selfish clique. Here are the very words uttered by him in the last debate on the boundary question:

"I do not believe that the majority of the people of Quebec grudge us our rights, but I do fear, from past experience, that there is a small, selfish clique in Quebec who desire to deprive Ontario of her rights in this matter; and I fear they have too much influence in deciding this question in the councils of the Dominion."

If the hon. leader of the Opposition has no sympathy with that cry, how is it that another of his colleagues, the hon. member for North Norfolk, is reported to have uttered the following observation—not from his seat in the House; I do not believe he would dare to use such language from his seat in this House—but in a stump speech delivered a fortnight before the opening of this House at Aylmer, county of Elgin. He said:

"Why should Ontario submit to such injustice? It is the Province that pays three-fifths of the revenue of the Dominion; it is the heart of Canadian virtue, intelligence and enterprise, and it intends to assert its rights. It has long enough been made the catspaw of French lickspittles, and build the harbors and public works of Quebec."

I do not wish to misrepresent the hon. gentleman; but if he has really used that language, even in a stump speech, even in the backwoods, I can only say as a member of this House that it is to be regretted that a man of the ability and standing of that hon. gentleman, who pretends to possess liberal and broad views, should have so forgotten himself as to use such coarse and unjust language towards a race which deserves better treatment—a language which I am sure, if it has been really used by the hon. gentleman, will be resented by every Frenchman worthy of that name. If I am told that it is not incumbent on the hon. leader of the Opposition to stand by my countrymen when they are unfairly and unjustly assailed, when they are treated, for instance, as they were by the hon. gentleman for North Norfolk, as lick-spittles, such an excuse could not be urged in behalf of the member for Quebec East. Still that hon. gentleman, who is supposed to be entrusted with a peculiar mission in this House, has remained as silent on that most important point as his hon. leader—I will not say his master—although that would be a very fitting return for the epithet of slave addressed to us by the hon. leader of the Opposition. One would have thought, however, that the hon. gentleman had made sufficient sacrifices to please his leader. Was it not enough that he should have sacrificed the views of his party, or rather the remnant of his party—and even that remnant is not always true to the hon. gentleman—on a most important question, the question of protection to Canadian interests, without accepting silently the most humiliating role which has been assigned to him. No, my hon. friend and his friends are party to a comedy which is being played by the opponents of the Government at the expense of the people at large. Let me draw the attention of the House to the fact that while the Liberals of Ontario claim that Quebec reigns supreme, the Liberals of Quebec contend loudly that their Province is shamefully neglected by the Government, and that Ontario secures for herself the lion's share. In this way the Liberal party have pursued a wholesale policy of deception. They can exhibit at one time what the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) would call the two sides of the shield, in one Province the silver side and in the other Province the brazen side. To prove my assertion let me quote another article of the Globe of the 30th January last:

"Sir John A. Macdonald has thrown overboard every affectation of regard for Ontario, given up even the wish to conciliate this Province and now looks for his main force to Quebec. By bribery and political arts he trusts to keep ranged alongside his Bleus a sufficient number of members from Ontario and the other Provinces to give him a working majority. Sir George E. Cartier promised his followers that they should rule the Confederation, and by the aid of Sir John the pledge is at present being fulfilled with a vengeance."

As a matter of history, Sir George E. Cartier never promised, and never could have promised his followers in this country that they would rule under Confederation. That assertion is a deliberate falsehood, a deliberate perversion of facts. That great patriot promised his fellow-countrymen that under Confederation their rights as a distinct race in this country would be protected, and but for that solemn pledge which was given to them the French Canadians never would have consented to enter the Union. But, unfortunately, the French Canadians have to come to the conclusion that that pledge will not be respected by the Liberal party. Sir, at the time of Confederation one of their leaders, the late hon. George Brown, stated in a speech that the people of Lower Canada had consented to enter the Union, had consented to concede representation by population to the Province of Ontario on the express condition that Quebec would have an equality of representation in the Upper House. Here are the very words of Mr. Brown:

"Our friends from Lower Canada have agreed to give us representation by population to the Lower House on the express condition that they should have equality of representatives in the Upper House."

Well, do we not know that the Liberal party is striving to-day for the abolition of the Senate, which would be a violation of the Federal Act and a breach of faith fraught with the most alarming consequences, and tantamount to a dissolution of this Union. But even the maintenance of the Union does not much concern our friends opposite. At the present moment I see unfurled in the city of Montreal the flag of independence, and they mean to cheer with the hon. Mr. Jones, a former member of a Liberal Cabinet, when the British flag shall be hauled down from the citadel of Halifax. Now, Sir, that we have fully ascertained, according to the Grit papers and the Grit politicians, that the Premier of this Dominion is sold to the Province of Quebec, is sold to the "lick-spittles" of Quebec, to use the delicate expression of the hon. member for North Norfolk.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is an expression I have no recollection of having used. I disclaim the language attributed to me by the hon. gentleman. A report of my remarks on that occasion was made by a person who at the time was a stranger to me, I never revised them, and I disclaim the words which have been put into my mouth. I never used them with reference to the French Canadians or, to my recollection, with reference to anybody else. I should be sorry to use so vulgar an expression, and if I had done so I should feel it my duty to make an apology.

Mr. ARKELL. I wish to inform the hon. gentleman that I have his speech here word for word, as published in his own organ, the St. Thomas Journal.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have just referred to that speech, and stated that the report of that speech had never been revised by me, and was not authorized.

Mr. TASSÉ. I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that he never uttered that language, which would have been most abusive to my countrymen, and which would, I am sure, be resented by every one of them. If I have cited that language it is because in the debate on the boundary question, these very words were quoted by an hon. member from the speech of the hon. gentleman, and that I find those words in the report of the Hansard. I am sorry my hon. friend has not taken an earlier opportunity to say that the language attributed to him was not used by him on that occasion. Well, now, let us see the other side of the shield as it has been exhibited lately to the electors of the Province of Quebec by a French Liberal paper, La Concorde, of Three Rivers. The article which I will cite has been complacently reproduced in the organ of my hon. friend for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), L'Electeur, and also in La Patrie, of Montreal, which is the recognized Liberal organ of that district, and it will be quoted by the supporters of my hon. friend on all the hustings of that Province. Let us see the article in that paper which will be an antidote to the French domination cry:

"Never since the 17th September, 1878—the date of the last Conservative victory—has Lower Canada been so clumsily and so openly ill-treated as ever it was or probably ever it will be. Is it not a fact that the Macdonald-Langevin Cabinet has refused to our French Canadian members nine-tenths of the requests made them on behalf of their constituents? Is it not a fact that the present Government refused Mr. Vallee's application for a subsidy in favor of the Lake St. John Railway? Is it not a fact that the Government refused Mr. Lanary's request that it should build the St. Charles Branch? Did it not refuse Mr. Casgrain the building of a station at Elgin in the county of L'Islet? Did it not refuse Mr. Bourbeau the printing of pamphlets on the cultivation of tobacco, beet-root and agriculture generally? Did it not refuse Mr. Gigault the dredging of the Chambly River? Did it not refuse Mr. Bergeron the widening of the Beauharnois Canal? Did it not refuse Mr. Mongenais the building of the Cedars Canal? Did it not refuse Mr. Lanary the building of railway stations at St. Francis and at St. Peter in his county? Did it not refuse Mr. Hurteau the dredging of the Assomption River? Did it not refuse Mr. Bourbeau the printing and distributing of pamphlets which would make our mines known? Did it not refuse Mr. Bergeron the building of a line between Lachine and Caughnawaga to facilitate winter navigation? Did it not refuse Mr. Grandbois the erection of a lighthouse at Rivière du Loup? Did it not refuse (Mr. Vanasse, we believe) the abolition of duties on Canadian tobacco? Did it not refuse Mr. Mousseau help for the people burnt out at Upton, St. Helene and St. Liboire in 1880? Is it not a fact that the Geological Museum, an institution belonging to Montreal, a Lower Canadian city, has been removed to Ottawa, an Upper Canadian city, by this same Conservative Government? Is it not true that several unjust refusals made by French Canadians are so flagrant that they have been loudly denounced by the Courier de Montreal, by Senator Bellerose and other authorized persons? Lastly, is it not true that the influence of the Province of Quebec at Ottawa, amounts to a cypher to-day, as is shown by the distribution of portfolios under the present régime and that under the Mackenzie Administration? Liberal régime: Hon. L. S. Huntington, Post Office; Hon. W. Laurier, Inland Revenue; Hon. R. Lafamme, Justice; Hon. C. A. Pelletier, Agriculture. Conservative régime: Hon. A. P. Caron, Militia; Sir H. Langevin, Public Works; Hon. J. H. Pope, Agriculture; Hon. J. A. Mousseau, Secretary of State; or two portfolios to-day against the four we had formerly. Can we ever be more crushed, more powerless and more neglected than we are in the year of our Lord, 1882, under the reign of these political pigmies whose names are Langevin and Mousseau? Let electors remember this."

I will not enter into the merit of these articles. They speak for themselves. They are nothing but shams, but frauds. I have cited them to expose the baseless tactics to which the Liberals are resorting to excite sectional jealousies against the Government. Such electoral dodges may succeed with some, but I trust that the vast majority of the electors are too intelligent to fall again into the trap laid for them. I see that a great fuss is made to-day by the Liberal party in relation to various matters touching the autonomy of the Provinces. Well, Sir, I am a Federalist in the fullest sense of the word. I am quite ready at any time to uphold the letter as well as the spirit of the Constitution. I regard the Act of Union as the true charter of our liberties. I regard our system as more perfect than the British or the American Constitution. I regard it as an improvement on both. But let me warn those who are raising this cry of French domination, that they are acting as the worst enemies of the Provinces, as the worst enemies of the Constitution. When the great scheme of Confederation was discussed, one of the main reasons urged by the late Hon. George Brown for its adoption was the following:

"I favor this plan because it will put an end to the warfare between Upper and Lower Canada. A most happy day will it be for Canada when this Bill goes into effect, and all the subjects of discord are swept from the discussion of our Legislature."

Well, it must be evident to every one that in prosecuting their mischievous work, in arousing Ontario against Quebec, the Liberal party is assuming a most dangerous responsibility and destroying one of the very objects for which Confederation was established, which was to put an end to the irreconcilable strifes of the old Provinces. There are some who hold that national distinctions should not be made or recognized, but I could not favor such a view. These distinctions alone have created Confederation. But for them a Legislative Union would have been established. They are essentially a part of our political system. But for them I could not speak here my own language when I choose to do so. But for them the practice of having three French members in the Cabinet would not prevail. But for them you would not perhaps, Mr. Speaker, occupy to-day the proud position of First Commoner—a position for which you are so eminently fitted otherwise. But for them it would not have been necessary to enact that the limits of twelve counties in Quebec—another safeguard against French domination—could not be altered without the assent of a majority of their members. I have no hesitation to state, Mr. Speaker, that if this Union is to be maintained, we must take into account these distinctions as much as possible. This Union rests on a diversity of interests, national, religious, educational and social, and these interests must be represented. Those conversant with history know that one of the main causes of the political commotion of 1837 was the fact that the French element was not fairly represented in the Legislative Council or in the Public Service. That grievance is set forth in very strong terms in the celebrated ninety-five Resolutions adopted by the Legislative Assembly of Lower Canada in 1833. Those conversant with history know also that when that worthy Governor, Sir Charles Bagot, undertook with so much success to conciliate Lower Canada, one of his first acts was to confer some of the most important offices on those in whom the people had the greatest confidence. Let us not repeat that page of our history. Let us benefit by experience. It is true that these distinctions of race may complicate to a certain extent the problems of government, but their inconveniences are counterbalanced by still greater advantages. Lord Dufferin has, expressing an opinion on that subject well worth recalling, said:

"I do not think that ethnological homogeneity is an unmixed benefit to a country. Certainly the least attractive characteristic of a great portion of this continent is the monotony of many of its outward aspects, and I consider it fortunate for Canada that her prosperity should be founded on the co-operation of different races. The interaction of national idiosyncrasies introduces into our existence a freshness, a variety, a color, an eclectic impulse which otherwise would be wanting; and it would be most faulty statesmanship to seek their obliteration. My warmest aspiration for that Province has always been to see its French inhabitants executing for Canada the functions which France herself has so admirably performed for Europe."

Before concluding I will take this opportunity to refer to a statement made some time ago by the hon. leader of the Opposition, in the course of an answer to the congratulatory address presented to him by the Liberal Association of Ottawa:

"I thank you for the very kindly allusion to my father. I am old enough to remember, though I was but a young lad at the time, those days in which we took part in the great events to which your address has alluded. I was in Montreal a portion of the time, and saw and was much with some of the leaders of that day, Mr. Lafontaine and Mr. Baldwin. I remember the spirit which animated these men then and for some time afterwards. I remember the strong phalanx of Lower Canada Liberals who were then the backbone of Liberal Government."

Times have changed, as, no doubt, the hon. gentleman feels it severely when he contemplates the much mutilated band from Lower Canada—not even a corporal's guard—which surrounds him. But how can he expect that this small band will ever become the backbone of the Liberal party with the daily and violent onslaughts of his press and of his colleagues against the so-called "French domination." I only wonder that he can obtain support at all from that quarter. The hon. member for Quebec East, who was present on that occasion, in order to encourage the few French Liberals of the Ottawa district, not only endorsed the statement of his leader, but even expressed the conviction that "if the grand old leaders, Baldwin and Lafontaine, returned to earth they would not be found in the ranks of the so-called Liberal-Conservative party, but among the Liberals who believed not in legislating for personal aggrandizement, but for the greatest good of the greatest number." Truly, Mr. Speaker, Lafontaine and Baldwin were two great men. Their names cannot be too much honored, too much respected. Their names will be forever enshrined into the hearts of a grateful people. Both will occupy a high place in the Canadian Pantheon. But why should the hon. member for Quebec East insult their memory in stating that if they were living to-day they would be found in the ranks of the Grit party. Baldwin was a Liberal, but he was not a Grit. He was chased out of public life by a Grit. Lafontaine was a Liberal in the broadest sense of the word, but he was not a Rouge. Lafontaine was the embodiment of the political unity of his race, and that unity was broken by the friends of the hon. member for Quebec East. His bitterest enemies were the Radicals, headed by Mr. Papineau, whom the hon. member for Quebec East seems to discard, to repudiate now. Lafontaine has founded a political creed which is the creed of the French Conservatives of to-day; his associates and his disciples were the Morins, the Tachés, the Cartiers who have been, with this great man, the real founders of the French Conservative party. If any one doubts that Lafontaine was opposed in the most violent manner by the party represented now by the hon. member for Quebec East, the following extracts from Le Pays and L'Avenir—the French Liberal organs at that time—will show to what extent the leaders of the Opposition misrepresent history in claiming Lafontaine as one of them. On the 5th December, 1852, we find the following language used by Le Pays:

"Decentralization and democracy are one, but he who says centralization says despotism. Now, Mr. Lafontaine did nothing but centralize during four years, thus ignoring democracy. His supporters ignored it also. Centralization has always been to this country the hydra-headed monster of the fable, the beast with seven heads of the Apocalypse."

Now, what will one think of the Liberals who claim as their own a man whom formerly they charged with being not only a despot, but with having introduced into the country the hydra of the fable and the beast with seven heads. That is indeed a strange fashion of eulogizing one's leader. But let us proceed. In another number Le Pays, speaking of Mr. Lafontaine's retirement, says:

"Messrs. Lafontaine and Baldwin, the two most backward men in the late Administration, have both gone back to private life. Mr. Lafontaine, the greater tactician of the two, feigns ill-health; as to Mr. Baldwin, he was simply shown the door."

If the Liberal party do not understand the interests of the country, no party understand better how "to show the door to their leaders."

"Now, we are of those who believe that Lafontaine retired from public life simply because he had abandoned all hope of being able to continue his system of restricting the rights of the people, of invading the privileges of the House, and of increasing the prerogatives of the Ministers..... The Journal de Québec acquired its Conservative ideas at the school of the Baldwins and the Lafontaines."

On the 24th August, 1853, we also find:

"It is notorious that Mr. Lafontaine, notwithstanding the silence of his retirement, stood as a perpetual skeleton in the cupboard of the present Ministry. For us, we had no cause to fear Mr. Lafontaine, for his return to public life was an impossibility, owing to the principles with which he had tried to inculcate the Legislature during the last Parliament. We do not wish to say that Mr. Lafontaine would not have found an electoral division to return him to Parliament, but he could never have found in the House the elements wherewith to reconstitute the despised party which governed us from 1847 to 1851. Mr. Cauchon is the only member of that party who has remained in the House; and this small individuality, embodying in itself the debris of that party, could not send forth the slightest ray of hope."

Now, let us see the opinion expressed by L'Avenir, of the 5th October, 1850:

"The cause of Democracy is nothing new. From the day when these reactionary men (Baldwin and Lafontaine) shall fall, swept away by the flood of light of public opinion shed upon their deeds or by one of those occurrences in appearance accidental, and which no one can foresee, but which are so justly called providential, from that day our programme (that of democracy) will again be that of the mass of the French Canadian population."

I may observe here, that it is not surprising that our opponents should try to steal our mighty dead, when we see prominent members of the Liberal party eulogizing now the late lamented Sir George Cartier, whom they disparaged, whom they maligned in his lifetime, and even represented as the assassin of his nationality. But there is another reason why the Grits of Ontario and the Rouges of Quebec cannot claim Baldwin and Lafontaine as the founders of their party. These two great men would never, to rise to power, have attempted to kindle civil discord in our midst. Their whole political life was devoted to unite two races which had been so divided in the past. Their whole political life was imbued with the same lofty sentiment which animated a British Governor when he elevated a common monument to the memory of two great soldiers, who nobly fought and died for their country, Wolfe and Montcalm. Their whole political life was devoted to teach the people that a spirit of compromise, of mutual forbearance, is indispensable to the Government of this country. Their whole political life was devoted to obtain, to maintain and to extend the principle of responsible government, which Papineau and his party repudiated and which the Liberal party have endeavored to destroy by foul means. Baldwin would never have raised the sham cry of French domination. He who had been received with open arms by the county of Rimouski when rejected by his old supporters. Baldwin would never have aroused the prejudices of the people to reign thereby. No, he was too much the friend of truth, the friend of liberty, the friend of good government to assume the role of a demagogue. He had learned to appreciate the virtues of our race, and he knew that if they could be combined with the sterling qualities of the English-speaking race, we could stamp this half of a continent with the best features of the greatest peoples in the world. If the voice of the great Reformer could again resound in our Legislative Assemblies, it would be to denounce the Reform party as degenerated, as a party who has nothing to reform; to denounce the enemies of our country, those agitators, those demagogues who, regardless of consequences, under the false name of Liberals, are endeavoring to undermine, to destroy his noble work of the union of the various races which inhabit our young Dominion—a union which, I am proud to say, the Conservative party is still prosecuting with an undiminished vigor, under the safe guidance of its illustrious leader—a union which you will admit, Mr. Speaker, is necessary, is indispensable, if Canada is to become, what should be our common aim, our common ambition, a great, a glorious and a free country.

Mr. LAURIER. I have listened with a great deal of attention and a great deal of curiosity to the speech of the hon. gentleman, thinking that it would come to some conclusion, but I find that after a very laborious effort he has brought forth nothing, and that the only thing in his mind is a complaint that his countrymen and mine do not secure, at the hands of the Government, their legitimate share of the public patronage. I am aware that the question of patronage is always an absorbing question for the Conservative party, or at least for the Conservative party in my own Province. Whether my countrymen have or have not their legitimate share of patronage at the hands of this Government I do not care, and one would have thought by the lofty tone which the hon. gentleman has assumed that he would be above such matters. But it seems he attaches some importance to them, and let me tell him that he is committing an injustice to the Government of which he is a supporter. He has given us in detail the number of gentlemen of the French race employed in the several departments of the Government, but he has overlooked some of the most important of the employes of the House and the Government. He has forgotten to mention that all the correspondents of the French press of Lower Canada, who sit in this gallery, are employed as sessional clerks, and paid by this House. It is a fact, Sir, that ought to be known, and for which the Government which the hon. gentleman supports ought to have full credit. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would not take the trouble to answer the charges the hon. gentleman has made were it not for the fact that he has chosen to speak disparagingly of the party to which I belong. He has represented that we are merely a small band in this House. So we are, Mr. Speaker, but the Liberal party of the Province of Quebec have no reason to feel ashamed of their position. If we are but few in this House to-day it is because we have been decimated in the defence of a noble cause; because we have defended freedom and constitutional government against the attack of the party to which he belongs. The hon. gentleman says that the Grit press of Ontario makes appeals to the prejudices of their fellow-countrymen. If they do so—a matter which I do not know of, but which the hon. gentleman seems to have thoroughly investigated—he is right to denounce them, and I can only wish that he would only urge in the paper he edits that the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec should profess the same principles which he professes here. If we are decimated, is it not due to the fact that the press and the party to which he belongs have always traded on the prejudices of our people? The hon. gentleman and his party would not have a standing in this House, were it not that for the last twenty-five years they never dared to meet us on political questions, but have always appealed to the prejudices of our countrymen. Who can deny the fact? The hon. gentleman objects to the remark I made somewhere that if Baldwin and Lafontaine came back to this country, they would not recognize the party to which they belonged as their party. Can the charge be denied? Is it not a fact that the press to which the hon. gentleman belongs has always represented it a heresy to belong to the Liberal party or to be called a Liberal? When we attack the Government, when we condemn their principles, when we try to engage them in a battle on political grounds in the Province of Quebec, we are always met with the same cry: "These gentlemen are enemies of your religion, they are Liberals, and it is not possible for a Catholic to be a Liberal." How often have we not found these words in the press of the hon. gentleman. How often could I not find them, if I had time, in the very paper of which he is the editor. It is because of such cries that we are so few here to-day. But, as I said before, few as we are, I would rather stand here a defender of the rights obtained for us by our fathers than to belong to the so-called Conservative party of the Province of Quebec. Any hon. member of this House can judge what that party are by a single utterance that has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman. He has spoken with glee, with jubilation in his countenance as well as in his voice, of the fact that a large section of the French Liberals sitting on this side of the House voted against their party the other night on the boundary question. It is inconceivable to the average Conservative of the Province of Quebec that a man belonging to a party can be independent; he cannot realize that a man belonging to a party should vote according to his conscience. But we are Liberals, and it is our own pride that we will not submit our individual judgment to any man, living or dead, when we stand up and vote. We express what is in our consciences and our hearts. I voted on one side and some of my friends voted on the other side; but they never received a reproach from us, because we knew that they were voting according to their consciences. But not later than Friday last four hon. gentlemen opposite had the courage to do what our friends did, and the moment the whip was cracked over their heads, and the hon. gentleman who has just spoken knows it, they were driven into line again. If they were of the same metal as the hon. gentlemen on this side, I do not say that they would have voted otherwise, but they would not have submitted to have the whip cracked over their heads as it was done the other night. There is another remark in the hon. gentleman's speech to which I wish to take exception. I protest with all my heart and with all my might against his utterance regarding the Chief Justice of Quebec, Mr. Dorion, and I think the hon. gentleman himself ought to regret it. If there is a man in Lower Canada who has the esteem and respect of his fellow countrymen of all shades of opinion in politics and religion, it is the present Chief Justice—the hon. A. A. Dorion. What is the reproach attempted to be made on him by the hon. gentleman? The only reproach was that he said he had abandoned a political station to take a judicial station.

Mr. TASSÉ. After having stated in this House that no such appointment was contemplated.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, did he state an untruth? Will the hon. gentleman dare to make such an assertion?

Mr. LAURIER.

Will he question the word of the Chief Justice when he stated in this House that he did not contemplate taking such an appointment? Is it not a fact that a man can change his mind? I have been told several times that the Government which the hon. gentleman supported changed their minds between six and eight o'clock in the evening. If such a thing is possible, is it not too bad that the hon. gentleman should bring such a charge as that against the Chief Justice? Chief Justice Dorion said at one time that he did not contemplate taking office. I am sure he did not. At another time he accepted it, and how? I am sure I am not betraying any secret when I say that it was only at the earnest solicitation of his personal friends, and that he made a great sacrifice in doing so. He only transferred his usefulness from one sphere to another, and to-day I blush for my country, which possesses so few eminent men, to hear such charges brought against one of her worthy sons. The hon. gentleman has mentioned another name, that of Mr. Letellier. What has he to reproach him with? Is it accepting an office? What does he complain of in this case?

Mr. TASSÉ. With a very serious offence—with violating the grand principles of responsible government.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will not evade the question in that way. He did not make that charge, which now only comes in as an afterthought. Does he reproach him for accepting an office under the Crown? I am glad to see he has not the heart to repeat it again. It is a shame to make any such charge. Did the late Mr. Letellier commit any offence in this respect? Did he violate the laws of honor when he became the Lieutenant-Governor of his native Province? Not a charge circulated day after day in the press of the hon. gentleman against such men has a shred of foundation. This is a very serious charge, however; and the party opposite must be very much reduced indeed when it can stoop so low as to utter a name they should never mention in this House—the name of a man which their wicked persecution has driven into an early grave.

Mr. HOUDE. I must protest against the judgment passed by the hon. member for Quebec East, on the majority of his and my compatriots of Quebec. The smallness of the party of that hon. gentleman in this House, to which he alluded, is not due to the bigotry and intolerance of our party. I have been in many constituencies in Quebec, including those of my hon. friends from Iberville and St. John's, whom I see here present, but have never heard any French Conservative drag in religion on the hustings. But I have several times heard French Liberals introduce it and try to provoke and draw us on that ground. What is the cause of the present condition of that party? The member for Quebec East himself, in an eloquent lecture which he delivered five years ago before a Liberal Club in Quebec, the Club Canadien, acknowledged that the founders of the Liberal party of to-day were so extreme in 1848, 1850 and 1852, and so radical, that they not only frightened the Catholic clergy but the Protestant citizens of Canada, and especially of Lower Canada. Though he might be reproached for it, he had to acknowledge the fact, saying there was more honor in acknowledging a truth than trying to conceal it. He also explained why the Protestant Conservatives of Quebec were united with the French Conservatives—namely, because they liked liberty and also liked order; and it was because they were in favor of order and well understood liberty, that they were obliged to stand against the new Liberal or Radical party. I am glad to say that that party was modified as to its political aspirations and utterances as time passed. It is possible that in some instances members of that party may have suffered an injustice from illegitimate fears in regard to them. But whose fault was it? The fault of the founders themselves, whose extreme principles were so dangerous that my hon. friend himself, in spite of all the respect and esteem he always entertained for them and enjoyed at their hands, was obliged to repudiate. The reason the Quebec Liberals in Parliament are so few is, that they made promises to the people of their Province when they propounded what they called the National Policy in 1871 and 1872—this name was not invented by the Conservatives, but by my hon. friend and his supporters themselves; and when they came to power in 1873 and 1874, they failed to carry them out. When the day of trial and the day of judgment came, they were found wanting by the electors, and most of them were condemned to exclusion from Parliament. I know that in every party there are extreme men, including the Conservative party, although in far smaller number than amongst its opponents. But to-day, look at those extreme men who have been found occasionally in our ranks. They are in complete accord with the friends of my hon. friend the member for Quebec East. Take the Canadien of Quebec and its mighty editor Mr. Tarte. With whom is he and all his party acting to-day? They are entirely in accord with the chief of my hon. friend in the Province of Quebec, the hon. Mr. Joly. My hon. friend and his friends are not so scrupulous as to prevent them using these extreme men for their political ends. During the election—I should say defeat—of my hon. friend in Arthabaska, in 1877, I heard there a Liberal leader, and later on in 1879, another Liberal leader, both of my own origin, speaking of the leader of the Conservative party in terms of fanatical abuse which no Conservative speakers or organs in the Province of Quebec ever used towards their opponents. It is a well-known fact, both in and outside this House, that the hon. member for Lambton, when leader of his party, and the hon. member for West Durham as leader of that same party, have always been respected by French Conservatives. We believe it to be our duty to oppose their policy because we do not think it is in the interest of the country, but we have always respected those hon. gentlemen. I shall not make the hon. member for Quebec East responsible for the utterances of Mr. Langelier on the occasion I have just alluded to, but I wish to remind him that if there was a small number of our own compatriots who have forgotten themselves so far as to abuse political opponents, they are not on our side. I am glad to say, to the honor of my compatriots, that in spite of all the eloquence of the hon. member for Quebec East and his prestige personally and as a Minister of the Crown, he could not receive any benefit from such fanatical utterances as those made by the Hon. Mr. Langelier, and repeated two years after by the Hon. Mr. Mercier. What did they say? They represented the hon. leader of the Conservative party as a man who was trying to put the rope around the neck of the French Canadian nationality, and wishing to walk knee-deep in their blood. Was that worthy of men who call themselves the most liberal, in fact the only liberal class in the Province of Quebec? We are represented by the friends of the hon. member for Quebec East in Ontario, especially the Reform press, as enemies to progress, as retrograde and as bigoted. Well, can they cite a single instance, when we tried to deprive any of our compatriots of other creeds or origins of their legitimate rights or of rights which we wished to enjoy ourselves? Never. More than that, when the question was before the country of encouraging progress, building up this great Confederation, acquiring and opening up the great North-West, it was the French Conservatives and not the Liberals who favoured those measures. The Liberals opposed almost every enterprise of progress from the Grand Trunk to the Pacific Railway. I think the hon. member for Quebec East will regret of the judgment he has just passed in the heat of debate on the mass of his countrymen of French origin in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I have to solicit the hon. Minister of Finance for another nationality. We have had a field night for the Irish nationality, and I may say we occupied the time very well indeed. We have had a field night for the French nationality, and my hon. friend has done credit to his race. Would not the hon. Minister of Finance give us a field night for the Scotch, the despised Scotch, who are not represented in Parliament or anywhere else according to their capacity, and who are not represented in the Departments as they ought to be. But if I talk in the classic language of my native country and speak to any man in Scotch, there is not a single one who can answer me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You do not go to the Department of the Interior.

Mr. ROSS. I know the hon. Minister of the Interior could do it. That accounts for his nationality. But I know there is scarcely an individual—only one to my certain knowledge in all the Departments, among the 585 quoted by the hon. member for Ottawa—who can use these classic terms, who can speak in that language in which a man can neither lie nor swear; and I think the hon. Minister should give us a night for that nationality. Why is it that we have had such a séance—I was almost going to call it a farce—as we have had here to-night in the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa? I must not be unkind, I must not be severe; he has been so kind and polished himself; but is it not, after all, a farce to keep the House of Commons in session nearly two hours to hear a grievance that no person complains of but the hon. gentleman himself. Surely his nationality are quite able to take care of themselves outside the House as well as in it without such a cry for political pap, without such a shriek for political patronage, without such an appeal to this House and to the people of Ontario, not to speak so unkindly of the French population. Sir, what we have heard spoken by the hon. member for Ottawa, from the political standpoint, was the strongest charge any hon. gentleman could make against the party the hon. gentleman supports. His leader and his party have been in power since Confederation, and for many years before; and if the French element, that I appreciate very highly, that I respect very highly, is not properly represented in the various Departments of the Dominion, to whom is it due? Is it owing to the Liberal party that the Senate does not contain more French Senators? Is it owing to the Liberal party that the various Departments are not better stocked with French officers, many of them very competent and capable? Surely not. Then it must follow from the argument of the hon. gentleman that if the French element is not properly represented in the various Departments his party is responsible for it, his leader is responsible for it, and he, notwithstanding that gross insult heaped upon that heroic race, in supporting the hon. leader and blaming the Liberal party. Every citation from statistics and from the Departments to which he referred is but another argument to show that, notwithstanding the fact that the French of Quebec have kept his leader in power since Confederation, and keep him there to-day, that leader and that party are committing that great wrong of which the hon. member for Ottawa is such a distinguished representative. I want the hon. gentleman to reflect upon that simple fact; although he spoke of the people of Ontario, of whom I am an humble representative, as bigoted, I think he will find, if he visits Ontario, as much toleration, both religious and political toleration, as there is in any Province under the sun.

Mr. TASSÉ. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me. I never said the people of Ontario were bigoted. I said that the Grit press was bigoted, that the Grit orators were bigoted, and I repeat it.

Mr. ROSS. The statement is true as respects the Conservative press and the Conservative orators; they are bigoted as well as the Grit press and orators, as the hon. gentleman kindly calls them. But I took the words of the hon. gentleman down. He was referring to the people of Ontario and he spoke of them in this way "The bigotry of that race." Now, the race of the people of Ontario is Anglo-Saxon.

Mr. TASSÉ. No; I was mentioning the Globe and the Free Press, and I said such is the bigotry of that party that even the name of my hon. friend the Secretary of State has been cited by the Globe to scare the good people of Ontario. That is what I said.

Mr. ROSS. I would be very happy to accept the hon. gentleman's explanation, but that is not as I took his words at the time. The words struck me as out of tone with the general course of the hon. gentleman's remarks. It may have been a slip of the tongue, but if he denies the statement, I am very glad to stand corrected, as I would be sorry to charge the hon. gentleman with anything like intolerance. I have only formed the acquaintance of the French people since I came into this House, and I do not find any bigotry nor intolerance on their part, but I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that, I think, we have grown too large now as a people, we have tried too long as a part of this Confederation, of which the hon. gentleman spoke in such glowing terms, to waste our time in talking about these little national differences. Are we French? Are we Dutch, or Irish, or English here? I say no, I say we are Canadians here; and my idea in regard to political appointments is this, not is this man an Irish Catholic, is he a Protestant, or is he a Frenchman, but is he capable of discharging the duties of that office? That is my idea. I am sorry that at this stage of Confederation, when we are endeavoring to establish its prosperity, when we are, as it were, poising our wings to show the strength and vigor of our flight, that an hon. gentleman of the capacity and the talent and the culture of the hon. member for Ottawa, should raise such a cry as the French domination cry, the lack of French patronage and the lack of French sympathy. If there is any way by which the great work of national consolidation can be prevented, if there is any way by which national desires can be prevented, it is by taking a course such as the hon. gentleman has taken. Though I may not be old enough in years to lecture the hon. gentleman, he will allow me to express my sentiments, and to tell him, frankly and earnestly, that I do not believe this is the place to raise these sectional cries, nor is this the place to call attention to those little differences of race and nationality, which, after all, amount to little in the great problem of making out our national existence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no motion before the House. The hon. gentleman on his right had made certain observations, and as a general rule those observations are not replied to.

Several hon. MEMBERS. No, no, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Allow me to proceed. As a general rule those observations are not replied to, but if the nature of those observations are such as obviously to call for a reply the reply is recorded, but it is always limited to two or three speeches before proceeding to the Orders of the Day. I think that is the constitution of the law.

Mr. BLAKE. No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I know it is.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not at all understand it as the hon. gentleman has stated it. On the motion to go into Committee of Supply it is competent to any hon. gentleman to raise a debate upon any question of general public interest, and I could discuss the question which the hon. gentleman has started if the hon. gentleman had not started it. We can all discuss everything, and after this every hon. gentleman man could discuss more than the measure before the House. It is not the first person who happens to catch your eye that has the exclusive right to discuss a question of grievance. But after a motion is put into your hands no further motion can be proposed in amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply. If that motion is withdrawn or carried then it is competent to make another motion to go into Committee of Supply. That one hon. member should occupy the attention of the House and state his views upon some subject, without an opportunity for criticism being allowed to the other side, is not in accordance with common sense, with fair play or the rules of the House as I understand them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman need not misrepresent me. I did not rise to a point of order. I simply said that the practice in the English House of Commons was, whenever such questions arose, as they did every Session, and there was not a motion, after two or three speeches, it is considered a matter of practice that the regular business of the House should go on. I am not mistaken about this question of practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman may be mistaken, for he has been mistaken before. On June 13th, 1845—to quote from English Hansard:

"On motion to go into Committee of Supply Sir H. W. Barron called the attention of the House to the state of the Irish fisheries. A debate took place, at the conclusion of which, Sir Charles Napier (who had already spoken) rose to bring forward the subject of the defences of the Natal forts and arsenals.

"The Speaker ruled that the hon. member, having spoken already, had lost his opportunity. It was not objected that he had no right to speak, but that he could not speak twice on the one motion to go into Committee of Supply."

A gentleman had lost the opportunity, having already spoken. Any hon. member, except that hon. gentleman, could speak. The First Minister will admit he was mistaken for once.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Then, how long are the speeches to be? Who are to measure the length? Who is to apply the test? Is the Speaker to be charged with that responsibility? I had no intention of speaking on this subject, and therefore I will not do so now. I simply make this remark. The hon. gentleman was so unjust as to attack the memory of the dead and to attack the living who are absent. With respect to the accusation that Sir A. Dorion is not quite honest in his declaration on the subject of his appointment, I explained, in reply to the leader of the Government who made a statement of that kind, that the subject of his appointment with the Chief Justiceship was never discussed between Sir A. A. Dorion and myself or any member of the Government until some days after prorogation. When I first mentioned it to him, with that generosity which always characterized him, he at first declined, and I asked him to reconsider it at the request of his friends. I regret that such a scandal, for it is a scandal, should be applied to Sir A. A. Dorion, for whom I have the greatest possible veneration—a man whose name is a household word through Upper and Lower Canada, who would at any time have been elected for an Ontario constituency, as a man whose patriotism was above suspicion, and whose character was beyond reproach. I regret exceedingly I should have occasion again to vindicate him.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. First Minister is mistaken in the rule laid down by him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I laid down no rule. I merely stated what the English practice was.

Mr. MILLS. If it is not intended that we should follow the English practice, I am mistaken as to the intentions of the hon. gentleman. The English practice is, on motions to go into Committee of Supply, that it is the right of members to discuss any grievance whatever, and although, as the hon. member for Lambton has said, the party who has spoken once on the subject is not at liberty to speak a second time, yet upon it members of the House may continue the discussion as to the particular grievance which is under consideration; or the discussion may be continued on a new subject introduced.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I desire to offer a few remarks on the question before the House. I did not happen to be in my seat when the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé) made his speech, but I was informed that he complained bitterly that the French people of the Province of Quebec, in the distribution of patronage, did not get their right share. We all know that for the last twenty-five or thirty years, with the exception of five years the Conservative party, the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs, have been in power, if the French population of our Province do not get their legitimate share of the Government patronage the hon. member must throw the blame on those who lead the party to which he belongs. I am told also that the hon. member complained of the fact that some Liberals voted with the Government on the question of the boundaries of Ontario. Well, surely the hon. gentleman should praise us for having voted with him and his friends on that question. I will tell the hon. member for Ottawa, and the hon. leader of the House, that when I gave that vote I did it conscientiously and because I thought the proposition was a reasonable one under the circumstances. I belong to the Liberal party. As a general rule I will support my party; but while I belong to a party I do not consider I am the slave of any party or any man, and it has been my practice, whenever I thought I could not conscientiously vote with my friends, never to hesitate in recording my vote with my opponents. The hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Houde), in the course of his remarks, seemed to deny the assertion made by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) that the general course pursued by the Conservative party had been to appeal to the prejudices of the people and to their religious feelings. He said that he went to several counties, even to the county of Iberville, and in the county of Iberville he had never heard a speech about religion on the hustings. Of course, the hon. gentleman never heard such a speech in Iberville. I met the hon. member there, and I am sure he told the truth when he said he never heard in that county a religious speech on the hustings. Such is not our practice in that county. An attempt to do so was once made, but the intelligent electors frowned it down, declaring they would not have an appeal made to their religious feelings on account of politics. I wish all the electors of Quebec were sufficiently well educated to know that they can be Liberals without jeopardizing their souls. In Iberville they know they can belong to the Liberal party and be good Catholics at the same time, but we know it is not so in all constituencies. In several constituencies in Quebec where the Conservative element is predominant it is not so. The newspapers tell us that in a large number of constituencies appeals have been made to religious feelings in favor of the Conservative party, and that party have received the benefit of that practice. If the hon. gentleman will read the history of an election investigation which took place a few years ago, he will find that appeals were constantly made to religious prejudices and to such an extent that the election has been annulled after being decided. Will the hon. gentleman deny that it is a fact that in many constituencies appeals were made to religious principles in favor of the Conservative party. I do not wish to be understood as drawing any blame upon our clergy, who, as a body, are entitled to our respect; but while we know that many of them were wise enough to shut their mouths and keep away from mixing in election strifes, others participated in these contests and decided elections in favor of the Conservative party. So much was this the case, that last fall decrees came from the Court of Rome forbidding the clergy from taking part in the elections in the Province of Quebec. Why were these decrees published? Obviously because information had been received at Rome that great abuses had taken place with regard to that question. The hon. gentleman said that the founders of the Liberal party preached doctrines which frightened the priests and a large number of the Catholics of the Province, and that that was the principal cause of our small numbers in this House. I do not know whom the hon. gentleman means by founders of the Liberal party. I have always thought that formerly the greatest man of the Liberal party was Papineau, and after him, as the re-organizers of that party, after the rebellion of 1837, came Lafontaine, Morin and others in the Province of Quebec. Afterwards Mr. Dorion was the leader of the party; and I have yet to learn that any one of these illustrious men ever preached or expounded any doctrine which was of such a character as to frighten the conscience of any man in the Province of Quebec. My hon. friend said that another cause of our being small in numbers in this House was the fact that a few years ago—

Mr. HOUDE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to explain. I did not say that that was the principal cause of the small number of the Liberal party in this House. I said that the principal reason was that they had repudiated the National Policy, which had formerly been propounded by the same party.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I accept the hon. gentleman's correction, but I do not believe that the Liberal party as a party ever propounded the National Policy. I have been informed, and I know that a few men in that party have expressed opinions in that sense. We know that very well, but these men were few. They were not the Liberal party, and I maintain that so long as a doctrine has not been propounded to the people as the doctrine of a party it cannot be considered as accepted by the party. The National Policy was never propounded to the people by the Liberal party. There were several men who expressed their individual opinions in that direction, some of them of high standing, I admit; but the National Policy was never accepted by the Liberal party.

Mr. CASEY. I am afraid the speech of my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Tassé) was not caused so much by the existence of a sectional feeling between Ontario and Quebec as because there is too little of that feeling, and my hon. friend is anxious to stir up a feeling which did not previously exist. I hope he has found by the response he has met with by the French Canadian members on this side that there is no possibility of the success of such tactics. There were times when English children used to be frightened by the bogie of Napoleon Bonaparte, or Boney, as they used to call him; but my hon. friend is trying to frighten the French Canadians by the spectre of Gritism. It may be on account of attacks made on himself by certain newspapers printed in the English language that his bill has been stirred up on this occasion. I do not say that those attacks were justifiable or that they were not, but it does not follow that because the hon. gentleman was attacked by an English newspaper that the French race generally was attacked by the English-speaking people or their press. The hon. gentleman's case is an exceptional one, and there are very few of the French members in this House who have drawn on themselves attacks by the English-speaking papers. It is easy, of course, to cull from the newspapers which the hon. gentleman sees in his capacity as editor, a lot of articles which appear to reflect on the French nationality; but if he will take the average editorials in the English-speaking papers in Ontario he will find that the number of attacks on the English members of the Cabinet are much more numerous than those on the French members—in fact, it is an exception when a French member is attacked. Of course, we must draw the inference that the English-speaking members of the Cabinet commit the greatest number of atrocities—using that word, of course, in a jocular sense. It is an utterly artificial and forced effort on the part of the hon. member to make it appear that there is any such thing as a general attack on the French-speaking members or on the French nationality by the press of Ontario. It would have been easy at different times to cull quite as strong a list from the French newspapers pitching into the Grit party, or into the race which inhabits Ontario, but nobody would believe from that that there was any sectional feeling in Quebec against Ontario. Nobody in Ontario fancies that the people of Quebec have any special grudge against us on account of our nationality or religion, and it would be absurd to try to make the people of Ontario believe any such thing. My hon. friend from Lambton spoke truly, when he said that Mr. Dorion could have stood for any Liberal constituency in Ontario. The same is true of many French members on both sides of this House. The hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. Minister of Militia, can boast of many personal friends they made on their trips last year. They were received as well as if they were English-speaking Ministers; and these hon. gentlemen would be gladly elected in a Conservative constituency of Ontario, if circumstances required them to go there. But if anything could stir up any of the feeling the hon. gentleman objects to, it would be the sort of attack he has made to-night. I am sure that feeling could not be stirred up against the French people as a whole, but only against the individual specimens with so few of those characteristics of the race, courtesy and politeness, as some hon. gentlemen opposite have shown to-night.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to make an observation or two, before the House goes into Committee of Supply. We were promised several measures in the speech of His Excellency, and a number of these measures have not yet been submitted to Parliament. The ancient rule of the House of Commons was to consider grievances, which legislation has recently taken the place of, before the House went into Committee of Supply. We have for several weeks been voting supplies; and these measures to redress inequalities in the representation of the country, to provide for the Government of the North-West, and others which the Government promised to submit to Parliament as necessary for the good government of the country, are not yet before the House. It was the old rule of the House of Commons in England that before Supplies were granted to the Crown, the Crown was asked to redress those grievances which were read by the Speaker from the Chair. At the present day, in England, it is the practice of the Government to submit their measures to Parliament in time to give the country an opportunity to become acquainted with the intentions of the Government before the supplies are granted. It has recently become the practice in this country—a most pernicious practice, I contend—to first deal with Supply, and at the last moment to submit important measures when there is no time for their consideration by the House. One measure last year—that relating to the boundaries of Manitoba and bringing Ontario into conflict with Manitoba—was submitted on the last day but one, and passed on the same day, when nine-tenths of the members had left.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They should not have left.

Mr. MILLS. I say the Supplies should not be granted before such important measures are considered. Now, let me call attention to the practice in England by citing a few measures and showing how long they were before Parliament. In 1831, when the Reform Bill was passed, Parliament met on the 14th of June, the Bill was immediately introduced, and it was not till the 19th of September that it was read the third time. In 1866, when the Reform Bill of Lord John Russell's second Administration was discussed, Parliament met on the 1st of February, the measure was introduced on the 12th of March, and it did not receive its third reading until the 15th of June in 1867. A Reform Bill was introduced by Mr. Disraeli, in Lord Derby's Administration; the House met on the 5th of February, the Bill was introduced on the 25th of the same month, and it did not receive its third reading until the 15th of July, 1869. When Mr. Gladstone's Government was in power, Parliament met on the 16th of February, 1869, the Bill for disendowing and disestablishing the Irish Church was introduced on the 14th of March, and was before the House six weeks. In 1870, Parliament met on the 11th of February; the Irish Land Tenure Bill was introduced on the 15th of February, and on the 30th of May it received the third reading. In 1880, Parliament met on the 29th of April, and the Compensation for Disturbance Bill was introduced on the 18th of June, and was before Parliament for six weeks; and in 1881, the Irish Land Bill was introduced on the 17th of April, and was not carried through the Commons until the 29th of July.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Because it was debated all the time.

Mr. MILLS. So it was; but the hon. gentleman takes precious good care that no opportunity shall be given for the discussion of important measures submitted to this House. Now, I am pointing out that the practice the hon. gentleman is introducing is wholly irregular and unconstitutional. The Government is supposed to be carried on here according to the well understood wishes of the people, and their wishes cannot be ascertained by the present practice. When the Bill for disendowing and disestablishing the Irish Church was introduced, Mr. Disraeli asked that the measure might be introduced at a sufficiently early period to give the members of the House of Commons an opportunity of consulting their constituents on the subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who did that?

Mr. MILLS. Disraeli. I read that very extract from his speech last year to show that we ought to have longer time to consider the Syndicate contract than the hon. gentleman was disposed to give in the first instance. I mention these facts to point out that we ought to return to a more healthy practice, and that as to Government measures it is only fair and courteous to introduce them at a period of the Session which will give ample time for their consideration by the House and the country. There is an intelligent public opinion outside this House, and which on some measures largely controls the opinion that largely directs the policy of this House. There is no opportunity of consulting that opinion, or of fully considering the measures submitted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says that the Government is introducing a new practice, but I will venture to say that the present Government has brought down their measures earlier and pressed them more rapidly than the Government of which he was a distinguished member. I will not throw that statement across the floor singly, but shall take occasion to look into the Journals, which I think will prove my statement. The hon. gentleman says we should not grant supplies until grievances are dealt with, or legislation, as he says, which represents that action is effected. I cannot quite agree with that. The practice in England, as I understand it, is that in three or four days after the Speech is through the Orders, the naval and military supplies are, as a general rule, brought down. They do not in England follow our practice of discussing the Estimates de die in diem; they sprinkle them through the whole of the Session, and the most important votes are generally carried before the question of grievances or legislation in view of grievances can be brought down. It is quite true the Reform Bill of 1831 was introduced at the beginning of the Session. The people elected the members for the purpose of carrying that Bill, and on the same ground when our Parliament was called, three months before the time, to settle the important question of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we met in November; but I do not think we made much by our abnormal action on that occasion. I do not think we received much sympathy from hon. gentlemen opposite who deliberately set to work to oppose us. We said we called Parliament together with a view of getting its opinion so as to enable the work to proceed; and the opposition at all events, I will not say obstruction, we received with the unconcealed purpose of delaying the measure, cannot be forgotten. I think we brought down all our measures early except that for the readjustment of the representation.

Mr. MILLS. And the Bill for the division of the North-West.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have already explained that the division was simply for postal purposes and nomenclature, or the names of those divisions, but the House approved of it. They might cover the areas of future Provinces; but there is no legislation required in regard to them. All the other Government measures are down. We took the very proper course of introducing several of the Bills in the Upper House. It is of great importance the work should proceed simultaneously in both Houses; so you see the Senate has worked industriously and sent us a number of Bills, and in this respect, I think we have made an improvement. That House now largely exercises the work of revision, which it is eminently qualified to perform.

Mr. MACKENZIE. When does the hon. gentleman intend to introduce the Re-distribution Bill?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In a day or two.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You stated last Thursday or Friday the same thing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I only gave notice, on Thursday or Friday, of the introduction of the Bill.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

83. Lachine Canal..... $790,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What is the position of the work, and what will be required to finish it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of this amount there is a revote of $523,000, and a new vote of $267,000. This amount is for the purpose of completing the work.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What depth does that give.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Fourteen feet at Lachine, and it completes the work with that depth of water. This will complete the work, including the two St. Gabriel Basins. Deepening the bed of the canal between the locks will cost $500,000 more, and that will not be required until 14 feet navigation is acquired throughout.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What has become of the St. Gabriel Basin?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We are constructing two additional basins for the purpose of providing additional facilities. That is included in the vote of $790,000.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. As I understand, this vote closes all the expenditure, piers inclusive.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Only for a depth of 12 feet, of course it is more at the lower entrance.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Is there any difficulty as to the supply of water to the mills?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The difficulty was about the current, and I myself partially determined to limit the granting of applications for water on that account. There was a current of from three to four miles an hour.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite right, and the intention is to limit the supply of water for manufacturing purposes to such an amount that will not interfere with the navigation of the canal, which we look upon as the primary object.

Mr. MACKENZIE. At the other canals it was always a source of loss instead of profit to the Government. There were always claims for compensation, or demands for arbitration or valuation which swallowed up more than the entire amount received. When we get to the items for the expenses on the canals, I would like to know the state of the accounts between the Government and the lessees. Some of them are of long standing and large accounts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will give the hon. gentleman that on concurrence. I may state, without being able to give the exact amounts, that the Government have made great efforts during the past season to collect arrears, bad debts have been written off and the most stringent measures adopted for the purpose of compelling payment of all arrears on the whole canal system.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Could the hon. Minister state to us roughly what he expects will be the effect of competition on the canals by the railways? To a considerable extent I am afraid our anticipations, from the enormous expenditures on these canals, hardly anything will be realized.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no doubt that the discovery of steel rails, and their general use on railways, have had a very serious influence upon canal traffic. It has enabled large amounts of freight to be moved with so much greater facility and at so much less cost than could be done before, that I am afraid we cannot expect the great amount of traffic for the canals that they formerly secured.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The vote already taken will finish all the works at the Cornwall Canal. The works are not quite finished yet, but the amount remaining unexpended will be expended by the 1st of July, and will complete the works at Cornwall. There was one contract let at Cornwall which was to give the same depth of water, twelve feet on the mitre sills, as in the Welland and Lachine Canals, and that contract will be completed by the 1st of July, and that portion of the canal will be on the same scale both above and below.

84. St. Lawrence River and Canals..... $154,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is to complete the works under contract, which will cost about $300,000, in addition to the $154,000 now asked for. This will complete a channel of 300 feet in width adapted to a navigation of 14 feet through the Galops Rapids. The sum now asked for is as much as will probably be expended this year on that section of the canal.

85. Welland Canal..... $600,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The vote which is now asked for is only about half what will be required to complete the Welland Canal, including the aqueduct. There is a revote of $492,000 as part of the $600,000. It is expected that the entire sum will finish section 34, complete the aqueduct and enlarge the old lock No. 2, and settle the estimates still unpaid. It will complete all the work except increasing the Welland Canal from twelve to fourteen feet. Certain portions of it are now fourteen feet, and to deepen the rest to fourteen feet will require an additional amount.

87. Carillon Canal, Dam and Slide $180,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will be glad to hear that the amount required entirely to complete that work will not exceed the original estimates, which were $1,170,000. There is now expended and will be expended on the 30th June, 1882, including what will be required, $939,348, and the total required from the 1st July is $230,651, and the vote for the present year, with $50,000 more, $180,000, will complete the work within the original estimate. In addition to this amount of $180,000, the sum of $50,000 will be required to complete those works.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman stated in his report, I think, that the amount of quantities moved would be $446,600. I would like to know how that estimate has been carried out by the actual facts.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The total expenditure up to 30th June, 1880, was $571,023; to 30th June, 1881, $191,326; and from 31st December, 1881, to 1st July, $131,080; total, $893,428. The estimated expenditure to the end of the present year, $45,920, making a total of $939,348 as the amount required to 1st July, 1882; that leaves on the original estimate of $1,170,000, $230,651; and there will be required $50,651 to complete the work, so that it will be completed within the estimate.

Mr. MACKENZIE. When I left office, tenders had been received for this work. The lowest was about $420,000. This contract was taken from the old contractors in consequence of their not proceeding with the work. The hon. gentleman gave them part of it, and gave the lowest tenderers, Messrs. McNamee & Co., another part. He estimated then that the amount, moneying out the quantities according to the contract schedule, would come to $446,000, and McNamee & Co.'s tender was $420,000. What I wanted to know is the expenditure since that time. The statement the hon. gentleman has made refers to another contract. If I recollect aright, $334,000 were paid on the contract of Cook & Co. before the work was taken from them in June, 1878.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not in my power to give the hon. gentleman the precise figures to which he refers, but I may state briefly the result on these. Cook & Co. were the contractors; difficulties arose in carrying on the work, and the contract was cancelled; new tenders were asked for, and when the present Government came into office, they were waiting decision. Mr. McNamee's tender was the lowest, and he was notified that the contract would be awarded to him. Subsequently it became a very grave question as to whether we should go on, in the then financial condition of the country, with these works or not, and it was decided not. Mr. McNamee was informed of this decision, and his deposit returned. Subsequently, on the report of Mr. Page that the work was deteriorating and would sustain serious injury, it was determined to carry out the design of deepening the navigation of the Ottawa Canals and proceeding with this work. In the meantime the former contractors made a large claim on the Government for having been dispossessed of their contract, and after the vote was taken Mr. McNamee notified the Department that he would not proceed with the work under his former tender because they had in the meantime become seriously deteriorated by the action of the water. Cook & Co., who had been dispossessed of their contract, said they would be willing to abandon all claims against the Government if reinstated at their original prices. That offer was accepted, because it was found that the cost would be less than the next lowest tender to Mr. McNamee. They were, however, called upon to strengthen themselves as this work was an extremely difficult one; and an agreement was come to between Mr. McNamee and the old contractors, to divide the work. The more difficult portion of it, the dock and slide, was taken by Mr. McNamee, and the remainder by the original contractors. The work has been vigorously carried on, and will be completed for the amount already stated. The new works consist of a dam across the River Ottawa, three-fourths of a mile above the village of Carillon, and of a canal three-fourths of a mile long. The construction of the dam has been completed, and the gates closed the 9th November. The work has been completed very satisfactorily, and there is every reason to believe the lock will be opened for navigation in the spring of 1882.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The gist of the whole thing is simply this, that by not accepting Mr. McNamee's tender the work has cost $26,000 more than it would otherwise have cost. Mr. McNamee, whatever he may be, is a vigorous contractor who has always carried out his contracts very efficiently.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I explained to the hon. gentleman the reason for our proceeding; we accepted Mr. McNamee's tender, but under the circumstances did not go on with the work. The hon. gentleman is quite correct in saying that had the work been then proceeded with, it would have been completed for a smaller amount.

88. Grenville Canal $575,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. At all these places the vote is very large in proportion to the amount asked. Only one-third of the amount voted is asked. What is the reason of that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They naturally over-estimate the rate of progress at which the work could be carried on. The amount now asked for, is for the completion of this section of canals.

89. Murray Canal $200,000

Mr. CROUTER. May I be allowed to enquire if the Engineers have finished the surveys and made a report to the Department?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Rubridge has finally completed a survey. There was a survey also made by Mr. Perley, and Mr. Rubridge subsequently made a very careful examination and survey, and there is a question yet to be decided as to which of the two routes should be adopted; but Mr. Perley's estimate for this work is $700,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Which will suit better for election purposes?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope the hon. gentleman does not mean to insinuate that the construction of an important section of navigation in connection with the great canal system of the St. Lawrence would be in the smallest degree influenced by considerations which at no very distant time seemed to have had so much influence on another portion of the line. I am quite certain the hon. gentleman recognises as fully as I do the great importance of extending the interior or barge navigation, as it will be extended, to Presqu' Isle or Witter's Bay. The hon. gentleman knows that perhaps the most dangerous portion of the navigation in connection with our canal system will be avoided by the construction of this work, and if an expenditure of $700,000 will enable us to avoid the dangerous part of the canal system, the expenditure will be well expended.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Where are the $700,000 to be expended? What route is that which Mr. Perley has estimated on?

Mr. McCUAIG. I desire to ask whether the estimate of the cost of the work is for the route by Weller's Bay. From Presqu'Isle to the waters of the Bay of Quinté it is five and a-half miles or six miles, and from my own knowledge of the locality the route through Weller's Bay will be much shorter and more advantageous to the country at large, as the length of the canal will not exceed two miles. I may state, without fear of contradiction, that in navigating Lake Ontario, you cannot with a south-west gale enter Presqu'Isle. I have before me the report of Mr. Page and Mr. Rowan, and it is very clear from that report Weller's Bay is a natural harbor of refuge and easy of entrance. If that be the case, a vessel navigating Lake Ontario, and forced by winds into Weller's Bay for safety, although within a mile of the entrance to the Bay of Quinté she would be obliged to remain in the harbor of refuge until the gale had subsided, whereas if the canal were cut from the Bay of Quinté direct through to Weller's Bay, she could proceed on her voyage down the Bay of Quinté to Kingston. The matter is of such consequence, aside from any question of mere local freights, that I trust the Minister will look carefully into the matter before coming to any decision.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In reply to the question asked me by the hon. member for Centre Huron, I may say that we expect to obtain a depth of fourteen to fifteen feet. There are two routes—one by Presqu'Isle and the other by Weller's Bay. The latter is the shorter, but rock has to be encountered, whereas the other, though longer, is entirely free from rock cutting. Mr. Page, who is just now carefully considering the estimates on both routes, previous to an ultimate decision, has roughly estimated the cost to be the same by both routes. With regard to the point raised by my hon. friend from Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig), he would soon settle the matter in favor of Weller's Bay, but we are not certain that it is the best, and it is possible that Presqu'Isle may be found to be the most available point. I can only say that after having obtained the report and the judgment of the engineer on the whole subject, we shall consider it carefully, and that we expect a decision will be arrived at at an early day.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he knows, after entering the Bay of Quinté, what depth of water can be secured from the head down to Belleville and past it. I rather doubt whether there are any vessels now navigating the bay which draw more than 10 or 11 feet of water, so that the matter would be one of considerable importance. I am informed, though I do not pledge myself to the statement, that there will be considerable difficulty in obtaining a channel of the necessary depth after you get into the Bay of Quinté.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That matter has been fully looked into, and it is believed that there will be no difficulty in obtaining a navigation of fourteen or fifteen feet, otherwise, of course, it would be useless to get that depth in the canal.

Mr. McCUAIG. When I called at the office of the Minister of Railways I saw a petition which had been circulated in favor of Presqu'Isle. I may say, in the first place, that I disclaim being influenced by any local considerations in the matter. I am of opinion that our large canal system should be taken out of the channel of local prejudices and interests, and that it should be viewed entirely in the light of a national work. Believing that this should be our policy, I say that Weller's Bay is by far the better route for the canal. I am supported in this view by a petition presented by Mr. Pierson bearing the signatures of the inhabitants of all the towns, villages and ports on both Lakes Ontario and Erie. It was signed by some of the most influential men of Upper Canada, including master mariners who are not likely to be influenced by local considerations. On the other hand, the petition in favor of the Presqu'Isle was signed only by bargemen, a master and a few seamen residing in the locality. I hope the Minister will give these petitions respectively the weight to which they are entitled—one being signed so numerously and influentially, and the other by a few men whose interests are purely local. Mr. Page stated that a vessel on Lake Ontario approaching Presqu'Isle Harbor, must, before getting in range of the inner light, with a view to entering the harbor, change its course fully 270 degrees, which in certain winds it is barely possible to do. When up with Salt Point (upon which there is a light, and behind it about 1,000 feet distant a range light) the course must again be changed to north-westerly, so as to clear Calf Pasture Shoal, and enter the wider portion of the harbor; in fact the direction of the entrance, crookedness and insufficient width of the channel are found by masters of vessels to prove serious obstacles to its being used either as a harbor of refuge or for commercial purposes. Again, he says that at the entrance to Presqu'Isle Harbor, there was in October, for a short distance, a depth of only ten feet which at extreme low water would be reduced to eight feet, therefore a very large quantity of dredging must be done in order to obtain the proposed depth; the channel being intricate, it would require a width of at least 250 to 300 feet, and at the outer end should have additional depth to allow for the plunging of vessels in a heavy sea. A comparison of distances from a point in the lake, which may be taken as common to the navigation into Presqu'Isle Harbor and Weller's Bay shows that the length from this point via Presqu'Isle Harbor to the Bay of Quinté would be fully twice that via Weller's Bay to the Bay of Quinté. Moreover, he declares that were the channel through Presqu'Isle Harbor, and other improvements made, the unavoidable difficulties to be encountered navigating it, would still present an insuperable objection to the adoption of the route to Presqu'Isle Harbor, and that in this view of the case the selection must lie between the two other routes, both leading to Weller's Bay.

Mr. BROWN. I find, from Mr. Page's report in 1867 or 1868, and also from that of Mr. Rowan, that it was almost impossible in a south-westerly gale to get into the Presqu'Isle Harbor. A vessel going east comes to Presqu'Isle Point, then a range of lights leads into the harbor; but it has to tow back and sail two and a-half or three miles to reach the point where the canal is contemplated to lead into Presqu'Isle at Weiss' Creek. They say that a vessel rounding in that sort of gale would be liable to the disasters that occurred there last year. Masters of vessels inform me that the anchor would not hold there owing to the presence of what they call eel grass, which fills the flukes of the anchors, so that the vessels drift down to the beach below. According to Mr. Page's report the route by Weller's Bay is a perfectly straight course all the way. The channel entering into Weller's Bay is fourteen feet deep, and the bay is thirty feet deep. As early as 1833, Mr. Beard recommended Weller's Bay, which route would only require a mile and three quarters or two miles of canal work, while the Presqu'Isle route would require eight miles. The entrance into Presqu'Isle Harbor is also condemned by that report. The channel is crooked, and there are only from eight to ten feet of water in the harbor, and vessels have great difficulty in approaching it in a westerly gale, which generally prevails there. This project, which is in the interest both of navigation and commerce, would obviate all the dangers of navigation along the southern coast of Prince Edward county, and prevent such great disasters as those which occurred last year. At present a vessel loading in the Bay of Quinté and going westward has to travel 150 miles to get to a point on the lake within two or three miles from the place where she was loading, while, if this canal were built, she would reach the same point in two or three hours. I am speaking from practical knowledge, although my principal information is derived from the reports of Mr. Page, Mr. Munro and Mr. Beard. I believe Colonel Philpott, Royal Engineers, also reported in favor of Weller's Bay. That route is both the shortest and the cheapest, and I hope the Government will look carefully and seriously into the matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the subject will engage the most careful consideration of the Government before any decision will be arrived at, and I am quite sure the interesting speech the hon. gentleman has just delivered will have satisfied my hon. predecessor that this work is entitled to the support of the country, irrespective of any political considerations. I may say, after a good deal of examination of the question, there is very strong reason to believe that a lock may be dispensed with altogether. If that should prove to be the case, it will reduce the estimate by $120,000.

Mr. McCUAIG. I wish to say that the matter of a harbor of refuge on the north shore of Lake Ontario is of great importance. Mr. Page states that vessels on Lake Ontario running for Presqu'Isle Harbor must, before getting to the inner side, change their course 270 degrees, which it is impossible for a vessel under canvas to do against a south-west gale.

Mr. CROUTER. The member for Prince Edward has, of course, entered into this argument with great zeal. He has stated that there are petitions from a large number of sea-going people in regard to the impracticability almost of getting into Presqu'Isle Harbor.

Mr. McCUAIG. They have been presented.

Mr. CROUTER. No, Sir; there is a petition in the office of the Minister of Railways and Canals, bearing the signatures of over 100 practical sea-going men from the vicinity, while people throw cold water on them. But why should they not be better acquainted with the real merits of the question than gentlemen from the farther portion of the lake. It is very well known that Presqu'Isle Harbor is the only real harbor of refuge on the north shore east of Toronto.

Mr. McCUAIG. Except Weller's Bay.

Mr. CROUTER. How long has that been a harbor of refuge?

Mr. McCUAIG. Twenty-five years.

Mr. CROUTER. I well remember the channel there being filled up with sand, and navigators having to dig out a channel. Then in a few years this sand was blown away, leaving an entrance into Weller's Bay. Where is the guarantee that this sand will not blow away again and leave the whole harbor open to the lake? Presqu'Isle, with a little more dredging, will always afford a safe haven for vessels. For perfect safety to the shipping at large Presqu'Isle is the real course and destination.

91. Dredging Basins No. 4, Lachine Canal $2,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Will this have to be dredged all the time? This is charged to income. Will the basins have to be dredged out every year?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; this dredging is to put the basin in order. One of two small basins was deepened while the Lachine Canal was being enlarged. This is for the purpose of giving it the same depth as the others. At the basin deepened the improvement is supposed to be permanent.

Mr. BROWN.

92. Construction of a Swing-Bridge at Valleyfield... $8,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Is this a new bridge?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; there were two plans for construction, one for above and the other for below. The site we have selected is approved of, and the Chief Engineer is of the opinion that while the upper works should be of wood, the basement should be of masonry. The population of the town has largely increased, and it is absolutely necessary to have a second bridge.

93. Chambly Canal—raising banks, lowering bottom of Canal, &c..... $31,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Is this to give greater depth?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is to greatly improve the canal, including the following works: to rebuild the east side, $6,000; to build two cross dams, $1,000; to build the upper walls at lock 4, $1,000; to build a wharf at St. John and a long new revetment wall, $3,110; operating the dredges, $8,855; approaches and gravel, $1,250.

94. St. Ours Lock and Dam—Construction of gates, piers, deepening and widening channel... $21,350

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is a similar class of work to that provided for by the last item; but here there are two pairs of gates to be made.

187. Repairs and working expenses of Canals..... $402,190

Mr. McCUAIG. It may be pertinent to call the attention of the Government to the dry dock at Kingston. We are spending millions of money for the enlargement of the Welland Canal, for the purpose of attracting the western trade via the St. Lawrence, and a dry dock is absolutely necessary at Kingston of sufficient capacity to take out those large vessels that we hope to attract to her port.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Government has this question under consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I observe that the working expenses are $411,550 and the income $369,597, leaving a loss on the whole canal system of $41,953 as the result of last year's operations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The expenditure last year was exceptional, the Welland Canal was found to be in a very bad state, and a great deal of work had to be done to put it in an efficient state of repair.

184. Intercolonial Railway..... $1,906,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The details of this vote are as follows:—Locomotive power, $628,000; car expenses, $445,000; station and train expenses, $254,000; general charges, $143,000; maintenance, $140,000. Total $1,906,000. There is an increase of $300,000. In former years we had to pay more than a dollar to get a dollar's worth of traffic, this year the accounts are nearly balanced and the additional traffic has involved this additional expense.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman make any statement as to the cost of working the Rivière du Loup Branch, and the receipts obtained from it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The accounts are not kept separate. I do not know of any mode by which we could ascertain exactly what accounts apply to any particular portion. The acquisition of this branch has been of great value to the Government; it has enabled us by putting down steel rails on that track, which was in very bad condition, to make more regular connections, and also to hold the traffic over the road by the rapidity with which we can put it through.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman stated that a very large portion of the increase was for rolling stock.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not in this vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE. With regard to another vote, I say. Now, I find that in July, 1878, the total amount paid and chargeable to capital was $2,006,047.26; average mileage at the time, 714. This gives $2,809.59 as the amount per mile for rolling stock of all kinds. In July, 1882, there were 889 miles in operation; amount paid out of capital up to that time, $2,753,001, or at a rate of $3,099 per mile for rolling stock. I would like to know how much of the rolling stock got during the last ten years, has been chargeable to income. There is no statement in the report that gives it, and it is interesting to know. My conviction is that much too large a proportion is charged to capital.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in that impression. The rolling stock of the road was stated by Mr. Brydges to be working to its fullest capacity in 1878, and he reported that the rolling stock was barely sufficient to perform the traffic of the road. Now that there has been a great increase in the volume of traffic, the hon. gentleman will see that it will be impossible to do it with the existing rolling stock and additional rolling stock will be provided from capital account. What the road is obliged to do in order to make a fair exhibit, is to maintain in a state of thorough efficiency the road and the rolling stock provided from capital account to the traffic. If the volume of traffic has increased 40 per cent., as it has done, of course you must from capital account furnish the additional amount of rolling stock. That is the practice of all railways. All a railway undertakes to charge for working expenses is to maintain the thorough efficiency of the rolling stock. Capital account is closed until there is a great additional volume of traffic which requires to be provided for. On the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railways, the moment there is a great additional volume of traffic, rolling stock sufficient to handle that traffic is provided and charged to capital account. I had a communication last summer from the managers of both those roads, and they both stated that was the practice with reference to both those roads.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would like to see those communications.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I asked specific questions and had specific answers.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The Great Western have new lines built, and that is a totally different thing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not refer to the extension of the lines at all. I refer to the rolling stock required for the increased volume of traffic, and both gentlemen stated to me that the practice on these roads is to provide for such an increase of expenses by charging them to capital account. The hon. gentleman will at once see that it would be quite impossible to furnish the amount of rolling-stock required to do $500,000 worth of additional traffic a year. If the traffic amounts to a million dollars a year instead of half a million, you cannot handle it with that, nor is it possible to obtain it from working expenses, especially where you have a deficit to draw from instead of a surplus. It must be furnished chargeable to capital account. Now, I think the hon. member for St. John fell into some serious errors in dealing with the subject of the operation of the Intercolonial Railway. He endeavored to show that the comparison made by the hon. Minister of Finance between the results of the operation of the Intercolonial Railway under the late Government and under the present Government, is incorrect; and he has brought forward an array of figures in support of this position. But I shall show the hon. gentleman that he has not placed the facts correctly before the House. I have always admitted that the late Government were not responsible for the expenditure of 1873-74, as the obligations for that year, incurred by their predecessors, had to be carried out. I therefore take the five years from the 1st July, 1874, to 1st July, 1879, and I find the following facts:—

		Revenue.	Expenditure.
1874-5.....	381 miles in operation	$ 861,593	$1,143,157
1875-6.....	518 do	848,862	1,092,775
1876-7.....	714 do	1,154,445	1,661,673
1877-8.....	714 do	1,378,947	1,811,273
1878-9.....	714 do	1,294,100	2,010,183
Yearly average, 608		$1,107,589	$1,543,813

Having, for the reasons given, omitted the years 1873-74 in considering the working of the railway under the late Government, I begin its administration under the present Government for similar reasons, with the year 1879-80, and find the corresponding figures for the last two fiscal years to be:

Years.		Revenue.	Expenditure.
1879-80.....	825 miles in operation	$1,506,298	$1,603,430
1880-81.....	840 do do	1,760,394	1,759,851
Yearly average..... 832		$1,633,346	$1,681,640

These figures prove that the average yearly earnings of the Intercolonial Railway, during the Administration of our predecessors, were less by $525,712 than under the present Government, while the average annual expenditure was less by only $137,827, although the average length of line operated during the five years ended the 30th June, 1879, was only 608 miles, and in the following two years 832 miles. Had the expenses of the last two years borne the same proportion to the mileage under the operation as those of the preceding five years, the average annual expenditure would have been, not $1,681,640, as I have shown it to have been, but $2,112,448, showing an economy to have been effected, under the present Administration, of $430,808 per annum, the cost of maintenance of way, renewals of bridges, fences, rails, &c., being charged in each year to revenue, as I continue to charge it from year to year. The cost of the change of gauge in 1875 and 1876 did not enter into this account, and in stating that this amount, about $843,000, formed part of the expenditure embraced in the figures submitted by him, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee) was in error, as he also was in stating that the cost of steel rail renewals, which form a charge against maintenance of way, are charged to capital under the existing Administration. The hon. gentleman states, moreover, that items which formed a charge against revenue under the late Government, are charged to capital by their successors. This is not correct. It is true that works of extension at the termini of the railway are still charged to capital as hitherto (the capital account for works along the line having been closed), as also old accounts in connection with the construction of the road under the Commissioners. But in this we only follow the practice laid down by our predecessors about a year before they surrendered the reins of Government, for several years previous to which extensive works were charged to capital, which if done at the present time would form a charge against revenue. The capital expenditure during the five years ended the 30th June, 1879, was:

1876-7	314,925
1877-8	408,817
1878-9	226,639
Average per annum	$328,695

And for the two years ended the 30th June, 1881:

1879-80	$161,439
1880-1	68,430
Average per annum	$114,934

It will thus be seen at once that the statement that we charge to capital what our predecessors charged to revenue, is incorrect, the fact really being that we charge to revenue items which they, until a year or so before resigning office, systematically charged to capital. I have, of course, not taken into consideration the capital expenditure in connection with the purchase of the Rivière du Loup Branch, which would be out of place in the comparison I have given of the operation of the Intercolonial Railway during the two periods under consideration.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). The basis on which we started from for different years. I took from 1874 to 1878, as did the hon. Minister of Finance, who made a comparison of those years.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. From July, 1874, to July, 1879.

Mr. BURPEE. I am speaking of the statement made in the Budget Speech in which the hon. Minister took from 1874 to 1879 to make a comparison.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman said in my hearing that he was not responsible for the years 1873-74.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I took from July, 1874, to July, 1879.

Mr. BURPEE. I took the receipts and expenditures from the Public Works Report. After taking out what was charged to capital account, the mileage in certain years is undoubtedly different from that of which the hon. Minister of Railways has spoken, as he has left over five or six miles of branch railways. Taking 1874 to 1878 and deducting the amounts of $150,000 spent on steel rails and $17,000 and $200,000, the figures, according to the returns, are correct, taking the six miles difference mileage into account. The amount spent on capital account was in 1879, $226,000; in 1880, $548,000; 1881, $608,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman includes the Rivière du Loup Branch. I left that entirely out of both calculations.

Mr. BURPEE. I took it from the report that the hon. Minister submitted to the House. In 1882, the amount was $446,000, and a Supplementary vote asked this year reaches $383,000 odd, making $730,000. The Estimates for 1883 amount to $609,000, on capital account. Nothing is said in the Public Works Report about any grant being for the Rivière du Loup Branch.

Mr. MACKENZIE. According to the figures the average is 615 miles a year, and not as the hon. gentleman stated. The hon. Minister has included what is not in the annual reports charged to working expenses; the hon. Minister gave $1,661 instead of $1,461, and $1,811 instead of $1,611.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman will find the statement I have given perfectly accurate.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think it is not perfectly accurate. I am not counting anything at all for the original expenditure on the Rivière du Loup line. Then, Sir, let us look for a moment at the expenditure for the year 1878-79. In the year 1876-77 the expenditure for the maintenance, which is one of the heavy items, was $384,280. The expenditure in 1877-78, our last full year, was $451,114. Now, in the succeeding year, 1878-79, we were in office three months. We undertook no extraordinary works on the railway at all during those three months. We were engaged mainly preparing for the General Elections and were away from the Capital a part of the time, but the expenditure for maintenance of roadways increased suddenly that year from $411,000 to $567,000. I have never obtained a statement of the expenditures under that head, though I have frequently asked for it. I recollect picking out a few of them, but only a few, and no account of them is rendered in the return. In the first year there is no doubt that enormous expenditures were created in order to save the expenditures in the next year, and the result was that $126,737 were spent that year in excess of the previous year, 1877-78, and in the following year the expenditures descended—as it well might after everything had been rushed into the previous year that was possible—to $385,000. The increase in the expenditure for station expenses, which are a kind of expenses that may fairly be contrasted, because the same work has been in effect, was: 1878-79, $4,987, and for general charges, $5,527. Now, station expenses and general charges occurred almost entirely in the time when hon. gentlemen controlled the work. They had nine months and we had three. I admit that considerable savings were effected by hon. gentlemen in the matter of cutting down wages and salaries. I never approved of that, nor do I approve of it now. I believe in employing the best men and paying them the best wages, and I do not believe in cutting down the wages of workmen to an inordinate degree, as was done in this case. That saving was made at a vast expense to the country, because the force employed has not been sufficient to maintain the road efficiently.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in arriving at any such conclusion as he has just stated. I have no hesitation in saying that there is no road on the continent with which the Intercolonial will not favorably compare. It has been visited by railroad men from various parts of the United States, who have been carried over it at a speed of eighty miles an hour, and the condition of the road has excited the admiration of every railroad man from the United States who has visited the country to such an extent that they have again and again spoken in the highest and most eulogistic terms of the condition of the road. All the savings which have been effected have been real and genuine, and it is impossible for the hon. gentleman to take up the statement which I laid on the Table of the House, at the request of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), without arriving at the conclusion that we have been enabled to obtain a very large amount of increased traffic and to handle that traffic at a greatly decreased expenditure. I find that one error has occurred in the table which I had requested to be prepared, making the average number of miles under the late Government 540 when it should have been 608. The rest will be found to be strictly accurate and to afford a just and fair comparative statement. All the stock furnished from capital account has been maintained, and, as Mr. Brydges stated in his report, it was barely sufficient to do the traffic then. It has been maintained in a thorough state of efficiency, without any charge to capital. All that has been expended from capital account for the purchase of rolling stock has been legitimately expended to meet the additional volume of traffic required to be handled. The reduction which took place in the wages and salaries of employees, and which, I must say, was cheerfully assented to by the parties concerned, was not such as at all to affect the efficient operation of the road. A few persons, it is true, did leave and went to the United States, but in almost every instance the parties have applied for permission to return to their old positions. The persons who have been engaged in operating the road have devoted the utmost time and attention to the duties they had to discharge, and they have worked with a success which, I think, should have excited the admiration of hon. gentlemen opposite rather than their criticism. An enormous public saving has been effected; the work has been carried on in the most vigorous and efficient manner, and never was the traffic handled with the same degree of success as has attended the handling of this large additional volume of traffic. I have furnished the House with data from which every person would be able to judge exactly how the matter stands. All the increases of the capital expenditure which have been charged against the hon. gentleman for the five years have been correspondingly charged for the two years.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman has failed to notice this point: that he paid nothing for steel rails. Yet he charges us with the amount we expended. If you deduct $200,000 from 1876-77, 1877-78 and 1878-79—taking the same view of the last year that the hon. gentleman does with regard to the responsibility for it—and we have a difference of $168,000. The entire line was laid with steel rails before I left office.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not the entire line.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes, the entire line.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The line between Moncton and Shediac has not been wholly laid with steel rails yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not count that as part of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. ANGLIN. It is perfectly amazing that the hon. gentleman should stand up and make the statements he makes here deliberately—statements which he says are facts, but which we say are contrary to the fact—repetitions of statements made by himself and the Finance Minister in the country, disputing the evidence which their own books could afford them if they choose to look into them. The hon. gentleman has gone through this country declaring that through his skilful management and his prudent economy he has succeeded in saving some $750,000 a year in the working expenses, deliberately withholding from the public the facts which would explain what that economy meant. He knows that he charged against the hon. member for Lambton, as working expenses, $146,000 for steel rails renewed, and some $270,000 for raising the bridges, both of which were extraordinary expenditures on capital account. The hon. gentleman knows too that in the expenditures of the same year there was something like $100,000 expended in fitting the old rolling stock to the narrower gauge, which ought also to be charged to capital, but he chose to charge it to working expenses. All these sums ought to be deducted in all honesty and fair play; if the hon. gentlemen had the slightest sense of justice or fair play to their opponents, they would deduct them. If statements of this kind are made, the public ought to be given the facts honestly and frankly; but they are not, they are deliberately misled; misstatements are put before them as facts. The hon. gentleman stands up and compares years when only a portion of the railway was open, and when the working expenses could not be so great, with years when the entire road was open. The true mode of comparison is to commence at the time the road was opened, in 1876, and balance the receipts against the actual working expenses of each year. The hon. Minister of Finance, in order to give value to his statement, said that he got it from Mr. Tims, the accountant. There is no doubt Mr. Tims made his statement from the books, but Mr. Tims was not directed to go into the question of how much was unfairly charged to working expenses for the purposes of comparison between the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton and the hon. Minister of Railways. The report for the year 1877-78 says:

"In 1876-77 the expenditure for renewals amounted to $543,595.68, and was entered in the Public Accounts, Part III, page 58, under the head of Renewals, Suspense Account. Of that sum $200,000 was charged to working expenses for renewals in that year; $200,000 is charged for the fiscal year 1877-78, and the balance, $143,595.68, will be included in charges for renewals in the account of 1878-79. The cost of working the line, with maintenance, is $1,811,273.56, including $200,000 for renewals, chargeable to 1877-78, from the total expenditure $543,591.88 made in 1876-77."

Deducting, therefore, $200,000 for renewals from $432,326, the nominal excess of expenditure over revenue, the real excess over expenditure would be reduced to $232,326, and that is the last year the hon. member for Lambton had charge of the Treasury. But even from that sum a large amount will have to be deducted for reconstructing the rolling stock, the construction of sidings, station buildings, tanks, &c. The Minister of Railways, in comparing the results of the management of the Intercolonial with those of the management of the hon. member for Lambton (M. Mackenzie) takes the year which was really the year of his own administration, for the road was really under his absolute control for nine months of that year. But the Minister of Railways states that the Opposition invariably insist that the present Minister is responsible for the expenses of 1873-74. They have never done anything of the kind, except in so far as saying that those gentlemen are responsible for so much of the expense of that year as they rendered inevitable. For that year, for the obligations they contracted, they must be held responsible; but the present Opposition claim credit for not having spent all the money estimated as necessary by hon. gentlemen opposite. We boast we succeeded in keeping the expenses several hundred thousand dollars within the estimates, and particularly with regard to railways. Unless it can be shown that hon. gentlemen opposite had incurred some obligation or entered into some contracts in 1873-74, which the succeeding Government would have been glad to escape from and would not have undertaken had they been free, it will be absurd to hold the late Government responsible for the railroad expenditure during that year. But it suits the hon. Minister just now to claim that year, for that gives him a pretext for charging the hon. member for Lambton with the expenditure on the road for nine or ten months after he had ceased to control it. There was no other obligation resting on the Minister of Railways but that of extending those bridges. He constructed thirteen new sidings which were not necessary. But if they were necessary, when you come to the point of the hon. gentleman's wonderful saving and working expenses, is it reasonable to set this among the working expenses? Would it not be fair and honest to take that out of the working expenses? The hon. gentleman defended himself two years ago by saying: "Oh, I continue the road under the management of the late Government." Mr. Brydges was continued in the same extravagant management. But he had the same power to dismiss Mr. Brydges, if necessary, the day after he took office as when he did dismiss him. He ought to have been quite prepared, when he took office, to undertake his wonderful task of economy. But, in his comparisons of the management of the late and the present Governments, he ought to state the whole facts frankly. Let him tell the public that the year he credits Mr. Mackenzie with was his own year, and that he might have curtailed or reduced that expenditure had it been absolutely necessary. If he will fairly compare the expenditure under each Government, let him take 1877-88, during which the member for Lambton had the entire control of the road, for which he is responsible. When he talks of obtaining new traffic for it one would really suppose that the increase of the traffic was due to something he had done. Everything done to procure additional traffic was done before he took charge. One of the sources of this new traffic was the calling of the Allan steamers at Halifax, and the landing of a large portion of the goods intended for Canada. Again, the calling of those steamers at Halifax has led to the development of the cattle trade which is rapidly expanding. It was not the Minister of Railways who compelled those steamers to stop at Halifax, but the member for Lambton. A trade, of course, does not spring into full existence at once; it is a matter of gradual development. These two great sources of revenue were supplied and developed without any action of hon. gentlemen opposite. One of the great freights of the railroad is the fish trade, which also was developed while the member for Lambton had control of the road. It has grown since he was in power. He did everything to foster that trade. No new railroad through a new country of comparatively sparse population can be expected to have as large a trade the first, second or third year as afterwards; railways foster and create business. Depression may affect it for a year or two; because as we all know that depression began to be severely felt in 1877-78, the last year of the management of the member for Lambton. The increase of the receipts from freight that year, as compared with the year preceding, was 19.44 per cent., and the uniform growth and reduction of the deficit was $74,901, showing a very rapid development of the trade of the country and of the road. But it so happened that the depression continued and became more severe in the year following, notwithstanding the advent of the present Minister to office,—notwithstanding the promises of the National Policy which were to restore and revive business the moment they got into power. Notwithstanding the declaration of the Minister of Railways that a new era had dawned on the Dominion, the depression not only continued but became intensified. That was one of the reasons why the deficit was so much larger that year than the previous one. When all these facts are taken into account, I really think the hon. gentleman ought to have more regard for the reputation of the Government—though it be a bad one—than to persist in repeating statements entirely contrary to the facts as demonstrated in the official archives. When the railway was handed over by the hon. member for Lambton it was probably the finest road in America. The road-bed, superstructure, and equipment were all that could be expected, and the road was all laid with steel rails except from Painsec Junction to Shediac. That is to-day in a very wretched condition. Only a day or two ago a train tumbled off—and the locomotive is still, I believe, in the ditch. The hon. gentleman pretends that the slight repairs necessary from time to time on a new road are to be compared to an entire renewal of superstructure, rails and all. He must see this is a perfectly unfair way of putting the case. The hon. gentleman says that in the present condition everybody abuses the road. No doubt, even in its present condition it is an admirable road; but it is not in the condition it was when handed over to him. The rolling stock is in a deplorable condition. The other day I referred to a letter of Mr. John Murray, who describes the locomotives as being almost useless. One especially, No. 73, has figured in a number of serious accidents through its being put to draw more cars than it is able to draw. The Rivière du Loup Branch did not entail any large addition to the rolling stock because the Government rolling stock was formerly used over it, and at greater wear and tear than at present, while the old rails have been replaced by steel rails. With regard to the hon. Minister's statement of the amount he has saved, there is room to doubt its accuracy. The Public Accounts are before us, and the hon. gentleman cannot pretend to say that the deficit, under the hon. member for Lambton, was more than $232,000 on the working of the road.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When an hon. member undertakes to speak against time he should select some other hour besides 2 a.m. I will give the hon. gentleman a reason why the expenses in 1878-79 were larger than in any other year. I believe the result of that was that the expenditures which were required were deferred until after the last Session previous to the General Elections, and then I have this evidence that the manager of the road and the chief superintendent engaged—immediately after the House rose for the last time, and when no returns could be again exhibited to the House—engaged in these expensive operations, and that he allowed the road to remain in abeyance until that period. The improvement can be made matter of proof by all the persons connected with the road, and by the works that were undertaken, and the result was that the expenditures made by the late Government were very much larger than they would have been. Then, again, between the 1st of July of that year and the 8th of October something like $8,000 were paid out in increased salaries to officials. It was found very urgent to obtain political support by the appointment of a number of people here and there, and the result was that I see in that short period no less than $8,000 increase was expended in salaries. I will ask the hon. gentleman now to take the year 1878, which he says is a fair year to test the comparative economy of the two Governments. They had then 714 miles of road in operation, and the expenses were $1,811,273.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No; $200,000 is to come off that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Suppose I give the hon. gentleman the benefit of this $200,000. I take them as I find them.

Mr. MACKENZIE. They are not that way.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I maintain now, as I always maintained on that side of the House, that the renewals of the road of whatever character, required to be charged in the year in which they were made. They require to be spread over the five years. No one will pretend to state that renewals do not require to be charged to working expenses, and I charge that way all the renewals of the same character since then to the present Administration. Now, you will find that in the year 1877-78 they expended on 714 miles of road, $1,811,273. Now, Sir, I only expended on 825 miles of road for the year 1879-80, leaving out altogether the intervening years, $1,603,432, $218,000 less for operating 111 miles more road. Now, even if you take away the amount for steel rails, you see the enormous economy effected. With regard to that table I presented I regret that the clerk made a mistake in stating the number of miles in operation during the five years averaged 540, instead of 608 as it should have been. That, of course, involves a change in the figures I subsequently gave, showing that the average annual expenditure, instead of being $2,515,653, it should have been $2,112,448, showing an economy under the present Administration of $438,808. With the exception of that error I have no hesitation in saying that the strictest accuracy of every item submitted to the Committee can be maintained. I have gone into the figures on the table submitted and have worked out the whole question in such a way as to place it within the power of any hon. gentleman, with the Public Accounts in his hands and the reports of the various years, to verify accurately every statement. Now, I may say, with reference to the Pictou Branch, that a certain portion is not in so good condition, and that is the reason why I have been expecting, as the hon. gentleman knows, from month to month for the past year, to be called upon to hand it over. I did not wish to lay down a dozen miles of steel rails on a road that was to be soon out of the hands of the Government, and thus make a very valuable present to parties whom I thought had received quite enough before. The hon. gentleman did re-lay with steel a large portion after he had passed a Bill to transfer the Pictou Railway, upon which steel rails were laid, and I thought that was doing quite enough for a company which was to receive the road as a present. Had I supposed the road would remain in my hands I would have been compelled to do more to-day than I have done. For all the rest of the Intercolonial Railway, for all the rolling stock and everything connected with it, I challenge the strictest scrutiny to show that everything has not only been maintained in a thorough state of efficiency, but the road to-day is in the finest condition it has ever been. Now, I will add the testimony of Mr. Schreiber, Chief Engineer of Government Railways, and at present in charge of this work. They are prepared by the Chief Engineer of Railways, who is well known to hon. gentlemen opposite, who commands every respect and confidence, and who is known as an able and painstaking officer; and if there is any inaccuracy in this statement, that gentleman is responsible. I have told him from the first hour I had anything to do with the railway and that he was put in charge, that he must not allow the road to run down or the rolling-stock to deteriorate, and that instead of such being deemed an economy it would be considered as the most blameworthy act of which he could be guilty. I told him that all the money required to maintain the road and the rolling-stock in the highest condition of efficiency was at his service, and I would recognize it as the greatest fault of which he could be guilty to allow either to run down. Hon. gentlemen opposite are aware that the chief mechanical superintendent, Mr. Whitney, has for twenty years filled the position—and I confess I place implicit confidence in his statement; and having myself visited every part of the road with the officers, and having taken the superintendent and mechanical superintendent to examine everything and obtain all possible information, I feel myself in the position to declare that all statements respecting deterioration either in the road or rolling-stock are distinctly unfounded. I have taken all the means that a gentleman, not being a professional man, could take to obtain accurate information, and that I have laid before the House fairly and impartially, and I challenge the closest scrutiny into those statements and the most careful examination by any person who wishes to look into them.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Whoever is to blame, every statement that has come before the House is a false statement. The hon. gentleman can locate the blame where he pleases.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman cannot say that the statement is a false one. I stated that all the renewals for the five years he was in power have been charged against him, and that all the subsequent renewals have been charged against the present Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There have been no renewals since the hon. gentleman came to office. He cannot show there was a line laid down which was then beyond repairs. The renewals for 1874-75, was $292,000; for 1875-76, $215,289; for 1877, $200,000; for 1878, $200,000; for 1879, $143,000. Not a dollar was spent by the hon. gentleman or this Government corresponding with his figures, and, therefore, no fair comparison can be made except by deducting those expenditures that were abnormal. In every instance in the Public Reports it is stated with that deduction made, yet the hon. member comes down with a statement which is a false statement and one calculated to deceive the public.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is perfectly true, every line of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am stating the facts, and I invite every member present to go and look at the reports and ascertain what is correct. The renewals in every year have been deducted in making a comparative statement. I wish a statement to be prepared and brought down before concurrence to show the precise condition of the road over the entire line, the amount of the rolling-stock in each year and the revenue.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will give the information to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I want also a statement of the expense and maintenance of way in 1878-79, and I believe that expenditure was deliberately made by the Minister for the purpose of making it as large as possible, and reducing the expenditure for following years. Expenditure for 1877-78 for maintenance of way, was $441,114; for 1878-79, only three months of which was under our control, there was expended on steel rails, $567,851; the following year the amount was reduced to $385,536. I hope if the hon. gentleman is going to present full information to the House he will withdraw the false statement he made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is impossible to withdraw false statements as such have not been made. The falsehood rests with the hon. gentleman in making such a statement. When I sat on that side of the House I stated that it was an untrue policy to bring down accounts in which the renewals were not charged, and I maintained they should be charged each year. The renewals are always charged to the year in which they are made. I might differ with the hon. gentleman as to the proper mode in which to charge the amounts, but if I bring down a statement in which the renewals in both cases are charged to the year in which they apply there would be no falsehood. The hon. gentleman may differ from me but he forgets what is due to himself when he characterizes a statement as false which is a perfectly true and frank statement. I defy the hon. gentleman to put his finger on any statement I ever made in this House or any document I ever submitted that could properly be characterized by any terms so insulting.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have just put my finger on such a case, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to deny it. I invite every hon. member to look at the Public Accounts or the Report on Railways and say if I am not right. The hon. gentleman will not get out of it in the way he thinks of it. I say that we laid the whole line with steel rails and that he did not lay any, and I say that nothing could be more false than the comparison he makes in that respect.

Mr. WELDON. I spoke the other night with regard to the number of casualties on the Intercolonial, and I find from statistics that that road occupies a very unfavorable position compared with others in this respect. In the whole of the railroads of Canada last year 99 lives were lost, while 147 persons were injured, making a total of 246. I find that on the Grand Trunk Railway 25 were killed and no others injured. On the Great Western Railway 9 were killed and 27 injured, making a total of 36. On the Intercolonial Railway 14 were killed and 67 injured, making a total of 81, or nearly one-third of the whole. We find also that many accidents occurred which are not reported, and I call attention to the following paragraph from the St. John's Globe of April 20th, entitled: "Another smash-up on the Intercolonial:"

"Rumors were current to-day that a collision had taken place on the Intercolonial yesterday, near Springhill, and that one of the new engines recently built by Messrs. Fleming & Sons had been badly wrecked. A reporter enquired at the railway station, but the officials there proclaimed ignorance of any accident. From other sources it was gleaned that at an early hour yesterday morning, somewhere between Springhill and Moncton, Conductor Brown's coal train was run into by a special and both engines seriously damaged. No one was injured. The last engine put out by Messrs. Fleming & Sons was one of the number. It was also stated that Engineer McNair, who was in the accident with the late Conductor Geldert, was driving the engine of the special train. The alleged cause of the accident is that the brake on the van would not work, but railway men assert that there are other and better reasons."

If it be true that these accidents are caused by the men being overworked it is false economy. It is noticeable, too, that in most of these accidents it is the employes of the road who generally suffer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see at once that if all the accidents occurred which are reported we would not be able, after repairing locomotives and so forth, to effect the enormous saving which we have effected. There is no truth in the statement that the officials are overworked. There are occasions, of course, when the officials perform more than their usual amount of labor, but it is voluntarily undertaken, and it would be impossible to carry on the work of this road by maintaining a sufficient staff to meet the traffic at particular times without increasing the labor of the regular staff. This would be utterly ruinous to any road, so that at particular times of pressure the road must be operated by calling upon the regular staff.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. With respect to the Prince Edward Island Railway the hon. gentleman must be aware that the recent decision of the Court here, so far as the evidence has been given to the public, seem to show that it was not in good condition. Damages were awarded in one case, if I remember a right, to the amount of $40,000 to one man, and upon the ground mainly that the road was not in a fit condition to be travelled upon, that there was both negligence in construction and negligence in keeping it in repair.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I regret the accident on the Prince Edward Island Railway; but I think we have sufficient margin, as compared with the late Government, to pay a good deal more than the amount mentioned by the hon. gentleman as having been awarded under the very extraordinary judgment of the judge, should that judgment be confirmed, of which we have no expectation. That judgment has been appealed against, and we shall be prepared to show that that finding of the judge was based upon testimony of the most undoubted perjury. I shall be able to show that the gentleman in charge of that railway at the time was one whom my predecessor advanced. He found him in the service at a salary of $2,400 a year, and increased his salary to $4,000 a year.

Mr. MACKENZIE. But I required him to give up an appointment with the Nova Scotia Government from which he was receiving $1,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But we were giving him only $2,400 a year. He was chief engineer of the road and ought to have been able to see that the track was maintained, and that gentleman's testimony proved that where this accident occurred the road was in first-class condition. The track-master, who had been in the service during all the time of the hon. gentlemen opposite, a man of great ability and who is there now, swore in the most positive terms that the road was in the best possible condition. But a dismissed section foreman was brought there from the States who swore that the road was in very bad order. As the matter is still before the Courts, it is not necessary for me to say more than that I have no doubt whatever that the extraordinary damages given to a man who is at this moment performing the duties of cashier in a bank at Charlottetown, are much too great. The deficits on the Prince Edward Island Railway have been as follows:—For 1875-76, $96,869; for 1876-77, $97,930; for 1877-78, $85,700; for 1878-79, $97,457; for 1879-80, $57,789; and for 1880-81, $71,992.

Mr. MACKENZIE. As to the capacity of the engineer that is to be measured by instructions received from headquarters. I saw a statement in some of the papers that a very large number of new sleepers were put in immediately after this accident.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think a large number of sleepers were put in.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That would show that there were no arrangements to put the road in a good condition. The hon. gentleman seems to think it extraordinary that he has succeeded in reducing the amount of the deficit. Well, it ought to be reduced. During the last year I had charge of that road, a large party was engaged during the whole year in renewing portions of the road, extending some parts, straightening curves and so on, and the hon. gentleman found all these works done when he came in. The hon. gentleman says there has been undoubted perjury. Then, have the Government taken steps to have the parties arrested?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No steps have been taken that I am aware of. I make the statements on a report made to me yesterday by the officer who represented the Government at the trial, a highly respectable gentleman of the legal profession, Mr. Hodgson, and his report leaves no doubt on my mind of the most glaring perjury by witnesses at that trial.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Then I presume the Government will take immediate steps to have the perjurers arrested.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that I hold in my hand the report of Mr. McNab. On the 24th August, 1880, a train left the track on the Prince Edward Island Railway, in consequence of which several persons were injured. It was alleged that the accident was caused by the bad condition of the track. Mr. McNab held an investigation and reported that:

"The accident is unaccountable, as the investigation which has been made shows that the road-bed has received a great deal of attention this summer, it having been levelled and gauged and provided with new sleepers where necessary, and no reduction has been made in the number of men employed."

Speaking of the place of the accident, Mr. McNab says:

"It had been examined by John McQuade, one of the section-men, on the morning of the 23rd instant, and it was then in good condition."

And further:

"As the investigation which has been made, combined with a personal examination of the ground, satisfies me that the road-bed had no connection whatever with causing the accident."

The road-master, Mr. H. Houle, is a man of great experience, having been connected with railways for thirty-two years, chiefly with the Calais and Baring Railway, the Grand Trunk, the European and North American, the Western Extension, the New Brunswick and Canada, and the Prince Edward Island Railway. His connection with the latter line dates from its commencement. So all those parties who were on the spot and responsible for the condition of the road, and who were trusted by the late Government, concurred in saying that the road was in first-class condition.

Mr. ANGLIN. Very respectable people in Charlottetown said that they went outside the place and were able to kick some of the sleepers off the track after the accident occurred.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not require any other statement to prove that the man who asserted that gave false evidence. The hon. gentleman knows that over a sleeper that you could kick to pieces, a train could not be taken. Certain parties swore that they could pick the spikes out with their fingers and kick the sleepers off. Will that be believed in face of the statement of Mr. McNab, Mr. Houle and others, all able and accomplished men, who examined and declared the road in first-class condition.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Were those parties examined on the trial?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; and the verdict was founded on the testimony of the parties who had been dismissed. The people in the neighborhood got excited on the subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The verdict seemed to me a very heavy one indeed. I enquired and was told by some people that the rails could not be kept together.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have the good authority I have mentioned for the falsity of that statement.

Resolutions ordered to be reported.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am not prepared to say exactly; probably some Government Bills, and then Supply.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Is the Redistribution Bill to be taken up first?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not at the next sitting of the House.

House adjourned at 3 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 26th April, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE IRISH RESOLUTIONS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the Address adopted by this House on Thursday last, the 20th inst., to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, in relation to the affairs of Ireland, be engrossed.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman announced that he would take steps to prepare an Address, which would have the assent of their Honors in the Upper House—a joint Address.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is the subject of my next motion.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that a Message be sent to their Honors, that this House has passed an Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen in relation to the affairs of Ireland, to which they desire the concurrence of their Honors.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS BILL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the Order for the House to go into Committee on Bill (No. 5) respecting the sale of Railway Passenger Tickets, be transferred from the Public Bills and Orders to Government Orders.

Motion agreed to.

RE-ADJUSTMENT OF THE REPRESENTATION.

Mr. BLAKE. When is it the intention of the Government to ask leave to introduce a Bill for the re-adjustment of the representation?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To-morrow or next day.

NEW BRUNSWICK MAILS.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the Government to the fact that there are no mails to-day from New Brunswick. Every day we are without mails from that Province.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). There must be some defect in the post-office arrangements, for three times a week our mails do not connect. The Postmaster-General, or the Minister of Railways, should pay some attention to this matter; the present condition of things is too bad.

CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 36) respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 26,

Mr. CASEY. This clause appears to hold out to the young men of the country a prospect of entrance into the Civil Service by passing that examination. But we find further on, that although a young man may be successful, he has no chance of being taken on probation as a member of the service, unless he is selected by the Minister at the head of some particular Department. From the explanation which we have already received, I gather, that no matter how little examination any man may pass, he does not require any right even to be taken on probation by passing his examination, and, as a matter of fact, that he will not be taken on probation unless recommended by some supporter of the Government of the day. I have no doubt that the system of nominations by political patronage will remain exactly as it has been. Now, I think it would more correctly express the actual state of things which will exist under this Act to provide, as it was provided in one of the English Civil Service Acts, that only those who have been recommended for positions by members shall have an opportunity of going to these examinations. There will be no use of any one else going up, and it will involve a waste of time and money on the part of the applicants and the examiners, as only those who are on the right side of politics can obtain a recommendation to any influential position, and I think it will be much fairer to the applicants for such positions that the examinations shall be limited to those who are recommended by supporters of the Government, because that is what it really amounts to.

Mr. BLAKE. I perceive that the young men will have to pay a fee. There is an old proverb "what I keep, that I lose; what I gain, that I save." I want to know on what principle these fees are to be exacted, and what the probable amount will be?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position now to say what fees will be required, but I suppose that if a candidate is selected to pass his examination, he will have to pay a small fee for his certificate. That, of course, is done everywhere.

Mr. BLAKE. The examination shall be open to all persons, upon the payment of a fee, therefore it is not a preliminary for taking advantage of the certificate, but it is a preliminary to going into an examination. I am not opposed to the payment of a nominal fee. In one of the institutions with which I have been connected, the Law Society, the fee required to be paid is one dollar. It is required upon the principle that there should be some check upon persons first giving notice and afterwards not coming up. But I think it would be extremely objectionable to put on a fee which would be an obstacle or barrier to coming up, who will say to the young man: "You have no certainty of getting into the service, there is no certainty of you getting a certificate, but there is a certainty of losing $5."

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no intention, but the contrary, to put any obstacles in the way of candidates coming up to pass their examinations; but, as the hon. gentleman says, there must be a certain check on parties giving the notice and putting the examiners to trouble and then failing to come up. There may be a fee exacted in that case, perhaps a fee from those who will receive their certificate. The thing is safe in the hands of the Government of the day, no matter of whom composed, because they are responsible to Parliament.

On clause 27,

Mr. CASEY. A notice of one month is scarcely sufficient for examination in British Columbia for instance, because it would take the Canada Gazette a fortnight to go out there.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is a question of detail in the regulations. We may still give special notice in the local papers, but it is absolutely necessary to be published in the Canada Gazette.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Is it intended that this clause shall apply to the preliminary as well as to the qualifying examinations?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It really seems to me to be quite unnecessary. I am sorry the Chairman has consented to strike out that preliminary examination.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is nothing to prevent the two examinations taking place at the same time. Notice may be given for the same time if the examiners find, on the preliminary examination, that, say, two young men out of ten are not able to pass the examination in arithmetic and orthography, they may tell them to withdraw, there is no chance of passing their examination.

Mr. CASEY. I see the notice is to state the time and place of examination and the subjects. Now, a notice of a month or even six weeks is too little to give on those subjects. The subjects should be settled by the Board of Examiners as early as possible after its organization, and they should then be published, so that all those who intend to come will have proper notice to prepare themselves on the different subjects. I think the House should have a general statement as to the character of the examination. We know the character of the qualifying examination in England, because we have the examination papers for some years back. The qualifying examination is pretty severe, but the competitive examination is excessively and unduly severe, and gives an improper advantage to those who "cram" as is the practice in England.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When the Board is appointed it will have to go to work and prepare subjects for examination, and submit them for the examiner of the Executive, and the subjects will necessarily have to be published in the Official Gazette. That is the practice which obtains in regard to examinations for the Indian service. We could not, of course, ask a young man who proposed to have an entrance as a third-class clerk to have an examination in classics, Latin and Greek, but in the elementary subjects which he must know to make him a good clerk. If he wants to pass an examination for a higher degree the subjects must be more difficult.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think this matter rests entirely with the examiners. The members are not, under this Bill, an independent Board of Commissioners as they are in England, charged with the policy of the Civil Service; but this will simply be an Examining Board, the policy of the service remaining in the hands of the Governor in Council. Therefore, the service of the examination is a matter of policy not of detail, and the Government will decide it without the interference of the Examining Board.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government may consult with the Board.

Mr. CASEY. The examination should not include the higher branches of classics and scientific subjects. It is merely a qualifying examination intended to test the fitness of young men for ordinary clerical employment, and it should not exceed the capacity of an average well educated young man. Young men should not be admitted into the third class who could not be qualified to rise to the second and first. One of the complaints made against the service by several of the Deputy-Heads before the Committee of which I was Chairman, was that the service was filled with young men in the lower grades who were not fit for promotion. The object of the qualifying examination is to secure the entrance of young men who are fit for promotion. I object to the principle of selecting second or first-class clerks by a higher examination than that for third class. I adhere to the only true system followed in every thoroughly organized system of Civil Service, that a man should work up, and that the higher grades should be attained by special qualifications and not on the ground of higher literary attainments. The principle of competition is that the man with the highest qualifications should be appointed. But in England, examinations are applied only to the lower grades; they are not considered a test for the higher grades, the test for those must be experience. In England, when a list of successful candidates is made out, they are given to understand that their claims will not extend beyond the period of the next examination, so as to prevent a number of men hanging on indefinitely in the expectation of getting Government employment. This section does not state whether the list will be made out so as to show the order in which the candidates have passed. This should be done, as there may be considerable difference between two successful candidates.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not the intention to make the candidates pass a new examination each following term. Some of them may hang on, but they will soon find out what chance they have for appointment. Others will come up, and those who have passed, but have not been appointed, may not possess the other qualifications necessary. The regulations may provide for discrimination as to capacity, but that must of course be left to the regulations.

Mr. CASEY. It is really necessary to mark their standing, because it is quite possible for a highly educated man in passing this examination to show that he possesses other knowledge which might be useful to the Departments, and which the Minister should know.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A candidate who comes up for examination to be admitted into the third class may, if he chooses, pass an examination to qualify him for the first or second class; and if he should pass it successfully, that would be a strong recommendation to the Minister to select him in preference to another for the first or second class, should he be otherwise qualified.

On clause 29,

Mr. BLAKE. The examinations are, by this clause, provided only for appointments to third-class clerkships and messengerships. The hon. Minister has stated that a candidate may have the option for passing for first and second-class appointments. If that be the intention such examinations should be provided for in this Bill.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That may be provided later in another clause. We will let this clause stand, and if not will add to it a provision of this nature. But, in the meantime, I would ask that the clause be adopted as it stands, and I will take a note of the suggestion.

On clause 30,

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I would like much if the Minister would insert an amendment which I propose in the fifth line, on the sixth page of the Bill, providing that in the selection no consideration shall be given to the political predilections of the candidates. I hold that the prizes of the service should be open to the young men of the country without regard to politics. In England, where there are competitive examinations, politics are ignored altogether; and I think, when we are creating provisions for a new Civil Service, we should, as far as possible, put a restraint upon the Government in the matter of making appointments out of political considerations. I would move that after the word "select" there shall be added "having no regard to political party considerations."

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the clause should be adopted as it stands, without the amendment. The fact is, we do not speak of politics in this Bill at all. We are settling the Civil Service without reference to one party or the other. When I introduced the Bill, and also at the second reading, I said that I wished to have the countenance of hon. gentlemen in the measure, as I thought it was a matter in which both sides were equally interested. Hon. gentlemen may some day or other come back to this side, and they will, of course, have the law to work upon; but we, as a Government, having the countenance of Parliament, must be left to select these men, who having passed the examination are found to be qualified for office. We will select the men, who, in our opinion, are the best men to be appointed, and if, after six months, any man is found to be unfit for office, of course he will be replaced by another. If hon. gentlemen have not confidence enough in this or any other Government, to allow them to select the officers under the provisions of the Bill as they stand, they will not succeed better by inserting the few words proposed to be added. What guarantee will the hon. gentleman have with his amendment, that a selection would be made without reference to politics? Here is a list of twenty men, and out of them will be selected those who are considered the best. What effect will these words have? How can you prove that there was no reference to politics, or that there was a reference to politics in any particular appointment? It would be impossible to establish the one thing or the other, and, therefore, the words are useless, and the clause should be adopted as it stands.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. You should add the words since they would do no harm.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has frankly admitted that he would pay no attention if they were in.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We pay no more attention than we would without them, because we would select the best men in any case, according to our opinion of their fitness.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentleman practically says that amongst the qualifications the best men are—

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman, in his experience, will be able to give us all those qualifications.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. We know that without the safeguard of competitive examinations this would be nothing but a political farce or dodge.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows it by experience.

Mr. CASEY. It is true that nothing short of political examinations can prevent the introduction of a political and personal favoritism. I object to this clause, which simply leaves the choice of officers entirely in the hands of the Minister as before, with the exception that he must choose from a certain list of qualified men. I wish to call attention to the very strange words of the Commissioners in regard to this matter:

"Notwithstanding the reluctance of witnesses to commit themselves to any specific statements as to the inefficiency of their subordinates, there is sufficient in their general statements on that subject to justify the conclusion that the service is susceptible of very great improvement, and that there have been many appointments to it of persons whose habits, lack of educational requirements, or inaptitude for business could not fail to produce a state of affairs fully justifying most of the propositions stated in the reference to the Commission. But, apart from any specific statements made in the evidence, we find in its general tenor and in what we have ourselves observed, abundant reasons for the conclusions that the service requires reform, and that it has not been sufficiently guarded against the evil effects of political patronage. To this baneful influence, we believe, may be traced nearly all that demands change. It is responsible for admission to the service of those who are too old to be efficient; of those whose impaired health and enfeebled constitutions forbids the hope that they can ever become useful public servants; of those whose personal habits are an equally fatal objection; of those whose lack of education should disqualify them; and of those whose mental qualities are of an order that has made it impossible for them to succeed in private business. It is responsible too for the appointment of those who desire to lead an easy and, what they deem, a genteel life."

What I wish to call attention to especially, is that to this baneful influence may be traced nearly all that demands change. It is not merely the admission of unfit men to the service, but the promotion and treatment of these men after being in the service, the general management of the service, its general tone, and its reputation before the public who are debased and degraded by the fact that the men are appointed by political influence. It is not merely an educational qualification that is required, but a radical change in the method of promotion. I heartily agree with the Commissioners that political influence is at the root of nearly all the evils of the service, and therefore I object to the clause as it now stands.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Perhaps the hon. Minister will accept the words "and the appointments shall be made from the three highest names on the list." This would be better than this mode of allowing the Government to select in this promiscuous way, from among the successful candidates, those who may be particularly recommended by political favoritism.

Mr. BLAKE. It is provided that they shall be selected in order, is it not?

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). This is the pith of the whole Bill, and unless there is some safeguard here against political influences, which have depraved the Civil Service, the Bill will be utterly useless. We were looking forward to a Bill providing substantial reform, but there can be no reform unless the appointments are given to the men who stand at the head of the list, other qualifications being equal. The hon. gentleman knows that the system which has been so successful in the New York Post Office under ex-Postmaster-General James, was based upon competition; he knows that all the Bills at present before the United States Senate are based upon this system; he knows that all that has recommended the English system to all who have considered the question is this feature of competition; and he knows that these Commissioners, appointed by the hon. gentleman himself, base all their demands for a change in the service on a system of competition. Another clause of their report says:

"We claim that it is the most effectual, indeed the only, means of completely and permanently cutting away all opportunities for the exercise of political influence, which we believe to be so injurious to the public interests."

Now, the hon. gentleman appointed Commissioners to supply us with information with regard to certain evils in the Civil Service; they have supplied this information very fully, but the whole pith of it is discarded by the hon. gentleman. Yet we pay for this work; these Commissioners have been on duty for several years, and, I think, we have paid them $3,000 or $4,000. The hon. gentleman is using the time of this House with a Bill which is perfectly useless; my opinion is that it will be used as a protection to cover up some of the worst cases of political appointments in the service. Now, the hon. gentleman surely will not go back on the report of the Commission, or refuse to be guided by the experience of England and the United States, or ignore the kindly admonitions which he hears on this side of the House from gentlemen who know a good deal about competitive examinations, and as much as the hon. gentleman about reform in the Civil Service. If the hon. gentleman refuses all hints which we give him, he might as well adopt the course suggested, and do, by Order in Council, what he proposes to do by this Bill. I think the hon. gentleman is practically insulting the intelligence of this House when he refuses to entertain the slightest amendment we offer, and I am almost prepared to say that he might as well put his Bill through Committee pro forma, have it signed by the Speaker, and just have the House prorogued. I never knew a Minister on the Treasury benches, when initiating such a great measure, to treat the intelligence of the House with so much contempt as he is doing.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it proposed that this clause shall apply to the office of the Auditor-General? If it is, it seems to me to be subversive of the Audit Act.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The new clause which I propose to add provides that the powers and duties of the Auditor-General are saved.

On clause 31,

Mr. CASEY. This clause seems to be peculiar. If a man is rejected, another clerk is selected in his stead, and then the Head of the Department decides whether the man rejected is utterly rejected or taken on trial again. That would seem as if two men were to be put in the place of one.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Not at all. If a man is rejected, he, of course, goes out of the office and another man is selected in his place; and then the Head of the Department decides whether the name of the person rejected shall be struck off the list—not the list of the Department, but the list prepared by the examiners, as being unfit for the service generally.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand, however, that this rejection shall be definitive for that particular Department. Is he to be allowed another trial in that Department, or in the other Departments?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The trial he has had in that Department shows whether he is fit for the service or not. After having been tried for a year, and the Deputy-Head reports that he is not fit, he is rejected; and then it is for the Head of the Department to see whether the reason for his rejection is sufficient to render him unfit for the service generally; in that case he states so, and the officer's name disappears from the list.

Mr. CASEY. I think the provision should be limited so as to specify that he must not have a trial for the same Department; otherwise an unscrupulous Minister might state that he was unfit for the service altogether.

On clause 32,

Mr. BLAKE. On sub-section B of this clause arises a portion of the suggestion I made the other day. I maintain that the report of the Deputy-Head ought to be that the requisite qualifications are not possessed by any person then in the service of that or any other Department, and available for the office. If the qualifications are professional, the range is of course rarer; but there may be other qualifications for an office, such as that of an accountant, and there might be some person in the other Departments who would possess those qualifications, and who ought surely to have a chance for the office. The hon. gentleman suggested that this might demoralize the Department, and I have endeavored to phrase the amendment I propose in such a way as to meet that objection, my language being: "Not possessed by any person then in the service of that or any other Department and available for the office." So that if peculiar circumstances should render an officer not available, but wanted elsewhere, still we could go and find another person outside.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government or Head of the Department, by this clause, is not precluded from selecting another officer from another Department. The clause means that if the qualifications required are not possessed by persons in the other Departments, and the

Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

Deputy-Head concurs in a report to that effect, then the Governor in Council may select any person deemed best fitted to fill the vacancy. We are thus not precluded from taking an officer from any other Department, whom we may select as well as an outsider; and therefore we cannot put in sub-section B the words: "That the requisite qualifications are not possessed by any person of that Department or any other," because the Deputy-Head could not report that. He is not supposed to know the qualifications of officers in other Departments. But, by stating what is proposed, he may say: "I concur in your report, so far as the Department is concerned; but if I find that in another Department there is another officer qualified for the position, who can be replaced without destroying the efficiency of that Department, I shall recommend him." And, therefore, it will fall under the second sub-section, which says that he may select that person from another Department, or from the outside.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not argue that the Governor in Council was precluded from selecting a person from some other Department, although I might have pointed out that sub-section A does seem to indicate such a difficulty. But I do not say that that is the effect of the whole clause; whereas, according to the hon. gentleman's limited interpretation of the Deputy-Head's report, it ought to be simply that no one in the Department itself possessed these qualifications—that he does not know any more as to the qualifications of individuals in other Departments than in an outsider; nor can he know any more of the working of other Departments than an outsider. So he is not qualified to say that such a person in another Department is or is not fit for the office. But what I wanted to emphasize was, not that the Governor in Council is precluded from selecting an officer of another Department, but that the scope of the clause indicates that the outside is to be looked to instead of the inside; and I want the clause to recognize the propriety of looking inside first, of widening the area of expectant promotion to deserving persons inside the service as far as possible. That was my object.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. On principle, I would have no objection to meet the hon. gentleman in this way: in the second sub-section to provide: "If the Head of the Department concurs in such report, the Governor in Council may appoint such person if found in other Departments, or from outside, as shall be deemed best fitted to fill the vacancy."

Mr. BLAKE. It might read thus: "Such persons as shall be deemed best fitted to fill the vacancy from any other Department, if there be any other available, and if not, an outsider, could be taken." I have just one other suggestion with reference to sub-section 2. It will be observed that the clause in sub-section C provide that it would be for the public interest that the examination, herein provided for, should, as regards such vacancy, be wholly or partially dispensed with. I am strongly of opinion that the examination provided for by this Bill, which is only a qualifying examination, need never be dispensed with at all. It is quite different when it is a competitive examination. I should be disposed to say that any person, however advanced in years, or special his qualification, who cannot pass the qualifying examination would hardly be fit for any situation at all. But the clause provides that it shall be wholly or partially dispensed with; and then, if the Governor in Council shall select such person as he may deem best fitted to fill the vacancy, I suggest the introduction of these words: "The persons selected shall undergo such examination as may be suggested in the report." If there is to be only a partial examination, the persons should be selected finally after passing it.

Mr. CASEY. On the question of examination, before that alteration is finally made, I wish to say that the reason here given for deviating from the ordinary rules of appointment is chiefly that professional requirements exist which cannot be tested in the ordinary way. I think it should be made obligatory in cases where professional requirements are in question that a candidate should pass an examination for those requirements.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. CASEY. Then the hon. Minister abandons the idea of test qualifications; he goes back on the spirit of his own Bill. A man to be admitted to the third class must pass an examination, but a man requiring professional knowledge or special requirements is not subjected to examination at all, so that there is no attempt to secure efficiency in this class. It has occurred again and again, as testified before the Committee by Mr. Sandford Fleming, that men utterly ignorant of professional duties were appointed as surveyors under him.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have accepted the suggestions of the hon. member for West Durham, which I thought were carrying out the idea of this clause; but I am sorry to say that I cannot consent to the amendment of the hon. gentleman—it is not necessary. The examination is for admission into the Civil Service as ordinary clerks, but I do not think it should be extended to gentlemen who are selected on account of their professional qualifications. We should not ask a chief engineer, or a chief architect, or any person in that position, to pass an examination.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite agree with the hon. Minister so far as regards the higher offices. It is by his professional knowledge, his own high reputation, his skill, certificate and approved record, that you appoint such an officer; but that does not apply to subordinate officers, who do not require skill and knowledge of that kind. I do not go quite so far as to say, that in the latter cases there should always be an examination. Even under the English Act a wise discretion is given, which was exercised not long ago by Sir William Harcourt in the case of an inspector of mines. The person appointed had no great educational advantages, but had special advantages of training, and the possession of the confidence of the people among whom he was to discharge his duties, and his appointment, without examination, was defended on those grounds. The Deputy-Head should be allowed a certain amount of latitude, in deciding whether, in cases of professional appointments, an examination should be undergone or not.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I differ with the hon. gentleman on this point. I do not think an engineer, or an architect, or any other officer of that kind, should be submitted to an examination. He has already passed his examination and received his certificate of admission into his profession. His certificates are well known to the men of his profession and to the clerks, by whom he is considered qualified to fulfil his duties, and he is selected by the Head of the Department, and confirmed by the Governor in Council for the position. Then he is not there permanently. Under this law he may be discharged after a certain time if he is not found to be competent. I think, under the circumstances, the clause should remain as we have amended it. I now propose to add the following as a new clause, to meet the suggestions of the hon. member for West Durham:—

"If a vacancy occurs in the office of the Auditor-General such report shall be made by that officer to the Minister of Finance, who shall lay it before the Governor in Council, and in any case in which the Auditor-General deems it necessary to report for the information of the Governor in Council, such report shall be made through the Minister of Finance."

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know how that is going to work. As well as I remember the Audit Act, it provides that all appointments to that office shall be made by the Governor in Council. You deal here only with the case of a vacancy occurring in the office. Supposing there is a new appointment, that an additional officer is required for the staff.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In any case in which the Auditor-General deems it necessary to report to the Governor in Council—that will cover the case.

Mr. BLAKE. I am discussing whether it is a workable provision. I now refer to the case where a fresh appointment may be required, not a vacancy at all.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The first portion of the clause provides for a vacancy, then "and in any case in which the Auditor-General deems it necessary to report for the information of the Governor in Council;" that will cover any new appointment.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me that is a very awkward attempt to provide for the general run of the office of the Auditor-General, hitching it on to the 32nd clause, which deals only with exceptional cases. Clause 32 deals with a certain class of vacancies which require to be filled by persons having some special or professional knowledge. The report to be made by the Deputy-Head is only in exceptional cases.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It is very clear this amendment now applies only to these exceptional cases specified in clause 32. I think it would be better to make a separate clause for the general application.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The second portion of the clause reads: "in any case in which the Auditor-General deems it necessary to report." Perhaps it would be better to say: "in any case in which the Auditor-General has reported and deems it necessary to report." He may find it necessary to communicate with the Governor in Council; he may require some change to be made in his department, and I think the clause as amended would cover the case.

Mr. BLAKE. I think if the hon. gentleman will have the Bill looked over by some of the legal officers with reference to the whole case, he will find this is a very imperfect way of accomplishing the object we all have in view.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I instructed the Law Clerk what we required to be provided for in the Bill with reference to the medium of communication between the Auditor-General and the Council. However, before the Bill is finally passed I will again call his attention to the point raised by the hon. gentleman.

On clause 33,

Mr. BLAKE. In this clause it is of great consequence that we should also recognize the right on the part of clerks in other Departments to expect, if there be not clerks available for promotion in any Department where a vacancy occurs, to have a chance of promotion. I maintain that the practical business of the service, except for the highest grades, require in all the Departments somewhat similar qualifications.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I admit that in the event of the Head of a Department being unable to find a clerk qualified for promotion within the Department, he might select a clerk from some other Department.

Mr. BLAKE. If the hon. gentleman agrees to the application of the principle here, it will require other words, because the clause there deals with peculiar qualifications, and not with the ordinary promotions. If the hon. gentleman agrees to the principle, there will be no difficulty in settling the terms.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I stated that yesterday in regard to the other clause, and I think it follows here.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. What do the words "unless the Governor in Council shall otherwise order" mean? Is it not intended that every one in the Department shall have an opportunity of undergoing examination, or a chance for promotion ?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This has reference to the previous clause, which suggests what shall be done in the case of a vacancy of office requiring peculiar qualifications.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I think, as it appears here, it will apply to the 32nd clause, which is a general one.

Mr. CASEY. Though I do not think that it was intended by the Government, the effect of the words, as they are placed here, will be as the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) suggests.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no objection to strike out the words.

On clause 33,

Mr. CASEY. I think the wording should be changed to express more clearly what are the facts of the case. Promotion by examination means promotion made in consequence of having passed certain examinations; but that is not what is provided here. The clause provides only that selections for promotion shall be made from those passing qualifying examinations. I would suggest the words: "promotions shall only be made from amongst those who have passed the prescribed examinations as hereafter provided by the regulations," and so forth.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That would alter the meaning altogether, and I think the clause must stand as it is.

On clause 35,

Mr. CASEY. I would like to ask if this clause would interfere with the arrangements existing in the Excise Department, and perhaps others, for competitive examinations for higher positions in the service.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; those examinations will stand as at present.

Mr. CASEY. I would here again urge that this list should be made in the order of merit, for the same reasons which I mentioned in the case of the entrance examinations.

On clause 36,

Mr. BLAKE. This clause proceeds on the theory that there are always persons available for promotion in the ranks of the Department, and while this may be the rule, especially in the larger Departments, but in my own experience, having charge of a Department with few employes, I found more than once that there was no person in the ranks of the Department whom I could fairly, having regard to the public interests, promote to a higher office. I would, in view of the recurrence of that difficulty, suggest some such amendment as the following:

"Provided that where no person employed in the Department is found available for promotion therein, then an examination shall be held of persons employed in the service of other Departments with a view to the promotion being made as far as practicable from the service."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CASEY. I must again protest against the fact that this clause leaves political influence in regard to promotions exactly as it was before; that the recommendations of the Commission are totally disregarded, and that no reform whatever is made in the method of promotions. This clause is contradictory of clause 33, which says promotions shall be made by examination, and leaves the power of promotion entirely under the control of the Minister.

On clause 40,

Mr. BLAKE. The latter part of this clause in effect, gives to the Governor in Council the absolute power of deciding how the whole sum voted for the Civil Service shall be allocated among the civil servants.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No. After the passage of this measure, the Governor in Council will have to put it into execution, and the Governor in Council will have to do what was done once before, when there was a theoretical organization made in the different Departments. That is to say, the Governor in Council determines by an Order in Council that in such a Department there will be a sub-Head, a chief clerk, a first-class clerk, and so many others, and so many messengers; next, the salaries they shall receive. In this case, to put the Act into force, we shall have to retain the whole Civil Service and see what number of officers will be required in each Department to execute the work; and then the Governor in Council will determine the particular organization of the Departments, and follow the law as to the salaries. The salaries will be fixed by this Act. On the other hand, we do not interfere with the present incumbents who will retain their salaries. We will take those clerks able to fill the offices and say: "That chief clerk shall occupy this office, &c." But we wish also to say that in expenditure we shall not exceed the amount voted by Parliament. So, if we should require more officers than are provided by Parliament, we cannot appoint them; and shall have to ask Parliament for more as well as for the money to pay them. That is the object of the clause.

Mr. BLAKE. That may be its object, but it is not its effect, because it does not provide that the total amount voted for each Department shall not be exceeded, but only that the total amount voted for the whole Civil Service shall not be exceeded. So that out of the total amount, $700,000 or $800,000, they may appropriate enough to support extra officers, exceeding, in one Department, in this way, the whole amount of the saving effected in any other.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We cannot do that, because the money appropriated by Parliament is so much for each Department, and we cannot violate the Supply Act in regard to any.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Does this Bill require the reorganization of the Departments altogether? Will the officers require to be re-appointed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It will enable the Governor in Council to remodel the Departments, and appoint first-class, second-class and third-class clerks. At present there are first-class, senior second-class, junior second-class and then third-class clerks, or fourth class; while, under this Bill, there will be but three classes, the time will be longer also. This Act will enable the Governor in Council to remodel each Department if found necessary.

Mr. CASEY. The second sub-section requires some explanation. A man's rank in the future reorganized Department will be decided altogether by the salary he happens to be in receipt of when the reorganization took place; so that any existing inequality will be perpetuated. This clause also provides that where there are too many clerks, the Governor in Council shall select those who are to be the acting clerks, and the balance are to be supernumeraries. Does that mean that they are to retain their rank with the salary, or the salary without the corresponding work?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the reorganization, should the Governor in Council decide that there shall be two first-class clerks, while three are already in the Department, he will appoint two; but the other will retain his rank and salary, but will perform the duties of the next lower class. When a vacancy occurs in the first class, he will be appointed to it, receiving the rank and salary of that class. We do not want to degrade any officer; but the organization of the Departments will be different, securing a smaller number of clerks in certain classes. After a while the supernumeraries will be absorbed in the Civil Service and disappear. The intention is that these clerks will fulfil their proper duties.

Mr. CASEY. While retaining the same salaries as at present, the new supernumerary first-class clerks will be doing inferior work. As I said, the clause must mean either that a man retains his rank without his salary, or the rank and salary without the appropriate work. He retains the rank and salary for doing an inferior class of work. It may be a little inconvenient for the moment for the officers, but he is remunerated at all events. How is the difficulty to be met? I suppose after the allocation in the different Departments regard will be had to the amount voted as salaries, and the number of clerks allotted to each Department will be only such as can be paid the salaries allotted to the different grades.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If after the reorganization of the Department the Governor in Council thought that one or two clerks of higher grade were required, and the money was not available in this year's vote, these clerks would be appointed, but would fulfil the duties of a lower grade until Parliament would decide whether to vote the money or not.

On clause 42,

Mr. CASEY. The principle of employing temporary clerks to do permanent work which has gone on for many years, will, I hope, be remedied by this Bill. I have known temporary clerks to have been kept in the service for eight or ten years, while many permanent clerks have been dismissed after shorter terms of service. Matters should be so arranged that a Department would know how many clerks it wants for ordinary transactions, and beyond that the employment of temporary clerks should be strictly temporary.

Mr. BLAKE. The present provision provides that the employment of temporary clerks should not continue longer than six months. What is the rule to be in future with reference to other employment of temporary clerks? Whatever that may be, it should equally apply to those at present doing temporary work. They are paid out of contingencies, and the public do not know what is paid at present, as my hon. friend has pointed out, for what is practically a permanent service. You are providing no limitation as to the length of time those now temporarily employed should be continued. Every person now temporarily employed ought to be discontinued contemporaneously with your new theoretical organization. Then, if there is a pressure of work you may employ temporary clerks, and will no doubt select those at present so engaged. I wish to object to the system of charging salaries of clerks employed on public works against the different works. They should come out of the vote for the salaries in the Department of Public Works. I think that the officers who are in the employment of the Public Works Department, temporarily or permanently, ought to be paid out of the public revenues, and so far as possible out of the moneys especially voted, and that only those who are regularly on the work itself can reasonably and properly be paid out of the vote for the work.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman may be theoretically right, but practically he is wrong. Suppose that in the Public Works Department a number of civil engineers or architects are required for a special service, and that we have in the Department a number of men belonging to those professions, who have been for several years employed as clerks; is it right and proper that we should call upon these to perform this special work? The hon. gentleman made a distinction about clerks who are working on the spot, and a professional architect; but if the plans have not been prepared, the work has to be done in the office. We have more or less officers according as the Government has given the Department more or less work to execute, and therefore these clerks, if they were to become permanent officers, would cost a great deal of money, and hence these officers must be temporary clerks or temporary officers. I have always found that it is better to divide their labor between the different works. For example, here is one who is specially employed for three or four months, preparing plans and specifications. Well, his salary is taken out of the appropriation for the special work on which he is engaged, in the same way as the clerk of works who is on the spot looking after the work. I think that the rule which has been followed from year to year should not be discontinued. I think it is a proper rule that each work should carry its own expenses with it, and these are legitimate expenses. However, these officers may be called extra clerks, they must still be paid, and if you put them on the permanent staff, or on the special staff of the Department, then they will be considered as belonging to the Civil Service, and will be considered as a source of increasing expense. Whenever a vacancy occurs in a higher grade amongst men of that class we know that we may promote one of their number who has performed his duties well and reward him for his long services. In this way I think the public service is as well accomplished, and at a cheaper rate than if we made the appointments in the other way.

Mr. BLAKE. I want to point out one great defect which arises from the continuation of the present system, and which ought to be remedied by some change of practice in the reports furnished to the public. There is no check whatever upon extravagance in the Department of Public Works. The only check which we have with reference to salaries is the annual vote, and the only check we have with reference to contingencies is the annual vote and the scrutiny of it; but we do not know at all what is the real staff, or what the real amount is, how much is covered by the salary account for persons employed in the different public works; therefore, we have not that scrutiny we ought to have, there being no publicity at all given to the real staff of the Department, or the real expenditure that occurs in the Department. Now, that is an objection far more than counterbalancing the suggested improvement of each work being charged theoretically in the Public Accounts with the precise expenditure which belongs to it. In order to carry that out you will have to charge each work to the account of the officer at the head of each Department. The hon. Minister did not direct his attention to the extended authorization which is given by this Act to the continuance of the temporary clerks, now under appointment by the hon. Minister. According to my memory of the Act no temporary clerk can now be continued for more than six months; but the hon. gentleman proposes to give an indefinite right to continue the service as temporary clerks of all persons yet so employed. That seems to me to be wholly indefensible.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The object of this was that, after they had been there several years, we would deal with them in the same way as we have been doing with the permanent staff of the Department. While we are now adopting a new Civil Service Act, we ought to take into account the service rendered in the past by those who are now in the Department. I think those clerks who have been employed for a number of years should be dealt with liberally, and therefore we should make an exception in their favor. I think the clause should pass as it is.

Bill reported.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY RETURN.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to lay before the House a return correcting the errors that were found in the return of the earnings, per train mile, on the Intercolonial Railway, which I promised to procure for the hon. member for Centre Huron. The following are the corrected figures for the year 1876-77: earnings per train mile, 65.09 cents; working expenses, 93.69 cents; loss, 28.60 cents; train mileage, 1,773,671 miles; average tons of freight moved per engine purchased on capital account, 4,214. Then, for the year 1879-80, the capital expenditure, exclusive of expenditure in connection with the Rivière du Loup branch, was $158,439; and the capital expenditure in connection with the Rivière du Loup branch was $1,889,575. These are the correct returns.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 100) to incorporate the McClary Manufacturing Company.—(Mr. Carling.)

THE DUTIES ON COTTONS AND WOOLLENS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. ANGLIN moved in amendment:

"That the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved, That the system and scale of duties on cotton and woollen goods have resulted in the imposition of a rate of taxation on those articles chiefly used by the masses inordinately high and greater than the rate imposed on those articles chiefly used by the rich, and that the said duties should be amended so as to reduce the rate of taxation on the masses, and to make it more nearly proportionate with that levied on the rich."

He said: We on this side of the House object to the present Tariff, mainly on two grounds: first, that it takes from the people of this country many millions of dollars more than are required for the proper maintenance, in the most efficient state, of the various public services of this country; and, next, Sir, that the burthens it imposes are unequally and unjustly imposed, because they bear more heavily upon the poorer people than upon the rich, because it burthens the masses more than those who are supposed to have large means, and who could afford to pay excessive taxation, were excessive taxation of any class necessary or desirable. It is probable that because we move this resolution the charge will be repeated against us that we are the enemies of the industries of this country, that we are the enemies in a special degree of the manufacturing interests of this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, even the day after the election of 1878 took place, we, small as our numbers are in this House, represented nearly one-half of the whole of the people of this Dominion. To-day, small as our numbers are—and we have not increased much in numbers in this House—to-day I believe we represent considerably more than half of the people of this whole Dominion, and that we could be in thought or in fact the enemies of any great interest of this country, is an assertion that scarcely requires refutation. It is an assertion, however, which has been repeatedly made, and I have no doubt will be made again. I have no doubt that when hon. gentlemen on the other side go to the country, whether it be in the month of June next as some say, or next year as others still think, one of the cries on which they will seek re-election will be the cry that they are the friends of the manufacturing industries of this country, and that we are their inveterate enemies.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. ANGLIN. I see that hon. gentlemen intimate that that will be one line which they will take in the approaching contest; but I say that we are prepared to meet them on that line, that we are prepared to show that we are the friends of the working classes of whom they once talked so much, but of whom they say so little now. We will be prepared to show that we are the true friends of the manufacturers, and, indeed, of every industry of this country, because our policy is the policy of even-handed justice and fair play to all classes, because we refuse to create monopolies, because we refuse to impose unjust and undue burdens upon any industry of this country. The cotton industry, Mr. Speaker, is one of those to which we are said to be especially hostile, because we urge that, under the present Tariff, undue and unfair advantages are given to those interests, and that the working classes especially, on account of these advantages, have to pay enormously high prices for the goods they are compelled to purchase from those manufacturers. We, Sir, were glad to observe the progress of the cotton manufacturers of this country under the old system. We would be delighted to observe the progress of the cotton manufactures of this country to-day, and though we object to what we find to be unfair in the Tariff in respect to the duties on cottons, we would not inflict the slightest injury or do the slightest wrong to those interests. Under the old system cotton manufactures were fairly progressive. It was comparatively a new industry, and only a few years ago was comparatively a very small industry indeed. Probably the factory built in St. John some years ago was one of the first erected in the Dominion. One has existed at Cornwall a great many years. The Hudon cotton factory at Montreal was established in later years, but I find from some statistics taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns the following facts which show the growth in the manufacture of cotton in this country for a number of years. So late as 1872, after hon. gentlemen on the other side had been a great many years in power, after they had had ample opportunities of encouraging the industries of this country, and promoting their growth, the whole of the raw cotton imported into Canada was but 1,701,210 lbs. In the following year, 1873, when they were still in power, the quantity had increased by about 250,000 lbs., being 1,982,848 lbs. Then they went out of office, and immediately after they went out and the Liberal party obtained power, there was an extraordinary increase in the quantity of raw cotton imported. It increased from 1,982,848 lbs. in 1873, to 3,514,281 lbs. in 1874. Were I, Sir, to follow the system of logic, so called, of which hon. gentlemen opposite are so proud, I would assert, and produce these figures to prove, that the downfall of the hon. gentlemen, in 1873, gave a valuable impulse to the cotton industry of this country; the quantity manufactured certainly increasing nearly twice. In 1875, there was an increase to 3,778,109 lbs., and we find a still further remarkable increase from that quantity to 5,527,428 lbs., in 1876. There continued to be a steady and most satisfactory progress in the development of the manufacture of cotton in this country. Then, as we know, hard times came upon Canada; the business depression which prevailed for some time previous in other parts of the world began to affect us in Canada, notwithstanding the admirable administration of public affairs at the hands of the hon. member for Lambton and his colleagues. Consequently, the quantity of cotton fabrics imported, amongst other things, began to decline. In 1872, the value of cotton imported was \$10,182,000, in 1873 it was slightly less, but still over \$10,000,000, and, in 1876, it had fallen to \$7,160,013, a falling off of over 25 per cent. Notwithstanding that decline in those importations, the manufacture of cotton in this country steadily increased. If I chose to adopt the mode of argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, I might say that that increase in the manufacture of cotton under the more favorable administration of the hon. member for Lambton, had led to this large reduction in the imports from Great Britain and the United States; but I do not choose to follow that mode of reasoning; I prefer to follow the plain, manifest ways of truth and fair dealing. As we know, the depression increased very greatly, yet the manufacture of cotton went on increasing. In 1877, the quantity of raw cotton manufactured was 5,578,222 lbs.; in 1878—that year of woe and mourning and suffering, according to hon. gentlemen opposite—the quantity of raw cotton imported rose to 7,243,431 lbs., or 1,700,000 lbs. more than in 1877; and, in 1879, only a part of which year was influenced directly by the National Policy, the quantity increased to 9,721,700 lbs. Thus we find a steady, natural and most satisfactory growth of this particular manufacture under the financial system then in existence—a growth that was scarcely affected by the extraordinary business depression then prevailing throughout the civilized world. We find, of course, a very considerable increase after that. The effect of the National Policy on this particular branch of manufacture has been what we on this side of the House always anticipated it would be. It stimulated the growth of that industry, so that we find it jumping up to 13,000,000 lbs. in 1880, and again to 16,000,000 lbs. during the financial year ending on the 30th June last. Now, I contend that there was a more healthy and satisfactory growth of this particular industry before it was stimulated by the extraordinary taxation imposed on cotton imports by the National Policy. If there had been no National Policy it is but fair and reasonable to suppose that after the business depression had passed away, the growth of this particular manufacture would have been far greater than it was previously. Taking the ratio of importations of cotton fabrics as the basis, our importations of raw cotton would probably have increased, in 1880 or 1881, to somewhere about 12,000,000 lbs. without any extraordinary impetus or stimulus. Under these circumstances, it is absurd to allege that we did any injustice to the cotton interest in our time. While the factory at Cornwall, for some reason never clearly explained, did not pay large dividends for some years, or paid no dividends at all, and it has been alleged that this was due to defects in the construction of the establishment in the first instance and to mismanagement afterwards—the factory at St John grew from a very small to a very large establishment, and the Hudon factory at Montreal, it was announced in the public press, declared a dividend, the year before the new policy went into operation, of 27 per cent. If other factories did not pay so well as that, it was not for the want of higher duties, but because the factories were not properly constructed, were not located in the proper place, or were not managed with the skill necessary to ensure success. But we are told that the necessities of the country required the imposition of higher duties. Duties could have been imposed so as to produce all the revenue which the hon. Finance Minister and his friends boast they possess, without being so regulated as to weigh unduly on the poorer classes in the country. An increase in the Tariff of the ad valorem duties would have given these gentlemen additional protection. That it would have been impossible to refuse them had we found it necessary to increase the Tariff. We, therefore, do not, by this amendment, object so much to the increase of the rate of taxation as to the manner in which the Tariff distributes the burden of taxation. It makes the burden of the rich only a little heavier, while it increases enormously the burdens of the poorer classes. The hon. Finance Minister has said that the general articles of merchandise on which high duties are now imposed have not been made dearer. That is simply begging the question; it is a subterfuge, a trick of which men who desire to stand high in the opinion of their fellow-countrymen should be ashamed. The question is this: does or does not the increase of the duties add to the cost of the articles? Would we or would we not be able to procure those articles more cheaply, had the duties not been increased? We say the price to-day is as much more than the price otherwise would be, or very nearly as much more as is the duty to-day more than the duty of four or five years ago; that the manufacturers everywhere of all kinds of articles, charge just as much for them as it is possible to get and yet avoid competition with the imported article, unless in one or two instances, including boots and shoes, where the competition has always been so great as to prevent the manufacturers from keeping up the prices. The hon. Finance Minister admits that cottons are somewhat dearer than they were a few years ago, but only because of the increase in the cost of the raw material, and only inasmuch as the cost of that material has increased; that there has been since a very considerable average addition to the cost of raw cotton. I hold in my hand a statement prepared by a gentleman whose knowledge of such matters has been repeatedly proved correct beyond question, of the prices of cotton in the several years from 1877-78 up to the present time, and this gives the average for each month in the year. It commences with what is known in the trade as the beginning of the cotton year, 1st September; and if I take the average of the each year, I find the average of 1877-78 was $11\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb; 1878-79, in which the hon. Minister started the National Policy, average $11\frac{3}{4}$ cents per pound; 1879-80, $12\frac{1}{4}$, or one cent and a fraction dearer than in the year preceding. But, from the beginning of September, 1880-81, up to August 11th, 1881, the price was $11\frac{1}{2}$, or nearly 1 cent a lb less than in 1879-80, and very nearly as low as in 1878-79, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent difference in the production of the whole year. A pound of cotton will make $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards of cloth, and if we divide this fraction of $\frac{1}{4}$ by $3\frac{1}{2}$, we will ascertain the almost infinitesimal extent to which the price of the raw material advanced, and to which it ought to have affected the price of the raw material. It is so small that I am sure that if the hon. Finance Minister had looked into it he would scarcely have dwelt on the fact that the price of the raw cotton had advanced, or have given that as a reason why cottons are considerably higher than when the National Policy went into operation. He also stated that to-day we could purchase in this country, cottons of all grades, at prices only exceeding by 5 to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. the prices at which similar goods are sold at the mills in the New England States. If that were correct, it would only prove that there was no necessity whatever for any change in the Tariff in order to protect our cotton manufactures. Five and one-half per cent. deducted from the old Tariff rate of $17\frac{1}{2}$, would give 10 to 12 per cent. protection to Canadians over and above the price charged by the manufacturers, and in addition would be the cost of importation. The hon. gentleman, in making that statement proved too much, if the statement were to be accepted. I have no doubt he made it in good faith, but on information furnished him by persons interested in the trade. But why is it that we are always asked to compare our cotton prices with these in the United States, whose manufacturers require such extraordinary protection, 30 to 40 per cent.? We know that, in spite of that high protection, the British manufacturers force an immense quantity of cottons into the United States markets; and since the return of good times, the boom of which we have heard so much, the importation of British cotton into the United States has increased enormously. We should sometimes compare our prices rather with the prices in Great Britain. What good reason can be given why our manufacturers should not produce cotton of any grade or class at as low a price as the manufacturers in the United States? We get our raw cotton quite as cheap as they, and our fuel; and if they have water-power in some districts so have we, and labor must be at least quite as dear in the United States as in Canada, for we find thousands of our people flocking every week and month to the United States to find employment and better pay than they can get in this country. Why should we be asked to pay 5 or $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. more for cottons than we could buy them from foreign manufacturers for? Under the old system the Tariff was $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and it might have been necessary to make it 20 per cent. or more, in order to raise more revenue to meet the increased expenditure of the country, and to that extend the cotton manufacturers must have been protected, but there is nothing to show that special protection of that manufacture is necessary, or to justify the peculiar mode in which those taxes have been imposed. The hon. the Minister of Finance laid on the Table, some time ago, a number of papers in which it was alleged that the prices in this country are quite as low, and in some cases, even lower, than the prices of goods of a similar character at the factories in the United States. I observe, that in some of those papers the price per lb. of cotton goods of a particular kind is stated to be lower in Montreal than in the United States. That is not a means of ascertaining conclusively whether the one class of goods is cheaper than the other or not. We all know that the coarser the article manufactured the more it is likely to weigh. There may be very material difference in the character of articles bearing the same name in Canada and the United States. I made it my business before I left St. John to consult on that very question, a gentleman, who is admittedly one of the very best buyers in the dry goods trade in that city. I asked him to show me goods of the same quality imported from Great Britain and the United States, and obtained from the factories in this country, and to tell me honestly how the goods could compare in cost and quality. He told me, what I found to be the fact on careful examination, that a comparison of any kind was exceedingly difficult, that the qualities were essentially so different, that only one thoroughly experienced in the trade could attempt to institute a comparison, and even to one of the largest experience a comparison was still difficult. The texture of the goods, their appearance, and what I may call their selling qualities, were very different. However, I said to him, select if you can two pieces of goods, the one American, the other Canadian, which you as a man of experience can say are intrinsically of the same value, no matter what may be their outside appearance. He did select two such pieces, and laid them side by side. I could not attempt myself to institute any comparison between the two, their texture and appearance were so different. He assured me that intrinsically they were exactly of the same value and that the imported goods cost him $\frac{1}{3}$ of a cent per yard more than the Canadian goods. He showed me, however, some goods which were more salable than the Canadian goods, and he said: "On these I can have a larger profit than I possibly can on the Canadian article, and these my customers will purchase much more readily at the same price." Let me now give you one or two cases taken from actual experience of calculations based upon intimate knowledge of this particular business. With regard to white cottons, I found an instance where an article which cost $3\frac{1}{2}$ pence in England, equal to 6.44 cents, on which the duty was $30\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. cost laid down in the market on this side 8.68 cents. That the gentleman who furnished us this information, and who is of unquestionably high standing in the trade, told us was equal to Valleyfield cotton that cost here $9\frac{1}{2}$ cents. Another case of imported cotton cost $2\frac{1}{2}$ d., on which the duty was $35\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and which cost laid down $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents. Large quantities of cottons of that class are imported and pay high duties and are sold at a profit. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite will say these goods cost no more than if the duties were very much lower, any advance in price being caused by the advance in the raw material. All these are actual transactions. Oxford shirtings, which cost 5.20 cents and duty 42 per cent., cost laid down in the store 8.47 cents, and those are sold against Dundas shirtings, which cost 9 cents at the mill. Yet the hon. Finance Minister will say, on the authority of gentlemen engaged in the trade, that the Canadian article is sold at a lower rate in the store than the imported article of equal quality. There is another case in which cloths known as Congress American shirting costs abroad 11.87 cents, and the duty on this is 23 per cent. This is a high priced cloth. We dealt a moment ago with the Oxford shirting which cost only 5.20 cents and paid a duty of 42 per cent. When we come to this higher quality of goods, goods not worn, I presume, by the humbler classes, the duty is but 23 per cent. Then take American brown duck. Here we have in actual operation, a very simple exemplification of the working of the Tariff in this respect. The American brown duck of famous brand, of Woodbourne, Baldwin & Co., weighing ten ounces, sold, in 1880, at the mill, at $14\frac{1}{2}$ cents. The duty was 25 per cent, and the cost laid down in the store in Canada, $18\frac{1}{2}$ cents per yard. Cornwall manufactures a somewhat similar article weighing also ten ounces, and also called brown duck; that was sold, in 1880, at 18 cents or a-half cent less per yard than it cost to import this famous American class of goods. In the following year we find the American goods lower in price selling at 14 cents instead of $14\frac{1}{2}$, and costing laid down in store, 18 cents a yard, and the Cornwall price reduced just in proportion, down to $17\frac{1}{2}$ cents from 18. The gentleman who furnished me with this information alleges that the Cornwall article is very much inferior in make. It must have been inferior in make, or else that difference in price would have been sufficient to exclude the American article altogether from our market. Now, Sir, if these statements are reliable, as I believe they are, if they cannot be controverted except by other statements from parties interested, they go far to contradict the statement of the Minister of Finance, that Canada cottons are sold to day in Canada at prices much lower than British or American cottons could have been imported under the old Tariff—in point of fact, at 5 to 7 per cent. higher than the price of the American articles at the American mills. Then, with regard to the manner in which the burden is distributed, with regard to the fact to which we take special objection, that the articles used by the masses of the people are the heaviest, taxed let me say that not only the cases I have just referred to prove it conclusively, but also the Trade and Navigation Returns which I have carefully examined. I find that during the year ending 30th June, 1881, we imported, of British grey and bleached cottons, 5,002,952 yards. Well, Sir, that is a large quantity, and the very fact that so large a quantity has been imported is itself not merely prima facie but conclusive proof that the articles sold in the country of the same class and quality must have been sold at as high a price as the imported article, otherwise so large a quantity as 5,000,000 yards would not have been imported and sold. These British goods cost only $6\frac{1}{2}$ cents a yard on the average, the duty paid on the whole of them was 30 per cent; and I have shown that in some classes of these cottons, the duties run as high as 42 per cent., that is on the very cheapest of the articles used by the people generally. But, taking the whole of that class, we find that the duty was as high as 30 per cent., nearly one-third of the original cost imposed as duty on the article; and, in addition to the 30 per cent., the cost of importation must be taken into consideration. From the United States, in that same year, notwithstanding their high Tariff and all the other difficulties in the way of their producing articles as cheaply as we ought to be able to produce them, we imported of that same class of goods, 3,892,779 yards, so that altogether, we imported nearly 9,000,000 yards of grey, bleached and unbleached cotton during that year, and no doubt the whole of it was sold in the country. The facts that it was imported and sold is conclusive evidence that the home-made article was sold at a price relatively quite as high. But the article we imported from the United States is of a higher class than that which comes from Great Britain. The article from Great Britain cost $6\frac{1}{2}$ cents per yard, and that from the United States a little over $9\frac{1}{2}$ cents per yard, and just because it was a better article and therefore was used by the well-to-do classes of the country, not the poorer classes, it was taxed only 25·4 per cent. So again with British gingham. I find British gingham costs 10·8 cents, paying a duty of 33 per cent. I find that United States gingham costs 14 cents per yard, and paid 29·3 per cent. Then we come to another article that can hardly be compared with anything in former years, because of the great change in the classification. In former years I find the quantities of goods described as denims, drillings, and that sort, were something very small. Last year, they assumed very large proportions, and the importation was 5,352,537 yards from Great Britain. These goods cost a little over 11·2 cents per yard, and they paid an average of over 35 per cent. From the United States in that same year we imported 4,383,424 yards. These, again, like the other cotton goods, were of a higher quality, costing 14·3 cents per yard. We find that the rate per cent ad valorem duty is very much smaller, being 28·9 per cent., nearly 7 per cent. less than on the British goods. So through the whole of these articles, we find British goods the cheaper but paying a higher rate of duty, and they are the goods chiefly used by the working masses of the people, than American goods of greater intrinsic value. In all these various classes we find the same thing. We find an article of higher intrinsic value, costing more in its manufacture and requiring more labor for its production, yet paying a lesser rate of duty than the coarser and cheaper articles which are used by the masses of the people. Let me say en passant that the operation of this Tariff has been similarly to exclude more of certain classes of American goods from our markets than of British goods. The intrinsic cheapness of the British article has overcome the operation of the Tariff to such an extent as it overcomes the operation and effect of the American Tariff in the United States. But, Sir, a diminution had taken place in the quantity of American cotton imported before the National Policy went into operation at all. The six years which the Minister of Railways is so fond of describing as years of unexampled prosperity, were years of great depression in the United States in the cotton trade. The manufacturers of that country were compelled, not being able to sell their goods at home, to send large quantities abroad and to sell at very low prices, and just as trade improved and things began to mend, so was there a falling off in the importation of American cotton goods. We find a very marked diminution before the National Policy came into operation. Now, I think I have proved, if figures can prove anything, if authentic public returns can prove anything, that the advance in the price of raw cotton has not to any appreciable extent caused the advance in the price of cotton in Canada. I think I have proved, moreover, that the price of cotton manufactured in this country to-day is quite as high as the cost of the imported article of the same class, plus the duty and the cost of importation. Moreover, I have proved beyond all doubt that the rate of duty imposed on the articles consumed by the masses of the people is very much more onerous than the rate of duty imposed on the goods which are supposed to be used by the well-to-do classes. Well, we will look also at the question of woollens. The hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted a like policy as with cotton. Not only do they tax woollen goods at a very high rate, but they tax to an enormous extent the goods which are more especially used by the working people. The woollen industry is a much older industry in the country than the cotton industry. The woollen industry attained very remarkable proportions many years ago. We heard of woollen mills springing up all over the country long before the National Policy was ever heard of or thought of. When hon. gentlemen opposite were in power in 1872-73, a very large number of woollen mills were in existence, and their number continued to increase. Looking at the importation of wool, I find that the 8,000,000 lbs. to which the hon. Finance Minister has referred, was not a very remarkable importation, not in fact, very much in excess of the quantity imported in other years; it was not more than the natural growth, of population and trade would lead us to expect. I do not believe there has been, as the result of this policy, any very great expansion of the woollen trade. There has been a revival in that business as in every other business. It may be that in 1878-79 those mills found difficulty in disposing of their products, and were compelled to sell at little or no profit; that is a fact of which we are all aware, and which no one will deny. But we do deny that such a state of things prevailed for want of Protection. The cause is obvious. The depression which prevailed throughout the world necessarily and inevitably affected this particular branch of business, and the producers found no customers for their goods. If there had been no change whatever in the fiscal policy we would have found a great revival in this industry, because it is one in which Canadian manufacturers have excelled. Some of the cloth they produce is of its kind equal to any manufactured in the world. I lately visited some mills at Almonte, and I admired beyond measure some of the products of the manufacturers in that district, which can favorably compare with any goods of a similar character to be found. The manufacturers learned to excel in that business years ago, and with a revival of trade their business revived. It has not revived because of the exclusion of foreign goods; notwithstanding the high rate of duty now imposed on foreign goods they have not been excluded. Foreign importations are now as large as in 1878; in that year the whole value of imported woollens was \$8,535,133; the year before it was a little more; in 1876, it was \$8,462,000; in 1881 it was \$8,742,000, so that it was not the exclusion of foreign goods that caused the revival of this branch of industry. The heavy duties on certain classes of foreign woollens gave to Canada manufacturers almost a monopoly of the home market, and enabled them probably to charge higher rates than those at which the goods would have been sold; but the effect on the general imports has not been remarkable. The hon. Minister of Finance is fond of saying that the people obtain their woollens at much lower prices than before the National Policy came into operation. That has been disputed; even if that were true it would be a mere begging of the question. The question for the people to consider is this, could we procure our woollen goods at lower prices than we are now compelled to pay, if the duties had not been increased? The answer to that is that they could have been purchased at much lower prices. This branch of industry flourished under the old system; the depression reached it long after other industries had begun to suffer. The recovery would have been as rapid as in any other branch of business, even had no change of policy taken place. Let me say, that if there had been a manifest necessity to increase the rate of taxation for revenue purposes the woollen manufacturers would have obtained an advantage from the increase of duties—that certainly would not have been refused to them. What we now complain of is the improper distribution of taxation which is unfair, unjust and bears heavily on the masses. We are no more hostile to them than to any other manufacturers; we are delighted to see them grow and prosper; we are much pleased to see new mills and manufactures springing up, and success achieved by the proper investment of capital and use of skilled knowledge. Let us see how the duties bear on this class of goods. The figures furnished in the Blue-Books are not such as enable you easily to judge of the progress of the trade; they are simply prepared for purposes of Customs duties, which is quite proper. I looked for a long time to discover what grounds the hon. Finance Minister had for his statement, that the wealthy people of the country voluntarily paid an additional \$400,000 in duty on their fine cloths, during the last year, more than they had paid in former years. I am not aware that people pay voluntarily what they have to pay in duty on articles they are compelled to purchase. I find, in the Trade and Navigation Returns, that cassimeres, cloths, tweeds, and goods of that class, are all put down together at so many cents per lb. But I will give the result of my figuring to the hon. gentleman. I find that of that class of goods, we imported from Great Britain 5,469,519 lbs.: the average price per lb. of all those cloths, tweeds, broad cloths and so forth, was 61½ cents, and the rate of duty was 32·19 per cent. From the United States we brought a very small quantity of these goods, but they must have been of a superior character, 12,695 lbs., costing \$1.25 per lb., and instead of paying 32 per cent. duty on them, we paid 25·9, or more than 6 cents per lb. less than upon those imported from Great Britain. Take another class of goods—blankets. I find that is an article very highly taxed. We imported of blankets, from Great Britain, 589,477 lbs., and the fact that we imported this large quantity of these goods, and that they were sold in the country, is prima facie, I may say conclusive, proof that the domestic blanket-maker charges as much for his product as he can possibly get. That is the average, but there are instances in which the cheaper blankets are taxed enormously higher. From the United States we imported only 7,067 lbs., but instead of costing 29½ cents they cost 59·4, and the duty, instead of being 45·4, was 32·6 per cent. I have here a statement taken from one of some invoices of blankets, and it is very remarkable indeed as going to prove the policy of hon. gentleman opposite of charging the higher rate on the poorer article. In September 9th, 1881, these blankets were imported from Great Britain. In that importation were goods that cost 23½d. per lb. on which a duty of 35 per cent. was paid. There were others costing 17d. per lb., but upon those a duty of 43 per cent. was paid. Blankets of a much poorer quality, costing 13d., paid a duty of 49½ per cent. A still cheaper blanket costing 9d. paid a duty of 61 per cent. Then, again, on a much cheaper article—one of the poorest I suppose that could be imported, costing 7½d per lb., scarcely the price of the coarsest kinds of wool—a duty of 70 per cent. was actually paid. Let me go back a moment to cloths in order to show how the duty affects the price of those articles. I will take an actual invoice in this case also. On a quantity of woollen goods imported, English naps for children costing 1s. 4½d., a duty of 57 per cent. was paid. Then there was a heavy class of clothes for ulsters and jackets, which costs 7½d, and upon them the duty was 49 per cent. Then we have what are called heavy presidents for ladies jackets which cost 1s. 9d. per yard, and the duty on that class was 46 per cent. On another class of goods which cost 4s. the duty was 35 per cent. So it is throughout, the poorer the article and the cheaper the more heavily is it taxed. Then with regard to goods called black presidents, one article which cost 2s. 1d., paid a duty of 45 per cent. Now, in former times, under the old Tariff, this particular class of goods sold wholesale in Canada at 75 cents, but to-day, under the operation of this Tariff, the price is 92½ cents a yard, or 17½ cents more than it would be were the old Tariff in operation. Another class of goods costing 2s. 7d., paid a duty of 39 per cent., and these goods, which formerly sold at 95 cents a yard wholesale now sell at \$1.10 per yard. Another class of goods which cost 2s. 10d. in Great Britain paid a duty of 37 per cent. These goods formerly sold at \$1.05 here. They now sell at \$1.20. Hon. gentlemen opposite nevertheless assert that woollen goods are no dearer because of the duty. They say they are cheaper than in former years, and while the hon. Finance Minister is ready to tell us that there has been an advance in the raw material of cotton goods, he forgets to tell us that there has been a serious decline in the raw material of woollen goods; that the cost of wool is very much lower, for which of course the farmers are very thankful. But owing to the National Policy our people are deprived of any advantage from that decline in price. Take again the article of carpets, and here you find another illustration of the fact that under the present Tariff the cheaper the article the higher the tax. Upon Brussels carpets, of which we import a very large quantity—1,333,000 yards—and which are used almost exclusively by the richer classes, a duty of 20 per cent. is paid. Of two-ply and three-ply carpets ingrained, all-wool, we imported from Great Britain 120,119 yards, costing 66·2 cents per yard, on which 36 per cent. was charged, while the Brussels carpet, the carpet of the rich man, paid only 20 per cent.; of Union carpets, which are especially those of the poor classes, we imported 150,000 yards from Great Britain, on which a duty of 31·6 per cent. was paid, and some from the United States, on which 33·3 per cent. was paid, while the rich man's carpet only paid 20 per cent. Now, I have endeavored to show that the statements made in the amendment in your hands, Mr. Speaker, are well-founded—that the duties charged on the cotton and woollen goods of the poorer classes are proportionately higher than those charged on the goods of the wealthier classes. I know it will be alleged that the reason for this is that in this country we manufacture the cheaper and coarser articles, and do not manufacture the finer articles—that there is some manufactory producing the union or other lower-class carpets, and therefore they are protected in order to give our own manufacturers command of our own market. But I have shown that our own manufacturers have not yet obtained our own market, and that our manufacturers do not sell their goods at the price at which they can produce them, but take care to obtain the highest price the duty enables them to get for the articles they sell. This is more particularly the case with regard to woollen goods. I am informed that heavy pilots and cloths of the class which pay a duty of 50, 60, 70, and in one case I know of as high as 80 per cent., are not manufactured in the country at all, and therefore there is not even that pretext for imposing the duty, while the people have to bear the burden. A St. John merchant told me that on a quantity of heavy cloth which he imported specially for the purpose of making up winter cloaks for girls, and which cost 1s. 2d. or 1s. 3d. per yard, he actually had to pay a duty of 80 per cent. at the St. John Custom house; and that class of goods, he said, is not manufactured in this country. Now, I may state exactly what we are paying for our cotton and woollen goods under the present Tariff. We paid into the Treasury on our cotton goods imported \$2,271,937 last year, or \$486,156 more than we would have paid under the old Tariff. On our woollen goods we paid \$2,345,627, or \$815,773 more than we would have paid under the old Tariff; on these textile fabrics, which are absolutely necessary for all the people of this country, rich and poor, we paid in all \$4,617,564, or \$1,301,729 more than would have been paid under the old Tariff. If it were necessary to raise this enormous amount on the clothing of the people of the country, I presume none of us would complain, however we might regret the necessity; but what we do complain of is that not only more is raised than is necessary for the country, but that this burden is unfairly and unequally distributed, and bears enormously on those who can least afford to bear it. In addition to that we have to pay, under this Tariff, a very large amount more to the manufacturers of the country—how much it is difficult to ascertain. Supposing the 16,000,000 lbs. of raw cotton imported last year were manufactured into 60,000,000 yds. of cloth or the equivalent, we paid \$471,520 more to the manufacturers than we would have had to pay if the old duties had been maintained. For woollens, we paid \$700,000 more than we would have paid if the old Tariff had been in operation. Now, what we complain of is that under this Tariff more money is taken from the people than is required for the public service; we complain still more strongly that the amount is so unequally distributed that it bears harshly and cruelly in many cases on people who, even in these prosperous times, find it exceedingly difficult to buy clothing enough to protect them against the cold of winter. We complain and protest against this policy, particularly on that score—not because we entertain any hostility towards the manufacturers—not because we do not wish to see them flourishing, and exhibiting every satisfactory proof of prosperity—but because we feel and believe that a large number of the people are unduly burdened and cruelly oppressed by the taxation now imposed.

Mr. BLAKE. As there does not seem any disposition on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to answer the remarks of the member for Gloucester, I am anxious of taking this opportunity of stating to the House some of the reasons which have led me to differ with the hon. Finance Minister, in the statements which he has made to this House as to the effects of these duties on certain classes of goods largely consumed by the people. And I am not sorry the hon. gentleman has omitted or delayed to answer statements made from this side, because I am anxious he should have the opportunity of responding to the observations which I shall now present. Before dealing with the effect of the duties on cottons, I wish to read to the House a letter sent to me very shortly after the hon. Finance Minister read, with reference to woollens, a letter from a manufacturer of Montreal, Mr. Greene. The hon. gentleman brought forward some precis of evidence to sustain the proposition which he advanced with great boldness and positiveness, and without any reserve or qualification, as to the practical effect of the Tariff on prices—as to the prices the people were paying relatively to the prices in former years. And as the hon. member for Gloucester observes, the hon. gentleman declared that we were paying lower prices for the various domestic manufacture of woollens than in former years, to prove which statement he read the letter from Mr. Greene. A friend of mine in Montreal applied to the senior partner of a large house, Maclean, Shaw & Co., upon that subject, and immediately afterwards I received from that gentleman the following letter addressed to him by Mr. Maclean:

"In answer to your enquiries as to the causes why goods in our line are sold cheaper now than in 1878, we find, on examining our English invoices, that we are buying the same grade of hats from the same houses 20 per cent. cheaper to-day than in 1878. So that, even with the increased duty, they cost us less laid down in Montreal now than in 1878. It is clear to any sensible merchant that if the duty was 17½ per cent., instead of 25 per cent., that these goods could be sold still cheaper. The sealteco and astrachan cloths imported for use in the manufacture of cloth caps, are also bought at a less figure than in 1878; and if these goods could be laid down as cheap now as under the old Tariff the cloth caps used by the poorer classes could be sold at a less figure than at present. It cost 50 per cent. under the old Tariff, and 85 per cent. under the present Tariff to lay these heavy goods down. The true reasons for the general reduction in the class of goods handled by us are, first, that competition is cutting prices every year, which competition was in existence before the National Policy came into force; and, second, that the goods used by us are bought at a much less figure in the English market now than in 1878. As you know, I am a supporter of the National Policy, but I do not believe in supporting it by a misrepresentation of causes and facts."

I am sorry that the hon. gentleman should have thought it consistent with his position as Finance Minister, to have brought forward letters to prove, and to have alleged himself, as a fact, that the cost of the domestic production of those articles to which he particularly referred, had been reduced—by virtue of his policy, while in fact, the operation of those causes of greater competition, and particularly of lower prices abroad was to keep the domestic manufactures down. And while as this supporter of the hon. gentleman and his policy states, those goods to which he referred, and to which particularly Mr. Greene referred, being sold 20 per cent lower in the foreign market, they came into this country at about or a little below the prices of 1878, notwithstanding the increase of the duties. But it is plain that if the duties had remained where they were, we would have got our goods 20 per cent cheaper. That observation applies to the manufactured articles of woollens to which I referred, and the proofs are apparent. In almost all particulars of the consumption of the masses, there has been some abatement in prices abroad more or less. I wish, in reinforcement of the argument of the hon. member for Gloucester, to give a few statements of actual transactions in woollens, in connection with which there will be found some reference to the relative cost abroad, of woollens in 1878 and 1881, indicating the very low prices abroad in 1881 as compared with 1878, and furnishing a good reason why even the enormous increase of Canadian duties should have made prices relatively not very different—but indicating also that, in a word, the increase of the duties has absorbed the reduction in price, of which the people of the country otherwise have had the benefit. The particulars which I have to give are actual entries of transactions in the Custom house by merchants. Among these is an entry of 2nd February, 1882, as follows: Blue serge, cost 6d; duty 44½ per cent.; cloth for workingmen's suits, cost 1s 3d; duty, 39½ per cent.; fancy tweeds, gentlemen's suits, cost 2s 6d; duty, 29½ per cent. The enormous duties are on the material used by the poorer classes, while the duties are relatively light on the stuff worn by the people in better circumstances. The facts which my hon. friend for Gloucester presented are exemplified by those figures. Let me give a few other instances: Cloths, 1s 5d, cost laid down, 55½ cents, duty over 50 per cent; cost 9d., duty 50 per cent, used for boys' children's and men's suitings ready-made and ulsters by the better classes and used by mechanics and farmers, cost 1s. 8d., duty 50 per cent. Cloths cost 1s. 10d., duty 40 per cent. worn by wage-receiving people exclusively. Cost 1s. 6d., duty 35 per cent., very extensively used in town and country. Cost 2s. 2d., duty 40 per cent. Cost 1. 4d., duty 60 per cent., cloth used for men, women and boys clothing. Cost 4s., duty 27 per cent. Scotch tweeds used by first class tailors. Cost 10s., duty 25 per cent., used by high class trade. Cost 13s., duty 23½ per cent., used by high class trade. In black and blue broad superfines and higher qualities of French cloths the duty sometimes comes below 23 per cent., and as freight is all charged by measurement it is therefore the same on cheap and dear goods and adds to the inequality. The same merchant who gave me these prices from actual transactions in his trade, adds that woollen goods of all kinds, medium and low grades, are much cheaper in Great Britain than in 1877-78, but the Tariff has absorbed the reduction. Another merchant gives me these particulars: He paid in Great Britain, in 1881, 2s. 2d. for heavy woollen goods, which cost him, in 1878, 2s. 6d., or 4d. less in 1881 than in 1878; but his selling price for the 2s. 2d. in 1881, was 5 per cent. in excess of what he sold the 2s. 6d. goods for in 1878, though his percentage of profit is the same, thus showing that the duty not only absorbed the reduction, but actually increased the price of the goods. It is stated by this merchant that the letter on which the hon. member relies, although it may be true in one or two special lines, is not true on the whole, as to the general class of goods consumed by the people. As to an article costing 2s. 6d. in 1878, the selling price wholesale was 92½ cents, and, in 1881, the article costing the same price could not be sold under \$1.07½ at the same percentage of profit, showing an advance of $16\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., entirely necessitated by the increase of duty. Flannels, of which the sterling cost, in 1878, was $9\frac{1}{4}$ d., cost at the wholesale price in Canada, 25 cents; in 1881, the sterling price was 9d., and the wholesale selling price was 30 cents. The advance in this case on the sterling price was, in 1878, $47\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and in 1881, $65\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the additional advance being required to pay the increase of duty; so that the cost went up instead of going down, although the sterling price was less than in the former year. As an example of the admirably graduated scale of duties, which the hon. gentleman's Tariff imposes on goods more expensive, as compared with less expensive goods, I will give a series of quotations in the articles of ladies' jackets and mantles, showing how the duty goes down as the price goes up:

Sterling cost		Duty	per cent.
3s. 11d.	54 $\frac{1}{2}$	per cent.
4s. 8l.	48 $\frac{1}{2}$	" "
5s. 11d.	42 $\frac{1}{2}$	" "
7s. 3d.	40 $\frac{63}{100}$	" "
9s. 11d.	37 \cdot 85	" "
12s. 11d.	32 $\frac{1}{2}$	" "
18s. 9d.	30 $\frac{7}{10}$	" "
29s. 9l.	28	" "

That is the general application of the hon. gentleman's Tariff. If you take the articles which are cheapest and dearest, the duty, speaking in a general sense, may be said to be twice as heavy on the cheapest as on the dearest class of goods. That is all I propose to say at present on the question of woollen goods. I wish particularly, as I said in my opening remarks, to deal with the hon. gentleman's statement as to the practical effect of this Tariff upon the subject of cotton manufactures. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman's proposition that we should try his Tariff by its practical results, and if we find that it has operated beneficially—that looking at all the considerations—those on the surface as well as those which have to be ascertained and do not dwell so much on the surface,—it has operated beneficially, then the hon. gentleman will have proved himself in the right. The broad and general statement made by the hon. member requires a very considerable amount of detail and examination to ascertain whether it is founded on fact, whether in truth the results are such as the hon. gentleman declares they are. There are a number of considerations with reference to the cotton manufactures which are material, in order that we may reach a conclusion. We have heard of the great prosperity of that manufacture. The hon. Minister in his general statements, and other hon. gentlemen, have said repeatedly, that it is due to the circumstance that there is a very much larger production, and not to enhanced prices or enhanced profits per yard. It is due they say to the very large production which enables a large profit to be made by the manufacturer, even upon a reduced price per yard, so that the consumer gains while the manufacturer also gains. Let us first ascertain, so far as we are able, what the margin of profit is, and I agree with the hon. gentleman that a large margin of profit honestly obtained, not by law, but by the exercise of those virtues, talents and industries, which lead to success, in those walks of life in which a free competition exists is a thing not to be deplored, but rather to be regarded as a source of satisfaction. Let us first ascertain what the rate of profit is. On that subject I have some information, which I derived largely from shareholders in some of the mills, and which I believe to be authentic. Of course, in particular it is somewhat difficult to get authentic information. The shareholders' meetings of the cotton mills are not public, their statements, if they are laid on the Table, are not taken from the Table. The largest portion of their profits is not declared in form of a dividend. There are bonuses in the shape of watering stocks and of other kinds. There are large increments of capital in the way of improvements and enlargements and costs which are all to be taken into account.

Mr. BLAKE.

in order to ascertain what the actual profit of the enterprise is. Take, for instance, the Hochelaga or Hudon mill. The original stock of that enterprise was \$400,000, which, it is reported, was not all paid up in cash. That Company is said to have made, as the hon. gentleman for Gloucester points out, 27 per cent. on its capital in 1878, before the new Tariff Act, and after providing for depreciation in that year. The stock has since been watered in the proportion of one share in every three. Since that time a cash dividend has been paid of 10 per cent. on the watered stock equal to $13\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. on the original stock. An enormous actual value has been put into the concern besides. The mill and machinery was first of all doubled, and after being doubled was trebled out of the earnings. So the mill and machinery now represent three times what they represented when this Tariff was imposed. The result of this, and the statement of their actual earnings and profit as given to me, is that their earnings have been, at least, 50 per cent. on the original stock of \$400,000, or at least \$200,000 a year for the last year or two, and their watered stock mark—not the original stock of \$400,000, but the watered stock has been quoted at 275, and is said not to be purchaseable under 300, but at 275 it would be equal to 365 per cent. on the original \$400,000 which is supposed to have been invested, thus bringing up its market value to over \$1,400,000. The stock is about to be again watered, I believe, to bring it up to about \$1,000,000, and when it reaches that figure upon the original \$400,000, it will be saleable at a very high premium. Now, these are startling results, and these results have been attained after very liberal allowances for depreciation, for keeping up the stock, and after an arrangement had been made which of itself indicates how large are the transactions which can be carried on on an original capital of \$400,000. I will only mention that the commission paid to the mill agent who sells the goods was \$27,000, or $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the original capital. You can imagine by this what the profit of the enterprise must be when the commission paid was $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the original capital. Now, I propose to refer to the Valleyfield mill as another example. The original stock was \$374,000, and that has been watered to \$500,000, or by $28\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. since this Tariff. The dividend declared last year was 20 per cent. on the watered stock, equal to over 27 per cent. on the original stock, besides which they laid up about \$23,000, and spent about \$15,000 for improvements and additions, and a commission was paid by the mill over and above all its profits of \$18,000. The commissions paid by the two mills therefore amounted to \$45,000 in that year. There stock was quoted lately at 187, equal to 215 on the original stock. Now, as I have said, if these enormous profits, if these enormous earnings of the last year or two, of 50 per cent. on the part of the Hochelaga mill, and of a sum about equal upon the original capital stock, upon all the stockholders put into the Valleyfield mill, were due to the circumstances I have referred, it is a subject of congratulation for us all; but if they be due to an excessive and inordinate protection which has obliged the people of this country to pay an inordinate price to these manufacturers of cottons, then they are not a subject for congratulation, but they are a subject for lamentation and regret. The hon. member said that owing to the large production the price of Canadian cotton had gone down, and he spoke as if it were a mere trifle to 5 or $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. above United States mill prices. He declared he had a statement that cotton cost no more, both bleached and unbleached cotton, than from 5 to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in excess of the mill price of similar United States goods. Now, in the first place the comparison of the hon. gentleman is not a reasonable one, because we know that the American goods are made under a system which greatly increases the cost of those goods to the people of that country. We are well aware that they are made under a very high protective system, enhancing the cost of labor and of everything involved. I will not enter into this subject further than to say, that the circumstance that America exports to Great Britain an enormous value of raw cotton and does not export the manufactured article, while Great Britain exports enormously of it, proves that the cottons that are made in the United States are inordinately high priced. Great Britain is able to take the manufactured material across the water and to return some portion of it manufactured to the United States, and send it to all the neutral markets, while the United States is utterly unable to compete with her in those markets. That shows that the comparison of the hon. gentleman proposes to make is not very satisfactory, even if his statement were correct that we do pay only 5 to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. more than the American mill prices. Nor is it very satisfactory even considering the figures. My hon. friend from Gloucester pointed out that our imports of raw cotton, last year, were 16,000,000 lbs. Now, I assume that 2,000,000 pounds would represent a liberal allowance for cotton used as waste and otherwise than in the mills. I assume that 14,000,000 pounds went into Canadian production. The product of 16,000,000 pounds in various forms was probably worth, at Canadian mill prices, \$5,000,000, and if there were $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. only in excess of United States mill prices, it is clear that there would be \$350,000 paid by the people of this country for the domestic cotton product on in excess of the cost in the United States. According to the hon. gentleman's own statement, this will prove the fallacy of that statement. But it is enormous. One proof my hon. friend from Gloucester has already referred to, that is the circumstance that enormous importations have been made of cotton goods at an enormous duty of from 26 to over 40 per cent. The Canadian supply was unequal to the demand, and it is impossible to suppose that the Canadian goods were kept so far below the duty here as the hon. gentlemen would suggest; when you find a range of duties from 26 to over 40 per cent., and the domestic supply unequal to the demand, you find the answer in these facts alone to the hon. gentleman's arguments, even if we were to have no more facts to deal with. The cotton imports to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, show these facts. I will not enter into the details of these various imports, but I will point out that the grand totals indicate that an average rate of duty such as proves the general fact to be that what we import costs us over 30 per cent. in duty. The grand totals of both articles denominated grey and bleached, &c., and denims, drills, &c., indicate an import from the United States and Britain combined, of 18,645,613 yards, at a cost of \$1,928,499; average cost per yard of all these goods was 9-15 cents, and the average duty was 30-36 per cent. On the smaller importation, gingham and plaids, the average duty was 32 per cent. over; wadding, &c., over 27 per cent.; knitting yarn, over 27 per cent.; wax, on beams, 34 per cent., so I am quite sure I am correct in stating that the rate of duty which we pay on all such cotton goods we import exceeds 30 per cent., irrespective of freight and charges.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. On all cotton goods?

Mr. BLAKE. No; not on all cotton goods, but on all cotton goods of those classes which are manufactured in the country. Of course, when the hon. gentleman proposes to include prints which we do not make, for the purpose of proving some illusory statement as to the advantages of his Tariff in this particular, he is welcome to repeat that calculation for the twenty-fifth time, and it will have as much weight as it did the twenty-fourth time. But I am dealing with the classes of goods manufactured here as compared with the importation of the same classes of goods, and I am averring as a general proposition, that these goods that we buy in Canada cost us approximately, including the duty and the cost of transport, within a shade of the cost of analogous goods which are manufactured abroad. While the hon. gentleman dealt in generalities, it was of course difficult to grapple with him. He said cotton goods are sold within 5 or $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of United States mill prices; but when we ask him to bring down the evidence on which he makes that highly important statement, he brings down a letter from Mr. A. F. Gault, and that is the only evidence on this particular subject on which the hon. gentlemen based his statement. The hon. gentleman is asked to bring down all the evidence, and that is all the evidence he can afford us. It is unfortunate that the hon. the Finance Minister ventured a statement of that kind upon that paper without having made further enquiry, without having obtained information from other quarters—however respectable, and I am the last to impugn the respectability of the quarter to which he applied—from opposite points of view, from those interested in other phases of the question than that in which Mr. Gault is chiefly interested, full information in order to enable him to reach the bottom of the question, and see how far Mr. Gault's views accorded with the actual views of the case. That letter is a very important contribution to the literature of this question. It deals broadly with a number of propositions which have formed the subject of discussion in various ways. Amongst other things it deals with the cost of the raw material. The prices of raw cotton says Mr. Gault, such as is generally used in Canadian Mills, run as follows: 1878, 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ c; 1879, 13 $\frac{1}{2}$; 1880, 14 $\frac{1}{2}$; 1881, 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb., thus indicating a range of prices which are important when we deal with the cost of the manufactured article. This statement indicates a rise of 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ cents between 1878 and 1881, but it admits a slight fall of one $\frac{1}{4}$ of a cent between 1879 and 1881; and I ask therefore the attention of the House to the fact that the raw material was rather cheaper in 1881 than in 1879. Dealing with the cotton manufacture, we may look at the public statements as they appear in the Trade and Navigation Returns, and see what was the valuation as to the actual cost of the cotton imports. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee) gave us that statement the other day, but in this connection it is worth while repeating it. In 1878, according to Mr. Gault, it was 10-50 cents, while, according to the Trade and Navigation returns, it was 10-70 cents. In 1879, according to Mr. Gault, it was 13-50 cents, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, 10-12 cents. In 1880, according to Mr. Gault, it was 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, 11-30 cents. In 1881, according to Mr. Gault, it was 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, it was 10-65 cents; making for the fiscal year a slight fall between 1878 and 1881, and a slight rise between 1879 and 1881, and showing absolute values far below those Mr. Gault gives, except for the year 1878, with which it is desired to make a comparison with the year 1881, the Trade and Navigation Returns give 10-65 cents, as against 13-25 cents by Mr. Gault, or an excess of nearly 25 per cent. We take another test. The quality of cotton used in Canadian factories is probably on an average inferior to the general standard of quality of middling uplands in the New York and Liverpool markets. Some may be used, perhaps, superior to that description, but probably all round it is an article inferior to that; but taking the standard quality of middling uplands in New York either for the cotton year or the calendar year, for I do not know from which Mr. Gault gives his figures, this is the result: the cotton year begins on 1st September and the quotations, are generally taken from that period. The average price of New York middling uplands for the year ending 31st August, 1878, was 11-23 cents; 1879, 11-17 cents; 1880, 12-32; 1881, 11-40 cents. There is thus no very material difference between 1878 and 1879, but I think it probable that Mr.

Gault's statement may have been for the calendar year, though that is new conjecture. In view of the possibility that he took the average for the calendar year, I give the following quotation: For the calendar year 1878 middling uplands in New York were 10.81 cents; 1879, 11.37 cents; 1880, 12.62 cents; 1881, 11.50 cents, or a rise of 0.69 or $6\frac{4}{10}$ per cent. between 1878 and 1881, and $\frac{1}{4}$ of a cent. or 2.13 per cent. between 1879 and 1881. I have established that neither the absolute nor the relative prices of raw cotton as between 1879 1881 present appreciable distinctions. We all know that for a certain number of months in 1878 raw cotton was very low, but the price for the year is such as I have pointed out. The Trade and Navigation Returns, the New York prices, and Mr. Gault, all pretty much agree as to the price for that year, and as to the prices for the succeeding year they also fairly agree, but Mr. Gault has, to an extent that I can not understand, exaggerated the prices in 1879-80-81 beyond the price of New York middling uplands, whether you take it for the calendar or the cotton year, or whichever way you choose to take it. I deny, therefore, the accuracy of Mr. Gault's statement as to the cost of the raw material; but supposing his statement to be accurate, I call attention to the fact—which has an important bearing on other facts which I shall bring before the House, and that Mr. Gault acknowledges the average price for 1879 was a trifle higher than that for 1881. In instituting comparisons between the prices of cotton in 1879 and 1881, we may leave out of account the question of raw material. There is a practical agreement as to prices even by Mr. Gault himself. As to the cost of labor we have no statistics. The hon. member for Montreal West gave us a number of statistics, but he did not give us statistics of this particular manufacture which I believe is outside of the limits of the city, but to which he knows something of the rate of wages prices. Now, my belief is that some professional and skilled workmen in the cotton mills have better wages than in former years, but so far as I have been able to learn, if you go down to the large wage-receiving classes no material advance in prices has taken place up to the point to which I will now speak, namely, December, 1881, when Mr. Gault gave his statement of prices on which the hon. Finance Minister relied. I am of course unable to deal with the topic accurately in the absence of accurate information; but the statement I have received is, that irrespective of the raise of prices among a few of the more skilled and higher priced men, there has been no sensible advance in wages up to the date to which I have referred. There is, however, an element, no doubt, one to which the hon. Minister has referred, which ought to lead to greater economy of production, and if we allow on the one hand for the reduced cost due to a larger production and improved machinery, the Hochelaga mill has been trebled in that respect, and therefore those conditions more than counterbalance any slight advance if, there be any, in the price of labor. Let us deal for a moment, before passing to the consideration of prices, with the cost of some standard cottons in the free markets of the world. I have obtained a statement of the cost of standard goods of the world wide known firms of Horrocks, Miller & Co., and James Findlay & Co. The former list shows these variations in what is called A cloth, a well-known standard number from January, 1877, to January, 1882:

		Pence stg.
January 26, 1877	32 inch A	3½
June 1, 1877	"	3½
October 25, 1877	"	3½
January 12, 1878	"	3½
June 19, 1878	"	3½
December 4, 1878	"	3½
January 22, 1879	"	2½
March 31, 1879	"	3
April 7, 1879	"	3
May 22, 1879	"	2½
July 1, 1879	"	3½

MR. BLAKE.

January 16, 1880	32 inch A	3½
February 4, 1880	"	3½
February 17, 1880	"	3½
May 1, 1880	"	3½
July 12, 1880	"	3½
August 25, 1881	"	3½
January 4, 1882	"	3½

Giving you the range which has been obtained with the fluctuations such as they are largely dependent on the fluctuations in the raw material, showing no material change from 1877 to January, 1882. The prices from Findlay & Co., for J shirting another standard number, are as follows from August, 1876 to January, 1882:

		Pence stg.
August, 1876	32 inch "J"	4
January, 1878	"	3½
January, 1879	"	3½
February, 1880	"	3½
January, 1881	"	3½
January, 1882	"	3½

Thus indicating again that there has been no marked rise or any serious variation in price in these standard goods in the free market of the world. Now, to advert to Mr. Gault's letter in which he proposes to deal with the actual and relative cost of the two large classes of goods to which he refers as compared with their cost in former years. The points of comparison which I take are January, 1879, which is same as the end of 1878, May, 1879, a period at which changes were made in the price lists, and the average of the whole year of 1879, comparing each of these with December, 1881, the point of comparison which Mr. Gault gives. Now, Sir, let me once again state what his comparison of prices is. The prices realized for the average run of Canadian greys were, as he says, by the pound, in 1878, 26½ cents; in 1879, 28 cents; in 1880, 27 cents; in 1881, 28½ cents, giving an increase of but one-half cent on 28 cents between 1879 and 1881. As I have already pointed out the average cost of the raw material I will only add that in May, 1879, middling uplands cost 12½ cents in New York, while in December, 1879, they were 12 cents only. As the raw material is generally contracted for some time before, the monthly average is perhaps of less importance, except to point out that in the particular instance to which I referred the raw material was considerably higher in May, 1879, than in December, 1881. Now, to get at the advance in cost of grey cottons, which I aver to be considerable contrary to what hon. gentlemen has said, contrary to what I observe is being generally stated—I aver that there has been a very material and marked advantage in gray as well as in bleached cottons, and the mode I have adopted to get at the advance is this: I have taken three mills and five of the best known and most largely consumed brands at these mills, and these brands are also of a kind which will bear comparison one with another, being as nearly as possible the same in weight and texture. The mills I have taken are the Hochelaga, the Cornwall and the Dundas mills, and the brands are: Hochelaga, G, H, HHH, XX, and XXX. The Cornwall brands are: AW, AD, AC, AE, and AA. The Dundas brands are: D, C, B, A, AX. These brands corresponding as nearly as possible one with another in the order in which I have stated them. These represent very fairly the total product of these mills. I find that the average cost of these cottons was, in January, 1879, by the yard, 7.18 cents. The average for the year 1879, was 7.40 cents, and that average is obtained by taking the price lists for the months during which those price lists were in force, estimating a like average consumption per month, and thus reaching the average for the year. The average was, as I have said, 7.18 cents, in January, 1879; 7.40 cents, for the year 1879; 7.57 in the month of May, 1879; and 8.39 in December, 1881. Of those brands

Hochelaga HII, B, H, and the analogous brands of Cornwall AC and Dundas are most in consumption, and in them the average increase over January, 1879, was 21.51 per cent.; over May, 1879, 14.13 per cent.; and over the average of the whole year 1879, 17 $\frac{2}{3}$ per cent. The average increase in the price of all these brands, making allowance for the proportion consumed of each brand, in December, 1881, over the price in January, 1879, was 17.95 per cent., and over the price for the whole year 1879, 14.35 per cent. These results are derived from the mill lists. I do not interfere with the terms for cash, but I have taken the trade discounts, which, in the early portions of this period, were allowed on the mill prices, and I have reduced them to net terms, subject to the usual credit. The prices to which I have referred of the various classes of goods are perhaps material to be given in detail, at rate for the month of January, 1879, for the average of the year, and for December, 1881. The brands I have referred to are consumed in about these proportions: 15 per cent. of the first brand, 15 of the second, 40 of the third, 20 of the fourth and 10 per cent. of the fifth. There are some other brands of which, however the consumption is, relatively speaking, insignificant. The prices of Canadian greys at the Hochelaga mill are quoted as follows:—

	Jan. 1879	May, 1879	Year 1879	Dec. 1881
G.....	5,781	6,012	5,881	6,625
H.....	6,240	6,475	6,338	7,125
HH.....	7,170	7,630	7,408	8,625
XX.....	8,095	8,556	8,325	9,375
XXX.....	8,550	9,020	8,752	9,875

The prices of the Cornwall goods and the Dundas goods, with which I shall not trouble the House in detail, show the general results, with certain variations, producing the general averages I have given. Now, you will observe that Mr. Gault's letter, upon which the hon. Minister relied, gives the average price of Canadian goods in 1879, as 28 cents per lb., and for December, 1881, as 28 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb., being an increase of only 1.80 per cent. The increase, as ascertained by these figures, is no less than 14.35 per cent., and that is the real measure of the increase in the cost of grey cottons between 1879 and December, 1881. Now, the duty, as I have proved to the House, is a little over 30 per cent.; it was 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; the increase in duty is therefore 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and the manufacturer has increased his price to the extent of the duty, and a little more; while the duty has increased 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., the manufacturer's price has increased 14.35 per cent. To pause here and enquire what the effect on the Canadian people would have been, supposing a like increase had taken place in the cost of all Canadian cottons to that which has taken place in the cost of brown cottons, the increased cost on the cottons manufactured from last year's imports, assuming 1,000,000 lbs. or more of raw cotton to have been manufactured, would have amounted to about \$625,000 over the cost in 1879. The next question to be disposed of is, how near the makers do, in fact, go to the duty point. I have already shown that the manufacturers have increased the cost of cotton to an amount more than commensurate with the increase of the duty. Now, how near do they go to the duty point? I say they go as near as they dare; that is natural and reasonable. The duty was put up in order that they might raise their price—in order that they might have an advantage; I say they take all the advantage they dare take of it, and Mr. Gault admits that. Fortunately, we are not met here with the statement that there is any patriotic or philanthropic feeling on the part of the manufacturers which induces them to take any less advantage than they can take; but, this gentleman says they do go as near the duty as they dare. I will give you his own words:

"You will see that the manufacturers are not really availing themselves of the extra cent per square yard, the principal reason being that they require to be this much below the regular market price of the United States trade to prevent enough odd lots coming in to disturb the market."

That is, they go as high as they can without allowing odd lots to come in to disturb the market. But there is no question of reasonableness of price or of consideration for the consumer. Nay, more; there is no question about the dealers' legitimate profit; there is no question about the wholesale merchants' or the retail merchants' legitimate profit. The arrangements are such that these profits are absorbed by the miller. There is an amusing statement in Mr. Gault's letter on this subject. He says:

"It is worthy of remark that nearly all the wholesale houses, as well as retail, sell Canada manufactured cotton to their customers at or about the mill price, certainly in few instances in which more than 5 per cent. profit, while imported goods of the same class usually pay 10 or 15 per cent. profit, customers getting the advantage of the close competition between the dealers."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman cheers it. Is it for philanthropic reasons that the dealer retails or sells it that way?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The consumer gets the benefit.

Mr. BLAKE. Not so. It is because the manufacturer takes the whole profit in his dealings. Goods must be sold at a living profit; but, as Mr. Gault says, the Canadian goods are sold at cost by the wholesale merchant and retailer. Now, even cotton manufacturers do not sell their goods for love. They sell them to make money; so the wholesaler, so the retailer, and this is certain that the wholesaler or retailer must get on his average sales a living profit, or advance, or else he will get into the Bankruptcy Court, if there is one, or into trouble if there is not. What he does not get in cottons, as what the grocer does not get sugar, he has got to make up from the consumer on other classes of goods. It is no advantage to the consumer, when a certain average rate of advance must be obtained by the middleman, in order that he may live, to be told that a particular article is sold at cost; he will have to pay more for some other article to make up the difference. What happens in this case is, that the cotton manufacturer, absorbs not merely his own share of the profits on cotton but also the share of those who intervene between him and the consumer; and, therefore, the consumer not paying to the middleman a profit on this article, has to pay to the middleman on other purchases his living profit in the prices of cotton and other articles as well. The consumer must pay in the end as much as will enable the middleman to live, on his average transactions. The manufacturer gets the whole profit, the mills have a perfect monopoly at present on many of these goods, securing their own prices and terms; and the question, being reduced to a purely business question, is—how near do the mills go to the duty point without permitting odd lots, as Mr. Gault says, to come in and disturb the market? That is the question which agitates and disturbs their minds. The duty is on the average over 30 per cent.; to that is to be added the advantage from freight, which, so far as the American goods are concerned, is of course a varying one, dependent on the market for consumption. It may take as much to carry goods from Boston to Toronto, as from Montreal to Toronto; and therefore there would be no advantage to the Canadian manufacturers of Montreal, over the American manufacturers of Boston, in the way of freight; but no doubt there would be some advantage, even in the case of American goods, to the Canadian manufacturer, because there are cotton mills in various parts of the country. Still, for the purpose of eliminating a disputable point, put aside the question of freights, and the amount of additional advantage the Canadian manufacturer has in freights, and deal only with this advantage in the way of duties, the question is whether they dare take only 5 or $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—whether they are obliged to leave $22\frac{1}{2}$ to 25 per cent. of a margin in order, irrespective of the advantage in freights, to prevent the American goods coming in. That is perfectly absurd. The hon. the Finance Minister misread Mr. Gault's letter when he extracted any such statement from it. The statement which the hon. Minister applied to grey cottons is the statement which Mr. Gault made with reference to bleached cottons. The statement he made with reference to bleached cottons, did not give the whole facts of the case; because, what is applicable to grey cottons is not applicable to bleached. I shall show that the hon. gentleman misread Mr. Gault's letter when he assumed that that gentleman, in speaking of grey cottons, declared the manufacturer took only 5 to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. over the American prices. He gave an account of United States grey or brown sheetings, and he says the average laid down price is 33.73, while the average for Canadian of a like kind is $28\frac{1}{2}$ to 29. "You will see," he says, "the manufacturers are not availing themselves of the extra 1 cent per square yard, the principal reason being, that they require to be very much below the market price." He says with regard to the grey cottons, that they are not availing themselves of the specific duties. He does not say that they demand only 5 to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. over the mill prices. When he comes to white goods, he speaks of them as being sold at from 15 to 20 per cent. less than they can be laid down for, or from 5 to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. less than the American kinds. What Mr. Gault says as to the grey goods is that the manufacturers do not take advantage of the 1 cent, the specific duty, and that is all he states. What would that be? The specific duty would be as near as may be about 15 per cent., and the statement of Mr. Gault is that they take advantage of that amount. I have shown that the duty is about 30 per cent. specific and ad valorem; yet he says the specific is not availed of. That would be a very serious thing; it would make the cost of grey cottons at least 15 per cent. over the United States cost; but the statement is wholly fallacious. He gives a table of brown sheetings of American make, of which he asks you to draw the conclusion that he deduces. He gave the brands and qualities and widths, which are not at all comparable with the Canadian goods. He gave a number of light and narrow and fine goods of different qualities altogether, and they are unfair even if the comparison were made by the yard. They are still more unfair when the comparison is made by the lb. There are in this list of brown sheetings, of American make, only three or four brands which were at all extensively coming into consumption even under the old Tariff. The laid down prices he gives, also, are obviously incorrect. But I will assume the table to be correct in all particulars, and will give you its results. The average cost of United States greys, taking all the print cloths, the narrow and fine goods, and the high-priced goods which he goes on to compare with our average Canadian brown sheetings, is 25.89 cents per lb., and the laid down cost at Montreal, 33.73 cents, or an addition of 7.84, or 33.15 per cent., which constitutes the average advance in price on account of duty and cost of transport. The Canadian price is 29 cents. So, by his own table, without disputing a single one of his comparisons, without investigating a single one of his figures, and taking his own results, Canadian brown sheeting cost 12 per cent. in excess of the cost abroad, of the United States goods, which he gives as a measure of comparison. Consequently, by that mode of calculation the measure of advantage, instead of being 5 per cent. as the hon. member said, instead of being $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. as the hon. Minister suggests, is really 12 per cent. Suppose that that were the general result in the case of Canadian cottons, it would mean an extra payment to the Canadian manufacturers of \$540,000 on the product of 14,000,000 lbs. of raw cotton used in the mill. But that is far from it. Mr. Gault acknowledges that the Canadian brown sheetings are chiefly from three to four yards in width. Let us say an average of $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards. He makes out the average price of these goods in December, 1881, was $28\frac{1}{2}$ to 29 cents. I make out that the average price was 29.46 cents, having taken the prices of the five brands produced by the three mills to which I have referred. Mr. Gault, in taking Hochelaga alone, is as nearly correct as possible; but taking the three mills to which I have referred the real result is, that the average price in December, 1881, was 29.46 instead of from $28\frac{1}{2}$ to 29. But I will assume the price to be 29 as Mr. Gault suggests. To what does he compare these average Canadian brown sheetings $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards in width which he says cost 29 cents? He compares them with finer, narrower and better goods altogether, made of finer yarn and in a different manner. I will give you proof of this by reading extracts of letters from numerous merchants in the highest standing in the country, with whom I have corresponded on this subject:

"Mr. Gault omits to state that the American grey cotton is intrinsically a better cloth, finer in make. For example, the Great Falls E is a well-known cloth in Canada. We know of no grey cloth made in Canada equal to it at the present date. It could be imported to sell at a profit if it recedes half a cent in price which, it may do. Or take the Atlantic H, the Canadian mills make no such cotton.

"The Canadian mills are not improving their cloth as they should. The tyrannical protection they get obviates the necessity of this. The Hochelaga greys approach nearer to the American goods than any other mill in Canada. If it had not been for protection granted to them that they did not require they would have done better. Since the new duty went on they have not improved. They have deteriorated. The Dundas mills made better goods years ago than they now do. Any housekeeper in the county of Wentworth could speak to that. The reason is the same with them all. They have no incentive to excel. Their goods are sure to sell owing to the enormous protection they have.

"Regarding white cottons, the English market is the check on the Valleyfield mills, who are the sole makers of bleached goods in Canada, the new mill at St. Henri, near Montreal, not having got started as yet. Many wholesale houses this spring have kept English bleached cottons solely in stock. The English goods are to-day better value than the Canadian.

"Regarding colored goods the Massachusetts mills send their goods here yet. They are superior in coloring and styles, and in spite of the 2 cents specific duty in addition to the 15 per cent. ad valorem, are largely imported.

"Regarding cotton yarn, the American yarn is finer than the Canadian and does not take so well in this country.

"The Canadian is a coarser thread and comparisons between the two are scarcely in order; indeed in making any comparison between American and Canadian goods the same remark applies. As before mentioned the American cloth is a finer fabric as a rule.

"More pains have been taken with it to make it good value.

"Nothing could illustrate the fallacy of excessive protection better than the fact that Free Trade England is to-day sending us more bleached cottons than either Canada or the United States, and they are improving fast, in fact beating us on our own ground irrespective of all the protection accorded to the Canadian mills.

"Mr. Gault's concluding remark that nearly all wholesale houses as well as the retail sell Canadian manufactured cottons to their customers at or about the mill price, certainly in few instances not much over 5 per cent. profit, while imported goods of the same class usually pay 10 to 15 per cent. profit, is a startling one. How could his clients live if they sold their goods for cost price? Are they philanthropists or do they find the English goods better value than they can get 10 to 15 per cent. more. Mr. Gault has impaled himself on the horns of a dilemma by such a statement."

Another gentleman says:

"With reference to print cloths and the other fine United States greys, they differ from our greys in being finer texture and I have no doubt are made of a higher priced raw material; at any rate, they are of a smaller, finer yarn, which yarn must be worth more per lb. than the coarser yarn that Canadian greys are made from. The Great Falls F and the Atlantic H and Atlantic V are made of similar yarn to Canadian cottons, at least as good yarn as any of the Canadian grey, and better yarn than the Leybster greys; I think quite as good as the Dundas or the Hochelaga. With reference to the white, the Dwight Anchor and Wamsutta are a very fine, high grade of cotton and are still imported into this country by high-class retail trade such as some of the best stores who serve wealthy families."

Another gentleman states :

"I have merely to state that even Mr. Gault must admit that given the same weight for the same number of yards, of Canadian and American cottons, the make and quality of the latter are much superior. Prices of American manufactured cottons ruled high last season, in consequence of great demand, and there were more English than American cottons imported into Canada, as the prices were much lower of the English.

"I might also add that the knitting cotton sold, although bulky, is of very small value, and in comparison to other descriptions of cotton and woollen goods imported, on which the Tariff is excessive, the entire value of the whole consumption is a mere bagatelle; and it is not fair to single out an article of this kind, of trifling value, to prove the success of an exorbitant duty on other goods."

Another gentleman says :

"Mr. Gault has selected special brands from different mills which from their peculiar make and quality would hardly under any circumstances come into consumption in Canada. I have no means at hand of testing whether the prices he quotes are mill prices or jobber's prices. They should be mill prices to compare with Canadian mill prices. No business man could say that the quality of cotton put into Canadian cottons is as good or fine as that usually put in the United States cottons. As to the bleached shirtings, it is a difficult matter to sell them (Valleyfield) quality deteriorated, shirtmakers alone buy them to any extent. British white cottons preferred even though it cost more. His statement regarding cotton yarn is simply not correct, but that is one statement against another which could only be proven by having them tested.

"As I before stated it is a very unfair and unbusinesslike comparison for Mr. Gault to select lines of cotton that are not suitable for this trade (Canada), and with two exceptions so far as I can remember, that were never brought into the country under the old Tariff; these were the 30 inch "Atlantic V" and 36 inch "Atlantic H" and the 36 inch "Great Falls F"; but a very small quantity of any of the other brands could then be sold, as they are fine quality and more suitable for a city trade than for the mill, and I will ask you not to lose sight of the fact that Yankee cottons are made from better stock than Canadian; hence the impossibility to institute a fair and just comparison, having such a large market in the States, the makes are adapted to different localities and printing cloths are not used in Canada.

"The Valleyfield goods. It would be difficult to induce any house to buy a quantity of them; they are run down so in quality."

Another gentleman says :

"To my own mind, the whole matter lies in this simple question: Can grey and white cottons be imported into our market in the face of the existing tariff? The answer is, they can.

"Mr. Gault's method of reasoning as to the profits derived by the wholesale and retail merchant is singularly specious; he wisely makes no reference to the manufacturer. I may refer to the question which I proposed in my former letter? Out of whose pockets comes the increased price of the manufactured article? Out of the pockets of the consumers. Who receives the spoil? The manufacturer, and be alone.

"Our sales of English whites have been greatly in excess of Canadian, being better value in spite of the enormous duty.

Another gentleman says :

"The mills are so far behind in their delivery that we are sold quite out of their make, but the fact that English white cottons are imported largely and sold at a much larger profit, after paying the exorbitant Tariff, shows how much the mill is appropriating of the Tariff: in fact it shows that the mill is taking all the Tariff in addition to legitimate manufacturers' prices. The same can be said of colored goods, as the commission firms of Wright, Bliss and Falyan, lately Bliss, Falyan & Co. and Geo. O. Richardson & Co., of Boston, have been and are selling dark largely to the wholesale trade of Toronto and Montreal, and every live wholesale dry goods house in the Dominion is importing English shirting largely.

"You are quite right in pointing out the misrepresentation of Mr. Gault when he averages print cloths and such other fine cottons along with regular grey cotton to get a higher average price per lb. than greys like Canadians would show. The Great Falls F is a brand well known by Canadian merchants, as it came in here freely under the old Tariff; and you notice by his own statement the Great Falls E and the Adriatic Standard only show 1c. per lb. over the average he gives for Canadian cottons while the specific duty alone on these brands would be about 3c. per lb. in addition to the ad valorem duty.

"The list of grey goods given includes only three or four brands which went into consumption here even under the old Tariff.

"The others being light or narrow are not fairly comparable with Canadian made goods, more particularly when the comparison is sought to be made on the basis of an average price per lb. weight of manufactured cotton cloth.

"The same applies to a great extent to the white goods enumerated, although as has been stated it is more difficult to even institute a comparison in white goods. In the greys the Adriatic Standard, 36 inches, weighing 2.84 and the Great Falls E 2.90, are the only two that from experience I am in a position to compare with Canadian goods.

"The standard will weigh about the same, probably a shade more than the Hochelaga XXX.

"The Great Falls E about the same as the XX, but we are using a Black Hawk which weighs about 2.80 or between 2.80 and 2.90 which counts 44 x 48, costs us 9½ cents laid down and is preferred by many when placed side by side with the Hochelaga L, costing 9½ and freight from Hochelaga (which, in passing, is quite as high as the freight from Boston. The Great Falls E costs us 7½ cents in Boston and is laid down at 10-10 while the XXX costs 9½ and freight.

"There does not seem to me to be much use in comparing Canadian and American white cottons. The fact is the English white cottons have had the effect in this market of keeping the price of Valleyfields down. If we had not been able to draw supplies from Manchester our whites would have cost us a great deal more than they do. There are very few English greys imported excepting lower qualities, than are made in Canada, and wide thin goods for cheese bandages.

"In whites they are imported largely for two reasons. The value is much better and the supply of Canadian is not equal to the wants of the country."

Mr. PLUMB. Name these authorities.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not intend to name these parties. The mill manufacturers of this country have at present the command of the trade, and to name them would be to expose them to be boycotted. I read these letters on my responsibility as a member of Parliament, stating they are given to me by the first houses in the trade in the various cities of the Dominion. I am not bound to name them. Another gentleman says :

"The large quantity of the better grade of English and American white goods that are imported do not come into competition with those made at Valleyfield which are a much lower class of goods and much used and are easily sold at a price just a little below what the same sort can be imported for. As the duty on low priced goods is much higher than on the finer, manufacturers will naturally make that which pays best.

"I might say that the best grey goods found in our large retail stores are American, and though not weighing any more per yard than our Canadian they are usually better made, have a nicer finish and consequently sell higher, so that retailers prefer to handle them. This will also apply to the white, which up to a short time were disgraceful in make and finish, yet they sold, and the company made last year not far from 40 per cent. on the paid-up capital."

The relative proportion of grey and white cloth made in Canada is about 5 to 1. Another gentleman says :

"Brown cottons are certainly kept out of the market, and the Canadian prices are a little under American 'laid down,' but the manufacturers cannot claim that they are not taking full advantage of the Tariff because if they do not give some margin the fluctuations of the American market would occasionally permit of the importation of certain lines. You will observe that according to Gault's figures the duties on brown goods range from 30 per cent. on the best line he quotes to 31½ per cent. on the lowest. With such a tariff they can well afford to sell a little under what the tariff would allow them to get. A comparison on between American and Canadian brown cottons, based entirely on weight and count is not fair because the American goods are much purer and cleaner. Canadian mills send out goods as perfect which no American maker of any repute would sell except as seconds.

"Note the point he makes about the small profit the jobber gets and the advantage to the consumer in the close competition between dealers; compare the profits he says the jobber gets with the dividends paid by the mills. The jobber takes nearly all the risk, and the 'profit' would not pay expenses, so that according to his own showing the jobbers are only servants of the mills and handle the goods for nothing. I think you are quite safe in stating that it costs more than 5 per cent. on the business to carry on jobbing.

"Respecting the white cottons, comparing these with American is out of the question, as the Americans make theirs so much better in every way. You can readily understand how easy it would be to make cottons weigh well by adding starch and other kinds of dressing, and this is done by the Canadian mills whilst the American goods are almost pure. In our business for the present season nearly one-half of the total sales in white cotton has been in English and American goods, and this is also the experience of others. There are no Canadian goods made like the last three, and especially the last two, on his list. If he had gone on and quoted still finer goods he could have made his average price per lb. higher. Regarding the yarns, this statement bears its own refutation as if the American yarn was inferior in quality it could not be sold, there being no scarcity in Canadian yarns, and jobbers can get all they require."

Another gentleman says :

"It is most unfair on the part of Mr. Gault (and he must have known that it would be misleading, too) for him to include in his comparison of grey or unbleached cottons, printed cloths and the finer makes of grey such as are not made in Canada.

"We are not able with any degree of success to import any unbleached cottons from the United States. Our Canadian cotton manufacturers regulate the price just so as to leave us no, or very little margin in importing from the States.

"From the enormous protection the Canadian manufacturers have (1 cent, say 1 cent per square yard, and 15 per cent. ad valorem) we verily believe that they have from five to ten times greater profit per cent. in selling cottons by the hundred bale lots to responsible wholesale men than we have in selling from one to five pieces to merchants of different standing all over the country.

"We know less about the relative values in United States and Canadian bleached goods than we do in unbleached. We know, however, that we import largely from England in bleached goods, and sell them side by side with the Canadian bleached goods at a much better profit than we can get on Canadian goods, and of course the Canadian manufacturer gets the difference in profit."

Now, Sir, I have shown you by this statement how unfair in the general is the basis of comparison upon which Mr. Gault's statement rests. I have shown from the testimony of numerous persons that the average of the goods he refers to cannot be properly referred to as a basis of comparison with the average comparison from sheetings manufactured in Canada. His comparisons, while he admits the average Canadian goods are about 3½ yards to the lb. include printed cloths, weighing 7 yards to the pound; Monadnock greys, weighing 5·30 yards to the lb. Newberry BB's, weighing 4·20; Continental K's, 4; Nashua R's, weighing 3·45, out of a very high count increasing the cost. The brands which may be most fairly taken in comparison with our very best are such as Adriatic Standard and Great Falls E. I have prepared a table showing cost abroad, rate of duty, and the cost duty added of Gault's samples, divided into two parts. I have not added freight and charges, an additional protection varying in amount according to the point of distribution, and therefore disputable, through the charge at Montreal may be taken at about 2 per cent. The table is as follows:—

	Yards to lb.	U. States cost per lb.	Rate of duty.	Cost duty added.
Printing Cloths	7·00	28·00	33·75	37·45
Monadnock Greys	5·30	30·475	29·49	39·46
Newbury BB's	4·20	28·35	29·81	36·80
Continental K's	4·00	27·60	29·49	35·74
Nashua R (High Count).....	3·45	26·737	27·10	34·20
Average	4·79	28·23	30·09	36·73

I have taken as a second part the remainder of Mr. Gault's table:

	Yards to lb.	U. States cost per lb.	Rate of duty.	United States cost duty added.
		cents.	per cent.	cents.
Massachusetts I.....	4·00	25·60	28·02	32·71
Atlantic V.....	3·70	24·97	27·31	31·80
Laurel D.....	3·15	23·62	28·30	30·32
Atlantic H.....	3·05	23·64	27·90	30·23
Adriatic Standard.....	2·84	22·72	27·5	28·96
Great Falls E.....	2·90	23·20	27·5	29·58
Average.....	3·27	23·96	27·76	30·60

Now, I do not admit that second part of the table itself to be a fair comparison with the average Canadian brands at all, but even assuming that it is, these are the results. Now, I have taken, as I have said, the five staple brands of Hochelaga, Cornwall and Dundas, and their weight is, as Mr. Gault says, about 3½ yards to the lb., and taking, in the first place, Mr. Gault's own statement of the cost at 29 cents, the result is this: Canadian cotton costs 29 cents; United States cottons at mills costs 23·96 cents; excess of cost of Canadian cotton cost, 5·04 cents, or 21 per cent. in excess. Then add cost of duty to United States cotton and it will be 33·60 cents, or 1·60 cents in cost of Canadian cotton, or about 5½ per cent.

Mr. FARROW. Is the hon. gentleman reading a letter or is it his own speech he is reading now.

Mr. BLAKE. I am referring to certain figures which I do not propose to carry in my head, even to please the hon. member for North Huron. I say that the excess of United States duty added is by these figures only 5 or 6 per cent., and if you take the average cost of Canadian, as it is at 29·60, the result is that the excess of Canadian over United States at mill is 23 per cent; and the excess of United States duty added only about 3½ per cent., and the truth is if you were to take a fair comparison, which even the second branch of this table does not give you, of goods of equal value, you would find, instead of being, as I have pointed out, 21 or 23 per cent., the mill cost of Canadian goods would be between 25 and 30 per cent. over the mill cost of United States goods of equal value. I have shown that Mr. Gault acknowledged, in effect, that they took 15 per cent. on the brown, but that, in truth, they took nearly 30 per cent. These figures prove another thing: By reference to the relative cost which is given for these goods at the three Canadian mills, it appears there is a practical understanding as to the rate to be charged, and there is not, except under particular circumstances, any competition. So much with respect to brown sheetings and Mr. Gault's statement in respect to them, and I once again reiterate that the statement which the hon. Minister attributed to Mr. Gault respecting brown sheetings is a statement which Mr. Gault does not make, but he confines himself, in that regard, to bleached shirtings, to which I am now about to refer. Mr. Gault admits that in white goods the comparison with United States goods "can't be made so clear" on account of the variety of styles and makes. He gives a list of United States goods. Low fine shirtings cost abroad, 5 cents, duty 30 per cent; Manantic E cost abroad 6½ cents, duty 28·9 per cent.; Chapman X cost abroad 7½ cents, duty 28 per cent.; Elerton VS, cost abroad 8½ cents, duty 27·09 per cent.; Hill Semper Idem, cost abroad 9½ cents, duty 25·42 per cent.; Dwight Anchor cost abroad 10 cents, duty 25 per cent.; Langdon, G B, cost abroad 11½ cents, duty 23·22 per cent.; Wamsutta, cost abroad 11¾ cents, duty 23·10 per cent. The average cost per lb., in the United States is 37·38 cents; average duty 26·34 per cent; average cost per lb., duty added, is 47·12 cents. Now, Mr. Gault compares these with Valleyfield goods, of which he says the average price is about 38 cents a pound. I have taken the brands of Valleyfield white cottons—X, XXX, O, OO and OOO—being almost the whole consumption of Valleyfield, and find the average cost 38·89 cents. There is no comparison whatever between these goods. It is true that Langdon, GB, and Wamsutta may be looked at, but they compare, if at all, only with Valleyfield brand, LLL, of which the consumption is insignificant. These are goods made in the protected United States. It is the low price of English bleached goods that has kept Valleyfield down. It is with them the competition is; and a fair comparison would be with them. Valleyfield has, however, increased seriously in price. The price of October, 1878, and January, 1879, was of the brands mentioned. Average per yard for October, 1878, and January, 1879, 6·80 cents; for May, 1879, 7·24 cents; for year 1879, 7·32 cents; for December 14, 1881, 8·475, an increase over October, 1878, and January, 1879, of 24·72 per cent.; over May, 1879, of 17 per cent.; over average of 1879, of 15½ per cent. The brand X presents the following results: Increase over October, 1878, 31·94 per cent.; over May, 1879, 21·08 per cent.; over year 1879, 20-25 per cent. While the price has gone up the quality has deteriorated seriously, and it is only from necessity that the goods are bought. The competition is with England. Here the ocean and inland freight is a clear gain to home producer. have already given a statement showing the rates of of duty on cottons imported. To this must be added a considerable sum for freight and charges, making an enormous protection. Yet goods are coming in in great quantities. The mills keep just low enough to enable them to get the orders. Instead of getting the goods (as would be assumed by Gault's letter) at an advance of only 5 to 7½ per cent. over similar goods, or the goods in competition, we get the goods at nearly the highest point which duty and freight allow manufacturers to charge. Then, as to colored goods, Gault says it is impossible to arrive at any accurate estimate. But we have once more the best test: the demand is greater than the supply; the foreign supply is hampered with duties of 30 per cent. and over. Therefore, the home market can and does charge almost all that. The general result is that we are paying within a shade of duty point. That duty point may average (without freight) about 30 per cent.; and therefore we are paying that much, leaving out freight and charges for fluctuations. If the home product was at mill prices, $5,000,000, and assuming only 25 per cent. advance over cost abroad, we would have paid for our home-made cottons $1,000,000 more than the cost abroad. No wonder cotton men grow rich. But I will add some further proofs of the proposition I have advanced. I have some letters and a memorandum of actual transactions in addition to those already given. Now, these are the comparisons we are to take. What is the sense of the Minister bringing forward a lot of grades and styles of American white cottons which bear no comparison whatever with the Valleyfield cottons? Of the brands to which I referred only one or two may be compared with the Valleyfield LLL, the consumption of which is insignificant, and he omitted to consider what the goods were and what their cost was which did come in competition with Canadian goods, the British goods, and what the rate of duty is, and how the prices go with reference to them. The prices with reference to them go as above stated, that the Canadian manufacturer charges almost within a shade, the whole advantage, the cost abroad, duty and freight added. Now, the general result is, that the duty being over 30 per cent, we are paying between 25 and 30 per cent. for our various commodities of cotton beyond the cost abroad. As I have stated the mill prices would be about five millions out of a total product of from 14 to 16 millions pounds, and if we pay 25 per cent. more than the cost abroad, that means that if the price abroad were four millions while we were paying five, the duty enhances the price of Canadian cottons to the people of this country by one million dollars, which I believe is the lowest estimate which we can make of the cost to this country of the system which the hon. gentleman has introduced. I wish to give some further evidence of the proposition I have advanced and I will read some further letters on the subject:

"Of cotton goods mentioned, such as tweeds, ducks, bed ticks colored shirtings (Oxford), although made in Canada, the heavy duty charged on imported goods of some classes is not sufficient to keep them out of the country. In some or rather in nearly every instance the imported articles are much the best, and most desirable, and more than hold their own with the Canadian manufactured articles so that the actual cost to the consumer is not only increased by the amount of duty paid on each and every description of goods but also by the merchants, percentage of profit on that duty paid, as the profit is put on to the actual cost of goods delivered, including duty, &c.

"In the matter of bed ticks, ducks, bleached cottons, &c., the prices are so regulated by the Canadian manufacturer as to take the full benefit of the protective tariff by giving the wholesale buyer the very smallest margin of choice in favor of Canadian-made goods. They cut it so fine in many instances as to defeat the end they seek to obtain.

"I note your remark, the statement is boldly made, that in domestics, greys and whites, and indeed generally, the prices are but slightly above

United States mill prices, and are supplied as they would be if imported at a 10 per cent. duty.

"If, however, the duties were reduced to 10 per cent, these are the very parties who would most object. When the Tariff was 17½ per cent., manufacturers of domestic staples did not find it sufficient to keep out American goods, and if the duties were reduced to 10 per cent. there is not a mill in Canada that would be able to continue operations, as England and the United States both would supply all Canada at lower prices than the same qualities could be made in the Dominion.

"In many goods, called by the same names in Canada and the United States, the makes are so dissimilar as to be quite unsuitable to the same purposes of use. I more especially allude to grey or unbleached cottons, which in Canada are all of stout or thick threads, very rough in finish, and not so fine in texture as those of the United States.

"The first cost of these goods is so low in both countries, that the Canadian duty of 1c. per square yard and 15 cents ad valorem, is sufficient to compel the people to use the Canadian, though not as desirable. In the finer grades costing in the United States at present 7½ cents, and upwards, we still import.

"There are no such goods of fine thread and closely woven, made in Canada.

"The duty paid, as per copy of entry, you will see amounts to 28½ per cent., and as the goods are to be obtained at all times, on ordering, it is only necessary to purchase in small quantities.

"In 29 inch unbleached drill, Peperell & Lyman Mills (twilled grey cotton), the duty amounts to 24½ per cent. as per entry following. The cost in the United States at present is 8½ cents per yard; in Canada, at Hochelaga Mills, 10½ cents.

"The above cost us landed at our door 10½ cents per yard; the Canadian exactly the same, including freight and cartage; and there is no choice whatever in quality or make between the United States Peperell Mills, Lyman Mills, and the Canadian Hochelaga. You will perceive, however, the duty 24½ per cent. is considerably in advance of 10 per cent.

"In bleached or white cottons the difference is more marked. In Canada there is only one mill making these goods, at Valleyfield. We have imported a few from the United States this season, but not many, as the demand for manufactures of this class in the United States, in consequence of the generally lively state of trade in that country, has forced up the prices.

"There is no Canadian bleached cotton of similar make or quality of the above, but the per centage of duty is a long way from 10 per cent. From England, however, we have had considerable bleached or white cottons since July, as they were cheaper there this season than in the United States. We give below a copy of Customs House entries to illustrate per centage of duty and comparison with Canadian; 30½ per cent. duty is, however, a long way from 10 per cent. Goods as under we have received several times this season, that is to say repetitions of the same goods:

reference to the Canadian referred to. The white cotton at 3d. is a double warp, no such goods being made in Canada, but very essential for household use.

The English cotton is, however, worth $\frac{1}{2}$ c. per yard more than the Canadian, and notwithstanding the duty of 30 $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., which is a long way from 10 per cent, we sell the English more readily at $\frac{1}{2}$ c. higher price than the Canadian.

"In bed ticks, the lower grades we do not now import, as in consequence of opposition amongst Dundas, Cornwall and Stormont mills, the prices are very slightly in favor of the Canadian, about 5 to 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. average on those costing up to 15 cents. At this price, however, the 'Millbury Feather,' a Boston tick, surpassed all competitors in Canada.

The 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. cloth is much better than what was recently offered by the Cornwall Cotton Manufacturing Co. at 13 cents and 14 cents, less 10 per cent.

"These goods cost 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. and 3d., and were bought merely as a sample lot to show customers with a view to spring trade, as they are altogether sold at that time of the year.

"The cloth at 3d. is heavy and more durable than the lowest made by Cornwall or Dundas Cotton Co. It cost us landed 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents at the above duty, and is better than the lowest made in Canada, which is by the Cornwall Co., and cost according to price list at present in our possession (not the latest) 10 $\frac{3}{8}$ cents net, exclusive of freight. On a few 'Cornwall' goods that we know, the present quotations of prices have advanced $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per yard, and the whole list is sure to be higher, as prices have advanced everywhere.

"In conversation with the Montreal agent at the Cornwall Cotton Co., when here (in October last I think), he stated he was formerly agent in Montreal for the Boston Duck Co., and that the Cornwall Co. now regulate their prices by the cost at which the Boston can be landed here, so as to be below.

"He quoted Cornwall checked duck at 15 cents net, irrespective of freight, that of the Boston being 11 cents, and equal in quality. The Boston Checked cost landed at our door 14 $\frac{3}{8}$ cents.

"In plain brown ducks the difference is more marked and we sell as good qualities as the Canadian at 2c. per yard less.

"The duty on checked duck, American costing 11c., at 2c. per square yard, and 15 per cent. ad valorem is 27 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I give copy of one entry to illustrate :

"July 7th, 1881.

"We have a great many entries for American ducks, mostly made in the early part of the year, when they are mostly used and the duty generally averages upwards of 30 per cent.,—long way from 10 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE.

"The above cost 15 $\frac{1}{4}$ cents, and we sell it readily at 2 cents per yard higher than Canadian (Stormont, AAA), the net price of which is 18 cents. As stated in previous letter, the 2 cents per yard, and 15 per cent. ad valorem on the lower grades, makes such a heavy percentage that we do not now import them, and this is about the only illustration I can give, which I think a good one, as it shows we get 2 cents per yard more for an American tick than we can get for a Canadian costing 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents higher.

"A few days after writing you on December 8th, I received some prices quoting amongst others, plain brown duck marked 9 oz., at 14 cents. This is much inferior to that of Boston Duck Co., marked XX, the price of which at the time was 11 cents.

"The classes of cotton goods (imported) which enter into competition with Canadian goods are: 1st white cottons; 2nd demins; 3rd heavy colored shirtings; 4th grey cottons.

"There may be a few other lines but compared with these they are insignificant, and consequently not worth anything.

"As to the white cottons the consumption is large. The Valleyfield company have hitherto had the market exclusively. A new company will share the trade with them during the coming season, and may somewhat affect the price. We have a large standing order but from the enormous number of orders which the mill claims to have are unable to say when it will be reached.

"The duty, as you know on this class of goods is 15 per cent. and 10 per cent. per square yard specific. English cottons are imported from 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. or 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ d. up to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., taking the lower price for example call 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. sterling, 5 cents, specific duty 20 per cent., ad valorem 15 per cent. Total 35 per cent.

"The consumption of Demins plain and striped is very large. The duty is 15 per cent., ad valorem, and 2 per cent. square yard. These goods are imported at prices from 4d. to 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Taking the lowest price then say 4d. or 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents currency, the duty would be say 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per yard specific, the width being 27 inches, the duty being 2 cents per square yard, and the ad valorem of 15 per cent. or nearly 35 per cent.

"Heavy colored shirtings are very largely used and largely imported, the prices varying from 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 4d.

"Taking the lowest at 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. or 5 cents and the duty specific, say 2 cents per square yard, this for 27 inches would be

"Grey cottons of which the consumption is enormous, are quite shut out. The English here never being able to compete, but the American grey cloth with the present Tariff would be subjected to a duty varying from 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. All the goods referred to are used by the masses, by the working men of the country and in no instance save in very small quantities find their way to dwellings of the wealthy.

"The questions will arise if goods can be imported and sold after the payment of duties bearing from 30 per cent. to 45 per cent. what must the manufacturer make and from whom does he make it? Literally who pays these enormous duties.

"None are so benefitted as the manufacturers, who feeling the protection which they enjoy under the existing Tariff are simply arrogant, giving larger discounts for cash when they were earning but small dividends than they do to-day with their enormous earnings, pleading for orders before which they now regard it as a favour to execute and giving merchants to realize painfully that they are the masters of the situation.

"In no part of the world (and our own operations include China and Japan, in addition to the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Switzerland) save Canada do we know a single instance where manufacturers don't realize that business is something designed to be ultimately beneficial. That merchant and maker are alike to feel that their interest is a common one. In Canada the manufacturer virtually says to merchant and people, we have you under our heel and we propose that you should feel it."

There are numerous instances which I could give in detail of invoices, of statements of actual transactions, of comparative statements of different lines of Canadian with American and English goods, indicating that in almost all cases the Canadian goods are sold at a price approximating the cost of the foreign competitive article. I have here many instances at hand, but I will not add to those I have given. With reference to ball knitting cottons, to which the hon. gentleman referred, I hold in my hand two letters from the Montreal agents of Morse, Kaley & Co., one dated November 18, 1881, and the other April 12, 1882, which state that the discounts on Morse, Kaley & Co.'s knitting cottons are 25, 5, 5, and 5 per cent. off, irrespective of the cash discount. Thus, it appears that while Mr. Parks' charges are 39 \cdot 60 cents net cash those of Morse, Kaley & Co. are irrespective of duty 31 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents, making the cost of Morse, Kaley & Co.'s cottons, with the freight and duty added, 40 \cdot 03 cents against 39 \cdot 60f or Mr. Parks', or very nearly the whole advantage of the duty. So that in all instances in which I have made enquiry—and I have here fifty or sixty additional statements in proof of the same fact, I come to the conclusion that it is not, as Mr. Gault contends, essential to the Canadian manufacturer, in the present condition of trade, that he should go as far below the duty point as he is said to go; but that, on the contrary, to retain his trade, he has only to keep a shade below the duty point; and the practical result of this Tariff, instead of being to supply us with domestic cottons at the old rate, has been to charge us an enormous tax, bearing disproportionately on the goods consumed by the poor. The effect has been to impose an enormously added tax to the goods which we buy from the British or United States market and to increase the price of the domestic article in favor of the domestic manufacturer to the extent of 25 per cent. or about one million of dollars.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I confess that I would have preferred that my hon. friend should have delivered this speech on Monday next, as he no doubt proposed doing, on a motion he intended to present to the House, because I understood that he had been provided with a brief, that would require two or three hours to speak from, prepared by the importers of cotton goods.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Will the hon. gentleman say no after having read these letters from different persons?

Mr. BLAKE. I will say no.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, I do not object to it. When I was a very young man I used to attend the courts in the city of St. John, and nothing struck me so much as the wonderful ability displayed by members of the legal profession. I found that a gentleman of eminent ability, who had perhaps arrived in the city the previous night, and his brief would not be many hours in his hands, before he would appear in the court and make a most elaborate statement, which certainly did great credit to his ability and his skill in addressing a jury. I have heard that same gentleman a year after, having been retained with a brief on the other side, not in exactly the same case, but in a case involving the same principles, making as clear and forcible an argument on the opposite side of the case. It has often been said that there are too many lawyers in the Commons and Local Legislatures. But I do not know, considering the nature of the duties involved, whether all the members should not be members of the legal profession, in order that they might not, from time to time, present their views under different circumstances—both sides of the case—as has been ably done by a lay member on this occasion. The hon. member for West Durham has presented his views in a very lengthy and elaborate and complete form from his standpoint. He commenced by censuring me as Finance Minister for presenting letters written by gentlemen in the Dominion, upon which I formed my judgment with reference to the effect of the Tariff on the prices of certain goods manufactured in the Dominion.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not censure the hon. gentleman for reading the letters, but I said he got more.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I gave the names of the letters I read, which came with the weight of their names throughout the country; and I know they did not mislead me in their answers to my questions. I told then I proposed using those letters in Parliament, and asked them for all the facts and nothing but the facts. But the hon. gentleman opposite declined to give the names of the writers he read, which is the difference between us. And what reason did he give for his refusal? That the writers were manufacturers of the Dominion, possessing a monopoly of their business, that they were under obligations to the Tariff, and he feared to give their names lest it should injure them.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say that.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In the same breath he also said that those men stated they could import into the Dominion and sell a better article of goods, and obtain better profits from them than from Canadian goods. If so, there was no reason why they should not give their names, if so independent of home manufactures. It is exceedingly difficult I admit, and the mover of the resolution says the same, and as says one of the writers of the letters communicated to me, which I read to the House, for persons even intimately acquainted with all the prices and business of these different branches, to give correctly comparative prices, so that there can be no question with regard to them. But if it is difficult for persons in the trade to do so, it must necessarily be more difficult to others when considering both sides of the question. But there are some points on which there can be no great question. I must refer to the question of woollen goods. Why, the mover of the resolution, and the gentleman who has just sat down, if necessary, could establish by certain evidence that the construction of railways had injured certain localities in the Dominion. I know localities where property is worth less than before railroads were built in their vicinity. But though you can find such cases, it would be an insult to our intelligence to say that railroads have not been a blessing to the country. So it may be with reference to some manufactures. Take the coarse shoddy blanket, and I admit the duty upon it is high. I know that that blanket has been shaken before the people of the Dominion everywhere to show the injustice of the Tariff, as the hon. gentleman says, like a red flag. But is it necessary in the interest of the country that that blanket should be imported? I believe it is not, because they can be replaced by blankets made in the Dominion, of Canadian wool, that will last in the lumber shanties for two or three years instead of only one, and by a cheaper and better blanket. Therefore there is no necessity for us to import such blankets. It is the same with reference to several other articles, some that we are not making may be imported with advantage. I think the mover of the resolution misstated what I said, that the finer woollen goods that were imported paid in duties last year $400,000 more than the year previous.

Mr. ANGLIN. What was said was that our wealthy class voluntarily paid $400,000 more on these goods.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I said, with reference to silks and satins, and spirits and wines and various other articles, that the users paid last year \$750,000 voluntarily, because they were not the necessaries of life. I went further and said that \$400,000 more was paid on the best class of woollen goods, which is a fact; and that cotton goods that paid 20 per cent. yielded \$300,000 more last year than the year before. While a great deal has been said throughout the country of the increased duties paid by the poor man for the cotton dress that his wife wears—and I ask the hon. member whether the average of duties on cotton goods is 30 per cent.—that cotton dress pays into the Treasury $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents more than in 1878. But that duty and the \$300,000 and \$400,000 additional that was just mentioned, goes only to make up the deficits that existed before the present Government was formed. The statements I made on woollen goods in my Budget Speech were not made on the authority of Mr. Greenshields, but on the authority of Mr. Catellier, or Catellier & Co., Montreal, naming distinctly the classes of woollen goods produced in this country. I read this letter to show that the prices were cheaper than before. The answer that the hon. gentleman gave, that woollen goods of this class are lower in England, does not amount to much. If they are lower in England it is just the same percentage. This proves that the increased duties have not increased the prices here, to say the least of it. The increase of duty has not increased the price. If the statement that is made has not been controverted, if that description of goods sold 25 per cent. less than in 1873, and if it be true that the same article is worth 25 per cent. less in England than in 1873, it does not establish that the imposition of a higher duty has increased the cost to the people. I recollect that, in 1879, when hon. gentlemen opposite were explaining why they had a deficit, they spoke of the falling off in the value of goods as compared with 1873. I admitted that had a very great effect on the Tariff, and undertook to show that the increased Tariff we were imposing in 1879 on the value of goods at that time was per yard no greater than in 1873 when we applied the duty in 1873 to the 20 or 22 per cent., as the case might be in 1879. Now, we find, notwithstanding as has been said by the hon. gentlemen opposite, there has been a great depreciation in the value of cotton and woollen goods in the English market, our revenue has increased wonderfully. I reaffirm what I said in February last, that the woollen goods manufactured in the Dominion, including blankets and tweeds, consumed by the masses of the people, are sold to-day less than in 1873. I am prepared to prove further that, though the prices have decreased in England, a large portion are sold lower than they could have been if imported under the Tariff of 1878. It is quite true we have not yet reached, either in cotton or woollen manufactures, all the description of goods we hope and believe we will manufacture here ere long. Last year I had to admit, from the calculations and estimates placed in my hands, that we paid on refined sugar during the year 1879 and 1880, 25 cents per 100 lbs. more than we would have had to pay if imported under the Tariff of 1878. Then we had but two refineries in the Dominion. What is the result now? With five refineries in operation it is established beyond doubt that the description of sugar called yellow sugar is sold less than it could be imported at under the Tariff of 1878. Suppose all that has been said by the hon. member had been correct, with reference to the effect of this Tariff upon cotton goods, as far as their price is concerned, would that be a reason why this House should abandon the policy that induced us to increase the duty on cotton? Certainly not, because we know perfectly well that, though we have had additional cotton factories put into operation, there are not yet sufficient in Canada to supply the whole market, and until then, especially upon some articles not extensively manufactured in this country, we should have to pay into the Treasury a duty on imported goods, but the time is not far distant when there will be but little importation, and the prices will be less than they are at present, than they have been or than they would be under the Tariff of 1878. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat made somewhat strong statements with reference to the operations of two cotton mills. I do not know if I took him down accurately, but I understood him to say that the Hochelaga mill had increased the value of its stock \$1,000,000 in two years, that \$400,000 was the original, which is now worth \$1,400,000.

Mr. BLAKE. I said that the stock, which was $400,000, had been increased by one share on every three, and that watered stock of $533,000 was quoted at 275 premium.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is about trebled in value. Then the hon. gentleman said with reference to another mill, that it had increased in stock value about $450,000.

Mr. BLAKE. No. I said the stock of the Valleyfield mill was $374,000 and had been watered, so that it was now $500,000 and is quoted at 187 premium.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That would give an increase of \$450,000. There is, if the hon. gentleman's statement be correct, \$1,500,000 of increased value of property in those two mills alone, whereas the whole amount of labor expended in the manufacture of cotton imported in the two years, the whole amount of interest on capital, the profits and everything else over and above the value of the raw cotton, is \$2,300,000. The inference to be drawn from the hon. gentleman's statement is that these capitalists have in the last year, in these two mills alone, made \$1,500,000. That cannot be; there is nothing to warrant it. There may be speculation in this matter. When I state that the whole value of labor expended, interest, capital and profits in the cotton manufactures of the last two years have increased the value of cotton imported from its raw value to about \$2,300,000, the facts of the case do not warrant any such high prices as those quoted. The hon. gentleman understands very well how to put a case. He said that the finer descriptions of woollen goods could be laid down at 60 per cent. and the coarser at 80 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very solicitous about the poor man with reference to the rates of duty on the articles he consumes. Would it not be outrageous to pay 20 per cent. on the tea he used, as he did when they were in power, while the more wealthy classes had only to pay from 10 to 16 per cent. on their tea. There was no escape in that case from unequal imposition, whereas, with reference to woollen goods, the articles that are made in Canada of the coarser class are those upon which the people pay no duty whatever. If I used to-day a garment the material of which is supplied to me at a price as low as it could be imported at, from England or elsewhere, no matter what the duty may be, it has not increased the cost. He states it is \$5,000,000, but there is no statement that can be presented by any importer that will show anything of the kind. On the contrary, it is quite clear—and this is confirmed by the evidence of a gentleman thoroughly understanding the cotton industry which was given before a Committee sitting last week—it is clear that in order to obtain a market the Canadian manufacturer must sell for less than the article could be imported for. The hon. mover of the resolution stated that the Canadian manufacturer in some mills here charged 9 cents while a similar article imported can be sold for 8 cents. I cannot understand how that is possible. We all know perfectly well, however, that there is a certain prejudice among the people against domestic manufacturers. We are all aware that there is a popular impression that the imported article is better than the article manufactured here, although there may be absolutely no difference between them. But after two or three years' trial, and when it is clearly established that we manufacture just as good an article as can be imported, that prejudice will be removed. More than that, it will be to the interest of the manufacturers to sell their productions for less than the article can be imported for. That being the case, it may vary from 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. A statement has been furnished to me that the average price of the Canadian article is 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ or 14 per cent. higher than the article imported. Then the consumer gets that under better terms than under the old Tariff, where they paid 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. When you import an article from the United States under a duty of 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., you will, of course, sell that at a higher price than a Canadian article that costs 12 or 14 per cent. It is only a question between the hon. member and myself, as to whether it is 5 or 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That is the only point at issue. But as far as the consumer is concerned, he has the article at a cheaper rate than before. Now, in the inauguration of any great policy such as this, as I have stated over and over again, all its beneficial effects cannot be realized until it has been in operation a number of years, but a number of years will be required to create the competition that is now being created by the National Policy and the Tariff of 1869 which will give to the consumer prices as low as they possibly can be; and the marvel to me is that we are able at the present time, only three years after the introduction of the National Policy, to manufacture thirty or forty of the leading articles here and sell them at a less price, or as low, as they were sold for before this duty was imposed. With reference to the cotton industry, we have at present 200,000 spindles, within twelve months there will be 400,000, and within a year probably 500,000, and then competition will be so sharp that we will find that the manufacturers themselves, though they may not be reduced to the point referred to by the hon. ex-Minister of Finance that their capital will be ruined by competition, certainly we will be in the position that whatever may be said to-day as to whether the true price is $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. or $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or as may be said here, $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in excess of what they were before, there is this important fact as shown by the public documents and the Trade Returns, that the whole imports of cotton goods in 1880, yielded a duty of $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. upon the whole of them, or 5 per cent. above what was collected in 1878, or contributing to the Treasury of the Dominion of Canada \$450,000 a year more than was collected in 1878. As I said before, I here repeat, that we must necessarily expect a reduction in the revenue from this source as these establishments increase, though we may obtain in return a portion of the revenue that would be lost, or the goods consumed by the people engaged in these manufactures. Still we have a right to calculate that a considerable portion of the revenue now collected on these articles will no longer be collected, and that the day is not far distant when a larger portion of the goods consumed here will be made here and not imported, and at a price less than the average in 1873. I do not desire to go into this matter at greater length at present. There was something said about the prices of our cotton. I have had placed in my hand recently a statement, that since 1880 the cotton landed in Canada cost $12\frac{1}{2}$ c., in 1881, $11\frac{1}{2}$ c., in 1882, $12\frac{1}{2}$ c. I have this within the last two or three days. With reference to the value of cottons it is difficult to arrive at the true value. I understand that the value given in the Trade Returns is that of the article in the country to which it is imported, and that the price given by the hon. gentleman was the price of the cotton landed in Canada. Therefore, there has been nothing said by the hon. gentleman in the very elaborate statement furnished to him by the importers of cotton, that has shaken materially the statement that was made by me sometime since, of that description of cotton that is chiefly manufactured in Canada. Speaking of bleached cotton at the present moment, I think the hon. member stated there was one mill making bleached cotton. In six months another bleachery will be established in connection with one of the largest mills being erected in New Brunswick, where there will be sharp competition by the ablest Canadian manufacturers, with great capital at their disposal. I am satisfied the moment their establishment is completed for the bleaching of cotton, we will find that the competition will result in the reduction of prices, and that when we meet here next year it will be found that there will not be so great a discrepancy between the prices in Canada and the United States as there is to-day. But suppose the hon. member was correct, that we paid a little more for these articles that we consume, so far as the general policy is concerned, the very fact of the erection of these large establishments throughout the country, investing millions of dollars of capital and employing tens of thousands of people, the result will be that the indirect advantages we will derive from it will far outweigh any disadvantages we may have to undergo at present. But I hold that is not the case; and while there is a higher rate of duty paid on some articles and money is received by the people of this country for the payment of necessary expenditures for the redemption of the debt and for the future relief of the country from taxation, and while we are in our present prosperous position and going to prosper, as I feel satisfied we are, if the hon. gentleman could show that every statement which he has read, which has been furnished to him by parties who have been his attorneys in preparing his case, the people of this country would say we throw aside any such statements as these and stand by the policy we inaugurated in 1879.

SIR RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I am no more desirous than the hon. gentleman to prolong the debate, but I would like to say a few words in reply to some remarks he has made. First of all let me say that the hon. gentleman has wholly failed to apprehend the argument submitted by my hon. friends. Their argument was not an argument in favor of Free Trade or against Protection. They confined themselves, and very properly, to these two things: first, to pointing out the excessive character of the profits and monopolies granted to half-a-dozen people of this community by the hon. gentleman, to the great detriment of the masses of the country; and secondly, to show how atrociously unjust to a large proportion of the people of this country is the scale of duties the hon. gentleman has adopted. Neither of these two points has the hon. gentleman attempted to meet in the slightest degree, and for excellent reasons, he could not meet them. He has no evidence which in the least disproved the statements of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Blake) and my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Anglin). When he talks about my hon. friend presenting his case, arguing first on one side and then on the other, does the hon. gentleman forget how he and his colleagues in 1867 inaugurated their rule by enormously reducing the whole taxation of this country, and told us through the mouth of the Prime Minister that it was a step in the right direction. Has he forgotten how two years ago he himself declared it to be the aim and object of his policy to gradually reduce the imports of this country, whereas, as a matter of actual fact, he has largely increased them. Sir, the hon. gentleman talked to us just now about the shoddy blankets introduced into the country. The hon. gentleman has spent a great deal of time in visiting the various manufactories of this country, and had he made proper enquiries he would have found that in no one thing has the result of his policy been more marked than in the extent to which shoddy has been introduced into the woollen manufactures of this country in a great many cases. He told us that $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents was the amount added to the cost of the cotton dresses worn by the people of this country. If the hon. gentleman had told the exact fact he would have said that under his present policy every farmer's wife pays one-third more than she needed to pay for all those articles she uses for herself and children. The hon. gentleman has inflicted on the people of this country, and more particularly on the poorer classes, a tax ranging from 30 to 40, and even 50 per cent. on all the articles of raiment which they chiefly use. He says we pay no more than we used to on woollen goods. Let me take his own Trade Returns, and see from them the figures at which those goods could be laid down in every merchant's shop. Let me add the amount which on the inferior class of goods are charged by his Tariff—an amount making from 40 to 49 or 59, or even 69 per cent. Why, Sir, at this moment I could go into any shop in London and could obtain goods probably for two-thirds, and in many cases one-half the sum I am compelled to pay in Montreal, Toronto or any other city, and if that is true, as I know it to be true, in my own experience, it is ten or twenty times as true—if it is true of the high-priced goods, it is ten or twenty times as true of the low-priced goods, which pay a vast deal more. He talks about $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. being paid on our total imports. How is that made up? By paying a certain amount out on those goods which we did not manufacture in this country, and 30 or 40 per cent. on those goods imported in competition with our own manufacturers. Cannot the hon. gentleman understand the plain fact that it does not matter to the people a straw whether they pay their taxes into the Treasury, or to the manufacturers of this country. The amount comes alike out of their pockets; and if, Sir, as the hon. gentleman knows, when we purchase goods from the manufacturer here, that manufacturer avails himself of this Tariff to raise the price to us to within 1 or 2 per cent. of the sum which we would have to pay after paying the duty, that is just as great a tax on us, and on the consuming people as if it was directly taken out of our pockets by the Custom house officers. Now, the hon. gentleman cannot deny the figures submitted by my hon. friend, as to the enormous profits made by these people. I have always admitted it was a matter which was perfectly plain and easy to be seen when these gentlemen came to me and demanded increased protection, that those who were on the ground, those who had the control of capital were likely to make enormous profits and how? Not fairly, not justly, not reasonably, but out of the power of taxing the rest of the community for their particular benefit; but I and my hon. friend and the party with which we were connected refused to allow ourselves to be made a catspaw or the instrument of a small class to the detriment of the whole. We desire by all reasonable and fair means to aid the manufacturers of this country. I have made enquiry, and more particularly with reference to the cotton manufacturers. I knew the facts stated by my hon. friend; I knew that where due skill and diligence were exercised and a proper amount of capital employed, the cotton manufacturers of Canada, before 1879, were making large and liberal profits—as high as 20 and 25 per cent.—and I was not disposed to add, as the hon. Minister has truly stated, one and a-half millions to their individual profits—in the case of two mills alone—at the expense of the rest of the community.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not state that.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman took my hon. friend's figures and he was not able to gain-say them.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I said it was impossible that they could be correct, unless there was some speculation.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It is possible. You give the proprietors of two mills the right to tax four millions of people; and it is just as easy for them to turn stocks of $400,000 or $500,000 into stocks of $1,500,000, as it is for the proprietors of half a dozen sugar refineries to tax the people one million and a quarter per annum, as they have done for the last three or four years, through the instrumentality of the hon. gentleman's Tariff; and if the hon. gentleman has no better proof to give of the success of his policy than these sugar refineries, he stands self-condemned as false to his trust, as having abused his power, and the power the majority at his back gives him, to tax the many for the benefit of a very few. Now, Sir, I grant freely that there is no use of discussing this question on the basis of Free Trade; we are not in a position to adopt Free Trade here; we have to impose a heavy Tariff, as I have always pointed out, to obtain the revenue we require; but the difference between us and the hon. gentleman is, that we desire to have a tariff just to the poor as well as the rich; and it is plain to a demonstration that the Tariff the hon. gentleman has imposed is one of the most unjust that could possibly be devised as between these two classes of the community. When you have specific taxes as heavy as the hon. gentleman has imposed upon articles which form a very large part of the clothing of all classes, and which range in value from 3 or 4 cents to 17 or 18 cents, these specific duties must necessarily inflict a gross injustice; and I was astonished at hearing the hon. gentleman denounce us because we refused to repeal a specific duty on tea, a specific duty much less than the hon. gentleman himself had imposed when he was formerly Minister of Customs. Hon. gentlemen who heard his speeches may remember that on no one point was that hon. gentleman louder than the inherent injustice of the specific duty on tea. It was idle for me to show that that duty worked a loss of about one-half a cent per head to the people of this Dominion, and was compensated for in other ways. Why, the hon. gentleman does not hesitate to inflict a loss of 6 or 7 cents on every individual yard of cloth which goes into the dresses of the children or the wives of the poorest men in this country, and at the same time talks of his disinclination to inflict an injustice on these people. Take the hon. gentleman's own remission of the tea duties. In the case of many poor families, we know that they cannot afford to use more than ten or twelve pounds of tea, and the hon. gentleman's total remission in these cases would not amount to more than 60 or 70 cents per family. I tell him that one single dress for a child costs at least 60 or 70 cents more than it need cost, under the operation of this specific duty.

Mr. BOWELL. That would be ten yards of stuff for a child.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No, it would not. The hon. gentleman has an enormous specific duty and an enormous ad valorem duty besides. I am speaking of the duties on the articles which the workmen of this Dominion consume, and I say that on an enormous number of articles of heavy stuff you have put 17 or 20, and in some cases 25 cents a yard. Now, Sir, what is the result of this, even to the manufacturers themselves? Why, Sir, there are other manufacturers in Canada besides those who are manufacturing cotton or woollen goods, and by this unjust and oppressive system of taxation you injure all these other manufacturers very considerably. You add considerably to the cost of living of their employes, so that they must either raise their wages, or their standard of comfort must be seriously deteriorated; you interfere with their power to sell their goods to the community, and you interfere materially with their chance of carrying on an export trade. We notice by the returns that the export trade of corn is falling off, that our shipping trade is declining, and no wonder, when we have paralyzed the introduction of any foreign goods into this country, at the same time we add to the cost of production in this country. Now, apart from the article of food, the vast expenditure of every workingman in this country is necessarily for the clothing of himself and his family. I have always felt that our late Tariff was put up as high as it ought to be, having regard to the comfort of the great mass of the community. In some important respects I thought it was too high, and, apart from the requirements of the revenue, I regretted to have to impose it, because I hold the simple straightforward doctrine that it is a great injury to the community to increase the taxes on any account whatever. Now, Sir, the other day, when the hon. Minister of Agriculture was giving us an estimate of the cost of each child in this country, I think he put it as high as $50 per annum.

Mr. POPE. No, I never did.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman did so. No doubt he has forgotten it, but he entered into a calculation of what it would cost to rear a child in this country. But it is not a matter of much consequence whether the hon. gentleman was right or wrong in that contention. My point is that the large proportion of the expenditure of the people goes either for food or clothing, and the hon. gentleman has added enormously to the cost of clothing by these excessive taxes on cottons and woollens. As it involves some 40 or 50 per cent., taking the average of both cottons and woollens, on all the articles that go into the clothing of the poorer classes, it is easy to see how enormous a tax the hon. gentleman has inflicted on each family, and he cannot inflict that tax without at the same time largely diminishing the whole standard of the people of Canada, and injuring to a large extent the self-respect, both of parents and children. There is no one thing more desirable for us to do than to provide that the children of the people of all classes shall be well and properly clothed. That is a matter of the greatest importance in a moral and social point of view as well as in a political point of view, and the hon. member, by this Tariff, renders it to a great extent impossible for a great number of people to clothe their children as they wish and ought to clothe them. That is the effect of the hon. gentleman's policy, an effect which is ever produced to a large extent in other countries where a similar unwise system of taxation has prevailed. The hon. gentleman had a great opportunity in his lands. By no skill of his, by no exercise of ability, but by fortunate chance or by fortunate decrees of Providence which gave us good harvests at a time when other nations in the world were afflicted by something like a famine, we obtained a very great advantage and the revenue very largely increased. We had at the same time thrown open a large extent of country in the North-West, which it is of great importance we should settle. What the hon. Minister has done is this: He has to the uttermost of his power thrown away that advantage. He has done all that in him lay to make it possible by this monstrous Tariff, which cannot ever be called a protective Tariff, but which is an unjust Tariff, especially to the poor, to deprive us, to a very great extent, of the advantage which we might otherwise have fairly expected, and which our agents might have held out to the people of the Old World.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman opposite does not appear to understand, and I am sure his followers do not, judging from what I have seen and known. I dare say they suppose the people of the Old World are as benighted and ignorant of the first principles of common sense as, I regret to say, are a great many people of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite had an opportunity to give a great impulse to immigration, and to be able to show that here they could obtain supplies of necessary goods more reasonably than in the United States, and place them as far as they could, on a par with the people of the United States, as regards the cost of living. What they have done is to throw away that advantage, to increase the cost of living and to add to the difficulties of settlers in the North-West. Apart from the tax on coal, the hon. gentleman has secured no addition to the revenue, because it is perfectly clear to a demonstration that the Tariff which we had in force, if applied to the scale of importation, would naturally have given as much. The increased exports we were able to send across the ocean, would have given us to-day quite as large a revenue as the hon. gentleman now boasts of. The present time of prosperity may receive a check, as has occurred several times previously, and what will then be our position? It will be simply this: we shall have thrown away our advantage. The savings which our people are able to make are being absorbed, not for the benefit of that people but for the benefit of a select few. We will find when the day comes, which the hon. Minister partly expects, that our imports are checked, and the temporary inflation has passed away, that the taxes will remain and the cost of living will remain, while the position of the people under this Tariff will be infinitely worse than ever before, even in the worst days of the depression.

Mr. PLUMB. We have heard very much the same line of argument addressed to the House by the hon. gentleman before, and we are quite accustomed to being told that we know nothing of the first principles of political economy, that we are utterly ignorant and are slavish followers of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. Well, I think there was a time when the blind, ignorant, servile followers of that hon. gentleman followed him over the precipice of 1878, and I think we will have wisdom enough to avoid the downfall to which that hon. gentleman led his followers by the insatiate policy which he and his associates pursued while in office. The hon. gentleman says the Finance Minister has been false to his trust, and has abused his power. That is the sort of language the hon. gentleman uses, who was rejected by his constituents and forced into another constituency, and who stands to-day in the estimation of the people of Canada as being entitled to the adjectives given him by the Globe in 1872 before he left the Conservative party and went over to the other side, when it declared he was a "mixer and muddler of figures." No man with his opportunities has mixed and muddled figures more than the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and who always poses as an authority on financial matters. The hon. gentleman says we have imposed a heavy tax on the poor man so as to prevent him from enjoying the comforts of life, and he asserted that the Tariff imposed a tax on a baby's dress of no less than 70 cents. It is well known that in no case could the tax exceed 1 cent or 1½ cents per yard, the baby's dress must therefore have had a skirt forty-six yards in length. The hon. gentleman's idea of baby clothes are quite equal to those of the leader of the Opposition, who stated in one of those arguments which he labors over, and gives to the House from a brief, that it requires seven yards of material to make a man's shirt. The garment must have, in such a case, been very large or the man very tall. The hon. member for Centre Huron further declared that the present Tariff actually prevented the poor man from clothing his children properly. I can remember well when the passages of this building were besieged by the starving men during the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the late hon. First Minister was compelled to escape through the basement of this building in order to evade the masses who were pressing him for work. What difference did it make to them whether goods were cheap or not at that time? What a mockery to say there were no prices at that time when there was no labor for the workingman, while now every man is employed and is receiving full wages, when it is impossible in Toronto to find a laboring man not employed. I know that labor in Toronto is both scarce and dear at present. Parties who wanted laborers the other day had to send to the Emigration Office, not being able to get them in the city. They could not find a single man idle; and if the workingman now pays a cent or a cent and a half a yard more for the cotton in his baby's dress than formerly, he is perfectly happy to bring it home to his wife, because he buys her better food and provisions than under the régime of hon. gentlemen opposite, no matter how cheap cottons then were. But these hon. gentlemen are such friends of the poor man, that under their régime they kept him poor—the poor were always with them; and if they attained power again they would reduce him to the poverty he was plunged in while they held the reins of power during those five disastrous years. The hon. gentleman says that it was by no skill of my hon. friend the Finance Minister, but by the fortunate decree of Providence that we had a good harvest, but that we have failed to take advantage of our opportunities to open up the North-West. But after five years of struggle the hon. gentleman opposite completely failed to open up the North-West. They had a policy for settling up the North-West, by which the lands for 40 miles on each side of the railway were reserved so that no man could buy an acre, no settler could go there unless he paid $1.25 an acre, and agree to pay such further sums as the Government might please to exact. We all know what kind of a pressure would be put on the settlers if in the hands of such an unscrupulous Government like that of hon. gentlemen opposite, if there were dues to collect during an election. Not only would they have to pay heavy prices for their lands, but they would have the screws put on them most heartlessly. I am glad that settlers never entered into that transaction. Does the hon. gentleman know that from January till the 10th April, 1832, 21,000 emigrants have gone to the North-West, and since the 10th April 10,000 more, a larger number than during the whole five years during which these hon. gentlemen attempted to carry out their singular policy in regard to the Pacific Railway, which culminated in their bringing in a Bill during their last year of office which promised any fifteen persons, no matter whom, that associated together a title and certificate from the Minister of the Interior, to become a railway corporation, to pay them 10 per cent. or $6,000 a mile, and to give them 6,250 acres a mile bonus. There were no restrictions either as to the kind of rails they should lay, the kind of grade they should make, or as to the time in which they should build the road or the price for hauling the traffic. The member for North Norfolk, when advocating the passage of that Bill, said the scheme would only absorb half the lands of the North-West, thus favoring the granting of 125,000,000 acres to irresponsible parties who should girdle the whole country with railroads and tap the Canadian Pacific, and utterly destroy the chances of its bringing one ounce of traffic in Ontario or Quebec. And yet the hon. gentleman who has just sat down says that this Government has failed to take advantage of the opportunities in opening up the North-West. The scheme of hon. gentlemen opposite was to destroy the Pacific Railway, and give a bonus to every bogus railway company—to give the whole of that property to irresponsible parties, who could have built railroads without check or restriction. Yet we were told by the hon. the Minister of the Interior in the late Administration that it was only in this way the North-West could be opened up; and the hon. member for North Norfolk stated that it was useless to attempt to get capital into the North-West, unless you gave it every privilege; that the whole of the western States were settled by such a policy, and that it was silly for us to haggle upon a few hundred acres to the mile. I repeat there was no restriction in regard to the railways to be built in that region. These hon. gentlemen were not so critical then as when criticising the present contract for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Such was the feeling in regard to the scheme of the late Government, such was the disagreement among its supporters themselves, that the Premier dared not bring his Bill to a vote, and had to withdraw it ignominiously; and that was the result of five years' cogitation on the part of hon. gentlemen who now find fault with my hon. friend for his supposed neglect of his opportunity to open up the North-West. Hon. gentlemen ought never to open their mouths with respect to the railway policy of the Government, after the exhibition of that scheme exposed in the House, during a late debate. They should never presume to go before the people and talk about monopolies in the North-West when they intended to hand over one-half of the lands to parties over whom the late Government would have had no control—whom they would have permitted to build roads without fixing anything as to the freights, alignment, grades or curves. They took power to alter their whole homestead and land laws in order to satiate the sharks who were invited to come in and build those railroads. But I rise simply to show briefly the evidence of one of the most intelligent gentlemen of this country, an experienced merchant and manufacturer, a man well known for business ability and an authority on all subjects on which he speaks; a few extracts from the practical, plain, common-sense evidence of that gentleman, to dispose of the special pleading of the hon. gentleman who has treated us for the last two hours and a-half to the most tedious tirade which was ever made or read in this

Mr. PLUMB.

House, contrary to the rules of the House, and which he has imposed on the House to try our patience in a way in which I believe the House by-and-bye will learn to resent. He rose, and with a hundred or two hundred pages of manuscript he read page after page on subjects on which I am quite sure he could not have been examined ten minutes after he laid down the papers. We have had evidence striking enough, that he dare not show the name of the gentlemen who gave him what he considers proof of his views. He dared not produce the names of those who had furnished him with that information, and he expects that the country will be deluded by that kind of wire-woven argument which he brings here. He imagines that that sort of thing is going to fill the popular heart. Why, no man, unless he were an expert in the trade, could possibly follow him for five minutes, and I undertake to say there is not a man who sits behind him that understood one word of the argument he was endeavoring to make. I noticed that the hon. gentleman for Bothwell, his greatest admirer and most devoted follower, calmly resigned himself to slumber during the speech of his leader, and was probably dreaming about anything except the theories that the hon. gentleman discussed. I am going to read the evidence of a man who is not ashamed to put his name to what he says, and who knows what he is talking about, and I call the attention of the House to his statements:

"Woolen goods of Canadian manufacture are cheaper now than they were prior to 1878, but of course you will understand that the price of raw material must more or less affect the price of manufactured articles. The prices of wool were as follows from 1876 to 1878:—Rio averaged 17½ cents a pound, and since 20 cents a pound. Cape wool, 17½ and 20½ cents respectively, and Canadian fleece 26 and 25½ cents. I may say that Canadian fleece wool is not used now very largely by Canadian manufacturers, except in making blankets. It is too long. It is true it is utilized in the manufacture of the coarser classes of carpets, but our carpet industry is not yet extensive, although it is growing, and I am satisfied that it will continue prospering more and more under the present Tariff. Pulled wool averaged 26½ cents a pound prior to 1878, and 29½ cents since, and Monte Video 17½ and 19½ cents respectively, and generally speaking woolen goods, which were 72 cents a yard prior to 1878, have been since 71 cents a yard. I am connected with cotton and woollen mills in Cornwall and with the Londonderry iron works in Nova Scotia, where alone pig iron is produced in Canada. The effect of the Tariff has been to advance the price of Canadian pulled wool, which is being grown in steadily increasing quantities, as it is more suitable for Canadian coarse tweeds than fleece wool. Southdown and Oxford wools are largely used in the manufacturing of medium tweeds and flannels. The duty on woollen goods affects the price of wool by enlarging the home market and increasing the demand for wools in the country, by which farmers can be materially benefitted. At the Cornwall mill we make both blankets and tweeds, coarser medium tweeds, and white and grey blankets. We have now succeeded in turning out very beautiful blankets, which, in my opinion, are superior to the imported article. For these purposes I think Canadian wool is mostly employed. The blankets are now as low in price as they were at any time previous to the Tariff. We made them at Cornwall from 1859 to 1874, when we ceased owing to foreign competition, which prevented the enterprise yielding any return, but the prices during the last three years have been lower than they formerly were by fully 20 per cent. We are supplying a market which was previously occupied by imported articles, but now the importation does not compare in the proportion of one to ten to what it was previous to the introduction of the National Policy. That an increase in the market enables manufacturing to be carried on more cheaply is a great principle in the business. Anyone so engaged will understand that the great thing is to get a continued run upon one class of goods. The manufacturer is not like a merchant. The profit of the former is measured by the production of his machinery, and the larger the production the cheaper he can manufacture. This explains why we are now selling our blankets cheaper, and this applies to every class of goods. The wages we pay have increased in some instances as much as 30 per cent., and in all branches of manufacture they have been advanced. There is a most useful class of flannels which are used very largely by the people of this country, grey flannels. These were first made at Chambly, but the prices remain as low as ever they were, excepting one year, when the Chambly mill endeavored to drive competitors out of the market by cutting prices, but failed. Canadian etoffes are supplied at from 42½ to 45 cents per yard, weighing 14 or 15 ounces, and this proves that these goods have not been advanced in price by the Tariff. I will use a statement contained in a letter from the agents for such goods in Montreal. Seeing that there is no advance in prices, it may well be asked, where is the benefit of the Tariff to manufacturers? Our answer to this is simply that the mills are all kept fully employed, and are turning out more goods, and the Tariff is so evenly balanced that if the prices were increased the manufacturers, in our opinion, would lose sales by importers turning their attention to foreign goods. You see the National Policy has enlarged our market; it has displaced foreign goods and we are supplying the consumers. That is the whole thing. No manufacturer can live, it does not matter what price you give him, unless he can sell his goods as fast as he can make them."

I rose more particularly to read this important extract, one ounce of which I think is worth a ton of such arguments as were given us by the hon. gentleman who detained us two or three hours reading from his brief. These hon. gentlemen are addressing themselves now in the interest of the importing merchants, and if the hon. gentleman ventured to give the names of his informants it would be found they are importing merchants, men who are in direct hostility to the manufacturing industries of the country. Sir, this is the hon. gentleman who addressed the House on a previous occasion at two or three o'clock in the morning, when his followers were wearied out, when he spoke an hour and a half on the manufacture of window glass, in which he said that we could not compete with Belgium, although we had cheaper taxes and cheaper material. I merely wanted to say that we have been told that Belgium would undersell us in our window-glass, no matter how much protection we put upon it, and I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that Belgium is a higher protected country than any other country in Europe, and has a higher protective tariff in many respects than even the United States. Under this tariff she has so far prospered that she can undersell England in window-glass in her own market. She takes heavy iron works and undersells England in the very markets where iron and coal are produced together. The evidence I read just now was given by the Hon. D. McInnes, President of a Manufacturing Association in Cornwall, a practical man whose word, I think, will be accepted by this House quite as ready as the anonymous statements given by the hon. gentleman whose authors were ashamed to give their names.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

157. Expenses connected with the Geological Survey...$80,000

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The report of the Director of the Geological Survey shows how much has been expended, and the additional vote of $10,000 is simply to do so much more field work on the survey.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I suggest that much might be done if some borings were caused to be made at points in the North-West. Some attempt, I think, was made two years ago, but to the best of my recollection only a small sum was available, and some members of the Geological Survey told me they were completely stopped for want of funds. Of course I am quite aware that anything like close boring would be inconvenient, but it would be a matter of great importance that a few borings at a distance of 100 or 150 miles from each other were made along the Manitoba frontier for the purpose of ascertaining the junctions a little better than we know them now, and also of locating one of the coal fields that we know to exist in that region.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Selwyn went himself to the Souris district at my request and examined the coal measures there. There have been no borings westward nor north towards the Saskatchewan, but the surveys have shown that there was a large coal measure there easily available, and of good quality. When we were discussing a resolution about coal, I mentioned that some English gentleman, who has dealt considerably in coal, has procured a portion of the coal region and is now sending out employes and machinery in order to commence work this summer.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. If I recollect aright from the account I read the explorations of Mr. Selwyn only extended over 200 miles of country. My proposition had reference to a series of borings to be made up to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. What Mr. Selwyn has done is available so far as it goes.

Mr. CASBY. I should be very glad to know that $10,000 were intended to be expended on further explorations in the North-West. It is time we should protest against the course pursued during many years of expending the principal portion of the grant on mineral explorations in Nova Scotia. No doubt it is an interesting field, geologically and economically, but the lands belong either to the Provinces or to individuals. Increased attention should be given to the North-West, where the public lands belong to the Dominion. Borings have been carried on for some time. Mr. Selwyn conducted borings for coal at distances twenty miles apart, but did not make any fresh discoveries. It is absurd, however, to make borings at such distances apart, because if such were done even in the case of Spring Hill important deposits might not be touched. One boring made by Mr. Selwyn was on the banks of the Souris River where an outcrop of coal occurred. The next boring in the same neighborhood, but instead of it being commenced from the bed of the stream which is 150 feet below the prairie level, it was commenced on the top and it did not reach the depth at which coal was found at the first boring. The borings were not carried on to the depth contracted for. I hope the hon. Minister will see, not only that a large amount is voted to geological explorations in the North-West, but that the money will be efficiently spent, as Mr. Selwyn did not efficiently spend it during the last summer.

Mr. MILLS. Are any steps being taken towards completing the collection of the Natural History Department?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This amount is for field work only.

Mr. MILLS. With respect to the Geological Survey, it is of special consequence that a large expenditure should be made in the North-West for some years, in order that we may more thoroughly ascertain its natural resources. There are salt springs and petroleum beds as well as coal fields, and it is highly desirable that their location and value should be ascertained at a very early period. Salt was of very great consequence, and the salt springs were found capable of being worked.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This was a general vote for field work. Before Mr. Selwyn makes his arrangements the suggestions would be considered; and I agree that a large portion of the money should be expended in exploring the new territory.

Mr. ANGLIN. The value of the Geological Survey in the Lower Provinces is as great as anywhere else, for although the lands belong to private individuals their development contributes to the general prosperity of the Dominion. I have, however, no objection to the surveys being carried on more largely in the North-West, and they will probably prove of great value.

158. Indians, Ontario, Quebec and Maritime Provinces, $25,600

In reply to Mr. MILLS,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is an increase of $1,800 for the Indian schools in these Provinces. The usual annual grants for the Indians of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is $4,500, and it is found that that vote is fully absorbed in taking care of the Indians, and though the Indians of those Provinces are worse taken care of than those of the other Provinces, $900 has been annually taken out of the grant for each Province to support six schools. It is now proposed that a special vote shall be taken for these schools, and it is shown by the reports that five other schools are required, three in New Brunswick and two in Nova Scotia. These five schools make $1,500, which with the $1,800 for the others, make $3,300, the increase to the vote.

Mr. MILLS. I think it would be well to consider the advisability of putting these schools under the charge of the school authorities of the respective Provinces, the Government here paying the salaries of the teachers, as thereby more careful examinations and better work would be secured.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The matter has not been brought to my attention, but I will consider the suggestion.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The reduction of annuities under the Robinson Treaty is owing to there being an unexpended balance of cash on hand with interest.

162 {	For Indians of British Columbia generally....	23,300 00
	Surveys	7,600 00
	Reserve Commission.....	11,249 31

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In British Columbia Mr. Sproat has resigned, and Mr. O'Reilly, Government Mr. CASEY.

Inspector, is his successor. He is a very efficient man, and the salary is saved so long as he serves. He is now actively engaged in settling the matters of the Reserve Commission.

Mr. CASEY. A missionary from British Columbia, who came here to see the Department about Indian affairs in that Province, informed me that there was really a prospect of trouble with the Indians there unless something definite was done for them, as has been done for the Indians in other districts. It appears that to the present time nothing has been done in regard to their reserves or payments, and they seem to think they are ill-treated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have a Reserve Commission which has been laying out reserves for several years. The Indians take to these reserves very well, and I do not think the Indians are at all aggrieved unless they are told so by designing whites.

Mr. CASEY. I think a missionary living among the Indians should know their condition better than the hon. gentleman. If this Commission has been working for years at an expenditure of $11,000 a year, it is very strange that it has not been able to locate the Indians on their reserves.

Mr. MILLS. I must say I think the Commission is being protracted very long. I think it has been in existence for upwards of seven years, and during that time it ought to have succeeded in locating 30,000 Indians. I think it is highly undesirable to suggest to the Indians that they are entitled to be pensioned out of the Public Treasury; but there is no doubt that they were dissatisfied and that the Government of British Columbia were not disposed to deal very generously with the Indian population. One of the difficulties of the Commission in its early days was to find reserves marked out, because in many instances territories that the Indians claimed had already been granted as pre-emptions to white settlers. I think the Government ought to be able to bring this Commission to a close very soon.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is true there has been some difficulty, from the disinclination of the Government of British Columbia, to enter early into the question of settling the reserves. But I do not think there is now any obstruction in the way, and I am quite sure that Mr. O'Reilly's report will be accepted by the British Columbia Government, and I believe Mr. O'Reilly to be an active, energetic officer, full of zeal for the service, even to the neglect of his own interests, and from what I have seen and known of him I am satisfied that he will not remain in the office any longer than there is need for him to do so.

163. Indians in Manitoba and the North-West..... * 830,499.39

Mr. MILLS. I called the attention of the hon. Minister last year to the largeness of the sum for annuities, and to the fact that when you collected the payments made of the annuities due for different years, it was pretty clear, from the Public Accounts, that we had not an accurate return of the number of Indians of the various bands, and that through Indian dishonesty a considerable number were paid twice or even a third time. The sums paid last year and this year are very much larger than four or five years ago. In 1879 the amount was $164,000, or nearly $40,000 less than at present. Of course there were some bands of Indians in treaty No. 6 who had not accepted the provisions of the treaty a few years ago, and were not paid, and this will make some difference. Still I think there are frauds practiced on the Government in the receipt of those annuities in the North-West. Another thing I will mention, before 1876 the Public Estimates were made up just as these are, when the hon. gentleman, now Minister of the Interior, strongly insisted upon receiving a detailed statement as to the number of the Indians in the different treaties who were to receive annuities, and the amount paid. Thus, in the Estimates for 1879 it was stated the Indians in treaties Nos. 1 and 2 were to receive $27,000; No. 3, $15,640, &c. Now, the hon. gentleman, instead of adhering to that rule, has asked for a lump sum, and the same with regard to the purchase of agricultural implements, provisions, payments, &c. It is very much more difficult to follow the expense when only a lump sum is brought down than if a detailed statement were submitted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no doubt that there have been some frauds and some Indians paid twice. They are very clever fellows, and some of the agents cannot know one Indian from another, they look so much alike; but of course these frauds will become more difficult by degrees. True, these annuities were not so large in 1876; but the hon. gentleman gave the reason in stating that the Indians are coming in very largely and claiming their annuities, and now the American Government are driving British Indians who were in the United States into our North-West and insisting that they shall not be allowed to come back.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. There were about 8,000 families receiving annuities; families of about five persons each to judge by the amount paid.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot say; I do not know much about the prolific qualities of the Indians.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It is clear from the vote that there is an average of about five Indians to each family and that we are paying about $100 a family, which is an enormous sum per se.

163. Agricultural Implements.....$23,616

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. How is that enormous increase going to be distributed or arranged?

Mr. MACMILLAN. I would like to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that it would be desirable, in asking for tenders, that the articles should be inspected in Ontario before being sent to the North-West. The inspection would be an easy matter. Thus would be created a greater competition than at present; because competitors object very seriously to taking such articles to the North-West and then having them refused. In the notices calling for tenders we are really advertising the American manufactures, particularly when they ask for a plough that is equal to the John Deer Plough, Chicago. I am quite sure we can manufacture as good articles as the United States, and we should not advertise their manufactures. Besides, in advertising for reapers, attention is called to another United States firm, the McCormick Manufacturing Co. We are thus holding out inducements to people to believe that they manufacture better farm implements in the United States than in Canada. By inspection in Ontario, and proper competition, I am positive we could get those implements 10 to 20 per cent. cheaper than when inspected in the North-West. The work would not take over one week or twelve days at the outside, and would prevent the rejection of articles on their arrival in that region after the payment of freight on them.

Mr. TROW. The hon. gentleman is wrong as to the American plough, which has been made a specialty for a quarter of a century. It is better than ours; and the soil is so tenacious in the North-West that an ordinary plough does not clean. Scarcely a farm you pass in the North-West that you do not see one or two Canadian ploughs thrown aside. I think there is no harm in saying that Canadian ploughs are equal to that good American plough, because it is a particularly useful one; and if people here can make as good it is right to advertise it.

Mr. MACMILLAN. I am very much obliged to the hon. gentleman for his views on the subject, but I happen to have travelled as far in the North-West as he, and can speak with some little knowledge on the subject. In many instances, they prefer the Ontario manufacture to the John Deer plough. All along Portage la Prairie and Brandon they consider our ploughs quite as good as the John Deer. Because the latter have had heretofore a reputation, I do not think we should desire to continue it as against our own manufactures.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) ought to know that in the very town in which he resides ploughs are made not at all inferior to those made in the United States. In the little town of Millbank Mr. Covony, a large manufacturer there, is manufacturing a similar description of ploughs, and selling them at the lowest prices. I do not see why the Government should apply for a Deer plough or any other plough made outside of Canada, when we can furnish them here of the highest quality. †

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman is asking for $12,000 more for agricultural implements than last year. No doubt the Indians in all the various bands have been supplied with agricultural implements, &c., which the Government were obliged to give them under previous stipulations. I suppose the Government are now proceeding to give the Indians implements and cattle gratuitously.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In Mr. Dewdney's report the hon. gentleman will find the matter fully gone into. As the Indians are now settling on the reserves, the desire is to furnish them with implements which will remain the property of the Government.

163. Provisions for Annuity Payments..... $43,440 07

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is really not an increase over last year, when the expenditure was much greater than the vote. The hon. Minister of Finance and the Department of the Interior thought that was an excessive estimate, and it was cut down; but the result proved that the local authorities were right in their estimate. Then it was hoped that the Indians, as soon as they were settled upon their reserves, would relieve us from this expenditure. It is important to see whether any portion of this expenditure for provisions has been incurred in the payment being made to the Indians who are located upon the reservation.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. How many does the hon. gentleman suppose will be added to the Indians already in our territory from that cause?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. From 4,000 to 6,000.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Is he satisfied that these are Indians who properly belong to us, and who really had their domicile north of 49°?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no fear but that our own Indians will see that those who come across are really British Indians.

Mr. CASEY. I understood the hon. Minister to say that a great many Indians had been rather arbitrarily forced across the line into our territory, but I did not understand him to mean Indians who had gone south.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are British Indians who may have been living south of the line for some time.

163. Supplies for destitute Indians..... $294,525 20

Mr. MILLS. That is a large item.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The original estimate for the current year was $406,000, afterwards reduced to $102,000. That was the estimate of last year, which latter sum has proved to be quite inadequate to the requirements of the service. Up to the 31st December, 1881, the ascertained expenditure was $221,194, more than twice the amount of the reduced estimate of last year. Although half a year only has elapsed nearly as much more, it is estimated, will be required for the approximate half year.

Mr. MILLS. Then I must say it is pretty evident that the Indians have become pensioners upon the Public Treasury, that we are called upon to feed them, to clothe them, and that they are doing little or nothing for themselves. Now, I believe a barbarous population like the Indians may very easily be made wholly dependent upon the Government. I felt satisfied that that was the danger in dealing with the Indian population of the North-West, and I think that the extent to which they have been provided for during the past two or three years has produced such a condition of things that it will be very difficult to induce the Indians to devote themselves to industrial pursuits. I am of the opinion that the Government is largely responsible for this large sum. I have been told that in some instances the agents have told the Indians that if they did not hunt that they would be provided for at any rate, and the Indians have become discouraged. One party wrote me that a friend of his had been offered a very large sum if he would remain with an agent for the purpose of assisting him in feeding the Indians. He said the bands under him were not going out to hunt, and there would be a handsome thing in providing food for these Indians. Now, it is easy to see that unless there is some stringent check upon the appropriation that is being made for the Indians in this way, at a great distance from the seat of Government, and without any special supervision, there is great danger that the agents may be tempted to malappropriation of these funds.

Mr. HESSON. An agent can have nothing to do with furnishing supplies to these bands. We are driven into a large expenditure of this kind. We were told a year ago that this expenditure would go on increasing, by reason of the efforts made to induce the Indians to settle down under a system of farming. I desire to ascertain if the agents had control of the supplies under this item. If so, it is an unfortunate state of affairs; but I understand that the goods are furnished by contract.

Mr. CASEY. At whose discretion are supplies issued?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In case of apprehended famine the matter is to be dealt with on the spot; but the whole matter is dealt with by Mr. Dewdney, who has charge of the whole reserves. When the Indians are starving they have been helped, but they have been reduced to one-half and one-quarter rations; but when they fall into a state of destitution we cannot allow them to die for want of food. It is true that Indians so long as they are fed will not work. I have reason to believe that the agents as a whole, and I am sure it is the case with the Commissioner, are doing all they can, by refusing food until the Indians are on the verge of starvation, to reduce the expense. The buffalo has disappeared during the past few years. Some few came over this year, and although their arrival relieved the Indians, I was rather sorry, looking to the future, that such was the case, as the Blackfeet, Bloods, and Piegans who had settled on reserves at once returned to their nomadic habits and abandoned the settlements. It will occasionally happen that the agents will issue food too liberally, and the Government must depend on their agents—the agents advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite and who are doing the work well. I do not hear any complaints of dishonesty. One case occurred in which the agent would neither issue food or allow the Indians to take it, and the agent thought it was better he should issue it. We hope that the Indians will now settle down; but Indians are Indians, and we must submit to frequent disappointments in the way of civilizing them.

Mr. MILLS. No doubt the Indians will bear a great degree of starvation before they will work, and so long as they are certain the Government will come to their aid they will not do much for themselves. The maintenance of farms has reached $90,000, and although the experiment has been two years on trial there are no results therefrom, nothing adequate to warrant the expenditure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Indians eat the produce.

Mr. MILLS. Then that should be stated in order that we may arrive at a correct conclusion as to the cost of the Indians. No less than $170,000 are expended for managing 30,000 Indians in the North-West.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. More than that.

Mr. MILLS. Whatever the number may be it is not very large. No doubt if there was a white man on each reservation working with the Indians, showing them how to farm, and at the same time impressing upon them the fact that they must produce food for their sustenance, much greater results would have been accomplished.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The farm is there on the reserve or just contiguous to it. We try to get a practical farmer with an assistant to work with the Indians. The expectation of the Commissioner is that the Indians will sow about 4,000 acres in the spring of 1882.

Mr. TROW. There is considerable force in the remark of the hon. gentleman for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), in reference to indulging the Indians. It would be wrong, of course, to allow them to suffer, but they should be thrown on their own resources as far as possible. I have known bands of Indians to be lounging about when they might have been providing for themselves. Last fall we saw them in large numbers begging at points in Montana, when we counted in one day more than one hundred carcasses of buffalo on the prairie.

Mr. BANNERMAN. The hon. gentleman is speaking of the country south of the boundary line, and not of our own territory. There is nothing in which the Canadians compare more favorably with the people of the United States than in their treatment of the Indians.

161. North-West Mounted Police..... $413,000

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This amount is estimated for 500 men instead of 300. The average cost of a Mounted Policeman and a horse, prior to 1879, was $1,000 per annum. The cost during the current year will be $875, while the estimate for 1882-83 is $820. The average annual cost of an infantry soldier in the United States is $1,000, and of a cavalry soldier, from $1,600 to $2,000. The cost per man and horse of the Mounted Police is $875; the pay of the force, including the staff and gardeners, is $160,000; the vote for 1881-82, was $110,000. The present vote is for 500 men and 5 officers, an increase of 200 men; but no increase of officers.

Resolutions ordered to be reported; and (at 2:55 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 27th April, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions to be embodied in Bill (No. 36) respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution 1,

Mr. CASEY. Is the hon. member satisfied with the propriety of making a per diem allowance?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government will take care to limit the time as far as possible to save expense.

Mr. BLAKE. The possibility of travelling expenses ought not to be recognized in the case of persons named to assist the Board. Those persons should belong to the localities in which the examinations are held, and not require travelling expenses.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I move that the words "exclusive of travelling expenses" be struck out in the case of sub-examiners.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CASEY. I suppose these local assistants are merely to see that the examination is fairly conducted, that they have nothing to do with the sending of papers.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The papers will be sent to the local examiners and they will come back.

On resolution 2,

Mr. BLAKE. I think this is objectionable. It is quite possible that the salaries of the Deputy-Heads ought not to be all at the same figure, but I cannot perceive any reason whatever for the proposed discretion which is to be given to the Governor in Council to determine what shall be the salary of a Deputy-Head. The Government knows, by this time, what are the duties and the responsibilities of the office of Deputy-Head of each Department. We ought to have a statement made of what the salaries are to be. I object, also, that there is no necessity for this discretion to the Governor in Council, because the Government knows to-day as well as it ever will know what the salaries ought to be. I object that it is contrary to sound principle to permit the Governor in Council to have this discretion without reason. I object, further, that so far as I can judge, it is intended to give a latitude to the Governor in Council subsequently to increase the salaries, and the salary of a Deputy-Head ought to be a fixed sum. I would ask the hon. Minister if it is intended that this salary shall be the sole emolument of all the Deputy-Heads. At present we have a system under which, in various forms, additional emoluments are paid to certain of the officers.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman's objections are not well founded as to giving the Governor in Council power to fix these salaries. The hon. gentleman must see that by this Bill, the minimum and maximum salaries for these Deputy-Heads are fixed for this year. The Governor in Council will have no right to increase the salaries for this year, because we have no money voted to enable us to go beyond the maximum. But in the future, should the Governor in Council think that a salary is not sufficient, then they would have to ask Parliament for a vote of money to increase the salary; therefore the whole thing is in the hands of Parliament. The same rule will hold as to all other salaries. These provisions are not new, they are the provisions of the present law. Not a single dollar can be added to a salary without the previous sanction of Parliament. In answer to the hon. gentleman's question, I may say that no additional emolument of any kind will be given to these officers, whose maximum salaries shall not exceed $4,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What is to be done with those who are above $4,000 now?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is a provision in the Bill by which the position of the present officers shall not be disturbed.

On resolution 5,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would move that the word "biennial" should be replaced by the word "annual."

Mr. CASEY. I think that is a step in the right direction, and that, indeed, the hon. Minister might go a little further. I think the annual increase in pay should be more rapid in the ranks of the service, because it is while a man is in the lower ranks that he is really improving.

Amendment agreed to.

On resolution 6,

Mr. CASEY. I think it is during the first two or three years of clerical service that a clerk improves in the knowledge of his duties. After that time no increase of salary should take place, unless he changes to more difficult work. I would prefer that such clerks should obtain an annual increase of $100 for three or four years, and afterwards reduce it to a lower ratio, instead of the provision of $50 a year.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think it better to make the increase $50 a year, for this reason: Third-class clerks are generally young men whose wants are less than those who have a number of persons dependent upon them. The increase is given in order that such clerks may improve during several years, in order that they may show themselves worthy of promotion.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister, in pursuing this course, is practically giving up perhaps the most important recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. In the English service it has been the practice for a considerable time to give fair salaries to the higher grades of officers, and to have a purely clerical staff at low salaries, quite distinct from the ordinary Civil Service. The practical result of the hon. gentleman's policy will be to give such clerks about $1,000 a year, while the service will be filled with a large number of third or fourth rate men who are of no use except for purely clerical work. It would be much better to abolish the third class and have them placed on a similar footing with temporary clerks.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I desire to call the attention of the Committee to the prevailing salaries. The average salary in the Governor General's Secretary's Office is $2,000; Privy Council, $1,070; Department of Justice, $1,300 in one Branch, and in the Penitentiaries Branch, $1,362; Militia and Defence, $1,344; Secretary of State, $1,090; Department of the Interior, $1,200; North-West Mounted Police, $1,200; Department of Indian Affairs, $1,010; Auditor-General, $1,150; Department of Finance and Treasury Board, $1,300; Inland Revenue, $1,250; Customs, $1,200; Savings Banks and Post Offices, $951; Agriculture, $1,084; Marine and Fisheries, $1,240; Public Works, $1,400; Railways and Canals, $1,580. Many of those salaries are paid for purely clerical work, such as copying letters and documents. Take the Department of Militia and Defence, where there is no clerical work done, the average salary is $1,334, the lowest salaries being $600 to $800. It is evident the country is paying some officers more than they are worth, while probably some of the higher officers are not paid enough. The worst feature of the Bill is that it proposes to continue this system instead of adopting that which prevails in England. I discussed the matter with the Chairman of the British Committee once or twice, and I learnt from him the great saving which had taken place in England, and I regret the same has not been adopted here. I regret exceedingly that it has not been introduced here. It is perfectly clear that it can be introduced, and that it ought to be introduced, and that it would serve an excellent purpose and enable us to do full justice to those classes I have referred to as being absolutely necessary in every Department—those possessing the higher grade of duties and the higher average of intelligence to perform them.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think that by this measure we will obtain as good a class of officers as we would have had under the previous system; but I think the average will not increase so fast as under the existing system, because now we have four classes instead of three, while the time a man may remain in a class is five years, by this measure the time fixed for the third class would be twelve years. Of course, an officer may be promoted from one class to another if there is a vacancy, and he is fit for it, and he has passed his examination. The increase from $400 to $1,000 will be slow; as it is by steps of $50 a year, it will take twelve years to reach that maximum, so that if a young man enters the service at eighteen he will be thirty before he gets $1,000, and if he enters at twenty-two he will be thirty-four. I think $1,000 would not be an excessive salary for a man at that age, after spending that time in the public service.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman misapprehends our point. We say that it would be much better not to have any third class at all. If he likes he could admit a man into the second class, reducing the minimum salary and allowing them to work their way up. I am sure that that would add materially to the efficiency of the service within a few years. We do not want to bring into the service a class of men, respectable enough, but of very mediocre ability, who would regard $1,000 as a very handsome salary. We want to secure men for the highest class of whom something can be made, and we would better the service considerably if we adopted the scale of salaries that the hon. gentleman proposes, because it would not allow him to give fair salaries to those who deserved them.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think the hon. gentleman's argument is sound with reference to those classes of officers who attain the maximum efficiency in two or three years, and who cannot rise any higher except by fitting themselves for what you may call the more intellectual classes of the service. I think the Commission demonstrated the fact that a large proportion of the whole work is of a routine, clerical, mechanical character, and they suggest that every man who is simply a good writer, and nothing more, ought to have eight or ten years in which to reach a salary of $1,000. It is not our experience of that class of persons that they earn any more, and why should they in the Civil Service? I should be sorry to say that writers should not have the opportunity of promotion in common with others in their ranks; but I think it is a mistake to perpetuate an error by which, as the Commissioners all agree, there is a culmination in the higher classes of the highest salaries irrespective of the work performed by the great bulk of the service.

Mr. CASEY. I agree very strongly with the remarks of the hon. members who have just spoken. I think, if there is an increment at all it should be the most rapid in the lower grades. It is important too that there should be an opportunity afforded for the promotion of those who display a special aptitude for certain of the higher classes of work, as recommended by the Commissioners; a system which gives regular annual increases of salary to officers so long as they do not misconduct themselves is utterly ruinous to the system, and unfair to those who display special ability in the performance of their work. The Civil Service should be regarded as any other profession in which the highest salaries should go to those who display the highest merit. This may be done by employing a considerable number of non-promotable, temporary writers, such as are employed in England, and reserving the prizes of the service for those who display ability in the discharge of their duties. I notice from the returns that a number of clerks who were appointed several years ago, between 1873 and 1875, have not yet been promoted from the third class, and have not yet received any of the annual increase of $50. I would like to know whether they will be placed as receiving the salary they ought to have received, and whether the arrears of increases will be paid to them.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not able to answer that, but the policy of the Government is to preserve to the officers in the service the rights they have now. Besides, there will be some weeks before the law can be put into force, and during that time the Government may see what the rights of those officers are.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to observe, with reference to the marine mail clerk, that I do not see what there is in our situation to render it important that we should preserve a class of officers which is not preserved by any other country. Mails for Europe are leaving New York every day, and I believe none of them are accompanied by mail clerks. What reason can there be for our retaining permanently, for that fraction of the mails which goes by the Canadian lines, these marine clerks, when we know that the great bulk of the correspondence is carried by other lines without them?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman will allow the resolution to go, when we come to the third reading of the Bill, I shall be able to obtain from the Post Office Department the reason why this is done.

Mr. BLAKE. I have received, as I suppose every other hon. member has, a statement with reference to the railway mail clerks. May I ask whether the hon. gentleman has considered their position, or whether the original plan remains unaltered by the proposal now made.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I myself received a statement from some of these officers, who are very deserving, but the Post Office Department, which I consulted, are of opinion that third-class clerks should remain. The proposal of the railway mail clerks, so far as I recollect, was that there should be only two classes, so that the salaries would be higher at the beginning, and they might advance sooner than at present. The Post Office Department, however, is of opinion that the present salaries are sufficient, because there are certain additions given for extra work such as night work.

Resolutions agreed to and reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN, moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 35) respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 44,

Mr. CASEY. I think the power to grant leave of absence for twelve months, for any other reason except sickness, is not well founded.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am of a different opinion.

Mr. CASEY. What other reason can you give?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. An officer may have a very important case in England, France or Germany, and will require leave of absence. Of course, the Governor in Council will have to provide for a successor to be paid out of the salary of that officer.

On clause 45,

Mr. CASEY. In regard to this power of suspension, I am not in favor of putting too much power in the hands of the Deputy-Head, though the initiative should be taken by him, as he is more directly in contact with the clerks and knows best their conduct and deserts. I think this power should be primarily in the hands of the Deputy-Heads rather than with the responsible or political Heads who will know little about the clerks. This change would remove a great deal of trouble from the hon. Minister's shoulders, and relieve him of the suspicion of suspending any one through personal or political motives. The hon. Minister need not shake his head and sneer at that remark, because we are told distinctly by the Commissioners that clerks have been continued in office, unpunished for misconduct, purely for political reasons. Some clerks enjoying the friendship of the Government can act as they please, regardless of the Deputy-Heads. The power of discipline should be in the hands of the men most interested in its maintenance and in the good working of the various offices.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The principle proposed by the clause is not a false one. Surely the Head of a Department should have the right to suspend an officer himself, without begging the co-operation or assistance of the Deputy-Head.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. But the Deputy-Head cannot suspend except his principal be absent.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Certainly not. If the Head is absent the Deputy has to administer the Department, and if he finds an officer misbehaves himself he may suspend him and report to the Head his action and the reasons therefor. It will be for the Head then to consider the proper final action.

Mr. CASEY. Of course, in such extreme cases as personal insolence on the part of a clerk, suspension should be exercised by the Head of the Department; but in ordinary cases the power should rest with the Deputy-Head. I suppose while he is present in the office, if insulted, the Deputy-Head must come and ask the Head if he can suspend the officer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Why not?

Mr. CASEY. Because in many cases where the Deputy-Head has asked the suspension of a clerk, the political Head has refused on political grounds. The power of enforcing discipline should be in the hands of the Deputy-Head, whether the political Head is present or not.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the first time I have heard of the Head of a Department acting in that way.

Mr. CASEY. Instances were given in evidences before my Committee. With regard to the fines mentioned in the sub-section, one day's pay is a very trifling penalty.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; the burden of the punishment will consist in the shame cast upon the offender.

On clause 46,

Mr. BLAKE. There may be cases in which additional remuneration should be paid to a Deputy-Head, but it ought to be specially stated in the Estimates that a sum is voted for such remuneration, so that Parliament may know to what officer the money is given.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is the intention, and to make it more clear I would suggest adding the words: "for that special purpose" to the clause.

Mr. BLAKE. The third sub-section may be construed to mean that an officer who has obtained leave of absence to attend to his private business during three months or more, may continue drawing his full salary, while a junior officer, who performs his work, will receive additional salary. The clause should be altered to prevent any such construction.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is right. I would suggest that "through illness" should be substituted for "or by illness."

Amendment agreed to.

On clause 47,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved to insert the words "including the office of the Auditor-General" after the words "there shall be kept in each Department."

Amendment agreed to.

On clause 49,

Mr. COSTIGAN. It appears that, under this Act, second-class clerks will be entitled to only a biennial allowance, while first-class get an annual allowance of $50.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is changed now, and second-class clerks get an annual allowance.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I suppose it is the intention that the clerks in the Department may continue to receive the emoluments they now receive notwithstanding the passing of this Act.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I stated just now that the position of an officer is not changed, in so far as he receives emoluments.

On clause 51,

Mr. BLAKE. This, I observe, is a sort of amendment of the Superannuation Act, and perhaps the hon. Minister will explain the changes proposed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is an improvement on the Act. To-day, the Treasury Board makes an enquiry, but it is not bound to make it as fully as is here prescribed. For example, an officer in a Department becomes old or unfit for work by reason of paralysis or accident, and it is in the interest of the Department that he should be superannuated. The Head of the Department so reports to Council. The case is referred to the Treasury Board, and that Board reports that the officer has been so many years in the service, that he is in a certain position, and that his superannuation would amount to so much per annum. Then the first thing the Treasury Board would look into would be whether the person proposed to be superannuated was eligible and within the Act, and then whether his superannuation would result in benefit to the service and be in the public interest. There is a guarantee here. After the Minister has reported the Treasury Board may find that the Head of the Department was not cognizant of certain facts with which they were acquainted, and they were therefore in a position to say whether they would recommend his superannuation or not, because it might be found, by obtaining an additional medical certificate, it might appear that the officer would recover after a short period.

Mr. BLAKE. I know there have been great abuses in connection with the Superannuation Act, and anything that would tend to remove abuses would be desirable; but this proposal in its practical operation will not be very different from the existing law. Enquiry is made at present by the Treasury Board. There have been cases in which it has been difficult to understand upon what principle the superannuation has been directed. I wish to refer to another point in connection with this question. One of the greatest abuses that has resulted from the system of superannuation has been in the addition of years to the ten years' clause. The addition is not, as a rule, based on the services the officer has rendered. The law does not contemplate that. The law contemplates that the addition shall be made in the case of those who enter the service late by reason of special qualifications existing, which could not be acquired by those of younger years. Motives of compassion often decide these cases, as the hon. Minister will find, if he enquires, irrespective of special or particular qualifications. I would suggest that the Treasury Board should decide when such an officer is appointed, whether an additional number of years shall be added, and if so, how many; as I believe that would largely do away with the abuses which undoubtedly occur under the ten years' clause.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As the hon. gentleman will see that his remarks do not apply to the inside service, and with regard to other officers, I think it is a great deal better to leave the particular cases to be decided when they come, especially as the number of such cases is exceedingly small. I know I attend the meetings of Council tolerably regular, and I am not aware they have granted an additional number of years in more than two or three cases. Not only must the officer show that he comes with special qualifications, but he must show by his actual services that he is entitled to the additional number of years. I think the hon. gentleman will see that the carrying out of his suggestion would involve more danger from political pressure, and so on, than exists under the present system.

On clause 53,

Mr. CASEY. If this report is to be made at all similar to the report of the English Civil Service Commission, it should include copies of the examination papers, so that Parliament and the public might be able to judge what sort of test the candidates were subjected to. The examination papers of the University of Toronto, the Normal Schools, and of every examining body, are published, and there is no reason why these papers should not be brought down, but strong reason why they should.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. These papers, like all other papers in the Departments, will be always at the call of Parliament, on the motion of any hon. member.

Mr. CASEY. It is very important that they should be brought down as part of this report, because they are the most essential feature of it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I will meet the hon. gentleman's suggestion by adding the words at the end of the 24th line, "copy of the examination papers."

On clause 54,

Mr. CASEY. I would like to suggest an addition to subsection 2. I think we should know what dismissals have taken place during the year, as well as what appointments and promotions.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not think so. Why should you destroy the prospects of a man who may have misbehaved and been dismissed, by parading his name before Parliament and the country? I think we do well not to give the names of those dismissed, or the reasons for their dismissals, and, for my part, I will not consent to change that.

Mr. CASEY. I think it is absolutely necessary that the public should know why their servants are dismissed. The hon. gentleman takes refuge behind the cry of compassion for dismissed officers. I say it is just as often in justice to the man himself that we should have the reason of his dismissal.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In this case, if the hon. gentleman thinks it is an injustice to an officer, he will come with a motion to Parliament, on the subject. I remember some years ago a gentleman, not now in Parliament, put a motion on the paper, asking information for such a purpose. He was a friend of the officer, who was no friend of mine. I went to him next day, and said: "Here are the papers, if you wish them, but if made public they will destroy that man." He looked at the papers, thanked me, and withdrew his motion. If the hon. gentleman opposite will take the responsibility of asking for papers in any particular case, he may get them.

Mr. CASEY. Papers have been refused myself in certain cases, on the ground that they would injure the man, when it was my conviction that the production of the papers, instead of injuring, would have removed any unjust accusation under which he lay. The Government dismisses persons for improper reasons, and then takes advantage of this cry, that the production of the papers would injure the officials, when, in reality, they fear it would hurt themselves. It is absolutely necessary for Parliament, as men are liable to be improperly dismissed, to know all the facts of the case. There has been too much working in the dark in respect to the Civil Service, which has been regarded as the concern of the Government, and not the concern of the public. You cannot create a stronger incentive to a man to be honest, supposing he has dishonest intentions, than establishing a rule that his dismissal, and the reasons for it, shall be published throughout the country. For instance, a man who has swindled the Government ought to have his character exposed to the country.

Bill reported.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it the intention of the hon. gentleman to move the third reading to-morrow?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman prefers to wait until Monday, I should be satisfied.

Mr. BLAKE. I think I would. So far as I am concerned, there will be no debate on it of any length; but it is possible I may have an observation or two to make, and a motion to record on the principle of the Bill.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills (from the Senate) were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 151), to define the rights in certain cases to assault, wound or kill certain prisoners.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

Bill (No. 152), respecting bridges over navigable waters, constructed under the authority of Provincial Acts.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

GENERAL PORT WARDENS' ACT.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 120) to amend the General Port Wardens' Act, 1874.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman explain the measure.

Mr. McLELAN. As I explained, when the subject was before the House before in the form of a resolution, the object of this Bill is to provide that when a consignee cannot be found, the Port Warden shall take charge of the property until the owner or consignee can be discovered. Also, that the Port Warden may have the power to appoint a deputy in case of absence.

Bill read the second time; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. This Bill gives the Port Warden power, in the case when the consignee cannot be found, to initiate proceedings so as to avoid loss or damage to the parties interested in the vessel or cargo; but does not say how far he may go, whether he may carry those proceedings to their conclusion.

Mr. McLELAN. He is to perform all the acts that would have been performed by the consignee or owner.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I can scarcely conceive of a case where there will be no consignee. I asked the hon. Minister the other day if he knew of any such case. If such a case has occurred this provision of course might be made.

Mr. McLELAN. That same power is given to the Port Wardens of Quebec and Montreal, and this Bill will make it apply generally.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I suppose it is intended that the Port Warden shall be responsible for the action of his deputy. To make this clear, I think the words "shall be responsible for the conduct of his Deputy" should be inserted.

Mr. McLELAN. I think the Bill is clear as it is; but I have no objection to the amendment.

Amendment agreed to and Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MARINE TELEGRAPH.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 127) to make further provision regarding the incorporation of a company to establish a marine telegraph between the Pacific coast of Canada and Asia, and for repealing the provisions of any Act inconsistent therewith. He said: When I introduced this Bill the other day, I had the intention of asking the House to allow this Bill to go to a second reading, and to adopt, not only the first, but also the second clause, giving exclusive right for twenty years. The fact is, we incorporated this Company last Session to establish a cable across the Atlantic, and also one across the Pacific Ocean. That Company, up to very lately, seemed to have stirred very little about organizing and raising their capital. From time to time the rumor came that the Company was succeeding in obtaining their capital, and so on. I do not want to say anything in disparagement of the Company, because if they can raise the capital so much the better. As the Session proceeds, I intend asking the House to adopt this first clause, giving an extension of time to this Company of twelve months, and I will drop a few of the other clauses.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course that removes one of the great objections of this Bill. But the hon. Minister has not given us any information as to how it happens that the Company, which is under this peculiar favor, has not made any progress either. It has not even been incorporated, and the hon. Minister has had no opportunity yet of exercising that power which, under very exceptional circumstances, we gave to the Governor in Council to incorporate the Company, which was promoted by Mr. Fleming. Now, is it the case that that Company will not proceed unless its promoters obtain exclusive rights? Is it the case that they abstain from procuring their incorporation because they have not exclusive rights, and that they are waiting to see whether this other Company will succeed, and if it does succeed they will not go on, and if it does not succeed, they will come here next Session and ask for an exclusive right because the others have failed?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. BLAKE. That would rather seem to be the case from the hon. Minister's statement. It would seem as if the promoters of the Act are not themselves advancing until they obtain an obnoxious privilege, which the hon. Minister was about to propose to give them this Session. I think we are entitled to know, since a public Bill has been proposed in the interest of certain promoters, what progress they have made, what expectation they have of proceeding during the recess to do those things which have not yet been done. We are the more entitled to know it, because when this Bill was introduced we enquired whether there had been any correspondence at all, and the answer was there had been none, and in consequence there is nothing to show that the present extension of time will be availed of.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The reason why the incorporators have not proceeded are those I gave last Session when I proposed the Bill, namely, that there is no chance for two companies to succeed in that way. If one Company does not succeed in raising their capital the other Company will try and see if they can do better. The fact is, that when Mr. Fleming asked for his charter last year we had no idea this other Company would ask for rights in the Pacific Ocean. The rights that had been given in their Bill was only for the purpose of laying a cable across the Atlantic, therefore any other company could ask for privileges on the Pacific Ocean, and Mr. Fleming asked that he might be incorporated for that purpose. From the energy Mr. Fleming has displayed already, I have no doubt he will prosecute his undertaking. When the other Company was incorporated and promised us such great results, of course Mr. Fleming was justified in hesitating about raising another Company while the first Company was supposed to be able to raise the capital and go on at once. He told me himself that had the other Company failed, he did not think that would prevent him from going on. At that time he had obtained certain powers for the landing of a cable in Japan, and other attempts were made by him to obtain privileges elsewhere, but this other Company being in the field and being known as desirous to raise capital, Mr. Fleming did not think that he should attempt the same thing, and deceive those that were trusting in him by trying to raise capital that might not be used afterwards. Under these circumstances, he was not able to go on, and we ask Parliament to give him another twelve months so that during that time things may shape themselves better, and if the other Company does not raise their capital he will try his hand at it, which, however, does not mean that he will ask any more privileges. From the attention that has been called to these schemes, he might then be able to raise capital and work the Asiatic cable without asking any privilege of Parliament; but if he requires the privilege, of course Parliament may grant it or refuse it. At all events, I do not think we should refuse him the twelve months extension.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The hon. gentleman says that the fact of this Company being incorporated has had the effect of deterring Mr. Fleming from going on. May it not also be the case that the Act passed last year in favor of Mr. Fleming was the reason this Company did not go on?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Fleming was the first in the field, and when the other Company came to Parliament they changed their scheme, and asked not only for privileges on the Atlantic, but for the privilege of laying an Asiatic cable. What they asked for, in the first place, was an Atlantic cable and nothing else.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I do not so understand it. It was contemplated to extend the lines beyond the Atlantic when the petition was presented, and it was so stated by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier). Why did not Mr. Fleming make the application for a charter in the ordinary way? Why did the Government not take charge of the Bill and save him the fee of $200. It seems to me that, both last year and this year, Mr. Fleming should have stood in the same position as any private person applying for an Act of incorporation. No reason has been given why the Government should have taken such an interest in Mr. Fleming's project. I understand that this is a bona fide Company, and they are taking measures to have the work prosecuted. I am not opposed to the extension of time for twelve months, but Mr. Fleming should, like an ordinary individual, have proceeded in the usual way to obtain a charter of incorporation.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

196. Post Office..... $2,018,900

Mr. MACKENZIE. I desire some information in regard to the increase in Ontario.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is due to increased mileage and the extra trains. Some of the extra mileage is on the Port Dover and Lake Huron Railway. Then on the Great Western we have to provide for the probable increase of service on account of additional trains, and the same with regard to the Canada Southern, Northern and North Western, Credit Valley and the Grand Junction. There is an increase of $10,000 in the ordinary land conveyance, to provide for additional routes and the cost of additional services. Then there is an increase of $4,000 for mail bags, locks, principally owing to our having had to return the American bags, which were formerly in use. In Ontario, there is an increase of the salaries in clerks, and one additional clerk in Ontario, making in all $4,000, the increase being necessary on account of additional work, owing to the constant increase of correspondence. There will probably be an increase of the clerks and letter carriers in the city post offices. Then we have to provide for the increase of the postal business, which will probably demand more supervision, and there are other increases of a miscellaneous character.

Mr. MILLS. I sent a petition to the hon. Minister asking for the establishment of a post office near the boundary between Kent and Bothwell, on the line of stage from Thamesville to Dresden. I have received no communication with regard to it, and I would like to know whether any action has been taken.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have no recollection of the petition, but I dare say it is being dealt with by the deputy.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I observe that, under the head of Ontario—though I do not see why it should appear under that head—that there is apparently an increase of $4,000 for ocean mail clerks. I would like to know what the hon. gentleman proposes to do with respect to that branch of the service.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That charge has heretofore been made against the Province of Quebec, but now it will be divided between Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. BLAKE. The charge is one which would not appear to belong to either Ontario or Quebec alone, or to both of them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It has to go somewhere.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, but it belongs to the service generally. I would like to ask what is intended to be the permanent policy of the Government with reference to this branch of post office expenditure. I pointed out a while ago the fact that, so far as I know, ours is the only country which incurs these expenses for ocean mail clerks. The mails between England and the United States and between Europe and America generally, with the exception of those on the Canadian mail line, are not sorted at the expense of the country. Their sorting proceeds at either end of the journey, and we know that the necessary arrangements are made for very expeditious transport and sorting of the mails. At whatever period of the transportation this work is done, it is not, so far as I know, with reference to the vast bulk of the mail matter that passes from Europe to America, done on the journey, and I do not understand why it is proposed that we should be permanently saddled with this extra cost.

Mr. O'CONNOR. All I know is that this estimate has been taken for a long time, and that it is continued. I do not know of any change of policy on the subject. With regard to what is done on board the boats, I am told that the clerks are busily engaged during all the voyage in making up the mails.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, I believe a considerable amount of work is done by clerks; but I say that, so far as I know, it is work that is done ashore with reference to the great bulk of the European and American mail matter. If the hon. gentleman has not been informed as to the advantages derived from continuing this item of expenditure, which is not incurred by England or the United States, he will perhaps be able to give us some information on concurrence.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When this matter was under discussion in connection with the Civil Service Bill, I stated to the hon. gentleman that I would enquire of the Department, and be able to give him an answer at the next stage. I have had no time to confer with the Department since then, but he may rest assured that at the next stage of the Civil Service Bill, I shall be able to tell him why this system has been continued, and also whether he is correct with regard to other countries.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is an illustration of the advantages of occasional changes of Government. The hon. gentleman, who is so extremely anxious to save this expenditure and to obtain information on this point, was content for five years, without a murmur, to vote this same estimate to the Government which he supported, and I believe that this is the first time that this estimate has been attacked. Now, it appears to me that the fact that the mails are carried in a different way between Canada and Great Britain by the Canadian lines of steamers from what they are carried by the United States steamers may have a reason for it. The hon. gentleman knows that a subsidy is paid for the conveyance of the Canadian mails, while in the United States there is no subsidy. I shall be greatly surprised to find that the same method, which obviously facilitates the distribution of mail matter to such a great extent, is not followed in connection with the transmission of the mails from the United States to Great Britain. I know that the mail clerks are almost constantly engaged during the entire voyage in distributing the mail matter, and if that work were all required to be done after the arrival of the mails, it would entail a great deal of delay in the distribution, and defeat the increasing desire felt by the general public for the greatest possible dispatch in the transmission of mail matter. The reason for the adoption of the system, as practised in Canada under the late Government without a question, or a surmise that it was possible in the public interest to save anything in this regard, is, I think, based on such obvious advantages as to commend it to the judgment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in thinking this to be the first time that this item has been referred to. I brought this matter to the attention of the Government when I was a supporter of it, though not in the House, and expressed the views I now express. The observation of the hon. gentleman does not meet the case. There is a difference, it is true, between the mode in which we remunerate our ships for the carriage of the mails, and the mode in which the great bulk of the ships are remunerated. We pay a great deal more than what is involved in this particular item.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Railways, as usual, is quite mistaken. I recollect that this question was brought before the House, and that the then Postmaster-General stated that the service would be gradually discontinued. Now, I find that, in 1878, only $5,000 was asked for this service, but these two votes together are $6,500, showing that the policy then intimated, to the best of my recollection, by my hon. friend the late Postmaster-General, appears not to have been persevered in, but to have been reversed. As the hon. gentleman is anxious to remind us of what happened on our side while in office, I may remind him and the House of the extraordinary attacks that used to be made on my hon. friend by the hon. gentlemen opposite for the enormous expenditure on this service. Now, in 1878, we required $1,760,000 for it, but the present Postmaster-General $2,018,000, besides, probably, Supplementary Estimates, being an increase of nearly $260,000. This is a very clear proof of the remarkable alteration in the views of the hon. Minister of Railways since he entered office. There may be some reason for part of this increase, and there may be this reason also, that hon. Ministers are not careful in their expenditures and not anxious to check items like those.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no service that Parliament is called upon to provide for, perhaps, which it provides for so cheerfully as this service, and there is none that it is so anxious to see increase. What I criticised with some sharpness, perhaps, when sitting on the opposite side of the House, was the great difference between the expenditure and the revenue. The more we expend on the Post Office the better, provided we get the money back; and, notwithstanding the great increase in the postal accommodation of the country, it is given at less cost than formerly. The deficit at present is less than that of the late Government, and the hon. gentleman will find that there was not that same reason for the close examination of the accounts that existed formerly.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The deficit the last year was $555,000. I do not think in our last year of office it was any greater—probably it was not quite so great, although that does not affect the explanations of the Postmaster General on the subject.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The annual deficit was less from 1879 to 1881, than during the four years previous to 1878; and for the present year, judging from the receipts so far, I think there will be $100,000 in excess of the estimates, showing that the deficit is likely to be much less than last year and the year before. The increased business will, of course, necessarily increase the expenditure, as most of the postmasters are paid a percentage on the revenue, as much as 40 per cent.

Mr. RINFRET. Before this item is passed, I would like to ask the Government whether it has decided upon giving the parish of St. Flavien a daily mail. Some time ago, I made this enquiry of the Government, and the hon. Minister of Public Works replied, that the matter was under consideration. Has the Government come to any decision?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The intention was to give the matter a favorable consideration, should it be found practicable. I do not yet know what additional amount will be required. If the thing is possible, and if it is within the limits of the attributes of the Department to alter the line ordinarily followed by the mails, I feel convinced that it will be granted. I cannot give the hon. member an answer to-day, but I will make a note of the matter, and will probably be able to do so Monday or Tuesday next.

Mr. RINFRET. The parish of St. Flavien is situated close to the Grand Trunk Railway, and the mails might easily be transported daily by that road. It is a very important parish, and I think that it is the only one in the county that receives mails twice a week only.

Mr. DAWSON. Before the item passes I would draw the attention of the Government to a part of the country where the mail service is not very efficient, not from any fault of the Post Office Department, but probably from circumstances over which it has no control, and that is in the carriage of the winter mails between Parry Sound and the Island of Manitoulin, and along the north shore of Lake Huron. The mails are often very much delayed, and petitions were sent to Parliament and to the Government this winter complaining that they had been over a month without mails. Of course, it arises from the circumstances of the case. There is no winter road along the Georgian Bay, and the mails have now to be carried, as they were half a century ago, on men's backs and with dog-sleds. I think this Government should enter into communication with the Government of Ontario, to get a winter road along the Georgian Bay, from Parry Sound up to Killarney. It would not be a work of great expense, and it would greatly facilitate the carriage of the mails. We have now east of Sault Ste. Marie and in Algoma, a population of 12,000; and there is not another instance in the whole history of the colonies, of 12,000 people having their mails carried on dog sleds during winter. I hope that some better system will be devised for next winter. Of course, we know that when the railroads, including the Canadian Pacific, are completed up to Spanish River, all this difficulty will vanish; but something should be done in the meantime to remedy the evil.

Mr. ANGLIN. I have to notice and protest against the statement of the hon. Finance Minister, in comparing the expenditure previous to 1879 with the expenditures since that year. Under the late Administration a great many changes were made tending to reduce for a time the income even if the business had continued as large, if there had been no general business depression; but some of those changes were very important. There was the reduction in the charge on letters, and on the rate of postage between Canada and the United States, and other changes all calculated for the time to reduce the revenue, and all, after a time, to increase very much the business of the Post Office. These changes, including the reduction in postage, have led to an increase of the revenue. There was also, of course, an improvement in business generally, which led to a larger business being done through the Post Office. The position of the hon. Minister of Railways is untenable. He would have it that the accommodation given to the public must be limited, if the revenue from the Post Office itself is not nearly sufficient to cover expenditure. That is not the principle on which we proceeded, and it is not fair to say that at any particular period there was room for complaint, because the expenditure did bear the same proportion to income that it did at some other period. I presume there is nowhere too much accommodation given to any portion of the people. Once you create a post office it must necessarily be sustained, whether the times be good or bad, whether, owing to changes in business, there be an increase or decrease in the mail receipts. I think the late Government acted very properly on that principle, and very properly increased the accommodation to the public in various ways. To day, notwithstanding the increase in business, there has not been any increase in the post office accommodation in the North-West, yet the deficit last year was quite as large as the last year of the late Administration. The hon. Minister of Railways has no right to try and cover up the facts by a system of averages which does not apply in this particular case. The changes were made in the earlier years of the late Administration, and were only producing their beneficial effect in the latter year of that Administration and during the term of the present Administration.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Gloucester as to the benefit to be derived from increased accommodation. My attention was drawn to the large increase in the postal service; and in the Postmaster General's report for the past year, I found the following statement, which accounts for a large proportion of the increase referred to by the hon. member for Centre Huron. The country postmasters, who were left for quite a number of years during the late Administration without receiving any increase, have, during the present Administration, had their salaries readjusted in proportion to the work done. In 1877, the country postmasters of Ontario received $180,493; in 1881 they received $230,779. In 1877, the country postmasters of Quebec received $59,201; in 1881 they received $68,758. In 1877, the postmasters of Nova Scotia received $41,329; in 1881 they received $46,061. In 1877, the postmasters of New Brunswick received $25,614; in 1881 they received $29,863. In 1877, the postmasters of Manitoba received $1,339; in 1881, they received $5,255. In 1877, the postmasters of British Columbia received $4,205; in 1881 they received $5,046. In 1877, the postmasters of Prince Edward Island received $3,814; in 1881 they received $5,449. This is for the country postmasters alone; the difference in these two years amounts to about $75,000. No one will say they are not well entitled to the increase they have received, and which was based entirely on the amount of work done and the mail matter that went through each office.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What steps have been taken to remedy complaints as to insufficient postal accommodation at Winnipeg? I am aware that owing to the influx of population there, the present provision can hardly be expected to be sufficient, but the complaints which have reached me, both from private and public sources, are both numerous and loud.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The clerks in the offices there have been largely increased; seven or eight experienced clerks have been sent from Ontario and Quebec up there. Besides that letter boxes have been established in various parts of the city, and letter-carriers have also been increased in order to relieve the office.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. the Finance Minister be good enough to give the figures which he said bore out the statement that the difference, though large, was less now comparatively than in former years before 1878.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have made the statement in my Budget Speech, and am taking out the figures now.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The expenditure of 1874-75 was $1,695,000, and the deficit, $288,000, or about half last year's deficit.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If the hon. gentleman will take the four years following, and compare them with the two years, 1878-79 and 1880-81, he will find a different result. I recollect it was said that I did not, in my comparison for the post offices, extend the five years, as I did in other cases. That was quite true, because, in 1874-75, we had a higher rate of postage. We were then receiving a larger sum for performing the same work, therefore I took the four years when the rates for postage were the same as in 1879-80 and in 1880-81, for comparison. I cited the figures to show there was a reduction in the average of the four years.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The invariable result hitherto has been that reduction in rates have produced a larger revenue, in the course of a very few years. That has been the experience in England, and is corroborated, to a certain extent, by our own experience. This is what my hon. friend pointed out as entirely vitiating my hon. friend's comparisons.

Mr. MILLS. Has the hon. gentleman, in that calculation, included the expense in the first four years of changing way offices in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick into post offices. There was a very considerable expense incurred during those years in consequence of those changes, and the hon. gentleman's comparison is manifestly unfair if it has not included this expenditure.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I admit there was some additional expense incurred in changing the way offices into post offices, but the same rate of salaries existed in 1878 and has not changed. The only difference I know is that the printing was very large during four or five years when these way offices were converted, and it was smaller afterwards.

Mr. CURRIER. I would like to enquire of the Postmaster General what advantage the public or the Department have reaped from the new system of doubling the price of the post office boxes. I know it has been a serious inconvenience to many citizens. Has it increased the revenue?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I cannot say whether it has or not. There has been no return yet made on that subject. The change was made during the incumbency of my predecessor.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the fact that in the city of Quebec, since the post office boxes have been increased, the letters are now distributed very late. When we paid $1.50 for a box we received our letters early in the day, now we are paying $4 to $6, and we get our letters very late.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think an opportunity should be given to the Postmaster General to say whether the rumor is well or ill-founded, which states that the uniforms for the letter-carriers in several cities and towns of the Dominion have been imported ready made from Great Britain.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There has been a great deal said about that matter, but the rumor is altogether unfounded. The uniforms are made in this country, though others have contended that it would be better to import them.

Mr. ROSS (Dundas). I desire to bring to the notice of the hon. the Postmaster General one or two matters that should claim his attention. In some country post offices, the postmaster gets only a salary of $10 for attending to the mails twice a week. Now, is that the way to pay the servants of the Government. We pay city postmasters and their deputies large salaries, yet we ask country postmasters to attend to the post office, to enter into bonds, for a salary of $10 and upwards. Then there is another point. In large and thriving villages, such as I have in my county, the postmasters have to devote their whole time to the office, and employ assistants, for only $600 a year. They have to furnish the office, employ competent assistants, and to distribute to some fifteen or twenty corresponding offices, and for all these duties they only receive from $600 to $900 a year. It seems to me there should be some readjustment in the allowances to country postmasters. The postal service is becoming every day more important in this country, and people are every day appreciating and demanding better postal facilities; yet, in many neighborhoods, people have got to put their hands into their pockets and pay a certain sum yearly to keep the postmaster in office.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There must be very few offices where the postmasters receive no more than $10 a year, and that is in places where there is but very little to do. Moreover, these offices are generally kept by persons who are carrying on some other business, and they are glad enough to get charge of the post office in order to attract people to their place of business. As to the large villages and towns, I think my hon. friend exaggerates a little the state of affairs there. The postmasters in all the towns are paid a percentage upon their collections. Besides the 40 per cent. which they receive on collections, they are allowed compensation for forwarding offices, lights and things of that kind. As a general rule, I think, they are pretty fairly dealt with.

Mr. McCUAIG. I am free to admit that the salaries paid to postmasters throughout the country are small, but we are applying for an increase to the number of post offices. Whenever we add to the number we increase by a large amount the expenditure which is already very large. If this House is prepared to vote double the present sum the Postmaster General will be quite willing to increase the salaries of the postmasters, but unless it is prepared to vote a large sum in addition to that already granted, the salaries cannot be increased. I consider it my duty to bear my testimony to the very faithful manner in which the Post Office Department is conducted. We have few instances of irregularities taking place in that Department. A visit to the Department will reveal the fact that persons are constantly asking for increasing postal accommodation. It is wonderful to me that the Department, having so much to do with the inhabitants of the country, should be as successful as it is and be so free from blame. In my county they occasionally complain of the small accommodation they receive, nevertheless if a vacancy occurs there is no trouble in securing the services of good men.

Mr. SCOTT. At the last Session some hundreds of dollars were expended for lock-boxes in the Winnipeg post office. Although a year has elapsed they have not been placed in the post office. With the large immigration that is taking place into that country, and the number of people desiring to receive and send letters, the city lacks necessary post office accommodation. An attempt has been made to increase the postal facilities, but it is absolutely necessary that Government should provide a sum for the construction of a post office commensurate with the increased demands for postal facilities in the North-West. The Government have lately assisted a little in increasing the facilities by appointing letter-carriers, but without a building of sufficient size the officers cannot discharge their duties. I read a letter to-day stating that people were paying from $1 to $1.50 for the privilege of getting in ahead with their postal matter. That is not a fair way to treat the North-West, and I trust, in the Second Supplementary Estimates, the Minister of Public Works will insert a sum sufficient to construct a post office which will suffice for the requirements of the North-West.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter has not escaped the attention of the Government. The hon. gentleman has called the attention of the Government to the subject, and pointed out the requirements of the Winnipeg post office in order to afford accommodation in view of the large number of people who are going up to reside, to see the country, and to speculate, and the reports from Winnipeg were that the post office accommodation was not sufficient. On receiving those complaints directions were given to the Government architect to increase the accommodation, first, of the clerks inside, and, second, of the public. The space inside has been more than doubled. The outside of the post office, for the use of the public has also been more than doubled, and a second door is being provided, so that parties entering the post office will not have to return by the same door. This increased accommodation, with the extra clerks whom the Postmaster General has appointed, and the boxes placed through the city, as well as the letter-carriers appointed, must have relieved to a certain extent the pressure. We have to complain of the Winnipeg municipal authorities, that they have not numbered the houses. If that had been done at the proper time, we would have been able to place carriers on the route sooner, and relieved the post office. The municipal authorities have since given directions that the houses shall be numbered so that the population may be attended to by the carriers. I may add this information for the benefit of the hon. gentleman, that when the Estimates come down, he will find in those for 1883, an item for a new post office.

Mr. ROSS (Dundas). The hon. the Postmaster General thought I was exaggerating, but I have the figures here. I made no charge, because, as far as the hon. the Postmaster General is concerned, he has shown every disposition to meet the wants of the people in the most generous manner. I wish merely to substantiate what I stated by giving the figures. At Morrisburg, the postmaster, who has to employ an assistant, receives a salary of $694, which with allowances has brought it up to $874. At Iroquois, the salary of the postmaster is $511. I know that the postmaster at Iroquois has to rise to go to work at 6 a.m. and is employed to 9 p.m., with an assistant, and he receives $911 for that work.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). The hon. the Finance Minister in his Budget Speech referred to the Post Office expenditure. He took the years 1875 to 1879, showing the average annual expenditure to be $1,709,000, and the average annual receipts $1,149,000, average deficits annually $560,000, for the late Government; while for the years 1880-81, the average annual expenditure was $1,847,000, and the average annual receipts $1,302,000, average deficit $545,000, or a deficit of $15,000 a year less than the late Government. Now, the expenditures were as follows:—

1875	1,520,861
1876	1,622,827
1877	1,705,311
1878	1,724,939
1879	1,781,424
1880	1,818,271
1881	1,876,688

Showing an increase of $59,000 in 1879, and $58,000 in 1881. The receipts were:

1874	$1,139,973
1875	1,155,332
1876	1,102,540
1877	1,114,916
1878	1,207,790
1879	1,172,498
1881	1,352,110

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is important, for the purposes of comparison, that such years may be taken as may afford a fair comparison. The hon. member takes 1873-74 and 1874-75 and places these years against 1878-79 and 1879-80 and 1880-81, but he should remember that in 1873-74 and 1874-75 the Government were receiving a larger rate of postage on letters and newspapers and had not at that time granted increased accommodation to cities, which involved increased taxation. If we take 1875, we find that the expenditure was $1,622,827, and the receipts $1,114,000, being a deficit of $607,802. The deficit in 1876-77 was $590,316; 1877-78, $517,148; 1878-9, $612,005; 1879-80, $507,773; 1880-81, $544,002. The average deficits for the two years 1878-79 and 1880-81, was $545,000, against $556,849; making a difference of some $12,000 or $13,000 as between the last two years and the years previous. In the last two or three years a new system was adopted. As the late Postmaster General will recollect, a commission on sums is retained by postmasters, but I think in his time the whole sum was sent to the Department and the commission sent back. Of course this does not effect the balance, but it does effect the aggregates.

Mr. BURPEE. The hon. Finance Minister selects those years of the late Government when there was a decline of revenue. The rates were reduced, and therefore the revenue naturally fell off.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The facts show that the revenue in 1875-76 was $1,114,000, and in 1878-79 $1,172,000.

Mr. BURPEE. The hon. gentleman will find that the receipts were, in 1875, $1,155,000; in 1876, $1,102,000; and in 1877, $1,114,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The same rates are charged now.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Does the hon. gentleman deny that the result of these ameliorations has been to increase the matter transmitted by mail?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is very likely, but I find in the four years to which I refer there was a slight increase of the revenue notwithstanding.

Mr. ANGLIN. The expansion is a slow process comparatively. It does not take place immediately after the reduction, especially if there is not material. The reduction is not very considerable, however, in our local rates or the rates on foreign letters—those to the United States and Great Britain. The reduction was a material reduction, no doubt calculated to increase very considerably the correspondence between these countries and the Dominion; but that increase would be gradual. Notwithstanding the general depression in business, which must have affected the amount of business done in the Post Office, we find that the income from the postal service increased gradually until it became as large as it was before the reduction was made. In 1874, the income was $1,139,000; in 1875, $1,155,000; in 1876, $1,102,000; in 1877 it rose to $1,114,000, and, in 1878, it increased still further to $1,207,000, or considerably higher than it was in 1874 or 1875 notwithstanding the depression; proving conclusively that this decrease in the rates of postage led to an expansion in the revenue, and that expansion should have increased still further. But we find that, in 1879, when the country should have recovered rapidly and have attained a condition of unbounded prosperity under hon. gentlemen opposite, the revenue declined to $1,172,000; and after the great depression of 1879 passed away, the revenue again expanded, until, in 1881, it reached $1,352,110, that increase being the result of two causes—the reduction in the rate of postage and the increase in the general business of the country.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Public Accounts do not show that there was any great loss of revenue as the immediate result of the change, or that there was any very steady or gradual increase. There was some increase, but not so large as might have been expected under the circumstances. It is quite evident that any change made in the rates in this country does not affect the number of letters sent as a similar change does in the Old World.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). What I wished to point out was the ingenuity of the hon. gentleman in selecting 1875, 1876, and 1877, three of the smallest years of revenue collected by the late Government for comparison, which I think was very unfair.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I took the years in which the receipts were charged in the same way, and every hon. member will admit that that is the fair method.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Certainly not. When you determine to reduce the rates of postage, every man knows, and the experience of all countries teaches, that you must submit to a considerable loss of revenue for three or four years, and therefore until the system has had full time to get into operation, that basis of comparison is false and unfair.

Mr. BUNSTER. I regret to see that the item for British Columbia is reduced some $200, when it is a well known fact that in all new countries the Government should always try to increase the postal facilities of the people. I merely want to draw the attention of the Postmaster General to this great injustice to British Columbia, hoping that it will not occur again. There is an outlying district known as Comox which has been greatly neglected, and I have drawn the attention of the Postmaster General to it year after year without much effect. The paltry sum of $1,200 would give that settlement a weekly mail. At present they have a fortnightly mail while in the cities of Ontario, and the older Provinces, the mails are carried to the people's doors. But the residents of Comox are obliged to remain without a mail for a fortnight though they are as good British subjects and as well entitled to frequent mails as the people of any other Province. The postal service in British Columbia should not be starved, while the service in other Provinces is increased. If we had a proper Post Office Inspector in British Columbia this injustice might not be prolonged. Albernia, and the west shore of Vancouver Island, which promises to be a city, has had no provision made for mail facilities, though there are over 250 settlers who might, with proper postal accommodation, be increased to 500. There is also the district of Sook—

An hon. MEMBER. Spell it.

Mr. BUNSTER. I don't know how—it is an Indian name, but letters are not sent to Sook as they should be. The settlers have to travel a distance for them different to the provincial system before we joined the Confederacy, and whoever made the recommendation for the change did so against the well understood wishes of the settlers, and the Department made the change without consulting me, and my constituents are displeased with me for the said change. There should be mail facilities to Sook, continued to the end of the islands from Otter Point to Cape Bear. In all new Provinces, Governments assist the establishment of mail communications though at a loss, for the convenience of the settlers who, on their part, contribute to the revenue in the payment of tea, sugar and other duties. But it is not fair to reduce the postal facilities of British Columbia which is increasing in population, even if they are Chinese. The rights of British Columbia in this respect has been shamefully neglected. I hope the Postmaster General will demand of his agent in British Columbia a description of its postal facilities. He has, in reply to my own enquiries, said: "We do not want to bother the Government with many reports about the requirements of the district." The people will sometimes say to me: "Bunster, where is your political influence—why do you not get us a mail to such a place or weekly communication to Comox?" I must admit the late Government did give us a weekly communication, but, through the operations of a bogus contractor, we are compelled now to take a fortnightly mail. I do not think that is very creditable to the present Government, since the population of the district is decreasing. I hope the Postmaster General will do us justice in this respect.

Mr. HOOPER. I wish to call attention to the arrangement doubtless entered into some years ago for carrying the mails from east of Toronto to Southern Manitoba, but which, under the present circumstances of the country, should be changed. It is this: All the mail matter sent to Southern Manitoba, to Emerson for instance, which is the distributing office for that point, goes to Winnipeg—that is, if carried by the Grand Trunk, which does not make up any mail bag for any other point. If carried by the Great Western, a mail bag is made up which goes direct to Emerson. The result is that you are paying the railway for taking a large amount of mail matter from Emerson to Winnipeg; it is there redistributed and mailed back to Emerson, which is the distributing point for all Southern Manitoba. Any business man will understand how great the inconvenience is of letters received two or three days later than they should be delivered. Again, take the country post offices. If it is an office for a weekly mail, and the mail from Winnipeg arrives one day late, parties in business and other people will get no mail for a fortnight. If a monthly mail should be a day or two late, the people will not get their letters for two months. I suggest some alterations, so that all mail matter intended for Emerson and west of it, should be sent direct to it and not to Winnipeg. There is another consideration. In consequence of the very large amount of mail matter which goes to Emerson—and few hon. gentlemen are aware how great is the quantity—it should go there direct; but at present it entails in the office at Winnipeg, a very large amount of labor, which should be performed at Emerson, and the postmaster at Emerson should have, at least, two assistants and a proper post office building. I have not the least doubt that the post office is flooded and probably the postmaster has been obliged to take the whole of his mail matter out of the building. Again, you are paying in Winnipeg a very large amount in the shape of salary, whereas the postmaster at Emerson receives a very small compensation. I see by the last returns he simply receives $645 as a salary, whereas if he had $1,000 it would be little enough for the work; he is also paid $100 for forwarding and $80 for fuel, rent and light. A proper building should be erected in the town for a post office. The large increase in the population and the business done, require a proper building.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The matter will be looked into, and if found convenient and necessary, the changes will be made.

Mr. BUNSTER. I find, on a more careful examination of the Estimates, that the decrease is $1,200, instead of $200 in British Columbia. I hope the hon. Postmaster-General will explain why there is such a reduction against British Columbia. If he thinks the population is decreasing, he is mistaken. If he will give better postal facilities it would increase faster than it does. It is really an important matter that the settlers in British Columbia should have proper postal communication, but instead of being encouraged by the Government, by increased facilities, the opposite course is taken at present.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I desire to make a single observation in a sense which, I am sure, must recommend itself to the mind of every hon. gentleman who has been familiar for the past few years with the question under discussion. The hon. the Finance Minister has shown a gift in the way of comparisons, that does deserve a great deal of credit. I should like to see him compare his party, as it stood on this side of the House, with his party as it stands on the other, in relation to this single Department. When they sat here there were no words too long, no denunciation too deep in regard to the maladministration of that Department, its gross extravagances, its profligate waste of money. These hon. gentlemen went to the people, as it is said they are going before the people now; and I think before they go the hon. Finance Minister should explain why it was that when they came into power they did not check the extravagance of this wastefully conducted Department, get rid of some of the useless employes and change the administration they had so loudly condemned. I have heard the hon. gentleman complain of having words put in his mouth. Though something of a ventriloquist I will not put words in his mouth, but would like him to give utterance to explanations as to how it was that after pursuing this course toward the unfortunate Department, he did not when he came into office carry out the views which his friends and he when in Opposition thought had so much to recommend them. I would like to hear the hon. gentleman admit frankly that when his party got into office they found they had been previously talking about what they did not understand. The hon. Postmaster-General could explain, that when he got there he found it was not so easy to make any change, and that the evils he denounced were purely imaginary. I am not speaking as to whether the increased expenditure under this Administration is justifiable or not, but am simply drawing a comparison between criticism out of office and the conduct in office of hon. gentlemen opposite. If it be really true that they maligned the administration of this important Department, that their position in regard to it was untenable, they should either acknowledge their error, or be able to point to some change of policy which would justify their former attacks.

166. Miscellaneous Printing. $10,000

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This item is made up of printing Budget Speech in English, $344; in French, $133, and Parliamentary reports $8,721.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Halton). This item affords a favorable opportunity for me to make a remark which I make for the benefit of all parties concerned, as we are told that we are to go before the people very soon. I confess that there was some force in some remarks made by the hon. gentleman who spoke from the other side of the House with reference to claims which are put forth at elections by political parties and aspirants to the confidence of the people, because they promise if they get into power to effect great economy in the public expenditure. I confess that for myself at the last General Election I did arraign hon. gentlemen opposite for having, during the five years of their Administration, failed to carry out those pledges with respect to the public expenditure and reforms in the administration of the public service, which they had led the people to believe would be carried out; and, Sir, the gentlemen who opposed them, the party of the then Opposition, on their own behalf, and I, as a supporter of the policy which they then professed, on their behalf also, did arraign the Government of the day for their failure to carry out their promises to the people to make those reforms, which seemed to me necessary to the circumstances of the country. I must say that I have the same feeling of regret that hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury benches have not devoted themselves more earnestly towards effecting administrative reforms. They have carried through some very important measures, they have had matters of great public concern to deal with, and so far as these are concerned I have no fault to find. I feel that their pledges have been redeemed, that the promises made in behalf of that party have been, to a large extent, accomplished, but in the administrative department of the Government I do not see that activity, that zeal and that desire to remove admitted evils, and to effect promised reforms, which I had hoped and expected from them. Having said so much, I will call the attention of the members of the Administration to the state of the public printing, to the manner in which that printing is accomplished, to the enormous expense, and to the delays which occur in the execution of the public printing. Some years ago, before Confederation, it was proposed to remedy the difficulties we had experienced in that Department by establishing a Government printing office, and on the occasion of a visit to Washington in connection with the Post Office Department and some other matters, I was instructed by the Government to make enquiries into the system which prevailed there. I discovered that after trying the contract system for a number of years, and after trying various modifications of that system, Congress had discovered there was only one method by which the public printing could be satisfactorily performed, and they established a public printing office under the control of a public officer; and any hon. gentleman who chooses to go into the library and examine the public documents for a series of years prior to the establishment of a Government printing office, will see what a great reform was effected in the character of the printing, in the binding, and in all those branches which belong to that department, and they will see also, by an examination of the Public Accounts with respect to the public printing, that there was a great saving of expense. It struck me at the time that a great benefit was obtained in consequence of the efficiency and the promptitude with which the printing was done. The manager of the printing establishment called my attention to the delay that had occurred at the meeting of Congress, from the reports of the various Departments and the public documents that it was necessary for Congress to consider, not being in a position to be put into the hands of members. The reports were behindhand, and, under the contract system, it took a long period to get them ready. He even asserted that Congress was continued in Session some weeks longer than was necessary because of their inability to proceed with the public business for want of the printed documents which they ought to have had earlier in the Session. He said that was now remedied, because he made a list of the various documents and reports required, and was accustomed to go to the Departments and call for the manuscripts, and the consequence was that those reports were printed and in a form to lay before Congress as soon as it meets, and the members could go to work immediately upon them. On the ground of expense, on the ground of facility and promptitude in obtaining information in a form in which a parliamentary body could deal with it, there is no question whatever, I think, that there is a great advantage in having a public printing office. Now, Sir, if you look at the nature of the work, you will see that all you require is the plant and the salary of a superintendent, a book-keeper and one or two others; because the printing business is of that kind that when there is a sudden demand for printers, they are of that circulating class, that you can, by offering them fair wages and certain employment, get as many as you require, and when Parliament is dissolved, you dismiss your extra printers, while there is always enough work required in the meantime to keep a certain force employed. On other grounds, it seems to me, great advantages could be secured, a saving effected, and a much more satisfactory result in the work itself. A report was made to the old Government of Canada with respect to that matter, but from one cause or another, it was not taken up; the fact that the gentleman who was in the office of Queen's Printer enjoyed a good deal of sympathy, which contributed to delay the matter a couple of years, and then Confederation took place, and from that time to the present we have been going on in the present fashion. At present I believe it is doubtful whether we have any legal existing contract between the Government and the gentlemen who perform the public printing; It does seem to me that this is one of those administrative reforms that ought to be taken in hand, and if accomplished I am satisfied we would reap beneficial results. I trust that having called the attention of the Government to the question it will be considered, and they will earn for themselves great credit if they succeed in making the change. At present there are charges of mis-management, charges of political intermeddling, and political objects being secured through contracts for public printing. I do not know how much truth there may be in these, but all that would be removed if we had a public printing office under the charge of a competent printer to superintend it, and the public printing done in a workmanlike manner, done promptly and efficiently, and I am sure, under these circumstances, done satisfactorily, and to the great advantage of the public Treasury.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It will be remembered that two or three years after Confederation this subject was brought prominently before the House and discussed, and it resulted not only in the printing that had formerly been performed for the public Departments without contracts being placed under contract, as well as the printing of Parliament, but also the distribution of the stationery of the public Departments was placed under the charge of the Government. I do not hesitate to say that the change made at that time has saved the country a very large amount annually and been a great relief to the Government; and it is a question whether this country has reached such a position as to warrant it in establishing a separate printing office under the direction of the Government as is the case in the United States. As regards the publication of public documents and records the United States possess advantages over those we possessed here last Session, but the Government was then placed in an exceptional position that may not occur again. The inconvenience felt has been less this year, but it is a question for Parliament to consider whether we have arrived at that point in regard to the importance of the work that has to be performed to lead us to establish a Government printing office. If we have not done so no doubt we shall arrive at that position, because it is only a question whether the extent of the work will warrant the Government in establishing a printing office.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. How much is paid altogether for printing?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. A very considerable sum, and it might include the printing of Hansard. It is a question whether the Government will be able to do the work as cheaply as under contract. There can be no doubt whatever that the work will be more satisfactorily performed.

Mr. McDougall. At all events, the Government will not be sued for damages for sending printing away to other offices.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The firm of Desbarats had the contract for the printing of the Statutes in 1860, and Mr. Thompson had the contract for Parliamentary and Departmental Printing. In 1862 or 1863, the Government of which the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) was a member, entered into an arrangement for the purchase of stationery by the Clerk of the House, and it has continued ever since. One thing is quite apparent, that the printing and binding of our laws and papers, are far inferior to the work done for any other colony.

Mr. McDougall (Halton). Even British Columbia. The Statutes of that Province are printed like English books.

Mr. MACKENZIE. In New Zealand they are done at the Government printing office. It is, no doubt, desirable that we should avoid as much as possible, doing work by public contract. I am disposed to cast in my view with the hon. member for Halton, but our work is badly done, especially the binding of our Statutes and Sessional papers. It is very nearly impossible to read the earlier volumes of the Confederation Statutes. They are printed exceedingly cheaply, but I would prefer to pay a little more and have an article that would wear and give us more satisfaction. I have often felt ashamed at sending away some of our documents, that they were not better specimens of printing.

167. Unforeseen expenses; expenditure thereof to be under Order in Council and a detailed Statement to be laid before Parliament during the first fifteen days of the next Session..... $50,000

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The amount paid under this head last year was $24,128.

168. Commutation in lieu of remission of duties on articles imported for the use of the Army and Navy..... $4,000

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Last year we paid $1,749. So many difficulties occurred in the matter that a fixed sum is given in lieu of the allowance to the officers, no matter how much or how little they drink.

Mr. ANGLIN. While I have not the slightest objection that the officers should obtain their wines free of duty, I think we should be careful not to pay out of the people's pockets an amount under such conditions so as to be merely an addition to their pay.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Complaint is made on the part of the officers that a sufficient amount is not allowed, and a protest has been sent from the Imperial authorities calling our attention to the fact that we should increase the sum; but the Government has not increased it.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the allowance paid out of the public revenue.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. $1,749.

Mr. BOWELL. I think it is about $50 or $60 per officer.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What has been done in the case of the officer at Halifax who was charged with fraudulent practices in connection with the importation of brandy? According to the newspapers he was suspended from his functions and a subordinate was released.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not think any one has been released by order of the Government.

Mr. BUNSTER. Esquimalt is supposed to be the head naval station on the Pacific coast for Her Majesty's fleet. Many of the naval officers, instead of going through the circumlocution of going to the Custom house and paying for the goods at the bonded warehouse, and then going back to the Custom house with the officer's receipt, say: "No, you can keep the duty." This is a great injustice to the port. An officer going to sea and wanting to buy a small quantity of goods has to go from Esquimalt to Victoria, at considerable cost and great inconvenience. I hope the hon. Minister of Customs will take the matter into consideration and endeavor to give us a more simple form of collecting these duties. There should be a bonded warehouse at Esquimalt as well as Nanaimo.

169. For the expenses of Government in the North-West Territory, including roads, bridges, ferries, and aid to schools..... $20,000

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Last year the sum voted was $30,000, and the sum expended, $18,279; therefore, we ask for only $20,000 for next year.

170. For the expenses of Government in the District of Keewatin..... $5,000

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The sum voted last year was $7,500, but only $1,265 was expended, principally for the care of insane persons, and therefore we reduce the vote to $5,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Was none of it expended for schools?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

171. To meet expenditure estimated to be required to put into force the Act respecting the traffic in Intoxicating Liquors..... $5,000

Mr. BUNSTER. This item applies in a wholesale way to the North-West, and the Americans take advantage of it by warning emigrants that if they come here they will be deprived of their beer and other refreshments.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They get pain-killer.

Mr. BUNSTER. That may be very good for them to get from a drug shop, but it would not appease the appetite to which they have been used. Many Englishmen, and particularly Germans, who are in the habit of using ale as their natural beverage, do not care to be deprived of it, and I hope next year the Government will see to giving every man his natural beverage, as they do in Ontario, and strike this item out.

175. To compensate members of the North-West Mounted Police for injuries received in the discharge of duty..... $2,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This, I observe, is a new item. On what basis does the hon. gentleman calculate the amount? I think such claims have hitherto been paid out of the vote for unforeseen expenses. I am not prepared to say, however, that it is not wise to have a special vote for the purpose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We do not suppose we have any special ground for including that sum, which is moderate. There have been no large claims paid at any time; a few small sums have been paid. The settlement of these claims is a difficult question. A strong young man was seriously injured, and claimed large damages because he was an educated man, or almost a medical man. My answer was that he was a soldier, and his liberal education would not make any difference. So there has been no rule laid down on the subject. I propose a scale somewhat similar to that of the British service, though a little higher, as our men are of a superior class to the infantry soldier, and better educated, and are really to be considered as always in the field. Their work is so hard that a great many drop out for want of physical strength.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I know it is. In the case of present enlistments, has the hon. Minister discontinued the land bounty?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Long ago.

176. To reimburse D. H. Waterbury for loss sustained by his removal from the St. John post office.. $4,500

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Why is this vote proposed.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think there is equity in this proposal. Mr. Waterbury, a post office clerk in St. John, was dismissed from his office, in 1874-75, because the Inspector of Post Offices at the time thought him guilty of a very serious offence. The young man, in order to vindicate his character, brought an action against the Inspector, Mr. Dewe, which extended over two years. He felt he was innocent, and that was the only course left him to vindicate his character. The Courts of New Brunswick gave him a verdict for $6,500, from which an appeal was taken by the Government to the Supreme Court, in order to test the point as to the liability of an officer in such a discharge of his duty; and it was decided that the Government was not responsible. But this young man, having established his innocence, the Government felt, about a year ago, that the least they could do was to give him employment, and pay him the salary before received; and considering his great anxiety of mind, for a long time, and the position he and his family were placed in, not having been able to find employment, owing to the suspicions against him, we reported in favor of giving him $4,500 in compensation. I am not blaming any one, and I believe that Mr. Dewe acted honestly in the discharge of his duty.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). There can be no doubt about the justice of this proposal. The Minister of Finance has placed the facts before the House correctly. The young man though innocent was a long time in compulsory idleness, and this vote would no more than compensate him for his loss of employment and mental suffering.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I am very glad that the Minister of Finance has spoken so favorably of Mr. Waterbury. I have advocated his claims since 1874-75, but always failed. He was injured and dealt with in a most arbitrary way. We all thought so, and a jury of his countrymen gave him an award of $6,500, his claims being sustained in every court. The people of the country knew him better than Mr. Dewe and stood by him. So, at the heel of the hunt he comes out, after several years of great anxiety and compulsory idleness, for nobody would employ him in the face of such a charge, with his character vindicated, and yet after eight years of suffering and much loss he does not get the amount the jury awarded him. Still I am glad that even this compensation is granted him, and he stands before his countrymen with his character fully vindicated.

Mr. WELDON. I was the counsel employed in the case and can confirm the statements of the hon. Finance Minister. The action brought against Mr. Dewe was one of slander for his statements in his report as Chief Inspector in the Post Office. The young man brought the action to have an opportunity of proving his innocence, in which he succeeded in doing. Perhaps Mr. Dewe was over zealous, but I think he acted from a sense of duty and not from malicious motives; because, on a subsequent occasion, he expressed anxiety that he would be able to clear Waterbury entirely of the charges made against him. The question was tested and resulted in a point of law being decided in favor of the Government. Under the circumstances Mr. Waterbury was perhaps unfairly dealt with, although at the time Mr. Dewe thought he was doing what was right. Under the circumstances this grant is a very fair and equitable one.

Mr. McCUAIG. I would like to call the attention of the Government to two cases in my own county where injustice was done to two public officers connected with the Customs at Wellington and at South Bay. They were appointed years ago at a salary of $450, and the officer at South Bay was transferred from Bath at $450. During 1873-74 the salaries of these two officers were reduced down to $250 without any explanation being given, although they had been about twenty years in the service. The officer at Wellington, who is of a very advanced age, has applied for superannuation. Instead of allowing him, upon the average received for many years, the Government propose to superannuate him on the lesser sum, giving him in his old age about ninety dollars per annum. I consider this is a very great injustice, and poor encouragement for officers in the service. I hope the hon. Minister will take my representation into consideration.

Mr. BLAKE. From statements made by hon. gentlemen on both sides, there may be exceptional circumstances in this case to justify this vote, but it ought not to be construed into a precedent. The officers in the service are held during pleasure, and while there is no power of Executive action, which ought to be exercised with a more scrupulous regard to fair consideration for the incumbance of the officer, still I have always held it might be quite within the duty of the Executive to remove an officer, although they could not prove him guilty of any malfeasance. We cannot lay down the rule that there must be absolute proof of his being guilty of some impropriety. I am glad to say, from the statements from both sides, that not only were the suspicions unfounded in this case, but this young man demonstrated his complete innocence. This vote, however, must not be construed as an admission of the principle that the Government must be fettered in its discharge of its duty in removing officers without absolute proof, or submit to a demand for compensation, as to admit this would be very seriously to cripple the efficiency of the service. Therefore, I have felt it right to make these observations on this question. The rule should be, that in the case of an officer discharged on an unjust suspicion, reparation should be afforded him by re-appointing him to the service, by restoring him, with honor, to that service from which he was removed. That would be a sounder mode than to propose that Parliament should give pecuniary considerations for loss of office, which office after all is held during pleasure, and from which the officer might be removed without cause assigned or suggestion of impropriety at all.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I quite concur with the remarks of the hon. gentleman. This case is a special one. I doubt whether for the next quarter of a century a similar one will arise. I agree that it would be a mistake to recognize the principle that the Government could not dispense with the services of an officer when they thought it desirable to do so. In this case the Government did restore the party to his position. He was not taken into Court by the Government but was dismissed.

Mr. WELDON.

There was only one means of establishing his innocence before the country. Therefore, he took the case into Court himself. A young man without any means of his own whatever, except his own character, and with a wife and four children dependent upon him, he felt it important he should establish his character. The evidence produced before the Court, as well as subsequent circumstances, established beyond doubt his innocence. He claimed damages and got them for $6,500. I must say it is exceedingly gratifying to me to hear the remarks on both sides of the House, because the value of this vote will be increased beyond the pecuniary value by the way it has been accepted on both sides. I quite agree this case should not be taken as a precedent.

Mr. MacDONNELL (Inverness). I do not rise to oppose this vote, but I think it establishes an important precedent. I cannot draw any great distinction between this case and that of a person who is prosecuted at the suit of the Crown for a crime of which he is found to be innocent. Every day we find that innocent persons are arrested, kept in jail without trial, and when the trial comes off and they have expended large sums in establishing their innocence, they get their discharge from the criminal box without receiving compensation. The hardships suffered in such a case, is equal to that suffered in the case before the House. I had a case here a few years ago, when the Government prosecuted a man in my county on a charge of keeping an illicit still. This man was put to a great deal of expense at the suit of the Government, and was proved in a Court of Law to be innocent; still he could not tax his costs against the Government. The one case is of equal hardship with the other, and I think it is establishing a precedent which, if carried out to its logical conclusion, would involve the country in many large actions for damages.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I would like to hear from the hon. leader of the Government a declaration of his views on this subject. I am afraid that the hon. the Minister of Finance will find that a vote of this kind will open the door to a considerable number of claims. It may be very desirable to compensate unfortunate parties who have been wrongfully deprived of their position, but it is a far worse thing to have been condemned to imprisonment.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite concur in the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham, that this ought not to be taken as a precedent. I do not think there is much danger of that, from the fact that there will be very few dismissals where the party is cleared afterwards and has the good fortune to be able to establish his innocence. If it were proved beyond a doubt, it could be published, if it did not affect other parties. Mr. Dewe made his report in the exercise of his duty. He was not liable for anything in that report, but that report ought not to have been known, and the hon. Minister ought, if he was satisfied of the misconduct of the party, to dismiss him, as he did. He ought to have dismissed him and no reason given. It is well known that no reason could be given for the dismissal of an officer during pleasure. Of course, that is a correct statement of the principle. When the conduct of the Government is impugned in Parliament, of course Parliament is paramount, and can enquire into the circumstances, and see whether injustice has been done. As a general rule Parliament refuses to interfere except there is grave suspicion of improper conduct on the part of the officer responsible for the dismissal. In this case, Mr. Dewe unfortunately said to some person, or in some way, that the party was dismissed because he had committed a felony, and upon that unprivileged statement, which could not be held as official or protected by law, there was an action for slander brought against Mr. Dewe. The Government undertook the defence of Mr. Dewe, and I did not at all complain of that, although Mr. Dewe was not acting officially in making that statement. The case was fought out and carried from Court to Court, the Government standing between Mr. Dewe and protecting him in this action. Although Mr. Waterbury satisfied the Court and the jury that he was innocent, he got a verdict of $6,500—he remained for years under the suspicion of having committed a grave offence. Afterwards his innocence was established beyond a doubt by other circumstances arising quite independent of the evidence at the trial. For about six years this case was dragging, and during the whole of that time this young gentleman was under the imputation of being a felon, and it was thought allowing him $750 a year would not be too much compensation under the exceptional circumstances of the case. I suppose in defending himself he spent fully that amount. It is an exceptional case, and I hope we will not see a similar vote appearing in the Estimates for another year.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Would it not be better, instead of putting it down as compensation for loss of office, to put it down to pay expenses incurred by Mr. Dewe?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That would be better.

Mr. BLAKE. There is a little difficulty in reconciling the statement of the hon. gentleman with what I understand to be the law. He says it was because Mr. Dewe, in an unofficial manner, made a verbal statement of the circumstances of the dismissal, and the action was brought. Yet, if I rightly understand the case, the legal defence, upon which the verdict turned out to be inadmissible, was that the communication was a privileged one, that Mr. Dewe had communicated only to such persons as he was warranted in doing in the discharge of his duty. If Mr. Dewe did make such a communication as that, and the case was brought under those circumstances, Government ought not to have taken up his defence, and the Government could not have succeeded in saving him from the consequences of such an act. The hon. gentleman has said that the officer must be dismissed without cause being assigned, and so it is unless Government chooses to assign the reason. If a man be dismissed for immoral conduct I would not have any objection to let him know the reason if he asked it. If that is all that occurred, if there was no more said by Mr. Dewe, what has this young man suffered more than any man who after being charged with an offence, afterwards proved himself to be innocent. By the wording of this vote the House is laying down the principle that if a man is wrongfully removed from office he is entitled to compensation.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. This is a dangerous principle to establish. I am not opposed to this vote, but it should be manifest to all future Parliaments that we did not commit ourselves to this principle. What right has this young man to compensation any more than a person who is indicted and acquitted. The young man instituted proceedings against the Government and was acquitted as being innocent of the charge. This is no doubt an exceptional case. I will not vote against the appropriation. The language should be changed so as to show Parliament has the right to remove officers. The difficulty was that Mr. Waterbury asked for an investigation and Mr. Dewe refused it, and he then had recourse to the Courts.

Mr. ANGLIN. It was after the dismissal of Mr. Waterbury that the statement appeared that he was dismissed, because he was suspected of having rifled letters. He suspected Mr. Dewe as being the author of the statement, which he denied, and Mr. Waterbury complained of the manner in which he was treated. It was because of something said by Mr. Dewe that the action was brought. Mr. Dewe had Mr. Waterbury brought into the presence of the postmaster and the clerk, and in his presence charged him with being guilty of the offence, and stated what led him to that conclusion. Much sympathy was felt for Waterbury in St. John, especially after it became known that the offence was committed by some other person in the establishment. I am satisfied the grant would meet with approval in St. John, at the same time there is room for serious doubt as to the policy of establishing such a precedent as is now proposed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It might be changed to read "to reimburse Mr. Waterbury his costs in the case of Waterbury vs. Dewe."

Mr. MACKENZIE. A case has come up in the English Parliament this year, where an innocent man was convicted of attempt to murder. The Home Secretary agreed to ask a vote to compensate him for the injury done by the unjust sentence.

Mr. ANGLIN. I trust that the hon. Minister will see that the money is paid into Mr. Waterbury's hands and no one else.

Resolution, as amended, agreed to.

197. Surveys of Dominion Lands..... $450,000

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The increase in this vote is in consequence of the necessity of keeping pace with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Last year about 9,000,000 acres were surveyed into lots for settlers, costing $350,000. The projected surveys for this year embrace 10,000,000 acres along the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and 8,000 square miles of outlying townships in preparation for sub-division surveys next year. In addition to these, there are to be three outlying surveys—one at Edmonton, one at Battleford, and one at Prince Albert. Complete surveys are to be made at these points with the view of meeting probable settlement.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I understand that this work will be completed at an average cost of 4 cents an acre. Will this vote of $450,000 enable him to survey the full belt of twenty-four miles on each side of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in addition to those side lines?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I fancy so.

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon. gentleman expect to survey the whole of the remaining lands to the Rocky Mountains this season?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We are going to try and keep pace with the construction of the railway. The Company hope to get the road built by the end of next season as far as Calgary, near the Rocky Mountains, and we are going to try to keep pace with them.

Mr. MILLS. I understand that at present the whole country is surveyed as far as those surveys have made progress. It will be a waste of money to survey inferior lands on which people will not settle. I think it would be well to block out the country in outline surveys, unless the land over any large area is utterly unfit for settlement. But we should be in no hurry pressing the sub-division townships, except at points to which immigration is being directed. A very large portion of the land so surveyed will not of course be occupied for many years; settlers will pick out the best lots, and the others will be neglected.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I have it stated that sufficient means have not been taken to render the surveys practically useful in years to come; that the wooden stakes and other marks made cannot be expected to be permanent, and that surveys will have to be made over again, if means be not taken to mark more permanently and distinctly the outline surveys.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The land marks of all surveys are liable to displacement, but means must be taken to prevent that as much as possible. People crossing the plains have often pulled up stakes and made fuel of them. In the block surveys it is intended to mark the points with iron piping which can be useful for no other purpose. Only wooden posts will be put down in the subdivisions, as the spots can be easily ascertained from the main points.

198	{	Dominion Lands (Outside Service), covering salaries and contingent expenses of Land and Timber Agencies, Inspections, &c.	61,095
		Extra Clerks at Head Office, Ottawa, publishing maps, advertising and other similar expenses.	20,960
		Outside Service, British Columbia, staff contingent expenses, &c.	10,645
		Land Guides in Manitoba and the North-West.	7,920

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. This is nearly double the last rate; what is the cause?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The rapid increase of the business in this branch in the public service. A Land Commissioner and an inspector of land agencies has been appointed with headquarters at Winnipeg. Mr. Walsh is the Commissioner, at a salary of $5,000, and Mr. Percy is the Inspector at $3,200—he is the Deputy-Head. They form a Land Board. Mr. Walsh will attend to the land business generally, instead of having it inconveniently and ineffectively transacted, a system which the North-West has outgrown. Settlers will go westward, as westward the star of empire holds its sway. There will be an increasing number of land agents, who will have responsible duties to perform. These men are liable to great temptations in that country just now, to which, I am happy to believe, only few of them have yielded. Still there must be an efficient supervision, and I believe that Mr. Percy, who possesses the highest testimonials, is physically and mentally well fitted for the office. The Commissioner will attend to land granting, while the inspector will examine those agencies, report upon them, and maintain the machinery in good working order. Land disputes will be settled by that Board, whose decisions, the members agreeing, of course, will be considered as final, subject to reference to the Courts and to Parliament. Should the Commissioners differ, there would be ground for an appeal to the Department and the Government. As fast as possible all the land granting business will be transferred to Winnipeg and the North-West. It is the policy of the Government and the Department that all general questions and regulations shall be attended to at Ottawa from which patents will ultimately issue. There are some new offices established: a land agency for Qu'Appelle district, and an agency at Edmonton, these are provided for in this estimate. The expense of the new agency at Qu'Appelle will be $3,800. There are seven land offices, or eight, including the land office at Edmonton. The land office at Edmonton has been removed. There is no land office at Rat Portage as they have not reached there yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What is the $10,645 expenditure in British Columbia for, we have no lands there except the railway belt?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am very glad to find that there is very good land there, in the opinion of the settlers in the Kamloops country. Complaints are made that the Government have not laid out that land, and people are anxious to come in and settle. It is really a large and valuable grazing country and there is a certain amount of land fit for agricultural purposes.

Mr. BUNSTER. I am very sorry to find the insignificant sum of $10,640 put down for this service. The Dominion does not object to take $700,000 out of British Columbia for Customs, but can only afford the paltry sum of $10,000 for opening up a certain belt of land reserved at the request of the Government. For my part, so far as the paltry sum of $10,000 is concerned in exploring British Columbia, I would sooner see it struck out than see the Province insulted by such a small item as that. He ought to have put down $110,000 instead of $10,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would mention to my hon. friend that we cannot commence surveying the lands that are to be granted in aid of building the railway, until we know where the railway is to be built. Whenever the railway line is finally located and confirmed by the Government, then we have twenty miles on each side of that line, and such portions of that line as are likely to be available for settlement, of course, will be surveyed. The Government will ask for a vote to survey those lands, and hope to be recouped afterwards by their sale. The first item included in this sum for British Columbia, is to cover the expenses of Mr. Trutch and his establishment. Mr. Trutch, as the House knows, was sent there as Government agent. He has general supervision of our interests in that portion of the Dominion, and he has general supervision over the railway matters there and over land matters, and is continually referred to on all subjects, Customs, Inland Revenue, and every question of public interest. It is arranged that the expenses of this establishment should be divided between the two Departments of Railways and Interior. The whole expense is $9,840, for which $4,900 is to be charged to the Department of the Interior and the rest to Railways and Canals. Then there is a branch of the Surveyor-General's Department, consisting of a surveyor in charge with a salary of $1,000; a draughtsman, $1,200; two clerks and a messenger, costing altogether $5,700.

Mr. BUNSTER. It is very seldom that British Columbia is heard on the floor of the House here. It is not many years ago since I drew the attention of the Government to British Columbia. Now, the leader of the Government refers to Mr. Trutch, who once drew a map of British Columbia, and when I accused the hon. member for West Durham of having done injustice to British Columbia, he answered by holding Mr. Trutch's map so fashion on his head, which has ever since been a curse to British Columbia.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Which, his head?

Mr. BUNSTER. No, the map. I wish to call attention to the great injustice Mr. Trutch has done to British Columbia in drawing any such map, when it is well known British Columbia has never been surveyed. There has been no survey made of it, and the paltry sum of $10,000 is offered in place of about $110,000.

Resolutions ordered to be reported; and (at 12.05 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 28th April, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RE-ADJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I beg to move for leave to introduce Bill (No. 153) to readjust the representation in the House of Commons. The Bill, of course, as the House knows, is introduced under the British North America Act, and in consequence of the Census of 1881. By that Census it appears that the representation of all the Provinces will remain as it is, with the exception of the Province of Ontario, which obtains four additional representatives by the increase of population, under the scale established in the British North America Act. It is also proposed in this Bill, in consequence of the increase of population in the Province of Manitoba, to give it one additional member; that will be five additional members added to the House, 211 instead of 206. The principle upon which the readjustment of the constituencies is arranged in this Act is to equalize as much as possible the population of Ontario. In consequence of four new members being added, there must be, of course, a locus standi for these additional members. Besides these four members it is proposed to unite the town of Niagara with the county of Lincoln, and also to unite the town of Cornwall to the county of Stormont, leaving six constituencies to be provided for in the Province of Ontario. The arrangement with respect to the additional members will be as follows: The county of Essex, which, as the Census shows, is a county of a large population, is to be divided into two; the county of Lambton, which also has a large population, is to be divided into two; Bruce, which has two ridings, will have an additional electoral district; Middlesex, which has three ridings, will have four; Simcoe, which has now two, will have three; and the county of Ontario, which has two, will also have three. These are the arrangements by which these six additional new constituencies will be provided. I do not propose to enter into minute details as to the different constituencies, because, until the Bill is in the hands of hon. members, and they have the Census before them, they will gather no information by reading the Bill; but I will point out how the principle of representation by population has been applied. Of course, there is not and cannot be a perfect adherence to the principle, pure and simple, of representation by population. In some cases it is impossible to follow strictly that principle, and to provide strictly that all electoral districts shall have the same body of population, but the alterations have been all in that direction. In consequence of the readjustment of so many of the counties there will be a considerable alteration in the arrangement of the different constituencies. I will point out most of them, as I have them in my memorandum. In Cornwall and Stormont the population is the same, and there is no alteration; it is merely joining the towns. Carleton (Ontario) is altered. The population, in 1871, 24,689, is reduced to 20,287, and the reduction will be applied to the adjoining county, the north riding of Lanark. I may mention that the average population in the different constituencies is about 21,000. The north riding of Lanark is too small according to the average. It had 13,943, and it will be increased to 18,345. So in Leeds and Grenville there is an alteration about the same.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the alteration?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is reduced from 12,929 to 12,423. I now state the fact generally, and I will give the particulars a little later. Brockville, which has a population of 12,514, by the addition of the township of Kitley, will be increased to 15,007. Victoria North, with a population of 13,799, will be increased by the readjustment to 16,540. The whole population of the county of Ontario is 60,809. By the readjustment and the addition of some townships from Muskoka, which has some 27,000, South Ontario will have 20,244; North Ontario, 20,823; and West Ontario, 19,730; the constituencies being thus very nearly equalized. Muskoka, which has 27,204, will have 17,640. East York will be reduced from 23,312 to 22,853. North York, from 24,501, will be reduced to 21,730. The three Simcoes, by the readjustment, will stand as follows: South Simcoe, 22,721; North Simcoe, 26,129; and East Simcoe, 27,185. Lincoln and Niagara, with 26,408, will be reduced to 20,901. Monck, from 17,145, will be increased to 17,380. South Wentworth, which had a population of 14,993 will be increased to 16,229. North Brant, which is now very small, 11,894, will be increased to 17,635. South Brant will be reduced from 21,975 to 20,482. North Oxford, from 25,361, will be reduced to 24,389. South Oxford will be reduced from 24,732 to 23,133. South Perth will be increased from 20,773 to 21,889. North Perth will be reduced from 34,207 to 26,276. North Wellington will be reduced from 25,870 to 23,082. By some accident the figures have been left out for the three Greys.

Mr. BLAKE. Are the Greys to be changed?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; slightly. East Bruce will have 22,355; North Bruce, 17,655; West Bruce, 25,618; East Elgin will be reduced from 28,147 to 26,301; West Elgin will be increased from 14,214 to 23,480. The four Middlesexes will stand thus: Centre, or South Middlesex, as I think they are going to call it, 18,889; East Middlesex, 24,552. However, a suggestion has been made to me to-day, that East London, which is really a portion of the city of London, should be taken away from East Middlesex and added to the city, of which it is merely a suburb. West Middlesex will have 19,491; North Middlesex, 19,540; South Huron, which had a population of 27,103 will have 23,042; Centre Huron will be reduced from 26,474 to 22,321; Bothwell, from 27,102 to 22,268; Kent, from 36,626 to 28,112. Essex is divided into two ridings. The population of South Essex will be 22,385, that of North Essex will be 25,659, the division being very nearly the same as for the Local House; and Lambton West will be 24,356, and Lambton East, 18,260. North Norfolk, which is now 17,219, will be increased to 20,869; South Norfolk will be increased from 16,374 to 19,019. Hon. gentlemen will see that alterations on the whole have been in the way of equalizing the population.

QUEBEC.

All that part of the parish of Ste. Monique, now in the county of Terrebonne, is hereby detached from the said county, and annexed to the county of Two Mountains.

These are the provisions of the readjustment. The Bill will be printed and distributed immediately, and plenty of time will be given for discussing it in all its details.

Mr. BLAKE. Before this Bill is read the first time, I wish to make a few remarks. Of course, it will not be expected that I should enter, in any degree, into the details of the proposed readjustment; but I wish to make some general observations with regard to the measure, so far as I have been able to apprehend it. Sir, this measure has been brought down too late and too early. It has been brought down too late, because a measure of this description, which affects very deeply the political interests, feelings, wishes, and opinions of a large portion of the constituencies of Canada, ought to have been brought down at an early period of the Session, when there would have been ample opportunity for its details to be mastered, not merely by us here, but also by those for whom we are legislating. So far as the public basis of the Bill goes, it is based upon information which was in the possession of the Administration as long ago as before last midsummer. The Census returns were published about midsummer, and they were in the hands of the Administration and available to them for a considerable time before their publication; there was, therefore, so far as the public basis of a Bill to alter the representation is concerned, all that period for its preparation. But although its necessity was known, although it was announced in the Speech from the Throne, although it was repeatedly asked for, it is not brought down until the eleventh or twelfth week of the Session, when the hon. gentleman has upon the paper a notice to take Saturday; when we are wearied with our work and all anxious to go away; when, although the hon. gentleman says there will be time for discussion, he knows perfectly well there will not be time for discussion; when there will not be time for that communication with the people to which I have referred, and for their responses to come—I say it is not until this hour that this measure is brought down. It is brought down too soon, for the reason that such a measure as this ought never to be brought down at all. We know the name of a politician which has become historical in connection with the use—the profligate and outrageous use of political powers in the interests of a particular party in the neighboring Republic, to alter constituencies; and I venture to say that this Bill will associate the hon. gentleman's name for all time to come with a similar practice. Sir, what are the principles of the hon. gentleman in reference to readjustment? So far as I gather from his statement, there are over fifty changes proposed to be made in the Province of Ontario. Over fifty constituencies are to have their boundaries changed by this measure. The political map of the Province of Ontario is to be entirely reconstructed. What is the excuse? The excuse is that four seats had to be added to the Province of Ontario. What is the justification beyond that? That the hon. gentleman's nice notions of justice and equality to the different parts of the population are offended by certain discrepancies in the numerical proportions of the different constituencies, and he is obliged, by that strong sense of justice which animates him, to see that these are removed in consequence of the addition of those four members. What is he doing in order to accomplish this? Disregarding, so far as those statements we have can give us information at this moment, wholly the principle which he himself stated should govern us in making the changes ten years ago, when a similar duty devolved upon him—the principle, in respect of which his views were assented to on that occasion by this side of the House, of having regard to the municipal boundaries and divisions, a proper consideration of which should guide him in regulating the constituencies. He is wholly disregarding that principle now. He is detaching townships from their counties and adding them to other counties, and making his divisions under the pretence—and I repeat the word pretence—of equalizing the population, but with the real result of doing what he threatened he would do to an hon. friend of mine not now in the House, hiving the Grits. Hon. gentlemen may laugh at it, but if they had the spirit and honor of men they would repudiate it. They laugh at it as a good joke that the majority in this House should legislate themselves into power. They laugh at it as a good joke that they should take advantage of their power and majority to do what I have stated is the ruling principle of the right hon. gentleman, so far as he can accomplish it—to collect together a number of townships where the Reformers happened to be in a strong majority, and detach them from the adjoining counties, and so to weaken the strength of the Liberal party in a large number of constituencies, giving them in return an occasional constituency. That is the main feature of this measure so far as redistribution is concerned. Let us consider how far this affects the natural municipal boundaries of the counties, and how far this business of equalization is really the honest intention of this measure, or ought to be adopted by this House. I will deal first of all with the question of detaching the townships from the counties, and making in effect electoral districts, which, although the hon. gentleman calls them ridings of counties, are not, in a great many cases, ridings at all. The name is nothing; it is the substance we look at. In many cases he takes a township from one county and adds it to another and calls it the north, east or west riding of this, that or the other; but it is no longer a portion of the original county, a segment of that organization—it is something added to another county for political purposes—for the purpose of strengthening the Government and weakening their opponents. I wish to read what the hon. gentleman thought on this subject ten years ago, when he had a similar duty to discharge:

“With respect to the rural constituencies, the desire of the Government has been to preserve the representations for counties, and subdivision of counties as much as possible. It is considered objectionable to make representation a mere geographical term. (Hear, hear). It is desired as much as possible to keep the representation within the county, so that each county that is a municipality of Ontario should be represented, and if it becomes large enough, divide it into ridings—that principle is carried out in the suggestions I am about to make. That rule was broken in 1867 in three constituencies, viz.: Bothwell, Cardwell, Monck; and I do not think on the whole that the experiment has proved a successful one. I do not think it was unsuccessful as far as the representatives of those new constituencies themselves were concerned, as they are well and ably represented by the gentlemen who now hold seats for the constituencies; and I hope that if am returned again to the next Parliament I shall meet those hon. members. But it is obvious that there is a great advantage in having counties elect men whom they know. Our municipal system gives an admirable opportunity to constituencies to select men for their deserts. We all know the process which happily goes on in Western Ontario. A young man in a county commences his public life by being elected by the neighbors who know him to the Township Council. If he shows himself possessed of administrative ability, he is made a Reeve or Deputy Reeve of his county. He becomes a member of the County Council, and as his experience increases, and his character and abilities become known, he is selected by his people as their representative in Parliament. It is, I think, a grand system that the people of Canada should have the opportunity of choosing for political promotion the men in whom they have most confidence and of whose abilities they are fully assured. All that great advantage is lost by cutting off a portion of two separate counties and adding them together for electoral purposes only. Those portions so cut off have no common interest; they do not meet together, and they have no common feeling except that once in five years they go to the polls in their own township to vote for a man who may be known in one section and not in the other. This tends towards the introduction and development to the American system of caucuses, by which wirepullers take adventurers for their political ability only and not for any personal respect for them. So that as much as possible, from any point of view, it is advisable that counties should refuse men whom they do not know, and when the representation is increased it should be by subdividing the counties into ridings.”

Then he went on to point out that he had acted on that principle:

“I omitted to state that it is not intended to divide either Ottawa or Hamilton. Although we have adopted in Old Canada the principle of electoral divisions, it has not been considered in England a proper mode of representation, inasmuch as it totally excludes minorities, and in some constituencies in England they have introduced the system we now propose for the purpose of protecting minorities. It is therefore proposed that Hamilton shall return two members.”

Then replying to the hon. gentleman, I said:

“He did not intend to discuss the details, but agreed that the principle of the division of the counties adopted was judicious, making the electoral divisions conterminous with the counties; and that it was not well to urge the doctrine of population too far, although it should be regarded as far as possible. The principle of representation by population had been properly disregarded, the charges having been made evidently for political reasons, and he was not surprised that the Bill had been brought down at this late stage of the Session when there was scarcely time to discuss it."

Then at a subsequent stage of the debate, the hon. gentleman said in reply that he believed the House generally agreed with him that the county organization should be preserved as much as possible. He had observed this principle, and no county in Ontario had been split up. That was the opinion of the hon. gentleman then. But now we find not merely electoral districts which have learned to act together, which have learned to consider themselves as an organization and as an entity, disturbed by the county divisions, disturbed with regard to one municipality, being taken from one county or a riding and added to another, merely in order to carry out an extensive scheme of the hon. gentleman—not to equalize the population, but to strengthen his hands politically in Ontario. Let us consider how wide his sense of justice extends with reference to the equalization of the population. Is there one law for Ontario and another for the rest of the Dominion—one sense of justice in dealing with Ontario and another in dealing with the rest of the Dominion? Is that what is so offensive that the majority of the House feels, with a stern virtue that they must remedy it so far as Ontario is concerned, at whatever cost to their political prospects, wholly inoffensive, wholly delightful, and to be continued, preserved and extended in all other places? Let us consider what those inequalities are, which the hon. gentleman is bound to redress, as compared with the inequalities which he thinks he should not, and which are favored by the majority in the other Provinces. Let us consider the condition of things which it does not disturb in the other Provinces—for he is not disturbing a single constituency, with the exception of a trifling allegation of both parts of a parish into one district in Quebec. What is the condition of things in Prince Edward Island? Each county there returns two members. Queen's returns two, with a population of 41,111, or 21,505 souls return one member. King's returns two members, with a population of 26,433, or 13,206 persons return a member in that constituency. But the hon. gentleman is not moved by this circumstance. He does not think we have anything to do with Prince Edward Island. Then he must leave Prince Edward Island just as it is, and give to thirteen men in King's the same power that twenty-four men have in Queen's, and say 17,000 men may return a member there, so that the proportion of political power in the different constituencies is twenty-four in one to thirteen in another, and to twelve in a third; and that is a condition of such great equality that the hon. gentleman's reforming tendencies did not lead him to propose any amendment to the representation to equalize the representation in Prince Edward Island. Take the Island of Cape Breton, N. S. Inverness returns a member with 25,651 votes; the adjoining county, Victoria, returns one with 12,470; thus Victoria has two votes to one in Inverness, because its population is not half that of the other. Take the county of Richmond, also in Cape Breton, and you find the aggregate population of Richmond and Victoria is 27,591, against a population of 25,651 in Inverness. Thus, practically, those two counties return two members, while Inverness, with an equal population, returns only one. You have one half the political power in the one case that you have in the other. Halifax, city and county, with a population of 67,917, returns two members; Lunenburg, with a population of 28,583, returns one; and Queen's, with a population of 10,577, returns one. Thus one man in Queen's has nearly three times as much political power as a man in Lunenburg, and more than three times as much as a man in Halifax. Shelburne, with a population of 14,913, returns one member. Shelburne and Queen's together make 25,490 and have two members, while Lunenburg, with 28,583, has only one. To Cumberland, which has 27,368 souls, the same observations would measureably apply. Take New Brunswick. The county of York, with 30,397 souls, returns one member; Westmoreland, with 37,719, one member; Charlotte, with 26,089, one member; Northumberland, with 25,909, one member; while Queen's, with 14,027, or less than half of York, less than half of Westmoreland, and a little more than half of Charlotte or Northumberland, has one member. Sunbury, with 6,651, has one member; and Restigouche, with 7,058, has one member. Thus two persons are returned by 13,709, as against one by 37,000 in Westmoreland, and one by 30,000 in York. Add Sunbury, Restigouche and Queen's, and you have 28,026, returning three members, as against one returned by 37,000 in Westmoreland; add Victoria, 15,686, and you have four members by 41,600 as against one by Westmoreland with 37,000. That is the state of things which the hon. gentleman does not propose to interfere with in the Province of New Brunswick. What are these principles of eternal justice of representation? Are they principles which are applicable to men in one part of this Dominion and not to those in others? Is it essential to disregard those considerations which have induced the hon. gentleman to leave these county and municipal divisions undisturbed, although the excrescences and deficiencies of the system, consequent on leaving them undisturbed, are even greater than those he proposes to remedy in Ontario. Look again at the Province of Quebec. I do not take for the purposes of this comparison the urban constituencies. I leave out Montreal and Quebec, because I always thought that peculiar considerations apply to capital cities; and am not going to discuss to-day how far these considerations should apply. Rimouski, with 33,791 souls, returns one member; Beauce, with 32,020, returns one; Drummond and Arthabaska, two counties, with 37,360, return one; Chicoutimi, 32,409, returns one; Hochelaga, with 40,079, returns one; Ottawa, with 49,452, returns one; making a total of six members returned by 225,091, or an average of 37,513 to a member, in those six constituencies. Take seven more. Gaspé, with 25,001, returns one member; Temiscouata, one with 25,484; Lévis, one with 27,980; Nicolet, one with 26,611; Richmond and Wolfe, one with 26,339; Portneuf, one with 25,175, and Champlain one with 26,818, or a total of 183,408 in the seven constituencies, making an average of 26,201 souls to each member. Add the whole together, and you find thirteen members returned by 408,499 souls, or an average of 31,422 to each. That is the state of things in thirteen rural constituencies in Quebec. Let us look at the other side of the picture, let us see if the hon. gentleman has considered the inequalities in Quebec. Montmorency, with 12,322 souls, returns one member; Three Rivers, one with 9,296; Saint Maurice, one with 12,986; Montcalm, one with 12,766; Jacques Cartier, one with 12,345; Laval, one with 9,462; Sherbrooke, one with 12,221; Brome, one with 15,827; Iberville, one with 14,459; Verchères, one with 12,449; Chambly, one with 10,858; Napierville, one with 10,511; Laprairie, one with 11,436; St. John, one with 12,265; Chateauguay, one with 14,393; Soulanges, one with 10,220; Vaudreuil, one with 11,485; L'Islet, one with 14,917; Montmagny, one with 15,268; Stanstead, one with 15,766; Huntingdon, one with 15,495; Beauharnois, one with 16,000; L'Assomption, one with 15,282; Two Mountains, one with 15,856; giving an average for twenty-five constituencies of 13,048 to each member, as against an average in thirteen of the larger constituencies of 31,500 souls to a member. Take a few of these smaller constituencies: Three Rivers, 9,296; Laval, 9,462; Napierville, 10,511; Chambly, 10,858; Laprairie, 11,436, and Soulanges, 10,220, and you have a total in these six constituencies of 61,583, or an average of 10,297 souls to a member. Take seven others: Sherbrooke, St. John's, Vaudreuil, Montmorency, Verchères, St. Maurice and Montcalm, and you get thirteen constituencies with an average of 11,421, as against thirteen others with an average of 31,422 souls to a member. The hon. gentleman's opinions of political justice and the rights of the people extend just as far as the Province of Ontario, and he thinks it unnecessary to disturb the constituencies in the other Provinces, by any attempt at equalization at all. To use a vulgarity it is too thin. It is impossible to contend that the people of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island are to be treated in a different way from the people of Ontario, that they are entitled to have any greater regard paid to their rights, or any different measure applied to them from that which is to be applied to the people of Ontario. The hon. gentleman had a duty to discharge. That was to propose to Parliament a mode by which additional members should be assigned to Ontario and he takes advantage of the occasion to propose a complete reconstruction of the political map of Ontario, based upon a violation of the principle which I have read from his speech, of ten years ago, and that violation is obviously made to strengthen his political party, as the great bulk of these changes is intended to do, and to weaken the political party of those to whom he is opposed. Why, Sir, we know how this has been going on. We know there have been caucuses, gatherings, meetings of local politicians, interviews with the Tory candidate members, and discussions of this subject from one point of view only. We know that this discussion has been: "How shall we be strongest? What change shall there be, how shall we be strongest? What change is there which will alter the political map of Ontario in our favor? What change can be made which will weaken our opponents and strengthen ourselves?" Why, conventions have met, the Liberal Conservative Convention of North Bruce met in solemn assembly and have passed resolutions on the subject. They unanimously resolved, and the hon. gentleman has heeded them, that the north riding of Bruce, if both townships, Bruce and Saugeen were detached from it, would be a safe Conservative riding, but that if the township of Saugeen were left it would be dangerous at present and disastrous in the near future. And so the hon. gentleman abandons his boasted plans, he cuts the north riding of Bruce below its population and adds to the other riding, in order to do what the Liberal-Conservative Convention, through its delegate Mr. McNeil, or whatever you call him, told him was necessary in the political interests of his party, and a necessity to mould the riding so that it might return a Conservative instead of a Reformer, even without abstracting from each township a Reform majority of 300 or 400 voters. That was not enough, and after taking 300 or 400 from the Reformers, the hon. gentleman is told by his political supporters that he must go further, that he must dock Saugeen too, else it would be dangerous now and disastrous in the near future; and he takes Saugeen and adds it to the centre part of Bruce in which there is a Reform majority close upon a thousand in order to strengthen himself in the two other constituencies. This is one instance of the mode in which this plan has been arrived at. I say that having a great duty to discharge which demanded from the hon. gentleman that he should discharge it upon principles of general public justice, he has determined to use his majority to load the dice in the political game which is shortly to be played, and so far as he can to take care that the free sense of the people of Ontario, as spoken by the constituencies which he is never tired of boasting returned him so large a majority at the last election, and which he knows, such is the present sentiment, would return him in an equal minority at the next election, to alter these constituencies so as to produce by force of law, if you can call such a thing a law, a result which he feels, without this interference, would never be produced at all. Why, Sir, we hear hon. gentlemen talking of their strength; they say they are strong as ever they were. Well, there are two omens that they do not feel as strong. First of all they talk of precipitating the elections because they know they would be weaker next year than they are this year; they talk of anticipating it by an appeal to the people, because they feel it is dangerous to wait, and they say that even now, in the Province of Ontario, it is dangerous to appeal to the people with the present bounds. They say: we must proceed legislatively to expound in advance what the vote shall be of the people of Ontario by cutting and carving up the constituencies, by arranging them so as to concentrate, so far as they can, the Liberal strength in a comparatively limited number of constituencies, to weaken as far as he can the Liberal strength in a great many of the constituencies, that is the general plan and scope of the hon. gentleman's measure. I hope, Sir, that the sense of spirit, of justice, of goodfeeling of the Province of Ontario will resent the hon. gentleman's course; that they will say it is a very unfair advantage in a party by their power in Parliament to carve out the constituencies in the way proposed, and that they will refuse their assent to a measure so highhanded, so arbitrary, so unjust, and that the hon. gentleman may not reap from it the full benefit which he expects. But at any rate it will not be our fault if the full iniquities of this measure be not disclosed. They must be disclosed, and we must ask and we demand an answer why this measure is of so different a character from that which the hon. gentleman proposed ten years ago as the county divisions; why a measure so different from that which he is applying to-day to all the other Provinces of the Dominion, should be extended to that Province for which and in whose name to-day and upon this occasion, though sitting here in a minority, I believe I speak.

Mr. MILLS. Before the motion is put I wish to make an observation or two. I had made an extract of the speech of the hon. gentleman, which he delivered here in introducing a measure in 1872. My friend who has spoken has read that extract, and I shall not trouble the House with it. But, it is quite obvious, the hon. gentleman has departed entirely from the principle he laid down then. I believe that was a just principle, which exercised the necessary restraint over the Administration of the day, that it secured to the minority of Parliament something like fair protection against the power which the majority in the House possesses for purposes like this. We do not say the hon. gentleman will reap all the advantages he expects from this measure, but what his friends anticipate there can be no doubt of whatever. The hon. gentleman has been boasting here for the last three years, and his friends have been boasting behind him the extent to which they enjoy the confidence of the country, have been telling us of their popularity, yet we see to what extent they distrust the people by the measure the hon. gentleman has submitted. The hon. gentleman professes that he is anxious to equalize the representation of the people in the Province of Ontario. I deny that the hon. gentleman has any such object in view. His object is to legislate himself and his friends into Parliament, that is the object disclosed in the face of this measure. Let us take the county of Essex. That county has a population of 46,962, more than sufficient to return two members to this House. Why then does the hon. gentleman take a township off the county of Kent and add it to Essex? Why the two constituencies of Essex, without that township, will have each 23,481, and yet the hon. gentleman detaches a township from the county of Kent and adds it to a riding of Essex, which will have after that addition more than an adequate population to entitle it to a member. The hon. gentleman has wholly ignored the fact that the county of Bothwell is not a municipality, that it is part of Kent and a part of Lambton. Kent has upwards of 54,000 population. Now, if the hon. gentleman wished to deal fairly, why did he not give two members to Kent and two to Lambton? Why not do away with the county of Bothwell altogether. The east riding of Kent would not have been more populous than the west riding is at this moment, and if he wishes to adopt the principle of representation by population, why not give to the two counties of Kent and Lambton five members in this House? They would have 21,000 of a population for each representative. If he had wished to adopt that principle, he could have formed a new county out of these two counties, which would have had upwards of 21,000 of a population. Then the hon. gentleman has taken off two townships and a town in which there is a large Reform vote, as I shall show when the Bill comes up for the second reading, and tacks them to the west riding of Elgin; but when we look at the county of Elgin we find it has a population of 42,161, and if the hon. gentleman wished to equalize the population, all that was necessary was to detach the city of St. Thomas from the east riding and add it to the west riding; then we should have had about the same population in the two ridings. But it is perfectly obvious that that would not have served the purpose of the right hon. gentleman; it would not have served the interests and objects of his friends; for it is obvious that the intention of the right hon. gentleman is to legislate himself and his party into Parliament, no matter what may be the views of the majority of the electors of the Province of Ontario. The Bill is a disgraceful measure; it is a disgrace to the right hon. gentleman who submits it, and it is a disgrace to hon. members who support it. It is neither just nor magnanimous, and I say no person who has proper respect for the principles of constitutional government, and of giving to the political sentiment of the country a proper influence, will support the measure which the right hon. gentleman has submitted. It is a violation of the principles laid down by him in 1872, and it does not carry out the object which the right hon. gentleman stated was his object to-day, but which we know is not his object, because his object is to secure to himself and his friends that power which he believes the country, if fairly represented, would not give him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not at all surprised at the great warmth displayed by the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bothwell. They do not like the Bill, and why do they not like it? Because they think by a fair and equal adjustment of the population of Ontario they may lose some seats which they have to-day. When Mr. Fox made the great mistake of declaring that the Prince of Wales had a right to assume the Regina without a vote of Parliament, Mr. Pitt said triumphantly:

"I will unwhig that hon. gentleman if he ever goes back on whig principles."

The sole objection of hon. gentlemen opposite to the Bill is because we are equalizing the population.

Several hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Their sole objection, I say, is that we are equalizing the population, which was the great Reform principle of representation by population. In former times William Lyon Mackenzie raised the cry of representation by population, and made it ring through the Provinces of Upper Canada, and Upper Canada demanded that measure almost at the point of the bayonet. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite do not like representation by population. They do not like that the population should be arranged in constituencies nearly equal in numbers, and which would express, at all events much more equally, what the deliberate opinion of Ontario is than can be done now with constituencies varying from 30,000 to 34,000. This Bill secures in a great measure equality, and the different constituencies represented, if this Bill passes, will come here with equal force, authority and voice, and will represent more clearly and fully the views of all sections of the Province than is now done with the present inequalities. The hon. gentleman has quoted my speech in 1872. I do not go back on a single word of that speech. Although the hon. gentleman has said we received the support of the Opposition at that time, we received no such support; we were attacked as we have been now for gerrymandering, and making changes with political designs. I remember very well a distinguished and illustrious friend of my own, who sat on the other side of the House producing the picture of one of the ridings of Huron, and said they might worship that, because there was nothing like it in heaven above, on the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth.

An hon. MEMBER. That was true.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The same objections were taken to the Bill of 1872, as are taken to the Bill of 1882, and with just as little reason. The same changes were brought ten years ago as now; but notwithstanding that fact hon. gentlemen opposite are so convinced we acted justly in that re-adjustment, that they are anxious to adhere to it; and, in 1892, if the hon. member for Bothwell and myself are sitting in the same relative positions as we are now, no doubt he will argue, and the leader of the Opposition will contend for the settlement of 1892, just as he is fighting now for the re-adjustment we made ten years ago. I do not go back on a single word of what I said then. I said then, and I say now, it is of great importance to keep the arrangement of the electoral and municipal divisions which were the same; but if the hon. gentlemen will take up the Consolidated Statutes of Ontario they will see what the Liberal party headed by Mr. Mowat did.

Mr. RYMAL. What has that got to do with the question?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I contended then that it was of great importance that the municipal counties should be the electoral districts, and I gave my reasons: that young men would become first councillors, then reeves and then wardens, and there would be municipal as well as political uniformity. But we see that the Ontario Government have disregarded that—as is their business—and they have changed the municipal and judicial divisions.

Mr. BLAKE. How did they do it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will produce, in future discussions, a calculated statement, showing exactly what they have done. I say that Ontario has disregarded this principle, and has made the municipal districts different from the electoral districts. The hon. leader of the Opposition has said it is very wrong to take a township from one electoral district and add it to another. Mr. Mowat split townships and villages into two; and when I find that Ontario had, by a Liberal government, acting on Liberal principles, born, cradled and raised in accordance with the principles of responsible government, disregarded that principle, drawing a distinction between electoral and municipal representation, the whole object of my argument is gone and the impropriety of the change, if there be an impropriety, rests on the Liberal Government of Ontario, which is regulated by the power behind the Throne—the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition here. I did not hear what the hon. gentleman exclaimed against the redistribution of seats for the Province of Ontario. I did not hear his indignant tones ringing either on the stump, the platform, or elsewhere, against the legislation in that Province, and if the principle which I laid down in 1872 is to be destroyed, the blame rests there and not with us. Great was the sin, according to the hon. gentleman's language, and great will be the retribution of justice under this Bill. I remember something which happened in this House when the hon. gentlemen were sitting on this side. Do not we remember that there was a contest for the seat in North Wellington—there was a cross protest, one against Dr. Orton the other against Mr. Higinbotham. The latter held the seat, but while the matter was under trial before the Courts, Mr. Higinbotham introduced a Bill to so dispose of a township—to gerrymander it—so that if the protest went against him and he was unseated he would certainly be elected again. We did not hear the hon. gentlemen protest against that. They condoned it, they supported it and they acquiesced in it. There they sit, these purists. They countenanced that Bill and they countenanced the gerrymandering of the township of Tuckersmith to another riding, but we all remember that the whole country declared: "Thank God, we have a Senate to prevent such a course." This Bill which was introduced in the case of Mr. Higinbotham was only dropped at the last moment; first, because it was too late in the Session, and, second, because the Senate would not stand it, as they saw by the way they had acted in the Tuckersmith case—they would not stand the infamy, to use the language of hon. gentleman opposite. I declare that this Bill is an equalization, in a very large degree, of the population; that it cures many anomalies in the representation. The hon. gentleman says: "Why do you not include the Lower Provinces in the re-arrangement?" Why, Sir, Ontario was the only Province, I believe, that fought the battle of representation by population. Quebec, I think, went against that principle, and if they are satisfied with the mode of distribution I do not think it is at all necessary, when there is no alteration in the number of their representatives, that we should interfere and force that principle upon them; but we, the majority of the Ontario representatives in this House, are fighting the battle of representation by population against the indignant protests of hon. gentlemen opposite. We, Sir, stand on the great principle of representation, by population on the floor of this House. Then, again, they say it is done for political purposes. It is an unworthy, an unparliamentary and un-British idea, that political majorities go by geography and that opinions are cast iron. Look what a shifting sand are the political proclivities of any portion of the country. In 1874, the hon. gentleman opposite had a large majority in the counties, and in some of them, which hon. gentlemen call Tory counties, they had majorities. They would have had no objection then to representation by population carried out on the return of 1874. Then, Sir, in 1878 there was a complete change. There was a much larger majority returned against the hon. gentleman opposite than there was for him in 1874. It shows that the argument to be drawn from the supposed political proclivities of any locality is worthless—there is nothing in it. It is a proud thing for the Province of Ontario to be able to show by the manner in which they decided in 1874, and reversed their decision in 1878—the hon. gentleman says they are going to reverse their decision again in 1883—that they are not governed by hereditary or ancestral politics, that they are not governed by any tie of party, but that their decisions, whether they are right or wrong in individual cases, are given freely and independently; and as we are threatened that they will decide against us again if we do, so we will have to submit with Christian resignation. It is a proud thing for us to say, while we are carrying out the principle of equalization of representation by population, that there is no fear or dread that the people will be less independent, less inclined to use their votes when they are members of a large constituency, than when they are members of a small one. But there is a timidity across there. They would rather bear the ills they have than fly to others that they know not of. They are afraid of the change. They are afraid of having to go to a new element —to trust a new element in any given constituency. They thought they had their little arrangements with the present constituencies, and they do not want any new elements which would alter or free the constituencies from the alliances, right or wrong, of party caucuses, party organization and party manipulation. I stand on the principle that this measure is a fair one; that it is a Bill which equalizes the population, which acknowledges the principle which was pressed to a successful completion by the Liberal party—the old Reform party of Canada—since that time adopted by all parties as being the true principle, the real basis of representative institutions. This, Mr. Speaker is, I think and hope, a sufficient answer to the fears and apprehensions and the declamatory denunciations of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE. During the twenty-two years I have sat opposite the hon. gentleman, I never recollect any speech he made, less pregnant with argument of any sort than the one he delivered to-day. It is perfectly manifest that this is a scheme from end to end for the political aggrandizement of the hon. gentleman and his friends. There is no excuse whatever for the measure as he has brought it in. I was surprised to hear him say that his reason for doing so was that the principle of representation by population had never been asked for in the other Provinces, but that as Ontario had demanded it as a recognized principle, he used it in order to aggrandize his own followers. Sir, he ought to be ashamed, if shame can be brought to his countenance, to introduce such a measure as this. He has proved on all occasions during this Session that he is a traitor to his own Province in its feelings and interests. The hon. gentleman has not failed to try, by every effort in his power, to thwart his own Province; he has denied it political power in the aggregate, and now he brings in a sub-division of the constituencies in order to do it in detail. The migration of agents and candidates to the capital from all parts of the west for the last few weeks has proved that his sole object has been the aggrandizement of the political party of which he is the head. I can put my finger on gentlemen who were brought here for the purpose of being consulted with regard to the division of the constituencies.

Mr. BERGERON. Do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Was not the Tory candidate for North York brought here?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; he was not.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I had the pleasure, if it is a pleasure, of travelling with him in one of the cars one night, and I heard my own name mentioned and my own constituency canvassed by one of two gentlemen, one of whom was a Tory candidate at the last election; and I heard the assurance given that York would be so arranged that neither Mackenzie nor Widdifield would have the slightest chance—that Mr. Anderson had just returned, and had secured such an arrangement, and the arrangement mentioned was precisely what is carried out in the Bill to-day. Why, Sir, there is a gentleman from Middlesex here at present, who has evidently come in at the last in order to be sure that West Middlesex, for which he is a candidate, will be properly attended to. The same thing is boasted of by Conservative candidates all over the country. The hon. gentleman knows that in the Lower Provinces no division that he could make would benefit him; that he calculates to be able to destroy largely a political party in his own Province by such infamous schemes as that which he has proposed to-day. The hon. gentleman endeavors to mitigate his iniquity by saying that Mr. Mowat and the Local Legislature interfered with municipal divisions. Will he tell one case in which that was done?

Mr. FARROW. In my own riding. The town of Wingham.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The town of Wingham was partly in two counties..

Mr. FARROW. The township of Turnberry.

Mr. BOWELL. For the county of Dufferin the township of Mono was taken from Cardwell, the township of Amaranth from South Wellington, the township of Mulmur from South Simcoe, and I could name others. This is disarranging municipalities.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The case the hon. gentleman has mentioned is not in point. I do not wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite are impatient. If they have the feelings of men about them, they ought to feel impatient. They ought to feel scandalized by the measure which their hon. leader has brought forth. The case mentioned by the hon. Minister of Customs is the case of a municipal district created at the instance of the inhabitants—a municipal county created which was not in existence before.

Mr. HAGGART. What about Cardwell?

Mr. MACKENZIE. It became necessary to give additional members, and the county of Cardwell was made an electoral district for that purpose. What harm was there in that? Who ever complained of it?

Mr. HAGGART. The district of Cardwell was to consist of Caledon, Albion, Adgela and Tecumseth, all townships taken from South Simcoe, and the village of Bolton.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Exactly. The additional representation had to be given where the population lived. Here we find the county of Middlesex, with a population of 72,000, getting four members, while the counties of Kent and Lambton have a population for five members, and two or three thousand over, and yet they do not receive that representation. It is so arranged that part of Kent goes into Elgin, and part of Lambton goes to the old county of Bothwell, while the part now in Bothwell is included in Lambton. The hon. gentleman has so arranged Lambton that he has given the villages that are in the midst of one municipality to the other county, in order to secure, if possible, one member. I shall discuss the matter in detail, however, when we go into Committee. The hon. gentleman has given no reply to the statements presented to the House by the hon. member for West Durham in regard to the populations in the large counties in the Lower Provinces. The hon. gentleman says that he wishes to have the population evenly divided; but if he can show me a single instance in which his manipulation of the population has not been in the interest of his own political party, I shall be very much surprised.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I will mention one. The county of Essex is divided for the purpose of representation exactly as it is for the Local Legislature, with the exception that a Reform township is taken from Kent and added to Essex. For my own part, I would be glad if that was not the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, it is thought that the one county would be obtained, while the other was safe, and that was the hon. gentleman's own view, I have no doubt.

Mr. PATTERSON. No; it was against my wish that it was done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He protested strongly against it, I know.

Mr. CARLING. I think the hon. gentleman will find that the west riding of Middlesex has not been changed politically.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, I have not gone into it in detail, but I have no doubt it is changed politically, and I have no doubt my hon. friend from London (Mr. Carling) was a consulting party in these arrangements. If the hon. gentleman says he was not consulted I will accept his statement. He does not answer me. I recollect many years ago that I had to trot out the hon. gentleman, but he would not come.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Somebody had to be consulted.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Of course, and therefore all the sitting members and political aspirants were called together, from Dan to Beersheba, in order to make known to the head of the clan the precise measures necessary to secure success in each of their districts. And this is done by a gentleman at the head of the Government, who is supported to administer the affairs of the country with some regard to fair play, and to respect the interests of the country more than the interests of party. I believe that, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's trickery—I think his masterpiece of political trickery—it will do him a great deal of harm in some districts where the manly feelings of some will be partially aroused to the injustice he is trying to perpetrate. He told us he is the guardian of the sacred principle of representation by population—a sacred principle that he devoted a lifetime to oppose, but which he was willing to accept and act upon when it became absolutely necessary to secure himself in power, as he would to-morrow or next day accept any principle however violent and revolutionary that would keep himself and party in power. It is the duty of the Government, even if possessed of a large majority, to pay some regard to the principles of justice and equality to all classes in administering the affairs of the country. He has ever placed his party interests, however, before patriotism; he subjects everything that concerns the interests of the country, or that in any way affects his opponents, to the crucial test of party advantages to be reaped by himself and friends. I can only say that I trust the direct effect of the hon. gentleman's measure will not, to the extent he is calculating upon, increase his power, as it certainly will not increase his prestige in the country.

Mr. RYMAL. I will say a few words in reference to the change proposed in South Wentworth. It was not sufficient that Wentworth, as at present proposed, should be made out of two counties; in order to make it Tory, the Government have drawn from three electoral divisions. They have come within a mile of the county buildings, the county seat of Wentworth for seventy years, ever since Upper Canada was settled, and taken one of the most populous of her townships from her, and transferred it to Brant. They have gone some thirty-five miles to draw a portion of the population to the south riding of Wentworth. The hon. the First Minister says he did it to equalize the population. The south riding had 14,993, and as it is now it will have 15,539 residents. To effect this change he is transferring this populous township to Brant. I have heard a great many stories told by the right hon. gentleman, but did he ever tell one showing as little common sense and reason as that? No. I had some idea before I came here what was being devised by his Tory friends in Wentworth. He says he has not been waited upon by delegates from the different counties, to consult with him upon these matters; but there has been more than one delegation from Wentworth to advise the hon. gentleman, and he has followed their advice. To tell me that this change was not made with a political purpose! Why, I have read the Arabian Nights Entertainment, the Travels of Sinbad the Sailor, and of Gulliver, but any of those narratives would commend themselves to my judgment and faith, more than that statement of my hon. friend. From first to last those changes were all in the one direction. They are calculated to throw the Reform strength of a group of three or four constituencies into one and to make it absolutely Reform; and then we have taken from one, two, or three surrounding districts, which have been depleted of their Reform strength, portions of counties, in order to make two or three Tory constituencies where possible. There is not a change that does not run in that direction. To talk about justice after a game like that is to insult the common sense of every man in the House. I do not wonder that some of the hon. gentleman's followers hang their heads with shame. Oh, they can howl as loud as they like; if they had the power, they would be demons. They may well hang their heads with shame, for, fearing to meet us before the people, of whom they boasted they had the confidence, they have used their strong legislative power to legislate us out of Parliament. But they meet us with loaded dice and gerrymandering the constituencies to beat us at the polls by trickery and not by the unrestrained voice of the people. I have not had an opportunity of looking at the map, which will show something, I dare say, that would recall a document exhibited by me a few years ago, and to which the hon. the First Minister referred by saying I described it as not the likeness of anything in the heaven above or in the earth beneath. The population of Huron in 1871 was so Grit that the county had to be gerrymandered—it did not answer his purpose. I understood him to say that a township was taken off it, which I believe was to insure the catching of a Tory gudgeon in that constituency. During my twenty-five years of political life, I have never witnessed so infamous a proposition as I believe this to be. Infamous as I believe it, infamous as I regard it, I believe it will be carried out. It is brought down in the interests of hon. gentlemen who will vote for it, because it will secure them seats that they know they would lose, if the unchanged constituencies were appealed to. If it had been done in the interests of equalizing constituencies, Ontario would not have been the only Province that would have been dealt with. The other Provinces has as large inequalities as that of Ontario, with the exception of the favored borough of Niagara, and nothing has been done with them. The principle acted on is that Ontario alone is to be dealt with in this matter. Knowing that defeat stared them in the face, the Government have so gerrymandered the constituencies in Ontario that no doubt many of them will have changed their political complexion under the manipulation, and hon. gentlemen opposite will succeed to a very great extent in the object they have had in view. To say that the supporters of the Government interested have not all been consulted in this matter is sheer folly. The hon. member for Essex just now said that changes were made of which he did not approve. Was he consulted, or did he voluntarily come forward just now for the first time to say he did not approve of that change? There is not one of the Tory party in Ontario from the lowest to the greatest, that has not been consulted in this matter, and there is not a constituency represented by a Liberal from Ontario that has not had Tory delegations down here consulting the Ministers in reference to this matter. I could see them two weeks after the beginning of the Session, coming in day after day, and they were received by certain members who had the matter in charge. The whole thing has been going on as regular as clock work and now we find the result. I do not believe it will have the effect they desire, for I think that the feelings of an outraged people will revolt against such scheming as this. I have not patience to express my feelings on this subject. I feel a little like the man who was addicted to a great deal of profanity and was driving a waggon load of pumpkins up a hill. Some of the boys thought they would hear some tall swearing and lifted the tail-board out of the wagon. He drove his oxen until he got to the top of the hill, when he looked back and saw the pumpkins rolling down and the boys watching him to hear what he would say; but he said very little. One of the boys said: "Why don't you swear?" "Why," he said: "I could not do justice to the occasion." So I feel. The amenities of this House would be outraged were I to give expression to my feelings, and I do not want to outrage them. But if any hon. gentleman wishes to talk this matter over with me outside the House, there would be some strong denunciations used.

Mr. BOULTBEE. It is rather an unfortunate thing that this Bill should, on its initiation, produce a rather bad effect on the House, at least on some portion of it. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have lost their temper to a very unfortunate extent, except one of them who generally loses his temper quicker than any one else, the hon. gentleman for Centre Huron. He appeared smiling in a much more genial manner than I ever saw him in before, I conclude that he must feel secure and pretty comfortable about his seat. It is rather apparent that his colleagues do not feel very comfortable about theirs. It is an instructive example in this House, to find the sort of feeling that animates these gentlemen. We never knew before what a pure set of patriots they are. If they had to distribute the constituencies they would do it in such a way as patriotically to serve the Conservative party, to aid it by consulting those supposed to be best informed on the subject. In the way they did it in the Ontario House, we have an indication of the way they would make the distribution on this occasion. From what I know of what took place in the arrangement in the Ontario House, and from what I can bear in mind of what is proposed in this Bill, there is no such gerrymandering here as was proposed and actually carried out in Ontario. Oh, but they say then it was all right. Now the boot is on the other foot. That was done in the interest of Gritism, of the faithful. But with this Bill these hon. gentlemen have lost their temper and made use of language which properly ought not to be used on the floor of this House towards their opponents. However, the hon. member for South Wentworth made a different speech in this House from what he ever made before, for I never heard him make one unless to damage an opponent or hurt his feelings; but on this occasion he was so affected that he compared himself to a man who was driving a waggon load of pumpkins up a hill and lost them all before he got to the top. That is what I expected it would look as if some one had taken the tail boards out of the waggons of the hon. gentlemen opposite and their pumpkins had rolled down the hill, for I never saw a set of men looking so downhearted. They have attacked this Bill in an unfair manner. Not one of them said this was an arrangement to distribute the seats strictly according to population and geographical propriety. They cannot deny that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. We do deny it.

Mr. BOULTBEE. Their abject demeanor shows that they think a re-arrangement of the constituencies in Ontario strictly according to population and with geographical propriety, wipes Gritism out of existence. Why should that be so? I am unable to follow the effect of the re-arrangement, and I know the political complexion of Ontario as well as any one. I say, as was said by the hon. leader of the Government, you cannot define that in that sort of way. You do not know from one election to another what the result is going to be, but we gather from these hon. gentlemen that re-arranging the seats so as to divide Ontario into ninety-two or ninety-four constituencies—I do not remember the number—so as to give them as nearly equal population as possible, and be as geographically correct as possible, means the utter defeat and extinction of Gritism, I am not surprised it should be so. These gentlemen are determined in carrying out their own ideas, and have set themselves against the will of the people in every possible way. After having been four years here they continue to oppose that National Policy, which was passed by a larger majority than any other measure. The general feeling has not failed but it is intensified, and the people are more in favor of that policy than before. Yet we hear those hon. gentlemen, because there is a re-arrangement of the constituencies, arraigning that as a reason why they expect to be ignominiously defeated at the next elections. It would be impossible such a state of things could exist. If the people were not so strongly opposed to the policy of these hon. gentlemen it would be impossible to make any re-arrangement which would result in the entire destruction of a party. When we come to debate this measure clause by clause we shall be able to show that, as compared with the arrangement made by the friends of these hon. gentlemen in the Province of Ontario, this is a fair and statesmenlike measure, and one that will commend itself to the favor of the whole people.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before this Bill passes its first reading I wish to offer a few remarks, and I first refer to the assertion made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, as to the geographical propriety that has been observed in the construction of ridings under this Bill. I have a little diagram here which shows North Norfolk as it exists under the rearrangement. If that is a specimen of the geographical proprieties that have been observed by the right hon. gentleman, then I do not want to know much about such propriety. Here is a riding forty miles in length and four and seven-eighth miles in width in the centre. Now, geographical propriety would have been observed had the township of Norwich been taken in the riding would then have been symmetrical. But unfortunately the township of Norwich gives a Reform majority, while the township of Dereham gives a Conservative majority; consequently the geographical proprieties are observed as we find them in this diagram. Well, Sir, I apprehend that when we come to examine this Bill—a Bill which marks one of the scandalous epochs in the history of this Dominion—we shall find the geographical proprieties observed in much the same manner in many other cases. This is the Government who boast of their strength before the people, of the popularity of their policy, and that they have nothing to fear from an appeal to the people; this is the Government which is about to bring on the elections one year in advance of the proper time, in order to snatch a verdict. Not daring to wait for the fruits of their policy to ripen twelve months longer, it now resorts to this scandalous scheme of gerrymandering the constituencies in an entire Province for the purpose of obtaining a verdict by fraud from the people. Well, Sir, they may succeed. It is possible this scheme will add to the influence and to the number of votes of the party now in power at the next General Election; but I apprehend that the net result of this thing will not be as favorable as the hon. gentlemen imagine. I believe the better sense of the people of Ontario, that innate sense of justice which exist in the breasts of the people, will in thousands of instances lead them to repudiate this scandalous outrage upon the rights of the minority, although it seems, at present, that the result will be to the advantage of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who are, if I may use the term, drunk with power. But, ultimately, when the record of history is made up, these men who are guilty of this outrage will be ashamed of the action of this day. I regret that a gentleman so long connected with the public affairs of this country, who has expended here so many years of his life, I refer to my right hon. friend, should allow his character to be sullied as it will be sullied by this measure. The hon. gentleman, however, seems to think it is a political necessity, but he must have very little regard as to what the verdict of the future may be, and I am sure the hon. gentlemen who sit about him will regret the step that has been taken to-day, this shameless gerrymandering of the constituencies of an entire Province, this outrage upon popular rights. I believe that the time will come, if they can feel a sense of shame—perhaps they cannot, some things can be done by men which would bring a blush of shame to the great Prince of Hades—but if they are capable of that feeling the day will come when they will regret this step, a step which I verily believe will be like a boomerang which will recoil upon them to their own discomfiture and loss.

Mr. BUNSTER. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. the First Minister to the desirability of having that part of British Columbia known as Vancouver Island, redistributed, giving all north of Nanaimo one representative, and all south of Nanaimo to Cape Beale one representative, except Victoria city which ought to have one in place of the two she now has. This would be only fair to that part of British Columbia known as Vancouver Island. I would like to call the attention of the hon. the Minister to a map which I have caused to be made, showing the geographical situation of Vancouver Island. Vancouver Island is not the inhospitable country that has been represented to him.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

FIRST READING.

The following Bill (from the Senate) was introduced and read the first time.—

Bill (No. 154) to amend "The Extradition Act, 1877,"—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 150) to incorporate the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 5) respecting the sale of railway passenger tickets.—(Sir Charles Tupper.)

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 117) to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the Inspection of Steamboats, and the examination and licensing of engineers employed on them.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 7,

Mr. McCALLUM. I think any one appointed inspector of hulls should undergo an examination to prove his competency.

Mr. McLELAN. This clause is put in so that in cases of necessity, we may call in the surveyors for the English and the French Lloyds. They are the very best men who can be found in the country for the inspection of shipping.

Mr. McCALLUM. If they are such good men, they can have no objection to being examined.

Mr. McLELAN. The very fact of their being surveyors for Lloyds' is a proof that they must have been examined.

Mr. McCUAIG. I have no doubt that Lloyds' surveyors are well qualified to give an opinion as to the construction of ocean-going vessels, but they have no experience of lake vessels, which are built on an entirely different principle.

Mr. McLELAN. It is provided that on the upper lakes, where there are no Lloyds' surveyors, competent ship-carpenters shall be provided by the Department.

On clause 9,

Mr. McCALLUM. I do not see that a man who is simply qualified to inspect the hull of the vessel can inspect the machinery also, or should be called upon to perform such work. At present there is a heavy penalty provided in the case of owners who have failed to obtain the inspection of engines and boilers.

Mr. McCUAIG. What is the object of appointing a hull inspector, unless he is qualified for his work? If qualified he does not require a Chairman of a Board of Inspectors to exercise jurisdiction over him. I contend the Chairman of the present Board is not qualified to inspect the hull; he is a mere engineer and unfit to pronounce on the hulls.

Mr. McLELAN. He is competent to discover and report any damage or defect in connection with the hull which will come to his knowledge when he is examining its boiler and machinery.

Mr. McCUAIG. What has he got to do with the hull?

Mr. McLELAN. He is to go aboard to examine the machinery and the boilers, and if he should discover or suspect anything wrong with the hull, it is proposed to give him power to call a meeting of the Board and procure an investigation; and, as a matter of course, the Board would send the hull inspector to report upon the vessel. It is an extra precaution for safety.

Mr. McCUAIG. The owners of steamboats have been called upon for the last sixteen or twenty years to pay the charges of inspection, and have not been after all relieved from the risk of unseaworthiness, because the inspectors of engines and boilers have not been able to satisfy the Courts they were qualified to pronounce on hulls. I object to the Chairman of the Board, who is nothing more than an engineer, having anything to do with the hull of a vessel.

Mr. McCALLUM. The 11th clause gives protection enough to the public, because if anything happens, if the vessel is injured in her machinery, hull or equipments, the owner is liable to a fine of $200 for every day he neglects reporting the matter to the inspector. After all that, more protection is proposed.

Mr. McLELAN. The word "hull" is left in for the reason that the inspector of machinery is supposed to visit the vessels oftener than the inspector of hulls, and if he discovers anything wrong with the hull, he is to call a meeting of the Board to have the inspector of hulls sent to the vessel. It is not provided the inspector of hulls shall have power to give a certificate.

Mr. McCUAIG. The moment you do that you raise a conflict of opinion. I have a right as the owner of a vessel to know what my responsibility is, and if you appoint an inspector, to satisfy the Court that a boat is seaworthy, his certificate should suffice. I object to an engineer having anything to do with the hull. Do you give the same power to the inspector of hulls to examine the engines and boilers of which he knows nothing?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes. If the inspector of hulls sees or suspects that anything is wrong with the boiler it will be his duty to inform the inspector of machinery.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon. Minister says that this clause was in the former Bill. That is no argument, because we went wrong before. The object of this Bill should be to set us right. I object to the inspection of boilers being under the control of the Chairman of the Board; the man appointed to inspect knows how to inspect. I, therefore, move that the word "hull" be struck out of the 2nd line of clause 9.

Amendment negatived.

On clause 10,

Mr. McCALLUM. I have something to say on this clause. The master should report to the owner and the owner to the inspector; the master should be made liable.

Mr. McLELAN. Suppose the ship was away from the owner, how could the master report then?

Mr. McCALLUM. Say the owner or agent.

Mr. McCUAIG. You first of all demand the right of appointing an inspector of the hull and engine, and after the engineer is placed on a boat with a certificate of your own inspector, and he neglects his duty, you subject the owner to a $200 fine for any neglect. Why should you fine the owner? The man who is guilty of dereliction of duty is the man who ought to suffer.

On clause 14,

Mr. McCALLUM. I move that this clause be struck out, it is entirely unnecessary, and is putting power in the hands of the inspector which he should not have.

Amendment negatived.

On clause 16,

Mr. McCUAIG. I feel it my duty to say publicly on the floor of this House that this inspector has built several vessels for men in Upper Canada, and in every case they were ruined. After the calamity at London, which befel this country by the operation of this very law, the hon. Minister tries to give him more power than he had before. The power given to him in this Bill is more than any man should be entrusted with in the country. I say he is unfit to examine the hulls of boats, and his experience is not such as to justify the giving to him of these powers. I saw this Bill before it was printed, and it has been since altered very materially, I suppose at the instance of this inspector.

Mr. McCALLUM. I know the Chairman very well and I know him to be a good and efficient officer in the discharge of his duties as far as the inspection of steamboat boilers and engines are concerned. The very fact of there having been so few accidents in Ontario proves that he discharged his duty efficiently, but at the same time I object strongly to putting anything in this Act but what is in the interests of steamboat owners and the people, because anything you put in it Mr. Risley will carry out to the letter. As to the accident which took place last year at London on, what I may call a frog pond, I consider it was the fault altogether of the man in charge of that boat at the time and not the fault of the inspector. The captain took four passengers on board where he ought to have taken only one, and if he could not keep off the crowd he ought never to have left the wharf.

Mr. McLELAN. We are not giving the inspector any more power than he had before.

Mr. McCALLUM. I object to sub-section 2 of clause 11. It requires the boiler to be swept out in order that the inspector may not get his clothes dirty. It would be cheaper for the Government to provide him with a pair of overalls to keep his clothes clean.

Mr. BERGIN. It seems to me this is giving the inspector a great deal of power. He may make himself, not only very obnoxious to owners of vessels, but he may do much injury to them. It gives him the power to remove the bulk-heads at any time in order to facilitate his inspection.

Mr. McLELAN. It will be a very simple process, just unscrewing the nuts. No man can inspect a steam-boiler without requiring that to be done.

Mr. McCUAIG. Any inspector may come on board a boat and test a boiler with the cold water test which will stand as high as ninety, but he must lock her up at sixty. By this Bill the inspector may knock off twenty or thirty pounds from any boiler after being locked up at two-thirds the test pressure, at his own discretion; consequently I am precluded from using that boat to its full capacity, and am unable to connect with the railways. Are you going to give the engine and boiler inspectors power to go on board and reduce the propelling pressure so as to render the steamer valueless? It is simply preposterous. Before this Bill was printed I asked the Minister to amend sub-section 3 so as to refer any dispute between the owner and the inspector to skilled arbitrators; yet I do not find that in this Bill. Our property now is almost valueless and this will make it entirely so.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I think this clause might be amended. As it stands now, any inspector may subject a boiler to a hydrostatic test whenever he takes it into his head, no matter whether the owner has a certificate or not. He may go every week and subject it again to this hydrostatic test, and may require all these bulk-heads to be taken away at the expense of the owner. It is evident that the best feeling does not exist between the inspectors and the steamboat owners. I think it would be well to amend the clause, so that inspection should only take place upon the application of the steamboat owner, and not whenever the inspector pleases to do so. I think that when a boiler is certified in the spring, that ought to be sufficient for the season.

Mr. McCUAIG. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) forgets that the engineer is an officer under the control of the Inspector of Steam-boilers, and it is his duty to notify the owner and inspector if he sees any defects in boilers. But for twenty-five years I have never heard of an instance where an inspector examined a boiler twice during a season.

Mr. McLELAN. Suppose an engineer calls attention to the fact that the boiler requires inspection, although it was inspected five or six months previous, it could not be done if the amendments were adopted. It would be better to adopt the clause in its present form as there would be no danger of an inspector making an inspection too often.

Mr. ROCHESTER. An inspection once a year is all that is required.

Amendment negatived.

On clause 18,

Mr. McCALLUM. I move that the word "and" be substituted for the word "on" in the first line.

Amendment agreed to.

On clause 19,

Mr. McCALLUM. I move that in sub-section 2 the word "boiler-cocks" be struck out.

Mr. McLELAN. It is important that these words should remain in, as I am informed that accidents have occurred by the boiler-cocks being screwed loosely in the boiler, there being very little hold on them, so that when pressure is on they fly off.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. McCUAIG. The City of London, a vessel lost at London with 208 passengers, was inspected by Mr. McNeely, and yet my hon. friend says she was not. She had been inspected by him, however, before the accident. That is about the general result—the owners suffer, and these men get off scot free, and this Bill is put through the House without being properly considered and understood. Steamboat owners have paid some $25,000 or $30,000 over and above what has paid these men, who are extravagant in their general expenses.

Mr. McCALLUM. I wish to amend clause 33, which provides that these boats shall have a supply of fire-buckets of metal, leather or other similar material by striking out the words "metal, leather or other." I believe wooden buckets are the best, as one of them thrown to a man overboard would enable him to float and save his life while a metal or a leather bucket would carry him to the bottom.

Amendment negatived.

On clause 35,

Mr. McCUAIG. This clause provides that each steamboat of 200 tons and upwards, shall be provided with 200 life-preservers; and each steamboat of less than 200 tons shall be provided with not less than three life preservers for every five passengers. The figure ought to be 250 tons instead of 200, as the measurement of vessels have been materially altered of late, in consequence of the saloons and staterooms. As has been pointed out by one of my correspondents, under this clause a vessel of 195 tons would carry about 117 life-preservers, while one of 200 tons must carry 200 life-preservers. If 200 are necessary in one case, the other number is quite too small. This shows that the Bill has been put together without proper consideration.

Mr. McLELAN. That is the law that has worked well for years. I wish to amend the clause by inserting after the word "passengers," the word "crew," in order to provide water-floats for them also.

Mr. McCUAIG. These wooden floats are of no avail to save a man, as we know by experience; they have been thrown away, and by this Bill it is proposed to revive them. I do not see the use of having a number of them besides the cork life-preservers, except in cases of excursions, and then in such cases I would place a standard pine board, 18 feet long, 10 inches wide and 1 inch thick, for every passenger or excursionist on board the vessel.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. My hon. friend knows that these wooden life-preservers have been used for a long time. Experience has suggested no difficulty regarding them, and it is scarcely worth while to make a change.

Mr. McCUAIG. Since this Bill was framed originally, the late Government altered the measurement of vessels so as to make it about three times what it really is. I have been forty years connected with the transport trade, and have not very often imposed on the indulgence of this House, but I look on this clause as very important for the preservation of life. Our whole inspection system for years past has been a myth. These different clauses are pushed through the House without being properly considered. Our property is rendered almost valueless as an investment, and bankruptcy stares every vessel owner in the face.

On clause 40,

Mr. McCALLUM. I think that steamboat owners should be allowed to say they will place a pump on board their vessel without being dictated to by the inspectors. A steamboat owner knows his own requirements. I protest against the way this Bill has been carried. If the hon. Minister will not allow what is right and reasonable, I will divide the House on the third reading on every single amendment that I have proposed, if it takes a week to do it.

Mr. MILLS. I am glad to see the hon. gentleman has woke up to the importance of observing the well-known parliamentary rule, that supplies should not be voted until legislation is brought down. He sees now the mischief arising out of the policy the Government has pursued.

Mr. McCALLUM. I do not see what the supplies have to do with it, and as far as that goes the supplies are not passed yet. I do not want to say I am going to obstruct legislation, but I intend to exercise my right in the interests of the people, and I ask the hon. Minister for a reasonable concession to the steamboat interests. I move that subsection 5 of clause 40 be struck out.

Amendment negatived.

On clause 41,

Mr. McCALLUM moved that the word "passenger" be added before the words "main deck of the vessel."

Amendment agreed to.

On clause 43,

Mr. McCUAIG. When the Chairman of the Steamboat Inspection was here from Toronto I was asked to go over to the Marine Department. I suggested that each sailor should be provided with a kind of cork waistcoat, which he should wear in storms and which would preserve him in case of accident. As a rule, the more intelligent a sailor is, the more he appreciates danger, and if he has something about his person to preserve him when he jumps into the water he would not be the first to jump into the lifeboat in case of accident, but would be the last to leave the ship, while assisting the passengers to escape before him. This suggestion was entirely ignored. One would suppose that the Minister would readily have consented to a thing of that kind, but no heed is paid to it. I think the Minister ought not to be above advice coming from members of this House, who, having had experience, can give intelligent advice.

On clause 44,

Mr. McCALLUM. I disagree with the suggestion of my hon. friend from Prince Edward. The poor sailors have quite enough to carry now. Let the owners of vessels provide them with life-preservers if they wish. With regard to the number of fire-extinguishers which a vessel shall carry, I think it should be fixed by this Bill and not left to the whims of inspectors. We want no Orders in Council, changing the number from one year to another.

Mr. McCUAIG. As an owner of passenger steamers, I consider every possible requirement for the extinguishment of fire should be given, and I am quite willing to leave that in the hands of the inspectors. With reference to cork waistcoats, my hon. friend happens to be engaged in tug-boats and not in passenger steamers as I am, and I think I know quite as much as he does about the necessity of deck-hands being provided with life-preservers.

On clause 45,

Mr. McLELAN moved to amend it, so that applicants for the post of engineer, in case the Board is not sitting, may obtain a certificate until the next meeting of the Board.

Amendment agreed to.

On clause 52,

Mr. LANE. I think something should be added to that clause. I believe accidents, which have occurred during the last few years, have been chiefly caused by overloading the vessels with freight. Last year, the Jane Miller went down in Georgian Bay with some thirty lives on board; two years previously the Waubuno was lost, and a year or so before the Simcoe, not one being left in either case to tell how the accident occurred. But it is well understood that two causes were mainly to blame: one, the overloading, and the other that the vessels were not properly constructed. There is generally an accumulation of freight at the last of the season, and there is a great anxiety on the part of steamboat owners to carry all they can the last trip or two. I think there should be a resident inspector at the chief ports on the great lakes to see that vessels are not overloaded. The matter is a serious one, and should engage the attention of the Government.

Mr. McCALLUM. So long as we are engaged in navigating the waters in this country accidents will occur. The men who are in charge of the vessel, who risk their lives upon her, and who know how she will act in a heavy sea, are the best judges of how heavily she may be loaded. The hon. gentleman says that there were no survivors of the accidents he mentions, and he then goes on to say that the cause of their loss was overloading, but how does he know. I have heard that the Jane Miller was built with only a single frame, and was not strong enough for the lake service though she would do well enough for a river. How would an inspector be able to tell how a vessel would behave on the water? You cannot lay down a cast-iron rule and say that every vessel shall only be loaded so much, as a proper load depends altogether on the make of the vessel.

Mr. DAWSON. The hon. gentleman has mentioned the loss of the Simcoe on Lake Huron. The reason that vessel was lost was because she was loaded with wheat in bulk, which shifted. Wheat is not allowed to be carried in bulk in ocean vessels, and I think a similar provision ought to be made with regard to vessels on the lakes.

Mr. McCUAIG. The best guarantee that a vessel will not be overloaded is that the master and mariners risk their lives on the vessels they sail.

On clause 55,

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). This clause, which is intended to prevent the master of a vessel from overloading it with passengers, is an important one, but I think the penalty is too small. We all know the great accident that took place at London, on which occasion it was proved the vessel was overloaded. I think the penalty of $200 for such a crime is too little; and it ought to be at least $1,000.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I quite agree with my hon. friend. When the captain of a vessel is so regardless of human life as to allow it to be overloaded, I think he ought to be held to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be subject to imprisonment as well as a fine.

Mr. McCALLUM. If the penalty were made any larger, I do not think you would be able to enforce it.

Mr. McLELAN. I will agree to strike out $200 and insert $500, making the fine not less than $50 and not more than $500. If it were made too large, actions might not be brought, and the measure would therefore be inoperative.

Mr. ROCHESTER. This House cannot be too strict in providing that captains and engineers do their duty properly. I saw last summer, while on a steamboat on the St. Lawrence, an officer of another steamer lie down on the safety-valve, and increase the head of steam so much as to cause the vessel to rush ahead with much greater speed, and there were a great number of passengers on board.

Mr. McCUAIG. That was a very remarkable case, because there is always an iron case over the safety valve. I think it should be provided that any violation of the clause respecting the number of passengers a steamer should carry should be punished with the penalty of $500; passengers lives are at stake, and the disobedient officer should be the victim.

Mr. McLELAN. This is a new regulation never tried before, and too high a penalty would make it inoperative.

Mr. McCALLUM'S motion, that clause 56 be struck out, was negatived.

On clause 57,

Mr. McCUAIG said that this provision for good and sufficient gang-boards was never carried out, and there is no use in retaining it in this Bill.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Why can it not be enforced ?

Mr. McCUAIG. Because these iron hand-rails on the gang-boards are never used.

On clause 62,

Mr. McCALLUM. I believe this clause violates the principles of British law, which says that a man is always considered innocent until found guilty. The clause reads:

"If any damage to any person or property is sustained in consequence of the non-observance of any of the provisions of this Act, imposing any duty on the owner or master of any steamboat, the same shall be deemed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to have been caused by the wilful default of the master or other person having charge of the steamboat, in respect of which such non-observance has occurred, or such damage is done, and the owner of such steamboat, in all civil proceedings, and the master or other person having charge thereof, in all proceedings whether civil or criminal, shall be subject to the legal consequence of such default." (31 V., c. 65, s. 36)

This goes very far; if a man is brought up before a court for anything that has happened, he will have to prove his innocence. This should be amended.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This provision only applies in the case of wilful default.

Mr. McCUAIG. No man in the world will be able to observe all the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. McCALLUM. It is time enough to punish a man when you find him guilty. A man should not be obliged to clear himself of such charges. I wish to amend that clause to provide that the owner of such a steamboat in all proceedings whether civil or criminal, shall be subject to the consequences of such default. I think that will meet the case sufficiently.

Mr. McLELAN. I do not think it is any improvement.

Mr. McCUAIG. If such laws are passed, with their restrictions and penalties we shall soon have no steamboats at all. Most of these clauses are ill-considered and useless.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. This seems to me a most reasonable clause, which does not violate any principle of English law; because in the first place a complainant, before taking action, must have sustained some injury in consequence of the non-observance of some rule or regulation which ought to have been observed; and the clause simply provides that if a man sustains damage in this way that, prima facie, it shall be considered as done wilfully by the master or owner. It is open to the master to show that it is not done wilfully.

Mr. McCALLUM. You violate that principle of British law, if you hold a man guilty before he is proved to be guilty. It is a most monstrous provision.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. If default is made he is presumed to be guilty.

Mr. SPROULE. If the accident occurs through any violation of rules of course there must be proof, and if the rules are violated of course the penalty is a fair one.

On clause 64,

Mr. McCUAIG. I move that "Justice of the Peace" be struck out. There are justices of the peace in Ontario unable to write.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported.

THE IRON INDUSTRY.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BURPEE. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to place in your hands the following amendment:—

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that pig, bar and sheet iron, boiler plate and tubing are materials for a large number of important Canadian manufactures in extensive use.

That the increased burden of duties now imposed on such materials enhances the cost thereof to the damage of both the manufacturers and consumers, and that the duties on such materials for manufacturers should be reduced so as to enable the manufacturer to supply the consumer at a lower cost.

In placing this amendment in your hands I may say it is so much in the interests of manufacturers that I hope the hon. members of this House will support it unanimously. This was part of our policy from the introduction of the Tariff in 1879. We advocated it on the ground that while the revenue of the country was large and necessarily increasing yearly, it should be so adjusted as to give a fair and reasonable protection to the manufacturing interests and the interests of all classes of the community. We took the ground that some parts of that Tariff were very objectionable indeed, that the taxes of breadstuffs, fuel, sugar, and raw material were injurious to the best interests of the country, and this resolution is carrying out the policy we then advocated. The raw material of iron enters largely into many of our most important industries, and taxation on it affects mechanics as well as manufacturers. There seems to be no advantage whatever to any person in the tax placed upon iron. There is one industry in Nova Scotia, the Canada Steel Company, who were supposed to be benefitted some by this tax, but to little extent. They themselves have said, over their own signature, that the tax on other articles entering into their manufacture destroyed entirely all the benefits they got from the duty on iron. I will read you a letter written by the agents of that company on the 4th of April, 1879:

"To the Editor of the Montreal Gazette.

"SIR,—We notice in your letter of this morning a telegram from Londonderry, N. S., stating that the Steel Company of Canada 'intends branching out in very extensive and enlarged works.' This statement is incorrect—as the duty of $2 per ton put on pig iron is barely adequate to counterpoise that put on coal, and will neither encourage the Steel Company to enlarge its operations, nor be likely to induce other companies to establish iron works in this country.

Your obedient servants,

"GILLESPIE, MOFFATT, & Co.,
Agents Steel Co. of Canada.

"Montreal, 4th April, 1879."

This testimony was given one year after the Tariff was passed. We find by the returns that the imports of iron for the present year are larger than they were last year, or the year previous. We find also, that whatever advantage that has been taken from the existence of the Tariff on iron, the Steel Company of Canada have taken that advantage, and just as the English iron advanced in price they advanced their price. I will read you the following table showing the imports of iron:—

Years.	Cwt's.	Value.	Average Duty.	Duty Collected.
1878	1,773,237 88,662 Ton	$2,852,644	3½ p. c.	$104,289
1880	1,587,817 79,391 Ton	2,815,984	13¼ p. c.	388,117
1881	2,704,859 135,243 Ton	3,299,188	13½ p. c.	441,631

also manufactures of iron imported :

	Value.	Average Duty.	Duty Collected.
1878	$4,449,997	13½ p. c.	$ 606,880
1880	3,882,297	24½ p. c.	934,626
1881	5,115,686	24 p. c.	1,226,859

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is an enormous increase in imports which was due no doubt in a great measure to the increased volume of business done and to the great rise of railway stocks going on in the country, and to the cheapness of money; but there is no indication whatever that the Steel Company of Canada supplied any more than they did before the tariff was adopted. To show how near the Londonderry Iron Company keep pace with the iron market of Canada, I have prepared a table of the prices of bar iron for the years 1878, 1879, 1880 and 1881, imported, and the prices of Londonderry iron:

"Londonderry has the advantage in time, free from rust, delivered as made. Interest, &c., merchants' per cent. on duty as well."

The price for 100 lbs. of English iron in Montreal in 1879 was $1.63; 1880, $1.89; 1881, $1.70. Londonderry iron in Montreal, 1879, $1.80; 1880, $2.15; 1881, $2.00. Price of Londonderry iron at St. John: 1878, $1.90; 1879, $2.10; 1880, $2.45; 1881, $2.20. So the prices for iron landed in Montreal from Londonderry have kept pace year by year with the corresponding prices from Liverpool, keeping about 10c. per 100 lbs. higher than it could be imported from Great Britain. Sheet iron is worth more, and they could afford to have that additional price on Londonderry iron on account of the damages it may receive from rust, &c., on the voyage out from Liverpool. They have taken advantage not only of the insurance and the duty, but of the damage liable on iron imported from Great Britain. So, in the iron trade, the imports have not fallen off but have increased rapidly, and the Londonderry manufacturers have taken the full benefit of the duty on it as compared with the English iron. The interests that are large consumers of iron and manufactures of are farmers composing 500,000 of the population. Iron they use is increased 5½ to 17½ per cent.; nails, 17½ to 30 per cent.; horse-shoes and nails, 17½ to 30 per cent.; tools, saws, hammers, chisels, axes, adzes, augers, 17½ to 30 per cent. Agricultural implements—Mowing, threshing, reaping, fanning, &c., such as shovels, spades, forks, &c., 17½ to 25 per cent.; carriages and waggon, 17½ to 30 per cent.; harness, 17½ to 25 per cent.; chains, &c., 17½ to 20 per cent.; bolts, nuts, screws, 17½ to 35 per cent.; wire for hay, 5 to 15 per cent.; hardware, 17½ to 30 per cent.; scales, 17½ to 30 per cent. The average advance is 12½ per cent., and the Tariff is no advantage. Lumbermen employ 75,000 hands. His iron is increased from 5 to 17½ per cent.; saws, 17½ to 30 per cent.; files, 17½ to 30 per cent.; chains, 17½ to 20 per cent.; sled fixings, 17½ to 30 per cent.; axes, 17½ to 30 per cent.; tools, &c., 17½ to 30 per cent. The average advance 12½ per cent., and no advantage accrued from the National Policy. Blacksmiths employ 10,000 to 11,000 men. Iron is increased from 5 to 17½ per cent.; nails, 17½ to 30 per cent.; horse-shoes, 17½ to 30 per cent.; anvils, 30 per cent.; vices, 17½ to 30 per cent.; bellows, 17½ to 30 per cent.; bolts, &c., 17½ to 30 per cent.; tools of all kinds, 17½ to 30 per cent.; machinery, lathes, &c., 10 per cent. if not C, 17½ per cent. if C, 25 per cent. all; coal, free to 50 cents per ton; iron screws, 17½ to 35 per cent.

The additional tax on every $100 is 12½ per cent., or $12.50 per $100, and there is no advantage from the National Policy. Carpenters employ 6,000 people, who have to provide their own tools. Nails are increased from 17½ to 30 per cent.; locks, 17½ to 30 per cent.; hinges, 17½ to 30 per cent.; screws, 17½ to 35 per cent.; bolts and nuts, 17½ to 30 per cent.; tacks and finishing nails, 17½ to 30 per cent. The materials used annually cause an additional tax of $12.50 on every $100, or 12½ per cent. Of coopers, there are 3,500 employed. Iron is increased from 5 to 17½ per cent.; tools, 17½ to 30 per cent.; screws and rivets, 17½ to 35 per cent.; nails, 17½ to 30 per cent. The increase in raw materials is equal to 12½ per cent., or $12.50 on every $100. Cabinet-makers employ 5,000 hands, and the home production is 97¼ per cent. of the whole consumption. Tools, a large item, as saws, axes, chisels, planes, vices, &c., are increased from 17½ to 30 per cent.; locks and hinges, 17½ to 30 per cent.; screws, 17½ to 35 per cent.; bolts and nuts, 17½ to 30 per cent.; tacks and brads, 17½ to 30 per cent. Carriage-makers employ 8,000 or 9,000 hands, and the home production equals 99 per cent.; iron is increased from 5 to 17½ per cent.; screw bolts and nuts, 17½ to 35 per cent.; screws, 17½ to 35 per cent.; malleable castings, 17½ to 25 per cent.; tools, a large item, 17½ to 30 per cent.; E.P. trimmings, 17½ to 30 per cent.; hardware, 17½ to 30 per cent.; axles and springs, anvils, 17½ to 30 per cent. Agriculture implements employ 3,000 hands, and the home production is 95¼ per cent.; pig iron is removed from free to $2 per ton; iron, 5 to 17½ per cent.; iron bars, 5 to 17½ per cent.; iron rivets, 17½ to 30 per cent.; iron bolts, 17½ to 30 per cent.; iron castings, 17½ to 25 per cent.; nuts and bolts, 17½ to 30 per cent.; nails and tacks, 17½ to 25 per cent.; rivets and trees, 17½ to 30 per cent.; screws, &c., 17½ to 35 per cent.; sieve wire, 17½ to 25 per cent.; brass and copper castings 17½ to 30 per cent.; iron wire, 5 to 15 per cent.; tools (all kinds), 17½ to 30 per cent.; machinery, 10½ to 25 per cent.; coach screws, anchors, bars, &c., 17½ to 30 per cent. The average increase is 12½ per cent. On manufactured goods the increase is from 17½ to 25 per cent., or 7½ per cent.; raw materials, from 6½ to 16 per cent., or 9½ per cent. Nail and tack makers employ 1,000 hands, and the home production is 95 per cent. Nail iron increased from 5 to 17½ per cent.; machinery, 10 to 25 per cent.; nail rods, 5 to 17½ per cent.; tools, 17½ to 30 per cent., Swede iron, 5 to 17½ per cent. Now, the increased Tariff of 1879 over the one existing previously was, on the raw material, 13¾ per cent., the increased duty on coal was 7½ per cent., therefore the Tariff discriminated against the nail makers, as compared with the Tariff of 1878, to the extent of 6¼ per cent.; and they are that much worse off than they were before. Thus the nail-makers complain, especially as they get no drawback on the nails they export.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If they export they get a drawback on the iron.

Mr. BURPEE. On the Londonderry iron?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Mr. BURPEE. Next we take the case of foundrymen. In 1879 they produced 93 per cent. of the articles consumed in Canada made in their foundries. They employed 8,000 men. The following are the increases in the various articles they use:—

Pig Iron	free	to	$2.00 per ton
Bar Iron	5½	"	17½ per cent.
Russian Sheet... ..	5	"	17½ per cent.
Sleepers	5	"	12½ per cent.
Iron Plate.....	5	"	13½ per cent.
Screws	17½	"	35 per cent.
Bolts and Nuts.. ..	"	"	30 per cent.
Copper, Tin, } ..	free	"	10 per cent.
Solder, Spelter } ..	5	"	15 per cent.
Wire	5	"	15 per cent.
Rivets and Screws..	17½	"	35 per cent.

The total result of the Tariff as it affects raw materials used by the foundrymen of the Dominion, as compared with 1878, is an increase from $4\frac{1}{2}$ to $14\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., including coal. Then on boiler plate there is an increase of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I do not intend to take up the time of the House more than to show first of all the effect of this duty on the raw material which enters so largely into the farming, lumbering and other industries of the country. A large number of our population have to pay the additional duty on the iron and the additional profit on the duty paid on the iron, for the merchants, I presume, in all cases charge not only the duty on the iron, but the profits on the outlay as well. Thus we find that the carpenters and the blacksmiths pay \$12.50 on every \$100 worth of materials used for building purposes, tools, &c. So with the cooper and all other laboring classes, while, on the other hand, we find that the manufacturers who are largely consumers of iron are no better off than they were before. I maintain that this amendment contains elements of large taxation to the several industries I have alluded to. I desire to place these things specifically before the House, in this amendment, because it is part of our policy to place on record the worst features of the hon. Finance Minister's policy.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I am sorry this question has been sprung upon the House without notice, as we all know that the iron industry is a very large one. Iron enters into almost everything that is used in the avocations of life, from the spade with which we till the soil up to the highest form of machinery for the purpose of saving manual labor. Had my hon. friend taken up the question of putting more duty on iron, I would have supported him willingly. Pledged as I am to support the Government—and I gave no uncertain sound on that question in my constituency—pledged to support any Tariff which would benefit the producers of iron and tend to the employment of labor, I would have joined with the hon. gentleman in asking for this increase. We all know that for every ton of iron that is produced four tons of coal are required in the various stages of its manufacture. If we produced the iron which we now import we would burn the coal down in the Lower Provinces instead of shipping it to the Upper Provinces, so that not only would we have a greater amount of coal mined, but we would have to employ a vast number of people in the various ramifications of its manufacture. But the hon. gentleman argues that the duty should be taken off, and I will try to show him presently that some of his grievances are ill-founded. He does not try to find a remedy for the state of things in this country. While other industries have been largely protected iron has not been sufficiently protected, and the reason is simple. If the Government were to tax iron what would hon. gentlemen opposite say? They would say: "We cannot build ships, because you tax iron so heavily that it makes ships dearer, and we cannot compete with the rest of the world." Now, I do not agree with that. I believe that if a duty were placed on the iron coming into this country, which we manufacturers call a raw material, viz., pig iron, then, instead of the price of iron being increased the competition amongst ourselves would be so great that pig iron would be as cheap, or cheaper than the cheapest we now import. If all the pig iron we now import—the hon. gentleman said it was 45,000 tons last year—were made in this country, what would be the result? In Pictou, where exist the finest iron beds in the world, side by side with abundance of coal, pig iron would be produced in large quantities, whereas now it cannot be because iron dribbles into Canada from all parts of the world. That is the complaint of the iron manufacturers, and not that the duty is too high. I had the honor of being Chairman of the Ironmen's Association, at their meeting here last year, and they proved that the duty had not only not increased the price of iron but diminished it; and that if the Government would put a higher duty on iron, the selling price would be far less than it is now, because the competition would keep down the price. Now, my hon. friend has referred to the increase of the duty on iron from 17 per cent. to 35 per cent.

Mr. BURPEE. I said from 5 to $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I took down from 17 to 35.

Mr. BURPEE. That was on screws and bolts and nuts.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Well, that is a small matter, because I might remind my hon. friend that screws and bolts and nuts are cheaper to-day than they were in previous years. My hon. friend found fault with the price of nail, plate and bar iron. Notwithstanding the increase in the duty, bar iron, nails and nail plate, are cheaper.

Mr. BURPEE. The price of bar iron in Montreal, in 1878, was $1.80 per cwt.; in 1879, $1.80; in 1880, $2.15; and in 1881, $1.85. It was about 10 cents per cwt. higher in St. John.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend shows that it was 5 cents per cwt. or $1 a ton dearer in 1881, than in 1878.

Mr. BURPEE. Besides the difference in the price in the English market, where it was 16s. 3d. less in 1881, than in 1878.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Never mind the English market. My hon. friend has shown that bar iron is only 5 cents per cwt. more than it was before. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman if he can refute the fact that nails were cheaper in 1881 than they were in 1878, notwithstanding the increase of 5 cents per cwt. in the price of bar iron.

Mr. BURPEE. The price of nails in Montreal, in 1878, was $2.60 a keg; in 1879, $2.65; in 1880, $3.15; and in 1881, $2.70; and the price in St. John in 1878 was $2.45; in 1879, $2.25; in 1880, $3.10, and in 1881, $2.70.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I entirely disagree with my hon. friend, because I know as a fact that nails were selling in St. John last year at $2.40 and $2.45 a keg. We can easily find out the prices of these grades of iron by telegraphing to the manufacturers. My hon. friend speaks of $2.70 and $2.75 being the price of those nails, but they were small. But if he takes the average between the ten and twelve penny nails, he will find the price is very much cheaper in 1881 than in 1878. The hon. gentleman did not take the average.

Mr. BURPEE. I took the large size.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Exactly; but I can produce figures from the merchants in St. John to show. What have the managers found fault with? That the Londonderry people were in a position to supply them with nail plate for nails, without competition, and could make the difference between the two markets, and were enabled to get in this country the full price of iron as against English iron—they could not import English iron to very much better advantage than they could purchase the Londonderry iron. The hon. gentleman says it was 5 cents per cwt. higher than the English iron; but everyone knows the Londonderry makes a superior nail plate, that the English makers roll out any scrap left and make an article of uncertain quality. But the quality of the Londonderry article is quite superior, for they only roll one description of iron; and any manufacturer would rather pay 5 cents more for that quality.

Mr. BURPEE. I said 10 cents higher was the average.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I took 5 cents down—he said $1.80 to $1.85.

Mr. BURPEE. I said 10 cents, but admitted the Londonderry was worth 10 cents more, being cleaner and free from rust, and that it was better to use it than the cheaper article from England.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend said that the Londonderry was slightly in advance to the English, and that the Londonderry people got the full benefit of the advance on duty.

Mr. BURPEE. That is all right.

Mr. DOMVILLE. He admits that the Londonderry iron is cleaner and better, and yet he complains it is 5 cents dearer.

Mr. BURPEE. My argument was that they kept pace with the English iron, and charged in addition 10 cents per cwt. more—that they took advantage of the duty.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I took down his words—that the cost of the Londonderry iron was 10 cents more than the English; but he stated in another place that the figures were $1.80 against $1.85, showing that his figures do not tally.

Mr. BURPEE. That was bar iron.

Mr. DOMVILLE. But my hon. friend said that he did not mean bar iron, but sheet iron. When I spoke of nuts, bolts and screws and said the manufacturer was getting his iron quite as cheap as before, the hon. gentleman said he did not mean nuts and bolts but nail plate; but I showed, according to his own figures, that the English cost $1.80, and the Londonderry, $1.85. Then he answered, the Canadian cost 10 cents more. What figures are we to take?

Mr. BURPEE. I will give you the exact figures. I said the English nail sheets, laid down in Montreal, cost in 1878 $1.70, and the Londonderry, $1.80; 1879, English, $1.70, Londonderry, $1.80; 1880, English, $2.05, Londonderry, $2.15; 1881, English, $1.70, Londonderry, $1.85. Bar iron, 1879, English, $1.63 per cwt., laid down in Montreal; Londonderry, $1.80; bar iron, 1880, English, $1.89, Londonderry, $2.15; 1881, English, $1.70, and Londonderry, $2 per 100 lbs.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend knows that the Londonderry is very different from the English and that those people roll horse-shoe iron.

Mr. BURPEE. I quoted our ordinary refined iron which was $1.70 in 1881, and $2 for the Londonderry article.

Mr. DOMVILLE. We know the ordinary refined iron is not equal to the Londonderry iron, and that if you roll a good quality of horse-shoe iron it costs 2½ cents per lb., while common barrow is as low as $1.50 and $1.45 in New Brunswick. At the time of the Fraser-Reynolds investigation, it was stated they had imported iron worth $1.60 and sold it to the Government at 4½, 5 and 6 cents per lb., and Mr. Brydges and Mr. Cunliffe were put on the stand and showed invoices, when the Committee said: "Here is a gross piece of extravagance, charging those high prices for such cheap English iron." Those invoices showed the cost to be $1.60 or $1.55, and Fraser-Reynolds' invoice was produced showing their charge per lb. But we found that of the thousands of dollars worth imported, costing $1.65 to $1.70, they had supplied the Government with about $50,000 worth, ovals, spread iron at 6 cents per lb. Here is the case—they tried to swear away the reputation of those men. That is very much a parallel case to the one I mentioned, as there is so much difference in the grades of iron, shaped and spread. If my hon. friend cannot show the House the exact grades, dimensions and qualities there is no debatable question before the House, because we do not know what we are dealing with.

Mr. BURPEE. There is one quotation for iron of a size. The iron I have quoted is for one of the largest iron merchants in Montreal, who takes the two qualities and for comparison compares the English iron equal with the Londonderry iron.

Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. member's complaint is that it costs 10 cents higher from Great Britain. Is there any compulsion to make the people pay 10 cents higher? Why does the manufacturer who is consuming that iron give 10 cents higher? If my hon. friend had said the iron was raised in price in England and consequently in this country, in consequence of this duty, there would have been something to find fault with. But my hon. friend says the iron in England changed in prices, and that while it could be imported from England for $1.80, we were paying in this country $1.90; but he does not attempt to show that the iron increased in price.

Mr. ANGLIN. That is precisely what he did say.

Mr. BURPEE. I also explained why the charge was 10 cents more.

Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. member says that the iron from England was imported at a certain price. That the Montreal consumer was compelled to buy nail plate in Canada. If they were compelled, why did they pay 10 cents per 100 lbs. more than they could import it for? He follows it up with saying the quality is better; consequently the deduction must be that it is of better value. Then my hon. friend states that the prices in England had altered. He goes as far back as 1879, and contrasted the various prices of iron in the London market and in this country. He says that it cost the consumer in 1878, $1.63 per 100 lbs., and continues his quotations until he brings it down to another when it cost $1.80. He has failed to show that the Tariff has increased the cost of iron in a greater ratio than before, except as he states, 10 cents per 100 lbs. Then he follows it up and loses his case, because he says they are compelled to buy it in this country and pay 10 cents more per 100 lbs., which nobody can compel them to pay, and at the same time qualifies his statement by saying the quality of iron for many reasons is better. There is no argument in that. My hon. friend has talked about boiler plate. Can he say it is any dearer than it was, comparatively speaking, before the Tariff?

Mr. BURPEE. Each merchant charges the duty.

Mr. DOMVILLE. That is not the point. I want to take up what is the selling price to-day. Will the hon. gentleman bring down the prices quoted in the past two years, and say that, taking into consideration the various rates in England, and comparing them with those in this country, boiler plate is any dearer.

Mr. BURPEE. It is dearer by the duty on the iron.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Will the hon. gentleman who has been so elaborate with his figures, say the difference in price in boiler plates between 1879 and 1881 shows an increase?

Mr. BURPEE. I have told the hon. gentleman twice the price was higher.

Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. gentleman told us what bar iron cost, and told us what nail plate cost, but I ask him to tell us how much dearer boiler plate is to-day than it was in 1879.

Mr. BURPEE. It is about 8 per cent. dearer.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I want the exact figures; I do not want any 8 per cent. My hon. friend has not perhaps looked into that, perhaps he is dealing with the question in the abstract from his point of view. We believe in giving the people employment, and in encouraging the manufacture of boiler plate in this country, and are proud to see our hon. friend support us by admitting that the iron we produce is so far ahead of the iron imported that we are prepared to pay 10 cents more per 100 lbs. for it. Had my hon. friend come forward and proposed a duty of about $4 or $5 per ton on pig iron; had he said, we are going to develop Nova Scotia, we would understand his position. My hon. friend is interested in all the various interests of this country, and everybody knows he has never failed to work them up as far as he is concerned, and he should have said here: I am mistaken, I see these beautiful fields of iron and coal, contiguous to one another; I see a market at home, the great North-West, which wants steel rails, fish-plates, bolts, &c., and instead of bringing it from a foreign country, I am willing to pay 10-cents per 100 lbs. more, and will bring in a resolution saying I do not agree with the policy of the Government, but as the country has decided for this policy, I will gracefully come in and acknowledge my error by proposing a tariff that will set all the iron mines in Nova Scotia going. Let us sink party differences and do what we can to build up this country. We may be wrong and those hon. gentlemen may be right, but still we are endeavoring to do what we can to find employment for our people; and I hope my hon. friend will withdraw his motion, and join us in asking for an increase in the duty on pig iron of $4 or $5 a ton, and an increase in the duty on bar iron.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). My hon. friend from King's (Mr. Domville) has sufficient parliamentary knowledge to know that the hon. gentleman to whom he made his appeal for an increased duty on pig iron, is not in a position to comply with his request. He might have turned to the hon. gentleman at his left and made the appeal to him. It is not necessary to follow the hon. gentleman through the whole tone of his argument. He was unable to hear the figures that had been given by the hon. member for St. John, and consequently made some statements upon them which were entirely unwarranted. He has made one thing clear, however, and I have no doubt he has succeeded in convincing the Minister of Finance that, though he cannot concede the motion of the hon. member for St. John to be a proper one, he should be convinced surely by the argument of the hon. member for King's that in imposing a duty of $2 a ton on pig iron he, instead of benefitting the country or any industry in the country, he has done an injury to many of the manufacturing industries of the country. My hon. friend has been consistent in his line of argument. Last year, I think it was, he presented, as Chairman of a Committee, a petition signed by some forty members of this House, stating to the Minister of Finance that the $2 duty per ton on pig iron was inoperative in its nature, so far as the development of our iron mines were concerned. That, Sir, is a fact that must be apparent to everybody. I myself share in the desire of the hon. member for King's, to see our iron industries developed, if that were possible without too great a permanent injury upon our other industries. It has already imposed a serious burden upon those of our manufacturing industries that employ the greatest number of skilled workmen and mechanics, and has produced no beneficial results. It has been in operation three years or more, and has been fairly tried. The Minister of Finance, in responding to the memorial presented by the forty members of Parliament, promised that he would give it his serious consideration before the present Session. He has introduced certain Tariff changes, but we see nothing in the direction of either increasing the duty, which the hon. member for King's says would produce beneficial results, or of removing the duty which is injurious so far as the development of the iron industry is concerned and highly detrimental to many other industries, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for St. John.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend from the city and county of St. John did not claim that it had been detrimental to any industries, but that it had increased the cost of the articles to the consumer.

Mr. PATERSON. So I understand by the increased cost my hon. friend means it has imposed burdens upon the people, taxes which they have had to pay. Now, I will consider the position of my hon. friend from King's with reference to the operation of the duty on pig iron. The hon. gentleman's utterances are recorded in Hansard when he brought this matter before the House last Session, when he said that a duty of $2 a ton on pig iron had succeeded in doing only one thing. What was that one thing? It was to give the Londonderry Iron Company a complete monopoly so far as they were concerned. The operation of that duty upon pig iron serves no other purpose than putting $2 per ton on Londonderry iron that the country uses. The hon. gentleman will not deny that, because he puts it in language as forcible as I can do, He says:

"The House will perhaps allow me a word or two in reply. I claim that on the adjustment of the Tariff there was not sufficient difference made in order to enable us to be on the same basis as before; and we ask to be placed upon that basis. We believe that while a duty of only $2 a ton is put on pig iron, the Londonderry Iron Works have practically a monopoly, and they will not offer sufficient inducement to anybody else to put up blast furnaces, because they say that with a duty of $2 a ton they have a market, and if you give us $3.50 we have an assured market, we know that we have an assured consumption market, and we can afford to sell iron as cheap as it is sold to-day. We do not ask the difference in the duty as a bonus to ourselves; all we ask is an assured market. The Londonderry Iron Works have really no competition, because the duty has been placed that no one else would put up works on an uncertain market. They are unable to sell pig iron and they follow two trades, for they are not only pig iron producers, but they enter into competition as manufacturers of iron, for they have a rolling mill; and while they decline to sell pig iron to those who are engaged in the rolling mill trade, they use it themselves, and say they ought to be protected, because they are producers of pig iron. You find that in running these furnaces they produce from classes of iron, Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4; and they only produce No. 4 iron fit for puddling enough for their own use; they have none to sell, and consequently they enjoy a monopoly. When the Minister of Finance framed his Tariff it would have worked admirably on a high rate of duty, but when the market rules low, it rules very severely against us."

Now, that is the marked effect of that duty upon pig iron, put upon the Statute-book and maintained there in face of the fact being pointed out by the hon. member for King's, that the practical effect was to give the Londonderry Iron Works $2 per ton on every ton of iron they made. Now, when this duty was imposed hon. gentlemen opposite prophesied the great benefits that would result from the imposition of the duty on pig iron. I am free to say that if these anticipated results had been in any degree realized I would not have objected to that item remaining on the Statute-book. We find the hon. Finance Minister saying this when he spoke of pig iron in the Tariff debate:

"If this be so, we may reasonably expect that in the western part of our Dominion, in Nova Scotia, in the valley of the Ottawa, in the Provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick we shall have some branches of this manufacture springing up and producing the most beneficial results."

Those were the predictions of the Finance Minister as the result of the duty on pig iron. Blast furnaces in western Ontario and in the valley of the Ottawa were to be established; the sun was to be almost darkened with clouds of smoke arising from those furnaces; the sound of iron industries was to be heard in New Brunswick, and away in Nova Scotia, where they have iron of good quality and coal lying side by side, there was to be a great development of the iron industry. That was the reason assigned by the Finance Minister for the imposition of the duty; and three years afterwards he finds that the industry has not developed in the slightest degree, that the foreign trade in pig iron has been increased, and that the duty has enhanced the cost of the article and taxed the people for the benefit of one firm. I ask the House if it is not reasonable that, in view of this state of things, the resolution now before the House should be allowed to pass; it has utterly failed in developing the iron mines of the country, and it has resulted in placing $2 per ton in cash in the pockets of the Londonderry Iron Company for every ton produced.

Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. member for St. John should not be placed in a false position, because he stated at the time that the quality and class of the Londonderry iron was superior to that of any other iron.

M. PATERSON. I should be very sorry to do any injustice to the hon. member for St. John, and it would only be with more regret that I would do any injustice to the hon. member for King's. But if I understand the question I do not understand that the $2 per ton duty makes the Londonderry pig iron any better. That Company, no doubt, would produce as good iron without the $2 per ton duty as with it. We now come to consider the effects of this duty on manufacturing industries. It has injured them by imposing a duty on raw material. It is perfectly useless for the hon. member for King's, who is an intelligent business man, to venture on the line of argument in Parliament, that because they had to impose a high rate of duty on certain articles and it was found the price, notwithstanding the imposition of the duty was even lower than before, the imposition of the duty did not compel the people to pay extra taxation. The hon. gentleman should know the fact that markets rise and fall. It has been already pointed out by the hon. member for St. John that the price in Canada has increased relatively with the price in Great Britain and other countries, and if iron ruled lower at one time in the foreign markets it would sell at a correspondingly low price in this market. The argument is fallacious. What we have to consider is this: Would the iron have been sold at $2 per ton less if there had been no duty to pay. The hon. Minister of Finance, who is a candid and discerning man in business affairs, must answer in the affirmative, that if $2 per ton duty were removed the price would fall by an equal amount. We had the prediction of the Finance Minister, that in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario, there would be a sufficient number of iron furnaces, and that, as in the United States when their blast furnaces more than supply the home demand, the prices would fall, but with a large importation of foreign iron every business man must know that the imposition of the duty must be paid not partially but wholly by those who purchased the articles. I know from conversation with one of the manufacturers in my own town, that he made a bargain for a quantity of iron with a British merchant, the terms varying with or without duty. The difference in price was the amount of the duty levied by the Government. Take some of the manufacturing industries of the country and see what has been the effect of the duty.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Will the hon. gentleman state the price of pig iron previous to the imposition of the duty and the price at the present day.

Mr. PATERSON. I will not state that; I have not the figures with me and it is not necessary for me to do so.

Mr. DOMVILLE. How then can you say it is dearer?

Mr. PATERSON. My line of argument is before the House and it is sufficient to convince any man. Let me take the quantity of iron imported and what do we find? In 1878 there was $2,152,644 worth imported, in 1881 it was $3,299,188. That certainly proves that we had to be supplied from abroad, and as our home consumption is not sufficiently strong we must be paying the full amount in enhanced duty. I do not believe it is possible that the American producer of coal who knows that not one ounce of anthracite is mined in this Dominion, except possibly British Columbia, supposes that the manufacturer would pay the duty on the article, and so with reference to this article of pig iron. I will grant the position of my hon. friend if, as I said before, you had furnaces in sufficient number here to compete with the foreign market. It might be the position in a certain state of the market; there might be some slaughtering going on. I will admit that for argument's sake, though I do not believe it to be correct; but forced as we are to buy iron in foreign countries, is it not the height of absurdity to suppose dealers in iron, who know that we must find our way to their market, who know our necessities to buy are greater than their necessities to sell, would share in paying in the duty. It cannot be. Take some of the large industries of this country. Take the articles of wag-gons and carriages—and I may say here that my figures are taken from the Census of 1871. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) and the Finance Minister were hardly fair in attempting to pooh-pooh the statements of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee) because he took the figures from that census. Will the hon. the Finance Minister or anyone else tell me if, in speaking upon this matter in the House, where we may get figures upon which we may argue other than these? The hon. the Finance Minister himself endeavours to get some approximate figures by special Commissioners with regard to certain industries in this country, but he himself had to admit that they were not correct. There is only one place where we can get anything approaching correct information as to the home production of certain articles, and that is the Census of 1871; and I may say that we are a little at a disadvantage, especially those on this side of the House, in discussing the question, because, while we produced largely the goods manufactured in this country in 1871, the Census return of the quantity of those goods in that year will represent nothing in comparison with the products of those goods in 1881. I trust that when hon. gentlemen opposite find it necessary for them to send us to the country when this Parliament shall have reached its full time late in the fall of 1883, that they will be able to present us with the results of the Census of 1881, before that time, so that we may be able to address the electors, and base our statements on returns ten years later than those which are now at our command; and I know that these later figures will be much more favorable to the Opposition than those of 1871. In 1871 the carriage and waggon makers of this country produced $3,580,920. That production has gone on increasing. These manufacturers have shared in the general prosperity, and have benefitted by the increased population of the country during the last ten years, and the extra demand for their goods caused by that increased population. Practically there is no more importation of foreign goods of that kind now than there was then, and at that date, I believe, something like 97 per cent. of these goods was home production. They had the practical control of the Canadian market and the imposition of a higher rate of duty was of no benefit to them. But how have they been affected by the duty on the raw material? The duty on their

Iron.....	increased from	5	per cent.	to	17½

Take next, our foundries and machine shops; and I believe there is no industry in this country that gives employment to more mechanics than do these establishments, many of them being the longest in operation in this country. They were flourishing before the National Policy was introduced; and what has been its effect upon the large class which they are present? It is but a repetition of the others I have mentioned. There is an increase on their bar iron, their Russian sheet, their screws, their bolts, their nuts, their solder, their wire, their rivets and all the other articles they use, amounting to over 10 or 12½ per cent. Take next, agricultural implements, and what does the Census show?

The product of that branch of manufacture in 1871 was $2,685,393; and who will say that it has not been trebled or quadrupled since that time? At that time 2,546 men were employed in manufacturing agricultural implements, and I say that the number of hands has been increased four times since that period. The effect of the National Policy upon this industry is but a repetition of its effects upon the others I have named, an enhancement of the duties upon all the articles they consume. I am now speaking only of the articles connected with iron, and have no reference to the paints, oils, cloths and so forth which also enter into the manufacture of their products. Taking the whole list we find an increase of from 17½ to about 25 or 30 per cent. They had 95 per cent. of the home market in 1871, and who will say that the home market was not as effectively theirs as it is now. I will not go through all the industries that are affected by these duties on iron, but take for example the sewing machine industry, and what a large one it is. It has been injured, as can be abundantly proved by the return of drawbacks on manufactured goods brought down a short time ago. Before doing that, let me prove from the hon. Finance Minister himself that the imposition of these duties on raw materials do operate injuriously upon the manufacturers. Speaking on the question of drawbacks in 1879, and referring to this very sewing machine industry, he stated:

"The drawback is for the purpose of encouraging those industries and enabling them to compete successfully with manufacturers in other countries. I am satisfied that this system can be carried out successfully, but some regulations may be necessary in regard to it. It will doubtless entail a great deal of trouble in the Departments, but still there can be no difficulty in practically working out a system."

If the duty did not increase the cost of that article to the manufacturer, why does he want a drawback to enable him to compete with foreign manufacturers in other countries? By their system of drawbacks, the Government gave their case entirely away, because it shows that the hon. Finance Minister knew that these duties were handicapping the manufacturer; and here we have him telling us plainly that the imposition of a duty on the raw material of sewing machine manufacturers and all other manufacturers of iron, places them at a marked disadvantage in competing with foreign manufacturers in other countries—and why? Because it enhanced the cost of the article we produced; and in order to get over that difficulty the Government proposed that drawback.

Mr. DOMVILLE. But the iron manufacturers are not finding fault.

Mr. PATERSON. How does the hon. gentleman know?

Mr. DOMVILLE. We have no evidence of it.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, if I remember rightly, a little while ago I read in Hansard that a Mr. Domville, one of the most enterprising iron manufacturers of this country, had found a great deal of fault with the Tariff.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I did not complain that there was too much duty, but asked that more should be put on.

Mr. PATERSON. I rather think my hon. friend's argument was this: "You put $2 a ton duty on pig iron; that is a practical monopoly for the Londonderry iron works, and they charge me more for my iron, so that it costs me more for the finished article that I use in my rolling mill; and I want you to take the duty off pig iron, so that I and other rolling mill proprietors can get our goods cheap."

Mr. DOMVILLE. No, not at all. I certainly stated that if we had active competition in this country in the production of iron rod, iron would rule as cheap as it could have been imported from England without any duty. I did not state that, in consequence of the duty, iron had become dearer.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. PATERSON. I do not think I misinterpreted my hon. friend's remarks; but let me ask him, as a business man, if the duty on the products of pig iron has not enhanced the price.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I will state that bar iron and pig iron have not been increased in price in consequence of the duty; not only has pig iron been cheaper during the past year, but bar iron has been cheaper, and so have nail plate and nails. I state that without fear of contradiction.

Mr. PATERSON. Whatever his opinion may be, if he chooses to say that the price is not to be enhanced by the duty, then he must answer the question of who paid the duty, and if he says the foreign producer then he is wrong, and his testimony will be entirely hostile to that of the manufacturers on this point. I have stated that the only reason for the Finance Minister's instituting a system of drawbacks was that the manufacturers were hampered, and I can reinforce it by the statements of the Minister of Railways on the subject. Speaking in 1878, when the Cartwright Tariff was in operation, he said:

"Not only was that the case, but everything a Government could do to foster the manufacturing interests of this Company was done by the late Government. As the hon. gentleman knows right well we put the material the manufacturer used on the free list. We protected the manufacturers by relieving the raw material as far as possible from taxation. The hon. gentleman knows that we allowed machinery that could not be manufactured in this country to be brought in free of duty, thus assisting those who were engaged in such manufactures."

Then you find the Minister of Railways declaring that the policy of his Government, when in power before, was to afford protection to the manufacturers by placing their raw material on the free list; and he condemned the Cartwright Tariff because certain articles of raw materials had been taken out of that list. Again, we find him saying:

"I may tell the hon. gentleman further that what little protection was given to the manufacturing industry of Canada by the imposition of 2½ per cent. additional duty, raising the Tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent. was swept away by taking the raw material that our manufacturers used and taxing it so that the policy was as completely a reversal of that which had existed as was possible."

There was the testimony of the Finance Minister and the Minister of Railways to the fact that the imposition of duties on the raw material of manufacturers was a direct burden on them, and that their plan of protecting the manufacturers prior to 1874, was by having that raw material on the free list. And yet the members for King's and the Finance Minister will now be forced into the position of taking back their statements, and to assume the position the member for Kings does to-night, that you may put duties upon raw materials of manufacturers and not burden them. The statement of the Finance Minister and the Minister of Railways are against him, and the imposition of the drawback system is against him. What has been the effect of our drawbacks? They will show the amount of the burdens heaped on some of the industries. Last year two firms engaged in the manufacture of sewing machines were paid in drawbacks on the raw material $2,931, which shows that they were burdened that amount—on their whole product? Nothing of the kind; but on their products exported to foreign countries. And if they were taxed in that way on their exports, they were equally taxed on each sewing machine that went into every Canadian family. Take the manufacture of fence wire. Four firms were paid $6,998 in drawbacks, which proves, on the barbed wire for fences made and exported, they were burdened to that extent with the duty on raw material; and if so, they were burdened to a like extent on every yard or mile of wire fencing purchased by our farmers. On our machinery, we find claims from a large steam engine firm in Ontario, for $750, which the Government has not allowed, but the owners claim that they are burdened to that extent on their limited exports to foreign countries. If burdened to that extent on their exports, they have been burdened in a like manner and to a proportionate extent on their much larger sales in our own country. It is idle in the face of these facts, and still more idle in the face of the money paid back to these manufacturers on their raw material used, to say that they have not been damaged by the duties on it. How has our foreign trade been affected by it? The Finance Minister and the country know that our foreign trade which we boasted of with some feelings of pride in 1878, has, largely through the imposition of duties on materials, been prevented from competing successfully with that of foreign countries. There is a reduction of over 25 per cent. A few more years of like decrease, and our exports of manufacturers will be a thing of the past. I have in my pocket the statement of one of the largest manufacturing concerns in my own town, giving me a detailed list of the enhanced cost of raw materials directly through the operation of the Tariff, amounting to over $6,000, for the amount they used. Is not that a burden on our manufacturing industries? I do not often notice on our newspaper paragraphs, but I have seen one in the Mail, saying:

"If we remember right, and are not mistaken, Mr. Paterson, of Brant, made statements in the House as from a certain letter, which was afterwards found he had not quoted correctly, and the member from West Durham seems to be taking a leaf out of his book."

It does not remember right. I presume the statement they refer to is the statement I made on the public platform that I had figures to prove that that firm paid, through the enhanced cost of their saw material, over $6,000 more last year than previously; a Conservative paper in my town stated the sum was only $700, but a member of that firm, in a letter, said that my statement was in every respect true, that the duties had cost them over $6,000, and that they had never told the Minister of Public Works that the amount was only $700; but that they had told him they had claims to the amount of over $700 for drawbacks, which shows that while the Government was able to make fair promises, it was quite as able to break them. I challenge contradiction on that point. Testimony might be given by manufacturers in other lines in cases where thousands of dollars have been imposed on them, and yet the hon. member for King's says the manufacturers have not been injured. They might say in one sense they were not injured, perhaps, and that they take the price out of the purchasers. The member for North Norfolk stated that the enhanced cost of agricultural implements, owing to the duty on raw materials, was something like $2 each. But, besides, hon. gentlemen opposite have lost sight of the fact that less material was put into those machines at present, and that while the price may not have been increased, had it not been for the enhanced duty, the competition and improvements in machinery would have enabled the manufacturers to sell those implements cheaper than before. It stands true that they have suffered meanwhile, or one other thing has happened, that is they have taken the enhanced price out of the consumer. The proposition of the hon. member for St. John is fully borne out. I believe the Tariff has been an injury to the manufacturer in part, the consumer in part, because the manufacturer has borne part of the loss himself, and has been forced to put part of the loss on the consumer. Let us see how this affects the consumer. I take the blacksmiths for instance. In the year 1871 there were, according to the Census, 10,213 men employed in the trade. They have been vastly increased since then through the increase of population. How are they affected by this Tariff—the extra tax on them averaging about 12½ per cent. over what it was under the late Tariff, or $12.50 on every $100 worth of material they use? Either they pay this tax or it comes out of their customers. Take carpenters and joiners. There were 5,408 in 1871, and no doubt there is double the number at present. What has been the effect on them. We see that the carpenters are on a strike.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. That is exactly the sound I expected to receive from gentlemen who impose heavy burdens on those men, and refuse to remedy them; such derision is quite appropriate with the course they have pursued. Who will say they have not reason to strike; that, as far as the Tariff is concerned, the hon. Finance Minister has not given them reason to strike. As the hon. member for St. John has pointed out that as far as these men are concerned they have reason to demand increased wages; if they cannot get them any other way, they are not to be blamed for taking the steps they did. Each carpenter has to buy his own set of tools, and those in the trade know how large a thing this is to one of these mechanics. What has been the effect of this Tariff? Tools are raised from 17½ to 30 per cent.; hinges, from 17½ to 30 per cent.; screws, from 17½ to 35; bolts and nuts, from 17½ to 35; tacks and finished nails, 17½ to 35. I suppose if I were to say that $100 is the average cost of a kit of carpenters' tools, I should not be out of the way. This gives an increased tax of $12.50 to be paid by the carpenter. Let the hon. Minister show what has been the effect of the duty on these articles that are being imported into the country in larger quantities than ever before. Will he say their cost is not enhanced or take refuge in the subterfuge that things are no higher now than they were formerly. But admitting that, how can he say they would not be sold much cheaper if the duty were off. Take coopers, of whom 3,442 were employed in 1871. You find the same relative increase to tin and sheet iron workers, of whom there are three or four thousand, in the same catalogue. Mark you these taxes imposed on the artizan are not all they have to pay. I am not speaking of outside subjects, with reference to the clothes they wear or other goods they consume, but simply of the products of iron. Hon. gentlemen opposite feel disposed to say there has been no increase in reference to the Tariff. I have in my hand a circular issued by certain hardware, harness and saddlery dealers.

Mr. PLUMB. Name.

Mr. PATERSON. There is more than one name, there are the names of all the leading dealers in the Province of Ontario, and they say: "That in consequence of the great advance in the cost of all classes of goods, and the increase on custom goods prices are advanced from 15 to 30 per cent., with a prospect of a still further advance." This circular is dated 29th October, 1879, six months after the new Tariff came into operation. The articles consumed by the people, if produced in the country, must mean enhanced prices to the consumer. I have no desire to detain the House further. This amendment is one to develop the manufacturing industry. Under the present Tariff the Londonderry iron works remain solitary in their glory, unable to supply the trade. This proves conclusively that their tariff bears on the manufacturing interests of the country, and through them on the consumers. I share in the opinion expressed in the resolution that an increased burden has been placed upon the manufacturers who import under the operations of this Tariff. That being the case, the Tariff having proved utterly inoperative for good and powerful for evil, I would ask the House to allow the proposition of the hon. member for St. John to pass, that we may give the sewing machine manufacturers, the foundry and machine men, the agricultural implements and carriage makers—give to over one-half the manufacturing industries of this country—a fair share of protection which ought to be given to them by taking off the duties on their raw material, and placing this raw material on the free list.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is one advantage we possess on this side of the House when my hon. friend from Brant speaks—we can always hear him distinctly and understand perfectly well what he says, and are consequently able to answer his remarks. But we are not so fortunate when the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Burpee) speaks. For myself I was unable to hear many of his statements, and, therefore, am not prepared to answer him until I will have read them in the Hansard. There is something very remarkable in the course taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite on this question of protection. Resolutions have been offered in the past declaring emphatically that this policy is taxing the people unnecessarily for the benefit of the manufacturers; but to-night we have the hon. member for the city and county of St. John strongly imbued with the principles of the National Policy, and therefore he was no doubt the proper person to move a resolution of this kind to show that the manufacturers are damaged by this policy instead of being benefited by it. That is the proposition submitted to this House, and the hon. member and those who think with him will stand up here and denounce the Government for not having given sufficient protection to the industries to which he refers. These are the Free Trade gentlemen who are now coming out and declaring that we are recreant in the interest of that industry in not imposing more duty upon it.

Mr. PATERSON. No; it is to take the duties off instead of putting them on.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, and for the purpose, he says, of giving protection to the manufacturers. One word with reference to the statements of the hon. member for Brant. We have often heard these statements before from him, and it may be well to say a word with reference to the absurdity of his position when he says that the diminution of the exports of manufactured articles indicate the failure of the National Policy. Nothing could be more absurd; and why? I will give you an illustration. After he had made his speech in the House last Session, calling attention to this fact and declaring it was an evidence of the failure of the National Policy, a gentleman in this Dominion who had been for many years engaged in the manufacture of boots and shoes, said to me: "How absurd the statement of the hon. member on that subject. I recollect," he said, "crossing the Atlantic with you in a steamer two years since, when we were obliged to go to the British market for the coarser description of boots and shoes that we are manufacturing in the Dominion to-day. Now, my position is such that I have a grand market at home; I cannot supply even all the orders I have, and though I am under contract to send to England a certain quantity of goods, I am bound to supply them; but," he said, "I am in a position to-day to diminish that export because I have a profitable home market, and can give increased employment to the people, with better wages, and do a better business than before." This is one illustration of the effect of the National Policy. It has given employment in the home market for our people and makes it unnecessary for them to go abroad to sell without profit.

Mr. PATERSON. Did he tell you how many he had exported?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, we know it is a pretty large amount that they exported during this year, and he is going on with his contract to this day. A word with reference to the alleged failure of the National Policy with regard to the encouragement of the iron industry. He says I prophesied great things. I did prophesy great things; and let me tell him here that while the manufacture of iron has not sprung up with as great rapidity as other industries, there are reasons for it. In the first place you may start a manufactory for clothing, for instance, with a capital of $40,000, and various other industries with a capital of from $50,000 to $100,000; but when you come to the iron industry you require a large capital. In Londonderry, something over $2,000,000 have been invested, though perhaps, some of it has not been judiciously expended. We know that men, when they invest their money in an industry of that kind, want to be assured of the permanency of the policy of the Government. Within a twelvemonth I have been visited by several gentlemen representing a large amount of capital in the United States—one of them representing $2,000,000 capital, another $5,000,000—who came to Ottawa to consult me with reference to the establishment of this industry here. Their statement was this: "If we were sure that this policy would be permanent we would invest our capital, but we are in doubt." I asked him why he was in doubt. "Well," he said, "the paper that is read most in Canada is the Toronto Globe, and that paper tells us when the people give their judgment on this question again they will reverse it, and, therefore, we are in doubt as to the permanency of this policy."

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. And the wisdom of it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We have no doubt about the wisdom of it, neither had he; he wanted to know about the permanency. This was my answer: "Sir, in my judgment you may invest your capital without a doubt. In the election of 1878, the people spoke out emphatically on the subject, and since then out of thirty constituencies that were opened, we have carried all but two, and to-day our majority is eight more in Parliament, as a result of these declarations than it was in 1878; and I said such a thing is scarcely to be known in the history of our country, indicating as clearly as anything can what the verdict of the people will be when they again pronounce with reference to this policy. This very day, all over the Dominion, people are going on and establishing new industries. They are many American capitalists who are interested in the Dominion; and I will guarantee the time is not far distant when we shall see those iron industries established. Has nothing been done already? You would think that not one pound of iron more has been produced, and that no steps have been taken for producing it; but what is the fact? There are two furnaces instead of one being constructed at Londonderry, and from that date the construction will be doubled. Those furnaces would have been in operation before this had it not been for an unfortunate accident which happened in one of the mines from which the Company obtained coal with which to make coke. In New Brunswick, where we had industries in operation, it was thought that the whole trade would fall into decay. Some Americans came in, and owing to the National Policy they established the manufacturing of charcoal-iron. A company has been established in Montreal for the manufacture of charcoal-iron, and they have asked the Government either to allow to import crude petroleum at a low rate of duty from the United States, or to make some arrangement for petroleum produced in this country, because it is intended to manufacture iron with petroleum as well. Look at the movements that are taking place in Belleville and in the Ottawa Valley, and I do not doubt that it only requires the verdict of the people to introduce and bring into this country an immense amount of capital that is in abeyance, and is only so because hon. gentleman opposite have not in many cases declared their sentiments on the subject. I may quote a speech made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in order to show that hon. gentlemen opposite should be with us on this iron question. Referring to the iron industry in the United States the hon. gentleman said when the protective duty was imposed, iron manufactories were established, and in a short time the price of iron was brought down several dollars per ton and is now sold cheaper than British manufacturers can do in this market. If the hon. gentleman would speak out that new sentence we might have a sufficient declaration for the country and the capitalists outside to satisfy them that this policy was a permanent and successful one. The hon. member for Brant said the hon. member for King's might appeal to me, and declared he spoke as if he were making an appeal to the Government to do something more for the iron industry, and that when the memorial signed by forty members was presented last year to the Government asking for a readjustment of the Tariff with respect to iron, I said the Government would consider it. The Government have considered it, and I do not hesitate to say that if he err'd in any particular it was on the side of a low rate of duty. That is my judgment after three years' experience. It was a difficult matter to deal with, inasmuch as iron was the raw material for so many industries; and with respect to the duty on steel we have simply extended the time during which it will be admitted duty free until the close of the next Session, because we have already declared that so soon as it is manufactured in the Dominion the duty will be restored. Iron and sugar were two of the most difficult questions the Government had to deal with in order to provide that no particular industry should suffer, and at the same time give encouragement to those particular industries. The statement has been made by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) that the duty imposed was largely imposed by the consumer—that the manufacturer paid a part and the consumer another part. I frankly admit that to a certain extent manufacturers are additionally taxed upon some of those articles, but I assert that as far as the consumers are concerned they have paid only a slight increase in the cost. But what compensation have we given to the manufacturers, admitting that they pay $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duty on iron? With respect to agricultural implement makers, the cost of malleable iron is about the same as it is being made in Canada. What compensation have we given to the agricultural implement makers?

Mr. PATERSON. Nothing.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We have given them not only the market of Old Canada, but the market of New Canada. Were it not for the 25 per cent. duty the North-West would be flooded with American agricultural implements. As I said two years ago, on the evidence of a leading manufacturer, who had sold the year previous 1,800 reapers and mowers, and would sell that year 2,500, and was preparing to sell 4,000 the following year. Take the sewing machine manufacturer, for whom hon. gentlemen opposite have shown so much sympathy, and who had to pay something for castings. Those manufacturers, however, sold to-day four times as many machines as in 1878, and are in a much more prosperous condition. They are selling at a lower price owing to the fact that they have a larger market. As one of the manufacturers told me: they did not require to expend as much, in order to sell their goods, as they formerly did—because they sold four times as much as before—and could therefore sell them at a less price. The hon. gentleman says the fact of our allowing a drawback is an evidence that an additional duty is paid. Accept the hon. gentleman's proposition, and we give it back to them on their own industries, and therefore they are in as good a position as they were, while they are selling four times as many goods as they did in 1878.

Mr. PATERSON. One of them failed the other day.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Some men will fail in the management of any business. The position which one of the sugar refineries is in at Halifax to-day is entirely on account of bad management. Sometimes perhaps they may fail on account of the sharp competition, and, at all events, their failure would go to prove that they are not enjoying the undue advantages which the hon. gentleman says they are enjoying.

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the foreign manufacturers had three-fourths of the Canadian market?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not say so.

Mr. MILLS. How are they selling four times as much as before?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The reduction in the price enables them to sell more, and so do the improved times which have been brought by the National Policy. Talk of strikes. Had we any strikes in 1878, except strikes for aid and assistance—striking the Minister of Public Works to give them bread and keep them from starvation. If it was a question to-day with the people between strikes and starvation, they would say: let us have the strikes. Let us have things in such a state that we may be able to employ a large number of people; let us have the better times. If it were not for the prosperous condition of the country; if the manufacturers were not able to make something out of their goods, they would resist the strikes rather than yield to them, and the inference is, that there is more wages for the men, and that the people desire the better times rather than the poverty for all as in 1878.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The hon. member for Westmoreland says hear, hear; but I say that in no part of the Dominion is the National Policy more appreciated than in his constituency—nowhere have they shown more zeal or more enterprise. He will find growing up in that county a manufacturing industry which promises to progress as well as any other in the Dominion, owing to the industry, enterprise, and the capital of the men who have engaged in it; and if it should be a question with me whether the men of Westmoreland or the men of the United States should make money, I would say the men of Westmoreland. There is a great sympathy exhibited for the mechanic because it is showed the duty on his tools has increased $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. This is a terrible business, seeing that his whole kit is worth about \$100. Now, with reference to a large proportion of his tools, such as broad axes and narrow axes, I know they are not dearer to-day than they were in 1878. All the steel that goes into them is free. They have a larger market because they have a home market, and, as I said, you may go to Dundas, or any other place, and you will find that they are making them and selling them as cheaply as before. The sympathies of the poor mechanics are to be traded upon here by hon. gentlemen opposite, rather than support a policy which would give more work and better facilities to the workingman. Supposing it is correct that he pays $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the value of his kit of tools, compared with the result of his year's labor, that is a mere bagatelle. The hon. gentleman says nails are high. I am prepared to prove, from one of the largest manufacturers in Canada, who went through his books, that the average prices are 5 per cent. less than they were in 1878. With reference to nuts, every man in the business knows that they are less than in 1878, owing to the large competition in that branch of manufacture. Then, in reference to carriages and waggons, I showed, by a reference to the prices, which no one has attempted to controvert, that they are cheaper to-day than in 1878 by about 10 per cent. The foundrymen say that they have added about 15 per cent. to their prices this last year, and that that just about covers what the increased wages amount to. Malleable iron is furnished as cheaply to-day as before, or at least that was the case when I saw the deputation who came to Ottawa on that subject. With regard to spikes they were lower in 1881 than they were in 1878. Some of the manufacturers gave me the average prices of 1881 as compared with 1878.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What are spikes?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They gave me $2 per ton as being the amount of reduction since 1878.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What are the figures?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not know.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not believe it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. All I can say is that it was a reliable firm of manufacturers that gave me the information, and they say they took it from their books from 1878 to 1881. If these outside manufacturers could crush out our own industries, they would have the control of the market, and vote their own profits; but as long as we have competition at home and men struggling to keep the market, we shall get the articles at a less price than we could otherwise. I admit that some iron articles which are imported by the manufacturers cost them something more; but even these manufacturers are better off than they were before the policy was adopted. I remember visiting a small manufactory of horse-shoe nails in the city of St. John—and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Burpee) knows all about it—and what have they done since the adoption of the National Policy? They have erected a large building and widely extended their business, though we have charged 12½ per cent. more on their raw material.

Mr. BURPEE. You do not mean to say the Tariff has benefitted them any?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, I do.

Mr. BURPEE. The proprietor of that nail factory told me over and over again that it was a great injury to him.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Well, I should like to know, when we have increased the duty on the raw material but 12½ per cent., when we have increased the protection on their labor upwards of 25 per cent., when we have made the increase of protection to them even more than the difference in the raw material, why they should be worse. The hon. gentleman says, however, that they are not in as good a condition as they were before. There is something, perhaps, in the politics of a man. I believe there are many men to-day engaged in manufacturing who, if you asked them, would say that the Tariff had been no benefit to them at all; and yet, when the next election comes, the ballots of these men will invariably be cast for the National Policy. Therefore, I say that while we are not prepared at present to come down with a change in the duty of iron, yet—speaking for myself, though, I think, I speak also for my colleagues in this matter—if it became a question of the introduction of five or ten millions of capital into this country for the establishment of these industries in Ontario, in Quebec, in the Maritime Provinces, in Pictou, where we have beds of coal and iron within five miles of each other, the capital would remove the difficulty we are now in to give the manufacturers using iron their raw material as cheap as we do at this moment. While the number of these industries that have sprung up has exceeded our most sanguine expectations, still I am so hopeful of the iron industry to-day that I believe the day is not far distant when that industry will take as prominent a position as any industry brought into successful operation by this Tariff. And we know that the iron industry is no mean industry; on the contrary, it is one of the most important industries in the world; it is one of those that have made England what she is to-day. An American gentleman said to me that the iron ore from near Belleville is the finest and best on the continent of America. Under these circumstances I hold that if there is any proposition submitted to this House that we should reject it is this proposition of the hon. gentleman, to reduce the duty on iron and withdraw the encouragement now given to the people of this country to establish a mammoth industry which will benefit every man, woman and child in the community, and to develop a policy which will make this country the great country that Providence has destined it to be, and that many gentlemen here will live to see.

Mr. ANGLIN. If we remained silent while statements such as those we have just heard made in the old emphatic manner, we might be open to the charge of not being able to controvert them. When the hon. member for West Durham, two or three evenings ago, made some statements of which he had been informed by others, he was called upon to furnish the names, and if I remember rightly, the hon. Finance Minister himself was one of those who chose to impugn the veracity of the statements made. The hon. Minister makes a statement in this House of a very remarkable character. He tells us that some gentleman representing $2,000,000 of capital, and another representing $5,000,000, have come to Ottawa to consult him as to the propriety of investing that money in iron works in this country, and he tells us that they were quite satisfied with this protection of $2 a ton, although the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) says it is entirely insufficient. The hon. Finance Minister would have us believe that the iron industry is to be largely developed. I remember some time ago meeting a Church of England clergyman in St. John, who, speaking of the Finance Minister and some statements he had made a short time before, at a large meeting in St. John, said: "Well, I have always remarked with regard to Tilley, that, when he could not find facts to sustain his statements, he was ever ready to indulge in prophecy." And truly he has indulged in prophecy to-night. He admits, however, that the iron industry is not very largely developed. He claims, however, the second blast furnace at Londonderry, as every other new industry or development of an old one, as a result of the National Policy. Does he not know that some months after the Tariff went into operation the glass factory at Londonderry went out of operation altogether? Does he not know that, as regards the Londonderry iron industry, $2 a ton was said to be not sufficient protection, and that other protection must be given? Does he not know that that led to a serious modification of the rates charged on the Intercolonial Railway for the carriage of coal and other materials to that establishment; and that to-day it is protected in two ways: in the first place by $2 a ton on all the iron consumed in Canada, and in addition by the carrying on the Intercolonial all the heavy freight used by that establishment at a price that does not pay the road. Some years ago the boot and shoe manufacturers were in such distress that they were forced to send their productions to Great Britain for sale; but the National Policy, we are told, has given them a market, with abundant employment for all their capital, at home. What is the simple fact with regard to this boot and shoe trade? Why, that at no period for years past have we imported, into all Canada, of all kinds of boots and shoes, from the French article, bought by those who can pay high prices, to the cheaper kinds imported for children, more than $250,000 or $260,000 worth; and the imposition of the additional duty did not increase Canadian production by more than $120,000 a year. Will he pretend to say that the increase of $120,000 a year effected by the National Policy as an addition to the quantity of boots and shoes manufactured here, has produced this wonderful revolution in the boot and shoe trade? Our boot and shoe manufacturers had already a monopoly of the trade of this country. That there was a diminution in that trade as in others during the years of depression, is doubtless true. Economy had to be practised everywhere. But the National Policy could not possibly render any service to a trade that already had a monopoly of the whole business of Canada. With regard to agricultural implements, of which he has spoken, he has added burdens to the manufacturers in some cases by heavy additional taxation on their raw material. But then the Finance Minister asks, what have we done for them in return? We have given them the whole market of old Canada, and in addition new Canada. But they had the market of old Canada before the National Policy. The whole of the agricultural implements imported into old and new Canada in 1878 amounted to $126,326. If that had been utterly wiped out, by reason of the National Policy, would that additional business have produced such a wonderful revolution in the trade of Canada, as the hon. gentleman boasts he has produced? What else is the fact? That after the imposition of the National Policy, the importation of those articles actually increased. In 1879 it rose to $245,523, I think. The year after it fell again to $169,714, but even that was $43,000 more than in 1878; and this last year, 1881, they rose further to $177,888, or $51,500 more than before the National Policy went into operation. Where, then, is the wonderful revolution effected in our markets? As to his giving this industry the trade of new Canada, and asserting that without the present duties the United States would have furnished Manitoba and the North-West with their farm implements, how can it be argued that if those manufacturers were not able, under the old Tariff, to sell their implements at a profit, they could have competed in the North-West with our own manufacturers?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Because some of them are nearer our North-West.

Mr. ANGLIN. They have some factories nearer, it is true, but what advantage could that have given them with the old duty of 17½ per cent. against them. Have they not to pay a higher price for iron than our manufacturers? Had the Americans not to carry to the North-West the material of many of the articles they produced, and is that not as expensive as the carrying of the manufactured article? There was, therefore, no increase in the duty necessary in order to give our manufacturers a monopoly of the markets of the North-West. Take the difference between the cost in Toronto or any other city in Ontario and the cost landed in Winnipeg, and it will be seen there was no increase of duty necessary to give our own implement makers the absolute control of the North-West market also. I believe there were some causes in operation that prevented the agricultural implements of our own manufacture from being used in the North-West for some time. One was that our manufacturers did not for a time learn to produce the article specially required in the North-West, that the ploughs sent from Ontario were found not to be as useful breaking up the soil of the prairies as those manufactured in the prairie countries of the United States, that other agricultural implements were found also not to be so well adapted as the American article; but as our manufacturers found what was necessary they began to provide what suited the wants of the country, and even driving out the American article. It is an insult to the skill and enterprise of the agricultural implement makers of this Dominion to say that they could not, with a protection of 17½ per cent., compete successfully with the United States manufacturers in the great North-West. As they succeeded in excluding the American implements from the Provinces of old Canada, they would succeed in excluding them from the great North-West. If that be true, and it cannot be controverted, what becomes of the statement of the hon. gentleman, that his National Policy has conferred such wonderful benefits on the agricultural implement makers to revolutionize that trade, and though it has reduced their profits has enabled them by selling a much larger number to realize larger profits on the whole every year. The implement makers are not at all satisfied with this Tariff. We have had statements from time to time during this Session to show that some of the very largest agricultural implement makers in Ontario are very much dissatisfied with the Tariff. With regard to carriages, the hon. Minister told us they are cheaper now than ever before, and would have us believe that his magnificent policy has given carriage makers an extended trade by giving them a monopoly of our own markets. He alleges that although he has taxed so heavily nearly every article that goes into the composition of a carriage, notwithstanding carriages are now at a much lower price than they were before, and higher wages paid, the carriage makers are making better profits. There is no system of arithmetic that would enable the hon. gentleman to figure out such a result. Higher taxes on the raw material, higher wages for the workman, lower prices for the article sold and better profit for the carriage maker. The hon. Minister alleges he has enlarged the market, that there is such an increase of wealth that people can afford to buy more carriages now than formerly. I would willingly believe this to be true, but I know it is not true. In St. John we do not see as many carriages as we did ten or fifteen years ago. In 1878 we imported altogether in all Canada but $154,853 worth of carriages. Did the Tariff reduce very materially the number imported or the price? In 1879, during the depression, the quantity imported was smaller and the value lower, but the next year we imported to the value of $137,378. In 1881, when we may suppose the National Policy was in full operation, we imported $151,433 worth, or just $3,400 less than in the year before the National Policy went into operation. Where did the National Policy, in this particular trade, confer any benefit on the manufacturers? With regard to sewing machines, the hon. Minister made another extraordinary statement. For once he forgot to credit the National Policy with all this increased trade, and said it is partly the effect of lower prices. Far more are sold but at cheaper rates. The people, he says, can afford better to buy them. It is a most gratuitous assertion to say that people buy sewing machines only when they are well off; nine-tenths of them are bought by persons to be used as a means of gaining a livelihood, though no doubt the general increase in their use is very large. When we look at the number imported we find that the Tariff could not have enlarged the market for the Canadian manufacturer. In 1878, the whole value imported was $101,404. In 1881, was the quantity imported smaller? Had the National Policy the effect credited it? Not at all. The amount imported was nearly twice as large, $193,337. There were double the number of machines, so that instead of having once and a half as many machines we had three times as many machines imported as in 1878.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We manufactured and sold four times as many.

Mr. ANGLIN. I admit that to be unquestionable. Surely it does not prove that the National Policy was the cause of the increased production and sale of these articles, because if it had any effect it would be to increase the sales at home by the exclusion of the foreign article; but instead of excluding the foreign article, we find that under the operation of the National Policy the value of the sewing machines imported is nearly twice as large.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The reason is that they import the heads now and put them up here, and make and finish the frames here.

Mr. ANGLIN. Then the case of the manufacturer is worse.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is one reason why they are reduced in value.

Mr. ANGLIN. I do not deny the price has been reduced. We are progressing in all these things every day; we are discovering new and more expeditious modes of manufacturing sewing machines, and they are now manufactured much cheaper than they could be four years ago. Human ingenuity and enterprise are effecting improvements every day, but the hon. gentleman would not have them exercised in this country. I have run through several articles to which the hon. gentleman especially alluded in order to prove that the National Policy had effected so wonderful a revolution in the business of this country, and that it had given more employment and better wages. Where or when have the people obtained better wages than they did five or six years ago? Where are they put lower to day than they were then? Hon. gentlemen opposite have to compare the present state of things with 1878; they would like to compare the state of things to-day with the state of things when the business depression was at its very worst and people everywhere were suffering for want of employment; but if they are to claim credit for the National Policy, that it has elevated the working classes, or if they were to contend that the National Policy gives to the working classes better wages, they should compare the present state of things with that which existed in the country in former years of fair average prosperity—in 1874 or 1875; and if they do they must admit that the cases are very few indeed where the working people are earning as much in nominal wages to-day as they earned in those years, while a dollar earned to-day will purchase no more than 80 or 90 cents six years ago. Now, to come back to this other question, the hon. member for King's, usually so keen and sharp to comprehend a statement, seems to have misunderstood—perversely, I thought—the position taken by the hon. member for St. John. He would persist in arguing that the hon. gentleman endeavored to prove that the duty of $2 per ton on pig iron and the other duties on iron, enabled the Londonderry mines to charge a higher price for their iron in the market than is charged for other iron of the same character. The hon. member for St. John, on the contrary, took the ground, and proved by the statements he produced, that this duty imposed on pig iron adds at least $2 to the price of that iron in our own markets to-day. Then the hon. member for King's claimed that iron is cheaper now than it was two years ago, which is a begging of the question itself, an attempt to mislead the popular mind by saying they can get this article lower than formerly. We allege that there is room for doubting even the accuracy of those statements, but without questioning their accuracy, we assert that the addition of a duty adds so much to the cost of the article to the importer, and the importer has to charge his profit as well upon that duty as on the original price in the market in which he buys it. The hon. member for St. John showed that all through, before this increase of duty as well as afterwards, the Londonderry people not only charged 10 or 15 cents on the 100 lbs. more than the imported iron cost, but that their prices went up and down—kept pace, were the words he used—exactly with the cost of the imported iron, and that therefore the imposition of this duty, and the encouragement, so far as it has gone, of the manufacture of iron in Canada, has marked the effect which hon. gentlemen opposite promised with regard to all these protected manufactures, that competition would keep the prices down to a fair rate; but the manufacturer in this case, or in every other case, charges just as much for the article he produces as the imported article cost plus the price of duty; and in this particular case it cost more because the article to-day is of intrinsically greater value than it was four or five years ago. We allege that even if all kinds are made dearer by reason of the duty, and that all kinds of iron would be just so much cheaper were these duties reduced to-day to the same low standard, that the farmers, lumbermen, fishermen, ship-builders and mechanics are all interested in obtaining cheap iron. Any addition to its price is a burden to every class and industry of the country, and, therefore, not merely on behalf of the manufacturers, but also on behalf of the people I claim that this burden should be taken from the industries of the country in order that the people may obtain from the domestic manufacturers and importers goods at more reasonable rates, and that the duty on iron should be reduced.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Intercolonial Railway.

218. To pay J. O. Nolan for rent of a building at St. Octave..... $132

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is an amount found by Mr. Shanly, the Chief Engineer, due to Mr. Nolan for the rent of a building which was made use of by the Government after taking possession of the railway contract.

219. To pay J. B. McNutt, of Onslow, N.B., land damages..... $500

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is an amount due to Mr. McNutt by the official arbitrator, Mr. Cowan, who was selected to examine and report and take testimony on the subject, and he reported that the flooding of the lands caused by the destruction of the road compelled the removal of the buildings belonging to that gentleman at an estimated cost of $1,000, one-half of that amount to be paid by the Government.

222. To pay heirs of Geo. Moffat for transport of rails...$4,777 25

Mr. MACKENZIE. The Government never employed Mr. Moffat to carry the rails. He himself declared on his honor to this House that he had no such contract.

Mr. MILLS. When the hon. gentleman was charged with the violation of the Parliament Act, Mr. Moffat denied he had any contract with the Government whatever.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The claim arises in connection with the transportation of rails for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway in 1875, between Dalhousie and Campbellton. Messrs. McDonald & Co. had the contract, but Mr. Moffat claimed to have performed the service for the Government. Messrs. McDonald & Co. however claimed they did the work, and payment was made to them. Mr. Buchan investigated the matter, and reported in favor of Mr. Moffat; but it was subsequently referred to Mr. Shanly, who reported in the same terms. The Order in Council was passed after the fullest investigation, authorizing the payment to the heirs, and providing that proceedings should be taken against Messrs. McDonald & Co., to recover the amount erroneously paid them. Mr. Shanly found that the money was improperly paid to McDonald & Co., and was due to the persons who performed the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE. But the persons who performed the work performed it for McDonald, who was the contractor, and Mr. Shanly does not controvert that in the least. The matter was examined into fully by the officers of the Department, and they all refused to recommend the payment to Moffat.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that the payment was authorized after the fullest and most elaborate examination. Mr. Shanly, in his report, shows that Mr. Moffat did not act on the authority of Mr. McDonald at all, but on the orders of Grant, who was an engineer of the Government.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I recollect speaking to Mr. Moffat several times and he told me more than once that he had no claim himself at all. He said that his son was the party entitled to make the claim if anyone was. I understand that Mr. McDonald was the party who made the contract.

Mr. DOMVILLE. But he said at the same time the steamers were then worked by his son, but when the estate came to be wound up it, of course, had to have the benefit of any valuation of the steamers.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It is quite clear that Mr. Moffat distinctly denied having any contract with the Government, and here we are called upon to pay over a sum of money which has been already paid. I must protest against this, no matter what Mr. Shanly or anyone else may say.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. What steps have been taken to recover the money from McDonald.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is the intention of the Government to collect the money from McDonald. The Minister of Justice advises that proceedings should be taken to recover the money or that it should be stopped out of any money that may be due to him by the Crown.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Can you collect the money?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I presume so.

Mr. MACKENZIE. McDonald had the contract and he procured the carrying on of the work, and the engineers gave him the necessary certificate for the performance of the work. I do not believe that the Deputy Minister of Justice ever gave the opinion that it could be collected.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say so.

Mr. BLAKE. Has the hon. gentleman obtained any advice that there is a claim against McDonald? and on the statement made to-night I do not think there would be any.

Mr. HESSON. This work was not done by Mr. McDonald, and I think it is worth while to consider whether the party ordering that money to be paid should not be responsible. I think it is quite right and proper that the Government should pay the man who did the work, and it was the duty of the Government at that time to see that the contractor was not paid, not having performed the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He did perform the work. We had no business to interfere between the contractor and his men along the line, to see whether he paid them. If the Moffats chose to do this work for Mr. McDonald, it was none of our business. The work was paid for according to the regular usage of the Department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman thought, when he paid Mr. McDonald this money, that he performed the work; but it is proved that Mr. McDonald did not perform the work or obtain its performance, and that the work was done by the person for whom this payment is made, upon the direction of the officer of the Government in charge, viz., the resident engineer, Mr. Peter Grant.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Mr. Grant had no more business to give the order than the hon. gentleman himself.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the date of the arrangement with Mr. Moffat?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The date of the telegram from the Department is the 3rd of June, 1875.

Mr. BLAKE. Here is Mr. Moffat's statement made in the House on April 23rd, 1877:

"I never had a contract for the Intercolonial Railway in my life, to the best of my knowledge and belief. I know nothing about this, and I deny the whole of it. I have never obtained a cent of money from that railway, either for contracts or anything else. I have never sought a contract and never got one."

Mr. MILLS. Besides, Mr. Moffat, occupying a seat here, had no right to sit here; and it seems to me an extraordinary thing, in the face of that denial by Mr. Moffat, that the hon. Minister should pay his heirs or executors.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Mr. Moffat stated distinctly in this House that his sons did the work, though he admitted that he owned the steamers, but he did not know that it was done, as the arrangement had been made by telegram; but as they did the work, they ought to be paid for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There are no facts, and it was not made improperly. The work was done according to contract and paid for in the regular course.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. My hon. friend supposes this was the only contract, but Mr. McDonald was a railroad contractor, and this work was an incident to the other work he had in hand.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It appears in this case that the Government assumed that McDonald had performed the work as he ought to have done, or had procured some other person who had the means. Moffat was the only person who had the means of removing the rails, and, under the circumstances, the resident engineer employed another person, and the official arbitrator having obtained all the facts, reported that we owed that man so much money. I would like to ask the member for Westmoreland whether we were not bound to act upon the finding of our own officer?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Yes; if these are the facts. But Moffat testifies he never was the contractor. Did not McDonald acknowledge his indebtedness to Moffat for services performed, and is it not the fact that McDonald never repudiated his liability?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I cannot say.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I would like to know whether McDonald was interrogated on the point?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will get the evidence before concurrence.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does the report of Mr. Shanly, brought down on my motion, cover all the cases he has investigated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; but all the papers the Government were able to bring down were those on which action had been taken, and that the Government had dealt with. They regard Mr. Shanly's reports as confidential until they act on them. Some of his reports have not been dealt with.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think we are entitled to those papers. Parliament made an order for them unreservedly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We do not consider the reports proper to bring down until the Government had dealt with them. It would be prejudicial to the public interest to publish some of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I wished to get the opinion of Parliament before it rose on the Government's course of taking cases out of Court and submitting them to the arbitration of a single individual, and I am deprived of that opportunity by not having the papers whereby to know the claims submitted to this Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have taken no cases out of Court. The Order in Council was brought down under which Mr. Shanly was appointed, and it distinctly confines his duty to investigating and reporting upon cases that have not been adjudicated upon.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It may be true that cases are not taken out of Court, but the arbitrator is considering cases that might go into Court, which is the proper place for the decision of claims. Does the hon. Minister recollect, and will he enquire whether the claims of Frank Jones, in my county, for damages sustained by a fire have been settled?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; but I do not remember the amount. It was charged to the working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway out of which it was paid.

225. Extension of the Intercolonial Railway into Halifax....$5,000

Mr. ANGLIN. Is that work completed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There will be a further sum in the Supplementary Estimates which will complete it.

227. Rolling Stock $309,800

Mr. MACKENZIE. I asked for a statement of the entire amount of rolling stock paid and charged to capital account up to July, 1874, and from that date to the present time; also of the amount expended by the Government on repairs or new stock chargeable to revenue.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The statements will be laid on the table.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Where was this rolling stock obtained?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Part in Canada and part outside. There were 100 cars from Quebec and 200 from St. John; 200 box cars at $700; 200 cars at $700; 2 mail cars at $3,500 and 100 hopper coal cars at $228.

295. Repairs and working expenses on the Intercolonial Railway.....$300,00

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see that this is in conformity with the vote I took last year. I took a vote of $1,600,000 last year and was obliged to ask for this supplementary in order to cover the expenditure involved by the increased traffic. Every dollar of that is returned to the Treasury by the receipts of the road.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If we allow that item to pass at present we may have something to say about it on concurrence.

98. Repairs and working expenses, Windsor Branch Railway.....$8,000

Mr. MACKENZIE. That also I desire to discuss.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman will not find any necessity for discussing that. It is a mere matter of account. The Government placed the Windsor and Annapolis Railway in the hands of the Company upon practically the same terms as the original lease. The Company receive two-thirds of the gross earnings, and the Government one-third to maintain the road. This is simply an expenditure in the maintenance of the road, all of which is returned to us by the money received from the road. It is regularly paid, and that is a mere matter of account so far as this vote is concerned.

Committee reported; and (at 3:25 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 1st May, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SURVEY OF THE HARBOR OF ST. ROCH DES AULNETS.

Mr. RINFRET, in the absence of Mr. CASGRAIN, enquired, Whether the Government have recently caused a survey to be made of the harbor of St. Roch des Aulnets; if so, what has been the result and the cost thereof, and is it the intention of the Government to make improvements in the said harbor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No survey has been made recently, but one was made two years ago, and from that survey the Government concluded that it could not make any improvements to the said harbor.

IMMIGRATION AGENCY AT NEW YORK.

Mr. COURSOL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish an Immigration and Repatriation Agency at New York, specially for the repatriation of our fellow-countrymen in that State?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government has not the intention of establishing an Immigration and Repatriation Agency at New York, but it has already one to that effect in the State of Massachusetts.

ASSISTANCE TO THE MUNICIPALITY OF ST. MICHEL.

Mr. AMYOT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant assistance this year to the municipality of St. Michel, in the county of Bellechasse, in relation to the repair and maintenance of the wharf on the River St. Lawrence in that municipality?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I regret to have to tell the hon. member that the Government is unable to come to the assistance of the municipality of St. Michel, in the county of Bellechasse, this year, in relation to the repair and the maintenance of the wharf on the River St. Lawrence, but a survey is to be made during recess in order to obtain a report which will give the Government more information than it is possessed of at present.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT SYDNEY AND NORTH SYDNEY.

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton) enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to make provisions for public buildings at Sydney and North Sydney, this year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not the intention of the Government to make provision for public buildings at Sydney; but it is their intention to make provision for buildings at North Sydney.

INDEMNITY FOR DUTIES ON FISH AND FISH OIL.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's) enquired, When an answer may be expected to the memorial of W. H. Pope addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, dated January, 1879, asking indemnity for duties paid on fish and fish oil exported from Prince Edward Island to the United States in 1871 and in 1872; and also the letter on the same subject from the members of the House of Commons and Senators representing Prince Edward Island, bearing date 20th April instant, and addressed to the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, Premier of Canada?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This subject is now under the consideration of the Government, the attention of the Government having been called to it by a letter addressed to me about the 20th of April, and received about the 22nd.

DAMAGES TO THE SCHOONER M. C. UPPER.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Has any claim been preferred upon the present Government for damages to the schooner M. C. Upper, on the Welland Canal? Has the matter been settled? Has any sum been agreed to be paid? If so, what amount and when?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A claim has been made for damages to the schooner M. C. Upper. An amount will be submitted to the consideration of Parliament in the Supplementary Estimates of the coming year.

THE RE-DISTRIBUTION BILL.

Mr. BLAKE. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to enquire what is the position of the public Bill which has been introduced by the hon. the First Minister, and read the first time? According to our practice, no Bill can be introduced in blank or in an imperfect form. I make the enquiry because many hon. members are unable to understand what the provisions of the Bill for the re-adjustment of the seats are; and the Bill was found not to be in the possession of the House, and access could not be obtained to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Bill was introduced by me after I had asked leave to introduce it. It was printed in galley shape, for the purpose of having it printed and distributed to members; but, of course, we could not ask for the second reading until the Bill was printed, and members had an opportunity of reading it, and I am told it is being printed to-day.

Mr. BLAKE. The point was not that the Bill could not be read until it was printed. We knew that. The point was that the Bill introduced in print was retained by the hon. gentleman who introduced it, although it became the property of the House, according to the language of the Speaker of the English House of Commons, although, according to our reading, the first reading should be marked by the Clerk at the time. As I understand, it is the property of the House and not of a member. I do not think the hon. member who introduces it is expected to see to the printing, but it is put in the hands of the Clerk, who transmits it to the proper officer, who sees that the printing is attended to. Various efforts have been made to get access to the Bill. There are many representations as to what it says, and a conflict of opinion exists as to what its contents are. It seems to me an extraordinary thing that we should not have access to the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a matter of every day practice, and has been ever since I have been in Parliament, that the person immediately in charge of the Bill feels that it is his especial duty to see that it is got ready as soon as possible for the use of the House.

DOMINION LANDS ALONG RAILWAY LINES.

Mr. BLAKE moved that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That the present system of administering the Dominion lands situate along the lines of railway is likely to result, practically, in the acquisition by the railway companies of almost all the enhanced value, not merely of their own lands, but also of the Dominion lands in immediate proximity to stations on such railways; and that steps should be taken with a view to secure to the public, as far as practicable, such enhanced value in cases of stations hereafter to be established.

He said: This motion was placed on the paper on the 14th of March, but, owing to various circumstances, it has been postponed to so late a period that I do not propose at this time to engage in any lengthened argument on the subject; but I desire, briefly, to state the purport of the motion and the reasons I have for bringing it to the attention of the House. As the House knows, Dominion Lands Acts of various dates, including the one now in force, and the Bill which is now under the consideration of the House, contemplate the reservation of towns, cities or plots from ordinary occupation, and their sale by auction or otherwise as the Governor in Council may decide; and not long ago—I think in 1880—this principle was extended to the case of school lands in a manner which appeared to me to be somewhat arbitrary, but it was presumably in the general public interest. It was provided that if any section falling in the school lands list should happen to be suitable for a station, it should be withdrawn from the school lands list and sold by auction or otherwise for the public benefit, and the school lands list was to be credited with an amount equal to the highest value of other lands sold in the same township by either the Government or the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I mention these facts to show that the general principle of obtaining such value as could properly be obtainable on account of eligibility of situation in reference to locations for towns or stations is contemplated in the various Public Lands Acts provisions as a proper thing. Now the general system under which land grants are made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and also to the other railways, is that alternate sections only are given to the Company, the others being reserved to the Government. The practical result has been, so far as my information goes, that the Railway Company gets almost the whole enhanced value of these lands. The Company has, of course, the power to a considerable extent of controlling the location of these stations, and it is able by the exercise of that power, when a private individual has obtained possession of a lot cornering on its own lot on the lot on which the station may be—if the Railway Company is passing through a lot which is now the property of the Company—then it is able, I say, to point out to the individual, that unless he comes to terms with the Company, the station will be placed somewhere else, and is thus able to obtain cessions of the individual's interest in the property at moderate rates. I understand that various cessions have taken place under these circumstances. In some cases a bulk sum has been paid, and in others it has been agreed that the Company and the proprietors shall share in certain proportions in the enhanced value of the property which is to be sold by auction, and so on. Take the case of Brandon, which was fixed, I believe, by natural circumstances, for a station. A very large sum was paid by the Railway Company to what they called there a syndicate—a sum of $100,000 or so, and it is said that many hundreds of thousands of dollars have been realized by the Company out of Brandon station. That is the way in which the matter is operated in reference to these parts of country which were more or less settled, or had been possessed by private individuals prior to the present time. We are now dealing with the state of things in which a large extent of country is to be tapped or reached by the Canadian Pacific Railway and its branches and by various other railways. Now, I am told that a system prevails of sending out homesteaders and preemptors—that of a fine morning you may sometimes see four or five individuals started off along the line of railway to homestead and preempt choice and eligible sites. They homestead and preempt, not for themselves, but in reality for those who employ them for that purpose; and thus possession is taken of the choice Government lands along the railway, not for settlement or for the advantage of the settler, but to obtain the advantage of the enhanced value of the lands by their selection as stations or town sites. Where, on the other hand, a bona fide homesteader or preemptor has gone into possession, he is dealt with in the way I refer to, and he gets but a small part of the advantage, while the great bulk goes to the Railway Company which controls the situation. This is a very serious question. The tract of country through which the line of railway goes cost but a trifle, and the whole value of stations and town sites, if the present impulse in Manitoba and North-West settlement goes on, is almost equivalent to the cost of constructing the railway through the prairie country. Now, it does seem to me that the state of things under which it is possible for the Railway Company to acquire almost the whole of this advantage—the public getting nothing, and the real settler getting nothing, or an insignificant fraction—is objectionable, and that steps should be taken and the control of the Government be used; that the Government should communicate to the Railway Company the importance of their being sharers in the enhanced value of the lands selected for station grounds or town sites, so that by their being sold on joint account or in some other way, the right of the public to get the benefit of the enhanced value of the stations and towns being established on the line of railway, should be recognized. At the present time, as I have stated, the practical result is that the Railway Company is gobbling up the enhanced value of the Dominion lands as well as of their own, and are thus, to a large extent, paying the cost of building the road from the public lands of which the public ought to receive the benefit. I, therefore, move that the House go into Committee on this resolution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I presume that the hon. gentleman has moved this resolution at this stage of the Session for the purpose of expressing the opinion he has now done. He does not point out in the resolution any mode by which the end he desires to attain can be attained. He says something or other must be done to enable the country to gain the advantage of the favorable sites. I explained some time ago, in answer to an objection that came from the other side—an objection to the Government's having reserved one range of townships along each side of the Pacific Railway—that the Government had been informed, as the hon. gentleman has been informed, that persons professing to be actual settlers had gone along the line of the railway with no intention of becoming bona fide settlers, but with the purpose of setting up a colorable claim as settlers, in order to speculate on the enhanced value of these lands from their peculiarly favorable positions. We were informed that scores of people had gone out and squatted, or professed to squat, on lands along the railway for the purpose of selling them at an enhanced value afterwards. Of course, we could not object to people taking that course; but when we heard of it we withdrew from homesteading all the lands along the line of railway, until the bona fide settler had an opportunity of having a fair start, and of getting possession of these lots. Of course, we know that the odd-numbered sections on each side of the railway belong to the Railway Company as fast as they earn them. The Government cannot dictate to them where they shall put their different stations. Like other railway companies, they will choose the most advantageous points in their opinion—points where roads from the country will converge, in the vicinity of streams, and so on; and, as a matter of course, they will, if possible, place them on their own lands. Whenever they do this, the Government has a section adjoining, and the Government can either allow the bona fide settler to get the advantage, or, under the reservation I have mentioned—which was rather objected to by hon. gentlemen opposite—lay it out as a portion of the station or town or village which has been laid out by the Pacific Railway Company on their own property. That land has been deliberately withdrawn from immediate settlement for the purpose of gaining the end which the hon. gentleman desires by his motion. I fancy it will answer no purpose for the hon. gentleman to press his motion; and I do not suppose he will, having called attention to the fact, and having been assured that the Government are quite willing to enable the country or the bona fide settler to gain any advantage from proximity to a station. I, for one, do not think the Government should be eagerly anxious to engage in speculation. If it should be the good fortune of any emigrant to get a better farm than another, either for fertility or any other cause, from being in the vicinity of the railway, I shall not grudge him that advantage. If we can get bona fide settlers to take up the lands in the first place, and if we can get out of those lands sufficient payments to recoup the people of Canada for their great expenditure of the Pacific Railway, valuable results would have been obtained. The Government are keeping steadily in view the objects mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. CASEY. I am aware that there is great danger of speculators homesteading the lands adjoining the railway, and that the Syndicate themselves have the greatest benefit from these speculations. I was told by a gentleman in Winnipeg that he was going out on the 1st of March to the Qu'Appelle country, to settle squatters in the interests of the Syndicate—the lands to be held ostensibly for actual settlement, under a bargain that the squatters will transfer them to the Syndicate as soon as the titles are obtained. I think that the reservation of the range of townships on each side of the route, which the Premier said was reserved to prevent such abuse, is excessive. If the Government reserved a range of sections, the sections adjoining the railway on each side, it would quite answer the purpose.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I meant one range of townships—that is all right.

Mr. CASEY. I thought it was a slip of the tongue, and I think that provision is sufficient. Even that reservation is hardly just to the actual settler, as it is a reservation against the actual settler as well as against the speculator in lands, if means could be found for differentiating the actual settler from the speculator.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. How can that be done?

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman in this resolution does not point out a remedy, which is for the Government and not the Opposition to do. I think the real remedy should have been the Government's reserving, in their grant to the Company, all the odd sections adjoining the railway. The Company had quite sufficient payment for their work, in the twenty-four mile belt on each side, without getting the town sites. The Government would thus have acted as they act in the case of all grants to other rings of speculators, and retained a great source of revenue. Every town site along the Canadian Pacific Railway, from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains, will be worth, on the average, over $500,000. As these town sites are struck about every twenty miles, it is not hard to see what a source of revenue the Government would have acquired from the building of the road. Those sites would have realized about $10,000,000. The hon. gentleman says that it is intended, after the stations have been located, to open the adjoining sections to homesteading, or sell those reserved sections. I think that would be very unfair, as the earliest comers or squatters, being certain of the places selected, could seize and get all the benefit of those favored localities. If the Government reserves those sections to get the benefit of the town sites, they ought to reserve them altogether.

Mr. BLAKE. The course which the hon. gentleman says he has pursued, in order to accomplish his object, I think will entirely fail of any beneficial result. The very object he has in view will be thwarted by it. He says: "I issued an order reserving those sections immediately adjoining the railway;" but he said also: "I will open them some day or other." This means that, of course, the persons on them will get them when they are opened, and also an invitation, not to the bona fide settler, who does not wish to run any risks, but to the speculator and Railway Company to sell, send bogus homesteaders and preemptors on these lands, to be held and disposed of afterwards, not for the benefit of the settler, but for the benefit of the Company and the speculators, that is the practical result of the order. I do not believe a single man of those speculators, going out in the early spring, will be thwarted by the circumstance that there has been a temporary withdrawal of those lands from homesteading. Most of them can get other persons to avoid for their benefit the restrictions thus imposed. It is one thing altogether to say to the new bona fide settler on the spot that he ought to have the benefit of any rising value of lands. I agree with that. It is an inducement to such a bona fide settler to go into the interior and open up unexplored portions of the country, in view of getting choice sites; but the practical result of this system, as it is carried out by the Railway Company, is not to give such actual settler anything more than a mere fractional interest, reserving almost the whole of the profit to the Company itself. I have been told that the Company's profits will be three-fourths of the value of those sites, leaving only one-fourth to the settler or homesteader. Those figures may be mistaken, but they would indicate that the large share of the profit is to be absorbed by the Company, which is the advantage of knowing the sites of the future towns. At the crossings of rivers and some other points there may be clear indications of town sites; but taking the railway as a whole, it is equally clear that far the larger portion of the stations may be located at one place or another, a mile here or there making little difference, to suit the interests of the Company. The Company is able to say to any locality, unless you make such terms with us as we approve of we shall locate our station elsewhere. This policy has resulted, or is going to result, in depriving the Government from any profit from those lands, while the Railway Company will absorb the whole value of station sites as well as public Government lands. That is a state of things that ought not to exist. I regret that the hon. gentleman having taken the step he has, which seems to me is rather calculated to injure than to benefit the bona fide settler, is not now able to hold out any hope that any different result will take place.

Mr. MACMILLAN. I know perfectly well, as far as Brandon—which is one of the places where, according to the hon. member for West Elgin, injustice was done to the actual settler—is concerned, no injustice was done under any circumstances whatever, for actual settlers were the persons who have received the benefit on all sides, except the north side, where I understand Mr. Ross owned a section on which a squatter had placed himself, and the Government were bound to replace by selecting one immediately north of that locality. He was the only person who received any benefit from the selection in that way. I am also aware that the hon. member for West Elgin discovered cunningly that there was to be a site in a certain locality, and he with some of his friends set to work to buy up, and actually did buy up, a very important locality on the southern extension of the road. They had the authority of the locating engineer at the time, who managed the road, that this was a point at which there was to be a town, and purchased, to a considerable extent, land on this site. Subsequently they discovered that their information was unfounded, and begged the parties from whom they had bought the land, to let them off the bargain. The hon. member is one of those who accuse the Government of being parties to anything of this kind. To my mind railway companies have a perfect right to select the localities where cities are to be built, and I do not think that the hon. member for West Elgin ought to complain, after having been treated so generously, when he and his friends had placed themselves in an unfortunate position.

Mr. CASEY. As the hon. gentleman sees fit to attack me personally for having done something which he considers improper—

Mr. McLELAN. Not improper—speculative.

Mr. CASEY. I admit that I, with certain others, did suppose that we had bought a certain place which was publicly declared, by the Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to be the located terminus of a certain branch line. That gentleman had written a letter, stating that was the location and which was allowed to be shown to the public. I bought from second hands—from a party who had bought from the original settler. After investigation, and after having sold a number of lots in this new town site, we found that the man from whom we had bought had no title, so that instead of having to beseech him, we were in a position to compel him to return the money. He did not require compulsion, he was an honest man, and on representation of the case returned the money, and we were in a position to do the same by those who had bought lots from us. I do not see what this has to do with the question before the House at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has a right to speculate in property and make the most out of it, and I am glad that he and others are investing their money in the North-West. I think the hon. member has rather misunderstood me, or I failed in making myself understood. I quite agree with the hon. member that it is very difficult to find out who is the bona fide and who is the pretended settler; and we withdrew the first section on each side of the road, all along the line of the railway, for further consideration, until spring opened and a full tide of emigration set in, when everybody would have the same chance—on the plan, first come, first served. There is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says, that there is no greater security now, that bona fide settlers will get these lands, than there was three months ago. As I understand, his views which I take to be those of the Opposition, are, that these lots on each side should be reserved for the purpose of selling to the best advantage, and that speculators or pretended settlers should not be allowed to get possession of them. These views are worthy of all consideration, but the difficulty was that the Government had announced their policy, that a number of sections all over the country should be reserved for actual settlers, and this would be an apparent infringement of that rule. No precaution can prevent a person settling on a lot of land and improving it for speculative purposes, without really having settled himself, and the land being settled and improved, that is all the Government and the country can want. The difficulty was, we did wish to be supposed, as withdrawing from the plan laid down, that the even-numbered lots should be held for pre-emptions and homesteads. Still, under the circumstances, I think the Government will be slow to act in putting a range of sections on each side of the railway into market for homestead and pre-emption, without taking every possible precaution against speculators getting hold of the land.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not suggest the policy the hon. gentleman proposes. I suggested to him that it would be reasonable that the Government should confer with the Railway Company as to those lands on which stations are to be erected. The Company knows where the stations are going to be, and the Government and the Company ought to share the profits. If a railway company chooses to put a station on a lot of land it owns altogether, it has a right to do so, but then there is a profit on the surrounding lots, and the Government's adjoining lots may be very close. The Government ought to have early information where the stations are going to be, and that land should be reserved. Under the present system, neither the Government nor the settler gets any profit, but the Company gets it all.

Mr. MACKENZIE. These sections on each side of the railway will not be sold until all the conditions are completed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have come to no conclusion; but the tendency of the advice from the other side, and from my own mind, to accept that advice—

Mr. BLAKE. I must say that the hon. gentleman misunderstands me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I was answering my hon. friend opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I wish to understand what the hon. gentleman meant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that is the tendency, still I cannot speak exactly. We have only suspended the sale of the sections on each side, and we should think well of it before we open that suspension.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to ask him a question, though it has no particular reference to this subject? Where there are warrants granted for 160 acres, are there warrants still for the 160 acres, or only for a certain amount of money?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. For a certain amount of money, and it can apply on the purchase of the land.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have been applied to by parties in this position. They supposed they could get a quarter section with a warrant, but were told by the Government officials it was only payable as security for the $160. Now, suppose the land is $2 an acre, have they to pay $160 in cash besides giving money for the warrant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, that is the case.

Mr. BOULTBEE. It is quite evident the hon. member for Lambton wants the Government to exercise the same supervision as he did in the case of the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Kaministiquia, where the whole town plot got into the hands of a ring of speculators before the station was fixed there.

Motion withdrawn.

CHARGES AGAINST CHIEF JUSTICE WOOD.

Mr. SCHULTZ moved for the reading of the Journals of the House of Monday, March 7th, 1881, so far as they relate to the petition of Henry J. Clarke, Q.C., and others, setting forth certain charges against the Hon. Edmund Burke Wood, Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench for the Province of Manitoba.

Mr. BLAKE. It was the understanding in the House, agreed to by the hon. gentleman at my own suggestion, that the papers in this case should be printed and distributed for the use of members, before we should be called upon to give a vote. They have not yet been distributed. They were ordered some time ago, but we have not yet got a copy of the petition, nor a copy of the reply.

Mr. STEPHENSON. They were ordered several days ago, and I requested Mr. Hartney to expedite the printing as rapidly as possible. I cannot say why it has not been printed and circulated.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. SCHULTZ. It is evidently quite impossible to reach any result with this motion were it to pass the House at this time, therefore, as ample time has been given for the production of these papers, and as I have reason to believe the papers themselves are not important as bearing upon the decision of the House as to whether a Committee shall be granted or not, I object to withdraw the motion.

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to know the right hon. gentleman's views on the subject. Of course, it has been the practice heretofore in dealing with these cases—that of Judge Loranger for instance—to have the papers printed and brought down and made accessible to members. The hon. gentleman himself said that was reasonable. I stated that I would take the very earliest opportunity of calling his attention to the printing, and he agreed to that. If he, as leader of the House, thinks a different course ought to be adopted—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I do not. It was understood that the practice should be carried out, and that whenever a complaint was made against a Judge, the printed copy of the complaint and the evidence in immediate relation thereto should be put into the hands of the members in order that we might judge of the matter with connaissance de cause. The difficulty that I see in this matter is that if the Journals were read now, I presume we could not follow it up by appointing a Committee at this late period of the Session, as there would be no time for a Committee to do anything. I do not know what my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) proposes with respect to moving for a Committee, or what progress he hopes to make in Committee. Therefore it would be no object to read the Journals, unless there can be effectual action taken upon the charges that are brought against this judicial dignitary.

Mr. SCHULTZ. I would ask that the Journals of the House be read, and then that the motion should be put for a Committee. Of course, I am aware it is impossible to do anything with that Committee this Session, but there may be an alternative suggestion made which will reach the object we have in view.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. member withdraw his motion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not see that the House objects to reading the Journals.

Mr. BLAKE. A discussion took place on that very question. I ventured the suggestion that we ought not to read the Journals except for a purpose, and that that purpose must be the papers of which notice had been given. My hon. friend opposite agreed in that view, and the motion to read the Journals was postponed until the hon. gentleman should put on the notice paper a subsequent motion. At the same time, I suggested it would be necessary that the papers referring to both sides should be printed, and the hon. gentleman also acceded to that. Therefore, I say that if the motion is not to be followed up effectively by a motion for a Committee, it seems to me contrary to practice, and cannot occasion any good result to read the Journals, unless we are going on with the discussion of the subject as to the appointment of the Committee.

Mr. CASEY. As the hon. member himself has admitted that there is no possibility of carrying out his object by the appointment of a Committee, there can be no use in reading the Journals.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman speaks of an alternative mode. What does he mean by that?

Mr. SCHULTZ. Some of my friends, and I believe all the hon. members from the Province of Manitoba are as one in this matter, have proposed an alternative suggestion by way of an amendment to the motion. If I am not allowed to put the motion, of course, an amendment can be made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You can put the motion, of course.

Motion agreed to; and the Journals of the House read.

Mr. SCHULTZ moved:

That a Special Committee be appointed, composed of Messrs. Ryan (Marquette), Royal, Scott, Schultz, Robertson (Hamilton), Rykert, Grouard (Jacques-Cartier), Weldon, Daly, McCarthy, Kirkpatrick, Colby, Ives and Sir Albert Smith, to enquire into the Administration of Justice in the Province of Manitoba; and that the Petition of Henry J. Clark, Q.C., and others, and all other Petitions complaining of the conduct of the Hon. Edmund Burk Wood, Chief Justice of Manitoba, be referred to the said Committee, and that the said Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Mr. RYKERT moved in amendment:

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:—"it is inexpedient and highly detrimental to the administration of justice that such serious charges as appear in the Petition of Henry J. Clark, should be made against the Hon. Edmund Burk Wood, without an opportunity being offered to him of answering the same; therefore, in the opinion of this House, the Government should cause to be issued a Commission to investigate the charges contained in the Petition, and report thereon to this House."

Mr. BLAKE. I object to the principle involved in any such disposal of the case as is now proposed. If those charges have not been investigated by this House, it is because the petition was presented very late last Session, and because no hon. member took any effective step this Session to place on the paper a notice for the appointment of a Committee until as late as the 15th of March. If, even under those circumstances, a Committee has not been appointed, it is owing to circumstances which I do not know; and the House at the present time is not in possession of facts which would enable it to form a judgment on the case. Which of us know what the charges are? I certainly do not. Which of us knows that they are of such a nature as to require investigation, either by a Committee or in any other way? Which of us knows what the answer of the Judge is? Why, therefore, should we depart from the custom which has prevailed since Confederation of appointing a Committee to deal with charges against Judges and enquire into the case? A charge against an exalted functionary like a Judge of a Superior Court or against a Chief Justice of a Province should certainly be dealt with; but if it is not dealt with, and it hangs over for a considerable time because no person proposes that it should be dealt with, and subsequent delay should be due to circumstances connected with the printing, those facts afforded no reason for a departure from the rule which the House has hitherto followed in dealing with such questions. I look with jealousy for the proposal that the Government should have power to appoint a Commission to try a Judge. There is no reason, under the circumstances, why we should depart from the rule established, and the precedent followed, and why the House should not deal with care as with other cases by appointing a Committee to conduct an investigation, to sit during the Session with open doors, when every member has a right to attend and watch the proceedings taken on the evidence adduced. The Judges of this country hold their offices during good behavior, and can only be removed on a joint address by the Senate and House of Commons. In my opinion, any such address should have for its basis evidence taken before the Committee, and probably repeated at the Bar. Fortunately in the number of cases which have occurred we have never been obliged to proceed further than the preliminary investigation, and we have not settled the practice whether evidence in such cases should be taken at the Bar, as has been done in two or three cases in England, in addition to the evidence taken before the Committee. I speak without much consideration, as this motion has been taken up contrary to the understanding arrived at. I believe the question was raised and settled in England in one case, but evidence with respect to a Judge should be taken at the Bar of the House. However that may be as regards the preliminary proceedings, we have settled the practice that a Committee should be appointed to sit here during the Session with open doors, so that every member of the House could watch its proceedings. There is nothing to justify the proposal in asking the Government to undertake the task of naming a Commission under the Crown, to sit and take evidence during the recess. We should adhere to the precedent adopted and the course hitherto followed, and if the question has to be disposed of, it should be disposed of by our decision as to whether there is full ground for investigation; and, second, if there is ground for investigation it should take place before a Committee. I feel myself unable to say whether there are grounds for an investigation, or not. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) has put in your hands a resolution which declares that there are grave charges against the Chief Justice contained in the petition; but I do not know what the petition contains, and I am unable therefore to say whether the charges are grave or whether they are frivolous—or whether the petition is so framed that it should receive our attention. I agree that if there are grave charges in this petition, they should be made the subject of enquiry; but I do not agree with the proposal to decide the question without our having an opportunity of perusing the petition and the Judge's answer, nor to the proposal of the hon. gentleman that we should decide affirmatively that there is a case for enquiry, nor do I agree with the means—supposing there be a case—by which the hon. gentleman proposes to conduct the enquiry.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am fully impressed with the difficulties of the case, and I am glad that the matter has been brought up now, so that we may decide something like the practice that should be followed considering the peculiar position of the Dominion. Our judicial system, owing to the extent of our limits, is altogether different from that contained in England. There, whether it be an English, Scotch or Irish Judge whose conduct is accused, the petition can be received by the House of Commons, and can be disposed of easily during the course of a parliamentary Session. There, of course, the Sessions last from six to seven months in the year, and sometimes more, and from the proximity of the Courts and the Judges, and all the evidence that would be adduced in the case, there is no difficulty in disposing of the matter in the same sitting in which the charge is made. Here, from the great distance at which some of the parties may be from the seat of Government, it is almost impossible, no matter how grave the charge may be. A charge may be made against a Judge in British Columbia, or Manitoba, but it is almost impossible to have the petition presented, the Committee appointed, and the evidence brought before the Committee in one Session. So that from Session to Session the gravest imputations may be hanging over a Judge—his conduct may be impugned to the utmost extent, in a matter, which, if true, or at all true, would altogether incapacitate him from acting as a Judge, and yet the circumstances cannot be enquired into. I have not read the petition myself, but it is a matter of public notoriety that the learned Chief Justice made the charges the subject of a charge to the Grand Jury in Manitoba in which he went elaborately into the charges against him and answered them; and he distributed his answer to the charges all over the country. I received a copy of the charge and read it at his request. I did not read the accusations, but I gathered from the charge to the Grand Jury that the petition involved his capacity to administer justice fairly and impartially. There is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman says about the issue of Commissions by a Government, because the Government takes the responsibility of selecting the Commission. I think such a Commission ought not to go further than a Commission to take evidence. It should certainly not in any way be a Commission to try a Judge, as that would be exceeding the powers given us under the Constitution as a legislative body. But it is quite clear that a Judge will practically escape the consequences of his impropriety, or will run a great chance of escaping altogether, if a Committee is to sit here in Ottawa, if all witnesses are to be brought here, the evidence considered and the Committee to come to a conclusion, and then that that conclusion or report should be submitted to the House of Commons, and perhaps the evidence examined over again at the Bar. This might go on from year to year, and the Government be freed from all responsibility. That is the fact.

Mr. BLAKE. Manitoba is only three days from us.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman would find it difficult to go there in three days just now. On the whole, I think, it would be better to carry the original resolution.

Mr. BLAKE. I would prefer the original resolution, but I do not know whether there is a case to enquire into.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We can have the original resolution, and the Committee can meet at any rate.

Mr. BLAKE. Let us observe the constitutional forms of the House at all events. None of us have had an opportunity of knowing what the charges are, and we should, at any rate, let the petition be read and the learned Judge's response. I think decency would require that we should have an opportunity of studying both. The petition is there in manuscript, if not in print, and it can be read.

Mr. BUNSTER. I understood the leader of the Government to refer to the Judges of British Columbia; but I hope there is no aspersion on their character, because they enjoy the respect of the inhabitants of that Province. We all feel proud of our Judges, and I think the Government ought to feel proud of them too, particularly when they learn that all their decisions have been accepted by the people. They are men of superior ability, well able to carry out the law of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I believe the Bench of British Columbia is a very good one, and stands deservedly high, not only in the estimation of the people of British Columbia, but of those who are the best able to judge of their efficiency, and that is the Bar. I believe they are highly respected both by the Bar and people.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I would like to ask if there is any probability of the answer to the charges being brought before the House within a day or two, because if there is it would be better to let the matter stand over and allow it to come up again by consent of the hon. First Minister. It is quite clear that we are not now in a position to discuss, intelligently, the question of whether or not it is a proper question for an investigation of any kind. We have before us a petition presented some time ago by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz), and though I suppose most of us have read the charges, for my part I have not seen the answer which has been made by the learned Chief Justice. I do not think it is fair, under these circumstances, to ask the House to adopt either the original resolution or the amendment. The rule is clear that an investigation of this kind should not be entered upon unless the Government are satisfied that there are reasonable grounds. Lord John Russell said in a similar case: "Nothing but the most imperious necessity should induce the House to adopt such a course as enquiring into the conduct of a Judge." Now, we cannot say whether there is any imperious necessity for enquiry in this case or not until we have become acquainted with the charges and the answers to them. Mr. Todd says: "Before consenting to a parliamentary enquiry Ministers should investigate the cause of complaint to see whether there should be any enquiry." Now, I understand the hon. First Minister has not had an opportunity of considering the petition, and, under those circumstances, it is impossible to say whether or not this case is one that should necessitate an enquiry either by a special Committee or by a Royal Commission. Of course, the charges, if there is anything in them, might be proper enough for an investigation; but before we can pronounce on that point, we ought clearly to see the charges themselves as well as the answers made by the Chief Justice. If there is a reasonable probability of our having the answers in print this week, would it not be better to allow the matter to stand, and then we can give an intelligent decision on the subject. I have read over the charges, and, so far as I can see, with one solitary exception, none of them come within the rule laid down by the Imperial Parliament on this subject. I, therefore, suggest that the matter might be allowed to stand over.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend has started a point of some importance. It may be that some of these charges are such as the House might think not fit to be entertained; it may be, that others are fit grounds for an investigation. On this ground it is well to be guarded; it might be very damaging to refer to a Committee a charge against a Judge in the dark. As I understand the rule, you do not refer matters of enquiry unless you are able to lay down this proposition; if these things are true they will form a proper ground for the removal of a Judge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; I think that is the rule.

Mr. BLAKE. And surely the charges ought to be so substantially alleged and of such a character that if you can say these charges are proven, we could follow up the investigation with an address to remove the Judge; but can we say that now?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a very grave matter, and we should look at it on both sides of the House in such a way that no difficulty can arise. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for South Huron is a good one—that this matter should be allowed to stand over for a time; but at this period of the Session, I think the hon. gentleman who has taken the responsibility of bringing it forward should have an opportunity of bringing it up again; and if it be understood that it may come up on a Government day, it might stand till this day week, and then the papers may be in the hands of hon. members.

Mr. SCHULTZ. I, of course, assent to what is suggested, but I wish to point out the difficulty of the Printing Committee. The answer is voluminous, embracing nineteen quires of foolscap, and it will take a long time to print this. Whether that answer contains any evidence on these charges or not, this has been stated, and must be stated again, that this is not the first charge made against the hon. gentleman. The Legislature of Manitoba passed a resolution, which was transmitted to this Government, making serious complaint of the administration of justice by that Judge; and the action which was taken unanimously last Session has been repeated this Session; and if the Printing Committee find it impossible to have this answer printed, it will lead to the conviction in the mind of Chief Justice Wood, and of other culprits like him, that all that is necessary to prolong his case indefinitely or to save him from investigation is to fill an extra quire of foolscap.

Mr. BLAKE. There is a large amount of money voted for printing outside of the parliamentary printers. I think this is a case for applying the rule which has been applied by hon. gentlemen opposite in cases in which it was not so much required. I understand that the parliamentary printers printed the report of the Pacific Railway Commission for the Messrs. Stephenson, of Chatham, the Messrs. Stephenson taking the profits. That might be done in the present case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is fertile in expedients.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

FISH TRAPS AND BRUSH WEIRS, N. S.

Mr. KILLAM moved for copies of all Orders in Council passed since 1st May, 1879, in reference to fishing for salmon in the Dominion; also copies of all departmental instructions issued in pursuance of any such orders to fishery officers in Nova Scotia, together with a statement showing the scale of fees chargeable to licensees; also a statement giving the names and address of all persons in the said Province who paid such fees, together with the amount of fees paid by each, and the names of the fishery officers to whom such fees had been paid; also a statement showing the number of licenses granted for fish-traps and brush-weirs for catching any description of fish in each of the Maritime Provinces, with the price paid for such licenses. He said: My object in moving this resolution is merely to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the irregular system which prevails of charging for licenses for fish traps and brush weirs in the Province of Nova Scotia. In that Province there are, in all, 1,081 of these machines for catching fish. Of these very few pay license. The only fish traps that pay licenses are in the counties of Yarmouth and Shelburne, with the exception of one in Lunenburg and one in Queens; they pay a license of $40 each. Of the rest, only four brush weirs pay licenses of $10 each, and they are in the county of Yarmouth. So that nearly the whole revenue derived from fish catching is derived from the counties of Shelburne and Yarmouth, and these counties have never been assisted by the placing of spawn in the rivers therein. No application that I made to the hon. Minister or his predecessor had the least effect, although I placed the case strongly before them. I hope this motion will have the effect of relieving the people of the county I represent from this charge of $10 each for weirs, and that the hon. Minister will see that the rivers of these two counties will receive the consideration they are entitled to in connection with the distribution of spawn from the different hatcheries. I think it was suggested, the other day, that this motion and that of the hon. member for Antigonish, should be combined, as they are on the same subjects, and I think labor will be saved to the officers of the Department by preparing the information in one return.

Mr. McISAAC. My object in giving notice of this motion, which is added by way of amendment to the motion of the member for Yarmouth, was to elicit information which I failed to obtain in any other way. It will be remembered that in June, 1879, an Order in Council was passed prohibiting salmon fishing in all the Provinces of the Dominion, except under the authority of a license or lease. The order was to be universal in its application, but its operation has been but partial—a matter that I could not explain to several parties in my own Province engaged in this fishery, who knew that the order was to be universal, but that some persons in Nova Scotia were exempt from its operation, while other parties were subjected to heavy fees. Besides, it was impossible for them or me, since I came to Ottawa, to find out the scale of fees chargeable for license for salmon fishing. I applied to the proper authorities here for the information, and the only satisfaction I received was that instructions were sent to the different fisheries officers to charge in fact such fees as they thought proper. I could hardly believe then, and I can hardly believe yet, that such unrestrained authority would be left to any such body of men as the fishery overseers of the Dominion. I have nothing to say against any of them, but still there is a temptation to an abuse of their power, and to partiality to which such officials should not be exposed. Until 1879 no person in Nova Scotia had to pay one cent for the privilege of salmon fishing. The fishermen now consider this charge a very great injustice. The uncertainty, the elasticity of the tax is also a subject of complaint. Nobody can tell what amount may be charged, unless there are Orders in Council which I failed to obtain. I have also been written to since I came here, and asked whether this year licenses should be taken out. I have found they are to be taken out. What is the object? It has been alleged that the object was to establish fishing stations or berths. If that is the only object, can it not be constitutionally and legally attained without extracting money from every poor fisherman? I think it can. This is evidently nothing else but a device to extort money from those poor men; who are already too much taxed. I would ask the President of the Council, himself a Nova Scotian, and acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to consider this matter. It is not fair that the Province of Nova Scotia should be obliged to pay this tax, while the Province of Prince Edward Island is exempt, or that salmon fishing should be prohibited in one Province, unless licenses be taken out, while permitted in another. The regulation of the amount to be paid is at the discretion of the fishery officers. We may infer from the amount of the penalties attached to the violation of this regulation, the maximum figure that the fishery officers can charge. Invested with magisterial authority. They can fine a man $20 for every offence; and for every day a fisherman has his net out he is liable to a penalty of $20, unless licensed. Another clause states that all material and appliances used in fishing shall be seized and confiscated. Now, the outfit of a net-salmon fisherman amounts to something between $200 and $400, which may be all forfeited, in addition to the other penalty, if he does not take out his license. This is the only mode by which we can arrive at the maximum figure which the fisherman can be charged if he does not take out his license. There is another evil which, with all due respect to these overseers, should be mentioned. Their opportunities of favoritism which are sometimes turned to account. A fisherman may select a particular spot for his net, and the fishery overseer may have a friend whom he prefers to serve; the first party may then be told by the overseer: "Unless you pay me so much, you shall not have that place," and as his authority is discretionary, he may give the place to his friend for a merely nominal amount. I am sorry that complaints of this kind have been made. I feel confident that the acting Minister of Marine and the Government, when they consider this matter, will put an end to this injustice at once. It is said the charge is only nominal, and some fishermen in my own county pay from $2 to $3 for their license. But any money taken from the fishermen is by some considered only nominal, while anything given them is considered substantial. The penalty may be $40, $50, $60, or $400. I hope there are checks which can be applied to the action of those officers. I have only to bring the subject before the hon. Minister of Marine, I feel certain, in order that such an injury to his own Province will be removed, because he understands as well as any one that such a thing was never known in Nova Scotia as taxing the sea, for this is nothing else. I hope that this Order in Council will be cancelled, and the fishermen allowed to enjoy the sea and its products, as their forefathers have from the first settlement of the country.

Mr. McLELAN. I shall endeavor to have all the information asked for brought down as speedily as possible. So far as I have been able to enquire in this matter, it arose from the fact that the fishermen were disagreeing amongst themselves, and breaches of the peace occurred. It was necessary to make some regulation in order to maintain peace. Of course the value of the different locations vary, and must be judged in a large measure by local officers.

Mr. MACDONELL. I am aware that much difficulty and inconvenience arose among fishermen owing to disputes as to the rights to fish in certain localities. I have, on various occasions, made application to this and the late Government for the appointment, within certain jurisdiction, of officers to settle such disputes or prevent their occurrence; but I was quite unprepared to find any such applications would result in a tax being imposed upon fishermen for the privilege of fishing in the salt water. I could not believe that such an Act was on the Statute-book, and when informed that it was, when I saw the Statutes and ascertained that it was, I felt it must have been due to an inadvertency or a mistake. It was something new for our fishermen to be told that they could not fish in the high seas without having to pay a tax. I hope that this tax, which is unprecedented, and should never have been proposed, will be removed from the Statute-book.

Mr. BLAKE. It does seem to me that the procedure is of a most extraordinary and objectionable character. I could hardly believe, when told by an hon. gentleman of this House, that the practice is as has just been explained by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I agree with my hon. friend behind me. I am entirely opposed to this motion of imposing a tax upon fishermen, for the privilege of fishing in the high seas. If, in order to prevent disputes, it is necessary that an overseer should give out permits to fish, they should be free; or if you are to charge anything the charge ought to be a mere nominal charge, fixed at the lowest possible rate, to cover the extra expense occasioned by the issuance of permits—a dollar or so, as a sort of registration fee. But what is the case? The local overseer is allowed to fix a varying license fee according to his discretion, according to what he thinks is the value of the holding. How many are there that have this right?

Mr. McISAAC. Two hundred and forty in Nova Scotia.

Mr. BLAKE. Two hundred and forty in Nova Scotia alone, and each one within his own locality has a discretion to decide how much each fisherman to whom he gives a license shall pay for his license. To one he may charge $2, another $5, another $10 and another $20, as the case may be, and he has the right to enforce the taking out of licenses, and to punish the act of fishing without a license by as high a penalty as $20 for each breach, so that the punishment which the law describes as most effectual, is wholly out of its reach. I call earnestly for the immediate revision of this practice.

Mr. McLELAN. There are about 240 overseers, but very few grant licenses.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not care if there were but ten or twelve. I should equally object.

Mr. McLELAN. Their instructions are just to charge a nominal fee, sufficient to make the man holding the license feel he has a right in it, and sufficient to keep order. Most of these cases are in trap-nets, there is a distinction between trap-nets and those that are located. In most cases where they are fixed, a scale was charged. The charge for a trap-net is $40, in some other cases discretionary powers are given to the overseer, and in most of these cases reports are made as to the location. They have to report to the local inspector in Nova Scotia as to the value. The general instruction is that a nominal fee only is to be charged when licenses or permits are to be granted.

Mr. BLAKE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say the charge was according to the value of the holding.

Mr. McLELAN. That is where the nets are located, except the trap-nets. These are fixed by the Department at $40 per head. In some cases when nets of other description are to be set they are varied according to the locality.

Mr. CASGRAIN. To what extent do these licenses extend? I understand they govern the right of going within three miles from shore. I am afraid that if we took the right over ocean fisheries our neighbors might object.

Mr. McLELAN. It does not extend to ocean fisheries.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Then I am incorrectly informed by my hon. friend's colleague.

Mr. McISAAC. It is the Atlantic coast, the Straits of Northumberland.

Mr. McLELAN. It is the coast fishing lying upon the Atlantic.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Then it is within three miles from shore. It is important to know the exact jurisdiction of these overseers.

Mr. ANGLIN. In the first Session after Confederation the right hon. gentleman at three o'clock in the morning, moved the second reading of a Bill for the fishing matters in the Dominion. I protested against it being introduced, because I was then the only person present representing a constituency interested in fisheries, and I stated it was the intention of several members in the House to move an amendment which would secure in permanence the rights claimed by persons holding property along the coast of our bays and creeks to the fishing in front of their property. They claimed it as a right, and had sometimes by force excluded others from what they considered as an encroachment on their own fishing districts. It came to be regarded on all sides as the right of persons holding a farm that ran down to the sea to set nets for the salmon fishery. The right hon. gentleman then requested that I should not move any such amendment or delay the passage of the Bill in any way, as we were all anxious to rise; and he told me it was the intention of the Government that these riparian rights should be thoroughly respected for all time, and that if I wished it the Minister of Marine would write me an official letter to that effect. I replied that as the right hon. gentleman, in his position as leader of the Government, had made me a promise of that kind, I would accept it as quite equal to any written promise that could be made, and I have ever since regarded it as almost in the light of law as bearing upon this particular subject. Now these riparian rights are not respected. These owners are compelled to pay licenses for the right of setting their nets in contiguity to their own lands. I am aware that disputes have arisen from time to time as to the extent of these so-called rights, equitable rights, that required the intervention of the fishery officers. In my own county fishermen were induced to take out licenses in order finally to settle disputes of that kind. I did not care to interfere in the case for they seemed to be satisfied with the arrangement. If an amount at all equivalent to a rent is to be charged in any of these places to persons who are proprietors of land on the banks, then that, I think, would be a very distinct violation of the pledge made to me, and through me to the fishermen of the Dominion, on that occasion by the right hon. gentleman. My recollection of that pledge is strengthened by the continued irritation existing for some years, and I trust that the right hon. gentleman has also a distinct recollection of the promise he then made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sorry to say that I have forgotten it altogether, it is so long ago, though I have no doubt what the hon. gentleman says is correct. This is a matter of considerable importance, and I can promise that the subject will engage the immediate attention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The question of the rights of riparian proprietors on the bank of a river, or on the fore-shore of the sea, are two different questions altogether. However, I fancy the fishermen have a right to fish in the deep sea without licenses from anybody. As regards the fore-shore, I will engage that this matter shall be looked into, and that if there are any improper practices they shall be removed.

Mr. GILLMOR. That practice is observed already in the county I represent. I think every man has the preference to set one of these traps opposite his own land. The catching of fish in these traps or weirs is a very large industry in my county. It will not do to allow every person to build weirs indiscriminately. They must apply to some officer and have the location fixed, because the great difficulty is that one weir would necessarily destroy another unless they are a certain distance apart. Every man who wants a weir in front of his own land should have the preference, but if he does not occupy it the officer may grant it to another. The price is fixed: formerly it was $15, now I think it is $10. With regard to fishing in the deep sea with nets or seines, I do not know that an objection is urged to that. A large part of the fishing in the Bay of Fundy and along the coast in the inner bay, is done now by nets. There is no objection to any person catching fish by nets, and there is no license or tax imposed upon them for that purpose. With regard to these weirs, it is a very large industry indeed. I do not believe that the practice can be improved upon. It must be regulated by these officers, and the fishermen themselves would rather pay a tax of $5 or $10 than to have it left without regulation. The county of Charlotte is one of the largest fishing centres in the Province of New Brunswick, and I do not think any improvement can be made upon the practice that now exists. There has been a great deal of trouble, because no man can build a weir for less than $1,000, and no one will build a weir and take the run of the fish unless he is certain that he will not be interfered with. Therefore it must be regulated by a Government officer, and that is now attended to as well as it can be.

Mr. FLYNN. I was not aware, from the notice, that this regulation of Council applied. It says in the 19th section, "if the regulation shall be found necessary or deemed expedient for the regulation of the sea coast and inland fisheries." I would ask the President of the Council if the words "sea coast" applies to the Atlantic coast.

Mr. McLELAN. It is only on the shore, the fore-shore.

Mr. FLYNN. I am glad to hear that any injustice done to the fishermen will be remedied. It may be necessary to have an officer to superintend the weirs, but fishermen who set their nets in the deep sea will be subjected to a great injustice if they are compelled to pay a tax. I take the guarantee of the Government that any such injustice will be remedied.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. This can only apply to fisheries within the three-mile limit, because Canada has not jurisdiction beyond that limit.

Mr. McDUGALL. It has not exclusive jurisdiction within the three miles.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Yes, for fishing. While I would object to heavy taxation being imposed on fishermen, it is necessary to have some regulation, and to have a registration fee which should be small. While the late Government compelled parties to take out licenses, they gave the proprietors of the land bordering on the shore preference over strangers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. How far from the shore?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Canada has exclusive jurisdiction within three miles from the shore.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would we prohibit a man fishing one mile from the shore without a license?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The regulation applies to all waters within three miles of the shore, and all the fishermen were amenable to those regulations.

Mr. DALY. When the regulation referred to was first issued by the Government, no doubt it was considered in many quarters an oppressive tax on the fishermen of Nova Scotia. The license to be taken out for salmon fishing was considered burdensome, and it was thought that it would injure the fishermen very materially; but, as far as I have been able to ascertain, the feeling which was at first instilled into their minds by interested parties, has since worn out, as it appears that the fee is simply to enable the overseers to know who wished to set salmon nets and what were the berths they wanted, in order that proper order might be maintained. I believe at present there are no complaints—at all events none have reached me from my county—of the regulations which prevail, though, as several hon. members have urged, the fee should be one merely for the purposes of registration and issuing licenses, so that overseers may superintend with regularity and see that fishermen do not interfere one with the other as respects their stations.

Mr. KAULBACH. I feel deeply interested in the present discussion respecting the regulation for charging of licenses for inshore fishing, as the county I have the honor to represent is more largely interested in that industry than any other county in the Dominion. When it was first intimated that a charge for a license was to be imposed in order to avoid dispute for berths, the fishermen asked to have Lunenburg county exempted from the payment of a tax, which request was acceded to by the Department upon my application; they (the fishermen) preferring through the overseer to draw for berths rather than be subjected to a tax. Finding that the draw system is practically better, I, on their behalf, feel constrained to oppose the license system.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Sheburne). The amount of license charged for fish traps, $40, is a very heavy charge, and one that should be reduced at least one-half. I am glad the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) is aware of the fact that the fishermen are very heavily taxed, because all his votes and speeches and the legislation of the present Government have been directed with a view to more heavily taxing the fishermen; but I am gratified, even at this late date, on the eve of a General Election, that he seeks to reduce the burthens on this class of the people in which he now feels so deep an interest.

Mr. McLELAN. The Government does not desire to tax the fishermen, but to maintain order. The traps mentioned by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) are very large seines and catch a large number of fish.

Mr. KILLAM. I do not know that very great objection is made on account of the traps, which cost $2,000 or $3,000, or even more. If the compulsory inspection fee were removed, it would give more satisfaction than the removal of the license. I see no reason why a few brush weirs in Yarmouth should have to pay, when a thousand over the Province do not pay a cent.

GOVERNMENT LANDS WITHIN THE RAILWAY BELT.

Mr. HESSON moved for copies of all Orders in Council withdrawing from homestead and preemption all Government lands within the Canadian Pacific Railway belt. He said: When this notice was placed on the paper five weeks ago the Order in Council having been passed, an impression got abroad that the Government had withdrawn from settlement all that portion of their lands within the twenty-four mile belt on both sides of the Canadian Pacific Railway. When this motion was placed on the notice paper, now nearly six weeks ago, it was to obtain correct information from the Government as to the meaning of the Order in Council withdrawing homesteads from settlement along the line of railway. I have received several communications from parties in the West, who feel aggrieved over what they supposed to be the meaning of the Order in Council, and I was induced to put this notice on the paper in order to obtain the information sought for. It has been a very slow process reaching that information, and having learned meanwhile, that it was the intention of the Government simply to withdraw the first belt of one mile on every side, throughout the length of the railway, as it is being located, and not as the people supposed, so large a portion as twenty-four miles on each side of the railway—I say, having obtained that information, I beg now to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

ROBBERY OF ALMA, N. B., POST OFFICE.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for copies of all papers, correspondence and affidavits in connection with the robbery of the post office kept by Nathan Cleveland, at Alma, Albert County, New Brunswick. He said: This man, Nathan Cleveland, suffered a loss by the robbery of Alma post office, the robbers having carried off stamps and other things for which he was accountable. There being a difference of opinion between Mr. Cleveland and the inspector as to what took place, and as his bondsmen were being pressed to recoup the loss, I wish to have the proceedings stopped so that we may be in possession of the facts. I understand he was held responsible for some things for which, as he says, and as I believe, he was not responsible.

DEATH OF — BUCHANAN.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for copies of all petitions, correspondence and recommendations relative to indemnity to the friends of — Buchanan, who was killed at Sussex last summer by the explosion of a shell. He said: I brought this matter before the House when the militia estimates were under discussion, and at that time the hon. Minister of Militia and I did not agree as to the facts. I tried to show that the Government were responsible for the death of this man by the explosion of a shell at Sussex, or, if they were not responsible, that this rich and powerful Government should contribute something towards the support of his family. I may have been wrong in supposing that the Government were responsible for his death, but I cannot say as to that until I am in possession of the facts sought by the motion. I understand that when the matter was brought before the Department it was recommended by the Major General Commanding the Forces, and I do not think he would recommend it if it was not a proper thing to be paid. It may be that the Government could not be compelled to pay the amount by course of law, and that the parties are too poor to proceed by petition of right, but that should not prevent the Government from doing justice in the premises, and contribute a small sum to the support of this man's family.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What was the young man's age?

Mr. DOMVILLE. I think about eighteen.

Mr. MACKENZIE. To whom would the money go?

Mr. DOMVILLE. To his aged father.

SECTION 27, WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved:

That by the Public Works Act of 1867 Section 20, it is provided as follows:—

"It shall be the duty of the Minister to invite tenders, by public advertisement, for the execution of all works, except in cases of pressing emergencies where delay would be injurious to the public interests, or where, from the nature of the work, it could be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the Department."

That the contract with H. J. Beemer, laid on the Table, for the construction of the works on Section 27, of the Welland Canal, for the sum of $759,170, was made without inviting tenders for such works, by public advertisement.

That the said contract was made after six tenders only had been received in response to private circulars, issued to ten persons only, namely:—

Robert Wilson, of Granby, Ontario,
Alexander Manning, of Toronto, Ontario,
Alexander S. Brown, of Belleville, Ontario,
Merrit A. Cleveland, of Port Colborne, Ontario,
James Worthington, of Brockville, Ontario,
H. J. Beemer, of Montreal, Quebec,
Messrs. Smith & McGaw, of Port Hope, Ontario,
Messrs. Beldon & Co., of Syracuse, United States,
Charles Raynor & Co., of Syracuse, United States,
G. Peterson, of Lockport, United States.

That no opportunity was afforded to other contractors to tender for said work.

That the said contract was ordered to be made subject to the approval of Parliament.

That subsequently the said contract was ordered to be made, and the same now is binding, unless disapproved of by a resolution of the House of Commons

That this House will thus share the responsibility of Ministers unless it disapproves of the said contract.

That the said contract so let, without inviting tenders by public advertisement, and on circulars addressed only to ten persons, was a violation of the law and the policy of Parliament, and deprived the country of the securities and advantages to be derived from adherence to the law and policy which prescribes a free and open competition for such works.

That this House cannot approve of the contract so let in violation of the law.

He said: The Public Works Act sets forth very particularly the necessity of advertising publicly for tenders. This was, however, disregarded in this case, and circulars were issued by the Government addressed to several parties. This action was done, no doubt, on the advice of the Chief Engineer, Mr. Page, but no claim of that kind can be put forth by hon. gentlemen opposite as a justification for their action. It is very evident that a practice which may do in the case of small contracts, and which has been followed on the Intercolonial Railway, for instance, to a certain extent under both Governments with regard to supplies, is a very different thing when applied to a large contract like this, involving $750,000. There are also some circumstances connected with the transaction to which I would refer for a moment. The contractors were contractors of some standing on the Welland Canal and elsewhere, and were financially strong men, who ought to have been, in my opinion, compelled to finish their contract. The hon. gentlemen opposite, however, chose to relieve these contractors of their contract without sufficient reason, so far as I can ascertain from the papers presented to the House. The circulars were sent round on the 20th of September, if I recollect rightly, and tenders were received on the 4th of October. There was no necessity, on the part of the parties tendering, to make out lists, as an estimate of the quantities accompanied the circular in every case, and the estimate of the quantities could have been sent as well by those who tendered on a public advertisement, if it had been issued. I am quite at a loss, therefore, to understand what could have been gained by issuing a private circular. There are occasions, which the Public Works Act anticipates, on which the Government should take work into their own hands; but in this case I cannot see anything that hon. gentlemen could possibly gain by this method of making contracts. Invitations or circulars were sent, I think, in all, to ten parties, and of those ten parties only six responded by sending in a tender, thus limiting the competition unduly, and far more than there was any necessity for. There was one inexplicable circumstance connected with the invitation, and that is that the parties who had so recently failed in their contract, and whom the Government had released in order to let the contract to stronger men, were invited to tender afresh. I cannot understand why that should have been done. I recollect one or two cases under the late Government, notably the case of the Ottawa post office, in 1874, when the Government had to take a contract out of the hands of the contractors, Messrs. Hatch, and they tendered again, but the Government declined to receive any tender from them because they had failed previously. The same practice, I hold, ought to have been pursued in this case; after the parties had failed to finish their contract, they should not have been allowed to tender again for the works which they had a short time before given over. When I gave notice of this motion, it was my intention to go into the question of quantities and the prices of the materials furnished; but after the remarks of the hon. gentleman opposite concerning Mr. Page, who was the sole valuator, I have confidence enough in that gentleman to decline asking the prices and the quantities of the materials, especially as the hon. gentleman opposite promised to bring them down if they were required. My whole intention was to refer to the question of letting public contracts by private circulars. No doubt Mr. Page strongly urged this course, but I believe he is in favor of that as a general principle, which I infer from his letters. But we have not yet adopted that principle, and while his argument may be a reason for changing the law, it can be no reason for violating the terms of the Statute as it now exists.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is entirely in his right in making this motion, and I can certainly take no exception to the terms in which he has made it. I do think that the hon. gentleman is serious in proposing that that contract should be annulled, or that if the matter were left to his decision, he would assume the responsibility of annulling it. He treats it as a question of law. The law is as the hon. gentleman has stated it. I do not intend, at this late period of the Session, to take up the time of the House with this subject at any length. The subject was referred to before, in connection with a motion for papers, which are now all laid on the Table, or in course of being submitted. Though I have urged their production, the pressure of work has thus far prevented it. The papers will, however, disclose the cause of this contract being let without public tender in the manner to remove any necessity of lengthy observation on my part. As the hon. gentleman stated, the law required that contracts let in the Public Works and in my own Department, should be by public tender, and there is no doubt, it is the duty of the hon. Minister in all cases, consistent with the public interests, to carry out the law. I contend it was carried out in this case. The hon. gentleman will probably say that I am not in a position to set up my authority against that of the Chief Engineer of Railways and Canals, as to what constitutes a pressing emergency. He stated that this was a case of most pressing emergency. It was a very large contract, originally for some $750,000, and Mr. Page, having encountered great difficulty in getting the contract executed. The difficulty was so great that when those works came to a stand-still, the very able engineer on the spot, Mr. Thompson, directed the water to be let into the coffer dam, and he says if that had not been properly done, the whole side of the Welland Canal, involving a most terrible destruction as well as an enormous expense, would have gone out. Mr. Page came to the conclusion that this was not a case of an ordinary contract, but a case in which the contractors had been unable to carry it out in a manner to secure the object in view. The Chief Engineer considered that the prices were not half large enough for a very large and important portion of those works. The hon. gentleman says that the contractors should have been compelled to carry out this contract notwithstanding. I am not aware of any instance in which his or any preceding Government compelled contractors or their sureties—in the case of the Intercolonial Railway, contractors were obliged to be joined with sureties, responsible men, for the carrying out of the works—to finish their works in such circumstances. Nor were the sureties either obliged to execute those contracts. Again and again works were taken out of the hands of contractors and were finished at great expense on the part of the Government. Nor am I aware of a single case in regard to the canals, where, when the contractors broke down, the sureties, however wealthy, were called on to finish the work at their own expense. When it was represented that it was of the greatest possible moment that this work should be properly proceeded with, the Chief Engineer reporting there was a pressing emergency, and when I honestly concurred in that opinion, I think the hon. gentleman will see that I had no course but to submit to the Council the report of the Chief Engineer and my own views as to the necessity of the case in the public interest. That was done. It would not have been wise to neglect the counsel of so high and experienced an authority as Mr. Page. Mr. Page's proposal to send out private circulars showing the character of the work to be performed, and recommending the selection only of contractors whom he believed had the knowledge, experience and resources that would enable them to carry it out to a successful completion, while possessing great weight and authority, and commending itself to my judgment, was most unpalatable so far as the position of the Government was concerned. The Canadian contractors embrace a numerous and important section of the community. They possess great influence in their localities, and no step the Government could take was so likely to involve them in unpopularity with this large class, as to shut them out from public competition by adopting the views of Mr. Page. It was with very great reluctance I adopted that advice, simply because I believed the public interest demanded it. And as the papers disclose, when those private estimates were sent out to the parties selected by Mr. Page, who was authorized to give any counsel he thought proper, and to select the parties himself, I had no more idea to whom he sent those tenders than the hon. gentleman opposite himself. Mr. Page had asked to have that responsibility placed upon him, and I believed he could be safely entrusted with it, always regarding public interests. The hon. gentleman has criticized one of the parties, Mr. Cleveland, whom I was as much surprised as the hon. gentleman to find associated with those contractors.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Cleveland & Murray.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it was Cleveland alone.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Murray, in reply to my question, said he was with Cleveland.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Murray may have said so, but the question is: did Mr. Page send a circular to Cleveland & Murray? He sent one to Cleveland. The contract was let upon the assurance, on the part of Mr. Page, that he believed that Beemer & Co. were the lowest tenderers, but yet that he believed the work could be done by them successfully and thoroughly. There were a number of similar cases during the time of the late Government. I will only refer the hon. member for Lambton to his own return, laid on the Table, in which he will find a dozen cases—I am not saying he did wrong—but in which, without his being able to plead any special emergency, he entered into contracts without public tender or advertisement. I think I have showed a precedent for my action, though, perhaps, not in matters of so great a magnitude as this. Yet, I believe there is one case in which I believe a work had been re-let, in which he stated it was re-let for something like $1,000,000 without a call for tenders.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What case was that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A case on the Lachine Canal, I think; at all events it is mentioned in the return. Difficulties had occurred with the contractors, and the hon. gentleman found abler contractors to take up the work, when, with some slight modifications of the contract, and without asking for tenders, he gave them the work as the best arrangement.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What contract was it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was a contract for the Montreal section No. 1, two locks and a basin, and section No. 2 of the Wellington basin. The contract was originally given to A. D. McDonald & Co., and was cancelled on account of the unsatisfactory progress of the work. I am now reading from the hon. gentleman's own return. He says: "Consequently, no tenders were called for, and that contract was let to James Worthington & Co., at $1,089,012." I merely mentioned this to show that there are cases in which contracts were entered into by the late Government in the public interest without calling for tenders, establishing precedents if any were required. I do not think in this case any precedent was required, because the work was a very important one, and with the strong declaration of a gentleman of Mr. Page's experience, we thought we would not be justified in interposing our imperfect judgment in opposition to the plan which he proposed, and which I believe will be effectual in obtaining the construction of this work at the very lowest possible cost. The voluminous papers laid on the Table of the House, contains full particulars connected with this matter, and, from the terms in which the hon. gentleman has made his motion, I do not feel disposed to go more fully into this subject. At the same time, when making this contract it was provided not that the usual course should be taken in connection with the contract, that it should become ratified when laid on the Table of the House for a month, but it provided that, made under these peculiar circumstances, this House could at any moment, so long as the contract lasted, interpose and cancel it, and the contractors would have no right to make any claim for compensation. Mr. Lash suggested that as the best mode of dealing with this case. I trust these explanations will be satisfactory to the House, and I am sure that I might safely leave to the hon. gentleman himself to say whether that contract should be cancelled or not.

Mr. BLAKE. Unfortunately we have not been able to examine into the papers, as they are now in the hands of the printers and the manuscripts are not available.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have done my best.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not implying any blame to the hon. gentleman; but we are not qualified to deal with the case. If I had derived, from the perusal of the Chief Engineer's report, the impression the hon. Minister has derived from it and conveyed to the House, I should have thought his answer to the motion perfectly satisfactory, and, in fact, thought the motion should not have been made. But I derived, and maintain the opinion, that a wholly different impression is to be derived from the report, not that it does not strongly recommend the adoption of the course adopted, but as to the grounds on which that course is recommended. As the hon. member for Lambton has stated, and as is stated in his motion, the law provides:

"It shall be the duty of the Minister to invite tenders, by public advertisement, for the execution of all works, except in cases of pressing emergencies where delay would be injurious to the public interests, or where, from the nature of the work, it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers and servants of the Department."

The impression which I derived from a careful perusal of Mr. Page's report is this: I think that the House will see, when the papers are printed and laid before them, that Mr. Page made a direct attack, supported by very strong language and argument, against the principle of that clause of the Act of Parliament, against the principle of letting contracts for public works by public competition. It is upon that principle he tells us that what has happened in the past, when contracts have been let by public competition, will happen in this instance if the contract is let in the same way. He says that when you let contracts by public competition, a number of contractors come forward to tender; amongst them, a great number are incapable of properly executing the work, and a certain number who come in with still more unworthy motives, obviously referring to that class of tenderers who come in with a view of selling their contracts. He says that the parties responsible for letting the contract are embarrassed by the existence of these low tenders, that the best tenderers will not tender at these low rates, that the low tenderers are in the way, and that the consequence of the letting of this description of work by public advertisement is that the work is not let to the best men, who are best fitted to carry it out, and that difficulties will ensue. That is his résumé of the practical effect of carrying out clause 20 of the Public Works Act, and he advises the Government, in consequence of this, his experience, not to apply that clause. It is not because the case is one of pressing emergency, where delay would be injurious to the public interests, but because to let by public advertisement will induce the presence of a number of low tenderers, unable to perform the work, who will embarrass the letting of the work.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is not that a pressing emergency?

Mr. BLAKE. That is the law, and if it is a pressing emergency the proper way to meet it is to repeal the clause. It is not an emergency connected with the work.

Mr. McCALLUM. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say it was not a pressing necessity to have that work completed at once?

Mr. BLAKE. I say it was; but I say that the engineer did not tell us that to advertise would take a longer time than to send a private circular. I say that he did not tell us that that was the cause of the delay in letting the contract by public advertisement. What he tells us is, not that it was a pressing emergency where delay would be requisite to the public interest, but that if he advertised for tenders as the law required, there would come in a lot of inadequate and improper contractors, the existence of whose lower tenders would embarrass the Government in allocating the contract to the proper person. Now, I venture to assert that Mr. Page's report is an attack upon the general principle of the law, and it is an affirmation that the true way of letting important and difficult contracts for public works is not by public advertisement, and by competition, but by issuing circulars to selected contractors. Where I feel the Government erred was in yielding to that advice, and that if they were determined to yield to that advice they could only do it upon the theory that they were prepared to propose to Parliament a modification of the Act of Parliament itself; because if you do not modify an Act of Parliament itself, which I do not recommend—because I find from the report that you do not propose to modify an Act of Parliament—then you destroy the basis of Mr. Page's report. It is, I repeat, not a piece of argument directed to the special circumstances of this work, but a piece of argument to the view that difficulties supervened in the letting of great public contracts by adopting the principle which the law prescribes of letting them by public advertising. That is the difference between the hon. Minister and myself as to what the meaning of Mr. Page's report was. If Mr. Page reported, giving reasonable ground, as I have no doubt he would, if he did so report, that this was a case of pressing emergency, and that delay would be caused by advertising which could be avoided by letting the contract by circular, that would be another thing. But I say he does not bring the case within the law. His report declares the law is a vicious law which will get you into trouble, and that it ought to be repealed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Page, as I understand, took the ground: if I send circulars to a limited number of contractors and tell them that I am only calling for men of great experience and ability to ask for tenders for this work, I have a better chance to get such men to come forward than I would have if they knew this was to be thrown open to general public competition; and that they would have to compete with the very class of contractors to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. BLAKE. Why, Sir, that is the very thing; that is an attack upon the system of letting by public tender. It is not because this was a peculiar work that he says so. It is a contract of a quarter of a million for a special piece of work, but no more special than many other pieces of public work that have been let, and not requiring peculiar qualifications more than any other. It is not the most difficult piece of canal work that has been let; and I maintain that the fact of Mr. Page sending out to select contractors, whom he thought it expedient would result in procuring tenders from better contractors and a more selected contract for the public, suggests what I have said. It is an attack on the law; that is the position. It is a position that the law produces the general result.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think he leans in that direction.

Mr. BLAKE. The report is decisive upon it, and there it is that I think the question is a serious one. However Parliament—because Parliament was invited to express an opinion on this contract, and if this contract passed without an expression of that opinion, Parliament would be taken to acquiesce in letting a contract upon tenders received under private circular, upon general grounds, largely applicable to all tenders for large public works, not specially to this work but to all. The engineer, in a word, declares: "You can produce better results for the public by repealing this law, and by substituting a provision that tenders are to be asked for from selected contractors." Arguing from that gentleman's standpoint, every case that he proposes to the Minister it should apply it to that particular case. Now, I say that that applied to that particular case on that basis, it means that we are asked to agree to the repeal of that clause or to its being ignored; and you will find, if you have public works of an important character to let during recess, the same report made, unless Mr. Page happened to change his mind after the changed experience he has had in the letting of contracts in this way. That is the true, and I have no doubt that it is his sincere conclusion; but where I differ with the hon. gentleman is this: the hon. gentleman says: "I would have taken a grave responsibility if I had differed from Mr. Page." True, if he had differed as to the delay being injurious to the public interest, but not true if it is directed to the general proposition that the law is a bad law, that it produces ill results, and that that law should be departed from. That, it seems to me, was a question of policy which the hon. gentleman was perfectly correct in submitting to his colleagues, and having it decided as a governmental question; but where it appears to me the Government erred was in considering the law itself as impracticable instead of not being applicable in this case. We have seen to-night one instance of the exceptional results which follow; because in this very case one of the three persons to whom the contract had been let, about whom we have a volume of correspondence, showing how the difficulty came through him, and from whom the work was taken. The engineer himself says: "I can procure for you a high-class tenderer by adopting the system of private tenders," and he chooses from contractors in the United States and Canada ten men, amongst whom is the very man who had failed in the contract and created all the trouble. Now, I really find it impossible to justify that, and the hon. Minister has not attempted to justify it. He says he was much surprised.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. His explanation is that their price was utterly inadequate, that there was an impossibility of doing the work at their price.

Mr. BLAKE. I forgot that statement, because it did not appear to be very material. This man was the one Government acted for, having cancelled the contract of Murray & Co. My hon. friend beside me will be able to make an observation, by-the-way, on that subject. But it is clear that it gave great dissatisfaction to the engineer in charge, Mr. Thompson, and also to Mr. Page. It is extraordinary that the hon. gentleman did not apply to his Chief Engineer for an explanation; and he does not tender us an explanation of how it happened that having determined to take this and refining process for selecting his tenderers, he puts among them a person who was the cause of the trouble. There is another curious thing in the correspondence. We find a gentleman who is a contractor, combining the occupations of a lawyer, either telegraphing or writing to the Prime Minister to say that some one, and I think named Bannerman, was much surprised at not having an opportunity to tender, that there was some suggestion that there was only a favored lot to whom circulars were addressed.

You find the Prime Minister either writing or telegraphing, or directing a letter or telegraph to be sent, that he thought Mr. Bannerman ought to have been allowed an opportunity of tendering, and you find Mr. Page announcing that the time had already passed in which tenders were to be received. So the Prime Minister declared that the charmed circle of ten contractors should include, at all events, this gentleman who was a few hours too late. Tenders were received, and it was impossible to deal with other would-be contractors. The Prime Minister felt disposed to conciliate the body of contractors and recommended Mr. Bannerman, but the Minister of Railways was above all such considerations and would not say anything in favor of that gentleman. In regard to the McDonald and Worthington matter, I happen to know something of the facts of that transaction, and unless I am incorrect the McDonalds proposed the introduction of Mr. Worthington as an associate, and he was so introduced. But a new contract was made. The question in this case is this: The Chief Engineer in effect reports that section 20 of the Public Works Act is wrong in principle; that it embarrasses the Government of the country by introducing tenderers of inadequate standing and discouraging higher class tenderers; and he advised that this clause be abandoned in this particular instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals will look at page 85 he will find the first letting of these two contracts there set out. The figures appear to be as follows: Lemay & Bowie, $462,284; A. P. McDonald & Co., $626,728. If the hon. gentleman will add those two figures together, he will find they make a total of $1,088,012. A. P. McDonald & Co. took the work from Lemay & Bowie, as well as the other. I paid several visits myself to the work and found it dragging very much; and the McDonalds proposed to take in Mr. Worthington, and as I knew Mr. Worthington had been very successful in contract work, I, as Minister, expressed my gratification at the prospect of taking him in. Mr. Worthington, however, declined to come in as a partner unless his name was in the contract, so a new contract was made out, including his name, for the two contracts, but there was no tendering at all. This was done in order that Mr. Worthington should obtain security for his payment of the money.

Mr. McCALLUM. I know something of this very important work, and that all the expenditure that has been made on the Welland Canal is of no benefit until this work is completed. I have gone through the papers, and know that the Minister of Railways ought to be censured by this country if he had taken any other course in this matter. I found fault with the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) when he was in office for leaving the most important contracts on the Welland Canal to the last, and for withholding the letting of works that should be first completed until the last. With respect to the hon. gentleman's remarks as to Mr. Cleveland, I consider Mr. Cleveland is as good a contractor as we have in America; he has done a large quantity of work for the Government, satisfactorily, on the Welland Canal, and it should not be said that he should be cut out, because Mr. Page said it would take double the money to put in the coffer-dam than that for which he offered to do it. If a man took work at half price and afterwards found himself unable to do it, the Government should not ruin him; no doubt, he went on as far as possible. But hon. gentlemen opposite have found fault with Mr. Page and declared he wants to destroy the system of letting contracts. Mr. Page, in recommending the Government to let the work by circular, did so in order to secure an energetic and responsible contractor who would go on with the work at once, otherwise they might have obtained a contractor who would have taken the work at lower prices; but this was an important work and should be proceeded with immediately. The country has not lost any money by it. Only six tenders were received, and I have here a statement of the prices. The Government were slow in relieving Messrs. Hunter, Murray & Co. of the work. The late hon. Minister of Public Works let the work on September 26th, 1877. The hon. gentleman stated that the Welland Canal should be finished in 1876; but he did not let the contract for the aqueduct until 1877. The hon. gentleman had so much to do in regard to public works and canals that he had not time to consider how the work was progressing on the Welland Canal. The Government, as I have said, were very slow in taking the work out of the contractors' hands, and it was only after several letters had been received from Messrs. Hunter, Murray & Cleveland, asking to be relieved of some portion of the work, that this was done, and the Government engineer was appointed to settle with the contractors. The Government have done so, and the work ought to be carried on. It was Mr. Page who suggested that the work should be let by circular, and the Government gave the necessary authority for this to be done. Let me read the prices of the tenders: No. 1, H. J. Beemer & Co., $759,140; No. 2, F. A. Manning, $787,414; Beemer's tender being less by $28,274. No. 3, was Gibson & Co., $853,093, or $93,953 more than that of Beemer. No. 4 was Mr. A. Cleveland, this much abused man who knew all about the work and the difficulties he had to contend with, his tender being $890,427, or $131,287 more than Mr. Beemer. No. 5 was R. Raynor & Co., $956,99, or $197,852 more than Beemer's contract. No. 6 was Peterson & Co., $966,591, or $207,451 more than that of Beemer. I hope this firm has sufficient money to finish their work. Mr. Page would deserve censure if, under such circumstances, he did not recommend the contract to be let as in the present case. The hon. gentleman opposite did not always take the lowest tender, and I am surprised to find him making this motion. I believe the present leader of the Opposition was acting for the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) when the latter was in England, and I would like to know what were the facts about contract No. 1 on the Welland Canal. The contract was taken from Denison, Belden & Co., who were good contractors, and given to the highest tenderer. Why did not the hon. gentleman carry out the law of the land in that case? I do not say that the hon. gentleman did wrong in not always accepting the lowest tender. In fact, I think he did perfectly right. I can refer to this return and show several instances where he did not accept the lowest tender, but, as I said, I believe there are circumstances in which this should be done. He let a contract on the Canadian Pacific Railway, section 25, for building a tunnel, additional work, without any tender and without any security, for $70,830.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No, no.

Mr. McCALLUM. Yes, yes. I take my information from this return, and if the information is wrong the return is not correct. I find another for fortifications, Lévis, platform for guns, $1,005, in which there was no security and no tenders. Another contract was a subsidy for running a steamer between Gaspé and Campbellton, $5,000 a year, in which no tenders were asked for. Another contract was the transport of spikes from Duluth to St. Boniface, in which no tenders were asked. Then there is the Whitehead contract on the Canadian Pacific Railway, in which no tenders were received and no security given. The hon. gentleman should not find fault with Mr. Page, for he was glad enough to shelter himself behind that officer when he was in power.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I made no attack on Mr. Page.

Mr. McCALLUM. Why this motion then, if there is no attack on Mr. Page? And we remember the Goderich Harbor job, where the people of this country lost $30,000 by certain shady transactions; and the hon. gentleman got a letter from this able officer and sheltered himself behind his back, though he attacks him to-night. I have known Mr. Page for a long time, and there is one thing that is to be said about him: he always finishes his own work—he clears it up as he goes. The contractors in the present case I consider to be the best in America, either the United States or Canada, and I consider that the Government is getting the work done very cheaply if it can be done for this amount of money, and I hope the work will be completed in good time, inasmuch as we cannot get the benefit of the expenditures upon the canal until this work is done.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I should be sorry to protract the discussion, and would have taken no part in it, but for the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. These remarks he made in good spirit, except that he was entirely mistaken in reference to contract No. 1, on the Welland Canal, with which I was connected in the absence of the Minister of Public Works in 1875. Denison, Belden & Co., no doubt, are good contractors. I do not know, in fact, whether they are now or not, because I have not followed their career, but I know that at the time of this contract, when they presented the lowest tender, there were serious charges made against them in the State of New York, and they were of such a nature that but for the remarks of the hon. gentleman, I would have made no reference to them. I will, however, as briefly as possible, read some extracts from official documents in that case.

Mr. McCALLUM. That matter passed through the Courts, and we do not want exploded slanders in this House. The whole thing has been repudiated.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. If the hon. gentleman feels an anxiety to protect these gentlemen he should not hold them out in the position in which he held them to-night, as men who were badly treated by the late Government, and though the hon. gentleman did not impute motives, the worst possible motives have been imputed. I do not know what the result of the investigation may have been, but I propose to throw some light upon the subject. When the contract was made and when they were understood to be the lowest tenderers, the New York Journal of Commerce came under my eyes, in which appeared a report submitted by the Canal Investigating Committee to the Governor on the Denison contract. The whole story is too long to be repeated here, but its framework was fraud from beginning to end, according to the reports of the Commissioners. They wind up a report of considerable length by stating:

"That the parties interested in this contract, to whom it was unlawfully awarded, for whose behoof its conditions were unlawfully changed, and the work on it, and materials furnished under it falsely measured and estimated, were H. D. Denison, James J. Belden, A. Caldwell Belden, and Thomas Gale."

That is Denison, Belden & Co.

"That the false and fraudulent measurements, estimates and allowances under this contract were only possible through the culpable neglect or connivance of the canal commissioners, engineers and inspectors in charge with the contractors."

Well, Sir, that was enough to make one open one's eyes to the character of the men who had already two large contracts on the Welland Canal. In the New York Journal of Commerce we find the subject again referred to, as follows:—

"The Canal Fraud Prosecution.—Judge Westbrook to-day granted an order of attachment, directed to the sheriff of Onondaga County, against the property of Denison, Belden & Co., canal contractors, at the suite of the State, for $417,000; and also an order of arrest requiring bail from each in $200,000. The complaint of the Attorney General states that $150,337.02 has been paid the defendants for work never done."

The article then goes on to give a long list of works charged for, which were never done. There were a great many reports of this kind circulating throughout the United States, and the hon. gentleman will admit that a stranger, not knowing Denison, Belden & Co., would say that this was a prima facie case against them. I take up the London Times, and I find its Philadelphia correspondent expressing astonishment that the Canadian Government should have such men engaged on its public works. All this made it necessary for the Department to look into the conditions of the tender of Denison, Belden & Co., to whom the contract was about to be awarded. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman's friends were not entirely silent on that occasion. I find the Mail quoting the paragraph from the correspondence in the London Times to which I have referred, as follows:—

"In New York the campaign of the State Government against the 'Canal Ring' has assumed practical shape in the form of an action at law against some of the contractors. At the last session of the Legislature the Civil Remedies Amendment Act was passed for the better punishment of this kind of speculation, and under it the suit is brought. The Investigating Committee appointed by the Legislature exposed a number of fraudulent contracts, and their report being sent to the Attorney-General, he has filed a bill of complaint in the New York Supreme Court founded upon one contract for about $76,000, upon which there has already been paid out over $417,000. Suit for the recovery of the sum is brought in the name of the State against the contractors, Henry D. Denison, James J. Belden, A. Caldwell Belden and Thomas Gale. An attachment for that amount has been issued against their property and an order for their arrest accompanies it, bail being fixed at $200,000 each. This suit will probably open vigorous action against the ring. It is stated that owing to speculations the New York canal deficiency this year will exceed $1,000,000."

This subject also attracted the attention of the newspapers of this country. The Mail had an article about that time, headed, "More Denison-Beldenism," in which it states:

"More developments are coming to light respecting the very peculiar manner in which Mr. Huntington's friends, Denison, Belden & Co., 'fix' their contract schedules to their own vast profit and the people's grievous loss. A despatch of Saturday last, from Saratoga, where Governor Tilden is at present staying, says:

"The Canal Commission appointed by Governor Tilden made to-day their second report. It comprises another contract of Belden, Denison & Co. for work done near the city of Utica, which was to cost about $10,000, but on which the State has paid about $50,000. The case is even more flagrant than the one which is the subject of the present suit. The Governor immediately transmitted the report to the Attorney-General to-day, with a request under the law of last winter, that the suit be commenced in behalf of the State to recover moneys wrongfully paid. This is a case in which Horace Seymour, jr., nephew of Horatio Seymour, was appointed engineer to superintend the execution of the work. He insisted upon its being performed on the terms of the contract, and the conflict arose. The contractors endeavored to have him instructed to measure work that had never been done and to acquiesce in their fraud against the State. When they found they could not succeed in this purpose, and could not get it removed, they recklessly abandoned the work, leaving a stop wall, which they had pulled down in the canal, from which it had to be removed to render navigation possible. This suit will also be pressed forward with the utmost vigor. Other cases are partially investigated."

The Mail goes on:

"An Albany despatch of the same date announces that the Attorney General has been instructed to take action upon the Utica contracts, and that suits will be forthwith pressed against Henry D. Denison, James J. Belden, A. Caldwell Belden, and Mead Belden. Governor Tilden tells the New York Herald of Sunday that the canal men can march well with muffled drums; they can fight well in ambush, but when we get them in the open field they are beaten at once.' Unless Mr. Huntington cancels the contract awarded them, Denison, Belden & Co. will carefully establish themselves behind the torres veritas of the parallel, and bid defiance to Governor Tilden and proceed to assault our Treasury with all the audacity they have displayed and the experience they have gained in their great campaign on the Erie."

Again the Mail gives the following despatch from Ottawa:—

"The Dominion Government has awarded the contract for the enlargement of the Welland Canal, section No. 1, to Denison, Belden & Co. of Syracuse."

The Mail also published the following despatch from Albany:—

"The Argus to-morrow will contain the first report of the Governor's Canal Investigation Commission in full. It relates mainly to the Denison contract between Port Schuyler and the Lower Mohawk Aqueduct, on which more than $400,000 has been paid for work contracted to be done for less than $80,000. In this report the Commission have developed the profligate system upon which extraordinary repairs have been made for the last eight or ten years throughout the eastern division of the canals. It is understood that the report will be followed by a succession of reports on other contracts, as fast as they can be put into form, and the suit to be brought by the Attorney General against Denison, Belden & Co. is based upon the facts set forth in this report."

I could go on quoting from Ministerial journals of that time, but it appears unnecessary. Of course the hon. Minister of Railways, finding this to be the state of things as to a matter which I am sure he has not much investigated, will be glad to know that in imputing improper motives he is mistaken, and that the course urged by all parties to be taken in this matter was pursued by the Government. It does not, therefore, lie with the hon. gentleman, nor with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, to blame us, unless they declare that allegations of fraud made in the warrant of the Governor of New York, and the general voice of the State, given expression to in all the newspapers on both sides of politics, were to be utterly disregarded as to the placing of great contracts in the hands of these people. I am mindful of the hon. gentleman's remark that he did not wish to protract this discussion, and I am willing to follow his example. I had intended to say more on this matter, but I satisfy myself with this statement, that it is not my fault if Denison, Belden & Co. are spoken of in these terms in this House. I never reproached them, but acting with my colleagues, and with a sense of the delicate position of responsibility I occupied, and acting on the advice of those in whom I had confidence, I simply felt that it would be an act of impropriety to give a contract to parties whose characters were impugned as theirs were. As to the other statement that I gave the contract to a higher tenderer, I do not want to apply the adjective which the hon. gentleman applied to Mr. Patrick Larkin the other day; but his tender was only $300,000 more than that of these people, and he took the contract at their price; and I conclude my observations by simply asking the hon. gentleman whether Mr. Patrick Larkin has concluded his contract on the Welland Canal to the satisfaction of the Government?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may, perhaps, be allowed a single remark with reference to an expression made by the leader of the Opposition, that there was scarcely sufficient foundation for the position taken in Mr. Page's report. It is right that I should give a brief extract from Mr. Page's report in order to point out that Messrs. Hunter, Murray & Cleveland could not carry on their contract. He says:

"The construction of the coffer-dams, and the unwatering of the foundations for the new structure, could not be done by the most experienced contractor under the best management for less than double the amount stated in the contract for that purpose."

And the hon. gentleman knows that there is nothing so fatal to a contract as the price being utterly inadequate to do the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is only a part of the work.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; but it is a very important and a very expensive portion of the work. Mr. Page goes on:

"It appears to me that the only certain way of getting the aqueduct built now is to place the work in the hands of experienced, energetic contractors, at rates that will enable them to form proper dams, and otherwise conduct the undertaking advantageously, and in the manner contemplated."

So that Mr. Cleveland might have been a very good contractor, and able to do a good deal more at double the price than with half of it. Mr. Page says:

"I therefore advise that the offer of Messrs. Hunter, Murray & Cleveland to relinquish their contract, be accepted."

He says, in addition, on this subject:

"In regard to the question of proceeding with the works immediately under the Department, I venture to say that this is a case in which an experiment of that kind is the least likely, of any course that could be tried, to result satisfactorily; whilst no one could possibly form any idea of the time it would take, or what would be the probable cost of completing the undertaking under such an arrangement. The best—if not the only way, in my opinion, at all likely to be successful—would be to invite tenders for the execution and completion of the works by 'circular' letters addressed to such experienced, competent contractors possessing means and of such standing that they could be relied upon to carry out what they undertake."

Then he goes on to give his reasons for that opinion. Mr. Page's report goes very strongly in the direction of showing that public competition is not always the most successful mode of procedure. There was a time when hon. gentlemen opposite gave a great deal of weight to Mr. Page's views. My predecessor, after tenders were in for half-a-dozen of those last contracts, on precisely similar views of Mr. Page, gave them as a reason for setting aside all those contracts, and re-inviting tenderers, to obtain better tenders. As the hon. gentleman who has just sat down asked me a question on this subject, I will say I believe that Patrick Larkin executed his work very satisfactorily, and in a way to prevent fault being found with it. I do not remember having used any adjectives calculated to reflect on his ability; but if I did so it was unintentional. I think the hon. gentleman did wrong in referring to Denison, Belden & Co., who were attacked, as he says, violently by newspapers and political parties in the United States. A heated election had taken place, when Tilden ran for President, and they took a very active and influential part in defeating him. The result was, as I am informed, a violent political conspiracy was entered into to crush them. I am informed that when their case was tried by the highest Courts, that they were acquitted in the most honorable manner. But this I know, and my predecessor knows, that we never had contractors in Canada who performed their duties more faithfully, efficiently and successfully than Denison, Belden & Co.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman must admit also that when my hon. friend was attacked a few evenings ago by the hon. Minister of Railways, it became absolutely necessary to refer to the circumstances as they existed. He also knows, from observing the papers at the time, on his own side of the House, that a very strong case was made out; and also, although it turned out afterwards that it was very different from what we supposed, every one at the time believed that this was the case. The hon. member for Monck seemed to think that I was not consulted about the matter. I was; the matter was not fully settled till my arrival here.

Mr. McCALLUM. That was my understanding of it—that the matter was closed before the hon. gentleman got here. But if wrong I am glad to be set right.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. Minister of Railways today, and on former occasions, referred to the six contracts which were not let upon tenders received by them before they went out of office, and I was blamed by him for asking for tenders afresh, and was reminded that the fresh tenders cost somewhat more than the old. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will remember that they had the contractors before the Privy Council before we succeeded to office, and that they themselves decided not to act on those tenders. That is a little secret before not known.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I come from a constituency deeply interested in the works on the Welland Canal; and we know from the way in which that work dragged its weary length along, that the country was deprived of the use and profit of money voted by Parliament, and expended on that work. For years, as the hon. member for Monck has stated, I remember two or three in succession, when sitting on the opposite side of the House, asking the hon. member for Lambton, then Minister of Public Works, when this work would be completed, especially the aqueduct; and I remember him stating it would be finished in 1876; afterwards it was to be finished in 1877, and then in 1878. But we found that it was not till 1882 that this work could be made ready for vessels to pass through, and that it is not finished yet in its entirety. Why, if the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals had not exercised the right given him by the Public Works Act, of considering this work as a work of necessity, of emergency, of letting it in this manner, so that the trade of the country should have the benefit of this canal at the present day, he would have fallen short of his duty. We know the contract was not let by any favoritism. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not desire to charge that, nor was it let on account of any private letters to Ministers, from their friends, unlike some other works in this country, but it was let upon the report of Mr. Page, the trusted officer of the Public Works Department, whose praise the hon. member for Lambton has often sounded.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I will do it yet.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It was upon his report that the work was let; the hon. the Minister of Railways did not let it by public contract, but he invited ten men to tender for it, the most skilful contractors in the country, and out of those ten tenders the best was selected. Can hon. gentlemen opposite say that anything wrong was done in letting this contract? Not a word. They simply say that it is the policy of the country to adhere to the Public Works Act. Well, we agree with them in that respect. We have often impressed upon them when they were in office that that was the proper way to let public works. They will remember very well that we called their attention to a great public work, costing hundreds of thousands of dollars, for which no contract was made and no tender invited by them. Did hon. gentlemen opposite then say this Act should be adhered to? Did they say that was a work of emergency? No, it took years to finish it; and though finished two or three years it has never been used to this day.

Mr. ANGLIN. Why?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Because there is no trade to go there.

Mr. ANGLIN. There are no gates.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. There are gates there to be put on, but there is no possibility of using it; there is no trade to go through, and if vessels did go through they could not get back, because the Rainy River has never been deepened.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes, it has.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It would take this country thousands of dollars to build vessels to navigate that lock, which has simply been left there as a monument to the late Administration. I have heard it remarked that some 2,000 years hence, when some explorer will pass through that country to visit the ruins of the great empire which is to be erected there, he will find this great cavern filled up with debris of all sorts, and wonder what commotion of the earth caused this great curiosity. We ought to have put in large letters on the side of the lock something to say under whose Administration it was made: "Mackenzie fecit A.D. 1877." That was a work which was not of public emergency, and which was built in violation of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, or the Public Works Act, yet hon. gentlemen opposite now simulate indignation because a work of emergency, for which the whole trade of the country was waiting, was let without calling publicly for tenders. Hon. gentlemen opposite should be the last to complain of any apparent violation of the Public Works Act. The hon. Minister has shown conclusively that the action of the Government was fair and proper, considering this work as one of public emergency, and was not done in violation of the Public Works Act, but in accordance with the report of their eminent engineer.

Mr. ANGLIN. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of this trick of carrying war into Africa. When they find themselves hard pressed they retort by saying: "You did something quite as bad or very much worse." We have heard a great deal about the Fort Frances Lock, and we know the mode in which the work was carried on. The hon. Minister of Public Works of that day believed he was carrying on the work in full conformity with the Act, and the mode he adopted was the best calculated in the public interest to carry out that work, which was remote from the ordinary means of conveying supplies or material into that part of the country. At that time it would have been impossible for contractors to ascertain what the work would cost. Therefore, if any reliable contractors tendered at all they must, necessarily, in order to protect themselves, have tendered at so high a price, that having the alternative of selecting reliable contractors at those high rates or letting to less reliable contractors at low rates, on the one hand, and doing the work as a public work on the other, my hon. friend felt that his duty to the country required him to carry on the work as he did. His interpretation of the Public Works Act has been challenged. It was said that the provision as to what may be done by the officers of a Department, only justified him to employ such persons as were ordinarily in the employ of the Department, on departmental work, but did not authorize him to employ them on a work of that kind. The hon. gentleman says the lock was placed out of the way; that there is not, nor ever will be, use for it. I have been told by persons in that part of the country, that if this lock was used and the improvements made, which would not cost a great deal, it would be of great utility and open up a vast extent of valuable water communication. I am further told that there are in that neighborhood two steamers contracted for by the present Government, when formerly in power, at an enormous expense, which are now lying rotting away and might have been very properly employed to very great advantage to the people resident in that country, for the purpose of opening up a country where, although the lands on a whole are not of much agricultural value, there are valuable resources of various kinds. I have heard it stated and reiterated that if the lock is allowed to remain in its present state, it is simply as a reproach to the late Government and a standing proof of the charges made against them. However, whether the Fort Frances Lock was well advised, has nothing to do with the present case. This case must stand entirely on its own merits; nor is it any use to the present discussion to say that the work on the Welland Canal was not pushed forward during the existence of the late Administration as rapidly as it might have been. No doubt on that, as on many other works of similar magnitude, there were some mistakes as to the amount of work to be done, and the time in which it should be done. I do not think the hon. member for Lambton, while Minister of Public Works, could justly be charged with want of zeal in the prosecution of that work. I think he was too desirous of seeing the work completed, to omit anything that he could reasonably do. It is not for hon. gentlemen opposite to blame the hon. member for Lambton for not having completed that work within his five years, though he brought it near completion, when they themselves have been four years in office without completing it. With regard to this being a work of emergency, the hon. member for Monck, especially, speaking of the manner in which the work was carried on, seemed to indicate that there was a great deal of delay, that though the loss of time was not connived at by the Department, it was half tolerated, and that no active measures were taken to compel those contractors to proceed rapidly with their work. No doubt representations were made to them, perhaps remonstrances were made to them; nevertheless, they were allowed to go on dallying with the work. Time might have been saved if the work had been taken off their hands sooner, and the emergency would not have been so great. In reality it appears that no time was saved by the hon. gentleman; he does not pretend to argue that an emergency existed from the necessity of saving time, but that course was adopted in order to avoid trouble and worry of having to deal with contractors by whom Mr. Page thought the work could not be perfectly done. There was another mode in which the hon. gentleman might have proceeded. He might have invited tenders from all parties who chose to tender. Not only those selected, but all parties might have had an opportunity of tendering, and when the tenders came in the hon. Minister might have put aside those parties whom Mr. Page did not consider trustworthy, and he might have selected from those that were really eligible, and then take the lowest of them and so arrive at a result quite satisfactory to the country. Now, let me say to that hon. Minister, that I have myself heard some of the most respectable contractors in Canada complain very bitterly that they received no intimation whatever that tenders would be received with regard to that matter, that the gentlemen who obtained the contract are Americans, while respectable Canadian contractors of known character and standing were never invited to tender at all; and this fact has given rise, in many parts of the country, to very serious complaint, and, let me say, complaints that really are not unreasonable.

Motion negatived on a division.

QUARTERLY STATISTICS OF TRADE.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Department of Agriculture should publish quarterly statistics of the trade of Canada, the condition of its finances, shipping, railway and canal traffic, and such other information in regard to trade and commerce as might be considered valuable from an industrial or economic point of view.

He said: Many members of this House must have felt a difficulty in getting current statistics of the trade and commerce of Canada or of the different Provinces, or any of those matters in which we are deeply interested in this House, and which so frequently occur in discussion. I am anxious that a Department of Agricultural Statistics should be created as a sort of sub-department in which statistics of this kind might be compiled and published quarterly or annually. It is exceedingly difficult to Canadians, or to strangers coming here, to ascertain our standing, either financially or commercially, in order to know the progress we are making in exports or the extent of our imports. It is very often necessary to turn over several volumes of Trade and Navigation Returns, and if we wish to see our financial condition we might have to refer to various volumes of Public Accounts. In the same way, if we want to ascertain our standing among commercial nations, we must look over various reports of the Marine and Fisheries Department. Now, not only is this inconvenient, but it often prevents us being sufficiently informed in regard to those matters. I am strongly impressed with the idea that the Minister of Agriculture could establish, in connection with his Department, a sub-bureau, where these statistics could be compiled. I believe it would effect an important saving in the publication of the Departmental reports. Our reports are exceedingly voluminous and very expensive, and often nearly all that is valuable in them is the statistical part. I think if the Minister would issue annually, just before the meeting of the House, statistical information of all the reports of the Departments, it would save the members a great deal of trouble and expense. Besides, we are getting to be a somewhat important people. If we are not putting on airs of independence, at least we are feeling a little like it—we are assuming, at least, the importance of a new nationality. I notice that in almost all the colonies of the Empire there is such a Department as this in connection with the Government. The colonies of Australia and Van Dieman's Land, and the larger Australian colonies, have such statistical reports as I referred to, from which I think the Minister could get valuable hints. For these reasons, as well as for economical reasons, I think it is desirable the Minister should undertake this work; and we will be delighted to see, lying upon our tables when the House meets, a careful compilation of all the statistics of Canada—statistics of its commercial progress, of our commercial standing and of our financial standing, and of the number of immigrants arriving here. If the Minister should think it within his sphere to extend the scheme a little further, I think he might very conveniently, with the library at his elbow, make some comparisons such as are made in the statistical reports at Washington, in the Statesman's Year Book, and in that valuable compilation of Mr. Gosford, the librarian at Washington, which would enable us here to see at a glance how we stand relatively with other countries. I need only say that the hon. Minister was kind enough to ascertain from me privately my undivided view on this question, and I think he is favorably impressed with the suggestion, and I commend it to his consideration individually as well as to the careful consideration of the House.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not quite understand why the hon. member has formed the opinion that the Department of Agriculture would be the proper Department to furnish returns with respect to the country. It strikes me this duty would fall more properly within the Department of Customs. That Department issues every month a statement—it is true, not as complete as is desirable—of the exports and imports, and of the character of the exports, for each month. Without incurring a large expense this statement might be enlarged and perfected; but while I have seen the importance of obtaining not only these statistics but also agricultural statistics, it is just possible that in the Supplementary Estimates a vote will be asked for the purpose of obtaining fuller agricultural statistics, especially in a certain portion of the Dominion which is creating a great deal of interest. Nevertheless, it would be unwise to take the matter of trade returns out of the hands of the Minister of Customs, whose Department is particularly employed in obtaining and collating that information. It is very desirable to have a Statistical Department where all information may be obtained, but I am not quite sure that if the Government were to ask the House to spend $50,000 or $75,000 in procuring that information the hon. member for West Middlesex, on the stump in 1883, would not point out to the country that this was an extravagant expenditure by the Administration.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). When I suggested that the House should impose the responsibility on the Department of Agriculture, it was because I noticed it is designated the Department of Agriculture and Statistics, and I thought such work would be germane to that Department. That was my only reason. I am not particular as to what Department undertakes it, but, as the House will see, I had good reason for naming the Department of Agriculture. Besides, that Department publishes criminal statistics. In my opinion, the cost need not amount to $50,000 or $75,000, and if the Finance Minister suggested such a large sum I would charge him with extravagance. If a cost could be kept within reasonable limit by the employment of one or two efficient clerks, making the expense $4,000 or $5,000, then I promise the hon. gentleman in advance that I will not charge him with extravagance.

Mr. SPROULE. If the information desired could be obtained for a reasonable sum it should be procured. It would be of great advantage during the debates on the trade of the country, its industrial prosperity and agricultural advancement, if correct data could be obtained on which to base arguments. It is only by means of such information that we are able to ascertain whether the country is prospering or not. The House should have information, not only in respect to our trade, but as to our agricultural resources, the quantity of grains and the kinds grown, the increase in railway business, and other particulars. If we had some such statistics produced once a year, if not oftener, it would be of great benefit to the House in determining what the country requires. It would also be a means of ascertaining what the pursuits of the people should be, for we would be able to learn how many are engaged in agriculture, the number engaged in manufacturing, in professional life and in other occupations, and we would thereby be enabled to determine whether it was in the interests of the country that the people should continue in the same lines of business, or that they should develop new industries and give employment to the people. I am of the opinion that if such information can be furnished for a reasonable outlay, it is very important that the Government should, at as early a day as possible, adopt measures to procure it.

Mr. BOWELL. The object of the hon. gentleman, no doubt, is a very praiseworthy one if there was any possibility, without incurring a much larger expenditure than he anticipates, of procuring those statistics referred to; but the motion involves more than the hon. member has any idea of. It asks for the publication, quarterly, of the financial state of the Dominion. That applies exclusively to the Finance Department, and although the debit and credit account of the Dominion is not published quarterly, still every month the amount of receipts from all sources, together with the expenditure for that month, is published in the Official Gazette; and comparing that with the annual return made by the hon. Finance Minister, together with that of the Auditor, any person desirous of obtaining the financial state of the country can do so every month. The motion also asks for a statement respecting shipping. On referring to the Trade and Navigation Returns a full statement of all the shipping of the Dominion by Provinces is to be found. There would be some difficulty in publishing that quarterly, and I cannot see that any particular advantage would be obtained. The motion further asks for statistical returns quarterly of the railway and canal traffic. By referring to the return laid on the Table by the Minister of Railways and Canals, statistical returns in regard to the traffic will be found. True, it is annual and not quarterly. The balance of the motion in reference to the trade and commerce of the country is given very fully in the Trade and Navigation Returns. If these returns are to be given quarterly, and are to be extended as they are in the Trade and Navigation Returns, they would require, so far as the Department of Customs is concerned, at least double or treble the present staff. So far as I could understand the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), he desired to have the motion extended to agricultural returns, but I am not aware whether my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture would have the statistics in his Department which would enable him to supply these returns in the manner in which they are asked. There is but one way in which the objects sought by the motion could be accomplished, and that would be by quadrupling our present staff; but a synopsis could be given of them as nearly as possible by some one officer, with probably one or two clerks under him. He would have to obtain his information from the different Departments, and keep constantly at the work in order to have the returns published quarterly. But as the hon. gentleman must know it would be almost impossible to place them before the country until a month or two after the quarter had expired, as they could not possibly be prepared earlier. I readily admit that it would be a great convenience to the members of this House to have a compilation of these returns before them at the beginning of each Session. The only information asked for in the resolution which is not laid before the House, in the annual returns of the different Departments, is a comparative statement of our trade and commerce and railway and canal traffic with that of other countries. There are now in these returns comparative statements of the trade of one year with that of other years, and I am sure, so far as my own Department is concerned, if any suggestion could be made which would enable us to make these returns clearer and more concise and more easily comprehended by the House, it would be accepted and adopted. But I do not think that the benefit which would be derived from the adoption of the principle involved in this motion would be commensurate with the expense which would devolve upon the Government in preparing these returns.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think, after what my hon. friend has stated, the House will rather hesitate before undertaking this vast work, for it is a vast work. If this resolution is carried out it would require for each quarter a revenue as large as the annual Trade Returns. The hon. gentleman does not ask for a mere summary.

Mr. ROSS. Yes, a summary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, he asks that we should publish quarterly statistics, and we know what statistics mean. To be of any value they must be full. He asks for statistics of the condition of our shipping. A return, stating that there are so many ships sailing from so many ports, is not what he wants. So with regard to our railway and canal traffic, he does not want a return stating that there have been so many trains running, or such an amount of traffic carried over the Government or other railways for the past three months. That would be of no value. Statistical returns must be full to be of any value, for otherwise they would be misleading. The hon. gentleman says he does not desire that any great expense should be incurred; and as I wish always to meet the views of hon. gentlemen, I would suggest a change in the wording of the motion. It will not do to have it read "the Department of Agriculture," because although that is the Department of Agriculture and Statistics, it does not of necessity apply to the trade returns, nor to the railway and canal returns which come from other Departments. Supposing it should read this way:

"In the opinion of this House it is desirable that quarterly statistics of the trade of Canada, the condition of its finances, its shipping and railway and canal traffic, and such other information regarding its trade and commerce as may be considered valuable from an industrial or economical point of view, be published if it can be had at a moderate expense."

Mr. ROSS. I do not object.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

COMMERCIAL RECIPROCITY WITH THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. BUNSTER moved that a Select Committee be appointed to draft an address to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, to beseech Her Majesty to obtain for the Dominion of Canada, commercial reciprocity with the Hawaiian Islands; embracing corresponding advantages to those embodied in the existing treaty between the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, which was entered into in the year 1875. He said: The Hawaiian Islands will probably have a great commercial future which will have an important bearing on the interests of this Dominion and in the way of furnishing work for the Canadian Pacific Railway. As we are all aware the Hawaiian Islands lie in the tropics, and we want tropical fruits in Canada and particularly in British Columbia. I know that we have not the power of making treaties without the assistance of the Mother Country, but I hope the Premier will urge this matter on the Home Government. I notice that the Government did not see fit to press on King Kalakua the importance of a commercial treaty between the Dominion and the Sandwich Islands; but the Americans saw fit to negotiate a treaty with the Hawaiian Islands, from which they reaped a considerable advantage, and to-day it is a question before the Congress of the United States which had the best of the bargain. It is generally conceded that the Hawaiians had the best of the bargain, and the United States people are trying to break off the treaty. While they are doing that, if the people of the Hawaiian Islands see that they can make a treaty with Canada, they will probably give us more favorable terms than they otherwise would. If trade relations can be opened up between that country and British Columbia, the receipts of the Canadian Pacific Railway will be greatly added to. We are within some twenty days' sail of the Hawaiian Islands; we claim to be able to offer the best rural scenery in the world to tourists; we claim that if this treaty is carried out we will be able to offer inducements to tourists from Europe and elsewhere to visit our shores. I think, therefore, the importance of my remarks will sufficiently commend itself to the Government to justify them in granting the request. Although it is late in the Session, still the gentlemen whose names I have taken the liberty of placing on the Committee will, I dare say, give their attention to the matter, and probably present such a report to the Government that if they do not pass it this Session, they will pass it next year, when they return to power.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite appreciate the motives of my hon. friend in moving this resolution, and I agree with him that it would be well if commercial relations could be established between the Hawaiian Islands and the Dominion of Canada. At this late period of the Session, I presume my hon. friend does not mean to press his motion, but he has moved it for the purpose of explaining his views and calling the attention of the Government and Parliament to the importance of this question. That trade is not to be undervalued at all. The United States took great pains to obtain a commercial treaty with Hawaii, and I think we ought to do something whenever we are independent enough to open direct negotiations with these Islands. I think if my hon. friend would be satisfied with the remarks he has made, I can assure him on the part of the Government that they will endeavor during this summer to see what can be done in the way of opening these negotiations. Her Majesty, I believe, has no representative at Hawaii just now; but there is a Consul, who in the absence of an Ambassador, I suppose, has certain diplomatic duties and functions, and I think without much difficulty some quasi-official communication could be had with the Government of the Islands on this very important subject. I may say to my hon. friend that last summer I had the honor of being presented to His Majesty when I was in England, and he entered with me into a very long and interesting conversation as to the productions of his kingdom, and spoke very strongly about his desire to open negotiations with British America on the Pacific, and made serious enquiries as to what our probable products would be; and I, as representing one of the constituencies there, was able to give him the most full and explicit information with respect to all the productions of British Columbia. So that the initiative has been taken in this way for the establishment of commercial relations between the Islands and Canada. I hope my hon. friend will be satisfied with this explanation and assurance, and will not press his motion.

Mr. BLAKE. This is a painful instance, Sir, of the shortsightedness which beset hon. gentlemen opposite the other day—my hon. friend (Mr. Bunster) I am sorry to say assisting them—and induced them to take a step which would have facilitated our taking these proceedings. I am very glad to hear of the interesting conversation which the hon. gentleman had with His Majesty, and I am sure it would have been interesting to all of us if he had given us some of the details of it. But if my hon. friend had placed himself in that position by which we could have succeeded his motion with an address to appoint the hon. gentleman from Vancouver as an envoy to make these negotiations, I am satisfied the matter would have reached a conclusion by a much shorter way than the roundabout way which my hon. friend's vote has inflicted upon us.

Mr. HOMER. Before the existence of this treaty between the United States and the Hawaiian Islands, there was a comparatively large and growing trade between that country and British Columbia; but since this treaty has come into operation, that trade has dwindled down to almost nothing. If reciprocity can be established between the Dominion of Canada and the Hawaiian Islands, we might not only recover that trade, but increase it very materially. British Columbia can supply them with fish, lumber, coal and other products; and you, in the present state of your manufactures in the Eastern Provinces, will be able to supply them with all the machinery and all the descriptions of manufactures they may require. In return, you will be able to take their sugar, fruit and other products for which there is now a large and growing market in British Columbia, and which will be increased by the opening up of the North-West when the railway is finished. Taking this view of the matter, it is very desirable that some action should be taken for the purpose of establishing reciprocity between the Dominion and the Hawaiian Islands, more particularly as the present treaty between the United States and those Islands is likely to come to a sudden end, if we are to judge of the feeling between them and the United States. Should that treaty cease and a reciprocity treaty be established between the Dominion and those Islands, I believe the result would be highly beneficial to both contracting parties. I hope that during the recess the Dominion Government will devote a portion of its time to the consideration of this matter, and that it will be able to report a good result at the next meeting of this Parliament.

Mr. BUNSTER. I wish to thank the Prime Minister for his graceful assurance that he will give this matter his serious consideration. Notwithstanding the threat of the member for West Durham with regard to my vote, I must say that I hold myself not so much responsible to the House, as to my constituents, for the manner of casting it. I think my independent manner of voting will materially conduce to their sending me back to Parliament. The Premier's influence in London may have a considerable effect in bringing about such a treaty.

Motion withdrawn.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a copy of the memorandum of Senator Macpherson on the subject of the Pacific Railway, and Mr. Sandford Fleming's position, referred to in the evidence taken before the Canadian Pacific Railway Commission, at page 1685. He said: On this page of the evidence will be found a memorandum quoted by Mr. Fleming himself, explaining his position relative to certain matters in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think the House is entitled to the correspondence or memoranda on that subject.

Motion agreed to.

DAM AT LAKE TEMISCAMINGUE.

Mr. ROCHESTER, in moving for a copy of all surveys, &c., in relation to the building of a dam at the foot of Lake Temiscamingue, said: My object is to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that the River Ottawa requires some more improvements in order that the lumber trade on the Ottawa may have more than the present convenience. A great change has taken place with regard to the Ottawa. I should like to see the Government build a dam across the Ottawa at the foot of this lake, in order that a reservoir might be made to hold back the spring freshets and utilize the water later in the season when it is actually required for navigation. Now that the country opposite on the Ottawa is becoming greatly cleared, and the sun has a chance of getting at the snow in the woods, we find, as in other parts of the country that have been cleared, that the snow goes away so much faster as to make tremendous freshets in the spring, so that it is almost impossible to build works strong enough to withstand it. While this water comes down almost all at once in the spring—high water, of course, can last but a very short time—its highest stage lasts about ten days. Then it begins to go down, and early in July it is so low in the Ottawa that it is very hard to get our timber and logs down the river; and it is equally difficult for vessels on the Ottawa carrying lumber, and doing the trade of the Ottawa, to find water enough for navigation, from the simple fact that this water goes off so very fast in the early spring, much more than it used to do some years ago when the country west was covered with wood. My object in bringing this before the Government is simply to explain that it is a plan adopted by the lumber trade on a smaller scale. In all parts of the Ottawa west we have to dam up the smaller lakes every spring to hold the water back, in order that we may bring our logs and timber down. If a dam were put across the Ottawa River in order to hold back a certain amount of the spring freshet, there would be navigation on the Ottawa during the months of low water. I believe I am correct in saying that of the logs and timber got out on the Ottawa last year not more than one-half was got to the mills. This is a very serious loss, because by sawing this lumber and sending it to foreign countries a larger amount of capital is brought into this country. Instead of sawing, as we usually do, about 3,000,000 feet of lumber, we only sawed about 1,500,000 or 2,000,000 at the outside. There are no Government works in any part of the Dominion that pay the same rate of interest into the Dominion Treasury as the works on the Ottawa. I think I am therefore justified in asking the Government to make a survey and examination of this place. Temiscamingue Lake is about 90 miles in length, and varying from one to five miles in width, with very bluff hills on both sides nearly the whole length. That part of the country is not an agricultural country. The land is inferior with the exception of some at the head of the lake. Raising the dam there to the extent I propose would not drown these lands and do little or no harm to any one in that direction, while it would be of great convenience to the staple trade of the country. Besides the loss at present incurred through the sticking of logs from May to the middle of July, our water mills run at full speed, and from that time until the fall they run at not over half speed. If we had water at the average height it would not only aid navigation, but also enable the mills to run at full speed during the whole sawing season. I believe that the Kipewewa Lake, which empties into the Temiscamague, could also be dammed, and those two immense reservoirs would hold sufficient spring water back to enable the mills to run full time during the whole sawing season, and there would be a good depth of water for sailing craft the whole season through. I may mention that the trade between here and Montreal is very large, and between here and the United States. I was not in the House when the Estimates came up in regard to the Carillon Dam, from the completion of which the country has received such great benefit. I am sure there is no dam to compare with it in this country or in the United States. It is some 1,800 feet long and 18 feet high and dams the whole of the Ottawa tributaries for two or three hundred miles above here, down to Carillon. It has been built and completed on the plan of an old and tried Superintendent of Public Works on the Ottawa River, Mr. Merrill, who was superannuated some years ago. A large amount had been spent on that dam, and no benefit derived; in fact, it was carried away every spring. I was the means of bringing the old gentleman back to the Minister, to whom he submitted a plan, which was approved, and since that the dam has been built and completed. That dam was to raise the water between the foot of Grenville and Carillon and drown out what was called the Chute à Blondeau. Now, I would say, for the information of the House, that all the lumber on the Ottawa River has to pass through this small channel of the Chute à Blondeau, only wide enough to admit of two barges passing side by side. Last summer one of these barges swung round and blocked up the whole channel, not a boat could pass for two or three days, and finally the barge had to be sawn in two and turned off. Now, this dam being built, a steamer can go anywhere over the Ottawa River between the foot of the Grenville Canal and Carillon, eighteen miles. That is one of the benefits Ottawa has derived from the improvements on the river below here. As soon as Ste. Anne's Locks are completed, with one or two more improvements that require to be made between here and Montreal, we will have excellent navigation for the transport of our lumber to Montreal. I think we need to have a survey and examination of this dam at the foot of Lake Temiscamingue. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier), who is also acquainted with this scheme, may raise some objection to a dam at the foot of the lake, and may want it further down in order to aid navigation; but I would say that the present dam the timber trade is asking for now would be no detriment, but would aid the navigation of the river, because some years before the canal could be built, such as I know he is in favor of, we would have the benefit of holding back that water and getting the use of it during the summer months. The House will understand this question when I show them the difference between loading a barge at this season of the year and loading it in the month of July. The average load of a barge in the month of July would be 275,000 feet, board measure, while the average load of the same barge, from the middle of July to the middle of September, would only be 107,000 feet, or a difference of 168,000 feet. The expense of taking that barge from Ottawa to Montreal, with the 275,000 feet, would be just as much as the expense of taking it with 107,000 feet. This will show the House the benefit that can be derived by the trade if we could retain a portion of this spring freshet and hold it back until the first of July, and let that water gradually come down and keep up the Ottawa River to a fair depth during the summer months, so that navigation would be benefited by logs and timber being brought down the river. I am satisfied that when the water gets low in the month of July it costs $2 to drive logs more than it costs in June. This will give you some idea of the difference it will make if we can retain a portion of this water and be able to use it when it comes from the lake. I hope the hon. Minister will, in the Supplementary Estimates, bring down something to pay for a survey and an examination, such as will prove satisfactory and adequate to existing circumstances.

Mr. CURRIER. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Carleton, especially as to the necessity of something being done by the Government towards regulating the flow of water in the Ottawa River. It is well known to many people in this country that as the country becomes cleared up and the land exposed to the sun in large tracts up the Ottawa, we have from year to year an increase of high water at the spring flood, and in the same proportion low water in the fall. This will go on increasing so long as the extent of cleared land increases, whether from the operations of the lumberman or the farmer. This ought to be provided against, and only the Government can afford a remedy. While I quite agree with my hon. friend from Carleton in this point, I cannot agree with him as to the scheme of building a dam at the foot of Lake Temiscamingue. I know that country pretty well, and I am certain that scheme cannot be carried out. That lake is about seventy-five or eighty miles long, and on the north side of it there are large tracts of splendid farming land, as good as can be found in any part of Canada, and even on the prairies. At the head of the lake is a large tract of country which I believe is an Indian reserve, and which cannot be surpassed as to quality. If a dam be built at the foot of the lake it would completely overflow these lands, and it would submerge the Hudson Bay station. It would also submerge the village on the Ontario side of the lake where the Roman Catholic mission is established. Then there are many farmers on both sides of the lake who would be flooded out. I believe, however, that if a dam were constructed at the foot of Seven League Lake, which is about 30 miles below the place indicated by the hon. member for Carleton, a dam here with a slide to overcome the rapids for running timber, would be of very great advantage, not only to the lumber trade, but to extend the navigation upon that lake down to a point within thirty miles of the Mattawa on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This would be of immense advantage, not only to the lumber trade, but to the settlement of that part of the country. I agree with my hon. friend in what he has said with regard to the improvements on the Ottawa Canals, and especially to that at Carillon. They have enabled our lumber boats to carry three times the quantity they carried before the improvements were made. Before the enlargement they were only able to carry from 80,000 to 100,000 feet, whereas they were now built to carry 300,000 feet, which was an immense advantage to the lumbermen of this district. If my hon. friend will extend his motion so as to invite the Government, not only to examine that place, but also Kippewa and other lakes, whose waters could be reserved to advantage, it would be desirable.

Mr. ROCHESTER. I do not ask the Government to do the work without making a thorough survey. With respect to the assertion that this work would interfere with the Hudson's Bay fort at the head of Lake Temiscamingue, I think the fort is at least thirty feet above the level of the lake, and would not be affected by the improvement; but if the fort had to be removed higher up, such a difficulty should not stand in the way of the trade of the district. I hope the Government will place in the Supplementary Estimates a sum large enough to make a thorough investigation in respect to the works.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. With the data we have before us we could not ask Parliament to give us a grant of money for this purpose. The information is not sufficiently full, and we shall have to make a new survey. I intend to send there the Chief Engineer; but with the data in his possession he did not feel safe in making a recommendation in this matter. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier) has suggested that we should make an examination of two or three other lakes in that neighborhood. Perhaps the hon. member will communicate officially with the Department in regard to the matter, and if the lakes are not far apart the engineer might also examine them.

Mr. CURRIER.

Mr. ROCHESTER. I would suggest the old Superintendent of the Ottawa Works and the Superintendent of all the improvements on the Ottawa should be sent to make this examination.

Motion agreed to.

MR. FLEMING'S CABLE SCHEME.

Mr. BUNSTER moved for all documents, cablegrams and correspondence having reference to the cable scheme of Mr. Fleming, and also in connection with the European, Canadian, American and Asiatic Cable Company. He said: During these days of the march of progress this question is of too much importance to be allowed to drop. I am sorry to say that Mr. Fleming (the promotor) has joined himself to the Hudson Bay Company and is not paying that attention to this scheme that the country should demand from him. It is of more importance to the Dominion and the Eastern Provinces than many people are aware of. It is of great importance to British Columbia, inasmuch as she furnishes the key for the commencement of the cable work, and the Government should see that the scheme is properly carried out. No doubt, the Minister of Public Works will see that the papers are brought down. If Mr. Fleming does not care to carry it on we can form many other companies for the purpose.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUNSTER moved for all communications concerning immigration to British Columbia; also the report of the Dominion Agent in Victoria, on the same subject. He said: I am sorry to say the close of the Session precludes my doing justice to this motion and scolding the Government for the way they have neglected British Columbia as far as immigration is concerned. While many tons of documents respecting Manitoba have been sent from this city, nothing has been done regarding British Columbia. We all know the Government must feel proud of the bargain made with that Province, securing it on the promise to build the Pacific Railway; but the people of British Columbia have a grievance with the Government because they have not dealt with them as they have with Manitoba. I am sorry indeed that the Government has neglected us to such an extent, and I particularly draw the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to the matter, because he was out in our Province, and I believe enjoyed his visit as well as the salubrity of our climate. If any other maps of the Dominion are published, I hope he will see that British Columbia is included as well as Manitoba.

Motion withdrawn.

JUDICIAL CHARGES IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH moved for copy of all correspondence between the Government of New Brunswick or any of its members, and the Dominion Government or any of its members, in relation to the creation of a new County Court in that Province, and the appointment of a Judge thereto. He said: I have some remarks to make on this subject, but I shall reserve them until the appropriation for the purpose referred to in the motion is brought down.

Motion agreed to.

CONQUERALL BANK, NOVA SCOTIA, POST OFFICE.

Mr. WADE moved for a copy of a petition addressed to the Honorable the Postmaster General in February, 1881, praying for the re-opening of the post office at Conquerall Bank, Lunenburg County, Nova Scotia.

Mr. KAULBACH. This request is made by my hon. friend for the purpose of satisfying the idle curiosity of another party. A similar request was made to me, but having a knowledge of the circumstances I treated it with silence. The prayer of the petition is simply this: that the post office, as at present placed, is most inconvenient for the public, and it asks that it may be removed to a place which would be more satisfactory. It does not ask for the removal of the postmaster, but simply for a change in the location of the post office.

Mr. WADE. The hon. gentleman has made observations which are not respected in this House, and which, I think, he should not have indulged in. I have simply been doing my duty to his county, and he should rather have aided me than have spoken in the way he did.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURN.

The following motions for returns were severally agreed to:—

Statement showing the names of the persons in the second Registration District of the County of Rimouski, who have paid the tax on tobacco of their own growth sold by them; also, the amount paid by each of them to the several postmasters or other officials authorized to collect the revenue.—(Mr. Fiset.)

Copies of the last regulations of the Montreal Harbor Commissioners, and of the petition of the boatmen of St. Francis, St. Thomas and St. Michel de Yamaska, complaining of the said regulations.—(Mr. Vanasse.)

House adjourned at 11:10.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 2nd May, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 155) to amend the Patent Act of 1872.—(Mr. Pope, Compton.)

WINDSOR AND PICTOU BRANCHES OF THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, in the absence of Sir CHARLES TUPPER, moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 156) respecting the Windsor and Pictou Branches of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman give some explanation of the Bill?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I had hoped that my hon. friend the hon. Minister of Railways would have been present to introduce this Bill, but he is obliged to be absent on account of illness in his family. I need not go over the circumstances connected with the papers and the legislation in reference to the Windsor Branch of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, as they are in the recollection of those hon. members who were here at the last Parliament, and will be fully gone into on the second reading. An agreement was entered into in 1871 between the Government of the day and the Windsor and Annapolis Railway with regard to running powers on that road. The Nova Scotia Government, in the exercise of certain statutory powers, are about to assume the ownership of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, and this Act declares that upon such ownership being transferred to the Government, the running powers granted under the agreement should belong to the Government of Nova Scotia. It is in fact legislation to correct the imperfect legislation of 1875. That Act intended to transfer absolutely the ownership of the Windsor Branch from the Windsor and Annapolis Railway to the Western Counties Railway. The Government of Nova Scotia will, under the arrangement I have referred to, acquire all the rights of the several railways, and the running powers will be transferred to the Government under this Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to hear if there is any correspondence between the Government, or any member of the Government, and the Government of Nova Scotia, or any other party, touching this proposed legislation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is very likely there is correspondence. I know that the different parties have been heard before the Privy Council, where they were represented by counsel on both sides.

Mr. BLAKE. Then, as I understand, the arrangement has not received the assent of all the railways of Nova Scotia. There are opposing parties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; the Windsor and Annapolis are, with regard to certain terms.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that, to-morrow, the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

1. That it is expedient to provide for payment of the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature of Ontario, constituted by the Judicature Act, 1881, passed in the 44th year of Her Majesty's reign, by the Legislature of that Province, and that the said salaries shall be as follows:—

The Chief Justice of Ontario.....	$6,000 per annum
Three Justices of Appeal, each.....	5,000 "
The Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench...	6,000 "
Two Judges of the High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, each.....	5,000 "
The Chancellor of Ontario.....	6,000 "
Two Judges of the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, each.....	5,000 "
The Chief Justice of the Common Pleas..	6,000 "
Two Judges of the High Court of Justice, Common Pleas Division, each.....	5,000 "

2. That it is expedient to provide for the payment of the salaries and travelling allowances of two County Court Judges in the Province of Manitoba, the salary of each Judge being $2,000 per annum for the first three years of service, and $2,400 per annum after such three years; and the said travelling allowances being such as the Governor in Council may from time to time determine.

3. That it is expedient to provide that the salary of the Judge of the County Court of the city and county of St. John, N.B., shall be increased to $3,000 per annum.

4. That it is expedient to provide for the payment of the salary of the Judge of the County Court for the counties of King's and Albert, lately established by the Legislature of New Brunswick, and that such salary shall be $2,000 per annum.

5. That it is expedient that the said salaries and travelling allowances shall be paid out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

He said: The salaries referred to in the first clause are just the same as those paid at present, but it becomes necessary to make the proposed change so that the salaries may be properly paid and audited in consequence of the change in the Judicature Act of the Province of Ontario. The second clause is necessary from the fact that the Local Legislature have provided for two County Court Judges in the Province of Manitoba. With reference to the third clause the salary at present paid the Judge is $2,400, and he has to attend to duties both in King's county and in the city and county of St. John and, at the last meeting of the Legislature the powers of County Court Judges were largely increased. I think, under the powers given, it is nearly double, and therefore it will increase the duties of the Judge. In the city and county of St. John it will perhaps double the duties he will have to perform, and it will relieve parties who have suits before the Courts. During the last three or four years the remanents have been frequently fifty or sixty, and persons have had to wait more than two years before their cases were tried. This will enable them to have their cases tried by the County Court Judge, and it will relieve the other Courts, while it will increase his duties. That Judge has very onerous duties to perform, not only in connection with his chamber practice in his own Court, but in connection with other Courts—duties that would otherwise devolve on other Judges were they resident in the city of St. John; but many of them are resident in Fredericton. I move the House into Committee of the Whole on these resolutions.

Mr. BLAKE. Not to-day; these are money resolutions.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman will object.

Mr. BLAKE. We supposed that he was going to take the preliminary motion. I am very anxious to read some correspondence in the papers in relation to this question, and in relation to the creation of a Judgeship in the counties of King's and Albert, which, so far as my information goes, is an entirely indefensible proceeding.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government are, of course, acting under the provisions of the Local Act, which they consider warrants them in asking the House to consider these resolutions.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS FOR COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that, to-morrow, the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

Resolved,—That incase of a Judge of a County Court, after having continued in office as such Judge for a period of at least ten years, becomes afflicted with some permanent infirmity, disabling him from the due execution of his office, or in case a Judge of a County Court, after having continued in office as such Judge for a period of at least twenty-five years, resigns his office, Her Majesty may, by letters patent under the Great Seal of Canada, grant to him a pension equal to two-thirds of the annual salary of which he was in receipt at the time of his resignation, to continue thenceforth during his natural life, and be payable pro rata for any period less than a year during such continuance.

Resolved,—That if a Judge of the County Court be removed by the Governor in Council for inability or incapacity, and the inability or incapacity has arisen from the old age or ill-health of the Judge, Her Majesty may grant to him the same pension which might have been granted to him had he resigned his office at the time of his removal.

Resolved,—That all such pensions shall be payable out of any unappropriated moneys, forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolved,—That if any person receiving a pension becomes entitled to any salary in respect of any public office under the Government of Canada, such salary shall be reduced by the amount of such pension.

Mr. BLAKE. I object to going on to-day. These are money resolutions also.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I would request that the hon. Finance Minister, before this matter in regard to the County Court Judgeships for New Brunswick—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to order. There is no question before the Chair.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I move that the House adjourn.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoken.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I was simply going to ask the hon. Finance Minister—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to order. If we are going to have order, we must have strict order.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Mr. ANGLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. What I was going to say is this: I did not wish to take up time, as we are all anxious to get away, and I am surprised that the hon. First Minister should interpose. I wish to ask the hon. Finance Minister if he will furnish the correspondence I moved for in the resolution which was adopted last night relating to this question. That is all I rise for, and I presume he will do that.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Oh yes.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn and main motion agreed to

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That for the remainder of the Session this House do sit on Saturdays, and that when it adjourns on any Friday it shall stand adjourned until Saturday at Three o'clock, and that on every Saturday for the remainder of the Session Government business have precedence.

He said: With leave of the House, I will add to the motion that for the remainder of this Session Government business shall have precedence every Monday.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not object to the motion for sitting on Saturday, but I object to the amendment to give Government business precedence on Monday. No notice has been given of this.

Mr. BOWELL. I move that the motion be amended by adding the following words:—

“That for the remainder of the Session Government business have precedence every Monday.”

Mr. BLAKE. This motion will deprive us of the opportunity of proceeding with any motions that remain on the paper between now and Monday, and of asking questions. It devotes the whole of the remainder of the Session to Government business. It seems to me premature to take away Monday from private members. I am of opinion that the amendment is not free from objection either.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I believe that the amendment is in order, and that we can move that one, two or three days the Government business shall have precedence.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

NAVIGATION ON INLAND WATERS.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the order for the second reading of Bill (No. 135) to amend Chapter 29 of 38 Victoria, intituled: An Act to extend certain provisions of the Seamans' Act, 1873, to vessels employed in navigating the inland waters of Canada, be transferred from the Public Bills and Orders to Government Orders.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman explain the motion?

Mr. McLELAN. This subject has engaged the attention of the Government for some time, and we desire to make some amendments in the Act 38 Victoria, in the interest of seamen navigating our inland waters, to which we desire the application of amelioration, contained in the Admiralty report. We desire, in the meantime to meet actual hardships arising in the case of seamen on our inland waters, with reference to an operation of an Act passed in 1879.

Motion agreed to.

DRY DOCKS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that, to-morrow, the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide that if any incorporated or other Company approved by the Governor in Council as having the ability to perform the work, enters into an agreement with Her Majesty to construct a dry-dock, for the reception and repairing of vessels, at a place, and according to a plan and specification approved by the Governor in

Council on a report of the Minister of Public Works, as sufficient for the requirements of the public at such place, and to be completed within a convenient time to be limited by such agreement; then provided the Company performs the work according to such agreement, and to the satisfaction of the Minister of Public Works, under the supervision of whose Department the work shall be done, the Governor in Council may authorize the payment out of any unappropriated monies forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, of a subsidy not exceeding two per cent. per annum on the cost of the work, during twenty years from the time of its completion and acceptance by the said Minister; provided that such subsidy shall not exceed $100,000 per annum, and that the cost on which it shall be calculated shall not be greater than the value of the work as estimated by the said Minister, and the subsidy shall not be payable for any portion of the said twenty years during which the dock shall not be in complete repair and working order.

He said: At present there are applications from several of the seaports of the Dominion, and from some of the lake ports, including Kingston, asking aid towards the construction of dry docks, and it was considered the safest and best plan to adopt, in order to insure some merit in the applications that the parties should receive a certain percentage on their outlay on such work. It was thought advisable to submit to the House this proposition, in order to deal with all applications that may have merit—that the Governor in Council might think entitled to this consideration. The value of the work is not to be settled by the persons themselves, but by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, after which the percentage will be paid.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Governor General has given notice that he assents to this proposition.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to recall the hon. gentleman's attention to the possible inconveniences which may arise from dealing with other than with incorporated companies in the manner which is proposed. He will see, on reflection, that while he proposes to pay a subsidy for so long a period as twenty years, unless there is some corporation actually in existence, there is very considerable difficulty in making any engagement, for we do not know with whom we may be dealing. The present owners may assign their interests to any party and they may assign it to others. This provision also is worthy of consideration—that the dock shall be in complete repair and working order. There is no provision for its actually being kept open for use during twenty years. It may be in complete repair and working order, and may have been kept open for years falling short of the twenty. The hon. gentleman has stated that this general proposition is brought down in consequence of his having received applications from several places. I should be glad he would state from what points he received them, and if he would bring down the papers with those applications at an early stage of the measure.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That I will do. Speaking from memory, I think we have applications from Halifax, St. John, Kingston, Rimouski, and Moncton, and shall have another application later. A report of the action of the Council and the papers shall be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to repeal certain provisions of the General Inspection Act, 1874, and to make other regulations with respect to herrings packed and inspected in Newfoundland.

He said: Under an Act passed some years ago, it was provided that herrings imported from Newfoundland, after inspection in that Island, should be free from inspection in the Dominion on payment of 2 cents per barrel. It has been found by experience that the fishermen themselves are appointed inspectors, and inspect their own fish, and the fish come in here and are sold without any inspection whatever. The Government propose to place the fish, imported from Newfoundland, on the same footing, as far as inspection is concerned, as our own fish.

Motion agreed to; and resolution reported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY introduced Bill (No. 157) to repeal certain provisions of "The General Inspection Act, 1874."

Bill read the first time.

DRAWBACKS, CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 141) to provide for the allowance of drawback on certain articles manufactured in Canada, for use in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BOWELL. I fully explained this Bill when the resolution was passed in Committee. It is simply to change the wording so as to enable the Government to pay the drawback to manufacturers who may furnish spikes and other articles, provided to be admitted free under the Canadian Pacific Railway charter. Under the present Act, a drawback can only be paid to a manufacturer after proof is given of their actual use in the construction of the main line. I propose to place the manufacturers of these articles in precisely the same position as the merchants who import any article for a special purpose free, or at a lower rate of duty than other articles.

Mr. BLAKE. We have already a paper brought down showing the estimated amount payable out of the Treasury in respect to certain classes of these goods. It does not include the iron bridges, of which the hon. gentleman stated it was impossible for him to make an estimate. But could the hon. gentleman state what the amount is of the duty on the raw material, so to speak, as compared with the amount he estimates he will have to pay in the shape of bounty on the manufactured goods?

Mr. BOWELL. The amount paid back to the manufacturers is a sum equal to the specific duty, as nearly as we can calculate, the duty which would be paid upon the value of the article in England at the time it was imported.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman proposes to pay a bounty equivalent to the duty on the value of the manufactured article in England. What I wish to have is, what is his estimate of the amount of duty which would be payable but for this provision, and which, in point of fact, is payable by the manufacturer here upon his raw material used in the manufacture of these articles, if that raw material were imported into the country—the iron, for instance, from which bolts and nuts are made?

Mr. BOWELL. I have not made any calculation of that kind, the calculation has been based upon the value of the manufactured article, not upon the raw material. A large quantity of the spikes and bolts manufactured in this country are made from Canadian iron.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The duty, for instance, on bolts and spikes is specific and ad valorem, and the drawback under the Order in Council is not for both, it is simply a specific duty, so that they do not obtain the full amount of duty. It is in the form of a specific duty.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not in the form of a duty, nor in the form of a drawback, but is in the form of a bounty, and of a specific bounty, and it is a larger sum specifically than the specific duty.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). As I understand it, it is the duty, that it is payable on those articles imported into the country, both specific and ad valorem. There is one thing the hon. Minister might easily give us, that is the amount that would be payable on spikes alone, or bolts and nuts for putting the rails together. He might easily find out the number of tons from the number of tons per mile and the number of miles. If the mileage is something like it was when the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill was passed through the House, the amount would reach nearly $150,000, if the whole length of the line were taken into consideration. As I understand it, it is a drawback, not on the raw material, but on those goods as if imported into the country, which is, of course, greater than on the raw material.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no change in the principle of the Bill as adopted last Session. It is only changing the mode and the time at which this drawback, or an equivalent sum, can be paid to the manufacturer. Under the present law the Department is prevented from paying drawback on any article used in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, until evidence has been produced that it has actually been so used. Now, all I ask by the Bill is to enable the Government to treat the manufacturer in the same way as we treat a merchant who imports an article free for a specific use, upon his making a declaration that it is for the particular purpose, as provided by law, and he is then permitted to pass the article free. Under this Bill, upon evidence being given to the Department that a certain quantity of spikes or bolts have been furnished to the Canadian Pacific Railway to be used in the construction of the main line—not the branches—then the Department will be enabled to pay the manufacturer a sum equal to the drawback of the duty under this Bill. I explained to the House, when I introduced the resolution, that in order to prevent the payment of a larger sum through mistake or design, I proposed to have regulations adopted by which the manufacturer will have to make an affidavit that the articles furnished to the Company are for a special purpose, and another declaration from the Company that they are purchased for that purpose and will be used for no other. Then I propose to have a debit and credit account open with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, so that when the road is completed we shall be able to come to a direct decision as to whether a larger amount has been paid than they are entitled to. Hon. gentlemen can understand the difficulties in the construction of a road of that extent with its numerous branches, and if these articles were put into a warehouse, in Winnipeg or Brandon, or any other depot in the West, some of their men might take out these spikes and use them in the construction of a branch line, which would be in direct violation of the law and of their contract. In order to protect the revenue we shall be enabled to tell whether we have paid more than the Company is entitled to receive, by reference to this debit and credit account. We have calculations made and obtained from the Railway Department by competent experts in the construction of railways, Mr. Schreiber, for instance, as to the quantity of spikes, bolts and other materials that will enter into the construction of every mile of road; and when the road is completed and measured, we will be able to arrive at a correct conclusion as to whether a larger quantity has been imported from a foreign country and admitted free, or whether we have paid too large an amount for drawbacks. In case it should be shown that an error had been made in that way, then the bond which the Canadian Pacific Railway has agreed to give will be sufficient to hold them and to enable the Government to deduct from the subsidies which will be paid to them, a sum equal to that which had been overpaid. Every precaution has been taken that could possibly be taken, in order to protect the revenue.

Mr. BLAKE. It does not appear unreasonable, the principle of the provision having been settled by the
Mr. BURPEE (St. John).

Canadian Pacific Railway contract, that some relaxation should take place in the manner proposed. The hon. gentleman says he proposes to keep an account with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to rest until the completion of their line and then to clear up the accounts. Now, it is quite clear, from the course which he has taken, that there will be a very large amount of mileage of branch lines built before the construction of the main line will be completed, and therefore, it may be quite possible to anticipate this arrangement with reference to spikes, bolts and nuts to be used upon the branch lines, when the application, or purchase, or withdrawal is in advance of what the Company requires for its main line at all. It seems to me that a periodical reference to the question of how many miles of main line they had, and how that compared with their account in order to prevent an over draught in earlier years, perhaps to be remedied in later years. That would obviously have a great advantage; so that the hon. gentleman's precautions are not fully adequate to the occasion, unless he provides that from time to time the figures of the Railway Department may be compared with the amount of mileage of track that has been laid. Then he will know from time to time how many miles of main line are built, and whether the amount of drawback paid bears a proper proportion to the amount of the line built.

Mr. BOWELL. The proposition of the hon. leader of the Opposition is quite correct; that provision has been already adopted. The accountant has already called my attention to the fact that the demands are in excess of the millage already constructed, and instructions have been given to compare the account frequently—I would like the House to understand this—and the account will not be finally balanced until the road itself is completed. That will be a continuous check. Every demand that is made by the manufacturer for a payment under this law will be checked; and, in order that we may know exactly what amount of material has been used or brought into the country, instructions have been given to collectors that every entry which is made by or on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway of articles which are free under their contract, shall be at once sent to the Department and there entered, so that there will be the continuous check to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course, I apologize to the hon. gentleman, but he did not mention that precaution.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the third reading of Bill (No. 36) respecting the Civil Service of Canada.

Mr. CASEY. During the previous stages of this Bill we have frequently protested against the total disregard of the opinions and recommendations of the Civil Service Commission, shown in this Bill. I need only briefly recapitulate that in consequence of the agitation which this subject has received at different times, the Government appear to have felt it their duty to enquire thoroughly into the actual state of the service, and they did so by means of a Royal Commission. That Commission sat for several months in different places, and made an exhaustive examination and report. In appointing that Commission the Government intended it to enquire into the truth of a list of grievances which was laid before them. The Sub-Committee of Council stated in their report to Council, on which the appointment of the Commission was ordered—after recapitulation—that legislation had already taken place in regard to the Civil Service:

“Since the period above referred to, a series of years have elapsed and many changes in the character as well as in the extent of the service required in each Department have developed themselves, the duties of some Departments and some branches of each Department and of certain officers in each Department have been varied, diminished or increased, and many men have, by old age, incapacity, bad habits or continued idleness, become unavailable for useful purpose—the number of men in each Department has increased, it is thought out of proportion to the needs of the service. Young men have been appointed who, from want of education or strength of constitution or general unfitness, have not made, and will never become, efficient public servants. The general expense has been increased by the tendency of the existing rules to the gradual culmination of officers by mere force of survivorship into the more highly paid classes.

“A careful reconsideration of the duties of each Department, including both inside and outside service, is eminently desirable, with a view to seeking greater economy in all the Departments, by the weeding out of men who, from any of the causes named, are no longer efficient public servants, by the creation of a new theoretical organization for each Department, which should regulate the number of each class of officers required for its work, the promotions from class to class, and the steps by which salaries should be increased.

“Your Sub-Committee are of opinion that it is expedient, in the public interests, that a full, intelligent and painstaking enquiry, by the best men who can be selected for the purpose, should be made during the present summer into the whole subject, with the main objects above referred to, but with instructions, as on the previous occasion, to ‘make such other suggestions and recommendations for promoting the efficient and economical administration of public affairs as they deem proper.’”

The report goes on to suggest who shall be the Commissioners. The House will observe that this point of giving them authority to make other suggestions as they might deem to be for the advantage of the service was held to be a very important part of the reference. The Commissioners so considered it, because they take great care in making recommendations. They first examined into the present state of the system, and reported the evils that existed; they also examined into the systems of other countries, including France, Belgium, England and the United States, and they state briefly what is the system in operation in each of those countries. They especially devote themselves to the Civil Service of Great Britain, which—as being the outcome of the common sense and practical ability with which we always credit John Bull in governmental operations, and as having also had a trial for about twenty years in a more or less complete form—is the system to the results of which they attached the greatest importance. That system is based entirely on admission into the service by competitive examination, tempered by six months probation. This system they found, according to the reports made year after year by the Civil Service Commission, to have succeeded admirably well in the Mother Country, to have removed entirely all the evils that at one time deformed the service there, evils which were exactly similar to those which now deform our service, and they believe the same remedy here will produce the same results as in England. This the Commissioners make the vital part of their recommendations—that that system or some modification of it should be adopted in Canada, and this, the principal point in their recommendations, is the very one which the Government have chosen to disregard and overlook. I consider this is no slight neglect, it is no neglect of matters of detail, it is an intentional rejection of a great principle, the principle on which I believe the Civil Service of every country should be based. We have hitherto here adopted, in a modified form, the creed that prevails so strongly on the other side of the boundary—that to the victors in political contests belong the spoils; that employment should only be given to the friends of the party in power; that no money should be allowed to be drawn from the public Treasury except by a Grit or a Tory, according to the complexion of the Government then in power. I believe we do not see the defects of the system, because it has been for a long period existing here; but I believe it involves the most corrupt, unjust and oppressive principle ever adopted in any Government. It tends directly to degrade the tone of the public service, because that service becomes necessarily composed of strong partizans, of men who have no other object than that of getting into office when their party should come into power. I do not say this is the invariable rule, because some nominees are too young to have taken an active part, but their friends worked for the party with that special object. They obtain office because they are partizans, and they remain partizans when they are in office, and they continue to be an integral part of the party to which they owe political allegiance, though, perhaps, not in all cases so openly. We know how this party system prevails in the United States, that the employes in the public Departments are taxed to assist the election fund and to support the party which placed them in office. We have not got quite so far yet. We take it out of the officials in another way, we expect them to use influence with their friends, or to slip down quietly to a county and work for the Government—we do not expect them to contribute money, because we do not give them sufficient money to enable them to do so.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That was never done before we came into office.

Mr. CASEY. I do not say that; I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am speaking in no partizan sense. I do not make these charges especially against this Government. Every Government, so long as this system continues, will be compelled more or less to do partizan acts in connection with the service. I say the officers remain partizans in the service. That is an evil. When a change of Government occurs, the incoming Government finds all the confidential places in the service filled with political opponents; especially if one party has been long in power. The Government cannot feel comfortable, and its intentions cannot be properly carried out under such conditions. We know how leaky the Civil Service is in such circumstances, and that the secrets of the Government are divulged, it cannot be supposed in any other way except by the action of some partizan. I do not mean to say that such a thing is general, but it frequently occurs. The character of the Civil Service is also degraded and made less attractive to energetic men. A young man who feels he is able to make his way in the world is not attracted to the service when he knows that his promotion depends entirely on political favor, even if he gets a large salary on entrance; and it is for that reason that we find that the Deputy Postmaster General testifies that the Civil Service cannot obtain as good servants at an entrance salary of $100 as banks can at an entrance salary of $200. The difference is that in the one case a man is promoted according to efficiency, and in the other according to political favor. It was stated by several members of the Commission that the average of young men who entered the lower grades of the Civil Service are not fit for promotion, because men who are fit for promotion have too much ambition to enter a service of that kind. Now, I think the Civil Service should be as honorable and respectable individually and on account of the duties it performs, as either law, medicine, the army or the navy. It should require and should obtain as good a class of recruits. The inducement to obtain them is not higher salaries, because the salaries at present given on entrance are higher than those given in the initial stages of most professions. It is the fear that promotion will not follow according to merit, and we shall never obtain as good a class of recruits for the Civil Service as the banks, insurance companies and learned professions obtain, so long as the blot of political patronage remains on the service, either as to admission or as to promotion. There is another consideration in connection with this matter—a general principle which we should observe. I believe that all citizens of Canada have an equal right to obtain a share of the public money paid for the service of the public. Take such a state of things as prevailed some time before Confederation, and for some years after it, when one party was in power almost continuously for twenty years, and the other party was practically excluded from any share in the public service,

That is simply an injustice—an oppression of those who did not belong to the ruling party. I say that both parties have an equal right, as citizens of the country contributing equally to the revenue, to earn the money of the public in this way if they show equal ability. If we pretend to reform we should strike at the root of the evil and abolish the system of political patronage. For the purpose of putting my views on record I move the following amendment:—

That it be resolved,—That by the report of the Sub-Committee of Council of the 14th June, 1880, on the subject of the Civil Service, it was declared that “many men have, by old age, incapacity, bad habits or continued idleness, become unavailable for useful purpose—the number of men in each Department has increased, it is thought out of proportion to the needs of the Service. Young men have been appointed who, from want of education or strength of constitution or general unfitness, have not made, and will never become, efficient public servants. The general expense has been increased by the tendency of the existing rules to the gradual culmination of officers by mere force of survivorship into the more highly paid classes,” and that a reconsideration of the question is desirable with a view to seeking greater economy in all the Departments by the weeding out of men who, from any of the causes named, are no longer efficient public servants, and a Commission was recommended.

That by the report of the Civil Service Commission appointed accordingly objection is taken to appointment by political influence and patronage; and the Commissioners say:

“To this baneful influence, we believe, may be traced nearly all that demands change. It is responsible for admission to the Service of those who are too old to be efficient; of those whose impaired health and enfeebled constitutions forbid the hope that they can ever become useful public servants; of those whose personal habits are an equally fatal objection; of those whose lack of education should disqualify them; and of those whose mental qualities are of an order that has made it impossible for them to succeed in private business. It is responsible, too, for the appointment of those who desire to lead an easy and, what they deem, a genteel life.

“To the same influence may be ascribed most of the appointment of men taken from beyond the Service to the best places over the heads of tried and efficient servants.

“Political patronage is responsible for other evils, and we do not hesitate to express the conviction that many unnecessary Civil offices have been retained, and that new places have been created for no better purpose than to provide for the followers of influential politicians.”

That the Commission declares that the only remedy for the evils it discloses can be found in completely eliminating all traces of political patronage, and proposes probationary appointment by open competitive examination under an independent Civil Service Commission.

That the said Bill does not adopt this principle.

That the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend it so as to provide for probationary admission to the Civil Service by open competitive examination under an independent Civil Service Commission.

That the report of the Sub-Committee of Council of the 14th June, 1880, on the subject of the Civil Service states, that the general expense has been increased by the tendency of the existing rules to the gradual culmination of officers by mere force of survivorship into the more highly paid classes.

That the report of the Civil Service Commission finds that, “while by far the greater portion of the work of the Departments is of a purely routine character, and such as in private business would be performed by men receiving comparatively low salaries, it has heretofore been largely done by clerks who, by mere force of survival, have been advanced to the highest grades of the Service. This, we believe, is a fruitful source of unnecessary cost,” and declares that “the routine work of the Departments, such as checking, comparing, copying, compiling and transcribing accounts and documents, so far as we can ascertain, comprises four-fifths of the whole work to be done, and requires for its performance no special attainments beyond what can be acquired in the common schools. The clerks in this class should be promoted only on having passed a competitive examination, and thereby attained such a position as the lists herein referred to of clerks eligible for promotion as will establish their fitness to fill the vacancies that may occur in the higher grades. The salary at first entrance, we propose, shall be $500, advancing by biennial increment of $100 to $900.”

That the said Bill be referred back to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the same by providing for the creation of a class of writers to discharge such routine work with salaries proportionate to the nature of their duties with a view to greater economy.

Amendment negatived; and Bill read the third time and passed on a division.

FUGITIVE OFFENDERS BILL.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 108) respecting fugitive offenders in Canada from other parts of Her Majesty's Dominions, said: The papers sent down to the House show all the correspondence which has taken place between the Imperial Government and the Canadian Government relating to the old Fugitive Offenders Bill. Her Majesty's Government passed a Bill some time ago, to enable the transfer of offenders from one part of the Empire, especially the colonial part, to another part. After full consideration, the Government here came to the conclusion that certain objections which had been taken to the legislation in England should not be pressed. In order, however, that the position of the Dominion and the jurisdiction of this Parliament should be affirmed, Her Majesty's Government was informed that an Act would be introduced here for the purpose of legislating in the same sense as the Imperial legislation. This Bill is introduced for that purpose.

Mr. BLAKE. The mode in which the Government has chosen to assert or maintain the authority and powers of the Legislature of Canada seems to me to be not a very effectual one, and liable to lead to considerable confusion. While agreeing to withdraw the objections which have been taken to Imperial legislation upon a subject professedly within our own powers of legislation—practically within our exclusive power, unless our charter is revocable at the will of the Imperial Parliament—the hon. gentleman proposes to maintain the authority and autonomy of Canada by passing, verbatim et literatim, the same measure. Is the Imperial Act to be in force in Canada or not? It is intended to embrace Canada. Under which of the laws will fugitive offenders be arrested under the Imperial law, the Canadian law, or both? Are warrants to be issued under both Acts? You are practically asserting your power to legislate exclusively by a slavish imitation of Imperial legislation, by passing the Imperial Act, and thus making both laws applicable to the country. It is quite clear that one of them is enough. It is quite clear that if you admit the power of the Imperial Parliament to legislate in this direction, this law is effectual, and would answer the purpose. No doubt our legislation would be subject to those questions which arise with regard to the transfer of offenders beyond seas—into which I do not propose to enter to-day, although I think much is to be said on that subject—and even assuming that that difficulty would be surmounted by Imperial legislation, it would be limited to that portion of territory where the agreement of the parties would be obtained, and might be beyond our jurisdiction, if any would. That is no excuse for such a wholesale measure of legislation as that which is about to take place by the consent of the Legislature of Canada with regard to offenders in our own country. I cannot, therefore, myself congratulate the Government on this mode of asserting and maintaining the autonomy of Canada, and the rights which by the Act of 1867 were granted to the Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The question is not certainly free from the difficulties the hon. gentleman has pointed out. But, in the first place, this Bill was passed by the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of aiding the colonies to send criminals from one colony to the other. We cannot legislate, of course, beyond our own bounds; we have no power, under any legislation of ours, to arrest a criminal and send him across the seas, either to New Zealand, Australia, or to any of the other colonies. Her Majesty's Government, for the convenience and the good of the colonies, passed a general Act applicable to all the colonies, by which criminals escaping from any one colony to another can be arrested by a certain process and tried in the country to which he has escaped. All the colonies, with the single exception of Canada, have assented to the legislation on the request of Her Majesty's Government, and we think that we should not be the only recalcitrant colony, or that we should not give our consent to this Act, which was passed for the benefit of our colonies, and for their sake alone. But in order to vindicate the autonomy of Canada, we informed Her Majesty's Government that we would pass a law here for the purpose of authorizing the arrest of parties and holding them subject to be transmitted across the seas. I do not suppose that any particular difficulties will arise from a conflict of the jurisdiction. I take it that the Ontario Statutes will be upheld by the Courts, and that the moment a party is put on board a ship to be transported to another colony the Imperial Act will then take effect; so that really we can preserve our autonomy and gain the benefit of Imperial legislation.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. This is a transcript as far as possible of the Imperial Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE IN THE DISPUTED TERRITORY BETWEEN ONTARIO AND MANITOBA.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the second reading of Bill (No. 109) to amend and further continue in force for a limited time, the Act respecting the administration of criminal justice in the territory in dispute between the Governments of the Provinces of Ontario and Manitoba. He said: This Bill in effect continues for another year the temporary Act 43rd Victoria. In consequence of the legislation of last Session, the words "or in Manitoba" are introduced in the Bill after the word "Ontario."

Mr. BLAKE. The title of the Bill is objectionable. While it is called an Act to amend and further continue in force, for a limited time, the Act in question, as the Act itself shows, it is an Act respecting the administration of criminal justice. So the title incorrectly describes the Act which it proposes to continue in force. For the word "Manitoba," we should have the words "the Dominion of Canada."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am willing to correct the title.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

FIRE-ARMS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 111) to amend the Act 40th Victoria, Chapter 30, intituled: An Act to make provision against the improper use of fire-arms, said: This is to provide that pistols seized under the Act should not be destroyed, but handed over to the municipality, to be used by constables and other peace officers.

Mr. ANGLIN. Can the hon. gentleman inform us whether the number of weapons seized under the Act would, if used, instead of being destroyed, be of sufficient value to pay the cost of this legislation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I really cannot tell.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 112) respecting County Court Judges, said: This Bill owes its introduction to certain circumstances connected with the county judiciary in western Canada, that it is not necessary to specify just now. This is a law under which a County Court Judge can be dismissed after trial before the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, but the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario preferred not to act under it. Clauses 6, 7, 8 and 9 are money clauses, providing for superannuation, &c.

Mr. BLAKE. I regret that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, the return for which I moved at an early period of the Session, and which would have a bearing on this Bill, has not been brought down. I moved for the judgment of the Chief Justice, for the writ of prohibition against an officer appointed by this Government to enquire into the conduct of County Court Judges, and for all correspondence on the subject. If I rightly understood the case, from reports of the Local Legislature debates, the Ontario Government did not act on the power contained in their Statutes, after a declaration from the Government here that the Statute was ultra vires. The history of that old legislation is familiar at any rate to two persons in this House. The hon. gentleman caused to be disallowed the legislation making the tenure of office during pleasure, and left that in operation providing for the possible removal of a County Court Judge for inability or misbehavior after enquiry by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. That mode of prosecuting the enquiry was an objectionable one. I have a great aversion to the executive political power being in anyway directly or indirectly connected with the question of a removal of a Judge. It is important, no doubt, that the door to assaults on a Judge who has committed improprieties should be an open, obvious and plain door, and, at the same time, I think the more we free the Judge from the possibility of executive interference the more likely we are to secure a really independent judiciary. Therefore, I do not myself approve of the principle of the Act, though it may be an improvement upon the preceding Act. I am glad to notice that in this Bill, apart from the delicate and doubtful question of jurisdiction as to with whom the power of removal rests, I am glad to notice that the mode proposed here for the trial of the question of the collation of the evidence is a satisfactory mode. It is well to leave it in the hands of the Government to select from one of the Superior Court Judges, and to give to a functionary of that kind this power. But there is still the power and the discretion resting with the Government itself of dealing with the report. I should personally have preferred two Judges to one for the investigation, and a larger share of power. Our old Court is a very solemn one, but it is too cumbersome. Our full Court of Appeal, which was at one time composed of nine Judges, was the Court of Impeachment of a Judge, but it was too cumbersome, because it was difficult to get all the Judges together, and detain them for the period of time necessary. I think more than one might properly be allotted to the discharge of a responsible and particularly invidious duty such as this. There is another point to which I will refer. In a measure which has passed its third reading to-day, we have provided that if you remove the Deputy-Head of a Department you shall lay the causes of the removal before Parliament at its next Session. I really think the judicial office is entitled to as much respect and consideration, and Parliament is entitled to as much and more representation on that subject than it is to the removal of a Deputy-Head. I think the whole proceedings—the proceedings upon which the Commission was founded, the Commission itself, the evidence taken, the report of the Commissioners, and the action of the Governor in Council in every case ought to be laid before Parliament, at any rate in the very next Session after the removal of a Judge has been made. In other cases it might be proper to leave these papers unproduced, except on demand of a member who might move for them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with much the hon. gentleman has said. I would like as much as he does that there should be no interference by the Government of the day with the trial of Judges. Only the other day we had a discussion in the House about a Supreme Court Judge, and my hon. friend mentioned that the Government must take the responsibility of looking after the papers.

Mr. BLAKE. No, it was the hon. member for Huron, who mentioned it. I took a different view of the subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events, it is a subject worthy of every consideration. I think that the whole matter as to the best way of disposing of charges against Judges, should be taken up and settled upon a satisfactory basis. We cannot well do that now. The Ontario Government felt themselves unable to do as they desired in a particular case, on account of the doubt as to their jurisdiction. I can say, however, that I shall call the attention of my hon. friend the Chief Justice to the subject, with the view of establishing some satisfactory tribunal for the trial of such cases, entirely removed from all political pressure in the matter. Meanwhile, I hope the Bill will be passed. I do not propose to go into Committee of the Whole to-day, because the many resolutions are not yet passed.

Mr. BLAKE. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the Session is too far advanced to legislate on the matter now. At the same time I retain my opinion that this is not a satisfactory provision, and I would venture to suggest that the clause be continued in force only till the next Session of Parliament, and if the hon. gentleman makes an improvement upon it, he can continue it next Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will think of it, and I would like to consult my hon. friend the Chief Justice in the matter.

Bill read the second time.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McLELAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 119) further to amend the Pilotage Act, 1873, and the other Acts therein mentioned. He said: It is proposed to amend the Act so that the pilotage authorities may examine witnesses on oath, and that the Pilotage Commissioner of Halifax or St. John, absent twelve months without leave, shall forfeit his office. It also proposed to limit the time in which complaints may be made against pilots, and it defines the power to limit or cancel a pilot's license.

Mr. ANGLIN. When the resolutions were before the Committee, objection was taken by several hon. members. Further enquiry has given increased force to those objections. I speak more particularly with respect to the pilots of the city of St. John, who have presented a petition to the House in which they state their case. Long before New Brunswick came into Confederation, indeed almost from the foundation of the city of St. John, the pilot laws have been strict there. Persons desiring to become pilots are compelled to pass an examination in order to obtain permission to become an apprentice. The apprentices were compelled to serve in a pilot boat for five years in order to obtain a knowledge of the business. After serving five years, the apprentice had to make two voyages across the Atlantic in a square-rigged vessel, performing duty as a seaman, in order to become thoroughly acquainted with the working of the rigging and for other reasons. After that time the apprentice had to pass a rigid examination before he obtained a license. That is substantially the law still with respect to the qualifications of St. John pilots. I consider it hard that a man who has thus become qualified should be liable to be deprived of this license by a majority of the members of the Pilot Board. If this Bill should become law it would give this Commissioner the arbitrary power of withholding a license for two years without any cause assigned or complaint made or trial had; in respect to men of this class—and they are generally very respectable men indeed—who might have given offence to some members of the Board, they would thus be placed at their mercy. That, I think, is such a strong objection to the Bill as to lead the hon. Minister not to press that portion of the Bill to which I have referred. It is a matter of justice and right towards these pilots who have everything at stake. Deprive them of their licenses, and they are at once reduced to the position of common sailors; they would have no other means of livelihood, and they would be obliged to go to sea as common sailors. That they should be held to strict account and compelled to conduct themselves with the greatest possible propriety, and always be sober, steady and careful in discharging their duties, I quite admit; but they should not be deprived of their licenses until specific charges have been brought against them, and they have had a fair opportunity of proving their innocence. This arbitrary power of withholding licenses from pilots is a power that should not be given to any body of Commissioners.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I should be glad if the hon. Minister would explain the reasons why this proposal has been made. The hon. gentleman stated that he had received applications from St. John and Halifax to have the Act amended, and the House would be glad to know what reasons were given. I know the people of St. John are much opposed to the present Bill, and especially in regard to the proposed power given to the Pilotage Board with respect to licenses. I understand there has been no application made during the last two or three years for any change to be made in the law. If no such application has been made, on what ground has the present proposal been made?

Mr. McLELAN. One of the reasons given for the change was, that in many of the smaller districts of the Maritime Provinces, pilots who obtained a license performed their duties for a year or two and then absented themselves. After they had absented themselves without the knowledge of the Commissioners there was a want of pilots; and when they returned and resumed their occupations there were more pilots than were necessary. This evil had been brought to the notice of the Department, and it was represented that the Pilotage Board should have power to cancel certificates. This question had been raised in St. John, among the pilotage authorities there, and after the opinion of the Department of Justice had been taken, it was found that the pilotage authorities did not possess the power to limit the period for which licenses were granted. Considering the number of cases that had arisen in the smaller ports, where persons holding pilot licenses absented themselves after performing the duties, it was thought desirable to give the Pilotage Commissioners power to limit the period during which licenses should be granted.

Mr. WELDON. I think that some of the provisions in this Bill will prove a serious injustice to the pilots who are a very numerous and important body of men in the city of St. John. A certain sum is taken from these pilots every year which forms a fund out of which they are entitled to receive pensions. They are obliged to undergo a long apprenticeship, and a course of training which includes two voyages to Europe, and they are also obliged to hold a share in a pilot schooner. I think that, under the provisions of this Bill, they will feel a disinclination to enter the service, as they will consider themselves to be at the mercy of the Board. I object to the provision which enables the pilot authorities at their discretion to limit a period during which a license shall be in force to any term not less than two years. As suggested by the hon. Minister, if a man absents himself for two years, or is guilty of any dereliction of duty, his license might be taken from him. I agree that if a man neglects his duty, he shall be severely punished, because a great deal of property and many lives often depend upon their faithfulness and efficiency. I think, if a man has passed his examination, so long as he conducts himself properly, he should retain his license. That would be the only way in which we could secure and retain an efficient body of pilots. I believe, too, that a different provision might be applied to the smaller ports from that applying to larger places like St. John, where the number of vessels is very large.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I quite agree that the pilotage authorities should have extensive powers, but I do not think the reasons given by the hon. Minister, for the enactment of the fifth clause, are satisfactory. The Act of 1873, says :

"Every branch pilot or licensed pilot who shall pass two full and consecutive years without acting as a pilot (unless in case of sickness, unavoidable absence, or special permission from the pilotage authority of his district) shall forfeit his license."

The hon. gentleman says that if a man goes away for two years and comes back, he may resume his occupation, but meantime others are appointed and he is not required.

Mr. McLELAN. I said any time less than two years. If he is away six months, say during the season of navigation.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. But ipso facto, if he does not observe any of these conditions he forfeits his license. I believe in giving the authorities every reasonable power, but I do not see the necessity of this clause. It does not make it imperative on the pilotage authorities to make a license permanent for two years, and they may give it for a less period than two years if they choose. I have heard of no demand for such a provision, and though I approve generally of the Bill I do not think this clause is necessary.

Mr. McLELAN. I have been informed by the Pilotage Commissioner of St. John, that ever since 1875 their by-laws have required pilots to renew their licenses annually, and the question came up in the Courts of Justice as to whether this was legal or not.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. That is for the purpose of fees, but the renewal comes as a matter of right, unless there is a formal exception.

Mr. McLELAN. As I have said, they have been acting upon it since 1875, and they want to have power to do so hereafter. They want to have power to fill vacancies in the outlying sections for a limited period as they occur.

Mr. ANGLIN. This taking of the licenses annually is an old practice in St. John, which prevailed before Confederation, but it is merely for the purpose of taking the fees. There was not any power of dismissal created, or any power of withholding licenses, and we object to the arbitrary power now established of withholding licenses for two years without assigning any cause, and without perhaps any cause existing. Surely the hon. gentleman would not have such a state of things existing with regard to a class of men who require to undergo such training as the pilots undergo, and who devote their whole time to this pursuit. With regard to smaller ports the case is entirely different, and it is absurd to apply the same rule, and at those outports some skillful fisherman or sailor acts as pilot without having proved his competence in a general way, and without having to undergo a special apprenticeship or to acquire a special training. These men are selected by the authorities and the licenses are granted. Sometimes, because there is not a great deal to do, he devotes a great deal of his time to other pursuits. He does not require, like the pilot in a large harbor like St. John, to be on the ground every day. There is nothing of that kind in a small harbor; the conditions are entirely different, and therefore it is absurd to attempt to enforce regulations which in one case may be quite proper, but in another case would be entirely wrong and oppressive.

Mr. McLELAN. No; this measure is less oppressive, because it makes the licenses of pilots extend over two years.

Mr. WELDON. In St. John all the officers of the Corporation, including the pilots, were required to renew their licenses every year and pay their fee. Under the present law, they could not refuse to give a pilot his license if he paid his fee; but under this law, at the end of two years, they may for some reason or other refuse to give a pilot his license, and thus it makes him dependent on the pleasure of the Board. As has been pointed out, the pilots in St. John and other large harbors are not allowed to assume any other business, but in the smaller ports the pilots only follow piloting incidentally to their principal business. What we want is this: that as long as these men are qualified to act and conduct themselves properly, they shall be entitled to their license as a matter of course. The third section, I think, is a salutary provision, because the captains do not complain of the pilots. The Pilotage Board should have complete control over the pilot, but so long as he conducts himself properly, it seems to be only fair that he should be allowed to continue to pilot, and if he becomes disabled or aged, that he should be entitled to a portion of the fund to which he has contributed a portion of his earnings.

Bill read the second time; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 3,

Mr. AMYOT. I must thank the Government for the kindness which they have shown to the pilots of the Quebec harbor and below, for the amendment to their tariff which they have promised to sanction, but I regret very much that the third and fourth clauses of this Bill are brought before the House. The law at present in existence has always worked satisfactorily to everybody—to the proprietors of the ships, to commerce, and to the pilots. Nobody is asking for this change; the law is known all over the world. The proprietor of a ship knows when he comes into the river that he has four days to complain of any accident due to a pilot, and no more. Now, it is proposed to change that, I ask why? I understand that a few years ago such a measure was attempted to be carried through this House, and it was afterwards withdrawn. What is the power behind the throne which brings in this measure which nobody wants, but which everybody protests against? It is not in favor of the ship owner, the pilot, nor commerce. I think at this late period of the Session these clauses should be withdrawn. It is nothing but absurd to give this period of one year. A captain of a ship comes to Quebec; an accident occurs; he does not lodge his complaint, but sails off to another port near or distant, and, after other accidents, perhaps goes to England. He leaves his log-book there and one year after comes back to Quebec, when he lodges his complaint. But where is the log-book, where are the seamen, and the whole of the crew to give evidence? The pilot may be thus at the mercy of one man, who may be part owner of the ship; at how is the Harbor Commission to find out the facts about the accident? There may have been five or six since. Then these clauses give an immense authority, which is not asked for, to the Harbor Commissioners. What kind of a tribunal is this that we erect? You go before them and need not give your name or security, and lodge a complaint which is not even written, and upon that complaint, not written or sworn to, if the Harbor Commissioners happen to be unfriendly to the pilots, they grant an enquête. The judgment is given then, not by lawyers nor sworn Judges, but by parties who know nothing of the law, and it may take away from the pilot his license and certificate; and this judgment is final. The Harbor Commissioners are given every possible power over the property of that pilot without his being entitled to the assistance of a friend or attorney. You would thus leave the pilots at the mercy of an irresponsible tribunal, after giving the shipowner a delay of a year to prepare his plans of persecution; and if the Commissioners happen to be the enemies of the pilots, they will have no remedy whatever. There is no reason for this Bill, which will injure trade as well as the pilots, who are invaluable in the promotion and protection of our St. Lawrence navigation and commerce generally. I trust, therefore, the Government will kindly withdraw these clauses, and refuse to the Harbor Commissioners the powers now proposed.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. AMYOT. I was speaking before recess of the injuries which this clause would inflict on the pilots. Is it the intention of the Government to amend these clauses.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

Mr. AMYOT. I expect that these clauses will give great arbitrary powers to the Harbor Commissioners without any guarantee of protection or justice to the pilots. The Commissioners will sit as an unsworn tribunal, before whom complaints need not be made in writing, and the defendant may not know by whom they are made. There is also no guarantee as to the truth of the accusation; and there will be no appeal from their judgment. Nor does the law state what will be the offences tried; they may be imaginary. There is nothing specified neither as to the punishments. The Pilot Act of 1873 was passed as a compromise between the trading classes and the pilots, and the interests of every person were carefully weighed and examined, the Act specifying all the offences which a pilot may commit with the punishments that may be inflicted therefor. The law proposed leaves that to the arbitrary fancy of the Harbor Commissioners, and the amount of the penalty is not fixed. By the law as passed in 1873, all the offences are described and the penalty is described. Everything is provided. By the law as proposed, we create any amount of imaginary offences which it may please an arbitrary power to create at a given moment. I think there is no reason why we should give that power to the Harbor Commissioners; it is not asked for. We are not here simply to pass laws, but to pass laws when they are asked for and when they are necessary in the public interests. In the present case, that arbitrary power is not asked for, nor is the delay for complaints against pilots asked for. Since 1849, the four days after arrival have always been found sufficient. I do not see why we should extend that delay to a year, or thirty or even fifteen days. The proposed law speaks of a delay after the occurrence of the accident. Now the delay begins to be computed after the arrival of the ship in the harbor. If you give the delay provided in this Bill, a wrecked ship may arrive in harbor after the time specified, so that it will be too late. In any way we look at this Bill, it seems dangerous and tyrannical, and appears to treat the Corporation of Pilots as if they were mere school boys, or toys, not, I am happy to say, in the hands of the hon. Minister of Marine, who has always been willing to do them justice, but of somebody who deceives him. Two years ago something of the same kind was tried, but was refused. Circumstances have not changed since then, and I am sure the hon. Minister of Marine will be the first to remove these clauses.

Mr. VALLÉE (in French). Mr. Speaker, I have been entrusted by the pilots of the district of Montreal, who ply between Montreal and Quebec, with the care of looking after their interests in the matter of this Bill. It is necessary to well understand the position of these pilots, in order to comprehend how odious is the legislation now proposed. For thirty-three years has the old law existed; no one has ever complained of its working or of the manner in which it has been carried out, and yet it is now proposed to amend it. It is a fact generally admitted that respect should be shown to what is old and antique. The law passed in 1849 regulates the pilotage between the ports of Montreal and Quebec. It has been in operation from that date to the satisfaction of both pilots and merchants, as also of owners of vessels sailing between these two ports. Why should we now seek to amend the law in a fashion odious to the pilots, who have always fulfilled their duties to the satisfaction of shipowners? Now, who are really those whom we should consider when legislating on this occasion? Why, the ship owners and masters of vessels sailing between the ports of Montreal and Quebec. If they are satisfied with the conduct of their pilots, who is there who has the right to complain? No one. The only other people who might complain besides those I have already named, are the marine insurance companies. Now, in the present case, not a single company has had any occasion, or has felt capriciously inclined to lodge any complaint against the pilots of the district of Montreal. Mr. Speaker, I am, moreover, authorized to protest against this Bill by the whole body of pilots, the majority of whom, I may almost say the whole, reside in my county, for of the forty-nine pilots who ply their trade between the ports of Montreal and Quebec there are, I think, thirty-five who reside in my county. These pilots belong to both political parties. I do not, therefore, come here to take up a cause in the interests more of one party than of the other; I am merely defending certain rights in the interests of justice. These men, by their social position, by the knowledge of their profession, have acquired public confidence, and their public character and responsibility should not be made the subject of attack without a serious cause. Now, according to the amendment suggested by clause 3, this is what can take place: A pilot starts from Montreal in charge of a vessel which he takes to Quebec; at the latter port, he must, on leaving the ship, receive a certificate from the master to the effect that he has faithfully performed his duty. If no accident has occurred during the trip, he obtains a clean sheet; if, on the contrary, an accident has happened, the captain becomes the pilot's judge, and if he is of opinion that he has exercised all the care that can be demanded of any ordinary man, and that the accident was beyond his control, he will not lodge any complaint against him, but he will state that it took place owing to the current, or to darkness, or again he will lay the blame of it to some other ship which was coming from an opposite direction. Therefore the captain takes upon himself to exonerate the pilot and delivers a clean sheet to him. Now, what will be the result of the present law if it is adopted? Here is a pilot who is discharged on arriving at Quebec; at that port the captain takes another and proceeds on his journey. The ship owner who did not feel inclined to complain of the pilot to the Harbor Commission of Montreal when he discharged him, might do so in a year's time. We all know that a ship's crew is engaged from one port to that of destination. If the ship left Montreal for Sydney or Liverpool, the crew which brought her from Montreal to Quebec, will be discharged at Sydney or Liverpool; yet a year later the Harbor Commission, on any information whatsoever, with or without any one complaining, will be allowed to try that pilot before its Board. But why should he be thus tried? If he has been in fault, it should have been taken cognizance of immediately, and a report would have been made against him when he arrived at the port of Quebec. But why allow a ship's master or a ship owner to come a year later and say that his ship has sustained damage? If such damage has been sustained during the trip between Montreal and Quebec, it was known to him, and he should have immediately reported to the authorities, who have to judge the conduct of pilots, the damage sustained by his vessel. If he is given a year in which to lodge his complaint, a serious injury may be done the pilot, for the ship may sustain damage in some other port, and through some caprice the captains, aware of the fact that the pilot cannot disprove the charge, may then lodge a complaint against him. It is easy to be seen how odious this law would become were that clause adopted. According to the old law, the ship owner or the master of a vessel is compelled to report to the authorities within four days of the occurrence of the accident. It is now sought to extend this delay to a whole year or at least to the thirty days following such accident; but during these thirty days the ship will have been under the control of another pilot, viz., from Quebec to Bic. Now, let us suppose that an accident takes place after the ship leaves Quebec; if a feeling of friendship exists between the captain and the Quebec pilot, the ship owner or the master of the ship will be able to lodge a complaint against the Montreal pilot, and in what position will he then find himself? A year, six, or even three months after the accident, the master will alone remain of the ship's crew, which will have been discharged, and how is the pilot to establish his defence? The answer to that question suffices to show that that clause is entirely useless. Now, Mr. Speaker, we are here to legislate either in the public or in the private interest. In the interest of the public it must be established that the pilot has acted wrongly, and that he has been the cause of injury to the public; but if no report is made to the authorities there is no principle on which the Government can base itself to put in force such a measure. Now, besides the public interest, there may be a private one. In the present case have any private interests been affected? No, Mr. Speaker, they have not, for the Government has not, and cannot, have received a single complaint from either the merchants, the Board of Trade or the pilots themselves. Now, there are but these three parties which can lodge a complaint from the point of view of private interests. I am authorized by the President of the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal, Mr. Robertson, to state that there are no complaints against the pilots plying between Montreal and Quebec; and I am moreover authorized to state that Mr. Robertson has declared that it was not the Harbor Commission of Montreal that was asking for this change in the law. The Government is therefore not guided in its opinion by the body which has authority over the pilots; thus, neither the public nor the private interest demands that the law should be changed. Are the merchants or the insurance companies complaining? No, there are no complaints on their part. Well, then, who remains then but the pilots? Now, the pilots are on this occasion represented by me; they entrusted me with the care of defending their rights in this House, which will, I know, listen to me, and which is desirous of doing justice to so important a body. Now, the pilots say that this legislation is useless. How is it then that a law is placed in the hands of the President of the Council, who is acting simultaneously for the Minister of Marine? How is it that such a law comes before the House? Two years ago a similar law was introduced, but it was withdrawn at the request of members interested in the question. Why is it again agitated in our midst? How is it that every time a new Minister takes the place of the Minister of Marine that one should introduce in this House measures which no one asks for? Who are those who are entrusted here with the mission of persecuting that public body, which is an honorable body, against which there is no complaint, either on the part of the authorities who have the control of it, or on the part of the merchants? Why not respect a law which exists now for thirty years, and against which no one has a word to say? Let things therefore remain as they are, and it will be but doing justice to the pilots of the district of Montreal. Such are the few remarks that I had to make against the third clause of the present Bill. (The hon. gentleman continued his remarks in English.) This clause is to amend the old Act which has been in force for thirty-three years, and against which no complaint whatever has been made either before this House or the public. Who are the parties interested in the conduct of the pilots? They are surely the owners or the masters of the vessels, or, perhaps, the insurance companies, and it is on those we must call to judge the conduct of the pilots. Under the present law, the captain and the owner have a right to make a complaint before the legal authority, within four days after the vessel has suffered damages. This Bill proposes to amend that law as follows:—

Or of any other Act or law, as requires complaint or information of the master or owner of any ship, steamer or other vessel sustaining damage through the fault of any branch pilot for and above the Harbor of Quebec, before the pilotage authority of Montreal can declare that such pilot has forfeited his branch, is hereby repealed."

Thus, neither the owner or the captain will have the right to put the complaint before the legal authority. This claim will be replaced by the following:—

And the said pilotage authority may, in their discretion, investigate the matter and declare the branch of such pilot forfeited, at any time within one year after such loss or damages sustained through his fault, and upon such information as they may deem sufficient, and with or without complaint by any person whomsoever."

This clause is creating a tribunal. The pilotage authority may investigate the conduct of a pilot when no complaint has been made. Have we any such tribunals in this country? Have we ever seen such tribunals in the world? Never! This Bill provides that information may be laid by any one. I admit that the proprietor has a right to complain when he has suffered through the misconduct of the pilot. The Bill provides that the pilotage authority may institute proceedings upon such information as they may deem sufficient; that means that they may enquire into the conduct of the pilot without any complaint being made against him. The amendment is nonsense, and I cannot believe that the Government or the hon. Minister have originated it; neither can I believe that it has come from the President of the Harbor Commissioners, and certainly it has not come from the pilots, for they are opposed to the Bill. They have told me themselves that they did not ask for this legislation. This provision relating to the Montreal pilots is very unfair. When a pilot takes charge of a ship from Montreal to Quebec, when he lands at Quebec he has his discharge from the captain or the owner of the ship, and the ship is put under the control of another pilot from Quebec to Bic. Is it fair that the Montreal pilot should be under the control of the owner or the captain of a ship during one year after he has left the ship at Quebec under the control of another pilot? I think it is very unfair. When a pilot takes charge of a ship from Montreal to Quebec there is crew who were witnesses of his conduct, but after he has left the ship where will be the witnesses to sustain the charge of the captain? I hope the Minister who has charge of this Bill will withdraw that clause.

Mr. McLELAN. I think my hon. friends are unnecessarily alarmed on behalf of the pilots. We are not proposing to try them by any new tribunal, but by the same tribunal that has tried all officers for the last thirty-three years, and against which I believe there has been no complaint by the pilots. In the old law the same provision existed for trying charges and imposing penalties as is now proposed. All the change that is proposed relates to the time within which a complaint may be made against a pilot, and for that my hon. friend says that I am not respossible. I tell him I am responsible for it. A case came under my own observation in which I went to the authorities to demand an investigation into the conduct of the pilot, and found I was a few hours too late, that it should have been made within four days after the accident. Consequently, I came to the conclusion that a longer time should be given for the captain, or any person interested, to bring the charge. After an accident has occurred, through the misconduct of a pilot, the captain and those in charge of the ship have enough to do to attend to the ship, to keep her floating or to provide for her safety, and are frequently unable to formulate a charge against an offending pilot within four days from the accident. The hon. gentleman complains that the pilotage authorities may investigate a charge without a complaint being made. Well, the Pilotage Commissioners are the authorities that licenses the pilots, and they are responsible for their action. They have an interest in their well-doing. The captain may be lost in an accident, and there may be no other person legally qualified to prefer a charge against the pilot, in which case the Commissioners should have power to take the matter up. Other cases often occur where there is collusion between the pilot and the owner or captain, purposely to wreck a ship, in which case neither the captain nor the owner will prefer a charge against the pilot, who escapes scot free, though he may be guilty of a serious crime. The Harbor Commissioners are most anxious to have the power, upon sufficient evidence being placed before them, to order an investigation, even where the owner or the captain do not come forward to lodge a complaint, and they, being responsible for the conduct of the pilot, desire authority to hold an investigation and impose penalties when misconduct is proved. It has been considered desirable, in the interest of commerce and in the interest of the pilots themselves, that the time should be extended within which a complaint may be made. I inserted one year, in order that discussion might arise and the opinions of those interested in the subject might be gathered. I ask that clauses three and four may be allowed to stand until further consideration.

On clause 5,

Mr. VALLÉE moved that the words "except the districts of Quebec and Montreal respectively" be inserted.

Amendment agreed to; and Bill reported.

MILITIA AND DEFENCE.

Mr. CARON, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 148) to amend the Acts respecting the Militia and Defence of the Dominion of Canada, said: Under the law as it now stands re-enrollment of the sedentary militia takes place every five years. Under the proposed Act, power will be given to the Governor in Council to make this enrollment when in his discretion it may appear necessary to make it. An expenditure of $55,000 is required for the enlistment, and it is thought better that it should only take place when it may be deemed necessary.

Mr. BLAKE. When did the last enlistment take place?

Mr. CARON. The last enlistment took place about six years ago.

Bill read the second time; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SCRIVER. I would like to enquire of the hon. Minister of Militia if the Government, in making this change, intends practically to do away with this examination altogether, unless in a case of some great emergency as threatened now, or something of that kind.

Mr. McLELAN.

Mr. CARON. As the hon. gentleman will see by looking at the Bill, the Government wish merely to save this expenditure of $55,000 for re-enrollment whenever it can be saved.

Mr. SCRIVER. What I would like to know is, under what circumstances the Governor in Council might think it necessary to have such enrollment?

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman is asking a question which I am not prepared to answer. The Governor in Council will have power, if an emergency occurs, to decide whether or not it will be proper to incur this expenditure.

Mr. BLAKE. As I understand, under the law at present the enrollment takes place at certain specified periods, but under the proposed law the Governor in Council can order an enrollment as often as he likes.

Mr. CARON. True; but the purpose of the Bill is to prevent it being made unnecessarily. Last year, as the hon. gentleman will remember, a Bill was brought before the House and passed for the purpose of preventing this enrollment; but we wish to place the matter within the discretion of the Governor in Council.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

BRIDGES OVER NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 152) respecting bridges over navigable waters, constructed under the authority of the Provincial Acts, said: It has been found in practice that, in regard to bridges constructed only in one Province, there was a difference of opinion about the mode of passing them. Formerly the Local Legislature granted charters for the construction of these bridges, and then it was found that it could not deal with questions of navigation, and it was thought that the parties wishing to build the bridges should apply to the Federal Parliament. When they applied to the Federal Parliament, the difficulty found was that though we had the power to deal with navigation, the question of tolls, the character of the bridge, the kind of vehicles allowed to pass over it, and so on, were within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures. By this Bill it is proposed to deal with those bridges by a general plan. The Local Legislatures, under this law, will grant charters for the construction of the bridges, and the plans will be submitted to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council and the Minister of Railways for their approval. If they find them satisfactory, and that the navigation will not be interfered with, then they will declare that the bridge is a lawful one. If they find otherwise, they will declare that the bridge is an unlawful one. That is the substance of the Bill.

Bill read the second time; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 9,
