Cornwall employing 225 hands, in all 700 hands. The Commissioners which the hon. gentleman appointed say they inspected thirteen cotton factories employing 4,021 persons. Those figures show that the tremendous stimulus of 40 per cent. has not produced so rapid a growth of those factories as we might have expected. But what I desire specially to direct the attention of the House to, is this: that, according to the English Standard these 4,021 hands ought to represent 390,000 spindles, but instead of doing so the hon. Finance Minister informs us that there are but 106,000 or 108,000 cotton spindles in Canada, and I am not at all sure that there may not be many more cotton factories in the country than those visited by these gentleman. We see that even if this represents the whole number, that labor and machinery in Canada, is to labor and machinery in England, as 26 is to 90. Now, when the hon. gentleman tells this House that the people of Canada are getting cotton goods cheaper than they ever got them before he is making a statement which it is impossible can be true. No such waste of capital and skill can be reconciled with the statement of the hon. the Finance Minister. The President of the Council disputes the proposition of the hon. member for Centre Huron, that our imports would have yielded us a sufficient revenue under the old Tariff to have enabled us to meet the expenses of Government if economically administered. This the hon. Minister denies, but it is plain to every one that if we would not have imported so largely, then the present Tariff has wholly failed in its main purpose, which is to exclude foreign goods from the Canadian market. The hon. Minister says that if we obtain as much Customs business under a low Tariff as under a high one, we are burdened as much by the one as by the other. I deny his proposition. I am astonished that he should make it. He will find no authority to support him. Facts and reason are equally against him. If the Government put a duty upon coffee and tea, whether it be high or low, the public get the tax, except it increases the price of some other article which is in part substituted for them; but I know none such. But this will not hold good with regard to spirits. We put Customs duty upon imported whiskey. Do we stop there? Not at all. We say to the distiller, we have imposed a duty of 80 cents a gallon on imported whiskey. The price of your home made article is in consequence advanced 80 cents a gallon, and this sum belongs to us. It is no part of the price which you by your labor and industry give the article. It is an additional price given by an Act of Parliament, and we shall appropriate it to public uses. Now that would not be the less a tax if the Government neglected to take it. It would be received by the distiller instead of the Excise officer; but it would be paid by the public all the same. The hon. Minister of Finance imposes a duty upon bread stuffs. He tells the producer, that, in consequence of this Government interference, he gets a higher price. He tells or should tell the consumer, in consequence of this interference, you are paying an Excise duty to the producer of domestic flour and cornmeal, and to the Government on imported flour and cornmeal. Is not this so? If this contention be correct, then the burden is the same upon the consumer of the domestic article as it is upon the consumer of the imported article. The public pay the tax; but, because the Government do not receive it, the Minister refuses to consider it a tax. It is the measure of duties imposed, and the articles upon which they are imposed, by which the amount of taxation is to be determined, and not by the amount of Customs duties paid into the public Treasury. The hon. gentleman will not deny that he promised, by legislation, to increase prices. He will not deny that, upon the products of this country, those increased prices have been paid by the consumers of this country, and if so they have burdens imposed upon them. They are compelled to pay tribute money to their fellow countrymen, although it does not appear among the sums collected. I do no care to pursue so elementary a subject further. I have said enough to show this House that if the Government are at all right in their contention, the amount of taxes collected is not a measure of the taxations imposed—I dispute their propositions—I say they are alike contrary to reason and experience. I say they have not benefitted the producer, but they have burdened the consumer. Let us look for one moment at the agricultural products of the country. These gentlemen have told the farmers, we can help you by a tax on American cereals. Barley came free from the United States into Canada; barley was taxed 15 cents a bushel in going from Canada into the United States. What happened? The Americans have increased the quantity of barley produced in their country, during the last ten years, nearly eight fold, and the result is that the demand for Canadian barley has largely fallen off, and barley in western Ontario, at all events, has dropped again out of use as a farm product or branch of agriculture.

Mr. ORTON. There was more barley grown last year than in 1878.

Mr. MILLS. No; nor was there more wool grown. The price of wool has diminished till at the present time the market value is less than 25 cents. I believe the average market value in Ontario last year, of Canadian wool was 22 cents per lb.

Mr. PLUMB. The alpaca was manufactured.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman, if a consistent protectionist, would insist upon a high duty on foreign wool; and if the duty was only made sufficiently high the farming population of Canada would give up the growing of combing wool and turn their attention to the growing of fine wool. But so long as there is no duty on foreign wool they find the growing of combing wool the more profitable of the two.

Mr. ORTON. I think there is a duty on all kinds of wool that compete with Canadian wool.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman knows there is no duty on any wool that competes with Canadian wool, though there is a duty on wool that does not. If the Government would exclude the wool that competes with Canadian wool, I understand that the woollen manufacturers will be obliged to work up the Canadian wools, and the public would be obliged to wear the cloth produced from them. But the Canadian Government takes good care to impose duties on those articles not to be affected by the taxation. Some have a tax on barley because none is imported into Canada. There was no barley brought in before except what was imported to keep the seed from deterioration.

Mr. ORTON. How about oats?

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon. gentleman say that it affects the price?

Mr. ORTON. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. I know that in the section in which I live the value of oats has been increased, but it was increased before the adoption of the National Policy, by the building of oat mills, which made it possible when the oats were converted into meal to transport them to a distance in that form profitably, which cannot be done while the oats are unmanufactured; and some oat mills have been shut up by the Tariff because they could not get the necessary supplies to keep them running throughout the year. I return to the subject: were we overrun in consequence by the importation of American barley? Was all the produce of that other barley farm to which the First Minister so frequently referred, a few years ago, imported into Canada? No, except small quantities imported to improve the yield. We did not import from the United States; large quantities were exported thither from this country. Why? Because they produced less than they required, and we produced more than we could well consume. Every one knows that the tax on barley has not been of the slightest consequence, except to inconvenience the farmers who which to prevent degeneracy of the product by an importation of seed. Now, when we come to manufactured goods, where the home production is less than sufficient to meet the home demand, there can be no doubt whatever that the tax will increase the price, in many cases, to the amount of taxation. It was for this reason, mainly, that an increase of duties was demanded. Every one who chooses to exercise his common sense will see that this must be the case; and yet the hon. gentleman proclaims that his Tariff has not failed; that prices have not been increased; that goods, wares and merchandise, were never so cheap as now. A short time ago the Americans had a very high duty on quinine. It was repealed, quinine was placed on the free list, and it is now in the American market sold at one half the price it brought four years ago. Then it was smuggled from Canada into the United States. Now it is smuggled the other way. Steel rails not long ago were, in London, bringing about $30 a ton, and in New York they were $35 a ton dearer. The tax amounts to $28 a ton and the freights and charges to about $5 more. Will any one deny that the difference between the prices of London and New York are due to the extent of $28 to the American Tariff? The hon. Minister of Railways has referred to the coal Tax, and he says that the Americans paid the duty on coal. Now Prescott and Ogdensburgh are but a mile apart. The coal which sold a few days ago at Ogdensburgh at $5.75, brings at Prescott $6.65. The coal which at Windsor sells at $7.50, sells at Detroit at $6.75. Will the Minister tell the House that it will cost 90 cents to bring coal across the St. Lawrence; Does he think that any one would pay $6.65 if he could buy at 5.75 at Ogdensburgh, and get the duties paid? The difference in price before the tax was imposed did not exceed 30 cents. It is now 90 cents. What makes the difference? The Minister says that to obtain the same amount of revenue under the old Tariff we would need to import $21,000,000 worth more goods. The Tariff has, therefore, shut $21,000,000 worth out of the country, and has given a home market to this extent. I wholly dissent from this statement. The purchasing power of the people in any one year is a fixed quantity. If you increase the price of all they eat, and of all they wear, of fuel and of light, a large portion, if not the whole, of $21,000,000 is taken to pay this additional price leaving but a small sum if any for additional purposes. Every one must see that if hon. gentlemen have succeeded in securing better prices to producers, it is plain that more money will be required to purchase the same amount of commodities. The hon. member for Cardwell told us that the manufacturers of sewing machines in the United States sold them to Canadians for less than they did to their own citizens, that they always deducted the duties; so that if his statement is accurate, American sewing machines can now be imported into Canada as readily as if there was no duty at all. Both the hon. gentleman and the hon. Minister of Finance have said that no kinds of manufactured goods were as cheap in 1878 as they are to-day. Higher wages are paid; labor is less efficient, and yet every man is better off? The hon. member for Cardwell told us last year that sugar was never so cheap as it has been under the present Tariff. He has told us, if I remember rightly, that it is from 40 to 60 cents per 100 lbs. cheaper than before 1879. The hon. the Minister of Finance has said the same thing about cottons. Now what follows? That Canada never was a sacrifice market; that English and American goods were not sent in here and sacrificed. Mr. Drummond, of Redpath's firm, informed us, in 1876, that we were getting American sugars at less than their actual cost, because the American refiner was paid a bounty by his Government. Now, we are told that Mr. Redpath is furnishing us with sugar at a lower price than the price of 1873, although that was below cost; that he is paying higher wages, and that he is doing a prosperous business! The same story is told of cotton manufactures—that it is prosperously lower now than the ruinously low prices of 1878; and yet these lower than bankrupt prices are producing handsome profits! I would like to ask the President of the Council what he has to say to this? Can he find no couplet from Biglow or Butler which will properly characterize the statement of his colleague? I have already pointed out the extraordinary features of the hon. Minister of Finance's statistics. Let me here notice the efficiency of our sugar refining. The hon. gentleman's commissioners visited four refineries in which they say 885 men are employed. Mr. Gladstone says, thirty-nine men will refine 100 tons of loaf sugar every week, or 292,000 lbs. per man each year. If we take the mixed sugars of the United Kingdom we find that 5,174 men refine 1,822,000,000 lbs., or 350,000 lbs. to each man employed. Now, if the information furnished the House by the hon. Minister of Finance is at all to be relied upon, that we have 885 men engaged in the refineries, they ought to turn out 300,000,000 lbs. of ordinary refined sugar, nearly three times the amount refined in Canada. The hon. Finance Minister has made a statement which shows that the refineries here, either owing to the defectiveness of their machinery or to some other cause, are producing not more than one-third of the quantity produced in the United Kingdom with the same amount of labor. I ask this House to say whether such labor is well employed? I ask it to say whether the country is not compelled to pay for this inefficiency? It may be that these refineries are not so wretchedly managed as the hon. Finance Minister would have us believe; but if they are not, is it not plain to every one that this House has wholly unreliable statements laid before it? It is impossible that this statement can be true. It is impossible to believe that men greedy of gain—eager to grow suddenly rich, would so mismanage their business, as to employ three men to do the work of one. I observe that the hon. Finance Minister, in his Budget Speech, estimates the increased consumption of Canadian wool at upwards of 1,000,000 lbs. He says, that the exports in 1878 were 2,445,893 lbs. and, in 1881, 1,404,123 lbs., and he concludes from this fact that the difference is due to a larger quantity of Canadian wool being used in manufacturing. I do not think this is the case. My opinion is, that the number of sheep kept by the farmers has been very greatly diminished. The farmers of Canada turn their attention to the production of whatever pays them the best for the time being. Until the appearance of the wheat midge, the western portion of Ontario was largely devoted to the production of winter wheat. When the American war began, sheep raising and the growth of barley took the place of the growth of wheat. In 1860, there was less barley grown in the United States than in Canada. Within ten years the farmers increased their growth of barley eight-fold. The price of barley was greatly reduced. The price of Canadian wool has fallen year by year. Combing wool, last year, was not worth more than 22 cents, and the result is, that sheep raising and barley growing have ceased in the West to be agricultural productions. The dairy business, which, for a few years, was a leading branch of agricultural industry, has again fallen into the back-ground, and, during the past five years, the sale of wheat exceeds in value that of all other farm products taken together. I do not say that this is the most satisfactory method of farming, but I am simply stating a fact. A better price for oats has prevailed during the past six years than before, but it has been wholly due to the erection of oat-mills, which send the meal to the Scotch market. I have no doubt whatever, if the hon. the Minister of Finance were to put a duty of 10 cents a pound on fine wools, the Canadian manufacturers could be supplied with home grown wool; and if his theory had any value in his own estimation he would have done this. The hon. member for West Toronto has referred to the fact that manufacturing industries have been recently extended, and he attributes the large consumption of home-grown articles to the exclusion of foreign products. This has been a favorite style of argument upon the other side, and yet a very cursory examination of the facts will show it to be most fallacious. The hon. gentleman admits that the importations of the past year were very much greater than in 1878. The imports for 1881 were $105,330,840, and for 1878 $93,031,427. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have all along argued that the demand for home productions in 1878 was less than in 1881, and yet the foreign importations of 1881 exceeded those of 1878 by more than $12,000,000. If we take the years 1872-73, which hon. gentlemen referred to as a most prosperous year, we find that the imports exceeded in value $128,000,000, being $35,000,000 more than the year 1878, and yet hon. gentlemen do not say that the home manufacturers were driven to the wall in those years by excessive importations. The fact is that home and foreign products are, to a great extent, complements of each other. They are alike necessary to complete the assortment of the necessaries and the luxuries of life in this country. When the purchasing power of the community is from any cause diminished it effects this assortment all round. When there is a diminution of imports, there is also a diminution in the demand for home manufactured articles; and the years of the smallest imports are also the years in which home manufacturers are in least demand. It is because the same causes are operating with reference to each. The member for West Toronto has said that the question of Free Trade and Protection are not put in issue by this Tariff. That we all admit that there must be Customs duties, and it is a simple question as to the articles upon which these duties shall be imposed. I quite admit that the issue between us is not whether Customs duties shall or shall not be abolished. No one has spoken in favor of Free Trade on this side in the sense of wholly removing the shackles of commerce. It is not a question as between direct and indirect taxation, and the hon. member is only dealing candidly with this side of the House when he recognizes that fact. I have never hesitated to say, if a tax of 20 per cent. is necessary to meet the necessities of the Government, then I am ready to favor a tax of 20 per cent. If we cannot get on with less than 25 per cent, then I am in favor of 25 per cent. I set out with this proposition, that taxation in no form can in itself be anything else than a burden on the people; that it should be imposed only for public purposes and used only for the public benefit. There are certain canons which we ought to observe, I think, in the imposition of taxes. The tax should be imposed so as to take as little money as possible from the people beyond what finds its way into the public Treasury. It should be distributed fairly as between the Provinces; it should be borne by the population in proportion to their ability to pay; it should be so imposed so as to restrain commerce as little as possible. Now, in our estimation these are all burdens we impose on the population who are called upon to bear them, they are not benefits. It is not money paid into the public Treasury. It is not a tax to be justified by the benefits obtained. It is not applied in the public interest, but it is a tax imposed on one section of the population for the benefit of another section.

Mr. ORTON. I would ask whether it is not better, then, to propose a tax that gives the benefit to the farm producer?

Mr. MILLS. If the hon. gentleman thinks it is better he can undertake to establish that proposition, but I will undertake to say it is worse. Now, if the hon. member for West Toronto will consider these propositions, he will see that they are violated by the present Tariff; he will see that upon every one of them we are at issue with his friends, and that we have on our side every distinguished financier from Mr. Huskisson to Mr. Gladstone. His friends sometimes deny, and sometimes affirm, that taxation is in itself a burden. When British Columbia was admitted into the Confederacy it was said that taxation was a burden and this burden should not be increased for the purpose of giving effect to the terms of Union. When this Tariff was promulgated, a different doctrine was laid down, and it was said that, by a tax on coal, the industry of Nova Scotia would be revived, and by a tax on breadstuffs, the farmers of Ontario would be made prosperous. Here we have the theory enunciated that no matter what may be done with the taxes, the country is helped by their imposition. It is not their judicious expenditure which is to help the farmer and the miner, it is their imposition. Now, from this doctrine I dissent. They who promulgated it are the doctrinaires—the visionary theorists, who, like the hon. member for Cardwell, mistakenly suppose themselves to be practical men. I would like to ask the hon. member for West Toronto, whether this is not a very distinct issue between us? Taking the position that taxation is a public burden, we say the rich ought to bear their fair proportion. Do they do so? We deny that they do. Cheap cottons are far more heavily taxed than dear ones. Cheap woollen goods bear nearly double the tax of more costly goods. Cheap woollen or cotton goods are far more heavily taxed than the most expensive silks. If taxation is, in itself, a benefit then it may have been well to have measured out to the poor a double portion; but if it is not in itself a benefit, but a burden, a very different policy should be adopted. I have never, for one moment, doubted that any branch of industry might be stimulated by a sufficient bounty directly or indirectly given. But I have always contested the wisdom of undertaking to direct that which I believe is best left to the intelligence of our population. I do see serious dangers and difficulties in our road. I see that many branches of industry are approaching very closely to the line which separates prosperity from disaster. No one who has compared the manufactures of Canada with the manufactures of the United States, during the period of depression, can have failed to observe how many failures there was in that country, and how few there were here. The liabilities of those who failed of all classes in Canada, in 1875, were about $26,000,000; and if we leave out boot and shoe makers, who were practically without any foreign competition, the manufacturer did not fail for more than 2 per cent. of this amount. I will venture the prediction, if a matter in itself so certain can be called a prediction, that another crisis must produce a very different result. Why did our manufacturers pass so successfully through the last crisis? Because they have grown up to meet the requirements of the country. They adjusted themselves to the local needs of the population, and their productions in but few instances exceeded the minimum requirements of their customers. The variable complement was the foreign import. In 1878, our boot and shoe manufacturers supplied 91 per cent.; the woollen manufacturers, 85 per cent. in their own lines. Saddle and harness makers, 99 per cent.; carriage manufacturers, 99 per cent.; merchant tailors, 95 per cent.; the manufacturers of agricultural implements, at least 95 per cent. Now there is not much room left in those industries for expansion beyond what is afforded by the growth of the country in wealth and in population. I say, apart altogether from the question of injustice done by duties in excess of the public requirements, you are misdirecting the capital of the country. We have only to look at the Trade and Navigation Returns to see how much the purchasing power of the country varies. In 1873, our foreign trade amounted to nearly $218,000,000. In 1879, the most gloomy year since Confederation, it was $64,000,000 less. Now, there was a corresponding difference in our domestic and interprovincial trade; that is, a variation equal to 25 per cent. If we produce to the full extent of our market in years of prosperity, is it not evident that, in a year of depression, there must be great industrial disturbances? The number of employes in the more wealthier mills and factories will be diminished, and many of the weaker establishments will be closed. Is it nothing to have a large fixed population thrown out of employment? Is it nothing to have a large amount of capital, which, at frequently recurring intervals of time, is left wholly unproductive? Yet it is towards this destination we are hastily advancing, and the more apparent the success of the hon. gentleman's policy, the more certain is it that disaster must come. If our manufacturers had been allowed to obtain a safe foothold at home, if they had been allowed to manufacture under such favorable circumstances that they could have felt their way securely into foreign markets, then they would themselves, by crossing the frontier barriers, have protected their interests against the dangers of a contracted domestic market. I need not say more upon this point. We have no feeling of hostility to the manufacturing classes. We desire their prosperity, and we have marked out the line by which alone that prosperity can be made secure. We seek to promote the well-being of the whole people, and we adopt the policy which reason and experience alike demonstrate to be the necessary means to that end.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Pictou). This debate has gone on at such length that I had not intended to address any remarks to the House, but for some observations made by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Snowball) in reference to coal. His statements are so much at variance with the facts that I did not think I would be performing my duty if I did not challenge them. I refer, in the first place, to his observations with regard to the quality of Pictou coal. I thought that the quality of that coal was so well known and established throughout the country that no man would undertake to disparage it at this time of day. The hon. gentleman asserted that it was, generally speaking, of a bad quality, although in some exceptional cases it might be very fair. This statement is not borne out by the facts. If the hon. gentleman will only refer to the quotations of coal in the city of Montreal, where the largest purchases of Nova Scotia coal are made, he will find that Pictou coal—without any reference to any particular locality, or any particular mine in that county—is at a higher rate than any other produced in the Dominion. From actual experiments extending over ten days, with large quantities, and not from a single analysis, it was proven that Pictou coal was 10 per cent. better than Scotch coal; and in reference to the question of superiority, comparing the bituminous coal of Ohio with Pictou coal, I will read the testimony of a sea captain, who has had considerable experience in the business:

"MONTREAL, 2nd December, 1879.

"Mr. W. J. NELSON.

"DEAR SIR,—Referring to our conversation with regard to the comparative merits of Drummond and Ohio coals for steam purposes, I have no hesitation in saying that having used Ohio coal on board the steamer Filgate during the past season on Lake Ontario, I found that 40 to 50 per cent. more coal was required to give the same result that I obtain from Drummond coal furnished me for several years past by the Intercolonial Coal Company at Montreal.

"Yours truly,
"Captain S. FILGATE."

The observation made with regard to the quality of Nova Scotia coal was a most baseless slander on that great industry, and I was astonished that any gentleman should make such an assertion at this time of day. Perhaps I should not be astonished, however, because an hon. gentleman reminds me that it is in accordance with the policy of a good many hon. gentlemen opposite to decry the industries of their own country. That hon. gentleman also stated that the coal owners were leaning on the Government. Such might be true, Sir, of gentlemen engaged in producing slabs and deal ends, but there is no great industry in this country that has received less consideration at the hands of the Governments of this country than the coal industry. A great amount of capital is required to maintain this industry—the proprietors have to pay a large price for their mines, and heavy duties on every article used in their equipment. There is no class of people who pay more to support the services of this country than the people engaged in that trade—there is also a charge for a royalty of 10 cents a ton to the Local Government on the coal produced. The hon. gentleman also stated that the increase in the coal output from 1878 was only natural. Perhaps he meant to say that it was only natural that there should be an increase from 1878 to 1881, under the operation of the National Policy, as he might have said that it would be natural that there should be an increase in the deficit under hon. gentlemen opposite. The increase in the sales of coal between 1878 and 1881 amounted to 341,000 tons; and, only for the destruction of one of the largest collieries, which had an output of over 100,000 tons, the increase would have been fully 450,000 tons. The hon. gentleman also states that he cannot understand why the National Policy should have increased the export of coal to the West Indies. I think that fact is quite susceptible of explanation. We know that by the fostering of the sugar industries, our ships now carry coal to the West Indies as a return cargo for the sugar they bring back. The hon. gentleman also stated that the condition of the working classes had not improved. I can say, having lived in the coal district for the last ten years, that there has been an advance in wages, and that the condition of the working classes is 50 per cent. better than it was during the period the late Government were in power. I was particularly amused at the arguments of the hon. member for Richmond regarding the condition of the laborers in this industry, which were intended to show that the improvement in the coal trade had not been of any benefit to them. I think the hon. gentleman could not have credited the members of this House or the country with much intelligence if he expected them to believe that statement in the face of the fact that the produce of the mines had increased 50 per cent. I know that for a few years previous to 1878, the average employment was not more than four days a week, while now work is on full time; such a condition of things benefits not only the working men themselves, but all who are indirectly interested in the trade. The hon. member for Bothwell, I think, stated that the duty was imposed for the purpose of obtaining a higher price. I think the facts do not bear out that statement; the object in imposing the duty was not to give a higher price, but to afford a home market to that industry to a larger extent than before; and that object has been secured, much to the benefit of the people of this country, because the great mass of consumers obtain their coal cheaper than they would if these collieries were allowed to go down, which would have occurred to a large extent if the policy of the late Government had been continued. I did not rise for the purpose of making any lengthened remarks, but before I sit down I desire to show some of the effects of the National Policy upon the industry of the country. That policy has now been in operation three years, and we are able to judge by experience how far it has been beneficial in its operation, and how far it has fulfilled the expectations of its friends. No person has denied that it has fulfilled the expectations of its promoters in producing a revenue not only sufficient to carry on the affairs of the country, but to produce a surplus. A cry familiar to my ears some months ago was that we had no prosperity. That cry, I am happy to say, is getting played out; like many other cries, it has served its purpose, and must now pass away. I think, after the evidence which has been placed before this House, that statement will hardly be repeated in the country with any expectation of its being believed. Speaking of the county of Pictou, with which I am acquainted, I can say that there has been great progress in the industries of the county, and that that progress is largely due to the National Policy. A new woollen mill has been erected near Hopewell, with a capital of $30,000, and will soon be in operation for the manufacture of the finer quality of woollen goods. At Hopewell, another woollen mill has been enlarged, with a capital of $20,000; and I know that all the woollen mills of the country, of which there are many, are fully employed. When I had occasion, not many months ago, to pay them a visit, to get a large order which I had received from Halifax, filled, not one would undertake to fill it as they were all fully engaged. Notwithstanding that fact, there is no increase in the price of manufactured woollen goods to the consumer; the goods are of better quality than formerly, and, owing to the large production and the competition, they are quite as cheap, as a rule, if not a little cheaper, than before the imposition of the duty. I have heard a great outcry about the increased cost of blankets, in consequence of the duty of 45 per cent; but throughout my county blankets are furnished of better quality and at cheaper rates than before the duty was imposed. There are other new industries which have been started in that county, which but for the operation of this policy would not have been commenced. There is one in particular, that of the glass-works which now employ 125 men with a pay roll for wages of over $1,000 per week. There is a new factory erected, not quite in running order but it will be shortly, for the purpose of making car-springs, where it is intended eventually to employ about 300 hands. There are other industries which, under the operation of this Tariff have been largely extended, and I will give the House the opinion of the Eastern Chronicle, an authority which hon. gentlemen opposite will be glad to accept in cases of this kind, showing the progress in this single industry under the operation of the present fiscal policy, except for which they would have been unable to have carried on operations to the same extent. Speaking of the Nova Scotia Forge Company, that newspaper says:

"It is perhaps the most 'go ahead' iron manufacturing establishment in the county. In 1872, the present proprietors, Messrs. Graham Fraser and Forest McKay, started the 'spike factory' near the New Glasgow Station. From railway spikes they soon turned their attention to carriage springs and axles. In 1874, a steam hammer was added to the machinery of the shop, and they branched out into the production of car axles and ship's knees. About three years ago the present commodious factory was erected at Smelt Brook, and thus became the nucleus of what now bids fair to be the industrial centre of this county. The buildings, which cover some 4,000 square feet, are fitted up with the most improved machinery. Four steam hammers are in use the largest of which is a two ton double acting hammer, and is capable of forging very heavy shafting. Railway tracks run through the entire length of the building. The car axles and knees produced in this factory are made from scrap iron. Scrap is obtained from along the line of the Intercolonial, from Prince Edward Island and from wrecked steamships around the coast. The writer recently saw the hands employed in cutting up the scrap taken from the wreck of the ill-fated steamship Atlantic to be forged into car axles for the Canadian Pacific Railway, to be used in carrying the western bound pioneer to his home in Manitoba or the Saskatchewan. This Company employ about eighty men on the average, and the factory is kept running both night and day. The production of eighty car-axles is considered a fair day's work, which at 370 lbs. each, equals 4,440 tons per annum. This firm is also interested in the Nova Scotia Spring Works, now in course of erection at the same place."

Speaking of another industry, the Acadia Iron Foundry, the same newspaper says:

"Steam engines are constructed up to 250 horse power, and repairs to locomotives undertaken, their machinery being heavy enough to turn up the heaviest driving wheels. Fifty men are employed, and, for the greater part of the year, work is carried on both day and night. In the boiler shop the greatest activity prevails. A new set of boilers for the Scud were made there during the past season, one of the largest jobs of the kind ever turned out of any boiler shop in this Province. They obtain their raw material chiefly from Londonderry, and fill orders from all parts of the Dominion, but chiefly from the Lower Provinces. During the past six months their sales have amounted to about $38,000."

In addition to that testimony I can say that all manufacturing industries of the county are now fully engaged, whereas formerly they were languishing and in a very depressed condition. With respect to the coal question, the improvement in that industry is probably more marked than that of any industry in the Dominion. The sales of coal, in 1878, were 693,511 tons, which increased, in 1881, to 1,035,014 tons, being the largest on record. The hon. member for Richmond, N.S. (Mr. Flynn) stated that it had been equalled by the out-put in 1873. The hon. gentleman may have been correct as regards the out-put, but the sales were less by 150,000 tons. If that quantity of coal were produced and not sold it was lying on bank at a loss to the Company. 465 additional men were employed in 1881 over 1878; there were 183,705 additional days labour in 1881 over 1878. This improvement is due to the duty and to the National Policy generally—the stimulus given to manufacturing industries, and the protection afforded them in obtaining the home market. I know from those engaged in the trade they attribute their prosperity to those causes, and there are no gentlemen better qualified to judge of the causes than those engaged in the trade. They would be fools to insist on retaining a duty in the face of the uniform opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite, if it afforded them no benefit, and it is my opinion that, but for the protective shield thrown around them by the National Policy, half of those industries would have been extinguished by this time. As regards the question of wages, I think it will be found that wages have increased, and there has been a general improvement in the condition of all connected with the industry. In regard to the price of coal, the records will show that they have not been increased on account of the duty. No one will venture to say that prices in the Lower Provinces have been increased for that reason. In the Province of Quebec prices have not been increased, and no Province in the Dominion is more interested in retaining the duties than is Quebec from a consumers' standpoint, unless the collieries of the Lower Provinces be efficiently maintained it would be impossible for Quebec consumers along the St. Lawrence to secure their supply at anything like the moderate prices paid at the present time. What would be the position of affairs if they had now to depend on foreign importations for their supply. I am informed, on reliable authority, that the freights from Great Britain are from $3.75 to $5 per ton; add to that the price of the coal, and it will be found impossible that British coal can be landed at less than $5 or $6, whereas Lower Province coal can be obtained at least $1 cheaper. Of course, I know that in occasional years the condition of the market may be different, once perhaps in two, three or four years, owing to vessels coming out in ballast carrying coal at a mere nominal freight. That is such a disturbing element in this trade that it is sufficient to paralyse, in years of depression, those industries, and the imposition of a duty removes this difficulty, while on the whole it does not impose burdens on the consumers in the Province of Quebec. As regards the price in Ontario, I think the imposition of the duty has not imposed any undue burdens on consumers there, because, by means of the duty, Nova Scotia coal has become a competitor with American coal at a good many points in Ontario, and the moment that is the case, American coal companies reduce their prices in order to meet that competition. It may be true that, in the western section of Ontario, the price has been somewhat enhanced on account of the duty, but the people there cannot complain, they are in close proximity to the American lines, and are able to get their coal at a very cheap rate. It has been attempted to be shown that the competition of Nova Scotia coal has not reduced the price of American coal. To come to that conclusion we have to admit that competition in any branch will not reduce prices. Hon. gentlemen opposite argue eloquently on the effect of railway competition in reducing prices to competing points. The companies engaged in the coal trade in the United States are in many cases also engaged in railway traffic, and the principle that will hold good in the one case will hold equally good in the other. We know that Nova Scotia coal, notwithstanding the reduced price caused by competition, finds its way as far west as Cobourg. The arguments made use of by the hon. the Minister of Railways with reference to the prices of coal have not yet been refuted. In fact, scarcely an attempt has been made to refute them. The only denial made has been two statements from parties interested in the American coal trade. I do not know if hon. gentlemen opposite are in league with American coal proprietors, but their policy is in league with theirs. With regard to the price of coal at Buffalo, on the 1st of March it was quoted at $2.25, and on that day a contract was made at $2.65, ex-duty, being a difference of 60 cents between the price to the trade at Buffalo and the price at which sold for consumption in Canada, delivered at the International Bridge. I have said that the improvement in the coal trade is due to the National Policy, and has been obtained without imposing burthens on any section of the community. The proper method in discussing the coal duty is to consider its effects on the country as a whole. The duty has been opposed on account of its being a sectional tax. Those hon. gentlemen who opposed this duty which, after all, is really an ordinary revenue duty of 25 per cent. were not so sensitive in maintaining the protection of 150 per cent. on coal oil, an article of the same class as coal, so that it appears circumstances alter cases, and everything depends on where the sectional tax is imposed. The best test of the equality of a Tariff is the ability of a people to prosper under it. That has been eminently the case with the National Policy. There is no industry more deserving than the coal industry, of a fair and just treatment at the hands of any Government. It is an industry which dates back as far as 1785, and in which over $12,000,000 is invested. This industry has been treated more unfairly than any in Canada. I will explain briefly my reasons for saying so, and for holding that it is entitled to a protective duty. It obtained its greatest prosperity about the year 1865, when the markets of the United States were open to us. In that year we shipped to the United States 465,994 tons. The following year the United States Government imposed a duty of $1.25 per ton, which, in 1872, was reduced to 75 cents, but the result was that in 1879 only 51,645 tons were exported to the United States, or 8 per cent. of our entire sales, instead of 80 per cent as in 1865. The natural market of that industry was thus cut off, not through any want of energy of those engaged in it, but by the hostile legislation of a foreign country. The proprietors were compelled to seek new markets, and naturally turned to the Upper Provinces, but in consequence of the large quantities of coal that came out to the St. Lawrence in ballast, the efforts of our coal traders did not meet the success they deserved, and they only controlled that market in 1873 when coal was very high in Great Britain. In Ontario it was quite impossible to obtain an outlet, owing to the distance and the fact that American coal was allowed to come in free. There was not then, so far as I could see on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, a desire to deal fairly with this question. In order to obtain a home market, protection for this industry was sought by imposing on imported coal a duty which really did not amount to more than a duty for revenue. Yet that was refused by the late Government, it has been granted by the present, and with the results we have seen. It has been said that if the Reform party obtained power they would do justice to every industry in Canada. We think it much safer for the people to judge them by their acts than by their promises. We have seen what justice they extended to these industries, and I think that when the opportunity arrives, the people will show they know with what party their interests are safest. I will only refer in connection with this question to the policy of the Opposition enunciated by its leader during his visit to my constituency last summer. Amid the varying policies, however, propounded on that side, it is very difficult to know which to choose; but in the ordinary course of things it is safer to take that of the leader. On that occasion I listened attentively to ascertain his policy, when he said to the people: "your natural channels of trade are with the neighboring Republic; your exports will find their best market there, and your imports should come from there." Now, under such a policy as that, it would be impossible to restrict the importation of coal from the United States, or afford us any relief. It is a policy which I do not hesitate to say is inimical to our interests and subversive of the advantages that ought to flow from the Confederation of these Provinces, which was designed to establish inter-provincial trade; and especially inimical to mining interests from the fact that the industry was about being crushed out. It is inimical to the industries of this country, because it tends—owing to our peculiar position and the competition to which we are exposed, in meeting the cheap labor and larger capital of older countries, and the protective policy of the United States—to aggravate our weakness and difficulties. It is inimical to the permanence of any industry in this country, and will only tend to the exportation of the labor which should be employed in Canada to build up our own industries, and increase the wealth of our own country. But that is a policy which the hon. gentleman opposite would carry out on the first opportunity. That is the policy which the hon. member for Gloucester predicted would be approved by my constituents when appealed to. I think I am as well acquainted with the people of my county, and know their feelings probably as the honorable member for Gloucester, and I think that when the opportunity arrives the electors of Pictou County will pronounce a verdict which will not be so favorable to that policy as the hon. gentleman thinks. I believe the people are alive to their own interests, and when the time comes they will utterly repudiate and disown a policy so injurious to the interests of the country, and will sustain a policy of moderate protection to the home industries of Canada.

Mr. RICHÉY. If I venture to solicit the attention of the House for a short time, I am quite sure that I need not claim that it is not due to any selfish desire on my part to be heard in this debate, but simply to a sense of duty to the constituency I represent, owing to the course which this debate has taken, and to a sense of my duty to the Government which I am here to support. I recall to mind the fact that we were summoned for the despatch of business; and I remember that Bacon, who said that true despatch is a rich thing—for time is a measure of business, as money is of wares—also said that long and curious speeches are as fit for the despatch of business as a robe with a long train is for a race. But we have the same high authority for saying that although iterations are commonly loss of time, it is a gain of time to iterate frequently the true state of the question. I trust, therefore, I may be indulged if I attempt to iterate a true statement of the question, avoiding the endeavor to follow the hon. gentleman from Bothwell through all that historical narration in which he indulged, concerning the past history of hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches. I will confine myself to that particular point at present before the House, which I think has been well stated by my hon. friend who has just preceded me, when he said it was to consider whether, after the experience of three years of the National Policy, the predictions which were uttered by the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, have been fulfilled; whether our anticipations or their forebodings have been realized. I observed that the hon. gentlemen who have stood opposed to each other in this debate, have not always expressed the highest appreciation of each other. The hon. member for Bothwell chided us for our language. He informed us that vituperation neither added to the dignity of the hon. members who used it, nor to the dignity of the assembly addressed; and forthwith he proceeded by gentle insinuations to refer to hon. gentlemen on this side as owls and bats. I shall not follow that example. I desire to take a new departure and to recognize the ability and courage which have distinguished hon. gentlemen opposite, who have been the assailants of the National Policy. I think it required no little degree of courage to breast the flood of facts which the hon. the Finance Minister poured in upon the House. It required no small degree of ingenuity so to manipulate those facts and figures, if not to distort them, as to leave upon any candid mind the impression that the prosperity which this country now enjoys was, in no degree whatever, due to that policy. The course I intend to pursue is the very simple one of articulating some of the predictions uttered in 1879, when this Tariff was first brought down and passed into law, and appealing to the House to support me in the belief that these predictions have utterly failed. Among the objections which were urged, hon. gentlemen will remember, was this: that it was impossible the Tariff could produce the results expected from it, in the production of revenue and the protection of manufactures—that it must inevitably fail in one respect. That if it produced sufficient revenue it would not afford the required protection; and, if it afforded protection, it would not produce the revenue wanted. The answer to that prediction is found in the financial statements brought down from year to year by the hon. the Finance Minister—notably that which he has presented to us this year, in which, while he has been able to refer to millions of dollars of reserve, he has at the same time been able to show that the manufactures of this country were in a flourishing condition. He has been able to remove a million and a-half of taxation, and to sweep away entirely the duties on tea and coffee, and to grant the fishermen of the country the interest on that Fishery Award, which many of us had previously claimed on their behalf. He has been able also to refer to the prosperity of agriculture, a prosperity which, as hon. gentlemen opposite are not able to deny, they have attempted to refer entirely to the dispensation of Providence. Now, Sir, there are three providences to be considered in this connection. There is the Providence of the Supreme being, which was vouchsafed to those hon. gentlemen when they held office, as well as those who now control the Government. I find in the speeches of the Governor General of that time, words put into his mouth by his Ministers which recognized the bounty of Providence in that regard, in which he referred to the benefactions of Providence in the bounteous harvests which they enjoyed. But all these bounties of a beneficent Providence may fall short of their design if there be not superadded an intelligent Government and the providence of the people themselves. The hon. member for Centre Huron recognized this when he told the people of this country, and told them truly, that men could never grow rich by Acts of Parliament, but they must grow rich by frugality and hard work. But there was this to be considered, that their frugality was enforced, and their hard work was like that of the ancient

Israelites who worked for a Government which refused them straw. It was for want of providence on the part of the Government that those gentlemen failed, and it is by virtue of it that the gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches succeed. There was another prediction that those hon. gentlemen very much dwelt upon, that the Tariff would be hostile to England and calculated to irritate the United States. I will cite the words of some of the hon. gentlemen who spoke on that occasion. The hon. member for Centre Huron said the people of England were to find their manufactures excluded from their own colonies, and we were warned by him that we were exposing great and important industries in thus rashly throwing down the gauntlet to 44,000,000 of our best customers in the United States. The hon. member for Bothwell said this was making war upon the commerce of the United States; and the hon. member for South Brant said that with all their protestations of loyalty, this Government had enacted a Tariff which discriminated against Great Britain, and which struck at the tie which bound the people to the Mother Country. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) said if this Bill passed the last link which bound Canada to England would receive such a violent wrench, that nothing but the most skilful management would prevent us from drifting away from our moorings, and landing in the arms of the United States. Well, Sir, with regard to the United States, I trust that we may ever be able to maintain the most amicable relations with that great country. Sharing with them the possession of a continent, which certainly affords sufficient extent and resources for us both; animated by the same desire, to work out for ourselves, under God, and those bounties of nature which we possess, the highest destiny which we may attain; I trust that nothing but the most generous rivalry will ever characterize those two countries, as regards each other, but in that rivalry, I claim, we are at liberty to indulge. I conceive it alike dishonoring to the country to which the warning is addressed, and to the country, the terror of whose name is invoked, when we are told that we are not to pursue the fiscal policy which we believe to be for our benefit, because it may irritate a neighboring nation, whose pursuit of that policy, to their own advantage, and our detriment, may be alleged as the very raison d'être of the policy we are pursuing. With regard to England, I believe that but one sentiment animates the people of this country, that of loyalty to the Throne and admiration for the institutions of Britain, a desire, not to sever, but to strengthen, by every means in our power, the tie that binds us to the Mother Country. The question that concerns us now is, have we alienated the affections of England, or have we brought upon us that vindictiveness by the United States which was prophesied? Why, as regards our American neighbors, we have had greater indications of a desire to renew reciprocal relations with us. We have noticed in their press their congratulations upon the success of our policy; they have bought more goods from us during that period, while we have taken less from them. Now, with regard to this Tariff operating so as to injure our importations from England, I shall have to trouble the House with a few statistics. In 1878, we imported from Great Britain less than from the United States by over $11,000,000; in 1881, we imported from Great Britain more than from the United States by $6,879,686, so there was a change of our import trade, in favor of Great Britain within these years of over $18,000,000. We decreased in this time our imports from the United States, whilst we increased our exports to them. But there is one point to which I desire to direct attention, as presented in the speech of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). That hon. gentleman charged us with discriminating, under this Tariff, against England, because, upon the goods imported from England, the average duty, taking the whole imports, was larger than upon those imported from the United States. I do not know that I can put my hand upon the language which he employed, but he made a comparison, if I remember correctly, by which, upon dutiable goods, the difference amounted to 2 per cent., and, upon dutiable and free goods together, nearly 5 per cent. I noticed that that hon. gentleman made no comparison of years; he confined himself to the operation of the Tariff in 1881. He will excuse me, I am sure, if I suspected that the reason why he made no such comparison was because he could not do it with good effect. I, therefore, had the curiosity to make some enquiry myself into the figures regarding the different duties, and with what result, Sir? With this result, that whilst under this Tariff we increased the average duties against Great Britain by $2.91 in the hundred, we increased them against the United States by $5.54 in the hundred, showing a discrimination in favor of Great Britain of $2.63. If I go back to 1874, I find that the average duties were then heavier against Great Britain than against the United States by $5.70 in the hundred. Did the hon. gentlemen, who are now so jealous for the maintenance of our relations with Great Britain, decrease the average? No, they raised it so that, in 1878, the discrimination against Great Britain, having for its basis the average duties, was $7.37, so that their discrimination was more by $1.67 against Great Britain, taking the whole average on dutiable and free goods, than in 1874. Has this Government increased it? No. In 1881, the average discrimination was $4.70 on the hundred, or a reduction since 1878 by $2.67. That, therefore, is the position in which we stand as regards the charge of discrimination against Great Britain. The charge which these hon. gentlemen make is true as regards the positive average, but as regards the comparative average the charge is fully met and thrown back on the source from which it emanated. But we should take into consideration, as regards the averages of the past year, that they are largely to be accounted for from the fact of the expensive goods we are importing from Great Britain, and the low duties on many of the raw materials and other goods which we import from the United States. We find that on silks alone the importation has doubled. We imported, in 1878, $1,371,145 worth; in 1881, $2,589,569 worth; and the importation of these goods shows the extending wealth and the increasing prosperity of our country, for that duty, of course, is paid by the rich and those whose circumstances are improving. Then, we had another prediction, uttered by these hon. gentlemen opposite, that this Tariff was to destroy the character and credit of our country. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) asked "if the statements made by the hon. the Minister of Finance were not calculated to injure the credit, the character and the reputation of his country at home and abroad." I ask, Sir, if ever the credit of this country stood higher than it does to-day? If we compare the loans negotiated by the present Minister of Finance with those of his predecessor, if we look back upon the career of that predecessor when time after time he came down to Parliament with his deficits, and look at the position of our revenue now, we have at once an answer to those predictions of theirs which need no further comment. So far with regard to the generalities in which these hon. gentlemen indulged—the objections which they took to the general operation of the Tariff. But they did not rest in generalities. They descended to details. We were told that the Tariff was to rob the lumberman and annihilate his industry:

"We are to have the lumber interest, employing some 45,000 to 50,000 men with their families depending on them put in the greatest peril, because it is impossible to concede from the House that the imposition of 30 or 40 or 50 cents per 1,000 on the manufacture of lumber, will go very far to give that great industry its death-blow for the time being."

That was what the late hon. Finance Minister said. I need not dwell upon this question, because my hon. friend for North Renfrew (Mr. White) has so fully disposed of the whole argument and so ably discussed the matter, so far as it affects the lumbermen, that I think it is quite unnecessary to add anything to his remarks. I might, however, refer to the fact that whilst, in 1878, our exportation of lumber amounted to $19,511,575, in 1881 it amounted to $25,960,012, or an increase of nearly one-quarter. But this despoiling of the lumbermen was simply an example. The same hon. gentleman who used the language which I have just quoted, (the hon. member for Centre Huron, Sir Richard J. Cartwright) said that :

"They can understand from that illustration alone, how exceedingly trifling all the benefits which are proposed to be secured under this Tariff are, compared with the enormous mischiefs which will result from its operation. What is true of the lumber interest is true of the fishing interest, and of the transportation interest, and, as the agriculturists will find, true of their own interests also."

Sir, we can use that language to-day, but with a different signification. What is true of the lumbering interest is true of the fishing interest, is true of the transportation interest, and is true of the agricultural interest.

Mr. ANGLIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. RICHEY. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) considers, perhaps, that I am making a bold assertion. I suppose that the duty, therefore, will devolve upon me of proving it to some extent. An hon. friend—not of this Legislature, but a member of the Local Assembly (Mr. Harrington, Halifax)—whose conversancy with all those commercial questions and everything pertaining to fishermen, fully qualifies him to give the statement which I now quote from him, referring to the operation of the Tariff upon the interests of the fishermen, said :

"The fishermen of to-day were in a far better position than they were in 1878, when the so-called Reform party were in power, and this he would prove from statistics which could not be denied. Taking 1878 as the basis of comparison with the year 1881, it would be found that there had been the following increase in the price of fish: No. 3 mackerel, from $5 or $6 to $7 or $10; herring, from $3.50 to $4.25; codfish, from $3.25 to $4.25; hake, from $2 to $2.50; halibut, from $2.50 to $3; salmon, from $14, $12 or $10, according to quality, to $19, $17 or $15."

Mr. ANGLIN. What is the cause of the increased cost?

Mr. RICHEY. The increase in the price, no matter from what it comes, whether from Providential interposition or from short supply, does not affect in any degree the argument I am using, and which I will wish the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) to understand. If fishermen get the highest prices for fish and have no more to pay for the goods they consume, the Tariff has not operated to injure them. Then, as regards the prices of goods they consume :

"Prices have been reduced as follows: flour from $7 50 in 1878, to $7 in 1881; cornmeal was as cheap in 1881 as in 1878, despite what the hon. member for Victoria might say; molasses from 50 cents in 1878, to 45 cents in 1881; tea from 45 cents to 39 cents; sugar from 11 cents to 9 cents; boots from $3.50, $3.75 and $4 a pair, to $3, $3.25 and $3.80 for the same qualities; clothes were no dearer; blankets, unbleached cotton and so forth, were all the same price; felt hats which, in 1878, cost $1 and $1.25, were now sold at 60 cents and 75 cents. In fact, everything that entered into the consumption of the fisherman and his family was as low or lower in price in 1881 than in 1878, though they received much more for the fish."

They may have received much more for the fish, from circumstances which Providence only controlled, but the National Policy, as is alleged on the other side, does not seem to have added $6 to the taxation. Then, Sir, we ought not to forget that, under this Tariff, many articles which enter into consumption by the fishermen are entirely free from duty, such as twines and lines, salt, tar, pitch, and resin, and that the materials which they use for their sails has been put on the very low Tariff of 5 per cent. An argument has, no doubt, been formed in the minds of many people from the statement that the export of fish had to some extent decreased, not in 1881, because in that year there is an increase over 1880, but had decreased to 1880. The explanation of that is readily found in the fact that we have had a much larger home consumption—that fish which were formerly exported to the United States, and perhaps found their way through the United States back to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, now pass over the Intercolonial Railway to the Upper Provinces. It will be found that while it required only twelve cars to convey all the fish exported to the Upper Provinces in 1878, it required no less than 113 to convey them in 1881. With regard to the other allegation of the hon. member for Centre Huron, that the same statement as to the lumber interest would hold good as to the transportation interest, we have only to point to the change in the Intercolonial Railway. A deficit in the working of that railway of nearly $750,000 a year has been changed into a surplus; and what is true of the Intercolonial is true of the other railways, and of our shipping interests. According to hon. gentlemen opposite the shipping interest was to be one of those most materially affected by this policy; and it has been claimed by hon. gentlemen in this debate that their anticipations in that respect have been fully accomplished. The answer has been already given in the statement that steam vessels have largely supplanted sailing vessels on the sea. I have a statement, showing the remarkable increase of steam in the ocean-borne commerce of all nations, which was recently laid before the London Statistical Society, and which is referred to in a late number of the New York Shipping and Commercial List :

"In the foreign trade of Great Britain the entrances and clearances of steam vessels at the various ports of the Kingdom reached 37,000,000 tons in 1880 against 15,000,000 tons in 1870. In 1880, Great Britain had 3,000 less sailing vessels than in 1870, whilst in 1880 and 1881 wooden vessels disappeared from the Register at the rate of about one thousand vessels each year. The loss of British sailing tonnage from the Register during the last decade is estimated at about 750,000 tons, but this was replaced by an increase of 1,611,354 steamer tons, which is computed at nearly 5,000,000 of effective carrying power. Thus the steamer tonnage added to the British fleet since 1870 represents more effective carrying power than the whole British sailing fleet in that year."

We have the hon. member for Gloucester telling us, when desiring to make a point against the hon. Minister of Railways on the coal question, that for the first time in the history of St. John, fifteen or sixteen steam vessels had put in there for coal and for deals. That very fact is in itself an evidence of the extent to which steam vessels are being substituted for sailing vessels. But, Sir, I desire to turn the attention of the House to a statement of the hon. member for Bothwell, that there had been an increase in the shipping of Canada up to the time these hon. gentlemen surrendered the reins of power, and that the decrease since was owing to the operation of this Tariff. Let me call attention to the exact condition of the shipping of this country. In 1878-9, we had laden inwards 1,839,039 tons, and, in 1880-1, 2,398,539 tons; we had laden outwards, in 1878-9, 2,765,946 tons, and, in 1880-1, 3,697,024 tons, an increase of 931,078 tons. The total tonnage inwards decreased, under the Mackenzie Government, an average of 5,693 tons yearly, and in the five years under this Government it has increased at the rate of 491,712 tons; the total tonnage outwards increased only 13,331 tons per year, or 65,655 in five years under the Mackenzie Government. It increased under the present Government 1,032,362 tons in two years; an average of 516,181 tons yearly, or at nearly forty times the rate under the Mackenzie Government. The total tonnage inwards and outwards gave the following average annual increase:—Up to the end of 1873-74, 700,000; to 1878-79, 7,438; to 1880-81, 1,007,893 tons. I think I may ask whether that is not an answer to the allegations made as to the decrease under the present Government, while it was contended there was an increase under the late Government. In the coasting trade the increase of tonnage from 1878-79 to 1880-81 was, in steamers, 2,132,482 tons; sail, 917,601. Even in the matter of ship-building a point has been endeavored to be made in regard to the number of ships sold—that we have not sold as many as formerly. There is very little in that argument when it is considered that those who build ships might find it as profitable to hold them as to sell them under the improving condition of trade; but the fact is that from 1874 to 1878 the building of ships steadily declined. There was a decrease every year, the average rate being 19,254 tons, while in the past year, 1880-81, there has been an increase, small it is true, but still an increase of 10,000 tons. Then we were told “it would cripple all industries and force capital into less productive channels than it would seek if left to pursue its natural course, and it would prove absolutely disastrous to the country as a whole. It would stop the expansion of our manufactures.” Surely no man at the present day can contend that our manufactures have not increased rapidly, that they have not prospered under the operation of this Tariff. I think I might very fairly, after the remarkable manner in which those predictions have failed, appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite and ask them if they are not prepared to change their opinions and unite with the great party on this side of the House in going before the country and presenting before the world the spectacle of a united body determined to carry on the affairs of the country in harmony and with a single regard to the maintenance of its prosperity. I would not appeal to them without possessing some authority, for I might refer to the language of the hon. gentleman who long maintained the position of their leader in this House, who told us that when men ceased to change their opinions upon the great questions of the day they ceased to be fit to occupy the positions of representatives of the people. If that be true, I know of no opportunity that will be more particularly appropriate than the present to change their opinions and unite with us. I can conceive of none when they could more justly, in view of all the facts, unite with the Government of the day, giving in their adherence and allegiance and going to the country with us as a united body. However much I might indulge in that roseate view, I have little hope of their conversion. I am afraid they are wedded to their idols. But I have one prediction which I have reserved to the last, because the answer to it is only in process of evolution, and cannot be fully made until it is given by the people at the polls. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), said: “The mighty wave that rolled over the country on the 17th September last, and which floated himself (the hon. the Finance Minister) and his colleagues to the Treasury benches was gradually receding and the sober second thought of the people was beginning to assert itself.” If that hon. gentleman did me the honor to visit me in my home by the sea I might show him that the waves which gradually recede gather force and return with redoubled power upon the beach; and we have had during the past few years some opportunities of remarking the play of this popular wave. We have had many by-elections. It is true hon. gentlemen opposite won two seats from us. That might seem like a recession of the wave, but we gained six from them, and that seems like the wave returning with redoubled force, and I believe that all the signs of the times give token of a still greater demonstration of the feelings of the people when appealed to than was furnished by them in 1878. My only fear for the Government of the day, when the elections come and the returns are in, is, that they will lose strength for the want of the strengthening power of a strong Opposition. I am willing to confess that they have that now, an Opposition strong, if not in numbers yet strong in ability; if not in the ability necessary for the administration of affairs, yet in the ability required for criticism, and that is no small advantage to the country. Sir, if I had my own way I would feel very much disposed to stereotype the character of this Assembly. There are very few hon. gentlemen whose familiar faces I would wish to miss, but I very much fear when the returns are made if we could hear the song which will be sung by those hon. gentlemen we would catch the sad refrain:

“ Who will fill our vacant places;
Who our speeches speak to-night;
Fate, alas, has not restored us,
Seats in yonder spacious pile.”

It will be, Sir, a marvellous inconsistency if, with all the other predictions unfulfilled, this which I have last stated should be alone fulfilled; if the people of this country should sweep from power a Government under which they are prospering, only to place in authority those under whose administration they formerly sank into the deepest degree of depression.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. As it appears there is no other hon. member anxious to address the House before we go into Committee, I will ask the indulgence of hon. gentlemen present for a short time to review briefly some of the statements that have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I will do so briefly, both on account of the lateness of the hour, and also because nearly all of those statements have been answered satisfactorily, in my judgment, by hon. members on this side. But, Sir, I will also ask the indulgence of the House for a short time in referring to some matters of a somewhat personal character. My predecessor has, on former occasions, referred to myself in not very complimentary terms, but as my hon. colleague, the hon. Minister of Railways, has settled that account, I do not think it is necessary for me to reply. I find it difficult to realize how much our cause has suffered, how much the policy we are advocating has suffered by its unfortunately having fallen to my hands to present it to this House. If my hon. predecessor was not able, from the construction of my sentences and my ungrammatical expressions, to understand what I meant, and if I am to judge by the way in which they were received by the House, and, according to the statements of the press, since received by the country, though presented in an imperfect manner, I can realize what would have been the position of our case if it had been placed in the hands of an educated gentleman like my hon. predecessor who could have so constructed his sentences that the country could have understood it far more clearly and fully than from my mode of stating our case. There is another matter of a somewhat personal character to which I may allude. I have noticed, and other hon. gentlemen have noticed that during the last three or four years, Session after Session, some of my hon. friends from my own Province, though most of them very young politicians, seem to have made it the great ambition of their lives, on coming here, to make speeches that would damage me in my own Province by presenting me as neglecting its interests. Though I have been thirty years and more in public life, and have had, as a general rule, the confidence and support, not only of my constituents but my Province; these gentlemen who come here for the first time, unfledged politicians—you can see the pin feathers sticking out as they flutter their wings and attempt to crow—find it desirable to attack me personally. That may be right. I do not mind it. When I first entered public life I was somewhat sensitive on these points; but I recollected hearing some time later a statement made by an eminent man, that has often reconciled me to a good deal of abuse, and which, were I to accept it as applicable to myself, would be most flattering to me. The statement is this: that “abuse is the tribute which envy pays to worth.” Though I felt that in many cases I could not apply this to myself, still there was comfort and satisfaction in knowing that if a man is worth anything at all he is considered worthy to be abused. On the other hand, I have had a great many things said in my favor which I did not deserve. Therefore, I have not any great ground of complaint, and consider the account about balanced. But I was subject to a new scrutiny on the present occasion. The hon. member for Brant, not content with refuting my political views, went into a careful analysis of my costume. As my hon. friend was speaking on that subject, I was reminded of a circumstance that I saw narrated with reference to the early political life of the late President Lincoln. I read it just after his successful contest as a candidate for President of the United States. It appeared that that gentleman was brought into notoriety in his own State by the very warm and animated contest that took place between him and a Mr. Douglass for the position of Senator. The two candidates visited the different parts of the State together for the purpose of addressing the electors. On one occasion they arrived in a most westerly and newly-settled portion where the electors were not of the most intelligent character and not much versed in the political issues of the day. They mustered, dressed in the wool hat and red shirt, and Mr. Douglass came to the conclusion that to discuss protective tariffs and ad valorem duties would not be the course to take there, so he thought he would excite their democratic prejudices. So in order to impress these people unfavorably towards Mr. Lincoln, who was a tall, erect, military-looking gentleman, he said that a man of Mr. Lincoln's aristocratic, English carriage and bearing could not have much sympathy for the masses. Well, after he had got through, Mr. Lincoln turned the tables upon him by saying that his friend Douglass had referred to his English carriage. "Well," said he, "I recollect very well that my father, when he left Kentucky, had an old English carriage and brought it into this State. I have not seen that carriage for years, but the last time I saw it my father had converted it into a hen roost, and how Douglass could have known anything about that, unless he had been around that hen roost at night, is a mystery to me." It is not many nights since a member of my family was disturbed by a party seeking to obtain admission to my house through my coal cellar. I hope it was not my hon. friend from Brant endeavoring to find out what kind of coal I had in my cellar, or of what my wardrobe consisted. There was another role taken by my predecessor, the ex-Finance Minister, and that was with reference to the new system of appointments and promotions in the Departments of the Civil Service, referring to certain members who were said to have a great many relatives in the Civil Service. It so happens, and I am proud of it, that my ancestors were U. E. loyalists who came to New Brunswick in 1783. On both my father and mother's side they had very large families—on both sides twenty-two children—and you may imagine, Mr. Speaker, that, commencing with that number and descending down to the present day through four generations, there are few men in New Brunswick who have as many relatives as myself; and still, notwithstanding that I have been thirty years in public life and twenty years a member of the Government, I challenge any public man who has been half the time in public life or in the Government, with the same number of relatives, or anything like that proportion, to find fewer of them than I have in the Public Service. It so happened, however, that in the Department of which I am head—that is a case that has been referred to—that a gentleman was taken from a first-class clerkship who happened to have married my wife's sister, not a deceased wife's sister. That gentleman had been a number of years a first-class clerk, and it was found necessary, for the security of the public, that we should adopt a new principle with reference to our circulation. That gentleman had been twelve years in the British North America Bank and in a bank in British Columbia, and, as I said, was a first-class clerk, with but one senior, in that class, and the man best qualified to take charge of the work. Consequently he was promoted from that office on account of his qualifications. Still we are told here and throughout the country that this is a new system adopted, this promotion of our relatives. It would be a new policy, to keep from a Civil Servant his promotion because he was a relation of a Minister. Let me come to another point of a somewhat personal character. How often has it been stated on the floor of the House, since I have become head of the Financial Department, and since Parliament has adopted the policy of the Government in the shape of the Tariff of 1879, that I have changed my politics on this question of Protection? I would venture to say, from the fact that I have never thought it necessary to call the attention of the House to the fallacy of that statement, that there are many hon. members on both sides who think that I was, till 1878 or 1879, what is called a free trader. It is just as well to take a few moments to dispose of this matter, and I will say that I hold in my hands the Tariff of New Brunswick for 1851. I was first nominated for St. John, N.B., by the protectionists, in 1850. The Provincial Governments did not frame the Tariffs then; they were framed by members from each county appointed for that special purpose. We, in the city and county of St. John were then working for two objects: first, to defeat the Government, and, next, to carry out the principle of protection; and in 1851, the first Session I had a seat in the Local Legislature, the Committee brought down a report with propositions that were stronger in protectionist principles than our Canadian Policy of to-day. I think I then voted for every one of those propositions except one. Allow me to read a few of the items of that Provincial Tariff. As to narrow axes, which we were making at that time, what did we do? We imposed 1s. 6d. on every axe—25 per cent. or upwards; and on peas and beans, 1s. 6d. a bushel; barley, 6d., or 10 cents a bushel; barley meal, 100 lbs., 40 cents; buckwheat, 10 cents per bushel; buckwheat meal, 100 lbs., 50 cents; clock or clock cases of all kinds, 5s.; coals per ton, 1s., or 20 cents; on fresh meats, 9s. 4d. per cwt.; on oats, 3d.; oatmeal, per barrel, 2s. 4d.; rye, per bushel, 2d.; rye flour, per barrel, 1s.; wheat, per bushel, 2d.; wheat flour, per barrel, 3s., or 60 cents. The unenumerated articles paid £1 10s. or 7½ per cent.; and on iron castings, cooking, box and other stoves, and iron frames made in the country, 15 per cent.; on boots, shoes and other leather manufactures 20 per cent., chairs and prepared parts of chairs, protection was afforded; and carriages, waggon, sleighs and other vehicles and mouldings, 30 per cent. Those were the articles we made in the Province at that time. It is quite true that, in 1854, when the Reciprocity Treaty was established, and when all the natural products of the two countries were exchanged free, there was a change with regard to those duties, because many of these articles came in free. But, in 1855, the Government of which I was a member, formed in 1854, for the first time in the history of New Brunswick, brought down a Tariff; and as I held in that Province a similar position to what I hold to-day it devolved on me, in conjunction with my colleagues, to frame the first Tariff ever prepared or submitted by the Government of New Brunswick. In that Tariff there was a clear and definite distinction drawn between the articles made and the articles not made in the country, and down to the time of the Union 15 per cent. was the average on the unenumerated articles, and on New Brunswick manufactures from 18 to 25 per cent., that is, the articles made in the country. That was a policy in operation in the various Tariffs introduced by myself and colleagues into that Legislature. Then, when we came here, what was our attitude? From 1867 till the end of the war in the United States, we adopted a Tariff that was protective, considering the state of things in the United States, though we did not collect on unenumerated articles more than 15 per cent; but on certain other articles made there was a distinction, and that continued till 1873. It will be remembered perfectly well by members in this House who were members in 1873—when things were changed in the United States, when members of this House and persons elsewhere signified their feelings, in the elections of 1872—that a feeling was manifested throughout the country, owing to the change in the condition of labor in the United States and the then condition of their manufactures, that some protection was necessary in Canada, so much so that when I was Finance Minister in 1873 Members of Parliament waited on myself and the Government asking for a change in its policy. My predecessor, the late hon. Finance Minister, is not here; but I may say that he called upon me with one of his constituents and urged that we should impose a duty upon manufactured dye stuffs, upon the ground that dye stuff was manufactured in Napanee. Now, what is the fact? In 1873, when I made my financial statement, it will be within the memory of many members present that I then stated that the Government had representations made to them by gentlemen connected with the various manufacturing industries of the country, and that we recognized that the day was not far distant when these applications would have to be met with a favorable response. I said: "As we will have during the current year revenue enough for existing purposes, we shall postpone that matter till next Session." Hon. members will remember that, and it was indicated very clearly that as we would require more revenue, and as circumstances had changed in the United States, it was becoming evident that it would soon be necessary, in order to protect our industries, to give them more consideration than they had in the past. I did not hesitate to say that such was the deliberate conclusion to which the Government had arrived in 1873, and I will say to Parliament that if they had been in power when Parliament met in 1874 that policy would have been adopted and presented to this House, giving increased consideration to the manufactures of the country. I was anxious that we should have a renewal of the treaty in force from 1854 down to 1866, with reference to the natural productions of the country. Placed as we were then, we were prepared to accept that proposition and prepared to meet them more than half way; and that declaration was put upon record in 1879 when we asked for these changes in the Tariff. But in the absence of any such concessions being made to us the Government felt in 1878, when we came back to office, that the interest of the country demanded that we should give more consideration to the manufacturing industries than we had formerly. I make this statement because it has been said that I was a free trader. The other day it was stated here that one of my colleagues running for the city and county of St. John, in 1878, made a statement in my presence—and my not contradicting it, I therefore accepted it—that we deluded the people in leading them to suppose that we would not impose a duty on flour or coal, or various other articles, and that we gained the vote on that occasion under false pretences. I would ask the hon. gentleman from the city and county of St. John, whether there was any mistake as to our policy on that subject? I will ask him, if he and his colleague, a day or two before the election, did not send a circular to the electors, pointing out to them what would be the result of our election: that it would be to impose increased duties on the people's flour, that they would pay a dollar or two dollars a barrel more than at that time on what they would consume, and that they sent that circular over their own signature?

Sir LEONARD PILLER.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. Minister of Finance stated that he would vote against a duty on flour, and we asserted, and correctly as it turned out, that he intended, if he got into power again, to put a duty on flour.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I stated that if I had been in the House when this proposition came up, I would have voted against a duty on those articles separately. These gentlemen made the statement emphatically that we would revise the Tariff so as to give protection to the industries of the country. That is what we said; and it has been said here, and my remark has been quoted, that it was a simple readjustment of the Tariff we intended to make. When Sir John A. Macdonald was asked if he intended to impose a 35 per cent. Tariff? He said: "No; the people have been misled," and Sir John A. Macdonald was perfectly justified in making such a statement. The Tariff, as it stands to-day, with a large part of the breadstuffs imported now from Ontario, is a Tariff of 20 per cent. upon the whole imports. It has simply been a readjustment of the Tariff and an increase of taxation to meet deficits, and for the practical reduction of the debt. If the statement of my hon. predecessor had been reliable, if his estimate had been correct, that 2½ per cent. additional would raise $13,750,000 instead of $12,000,000, there would have been no necessity for an increase of taxation; but we had to come here and ask for a change in the Tariff that would enable us to raise about $2,500,000 more to maintain the credit of the country and change the deficits to surpluses. My hon. friend from the city of St. John (Mr. Burpee), in his speech yesterday, said the people of this Dominion must have been surprised when I declared that the taxation we imposed upon them last year was voluntarily paid by the people. No such statement was made by me that the people voluntarily paid this $18,000,000. I was saying that in the last year the people paid $2,000,000 more than estimated, but I said this large surplus was voluntarily paid, because the people purchased items of luxury, such as silks, satins, wines and other like beverages that were not necessities of life; that, owing to their improved condition, they had largely increased the consumption of these articles, thereby increasing the revenue on these items alone $750,000, as compared with the year previous; therefore I said they have paid it voluntarily in contradistinction to the duties raised on the necessities of life. That is correct, and cannot be gainsaid. Now, with reference to the discussion that has been going on here: It has been said that the Maritime Provinces, and especially New Brunswick, have, under this Tariff, paid a great deal more than their share. I want to make a statement here; I wish to do it deliberately; I wish every word to be carefully reported, and I ask the hon. gentlemen opposite, when it is reported, to take it up and consider it and upset it if they can. I am sure hon. members of this House will pardon me for referring to the Province of New Brunswick when they recollect the way I have been attacked here as sacrificing the interests of my native Province by bringing it into the Confederation, by agreeing to the terms then accepted, and then by sanctioning and introducing into Parliament a policy that had increased, unfairly, it is alleged, the taxes of the people of that Province. I wish to state my case, and it is this: If we estimate the revenue that would have been collected from the population of New Brunswick to-day, by the per capita taxation for Customs previous to Union, that is, if they paid $2.75 or $3 per head in 1866, and if you apply that rate to the present population, I state this, that in the sum we handed to them this year and the sum that we will hand to them next year—that is, on the payments made to them—either on the interest of the debt we as a Dominion assumed or the direct subsidy paid to them for local purposes, one will cover the other. Now, I will repeat that, if the people of New Brunswick were paying per head of their present population what they paid before the Union, in the shape of Customs duties, to-day they get back every cent of it in interest that is paid by the Dominion into the Treasury of the Local Government for its maintenance. I go further. I state this also: that the Local Legislature has, since Confederation, expended a million of dollars in subsidies to railways in that Province. They have given of their lands 1,600,000 acres towards the construction of railways. That has necessarily reduced their income. The Government of the Dominion have constructed, since Confederation, at the expense of the Dominion in New Brunswick, 250 miles of railway. What is more, that Legislature voted a few days ago, or are now voting for their local purposes, such as their roads, bridges and education, more money per head of their present population than was voted before the Union took place, and they show by their statements that they have money enough to do it. I hear some one say: "But you collect more from them than you did before the Union." I admit it; and the question has arisen over and over again as to the exact amount the people of New Brunswick pay directly or indirectly into the Treasury, either through our officials in that Province or on goods imported from other Provinces. I have heard various calculations and statements made here to show that a very large sum over and above what is shown as received from that Province is received indirectly. One of the modes of proving this is by showing that before Union we had a larger amount of imports than we have had since. Well, admit that; but before we entered into Union we had no distilleries in that country and all our spirits were imported. This, instead of appearing in our Customs receipts appears in our Excise receipts; this item is of itself half a million of dollars a year. Then what was the course of trade previous? Prince Edward Island brought nearly all its supplies from Halifax or St. John, and the goods consumed in Prince Edward Island before Confederation appeared to a very large extent as imports in both Provinces, and exports as well. There is a large increase of inter-provincial trade, apart from our trade with Old Canada, that is absorbed and not reported at all. But I think the fair way to look at this, is as I stated—and it has not been contradicted except by the ex-Minister of Customs, the hon. member for the county of St. John (Mr. Burpee), who based his calculations on the taxation of the people on revenues collected during the five years they were in power. That was not a fair way. I showed during the time they were in power they would have had to tax the then population $4.88, and in our time $4.66 or $4.65, and therefore I took this basis of my calculation that the people of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia consumed just about as many goods as the people of Ontario and Quebec per head. Therefore, though we collected 87½ cents less in the last two years than Ontario and Quebec paid, I am willing to accept as the scale $4.88 or $4.65, though we did not show we paid that by $1 a head. Take that difference between what was collected in New Brunswick per head previous to Confederation, and that calculation of the taxes from 1874 to 1878, and from 1878 to 1881; then, taking the Estimates that are on the Table, the House would see that New Brunswick gets back every dollar for local expenditure that is in excess of the sum collected from them before Confederation. I challenge the hon. member for Gloucester to discover any fallacy in that statement, which I am prepared to prove by facts and figures. Whatever may have been the effect of Confederation I am satisfied that the people of New Brunswick, my native province, are in a better position with reference to taxation to-day that they were before that Union took place; and every year as we go on prospering, as we will in the Dominion of Canada, under this policy, which is the only policy for the country, although efforts have been made to belittle it in various ways—every year the position of the people of New Brunswick will continue to improve. In New Brunswick we were slower in feeling the full effect of the return of prosperity, because in St. John we lost $20,000,000 by the fire in 1877, and we have not recovered from that yet. If it had not been for that they would have been in a position to compare with other Provinces, because the people of St. John were emphatically a manufacturing people. In 1850 the voters of St. John elected candidates upon this policy, and undertook to establish manufactories there; and if they had had the means at their disposal they would have stood equal to any manufacturing centre in any portion of Canada. I feel that to the end of my days, and my children after me will be able to say that Confederation has not been an injury to New Brunswick, but a blessing which will, I am satisfied, be realized more and more every year, and the time will speedily come when there will not be a man who will not feel that they are part and parcel of a country that it is not only their interest to be a member of, but that they will have a just pride in claiming. Now, Sir, I have listened with a great deal of care and a great deal of attention to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite. I missed a portion of the hon. member for Gloucester's (Mr. Anglin) speech but I have read it since. I have either heard or read all the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite; and to say that their case has been ably presented would do them no more than justice. I doubt whether hon. gentlemen behind me would have been able, had we had their case, to have presented it more plausibly. I feel, however, that the statements made on this side of the House have not been answered. There has been no attempt made to answer them; and I will point out briefly the fallacies in some of the statements made by hon. gentlemen. A word or two with reference to the question of loans. I was a good deal surprised that the leader of the late Government should have stated that I had attacked and abused the late Government. In order to vindicate the Government from charges made by the Opposition, it was necessary that I should draw contrasts; but there was not a single expression which fell from my lips which was not strictly parliamentary. I avoided as far as possible, though I can say severe things when necessary, anything of the kind. I do not think there is much to be gained by that. My object is always to induce men to listen dispassionately to me, because if a man's passions are excited you cannot get at his reasoning very well. Reference was made to a loan floated by my predecessor in 1874, and my predecessor said that loan was placed on the market just as Sir John Rose had placed a loan, and just as Sir Francis Hincks had placed a loan. The hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) repeated it, and I asked him when Sir Francis Hincks floated a loan? I knew of no such loan. The distinction between that loan and the loans that we floated previous and since is this. The hon. member for Middlesex said that the rule was to put in a minimum, to name a minimum. The rule down to 1873 was this: when you placed a loan on the market you placed a sealed minimum in the hands of your agents, so that if there was not a sufficient amount tendered you were not bound to take anything below that sealed minimum. Subsequently the gentlemen who manage these loans in London, and who understand their own interest very well, had an order made by which that minimum should not be a sealed but an open minimum. But there was this distinction between the loan floated in 1874 and the loans made since, which was that the open minimum was not fixed as the rate at which the loan should be sold, but a fixed price made at which the loan would be given; and the real cause of complaint was that three times as much was tendered for as sold, and it was not distributed equally to the parties tendering. Now, with reference to the surplus. There is no exception to the statement I made with reference to the surplus of last year. With reference to the surplus for next year, I may say that I think from the returns made since I made my Budget Speech, that it will exceed the sum I named. With reference to the debt, there has been no exception taken. It showed the position we occupied to-day, our condition at the time of the Union, and what our condition would probably be in 1890, when this road was finished. I did not say who had incurred this debt that has come up since. The late leader of the Government, I think, said that the only additional debt for which the late Government was responsible was the construction of the St. Peter's Canal. Another hon. gentleman has stated, I think, that the debt for which the late Administration was responsible, did not exceed $200,000. The House will pardon me if I call attention to that point. It has been answered to some extent, but not fully, and I have the figures before me here. According to the Public Accounts, the increase of the debt between 1874 and 1879, that is from 1st July, 1874, to 1st July, 1879, was $39,146,105; payments out of sinking fund, during that period. But when we are striking balances of the net debt, the sinking fund is taken into account, and, therefore, in making the statement as to the increase of debt between the two periods, we have to add for sinking fund, $4,190,064, making payments made in the five years in excess of receipts, $43,336,169. In addition to this there were expenditures made by the late Government under contracts let by their predecessors and previous to November, 1873, $3,651,354; expended on the Intercolonial Railway, which, of course, they were bound to expend under the contract, $6,560,227; and expenditure upon the Pacific Railway from July, 1874, to July, 1879, $11,173,165, making a total of $21,384,746.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). What about the canals?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This contains every item of expenditure that was contracted for. There were tenders accepted for the canals, but these were abandoned and new tenders were asked for, and, therefore, I hold that the late Government were responsible for the expenditures made under these circumstances. Therefore there was an increase of debt in excess of these expenditures during the period I have named of $21,951,423. It is true, it has been said that these gentlemen were under obligation to expend certain sums of money because we had agreed to do it; but after taking the expenditures made under contracts previous to November, 1873, and the sums expended on the Intercolonial Railway and the Pacific Railway, a very large sum is left that they might have escaped spending if they had felt it in the interest of the country to do so. Now, Sir, we come to the question of expenditure during the two years that the present Government have had entire control of financial affairs, as compared with the previous five years. I undertook to show that the expenditure per head of the population was less during the last two years than it was during the five years previous. That has been questioned; but upon what ground? It was stated that during one year, that is, the year 1878, reductions were made in the expenditure by our predecessors, which resulted in showing a much less expenditure per head of the population during that year than the average of the past two years. But, Sir, is that a fair way to test the question for the people of this country? Certainly not. It is not fair to test the conduct of an Administration by its expenditure just before it goes to the people; because in the last Session, the repentant Session, in order to make a good showing to the country, they reduced certain expenditures. The fair way is to take the five years of Administration for which these gentlemen were responsible, and to compare them with the two years for which the present Government are responsible; and if you do that you will find that, as I stated before, the taxation per capita of the population was less during the two last years than it was during the five preceding years. But, Sir, the late leader of the Government undertook to show that after deducting extraordinary expenses, there had been a very large reduction in the expenditure during the Administration of his Government. And how did he undertake to prove it? Why, he deducted certain expenditures made in 1877-78 that were not made in 1873-74. If we take from 1873-74 the expenditures that were not made in the year previous, we shall find the following charges: For railway management, and which should have been charged and was intended to have been charged originally to capital, $567,000; return duties paid to a company which, I think ought not to have been paid, $69,300; election expenses for which we were not responsible, $200,000; and other appropriations, making between $800,000 and $900,000 altogether in that year for which we were not responsible. The reductions in 1877-78, as compared with 1873-74, were as follows: Militia, $359,000; Dominion affairs, $200,000; militia stores, $144,000; boundary survey, $35,000. The expenditures for Dominion lands were reduced by $196,000; the lighthouses and coast service, $38,000, by diminishing the number of lighthouses that were being constructed; immigration, $138,000; Mounted Police, $46,000; the culling of timber, $33,000; amounting in all to $2,930,100 less for 1877-78 as compared with 1873-74; and, deducting $836,000 that was charged to railway management, and that should not have been so charged, and for which we were not responsible, it makes the difference in expenditures between those two periods, $2,093,000. If you deduct that from the expenditure of that year, for the purpose of comparison with 1873-74, it will appear that the expenditure for that year, supposing we were responsible for it, was less than the expenditure for 1877-78. Under those circumstances, though a great effort was made at that time to reduce the expenditure, we must hold the late Government responsible for the average expenditures during the years they were in power, and in those years the average expenditure reached from 20 cents to 23 cents more per head of the then population than we expended in 1879, 1880 and 1881.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). The statement made by the hon. gentleman, a moment ago, was that the Government of which he was Finance Minister in 1873, were not responsible for the obligations in connection with the canals. I will read a short quotation from his Budget Speech of that year. It is as follows:—

"We are, however, entering upon new and increased engagements, involving a very large sum of money. We are entering upon works—we have already done so—which will require a large increase of our debt. We have $10,000,000 to expend on the Intercolonial Railway. We have $30,000,000 for the Canadian Pacific, and the canal system that has been accepted by the Government will involve an expenditure of, at least, $20,000,000. These are serious matters, inasmuch as they add $60,000,000 to our existing debt."

The hon. gentleman, therefore, distinctly stated that he accepted the canal system.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We accepted it; but what did hon. gentlemen opposite do? They did not accept the tenders which had been received by their predecessors, but they invited new tenders. Upon whom then did the responsibility rest? I am not complaining, but I am making the statement that hon. gentlemen opposite increased the debt $21,951,000 during the period they were in office. It was argued by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), I believe, that I should not have compared the imports and exports of 1877-78 as regards trade with Great Britain and the United States; but that I should have taken the five years previous.

Mr. ANGLIN. I pointed out this fact, that in comparing imports and exports, the hon. Finance Minister took one group of five years for one and another group of five years for the other; I did not take the same group in each case.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not do that. What I did was this: I took the year 1877-78 and compared it with last year, because the amounts were nearer than at any other period. But I might with perfect safety have taken the average of the five years previous, and it would have shown that in one case—the imports from Great Britain—there was an increase of $1,700,000, and from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 decrease of imports from the United States. I only selected the particular year to which I referred because it was nearer in amount of imports than any other year. If you take those five years, it will be found that though the imports were greater from Great Britain in 1874, 1875 and 1876 than from the United States, there was a greater decrease last year as regards imports from the United States. It will be found that the effect of the present Tariff has been not to decrease, as has been stated, trade with Great Britain as compared with the United States, but to decrease largely the imports from the latter country. The late hon. Finance Minister declared that by this Tariff $7,000,000 additional taxation would be placed on the people, while we would receive but $2,000,000 additional revenue.

Mr. ANGLIN. The statement made by the ex-Minister of Customs was distinctly this: that according to his calculation, the present Tariff, applied to the imports of 1878, showed an increased taxation to the extent of nearly $7,000,000, and as the Finance Minister, in his Estimates, had assumed he would receive only $2,000,000 additional, the other $5,000,000 must necessarily go into the pockets of the manufacturers.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If my memory serves me right the statement was not made in that way. The hon. member took up the different items and said that, applying the present Tariff to the imports of last year, the result would be that \$5,000,000 would go into the pockets of the manufacturers. But when we are able to show that \$5,000,000 have gone into the Treasury, and that the goods, in almost all cases, are supplied to the consumer at nearly the same rate as before, the argument of the hon. member falls to the ground. Whatever may be the opinion of the hon. gentleman with reference to the operation of this Tariff, I think that after having listened carefully to the discussion that has taken place, we must admit that all the arguments have been on the side of the National Policy. The ex-Minister of Customs stated that the fishermen under the operation of this Tariff—and I can quite understand the object he had in making that statement—paid \$6 per head, or \$500,000 more into the Treasury than formerly, and that this \$150,000 to be given as a subsidy or bonus to the fishermen was only giving them back practically one-third of the amount taken from them by the operation of this Tariff. It so happens that there is no evidence either in the public records or the Trade or Customs Returns to show that the fishermen paid anything, or scarcely anything, more than they did under the old Tariff. We find that in Nova Scotia during the last two years, as compared with the average of the five years previous, the average amount of duty paid was only $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. increase, while the increase of the population was 7 per cent. If the fishermen of Nova Scotia paid \$250,000, where is it shown in the Public Accounts or Trade Returns? It is shown that the average payment for Customs during the last two years is but \$70,000 in excess of the five previous years, or an increase of 5 per cent., and that the increase of the population is 7 per cent. If that be the case, how could it be possible for the fishermen of Nova Scotia who have not, as a whole, paid more per head than they did in 1879-80, to pay \$250,000 alone more than they paid before? What did they pay it on? A statement has been read by an hon. member behind me to-night to show that the prices of certain articles used by the fishermen are as cheap as before, and tea and molasses cheaper. Except 10 cents per barrel additional on flour, and the duty on corn meal, you have no items to make up an increase. On the contrary, it would appear to me from the returns that owing to the articles used in the fisheries being admitted free, the fishermen pay but a very slight increase. When we ask Parliament to give \$150,000, it is not in return for any increased taxation, but to put the fishermen in the position they would occupy if they were without competitors in their own waters, and for which we have received the award of \$4,500,000. From whatever standpoint you view this question, the National Policy stands to-day stronger in the confidence of the people than it did two years ago, and whenever an appeal may be made to the people I am satisfied they will heartily endorse it. Statements have been made to show that our estimates of the increase of population and increased wages are not correct. I brought down a statement placed in my hands by the Commission that was appointed, and which visited only a portion of the manufactures of the Dominion, showing that there were 95 additional factories, that is but a portion of the increase. The hon. Minister of Public Works has a statement showing, from returns made in the different constituencies, that the new manufactures number 140 instead of 95. But I simply use a partial return, showing the new industries in the Dominion that have been developed. They have used that return to prove that this policy has done but little, comparatively, towards increasing those industries, knowing that they only represent a portion. My estimate of increase was 17 in old factories, from which it will be found that the number of persons employed is largely in excess of that three years ago—that they are more profitably employed, and are working full time, though they worked only part time before. And when we look at the confidence felt in the country to-day as compared with the feeling at that time—when we recognize that the great bulk of the people understand and appreciate, that in those hundreds of new industries, you have not all the result—for if you were to wipe out every new one, there is such an improvement of the old in the amount of work done and wages paid, and in the amount of comfort enjoyed by the operatives, as to vindicate our policy, but take the two items together, and you will see there is an amount of confidence in the country not witnessed before. The hon. member for Bothwell said, a few hours ago, that by-and-bye there would be depression of trade and great loss to the manufacturing industries when the reaction took place. Well, notwithstanding such predictions, there is confidence on the part of the men who have put their capital into these industries. But his own prediction affords an answer to hon. gentlemen opposite, who say that we are making millionaires of the manufacturers. He says these men are to be ruined by the competition when the change takes place. But with the opening up of new markets for our manufacturers, they amounted to over \$5,000,000 last year in Manitoba alone. With such rapid increase, there is a confidence to-day with the manufacturers of the Dominion that has not been previously felt, because they see that this great North-West country is not only to be opened up, but populated, and that there will be ere long millions of consumers for the manufacturers—that while they will have increased competition, they will have a more extended market in the North-West, calculated to build up the country, as the opening up of the western States built up the manufactures of the Eastern States. They see that the tendency will be to the North-West, and it is only this very policy that can secure the prosperity of the eastern Provinces, as the prosperity of the eastern States has been secured by the growth and development of the western. Under those circumstances we must expect confidence, not only in our policy, and that the people will realize and support it. My hon. friends opposite will find that correct when they go to the country and undertake to make the people believe that they are not as happy and as prosperous as they were from 1874 to 1878. The hon. member for Bothwell told us to-night that from the day we came into power our shipping had decreased. You would suppose, from his remarks, that the decrease in the manufacture of ships commenced in 1879 when we took office. He did not point to the fact, well known to everybody, that iron vessels are taking the place of wooden. We find that in 1874 the tonnage built in the Dominion was 190,000 tons; in 1875, 151,000; in 1876, 130,000; in 1877, 120,000, and in 1878, 101,000. It did not require a protective policy to diminish the tonnage during those years; the diminution took place under the Government of the hon. gentleman opposite. And if the hon. gentleman had gone back five years and traced the change, we should have no objection to his taking the year 1879. But, in 1879, the tonnage built was 74,000; in 1880, 60,000; in 1881, 74,000; an increase again. We know perfectly well the cause of that increase. During the term of the late Government our tonnage constructed in the Dominion decreased one-half, yet he would still have the House and the country to believe that it only commenced when we adopted a protective policy, while the causes exist outside of any legislation by the Dominion.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches formerly pretended to be able to remedy all those things; they were capable of controlling everything, and called us flies on the wheel.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We did not pretend to be able to control everything. If we did we might hope to control hon. gentlemen opposite. We have given up hope of convincing them that we are right and they are wrong. But we know, and the hon. gentleman should have been frank enough to state that this diminution in shipbuilding was not due to the National Policy, but to the fact that iron ships are doing the business of the world much more largely than before. I may just intimate to my hon. friend that, under this National Policy, it may not be long before we compete with iron shipbuilders on the other side of the Atlantic. It is our policy to do it; but in the meantime we do not intend to construct and sail iron instead of wooden vessels. If hon. gentlemen opposite imagine that it was increased taxation upon ships' materials that diminished the tonnage constructed, they are entirely mistaken. My hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Killam), though he undertook to make out a case of that kind, did not succeed; and I now tell him that in the case of 17 or 18 applications for a return of the duties paid on everything used by shipbuilders, showed that on everything except canvas, with one exception, they received an excess over their payments in the bonus given by the Government. I believe to-day, that with that bonus or drawback, they stand better than under the Tariff of 1878 without a drawback. The reduction of the tonnage constructed was not effected by the imposition of those duties; and it has been shown that there is an increase the past year over the year before, and as trade increases we will no doubt find occupation for our wooden ships. But whatever may be the case in this respect, I firmly believe that this policy is so firmly fixed in the judgment, affection and confidence of the people, that it will not soon be shaken. The resolution I now propose to place in the hands of the Chairman of the Committee, has been somewhat altered since I made my statement on the 24th of last month. For instance, fine salt, since 1879, was free from England, but paid a duty when coming from the United States. It is now proposed to impose the same duty upon all fine salt, no matter whether from England or from the United States, or wherever it comes from. It is proposed that the duty on all fine salt shall be the same as has been imposed during the last two years from the United States. In the proposition I made to the House, I stated that I proposed to ask the House to impose 4 cents each on vines imported into the country. We found upon enquiry that the value of the vines varies so much with reference to their quality and to their age, that it would not work fairly, and therefore we propose to drop the proposition of 4 cents and leave vines where they were. With reference to silver glass, it has been paying 25 per cent. It is now proposed, as we have increased the duty on the commoner kind of glass, window glass, of which a portion of silver glass is made, to increase the duty from 25 to 30 per cent., that is, silver glass to be the same as ordinary window glass. Books, maps, and charts, used by literary institutions, by societies and public libraries, and public institutions, it is proposed to put them, when used for such purposes, on the free list. Vaccine and ivory vaccine points shall be free. There has been exception taken to a duty collected on an article of that kind, and the Government proposes to make them free. Wood for fuel in Manitoba and the North-West, when brought from the United States, to be free. Steel is now free under our legislation till the first of next January; it is proposed to be continued free till the next Session of Parliament. Then there is an article called fillets for card clothing, a compound India rubber canvas, not made in the country, and from which card clothing is made; it is proposed to put that on the free list as well as hard rubber imported for the manufacture of combs and rubber goods. These are the principal changes that are made in the propositions as I stated them briefly to the House in making my Budget Speech. I, therefore, now move that the Speaker leave the Chair for the purpose of considering those Resolutions:—

3. Resolved—That it is expedient to provide that the foregoing Resolutions, and the alterations made in the duties on the articles therein mentioned, shall take effect upon and after the 24th February ultimo.

Mr. BLAKE. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to propose to submit now to the Committee a different set of Resolutions from that of which he gave notice of motion ?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They were not in Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. But you moved on the 24th of last month that we should go into Committee on them.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I moved that we should go into consideration of the Resolutions, a synopsis of which I read to the House to convey an idea of their nature.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it is very unfortunate the hon. gentleman should not have given us earlier notice of these changes.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I imagine they are not of that serious import you infer on the first Resolution.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On the item of sulphate of quinine,

Mr. BLAKE. Are there any manufactories of that article in the Dominion ?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am not aware of any. That subject was brought under my consideration in 1879, chiefly by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I believe the duty on quinine ought to be removed. I suppose that the hon. gentleman has felt that, in consequence of this high duty on quinine, there has been enormous smuggling in the west.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. MILLS. I believe nearly all the quinine consumed in the west the past twelve months has been smuggled. In fact I know that many of the population have found it to their interest to go to Detroit, paying their railway expenses, to buy quinine there and to bring it home without paying duty. They save money by the transaction.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I wonder the hon. gentlemen opposite did not find that out when they were in power, when it was $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. higher than it is now.

Mr. MILLS. When we were in power the Americans had a high duty on quinine that amounted to nearly 100 per cent. The result was that quinine was much higher in Detroit than it was on this side, and the smuggling was all the other way. But in the past two years quinine has been free in the American market, and the price has gone down 60 per cent. Competition there did not produce many of the beneficial consequences that have been promised by our Tariff here, and quinine was much higher than in Canada and England; but since it has been made free we find it is half the price on the other side the line that it is on this side.

Mr. BUNSTER. I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance to add to the free list, powder and fuse for blasting purposes. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), says "blasted minds." He may have a blasted memory that is not very creditable to him. I wish the hon. Finance Minister to consider the question of taking the duty off powder. British Columbia furnished the stone to build the mint at San Francisco, but this stone was met by an excessive duty on blasting powder, and I think this duty should be taken off in the interests of the Dominion at large.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. My hon. friend will remember that last Session or the Session before we did reduce the duty at his suggestion, but before concurrence, I will consider the question he has now raised.

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to ask my hon. friend from Vancouver if this duty increased the cost of the article?

Mr. BUNSTER. The article is not made in British Columbia.

Mr. BLAKE. But it is made in Canada.

Mr. BUNSTER. The explosive nature of the article precludes us from importing it, and while we exported to the United States $1,000,000 worth of gold and $1,000,000 worth of stone for building, I think we should have the duty removed from this powder.

On the item of glass, &c.,

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. Minister of Finance give us some information as to what he calculates will be the alteration in the cost of glass to the consumer by this change in the duty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have made some calculation, and suppose the consumer paid the increased duty to the full. It would be, as I think, $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents per box, or, upon an ordinary house of one and a half storeys, $37\frac{1}{2}$ cents.

Mr. BLAKE. The calculation is that the consumer will pay the duty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not say so, as likely more will be sold by the manufacturer. If the industry proves a success it will not be five years before the whole of the common window glass will be made in the Dominion, and the competition will be such that it will cost no more than now.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman state what in his calculations are the advantages that the domestic manufacturer has over the foreign manufacturer in glass by the present Tariff, as well as the natural advantage?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have not considered the advantages. Labor is higher, and in many respects he can manufacture at present, with the difficulties he has to contend with, as cheaply as we can get it from Germany, and when the manufacturer gets the market we expect he will be able to sell at lower rates than at present.

Mr. BLAKE. I have a great objection to the increase of the duty on common glass. My opinion, from the very slight researches I have made, is, that the national advantages to the domestic manufacturer are very great, and in considering questions of this sort we should not assume any arbitrary rate of duty. The hon. gentleman has frequently spoken of the supposed veneration we on this side had for $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., as if there was some magic in those numbers; but he seems to have an equal veneration for 30 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The 30 per cents. are very few indeed.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has introduced a number of 30 per cents. to-day. In the present case the object is not to increase but rather to diminish the revenue. The natural advantages to the domestic manufacturer of an article of this description are very great—such as the freight, the bulk, and expense of packing; and besides, a duty of 20 per cent. on an article of this kind would be as oppressive as 30 per cent. on many other articles. The bulk of our common glass—something like three-fourths of the import last year—comes from Belgium. Fifty feet of common window glass, such as I ordinarily used in a house in the country, would cost at Antwerp \$1, unboxed; the box would cost 20 cents, and the freight and charges to Montreal $18\frac{1}{2}$ cents, making $38\frac{1}{2}$ cents for boxing, freight and charges. The duty at present is 20 cents on the glass and 4 cents on the package, which gives you 24 cents of duty, making the cost at Montreal of that which cost \$1 unboxed at Antwerp, \$1.62 $\frac{1}{2}$. The cost of boxing fifty feet in Canada would be 7 cents only, which deducted from the \$1.62 $\frac{1}{2}$ would give \$1.55 $\frac{1}{2}$, showing a net advantage to the Canadian maker of 55 cents or $55\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., of which 24 cents is due to the duty and $31\frac{1}{2}$ cents to natural advantages. Of course the distributing points have to be considered, but I am taking Montreal for an example. As I have said, an article of this description should be lightly taxed, because under any circumstances the cost to the consumer is enormous in proportion to the prime cost of the article. The laid-down cost of \$1.62 $\frac{1}{2}$ at Montreal involves a wholesale addition of $27\frac{1}{2}$ cents, and a retailer's addition of 60 cents on box sales, making what would cost \$1 at Antwerp cost \$2.50 when going into the house; although in ordinary sheeting, or when fifty feet of glass is not wanted, the price would be increased to \$3.50 for fifty feet, so that this duty becomes about 50 cents by the time the stuff reaches the consumer. Yet the hon. gentleman proposes to add a new duty equal to 50 per cent. of the old duty to this article, the result of which will be to increase the ordinary cost to the consumer to \$3.77 instead of \$3.50 for what costs \$1 at Antwerp. Now, it seems to me that the protection which the Canadian manufacturer of common and colored window glass has, owing to the increased cost of boxing in the old country, the cost of freight from Antwerp to Montreal, and the duty which is equivalent to 24 cents on the package, is quite adequate to give all legitimate encouragement to that industry. Surely a duty of practically 55 per cent. is enough to encourage the manufacturer of window glass. And to add to that advantage a further advantage of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is to add that which is either unnecessary in order to the making of window glass here, or if it be necessary, proves that it is not an industry which we can profitably undertake. If it does not require such an enormous protection, it should not be given; for the hon. gentleman will acknowledge that until that happy day arrives when, by virtue of his Tariff, there is more than one glass factory in the Dominion, in the meantime the duty will be added to the price, and that the people of this country, already taxed to such a great extent for their window glass, will be taxed to an additional amount by both the home maker and the Government—by the home maker to the extent to which he supplies them, and by the Government to the extent to which they import. The result then of his proposition is to prop up an industry which has now a natural advantage of between 50 and 60 per cent. by giving it 12 per cent. more.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman has stated that in spite of great disadvantages the price of window glass in Belgium is $1 a box. He did not go far enough, or he would have explained to the House that Belgium is the most sedulously protected country in Europe, and that the enormous duty on window glass imported into that country is what has brought down the price. Therefore, the hon. gentleman's argument has contradicted itself.

Mr. HOOPER. In conversation with one of the proprietors of the Napanee Glass Works I put this question to him: "What effect would the imposition of an additional tax of 30 per cent. have on the consumer?" His answer was: "Not one cent; I shall be able to supply all my customers with glass as cheap, if not cheaper, than the price at which it can be imported into this country." The great competition in this country in foreign glass is with German No. 4, which is a very inferior article, and which in consequence of it not being able to find a market in Germany is exported here to this country and the United States, and the makers have heretofore been able to undersell manufacturers in the United States and any in this country. I also asked this gentleman what effect it would have on that class of articles. He said it would make no difference; he was prepared at all events to supply glass to consumers in Canada at prices equally as low, if not lower, than those at which they can be imported.

Mr. BLAKE. Why, of course, the manufacturer promises to supply the glass at a price equal to that at which it can be imported, because if he charged any more we would not buy it. But what we complain of is that the price of the imported article is to be raised by this duty to a point that is altogether exorbitant, and therefore the product to be supplied to us will be at a price altogether exorbitant.

On the item of white lead,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We increase the duty because we hope to encourage its production in this country. So far we have not produced the raw material from which the article is made, and having imposed a duty on the raw material it was found that a sufficient margin had not been left.

On the item of sand and emery paper,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They are manufacturing sand paper in this country, and from enquiries made, it is thought that with this duty imposed, manufacturers will be able to make all that is required and sell it cheaper than before.

Mr. BLAKE. How many manufactories are there?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is, at all events, one in Toronto, and, it is understood, others will be established; but owing to the determined action on the part of American manufacturers to drive our manufactory out of the market, it has been deemed advisable to encourage the establishment of other factories.

Mr. BLAKE. Are there any others?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Only one that I know of.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. BLAKE. How many hands does it employ?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not know. The firm manufactures other articles besides sand paper, which is only a branch of the business in which a large number of people are employed.

Mr. BLAKE. Then, as I understand it, this is also an increase of duty in expectation of diminishing the revenue.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is a very remarkable fact in connection with our manufactories, that they seem to make up very largely for the amount of duty.

Mr. MILLS. Would not a single establishment meet all our requirements?

On the item of silver plate glass,

Mr. BLAKE. Do I understand the Finance Minister to say that the reason for this change was to bring up the duty to the same point as on colorless window glass.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman, then, does expect that the price of colorless window glass will be increased by the duty?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, for a time.

On the item of spirits,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. At the present time fluid extracts imported pay a duty of $1.90. They are manufactured in the United States and England, but our manufacturers have to pay that sum on alcohol.

On the motion of books, &c.,

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman explain what he expects to be the operation of this change?

Mr. BOWELL. It will prevent the undervaluation of posters and other printing brought in from the United States. A specific duty of 6 cents per lb. and 20 per cent. ad valorem will prevent to a great extent fraud and also tend to cause the printing to be done in this country.

Mr. BLAKE. To what extent will the increase run?

Mr. BOWELL. Not more than 10 per cent. on the proper valuations, but to 40 or 50 per cent. on the undervaluation constantly made of these posters.

On the item of salt,

Mr. BLAKE. What is the purpose of this change?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. At present fine salt from the United States pays 5 to 8 per cent. duty, and that from England is free. This is to provide that all imported salt shall pay duty.

Mr. ANGLIN. There is a serious objection to this tax. It will be a serious burden on the farmer, for whom we have done nothing.

Mr. FARROW. I think no class of people has greater cause for grievance than the saltmen in the west. I do not think any one can reasonably object to the little tax. If the farmer wishes to avoid it, let his wife take the coarse salt and roll it down fine.

Mr. BLAKE. In what interest is the addition of 25 per cent. on the bags made? Is it the bag or salt-maker's interest, or that of both together?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The salt-maker's. They allege they are, to some extent, in an unfavorable position compared with the men who import the bags free; and to enable them to compete more successfully, this change is proposed, because the man who imports the fine salt now does not pay duty on the bags, it is so much added to the duty he would have to pay on the salt.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the value of the bag compared with the salt it contains?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not exactly know; perhaps it depends on the size of the bag.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps my hon. friend opposite, who was one of the salts of the earth, could tell us what the value of the ordinary bag is—the fine salt bag? How many pounds does the bag contain?

Mr. FARROW. Some are larger and some smaller. About 25 pounds; such a bag would sell for about 25 cents.

Mr. BOWELL. The prices of salt bags are as various as the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite. The importers of this salt get the bags in free; and in their advertisements of sale, one of the inducements held out to buy the imported salt, even if not so good as Canadian, is the gift of the bag. The bag imported by a Canadian salt-maker has to pay 20 per cent., whereas the importer gets in free, and when it is empty he can sell it, to be used for towelling or other purposes. This affords a positive advantage to the manufacturers of salt.

Mr. BLAKE. This cloth is made here and the bags are made here, and surely the hon. gentleman does not mean to say that they cost 20 per cent. more than if there was no duty.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say so.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says the importer brings in the bag and does not pay the 20 per cent. charged to others. I wanted some notion as to the effect of this duty in raising the cost of importing fine salt. You say it is in order to advantage the salt-maker. How does it advantage him? What is the enhanced cost of importing fine salt by reason of this charge?

Mr. HESSON. The gentlemen are anxious for the duty on bags for the purpose of protection against fraud. Bags are brought in on the top of barrels, the salt being afterwards packed in small cotton bags. The reason they ask for a duty on these bags is, when they buy cotton here they pay the duty that goes into their manufacture.

Several hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. HESSON. They do, however; and it seems reasonable if bags are permitted to come in free whilst cotton is taxed. I think they have a right to this protection, which I am glad the Finance Minister has given, though a mere trifle, in the interest of this great industry. Salt has been going down in the market and it has become cheaper and cheaper, and the attempt to fix it has but pressed it down. I have had to pay $2.50 for salt which I could buy to-day for 75 cents, and at the factory for 55 cents. If this duty has the effect desired, it is not worth our while to complain and request the removal of the tax, as the cotton bags are permitted to come in free, while the cotton itself is charged a duty.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the cotton used in these bags made in the country?

Several hon. MEMBERS. Some of it.

Mr. BLAKE. Then it is quite wrong to import it when they can buy it here; and if they bought it here they would not pay a higher price, but would get it as cheap as the imported article. I think the observations of the hon. member for North Huron and the hon. member for North Perth add a point to my question. Both say you are giving us a mere nothing; this is no advantage. I would like to know what it is. Surely the hon. Minister, before proposing that change, made some calculation as to the extent of its benefit to the home producer of salt, and as to the enhanced cost of the importation of fine salt. If not he did not do his duty to the Committee. I hope he will bring down this information. I regret he has not done it before submitting his proposition.

Mr. FARROW. There is a duty charged on cloth of a similar nature to that of these bags. The salt manufactured in this country is not packed in the same cloth as that coming from England. The imported bags do not pay the duty, which is not fair to the Canadian salt interest.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member has misapprehended my question. I was simply asking how much?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The case was presented to the Government in this way. It was stated that a party manufacturing salt in the Dominion, and putting it up in bags, the bag cost from 10 to 12½ per cent. made up here more than it cost to import the salt in a bag free. In the first place, we did not contemplate charging the duty on salt, but to give them the benefit of that 12½ per cent. between the cost to the man who imported it in the bag free and the man who made it here; but, subsequently, a deputation came here who discussed the whole question, and we decided it would be right and fair to give that industry, which to-day has less protection than almost any other, an addition of about 12½ per cent., or to give them 8 cents per hundred on all fine salt imported from Great Britain and elsewhere.

Mr. BLAKE. I wanted to know the extent to which the cost of fine salt was going to be increased by this duty on the bags.

Mr. BOWELL. When the value of the bag is known it is easy to ascertain the increased cost. I know that the large jute bags in which coarse salt is placed, and some fine salt, are purchased in Glasgow at 8 to 10 cents each, and the Government, in order to encourage that industry in this country, passed an Order in Council, placing jute cloth, unpressed and unfinished, on the free list. We have the best assurance that these bags will be made in this country at as low a price to the salt buyer as they are now purchased—certainly not more than one cent more, and at the same price at which they are purchased in Glasgow. Now, supposing that the bag cost 10 cents, that would just add 2½ cents to the value of the salt contained in the bag, and the same proportion to all the bags ranging in price down as low as 2 cents each.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Several manufacturers in the west had communications with the hon. Minister of Railways, and a proposition has been made by which it is very probable that salt sent from the west will be sent to the Lower Provinces at a much lower rate than is charged at present. They can even ship it by rail from the west to the Maritime Provinces at the same rate as coal is brought from the east, so that salt will cost the people of the Maritime Provinces no more than it costs them now when brought from England and the United States.

Mr. BLAKE. As the hon. gentleman has alluded to that interview, it reminds me that I understand by the newspapers that those people were benighted, enough to think that they were hardly used by the coal duty. They seem really to think that their fuel was raised in price. Perhaps the hon. Minister will give us some account of that interview.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman seems to have overlooked the fact that there are two bushels of salt in these larger bags. A bushel of salt is worth about twenty cents, and if the bag costs ten cents, that would raise the price of the bag two and a-half cents. Consequently, a two-bushel bag of salt would cost about 42½ cents. The hon. member for West Durham seems to forget that salt producers here have to compete with cheap labor in the Old Country, where these bags are made, and if these bags are permitted to come in free foreign labor is permitted to come into competition with our labor. I think it is continuing the same policy the Government have adopted, which I think is a wise policy.

On the item of iron boilers and iron tubing,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Might I ask the nature of this change; what has led to its being made?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We have ascertained, beyond doubt, that a quantity of this tubing is below two inches. There were difficulties in the way that I could not explain to my hon. friend last Session; but after listening to his earnest appeals, I made further enquiries, and am now glad to be able to meet his wishes as well as to secure the interests of the country by making the change.

Mr. PATERSON. I am greatly encouraged to learn that though the Minister of Finance apparently turns a deaf ear to my counsels, yet after the lapse of a year he accedes to my proposals. Although he has been a protectionist from the year 1851 down to the present time, I believe if I keep on instilling good doctrines in his ears, by-and-bye, perhaps, he may come down to a sound revenue Tariff basis.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is in the time of protection.

On the item of mustard and mustard cake,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is merely to settle the question whether this is to be 20 or 25 per cent. Mustard cake is 20 per cent. and mustard manufactured 25 per cents.

On the item of paraffine wax, &c.,

Mr. BLAKE. Why this change?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is owing to a great difficulty experienced in the Department as to the value of this article. Demands have been made to have it entered at ports at a low rate, but we have taken the average value of the imports for the year, and have imposed this sum which is the more specific duty than the average would be ad valorem.

Mr. BLAKE. Are there various grades of this article?

Mr. BOWELL. Some cost 5 cents, some 6 cents and some 4 cents, but the attempt is often made to bring it in for 2½ or 3 cents, and this change is made in order to remedy the evil mentioned by the hon. Finance Minister.

On the item of fruit trees, &c.,

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). This is an item which I would like to hear the hon. Finance Minister explain. I see no provision in the Tariff by which seedlings are excluded from the effect of this item. Seedlings are almost exclusively imported, and the effect of this clause will be to include them along with trees. Cuttings also are imported for grafting; and I think with regard to the latter item that it would seem that the Finance Minister must have listened to the representations of some set of nurserymen, and framed the item accordingly.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), in making the remark which he has just made, is objecting to the general principle of the Tariff, as everyone of the charges have been made in the particular way he suggests. That is the general rule, for we all know that the leader of the Government announced in the General Election of 1878 that he would construct the Tariff on the representation of those who were interested in the various industries to be fostered; that he would find out how much was required, and he would give it to them. I notice that the hon. gentleman has omitted one article, the article of grape vines. Did he find a greater difference of values in that case than in the others?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Was there any representation made as to any large contract on foot for the importation of vines, as I received some information of that kind?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not think so.

Mr. BOWELL. Representations were made that 4 cents a vine would be altogether out of proportion to the 20 per cent., and upon investigating the matter we concluded that it would be too high, especially upon that class mentioned by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), cuttings or shoots or buddings, and each one, of course, would be one vine, and from the invoices which I examined, I found that many of them were brought in from the United States at 2 cents per vine. The hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) is wrong with regard to any representation being made to the Department whatever with reference to the change on those articles. These changes were suggested from practical observations which took place in the different ports, as to the mode in which these articles were brought in, and it was thought better to make a low specific duty than to endure the constant annoyance that arose in every part of the country with regard to the importation of apple and other kinds of trees. I might say further that almost every nurseryman who has communicated with the Department since this was published have objected to it, particularly because they thought it included what the hon. gentleman calls seedling stocks. Now, as they are not specified, they are not interfered with, nor is the duty raised on that class of articles. The change affects only the articles which are mentioned. With regard to peaches, I may say that the only representations which have been made to the Department have been to raise the duty as high as possible, so as to make it even prohibitory, so as to prevent the importation of trees affected by the "yellows," a disease almost as contagious as smallpox, and which is almost unknown in this country, except in imported trees.

Mr. SPROULE. The principle which the hon. gentleman for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has mentioned as the one upon which the Ministry acted in framing the Tariff, I think, is a correct one, and one which I strongly support. The trouble with the late Government was that they took no notice of representations made by various classes of the people, but sat in their sancta sanctorum and paid no attention.

Mr. BLAKE. I have only to say, I do not find fault with the Finance Minister for finding out the people's grievances. I only wish that he would endeavor to find out the grievances of the other people who will be affected by these changes. These are his words to every question, and if you only hear one side you are not likely to form a sound judgment.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I am inclined to think, with regard to this matter, that the Ministry have gone into their closets in making these changes in the way described by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). The changes are disadvantageous to the people of my constituency, and I shall take an early opportunity of placing my views on the subject on record.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will state how the change will operate disadvantageously.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think it would operate disadvantageously in many respects. Those trees will be brought in subject to a specific duty, and they will be brought in under false pretences, such as 100 trees for 50c., 200 for $1, &c. It applies to trees of all kinds, including seedlings, and unless seedlings are specifically excluded I am afraid the Customs' officers on the western frontier will consider it their duty to value them as trees. The hon. Minister of Customs states that I made some general charge about the nurserymen obtaining this change. I did not do so; but I think some persons interested in the sale of trees have been making misrepresentations. I am quite satisfied that no person from the part of the country I live in asked for the change, and I think Essex, Kent and Bothwell are as much a fruit-bearing district as any portion of the Dominion. I do not think this change is in the interest of the farming community, or will tend to increase the number of orchards in the western peninsula.

Mr. SPROULE. If this duty will have the effect of shutting out these peach trees I think it will be really in the interest of the farmers. A few years ago, the Legislature of Ontario found it necessary to pass a Bill to compel the owners of diseased trees to cut those trees down, and we know that men from many of the American nurseries are selling diseased trees which will effectually destroy an orchard in a few years, and many in my section last year expressed the opinion that it would be advantageous to have a prohibitory duty placed on these trees.

Mr. PLUMB. On the frontier where I live the cultivation of peaches is one of the greatest industries; 20,000 or 30,000 baskets a day being shipped from the town where I live, and there the greatest complaints are made, not by the nurserymen, but by the orchardmen themselves that they cannot get American peach trees excluded. On the other side the peach trees are touched with a disease which has not yet much affected our trees; but there is great danger of having that disease brought among us if American peach trees are not excluded by a prohibitory duty. There is an abundant supply on our own side for all purposes, and small nurseries are increasing to such an extent that it is not necessary to cross the border for peach trees. I think an absolute prohibitory duty would have been even better than a duty of 3 cents each, until we find that the disease of "yellows" has been entirely stamped out in the United States.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not desire the statement of the hon. member for Essex to go forth uncontradicted. He says that he is informed by the Customs officers that seedlings and stock brought into the country for grafting are subject to the duty. I may say that there was some misapprehension on this point, and the moment it was brought to the notice of the Department a circular was issued informing the Customs officers that they were not to be so treated, but to be placed as formerly on the 20 per cent. list. I may inform the hon. gentleman that no nurserymen or any one else has suggested this change in the Tariff. Since he is very desirous of knowing how this change was made, I will tell him. We took the price lists of the large nurseryman in this country and the United States, upon which we based our specific duty which is lower than the 20 per cent. duty would be if the trees were entered for duty at the invoice price less the trade discount. I am sure no nurseryman will object to this duty when he understands it, and the only men who, I understand, object to it are the American peddlers who bring all classes of goods into this country in the spring and fall.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). He gave me no statement.

Mr. BOWELL. This is a matter of veracity. The hon. gentleman knows that he wrote a letter to Mr. McDougal, and came to me and showed it me, and I pointed out that those articles were not to be charged at that rate, but at 20 per cent., and with my approval he sent that letter.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). The hon. gentleman had better keep cool; anything I say in this House I shall be able to substantiate. I called upon the hon. gentleman in regard to this subject, and after explaining to him the views of my constituents he yielded on the matter of grape vines, and represented he would yield in the other matters. Perhaps I might have misunderstood him. I wrote a letter to one of my constituents and showed it to the hon. gentleman; he said it was all right, but he gave me no statement. The hon. gentleman has not, in my opinion, carried out in these items connected with the Tariff the terms which I was led to expect, or what I consider are in the interests of the constituency I represent.

Mr. LONGLEY. All classes of fruit trees can be propagated and grown in this country as well as elsewhere, and you know well that such trees are much better than imported trees. If that be admitted, it seems to me that if there is one article requiring higher protection, amounting to prohibition, fruit trees belong to that class. It may not now be the time to advocate such a policy, as the Government will adhere to their proposals, but I hope the time is not far distant when we will have such a Tariff as will lead to the production of the various kinds of fruit trees within our own country which will serve our purpose better in the end than imported trees.

Mr. KILLAM. I look upon fruit trees as a raw material and I am surprised that the representative of a fruit-growing country should advance any doctrine or support any policy calculated to prevent the farmers from buying fruit trees in any market they might select.

On the item of cotton manufactures,

Mr. BOWELL. An article called Kentucky jeans is imported which is not a jean, and this change was to prevent that.

On the item of table glass. In reply to Mr. BLAKE,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This proposal is for the purpose of adding to the other articles specified in the 30 per cent. list in the Tariff, cut, pressed and moulded table ware. When we imposed 30 per cent. duty on specific articles of glass ware made in the Dominion, we stated distinctly that it was because they were made in the Dominion, and the result has been satisfactory since, because prices have been greatly reduced. An establishment has been erected in New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, where this description of moulded table ware is manufactured, and I doubt not we shall have other glass manufactories. It is proposed that as they are now made in the country, they should be placed on the same list with lamp glasses and other articles placed at 30 per cent.

Mr. BLAKE. This proposal seems to be open to the same objection that I made to the former proposal with reference to glass. As I have said there is a real difficulty with any duties on these goods, on account of various considerations, and among these are their bulkiness and fragility, and the consequent additional cost of transportation. I have some information on the subject which I should have preferred giving to the Committee at an hour when they would have been disposed better to attend to business than now; but if the hon. Finance Minister insists on going on, I must give it now. I have here a statement of an invoice of ware of this kind, pressed glass and table ware brought into Montreal last month. The actual value of the goods was $2,731.34; the packages cost $240.13; and the freight from Wheeling and Pittsburg, $391.58; making an aggregate of $621.71; to be added to the cost of the goods, exclusive of the duty, $3,353.05. It would be observed that the goods cost, to pack and carry, 22½ per cent. on prime cost. Being bulky and fragile, and expensive to move, this gives an actual advantage of very great consequence to the manufacturer in Canada, who can make them at a distance less remote from the point of consumption. Now, the late Tariff would have added to this cost of $3,353, $477.96, or 17½ per cent.; and so, under the late Tariff, those goods could have been laid down at $3,831.25, or over 40 per cent. advance on unpacked goods to the point of Montreal. Under the Tariff as it stands they will cost, instead of $3,831, $3,962.85, or 48½ per cent. advance on the unpacked goods at the point of manufacture. The duty on the goods and packages is 22½ per cent. on the value of the goods. The packages are a lot of old flour barrels costing in the United States 35 cents, and weighing 30 lbs.; then the proportion of freight is 18 cents and the duty on them is 7 cents, making the total cost of the packages 60 cents; and they are sold for 10 cents after the importers unpack the glass, so there is a loss on every package of 50 cents, of which 7 cents is due to the existing duty. Under the proposed Tariff the duty is 30 per cent. on goods and packages. The cost of the goods laid down would be $4,281, or 55½ per cent. advance in the value of the goods unpacked and bought at the manufactory. The rate of duty on the goods themselves would be about 36½ per cent., but every barrel would have cost 10½ cents for duty, 18 cents for freight, selling afterwards for only 10 cents, representing a loss of 50 cents. The total cost of the barrels with freight and duty is thus 63½ cents. These goods weighed about 65,000 lbs.; the freight was 60 cents per hundred, equal to about 14½ per cent, or to 13½ per cent. on certain goods and packages. This proves that this class of goods is peculiarly expensive to export; because, with the duty added to the freight, the cost amounts to a large percentage on the value of the goods, including the packages; the cost is 14 per cent. on the value of the goods alone. Then on the goods, for their carriage, there is a large advance; there is the breakage and progress of transportation; the breakage in the shops, and the expense of the packages against those goods also. It is evident that the parties intermediate between the maker and consumer must make a large advance on such goods to make the business pay. The wholesale advance is 50 per cent. and the retailers 50 also. The result is the cost to the consumer under the old Tariff, $8,619.76, or an advance of 315 per cent.; under the present Tariff, $8,916.40, or an advance of 325½ per cent.; under the proposed Tariff, $9,334.34, or an advance of 349½ per cent.; under the old Tariff the duty was 37 per cent.; present Tariff, 50½ per cent.; under the proposed Tariff, 73 per cent. So the consumer will pay, by virtue of the proposed duty, 73 per cent. advance on an article which, owing to its expensive transport and fragility, is in any case very costly. It is obvious that this is not a thing that ought to be lightly taxed. The factory which the hon. gentleman referred to is at New Glasgow, and gets its coal very cheap indeed. It gets a supply of that raw material which is of the utmost importance in the manufacture of glass at a rate exceptionally low. It gets, therefore, as I have shown, a protection in the shape of duty of 22½ per cent. on the goods and also the freight; the freight is 32 cents per 100 lbs. by the car load, as against 60 cents on the invoice to which I referred. So the freight amounts to 7 per cent. on the value of the goods, assuming the same values which rule at Pittsburgh; and the freight from Montreal to New Glasgow would be but 7 per cent. instead of 13 from Pittsburgh, or an advantage of over 6 per cent. over the foreign exporter. The combined gain under the existing Tariff is thus 28½ per cent., which is one extremely advantageous to the Canadian manufacturer. By the proposed Tariff the duty would be over 36 per cent., which will, with the bright advantage of 6 per cent., make a total of 42 per cent. in favor of New Glasgow, assuming Montreal as the distributing point. I have further information as to the practical operation of this duty. I have got a few of the articles of table ware made by this factory, with their prices, and the prices of the same goods made in the United States at the points to which I have referred, Pittsburgh and Wheeling. At Pittsburgh, sets of table ware, $2.15; New Glasgow, $3.25, or 51 per cent. in advance. Bowls and covers, Pittsburgh, $1.75; New Glasgow, $2.75, or 57 per cent. advance. Another kind of bowls and covers, Pittsburgh, $2.25; New Glasgow, $3.25, or 45 per cent. Tumblers and patters, Pittsburgh, 20 cents; New Glasgow, 30 cents, or 50 per cent. Goblets, Pittsburgh, 29 cents; New Glasgow, 40 cents, or 37½ per cent. Double egg cups, Pittsburgh, 40 cents; New Glasgow, 60 cents, or 50 per cent. more—thus giving an average of 48½ per cent. advance of New Glasgow upon Pittsburgh prices. My opinion is that they are the latest dates, and that they are contemporaneous. Of course, the

Mr. BLAKE.

New Glasgow works are the latest. Now, I have said that gives you an average of 48½ per cent. upon the whole invoice that has been furnished to me of the New Glasgow wares. They do not make many sorts; I am not sure I have got all the sorts they make; but I was given these particulars, and I was told they partly represented the rest. Of course, that is apparently an increased protection, but it is accounted for by the fact that this price of 48½ per cent. included delivery in car loads from New Glasgow to Montreal. I have already pointed out that the delivery to Montreal is at the rate of about 7 per cent., taking Pittsburgh rates, and if you take that from the 48½ you find the price at New Glasgow is 41½ in excess of the price of Pittsburgh, while the protection is 42 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. I think the remarks of the hon. gentleman are only another illustration of the manner in which American manufacturers endeavor to crush out every industry established in this country. The quotation the hon. gentleman has given, according to my information, is quite correct. He stated the very latest prices; but I am informed that these prices were a short time ago up as high as $2.50 to $2.75, or higher; but the moment the New Glasgow works were established, and they began to sell their wares in this country, the Americans at once reduced the price of their articles in order not only to compete but to crush the industry in this country. The same principle prevailed when the western salt works were started. Salt was then sold cheaper from the Syracuse works, which are immediately opposite Kingston, at a lower price in Huron and the western section of Canada than in Belleville, which is hundreds of miles nearer the works. It is only another evidence of the manner in which every industry established in this country is endeavored to be crushed out by American manufacturers. I find no fault with them for doing that, but the result is that though these articles are manufactured in this country, they are sold cheaper to the consumer than before the establishment of the manufactories. There is not the slightest doubt that the same result would follow if this factory were closed. The American manufacturers, then, instead of selling at the prices the hon. gentleman has given to the House, would at once go up to the old rates, and then the Canadian consumer would have to pay advanced rates. Now, I have no doubt, from past experience, that when these works are fairly in operation these articles will be sold cheaper to the consumer than they were previous to the establishment of the glass works.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the American manufacturers have sold their exports here cheaper than they sell them in their own market?

Mr. BOWELL. I did not say that, but I presume such is the fact.

Mr. BLAKE. Then all I can say is that I should be very much surprised if that is so in this particular case, because in the invoice to which I refer, unless I misunderstood my correspondent, he gave me the duty actually paid on the invoice, and the duty actually paid was not the duty which the hon. gentleman is in the habit of charging, which, I believe, is based upon the value of the articles sold in the country where they are manufactured. I shall be surprised to learn that these goods have been valued by the hon. gentleman's officers at more than the prices at which they were invoiced. It is preposterous to suppose that the small market afforded in Canada would induce glass manufacturers in the United States to reduce, by those enormous rates, the supply for the whole of the United States themselves. If they are selling at reduced rates to Canada and keep them up for themselves, then, of course, the hon. gentleman would charge the duty at the cost in the country of manufacture, and, therefore, he would charge a higher rate of duty, ad valorem, than in this value. Now, I do not say that has not been done in this case, but I shall be very much surprised if it has. If he has not done so then these are the Pittsburg and Wheeling prices for home consumption, and in that case the hon. gentleman's argument would fall to the ground. Now, I may say a word in reference to manufacturers. My opinion is that they are just of the same flesh and blood, animated by the same motives, and pursuing the same interests in all countries where manufactures are carried on. They get as much as they can out of the consumer; they enter into trade for that purpose. If they sometimes lower the rates it is always with the view of making more profit in the end. The hon. gentleman takes the United States manufacturers, as if they were peculiar in that particular; not a bit of it. The Canadian manufacturer does the same. He takes as much as he can, or as much as he dares. I do not blame him for it; it is for that purpose he goes into business. Therefore I do not blame these New Glasgow gentlemen, that when they could exact 42 per cent. they take 41½.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is in error as to the basis on which duty is collected. Neither the Customs Department nor myself fix any value upon the articles brought into this country. We fixed the duty to-day under the law proposed by the late Government. I know the hon. gentleman is finding fault and reiterating what is constantly repeated in the press that represents the hon. gentleman's views, for carrying out the law he himself and his party put upon the Statute-book. It is the duty of the appraisers and the collectors, in every instance where an invoice is presented to them, to ascertain as near as can be obtained, the value of the articles in the market of the country where they are sold. Now, that is not fixing the value by myself or by the Department. The value is fixed by the manufacturer or seller in the United States; but if he sells to a Canadian purchaser at a lower price than the price in the United States and the appraiser knows that to be a fact, his duty is, under the law, to raise the value for duty. If the hon. gentleman had a little experience he would know that it does not follow, because an invoice may have been passed by a collector or appraiser, or any other official, at a certain price, that that establishes the fact that that price is the market value in the country in which it is purchased for duty. The trouble is that these invoices, either by the negligence or the want of knowledge of the officer are too often passed, but when they are sent to the Department here they are placed in the hands of the Dominion Appraisers who have every facility for ascertaining the true market value in the country in which the goods are purchased. This causes a great deal of trouble and discontent, and the charge which is made against the Customs Department—too often by those who know better—that there is any imputation on the honesty of the importers, is not correct. If a man goes to New York or Buffalo and buys goods at prices at which they would not be sold by the seller to his American customers, it does not follow that because he endeavors to make entry at an export price that he is dishonest, because many a man purchases in that way without having an exact knowledge of the law. Still it becomes the duty of the appraiser to raise the price to the value at which the same goods would be sold for home consumption. With regard to what the hon. gentleman has said, I know that, in the article of lamp chimneys and glass lamps, in very many cases the price has been actually raised because they have sold to the Canadian purchaser at a lower price than for home consumption.

Mr. PLUMB. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman why, in asking this calculation of freight, he made it 60 cents from Pittsburg to Montreal, and stated that the average was 32 cents.

Mr. BLAKE. I said the average rate per car load.

Mr. PLUMB. Does the hon. gentleman take into consideration the rate from New Glasgow to Montreal. He said the average was 32 cents.

Mr. BLAKE. No; I said the rate in one case was 32 and in the other 60 cents, and that one was 13 per cent. on the value of the goods.

Mr. PLUMB. But why take Montreal, the furthest point from Pittsburg, as the distributing point? Why not take Hamilton?

Mr. BLAKE. In that case you would have had the cost to Hamilton. Why not make it to British Columbia? I wish to say that I made no imputation against the Minister of Customs for observing the laws. He seemed to apprehend me, and to answer some enquiries in the newspapers. but this is not, perhaps, the time to discuss the newspapers. I said that he was in the habit of fixing the goods under the law, but that if he had done so in this case a greater rate would have been charged.

Mr. HESSON. It occurred to me when the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) said the prices which he was quoting as being lower than the prices here are the prices of goods in a country which has protection to an unlimited extent—to a prohibitory extent—so far as glass ware is concerned, I am not aware that the Americans are importing the quality of glass that hon. gentleman has been giving the figures for to-night, but I know that we have never had lamp chimneys so cheap as to-day, and if we, with our comparatively low Tariff, can compete with the Americans with their high Tariff, I think the hon. gentleman should look at the matter in that light.

Mr. ANGLIN. I may say that I have had a conversation with a number of the largest shareholders in the New Glasgow works about the time those works were going into operation, and they were unanimous in stating that they were satisfied with the old Tariff. If any application has since been made for a change, I believe it has been made without the concurrence of the principal shareholders.

Mr. HESSON. Does the hon. gentleman say that they increased the price of their goods?

Mr. ANGLIN. I said nothing at all about the cost.

On the item of stoves, &c.,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The question has arisen in the different ports as to whether forgings were castings or not. Some are entered in the rough state and were really castings, and this change is made for the purpose of settling the question.

Resolutions to be reported; and (at 3:45 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 24th March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

MARINE TELEGRAPH LINE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 127) to make further provision regarding the incorporation of a company to establish a Marine Telegraph between the Pacific coast of Canada and Asia, and for repealing the provisions of any Act inconsistent therewith.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman please explain the Bill?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Bill is composed of three clauses. The first is to extend the period mentioned in the Act of last Session, so as to give twelve months for the letters patent to issue; the second is for the purpose of giving to the Company an exclusive privilege, for the period of twenty years from the passing of this Act; and the third is to repeal the provisions of any Act inconsistent with the second clause. When the Bill comes up for the second reading I will enter fully into the reasons for introducing the measure.

Mr. BLAKE. Might I ask if there is any correspondence in the possession of the Government on the subject of this Bill.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; there is none.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

HARBOR OF THREE RIVERS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide for the appointment of certain Commissioners for the improvement and management of the harbor of Three Rivers.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This resolution is the basis of a Bill for the organization of a Board of Harbor Commissioners at Three Rivers. There will be five Commissioners—the Mayor of the city, the Chairman of the Board of Trade, and three other Commissioners appointed by the Government. A chairman will be elected from the five by themselves. The Commissioners will act without payment. They are to be authorized to borrow money to the extent of $300,000 on their works, without any guarantee on the part of the Government; and they will not be able to incur any expenses or borrow money without having first obtained the sanction of the Governor in Council or the Minister of Public Works.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN introduced Bill (No. 128) to provide for the improvement and management of the harbor of Three Rivers.

Bill read the first time.

CLAIMS ON THE BANK OF UPPER CANADA.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient that the sum of $250,000 placed by the Act 24 Victoria, Chapter 8, at the disposal of the Governor in Council, for the purpose of paying off any claims on the Bank of Upper Canada, settled and adjusted under the fourth section of the Act 33 Victoria, Chapter 40, subject to the conditions mentioned in the Act first mentioned, be increased to $255,000, subject to the same conditions, and that the Act first mentioned be amended accordingly.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. Minister be good enough to explain the precise reason why he requires this sum, as I understand it is an item of $5,000 only.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I should like the hon. gentleman to state why he requires that amount, and why it is necessary to require a special Act?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Under the Act referred to there was placed at the disposal of the Government $250,000. In June, $252,000 had been expended, and the Auditor General called the attention of the Department to the fact that there was no authority to make that over-payment, and on examining the claims to be brought before the Government, it appeared possible that $3,000 more would be required. It is necessary to have a few thousand dollars to pay claims, and the Government therefore asked that the $252,000 should be extended to $255,000. The amount of the receipts from the assets of the bank down to the present time amounted to $340,000, and $70,000 more were expected to be realized within eighteen months, when it was hoped the matter would be finally disposed of.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I suppose the hon. Minister has a list of all the claims against the bank. I thought a list had been submitted at the time it was placed in the hands of the Government. I am speaking from recollection as I have not examined the Statutes, but I think it is eleven or twelve years since the Act was passed under which the hon. gentleman is now acting. I thought all the claims had been put in when possession was taken.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is some circulation held by parties at this moment, and we have not money to pay it. A gentleman wrote since the opening of the Session asking why $500 of circulation, applied for to our representative in Toronto, had not been paid.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Then the amount is composed only of outstanding notes.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think mainly so.

Mr. ANGLIN. We, from the Maritime Provinces, would like to receive some further explanation in regard to this matter. We are interested to know how the Government became responsible for winding up the affairs of the Bank and paying its creditors, and how the Government became one of the largest creditors. We would like to know how much is lost in that way, for although it was lost before our time we have to bear our share of the consequences. It is desirable to know how much was lost, why it was lost, and why the Government have undertaken to wind up the affairs of the bank, and whether there is any probability of ever getting back any of the money which the Government of Canada formerly had on deposit or otherwise in charge of the bank. Hon. members from Ontario are, no doubt, familiar with the history of this bank, and are quite satisfied that the Government are only taking the course they should take in the matter, but the House would like to have some further explanations. There have been rumors afloat with respect to the management of the bank in former times, and it has been stated in another place that it was the duty of the Government to enquire into the history of the transactions of this bank in years previous to its failure; and it is alleged, if such enquiry were carefully made, it would be found that persons contrived to obtain from that bank, improperly, very large sums which, if proper steps were taken, they might be made to disgorge, so that the public would be relieved somewhat from the loss it has had to sustain in consequence of its having entrusted public funds to that bank. At all events, we would like to know why and how it is we are involved in this business, whether the Government money has been absolutely lost, whether we are coming in as one of the creditors receiving dividends from the amount realized from the assets, and any further explanations.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This matter was fully discussed in Parliament when the first Bill was passed, 33 Victoria, Chapter 40. What the conditions and circumstances connected with the case were, Sir John Rose or Sir Francis Hincks, the Finance Minister at the time, fully explained when the appropriation of $200,000 was made for the payment of the liabilities, the Government undertaking to pay the rest of the creditors, the Government taking the assets. When the affairs are closed, a dividend, equal to 12 or 15 cents on the dollar, will be received by the Government for their claim on that institution. If there is any fact which the hon. member for Gloucester wishes to elicit, or to ascertain whether there has been any improper conduct on the part of any person, creditor or debtor of the bank, let the hon. gentleman make a motion, and the Government will be happy to bring down information on the subject.

Mr. HESSON. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is not asking for a sufficient amount to meet all cases yet remaining unsettled. One of my own constituents is a creditor for £300 sterling which he has claimed for the last twenty years, and interest on it. The case has been submitted to a legal authority, and I suppose the Government will not pay it unless they are compelled to do so. It is not a matter of circulation but a claim against the bank.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Is it intended that these $3,000 shall be applied to the liquidation of the claim of one of the constituents of an hon. gentleman opposite which has been in suspense twenty years?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have not personally heard of this case before.

Mr. BLAKE. I think before the next stage is taken the hon. gentleman should bring down a list of the claims, $2,000 paid in excess and $3,000 expected to be paid, because they are very stale.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. When I submit the Bill I will bring down such a list.

Resolution agreed to and ordered to be reported.

DEEPENING CHANNEL BETWEEN MONTREAL AND QUEBEC.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to raise, by the issue of debentures in the manner prescribed by the Act 36 Victoria, chapter 60 (except as regards the rate of interest, which shall not exceed 4 per cent. per annum), a further sum, not exceeding $280,000 to be applied, subject to the provisions of the said Act as amended by the said Act 44 Victoria, chapter 7, in meeting the expenses incurred and to be incurred in completing the dredging and deepening of the ship channel between Montreal and Quebec.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is for the purpose of completing the channel to the depth of twenty-five feet, and the above is estimated to be the amount required.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Is it a loan to the Commissioners?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes. All the conditions of the general Act are to be in force, except that the interest be at the rate of 4 per cent. The Commissioners have plant on hand which, when the work is completed, will, they consider, realize a considerable portion of this loan.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I thought that twenty-five feet depth was completed through Lake St. Peter.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No; the Commissioners have been working all last summer. They were under the impression that the $1,500,000 put at their disposal was not all expended. Therefore they continued working through a certain period during the summer until the end, under that impression. When they made their report at the end of the season, it was found they had expended more than the amount put at their disposal. In the beginning they were authorized to invest a large sum in the purchase of plant, to the extent, I think, of $450,000 or $550,000. That plant is there, and therefore reduces the amount to be expended by so much. When this came to the notice of the Government we called upon the Commissioners to explain and they gave a statement of the value of that plant. Then they gave another statement showing what was required this year to complete the improvement to the depth of twenty-five feet. The amount that will have to be expended this season to complete the work will be $280,000. Then, the plant being sold, the amount realized will be about sufficient to recoup the Government for the $280,000, and thus the whole amount, $1,500,000 will not be exceeded.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Is the plant the only security?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is a Government trust as the hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. GAULT. I am glad to say there is no trust in this country that has so faithfully performed its duty from its very inception as the Harbor Trust of Montreal. Under the late Hon. John Young, Mr. Delisle, Mr. Cramp, and especially Mr. Robertson, the contracts have all been completed to the letter. I think it is very creditable to Montreal that we have always had such good men in the Harbor Trust.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. There are no contracts in this. The contracts were for the harbor. This is the river; and although the Harbor Commissioners had charge of this, they did the work themselves. The Government has, I understand, for security the tolls, besides the security of the plant.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I understood the hon. the Minister of Public Works to say that this $280,000 would complete the work. When completed, is the work of such a nature that it will require none or very small expense to keep it in order. I understand that the channel is 300 feet in length and twenty-five feet deep. Is it mud, or hard bottom.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. At certain places it is mud, and at others hard.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is all mud in the lake.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes. I understand from the Commissioners it will require some dredges to keep the channel clear. In spring they will have to examine the channel from end to end, to see whether any deposits have been made during the winter, and we expect the channel will be kept open to the depth of twenty-five feet. The Government have not considered whether they will ask Parliament to consent to providing for any greater depth. As hon. gentlemen on the other side must have seen, a meeting was held in Montreal to obtain the deepening of the channel to twenty-seven and a-half feet. Of course the Government did not take the matter up. We stated that there was no need of taking up that question at present, as there was enough work with the present channel to employ the dredges fully.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has said that there was a communication from the Commissioners, and an estimate; is that the estimate of the Commissioners, or the estimate of the Government Engineer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The estimate was shown to the Chief Engineer of the Department, and it was considered by him that the work would occupy a good part of the season, for a number of years; while, as a rule, the expenditure of the year was largely caused by payments of the dredges, fuel, &c., it was seen that this amount would be required for this season, inasmuch as the Commissioners have shown that it would require until the end of the season to complete the work.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will, at a subsequent stage, bring down the correspondence with the Commissioners, and the reports.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. ANGLIN. Perhaps the Minister will state whether there is a minimum depth of twenty-five feet in the channel from Montreal to Quebec.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In many places between those points outside the channel, there is a depth of twenty-five feet, but all the way there is not such depth, although the channel itself, which is 300 or 400 feet in length, possesses that depth from Montreal to Quebec.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY introduced Bill (No. 130) further to amend the Act 36 Victoria, Chapter 60, relating to the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal.

Bill read the first time.

QUEBEC HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to raise, by the issue of debentures in the manner prescribed by the Act, 36 Victoria, chapter 62 (except as regards the rate of interest, which shall not exceed 4 per cent. per annum), a further sum, not exceeding $375,000, to be advanced from time to time, subject to the conditions embodied in the said Act, to the Quebec Harbor Commissioners, to enable them to construct the cross-wall and lock necessary to render available as a wet dock, the dock constructed by them at the mouth of the River St. Charles, and pay the balance of the cost of the said dock.

He said: The Government intended to introduce a Bill based on this resolution, for the purpose of placing at the disposal of the Harbor Commissioners of Quebec a sufficient sum to complete the docks.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I should like to know the total amount already advanced to the Harbor Commissioners of Quebec under the several preceding Acts to which this refers. I think it is not far short of $1,000,000. I would like also to know generally what is the position of that Trust—how their revenues are holding out—whether they are able at present to pay their way—and whether they have reasonable prospects of meeting this additional charge placed upon them.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to give the exact figures asked for, but shall be at the next stage. I think the amount voted by Parliament was $1,000,000 or $2,000,000. The Act provided that something like $750,000 of that amount should be employed in redeeming the debentures issued by the previous Trusts for the improvement of the harbor. I think some hon. gentlemen present have seen the plans for the building of this dock, and must admit that it is a very great improvement, but it requires to be completed. The hon. member for Lambton was Minister of Public Works at the commencement, and he had this matter under his consideration when the site and plans of the proposed dock were to be adopted. The scheme was laid before the Government of that day and approved of. The Commissioners have consequently gone on, after giving the contract for the work, which is now completed, to a very great extent—the tidal dock. The original plan and intention was to build, when the lock would be ballasted, the cross wall, in order to divide the large tidal dock in two, making the tidal dock from the mouth of the St. Charles towards this cross-wall, and then inside the cross-wall, a wet dock. The amount to be provided for is for that purpose, and to pay for the remainder of the work that has been done and build this cross-wall of the lock. The Commissioners cannot obtain now any revenue of any consequence from that dock until it is completed. As soon as the cross-wall has been built, and the wet dock is perfected, then they will be in a position to load and unload vessels on the wet dock without any difficulty, and then, being in communication with the Occidental Railway, they will be able to receive cargoes of deals from the west, and unload them in the dock. They expect to build up a large grain trade there. They intend to build either one or two elevators afterwards, or make an embankment in order that they may load grain there. The hon. gentleman knows that there is another dock on the other side of the River St. Lawrence at Lévis—a graving dock—for which there is a special vote. The work on that dock is going on satisfactorily, and I have no doubt it will be completed in due time.

Mr. ANGLIN. How many vessels, say of 1,000 tons, will the wet dock accommodate at a time?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot exactly say; but, so far as I can recollect, the width of the dock, from the lower town to the embankment, is 800 feet. I suppose the depth from the cross-wall to the eastern end of the dock would be probably 1,200 feet, and of course the hon. gentleman may see what area that would give.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Though it may not be strictly in order, still it will save trouble afterwards if I may be allowed to call attention to another point. As I understand the hon. gentleman, the amount asked for makes up about $1,500,000 or $1,600,000 advanced to the harbor of Quebec, and on this we are to receive and they are to pay 4 per cent. I think on the sum already advanced they were to pay 5 per cent., and I presume that the whole amount has been or will be reduced to 4 per cent. That will make a change on the revenues of the Trust of about $64,000 a year, and I would like to know what the revenues of the Trust are at this present moment. Are they paying their way as it is, or do they rely on the profits of this expenditure?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They could not pay interest on the money expended on the dock, if they were to rely on the present revenue, but they expect a large revenue from these docks when completed. The hon. gentleman will, perhaps, allow me to defer to another stage of the measure fuller details as to the revenues, &c.

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to ask, also, for any papers or correspondence that may be in the hands of the Government on this subject.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think, Sir, there is some misunderstanding as to the amount. In addition to the $1,200,000 originally allowed to be spent in 1873, there was another Act passed in 1875, authorizing the raising of a loan of $500,000.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That was for the graving dock.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes; but it is under the management of the Harbor Commission.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes; I said that.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The amount will be $2,075,000 when the vote is given. Would the hon. gentleman give a statement of the revenue of the harbor?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I shall be glad to do so at the next stage of the measure. I may say that there was a special arrangement, either under the Act or by Order in Council about the graving dock, fixing the proportion to be paid by Montreal and the proportion to be paid by Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That was conditional on the Montreal Commissioners agreeing to the arrangement. They did not agree to it, although I think they should have done so. The 6th section of the Act provides for the manner in which the interest and Sinking Fund shall be paid. The original expectation was that the Harbor Commissioners would unite and allow the one graving dock to do for both.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. What interest has been paid in compliance with the Act of 1875?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say at the moment. The sum of $500,000 has not been all expended, perhaps $200,000 of it was, and the contract is still going on.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY introduced Bill (No. 129) further to amend the Acts to provide for the improvement and management of the harbor of Quebec.

Bill read the first time.

TONNAGE DUTIES AT QUEBEC AND MONTREAL.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

There shall be levied upon every vessel, whether entering at the port of Quebec or at the port of Montreal, a tonnage duty of 3 cents per ton register of such vessel, for the purposes of the Act respecting Harbor and River Police of Canada, and the said duty shall be a lien upon the vessel, and shall be payable by the master of such vessel to the Collector of Her Majesty's Customs at the port; provided, that any vessel of one hundred tons register, or less, shall be subject to the payment of such tonnage duty on her first entry in either of the said ports in any calendar year, but not on any subsequent entry at the same port in the same year; and that any vessel of more than one hundred tons register shall be subject to the said duty on her first and second entry at either of the said ports in any one calendar year, but not on any subsequent entry in the same year, and that no vessel bound to or from the port of Montreal shall be liable to pay such duty at the port of Quebec for the same voyage.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman the reason for this resolution, and the changes it involves in the present law.

Mr. McLELAN. A Bill making arrangements with regard to the harbor and river police has passed the Senate, and a blank was left for this clause, providing a tax on vessels. The tax is the same as in the Act of 1868.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. At present, I believe, vessels pay 2 cents per ton, three times a year, instead of twice. By this resolution the tax is made 3 cents each time and twice a year, so that vessels going in twice a year pay as much as they now do three times a year.

Mr. McLELAN. There is no additional tax. I will read from the Act:

There shall be raised, levied, collected and paid upon every vessel entering at the port of Quebec, or at the port of Montreal, on or after the day last aforesaid, a duty of 3 cents per ton register, of such vessel, for the purposes of this Act, and the said duty shall be payable by the master of such vessel to the Collector of Her Majesty's Customs at the port, at the time of the entry, which shall contain on the face of it the register tonnage of the vessel; provided that any vessel of one hundred tons register, or less, shall be subject to the payment of such duty on her first entry in either of said ports, in any year, but not on any subsequent entry at the same port, in the same year,—and that any vessel of more than one hundred tons register, shall be subject to the said duty on her first and second entry at either of the said ports, in any one year, but not on any subsequent entry in the same year,—and that no vessel, bound to or from the port of Montreal, shall be liable to pay such duty at the port of Quebec for the same voyage.

Mr. McCUAIG. Does this apply to inland craft as well as ocean vessels?

Mr. McLELAN. The Act will be precisely the same as the Act of 1868.

Mr. McCUAIG. My object in asking the question is this: By a singular mode of measurement the tonnage of vessels from Upper Canada is reckoned upon the saloons, state rooms and round-house, instead of on the hulls alone, as was the case some five years ago. Registered by the present mode, a vessel at 2 cents taxes would give a register of about 900 tons. I hope the hon. gentleman will consider the question of whether vessels should pay on the whole gross measurement, or on the hull measurement alone.

Mr. McLELAN. This makes no provision whatever with regard to measurement, and I think the practice has not been to collect from inland vessels.

Mr. McCUAIG. Does not it apply to vessels from Upper Canada?

Mr. McLELAN. There is no change whatever in the Act. It will stand exactly as it did before.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose, then, that it is intended to repeal the Act of 1868.

Mr. McLELAN. The Bill in the Senate is intended to make more clear the regulations for the harbor police of Quebec and Montreal, and it is proposed to introduce this clause into that Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. But it is not intended to repeal that clause in the Statute-book. Therefore the other will be repealed.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes, certainly.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. But it applies to vessels from Ontario as well as sea-going vessels.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

AMENDMENTS TO THE INLAND REVENUE ACT.

Mr. MOUSSEAU moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Inland Revenue Act, 1880, 43 Victoria, chapter 19.

1. By prescribing the license fee to be paid for a bonding warehouse when in the same building with a Customs warehouse.

2. By repealing the duty of 4 cents per lb. on common Canada twist, imposed by section 35, sub-section 10, and providing that it shall pay the same duty as other tobacco manufactured exclusively from leaf grown in Canada, under sub-section 8, such duty to be reduced from 14 to 8 cents per lb. for the two years next after the passing of the Act, and to 10 cents per lb. for the two years then next.

3. By reducing the duty, under sub-section 9 of the said section 35, on cigars made solely from tobacco grown in Canada, from 30 cents to 20 cents per lb.

4. By providing for a monthly payment, equal to the cost of properly surveying the establishment, by any party licensed to use a chemical still.

5. By making certain amendments to facilitate the working of the said Act, but not affecting the rates of duty imposed by it.

Mr. VALLÉE. I hope the hon. Minister will explain his resolutions, as they seem to be in contradiction with what the hon. Minister of Finance announced in his speech on the Budget.

Mr. McCUAIG. I have had several complaints made to me of the charges made by licensed warehouses in small places. The business done in a small town say like Picton would be much less than in a city, and yet the same rate is charged in both cases. This is a matter to which I should like the hon. Minister to give his attention, and, if possible, make a discrimination between cities and small towns. Of course the Government have very generously given every facility to merchants bonding goods, but I think the present charge is too high for small towns.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. The first resolution speaks for itself, and it is intended to do away with the very grievance mentioned by my hon. friend. At present every warehouse of the description referred to has to pay a fee of $40, and it is intended hereafter to charge only $10 or $15. The second clause refers to Canadian grown tobacco. The Excise duty on tobacco imported from the United States or elsewhere to be manufactured in Canada is at present 20 cents. In 1880, for the encouragement of the home manufacture of tobacco, we reduced the duty on manufactured tobacco grown in Canada to 14 cents. It is now proposed that tobacco manufactured from home-grown tobacco will pay only 8 cents per lb. for two years, and 10 cents per lb. for the next two years, instead of 14 cents. That makes a still greater discrimination in favor of Canadian tobacco. The Canada twist, which is generally manufactured by the farmers themselves, will have to pay 8 cents per lb. when it is manufactured for sale on the market; but when the farmers manufacture it for their own use, it will not be taxed. The duty imposed on cigars manufactured from Canadian tobacco is to be reduced to 20 cents per lb. These changes are made with the view of carrying out the Government's National Policy with respect to Canadian grown tobacco the same as other articles. Last year we imported from the United States alone 10,000,000 lbs of tobacco; we produced in Canada about 500,000 lbs., so that hon. gentlemen can see what a large amount of money is sent out of the country for his article. Notwithstanding what has been said against Canadian tobacco, it has been shown by experiments made in the Inland Revenue Department that our farmers produce tobacco of good quality, well adapted to the manufacture of cigars and cigarettes, and the quality of the tobacco having been demonstrated, it is in the interest of the country that that industry should be fostered more and more, and the best way to foster it is to induce the farmers to grow their tobacco and sell it in leaf to the manufacturers. For that reason it is wisely provided in the Bill that there will be no duty on Canadian leaf, and the object in raising the duty on Canada twist is to induce the farmers to cease making it, but to sell it to the licensed manufacturer. The total importations of tobacco, foreign leaf, free, amounted to 10,460,888 lbs.; manufactures of cigars and cigarettes, 152,911 lbs.; snuff, 19,317 lbs.; all other tobaccos, 144,046 lbs.; making a total of 10,876,842 lbs. We will now see how our own home-grown tobacco stands in the market. Canada twist, in factories, 433 lbs.; Canada twist, sold by farmers, 378,216 lbs.; cigars, exclusively from Canadian leaf, 1,853 lbs. So that it appears we did not furnish the market with even 500,000 lbs., while we imported nearly 11,000,000 lbs. of tobacco, and the Government thought that, in harmony with the National Policy, a change should be introduced. The Government have two objects in view: first, to encourage the manufacturing of Canadian leaf tobacco, for the manufacture of cut or smoking tobacco, and of cigars and cigarettes; second, to discourage, if possible, because we think it is more advantageous for the farmers, the manufacture of twist or roll, in order that they may sell their tobacco in leaf, and so cause the manufacturers to take their tobacco instead of importing tobacco from foreign countries. Full information has been sought and a close investigation has been made by the Government on this subject, and it has been established beyond any doubt, as will appear as the debate proceeds, that when the farmers were willing to grow tobacco after the proper method, they succeeded admirably, and they sold to manufacturers a large quantity of the best tobacco. In certain counties this industry has been a great source of prosperity, and in certain counties, especially in the county of Montcalm, there are farmers who grow from 10,000 to 50,000 lbs, and some few have even grown 100,000 lbs. Last year especially there were two farmers who grew the large quantity of 50,000 lbs. each. These have exercised good management and have produced a good article, and in this way they have realized more money from this industry than either from hay or grain or any other method of utilizing the land.

Mr. DUGAS. As the county which I represent produces more tobacco than any other county in the Province of Quebec, the resolution now submitted to the House interests greatly my constituents, and I think it is my duty to express my views on this subject. The prosperity which my county has enjoyed during the last two years is chiefly due to the growth of this native plant; it is therefore the duty of hon. members to take all possible means to develop and encourage the growth of this plant and to protect equally the interests of the producer and of the manufacturer. I regret to see it stated in the resolution, which is against the interests of the producer, inasmuch as it imposes a duty of 6 cents per lb. instead of 4 cents as it now stands under the present law, and that the producers would have to pay 8 cents per lb. on the quantity they cultivated last season. I did not hear the hon. gentleman say there was any time stated so as to give to persons the right to sell all the tobacco which they now manufacture in roll, and that is the only fault I have to find with the resolutions. I am certainly against the manufacture of tobacco by producers in roll, because we know that producers envelope bad tobacco with fine leaf and offer it to consumers, thereby depreciating the value of the tobacco; but it would be tyrannical on the part of the Government to impose a duty of 8 cents per lb. on the crop cultivated last season, producers being under the impression that they would have the right to sell that crop under the terms of the existing law. But as I now understand the hon. member to say that this law will not come into force for a certain time, I have no objection to offer. With this explanation on the part of my hon. friend, I have nothing more to say. I did not understand my hon. friend when he made that statement, and I do not think he made it. With this proviso, I am willing to accept the resolution as it is, but without that proviso I am certainly opposed to the present resolution.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. Minister has failed to explain the very wide departure that has taken place in the policy of the Government on this question since the hon. Finance Minister pronounced his Budget Speech. In that speech he expressly said that the duty on Canada twist would remain as it was, 4 cents per lb. The following is the statement he made:—

"It is proposed, however, to leave the amount collected on twist the same as it is now, and to license parties in different parts of the country, &c."

That was the policy of the Government on the 24th February, but the resolution introduced by the hon. Secretary of State is exactly the reverse of that policy. Then it was declared the duty would remain at 4 cents; now this resolution provides that it be removed altogether, and that after the present year it shall be 8 cents. My hon. friend is aware that after the declaration of the hon. Minister of Finance was made, the Conservative press of Lower Canada was very loud in praise of the Government on the removal of this most obnoxious duty. What will that press say now, when they find the duty on Canada twist is just doubled. That is not all. Next year the duty on Canadian tobacco will be 10 cents, and two years later it will be 14 cents. It seems to me all the arguments made use of by the hon. the Secretary of State and the hon member for Montcalm are destroyed completely by the policy of the Government, which is not to encourage, but to discourage the culture of tobacco, as far as it lies in their power to do so. We find that on this very large class of Canadian tobacco, the duty is doubled this year, increased 2 cents next year, 2 cents again the following year, and is then brought back again to what it is today. This does not apply to Canada twist alone, but as well to manufactured tobacco. The hon. member for Montcalm said he was opposed to twist altogether but was in favor of manufactured tobacco. How can he then approve of the policy of the Government which provides that after two years the duty shall be changed from 14 to 8 cents, then it shall be brought back to 4 cents, and then four years hence, when the elections will be over, it shall be again brought back to 14 cents. Is that the policy which the hon. member for Montcalm is willing to support? He must see that the Government gives really no encouragement to the cultivators of tobacco in Lower Canada. I cannot conceive for what object this resolution has been brought before the House, unless it be that we are on the eve of the elections, since it is expressly provided that the duty shall be decreased only for a certain time, and, immediately after the elections shall have taken place, it shall be increased to the old rate. It seems to me the Government do not deserve the credit they take to themselves on this question. It looks like a political dodge on their part. Why decrease the duty from 14 to 8 cents when you provide that in the course of a certain time it should be restored to its present rate? If the Government are making an experiment, they are showing beforehand that it will end in failure since they follow the decrease by an increase. I cannot understand what object the Government expect to attain by decreasing the duty for two, three, or four years at the outside, then restoring it to its old figure, unless it be to make political capital on the hustings. They made a great amount of political capital out of that question in former times, and the hon. Secretary of State is still not above or beneath making political capital on the floor of the House. Speaking of myself, he said at one time, I said Canadian tobacco had a bad smell. The hon. gentleman should remember he is not on the hustings and should not stoop to make such an assertion here.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. You did use those words.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has a better memory than I have. To me, all tobacco has the same smell, for I do not smoke. There will be great disappointment in the Province of Quebec when it is found, after all the praises of the Conservative press, that the Government have simply altered the duty for the elections, and will then return to their old policy.

Mr. DUGAS. I hope the hon. member for Quebec East will not disparage in future, as he has in the past, the climate and soil of his native country, since experience has shown that the climate of Canada is well adapted for the culture of tobacco. He would at one time have us believe we were living in a country where the climate was like that of Siberia. The policy of the Government is a good one. We do not want to encourage the making of tobacco twist in the future. What we want is to provide good tobacco, and not wrap up bad tobacco in twists. By reducing the duty from 14 to 8 cents, we will give an impulse to the establishment of tobacco manufactories. There are but few such establishments in Canada—not sufficient to fabricate the twentieth part of tobacco grown in the Province. Therefore the reduction of duty from 14 cents to 8 cents will be an encouragement to the manufacture of tobacco, and create a home market for our producers.

Mr. LAURIER. I never stated what I am charged with. I know we can grow tobacco, and I am only sorry that we cannot grow it as well as Cuba, but we must take facts as we find them.

Mr. PLUMB. I remember very well two or three years ago that a similar discussion took place in this House, and then the hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Laurier), who is now taking such an interest in tobacco growing, insisted that the climate of Quebec was not favorable for the growth of good tobacco. In this respect he was in perfect accord with all the gentlemen on his side of the House. One who lived in Quebec, for example, would insist that his native district could not grow tobacco, and another gentleman who lives in the coal districts would insist that it would take a Tariff of $2.50 to bring a ton of coal into Ontario; and so these gentlemen go on fighting against fate, and endeavoring on every occasion to depress and belittle the capacities of their own Provinces for the purpose of a temporary political triumph. I can tell those hon. gentlemen that the course they have pursued has alienated the people of Canada from them, and has given them the position, the humiliating position, which they now hold. I was very glad indeed that our Government had at last seen the propriety of endeavoring to promote the tobacco growing industry. I know perfectly well that until the farmers who produce tobacco are relieved very largely from the embarrassments which were thrown around the growth of that plant, that it will not be produced in Canada to a very large extent. Everybody knows that at the time of the American troubles, when the growth of Virginian tobacco could no longer be depended on, the Northern States, never having grown it before, never having been able to produce it previously, were induced, by the exigencies of the case, to turn their attention to its culture; and any man who travelled through the New England States last year would have seen along the side of the railway, leading from Albany to Boston, fifty miles on a stretch, tobacco crops, the value of which was almost incalculable. It was apparent that the Americans believed in the productive capacity of their own country. The representatives of Connecticut did not at that time rise in Congress, and say: "We cannot grow tobacco in Connecticut; we do not want any protection for this industry, because we know our climate is unsuitable to it"—as my hon. friend opposite said on one occasion, and perhaps now, for I did not pay attention to what he has now said with reference to tobacco culture in the Province of Quebec. We all know that Ohio, Connecticut, and Massachusetts now raise a tobacco crop of nearly equal value to the whole crop of Virginia, simply because they have been encouraged. In the district where I live, there is a soil perfectly adapted to the growth of that plant—2,500 lbs have been raised on a single acre. It is one of the most profitable crops that can possibly be cultivated. It requires great care, and great skill in the grower; but it is the duty of the Government to give the public every information on the subject, furnish the very best seed, and endeavor to persuade the agriculturists of Ontario and the sister Province, with which it is in close connection, to strive to make tobacco one among the crops of rotation. If we adopted the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, we should compel our agriculturists of Ontario and Quebec to do what? Simply to raise an indifferent crop for immediate domestic use. They have said they did not wish to encourage a home market. They would not help or benefit our agriculturists by the establishment of manufacturing centres—those centres which, according to the very eloquent statement made by the member for North Norfolk, would prove most beneficial, by adding a market for home consumption, and by securing rotation of crops of perishable material which cannot be shipped abroad. The whole policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is to compel the farmers to do one of three or four things—either to raise wheat, a crop which has died out largely in Lower Canada, or raise barley on which they have to pay the import duty of the United States, which they do pay, no matter what the hon. member for Bothwell, with his usual hair-splitting sophistry, says; or to raise oats and rye or corn, which cannot be profitably raised in the eastern Provinces. Anything that can be done by this Government to enable the agricultural community to secure a rotation of crops, no matter whether upon a small or a large area, is a positive benefit to it; and any step the Government can possibly take towards that end is a step in the right direction. I remember well when an hon. member from Lower Canada, asked the late Government for some relaxation of the very rigid rules they had adopted in following up the farmer who had grown tobacco, by sending an Excise officer to stand at his back; and I remember well, how the late hon. Finance Minister appealed to the Opposition of the day, and begged us not to support the proposition, upon the ground that it would take $600,000 or $700,000 from the revenue, and we all know he wanted it all very badly. He had deficits impending, and he knew perfectly well that without the revenue from tobacco his deficits would be much greater. I was lately delighted to learn that the tobacco growing interest would at last receive that attention from this Government which it failed to get from the late Administration. And I am glad also to know that the Government have, as a consequence, relaxed those stringent provisions which deterred the ordinary agriculturist from trying to raise tobacco. We do not yet know the extent of the capacities of Canada for that immensely valuable crop, a crop more valuable than any other that can be raised; and we do not know, because it has been the persistent policy of hon. gentlemen opposite to trip up the farmer by means of the tax-gatherer, who has stood at his back, and if he raised ten pounds of tobacco, has watched him, because the Government wanted a large revenue from that plant, it being absolutely necessary to the late Administration, as a consistent part of its policy, to wring from such industries the means of carrying on its operations, and meeting its extravagant expenses.

Mr. VALLÉE (in French.) Mr. Speaker, as the representative of a county which is largely interested in the cultivation and the manufacture of tobacco, I consider that it is my duty to express my astonishment at the change of policy just adopted by the Government in proposing this resolution. The members of the Province of Quebec have had a few interviews with the Minister of the Interior; we informed him of our views and of the wishes of that part of the population interested in the culture and sale of tobacco. When the hon. Finance Minister developed his financial exposé, he informed us of the decisions the Government had come to, and it was to the effect that the sale of leaf tobacco should be free; that the tax on tobacco, in coils, should be 4 cents; on manufactured tobacco, 8 cents, and on cigars, 18 cents. We were glad to hear of such a policy, and announced it to our electors. We asked them if these changes would give them satisfaction. They answered affirmatively, and steps have already been taken to reap the benefits of the new law. Yesterday, upon seeing the present resolution on the Orders of the Day, I enquired of the Minister to whose lot it was to present it, whether such was really the policy of the Government, for it was its policy; we were about to take new steps in order to have it modified, and to obtain a return to the policy announced by the hon. Minister of Finance. I was answered that the resolution was wrongly worded; that it had been badly translated, and that the translation did not give a version of what was in the Bill. But what is now my astonishment, when I hear the hon. Secretary of State expose as the policy of the Government, with regard to Canadian tobacco, precisely the one contained in the resolution. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to declare that we have been twice deceived. The question may appear unimportant in itself, but it is one of great interest to our farmers, who are all affected by it, especially in our district. I think that the resolution should embody the policy foreshadowed by the hon. Minister of Finance. It has been said that licenses had been abolished and that the farmer might cultivate tobacco in any quantity without a license, yet I do not see anything of the kind in the resolution submitted to us. I do not see that the principle announced by the hon. Minister of Finance is mentioned in that resolution. Now, according to the change that has just been made, we have, perhaps, cause to fear that if that resolution is adopted, the Bill will contain some further restrictions, and I would like to have on that point some more definite and more lucid explanations. Is the sale of leaf tobacco to be free? That is, will the farmer be at liberty to sell leaf tobacco in the same way as he sells his other products? If I have understood aright the explanations of the hon. Secretary of State, he says that the farmer is to have the right to sell his leaf tobacco to licensed merchants only. Now, are these merchants to have the right to dispose of leaf tobacco in any way they may see fit? If they are to have that right, why not extend it to the farmers? But if the licensed merchant does not himself possess the right to sell leaf tobacco, if he is in his turn compelled to sell it to manufacturers or place it in bond, I maintain that the farmer is entirely deprived of the advantages accruing from the sale of tobacco. If there is a desire to foster the cultivation of tobacco, some advantage should be granted to the grower. We know that the National Policy has for an object not only the encouraging of the manufacturer but also the producer. Now, I contend that in the present case the law, such as amended, does not encourage the producer. When the farmers are being discouraged, one does but make a semblance of giving them a market. They are told that they shall sell their leaf tobacco to the merchant; but why place this middle-man between the grower and the manufacturer? In many cases the merchant will not buy his tobacco, or, if he buys it, he will offer him a low price, so as to be able, in his turn, to sell it to the manufacturer. As will be perceived, this arrangement is totally against the grower. Let him be allowed to sell his tobacco to the manufacturer direct, or to dispose of it freely on the market, and then the manufacturer will go into the market to get his stock, just as every other manufacturer has to do to procure the raw material necessary to his industry. A great deal of noise is being made about the removal of the obligation to take licenses. It is said that the grower will have the right of cultivating tobacco for his own use, but that is nothing new; he enjoyed that right in the past. The only change made is a small affair; it is simply to the effect that the grower will not be required to take out a license to cultivate tobacco, and that the Department of Inland Revenue, instead of ascertaining from the grower the quantity of tobacco manufactured, will seek that information from the manufacturer or from the buyer, and consequently the same restriction which existed formerly as to the cultivation of tobacco will still exist, as the grower is not at present free to cultivate and sell his tobacco. Now, what is asked is that that restriction shall be removed, and, in removing it, no serious damage will be done to the revenue. I heard the hon. Minister of Finance tell us that the proposed law would bring about a decrease in the revenue of about $50,000. I do not know whether I have wrongly understood him, or whether his words have been incorrectly reported; but it is impossible that the revenue will be reduced by a sum of $50,000, if the grower is allowed to cultivate freely leaf tobacco. During the year which has closed, the sale of Canadian tobacco, manufactured or not, has brought in to the revenue about $15,000. Now, the only result that might follow from allowing the grower the free sale of tobacco in leaf, would be to make the Government incur a loss of $15,000; but the Government would in reality not lose that amount, as it would no longer have to employ a number of officials at an expenditure of about $7,000. Consequently, if, on the one hand, the expenditure is diminished by $7,000, the loss to the Treasury will be very small. It is known that the cultivation of tobacco is a most important question to our farmers. Compensations have been granted to the other Provinces; Manitoba has been granted privileges; privileges have also been granted to the Lower Provinces; why should not, therefore a few advantages be granted to the farmers of the Province of Quebec? The Government enjoys a considerable revenue, and it has this year an enormous surplus. It has encouraged trade by removing the stamp duty off promissory notes; this has diminished its revenue by about $200,000; why should the Government not make the experiment of allowing farmers the free sale of leaf tobacco? Let the manufacturer of Canadian tobacco be assisted by the imposing of a light duty, say of 6 or 8 cents per lb., so as to bring him into competition with the foreign manufacturers. I think that such a policy would be agreeable to the country, and that the farmers would be satisfied. The Government is in a very prosperous condition, and the time has come to make the experiment. I very much regret the attitude taken by the Government on that question, and if the opportunity occurs, I intend to express my views more pointedly than I am doing at present. I say, therefore, that the Government is, with the present resolution, deceiving the House and the country. The hon. Finance Minister, in his speech on the Budget, told us what the policy of the Government was; and now, without any notice, the hon. Secretary of State presents a resolution which differs entirely from the declarations of the hon. Finance Minister, and then we are told that this resolution is erroneous. Now, I contend that in the face of such a statement our request should be granted, and the Tariff should be established, such as it was announced by the hon. Finance Minister, for the country is cognizant of his declarations. By presenting the resolution the Government has afforded a member of the Opposition the opportunity of making a little malicious, political capital, or showing, for the benefit of his party. Perhaps I am contributing a little myself to do harm to the reputation of the Government, but I would fain believe, as has been said, that the resolution is erroneous. I would fain believe that the declaration made to me by the Secretary of State is correct and true; that the Bill will differ from the resolution, and this Committee will so amend the resolution as to make it agree with the declarations of the hon. Finance Minister, or if at every change in the Tariff, the policy of the Government is to be in contradiction with its resolutions, what dependence can be placed on such legislation? None. I see that, according to that resolution, it is intended to place the duty on rolled tobacco at 8 cents. The hon. member for Montcalm (Mr. Dugas) differs with us on this point; he wishes to abolish this mode of manufacturing tobacco; nevertheless, in certain parts of the country, the farmer is desirous of being free thus to prepare his tobacco. It is known that rolled tobacco is a purely Canadian industry, and were this privilege taken from our farmers, the effect would be to deprive them, without any corresponding advantage to the Government, of a liberty which is ever valued by those who enjoy it. I, therefore, hope that the Government will reconsider the question, and I ask that the duty on tobacco in coil be left at 4 cents. It is pretended that the decrease of duty from 14 to 8 cents, would have the effect of establishing a number of manufactories of Canadian tobacco. But, Mr. Speaker, I have gone in quest of information among the Quebec manufacturers, and I think it will be very difficult to establish manufactories of Canadian tobacco even at that rate of 8 cents per lb., and this is the reason why: Upon hearing of the changes which the Government intended making in the Tariff, certain parties immediately resolved to get ready to start a manufactory. They entered into a correspondence on the subject, and a Mr. Haggarty, of Upper Canada, replied that he would not sell his tobacco, after keeping it stored and drying so that it would be suitable for manufacturing purposes, at less than 12 cents per lb., or otherwise he would incur a loss. Now, if the manufacturer cannot get the Canadian leaf at less than 12 cents per lb., he will not be able to manufacture Canadian tobacco in such a manner as to compete to any advantage with the manufacturers of foreign tobacco. It is true that between the tax on manufactured Canadian tobacco and foreign manufactured tobacco there is a difference of 12 cents per lb.; but this difference is almost reduced to nothing by the price of the leaf, for the foreign leaf is sold at from 4 to 5 cents per lb., and even 3 cents, and this foreign tobacco leaf is better adapted to manufacture than the Canadian leaf. It is a well known fact that the Canadian leaf is coarser and that it weighs a great deal more; a pound of Canadian tobacco yields a quarter less in leaves than foreign tobacco, and consequently the Canadian leaf is in a very disadvantageous position to compete with the foreign leaf. Moreover, the few manufacturers of foreign tobacco in this country would wish to manufacture Canadian tobacco likewise; they have the machinery necessary to do so, but a restriction of the Department of Inland Revenue prevents them from manufacturing Canadian tobacco in the same establishment. Now, as the question comes before us of amending the law, I think that the Government should reconsider this point and allow these manufacturers to manufacture Canadian together with foreign tobacco, and in the same establishment. The answer to this is, and it is the answer of the officials of the Department of Inland Revenue, that frauds will be committed, and that it will be very hard to control their operations. On the other hand, manufacturers tell me that it would be as easy for the Government to control these operations as those concerning foreign tobacco, for the duties on foreign tobacco are paid in bond. Now, could not the same be done in the case of Canadian tobacco? Before such tobacco went into the factory the collector of revenue could collect the duty, and thus the interests of the Government would be safe. It is said, also, that the manufacturer of foreign tobacco would be tempted to largely mix the Canadian with the foreign leaf. Not so, for the weight of the Canadian leaf, and then the duty to be paid on it, as if it were foreign unmanufactured tobacco, would completely take away the profit which the manufacturer would wish to realize; consequently he is not interested in defrauding the revenue, and in mixing Canadian with foreign tobacco. I hope, therefore, that the Government will postpone this resolution for a few days, so that we may again submit these considerations to it. With regard to the manufacturing of tobacco into cigars, the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue has again changed, on this point, the declarations made by the hon. Finance Minister, who said, in his speech on the Budget, that the duty would amount to 18 cents per lb., whilst we find that in this resolution it is fixed at 20 cents. Well, if the Government wishes to encourage the creation of manufacturers of tobacco, I think it should show itself a little more generous; it will be free in future to amend the law; but why not for two years to come give greater freedom to the manufacturer? The only consideration which might prevent its doing so would be the loss of that source of revenue; but there is a considerable surplus in the Treasury this year, and I do not know why the Government, which is desirous of encouraging the growth and manufacture of Canadian tobacco, does not seriously foster it by favoring the establishment of new manufacturers. I think that with these few modifications the changes proposed by the Government would give satisfaction to the House and to the country. Besides, it is the Province of Quebec alone which produced nearly all the tobacco which is manufactured in the country. We see by public documents that last year, in the Province of Ontario, but 4,404 lbs. of tobacco were manufactured, whereas in the Province of Quebec the duty imposed on the cultivation of that plant amounted to about $15,000. Well, I think, that when, to please the Province of Ontario, the Province of Quebec pays $53,000 duty on flour, one might easily make us a present of a slight difference of $15,000. Such are the views which I have thought it my duty to submit to the Government in the interests of my constituents, and of the whole Province of Quebec. I regret that I should have been obliged to make these declarations and to assume the attitude which I have taken with regard to the resolution submitted by the Government, for its general policy enjoys my confidence, and I have always supported it up to to-day; but it seems to me that, under these circumstances, which affect equally all its supporters from the Province of Quebec, the Government should give us satisfaction by acceding to our wishes, and not place us in the humiliating position of having to go to our electors and tell them that we had been deceived when we announced that the policy of the Government would be so-and-so, or else that they themselves had been deceived when a policy was announced that had not any existence. It is a position that, for me, it will be hard to endure, and the Government should, I think, consider the false position in which it has placed us.

Mr. GIGAULT. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) say that he never decried the culture of tobacco in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. LAURIER. Certainly, I never did.

Mr. GIGAULT. I will read the speech of the hon. member, made on the 23rd of April, 1878, on this question. One hon. member had proposed to remove the duty on Canada tobacco, and the hon. member for Quebec East answered in this way :

" Was this country adapted to the cultivation of tobacco? * * * It was well known that, above all in the Province of Quebec, and in the Maritime Provinces, and also in Ontario, we could not produce tobacco which could enter into successful competition with the foreign grown article. We produced an inferior quality of tobacco, which was used for local purposes. The agricultural class was frugal and economical and it produced tobacco for its own consumption, but, on the other hand, it was equally certain that it was perfectly impossible to raise, in Canada, tobacco which could enter into successful competition with the foreign article, for the simple reason that we had not the climatic conditions necessary to its growth. The Province of Quebec, above all, and all the Provinces east of Quebec, could not raise tobacco on a considerable scale, for the simple reason that their climatic conditions were not proper to the growth of this plant, which was excessively sensible to such conditions. Again, our seasons were too short to admit of its successful cultivation; spring was too late and autumn came too soon; and, under the best possible climatic conditions, the tobacco which we cultivate could never attain maturity. The farmers were obliged to take it in before it arrived to perfect maturity, and then very frequently in Lower Canada, they were visited with frosts during the earliest months of summer, even in July and August, and it was known that tobacco was extremely sensible to changes of temperature and of the weather; and, under these circumstances, as an article of commerce, it lost much of its value, suffering in flavor and quality, and failing to command the price which it would otherwise secure. Owing to these considerations, the argument of his hon. friend lost much of its force. The object of the motion was to encourage the cultivation of tobacco in Canada, though of all the plants that Lower Canada could cultivate, the last thing which they could cultivate was tobacco, which could not become for them an article of export."

So our opponents are not satisfied in saying that our coal is not good, but they say that our tobacco is not good, and they go so far as to say that our climate is not good. But I agree with the hon. member for Quebec East on one proposition. He says :

" In a civilized country to pretend that tobacco ought to be exempted from taxation, is an error. It was above all, an article in which a revenue ought to be raised by every Government."

I believe, with the hon. gentleman, that a duty should be imposed on tobacco, because it is not an article which is absolutely necessary. The measure proposed by the Government is certainly a great improvement on the law adopted by the late Government under which no protection at all was afforded for the home-grown tobacco. The law as enacted by the late Government encouraged the foreign producer and the manufacture of foreign leaves, and the law proposed to-day is of such a character that the manufacturers in the Province of Quebec, will buy a very large quantity of leaf from Canadian producers, thus freeing the farmers from an injustice to which they have been subjected for a number of years. The object of this law is to encourage the culture of home-grown tobacco, and we know that we import every year about 10,000,000 lbs. of American leaf, and if the Government so amend the Bill that manufacturers shall buy that from our farmers instead of from abroad, they will do a great benefit to our farmers. The duty under the late Government was 20 cents per lb. on tobacco manufactured in Canada, and the present Government reduces that duty from 20 to 8 cents per pound, so that there will be a considerable loss to the revenue of the country. We have to make that loss good by increasing, as the Secretary of State says, the duty on twist tobacco from 4 to 8 cents. But I may say that I do not like that provision, for I would rather have the duty on common twist tobacco only 4 cents the lb., as it was before. At the same time I acknowledge the force of the argument used by the Secretary of State that we can make the loss good by the arrangement he proposes. I think this measure is a great improvement on the others which existed before, and I do not see how our opponents, who always pretended that Canadian tobacco is not good for anything, can now take so much interest in the Canadian producer.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I must say that on this question I concur with a good deal of what has been said by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée). The hon. gentlemen who have just spoken seem to think the Government should encourage the culture of Canadian tobacco. I cordially share in this opinion, because since I have had the honor of a seat in this House I have always been opposed to the taxation of home-grown tobacco. The hon. Secretary of State proposes in his resolution to change the duty from 4 to 8 cents for Canada twist, that is Canadian tobacco which is rolled by our farmers. I do not think this increased duty will work in the sense of encouraging the culture of tobacco by our farmers, and of meeting thereby the wish expressed by the hon. member for Portneuf. I think if you wish to encourage the culture of Canadian tobacco you must cease to levy any duty upon it at all. Our farmers must be left free to raise, manufacture and sell their tobacco to whom they please and under whatever form they please. If I understand this resolution rightly you propose to compel the farmer to pay a duty on his manufactured tobacco, but to let him sell the leaf duty free. Very well, but you impose upon him the restriction of selling that tobacco to some particular individuals—to the manufacturers—and this restriction will certainly hurt his intention in the sale of his tobacco. Suppose the manufacturers agree to fix a price for the Canadian tobacco, the farmer is bound to accept that price and to submit to the conditions made by the manufacturers. I have some knowledge of the independent spirit of Canadian farmers and do not hesitate to say that they will not accept willingly this restriction. They desire to be left perfectly free to sell their tobacco to whom they please, duty free, and under whatever form they please; and I think that it is the only way you can encourage the culture of that plant. I would like to see the Government encouraging that article of farm produce. This Government pretends to give to the farmers the control of our national market by the operation of the Tariff with regard to all our farm produce. In my opinion that is one of the very few articles of farm produce in respect to which you can give protection to the Canadian farmers, by giving them the control of the national market. The Government can very easily give to the farmers complete control of our national market for the sale of their tobaccos. We do not produce enough for home consumption, and we are bound to import it. Therefore, impose heavy duties on imported tobaccos, and levy no duties at all upon the home-grown article, and you will have secured, in my humble opinion, the surest way of encouraging the production of tobacco in Canada.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I do not intend to enter into the discussion on the question, but I must say I was astonished to hear the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) depreciating his country. He says the State of Ohio and other western countries, with regard to the production of tobacco and cereals, are superior to any country in the world.

Mr. PLUMB. I say so now.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I am afraid my hon. friend has gone back to his original habit, when he lived in the United States, of depreciating Canada in every respect. He now comes and tells us—and his utterances are of course entitled to great weight—that the Province of Quebec cannot raise wheat at all; not only that, he says the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia cannot produce wheat and rye.

Mr. PLUMB. I never said any such thing.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. He certainly did say that Quebec could not produce its own wheat, and he said that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick could not produce wheat and rye. I think that is unworthy of my hon. friend thus to undervalue and depreciate his own country.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I do not propose to trouble myself much as to the views of the hon. member for Niagara, but I think it is time the hon. the Minister of Finance should explain to us the apparent contradiction that exists between the resolution under my hand and the statement formerly made by him on the occasion of his delivering the Budget Speech. My hon. friend for Quebec East read correctly, I think, a statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance, that the duty on Canada twist was to remain as it was; and here we find that, instead of being, as heretofore, 4 cents, it is to be raised to 8 cents per lb. Well, that is a very material alteration—an important departure—from the policy laid down by the hon. the Minister of Finance a few days ago, and I think we ought to have some explanation from him as to the reason why, apparently, these resolutions put a double duty on Canada twist. The other points we can discuss more advantageously in Committee, but I would like to hear the hon. Minister give some reason for putting an expressly made statement of that kind in his Budget Speech, and now, without any apparent reason, altering it in the mode in which it is proposed to be altered by the resolution brought down by the Secretary of State.

INLAND REVENUE ACT AMENDMENT.

On the order being called to resume the debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Mousseau, that the House go into Committee of the Whole, to consider a certain resolution respecting the duty on tobacco,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

THE NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That in the opinion of this House it is expedient to increase the number of the constables in the North-West Mounted Police Force to five hundred men, with twenty supernumeraries.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. On a former occasion I stated to the House the necessity the Government felt for increasing this force. The force has been very efficient and very valuable, and has done good service, on which the fact that peace has been preserved in the country for so long a time is sufficient evidence. As a preventive force, it has been almost perfect. It is found, however, that its strength is overtaxed. Again and again the Commissioner in charge of the force has represented that they are insufficient for the duties demanded of them, especially on the frontier, where, on more than one occasion, there has been great hazard of a collision with large forces of hungry and, therefore, discontented Indians. By a mixture of courage and discretion these occasions have passed by without collision; yet I need not remind the Committee of the continuous danger which exists of collision, and the necessity of endeavoring to avoid it by all means in our power. There seems to be a general consensus of opinion that the strong pressure brought to bear on the Government and on Parliament by the officers in command should result in an increase in the force. So long as the Indians were alone with a few Government officials and persons of a superior class, they were kept under control; but that control is passing away, as it has passed away in the United States, with the influx into the country of persons of all ranks and all degrees of intelligence and morals; and as in the western States, there is great danger—happily we have avoided it hitherto—of collision between the Indians and the white settler going in there and thinking that he can treat these wild sons of the prairie as he would a fellow white man. The Commissioner has reported again and again on that point. I will not now weary the Committee by reading his report, but I will just recall to them these repeated recommendations in favor of an increase of the force. The same opinion has been expressed by almost every person who has written on the North-West, and I would quote from a very able and sensible letter of the special correspondent of the Globe, written in November last. He enters into an account of the different Indian tribes—the Bloods, Piegans, and the Blackfeet—and proceeds to say:

"If so, there may be serious trouble brewing, for the Bloods, Blackfeet, and other wild Indians of the South are not the class of men to be trifled with. They are, I think, more resolute and warlike than the Crees and Saulteaux of the North, and should they once break out in defiance of the police, I cannot but shudder to think of the possible results. Though so far the police have been able to make arrests of Indian depredators in the face of overwhelming odds, the general impression among the best informed frontiersmen is that this game of bluff is about played out, and that the day when three or four red-coated prairie troopers, through sheer pluck and coolness, can overawe a large band of Bloods, Piegans, or Blackfeet, is now nearly or quite passed by, and that in future the greatest caution will have to be exercised in dealing with these lawless, half-starved savages. Even now horse-stealing and cattle-lifting is going on in various quarters, in spite of the vigilance of the handfuls of police stationed at different points throughout this great stretch of country, and the settlers and ranchmen are threatening to take the law into their own hands. Should they do so, the most frightful results will be sure to follow and a general uprising of the Indian tribes might confidently be predicted. No matter what the cost may be, I think the police force should be doubled, and the Indian Commissioner invested for this winter at least, with absolute authority to grant to the Indians such supplies as may be necessary to keep them from starving to death. It will certainly be cheaper to feed these Indians than to fight them, and should they once set the authority of the Government at defiance, there is no force in this region that could reasonably be expected to enforce that authority in the presence of overwhelming numbers of hostile savages."

The article goes on to expatiate on this subject at considerable length. It is known that while there has been no actual outbreak, while through combined courage and discretion an outbreak has been prevented, yet, I regret to say, on two or three occasions, the forces of Indians were so overwhelming and their conduct so threatening, to the handful of police, that, ex necessitate, they were obliged to yield to the demands, sometimes insolently and arrogantly, with the consciousness of power pressed upon them by the starving Indians surrounding them. Of course, the less these facts are known the better, but I take the responsibility of stating, on the part of the Government, that they believe it is absolutely necessary to increase this force. In the Mounted Police Force Act which is now on the Statute-book, power is given to the Governor in Council, in cases of urgency, to increase the force from 300 to 500 men, but the words are such that I think the fair reading of the Statute is that the urgency must mean reasonable expectations of an immediate outbreak. And although it might warrant an increase of the force for a time to meet that anticipated outbreak, it would not be in spirit, although it might be in letter, sufficient authority to increase the force without the sanction of Parliament.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Of course, this is a very grave question. The proposed expenditure will, of necessity I fear, involve a permanent charge on the revenue. We are now going to have a force of 500, in place of 300 men, and, although no doubt the expenditure necessary to feed and maintain the men has been greatly reduced by the growth of the country, still I fear we cannot make up our minds, if the men are to be properly armed and equipped and supplied with a class of weapons thought necessary for such a force, that the expenditure cannot be much less than $450,000 a year. I forget at the moment what the hon. gentleman estimates, I think $430,000 or $435,000, but it will be, undoubtedly, close upon $450,000. I have looked over the hon. gentleman's report of the North-West. I do not know whether that report is intended to be supplemented or not. Is any other report to be brought down?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I think not.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Not at all events during this Session. I observe from the report that there is a very considerable number of other items in addition to the actual pay and maintenance of the force, for which a pretty heavy expenditure will shortly be required. If I recollect aright—I have not got the report here, but the hon. Minister can correct me if I am wrong—almost all the forts erected for the use of the troops have fallen more or less into decay, and will require to be either constructed anew, or repaired to such an extent as to amount almost to reconstruction. That, I think is the general tenor of the report. This is a matter to which I more than once called the hon. gentleman's attention, and I mentioned it to my colleagues in former times. I think it will be expedient to have a respectable number of pieces of cannon at headquarters; that is a thing which above all others gives trained troops an immense superiority over savage or half-disciplined men like the Indians, and, if I recollect aright, there are some pieces already in that country, but I do not know how many. The hon. member for Lambton says they were new when we got them; but, at all events, there are not more than half-a-dozen. That is a matter which deserves attention, and we require to have a considerable number of cannon and troops trained to their use. Then I notice that the officer in charge recommended the substitution of a new and somewhat expensive arm for the whole body of men under his command. I think he states that the arms which the troops already possess are of rather inferior quality, even inferior to those possessed by the tribes with whom the mounted police come in contact. I would also be glad to hear what scale of pay the hon. Minister proposes, the rate of pay for those men, particularly the 200 which are being added to the force, and the number of officers required for the troops. In connection with this I might say, it is quite clear that very great care will have to be taken in granting pasturage lands to the numerous candidates now applying for them. It is a very serious element in consideration of the policy of granting those lands, if a force of troops should be required for the purpose of protecting cattle on the ranches; and I think for that reason and others that very considerable care will have to be exercised in granting the numerous applications which are being made for those pasturage lands. I do not in the least degree object to such portions of the country suited to the purpose, being applied for, although it is provided that the Government retains the right of retaining portions of the land if found fit for agricultural purposes; but I think it would be an extraordinary course if we should place ranches in the midst of more or less turbulent tribes, who will be more tempted to commit depredations on cattle placed before their eyes than on any other form of property. I shall be glad to have some explanation as to what expenditure may be necessary in the various directions I have intimated, and this will be a good opportunity for the hon. gentleman to state somewhat in detail his policy with respect to granting cattle-ranches.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I feel very glad to have an opportunity of speaking on those points, although the subject of cattle ranches is not immediately germane to the motion before the Committee. The various forts in the North-West are, I believe, in a state of decay. They were built after the acquisition of the country. Fort Walsh comprises merely mud and brush huts, and the sashes and doors in these are crumbling and in a very bad state of repair. With respect to Fort Walsh, however, which is the chief fort on the frontier, it is proposed to break up that establishment, and the buildings will not be repaired. It is found that the fact of the force being direct on the frontier induces the Indians, returning from following the buffalo into the United States and afterwards returning, as they did last year, without being successful, to hang around the posts; there was not a very strong force there, and the Indians could not be removed, more especially as Fort Walsh is immediately opposite Wood Mountain and Cypress Hills, which have been, from time immemorial, gathering places for the Indian tribes. The policy of the Government is to endeavor to get all the Indian reserves to the north of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to remove them from the frontier, and, as much as possible, place a check on the depredations that are going on on both sides, American Indians coming into this country, and Canadian Indians crossing over to the other side. Those occasional depredations, which cannot be prevented, form the subject of correspondence between the Canadian and Washington Governments. Of course, when a complaint is made to Washington it is sent on here, and has to be dealt with. By removing the Indians to the north of the Pacific Railway, the danger of those lawless proceedings will be diminished, though I cannot hope they will be absolutely avoided. Then we propose to have some point selected on the Pacific Railway for the chief headquarters of the force, instead of its being on the frontier. They will be on the line of the railway, able to move east and west, and can easily, with some few outposts, keep the country between the Pacific Railway and the International Boundary in a state of order and peace. The selection of the point has not been settled. This selection is of very great importance, because the point selected will form the nucleus of a village or town—perhaps of a large town—and it will be the object of the Government to choose a favorable site, so that the Dominion may have some opportunity of selling lots at fancy prices, and thus more than recoup the Government for the expense of building barracks for the force. With reference to cannon, the force were given four light guns, I think, before we came in power. It is important there should be some one in the force capable of training the men in the use of cannon. I agree with the hon. member for Centre Huron that the exhibition of cannon to the Indian has a wholesome effect. Captain Cotton, an officer who has been trained in one of the batteries of artillery and is known to be a good artilleryman, has been transferred to the Mounted Police force, of which he is now the adjutant and is charged with the drilling of the men. The Commissioner speaks of the necessity of having the men armed with an improved style of arm. The truth is, our men are unevenly matched with the Indian in this respect. There are very few Winchester rifles owned by the force, while the western Indians are armed with these rifles which they obtain in the United States, and have besides, plenty of ammunition. Our men with the Snider carbine are therefore, not on equality with them. Now that there is very little buffalo coming north, we believe that judicious arrangements could be made with the Indians by which they would exchange their Winchester rifles for fowling pieces on being paid the difference in value.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the hon. gentleman proposes to exchange arms with the Indians?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; by furnishing them with fowling pieces in exchange for their Winchester rifles and paying the difference. I am told that a very considerable number of the Indians are ready to exchange on fair terms, the ordinary fowling pieces being quite sufficient for the game they can kill in future. The hon. gentleman asks about the pay of the force. The pay has been steadily decreasing until it has arrived at just the point which is sufficient to get men and no more, as the hon. gentleman will see by looking at the Bill. As to pasturage right, the hon. gentleman knows that from the International boundary along the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, the country is especially suited for pasturage. Leases are given to companies that undertake to bring in a certain amount of stock. These leases are carefully drawn, so as to prevent anything like obstruction to settlement. The Government can, at any time, for any reason whatever, abrogate a lease on two years notice, and besides that the Government can, at any time, when there is an appearance of immigration or tendency to settlement, resume possession of any tract that is wanted for settlement on making a corresponding reduction in the rental.

Mr. TROW. I do not rise to make any objection to an increase in the police force. I think the force is a very efficient one and it is essential an increase should be made in it, as it has a very large territory to superintend. I merely rise for the purpose of asking the Government whether the force could not be sub-divided in some way so that a portion would be stationed at Battleford or Prince Albert or Qu'Appelle, or any of those great centres of the North-West. I would ask further whether farms could not be established at those various places, and the force utilized at certain periods of the year in procuring hay for its use, the men receiving additional pay for this work. This would be beneficial to the health of the men, and be a very economical mode of procuring fodder for the animals. I merely ask for information in that respect.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The force has been distributed over various points; some men are stationed at Fort Walsh, some at Fort Calgary, some at Fort McLeod, some at Battleford, and some seven or eight at Qu'Appelle. The force is stationed at such points as the experience of the magistrates and the officers shows, may most need it. The main body will be held at some chief point on the Canadian Pacific Railway, so as to be able to supplement the force when wanted at any of the outlying positions. Those positions, of course, will change with the settlement of the country. We cannot foresee where the force will be most needed five years hence. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), has spoken of the men being utilized in raising hay, oats, and other crops. I am not sure the experiment would be successful. There is a police farm near Fort Calgary where the experiment was tried. But it is the opinion of all the officers, including the late Commissioner McLeod, and Col. Irvine, that they cannot be soldiers and farmers. With a very small force the duty has been so continuous and heavy that a great many men have been obliged to leave the force through physical inability to perform the service. Perhaps with a larger force the duty would not be so severe. But at several places the men have raised their own hay, and it is proposed their services shall be utilized whenever the point has been selected for the central barracks, as far as possible, in erecting the building. The men have raised hay, oats, vegetables and other crops, at Fort Calgary, but, I am told, the experiment has not been very successful. I have every confidence in the ability and desire of the present Commissioner to perform his duty, and to be as economical as possible, in order to save the country avoidable expense, by all the means in his power.

Mr. TROW. There is a small barracks at Qu'Appelle, where fifty men should be stationed. On one occasion nearly 3,000 Indians assembled there, for their pay, there being only six policemen present. The Hudson Bay officer stated there was great danger of an outbreak in consequence of the paymaster being three days behind time. A larger force would be required at such central point while the railway is under construction. I would further ask—can you not purchase the provisions necessary for the force from our own settlers? At Prince Albert there is quite a surplus of grain, as well as a mill. At present a large portion of the supplies is brought from the United States. I think our own settlers should get the preference even at an extra expense.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The force is supplied by tender; and hitherto, I fancy, the immigrants have consumed all the crops raised by their predecessors. We have been attempting, and, I think, successfully, to prevent such large assemblages of Indians as the hon. gentleman spoke of. They have been found very expensive. The Indians would not receive their pay till fed, and would not go away when so required, and there was, as the hon. gentleman stated, not sufficient force to make them leave. It was arranged to have the bands settle down, and pay the Indians only in small bodies on their own reserves. They are now not allowed to assemble in large numbers for their pay.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. There will probably be a considerable number of new officers required. Does the hon. gentleman propose to appoint them from the cadets of the Royal Military College? Because this is precisely the sort of service for which those young men were intended to be made available when that College was instituted. I think the present Minister of Justice, when Minister of Militia, repeatedly confirmed the statement that it was the intention of the Government to offer such appointments to those graduates.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not proposed to increase the number of officers, although the force is increased. It is rather over-officered. It was broken up into troops and divisions as of a cavalry regiment, the troops consisting of fifty or sixty men with three officers. Experience has shown there is no necessity for that large number. The troops will henceforth number 100 men, for which three officers will suffice. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that it is important to get the best material for the command of this force. Two appointments were made the other day to fill up vacancies in the staff of officers, both gentlemen, as far as I can learn, highly qualified for their positions. One is Mr. Perry, who carried off the chief prizes as a graduate of the Royal Military College, Kingston, and received a commission in the Royal Engineers, but who, from an accident which injured him, was obliged to resign it. He promises to be a most distinguished officer. I am happy to say that he is now well, and to all appearance as strong as ever. His appointment is considered most suitable. The other gentleman appointed is Mr. Prevost, who served in the "B" Battery of Artillery. He has been most highly recommended as a first rate officer, by the Commanding Officer, Major-General Strange. The vacant office of Superintendent has been given to Colonel Mackenzie, of the Militia, who commanded for a long time at Barrie, and is known to be a first rate officer. Those are the three officers added to the force since I assumed charge. The only other change is the resignation of Colonel McLeod, recently in command, who has resumed his original office of Stipendiary Magistrate. He has been succeeded by the Assist.-Commissioner, Colonel Irvine.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has not stated what proportion of the force he proposes to place at headquarters, the point on the line of railway which he designs as the central post.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There will be a varying quantity, I fancy. It is supposed that, of the 500 men, there will be always, at least, a force of 150 at the headquarters, ready to support the different outlying positions in case of exigency.

Mr. BLAKE. No doubt the circumstances of the country have changed very seriously, and it is not improbable that they may change still more. During the period I was in charge of the force, it was thoroughly organized upon the theory of headquarters, a central staff, one paymaster, etc. I found it was necessarily broken up into detachments, stationed in parts extremely remote, and inaccessible to each other for all ordinary purposes of discipline. It seemed to me, in that condition of the country, it was essential to recognize the necessity of dividing the force into groups with an efficient officer at a point somewhat decentralized, a policy which I found necessary when the men were to be paid. It is quite true the demands on the Mounted Police may have, to some extent, increased, owing to the settlement of the country, and the difficulties occasioned by the Indians wanting food. The hon. gentleman spoke of the labor being very severe. That must be largely in travelling, for I do not think there is much else for them to do unless they are engaged in fighting. But it must be observed that this very circumstance upon which the hon. gentleman proposes to restore the theory of a headquarters, is largely to diminish the necessity. When you find a long line of railway stretching through the country, with the proposed branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway stretching towards Edmonton, you find larger lines, it is true, but still the force can be moved largely by the assistance of locomotives. Therefore, it seems to me that irrespective of other considerations, the period of railway construction will, without doubt, greatly increase the degree of efficiency and render the usefulness of the force greater than at any other period. But taking all these circumstances into consideration the advantages thus secured are entirely overbalanced by the other changes in circumstances, so that the force requires to be nearly doubled, and here the situation becomes serious. The hon. gentleman says we must nearly double the force. I do not know what that may mean, but it seems to me impossible to set a limit to it. On a former occasion the hon. gentleman has said that we must feed the Indians in order to keep them quiet, and it now turns out that we must keep up the Mounted Police in order to keep the white men quiet. I do not know how far the proposed operations of the hon. gentleman with these guileless children of the prairie may be successful. He says he thinks he will induce them, with his well known powers of persuasion, and there is no doubt he has been able to exert great influence over persons much more astute than the children of the prairie, and some of whom I have the pleasure of looking upon at this moment—I say I do not know how far his great powers of persuasion may be successful with them. He says he may have convinced them that fowling pieces are necessary, but the observations he has just made indicate that he expects occasions to arise when the Indian may be supposed to pursue the larger game of mounted policemen, and when that comes I have no doubt the Winchester rifle would be an arm much more satisfactory than that which the hon. gentleman proposes to present them with. I, therefore, do not expect to hear next year of any extensive exchange made of Winchester rifles for fowling pieces, unless the hon. gentleman should pay for the Winchester rifles about double what they are worth. It does seem to me that the proposed changes, which of course, do not involve so large an expense as they otherwise might, because the rate of pay has been very properly reduced—involve a consideration of policy, and if the policy which is to be adopted is to have a headquarters, if it is thought necessary—and I do not say it may not be right to place so large a proportion of the force in different and isolated parts, as 350 or 400 men, and to leave only 150 at headquarters for the purpose of mobilization—then I think we are engaged in dealing with the Indians in a policy which may lead us a long way in point of expense. It seems to me we have got to warn, in the strongest way, the white settlers who are going into that country that they must take care of themselves to a great extent, and to take care of themselves by the exertion of that prudence, restraint and self-command which ought to be enjoined upon them, and by pursuing a course entirely different from that pursued by the adventurous person who has settled among the Indians, and whose conduct or cruelty has provoked some of the Indian difficulties. While we must give some reasonable protection, and I do not say that the Mounted Police ought to be disbanded, we have to avoid giving the people who are settling in the North-West the idea that a very large and continually increasing, expensive force is to be maintained there at the expense of the Dominion. At the earliest moment we ought to adopt some arrangements for the utilization of local forces, for the organization of the militia, and for their organization under, perhaps, a special system of officering, which should give some special advantages, incurring, perhaps, a greater expense, but giving a more efficient force, not merely in soldierly purposes, but also in those higher elements to which I have referred, self-restraint and moderation in the use of power. But to control the North-West by a large and extensive force of this kind would be an undertaking which I, for one, shrink from contemplating.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with my hon. friend in much he has said. Of course a force of 500 men can act as peace officers, serve processes, take prisoners and guard the courts, and do the whole of the work that has been done by the peace officers that are scattered over the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Five hundred men is not too large a force for this purpose. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that eventually that country should be organized under a special system, like a militia force, so as to perform the duty of keeping the peace and, when called upon, to aid the civil power, just as they are in the rest of the Dominion, but at this moment I am afraid that as between the white man and the Indian, the Indian will get the worst of it. Perhaps one danger as great as any in connection with the militia is that of the too active interference of the ordinary magistracy of the country. I might mention one instance of that kind which occurred. There was a rumor arrived at Prince Albert that an outbreak of Indians had taken place to the south, and one magistrate gave a requisition, calling out a newly formed militia company, and they started, fully armed to suppress the infant rebellion. They went down and if they had unfortunately come in contact with the Indians we might have had an Indian war. Luckily, however, they were met by an officer of the police force who remonstrated with them, sent them back, and quieted what was only after all an Indian riot. The hon. gentleman supposes this is a new plan with reference to having headquarters. The force always had headquarters, there having been about 125 men at Fort Walsh, and it is necessary to carry on discipline and training that a considerable force should be kept at headquarters. Those hon. gentlemen who have had military experience will know that a regiment scattered in detachments in order to be skilled and efficient in soldiering qualities are obliged to be kept together in large bodies in order to be worked up to the proper standard. That is one object we have had in view; but there is another, viz., the knowledge of a force at a central point, whence they can be moved east or west at any time at the shortest notice to give that support to the various outlying bodies which experience shows to be required. Of course we have to depend very much on the local authorities, the Indian Commissioner, the Lieutenant-Governor, and the Commissioner and Commander of the Forces—as to where men are required. We must trust very much to the reports of the officers on the subject, and I have every confidence, that with this additional force of police, the country may be reasonably expected to be as quiet for the next ten years as it has been for the last ten years.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am not at all satisfied as to the necessity for increasing the force. I can recollect that, in the early days of the late Administration, there was a military force stationed in Manitoba, and a police force was organized in the same year, and we were constantly receiving, for nearly two years, the most alarming letters, giving accounts of anticipated raids and other troubles by the Indians and others. We had to pay some regard to these communications, of course, but we never found anything serious resulting. A very bad class of white settlers came in from the western States, travelling northward, and bringing with them whiskey and other spirituous liquors. We succeeded, in the first two years, in forcing all that element out of the country. I do not think there are any very dangerous characters now in the Territories compared with what there were at the time I refer to, and I fear that the hon. gentleman has been receiving, as we did, letters from parties who are interested or afraid, and who desire to have a military force in their own immediate vicinity. The moral effect on the Indians of an armed force of 300 or 400 men is quite as great as if the number was 1,000. If the Indians determined on resistance even the force that the hon. gentleman proposes to organize, with the existing force, would have small effect upon them. On the other hand, if as a simple expression of opinion of the central authority, 300 would be quite equal in effect to a thousand. I only ask the hon. gentleman to consider whether the representations he has received are not from the same class of individuals as those to which I have referred. I remember some of them were from the very highest authorities in the country, and that they were of a very alarming character. We were first dissuaded from depending on the militia force, and as soon as the police force was organized we received similar manifestations from parties who should have been above that, and should have known that all that is required—at least, that is my opinion—is, that the Indians should be fairly treated, that promises should be kept with them, and that no Indian agents should be permitted to traffic or trade with them in bounties or money; in short, that we should avoid those causes of trouble which caused disaster south of the boundary, and not trust to a mere expression of physical force.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am quite satisfied that the addition to the force will add to the safety and security of the country, and will give greater assurance to those who go to make it their home, and when the settlement of the country, which now promises to be very rapid, takes place, necessities for keeping up the force may be removed or at least diminished. Of course, it can very readily be diminished at any time if deemed necessary.

Mr. THOMPSON. I notice that, on a question which I asked the right hon. gentleman the other day, I am reported to have spoken of "old" volunteers, and I find by the answer of the right hon. gentleman that he misunderstood me. If I used the expression, I used it in a figurative sense. I wish, however, to draw the right hon. gentleman's attention to the position of the volunteers, as a class who deserve well at the hands of this country; and if by any means a few of them could be brought to present themselves for places upon this force, they would find them most efficient. They would appreciate such a trust very much I am sure; and their being placed upon the force would be a grand thing for the country, as well as for the force itself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We shall be glad to have able-bodied volunteers of the age of from eighteen to forty years, who are able to read and write and able to pass the medical examination required. In a few days, if the increase is sanctioned, those in the west will be asked to go to Toronto, and if they pass an examination, then they will be accepted. First come, first served.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would suggest that a certain number—say one or two—of names should be forwarded, say by the commanding officer of each battalion, out of which a number might be selected. I see that, according to the rate of pay, artisans are to receive 50 cents per day. I presume that is in addition to the regular pay.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. ANGLIN. There is, unfortunately, some reason to apprehend that this Indian question may any day become a very serious one in the North-West, now that settlers are pouring so rapidly into that country. I rise to call the hon. gentleman's attention to a statement made to me, a few days ago, by a gentleman who has spent a large portion of his life in that country, and is personally familiar with much that is going on there. He said that, in his opinion, a mistake had been committed in breaking up the Indian bands into so many small bands, who are scattered about on small reservations through so large a portion of the territory. I presume the policy was to prevent the Indians from feeling their strength too much by bringing them together in large bodies, and so, perhaps, encouraged them to make demands which otherwise they would not be inclined to make, and give trouble which otherwise they would not be able to give. But he apprehends that as the white men settle in the neighborhood of these Indian reserves, they will follow in what appear to be the instincts of the white men on this continent, viz.: to trespass on the choicest lands held by the Indians, and thus inevitably bring about trouble, and that blood once shed will continue to flow, possibly, until the race is almost extirpated. He says also that if the Indians were on larger reservations and kept more to themselves, the efforts of the Indians to become cultivators of the soil would be more successful than they are likely to be under the present circumstances.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No doubt the hon. gentleman has brought up a very important point. The Indian reserves are provided for by treaties made with the Indians and selected by those Indians themselves. I am strongly inclined to doubt the accuracy of the judgment of the informant of my hon. friend. I think that the congregating of a large number of Indians in one place is a source of greater danger than their being scattered abroad in various reserves.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

INSPECTION OF STEAMBOATS.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient further to amend and consolidate as amended, the Act 31 Victoria, Chapter 65, and the Acts amending it, respecting the Inspection of Steamboats, and for the greater safety of passengers by them.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The resolution does not indicate at all the change which the hon. gentleman contemplates. It is defective in that respect and I think he ought to explain it.

Mr. McLELAN. The object of the Bill is to consolidate the various amendments made by the Inspection Act, and to provide more fully for the inspection of the hulls of ships. The inspectors of steamboats are men mainly qualified to inspect boilers and machinery. It is proposed to appoint men specially qualified to inspect the hulls of vessels, and the certificates of both classes of inspectors will be necessary for a ship to be pronounced seaworthy. Regulations are also made to fix the number of passengers which each boat shall be allowed to carry. These are the two main features of the Bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The rules require that, on any Bill relating to trade or to alter the laws concerning trade, being brought into the House, the proposition must first be submitted in Committee of the Whole. This is a simple notice of the Minister's intention to bring in some amendments, and I object to it as being entirely out of order.

Mr. McLELAN. The only change proposed to be made is to consolidate the law, and to define clearly the mode of appointment and qualifications of the inspectors.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course it is more than a consolidation, because the resolution tells us that "it is expedient further to amend and consolidate as amended," the various Acts. The objection of the hon. member for Lambton is that the whole purpose of the rule, which is to give the House an opportunity to make any suggestions they wish, is entirely thwarted, unless in some sort the substance, the essence, of the proposed legislation is stated in the resolution upon which the House goes into Committee. That is the difficulty—how are we to know that it is expedient to alter anything unless we know what the alteration is?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The House can pass a resolution, no matter how vague in its terms, declaring that it is expedient to amend the Act. The House can ask for a most specific statement unless it is fully satisfied with that made.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not think it is open to the House to adopt that course. It laid down very clearly that no Bill is to be brought in until the proposition has been first considered in Committee of the Whole. I ask the right hon. gentleman if he will state from the paper what the statement is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That it is expedient to amend and consolidate the Acts. A clearer or more specific statement could not be made.

Mr. BLAKE. What is to be considered is the proposition contained in the Bill. It is not sufficient that the Act shall be amended, but it shall be amended in some particular way, and it is that proposition that shall be submitted to the Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER decided that the rule, as generally understood and interpreted by late English practice, simply required the House to go into Committee to consider a general proposition setting forth the expediency of bringing in a measure on a particular question; and that consequently in his opinion the proposed motion came sufficiently within the meaning of the rule.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I think there is no necessity for this legislation in regard to an Inspector of Steamboats, because the law already provides that no one shall be appointed an inspector unless he is qualified to inspect the hull as well as the machinery and boiler. The Act of 1868 provides for the appointment of an Inspector of Steamboats and the second section sets forth that no person shall be appointed to inspect steamboats unless he has previously passed a satisfactory examination before the Board of Steamboat Inspectors as to his knowledge on the subject of hulls, boilers and the machinery of steamboats and the working of them. Accordingly, no Inspector can be appointed unless he is qualified to inspect the hull as well as the boiler and machinery.

Mr. McLELAN. If the ships were of iron the same officer would be competent to inspect the hull as well as the machinery and boiler, but in the case of wooden ships an Inspector should possess practical experience in the construction of such vessels. In practice the inspection of hulls has been neglected, and many accidents have been attributed to the want of that inspection.

Mr. McCUAIG. The existing Inspectors are not qualified to give an opinion as to the soundness and proper construction of hulls. Before the Bill was introduced the Minister kindly gave me an idea of its scope, and my experience, extending over twenty years, convinces me that the present Inspectors are unacquainted with the construction of vessels. In consequence of that the unfortunate London disaster took place. I, myself, consider, from many years' experience, that a hull inspector is necessary.

Mr. BLAKE. There must be a frightful amount of fiction in the Board of Steamboat Inspection reports if my hon. friend's experience be well founded. Since 1868, it has been provided that after the 1st January, 1869, no person shall be appointed Inspector of Steamboats until he has passed a satisfactory examination before the Board of Steamboat Inspection, as to his knowledge of hulls, boilers, machinery of steamboats and the working of the same, and received from the Chairman of the Board a certificate, in writing, to that effect. If none of the Inspectors know anything at all about hulls, though they have of course all received the necessary certificates from the Chairman of the Board, the Bill should contain a clause to remove the Chairman of the Board.

Mr. McCALLUM. Was the Chairman of the Board himself qualified? The Steamboat Inspection Law has been altered several times by Order in Council. I am satisfied we have not men in this country who can combine the two requisites, that is, can pronounce at the same time on the engine and boiler and on the hull of a vessel as well as on her equipment, and decide, if she is a passenger boat, what number of passengers she ought to be allowed to carry. There is no country that I know of where there have been less accidents under this law than this country. So far as the London accident is concerned, it was owing to the overloading of passengers, and not to the inspection at all. The boat was but a scow, and left the wharf with about three times the number of passengers she could carry on board. This Bill, so far as I can see, is intended to give greater security to life and property by providing safeguards as much as possible against such or other accidents.

Mr. McCUAIG. My hon. friend from Durham will remember the case of the Jane Miller which came up before the courts of law. Nearly all the inspectors in that part of the country where the disaster occurred were examined as to her seaworthiness, and were found to be ignorant of the construction of a vessel. There should be proper inspectors appointed, qualified to pronounce on the hull and construction of a vessel whose certificates would relieve owners from all responsibility. This Bill is framed I think with great care, and provides that the inspector of the hull shall be a ship-carpenter.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us whether a vessel has to be certified by the Chairman of the Board.

Mr. McCUAIG. The Chairman is, no doubt, well qualified to give a certificate as far as the engine and boiler are concerned, but he does not profess to be qualified to give a certificate as to the hull examination.

Mr. BLAKE. But he does give it.

Mr. McCUAIG. All-I can say is that, during the time of the Mackenzie Administration, the same gentleman was allowed to remain as Chairman of the Board of Inspection, although not as well qualified as he should be. The London accident drew my attention, as it did that of other steamboat owners, to the necessity of having an inspector of hulls, and I called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine to it. It was proved in that case beyond doubt that there was a bar of iron over the boiler on deck to keep it in place, and that the boiler was supposed to be fastened below by a bolt. The evidence showed that the vessel was too shallow in the hull. The engineer was unable to fasten the boiler by that necessary bolt, and the consequence was, when the vessel canted, the boiler slipped overboard. There was a want, in the first place, of a skilled mechanic to build the vessel, and great carelessness, in the second place, on the part of the inspector.

Mr. BLAKE. Will my hon. friend say whether this serious defect in the fastening of the boiler would come under the supervision of the hull or the machinery inspector. There might be a conflict of responsibility here.

Mr. McLELAN. It would be part of the duty of the inspector of the boiler and machinery to see that the boiler was properly attached.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any provision for more than one inspection in the year? I think it is essentially necessary to have inspections at different times. Boats efficient at the beginning of the season, may become unseaworthy towards the fall. I think provision for the inspection of cargoes—to see whether they are safely stowed—should also be made. The loss of the Jane Miller seemed due to the fact that she had no ballast, and when she turned sideways to go in to the wharf she suddenly upset. Provision should be made to ascertain whether cargoes are properly distributed, and whether the boats are in proper condition at different periods of the season.

Mr. McCALLUM. If the boats were to be inspected at different periods of the season they could do no work. A hull is supposed good for five or six years, and the engines and boilers are inspected every spring. Who is to know better than the man who sails a vessel whether the cargo is properly distributed? His own life is at stake in the matter. I was sorry to hear my hon. friend behind me finding fault with the Steamboat Inspector on account of the accident at London, for which he was not to blame. Against that accident provision could hardly have been made. Under this Act mistakes and accidents, such as we have seen, will be provided against, because the shipbuilder will give a certificate as to the number of passengers a boat is qualified to carry; and there must be additional life-preservers. That, I believe, is the object of the Bill. If you inspected those vessels more than once a year, their owners might as well burn them up. As to my hon. friend's remark that a vessel owner should be exempt from all damages, if possessed of a certificate of inspection, I reply he may mismanage his vessel; there may be some other cause for an accident than defects of the boiler or machinery. There may be faults in navigating, and he ought to be responsible for all damages. This Bill is necessary in the interest of steamboat men as well as in the interest of life and property.

Mr. McCUAIG. The object contemplated by the inspection of steamboats is security to life and property. By this Bill the hon. Minister is endeavoring to secure the services of proper and competent men to run those vessels, not only mariners, but engineers acquainted with the construction of engines. In addition, the Bill requires that a skilful ship carpenter, of experience and judgment, shall inspect the vessel. When that is done, the owner has performed all he is able to do, and all that the law requires, as a matter of course, is a certificate. Should an accident happen after the vessel has been approved by the Inspector, the owner is free from responsibility for unseaworthiness. Of course he is responsible for the employment of men of good conduct and experience, but the Bill does not interfere with that matter. The Bill requires, first, that the hull should be inspected to determine its seaworthiness, and again inspected to see that the engine and boiler are all right. This is all that can be done for the public protection from such misfortunes as the wreck at London. I believe the Victoria was unfit for her work, and that the Inspector was guilty of gross dereliction of duty when he failed to have the boiler properly fastened. To that the loss of life was certainly due.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think the argument of the hon. member for Monck is valid. There are many instances of loss from improper distribution of cargo, and the wearing down of vessels towards the end of the season, when they become unfit to buffet the winds and waves. We have the loss of the Jane Miller as a warning. When we consider the frequent lamentable loss of valuable human life, no paltry consideration should divert us from the necessity of frequent inspection, with a view to prevent such calamities.

Mr. McLELAN. I propose in the Bill to provide for annual inspection, and certificates may be granted as the inspector may determine. If the inspector determines that the machinery and hulls are not sufficiently good to run a year, a certificate for the part of the year during which they would be serviceable may be granted. At least once a year there shall be an inspection.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think that goes far enough, because, I repeat, vessels may run down or become damaged during the season, though all right in the spring, and may, late in the fall, be unable to stand severe weather. The inspection should be made early in the spring and early in the fall, and if they are found to be damaged, then the owners should be compelled to put their boats in order. I think that would result in a large saving of life and property.

Mr. McCALLUM. An inspector who inspects a vessel ought to be able to say whether she is fit to run all the season. If he thinks she is not, let him give her a certificate to run during the fine weather. I think that will satisfy everybody. I think just as much of the lives of seamen as the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig). Considering the number of steam vessels employed in this country, there is no other country in the world where accidents have been so few. As long as we are engaged in this business we must take steps to make it safe. In reference to the accident to the Jane Miller, no one knows the cause of her capsizing. How does the hon. gentleman know whether she foundered or how she was lost? All his assertions are mere conjectures. As for the Chairman of the Board of Inspectors being at fault in that accident, I stand here as a representative of the people and say, he ought to be held innocent. The hon. gentleman is altogether in error in stating that this boat was not deep enough in the hold for a man to crawl in. It is perfectly absurd that such notions as those of the hon. gentleman should guide the navigation of this country. Are we to have every man in this country punished because this little scow went down at London? This very Act will remedy that. There will be nothing of that kind in the future, because the certificate of the shipwright, to the number of passengers a boat may carry, will guide the captain in the number of persons he may take on board. The shipwright is the best judge of the number of persons the boat may carry. My hon. friend may say that because a vessel registers so many tons she can carry so many passengers. But that rule would not be found to work, because some vessels, being differently constructed, can carry a greater number of passengers, in proportion to her tonnage, than another vessel which registers a higher tonnage.

Mr. McCUAIG. I desire to say that, when this vessel was inspected after the accident, there was found a band of iron extending from the top of the boiler on each side, extending to the main deck, and which should have been fastened by bolts to the deck timbers. After the accident an examination proved that this was neglected, in consequence of which, the instant the steamer careened, the supposed iron stay yielded and the boiler shifted to one side, and finally slipped overboard, crushing and carrying with it several of the unfortunate passengers. If the Inspector had been careful in the discharge of his duty he would have discovered this band of iron was not fastened, and he would directed that it should be made secure, knowing it was the only stay for keeping the boiler in its place. That alone shows that the vessel was carelessly inspected, and shows the necessity of appointing a qualified ship-carpenter to see if the inspection is right.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is with great diffidence that I differ from eminent nautical authorities like the hon. member for Monck. He speaks of inspecting scows; but when this scow carries the lives of several hundred passengers, it becomes a matter of very great importance. I hope the Government will bring in a stringent measure with regard to vessels which carry passengers. We all know the importance that has been given to this subject by the English authorities, and the great work which Mr. Plimsoll has performed in connection with it; and I do hope the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will see that a stringent measure of protection is afforded the public.

Mr. ANGLIN. We are all agreed that it is of the utmost importance there should be a thorough inspection of steamboats, of their hulls and machinery, and that competent persons should be employed to make the inspection, such as will afford all possible security for the lives of passengers. The serious question arises as to how that inspection can be best obtained. I expected at first to find the hon. member for Prince Edward rather opposed to this Bill, knowing him to be a proprietor of steamboats, but my surprise was removed when I learned that he is himself the parent, or the putative parent of this Bill. I am surprised to hear him argue that a ship-carpenter or a shipwright has some special qualifications for examining a hull. The shipwright receives a plan of the dimensions of the hull, with instructions as to the quality of the timber that go into the hull, and he then builds the hull, without stopping to think what kind of machinery is to be placed in it. I think that the architect of the hull, who decides the proportion of the different parts to each other, is better qualified to inspect a steamboat and to say how many persons it can carry with safety, than a mere ship-carpenter, who may have been employed in constructing the hull. We have now a number of inspectors of steamboats who are presumed to be qualified to judge of the strength and efficiency of the hulls of these steamers. These gentlemen are not employed more than half the year; in fact I do not think any one of them works one hundred days in the year. They are, however public officers; they do not, I believe, any of them, attend to any other work or business. They expect to live on the revenue derived from their services as inspectors. If we pass the Bill in its present shape, I do not think it necessary that the hull of a vessel should be carefully inspected every year. If a vessel is built under the inspector, and sufficiently inspected afterwards, if it is built of proper material and of proper strength, it should last at least five or six years, just as sea-going vessels are classified for five or six or seven years, and are considered seaworthy for that time, unless they meet with some accident. It would not be necessary to have a careful annual inspection of the hull, and, therefore, we should not have another set of officers appointed who would have even less to do. Now, I cannot understand why it is not competent—if these inspectors are men of intelligence, and are possessed of sufficient knowledge of the machinery of vessels—to acquire, even if they do not now possess, such a knowledge with regard to the construction of the hull of a vessel as would be required to fit them for the position of inspectors. I really do not think that there is any such extraordinary knowledge required in those matters, and I do not think it is necessary that a man should serve eight or ten years as a workman in a shipping yard in order to be competent. I know that in the Lower Provinces ship captains who never handled an adze or a maul in their lives are year after year placed in the shipyards to inspect first-class ships—sea-going ships—and are regarded as the very best to look after those vessels. So, I think, any man of intelligence and experience who would make it his business to become acquainted with the construction and equipment of a vessel should be competent to discharge those duties. If these men do not choose to become thoroughly acquainted with the business and are not able after a time to pass a thorough examination at the hands of men competent to carry on such an examination, they should be set aside and their places filled by men as intelligent or more intelligent and more willing to learn their duties. But I think we should hesitate before creating a new class of inspectors and placing them to some extent in control of the business of steamboat sailing, which has not been very profitable of late years.

Mr. McLELAN. The employment of captains to inspect the construction of vessels has entirely gone out of date in the Maritime Provinces as well as in England. It is sometimes thought desirable to employ them for a week or two before the vessel is launched in water, to look after the rigging and its connection with the hull; but after the construction of the hull, which is the main part of the vessel, it is thought that they are better without the presence of the captain, and in the Maritime Provinces they dispense with the services of the captain until a few weeks before the launch.

Mr. ANGLIN. I am aware that the acting Minister of Marine is well acquainted with shipbuilding, but I am rather surprised to hear him make the statements he has just made with regard to dispensing with the services of the captain. I know that it does not frequently happen that captains are employed in that capacity, but I have often learned that captains were placed in the yard for the purpose of seeing that the vessel is properly built, that the timbers are sound and put together in a proper way, and that in cases where captains were not shipbuilders and never had been.

Mr. McLELAN. I know that years ago that was done, but it is not done now. Vessels are all inspected by Lloyds' inspectors, and they will not admit sea captains as inspectors on the boats. These positions are all taken by practical ship builders.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), appears to think that one man ought to be able to perform the duties of inspector of hulls and inspector of machinery. I say that the man who may know how to mould a vessel from the keel to the truck is not the proper man to know how well the vessel will stand. I know that a shipwright is the only proper man to know the number of passengers that a vessel ought to carry, according to her build, and not the master of the vessel. He says further that these vessels, because they are classed originally for five or six or seven years, do not require inspection every spring, but I affirm that they will, because the boats, the life-saving apparatus, the appliances for putting out fire, and every thing of that kind, require to be examined every year. But that is not all. A steamboat inspector, wherever he may be, has the privilege of going aboard a boat and inspecting her anywhere, and is expected to do so, and I believe by this law a captain of a vessel is bound not to refuse the inspector a passage if he wishes to go in any direction to inspect a vessel. I believe the intention is to make the law more stringent. I do not know how inspectors in the Maritime Provinces act, but I know that in Ontario the inspectors have to work very hard, and that in certain seasons of the year they have more than they can do to keep up with their work. I do not like to hear hon. members say that these men are not fit for their duty. I know that some of the steamboat owners occasionally think they are too harsh, and that they find a good many faults—for if these inspectors find the Act insufficient they get Orders in Council passed. Furthermore, I say that there has been very little damage to vessels under their inspection. Of course, a very serious accident happened at London; but is there any man in the House who could have imagined that such an accident would have happened on a mere mill pond. The water there is as smooth as glass, but the vessel was overloaded, and it was such that it had no more hold on the water than a man's hand. The trouble appears to have been that the men could not get into the hold to fasten the boiler, because the boat was so shallow. I am satisfied that the cause of that accident was that there were three or four people on that boat where there ought to have only been one; the master of the vessel ought to have compelled the people to go ashore, and he should not have left the dock until they did so.

Mr. McCUAIG. I do not wish to be misunderstood when I speak of the character of the inspector of boilers and engines of steamers. I bear willing testimony to their high character as a body, but I nevertheless say that the inspector who gave a certificate to the master of that boat was guilty of a gross dereliction of duty. Under this Bill, I do not think such a thing will occur again.

Mr. CURRIER. I think the Government ought to abolish the office of steamboat inspector altogether, and that they ought to make the law compulsory that the owners, not only of steamboats, but of stationary boilers, should insure in some of the insurance companies that are prepared to insure boilers. These companies have their own inspectors, and they take good care not to insure a boiler unless they think it is perfectly safe. I think this would be a great improvement, and would insure more safety to the public than the present system.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 117) to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the inspection of steamboats and the examination and licensing of engineers employed on them.

Bill read the first time; and (at 10:30 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 27th March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 135) to amend Chapter 29, 33 Victoria, intituled: "An Act to extend certain provisions of 'The Seamen's Act, 1873,' to vessels employed in navigating the inland waters of Canada, and to provide for the collection of the wages of seamen and other persons employed on board vessels trading on the inland waters of Canada, in a summary manner."—(Mr. Guillet.)

THE PRESBYTERIAN TEMPORALITIES FUND.

Mr. SHAW moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 66) to amend the Act intituled "An Act to incorporate the Board for the management of the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland," and the Acts amending the same.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I beg to move in amendment that Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee on Bill (No. 66) but that he do so this day week. My reason for moving this motion is that there are four Bills on the Order Paper, all relating to the same or a cognate subject. The Bills which is the subject of the present motion has been reported by the Private Bills Committee, but the other three Bills have not yet been disposed of by them, and it would be much more convenient that the House should discuss the general subject than discuss it in detail, and thereby occupy nearly four times the length of time that would otherwise be occupied. It was also understood, if I recollect aright, that these Bills should proceed before the House and the Committee pari passu: that is to say, that they should come up for consideration together, and a general discussion take place on the whole of the Bills. The Private Bills Committee has only dealt with the first of them, and as it would be convenient for the time of the House, as well as to secure a proper and satisfactory discussion of the whole subject, to enter upon it as a whole instead of in four parts, I submit the present motion.

Amendment negatived; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McLENNAN. I beg to move the following amendment:

That, whereas the union of churches referred to in the preamble was not complete, but left a minority of eight members out of thirty-three who had a vested interest in the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, which minority declined to become a party to such union, it be resolved that, before any disposition of this fund is made by this House, the right of the said minority should be maintained to a division of the capital of the said fund in such manner that the said minority shall control its proportion thereof.

I think it will be conceded that this Bill proposes to deal with vested rights in a manner that is quite new to this House. The fund of this Temporalities Board, it is well known, is not in its first creation the fund of a Corporation; it is the property of individuals, who have of their own motives and under conditions provided by themselves created the fund, and it is not left to be dealt with even at this late period by their successors. It happens that a number of the parties who have been dealing with this fund in the Church Courts, in the Law Courts, and before Parliament, are themselves the creators of the fund, and I think if anything more specific is required on this head, it is very distinctly stated in the deliverance of the Lords of the Privy Council, who state:

"The appellant is not a mere annuitant, and his right to an annual allowance does not constitute his only connection with the fund. He is likewise one of the commutants, one of the persons by whom the fund was contributed for the purposes of the Act 22 Victoria, Chapter 66, and in that capacity he has a plain interest, and consequent right, to insist that the fund shall be administered in strict accordance with law."

That the law was made by those creators of the fund itself is very clear and distinct. Having possession of that fund of $8,000 or $10,000 each, they determined to put it together to create a fund out of which an annual allowance should be drawn by themselves, and here are some of the conditions:

"That if any minister ceased his connection with the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, he should thereby forfeit his interest in the principal and interest of the fund. The first principle that formed the basis of this compact was this: the fund was 'to be unalterable by the Synod without the consent of all the ministers agreeing to it.'"

It is true that after a period of years a Union was formed of certain churches, and a majority of those men elected to go into that Union. An Act was obtained from the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec placing the administration of this fund in the hands of a new body, elected in a new manner, under which administration the creators of the fund would have no more than their life-interest in it, so that the very body by whom it was created was cut off from any further interest in the fund. Can this House take up this question and settle it upon a judicial basis? I really think that the members of this House will hesitate before they undertake to do so, and I believe that no disposition of this large sum will be satisfactory in which the contending parties are not in agreement—that some consent of the parties must be obtained, to make a settlement satisfactory. There seems to be the more reason why this should be considered, because there appears to be a possibility of bringing about this result. The minority is always the difficult party to deal with in any ordinary money transactions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Especially in this House.

Mr. McLENNAN. Especially in this House, and this House is accustomed to granting liberal charters for the creation of funds and property; but it is a new thing for this House to take up the disposal of a fund that is already created, and created upon a basis susceptible of discussion judicially. I believe this question is even now in the Law Courts, and I believe it is quite understood that no Bill can be passed in this House against the consent of the parties interested if it will take it out of the Law Courts. We know with what asperity this contest has been carried, on and that there is very little probability of any Act passed in this House accomplishing its end by force. We know, indeed, that when a question between religious parties arises, the most bitter and acrimonious contention is the result. I have not been in the Private Bills Committee, but I have heard the echoes of the contest that went on there. I believe if this matter were discussed as gentlemen of our position whose forum is the stump discuss political matters, there might be some urbanity and good-fellowship and concession and charity in the discussion; but we find when it is a church question that is being considered there is no possibility of agreement. It is in a church question that all the acrimony comes out which is so well described by a great historian as the savage nature of man breaking through the thin crust of civilization. I am sorry this Bill has got this far before the House, because I think this matter should have been settled long ago, and the reason it is not settled is, because some encouragement has been, in many quarters, given to the pretensions of the majority, who consider they have all power in their hands. I think it is in the power of this House, by adopting a wise measure of legislation, to procure a settlement of this vexed question that will be in the interests of every party concerned, and of none more than of the majority in this House composed of the party of the United Church.

Mr. BLAKE. I rise to a question of order. The rule of the House is, that no notice of amendment may be proposed to the Committee of the Whole House unless notice has been given, and I find no notice given of any such motion at this stage of the Bill. The hon. gentleman has given notice that, on the third reading of the Bill, he will move that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, but that does not authorize his amendment when the House is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLENNAN. When I require information on the rules of the House, I go to the Clerk. The Clerk has told me that I am justified in making the motion at this stage on the notice I have given.

The CHAIRMAN ruled the motion in order.

Mr. McLENNAN. Then I will go on with my remarks. We have been told that the opposition to this Bill is the work of a small faction. The statement has been made with a great deal of eloquence in the Committee, and has been circulated in print, that this small faction would fall to pieces if it were defeated in this House. I confess I am amazed at this statement coming from the quarters whence it has come. I shall be very much enlightened to know from any of these Presbyterian gentlemen whether they would themselves consent to be snuffed out by an order of this House on any contest in which they thought their property was involved. I do not think any of them would conceive it was possible to do such a thing, and I do not think this small minority is made of such poor stuff that it will be snuffed out by any Bill this House will pass. The result will be this contest will be carried on in the Law Courts, and for what purpose? To save to this United Church the sum of $50,000, or $100,000. The thing is preposterous. The churches in this country have lived without funds of this kind up to this period. The strongest among them have obtained their strength, and retain it without any such eleemosynary aid. It has happened that while this contention has been going on between the United Church and a small minority, that, in some parts of the church, the situation has been changed—non-contents have been allowed to hold their property, and what has happened in this case has been that the united church has grown and has become strong, by generously foregoing that advantage, and leaving to those, who thought they had a legal right to it, the privilege of possessing and using them. I think this is what will happen under a fair distribution of this property—under such a distribution as may be consented to by the parties, and may be confirmed by this House. I think, for these reasons, that this method of disposing of the matter—I have reason to believe—is one that will satisfy, in the first place, the minority who are contending for this fund. I believe, in the next place, that it will satisfy the majority who are contending for it as soon as they can get out of the trammels of debate, and that reason will have asserted its supremacy over the passion that has been created by this contest.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. What is your proposition?

Mr. McLENNAN. It is on the Table. It is a division of the fund according to the relative number of the majority and minority of the beneficiaries at the time of the Union. That is practically the substance of it. It does not belong to the church; it belongs to the ministers. I believe that it will dispose of a question that seriously affects one of the other Bills coming up in relation to the Queen's College. The College unfortunately cannot be divided as the fund can. It is a difficult subject to deal with, and this division will help to make a settlement of that unfortunate question, possibly, as well as the distribution of this fund. I think it is not only a measure that will be accepted and approved of by the contestants under the conditions I have named, but that it appeals to the good sense and fair and impartial judgment of this House as an arbitrator in this important question.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand now that we are now on the first clause of the Bill—am I right?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. I apprehend that, as a Committee of the Whole, we are limited to the consideration of the proposed amendment of a clause or proposal that the Committee should rise and report progress, or rise without reporting progress. This resolution does not appear to be an amendment of the first clause, but it appears to be an abstract resolution designed to require that before further progress is made, something should be done. It is, in point of fact, the resolution that should be made in amendment to the motion for the third reading of the Bill, to which it is appropriate. It is not an amendment to the first clause. It does not alter the first clause at all. The motion is out of order on another ground than that on which you, Mr. Chairman, have over-ruled my views on the previous motion.

Mr. McLENNAN. I believe that this is a most pertinent amendment to the first clause.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Upon the consideration that I can give the matter, my opinion is, that the amendment should properly come up on the third reading.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). This question of order has already been disposed of by the Chair.

Mr. BLAKE. No. The first question of order raised was, whether this could be done at this stage without notice; but the Chairman over-ruled it. On the present motion being put in his hands I pointed out it was not an amendment to the first clause.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). It is an amendment, for it proposes to provide for an amendment to the first clause—that they have power to amend that clause in a certain way. In terms it professes to apply to the first clause. The amendment reads: That the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to amend the first clause, so as to provide, &c. That amendment is pertinent to the first clause of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. In my opinion the motion in the Chairman's hands is no amendment at all.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). That is not the amendment then in the Notice paper.

Mr. BLAKE. No; that is the motion the hon. member for Glengarry put in the hands of the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in express terms an amendment to the first clause.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This subject is causing excitement among the Presbyterians all through the Dominion of Canada, and it is much to be regretted, although it is very natural, that any feeling should be aroused. I am going to move one or two amendments in the Committee, acting, as I believe, as moderator, thinking, perhaps, that we can arrive at a solution of the difficulty. I am going to move, in the first place, that after the word "following" in the 7th line on the 7th page, the following shall be inserted: "Shall be charges upon the fund in the following order." Then I move that the 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st and a portion of the 22nd line, down to the word "ministry" be struck out. I then move that after the word "requirements," in the 24th line, these words be inserted: "provided always that adequate provision be made for the payment during life of $450 per annum to those now entitled to it." I may as well state what other amendments I am going to move, although it may not be distinctly regular in Committee, in order that the Committee may understand what I would like to have adopted by the Committee and by the House. I shall move that in the 2nd clause in the 49th line after the word "extinguished," the following words be inserted: "Provided also that when the three classes mentioned in section one shall be fully satisfied, all the ten congregations which declined to enter the Union consummated in 1875, and who may not have entered the said Union subsequently, shall be each entitled to an equitable share of the residue of the fund, the said share to be proportioned to the number of congregations on the Synod roll on 14th June, 1875." Then, in the third section, I am going to submit that the words "the said Presbyterian Church" be substituted for the words "the said United Church" in the fifth and fifteenth lines of the third section, so as to allow the minority to have representation in the Board.

Mr. BLAKE. These seem to me, so far as I can judge, to be rather important amendments, and that we ought to have notice of them. It seems to me it is not regular to move these amendments at this stage. If the hon. gentleman desires to move them, he must give notice of moving them on the third reading of the Bill, which stage cannot be reached to-day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. For the sake of settling this matter, I do not think we ought to raise points of order. If these amendments would settle the matter, I dare say my hon. friend would overlook the point of order.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not profess to gather what the effects of these amendments are. They may be all right. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman speaks for both contesting parties.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I do not.

Mr. BLAKE. If he announces that he is expressing the united voice of both parties, it is a different thing. But if he does not make that announcement then I think both the House and the parties have a right to some notice, so as to gather what are the bearing and effects of these propositions.

Mr. SHAW. It may be that notice may be required, but the promoters of the Bill have had some notice of what has been suggested now. The Bill is already a compromise. It gives to the dissenting party, the party in minority, greater right, perhaps, than they are really entitled to. We say that the property of the Church of Scotland went over to the united body at the time of the Union, consequently the Bill itself is a compromise. However, we are willing still to grant to the minority perhaps greater rights than they are really entitled to. They are small in number, and we think that we may well concede to them even more than they can justly ask for. Because we are much more numerous we do not want to have the appearance of trespassing on their rights. We say the Bill, as it stands already, provides for their rights; it provides for the payment of annuities to the minority. The amendment here to the first clause simply makes the Bill a little more explicit; it does not substantially alter the first section. When before the Private Bills Committee, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) proposed a resolution somewhat similar to the amendment now proposed. It was negatived at the time; but, on further consideration, we think that perhaps it would have made the Bill a little more explicit in its first section, and we are willing to accede to the amendment suggested by the First Minister.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. member for West Durham will see how the matter stands, but I will not press my amendments if he desires delay. But I shall ask the Committee to report the Bill as it is, and then we can discuss the amendments on the third reading.

Mr. BLAKE. I believe that there having been no notice of the amendment, the true course would be to go through the Bill and report it in its present shape. Then the hon. gentleman could put a notice on the paper, and the next day that could be taken up so far as it is concerned. For my own part, after the statement of the hon. gentleman who promotes the Bill, or speaks as I understand with the authority of those promoting the Bill, it would not be material to press the point of order, but there are other amendments to be considered, and if the third reading is to be delayed, the Bill stands for them all.

Mr. SHAW. I only spoke in reference to the one section, and I regret that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) should take any such ground as want of notice, or presses it in regard to the Bill as a whole, seeing that we are desirous of getting along as amicably as possible, and seeing also that it must be apparent to all who have heard the discussions, that there is a great deal of feeling being engendered throughout the country in regard to the Bill. If it were possible to go on immediately and dispose of the matter as early as possible upon an amicable arrangement it would be much better to do so. I should like myself to see it disposed of as rapidly as possible. If the Bill is settled in Committee to-day, that fact will go a long way towards the settlement of the other Bills before the Committee.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman make the same statement with reference to the other amendments as with reference to the first?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman who has offered to make what is in effect a compromise, if he has made this proposition on behalf of one party, or as a mediator. I wish to know whether the minority was willing to accede to this proposition to stop this litigation, and also the litigation which has been commenced with reference to Queen's College, Kingston—a Bill with reference to which stands in my name. I have heard nothing of this compromise, and I know nothing of it, but it strikes me as being desirable that we should know if the minority relinquishes the contest with regard to Queen's College and the Widows' and Orphans' Fund, or whether they are going to continue the contest with regard to other funds.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I may say, for my part, that I have never heard of the suggested amendment, which the right hon. gentleman has proposed, until he read it just now. I am informed, also, that what may be termed the minority are ignorant with reference to it. It seems, from the statement of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Shaw), that he knew of the nature of these amendments, or had some previous knowledge of them. I was not able myself to catch sufficiently clearly the terms of the proposed amendments of the right hon. gentleman, and I do not now know their scope and effect. I am not prepared to discuss them at the present time. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Shaw) spoke of the Bill as being passed by the Committee as a compromised Bill. It strikes me as a rather curious kind of compromise—one of the sort which the highway robber offers to a man who tears off his clothes, takes his property and empties his pockets, and then offers him 25 cents to pay his way home.

Mr. McMILLAN. I was the introducer of the Bill which is being promoted on behalf of the minority spoken of, and I may say I had no notice whatever in connection with this amendment. I am exceedingly sorry that any advantage has been taken of the amendment as proposed by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), because I think we should discuss the matter thoroughly here, and probably we would be able to simplify matters in such a way as to avoid three or four discussions during which we would be going over substantially the same ground. It seems to me extraordinary that the promoter of this Bill should have been aware of this amendment, while we, the minority, to whom the majority are so gracious, whom they wish to treat so kindly, had no knowledge of it at all up to the present moment. If we are going into a discussion of the Bill at all let us arrange it so that we may discuss the whole matter on its merits once and for all, and not go over it three or four times; or if that cannot be done now, let us postpone the discussion until some such time, and avoid as far as possible keeping the feelings of the country irritated as they are to a very considerable extent at the present time.

Mr. McDUGALL (Halton). I think what we have just heard shows, in the first place, the propriety of our rules, which require amendments of an important character to be spread upon our papers, so that we may have an opportunity of taking communication of them and know their nature when we come into the House to exercise our judgment upon them. This question has attracted a great deal of public attention. It involves very important questions between two sections of a very numerous religious body of this country. It has been before one of the large Standing Committees of this House for some days, in which parties have been heard at great length, and the Committee, so far as I could observe, listened to them with the greatest attention, and endeavored as far as possible to meet the views of the promoters of the Bill and hear the objections of those who appeared to oppose it. There are two or three other measures which will stand on a similar principle to this Bill when it is finally settled, and I think when amendments are proposed here without notice which will alter the character of the Bill, and in fact destroy one of its main principles, it would be a more parliamentary course and more satisfactory to all parties to refer the Bill back, and hear the minority as well as the majority, who have apparently assented to a compromise without communication with the minority. As I contended before the Committee, and as I contend now, the question between the parties is one of no particular importance to this House. They merely come here because we are the only power who can make laws in the matter, and therefore after hearing both parties and after examining into the history of the case, we should legislate between them in accordance with right and justice. But, at the same time, if the parties choose to come to a compromise amongst themselves as to the dividing of the fund, or on any other matter in dispute between them, we would have been glad to have assented to any such proposal, and in fact they were urged to make some arrangement in the way of a compromise if possible. As every one knows who is familiar with the history of the transactions, there was a substantial minority of the church who declined to go into the Union, and, although they were out-voted, although, as a matter of law, they were left without legal rights as to property—as was contended and, I think, correctly—still we must remember that they are a large and respectable body, with friends and supporters throughout the country who sympathize with them, and it would have been a pleasant thing for the Committee to have listened to terms of compromise from those who are authorized to make them. But when the question was asked if the gentlemen who appeared on behalf of the United Church were authorized to agree to a division of the property, and assign a portion of it upon those who had no legal claim upon it, as was contended, they said they were not authorized to make that agreement; they did not feel that they were justified in telling the Committee or Parliament that they were entitled to assign a portion of this property, and therefore the Committee were forced to come to the conclusion that the promoters of the Bill, being legally entitled to have the control of this property, and to come to the Legislature for an Act to assist them in the modification of the machinery for administering it, passed the Bill in that form. And now, at this second stage, we are asked to agree to that which the promoters of the Bill declined to assent to, on the ground that they had no authority to give that assent, and I apprehend, also, that there was no just grounds for their giving it, even if they had the authority. Under these circumstances I say it is only fair to the minority to give them the opportunity of going back to the Committee with the compromise proposed; and the Committee will have to deal with the other Bills in view of the principle finally adopted in this case. I have studied the Bill with some care, and I confess I do not quite see the effect which the right hon. gentleman's amendments will have on the disposition of this property. But I think before we go back to our constituents and seek to justify our action in this case, we ought to know the reasons and grounds for our action, and it is only before the Committee that we can ascertain the views of the parties with reference to the proposed compromise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is quite clear that my well-intentioned attempt to arrange this matter is going to prove futile, and, therefore, I fancy the Bill will go through without any amendment. I cannot help that. I would have given notice if I had had the opportunity, but I was only able to consider the matter on Saturday last, and had, therefore, no opportunity of giving notice of the proposed compromise. The Bill, I understand, passed through the Private Bills Committee, the minority expressed their views very strongly, the Committee over-ruled those views, and the Bill, I believe, passed without any amendment. If the minority do not like the Bill as it is, there is an end of it—I shall not move any further.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The minority do not know what the proposition is, and they do not know whether they like it or not.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the proper course is to pass the Bill through Committee, and to postpone the third reading until another day, when the different motions can be brought forward, and we can discuss them with a full knowledge of the case.

Mr. SHAW. I was misapprehended in what I said with reference to the amendments. My remarks only applied to the amendment of the first section. With regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. the First Minister, I am opposed to it. I think the Bill ought to be reported as it is.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). It seems to me much better that we should not go on with the discussion now, but that it would be much fairer to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. McDougall), or that which I made at an early stage of the discussion, that the consideration of this matter in Committee should be deferred. I do not think any of the parties are in a position to discuss it now, in the face of the amendments made, and especially that of the hon. leader of the House. But if the House persists in going on, I think they should know what they are doing if they deliberately sanction this first clause. The first thing that startles me in connection with it is, that it undertakes to ratify and confirm everything that this Board has been doing since 1875. Now, are they aware that the Privy Council has declared that this Board has no legal right to administer that fund at all, and has been administering it illegally for the last six or seven years, and in such a way that the capital of the fund has materially diminished. Parliament has not before it the knowledge of what that Board has been doing all that time; and yet we are asked to ratify all its actions, although it has been declared to have been illegally elected. For my part, I am not prepared to do so; and I believe I would be failing in my duty as a member of Parliament, and to a large number of my constituents, who belong to that much despised minority, if I did not protest against this kind of legislation, when Parliament does not know what it is doing, and has not the necessary materials before it to form a judgment. We find that the fund, which originally amounted to $462,000, has diminished to $322,000. How has that diminution taken place? Is the House prepared to say that all the acts of this Board shall be whitewashed, or whether they have been guilty of the maladministration of that fund? For my part, I am not prepared to give a wholesale endorsement, at such short notice and without preliminary investigation, to all the acts of this illegally elected Board for the last seven years. Then the Bill goes on to provide for a defined appropriation of the fund, and there can be no question that it applies that fund in a manner totally different from that to which it was originally dedicated. That, of course, is the whole principle of the Bill. If it be said that this House is going to exercise its power to interfere with vested rights while they are in litigation before the Courts; if Parliament says it does not care whether these rights are in litigation before the proper tribunals or not; if it says that it is paramount and will exercise its supreme power, well and good—because that is the principle upon which this whole clause rests. The fund undoubtedly was dedicated to a particular body, that body being the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. It is proposed by this Bill, after providing for the life annuities of those who were the original founders of the fund, to take away the capital of the fund and give the whole of it to another and different church, the United Church, a church composed not of the original Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, but a church of which that body forms about one-sixth only, the other five-sixths being composed of the Free Church, United Presbyterian and the Church in the Lower Provinces, which originally had not one iota of interest in the fund. It proposed to apply the whole funds to a Home Mission fund, to aid weak churches in the United Church, that is the Church of the Dominion of Canada: of the Lower Provinces, as well as Ontario and Quebec, a church composed of Free Churchmen and United Presbyterians, which, as I have said, constitute about five-sixths of the present United Church. If that is not confiscation—Parliament exercising its supreme power to take away one man's property and give it to another—I do not know what is. This legislation is of a dangerous character; if this principle were established, it would form a precedent likely to be fraught with such calamity and wrong in the future, if allowed to pass, that I feel I would fail in my duty if I did not protest against the clause passing in the form in which it is now drawn. While I do not think it is desirable, at this stage, to enter into the whole merits of the question, I shall avail myself of my right to do so at a subsequent period. The subject is a large one, it is one of the most important that ever came before Parliament, as affecting private rights or the rights of corporations or religious bodies, for the Presbyterian, Roman Catholic and other Churches have property endowments; and if Parliament begins by saying they will take the property of one church and give it to another church, it may, the following day, apply the same rule to the church to which some one of us may happen to belong. For these reasons I most earnestly protest against this clause passing in its present form, and I ask the House to pause before it passes such sweeping legislation without having a full opportunity of considering and discussing the matter. It is much to be regretted that the compromise suggested has not been arrived at. When the suggestion was made in the Private Bills Committee, the majority said they had no power to accept a compromise. They did not say that explicitly, but they implied that they, as the stronger number, would override the poor minority and take away all their property; that they would stand on their power and not discuss the question of right, and not give more than the pensions to those men to whom by right the fund belongs; that they would have no compromise, and they declined all overtures, on the plea of not being authorized to enter into such a discussion. On the other hand, the minority, represented by the moderator, stated their willingness to agree to any terms of a fair character that the Committee might think fit to prescribe; but the majority, strong in power, thought fit to say they would have no compromise, and they will not allow twenty-four hours or a week's delay to consider the matter. Although there are other Bills that have not yet been considered in Committee, they want to rush this Bill through the House without discussion; they want, in fact, to give no quarter to this small majority which is struggling before Parliament for their rights. Not only so, but the minority say that as regards our rights we have to appeal to the Courts to determine them, and determine whether the fund is ours or not; but the majority believe they are more likely to get a favorable decision from the majority of Parliament, inasmuch as they control a large majority of Presbyterian votes, and through the strength of that majority they can influence members of the House who are dependent on the majority, and will at no distant day appear before their constituents; they have determined they will force this Bill and take possession of the fund, and give the minority a life interest in it as regards the poor old men who have become annuitants from it. There are seven surviving ministers of the minority, all old men who can live but a very few years. It is true they are to have the right to receive the annuities, but is that all to which they are entitled? Has the whole of the capital of the fund to be handed over to this United Church, five-sixths of which is composed of a foreign element, which has had no interest whatever in, or right to the fund. But no, say the majority, while we will give you annuities so long as the old men live, when they die the church to which you belong, to which you gave up your money, as the mover of the resolution has stated, $8,000 or $9,000 a piece, will no longer possess the capital of the fund which they created. The members of the old church gave their money to establish a fund, with the belief that its connection with the church would be perpetuated for all time; but this gormandizing majority now declared: "We will give you the annuities, but when you die we will take your money and confiscate it for the benefit of the United Church," is immoral legislation, which, if passed, will be a disgrace to Parliament, and I would feel I was recreant to my duty if I were not to protest, in the most energetic terms I can use, against this legislation, which will be a disgrace to this Parliament if enacted.

Mr. PLUMB. I believe this matter has been before a Committee of the House and the issue has been accepted by both sides. It is a rather novel proposition which has been submitted by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron), that the House has not the power to legislate on matters referred to Parliament. This Bill has been before the Private Bills Committee for three weeks; it has been fully discussed there, and the result of that discussion is the Bill now before the House. I do not speak of the merits of the Bill, but I say no good purpose can be attained by sending it back with amendments to the Committee which has already discussed it fully, heard every argument which can be advanced and have sent down to the House, as the result of their deliberations, a Bill which they recommend to be passed. I was very sorry to hear that obstacles interfere from accepting amendments proposed by the hon. leader of the Government. They seem to be offered in a spirit of compromise from a majority to a minority. I do not think that the spirit in which he proposed them was reciprocated by the other side, and I believe the better course to be pursued by Parliament is, this matter having been under discussion in the Private Bills' Committee, to accept their conclusion, and at all events not to refer it back to them, but to discuss the matter, if there is anything to be discussed, in the full House. We all know that this Committee, which was held in the largest Committee room in the House, was always so crowded that members not appointed on it, could not obtain access to its deliberations, and the same result would follow renewed meetings of the Committee. Now is the time to settle this question if it is in order to do so. I seriously object to having the matter postponed. I regret that it has become necessary for two bodies who seem, so far as I can see, to differ only on some points of church government—a distinction without a difference—to come to this House in order to obtain a settlement of a difficulty which should have been settled between them. I do not think it is exactly proper for any hon. member of this House to say that the conclusion to which we may come solemnly by a vote of this House, will be an Act of spoliation, robbery and injustice. I repudiate any such idea, and am prepared, when the Bill comes to a vote, to vote upon it, and shall vote upon it with a clear conscience in the fulfilment of my duty as a member of this Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This Bill is asked for by the Presbyterian Church of Canada. They may not accept the Bill with the amendments which the House may make to it, but that will be for them to consider.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. We will do what we think is right.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have got to do what is right, but they ask for incorporation, and framed a certain Bill. If they should not approve of it, as amended, on the third reading, it need not pass. The additions that I have suggested for the consideration of the Committee are those in favor of the minority. If the hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Shaw), who has charge of the Bill, does not like the additions, the Bill need not pass. I have simply to say that I speak in my individual capacity as a member of Parliament and a Presbyterian, and not as a leader of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. The proposition of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government may be such as may prove acceptable to the minority, but I do not understand what it is, and would like very much to have it explained. My own opinion is that these gentlemen who have come here to have the division of this fund settled ought to have been forced to make an arrangement between themselves, and I think very little pressure by the Committee would have forced them to do so. This fighting for the division of a fund is very unseemly. The proper plan would be to let those interested thoroughly consider the question and impress on them the feeling of the House that they should settle the difference among themselves, on such a basis of compromise as would be acceptable to all parties and the House. I move, therefore, that for the purpose of considering the amendment suggested by the right hon. leader of the Government, this Committee report progress and ask leave to sit again.

On clause 3,

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). If the majority of the House want to push the Bill through without giving any opportunity for discussion, I shall simply sit down. If not, I shall draw the attention of the House to the fact that, by the third clause, it is proposed to take the administration of the fund entirely out of the hands of the minority, many of whom were among the constituent members who created the fund. Is it right they should be left without a voice in its administration? Are these men who put their money into it to be shut out altogether, and have the administration of this fund handed over to a church with which they have no connection, and be obliged to take their pittance, as long as they live, from this strange church with which they have no alliance? This is only on a piece with the rest of the Bill, but it is well the House should know what it is about to do.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. As far as I can understand, the proposition of the hon. First Minister is, that this fund should be divided proportionately between those two churches. That commends itself to my mind. It is equitable and fair that this fund should be divided in proportion to the number at the time the severance took place, and the majority should accept that proposition. My sympathies are with the majority, but the minority are entitled to some consideration, and I cannot see any fairer way of doing justice to all parties than to divide this fund in proportion to the numbers at the time of separation.

Mr. SHAW. The object of the Bill is the benefit of the church. The church went into the Union, and having done so, the balance of the money should be the property of the United Church. The fund is not a personal one, nor the property of private parties, but is a fund held for the purpose of promulgating a particular kind of doctrine, and in this respect there is no difference between the two churches. They are all the same, and that fund should be utilized for that purpose, and not given to private parties.

Mr. MACMILLAN. In consequence of the irregular manner in which this question has been discussed, it is very difficult to say where we are. But, before the motion is carried, I am desirous of saying a few words on the subject. It is well, indeed, before passing this measure, to understand what this Temporalities Fund is, and in what manner it was formed. In order to get at the facts and discuss them clearly, we must know the source of this fund. So far as I can learn, it was formed under an Imperial Act of Great Britain, passed in 31st George III, Chapter 31, which set apart certain lands in this country for the purpose of promoting the Protestant religion in Canada. Those lands were held for a considerable period in this country without returns being made on them, or at least with but very small returns. It was contended by the Church of England that those lands and funds arising therefrom belonged to it solely, but some time subsequently it was conceded by a certain portion of its members that those funds belonged to the established Churches of England and Scotland in the then Province of Canada. It was desirable that the lands should be disposed of; and in order to do so there was an Imperial Act passed authorizing their sale, which was known as the Clergy Reserves Act, passed in the 16th Victoria, Chapter 21, authorizing the Canada Government to dispose of them and to invest the funds for the benefit of those churches. Acting under that authority the Parliament of Canada passed an Act, 18th Victoria, Chapter 2, authorizing the sale of the clergy reserves and the investment of the proceeds in certain institutions for the purpose of making a return to the respective churches. The funds from Upper Canada were to be placed in the fund known as the Upper Canada Municipalities Fund, and those of Lower Canada were to be invested in the Lower Canada Municipalities Fund. At the time that Act was passed authority was given by a parliament to the effect that, in case those churches chose to compromise and get a certain amount of actual capital into their hands, they should have power to do so; in other words, they were entitled to commute. Acting under that law they did commute, and I will read the grounds on which, and the purpose for which, they did commute. It was decided that each clergyman of the Church of Scotland, of whom I believe there were seventy-two or seventy-three, was entitled to £150 per annum out of that fund, the amount of the capitalized portion for each reaching £2,200. Each had the right either to take that portion capitalized, if he chose to do so, or the annual allowance; and in fact one minister did put the capitalized amount into his pocket, the Rev. Mr. McLaughlin, and had all done so there would not have arisen the trouble we have to deal with to-day. Authority was given to commute this amount in each case: but the Government were not prepared, nor were they desirous of commuting upon any other terms than for the whole body; they were ready to allow them as a whole body to carry out such an arrangement. So this arrangement was carried out by the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, that time. The following is the resolution passed for the purpose:—

“Resolved, 1st. That it is desirable that such commutation, if upon fair and liberal terms, should be effected; and that the Rev. Alex. Mathieson, D.D., of Montreal; the Rev. John Cook, D.D., of Quebec; Hugh Allan, Esq., of Montreal; John Thompson, Esq., of Quebec; and the Hon. Thomas McKay, of Ottawa City, be the Synod's Commissioners, with full power to give the formal sanction of the Synod to such commutations as they shall approve, the said Commissioners being thereby instructed to use their best exertions to obtain as liberal terms as possible; the Rev. Dr. Cook to be Convener; three to be a quorum; the decision of the majority to be final, and their formal acts valid; but that such formal sanction of the Synod shall not be given except in the case of ministers who have also individually given them, the said Commissioners, power and authority to act for them in the matter, to grant acquittance to the Government for their claims to salary, to which the faith of the Crown is pledged, and to join all sums so obtained into one fund, which shall be held by them till the next meeting of the Synod, by which all future regulations shall be made, the following, however, to be a fundamental principle, which it shall not be competent for the Synod at any time to alter, unless with the consent of the ministers granting such power and authority; that the interest of the fund shall be devoted, in the first instance, to the payment of £112 10s. each: and that the next claim to be settled, if the fund shall admit, and as soon as it shall admit of it, to the £112 10s., be that of the ministers now on the Synod's Roll, and who have been put on the Synod's Roll since the 9th May, 1853; and, also, that it shall be considered a fundamental principle that all persons who have a claim to such benefits shall be ministers of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, in connection with the Church of Scotland, and that they shall cease to have any claim on or be entitled to any share of said Commutation Fund whenever they shall cease to be ministers in connection with the said church."

We have now got to the point of material importance. We have got the following from the Government, we have the money in the hand; and the course we have to pursue with reference to it is prescribed. We agreed on an arrangement with regard to that money which lasted till 1875; a Board known as the Temporalities Board, having been appointed in the meantime, for the purpose of carrying out the wishes of the commutants with reference to this fund. The Synod had no control over this fund in any way whatever, but only the Board, who had absolute control. At this time, 1874, it was contended that it would be desirable that the Presbyterian Churches in Canada should unite; and most of the ministers of the respective bodies, consisting of what was known as the Free Church, United Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces, and a portion of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, decided to form a Union. But in forming that Union; they left a certain portion of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. It was contended strongly the other day by Principal Grant that the portion who separated from the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland and went into that Union had not lost identity in any way, but was absolutely the same church that had gone in. Now, it is a most singular circumstance, if that is the case. They either are the Presbyterian Church in Canada in conjunction with the others, or they are the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. Now, which are they? If they are the Presbyterian Church of Canada then they have lost their identity and are no longer the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. They themselves understood it at the time, and in fact the decision of the Courts since that time, refer to them as having gone out of the church. We see the same view taken in the Acts that were passed by the Ontario Legislature. In 38 Victoria, Chapter 75, an Act respecting the union of certain Presbyterian Churches, those churches are spoken of there as the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, the church of the Maritime Provinces in connection with the Church of Scotland, and the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces, as having united to form the Presbyterian Church in Canada. It is acknowledged that a certain portion remained out and did not go into the Union. Now, what is the name of that body, if they are not the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland? I call attention of the members of this House to the section of that Act which read as follows:—

"Provided always that if any congregation in connection or communion with any of the said churches, shall, at a meeting of the said congregation regularly called according to the constitution of the said congregation, or the practice of the church with which it is connected, and held within six months after the said Union takes place, decide by a majority of the votes of others who, by the constitution of the said congregation, or the practice of the said church with which it is connected, are entitled to vote at such a meeting, determine not to enter into the said union."

MR. MACMILLAN.

It is there stated explicitly that the minority remained out of the Union. If they remained out, no matter whether they numbered five, fifty, or one hundred, what is their name if it is not the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland? I would like to know what body they are. They still exist in a separate body with their moderator, their separate church government, and all the forms of their church carried on as effectually as before the Union. If the body that has gone into the Union is the Presbyterian Church of Canada, what is the body that remains out? Of necessity it must be the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. Now, this body had a perfect right, without the assistance of Parliament, to form this new body, but the difficulty is that they had no right to take the church property with them without the assistance of an Act of Parliament, and this is the Act of Parliament which proposed to take the funds into the United Church. Of course these acts were appealed against, and the Privy Council declared them illegal, it being held that this Board that was appointed at the time of the Union was illegal, that they had no right to deal with the funds of this Church, and that therefore every act performed by them was illegal. Now, Sir, what are we called upon to do by the Bill of my hon. friend from South Bruce. We are called upon to ratify all the illegal acts of that Board up to the present time. We are asked to make legal what the Court declared to be illegal. The judgment of the Court condemned the defendants who were in charge of the Temporalities Fund to the personal payment of the costs of that suit, because of the illegality of all their proceedings; but in this Bill we are actually asked to make legal what the Court positively refused, and absolutely ordered should not be done. It is true that the promoters of the Bill turn round now, and promise to strike that out; but, as a matter of fact, if they get this Bill they will turn round and make arrangement to pay these very costs that we have had struck out of this Bill. The whole matter is now thrown back to the position in which it was in 1875, except that this Board has depleted this fund from the sum of $597,000, as it was handed over to them by the commutants, to the sum of $332,000, a loss of two-fifths of the total amount. But we do not charge them with the blame of all this loss. We are desirous of taking as kindly a manner towards them as we possibly can. We are desirous of getting a certain portion of this fund, a portion to which we think we are entitled. In the first place, I may say that I have no doubt in the world that if the Courts were allowed to decide this matter the minority would recover every dollar of this fund and the properties throughout the country as well, but that is not our object. Our object is to deal as christianlike as we possibly can, if I may use the word.

MR. WRIGHT. That is a good word.

MR. MACMILLAN. In 1875, of these commutants who had a right to pocket their respective portions of the fund, there were thirty-three living. Their annuities had been regularly paid them out of this fund. The hon. member for Glengarry now asks to have this fund divided in perpetuity in accordance with the numbers as they then existed, ascertaining what that fund was at the time, and dividing it according to their numbers. At the time of the Union somewhere about twenty-five commutants went into the union, and eight remained out of it. My proposition in the Committee the other day was that as twenty had gone into the Union and seven remained out of it, of those who were now living, therefore, the United Church should take $\frac{3}{7}$ of this fund, leaving $\frac{4}{7}$ to be divided among the members of the minority, and that we should give these latter an act of incorporation authorizing them to control their own affairs. We thought this proposition would be a fair settlement of the difficulty and prevent any more unseemingly quarrelling between the two churches. I may say, Sir, that the Committee voted that down at the time, and I think after all, that is the only fair way of deciding this matter. I do not hold it out as a threat, but I do say that if justice is not done to us by handing over to us the absolute control of our share of that fund, I believe that when the matter is again brought before the Privy Council—as the House may rest assured it will be—we will have the same result as before, namely, that the minority, weak as it is, will still be recognized as the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, and entitled to the whole of that fund. That, I believe, will be the result if the House and the Board interested do not take the course which we advise.

Mr. CASEY. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman in addressing the House has not been able to rid himself of a certain spice of that personal feeling which seems to animate those who oppose this Bill, both in this House and before the Private Bills Committee. This is a question which we should discuss entirely without any ecclesiastical feeling, without any more feeling than we would exhibit in discussing the amalgamation of two loan companies, two banks, or two railways; what we have to deal with is not the ecclesiastical aspect of the case, but simply the money question, just as if these bodies were two lay corporations that were seeking to amalgamate instead of two church corporations. I think we who are outside both the churches concerned, and therefore able perhaps, to look at the matter more dispassionately than those within either of them, should not hesitate to state our impressions of the whole matter, and for that reason only am I inclined to lengthen the discussion. My hon. friend who has just sat down informed us about the origin of this fund. He says that when it was organized the clergymen entitled to it had a right either to the capital amount or an annuity, but that all of them chose to take the annuity and give up the capital. It was further agreed, he says, that the reversion of the principal should belong to the church and be applied to general church purposes, and every minister who seceded from that church should lose all claim to either the principal or the interest of the fund. That is the case as the hon. gentleman states it. If we took that as the basis for dealing with the Union which subsequently took place for the ministers who are now outside the pale of the Union, I think we should arrive at very different conclusions from those at which the hon. gentleman has arrived. The Presbyterian Church in connection with the Church of Scotland if not a legally incorporated body was certainly acting on a fixed constitution and with fixed constitutional principles. They had certain rules which they must follow in taking any action as a church. It appears that in the year of the Union that church acting according to all the established usages thereof, after consulting all the parties who had a right to be consulted decided to enter as a church into a union with three other churches. Now, if—as a gentleman who appeared before the Committee very clearly put the case—a church has a right to unite with another church in any circumstance, it has a right to do so when it has followed all its rules and complied with the constitution under which it acts. This church evidently followed all those rules; it followed the principles of its constitution and acted as strictly in accordance with the representative nature of its institutions as it possibly could; and the Church, by an enormous majority, decided to enter into the Union with the other churches. After doing so, those who, as individuals or congregations, did not wish to remain connected with the new church were allowed to dissent—were allowed, as it was called, to vote themselves out of the United Church, of which their Church had formed part. They therefore, according to the common sense view of the case, and the legal view of the case—

Mr. MACMILLAN. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to correct him? The exact words of the Act are:

“Determined not to enter into such Union,” instead of to go out of such Union.

Mr. CASEY. It appears, at all events, that, after the Church had entered the Union, certain ministers and congregations were allowed to say that they would not follow the other ministers and congregations into the Union—became, in fact, dissenting ministers and congregations, and, therefore, lost all claim to any share in the fund, either interest or principal. But the Church which entered into Union with the other churches was not inclined to take a technical view of the case, and it was arranged that those dissenting ministers and congregations, though technically forfeiting all claims to the fund, continued to be annuitants, and to be represented on the Board which managed the fund. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) said they objected to receiving annuities from a strange church, but he neglected to tell us that the dissentients were represented on the Board which administered the fund, and that, far from objecting to avail themselves of the fund, they have been for years receiving their share without objection. My hon. friend from Middlesex (Mr. Macmillan) goes on to put a conundrum, and he says, if the secession has taken place, what are those people who dissent from the Union, if not the Presbyterian Church in connection with the Church of Scotland? That is a conundrum which I do not propose to answer, simply because I cannot. I do not think that dissenting body have a legal or technical or ecclesiastical right to any definite name as yet. Of course, it is quite proper for them to assume any name allowed to them by courtesy, as a voluntary association, or to ask this House to give to them any name which the House should properly give to them, describing who and what they are. They certainly have not the right to the name of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, seeing that that body has merged its individuality into a federation with other churches, and that no seceders, be they few or many, can claim to be the original church. The argument has frequently been used that those who went out of the Union went back to where they were before, into the former old kirk, and that they were then the old kirk again. I think no contention could be weaker than that. The old kirk was organized under a certain constitution; whatever the majority did was the act of the church, and if that church choose to unite with any other it disappeared as a separate organization for the time being. My hon. friend tells us that we are asked to make legal by this Act what the Courts have declared to be illegal. In a technical sense he speaks correctly, for the Privy Council has declared that the acts of the Temporalities Board were illegal in that they were unauthorized, but they were not illegal in the sense of being contrary to law. What we are asked to legalize are the Acts of the Temporalities Board, performed under legislation which they were advised to be legal, and granted by an authority which they believed to be competent. We are simply asked to authorize Acts which were unauthorized hitherto, and it is very unfair to say that we are asked to authorize what is illegal. At the close of his speech, my hon. friend dropped an observation or two, which if he conscientiously believed them, would render the whole of this discussion unnecessary. He says he believes that the body of the Ministers and laymen whom he represents have already a legal right to the whole property of the Church which entered the Union, and that they can recover it by going to law. If that is the case, I do not see why they should oppose this Bill. It is rather puerile to tell us, as he tells us afterwards, that they oppose this Bill because they do not want to be hard on the majority, but to give them a fair share of the spoil. I think if these dissentients were perfectly certain that they would obtain more than they asked by the proposed compromise without getting it, they would not take the trouble to get it. But speaking of a compromise, this Bill as it stands, the basis of the Union effected between these churches was strictly of the nature of a compromise; and I think it would be very unfair for us to upset that compromise, which was obtained only after years of patient care and deliberate bargaining. I think, if we accept a compromise, assuming certain legal rights which these gentlemen say belong to them, we shall be interfering with the subsequent action which they declare they intend to take before the Courts. On the whole, I think there is no reason for thinking any injustice has been done to these gentlemen who have chosen to remain out of the Union which their Church as a church entered, but that the provisions of this Bill are extremely liberal, that they have no reason to complain that they are not getting either sentimental or substantial justice, and that the House should not consent to break down the Bill as it stands.

Bill reported.

BILL IN COMMITTEE.

The following Bill was considered in Committee and reported:—

Bill (No. 20) respecting the Portage, Westbourne and North-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Boulton.)

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time:—

Bill (No. 132) to incorporate the Montreal and Central Canada Railway Company.—(Mr. Fulton.)

Bill (No. 133) to incorporate the Western Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Williams.)

Bill (No. 134) to amend the Acts relating to the Great Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Kilvert.)

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. VANASSE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to open a Post Office savings bank at La Baie or at St. Thomas de Pierreville, in the County of Yamaska, in view of the extensive trade carried on in those wealthy localities.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The application was made in August last for a post office savings bank at La Baie. Mr. Bourgeois, Post Office Inspector, was asked to report and has not yet done so. He has been written to to-day to ascertain the reason why he delayed making a report. There has been no application for a post office savings bank at St. Thomas.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY ROUTE THROUGH ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether it is intended to propose to Parliament any legislation as to the route of the Canadian Pacific Railway through the Rocky Mountains or elsewhere.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is the intention of the Government to submit a Bill dealing with this matter at an early date.

DISALLOWANCE OF RAILWAY CHARTERS.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether the Government has taken any, and if so, what action on the application of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, for the disallowance of two certain Manitoba railway charters, in addition to the South Eastern charter?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Government has as yet taken no action.

Mr. CASBY.

LAND REGULATIONS.

Mr. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause to be translated and printed, in French, for the use of the public, the regulations respecting the sale of lands in Manitoba and the North-West, together with the maps and plans of lands for sale?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is the intention of the Government to issue the regulations in French, but the maps and plans do not require translation.

DREDGING GRAND LAKE FLATS.

Mr. KING enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to complete the dredging of channel on Grand Lake Flats, N.B., and if so, when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have enquired in the Department about this place, but the locality is not known there. Perhaps it has another name but by the name given it is not known in the Department.

BREAKWATER ON THE RIVIÈRE BLANCHE.

Mr. Fiset enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, this year, to join to the mainland by means of a wharf, the breakwater on the Rivière Blanche?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The works begun two or three years ago require to be continued at some future time, but the Government is not in a position to do so this year.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

COAL LANDS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That the future of the vast Territories of the North-West is largely dependent on the supply of fuel at a moderate rate.

That the present information as to the country and the coal areas is not sufficient to warrant Parliament in creating long enduring interests in large quantities of the coal areas.

That the regulations as to coal lands laid on the Table make no provision for the application as a general rule, of the just principle of public competition to the acquisition of those valuable lands, and thus leave open the door to disadvantageous cessions of the public domain for the benefit of individuals.

That the said regulations make no adequate provision to check the consolidation of large blocks of the coal lands in few hands, and the consequent restriction of competition and enhancement of the price of coal.

That the said regulations make no provision to secure any working of the coal mine by the lessee.

That the said regulations provide, by the arrangement for twenty-one year leases, renewable, for the creation of interests of longer duration than prudence at this time would, as a general rule lay down.

That they, make no proper provision for the settlement of the terms of renewal.

That the said regulations do not become operative, if disapproved of by this House; and the House is responsible for their coming into operation.

That the House disapproves of the said regulations.

He said: As I said when I gave notice of this motion some time ago, upon which occasion discussion was deferred, in order that we should receive the printed information since laid on the Table, it is impossible almost to overstate the importance of this question. There can be no doubt whatever that the fuel supply of the North-West, whether we consider the question in the light of the acquirements of the country, as affecting one of the necessities of life, or in connection with those classes of manufactures which may be expected very early to arise there, including the smiths, &c., the supply of fuel in that country which does not, among its many advantages, possess a very mild winter, is of the last consequence. It is true that the latest reports before us give a more favorable account as to the distribution of wood fuel than we formally possessed. There is some reference to that subject in the report of the Minister of the Interior to which I shall refer presently; but there can be no question whatever, I think, judging from that report—looking at the geological survey and the whole mass of documentary information we have with reference to the territory—that the supply of wood fuel is scanty—that for a great portion of the territories it is inadequate, and that it is of very great consequence that such timber that exists and as can be made available for that purposes, should be not used for fuel unnecessarily. But I need not dilate on this subject, because it has been thought to be of such present importance as to merit especial attention of the Administration; and they themselves have indicated in the strongest possible manner the inadequacy of the supply of fuel, and the importance of making special provision to meet the difficulty. For, among the items which were passed in Committee of Ways and Means the other evening, was one which renders free wood when imported into the North-West for the purpose of fuel; and, therefore, there is an express declaration on the part of the Administration that an importation of wood for fuel is possible, is necessary, and that it is important that the cost of that fuel should not be increased in Manitoba. We do not observe that it is at all likely that the same laws of political economy, which, it appears, makes coal cheaper by reason of the duty imposed upon it, are to be applied to the North-West with reference to wood. It is considered that the imposition of a duty there, on wood, does enhance the cost of the article; and the new method of procuring a cheap supply of fuel to the other Provinces of the Dominion, which is adopted by the Administration, is not to be applied to that particular locality. I think that the farmers of the North-West have some reason to be aggrieved, and to complain of hon. gentlemen opposite, because, having demonstrated as they did the other day, that they made the fuel of Ontario so much cheaper by the imposition of a duty on it, they are actually now about to raise the price of wood in the North-West, by repealing that duty, the existence of which would be productive of such beneficial results. But the scarcity of this supply, as I have observed, is indicated by the reports, more favorable though of late they be. The report of the hon. the Minister of the Interior in the following language, and also to the topic, to which I more particularly desire to call the attention of the House, states:

"The supply of fuel for the use of settlers in the North-West Territories is a question having a very important bearing upon the development of that country. The surveys and explorations conducted by the Dominion Lands Branch of the Department during the past few years have, to a great extent, dispelled the erroneous impression so long prevalent, that there is a serious scarcity of fuel material in or convenient to the prairie regions, and has established the fact that, with the exception of what is known as the Missouri Plateau, lying west of the Moose Mountains and Touchwood Hills, and south of the 52nd parallel of latitude, in which there are large tracts of treeless prairie, with but narrow belts of wood along the valleys of the rivers and streams, the timber is sufficient for the needs of settlers for years to come. It is now also proved, by the geological explorations of last season and of 1880, conducted principally in the district where timber is really scarce, that within a vast area lignite coal of fair quality exists in abundance. The most easterly discovered out-crop of this coal is at the Roche Per ée, on the Souris River, and the deposit is believed to underlie the whole of the plain to the westward, in beds from three to fifteen feet thick, extending to the very foot of the Rocky Mountains and cropping out on the flanks of the Cypress Hills, on the Bow, Belly and Red Deer Rivers, and in the valley of the South Saskatchewan. These facts satisfactorily dispose of the question of the obtaining of the fuel supply required for the future occupants of the territory."

And so again in the Geological Survey, first appendix, there are several passages which have a bearing on the question, and which I will submit. I quote from the report of Geo. W. Dawson, as follows:—

"In the eastern portion of the North-West Territory, including Manitoba and carboniferous system is not found at all, but the cretaceous rocks already alluded to overlap the limestones of the older Silurian and Devonian periods. The true coal formation can, therefore, in this region only be supposed to exist below a great thickness of cretaceous rocks, and even if accessible the probability of coal of any value being found in it is—from analogy with the portion of the western States already mentioned—exceedingly small.

Neither do the cretaceous rocks (including under that name the beds to the top of Division No. 5 of Meek & Stayder's section), of the eastern portion of the plains' yield so far as known, any fuel of economic value, in their great stretch from the borders of Mexico to the northern part of the North-West Territory."

He also points out that:

"Overlying the cretaceous proper are the representatives of the Fort Union beds of the United States Geologists, and in these the extensive and numerous beds of lignite of the Souris River Region occur, and constitute the nearest available supply of mineral fuel, so far as known, for the Province of Manitoba."

Referring to one of the statements that were made as to the particular deposits, I find the following statements on page 21 of the report:—

"South of the last section, and about one mile nearly due north of the position of the wooden depot, is situated an exposure showing the most valuable lignite bed I have seen in the Souris Valley."

And he shows that it is then visible at the edge of the river, and for 200 feet alongside of the bank. So again, at the 29th page, he says:

"The most interesting and important section, however, in this region is that which occurs in a valley joining that of Porcupine Creek from the west, exhibiting a bed of lignite, 18 feet in thickness, and yielding also some of the most perfect and interesting remains of plants."

On page 41 he says:

"From the Souris River region to this point, near the 108th meridian, the lignite tertiary beds exist as a conformable deposit overlying the cretaceous, properly so-called. They are generally nearly horizontal, and, when they are cut away, the lowest beds exposed are these of the Pierre group of cretaceous, No. 4. A portion of the northern extension of the same lignite-bearing formation is described by Dr. Bell, in the Report of Progress for 1873-74, page 65, and analyses of lignite given. West of this point lignite coals are now known to occur on several horizons in the cretaceous series, a circumstance not ascertained at the time of publication of my report on the geology and resources of the region in the vicinity of the 49th parallel. The structure of this western region will form the subject of a forthcoming report."

And again, describing the quality of lignites, he says:

"The lignites, it will be observed, are, on the whole, uniform in composition and contain an average amount of over 40 per cent. fixed carbon, when the water content is estimated at 12 per cent. They are thus inferior to the lignite coals in the vicinity of the Rocky Mountains. The lignites here described, however, gain some advantage in a practical point of view from occurring in a horizontal position, and out-cropping in the sides of the valleys in such a way that they might be worked by simple adits, avoiding the expense and trouble necessary when vertical sinking has to be resorted to in the first instance."

And then he gives a very interesting account, pointing out that they do not appear suited for smelting purposes, and the smiths who tried them reported it difficult to obtain a smelting heat. He goes on to say:

"The same fault has been found, I believe, with even the best classes of similar fuels found in the vicinity of the Union Pacific Railway, and arises, no doubt, from the great proportion of volatile combustible matter to fixed carbon, and the quantity of hygroscopic and combined water. As the lignites do not coke, they would appear to be unsuited for the smelting of iron in the blast furnace. They are perfectly suited for puddling iron, and the metallurgical treatment of various ores, if burned in gas furnaces. Similar even inferior lignites are extensively used for steam purposes in various parts of the world, and may even be employed on railways, though locomotives intended to burn these fuels, in order to give satisfactory results, must have, compared to those worked on bituminous coal, larger grates and fire boxes, and longer boiler-tubes, giving a greater heating surface compared with the horse power. The value of the lignites of this region lies rather in the abundant supply, the offer of fuel of fair quality for local use in a country which, though adapted for stock-raising and agriculture, is practically without wood."

The statement of the hon. gentleman, therefore, being that that is the practical condition of that section of the country, at any rate. Now, the statements to which I have referred, show that lignite coal of fair commercial value, possessing very considerable value for fuel purposes, suitable also for many other economical purposes, exists in various regions. The report of the hon. Minister says, that it is believed it extends under the cretaceous rocks over a vast area, but our information as to that statement is as yet extremely imperfect. Further information, it is said, in the Geological Report, will be given in the forthcoming report, and we have at present only the scanty reference I have given to the House, and some others, which occur in preceding reports and which do not add seriously to the extent of our knowledge. It is clear also that there are considerable economic advantages connected with particular veins and out-crops of this coal. Dr. Dawson points out the horizontal stratification and the circumstance that the deposit is frequently at the edge of a river, so that there is every convenience, supposing the river to be navigable, to transport the coal without handling almost direct from the mine into the water conveyance. This is a circumstance of the last importance with reference to the value of these fuels; and it is of the last importance with reference to the relative value of different beds of these fuels, because experience has demonstrated that the main expenditure in connection with coal is that of transport, and that where you get coal easily mined and easily placed on board cars or a vessel, you will get a cheap coal. There is some interesting learning upon this subject to be found in the bulletins of the last Census statistics of the United States. With reference to the bituminous coal supply of that country, which is known to be very extensive, the average price at the mines in 1880 was only $1.22 per ton; and the elements composing that price consisted of an average cost of labor of 76 cents, of materials for getting out the coal of 12 cents, and the royalty, in case the lands were leased, or the profit, or royalty and profit combined, the return to the owner of the land whether he were the miner or not, and the mining together, was 34 cents on the average, being the interest on the value of the land and the profit on the adventure, making an aggregate of $1.22. For the two great States from which we draw our coal supply as a rule, and with whose operations we are most familiar. In Ohio and Pennsylvania, the result were these: the average price of Ohio coal at the mine was $1.29 per ton, composed of, labor 86 cents, material 16 cents, profit 27 cents, labor and material in the case of Ohio coal costing $1.02. In Pennsylvania the average cost of the coal was only $1.01 at the mine, labor being 60 cents, material 10 cents, thus making 70 cents for labor and material, and profit 31 cents. The reason of these differences, of course, is that the coal is more easily got in the Pennsylvania mines, that the miner is not paid lower wages—on the contrary, he is paid rather higher wages—but he is able to take out more coal in a day, and the cost of material is less. The result is that they pay for labor and material 70 cents a ton as against $1.02 in Ohio, and that they are able to sell their coal for $1.10, at a larger profit than the Pennsylvania people who sell their coal at $1.29. The proposition which I stated is extremely clear, that the cost of getting out coal is the main consideration of cost at the mine. The value of the coal mine is dependent partly on those considerations, and partly also on the convenience of the mine to the machinery for transporting the coal to the place where it is to be used. Now, there are other statistics which have some bearing upon the question which I have to submit to the House with reference to the bituminous coal mines of the United States. There are reported in the Census returns no less than 2,843 establishments for getting bituminous coal in that country, and the area of and what they own is 416,642 acres, or an average of 139 acres to each separate establishment; of which 139 acres, seventy on an average are as yet wholly unworked, the rest are in process of being worked. In the great State of Ohio there are 618 separate establishments, which own 58,029 acres, or less than seventy-five acres to each separate establishment, of which fifty-five are unworked, and the rest in process of working. The value of real estate, not the plant but the value of the coal lands, is $62,354,000, or $151 per acre; and the value of the Pennsylvania lands is about $230 per acre; while the anthracite coal lands of the United States, irrespective of plant, are valued at $622 per acre. These figures indicate several points which are of value in considering the laying down of a policy for the acquisition of private interests in and for the working of the coal lands of the North-West. I am not, myself, an advocate for taxing the people for their fuel, unless, indeed, it be proved to my satisfaction, as it has not yet been proved, that it is a process by which they may get their coal cheaper; but I am desirous that they shall get it cheap. I believe that some day or other the people of the North-West will control their own lands, will administer their own lands, and, in that point of view, I do not myself object to our making some provision whereby there should be some rental, some royalty, some increment, from such coal mines if we permit them to get into private hands, particularly as there is no practical guarantee that the omission to charge a royalty would induce the supplying of coal to the inhabitants any cheaper. My desire is that we may, so far as we can keep the coal areas free; that we should not, beyond what the public interests and the present state of the development of the North-West indicate as essential, lock up, or permit to be locked up, create or permit to be created, large and long enduring interests in what may be extremely valuable areas of coal lands. The question of royalties I do not attach very great significance to as a source of revenue. The example of the Province of Nova Scotia is perhaps not wholly encouraging. No doubt some of the areas there are extremely valuable, but I learn that the facts which were illustrated during the late Session of the Nova Scotia Legislature would appear to indicate that the source of revenue to which an hon. gentleman alluded so glowingly the other evening has not been so extremely productive of late years. The information I have received is that the accrued royalties—the accumulated arrears for a period of thirty or forty years up to 1878—were about $45,500 at the end of 1878. On the 31st of December last there was due for royalties $104,000 by the mine owners of Nova Scotia, making an increase for 1879, 1880, and 1881 of nearly $60,000 beyond the balance due at the period preceding that epoch. The statement made by the Commissioner of Mines, when he brought down this paper, was that he had pressed upon the mine owners—had threatened to avail himself of the powers with which he was clothed in respect to collecting this tax or royalty; but he had been told that the trade was so dull, that they were unable to pay the royalty, and if they were compelled to pay it at that time they must shut up their mines: so they were given time. This I state to the hon. the Minister of Railways, who will no doubt be glad to hear it, because it is in a sense a corroboration of his view that he has succeeded in making coal cheaper. They say that the prices they received for the product were so low that they could not afford to pay a royalty of 10 cents a ton to the Nova Scotia Government. Now, while the areas may be vast, as the hon. gentleman says in this country they are, it is quite clear that there may be infinitely greater value in some portions of the areas than in others, that the variability of the thickness of a particular vein, that the facility of access to it, the facility of loading the product, may make one mine of infinitely greater value than the average of mines or the bulk of mines. This is illustrated by the result in other countries. We all know that some mines are immensely valuable; that others, although they may possess a very good quality of coal at no great distance from the earth, are yet unworked. Take for example the case of the Spring Hill mine, where some licenses to work mines had actually lapsed. They were opened and taken up by parties and they were immediately, upon being taken up, valued at not less than $250,000 or £50,000 sterling, and a very handsome sum was realized by those concerned in that fortunate speculation. Now, in this view, having regard to the variability of value, having regard to the circumstances that some mines should be much more valuable than others, it is of extreme importance that we should see that those mines which are of very great value do not go for a song, and that the profit which is capable of being derived by the superior advantages—natural advantages—which are attributed to particular mines, do not go into the pockets of a fortunate applicant altogether, but that the public should to some extent, either by getting cheap coal when coal can be got out, or in receiving a royalty or rental or remuneration for the privilege—in one shape or another share the advantage. And for that purpose it seems to me important that in some shape or other the principle of competition should, so far as it may be possible to apply it, be applied in this and in all other dealings with our public lands. It is the only safeguard against impropriety. I do not say, Sir, that it is always applicable, I do not say that it may be applicable in all stages of dealings with particular classes of the landed interests of the country, but I do say that it is a principle which we ought to adopt as our fundamental principle, and that we should ascertain in each particular instance in which it is proposed to depart from it, a very over-ruling necessity for departing from it before we agree that it should be departed from. There are, indeed, so-called competitions, so-called advantages to the public which are illusory; but what I mean is a real competition, a real opportunity for the public at large to participate in the benefits to be derived from obtaining those locations. I say that there are illusory as well as genuine competitions, and I will refer once again for example to the same mine to which I referred a while ago. In that case an order was made by the Governor cancelling the licenses already existing over these particular areas, and a gentleman in Halifax named, I think, Mr. Black, stepped into the office of the Commissioner of Mines one morning about ten o'clock, just when the office was opened and said to the Commissioner that he wanted to be located for a certain mine. "No," said the Commissioner, "you cannot; it is not in the market." "Yes it is," said the other, "the licenses have been cancelled." "I have not heard anything about it," replied the Commissioner. "Well, here's the Gazette," said Mr. Black; and he produced a copy of the Royal Gazette which had been published or, at all events, printed as on the day before, and was published first for the Commissioner by the new applicant, Mr. Black, and Mr. Black, as one of the public, took the advantage of the public announcement of the licenses and dealing in fair competition ostensibly with the public became the licensee or the locatee of the valuable Spring Hill areas. That is an instance of a wholly illusory competition, the result being that the whole of the public were not put upon a fair footing. Take another instance, brought to my attention the other day. A friend of mine in the House received a letter dated at Winnipeg on the 15th March. The writer says:

"I have returned from a sale of Government land, which was to take place to-day, at which a little game was perpetrated, which it is well for you to know. At the time of the sale a very large crowd assembled, so many that one could scarcely find standing room. The bidding was very lively until it was announced that, by instructions from Ottawa, the actual cash or certified cheques would have to be paid for all purchases. A favored few, who had been posted, could then purchase, being provided with the cash. This reduced the bidding to about ten men out of the whole crowd. It being after banking hours, nearly every man was excluded but those who were posted."

There, again, you have another mode by which it is possible to arrange, transactions, apparently equal to all, but which are in point of fact unequal. An announcement is made for a sale the time being fixed after banking hours, the conditions such that access is required to the banks, and except to those who were favored with private information which was not supplied to the public, or to those who carried their whole worldly wealth in their waistcoat pockets the competition was not a fair one. It is not that kind of competition which I wish to see applied—not that class of public freedom or fair play or equal standing—but a general principle of competition by which all interested may stand on the same footing. The valuable seams should be advertised, and auction or tender resorted to. There are other objections which it seems to me these regulations are open to. They make no adequate provision to check the consolidation of large blocks of coal lands in few hands, and the consequent restriction of competition and the enhancement of the price of coal. The regulation provides that no more than 320 acres shall be leased to one person. In the first place 320 acres may be a very large area. I have given you the average areas in the whole bituminous coal territory of the United States; I have given you the average area of coal in the State of Ohio; I have shown you that the block you propose to give to one person is more than twice as much as those to be found in the United States. But that is not all or the chief part of the difficulty. The chief part of the difficulty is that there is no practical preventive here for the consolidation of much larger areas. It is not provided that the lessee of coal lands shall not be at liberty to assign or sublease; it is not provided that he shall not be at liberty to assign to any other lessee of coal lands. Once a lease is made of one block to one person, and of another block to another person, there is nothing to prevent the two combining or the one buying out the other, and so one person becoming the lessee and proprietor, or two or three persons combining and becoming the lessees and proprietors of very large areas of coal lands. Now, the Minister himself has recognized the importance of a limitation of the area, else why provide that no more than 320 acres shall be leased to one person? But he has recognized it by a provision which I have shown is ineffectual to carry out the object of the restriction, because he has not provided, as it is essential to do if we desire to keep the coal lands in several hands, that an acquisition of interest by one lessee from another, shall be a cause of the forfeiture of the lease. That is essential if you want a genuine restriction. If you want a sham restriction, I admit that this regulation furnishes you with a very good one. Now, we have already before us the danger to which we are exposed in this regard. Amongst the papers laid on the Table is an application made in March, 1880, on behalf, I believe, of the Souris Coal and Fuel Company of Winnipeg, for the purchase under the regulations then existing of no less than 7,520 acres of valuable coal lands on the Souris river. They observed that it was important, perhaps, to have the application in different names, and they proposed the names of a number of gentlemen, one for one section, another for another section, and so on. We see that it was very easy to obtain applications in the names of different persons, with the object of concentrating in one ownership a very large area of lands. Under the law, but one of these sections could be granted to that company, a section in respect of which it appeared some claim existed on the part of some person who had applied and done some work on the coal area under the old law, and they were referred, as to the rest of their application, to the new regulations. But you see there the design, and the desire, if it be practicable, to obtain large areas of coal lands in few hands, and you see that if there be no effective restriction on the consolidation of large areas, it will be done. Nothing will be easier for Mr. Smith, Mr. Jones, or Mr. Robinson, each to apply for different areas, and after that to assign the different interests to one person on whose behalf they apply or to whom they may bona fide sell. There is another case disclosed in these papers which is worthy of attention. It is, indeed, a case of a very different character. I agree that the information received, and the proposals made on behalf of Mr. Lethbridge, are such as justified the Minister in giving very favorable consideration to his plans; but I want to call attention more to the general principle rather than to the particular application to what appears to me to be a proposed departure from his plans. The surveyors' description and the map are not before me, so that I have not been able accurately to ascertain how Mr. Lethbridge applies for four different areas, comprising altogether 320 acres of coal lands, and 320 acres of farming lands as appurtenant to each area of coal lands. I put aside the application, which is not relevant to the present question. What is relevant is this: that it seems to be a mistake to put into one man's hands different areas in different places, though each happens to be less than 320 acres, but making 320 acres altogether. I do no injustice to the applicant in saying that he asks for these four areas because he thinks them most valuable, and that they are most convenient to the river along which he proposes to mine and on which he proposes to transport the coal. It may be, therefore, that there are four different outcrops at convenient points on the Saskatchewan, and that these points are really different mines, which are being absorbed by one person, because the whole four points comprise no more than 320 acres. This is, in point of fact, the leasing of four separate coal areas, and may be the creation of a practical monopoly of the coal supply there. I say practical monopoly, because if the conveniences of mining and of transporting are infinitely superior at these four points to what they are at the other coal areas in the neighborhood, it is quite clear that the owner of these four areas has a practical monopoly. Now, it is said that there are coal rings in the United States which control the price, and regulate it very effectually the whole year round. If that be the case, with many thousands of areas scattered over many States, and with such enormous interests as are involved in the simple statement that the coal lands alone, without the plant, are valued at $64,000,000, how much easier it will be, in the early stages of the development of the coal areas of the North-West, to establish rings and monopolies there, and how doubly important it becomes that we should avoid as far as we can making facilities for the creation of such monopolies, and as far as possible take care that the valuable and convenient areas, the areas that furnish the greatest facilities at this time by water communication, and in the next eighteen months or two years by rail communication, for the supply of fuel, should be in separate hands, so that we shall have the benefit of the least restricted competition that is possible. I object again in my proposed resolution to these regulations, because they deal with the subject at a time when we are not sufficiently informed to be able to judge how it ought to be dealt with. I do not say that we ought to permit the coal mines to remain undeveloped because we do not know enough about them—far from it; but I do say that we ought not to adopt general regulations under which enormous areas of lands become open to lease, but that we ought to confine ourselves at the time to the opening of such mines as are required for the present and the immediately prospective needs of the North-West, until we learn more of these coal areas. Our geological force, in my opinion, ought to put forth the most active efforts in the North-West. I have for years believed that to be a prime duty; and I recollect a few years ago the hon. member for North Norfolk making a motion in reference to the surveys of that territory, with the view of obtaining reliable information as to the extent of our territories arable or otherwise. I believe further explorations in that direction will be of great consequence, and so far as economic mines and minerals are concerned we can afford to make extra efforts and explorations in order to ascertain what is the actual condition of the fuel supply of the North-West. Our present information imperfect and largely conjectural, and so far as information as to the economic value of the situations and the availability of the different mines goes, it is almost wholly useless. I object under these circumstances to the creation of such large enduring interests in the coal mines of the North-West. The plan proposed is one for a lease of twenty-one years, renewable—renewable not once but renewable indefinitely; and therefore it is safe with respect to conditions, a perpetual interest; if possible every twenty-one years to have fresh conditions. But those conditions are to be made by agreement between the parties, and no provision that I can see is suggested for what is to be done in case of disagreement, but the real owner is to continue to be the lessee; in effect he has a perpetual interest subject to the possibility of a change in the conditions of the lease every twenty-one years. I object further that there is no adequate provision for working the mines continuously. The clause of the regulations provides that leases may be worked in case actual operations have not been commenced within one year and the mine had not been worked within two years, but there is no provision for the continuous working of the mine thereafter. Now, the Nova Scotia Statute provides in a very different form in that regard. The Act says:

"When it shall be represented to, or shall come to the notice of the Chief Commissioner of Mines, that any mines or minerals claimed under a lease from the Crown, or under a lease granted pursuant to this charter, have been abandoned for the space of one year, have not been effectively or continuously worked, or have been worked only tolerably, or to prevent a forfeiture under the terms of such lease, or that the lessee of such mines has failed to comply with any of the terms, covenants or stipulations, in his lease contained, or by this charter required, or is acting in violation thereof, the Chief Commissioner of Mines shall cause a notice to be personally served upon the lessee or some one of them, and an enquiry shall be held."

There is in that Act an express provision for forfeiture in cases where mines are not effectively and continuously worked. If there be any justification whatever for entering into an extensive alienation of the coal mines of the North-West at this time, and with our personal knowledge, it is this and this only: that the needs of the country with respect to fuel present and prospective are such that it is incumbent on us to offer every encouragement for the development of the coal supply; and, therefore, I say, that if we find ourselves in that assumed necessity as the reason for making alienations of this kind, we ought to provide that there shall be an effective and continuous working of any mines leased under these regulations on penalty of a forfeiture of the lease. It is not enough to say that operations shall be commenced within one year and that the mine shall be worked within two years, but provision ought also be made that the mine shall be kept working. Under these circumstances I thought it to be my duty to lay before the House the views which I entertain with respect to these regulations. It is possible that on some points these views may be found not acceptable to some hon. members. I admit the question is surrounded with difficulties, that the application of the principle of competition in all respects may be difficult, that the question of exploration may be of some consequence, but I do say that it is infinitely better for us to go slowly than to go too fast in this particular; and I would very much rather give a discretionary power of making leases to a limited extent of areas particularly accessible after bids had been received or by auction, or by some way in which competition would be insured for a short time, it being the understanding that this power would be used only to such extent as the development of the North-West required, until after another year of exploration we know more than we now can possibly know as to the extent and availability of those coal areas, than to continue regulations which rendered possible, and which, having regard to these applications on the table, render it likely that very large orders of most valuable coal mines will be let at once, or within a very brief period, and will get within a very short space into very few hands, into those hands without providing any adequate provision for continuous and efficient working, and with the danger of some of them being held by speculators paying the nominal rent of 25 cents an acre, which is not much to renew the lease of valuable coal mines, the result of which might be to greatly enhance the price of fuel to the people of that country. It is because I have felt that these considerations ought to be laid before the House, and because I felt there might be a difference of opinion with respect to some of the points in which the regulations struck me as being defective that I have couched this resolution in the form in which it is now represented. I have not asked the House to affirm all the propositions which occurred to my own mind as sound; but I only ask the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider certain resolutions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I regret very much that my hon. friend, in his very interesting speech, did not confine himself to the proposition that he has submitted to the House, and strayed into irrelevant matter. I specially refer to the statements which he got from some unknown informant, so far as I know, that certain persons in the North-West were posted as to the sale of certain lands to the disadvantage of certain others who were not so posted. I have never heard of this before, but I venture to say—and I will be very much mistaken if I cannot prove it to-morrow—that the hon. gentleman's informant was altogether mistaken, and that no such transaction occurred. No doubt there are a good many disappointed speculators, and one of those may be the hon. gentleman's informant. My hon. friend's speech was very interesting, but, interesting as it is, it is thoroughly unpractical. The hon. gentleman spoke as if we had laid out in a small tract of country a limited amount of coal, so that it could be ascertained by the Government, be put up at auction, and sold specifically to the different parties that were rushing to compete for it. In the first place, that country, as the hon. gentleman knows, is as large as Europe, and you might as well say that you would put up all the coal mines in Europe, and those south of us in the United States, for sale, have them surveyed and disposed of at public auction, as take the course the hon. gentleman indicates. Why, that is the very way to prevent such a consummation as the hon. gentleman wishes—the procuring of cheap fuel. In the first place, the hon. gentleman says there is a great scarcity of wood as fuel in the North-West, but he very fairly quotes the report of the hon. Minister of the Interior of this year which states that the apprehensions of scarcity of wood fuel are greatly exaggerated, that excepting in the Missouri plateau there is a large quantity of fuel quite sufficient to supply the incoming population for years to come. But supposing that species of fuel is scarce, the greater the necessity of opening coal mines, and the preparation of other fuel as speedily as possible. The way to do that is not to survey the whole of the supposed coal areas, and wait until the surveyors have parcelled it out into 320 or 160 acre blocks. Why the whole policy of the Government of which he was a member and the correct policy was, as is the policy of the present Government, to encourage explorers to find out beds of coal and other minerals, and, as a reward for their labor and enterprise, give them, at a fair rate, what they have, at great expense and trouble, and with a great deal of enterprise, discovered. The whole system in the United States was based on that consideration—that the explorers should be encouraged—and, although these regulations have been before the public for some time, and under the present and all the Dominion Lands Acts provision was made for coal mines, there has been no rush of capitalists or coal owners into that country, competing with each other for profitable mines. Why, there is not a single coal mine opened in the North-West. There are one or two applications—very few applications. The only practical application that has been made to open coal mines in that country has been made by Mr. Lethbridge, an English gentleman of very large fortune, who was anxious to invest money in the North-West, and he went in the most practical way to work. He sent out an experienced coal miner who wandered over, not the Valley of the Souris where this lignite lies, but in the vicinity of the North Saskatchewan and Bow River. This man discovered coal there in sufficient quantity and of quality to warrant Mr. Lethbridge in investing his capital there. He applied for three small areas amounting in all to 320 acres, and I am exceedingly sorry that in consequence of the necessity of receiving the approbation of this House to these coal mine schemes he has been prevented from entering this fall into the possession of these areas and of putting his miners to work. We have lost a season by it. It cannot be helped. It is proper that in a matter of this kind the consent and approbation of Parliament should be received. Mr. Lethbridge is a gentleman possessed of very great wealth and of the highest standing, and he is resolved to push this industry, not as a matter of speculation, not to sell the mines, but to send out his laborers and overseers and to put steamers on the Saskatchewan to carry that coal to market. I would be very glad if we could get others like Mr. Lethbridge here. There is no fear of monopoly in that market. Why the report the hon. gentleman quotes shows that from the Souris across to the foot of the Rocky Mountains there is one uninterrupted mass of fuel in the shape of lignite. It is a good fuel for the purpose of heating houses. It is fit for steam locomotives and steam engines, but is not as good fuel as bituminous coal; but such as it is, it is a valuable fuel, and in the absence of wood there is an unlimited quantity of it in that district alone. So much is that the case that Dr. Selwyn, the Director of the Geological Survey, who was requested by myself to go up last year in order to give his special attention to the district, says the quantity of coal is so great that it is absurd to ask for a royalty at all, that it is so plentiful it will have no special value, and that the land containing it should be sold as common agricultural land under the regulations for the sale of other farm lands, so that any persons who gets it may work the coal on his own estate without paying any royalty. It is known, not from the survey of the Geological Surveyors nor from any other expedition, but from the reports of surveyors who have been going over that country, that coal all along the valley of the North Saskatchewan crops out in such quantities and of such quality that the supply is without any limit, and, therefore, is of no special value. Now, the regulations which have been laid before this House are substantially the regulations of the Province of Nova Scotia, requiring 25 cents an acre nominal rental for the land and a royalty of 10 cents per ton put out at the mouth of the pit. My hon. friend opposite, speaking of Mr. Lethbridge, objects to the four small areas given to him, altogether amounting to 320 acres. If they had lain altogether in one tract or mass of 320 acres, there would have been no special objection, however. What is the consequence of his having four small equal areas? That, instead of opening one, he must open four mines. If he had but one clear area of 320 acres, and if he opened any portion of that area and sold a certain portion of the mineral, that would be accepted as a sufficient compliance with the terms of the lease; but, with four several areas, he has got to work four several coal mines and do four times the work he would have to do if he had a coal mine of only one area. But the hon. gentleman says we ought to have the principle of competition. If you have that principle you will have no explorations. Do you think any man would be fool enough to go up into that country and employ skilled men, or experts procured from the United States or England, spend summer after summer exploring, and, after he had discovered a mine, after all that expense and enterprise—find his money was to be practically thrown away—that the last man who came in could take the possession of his mine, or force him to buy it at a ruinous price. As I said before, the ideas of my hon. friend are altogether unpractical. I would ask the hon. gentleman—if he can find, whether in the United States, Nova Scotia, in British Columbia, Australia, or any other British Colony, that the principle of putting up mines or coal areas to public competition has ever obtained. According to my information, that principle has not been adopted in any one of those countries, and I have no doubt for the same reason as has influenced the policy of this country—that the principle of competition is fatal, is unfair to the explorers, is calculated to impede the discovery of coal and other minerals and is thoroughly impracticable. Let us look at the resolution of my hon. friend and see what its objects are: The first portion reads:

I agree with that completely, and therefore hope that explorations will go on on a vast scale, that mines will be opened up very soon, and that every encouragement will be given to the explorers. And I should be very sorry that any pedantic delay, until the country was laid out in squares, circles or semi-circles, and put up at public auction, should impede the immediate production of fuel. The motion thus proceeds:

Why, the information is precise; it shows that even with our geological surveys, with explorations confined to the Souris, that if there were no coal elsewhere in the country, there is sufficient in the Souris region to supply the whole of that vast country. And we know that Mr. Lethbridge shows that there is a much more extensive one on the Saskatchewan. The resolution continues:

“That the regulations as to coal lands laid on the Table make no provision for the application, as a general rule, of the just principle of public competition to the acquisition of those valuable lands, and thus leave open the door to disadvantageous cessions of the public domain for the benefit of individuals.”

I have already stated that this competition would be unfair, unjust and obstructive of the object we all desire. Furthermore:

“That the said regulations make no adequate provision to check the consolidation of large blocks of the coal lands in few hands, and the consequent restriction of competition and enhancement of the price of coal.”

If there was a small area, of the size of a county or so, there might be some apprehension of a monopoly; but the first miner that goes in will be successful or unsuccessful. If he is successful in finding good coal and getting a good market, I should be very glad to see him buy the next area again and open them up also. The larger the capitalist and the more he has got invested in this work, the better for the country and the greater the chance of our coal mines being properly worked. The danger is of our getting hold of small areas and of holding them, not with the idea of working them, but of selling them to the larger capitalists who have larger mines in the vicinity. The resolution also says: “That the said regulations make no provision to secure any work of the coal mines by the lessee.” Such a provision would be nugatory. We provide that when a man gets a lease he must immediately commence work and show that he is in earnest; and it would be absurd to suppose that parties who found they were working at a loss, or that they could not sell their coal, would go on ruining themselves, not being able to find coal or a market for it. I believe that the regulations in regard to leases are amply sufficient for all practical purposes. If a party commences to mine, and works it for two years, he must have put his capital into the business, paying men and setting up machinery, and if so, he has done all we can reasonably call upon him to do in order to the continuance of his lease. The hon. gentleman says the leases are too long. He must give a party sufficient interest in the mines to induce him to invest his money in them. What capitalist would go to the enormous expense required to procure necessary plant and labor—and the labor will have to be procured from great distances—and wages we all know will be high—if not sure of a sufficiently long possession of the mine to reimburse his outlay? So it would be absurd for us to expect that capitalists would go in there unless they have the fee simple of the soil. That is the mode adopted in most portions of the United States, if not all, of selling coal lands at a fixed price. Unless they have the fee simple, they must have the right of long leases. My hon. friend complains that the lease is to be renewable for a further period of twenty-one years, with such ground rent or royalty as may be at the time of renewal agreed upon between the Government and the lessee. That is substantially what will be in the lease. He says: “Suppose he don't agree.” Then there will be no renewal. The hon. gentleman cannot expect that all the covenants which are usual in such cases should be extended in the regulations. All the necessary provisions will be made to make these regulations effectual. If the lessee will not agree to a reasonable renewal of his lease then he will find a clause in his lease which will prevent him from either getting it or remaining in possession. That must and will be provided for with all the ordinary precautions that are put in all sorts of leases. Now, it is very important that these regulations should be adopted. The hon. gentleman sees from the return that is made that there has been no rush for these lands. The difficulty will be to get people to go there to offer for them, and he need not be at all afraid of the monopoly. These regulations are not to be the laws of the Medes and Persians. We want to induce explorers to go there; we want to induce capitalists to invest their money there, and if we find this day year, if we all assemble here again, that in consequence of these regulations being adopted there is a degree of competition, and that it will be in the interest of the country that these regulations should be altered, we can alter them, but in the meantime don't make them more stringent than they are. As I said, the Director of the Geological Museum informs me they are too stringent, and he says we should sell the lands the same as we do other agricultural lands at $2.50 an acre. I might also quote my late Deputy, Col. Dennis, who is strongly in favor of reducing the royalty one-half in consequence of the enormous coal there, the great distances which the coal must be carried, the uncertainty of the enterprise, the paucity of settlers in the country, and the possible chances of a bad market. He was of the opinion that the royalty was too high. My answer was this: we have the example of Nova Scotia where the royalty is 10 cents, and if we find on experience that 10 cents is too high we can bring it down. It is much easier to reduce the rental than to increase it. I may say now that if it should be found that the royalty should be reduced from 10 to 5 cents, I think it will be a matter of future arrangement with the explorers. I hope the House will not involve the principle involved in these resolutions, by going into Committee on them.

Mr. BLAKE. If no other hon. gentleman desires to speak, I desire to say a few words in answer to the hon. gentleman. This position seems to me to be somewhat inconsistent. With one breath he tells us that the country is one mass of coal land, that you could not walk over it without finding coal land, every man had a coal mine on his farm.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, In the ore country.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman then went on to tell us that even if a coal mine should be found, experienced coal miners would have to be sent out in a proper way at great expense, that it would take whole summer to work, and examine and ferret over the land, and if you did hit upon a coal mine, you were so deserving of commendation for your discovery, your expense, and the trouble you have gone to, that I almost expected him one moment to say that we ought to give him a handsome premium for finding the coal mine, and give him the coal mine into the bargain. It does seem to me that those two statements ought not to have been delivered in the same speech, because they do appear mutually destructive of each other. If it be a fact that coal is so plentiful that it is valueless, why is the explorer to be so highly commended? The truth of the matter is, that there may, and there probably is, so far as we can judge from these reports, a vast area of territory under which, at various distances and at various widths, there will be found strata of lignite coal of varying qualities. The truth, also, is that although there may be that abundant supply in that sense, there may be favored spots as I stated a while ago where you can get coal at a nominal expense for the getting, as it is technically called, and where it will be so close to a river or a railway that it can be transported at a nominal expense. Nor do I find from these papers that any one of the persons who have applied for various areas have done so upon the ground that they were explorers, or had employed explorers who had discovered coal mines. If it be the case, I say the claim to the consideration of the Government is that they spent money and went to work and explored the land, and after some difficulty found coal mines; all I can say is that projectors of that description who make applications usually, to adopt an old phrase, put their best foot foremost; they usually tell what they have done, and sometimes they even exaggerate their claims for expenses they have incurred; and you may read this return of all the applicants from end to end and you will not find—at least I have not found—a single statement on the part of any of these gentlemen that he explored and spent money and found a mine; and therefore desired to be put in fief of it. Not at all, Sir. My belief is that the most valuable of these areas have been lit upon by others altogether, largely perhaps by our own officers, engineers and surveyors. To a considerable extent they have been known from a very early period by the Indians or the Hudson Bay people. There is no instance known of before the House of the discovery of coal mines by any person at all. These regulations do not say that the explorer, profiting with the discoverer, shall have a right to the mine. They say simply the applicant. They do not advocate that it is a right based on the expenditure of time or money, risk or hazard in finding a mine, but whoever comes, the man who may have heard from a third party, the man who has applied for a mine which he has known to exist for a long time may get the mine, may get even the mine on the Porcupine River which Professor Dawson describes as the most valuable one he has met with in all his explorations. It is a question of whoever comes forward and asks. The hon. gentleman made a great deal of the inapplicability of the principle of competition in this particular class of transactions, and the whole argument was based on this point of explorations; but I say that the regulations are not based upon that at all. The Nova Scotia regulations give, I believe, a license to explore within a considerable area, and the successful explorer gets a right—that is to say, application follows for a lease of the mine in a moderate area within the explored area. But these are general regulations, under which any man who chooses can apply for any mine, no matter how well known, and obtain it at moderate rates. Now, although there may be vast quantities of coal in the country, valuable coal mines may be few, at this particular time they may be very few. Those are valuable at this moment which are found along the line of water communication. Those will be valuable within a short time which are found within immediate reach of the railways which are being projected through that country; and it is the seams which are valuable as to location, or width, or facility of access which will be taken up. The hon. gentleman says that the regulations are based on the principle of the Nova Scotia regulations; but I tell him as I have told the House, that the principle of the Nova Scotia regulations is that unless you work the mines continuously and effectually the lease is forfeited. The hon. gentleman says: "Would you compel a man to go in if he could not find any coal." Certainly not, but it is no hardship for him to forfeit his lease, if he cannot or does not proceed to get out the coal. But by these regulations, if he simply goes to work in a year and mines any coal within two years he shall have the lease in perpetuum. The hon. gentleman says: "Of course he will not do all that and then stop." But that depends. He speaks of enormous expenditure on machinery, and the tremendous cost of labor in opening these mines, but Dr. Dawson points out that the great advantage of these mines I have spoken of is the facility with which they may be worked. He says all you have to do is to send a man with a pick-axe, and that he can pick it out along the banks of the river and drop it into the boat. That is all the machinery that will be required in many cases, and this question of enormous expenditure for working is quite beside the question, so far as the fulfillment of the conditions of these regulations is concerned. The hon. gentleman says he dreads the selection of small areas to hold and sell to capitalists. I dread the selection of small areas to be held and sold to capitalists. We are agreed about that. I propose that the hon. gentlemen should get rid of the difficulty by preventing anybody—the holders of a small or a large area—from holding it unless he continuously and efficiently works it. That would oblige the speculator in the small areas to go on and work the mine, or else give up his lease, and so the hon. gentleman would get rid of the difficulty he refers to. The hon. gentleman says: "I want consolidation; I am anxious to have it; I want the miner to add area to area, section to section, to go on enlarging his holding." Well, if that is his policy, it is singular that he should provide, in express terms, that no more than 300 acres should go to one person. If it is to be the policy of the House that illimitable areas are capable of being leased by any one person, why impose this restriction of 300 acres? This is only susceptible of justification in the theory, that it is proper to restrict the area, and yet the hon. gentleman says he will make the restriction an imperfect and inadequate one because, in my opinion, it is a good thing that there should be no restriction, and that as many areas as possible should fall into the hands of one person. But the more valuable the mine is, as I have already pointed out, the less labor will be required upon it; and in the choice mines, those along the banks of the rivers, where the coal would be got out with least labor will be the most valuable. These therefore, are the areas which will be appropriated; these are the areas from which we might have had a cheap supply, and these are the areas which will be appropriated on conditions which neither provide for their early, efficient or continuous working, only restricting the quantity to be held by one individual, for that wholesome competition which would ensure the reduction of the selling price. My view is, that the hon. gentleman has not made out a defence of the regulations. I do not propose anything so ridiculous as that the areas should not be sold or leased until we have surveyed the whole country. Nothing of the kind. I say rather let us deal with the question in the present imperfect state of things only so far as it is necessary; let us deal with them according to the present needs of the country, and not permit the general regulations to go in force, and all the valuable areas to be appropriated until we receive all the information which will enable us to deal with the question intelligently.

Mr. BUNSTER. An allusion has been made to the coal areas of British Columbia. I hope that the leader of the Government had not altogether forgotten our Province, for it has not forgotten him and probably never will. I hope he will advertise British Columbia as well as he advertises the North-West. I do not think the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) is as well posted about coal matters as he should be. He will find when the iron horse is snorting on the Pacific shores that we have a quality of coal unsurpassed on this continent. I am informed that the coal from one of our mines—the Wellington—has been exported as far as Texas, and that it has been pronounced there better than any in the United States, and that coal was drawn 2,500 miles into Texas. Therefore, I am satisfied that British Columbia coal will not take a second place to any North-West coal.

Motion negatived on a division.

THE SYSTEM OF GRANTING TIMBER LICENSES.

Mr. BLAKE moved:

That in the opinion of this House the existing system of granting timber limits is liable to result in gross abuse, and in the cession of valuable interests in the public domain for inadequate consideration to favored individuals.

That it is expedient to apply the just principle of public competition to the granting of timber limits.

He said: During the early history of the North-West it was not possible, I dare say, to apply the principle of competition to the granting of timber limits, and I have no fault to find with the principle or action that was adopted at that period in the history of the country. I think the time has arrived—and arrived for a good while—at which a change of policy is imperatively necessary. The hon. gentleman has said, with reference to coal lands, that he has not had many applications. That observation is not applicable to timber limits. The returns brought down show that there have been between one and two hundred applications; but I believe that a large number of others have been made, besides a vast number of permits to cut timber. There can be no question, therefore, that the subject of timber limits is of great interest to two classes—to the population at large, which is interested in obtaining a cheap supply of timber and lumber, and to a considerable class of the community which is interested in what is vulgarly called “grabbing” the timber limits of the North-West. Now, we have had in former days in the older Provinces experience of the system which is at present in vogue, and we know that the leasing of timber limits by private bargain gave rise to the grossest abuse and favoritism—that valuable interests in the public domain were alienated for inadequate considerations to political favorites; and so great was the abuse that the rule for a long time by statute has been that these limits shall only be sold by public auction. I believe that is the system prevailing in the sister Province, as it certainly has been so in Ontario from Confederation. This complete change in the timber system prevented any opportunity for that political favoritism to which I have referred, and the interest of the public was served to a large extent by the large premiums paid at public competition by intending lumbermen for the limits offered. Great fortunes have in some instances been made in the North-West already by the lucky men who have received timber limits, and considerable fortunes are now being made by those who have even moderate limits. The timber limits in that country are of a character that cannot endure; unfortunately there is not a very large supply of marketable timber, and, in many cases, the timber limits will not last for a very long time. It is, therefore, of the utmost consequence that those we have should be disposed of in the manner I indicate, in order that the public may have the value of the interest which exists in these timber limits. I received the other day an account of what had been done by one man who owned a small saw-mill. He produced between six and seven hundred thousand feet of lumber in the year, and he retired on a fortune of $20,000. The profits of lumber milling in that country are enormous; they are seldom less than from $10 to $15 on every thousand feet. Now, that is an evidence of the real value of a moderate limit, and we have before us a proof of the eagerness and earnestness with which limits are being sought for, in the voluminous return on the Table, disclosing the names of the applicants for locations. I am told that a not uncommon transmutation is for an agent for North-West lands to become the owner of a limit. For a while he is in his agency, and conducts the business; during that period the limits are disposed of, I do not say by him, but from reports by him; but a little while after he ceases to be an agent, and the next thing you hear of him is, that he is a partner in a timber limit, and engaged in the business of converting lumber into gold. As I have said, the system is one liable to the grossest abuse, and, as an evidence that there are considerable frauds, we read in the appendix to the Report of the Minister of the Interior:

“During the year, one hundred and fifty-five applications for timber berths and one hundred for mining locations were received.

“Five leases and twenty-one licenses for timber berths were given, and three hundred and sixty-six temporary permits.

“The reports and schedules in relation to timber, which are appended, show that there are in the Province of Manitoba forty-six saw-mills in operation at present, and in the North-West and Keewatin Territories, nine saw-mills. From the statements in returns given by their owners, these mills are shown to have an average capacity for cutting ten thousand feet, board measure, each, in a day of twelve hours. From four to five months only in the year, of sawing at this rate, should give a total quantity of about fifty-five millions, board measure, of lumber. The returns made for the purpose of payment of dues would give but twenty-one millions of feet of all manufactures of wood during the year. Even with due allowance for the proportion of timber that would be obtained from other than Crown lands, there is still so great a difference between the quantities returned as cut and the capacity of the mills, that it is to be inferred that these mills are in operation to their full capacity for but about a fourth of the year, or else that the system of procuring returns fails to obtain accurately the amounts on which dues are chargeable.”

These are alternative suggestions which the officer makes to account for the discrepancy between the reasonable capacity of the mills and the Government returns. I will venture to say that the officer believed, and I think it pretty plainly to be inferred from the report, that it is not that the mills cut four or five months in the year only, but that the system under which the returns are made up is defective as a means of ascertaining what has been cut or the amount of Crown dues chargeable. A portion of the profits are obtained by reason of the ineffectual carrying out of the regulations and non-payment of dues to the Crown. That also is very likely to result from the continuance of a system under which timber limits are granted to individuals at the instance of the Ministry, of their officers, and not by a system of public competition. Where you find those limits granted as favors to those who are in the Ministers' graces, granted privately, without the security of public competition, you will be very likely to find those who have obtained the limits not very careful as to the payment of subsequent dues, or as to making returns. I am not charging or insinuating that these things have occurred; I am merely saying that the system is one liable to abuses of this kind; that it is one which gives the fortunate possessor of the limit the whole of the good fortune, instead of sharing it with the public by having open competition; that the experience of other Provinces, particularly that of Ontario, is wholly in favor of the latter system, and wholly against the former system; that there are so many applications for timber berths as to make it all the more important and reasonable that a plan for open competition should be adopted. I am sorry to observe that the leader of the Government, after having in one case adopted the plan of open competition, receded from it. I refer to the case of the grazing lands. During the fall of last year a minute was adopted and sanctioned by the Government declaring that those grazing lands should be disposed of by public competition, but the new regulations of December altered that plan, and they are now disposed of according to another system; and the result of that system is developed in the returns which are laid on the Table, from which we find that numerous applications by mail before the Session, and some since the Session, for choice grazing lands in the North-West. I read some of those names with the pain of deep regret. I observe indications that the House is about to lose the countenances of many hon. gentlemen whom we would rejoice to see here many years to come, they being about to change their vocation from being representatives of Canada's constituencies to that of being cattle breeders. Tracts of land on the Kootenay, Bow River and other suitable places, Goshens in imagination, are applied for to the extent of from 35,000 to 100,000 acres, which are to be made valuable by hon. members, who have been up to this time more engaged in the business of attending to the concerns of men, but who from this time propose, under the auspices of the Government, to become herders of cattle. Or perhaps they do not intend to do so except by deputy, and, as the hon. leader of the Government suggests, with regard to owners of coal lands, they would sell the lands and turn an honest penny by the speculation. With respect to timber limits, I see no reason why, in face of the numerous applications, the limited areas and the advantage to the public in avoiding the danger of abuse, some system of open competition for timber limits should not be adopted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I see the hon. gentleman has imported into Parliament the habits which he has gained from forensic experience, that when he has a weak case he attempts to draw his audience away from the subject. When he was discussing the coal lands the hon. gentleman read a letter about the sale of lots, and now, when discussing timber limits he goes off to grazing ranches. The hon. gentleman says that he does not charge the Government with having done anything wrong, but that the present system, in his opinion, is liable to result in gross abuses. I suppose he meant that, from having had so much to do with the administration of such affairs in the Province of Ontario that when he transferred his eloquence from the Ontario Legislature to the Dominion Parliament, he brought that feeling with him. The hon. gentleman made up his mind that when he came from the smaller area to the larger one, that he would bring with him the fixed conviction that this system of granting, as we are now doing, licenses for timber limits was liable to abuse and ought to be curbed. Strange to say, we are following the example forced upon us by the Administration of which he was a member. In the Session of 1872, the Government of which I was then the head passed through Parliament the law 35 Victoria, (section 50) which contains this clause:

"The right of cutting timber on such timber limits shall be put up at a bonus per square mile, varying according to the value of the limit, and sold to the highest bidder on competition either by tender or at public auction."

That was a Bill passed by our corrupt Government, but we disappeared and were succeeded by the late Government in November, 1873. Strange to say, the first act they did in 1874 was to repeal that clause, and this is the clause they put in its stead:

"Provided that in cases where application may be made for limits on which to cut timber, after survey of the territory has been made, the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the hon. the Minister of the Interior, authorize the same to be leased for such bonuses as he may deem fair and reasonable."

Now, during the time that Administration was in power they leased 605 square miles of limits, and they did not put up one single acre to public competition. During the whole of the five years they, conscious of the abuse that followed such a practice, altered the competitive system and introduced the favoritism system—this system by which friends, political, personal, social or otherwise were to get limits. They carried it out to the extent of 605 square miles. I will give you an instance of the system. In the licenses that we grant now we provide that every license shall be forfeited, unless, within the year, a saw mill is erected to use that timber. The elections, I think, took place on the 17th September, 1878. What did we find? We all remember how we were attacked for appointing some of our friends just before we resigned.

Mr. MILLS. Nearly all were appointed then.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They were all my friends. I am not in the habit of appointing my foes. I have no confidence in my foes except occasionally when I have a foe of such ability as the hon. member for Buffalo. On the 7th October, 1878, long after the 17th September, 1878, and a few days before they shuffled off their political coil, the mantle fell upon my shoulders, they passed an Order in Council granting to two mortal foes—I must admit that—the Messrs. Cook and Sutherland—how much? We limit our grants to fifty square miles. They granted 200 square miles to Messrs. Cook and Sutherland, and instead of giving it in one area, what do you think they provided? Explorations along the River Saskatchewan, show that the timber between Edmonton and the Rocky Mountains is in small groups of twenty miles square each. The Order in Council was passed authorizing the granting to Messrs. Cook and Sutherland, of the timber limits, 200 square miles, on the North Saskatchewan and its tributaries between Edmonton and the Rocky Mountains in isolated blocks of twenty square miles each. Thus every tree between Edmonton and the Rocky Mountains was handed over by the late Government to their political friends Messrs. Cook and Sutherland, creating a monopoly so that no man can go in through that whole vast region of country. It must be this experience that is weighing on my hon. friend, and he fears that we shall commit the same atrocities—atrocities by the hon. gentleman's own account—that his friends committed. He dreads lest we should be guilty of the same favoritism, the same granting to monopolists, the gross abuse which he saw exercised by his own friends. But our practice has been this: the first few months we were in office there were two leases granted for twenty-one years, but we stopped that system and no leases are granted longer than one year, of course, with the same honorable understanding that exists in Ontario, that if a man puts up his mill, pays his dues, and acts honorably towards the Crown the Crown will act honorably towards him, and his license will be renewed from year to year as long as he keeps his contract with the Government. We have limited, except in very special cases, under special circumstances, and not with regard to the individual or the special circumstances of the country, the areas to fifty miles. Well, of the 605 square miles disposed of by hon. gentlemen opposite not one acre of it was under lease. One-third of all the territory on which timber licenses were granted by the present Government was put up by public auction, as the schedule before the House shows. During the whole five years that these gentlemen were in power they were granting leases, yet how much do you think they collected of dues? They collected $6,000 altogether, or about $1,000 per year. This shows either that these leases were all given to speculators or that the people took licenses on them where there was no timber. During the three years that we have been in power, we have disposed, by private sale, of 1,546 square miles, and at public auction of 746½ square miles; and during those three years we have collected $100,000 in dues, which are increasing largely every month. The principle we adopt is this: Immigrants are not going into one spot. Some will go to Bow River, others to Prince Albert, Battleford, Edmonton, Qu'Appelle—all over that country. These immigrants must have houses and must get timber. We cannot keep them along the twenty-four mile belt on each side of the Pacific Railway, they go where they please. They must go wherever they please, and we must, in order to assist those people and give them timber, grant timber licenses wherever timber is to be found, where the works are going on. But, if parties go and explore, they must make an application, and, if it is a reasonable one, if the applicant is respectable, if he enters into a contract within a year to put up a saw mill and pay dues, and give proper returns under oath, he will get a license. And so the immigrants, as they scatter all over the country, will find saw-mills, large and small and portable. They will be glad to get portable mills in the far distance. Any kind of machinery that will cut boards to build houses will be welcome. That is our system, and for the present I think it ought to be continued. When there is competition, two applying for the same place, it is to be decided by tender as at present; so one can bid against the other. Hereafter when we get on a little further, and the country becomes more settled—when the railroads have made progress, and the Canada Pacific stretches across the continent—timber can be largely carried from Georgian Bay, and the whole country reasonably supplied. When the country shall be more settled, we can probably adopt the Ontario system. At present it would be merely an obstruction, in my opinion. I think those men who have gone into the country with mills are doing yeoman's service, and are reducing the prices of lumber to reasonable limits. In regard to permits, parties received permission to cut for a limited period over a given area. The chief permits are granted for the purpose of supplying ties to railroads and poles to telegraphs; they are in the vicinity where timber is wanted, and if you did not grant the permits, the timber would be stolen without them, and you would get nothing. Timber for ties, &c., must be got out. This is merely a temporary resource for a temporary exigency. These are the reasons why I think that this resolution introducing the principle of competition is as yet premature. We have the sanction of his own Government to that policy. I suppose he was a member of the late Government in 1874.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events he was an ardent supporter; and he did not raise his voice that I heard of against the repeal or setting aside of the permission given by the previous Government in 1872, which was continued at the sole discretion of my hon. friend from Bothwell when a Minister. I have no doubt, as his successor, and I believe that he administered that Department with great ability and energy. He did his best; but he could not possibly have known the value of some of those limits, or he would have thought twice before he would have handed over those rather large, extensive, liberal limits in such a liberal, generous, unconditional, unrestrained manner to the Messrs. Cook and Sutherland.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman has adopted a rather singular style of defence from the motion before the House. He has undertaken to show that the late Administration acted improperly in repealing certain provisions of the law which he says he put on the Statute-book.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that you did it improperly, but that you approved of the system we are now carrying on.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman says now, that after a lapse of ten years, the system provided for in that Act was a proper system. He either now says that the law was premature, or that the late Government acted in a proper way in refraining from adopting the principle of competition in the first instance. Now, my hon. friend who has the resolution before the House, did not propose any more than in the resolution recently submitted, that the principle of competition should be adopted in the first instance. We know, and experience shows us, that that could not be done; that when settlers went into the North-West, when there was but little market for lumber, and the lumbermen were very indifferent, that it was impossible to carry out the principle of competition in the sale of timber limits in the first instance. The hon. First Minister has compared the small amount of duty collected on lumber while we were in power with a large amount now collected. But there is a much larger population in Manitoba and the North-West now than there was then. On personal investigation I found that, even as late as 1877, a great quantity of the timber cut at the mills in Winnipeg and the vicinity was obtained from Minnesota, in the vicinity of Red Lake; so that persons who had obtained timber limits from the Administration, in anticipation of the early failure of the timber limits of Red Lake, had not yet begun, to a large extent, to cut into lumber the timber on these limits. The statement I made will show the difference between the amount of timber duties collected at present and at that time; the greater portion of the timber cut into lumber was obtained in Minnesota. Now, I believe scarcely any is obtained in that quarter, and that the greater portion is obtained from the limits for which licenses have been granted. The hon. gentleman has told us that the timber limits granted to Messrs. Cook and Sutherland were very large, and was conceded to them after the defeat of the late Administration. That is true, but their application had been made at a very early period; and it was only in consequence of the pressure of business in the Department that it was not disposed of earlier. I may state here, whatever hon. gentlemen may think of the principle, that while I was in charge of that Department, while I did nothing that I thought might be more properly done by my successor—that all the matters with which I was conversant, that might have been disposed of at an earlier period, but were not disposed of—I thought it my duty to deal with as acts of administration, up to the last moment I was in charge of the office. I believe that was a sound principle, and that thus many matters were disposed of which, had they been left over, would not have been disposed of for many months. In fact, I believe there are some matters with which I was unable to deal entirely and which are not dealt with up to this moment. Now, as to the extent of this timber limit. The hon. gentleman represents 200 miles as a very extensive limit. Well, that is not the general opinion of lumbermen, and if the information I possessed at that time was at all approaching accuracy—and I have no reason to doubt it up to this moment—there is in that region an area for which this limit was granted at least twenty times the area covered with timber which is covered by the license granted to a brother of Mr. Hugh Sutherland and Mr. Cook. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has referred to that particular instance, but what are the facts? Those gentlemen proposed to erect a mill on the Saskatchewan. There was no mill upon the Saskatchewan with the single exception of Moore's. The settlers at Prince Albert had to pay as high as $110 or $120 per thousand for their lumber.

It was considered an advantage to the population for mill owners to be established in that district, and it was in order that competition might exist and that the people might obtain lumber at reasonable rates, that this license was granted.

Mr. HESSON. Has that mill been erected yet?

Mr. MILLS. If the hon. gentleman will ask his leader he will find that he cancelled the license. Further, I may say that at the time we retired from office there was a prospect of a considerable settlement at an early day in the region of Prince Albert and along the Saskatchewan. The location of the road was in that direction, and settlers were going in that direction in expectation of the construction of a railway through that region of country. I have no doubt whatever that if the location of the road had not been changed it would have been to the decided advantage of the people of the North-West Territory that this license should have remained in force and that greater facilities than now exist should be had for obtaining lumber in that quarter. What was right and proper five years ago may not be so now. Regulations which the Government were obliged to adopt temporarily at that time may be highly inexpedient at another period. The hon. gentleman knows there is a large population in that country. He knows the extent of timber area is somewhat limited, and that now there should be no difficulty in obtaining competition. We know there was great difficulty in the early period of settlement in the North-West Territories and Manitoba to obtain lumber at all, and therefore the lumbermen had to be invited into that region, and now that an opportunity for competition exists there is no reason why the principle of competition should not be made available.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I think I understood the hon. Minister of the Interior to state that $100,000 had been collected as timber dues. I would be glad if he would let us know to what date that comes down, what was the amount collected up to the 1st of June, 1881, and in what Department it is to be found.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot state now, but I will get him the information.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Where is it in the Public Accounts?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know. I got this return from the responsible officer of my Department.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. So far as I can see in the Public Accounts there appears to be no entry of that amount in 1881.

Mr. TROW. I am decidedly of opinion that the resolution now under discussion is a proper one for the consideration of this House. We have not under discussion what the previous Administration did or failed to do in granting large limits, but whether it is desirable now to grant them, or whether it is desirable to create monopolists in the timber interests in that great country. Notwithstanding the statement of the Premier in reference to the unlimited supply of fuel in that country, I must say that there is a great scarcity of timber. It is desirable that the Government should husband our forest resources as much as possible, and unless some check is put upon prairie fires, or some encouragement given to the settlers to plant trees, there will be a great scarcity of fuel in that country in the future. I am aware that in the old Province of Manitoba there is considerable timber, but outside the limits there is certainly a great scarcity from Fort Ellice to the Rocky Mountains. For hundreds of miles there is not a single tree, the Government ought to encourage the culture of timber, either by exempting the settlers from taxation or by granting them a small bonus of so much per acre of trees planted, or grant of land.

With reference to the coal interests which have been discussed, I have seen some of the coal in the Souris district, and found it of a very inferior quality. I question whether there is such an unlimited supply of coal as the Premier thinks. It is true, from reports we have received, there are large fields on the North Saskatchewan, and in reference to the Souris district the coal interest is not as yet developed; so far only an inferior sample of lignite has been found. I think the resolution should be thoroughly discussed and some means taken by the Government not to centralize our timber limits but to give as much privilege as possible to the actual bona fide settler. I am aware the Government has distributed the large proportion of timber limits—20 acre blocks, to settlers. That is right. But where there are large limits taken up by one individual it will be detrimental to that great country, because it will be to his interest to enhance the price of timber and keep up the price.

Mr. BLAKE. As no other gentleman desires to speak on this subject, I desire to say a few words in close of the debate. My hon. friend says I must have gathered my ideas in my experience in the Ontario Legislature. I suppose he knows, though he may have forgotten, that the law has always been in Ontario that the timber limits were at public competition, and I am not aware of any instance of abuse. On the contrary, I referred to the example of Ontario as indicating a state of things which proved the propriety of the step I was inviting the House to adopt. The hon. gentleman himself pointed out that twenty years ago this Government determined, experimentally, that the true mode of dealing with the timber berths was to sell them at public auction, and he and his friends put a law on the Statute-book providing for that. He says that the Government of my hon. friend from Lambton altered that law to the destination common to the applicants. Well, I do not know whether he was wrong when he passed that law in 1872, or whether the Government of my hon. friend from Lambton was wrong when they proposed the law in 1874. I do not remember that either of those laws were passed. I certainly did not oppose either of them myself. I supposed the hon. gentleman adopted the principle of competition as the sound and just principle to be adopted. I suppose that he thought the proper way was to sell timber limits at that time. I suppose he thought the time was ripe for the adoption of that system, even ten years ago, when there was hardly anybody in the country, when the question of getting a number of persons to bid was one I suppose he would be able to solve, but which he had not the opportunity of solving. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) was called on to administer those affairs, and at that time, or after an experience of two years, I presume—I do not speak with authority, for I was not a member of the Administration and cannot speak as to his motives—but I presume he changed the law because he found the time was ripe and that the country was so new that, as my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says, the difficulty was to get persons to cut the timber, and not that there was strong competition for the privilege of cutting it. I presume that was the reason, and I am quite sure that there was no dissent on the part of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) from the said doctrine that wherever it is applicable the principle of public competition should be applied, for I believe that hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) did not oppose the law of the hon. gentleman opposite when it passed. There was, therefore, a reason in the case of his Government, but it cannot be pretended that that exists at the present time. The return to which I have referred disproves the existence of any such reason, for I find that there were 155 applications for timber limits and 137 standing before the Minister—137 suppliant hands stretched forth to the Department begging his favor, and 134 perhaps since the return was made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Applications without limit.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, and patience without limit on the part of the suppliant until the Session is over or this motion disposed of. I understand that there was very great perturbation of spirit exhibited among the applicants at the mere notion that there should be any competition in their particular business. I have no doubt he has given to many of them by word of mouth, or sign, or nod, or in some other way some intimation that they might expect at an early and convenient day a favorable response to their applications so soon as the inconvenient investigations of Parliament are no more to be feared. I say that I have heard that there was considerable perturbation amongst the anticipants of the hon. gentleman's favors, at the bare idea that these matters should be submitted to a vulgar common competition, and that common people should have a fair chance of competing for the valuable timber limits in the North-West. The hon. gentleman says that, although ten years ago, when there were no people to compete with, he put a law on the Statute-book recognizing the principle. Now, when there are numerous competitions, when there is no difficulty in applying the law, I find that my proposal of ten years ago is premature to be madeto-day. "Wait," he says, "for another ten years, or twenty years, from the time I made the proposal for selling by auction, and then let the principle of public competition be applied." Well, it may be applied then, but the trouble will be that there will be no limits to put up then. The hon. gentleman has stated the course of the late Administration with reference to this matter. It appears that although they took power to grant licenses for these timber limits in this way, they granted only some 600 miles in the course of their Administration. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman includes those 200 miles which he has worthlessly—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Only the 600.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has granted 2,300 square miles during the three years he has been in power, so it was very obvious that during the previous Administration there was not a very energetic use made of this power. The hon. gentleman has granted 2,300 miles, of which 1,550 were by private application or arrangement, and he has 130 applications before him at the present moment for more, so that we may expect before another year a large portion of the remaining area will be allotted. Now, it is perfectly plain that the circumstances which he thought suitable, ten years ago, for the principle of public competition, are very much more suitable now and that there is no reason why we should not have a principle which is practicable now, and was always sound even when it was not practicable; and I think the resolution is one which should be adopted by the House.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move the adjournment of the House, but before doing so I wish to make a statement personal to myself. I did not happen to be in the House when the Orders of the Day were called, and, therefore, I take this opportunity of speaking of an article that appeared in the Globe of Friday. That article states that for the sum of $2,500 I was sold to a contractor. I do not suppose that many gentlemen on either side of the House will believe that, and I would have perhaps passed it over only that the statement is specific, and it affects a contractor, Mr. John Shields, whose future may depend upon that charge being unanswered or answered. I can only state, Sir, that there is not the slightest truth in the statement, and I shall shortly relate the facts, although it is rather unpleasant for one to be obliged to relate one's own affairs. An action was brought against me by Mr. General Hewson, which I resisted. It was put down for trial here at the last spring assizes, in 1881. I was at that time, as most hon. gentlemen know, exceedingly ill; I was confined to my house, and a good many supposed that I would never leave it. However, I was preparing to go to England when this trial came on, and my medical adviser told me that it would be as much as my life was worth to go to court and give evidence in the matter. I did not like it to be said or supposed or insinuated that I avoided giving testimony in the case. Mr. Shields, who, though a contractor, is a friend of mine, was subpoenaed as a witness in the case, and he came to see me and offered his good offices to relieve me from the worry and annoyance of the matter. I told him to go and see to it, and to pay a sum of money to get it settled if he could. The result was that it was agreed to be settled for the sum of $2,500, for which a release was to be given. That money was paid, but it was not paid by Mr. Shields; it was paid for me and by me. As I wish to be strictly accurate in the matter, I will say that not being a rich man, I had not the money at the time, and so my solicitor went and procured it from a friend, but not from Mr. Shields. Mr. Shields had nothing to do with it. It was lent to me, and when I came back from England, I paid half of it, all I could afford to do, and on the 1st of July I will pay my friend the other half, with interest. Mr. Shields made affidavit to the truth of these facts. He does not even know from whom I borrowed the money. These are the simple facts, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to inform the House of them for the reason I have stated.

House adjourned at 10:55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, TUESDAY, 28th March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

RAILROAD CONTRACT IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to a matter, respecting which I shall end with a motion—I refer to the letting of railway contracts in British Columbia. I shall not occupy much of the time of the House, not more than what is necessary to give a clear statement of the facts and to refer very briefly to the conclusions that must be deducible from these facts. On the 24th of October, last year, tenders were asked for the construction of certain works between Port Moody and Emory's Bar. Those tenders were to be received on 1st February, and the Government required that accompanying each tender there should be a cheque marked "good" by some bank or the cash in some case for $20,000. Accordingly tenders were received about the 1st February, & amongst the tenders was that of Messrs. McDonald and Charlebois, whose tender was for the sum of $2,277,000. On the 24th January this tender appears to have been made up by these contractors as on that day a cheque was obtained from the Bank of Montreal in Montreal marked "good for two days only." No further action appears, so far as the papers brought down to this House can show, to have been taken by the Government after the reception of tenders until February 1st, the day upon which they should all have been received, and I presume were received. On that day, as is usual in the Department of Public Works, the tenders were opened by Messrs. Schreiber, Chief Engineer; Mr. Trudeau, Deputy Minister, and Mr. Braun, Secretary of the Department. From the 1st February to the 6th, I do not see that anything further was done by the Minister or the Department; but on the 6th February, the private secretary of the hon. the Minister of Railways—not the Secretary of the Department—was sent to the Bank of Montreal in this city to enquire concerning this cheque that was marked "good for two days only," the object apparently being to ascertain whether the "two days only" was not some clerical error or an unintentional endorsement—to ascertain, in other words, whether the cheque was still good. Mr. Bradley, the Secretary in question, narrates the circumstance as follows:—

"DEPARTMENT RAILWAYS AND CANALS,
"MINISTER'S OFFICE, 6th February, 1882.

(Memorandum.)

"Re tender, Emory's Bar and Port Moody.—Under instructions from the Minister on Saturday last, I called, at about half-past 10 o'clock this morning, on Mr. Drummond, Manager of the Bank of Montreal here, and handed him a certain cheque drawn by McDonald & Charlebois, on the Bank of Montreal, dated 23rd January, 1882, for $20,000, and stamped on the 24th of same month 'good for two days only,' asking him whether he would pay it. On finding the cheque was marked 'good for two days only,' he shook his head and said it would be necessary to enquire at the head office. He suggested making enquiry, to which I assented. At about one o'clock this day Mr. Drummond called at my office, and handed me, in presence of Mr. Trudeau, the telegram from the head office, Montreal, which I, this afternoon, handed to the Minister, and which is attached hereto marked with my initials.

"A. P. BRADLEY."

"(Telegram.)

"MONTREAL, 6th February, 1882.

"To Bank of Montreal.

"Banker requisite to-day, please strike out 'for two days only,' from our acceptance stamp. The cheque will be good until paid.

"SHADBOLT."

"Handed to me by Mr. Drummond in my office about 1 p.m., 6th February.

"A. P. BRADLEY."

What strikes one as something remarkable, in the first place, with regard to this transaction up to this point, is this fact: that these contractors knew that the tenders would not be opened until the 1st February, yet on the 24th January they go to the Bank of Montreal and obtain a cheque upon which the regular stamp—not an ordinary endorsement—had impressed the words: "good for two days only." No man in his senses would have accepted such a cheque to send with his tender if he believed it was literally to be held good for two days only, because four days before the tenders could be received the cheque would be out of date. It appears from correspondence elsewhere in this return, that this was the stamp which was kept in the bank and was applied to cheques when they were required to be marked good by the bank, the short date, two days, being given to prevent these cheques from becoming current money. This appears to have been the object. We find the General Manager, in reply to the following letter from Messrs. McDonald & Charlebois:—

"MONTREAL, 23rd February, 1882.

"DEAR SIR,—On the 24th January last we obtained at your bank our certified cheque upon you for $20,000, and it was known to you that the same was to be used in our contemplated tender to the Government for railway work.

"Notwithstanding the fact that our tender was the lowest, we are, nevertheless, in danger of being deprived of our right to the contract on the ground that the cheque in question was certified 'good for two days only.' We will be obliged if you will state whether or not the limit as to time in the certificate on the cheque in question was merely a clerical error, and that the intention of the bank was to guarantee the goodness of the cheque until paid.

"We will also be obliged if you will state in your reply to this if any enquiry was made from Ottawa as to the goodness of the cheque, and what steps you took to correct the error, and oblige,

"Your obedient servants,

"McDONALD & CHARLEBOIS,

"E. S. CLOUSTON, Esq., Manager."

"MONTREAL, 23rd February, 1882.

"GENTLEMEN,—In reply to your letter of this date concerning the cheque for $20,000 accepted by us on the 24th ult., for your use in connection with your tender to the Government for railway work, I beg to say that the limit of two days only was unintentional, and was simply an oversight, that this was not at once struck out. It was certainly our intention to guarantee the cheque until paid. On discovery of the flaw on the 6th instant our Ottawa manager wired us of it, and I replied requesting him to strike out the objectionable words, and saying the cheque would be good until paid; to which he replied by letter of same date: 'Your reply to strike out restriction clause as stamped, and the cheque will be good until paid, is satisfactory to the Department.'

"Yours truly,

"E. S. CLOUSTON,

"Manager.

Montreal."

The other thing that strikes one as very remarkable, is the fact that the hon. Minister of Railways waited for six days after the tenders were opened before taking any action upon this irregularity, and then sends his own private secretary with specific instructions to know whether the cheque is still considered good. This message was delivered to the manager by Mr. Bradley, the secretary in question, in person, at 10.30 o'clock on the 6th February. Mr. Drummond suggested, very properly, he would ask the office in Montreal, and Mr. Bradley informs us in another place that he franked a telegram to Mr. Drummond to make the enquiry without expense to the Department. The enquiry was duly made accordingly; it must have been about 11 o'clock, and at half-past one it terminated. The manager of the bank here was able to wait on the Department of Public Works when he saw Messrs. Trudeau and Bradley at half-past one of the same day, the answer being that the cheque would be good until paid. What the object of the Minister was in enquiring whether the cheque would be good or not I cannot imagine, unless it was, and perhaps it is of increased significance, that he already made up his mind how to award the contract, and by imagining that the cheque was not good at the time he thought his position would be strengthened by getting a definite reply from the manager of the bank to that effect, in which his position would be much clearer. The reply, however, was entirely satisfactory as to the character of the cheque; it being good for the amount, so far as the bank could make the cheque good, until it should be paid. No action was taken by the Minister on that day, 6th February; but on the next day, 7th, he sends a memorandum to the Council stating, in general, the facts in connection with the acceptance of the tender and giving a schedule of all the tenders received. Then he says:

"That the 92nd clause of the specifications of the works embraced in this section states that no tender will be entertained 'unless a bank cheque, marked good by the bank, for $20,000, accompanies the tender.' 'I had the lowest tender as above, that from Messrs. D. McDonald and A. Charlebois, is irregular, inasmuch as the cheque which accompanied it is marked by the Bank of Montreal on the 24th January, 1882, as good for two days only.

"That the lowest tender made in conformity with the conditions of the specifications, is that by Mr. Andrew Onderdonk, for the sum of $2,486,255.

"That this amount is lower than the engineer's estimate of the value of the works to be performed, but the Chief Engineer, in a report dated the 6th February, 1882, states that Mr. Andrew Onderdonk has the necessary skill and resources to carry out the undertaking."

Then he recommends the acceptance of this tender of Andrew Onderdonk. He does not, however, inform the Council of the facts which occurred on the 6th of February; he does not mention that he had enquired whether this cheque was good, and found it was good; but he hints at a general statement that the cheque was marked good for two days only, and therefore he treats it as not being a cheque at all, or not being a representative of money which the Government could accept. On the day following, 8th February, an Order in Council is passed, which Order is, of course, as usual, a mere echo of the memorandum of the Minister, formally awarding the contract to the second tenderer, Andrew Onderdonk, for the sum of $209,255 in excess of the tender of Messrs. McDonald & Charlebois. No communication appears to have been made, so far as I am able to see, after the communicating with the bank, on the 6th February, with the contractors themselves, for on the 10th, I think, they appeared to have been first apprised of the action of the Minister and the Government, by an article in the Gazette, and they telegraphed to Sir Charles Tupper:

"10th February.

"This morning's Gazette says that we were the lowest tender for Port Moody section, and as we failed to make the deposit the contract was awarded to Onderdonk. This is incorrect; we are only waiting notice from the Department to complete deposit. Waiting answer.

"McDONALD & CHARLEBOIS."

In their innocence they imagined that all that was required was a deposit of 5 per cent. on the full amount of the tender, the deposit required by the Government as security for the performance of the contract. They would appear, as I read the telegram, not to have entertained any doubt as to the position of the matter otherwise, as they were aware they had sent a cheque to the Government. Then they sent another telegram, of the same date, to the Secretary of the Department, Mr. Braun:

"Any decision in British Columbia tenders; awaiting notice to make deposit. Answer.

"McDONALD & CHARLEBOIS."

They received this answer, no doubt by instructions, from Mr. Braun:

"Contract was awarded to Onderdonk whose tender was lowest, as yours could not be considered for want of cheque marked good as required by specification."

Then, on the 14th February, McDonald & Charlebois sent a petition to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, in which they state the general facts already mentioned. The petition sets forth the following facts:—

"1. That during the month of October the Government of Canada advertised for tenders for the construction of one of the sections of the Canadian Pacific Railway, between Port Moody and Emory's Bar, in the Province of British Columbia.

"2. That on the 1st of February instant, your petitioners filed with the proper officer in the Department of Railways and Canals, in the City of Ottawa, a tender for the construction of said works.

"3. That the deposit required by the advertisement and specifications was duly made with the proper officer of the Department of Railways and Canals at the same time as the said tender.

"4. That other tenders for the said work by other contractors were filed in the Department of Railways and Canals at the same time, and in like form with that of your petitioners.

"5. That the tender of your petitioners was the lowest of all the tenders so made and filed with the said Department for the construction of the said work.

"6. That the amount or difference in favor of the public between the tender of your petitioners and the lowest tender was about $200,000.

"7. That on the 10th of February instant your petitioners were notified by the Department of Railways and Canals that their tender had not been accepted because a cheque upon the Bank of Montreal for the amount of the deposit was not marked good as required by the specifications, and that the contract was awarded to a higher tender as shown by exhibit No. 1 herewith.

"8. Your petitioners, complaining of this decision of the Department of Railways and Canals, humbly represent to Your Excellency in Council, that the said cheque was duly accepted by the Bank of Montreal, at Montreal, on the 24th of January last.

"9. That on the 6th of February instant it was presented to the Bank of Montreal, in the City of Ottawa, by Mr. Bradley, the private secretary of the Minister of Railways and Canals, that the answer of the Manager of the Ottawa branch of said Bank was that the cheque was good till paid, and good from the date; that the secretary of the Minister of Railways and Canals replied to the Manager of the said branch that his statement was satisfactory to the Department, as shown by exhibits 2, 3 and 4 herewith.

"10. That the said cheque is still good, that it would have been cashed or paid at any time, and the same is now in possession of the Department of Railways and Canals.

"Therefore, your petitioners pray:

"1st. That the Order in Council setting aside the tender of your petitioners for want of a cheque marked 'good as required by specifications,' and awarding the contract to Messrs. Onderdonk & Co., be reconsidered by Your Excellency in Council.

"2nd. That the tender of your petitioners, being the lowest regular tender, be accepted by the Department of Railways and Canals, and the contract awarded to your petitioners, who are willing and ready to execute the same.

"And your petitioners will ever pray.

"McDONALD & CHARLEBOIS."

Those contractors, therefore, urged that their tender, being the lowest, should be accepted. The reply to this petition is accompanied by various exhibits, showing the transactions according to the telegrams that had passed, and Mr. Bradley's interest in the matter when he called upon the Manager of the Bank of Montreal, and it is we find a telegram was addressed and franked by Mr. Bradley, secretary of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; you will find the ordinary frank.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am merely stating what appears on the records.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The statement is not true, because Mr. Bradley never saw the telegram, but franked a blank on it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. At any rate, it is of no consequence.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is of great consequence.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The arrangement was made by Mr. Bradley to have the telegram sent, and he franked it; the mere question of whether it was franked by him or not is not a matter of importance, so long as the bank manager understood what was asked, which he appears to have done from that reply. The report of the Minister is simply this :

"On the facts having been submitted to Council, it was decided that no change could be made in the wording of the cheque, after the tenders had been received, and the contract was accordingly awarded to the next lowest tenderer, without reference to the informal tender sent in by Messrs. McDonald & Charlebois."

This was written to the hon. the Minister with the knowledge that the tender was not informal, but was strictly formal. The hon. gentleman knew also that no change was required in the wording of the cheque. It was not the wording of the cheque at all, but a mere endorsement by a stamp upon the cheque that contained the obnoxious words; and when the hon. gentleman, on the 6th, had the cheque early in the day, that cheque was still good. He was bound to account for his actions afterwards in some way or other, which he has not done in these papers. The transaction appears to be one of the worst I ever knew in connection with any transaction by any Government in this country. There is a deliberate withdrawing of the contract from the parties who were entitled to receive it, in the first place; there is no reason assigned, but that the cheque was marked good for two days only, although, from the hon. the Minister's own showing in the documents, he raised that objection himself by his telegram to the bank, to ask if the cheque was still good. Had he taken the ground that, on no consideration would he look at any cheque unless it was strictly according to his views on the technicalities of the case, his position would have been much better. But, even then, I think, where a saving of over $200,000 would be effected in the public interest, it was the duty of the hon. gentleman to wait a reasonable time in order to ascertain whether this was good or not. Instead of that he rushes in hot haste—and if he was a special friend and advocate of Mr. Andrew Onderdonk, he could not have acted with more precipitancy or less judgment than he did in the interest of the public. Now, Sir, this is so serious a matter that I feel bound to record my own personal opinion of it by moving a motion which will go upon the records of the House; and I hope, notwithstanding the differences of political opinion between myself and the majority of this House, that a majority of this House will see that this transaction is one that cannot be defended upon any ground whatever, and that the motion I propose to make will be sustained by the majority of the House. If it be not sustained, I confess that I shall feel that my judgment was greatly at fault, trusting, as I do, to the common sense and honesty of hon. members of this House in relation to the public interest in a matter of this kind. As I said on rising to move this motion I have in my hand, that it was not my intention to do anything more than narrate the circumstance, bring all the facts in a regular narrative form before the House, I shall move a motion, which I believe will gather all the incidents of the case and give effect to the views I entertain, that the House will join with me in those views, that the conduct of the hon. the Minister of Railways in this case, and that of his colleagues, has been quite indefensible. I admire the hon. gentleman's ingenuity. He has carefully, on each occasion, taken good care to have his colleagues thoroughly committed with him to the passing over of everything except the presentation of the cheque.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell me if he was aware, on the 6th February, of the circumstance of his going to the manager of the bank here to see if the cheque was good.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I shall probably have an opportunity of stating what I know, and I did know what the hon. gentleman asks.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, I will be able to obtain the information.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You have it now; the hon. gentleman says he did know.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Indeed, I was not aware he said so. However, I will move, in amendment to the motion :

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved, That from a return laid on the Table of the House by the Minister of Railways, it appears that tenders were invited on the 24th of October for the construction of part of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Port Moody to Emory's Bar; such tenders to be received up to the first day of February, last; and that fourteen tenders were received varying from $2,377,000 to $3,531,832, and that the lowest tender was that of Messrs. McDonald & Charlebois for $2,277,000, and that the next lowest, that of Andrew Onderdonk, for $2,446,255, or $209,255 higher;

That it appears that with their tender McDonald & Charlebois sent a cheque for $20,000, the sum mentioned in the conditions, dated on the 23rd day of January, last, drawn on the Bank of Montreal, which cheque was accepted by the said bank, but the acceptance stamp contained the words "Good for two days only."

That it appears by letter from Mr. Clouston, the Manager of the Bank of Montreal, that "the limit of two days only" was unintentional, and as it was simply an oversight, that this was not at once struck out. It was certainly our intention to guarantee the cheque until paid."

That it appears by letter of Mr. Drummond, Manager of the Bank of Montreal at Ottawa, that he explained to the Department of Railways and Canals, that the limitation on the acceptance stamp on the cheque had been inserted by the Bank inadvertently, and without its being known when issued;

That it appears from a statement of A. P. Bradley, Private Secretary of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and of Andrew Drummond, that pursuant to instructions of the Minister, given him on Saturday, February 4th, Mr. Bradley called on Mr. Drummond at half-past ten in the morning of Monday, February 6th, and handed him the said cheque, asking him whether he would pay it, or whether it was still good, to which Mr. Drummond replied that he must enquire at the Head-Office, on which the cheque was drawn, and that it was then arranged between them that such enquiry should be made, and further that enquiry should be made as to how long it would be held good, and Mr. Bradley franked a blank telegram for the purpose, which Mr. Drummond filled in, and despatched;

That it appears that a telegraphic reply was received from the Head-Office, as follows:—

"Please strike out 'for two days only,' from our acceptance stamp; the cheque will be good until paid."

That it appears that Mr. Drummond at one o'clock on the said 6th of February handed this telegram to Mr. Bradley, who requested that it should be left with him, and that it was so left accordingly, and that Mr. Bradley on the same day handed it to the Minister of Railways and Canals;

That it appears that on the 6th of February, the Minister was in possession of the answer to his enquiry and knew that the restriction in the acceptance stamp so inadvertently placed there, was not held binding by the bank, and that it was to be struck out, and that cheque was and would be held good until paid;

That it appears that on the 7th day of February, the Minister reported to Council that "the tender of McDonald and Charlebois which was the lowest is irregular, inasmuch as the cheque which accompanies it, was marked by the Bank of Montreal on the 24th of January, 1882, as good for two days only, and that the lowest tender made in conformity with the conditions is that of Mr. Andrew Onderdonk for $2,446,255," and recommending the acceptance of the latter;

That it appears that on the 8th day of February, an Order in Council was passed, based on, and according to the said recommendation awarding the contract to the said Onderdonk;

That the Report of the Minister to Council does not state the facts hereinbefore set out as to his enquiries about the cheque and the results of such enquiry;

That no enquiries were made or communication addressed to McDonald & Charlebois on the subject before the said Order in Council;

That on the 10th of February, in response to an application from McDonald & Charlebois, the Secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals informed them that their tender could not be considered for want of cheque marked good, as required by specification;

That it appears that on a petition of McDonald & Charlebois, a reconsideration of the matter took place, when the Council determined to adhere to the previous decision;

That the contract laid on the Table, and executed in pursuance of the said Order in Council between the said Andrew Onderdonk is not binding, if disapproved by this House;

That by maintaining the decision to reject the tender of McDonald & Charlebois, and award the contract to the said Andrew Onderdonk, a sum of $209,255 will be lost to the country;

That under the circumstances stated the tender of Macdonald & Charlebois should be accepted, and the said sum of $209,255 saved ;

That this House cannot approve of the said contract with the said Andrew Onderdonk, whereby the said sum of $209,255 will be lost to the country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I might safely have left the disposition of this motion in the hands of the House—I think I might say in the hands of both sides of the House—after the feeble manner in which it has been presented by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). The hon. gentleman has exhibited a desire to wound without the power to strike, and if he has provoked a criticism with reference to his own conduct which I have hitherto spared, he has only himself to thank for it. I have, in the first place, to tender my obligation to that hon. gentleman for having so recently as half-past ten this morning given me an intimation of this motion, that being the first I learned of any intention to bring such a motion as the present ; but, Sir, it was the last motion which any hon. gentleman or any man in this country, who has listened to the story the hon. gentleman has to tell, would expect to be made. But I think I was entitled to a notice “good for two days only” if no more, but the hon. gentleman did not give even that notice. Why did he not take the usual mode in dealing with such questions, of giving the two days notice which the forms of Parliament require, and thus placing before the House and myself an intimation of the motion he intended to move. The hon. gentleman had two objects in not taking that course, one being to take me by surprise—to prevent me even having time, as I have not had time to run my eye over the papers in connection with this matter ; and the other was because the hon. gentleman wished to expand the resolution which he has read on the Journals of Parliament without giving this House an opportunity of meeting it by a corresponding amendment. Those were the reasons which prevailed with the hon. gentleman, and, conscious of the feebleness of his position, he thinks to attain some small, insignificant, contemptible party object by pursuing a course that was not a manly or a fair course. Now, Sir, when that hon. gentleman stood where I now stand, when he held the high position of Minister of Public Works in this country, and when I felt it my duty to submit to Parliament a criticism on his conduct, I dealt with him in a different manner. From my place on that side of the House where he now sits, I told that hon. gentleman the motion I proposed to make, and when I proposed to make it, and gave him full and ample opportunity of meeting it. He has not seen fit to return that courtesy, but I thank him that at last he has given me an opportunity on the floor of this House of showing what the position of the Opposition of this country is on questions that, as he himself declares, are the strongest and most potent ground of attack on myself and the Administration of which I have the honor to be a member. I might say, Sir, that in order to a right understanding of this question we must go back a little, and we must enquire why it was that a cheque marked “good” was required by the Government with the tenders that were to be put in. Let me say, Sir, that the volume in my hand laid on the Table of the House by the hon. gentleman himself discloses the ground. This volume, reciting the contracts which he himself, while Minister of Public Works, signed and carried on in this country from the beginning to the end discloses a condition of contract jobbery such as it will be difficult to find a parallel for anywhere. From the first hour that the hon. gentleman became Minister of Public Works down to the last hour of his term you have only to read his own record—and I invite hon. gentlemen to read it—I say you have only to read this return brought down by himself of contracts in the Department of Public Works from the 1st of July, 1867, to the 28th of March, 1878, in order to find that a system of the most open flagrant contract jobbery marked the Administration of the hon. gentleman from the hour he entered office to the hour he left it. I say more. I say that the first act of the hon. gentleman was in character with the whole. Where is it to be found ? It is to be found in a return brought down in answer to a motion made in the House for the tenders for contracts 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 12, 13 and 14 of the Welland Canal. Now, what does that return disclose ? A return to be found in the Sessional Papers, number 58, volume 11, 1878. It discloses the fact that the Government of which my hon. friend the former Minister of Public Works, now Sir Hector Cameron—I mean Sir Hector Langevin (“Coming events cast their shadows before”) was a member, invited tenders with reference to these important contracts on the Welland Canal, and before we resigned and went out of power tenders were sent in and were ready to be acted on. The Government feeling that the responsibility of dealing with this great work was in the hands of the gentlemen who had been entrusted with power avoided awarding these contracts, and the hon. gentleman found—as I found under similar circumstances—that these tenders were left ready to be dealt with by himself. How did he deal with them ? By taking them up and examining them and dealing with them carefully as the public interests required ? No ; he swept the whole of them aside. And with what result ? The result is disclosed on the other page where it is shown that the hon. gentleman called for new tenders, the result being that the lowest of the old tenders as compared with the lowest of the new tenders shows a balance of no less than $272,867 of increased cost to the public by the new tenders. Subsequently he let the contracts, and he let them in a way which he would be very sorry to have me disclose, here or anywhere else, because so far from having been animated by the high principles which he now pretends should govern in relation to such transactions, the hon. gentleman entered on the duties of his position with a determination to serve his friends, and serve them irrespective of the public interests. The return shows that in one case—that of section 12, finding that the parties to whom he wished to give the contract were the highest instead of the lowest tenderers, he did not award the contract at all, but what did he do for them ? He pushed Messrs. Ginty & Dickey—of whom Mr. Dickey had been closely allied with the hon. gentleman politically in every possible way—into the next contract, and gave them a contract for which they had absolutely never tendered at all, and rejected the lowest tender which was put in by the ablest contractors that could be found within the wide domain of Canada—a fact of which he was aware himself, because they had been engaged in important contracts—I mean Messrs. Denison, Belden & Company. I say that under these circumstances it will not do for the hon. gentleman to pose here as such a purist, and to say that this is one of the worst transactions which he has ever known in connection with the letting of public contracts. I do not despair, Sir, of convincing the hon. gentleman, before I close, that the only mode in which he can save his reputation as a public man, is to withdraw this motion. I will give abundant reasons which will convince him, whatever he may do, and every fair-minded man who sits behind him, that in the public interest and as public men, regarding the responsibilities of the past and the responsibilities of the future, when they may be called upon to fill such a position, they have no course as honest, fair-minded men, but to withdraw that resolution or vote it down. Now, Sir, as I say, I found contract broking and contract jobbing rife from the time the hon. gentleman commenced his career to the time he left office. I have shown what the first transaction was, and now what was the last ? He says, I allowed days to elapse before finally awarding the contract ; but I say, Sir, that he allowed weeks to elapse, and awarded a contract at $123,000 higher than the lowest tender, and without allowing the lowest tenderer to correct a mistake which he said his clerk had made in inserting $95,000 for $195,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What contract was that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The last contract the hon. gentleman let after his defeat and before he left office, and that was the contract for building the Custom house in St. John. But Sir, while I have felt a sincere desire never to add a single feather's weight to the heavy blow which fell on the hon. gentleman when he was dismissed from power, I feel that, having ventured to place before the House such a case as he has now presented, it is only right that I should show the hon. gentleman that his memory is a little treacherous when he is obliged to consider this one of the worst cases he has known. What were the steps the Government took in this matter? What is contract broking? It is this. When contracts are invited a number of persons come in for merely speculative reasons and tender, without any means or qualifications of doing the work, but with the hope of getting the contract and selling out to a person who has put in a higher tender; and contract broking means putting in bogus tenders which the parties themselves have neither the means, the ability, nor the intention of carrying out, but for the purpose of selling out to parties above them. There is only one means that I know of, of preventing that contract broking, and that is the process which was devised of requiring a substantial deposit to be paid in with the tender, which the party would forfeit if he put in a bogus tender. Well, Sir, these parties were required, and were notified to put in a cheque for $20,000—why? Because this was not only a very large and very important contract, but the Government—as will be seen by reference to the papers laid on the Table of the House, and which disclosed the whole of this transaction from end to end—felt that the importance of having this contract promptly executed was very great. They felt the importance of preventing that contract broking, and of avoiding the danger of giving the contract to any one not able to carry it out, as was done in the case of a contract now on the Table of the House, which the hon. gentleman let to parties whom the Chief Engineer of Railways and Canals declared, for a most important portion of their work, had only half the money necessary; so that the contract broke down, and was let at a large increase on the original cost. Now, the House is aware that the Government of British Columbia had sent a delegate to England to impress upon the Imperial Government the statement that this Government were not proceeding to carry out, so far as they were able, the terms of Union with British Columbia; and one of the things they claimed was the immediate construction of this section of railway from Emory's Bar to Port Moody, which the House had declared we must construct. It therefore became important that that work should be proceeded with, and pushed to completion. It also became important, because the Chief Engineer of the Pacific Railway reported that it would open up and develop the resources of that Province to an infinitely greater degree, if this portion of the line, which we were bound to complete within a certain time, was completed at once rather than postponed, so that there would be a continuous line from tide water navigation to Kamloops. The Government decided to ask for tenders for this work in a lump sum, believing that, as the Chief Engineer had reported, that the surveys were complete, it would be more in the interest of the public to let it in a lump sum and in one contract, and especially as the rails required would all have to be taken from tide water at Port Moody. Therefore the reasons for letting the contract in one sum and to one contractor, as submitted by the Chief Engineer to the Government, were considered conclusive. But for the purpose of securing the prompt construction of this work, it was necessary to take measures to prevent bogus tenders being put in, and every contractor was furnished with a printed statement that his tender would receive no notice whatever unless it was accompanied by a bank cheque marked good. Now, Sir, what did that mean? A bank cheque that could be made good at the will of a contractor or at the will of some banker with whom he might be in collusion? Not at all. The whole policy was to have $20,000 in money placed in the hands of the Minister, which would be forfeited, irrespective of any effort on the part of the person who had put that cheque in with his tender if he failed to carry out the contract. Now, the hon. gentleman pretends to say that this tender was not informal. How can he say that when the specifications require that every tender must be accompanied by a cheque marked good, and he himself says that the cheque which was opened with the tender on the first of February, instead of being marked good, was marked "good for two days only." Does "two days only" mean anything, or does it mean nothing? Does "two days only" mean for ever, or does it not? There was this one point which the hon. gentleman mentioned, and of which I am very glad to have the opportunity of giving the most full and frank explanation; and that is, that this cheque was not submitted to Mr. Drummond, the manager of the Bank of Montreal, until the 6th of February, whereas it came into the possession of the Department on the first day of February. Now, Sir, I think I can dispose of that at once in a very satisfactory manner. The hon. gentleman will not say that six days after receiving tenders of that kind, and before the Government dealt with them finally, was an excessive period, because the hon. gentleman, as I shall be able to show, expended days and weeks and months in dealing with and finally awarding contracts during his term of office. The hon. gentleman knows the practice of the Department—that in all these matters, requiring a large amount of capital, one of the first things the Government does in connection with them is to satisfy themselves, as far as they can, of the ability and resources of a tenderer before they award him a contract. Now, Sir, the moment these tenders came in, the figures, the names and the position in which they stood were shown by myself to my colleagues, and inquiries were being instituted as to the means possessed by Messrs. McDonald & Charlebois, the lowest tenderers, for doing the work. I asked the Chief Engineer to make a report, as is usual, as I wished to bring the matter up in Council (I think that was towards the end of the week), and he said he would at once prepare a report. I then sent for the tender and cheque, for the purpose of examining them myself; and that was not until the 4th of February. Why did I send for that cheque and tender? Those gentlemen must excuse me if I say it was because I had had dealings with them before. A large contract was awarded them by the former letting of contracts for work from Emory's Bar to Kamloops, and when they were called upon to deposit the money which, under the contract and specifications, they were bound to deposit in order to have the contract made, they deposited a cheque, I think, for $137,000, and I found the money could not be obtained at the bank; I found the cheque had been obtained from the cashier of the bank without the knowledge of the directors or without the firm having deposited any money to back it; and, under those circumstances, the hon. member for Lambton will not consider me as acting unwisely in looking at the cheque for $20,000 before proceeding to make a report to Council. I looked at the cheque—I am not a banker—and I will give the hon. gentleman the same opportunity as I had, and this cheque, which the hon. gentleman says is still good, I will send to him across the House. He will find, unless his sight is better than mine, the words "two days only," are not sufficient to attract attention; there are some hieroglyphics there, but I could not make out exactly what they meant. I accordingly sent for Mr. Trudeau, Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, I said: "Mr. Trudeau, is that cheque all right. Look at the others." "No," he said, "it is not like the others. I do not know exactly, I cannot say." He did not see the words "for two days only." I then called for my private secretary, Mr. Bradley, and told him to take the cheque down to Mr. Drummond and find out whether it was a good cheque. I sent no message to enquire whether the cheque would be made good, because every hon. gentleman will see that a more idiotic thing I could not have done. Why? The whole thing turned on the point whether I had $20,000 that the firm could not get out of my hands, or whether the cheque was waste paper, for if the Bank of Montreal had sent half-an-hour after the tenders were opened that the cheque would be paid, I would have treated it as a piece of waste paper. Why? Because all they had to do was to go down to the Russell House the moment after the clock struck twelve, when the contractors would be checking each other's figures, and would then know how they stood, and telegraph an accomplice to make the cheque good, which otherwise would be treated as a piece of waste paper. After the experience I had of those gentlemen, when I got the answer from Mr. Drummond that he would not pay the cheque until he had enquired at the head office, I knew I was in this position: they had put a cheque in my hands not marked "good," but marked "for two days only," on the 24th, and when I came to ask for the money it rested with them to say whether I should have it or not. If they found themselves relatively in such a position as enabled them to get the bankers to respond to the cheque the money would be paid; if, on the contrary, the money was going to be forfeited, the requisite money would not be deposited, I would find myself in possession of piece of waste paper. Did I, not being a banker, take the right measures to ascertain whether the cheque for $20,000 was good, when I sent my private secretary to Mr. Drummond, a banker of long standing and a man of high character, to ask if the bank would pay the money? That at once settled the question that I had a cheque that was not of a negotiable character. What was Mr. Drummond's answer? Let me deal with the specific statement, for if it be possible for an hon. gentleman to make a statement, which more overwhelmingly defeats his own case than that which the hon. member for Lambton read to the House, I shall be very much surprised to hear it. Mr. Drummond was asked: "Will you pay the cheque." He shook his head and said: "No; it is marked 'for two days only'" and he gave that as the reason why he could not and would not pay the cheque. Mr. Bradley had no instructions from me to make, and I never dreamed of making a communication to the head office; he had no instructions, except to ask Mr. Drummond if he would pay the cheque, so as to make assurance doubly sure, either that I held a negotiable piece of paper worth $20,000, or a piece of waste paper. I learnt that it was a piece of waste paper, so far as I was concerned, because of the refusal of Mr. Drummond to pay the cheque. The statement that he would not pay the cheque without referring it to the head office proved, beyond a shadow of doubt, that, at all events, in Mr. Drummond's judgment, and I think the House will hardly expect me to doubt Mr. Drummond's answer to such a question, it was not a negotiable piece of paper for $20,000. The hon. member for Lambton says that this cheque is now good, that the fact of its being marked "for two days only," does not mean anything, that a cheque good for two days only "means good for ever." Will the hon. gentleman open his mind, will he close his eyes to the partizan side of this question so as to be able to see that Mr. Drummond declared that the cheque was not of such a character as would be paid: Will he open his eyes to the fact that Mr. Drummond said that he would not pay the cheque marked "for two days only" without authority, and that he telegraphed to the Manager of the Bank of Montreal asking "Is that a good cheque and for how long will you guarantee it." If the hon. gentleman will look at the cheque, which he says is a good cheque for ever, he will see there is only a stamp on it. I have laid on the Table of the House the cheque for Mr. Onderdonk's deposit. Let the hon. member for Lambton compare it with the one to which he referred, and what will he find. He will find it is stamped and marked, "accepted, Bank of Montreal," giving the date, and the name of the ledger-keeper, and the hon. gentleman has only to examine this cheque and compare it with that marked "good for two days only" and which was not accepted, in order to show beyond possibility of controversy, that the latter cheque was not such an one as would have been accepted as a good cheque by the Department. The hon. gentleman drew the attention of the House to the circumstance that the tender was put in on the 24th January. That is not the fact. This cheque marked "good for two days only," was in the hands of Messrs. Charlebois & McDonald down to 1st February, when it was deposited in the office of Railways and Canals. Taking the experience I had of those gentlemen, knowing that, without doubt, their tender was a speculative one, and that it was intended to secure the advantages resulting from putting in the lowest tender, and if that were not the case, of forfeiting nothing, I adopted the course I have stated. I had taken an opportunity of enquiring into the position of these gentlemen, and I found that their pecuniary circumstances, so far as I was able to learn, had not improved from the time they had been called on to make a deposit, and had given me an accepted cheque on a bank where there were no funds to enable the bank to respond to it; and when I said I must have a deposit on the Bank of Montreal, they were utterly unable to comply with the demand. Having had that experience in the past with these gentlemen, I had every reason to suppose, as I did suppose, that this was an attempt to trick the Department, and take an unfair and dishonest advantage of the other parties who had tendered. I leave to every fair-minded man in the House—I care not on which side—whether with the evidence before me, I was not right in coming to such a conclusion. Let us go a little further. In the first place, the question was, as the ex-Minister says, whether the cheque was good. I say that with my limited experience on such matters, I could not see anything upon the face of that cheque that satisfied me it was good, and I sent to Mr. Drummond, Manager of the Bank of Montreal; to ascertain if he would pay the money before I made my report to the Council. Mr. Drummond said he could not accept the cheque because it was marked good for two days only. That was the first time any of us in the Department noticed it was thus marked. This was on Monday. I had given Mr. Bradley instructions on Saturday to make enquiries but the bank was closed. On Monday morning he franked a telegram to the head office at Mr. Drummond's request, and I am glad Mr. Drummond did not confine his statement to the endorsement on the cheque, "good for two days only," because his enquiry shows that the cheque as marked was not negotiable. What did the bank say in reply to Mr. Drummond's telegram? Did it say: "Mr. Drummond, why do you ask this question? You know very well that the 'good for two days only' is but a form of speech and means nothing—that the cheque is good for ever." That would be the answer one would expect, if the contention of the hon. gentlemen is right. But the Bank of Montreal has never ventured to say that that "good for two days only" meant nothing, and that everybody must have known it was a good cheque. On the contrary, the statement of the Bank of Montreal is not that the cheque is good, but simply authorized Mr. Drummond to strike out "good for two days only"—to remove the restriction. Then the cheque, in the first instance, was restricted. From the beginning to the end, everything shows clearly that I had every reason a man could have to suppose that the cheque was a worthless piece of paper, put in intentionally for the purpose of tricking the Department into awarding a contract to parties who had no intention of carrying it out, but only intended selling it to the highest tenderer. That branch of the subject I will take up a little later. The error, these parties say themselves, was not theirs, but that of the Bank of Montreal; and I say frankly that they have, by the evidence produced from the Bank of Montreal, acquitted themselves completely of any design to act dishonestly or unfairly with regard to this cheque; but that was not a matter within my knowledge, nor for me to ascertain. As I said before, I made no application to the head office of the bank, because I did not want to know—a week later, after the tenders were opened and known—whether they would make the cheque good. This cheque was worse than if not marked. One can suppose that when persons of high standing and means put in their cheque not marked at all, it was an oversight on their part and the cheque is perfectly good. But the hon. gentleman knows that cheques have been refused over and over again because not marked good within the terms of the specification, and it would be against all precedent to allow parties to change their cheques afterwards. Therefore it was quite impossible for me to arrive at any other conclusion than that at which I arrived. But the hon. gentleman ventured to say, and he will be compelled to take back the statement—that I concealed the facts from my colleagues. He ventured to say that I did not place them in possession of all the information but took measures to hide the facts from them. My colleagues are here and they know the statement I am making to be strictly accurate when I say that the first thing I did on the 6th—the first day I got this information on Mr. Bradley giving me Mr. Drummond's answer and shortly afterwards placing in my hands the telegram from the Bank of Montreal handed in by Mr. Drummond, authorizing him to make the cheque good—was to place the cheque before my colleagues and the statement of Mr. Drummond that he had the authority of the bank to make it good.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is not in the hon. gentleman's memorandum as a Minister.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman ought not to jump at so extraordinary a conclusion as that I was concealing anything. I had nothing to conceal. All I had to do was to award that contract to Onderdonk & Co. without saying a word to my colleagues. The hon. gentleman knows that as Minister of Public Works when tenders are opened and placed in his hands, and there are undoubted informalities in any tenders which prevents their being considered, he may award, as he has often done, the contract to the lowest tenderer without consulting his colleagues. All I had to do if I wanted Mr. Onderdonk to have the contract was to decide the question with the evidence I had before me, that the cheque had to be altered which rendered the tender null and void, and warranted my taking the course I did to prevent contract broking and jobbery. But I placed my colleagues in full possession of the facts. I took, before any report was made in Council at all, on the 6th day of the month when I had the information, the cheque, Mr. Drummond's reply and the telegram from the Bank of Montreal to Mr. Drummond, and laid them before my colleagues and asked them what I would do. They said, every one of them—and some of them know as much about banking as the hon. member for Lambton himself—you cannot take the slightest notice of that tender because it requires the cheque to be altered in order to make it a negotiable cheque. You have the evidence, Sir, that the cheque was good for two days only, and the evidence of the Bank of Montreal here, that they would not pay it, of the Manager of the Bank of Montreal himself, not that a mistake was made, and that the cheque was perfectly good, but authorizing the manager here a week afterwards to alter the cheque so as to make it good, and then the contractors themselves come forward, and admit that an error was made, and the Manager of the Bank of Montreal says it was an unintentional error. The hon. gentleman says that the cheque is perfectly good, but he is the only man who can be found to take that view of it, neither the Montreal Bank here, nor the Manager of the Bank at Montreal, nor the tenderers themselves have, and not one of these gentlemen has—dared to say that there was no error, or that the cheque did not require to be altered before it could come up to the terms of the specifications as they were made, and yet on such grounds, indeed, the hon. gentleman undertakes to ask hon. gentlemen sitting on this side of the House to support a motion, that, as I have said before, he is the last man in this House or out of it, who ought to have ventured to attempt to put on the Journals of this House. Sir, if I wished to take up and expand on the Journal's motions—which I could carry, and not impotent attempts like this, made with the design to wound but without the power to strike—I could blacken the hon. gentleman's character in such a way as to prevent any person from ever recognizing him, and I will find the necessary evidences in this volume which he himself laid on the Table of the House, and I will prove a score of cases where the hon. gentleman had not anything like a such justification as this for his conduct, and where there would be fair and legitimate grounds for challenging the hon. gentleman's conduct. What does he say to the contract which was wrested out of the hands of Dennison, Beldon & Co. I am wrong, the hon. gentleman was not here at the time, the hon. gentleman was then on his way back from England, when in hot haste, without permitting, at the instance of the Chief Engineer of Railways and Canals, a poor forty-eight hours delay, until the Minister himself could arrive—the Acting Premier, who is now leader of the Opposition, and the hon. gentleman who sits beside him, the late Postmaster General, forced through a contract, and gave it to a violent partizan, Patrick Larkin, whose tender was higher than that of the first contractors in this country, and men who, at that time, had proved that their ability to deal with public contracts was greater than that of any other men almost to be found in the Dominion of Canada. Now, Sir, I shall reserve until the hon. gentleman's motion, which he has placed on the paper, and with which he has given me a legitimate opportunity of dealing—comes up, the comparison of the hon. gentleman's contracts with my own, and until he makes his motion with reference to the aqueduct contract, which has been laid on the Table of the House. But before I sit down, I will show to every man in this House, and I will convince every intelligent and fair-minded man on that side of the House—and they are all intelligent and they would be fair-minded if it were not for the party pressure which is applied to these hon. gentlemen—that, instead of the country having lost one dollar by the awarding of the contract to Andrew Onderdonk, the country has saved hundreds of thousands of dollars by this award; and I have shown that it would have been a fraud on every man who tendered to have accepted the tender in question. What had we done? We had given notice all over Canada of our intention to invite tenders for this work, and we had also invited an examination of the proposed undertaking, in order that tenderers might be in a position to state the lowest possible figure for which it could be done, and some of them had gone out there for this purpose. Ryan & Purcell, one of the most eminent firms of contractors in Canada, sent a gentleman out to examine this ground from end to end, to ascertain exactly what they could do this work for, as they were very anxious to do it, the contract on which they were engaged being near its close. They took the best means of finding out what this work could be done for, and what was the result? Why, Sir, I hold in my hand the list of contractors, which the hon. gentleman himself has read, and what does it disclose? That, from all the ablest contractors in Canada and out of it, whom we had in competition for this work, no less than twelve tenders were received, and it shows that the average of these twelve tenders is no less than $3,216,331. I may here say, Sir, that the very highest tenders came from parties in San Francisco and the adjoining territory, who had the best possible means of knowing what the work could be done for out on the Pacific Coast. How did Andrew Onderdonk's tender come to be so low? For this reason: That Onderdonk—as every intelligent man, and as the hon. gentleman himself knows—could afford to do this work for one-half million less than any other man in the world. And why? Because he is at present engaged in a gigantic contract from Emory's Bar to Kamloops, and because, if he had competition for labor, to which he would be exposed if the contract went into other hands, he might have to pay 25 cents extra a day per man. The sum would be enormous. Besides being engaged in a vast contract, he had the great mass of the plant, costing hundreds of thousands of dollars, on the ground, the organization and everything complete; and everybody knows perfectly well that he could afford to do the work—and had an interest in doing it—for a lower sum than any other man, and on terms on which no other man could do it. What do we find? The next tender to Andrew Onderdonk—as I still regard it—is a speculative tender. I have not the slightest idea in the world that McDonald & Charlebois ever dreamed of undertaking this contract. And why? Because, when they tendered once before, they could not put up the deposit, and their means, as far as I am aware, have not since improved. I will show a dozen instances in which the hon. gentleman himself decided to refuse contracts and tenders because tenderers had undertaken contracts and had not given satisfaction before, and the hon. gentleman will not contradict this. What was the position of Charlebois? He was contractor under the Government, and the history of this transaction shows whether he was fit to be entrusted with that $3,000,000 contract at Port Moody. The hon. member for Lambton gave him a contract on the Georgian Bay Branch, which was to be commenced on the 2nd of August, 1878, and to be completed on July 1st, 1880. But, Sir, that contract was taken out of his hands on the 9th of August, 1879, a short time before they were obliged to complete it, and how much work does the hon. gentleman suppose that Charlebois had been able to do? A mere trifle was at that time finished, because finding his utter inability to provide capital in order to deal with the contract, he had assigned and sold all right and interest in the contract to Smith & Ripley, who had energy and ability enough to go into the work. But the total amount payable—and the matter is now before the Supreme Court, and we have given him the last shilling to which he is entitled—is up to June, 1879, $11,000 out of a contract for $809,000, and yet that is the man who has come in to construct this work which would require $200,000 or $300,000 worth of plant before he could strike a single blow. Does the hon. gentleman think that there is any money lost to the people of this country in this transaction when a work had to be taken out of a man's hands and hundreds of thousands of dollars of public money to be spent, over and above the original amount granted, to get the work constructed. In the light of these facts does the hon. gentleman stand up and ask any man—even the strongest partizan who sits behind him—to believe that the public interests of this country would have been promoted by giving a contract to a man who had a contract, but was unable to deal with it with any more vigor than that the amount tendered in settlement in full in addition to the $11,000, is $13,807, or $24,807 in all. $24,807 worth of work done between 2nd August, 1878, and 9th August, 1879, on an $809,000 contract, which was to be completed in July, 1880. Now, Sir, I need not waste the time of the House by saying any more on this topic; but I can affirm that, so far from considering the public interest to be promoted, if we had wanted to waste the public money, we would have accomplished it more successfully than by any other means, by giving this contract at these figures to these parties. You may ask me—what then was the difficulty? Why did you not award the contract to them? If they were unable to put up the deposit they could not take it. But we were all determined—as I was from the first hour after I entered the office of Minister of Railways and Canals—to put a check on this system of contract jobbing and contract broking. And the moment it was awarded to them, they would have been in a position to sell it, and the hon. gentleman instead of taxing us as he does to-day for not having awarded the contract in violation of good faith and honest dealing between man and man, would have taxed us for having let the contract to be sold to a higher party, and hon. gentleman opposite would have been engaged in finding out how much money Onderdonk had paid to them and in seeking to establish a case of contract jobbery and contract broking, which I defy them to establish against me since the first hour that I became Minister of Public Works. What more? This work was estimated after a most careful examination—and as the Chief Engineer of Railways knows, I was anxious to put it down to the lowest figure, that I could safely state to the House that it could be done for—to cost $3,000,000. I came to the House, Sir, with every desire and anxiety and inducement to put the work at the lowest figure that I could state to the House; with Mr. Schreiber's estimate a year ago of $2,560,000. We spent accordingly another year, and Marcus Smith, a gentleman of high position, who when the hon. gentleman was in office was Assistant Chief Engineer, and who acted as Chief Engineer to a very large extent when the hon. gentleman was in power, spent a summer with an able staff of engineers in going over every yard of this work, and in ascertaining the least that it would cost; and in these papers you have his testimony that it would cost $3,000,000, according to the prices now paid for public work out there, where there is no competition between two contractors, to do this very work. I am going to lay on the Table of the House in addition to this, as I want to relieve the mind of the hon. member for Lambton from all impression that the public interest has been sacrificed in one jot or tittle, an estimate made out, according to McDonald & Charlebois' tender, as to what, according to their schedule rate, every yard of this work was worth. Is it $2,275,000? No, Sir I have taken the schedule rates of every tenderer and made up the figures, and this shows, Sir, that, instead of this being the cost, according to their own prices, the work would have cost $3,598,740; this is their own estimate. How does Onderdonk's tender compare, treated in the same way. His tender shows $2,468,000, and the same principle brings out a cost of $2,488,225, within $2,000 of his tender, as applied to the entire work. I will lay these figures on the table, and no man will be better able to estimate their value than the hon. mover of this resolution. Murray & Co. are the next tenderers to Andrew Onderdonk, and what does the House suppose that these gentlemen, who are acquainted with and who are anxious to secure public works, were willing to do this work for, and on their estimate the House can come to a pretty accurate conclusion as to what it could be done for. Onderdonk tendered

$2,486,000, and Murray & Co., $2,864,000, or nearly $400,000 more, showing that they all recognized the enormous cost of the plant required, and the enormous risk involved in procuring labor on the Pacific coast at the present day, which would render it unsafe to attempt it at any lower figures. Purcell & Ryan, who sent out one of the firm to go over every yard of the work, and who were most anxious to get it, tendered $2,970,000; O'Brien & Co., $2,999,000; Jas. Goodwin, $3,062,000; Wm. Davis & Co., $3,369,000, and so on to $3,531,000; making an average of no less than $3,216,331. and yet, Sir, the hon. gentleman ventures, in the face of these figures—and no person knows their value better than he—which he had in his hand, to insult the intelligence of this House and of this country by stating that the public had suffered to the extent of $209,000. What would have happened had we let the contract as the hon. gentleman desires? Either these gentlemen would have obtained what I believe was their object, contract broking, and would have bagged a handsome sum by selling out the tender—and we would then have been compelled to let it at the present figure—or by some means or other they would have managed to make the deposit; and if they could not make their deposit two years ago, when their tenders were accepted, and they had to get a bogus cheque, and attempt to impose on us for money what was not money, I want to know where they could have raised a dollar to go on with this work? Where is the contractor in Canada who would have joined with them on the opinion of these other contractors as to what this work would cost? I have shown, apart from every other consideration, that the grounds on which this tender was rejected, was one concerning which the Government had no option because they must either have done that, or said that they were ready to be imposed upon by any party who chose to put in a piece of paper, which he was ready to make good or not as he pleased after the tenders were shown. Regardless of this, I have shown the House, by evidence of the most conclusive character, that the public interests were consulted at the same time, and that the only result of a contrary course would have been that a year or two would have been wasted, and that the work would have been put up again to competition, and that it would have then cost a much larger sum than it will cost under the present arrangement; while the country and British Columbia would not have obtained the prompt construction of the work and the Government would have paid half a million or a million more dollars for the purpose of securing its construction. It was not necessary for me to say one single word in reference to this matter. But, before I sit down, I intend to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the comments of their own press with relation to this question. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite may think that I want to hold them responsible for these comments. But, I am not quite so sure that they ought not to be. I do not believe in a leading public man in this country, or in this House, posing as a man of great justice and taking a very high stand as a man utterly irreproachable and unexceptionable in his conduct towards other public men, and, at the same time, having a lying, degraded press, from day to day, saying to the public of this country, what he dare not himself utter on the floor of this House. I say, Sir, that the conduct of the Globe newspaper, since the hon. gentleman became leader of the Opposition, has degraded, in this country, public journalism as it never was degraded and never has been degraded before; and I cannot believe, Sir, that the hon. gentleman is not himself responsible for having a hired assassin shooting from behind the hedge at a man whom he cannot meet in open and manly warfare. I say that they have that most degraded specimen of public journalism—yes, I say most degraded specimen of public journalism—and who is the man at the head of it,

Gordon Brown. Why Sir, he is a man who, without brains to attain any position as a journalist, as a leader of public opinion in this country, was a parasite fattening upon the reputation, character and talents of his late lamented brother—that is the man. And, Sir, he is a man so lost to common decency, that when that brother who had nourished and cherished him, was shot down at the hands of a foul assassin, he took advantage of it to succumb to the power of the present leader of the Opposition, and to trample upon the dearest instincts of that brother—I say that while George Brown possessed his manly vigor and was at the head of that paper, the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie was secure. All attempts, and many they were, and the basest attempts that ever a public man encountered in public life in any country, to drag him down from his position, were all foiled by the potent hand of George Brown who would not permit that injustice to be done. But when he lay grappling with death, shot down by an assassin, the hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends seized that opportunity, in George Brown's helplessness, to dethrone the man that, while George Brown's arm remained unparalyzed, never could have been dethroned. And I say more, that having attained this position, Gordon Brown, who was craven enough to trample upon the dearest instincts of his brother, no sooner saw him in the grave, than he trampled upon that grave and held up to ridicule, as he is doing to-day the principles that George Brown fought for and contended for. I say that this craven hound, who shows that he is ready to submit to any indignity himself, thinks he can stab any public man's reputation in this country. What do you say to the man that, sheltered in the position that Gordon Brown is sheltered in, has assailed me as I have been assailed? What do you say to cowardice like that? I ask hon. gentlemen opposite what they say to the cowardice of that man who, in that sheltered position, ventures to do that which he has never been able to goad any man on the floor of this House to do—assail my integrity? I ought to be the last man to say an unkind word of him. No man in this country owes more to Gordon Brown than I do. My feeble powers never would have placed me in the position I enjoy to-day, in the estimation of my party throughout this country, were it not for the unjust vituperation of that man. Over and above anything that I have been able myself to accomplish by a laborious life, devoted to the public and to my country—I say, over and above that, I owe largely to the slanders of that man the position I hold in the affections of my friends and of my party. What conclusion can you come to when you find a man trying to hound down a public man, and attempting to deceive the public mind and uttering lying slanders in relation to public affairs that no man in the Parliament of Canada, holding any responsibility for his utterances has ever dared to adopt—I say, what would be said of the man that goes on and does that persistently, from day to day, until he excites to nausea the intelligence, and the common sense, and the independence of every manly spirit in his party throughout this country? I say, under these circumstances, the cowardice is all there; the infamy of a life like that is one that sinks to a depth so low that no powers of mine can describe it. What do you say to this paper? They thought they had a case. The hon. member for Lambton thinks that "good for two days only" means good for ever, and that it was a thing so plain that the Minister of Railways, and every other man in this country, could not hesitate for a single moment to perceive it. What did the Globe say? Why, they were misinformed; they did not know the cheque had been limited for two days only. What did they say? Why, Sir, on the 15th of February they say:

"Suppose there was a trifling defect in the lowest tender. If Charlebois & McDonald were ready to rectify it the money could have been saved."

What does the late hon. Minister of Public Works say to that? Does he say he would allow tenderers, after the tenders were sent in, to rectify the errors that occasionally happen, as I will be able to show on a future occasion. But he would not like to say here that he would adopt that as a maxim to guide a Minister of Public Works. The Globe goes on to say:

"It is perfectly ridiculous to say that the Minister who acted in these cases would hesitate to have the tender of Charlebois & McDonald made regular if he wished to save the public money."

Well, Sir, the present Minister of Railways and Canals will not permit any tenderer to correct errors in his contract and to take an unfair advantage of other parties who tender. Then they get a little more light, as they suppose. The next edition of the paper said:

"Messrs. Charlebois & McDonald deposited this security in the shape of a cheque marked good for a certain number of days. All that the Minister of Railways had to do was to award them the contract and draw the money. But it seems he waited till the period for which the cheque was marked good had expired, and then awarded the job to Onderdonk & Company."

So the hon. gentleman thinks, I suppose, that a cheque marked for two days was good for ever, and was as good as cash; but the Globe, which professes to know everything, declared that my crime was not treating a cheque as worthless after the time for which it was limited had expired, but that I had held it over, it being good on a day not yet expired, that I held it until the time expired, and then awarded the contract to Onderdonk & Co. Had I done such a thing, I would have been open to the censure of this House, I would have been without the support of any member, because that would have been manifestly unjust. If the cheque was marked for a limited number of days, I had only to cross the street and draw $20,000, and keep that in my possession till we had decided with reference to the matter. But when they found they were all wrong again, they turn round and say: "The Government had only to hold over awarding the contract till these days expired, to find a pretext, which was apparently desired, of giving the contract to Onderdonk." They themselves gave up the whole case by saying that, if the time for which the cheque was marked good had expired, the whole case was at an end. But when they found they were all wrong, when they found the time had expired before Charlebois & McDonald put the cheque in, and that it was marked good for two days only on the 24th of the month, that it was a worthless piece of paper, so far as we were able to learn, on the 26th, the tenders not having been opened till the first, they were equal to the occasion, and all the same it was a job, all the same they have defiled their paper from that day to this, by presenting in all its forms, and with a variety of falsehoods and misstatements, the same absurd story—for what purpose? For the purpose that they have succeeded at last in attaining, for the purpose of goading on some hon. gentleman opposite into doing what no man of them has ever dared to do down to the present hour—to come forward, not to attack my reputation and character as a public man, but to come forward and ask this House to disapprove of the mode in which this matter has been dealt with. They have succeeded in goading an hon. gentleman into making this attack, and it is the fault of the Globe newspaper, and not mine, if I am compelled to deal with that hon. gentleman, in relation to these matters in the discharge of public duty, hereafter as I have never dealt with him before.

Mr. CAMERON (South Huron). I think hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would like very well if the motion which has been made, and the speech which we have just listened to, were allowed to pass unanswered, judging from the specimen, at all events, we had from the other side of the House a few minutes ago, when one or two of the supporters of the Government cried "question, question," before the Speaker had finished reading the motion. That is the kind of fair play we expect to get on this side of the House from supporters of the Government. Now, Sir, however much one may disagree on general or particular questions with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, one cannot but admire the boldness and the audacity with which that hon. gentleman speaks. I have always noticed, in my knowledge of the hon. gentleman, and in my parliamentary experience, that the worse his case the bolder he is in making his assertions. I have always noticed that when he has no defence to offer, the hon. gentleman turns round and abuses the plaintiff's attorney, as he has attempted to do in the present instance, in abusing my hon. friend the member for Lambton. Now, what does the hon. gentleman state in his opening remarks? He says he might properly have left this motion in the hands of the House, because my hon. friend who sits before me (Mr. Mackenzie), presented his case in so feeble a manner. The fact is, Sir, my hon. friend did not require to present his case otherwise than he did. All that any man required to do is to relate the naked narrative of the events connected with the Port Moody job, and if any one will get up from the perusal of that narrative without being convinced that, at least, there is something wrong in connection with it, I am much mistaken. The hon. gentleman says my hon. friend has been goaded into making the present motion by the Globe newspaper. I have no concern with the Globe newspaper. As my hon. friend well knows, the Globe newspaper is very well able to take care of itself. But I think I can say that in something like fifteen years parliamentary experience I never heard a more scandalous or outrageous attack made by a member of Parliament on an absent man. Is that the kind of conduct you would expect from a Minister of the Crown? Is that the sort of magnanimity you would look for from a Minister occupying the position which he occupies. It looks to me—I do not say it now, but I would say it if I were not inside this Chamber—to be one of the most cowardly attacks I ever witnessed upon the floor of Parliament. A man who is not here to defend himself or answer the charges made against him, is attacked behind his back by an hon. member of Parliament. The hon. the Minister of Railways says that my hon. friend has been goaded into the present motion by the Globe newspaper. I know my hon. friend too well to suppose that he has been urged to make the present motion on any other ground or consideration than the public interest. The hon. gentleman says that the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) hopes to gain some mean, contemptible, petty, political advantage, by presenting this motion to the House. Why, Sir, if my hon. friend expected to gain any such advantage as that, he would not have presented this motion in the calm, deliberate and temperate tone in which he presented it. He would have assumed the attitude which the hon. gentleman assumes who has just taken his seat. He would have thrown back his coat, rolled up his sleeves, and assumed a pugilistic attitude; he would have spoken in thundering tones that would have reverberated through the halls of this Chamber, instead of the calm and temperate manner in which he presented his case; and I do not think it was in very good grace that the hon. the Minister of Railways charged my hon. friend with having presented the motion to gain a petty political advantage. The hon. gentleman further said before he came to deal with the merits of the case, that from the pages of the Blue-book which he had in his hand and flourished, that he could show that my hon. friend was guilty while acting, as Minister of Public Works, of contract jobbery and contract broking, and that he would, if he could, blacken and ruin the character of my hon. friend. He said all that he had to do was to turn to the pages of this Blue-book to establish that fact. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman has had abundant opportunities on public platforms and on the floor of this House, and yet he has never yet dared to prefer in Parliament any charge that would stick against my hon. friend. All I need do is to refer him to an hon. member who sits behind him, who supports him, and who is one of his devoted followers. This hon. gentleman is connected with one of the most prominent newspapers that advocates the interests of his party, and what does he say of my hon. friend? Does he give him the character which the hon. Minister of Railways gives him? Does he say that he was a man steeped to the lips in corruption; that he was guilty of contract jobbing and contract broking. No; the Mail newspaper says my hon. friend is one of the most honest men that ever stood in shoe leather, and yet the hon. gentleman says that he could, if he would, establish the fact out of a Blue-Book that my hon. friend has been guilty of jobbing in contracts. I challenge the hon. gentleman to do that. I defy him to do it. He has had three years to do it and he has failed, and if he were ten years more in his present position he could not convince the people of this Dominion, who know my hon. friend too well, that there is a dishonest bone in Alexander Mackenzie's body. The hon. gentleman has made the attempt, it is true; he has made the attempt by means of a Railway Commission to investigate and inquire into all the proceedings that took place while my hon. friend was at the head of the Department. We have never seen the report of that Commission, but we do know that some extraordinary and marvellous statements came out in connection with that report—statements that did not reflect much credit on gentlemen on the other side, and certainly did not throw any aspersions on the character of the hon. gentleman who sits before me. Why was not that document submitted to Parliament? Does not the hon. gentleman know that a great deal of the evidence that was taken by that Commission was of a kind that would not tell to the credit of the hon. gentlemen sitting opposite us?—and I have no doubt that that is the reason why that document has not been submitted to Parliament. The hon. Minister of Railways, says my hon. friend, was guilty of mis-conduct with reference to the letting of contracts, and he adds with his usual bluster: "Why, Sir, he would not wait a poor forty-eight hours in the public interest in order that a contract might be given to the person who was entitled to it in connection with the Welland Canal." I know nothing about that matter, but I know that the hon. gentleman would not wait a bare two hours, so that a telegram might be sent to Montreal, and an answer received at Ottawa, and the sum of $209,000 be saved to the country; but in hot haste, without a moment's delay, on the morning of the 6th of February, the hon. gentleman rushed to the Council Board, and reports to his colleagues that the tender of McDonald & Charlebois was irregular, because the deposit cheque —

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was in the House at the time, but I stated that the answer from Montreal was shown to my colleagues in the first instance, and before any action was taken upon it at all.

Mr. CAMERON. Very likely. The hon. gentleman said my hon. friend knew he could have awarded that contract on his own responsibility, at least I so understood him. I suppose, at any rate, that there is a sort of spirit in hon. gentlemen opposite that when the head of a Department presents a report to Council, the rest hold themselves bound by it. The hon. gentleman says his colleagues knew all about it. I say that only makes the matter worse. I supposed that only one man was guilty of what—if I were not in Parliament, I would call this a job, but I now find out that the hon. gentleman consulted his colleagues; that they knew all about it, so that if there was a job every man on the Treasury benches was equally guilty with the hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, what is the defence of the hon. gentleman, after all? Does the hon. gentleman suppose that he is going to defend himself in the eyes of Parliament, or even in the eyes of his supporters, by abusing the hon. member for Lambton? Does he suppose he is going to defend the granting of this contract to Onderdonk & Co., instead of to McDonald & Charlebois, by showing that Gordon Brown did something he should not have done? Is it to be accepted as a justification of the contract, or a defence against the charge made by the hon. member for Lambton, to abuse the Globe and say that it has published scurrilous articles about him, and destroyed his reputation so far as the Globe can do it? If not, I would ask him why three-fourths of his speech was taken up with abuse of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—abuse of the Globe newspaper, laudations of the late Hon. George Brown, abuse of the present managing director of the Globe? Does he suppose he is going to accomplish his defence by that kind of abuse? And, if not, what object had he in following that line of argument? Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman practically admits the fact that my hon. friend bases his case upon; he admits that tenders were called for on the 24th of October; that on the 1st of February these tenders were sent into the Department; that the cheque for $20,000 was handed into the Department on the 1st of February; and that, on the 4th of February, he requested his own private secretary to ask the Bank of Montreal whether that cheque was good or not. Now, I ask what object the hon. gentleman had in requesting his private secretary to go to the Bank of Montreal and ascertain whether this cheque was good or not? From the 1st to the 4th of February where was that cheque? It was in the possession of the hon. gentleman, and, on the 4th of February, he sent his secretary to the Bank of Montreal to enquire whether it was good or not. If these men had large contracts before, which they had been unable to fulfil, if the country was going to suffer by these men getting the contract, the hon. gentleman must have known that before the 4th of February, and, if he did know it before that day, he ought to have rejected their tender on those grounds. But the hon. gentleman does not pretend to have rejected it on that ground; the sole ground is that there was some irregularity in the cheque, and the hon. gentleman winds up his remarks by saying that these men could not complete the contract, because their tender was too low, and yet, Sir, on the 4th of February, with the full knowledge of that fact in his mind, and knowing these men as he must have known them, he sent down to the Bank of Montreal to ascertain whether the cheque was good or not. Sir, he knew perfectly well then, or he ought to have known, that this cheque was marked "good for two days only." His secretary could not go, however, on the 4th of February; he went on Monday, the 6th of February, and asked Mr. Drummond if that cheque was good. The hon. gentleman wants the House to believe that Mr. Drummond said that the cheque was not good. The papers show that Mr. Drummond said no such thing. What did he say? He did not say anything; he only shook his head, and then he said he would have to consult Montreal. The secretary went back and told the hon. gentleman that, and if he did not, he ought to have been his secretary no longer. This was done at about 10 o'clock on Monday forenoon; a telegram was sent, franked by the hon. gentleman's own secretary, and the answer came at one o'clock in the afternoon that the cheque was perfectly good, and would be good until paid. The hon. gentleman is in the habit of appealing to the honest and sensible men on both sides of the House, and I appeal to the honest and sensible men to put all these facts together, and to say what other conclusion they can come to than that up to the very last moment the hon. gentleman intended to give this contract to McDonald & Charlebois, if the cheque was good. I say that any man who intended not to give the contract to McDonald & Charlebois, and who yet took the trouble to send down to the bank to inquire whether the cheque was good, would have been acting the part of an idiot. On the 4th of February it is quite clear the hon. gentleman intended to give them the contract. What changed his mind? It is quite clear that the fact that they had not fulfilled former contracts, that they had tendered too low, and that they were not able to fulfil this contract, had not the slightest effect on the hon. gentleman's mind. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that there was a doubt about the ability of McDonald & Charlebois to put up the security. Let the hon. gentleman turn to the papers, and he will find that the moment they found that their tender was the lowest, they were ready to put up every dollar of the money necessary to secure them the contract. And yet the hon. gentleman wants us to believe that all this was done for the public interest. All I can say is, that it is a most extraordinary way of serving the interest of the public. The hon. gentleman complains very bitterly of the course my hon. friend has taken against him. What else could he expect, after the course of conduct he has been guilty of? Let the hon. gentleman go before an impartial judge and jury, who will decide fairly between man and man, and I ask nothing but the bare, naked statement made by the hon. member for Lambton, and the answer, if it can be called an answer, of the hon. gentleman, and I venture to say that such a jury, without leaving the box, would bring in a verdict of guilty against the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman has defended himself by abusing hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. He has quoted from the Globe, as he always does. Whenever there is a charge made against him on the floor of Parliament or outside of Parliament, what course does he take? Does he take the only course that an honest man is bound to take in order to vindicate himself before his fellow-countrymen? No, Sir. The hon. gentleman never does that. He launches out in a tirade of abuse against hon. gentlemen on this side, whether in Parliament or out of Parliament; against the Globe and other newspapers which venture, in the discharge of their public duties, to question and criticize the hon. gentleman's proceedings, and whenever a motion is submitted or allusion made to the hon. member he always assumes the same line of argument and the same line of defence. We have to treat the hon. gentleman as if he were, like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion. I beg to take a different view of the hon. gentleman's political course and conduct for the last fifteen years in the Parliament of Canada, and we are not going to be deterred, whenever we find it to be in the public interest to do so, from attacking the hon. gentleman's conduct, policy and actions with respect to public affairs, because the hon. gentleman throws out defiances and challenges. I recollect well the line of argument he adopted. Why, it is the same old story. I have heard the latter part of his speech four times over, and I can almost repeat it word for word. He challenges hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to ask for a Committee of Enquiry, and declares he will submit his conduct to the judgment of the House. Why, it would be the greatest folly for any man to suppose (I have the highest respect for hon. gentlemen opposite personally) that were one of the great leaders of the Conservative party—the hon. gentleman who carries in his coat pocket the revisionary interest to the leadership of the party—put on his trial before his peers in Parliament, they would wash the hon. gentleman perfectly clean whether he was clean or not. Let us see what the hon. gentleman said when similar charges were made against him. He said:

"Not a single word of insinuation, not a single question was raised among those hon. gentlemen. The House rose, and the editor and proprietor of a public newspaper, the Toronto Globe, who I am glad to know is within the sound of my voice, drawing venom from the depths of his own black heart, said that in the columns of his newspaper, which if there was a word of truth in it, convicted the leaders of his party of being unworthy of public confidence."

The hon. gentleman took good care to say that when Mr. Brown could not answer him—not on a public platform where Mr. Brown would be present, but on the floor of Parliament when the Minister could not be answered. The hon. gentleman further said:

"Then I say, how dare any journalist so insult the intelligence of the public as to fill his columns with lying and slanderous utterances after Parliament had risen, and when, after all the facts were before the House, no man could be found in the party to venture an insinuation against me."

This hon. gentleman is above journalism and above criticism, and nobody should say a word against him. Insinuations are, however, made against him now, and he adopts the same course; he defies hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and the Globe and other papers, and thinks that is a conclusive answer. The hon. gentleman further said:

"They had these documents in their hands for weeks, and yet after all these denunciations in the press, Parliament rose without a man being found to endorse the contemptible utterances of that lying and slanderous paper. That was my position in this House, that is my position in this third Session of Parliament, and goaded on to desperation by my challenge on the public platform, to any hon. gentleman to formulate a charge against the integrity of my conduct as a public man—a challenge to discuss my conduct in the House or out of it—or to investigate it before any tribunal; it is only now that the hon. gentleman ventures not to formulate a charge, but to that which is the most unmanly act which one man can do to another—to throw out an unworthy insinuation."

The hon. gentleman asks us to formulate a charge before any tribunal. Pray, how are we to do so? He says we assailed his character, abused him and slandered him, and that the newspapers week after week abuse him. They do more, they charge the hon. gentleman specifically and distinctly, as I can show from the columns of various journals, with having committed acts of jobbery and corruption, and yet the hon. gentleman has not had the manliness to vindicate his character before the only tribunal where it can be properly vindicated. What have the papers charged him with? With every crime known in the criminal calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. From pitch and toss to manslaughter.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). With every crime known to the criminal calendar except murder, with every offence of which a politician can be guilty. Allow me to mention one or two charges made against the hon. Minister in connection with contracts, and let us see how he has dealt with them. "The nakedness of his jobbery is remarkable." I say this is a foul insinuation, if it is not true, against any man, and no Canadian statesman should for a moment submit to the charge without taking the earliest opportunity, not simply to deny it, but to compel its author to appear before a jury. "He is a wily and brazen corruptionist." When charged with jobbery and robbery in connection with the Carillon Canal contract, and section B and Port Moody contracts, the Globe says it has proved them, and adds: "We are ready to maintain them." The papers further say: "He must be considered guilty of gross jobbery just as Guiteau before being sentenced was guilty of killing President Garfield. He is persistently assailed because he persistently practices corruption." "This year he plunders the Treasury for Onderdonk & Co." "His official career began in corruption and goes on consistently." "He is a national disgrace." "He plundered the Treasury of $264,000 to benefit a favored contractor." "The hardness of his falsifications is not more remarkable than the nakedness of his jobbery." These are charges on which could be based an indictment for criminal offence, and if not true the authors are liable to action for damages by the hon. gentleman. What has the hon. gentleman done? He came to Parliament three years ago and challenged hon. members on this side of the House to establish their case before a Committee of the House. I prefer to go before some other tribunal, although I have the highest respect for Parliament. Respecting certain charges, the Globe says it is ready to prove them. If that be so, why does not the hon. gentleman give that paper an opportunity of proving them? If he wants to vindicate himself, clear his character, and show there is nothing in the charges made by the public press, and repeated day after day, he has one remedy, and one remedy only: let him bring an action against the Globe, or some other journal, and before an impartial judge and jury. If innocent, his innocence will appear; and if guilty, his guilt will appear. What would be the result if charges of this kind were brought against Imperial statesmen? They could not remain in office for one hour. Two or three years ago an English statesman was charged with having some indirect connection with a Portuguese railway. This charge was made against him, and he resigned his position in the Government, rather than such a charge should be made against a member of the Government. That is the correct course for an honorable man to take. I hold that a member of the Government ought to be above suspicion. The hon. gentleman is willing to assume that the members of this House will condone his offences, but I challenge him to establish his innocence, or rather to give us an opportunity of establishing that he is not innocent, before an impartial judge and jury of the country. That is the only way he can vindicate his character from the charge my hon. friend has made and established against him beyond all reasonable question. The only way the hon. gentleman can clear his character is by bringing an action in court against the Globe newspaper and others that have accused him in this matter, and, if he can, vindicate himself before an impartial tribunal.

After Recess.

Mr. McLENNAN. I have no wish to prolong this debate, but I think there are some points in it with which a supporter of the Government can very well deal. The last speaker on the other side suggested that the hon. member should exculpate himself through the law courts. The supporters of the Government do not ask their leaders to descend into that arena. It would be neither creditable nor profitable. I can tell you how I was struck by the first report of the transaction that leads to this motion of want of confidence. When I read the report I had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the first motive with the Government was, that this work should be accomplished, that the contractors should be in every respect able to carry out the undertaking. I think all the debates that we have had here for the last two years, on the subject of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has made this point very clear, and I think the decision of the country has been very distinctly pronounced, that the first necessity of any contract should be that the party undertaking it be equal to the work, that the work be performed without unnecessary delay. It is not necessary that I should go over the whole history, or even any part of the history, of this Pacific Railway question to illustrate this point. It has been so clearly laid down on the floor of this House that it is quite unnecessary to repeat any of the arguments that have been made to maintain it. The supporters of the Government have maintained it from the first moment to the last of the discussion on this question. In carrying out a work of this kind, it has been decided that a corporate company was necessary. Whether that were so or not, it is necessary that contractors should perform the work. Well, without saying anything to the disparagement of a very useful body, we all know that contractors are a necessary evil. Nobody knows that better than the hon. gentleman who has made this motion. When we come to discuss that which is a necessary evil, we find that no geographer has ever yet laid down the Rubicon that divides necessary evil from supreme good. The good to be accomplished in this case was to guard the interests of the country, but the hon. gentleman opposite have laid down this Rubicon, and its narrow line is marked across the floor of this House. That which is supreme good when the hon. gentlemen are on your right, Sir, becomes—I do not like to repeat the strong terms that were used on the other side of the House—something supremely bad, when it happens to be performed—on the same side of the line, it is true—but when these hon. gentlemen happen to be on your left. This is the whole question at issue, and I think it is a very simple one. I merely throw in my little mite to the debate at this stage to indicate how the matter strikes a supporter of the Government; and as one of those supporters, I must say that there never was a moment when I felt more strongly than now the duty imposed on me to support the Government and the Minister of Railways in relation to this contract.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not aware that the hon. member for Glengarry has at any period of his parliamentary career, expressed any hesitation as to the line he should take on any question that affected the Government of the day. If he has at any stage hesitated, he has been careful to prevent us from learning it, because his bearing, his discourse, his vote have been, as far as I can judge, those not simply of a staunch, but of an undeviating supporter of the Administration whatever it might propose. Now, the hon. gentleman has adopted some of those side issues with which the hon. the Minister of Railways endeavored to embarrass the consideration of the question before us, and it becomes all the more necessary that we should clear away those embarrassments and see what really is the question which we are called upon to decide. The hon. gentleman whose proposal to the Administration, sanctioned by the Administration, and brought here for review, has been this evening challenged, and he has answered that challenge with a degree of violence and vituperation unusual even for himself. He commenced his answer to a statement very different from his, distinct from his in all its features, a statement which was almost a judicial statement of the point at issue, rigidly correct as to the facts, and drawing no unwarrantable or even uncharitable deductions from those facts, by a wholesale attack upon my hon. friend's credit, character and public acts as the First Minister of this country. His answer was, as I have said, characterized by a violence of language and unmeasured amount of license in a speech remarkable even for him. I do not think that such a line of defence was the line fit to be adopted by an upright man, vindicating his position as a public man. Now, I should like to know was the position of the hon. member to be improved by the debasing and degrading—within his petty power to debase and degrade—the position of my hon. friend the member for Lambton? The question that we have to dispose of this night is not that of the merits and demerits of my hon. friend, or of his Administration. The question is whether the contract which is laid upon the Table ought to be approved or not; and this question is to be disposed of by the consideration of the circumstances surrounding the execution of that contract, and by determining whether on the whole it is in the interest of the country that the particular contract should receive the approbation of the House. I say that, even if the charges which the hon. gentleman has made against the hon. member for Lambton had been true, they would have been no fit or appropriate defence of him in the position in which he stands to-night. But if instead of being true, they are, as we know they are, wholly devoid and destitute of truth, are much worse than the position of the hon. gentleman, in that he has made an attempt at defence upon such a sandy and such an unstable foundation as that. The hon. gentleman's friends and supporters have at intervals found great fault with my hon. friend for Lambton in many respects. They have found at different times divers defects as they conceived in his character, in his capacity and in his position as a public man; but, notwithstanding all the storms of invective with which they have assailed him, I believe there has subsisted and subsists to-day in the minds not merely of his friends, but of the great bulk of those who stand opposite of him in this House, a widespread, and, as I know, a well grounded conviction that he is a man of stern and unbending integrity, wholly incapable of doing those things which the hon. member has charged him with. I shall not endeavor to analyze the feelings and opinions which the hon. gentleman's own supporters entertained towards him in this regard. But I will say to him that the situation in this regard of my hon. friend the member for Lambton is so high that it ought to be his highest hope and aspiration, which some day or other, in some distant town, and by some great exertions, he may be enabled to place himself in somewhat the same position. The hon. gentleman did not confine himself to my hon. friend for Lambton. He reminded me of the old comparison of the cuttle-fish, and he exuded that dirty colored liquid with which that animal is said to defend itself, and poured it forth more upon my hon. friend from Lambton, though it was directed at myself. The hon. gentleman was pleased to indulge in various aspersions upon my character. I have, before to-day, told him, as I repeat to-night, that it is a long, long time since he wholly lost the power to evoke in me, in the slightest degree, emotions of surprise or indignation. The humblest of his followers retains that power but he has long since lost it. But, I may say, with reference to this charge which he was pleased to make to-night—with reference to the statement, first of all, that I had entered into some intrigue with Mr. Brown, to supplant or depose my hon. friend for Lambton, that I have before to-day, declared here and elsewhere, that the charge that I had entered into any conspiracy, or did or said a single thing to that end, was false and utterly baseless; and it is, if possible, more false and baseless still, when made in the particular connection in which the hon. gentleman was pleased to repeat it to-night. The hon. gentleman has charged me, I say, with these things, and with something more, with a fresh accusation—with being responsible for the articles that are written in the Globe newspaper about him, and, I presume, about other public men. Well, I am not responsible for the articles either in the Globe or any other public paper. There is a newspaper—there is more than one newspaper in the country—which is pleased from day to day and week to week to villify myself. I do not hold hon. gentlemen opposite responsible for the utterances of these papers in any degree, and for the great newspaper which especially supports them, I hold only one man out of the 208 who sit in the House responsible for the utterances of that paper. I do not understand upon what principle that hon. gentleman seeks to fasten responsibility upon any individual public man for the utterances of the public press. I may say to him that it is now many years since I expressed publicly the opinion that the utterances of the press on both sides of politics often went too far, and that much had been done to render more difficult than otherwise might have been the management of our public affairs, by a too reckless use of the powers of which the press unquestionably possesses. Such has been, such is my opinion—I state it frankly as I have held it for many years. But to observe of any particular public man without cause, without justification of any description, that he is to be held responsible for the utterances of any particular paper, is wholly unjustifiable. I should think myself wholly unjustifiable if I were to take up the columns of the Mail and read the epithets applied and statements made with reference to myself and charge them upon the hon. gentleman, because I have no evidence to prove that he inspires them; and but for his language occasionally, I should have hardly supposed even that he sympathized with them, though I cannot say that I am of that impression after what has happened to-night. I am disposed to believe that he does sympathize with them; but I do not hold him responsible, and do not expect to be held, either by him, or by his followers, or by any person in this country, responsible for anything except what I say, and for that I am always ready to make good what I have said; or if I find myself in the wrong, to retract it as a man ought to do. The tone of the hon. gentleman is fixed and habitual. He seems to believe that by the course he takes he will prevent criticism of his public acts—that he will prevent us from bringing forward as against him and his colleagues those grounds of complaint which we believe ought to be entertained. It is the tone of a bully and the true braggart. But I shall assure him that, while on the one hand, he will not induce us to follow his example in point of language, on the other hand we shall not be moved one jot or tittle from the discharge of our public duty, in bringing forward on every occasion, at the appropriate time, such cases as we believe we should complain of, and in stating them, not with the accessories of vituperation with which the hon. gentleman garnishes his orations, but stating them in that measured, calm and temperate manner justified by the facts, which we hold will be the best communication to the sense and feeling of the honest and moderate people of this country. Now, what is the question? The question is with reference to the contract upon the Table, which, under the law, is binding, if we do not disapprove of it. Under the law, we have the right to disapprove of it, and, under the law, our disapproval makes it not binding, and leaves the question open. We are responsible materially for this contract coming into effect, because, if he chooses to say so, this contract was not coming into effect, and it is upon the vote and decision of this House to-night that this question depends. It is true, it is in the negative form; the contract is binding unless we disapprove, and our disapproval nullifies the contract. Therefore, our constituents and the country hold us in effect responsible for the decision, whether this contract shall continue effective or not. Now, the contract is one let, not to the lowest tenderer, but to a tenderer $209,000 above the lowest tender. It is, therefore, prima facie a contract let, not in the interest of the country; it is, at the first appearance and upon the surface, a contract which ought not to have been so let. Unless there be some good reason to the contrary, the lowest tenderer ought to have received the contract. Unless there be some good reason to the contrary, the fair presumption is that, by the letting of the contract, $20,000 is lost to the country. The question is, what is the justification for this course? What is there below the surface which alters the appearance on the surface? What is there which justifies a letting of this description? Now, the hon. the Minister has to-day given several reasons why it was fit that this contract should be awarded to Onderdonk instead of McDonald & Charlebois, and, not content with giving reasons argumentatively, he has gone into the box and examined himself thoroughly, cross-examined himself with rigor, and given us evidence, argument, statement, indication, defence, retort, accusation and defiance all in a breath. Well, the reasons which the hon. Minister gives, which are not the reasons on the paper, and to one or more of them the hon. member for Glengarry alluded as the reason why—the hon. member for Glengarry read the papers, but it was not the papers that convinced him; he was satisfied that it was better to give it to the higher tenderer; he was satisfied it was in the interest of despatch and economy that the contract should be given to Onderdonk instead of McDonald & Charlebois, and he agrees with the views of the hon. the Minister of Railways in that regard. Now the hon. Minister says he ought not to have given it to McDonald & Charlebois first, because there was some former transaction about a cheque for a permanent contract which was an unsatisfactory transaction; second, because Charlebois, I think it was, was a contractor, or one of the contractors for the Georgian Bay Branch, and he did not prosecute this work with efficiency; third, because he was satisfied that McDonald & Charlebois had not the means to prosecute this contract with efficiency; and fourth, because their tender was too low. These, I think, are the four points on which the hon. gentleman gave his evidence and gave reasons. He asks the House to sustain him on that ground, and the hon. member for Glengarry is ready to do it. But there is this fatal defect in this plea of the hon. gentleman, sustained by his testimony, that whatever force there might have been in these grounds, these were not his grounds. Whatever force there might be in these grounds, they were not the grounds of the Privy Council, they were not the grounds upon which the hon. gentleman dealt, judging by the writing, judging by the statement, and judging by what he recommended to his colleagues. Had that been so, if the hon. gentleman, after examination and enquiry, had satisfied himself that McDonald & Charlebois were unsatisfactory contractors, and unfit to be entrusted with the work, and that there was such a difference between their tender and that of the next, that it was doubtful if they could execute the works of their contract, and therefore that they ought to be passed over, I suppose he would have said so. I suppose he would have told his colleagues so, I suppose he would have reported so to the Council, I suppose he would have said, these are the reasons upon which I ask you to determine, irrespective of the question about the two days' acceptance, that it would not be a fit thing to deal with these men—he might have given them as exclusive, or he might have given them as supplementary reasons. He gave them not at all; we heard not a word broached about them, not a whisper of them, until the contract being asked, and the hon. gentleman being called upon to defend it, he brings forward these as the reasons why it was a proper thing to pass over McDonald & Charlebois and to give the contract to the higher tenderer. Sir, it is utterly impossible for us to-night to accept these pleas. They are not the groundwork of the action of the hon. gentleman. The groundwork of the hon. gentleman's action is that which we had in the papers before us, is that with which we have to deal, is that upon which this controversy must turn. It must turn not upon his statement made between the eleventh and twelfth hours, that there are other reasons why this contract was justifiable; it must turn upon the validity of those grounds and these justifications which he gave before, which are in the papers before us, for the action which he advises and for the action which was taken. Now, let us consider what those grounds are. He talks of an irregularity in the tender; there was none. He talks of an irregularity in the cheque; there was none. There was an irregularity in the acceptance of the cheque. The cheque itself was a perfectly good cheque, as we speak of cheques. The circumstance that the acceptance is limited to two days did not make it less a good cheque, but it did, after the close of those two days, render it possible that McDonald & Charlebois might withdraw their balance, and if their balance was withdrawn it relieved the bank of their liability for that cheque irrespective of the balance. That is precisely the state of the case as I understand it. That was the condition of things with that restricted acceptance. The hon. gentleman says that this accepted cheque system was a device to prevent contract jobbing, of which he represents himself to be the inveterate and undying foe. A singular thing, if my memory serves me, that this effective plan to prevent contract jobbing; this plan which is so sacred that it is not to be departed from under any circumstance, but is to be adhered to in the literal manner which the hon. gentleman now proposes at whatever cost, was invented by the prince of contract jobbers, the hon. member for Lambton. I believe it was a security devised by my hon. friend who, the hon. gentleman has recorded this night, so far as his word or his statement can effect such a record with reference to any respectable citizen of this country, as having stamped his whole Administration with intended or designed jobbery—one of his first acts was to devise and carry out a scheme which the hon. gentleman says is the most effectual thing he can think of to prevent contract jobbing. Now, Sir, if this cheque was not good on the 6th of February, it was good to the extent to which I have stated it was; good to the extent of the drawers funds in the bank. The hon. gentleman committed a slight anachronism in the course of his narrative. He declared with great circumstantiality that Monday, 6th February, he saw the cheque for the first time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. The hon. gentleman will allow me to correct him. I stated I saw it on Saturday, the 4th, but as the bank was closed my secretary was not able to present it until Monday.

Mr. BLAKE. I heard the hon. gentleman. He said in the first instance it was on the 1st of July that he first saw the cheque and the tenders. At a subsequent period he said he told his secretary on the Saturday to go to the bank for the cheque. He made both these statements, and I can call numerous witnesses here to the truth of my recollection of the hon. gentleman's statement. Now, Sir, he says he ordered on the Saturday his secretary to make enquiry at the bank whether the cheque was good or whether it would be paid, and the secretary went on the Monday morning to the banker's to make that enquiry. The cheque you will remark was not drawn on the Bank of Montreal at Ottawa, but on the Bank of Montreal, at Montreal—the head office—but the hon. gentleman sent down to the manager of the agency at Ottawa to know if he would pay the cheque, and then comes the circumstance emphasized by the hon. gentleman's private secretary, no doubt at his instigation, emphasized by the hon. gentleman in his most melodramatic manner, the circumstance which he enlarges upon and intensifies, because, he says, Mr. Drummond says: "No; I will not pay the cheque." But what really happened? When it comes down to the small end, Drummond shook his head. Why, Sir, what an expressive shake that must have been. I do not suppose, in the history of the world, there has been a shake of the head which cost $209,000. The private secretary has recorded, and the hon. Minister reads with emphasis, the circumstance that Mr. Drummond shook his head, but he did not add by words to the cogency of this ominous shake, which, for all we know, might have been a nod, which would make all the difference in the world. He did not add by words the emphatic statement of the hon. gentleman. All he says was, that he must enquire at the head office, and the Minister's secretary authorizes him to do so, and franks a blank telegram in order that he might do so. The telegram is sent, an answer is received, and within an hour or two the enquiry of the hon. Minister—just as directly as it could be answered, seeing that he did not ask the banker of the office in which the cheque was drawn—was answered in the affirmative, namely, that they would pay the cheque, and that it was good and would remain good until presented. Now, the hon. gentleman says, that he believed that that was a trick; that McDonald & Charlebois—to whom, like most people about whom he speaks, he has not given the best possible character in the world—had engaged in a deliberate trick; that they were about to raise a rig on the hon. the Minister of Railways, and put in a cheque which was not good, and by that means to have the opportunity of selling this contract if they got it, and if they failed to sell it, of withdrawing, because there would be no funds to answer the cheque. He avers to us that such was his belief. The hon. Minister was informed at the earliest possible moment after his enquiry that the cheque was good, and that the restrictive power ought to be stricken out. He was informed also by Mr. Drummond, early in the transaction, as appears by the letter of Mr. Drummond, printed at pages 53 and 54 of the book:

"This no doubt occurred inadvertently and without being known when issued, which I explained to the Department previously.

"Yours truly,

"A. DRUMMOND."

He makes no enquiry, at that time, of the bank as to whether this was a plan to which the Bank of Montreal was a party and which they only withdrew on the Minister's enquiry. He makes no investigation into the matter to ascertain if his suspicions of McDonald & Charlebois were correct or not, but he jumps to the conclusion of criminal conduct on their part. Like himself again, if there is a good and an evil motive, a charitable and an uncharitable view, the hon. gentleman chooses the latter, and decides against McDonald and Charlebois without further enquiry at the bank, without any enquiry of themselves, and that they had been guilty of attempting to defraud him and the public. He decided, therefore, that he should pass them over and let the contract to the next tenderer. He acknowledges to-night that that uncharitable conclusion of his was erroneous. He acknowledges that they were not guilty of any such design at all. He is obliged in face of the distinct letter of the Manager of the Bank of Montreal to admit that this restriction on the cheque was wholly and solely the fault or error of the bank; that it was not put in of design at all, and that therefore what McDonald & Charlebois arranged for, what they were entitled to get and supposed they had received, what the bank supposed they were giving them was an unlimited acceptance prepared in accordance with the regulations, and that the guilt, such as it is, arose solely from the unintentional oversight on the part of the bank in issuing an improper stamp. These facts might have been found out earlier by the hon. gentleman had he not chosen to jump at the conclusion that McDonald & Charlebois were trying to cheat him. But they came out time enough; they came out before the contract was signed; they came out at any rate before we are precluded from disposing of this question. They are the facts known now to this House and in the country; they are the facts with cognizance of which it is that we are called upon to deal with this question, and we have nothing to do with the Minister's report; we have nothing to do with the Order in Council; we have nothing to do with the Minister's report on pre-consideration; we have to do with the facts before us, which facts are, as the Minister now admits, that McDonald & Charlebois put in a bona fide tender, accompanied by a cheque for $20,000, which they had arranged with the bank should be certified to an unlimited extent, in point of time, which the bank agreed so to certify, which the bank supposed they had so certified, which McDonald & Charlebois supposed they had so certified, and which, therefore, was wholly bona fide on their part. The whole difficulty is due to the circumstance that one stamp was used instead of another by the bankers. These are the facts with which we have to deal. Now, we are not to confirm this contract because the hon. Minister supposed that a fraud was designed, which the hon. Minister admits to night was not designed? The Minister says I dealt with this matter in the way I did because I was convinced at the time that an attempt was being made to cheat the Department and the public, but I acknowledge now I was wrong. I acknowledge, upon the further evidence brought forward, that that apprehension or view of mine was incorrect, and that there was no attempt to cheat the Department. One suggestion, indeed, was made by the hon. gentleman, which was that McDonald & Charlebois had the cheque in their possession for some time, and might have found out the error. But the hon. gentleman says he could not read the words in his acceptance; his deputy could not read them; so they had to look elsewhere for an interpreter and a spy-glass, to find them out, and I do not suppose that McDonald & Charlebois are to be charged with gross negligence, because they failed to find out what the hon. Minister—with the best intentions in the world, and with a high degree of vigilance for the public—failed to find out with reference to the acceptance. So it is with us to-night. Whatever difficulties beset the Ministerial mind, whatever notions of anxiety to guard the public against a fraud which he thought was attempted to be perpetrated by McDonald & Charlebois affected his action and the action of his colleagues, we can put all on one side; we know that it was all a misapprehension; we know that, as a matter of fact, Macdonald & Charlebois were intending to execute no such plot, but were bona fide tenderers, and were sending in a bona fide cheque, as they and the bank believed. Now, Sir, we are bound to consider, under these circumstances, whether the country is to lose $209,000 because of that unintentional mistake on the part of the bank. The hon. gentleman's argument on this branch of the case is this:—He says: "You must observe in the strictest way this rule about the certified cheque, because if you take uncertified cheques, there will be no security at all." But, Sir, it is a reasonable deviation from the rigor of the rule not to observe it in the sense in which the hon. gentleman says that it should be observed, when it is proved incontestably by his own admission, that there was no intentional irregularity at all on the part of the intending contractor—when it is proved beyond dispute that the whole transaction was bona fide, and that the difficulty, if any, is occasioned solely by an oversight on the part of the stamping officer of the bank, I say that to decide under these circumstances that you will not accept the cheque is not to open the door to frauds; because you decide to accept it only when you find, from unimpeachable testimony, that the maker and giver of the cheque supposed that they were giving a good cheque, and that the bank believed the cheque to be good during an unlimited time. In any case in which that is satisfactorily established, as the hon. Minister admits, there can be no difficulty and no danger; and to accept the cheque under such circumstances is not to open the door to frauds. But the hon. gentleman says: "Oh, but we must observe our notice; we gave a notice, and we must observe good faith to the other contractors." But I suppose this notice contained the clause, which is usual in such notices, that the Government were not bound to let the contract to the lowest or any tenderer; and whether that was the case or not, I know of no right that any other tenderer would have to complain, if a bona fide tender $209,000 lower, with a cheque issued and accepted under the circumstances disclosed in these papers, were accepted, even although by an oversight on the part of the bank, a two days' limitation had been inserted in it, nor would the hon. gentleman find a single man to tender the less for any such reason. No, Sir, I do not believe that this suggestion of the hon. gentleman to stick to what we may call the rigor of the law, to rule out a tender under the belief that a fraud was attempted, when we know and he acknowledges that it was all a mistake, and that no fraud was attempted, and so to lose $209,000—I say I do not believe the people of Canada will understand that sort of dealing with public affairs, or appreciate an extra payment of $209,000, justified upon such fine points of law as those which the hon. gentleman proposes to justify this extra payment upon. No, Sir; all being in good faith, and the case being such as it is, we have one duty, which is to save the public money, and to save the public money by awarding the contract to the lowest bona fide tenderer; and being responsible to my constituents for the determination whether this contract shall be made for a certain sum or $209,000 more, I for my own part have no hesitation in deciding by my vote that it shall not be let for the sum of $209,000 in excess of that for which we know it can be let. I have not said or insinuated one word with reference to the motives of the hon. gentleman. We do not know his motives, and we are bound to suppose that he was animated by a sense of public duty, and that he persuaded himself that it was his public duty to pass over the tender of Macdonald & Charlebois in favor of that of Mr. Onderdonk. But, Sir, while I assume that the hon. gentleman did manage to persuade himself that that was his public duty, I hope he will allow me the liberty of coming to a conclusion as to what my public duty is; and I believe my public duty to be to dissent from the hon. gentleman's conclusion, and to vote for the motion which in effect gives us an opportunity of letting this contract to the lowest tenderer at a saving of $209,000, instead of confirming a contract which involves that extra expense to this country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, commenced his speech by complaining in strong language, used by himself, of the language which he said was too strong, used by my hon. friend beside me. He says the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways stood in decided and unfavorable contrast to the judicial calmness with which the motion was made by the hon. member for Lambton. Sir, the tone of the hon. member for Lambton was quiet and calm, and if the language and insinuations, and the substance of what he said had been as moderate as the tone, there could be no objection to his speech. It was quite open to the hon. gentleman, if he thought my hon. friend was wrong in his course, if he thought the Government were wrong in agreeing with him, to say so and to make his motion; but it was not his duty, and he had no right, without the strongest foundation, to state that this was one of the worst cases that he ever knew in his Parliamentary experience. That language was used in a very soft tone, but it was a charge against my hon. friend the hon. the Minister of Railways, and it justified him in saying that it did not lie in the mouth of the hon. gentleman to make such a charge, because whatever my hon. friend's conduct was, he could show that from the time that hon. gentleman had held office until the time he left, he had let contracts in a manner quite at variance from the doctrine which he laid down and which the hon. member for West Durham supported. My hon. friend had a right to state that the whole course of the hon. gentleman as Minister of Public Works was in direct contravention of the doctrine he laid down, and that he could prove again and again, from the State papers, that in granting contracts to favorites he had entered into contract jobs. My hon. friend had a right to state that if he thought so, and he said he had the papers in his hand to prove it, and he did prove it in one or two instances, and, if time would permit, he could prove it in many instances.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; he cannot do it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon. gentlemen say we cannot do it. We might go from the smallest, meanest little job to the largest—from the Tolton one to the Belden one, from five pounds up to any amount of money;—the whole course of the hon. gentleman justified my hon. friend in using the language which he did, and he used it only in consequence of the charge made by the hon. member for Lambton that he had acted improperly and wrongly, and that it was the worst case he had ever heard of in his Parliamentary experience. The hon. member for the West Riding of Durham says: "What if the late Government had done wrong. The question is, whether this act is right or wrong?" It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to endeavor to draw the attention of the House from those considerations; they are only too anxious to avoid the tu quoque argument; to say, if we have done wrong, you have no right to quote it as a precedent and example of the hon. gentleman's party, and the action for which the country tried and condemned them. Now, Sir, with respect to this transaction, the hon. leader of the Opposition said, in the course of his speech, that my hon. friend had not consulted his colleagues as to certain portions of this transaction, that he had concealed certain portions of this transaction from them, and he asked the question across the floor if I knew of the going down to the bank, the presentation of the cheque, the sending of the telegram, and the answer from Montreal. I have no hesitation in saying that, whatever my hon. friend did in that matter, he did with the full knowledge and cognizance of all his colleagues, and I, as First Minister, declare that I assumed the whole responsibility of the transaction, in every respect, after being fully aware of the circumstances of the course taken by my hon. friend. And I say to this House and to the country that my hon. friend would not have been doing his duty to the public or to the tenderers if he had allowed himself to be induced, for fear of a cry that he was not giving the contract to the lowest tenderer, to do a striking injustice to all the other tenderers. These had rights as well as Messrs. Macdonald & Charlebois. They came, honest men I dare say all of them, here at public invitation, the Government asking them to undertake this great work and to place their money in the hands of the Government as security for their good faith. They had rights, and if my hon. friend had accepted this irregular cheque he would have been guilty of a wrong, of a dishonest act and an impropriety towards everyone of those tenderers, and especially towards Mr. Onderdonk who was the next lowest on the list. Let us look back at the whole subject of letting public works by tender. When we were in power before 1873 our practice was to receive every tender, to ask for no deposit as security of good faith, but not to be bound to accept the lowest tender. The reason why we pursued that course was that we thought by asking for any deposit it might prevent many young and enterprising contractors from entering into the field for contracting. We thought it was of great importance to induce upright and skilful men, experts in the various works they were called upon to execute, to come forward and tender. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they came into power, changed that practice.

Mr. MACKENZIE. And you objected.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did, and I was just going to say so. I thought it was limiting the field in this new country, and that it was much better to allow every one to make a tender, and the Government should afterwards judge whether the parties who were lowest on the list were fully competent to carry out the contract. The hon. member for Lambton changed that policy, and I am free to admit that, after a full consideration of all the circumstances, he was right. I think that on the whole, although it has had the effect of greatly limiting the field of contracting, yet the greater security given to the public for the satisfactory performance of contracts was a sufficient ground for the charge, and it relieved, or it was expected or hoped it would relieve the Government of the day, whether in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite or of members on this side of the House, from the charge of favoritism which was always made in our experience in office. Whenever we did not accept the lowest tender it was sure to be said by those opposed to us that we had robbed the country of so much money and had given the work to a political or personal friend. I thought that the hon. member for Lambton and his Government, by changing the plan and insisting on a deposit of money would relieve for all time to come Governments from that charge. I find, however, I was mistaken; that although a deposit of money shall be considered as a necessary precedent before giving out contracts or accepting a tender, even that does not save Governments from that charge, and now the Government are charged with favoritism. My hon. friend, the Minister of Railways, has been charged, or it has been insinuated, and it has been more than insinuated in the Globe, with having had a personal and perhaps pecuniary interest in the contract. I do not often read the Globe and do not know exactly the language used with respect to my hon. friend; but there is little doubt that it dares to insinuate that his action, although it was known to his colleagues and had their sanction, and in that action he had thirteen members of the Cabinet behind him, was due to a sinister motive in granting this contract to Mr. Onderdonk. The change that was made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and which we have carried out and will carry out, is this: that as a pledge of good faith the party tendering shall make a deposit of money, not a promise to pay money, but a deposit of money. That was the course taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the proper one; that is the course followed by us and I believe the proper one, that there must be, no matter whether a Vanderbilt or a Rothschild might make a tender, a deposit of money in the hands of the Government as a pledge of good faith. We have given our banks the right to make money, and bills issued by them are money, and, therefore, a cheque marked "good" by a bank is just the same and the Government must hold it to be the same as if bank notes of the Bank of Montreal, in this case, were actually in the hands of the hon. the Minister of Railways. The cheque of Messrs. Macdonald & Charlebois might be good, the cheque of Mr. Vanderbilt would be good or the cheque of Mr. Rothschild would certainly be good, but if those were deposited they were not money; they were the promises of men to pay money, and of men able to pay, but they were not. The cheque of Vanderbilt or the cheque of Roth-child would not have been, under the circumstances of the case in which the advertisement stated that no tender should be received unless there was a cheque marked good, satisfactory, according to the advertisement, than if it was a slip of blank paper. This cheque was marked good for two days only. Then it was cash only for those two days. At the end of those two days it might have been a good cheque. Messrs. Macdonald & Charlebois might have had millions in the Montreal Bank, but after the two days the cheque was no longer marked good. It was not a cheque according to the advertisement, and therefore must have been thrown out. It was thrown out. It would have been improper not to throw it out; it would have been a fraud on the other contractors. That is the position I take. It is one which cannot be controverted. It would not be controverted in any court of justice in the world. I am quite satisfied that if the hon. member for West Durham were sitting in his judicial capacity, he would be obliged to rule that that cheque marked good for two days only was, on the third day, a cheque without that word "good" upon it and therefore must be ruled out altogether. Not a court in the country could decide otherwise; and if any one should I would have very little respect for that court or its knowledge of law or equity. So strong am I of the opinion that it would have been a glaring injustice to accept the cheque, that I declare here that if my hon. friend had accepted it without consulting me and his colleagues, he would have done that which could not have been justified and would deserve the censure of his colleagues. Supposing Messrs. Macdonald & Charlebois had put in a cheque without its being marked good at all, would the hon. gentleman opposite have accepted it? No, he could not, because it was in direct contradiction to the terms of the advertisement. Well, if he could not have accepted a cheque that was not marked at all at the time the tender was opened, he could not have accepted a cheque that was good seven or eight days before, but which, at the time the tender was opened, was simply the cheque of Messrs. Macdonald & Charlebois, as if it were unmarked good—which was simply an order on the Bank of Montreal by that firm to hand over that amount if it was at their credit. That is simply the case. There cannot be a doubt that my hon. friend would have been unwarranted in acting otherwise than he did. If my hon. friend had seen those words, he should have thrown the cheque aside at once without making any enquiry at the bank. The gentlemen ought to have known when they enclosed that cheque what they were enclosing. They ought to have known it was only marked good for two days. It was no part of my hon. friend's business to know if it was good or not. It was their business to see that their cheque was correct in every respect, just as it was their duty to see that every other requirement of their tender should be regular. But my hon. friend sent down that cheque, and what was the answer? The answer was, the banker shook his head. Well, I do not think the hon. gentleman, with his high sense of his own credit, would like any banker to shake his head at any of his cheques. He would consider that an insult, and the person who presented it would, no doubt, also consider it an imputation on my hon. friend's credit. Mr. Drummond shook his head and said he would have to telegraph to find out whether the cheque would be paid or not. Mr. Drummond gave as a reason for not being able to pay it that it was marked good for two days only, and therefore he could not pay it without instructions. Well, he did telegraph. Mr. Bradley had no right to give him a blank telegram. He had no instructions from my hon. friend to ask Mr. Drummond to make that enquiry. He acted on his own suggestion, and I think was very wrong in doing so and deserved to be severely censured by my hon. friend. But what was the answer of the bank? The bank did not say that that cheque was a regular one, but it said it was a bad one, an irregular one.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Read the letter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Allow me to express what I believe and know to be the substance and sense of the answer. The answer was that it was not a good cheque, that it was a cheque good for two days only, that the error was unintentional but to make it good. Well, if it had to be made good in order to bring it within the terms of the advertisement, it was not good until it was so made good. But it was not good on the 1st February when the contracts were opened, and unless it was good under the terms of the advertisement on the day when the tenders were opened, no subsequent credit given by the Bank of Montreal could cure the original sin on the face of that cheque. The very fact that it had to be made good proved that it was not good. Therefore the Government could not accept the tender of Messrs. McDonald & Charlebois, and had to award the contract to Mr. Onderdonk, as being the lowest tenderer. This is not a case of passing over the lowest tenderer. I say that the tender of Messrs. Macdonald & Charlebois had to be thrown out because it was irregular, contrary to the terms of the advertisement, and because if it had not been thrown out it would have been a great injustice to Mr. Onderdonk, who was really the lowest tenderer, and had complied with the terms of the advertisement. The case is too clear to admit of argument. "But," says the hon. member for the West Riding of Durham, "the hon. Minister of Railways takes two lines of argument. In the first place, he says the cheque is bad, and, in the second place, he says these people ought not to have got the contract. In this, he says, there is inconsistency." The first part of the hon. member's argument was that he could not legally and properly, no matter how high might be the character and standing of Messrs. McDonald & Charlebois, have given them the contract. Then he went on to answer the charge that the country had lost some $200,000. He went on to answer that—and I think he satisfied part of this House, and that he will satisfy a part of the country—that we have saved the country from a great loss by that accidental mistake, and that the country will not lose a single farthing. What was the previous conduct of McDonald & Charlebois? Why, if the hon. gentleman has at all followed discussions of this kind in the British Parliament, the idea of a contractor having once committed a fraud, or an impropriety of any kind, big or little, would, by the universal voice of the Commons, be declared sufficient to render him unworthy to receive a Government contract, no matter how advantageous his subsequent offers. Look at the English Hansard; the books are full of cases of parties ruled out for previous improprieties, and declared incapable, under any circumstances, of holding Government contracts again. What did Charlebois & Company do on the previous contract? They went to a young bank—not a very strong bank, but one in good credit—and Charlebois induced the cashier, without the knowledge of the directors, and behind the backs of all the other officers, and when they had no money to their credit, to put in a false cheque and go for how much? About $137,000; and that was sent to the Government and was lodged as an evidence that they were never in good credit and of good means. The moment that was found out, the bank, in great alarm, repudiated altogether the improper act, and said that they were not responsible for it, and rejected it as a fraud. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways would have been justified, after that fact being known, in refusing to allow that man to appear as a contractor for any Government work in any part of the Dominion; but he did not do it, and if Charlebois' cheque had been right he would, under the strongest rule we have laid down, when the money had been paid and accepted, when there was a sufficient evidence of capacity to do the work—I say my hon. friend would have been obliged to give him the contract, and would have done so; but this necessity did not arise, and the character of the tenderers and their previous transactions were well known to the Government. We know he had fiddle-faddled or dallied with a previous contract in the manner described by my hon. friend, and that although he had to perform the work with pressing speed, a short period only having been given to him, that he had performed but $24,000 worth on a contract of $300,000 at the time the contract was taken out of his hands, and after a year and a half had elapsed. So my hon. friend had a right to argue, when the Government was charged with a strict adherence to what was right, and with causing a loss to the country, that we had no security, but had every reason to apprehend that if these people got this contract they would do the work as slowly and slovenly as that of previous contracts—that we should not have this contract fulfilled, that the work would not be done, and that the great aim of the Canadian Government, to build that whole railway from the Pacific to a junction with the Canadian system, within five years, would not be accomplished. We considered it of the utmost importance to the future of Canada and to the immediate prosperity of Canada that that great railway should connect the two seas as soon as possible. We have pressed that work, and have been told we have sacrificed public money in urging the early completion of that road. It is of the greatest importance that there should be no failure in the contract to connect Port Moody with Emory's Bar. We know that Onderdonk was pressing his work with all energy, that he had great capital, and that he could and would perform the work within the time; and we were exceedingly anxious that those portions of the road that brought down the railway from Emory's Bar to the Pacific should be finished within the same time, so that our expectations might be realized. We could have had literally no hopes that Charlebois & Co. could perform the work. Notwithstanding our apprehension with regard to their insufficient security, I am satisfied we should have had to do to those persons, on this contract, what we were obliged to do with reference to the other—take it out of their hands on account of their inability to perform it. And what would have been the consequence? We should have been obliged to finish it either as a direct Government work, or offer it under the most disadvantageous circumstances, and, after an immense loss of time and the disappointing of our expectations of finishing the road in five years, at largely enhanced prices, which would have absorbed, not only the $200,000 complained of in this case, but a great deal more. So my hon. friend was quite right in entering on the line of argument he followed, considering, in the first place, whether we should have saved money by acting differently, or were obliged to give the contract to Onderdonk; and, second, to tell the House that under all these circumstances there would be a pecuniary loss—whether there would have been an avoidance of all delay, and we should have had the road finished in time, and would have avoided all this difficulty, by preferring Onderdonk. A half finished work, when more than half the time had expired, and whatever the ruling prices at the moment, would not have been taken up by the contractors at prices for which they would enter into a work assigned them ab initio. My hon. friend had a right to argue that instead of this action entailing a loss, that action securing an honest, straightforward adherence to the advertisement or undertaking, to finish the road within five years, would occasion but a temporary loss, of the difference between the two tenders, while saving, in the end, two or three times that amount.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I have listened to this discussion and to my hon. friend's speech, and that of the right hon. gentleman with some regret that he has not impressed my mind more strongly in the direction of conviction. I have not felt that it was necessary in this discussion to import into it all the personal acerbities which the hon. the Minister of Railways may find it desirable to cultivate or cherish. I do not know even that the character which the hon. gentleman has seen fit to give the contractors, one of whom is a fellow-citizen of mine, is to be much undervalued, in consideration of the character which he also gave the hon. member for Lambton, who, if the hon. Minister talks truly, is not a respectable man, and does not even stand as well as those contractors, if what he said about them is entirely true. We all know, and the hon. gentleman himself and his friends know, that it was merely in the heat of unfair criticism he made these attacks on the hon. member for Lambton, and the country could perhaps, therefore, have thought it was in the heat of some such criticism he has spoken, as he has done, of the fraudulent intentions and the general bad character—and it has been endorsed by the right hon. gentleman—of the contractors who have been, as it appears to me, defrauded out of their rights. Well, Sir, I do not propose to go over the ground further than to express regret that the right hon. gentleman, with all his vigor, has not been able to satisfy me nor to induce me to feel so much like cheering as he seems to have done with some of his friends, some of whom no doubt acted voluntarily, while others were constrained by the general pressure. For example, this attack on the contractors, what did it mean? If these contractors, who are gentlemen and whose conduct in the department had been such that the hon. the Minister of Railways was justified in considering that they were trying to put a job on him, that they were trying, at any rate, to defraud the Department—if the history of his relations to them had been such that he knew if he gave them the contract he would have to take it off their hands at an immense loss to the country, is it conceivable that he intended to give it to these men at such a detriment to the public interest as the right hon. gentleman has just explained? How could he justify himself? What did he go down to the Bank of Montreal for at all? Why did he go there, if this is not the case? He went to the Bank of Montreal, he went there with the cheque which he appears to have had back in his own Department. I do not know what there was peculiar about it, but he said it did not look right. He called his secretary, and he did not find it looking well. He called his deputy, who could not see anything the matter with it. It made him suspicious of the character of these men, who, he thought, were deceiving him. Then why did he not throw the cheque out altogether? But he went to the Bank of Montreal, according to the statement of the Prime Minister, and made enquiries, and, if the cheque had been good, he would have given the contract to these men; but the cheque was not good. The hon. gentleman admitted, as it has been stated here by my hon. friend, that he thought it was not good, but he found it was good. If the cheque was perfectly good, the right hon. gentleman has made an argument that you must have the actual cash, that you cannot take a cheque even of Vanderbilt's, but if his cheque was not good, perhaps the acceptance of the Bank of Montreal would not be a legal tender either—but the hon. gentleman went there with the intention of accepting this cheque, and awarding this contract to the lowest tenderers, if he found the cheque was good. His secretary, the right hon. gentleman rather suggested, ought to be dismissed because he went further than he was told, and had not paid any attention to the answer Mr. Drummond had given by telegraph. He found the cheque was not good, he found Mr. Drummond did not know it was not good, and he went to the officer in the bank who knew nothing about the transaction, but he found the officer ready to ascertain whether the cheque was good, and the officer did ascertain it was good. If this cheque was good and binding on the bank of Montreal, what rights of Onderdonk were sacrificed? Because there happened to be a stamp on the cheque which the hon. gentleman could not read; because, while the hon. gentleman through all this examination in his Department, found this cheque was suspicious; and because his faith in the contractors, which was not strong before, was thereby weakened, because the imprint upon the cheque was one which he himself could not read, which his deputy could not read, and which nobody could read; and, therefore, even if that had not been suggested to him, if they had got under the impression that there was something of that kind wrong, surely the hon. gentleman could have found it convenient to give Onderdonk the contract if he wanted to do it. The right hon. gentleman, I think, stated the case fairly. He says he wanted this excellent man, with his great executive ability and his great experience, he wanted him to have the contract, and if Mr. Drummond had given this cheque as only good for two days, it seems to me it would have been easy enough to throw these contractors out without this attempt to blacken their character. It appears to me—I say it under correction—but since he had determined to give these men the contract, since his own pretension was that the cheque was not good, it was not necessary for him to stand up here, the Premier endorsing him, and blacken the reputation of these men and ruin them, as he has done, if the country has any confidence in the position he has taken. I do not understand how the hon. gentleman can justify himself to this country in stating that he intended to give this contract over to men whom he knew to have had fraudulent relations with the Department, and whom he believed, if he gave them the contract, would entail a loss on the country. I do not see how he can justify that position which he says himself he would have taken. But having placed himself in that position, having grounded himself entirely on the flaws in the cheque, I cannot see how he can endeavor to destroy the character of these two contractors. Of course the country is prosperous, we have four millions of money to the good; and if the country is anxious to pay the high prices for its public works which the hon. gentleman feels that we can afford to pay; if hon. gentleman opposite, with the flimsy explanation we have heard with regard to this matter, can justify themselves in voting that we ought to pay $200,000 more than the contract was worth, why that is their business, I have nothing to do with it; but as the question presents itself to me, the country has to pay over $200,000 for this contract more than there is any necessity of paying.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Before the question is put I would like to say a few words on the subject. It hardly needed, I think, the remarks of the hon. Minister of the Interior to satisfy every man who listened to the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways that the granting of this contract to Mr. Andrew Onderdonk was a foregone conclusion from the first, and that if this flimsy pretext had not been found to defraud the country of $200,000 for the benefit of Mr. Andrew Onderdonk, some other equally flimsy pretext would have presented itself to the fertile imagination of the Minister of Railways or the equally fertile imagination of his worthy coadjutor and chief. Sir, the Minister of the Interior may have been right in saying that my hon. friend's tone was as mild and as quiet as his argument was strong. In the case of himself and the Minister of Railways, the absolute reverse is true; their tones were as loud as their arguments were weak. Sir, is there any man in this House who has listened to these speeches who believes for one moment that if the case had been reversed, if a cheque which was presented and thrown out because of an alleged illegal stamp, had been presented by A. Onderdonk, that the Minister would have been so ready to enquire into it that he would have needed to send for a magnifying glass or a microscope to distinguish what he himself admits was an illegible inscription which cost Canada $209,000, or which, I fear, is to cost Canada $209,000, if I am to judge from the tone and temper manifested, before my hon. friend had well got through reading his motion, by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Sir, the defence of these two gentlemen is singularly inconsistent. The hon. Minister of Railways hardly attempted to deal with the legal aspect of the question. He confined himself with his accustomed skill in vituperation to a most abusive attack on my hon. friend from Lambton, on the member for West Durham, and on those contractors whom he might as well have spared, and finally on Mr. Gordon Brown. Well, Sir, as regards Mr. Gordon Brown, all I can say is this, that I think that everybody who knows that gentleman will say that he is able to treat with perfect contempt the attacks made upon him, I must say, in a cowardly and disgraceful fashion by the hon. Minister of Railways; and to Mr. Gordon Brown's tender mercies, I leave that hon. gentleman and his attacks. But as regards the questions which are before us as regards this allegation, so well disposed of by my hon. friend, that this cheque was not good—because that is the question at issue—neither the hon. the Minister of Railways nor the hon. the Minister of the Interior have been able to advance a single argument. They have been able to show that there has been a technical irregularity in the stamping it in an illegible manner. The hon. the Minister of the Interior did not attempt to contradict the position of my hon. friend who usually sits beside me (Mr. Blake), that the cheque was perfectly good so long as there were funds in the Bank of Montreal. That point was not attempted to be contradicted, and it is the vital point. What is the use of our taking tenders at all? What is the use of applying for tenders, if when substantial evidence is given, as in the present case, of the good faith of the parties, on so flimsy a pretext as this their tenders are to be disregarded and that at great loss and cost to the people of Canada, and if a man who is not the lowest tenderer, who is not within $200,000 of being the lowest tenderer, is to have the contract, because the hon. Minister of Railways is determined from the first that he should. I call the attention of the House to the fact that whether the charge of the Minister of Railways against the firm of Macdonald & Charlebois be true or false, it applies only to Mr. Charlebois, and not to Mr. Macdonald or his character or standing. I did not understand him to be impeached in any respect—and I say that so far as that firm is concerned, there does not appear to have been any ground for the charge made by the hon. gentleman. As for the other position which he took, that Mr. Onderdonk had facilities, that he was the best man, that it was in the public interest that he should get the contract; why, Sir, did not the hon. gentleman state that in his report to Council? Why, Sir, did not he take the honest and straightforward course? Why did he not say that he was convinced that this was not a case for using the ordinary form of competing by tenders, and that he and the Government took the responsibility of assigning the contract to Mr. Onderdonk in an open straightforward fashion? They could have done that if they had liked; I suppose they might, if they had so chosen have passed a special Act through Parliament this Session to give it to him, and that would have been an honorable and straightforward course, if they thought that the public interests really required it. But this is a piece of pettifoggery—a paltry and dishonest attempt to evade the manifest meaning and spirit of the Act introduced by my hon. friend from Lambton, and as my hon. friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake) rightly said, introduced by him for the express purpose of protecting the public, to see that a fair deposit of money was made, and that that was supplemented afterwards by a still more substantial deposit to protect the public. Now, these facts are present in this case. There is no gainsaying the fact, in the teeth of the evidence to us, that the $20,000 would have been paid; there has been no attempt to gainsay the fact on the part of the hon. Minister of Railways, that the $113,000 which were expected to follow would also be made good. What loss, what risk of loss, would there have been if the sum of $113,000 were put up? and unless that sum were put up, then the hon. Minister would have been perfectly in his right, perfectly at liberty to have discarded Macdonald & Charlebois, and given the contract to the man he desired, Mr. Andrew Onderdonk. But he could not do that; he could not consent to adopt the straightforward course in the matter; he must, forsooth, although he was well convinced long before the matter came to Council, that the money would be forthcoming,—although he saw clearly that the error, if error it was, was not an error on the part of the contractors—he must avail himself of this purely technical plea to put the whole country to loss, and open the door, I will venture to say, to far more serious frauds in the matter of contract-letting than any he assumed to guard against by this extreme and forced construction which he puts on the phrase of the statute which he referred to. The hon. gentleman talked of his blackening the character of my hon. friend beside me. Sir, my hon. friend can afford to smile at attacks from him or any other hon. gentleman on that side. Let them look to their own characters. As the London Times remarked of their chief, their's are characters and reputations which require the very tenderest handling; and I venture to say that a whole wilderness of Ministers of Railways might exhaust their efforts at vituperation for the disparagement of my hon. friend without causing one honest or intelligent man from one end of the Dominion to the other to think one whit less of Alexander Mackenzie or one whit more of the hon. Minister of Railways. The hon. gentleman talks of his generosity. He talks of the generosity he was going to show my hon. friend. Well, we have had an example of it. He was scarcely warm in his seat before he issued a Commission charged with the duty of raking up every possible charge, of making every possible investigation and enquiry into the conduct of my hon. friend. Where is the evidence of that Commission to-day, and why is it not brought down? We know why. We have seen enough of it in the public prints to know it and to know why it is not brought down. The reason was that the Commissioners who stood in judgment on my hon. friend were forced, much against their will, by the evidence submitted to them, to bring forth evidence in the highest degree detrimental to the position and character of the hon. the Minister of Railways, and if the hon. gentleman were not so audacious as he is, I do not think he would have dared to make the faintest reflection against the character of my hon. friend, as the hon. gentleman will find to his cost before the session closes if the report is brought down. Sir, as was well said, if the hon. gentleman really thought that this was not a proper cheque, why was it that he sent his Secretary to inquire of the bank if it was good; or, when within two hours he had intelligence that it was good, why did he not take steps to save this money to the people of Canada? Is $200,000 so small a sum in his eyes that no effort or exertion is to be made for the purpose of retaining it for the people of Canada? Why, one of his colleagues made a boast the other day that he was going to give $150,000 to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, and that gift was heralded from one end of Canada to the other as an unparalleled instance of the care with which the hard-working toilers of the sea were treated by the present Government. But while after long years they find it difficult to make a gift of $150,000 to the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, they can, for the sake of a special favorite of the Minister of Railways, at once, without qualm, or scruple, or hesitation, throw away the sum of $200,000. I should like to know what possible answer Mr. Drummond could have given to the enquiry of the Minister except to enquire at the head office? The hon. gentleman does not pretend to say that the cheque was made payable at the branch office; the cheque itself shows that it was payable at the head office of the Bank of Montreal. What else could Mr. Drummond do when he saw the cheque, but say that he would enquire at the head office whether the cheque was good or not? Sir, I do not pretend to say that this is the worst transaction in which the hon. gentleman has ever been engaged. I think possibly my hon. friend did speak a little rashly on that point; I fear much that there are worse—many much worse transactions behind; and although the hon. gentleman, strong in his brute majority, may vote down the motion of my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. There is another tribunal before which this case will be tried, and I for one think that not all the bluster of the Minister of Railways, not all the special pleadings and ingenious sophistry of the Minister of the Interior, will succeed in convincing the people of Canada that it is just or wise or prudent or constitutional to throw away $209,000 of the people's money, because the hon. Minister of Railways has a pet contractor whom he desires to favor at the people's cost.

Fortin,	Merner,

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have no intention to-night of replying to the very extraordinary speech of the hon. Minister of Railways; that I will take another opportunity of doing. I rise, however, for the purpose of correcting one mistake into which the hon. gentleman has fallen. He accused me of only giving him a few hours' notice of the motion, and declared with his usual recklessness that they invariably gave the late Administration notice of intended motions. Now, Sir, so far as I can recollect at this moment, I never received notice of any motion of the kind. I can remember several motions made without notice—one by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Bowell) on the purchase of steel rails, without the slightest notice of any sort; another, I think, by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDonald).

Mr. BOWELL. I gave you notice of another.
Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Mr. BOWELL. I beg your pardon; I gave you notice of the motion in reference to the Speaker.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is of no consequence, and it was not on going into Supply.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; I know it was.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, I have no recollection of it. There was another motion made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) without any notice whatever; and I am satisfied that I could find many others. Now, I gave the Prime Minister notice on Friday last of my intention to move an amendment to the motion to go into Supply; he did not ask me what the motion was, or I would have told him; but he asked me last night and I told him, and to-day, fearing the Minister of Railways should not know, I informed him in the Railway Committee room. That notice I knew was amply sufficient; he had nothing to look up; he had the papers before him, as I had. There was nothing intended to be discussed by me, nor did I discuss anything but the one point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will thank the hon. member for Lambton, when he undertakes to repeat a statement of mine, to repeat it accurately, which he has not done. What I said I repeat, that when I had occasion to challenge the hon. gentleman's conduct as a Minister, I gave him ample notice from my place in the House, and that was the motion in reference to the Pacific Railway; and I said that under the circumstances I was entitled to a little more courtesy at the hon. gentleman's hands than to be informed of his intended motion at half-past ten in the morning, when the hon. gentleman knew that it was impossible for me to leave the Railway Committee or my other duties to consider his motion; and I repeat that it was not the courtesy due to me from his hands, in view of the courtesy I have extended to him. He has not cited a case of any motion I made of which I did not give him notice.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have had no opportunity of looking up cases, but I mentioned several cases in which no notice was given. The hon. gentleman holds gentlemen on this side of the House responsible for the newspapers in the country, but he declines to be held responsible even for his own colleagues, and he knows that the leader of the Government received notice on Friday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman told me on Friday that when we were going into Supply, he was going to move; but he did not tell me what. Last night, after the House adjourned, I met the hon. gentleman in the corridor, and I asked him what he was going to move. He said he was going to move on one of the contracts, and I wrote a note to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, informing him of the motion.

SUPPLY.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

1. Charges of Management..... $169,834 01

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. This will be a proper occasion for the hon. Minister of Finance to inform the House of the nature of the arrangements which he has made with Messrs. Baring and Glyn, with respect to the payment of interest and commission, and also of the functions which Sir Alexander Galt is henceforth to discharge. As well as I remember, when Sir Alexander Galt was appointed Commissioner, it was stated in the Minute appointing him that part of his duties would be to discharge a large portion of the duties which had formerly been discharged by the Financial Agents. I understand now that there has been a complete alteration—that practically, Sir Alexander Galt will have no financial duties to discharge, and that the whole matter is to be placed in the hands of the agents for a period of something like ten years irrevocably. That is a matter on which it would be well for the hon. Minister of Finance to give the Committee some explanations.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I must say that I am a little surprised at the hon. member asking for information on this subject, because I thought the papers laid before the House gave very complete information with reference to that agreement. I may first be permitted to state that the first item of \$109 is an addition to the salary of the clerks in the office of the Assistant Receiver-General at Toronto; the next increase of \$300 is for additions to salaries in the office at Halifax. In Winnipeg the work has increased so rapidly and has reached such a volume that during the last six months the Government have been compelled to send an assistant from the Department at Ottawa, temporarily, in order that we may ascertain after the completion of the contracts for the building of the railway, whether an additional officer will be required permanently. But now it is pretty clear that an additional officer will be required, and in order to retain the services of the junior clerk at \$500, a considerable increase will be necessary, making the increase of the Department \$17,000. At Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, it is proposed to increase one salary by \$100 and appoint an additional officer; besides, the increase in savings bank deposits has progressed so rapidly as to render it impossible to keep up the work, and an additional officer will be appointed there after 1st July. With respect to country savings banks. In New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and British Columbia, it will be remembered that the officers are paid from \$200 to \$400, according to the amount of business they do, and as the amount of deposits has largely increased, no less than \$4,000,000 a year, these officers will be entitled to receive additional payment for the increased business. There are applications from various officers involving an increase of \$1,300. We will redeem, during the year, \$2,632,000 debentured debt of Prince Edward Island, bearing 6 per cent. interest, and save \$25,228.80. We next come to commission on payments of \$5,984,059 interest on debt, showing a saving of \$28,079. This brings me to the point referred to by the hon. member for Centre Huron. It is quite true that when Sir Alexander Galt was sent to London as High Commissioner, it was proposed to establish a financial agency, of which he should be the head. But a question subsequently arose as to the nature of the contract made by the Finance Minister of old Canada, and Finance Ministers since the Union, with respect to the floating of the bonds. On the face of the bonds it is stated that they are to be paid at the offices of Baring Bros. and Glyn, Mills & Co. when they fall due, and that the interest was to be paid by the same agents. It was alleged by the agents that this was a contract legally binding, and could only be broken with their consent or by arriving at a compromise. Considerable discussion took place by representatives of the Government in London, and it led subsequently to the proposal laid on the Table of the House, and its acceptance by the Government, by which those firms are to discharge certain duties for the Government for ten years from the 1st of January last, at the rate of $\frac{1}{2}$ instead of 1 per cent., for the payment of the coupons, by which next year a saving will be effected of \$28,079. I can give no further information than the copy of the agreement entered into, the proposal made by Glyn, Mills & Co., and the acceptance by the Government which has been laid on the Table. That contract provides that as regards \$35,000,000, that may be redeemed by the Government in 1885—and it has been decided by the Government to do so—bearing 5 per cent. interest, the agents have undertaken to substitute other debentures of the Dominion bearing 4 per cent. for the redemption of those, or in exchange for them, for a charge of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., whereas, under the original contract, if they redeemed the debentures and floated a new loan for that amount, 1 per cent. would be charged for redemption, and 1 per cent. for floating a new loan. But, supposing a new loan were floated, there would be a saving of 1 per cent.; it would amount of \$35,000,000, to \$35,000. That of course, does not come into next year's engagements, but we will find the benefit of it next year by the reduction of the rate of interest $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the 5 and 6 per cent. loans. There are \$5,000 additional entered by the Deputy Minister of Finance on stamps, postage and telegrams. We are about to strike off a \$4 note, and the preparation of the plate and issue of the new currency will add to the expenditure of the present year, and will probably increase very considerably the circulation of Dominion notes. The result of the operations of next year as compared with the present, as regards charges of management, will be a saving of \$45,000, which I think, will be highly satisfactory to the Committee. I may state to the hon. member for Centre Huron, that it is not now proposed to place the High Commissioner in charge of the payment of interest on coupons, or any financial work, except such as may be thrown upon him in obtaining silver coin, and various services of that kind, but not with respect to payment of interest of coupons or the floating of debentures.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I observe under this head an item including four extra clerks in connection with the issue and redemption of Dominion notes. I think the hon. Minister of Finance should make a charge of four extra clerks under the head of Civil Government.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. My hon. friend is mistaken. This is simply continuing the four extra clerks who are employed in the signing of notes, and they are chargeable under this head. They may be increased or decreased, according to the number of notes to be attended to.

Mr. ANGLIN. It is gratifying to know we are able to save $45,000 in the management of our large loan; but that gratification is considerably modified when we reflect that under this arrangement the plan proposed by the late hon. Finance Minister, and apparently adopted by the present Finance Minister and his colleagues, of establishing an agency of our own in London, through which we would hereafter pay interest, negotiate new loans and transact all the business transacted through Financial Agents, is altogether set aside. It was supposed that the High Commissioner should act as the head of that establishment while acting also in other capacities; and one of the reasons given for his appointment was that some such arrangement would be effected. All that has been abandoned without any reason being given, and now we are asked to congratulate ourselves on the fact that a new arrangement has been effected by which we will not pay as much in the way of commissions as formerly. The London agents, in this correspondence, claim they had a legal right to the old rates of commission, and pretended, in abandoning that right, they are making a very remarkable concession to our wishes. I cannot see from the correspondence why this arrangement could not have been effected quite as well without the intervention of the High Commissioner, and I cannot see why, because this arrangement has been made, we are to conclude that the appointment of this High Commissioner, at a large salary and heavy expenses attached to his office, was, in fact, an economy. Another point in this case is that charges of the gravest possible character have been repeatedly made in this House against those Financial Agents, by the hon. Minister of Railways in particular and some of his colleagues. They have been charged almost expressly, certainly by the strongest possible implication, with having abused their position for the purpose of plundering the people of this Dominion of millions of dollars. Even during the present Session it has been asserted that these Agents, in concurrence with the late Finance Minister—

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. And the present Finance Minister.

Mr. ANGLIN. And the present Finance Minister—because if there is the slightest suspicion in the one case the same suspicion must inevitably attach to the other operation—but the charge was repeatedly made, that these transactions were not merely of a suspicious character, but bore on the surface indubitably the evidence of the fact that the Financial Agents abused their position, and, with the concurrence of the late Finance Minister, placed that loan in such a way that they were enabled to realize enormous profits. We were told repeatedly that the fact of the names of those to whom portions of the loan were allotted not having been given was prima facie evidence of the dishonesty of the transaction, although it is well known Finance Ministers have always refused to give those names. We were always told it was contrary to sound policy to disclose the names of persons to whom sums were allotted on these occasions. The present hon. Finance Minister has never laid before this House a list of the names of persons to whom loans were allotted. This omission on the part of the late Finance Minister was given as indubitable evidence of dishonesty, yet we find that the Government has entered into an arrangement which will give to those agents, whom they charged with dishonesty, the management of our financial affairs in London for a period of ten years. I never thought there was the slightest ground for the charges made against those gentlemen, but, under the circumstances, I think we are entitled to an explanation of the reason why an agency of our own has not been established in London and an economy effected greater than that effected under the new arrangement.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The summer before last the Deputy Finance Minister was in London and made full enquiries, with Sir Alexander Galt, into the advisability of establishing a financial agency of our own in London. On his return he reported to me that the expense would be much larger than was at first contemplated. In view of this additional expense the Government considered it advisable to accept the subsequent proposition of their agents, which will enable us to save a very large sum annually. These are the reasons why they were accepted, and it was found that there was a staff sufficient to perform the work and all things necessary in connection with the transfer of those debentures and registered stock and all payments of interest—a larger and more expensive staff than was contemplated at the time Sir Alexander Galt took the position as High Commissioner.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It is very satisfactory to find that in spite of the charge very foolishly made by the Minister of Railways, the present Government have such unbounded confidence in the Messrs. Baring & Glyn that they are willing to put our affairs in their hands for eleven years positively; because this memorandum of the agreement is for ten years, and hereafter one year's notice. I do not think the saving is going to be as large as the Minister stated. We save, it is true, about $32,000 all told, in one way; but I see it requires $5,000 additional for the expenditure in connection with the management of the debt, which reduces it to something like $27,000. Then against that we have the expense of our High Commissioner, whose salary is $10,000, and contingent expenses, $4,000; and, if my memory serves me, there is probably $5,000 or $6,000 for other expenses, making in all about $20,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I shall have the papers to-morrow, showing all the sums paid him since 1878.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Then perhaps one or two of those items had better stand over.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I see no reason for that.

Mr. ANGLIN.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Considering the various expenses of the High Commissioner the reduction of the expenses spoken of does not amount to very much after all. I would like to know whether Sir Alexander Galt negotiated those $35,000,000, and his report to the Minister; because I find no such statement in this return, that he had agreed to pay 1 per cent. redemption money on that loan. Of course I have no access to the papers in the Finance Department, but my recollection is that the point was not at all clear. I will not say they may not have had some claim, but I do not think they had anything like the same distinct settled claim that they had in the case of the loans negotiated by New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Is the Minister prepared to lay before us any statement from his Department, or any made by Sir Alexander Galt, showing we were bound to pay that 1 per cent.? I would like to know on what ground they insist on that payment, which is an exceedingly large one; and although it was justifiable in the case of loans made by the smaller Provinces, I do not know whether, without an express agreement, it would be held justifiable in the case of Canada.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not desire to enter into a discussion of their legal claim, but the correspondence of the last year or two shows very clearly that that was part of the agreement between them and Sir Alexander Galt and Canada.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. We have not got it here.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; but it appears in letters that passed between them and the Department eighteen months ago.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Were they ever produced?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not know.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. We ought to have them. Did Sir Alexander Galt himself declare that that was the understanding?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That was the understanding between the Finance Minister, Sir Alexander Galt, who floated that loan, and the agents in London.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The point I make is this: I only ask for information, and shall be quite satisfied if the hon. Finance Minister will refresh his recollection and state if Sir Alexander Galt made the assertion in question. My own recollection is not so fresh as the hon. Minister's is, that on this point there was very great doubt indeed, and that this loan was not negotiated upon the same terms at all as the loans of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. That is a point of considerable moment, as to the goodness or badness of the terms named, and the House ought to have very full information. I should like to know if the hon. gentleman will bring down portions of the correspondence with reference to this charge?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I would like the portion respecting Sir Alexander Galt's understanding with the hon. Finance Minister.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If it has not been laid on the Table—my impression is that it has been—I will submit it without any motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My ear caught a remark from the hon. member from Gloucester, when leaving the House, and as I returned, it caught a similar remark from the hon. member for Centre Huron, about some grave charge of mine touching the financial interests of Messrs. Glyn, Mills & Co. and Messrs. Baring. I would be extremely obliged if the hon. gentlemen would point out any occasion on which I ever made any charge against one or other of these eminent firms, as I am not aware of it. When the hon. gentlemen will show me from the records that their memory is not at fault, I would be prepared to deal with the question. Until then, the hon. gentlemen may find it convenient to shelter themselves under a mere imputation.

Mr. ANGLIN. In the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways on the Budget, he distinctly charged the late hon. Minister of Finance with having mismanaged the negotiation of a loan in London, with having put it in the market at a fixed rate instead of for open competition, and he has stated that the Financial Agents at that time took up a large portion of that loan and derived an enormous profit from it. What portion they did take up actually was not definitely stated, but he certainly did more than insinuate, he almost directly charged, that the agents misled the hon. Minister of Finance on that occasion and took advantage of his simplicity or his incapacity—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. ANGLIN. To induce him to put a loan in the market in that way, and that they profited directly and largely by the course they advised him then to take. I think if the hon. gentleman's language is quoted it will be found to carry out very fully that idea.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman wants to know what ground we have for alleging that we reflected, by imputation, at least, on Messrs. Baring & Glyn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say anything about them.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It is perfectly well known in the city of London that Messrs. Baring & Glyn were responsible for every step that was taken; every bond that ever was issued passed directly through their hands, and if there was any malpractice of the smallest kind it could only have been done with the direct collusion of those gentlemen. The hon. gentleman talks about the possessors of the former bonds that he took across the Atlantic and disposed of to his friends. He says:

"That the men to whom he gave the $4,000,000 worth of debentures are, at this moment, the happy possessors of $2,920,000 more than they paid him for the bonds."

Well, if these were sold at a fair price in the open market there can be no question but that the men who bought them, and who are not the present holders, as the hon. gentleman well knows, unless the parties who originally took them have long since disposed of them; but if those men made any undue profit it was due to connivance of the present agents. These gentlemen, as a matter of course, conducted the whole negotiations. I do not know one single man to whom the Messrs. Baring in the first instance distributed the loans. The whole placing of them, the whole letting of them, was in the hands of the Barings and the Glyns, and if any favoritism was shown it was done by those gentlemen and not by me. It was for that reason the hon. member for Gloucester very properly enquired of the Minister of Finance whether he shared the extraordinary views of the Minister of Railways as to the character of these gentlemen; because if they are guilty of such connivance they are the last men in the world to have control of our finances for a fixed period of eleven years. If the hon. Minister himself stated that he made no imputation on these gentlemen, that he never meant to insinuate there was ever any impropriety, then it simply remains that in making an assault upon me he talked in glorious ignorance of what transpired in London.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentlemen have made a statement that I had seriously attacked the character and standing of Messrs. Glyn, Mills & Co., and the Messrs. Baring, Financial Agents of the Government of Canada. They are challenged to produce the record. They cannot produce a word, nor anything that bears the slightest relation to it. The hon. gentleman must know that these London financiers are the servants, not the masters of this Government; they are the agents, not the masters of the Minister of Finance of Canada; and when the Minister of Finance is in London he is the master and they are his agents to carry out his instructions. He is not here as their deputy, but he is there to direct as the Minister of Canada, and if they offer him their advice he is himself to judge of the soundness of their advice. The hon. gentleman can never shelter himself for one moment under the respected and respectable garb of Messrs. Glyn, Mills & Co., or the Messrs. Baring, who, when he was in London, were his agents to carry out his directions. Now, the hon. gentleman says that this money all went through their hands. Suppose it did, it does not touch the case. My charge is that the hon. gentleman went into the money market of the world and put that loan on the market in a different mode than any Minister of Finance of Canada has ever done before.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Sir Alexander Galt did it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Never. He never put a loan on the market for the Dominion of Canada since Confederation. I do not mean to say there might not be such a condition of things as to make such a step possible, but from the first day of the Dominion no Minister of Finance has ever undertaken to fix the time for which a loan was to run, to fix the interest and to make it impossible to have any competition so that the country would have a chance to get all the debentures were worth. My charge was that the hon. gentleman declared in his prospectus that instead of persons who tendered for this loan were to do so on the terms which he offered, receiving in pro rata according to the amount they tendered for, he provided, and so stated in his prospectus, that parties to whom nothing was allotted would have their money returned that they had sent in. So the hon. gentleman not only fixed the price far below what the bonds of Canada were selling for in the market at the time; he fixed it at a ruinously low rate, and he put it in the position that he himself could choose who were to be the beneficiaries, who were the parties to receive that loan; it placed him in a position so to deal with the parties who took that loan that they were nearly $5,000,000 richer than they would have been if they had never seen that hon. gentleman, and had never taken that loan. That was the position. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says it will be impossible for any such thing to be done without the connivance of the Glyn & Mills Co. He must suppose that he is talking to children instead of men who understand business. Why, Sir, there was nothing to prevent him going to A, B or C, and saying "I am going to put a loan on the market, and I am going to fix the price at 90 for 100 pounds sterling, debentures of Canada. You have just to go in for a certain amount, say a million of that, and you will net a good thing." Was there anything to prevent that? Was there anything to prevent him, if not to do it directly, to do it through half-a-dozen persons, and thus make it utterly impossible to bring a charge directly home to him. When he fixed the loan, and provided now it should be allotted he was master of the position, and was in communication with the Financial Agents of London. Suppose they did take a certain amount of the loan, they had a right to subscribe at the rate fixed by the authority of the Government of Canada. They had a right to take as much as they could obtain. I say that under these circumstances the hon. gentleman stands in the position of being responsible for putting the loan on the market in that way, and of putting it in the power of the parties who were the happy recipients of the loan to make an enormous sum of money at the cost of the people of Canada, because he did not allow that fair and open competition which my hon. friend the Finance Minister allowed when he negotiated loans in that market, and all of the Finance Ministers since the Government of the Dominion was formed. The hon. gentleman cannot shelter himself in any way whatever. There is the fact that he adopted this extraordinary mode, and the additional fact that when he was asked to inform us who were the happy recipients of this amount he refused to tell us, but we now know that the parties who had the good fortune to receive this amount are, as I stated, $5,000,000 richer to-day than they would have been if they had never seen the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I did not think that the hon. gentleman would, in cool blood, repeat the extremely silly statement he made the other evening in heated debate. It is quite clear that if these people got $5,000,000 out of me, they got $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 out of the hon. gentleman who sits beside him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I never said anything of the kind.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. That is as clear as daylight. If there was a difference of 15 per cent. in the loan which I negotiated a few years ago, there was a difference of at least 10 or 11 per cent. in the loan which the present Finance Minister negotiated.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I took the highest bid that I could get.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I say it is clear that if the people who took up my loan got $5,000,000, several millions of dollars were put in the pockets of the hon. gentleman's beneficiaries and friends. The hon. Minister of Railways knows two or three things which he does not choose to include in the statement he has made. In the first place he knows that there was no loan negotiated on the credit of Canada since Canada became a Confederation until the loan of 1874 negotiated by me. The only attempt at it was the small sum of £500,000, which was included by Sir John Rose in a larger loan of £2,000,000, three-quarters of which was guaranteed. That was not a loan on the credit of Canada, but a mixed loan. The parties who took the one were obliged to take the other. The loan negotiated by the hon. Minister of Railways was guaranteed by the Imperial Government. It was a 4 per cent. guaranteed loan. I remember quite distinctly that when Sir John Rose was asked to bring down the names of the parties to whom he allotted the loan of 1868 or 1869, he refused to give that information. He refused to give it because it was contrary to the custom of the city of London, and would impede them from other transactions; and I have always myself thought that this was an unnecessary restriction, but it was a habit or custom, and we were not in the habit of flying against it. As to the profits of the loan of 1874, if the hon. gentleman knew anything of the affairs of the Stock Exchange of which he prates so lustily, if he took the trouble to look at the Economist for 1874 or 1875, he would see that all through the two succeeding years that loan was selling on the London market at 2 per cent. lower than the price at which I placed it. He will find this by the Economist or any other decent authority of the Stock Exchange which he likes to consult. He will find that it sold at retail at a considerably lower price than I placed it, and that is a proof that when acting with the fullest concurrence of the Baring's I fixed the standard at 90. I got the highest price that could be obtained, or safely asked for a new loan. I tell him more, that we were obliged to go to the Bank of Montreal and Baring and Glyn to take one and a-half millions sterling in order to make up that loan, and without their aid it could not have been floated. Those were the facts stated in this House and proven over and over again, and they were perfectly well known to the hon. gentleman. And yet, knowing as he did right well that that loan was positively sold at a loss by the men who originally took it—by most of them at least—though it is possible that such strong houses as the Barings and Glyn's, who were able to hold it for years, may have made something out of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has based his whole statement on two palpable fallacies. In the first place he assumes that I said what I never said—that the beneficiaries of his loan made nearly $5,000,000 out of it. No such statement has ever been made by me. What I did say I repeat: that if the happy recipients of his loan had held the debentures until to-day they would be $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 richer than they would have been if they had never seen the hon. gentleman. I have never said for a moment that it was not the rising credit of the country that has made the great increase in the value of that loan. But I do say that when the hon. gentleman sold the debentures of Canada at a rate at which they had never been sold before—

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. By the Minister who made the loans.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am now speaking of the Dominion of Canada. Sir John Rose was sent to London to put a loan on the market. He did not put on a fixed price. He put it on the open market and asked parties to compete for it. I say that the hon. gentleman beside me, Sir Leonard Tilley, adopted the same policy. The late Finance Minister has endeavored on more than one occasion to shelter himself under the wing of Sir Francis Hincks. When he was brought into the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald, he was considered by hon. gentlemen opposite a resuscitated mummy. That was the opinion they had of him. But when they found that when in the position of a bank president, and to a certain extent in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, they could extract some little compliment from Sir Francis Hincks, he all at once became an illustrious financial authority. This old resuscitated mummy was revived and became a great authority; but I have Sir Francis Hincks' authority in black and white for saying that the hon. gentleman did wrong in putting his loan on the market at a fixed price. I have his letter saying that he should have put the loan on the market with a sealed minimum, and allowed parties to bid as much higher as they could. So that the hon. gentleman has that prop swept from under him. Now, Sir, what is the other fallacy? It is that if these parties made all this money a large portion was sacrificed by my hon. friend. No money was sacrificed by him. Had the hon. gentleman done what Sir John Rose did and what the present Finance Minister did, had he given the people of Canada fair play by putting the loans on the market in any mode that would have given public competition, no man would have said a word or have wanted to know who got the loan, because everyone would have known that Canada received the highest price her debentures were worth. But the hon. gentleman did not do that; the hon. gentleman did that which gave the opportunity for the money to be placed in the power of a dishonest man, if a dishonest man dealt with it. I believe, as much as I believe my own existence, that fortunes were made by men who took the loans from the hon. gentleman on those terms; I believe those fortunes were made at the expense of Canada, because if the hon. gentleman had done otherwise, the people would have got all the money they wanted, and he would have been saved from the suspicion that exists, not only in this House, but throughout the whole country, that he forgot the high position he occupied, and that he abused the high position he occupied, and made Canada suffer by the course he took; and, I tell the hon. gentleman, that he may raise these false issues, and put words in my mouth that I never used, that these $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 were taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada; I never said so, but I said that there were large margins between the amounts that Canada would have received had her debentures received fair play, and the amount they did receive by the foul play used by the hon. Minister.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The words used by the hon. gentleman were these:

"He cannot be impervious to the fact that the men who received these bonds are $600,000 richer than they were before."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say so now.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. He does say that $5,000,000 were taken out of the people of Canada. The fact of the matter is that money is 30 per cent. cheaper to-day than it was in 1874, and therefore those four per cent. bonds are worth 14 or 15 per cent. more than they were. But I repeat that with the exception of two or three strong holders, every man who touched the hon. gentleman's issue of £4,000,000 sterling lost money by it, and that the returns of the Economist newspaper show that the price obtained ruled largely below the price I got. Messrs. Barings and Glyn were no doubt directly responsible, as the agents of the Government of Canada, for the advice they gave; that every step was taken by their advice, and with their concurrence; they were very strong on the necessity of fixing their price, and they were right, because when I was placing a security for the first time on the London market, it was no time to run counter to the prejudices of the Stock Exchange. The hon. gentleman is quite safe in saying that no Finance Minister of Canada ever floated an independent loan save at 4 per cent., because no Finance Minister floated a loan before, and but for my success in floating these loans, the hon. Finance Minister would have found it more difficult to float his loans afterwards. But Sir John Rose and Sir Francis Hincks floated loans at fixed prices; the loans of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which that hon. gentleman himself conducted, were made at a fixed price. As to Sir Francis Hincks, when the hon. gentleman produces a letter from him, I will believe that Sir Francis Hincks used that language and not before, and I have good reason for what I say.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I will say that Sir Francis Hincks told me, without any solicitation on my part, that he considered the loan an admirable operation. The hon. gentleman said that he imputed no evil on the part of the agents; but though he did not do so directly, his remarks implied as much. I can respect a man who makes a direct charge, but I have no respect for a man who insinuates a base calumny against his neighbor.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. Minister of Railways is in the habit of making strong statements without really understanding what he does say. In his last speech he more than insinuated that an opinion was extorted from Sir Francis Hincks by improper means, and used by the late Government. Now, I do not think that Sir Francis Hincks, while he was a member of the Government of which that hon. gentleman was a member, deserved any such censure at his hands; I believe his conduct in this House was always honorable, and that we have no right to accuse him of making a statement which he did not mean to make, or which was not entirely consistent with his views on any particular subject. In the paper published in Montreal, to which Sir Francis Hincks is known to be a contributor, a number of articles appeared on this very loan, meeting the charges of the hon. Minister of Railways very directly; and in these articles, which everyone attributed to Sir Francis Hincks, and which he never repudiated, the ground was taken that the late Finance Minister was justified in recognising the prejudices of the London market. The question this evening was not whether it was proper to put a loan on the market at a fixed rate or at public competition; there are various opinions on that point; and all who have studied this question know that nearly all the Governments of Europe have put loans on the money market of Europe at fixed prices; and it is hardly to be asserted that the Finance Ministers of those Governments knew less of the money market, or were less capable of negotiating a loan than a Canadian Finance Minister. The hon. Minister of Finance put his loan on the market and asked for tenders, and he gained a little; but that was a second 4 per cent. loan, and it was put on the market when money was cheaper than it had been when the former loan was negotiated. But the hon. gentleman, in determining which of these loans was the better - and probably neither was better than the other - should take into account all the surrounding circumstances, the condition of the money market at the time, whether there was a feeling of confidence, or of apprehension or alarm. The state of feeling in the money market, whether it is one of confidence or of apprehension, the condition of Europe, the probability of peace or war, all these things have to be taken into account when determining the relative merits of loans negotiated at different periods. It is a very important element that when our later loans were negotiated apprehension of war between England and the United States, for which Canada would be the theatre, had very largely passed away. That feeling had existed for a long time after the American war and affected very materially the prices of American securities in the English market. When a feeling of confidence returned these securities began rapidly to advance, and as the American securities advanced so the Canadian advanced as well, as because of the changed condition of the money market generally. But the special point to which I wish to direct attention is this: that I believe the hon. the Minister of Railways, in his speeches made at various times, did impute to Baring Brothers and Glyn, Mills & Co. a charge of having acted improperly as agents of this country, of having abused the confidence of the hon. the Finance Minister, who placed confidence in them, of having misled him, and by that means obtained for themselves a chance of very large profits at the expense of the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman says he does not charge that any of the money was taken out of the pockets of the people.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I never said there was not a large portion of the money taken out of the pockets of the people. I said the whole of it was not.

Mr. ANGLIN. The statement of the hon. gentleman varies every time, but there remains this residuum, however objectionable it may be, that an imputation is levied against some one of having acted dishonestly in this matter. It is of little consequence when it is said that the Finance Minister made a mistake in adopting a fixed price when he placed the loan on the market; that is a matter of judgment, and any man may be mistaken; but it is an entirely different matter to impute dishonest motives. The statement that the happy recipients of the bonds are £600,000 richer, means something more than a change in the market value of the bonds. The statement is made to convey the impression, which the hon. Minister of Railways wishes the House to believe, that some one acted dishonestly or improperly in that transaction. My impression was, the hon. Minister of Railways spoke of our agents in England as if they were at least particeps criminis, and if there were any wrong doing from which the people of Canada suffered, they were the parties who mainly profited by it. It was stated years ago, at the time the loan was negotiated and subsequently when charges were made, that the Financial Agents took a very large portion of the loan, which the hon. Minister of Railways seems to think London capitalists were eager to obtain possession of, and which that hon. gentleman declares the hon. Finance Minister might possibly have induced his friends by private hints and suggestions, to take at the low rate at which it was intended to be placed on the market. We know that the Financial Agents were obliged to take a very large part of the loan, and they would have properly reaped advantage from the subsequent advance. This advantage will, at all events, have grown out of the debate, namely, that the Minister of Railways has distinctly and positively repudiated any idea or intention of imputing wrong-doing to the Financial Agents of Canada. But he still lingers to the idea that there has been dishonesty somewhere, that the hon. Minister has gone down and suggested to friends on the other side that there was an opportunity of making a fortune at the expense of the people of Canada. There was no fortune if the fair market value of the bonds was paid, and that has been proved by the hon. member for Centre Huron. That hon. gentleman established that the ordinary money lenders in London were not prepared to take the whole of the loan of £4,000,000 sterling, even at the low rate fixed. The hon. Minister of Railways contends that there was a definite intention to confine the loan to particular individuals; but the hon. member for Centre Huron states distinctly that the loan was only successfully floated because the Financial Agents and the Bank of Montreal took up £1,500,000 of the total amount. That goes very far to prove that the loan was sold at the very highest that could possibly be obtained for it on the occasion and under the circumstances.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is the hon. gentleman aware that the amount subscribed was greatly in excess of the loan—the first loan?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It was not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, it was. £6,000,000 for a £4,000,000 loan.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No, it was not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The returns prove that it was.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We will get the correspondence.

Mr. ANGLIN. This is the first time the Minister of Railways has taken the present position. He never before controverted the statement of the hon. member for Centre Huron that all of the loan was not bid for by the money dealers of London. It is now stated that a very much larger sum than $4,000,000 was subscribed, and therefore, there was no justification whatever for the Financial Agents taking any portion of the loan. Therefore, the charge against the Financial Agents becomes stronger than ever. They induced the Finance Minister of the day to place a loan at a fixed price, contrary to every principle of right and justice, according to the Minister of Railways; but more than that, when others had subscribed the full amount of the loan they obtained £1,500,000 for themselves. I had hoped to get rid of this charge once for all, as it is not creditable to the Government and Parliament that such a charge should be made and the slightest instigation cast on the Financial Agents, unless there was good foundation for the charge, and those making it were ready to substantiate it in a proper manner. I had hoped that by originating this debate I would put an end to this charge against the agents in Canada. I am sorry to say that it stands renewed by the late statement of the hon. Minister of Railways; yet notwithstanding his statement, we find this new arrangement made which places the control of our money matters for the next ten years absolutely in the hands of those gentlemen, who, according to the hon. Minister of Railways, misled the late Finance Minister, when they found him incapable or ignorant, into a corrupt transaction, or were abetted by him in the dishonest scheme.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not hear the first part of the discussion, but I believe I know something about the transactions of 1876, and I congratulate the ex-Finance Minister on being defended by one whose defence has done him more damage than anybody could have anticipated. When the hon. gentleman went to England in 1876 there had been for a long time a great stagnation in the money market, and money was a drug on Lombard street at 1 to 1½ per cent. The hon. gentleman floated a loan. I do not know how he was advised. The Financial Agents do not take the responsibility of the operations of a Finance Minister; they presume that gentleman is able to take care of himself. They are willing to float a loan, but it is his business to say how it shall be floated. He, and not the Financial Agents is responsible to Canada; and the hon. member for Gloucester is trailing a red herring across the track when he talks of the arraignment of the Financial Agents by our hon. Minister of Railways. The Financial Agents are simply the Financial Agents, and when they saw a "Johnny Green" coming into market to negotiate a loan, willing to fall into the natural trap that was laid for him, it was not their business to warn him against it. When that hon. gentleman proposed to make that loan at a fixed price, they were very willing to take it at that fixed price. Had the hon. gentleman made his loan open to competition, there would have been plenty of competing applicants, on account of the abundance of money seeking investment at the time. But the fact is he represented to the country that he had made a loan at 92 when, considering all the allowances, it did not realize over 87½. I say it realized less than that. I have never yet been able to find out the charges made on that loan, but I do not believe it netted 87½. The loan was a 4 per cent. one. Yet when the present Finance Minister negotiated a 4 per cent. loan at 95½, at a time of disaster following the failure of the Glasgow and West of England Banks the hon. gentleman said, in his usual supercilious tone, that my hon. friend's loan was as good as the one he had made in 1876, though it did not net over 87½. I defy the hon. gentleman to prove that he got 87½ net for it. I showed that it was not as good a loan as the loan made at 5 per cent. before, and produced tables to establish my assertion. The hon. gentleman said the calculation I made was not worth the paper it was written on. Still it was the calculation on which every financier of New York made his investments, and was very carefully made to show how much a loan, having a certain number of years to run and bearing a certain rate of interest, was worth to produce a certain rate. The hon. gentleman, then in the height of his power, with a very subservient majority at his back, could sneer at the statement I made, but that statement was absolutely correct and proved that the hon. gentleman did not receive for his loan anything like the return he said he obtained. The hon. gentleman knows he went before the country and stated he floated a 4 per cent. loan as if he had floated it at par and had reduced the rate of interest, when he knew he had not by that loan reduced the rate of interest at all. He raised $12,500,000, and in-doing so lost $1,500,000 on which the people have been paying interest ever since. That loan he made at a fixed price, although everybody in London knew perfectly well that a 4 per cent. Canadian loan was one of the favorite loans on the English market, except for whatever damage the hon. gentleman may have inflicted on the credit of the country by decrying it in every possible way and lamenting over the burden of debt thrown on him by his predecessors. The price having been fixed, of course nobody would give any more for the loan. What did my hon. friend, the Finance Minister, do when he went to England, forced to make a loan by the laches of his predecessor who knew he had a loan to meet on 1st January, 1879, and who, although he ought to have gone in the month of June, 1878, to England, when money was cheap, risked the credit and the financial interest of this country in order to prosecute the campaign of 1878. He left my hon. friend to make a loan in December, 1878; the consequence was that he was forced, having taken office, and been obliged to go back for his election, having the loan falling due in June, to go in December into the English market at the most unfavorable time to negotiate a loan. There was stagnation in the money market, not more than 1½ per cent. being obtained for money in London. He was forced by the laches of the late Finance Minister to borrow at a time that the failure of the Glasgow and West of England Banks had created a panic on the market. And in spite of that what did he do? He had such confidence in the credit of the Dominion and in his future—such a perfect reliance upon the good faith of the people of Canada, that he advertised for public competition. He did not make any limit or prescribe any price; and although after advertising, he learned that the financial storm in Lombard street was so great, and was advised he would have to make a second application, he placed his loan at a higher price than our securities ever commanded before. This is a lesson to the hon. gentleman opposite who has vaunted himself on his financial achievements; but neither he nor his supporters will learn anything from it. They are given over to believe what it would not be Parliamentary to say. The hon. gentleman may sit in his place, and sneer at the criticisms on him; but if ever there was a financial record of disaster, it is the record of the gentleman who was Finance Minister from 1873 to 1878, and was in that year ignominiously expelled from that position by the verdict of an irate and indignant people.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Considering that I have heard all this about ninety-nine times before, I do not think it will make much impression upon me.

Mr. PLUMB. You will hear it one hundred times.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. If I heard it one hundred or even one thousand times from the same source, it would make no impression. But for the information of some hon. members who may not know all the facts, I will say that the Finance Minister did not float a Canadian loan in 1878, but a mixed loan, one-half of it bearing the Imperial guarantee, the other being Canadian bonds purely; and, guarding against any risk of my successor being put to any inconvenience and expense, I reserved £2,100,000 sterling to provide against any possible injury which might accrue to the Dominion credit, no matter what the result of the elections. It was that piece of foresight on my part which enabled that hon. gentleman to make that loan in December, 1878.

Mr. PLUMB. Foresight is not the proper word.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask you to keep that hon. gentleman quiet. He frequently interrupts, and deserves no courtesy from any hon. gentleman on this side; and unless he chooses to be quiet, I shall have to move that the Committee rise and report progress, and to repeat that operation till we have a proper opportunity for discussion. Over and over again it has been stated by hon. members opposite, quite inaccurately, that the Financial Agents of this country, who have been in the receipt of an annuity of $50,000 or $60,000 a year from Canada, for some 25 years, are not bound to act as the advisers of our hon. Finance Minister, to the best of their knowledge and ability, whoever he may be. I say Baring and Glyn are so bound and they acknowledge it; and they would be the very last men to assume that they were free to make a profit out of the necessity of their clients. They are bound to do their best for their clients the people of Canada. It is on that score they were allowed their large commission. All through this discussion it has been assumed that they had a right to make a profit, an illegitimate and dishonest profit, out of the advice they tendered our Finance Minister. They had no such right; but, I repeat, we are bound to give them every assistance. In 1877 a question was raised as to the custom, when I showed that in the short space between 1871 and 1876, seventeen loans by every important State in Europe and elsewhere, aggregating £321,000,000 sterling, or between $1,400,000,000 and $1,500,000,000 had been issued in precisely the mode I adopted. I followed the customary habit of those best qualified to judge of the best mode of putting loans on the London market. Anybody who chose to examine the Budget Debate of 1877 will see those facts given in detail, and nobody has attempted to dispute them. The fact is that 1876, so far from being an easy time to float a loan, when I was in London the city was in a great state of commotion, and within twenty-four hours of my successful action, the Earl of Beaconsfield made his famous pronouncement at the Guildhall which brought Great Britain and Russia to the verge of war; and had that loan been deferred for two days we could not have secured it at all.

Mr. PLUMB. You did not float it at all.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. chairman, I will trouble you to keep that hon. member quiet. He may talk here or elsewhere as long as he pleases, but he shall not interrupt me. I repeat that in 1876 Europe was on the verge of serious disturbance, and it was a matter of touch-and-go whether we should succeed in floating the loan at all. As to the assertion that it was floated much below its value, there had been for several months previous no transaction to serve as a guide, except the borrowing of some small sums, those prices ranging, ex-dividend, from 92 to 9½; and it would have been a most preposterous thing for me to regard those transactions in any sense as a guide to the real price or value of money at the time. My hon. friend behind me was perfectly right in calling the attention of the House to the fact that after the assertions made with respect to the conduct of our Financial Agents, it was a very unpatriotic and improper thing for the Government to make them our agents for a fixed period of eleven years. If they are not true, and certainly hon. gentlemen, by their conduct, are contradicting them in the most emphatic fashion; then the Minister's conduct may be defended. But, in any case, when you come to deduct the expenses of Sir Alexander Galt's establishment, it is clear we are not making anything like the saving in this transaction the Minister indicated, because Sir Alexander Galt's salary and expenses were fixed with special reference to the fact that he was going to save a large part of these expenditures. That, it appears, is not the case, and, therefore, we must make considerable deduction per contra for the large additional expenses inflicted upon us.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With reference to the question of fact between the hon. gentleman opposite and myself, I think I can show that my memory is about as accurate as his. I undertake to say that when the $4,000,000 loan was put on the market by the hon. gentleman, the question was as to whether the agent was compelled to take a large portion of that because it was not subscribed. I stated it was much more than subscribed, and I now read from a letter of those high authorities, Messrs. Glyn, Mills & Co., and Baring Bros., to prove what I say. The concluding part of the prospectus states:

"The allotment of the loans will be made as early as possible, and in cases where no answer is returned to applications, it will be understood that it has not been practicable to make any allotment."

Messrs. Baring Bros. & Co., and Glyn, Mills & Co., on the 8th of June, say in a letter to the hon. gentleman himself:

"In compliance with your instructions, we have this day opened a subscription for £4,000,000 in Dominion 4 per cent. loans."

And on the 24th of June, those gentlemen wrote to the then hon. Minister of Finance:

"We have the honor to inform you that the applications for the Canadian 4 per cent. loan amounts to £6,368,000, but as this amount includes, as usual, some applications of a speculative character, it appears to us most desirable, in regard to the future standing of the loan, to decline making allotments to any person who might be unable to comply with their engagements, and probably obliged to sacrifice their allotments without reference to price. After a careful revision of the list, we advise, therefore, that we should confine our allotments to about £3,750,000, although we could issue the remainder. * * * Under these circumstances, we beg leave to suggest the propriety of your authorizing us to subscribe the balance of the loan per account of Government, and we wait your instructions on the subject."

So that the hon. gentleman will find my statement that over £6,000,000 sterling were subscribed for the loan, and the parties were pledged to pay 20 per cent. down on allotment, and it was also provided that if they did not pay their calls, they forfeited the 20 per cent. on the allotment.

Mr. PLUMB. I think the loan the hon. gentleman made in 1876, was the occasion upon which he presented the silver side of the shield, of which we have heard so much, and it was on that occasion he represented that at least $15,000,000 of surplus revenue had been accumulated. He says that if he had not made the loan of November, 1876, at that particularly critical moment, he could not have made it so well by several per cent. He told that to the gobe-mouches who were listening to him in the country; he would not have dared to say it in this House, where the statement would have been criticized. As if "several per cent." was an expression that a Minister of Finance could use when he was speaking of the credit of the country. As if it might have been as well 10 or 20 or 30 per cent. And those who believe everything that comes from that side listened to him with open mouth and applauded him. When he came before the House at the meeting of Parliament he stated that he had made a loan at about 92.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. PLUMB. I am quite sure he said he made the loan at about 92. He afterwards, upon investigating it—and we never could get to the bottom of it—stated the loan was made at 87½, but it never netted that, and I will tell the hon. gentleman he cannot prove he got 87½ for that loan to-day. Yet he has been before the country vaunting himself upon his financial achievements, but he has presumed to taunt my hon. friend for the mode in which he placed his loan in December, 1878, when he was forced into the market by the lashes of the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I have only to say that in the first place it is quite clear from their statement that this £6,368,000 is not a bona fide subscription at all. That is the custom in London. A large number of people ask the agents to put in subscriptions for much larger amounts than they have the slightest idea of taking. That was the statement made by them to me. Technically, the hon. gentleman may appear to be correct; practically, the Messrs. Baring and Glyn were undoubtedly correct in the advice they gave, because they could not advise the placing, and they say so distinctly, of more than three millions and three-fourths. Speaking from memory—and I recollect it very distinctly—they reported to me that they could not place the whole.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is the statement under their own hand that they could place the whole issue.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. But they did not advise it. They say:

"After a careful revision of the list we advise, therefore, that we should confine our allotments to about £3,750,000."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

And as the hon. gentleman will see they gave two or three very good reasons why they did not recommend it. Now, both of the hon. gentlemen opposite should know that it is the habitual custom in London for parties to subscribe for a larger amount than they hope to get. So it was represented to me, and if false representations were made to me by our agents in London, then they are not fit for the position they have held for eleven years without reproach. These were the three first subscriptions which I have already named, and after those three a number of others rushed in.

Mr. PLUMB. And they should not know it beforehand?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. They declared that they were going to take it, and it was perfectly well known that they were going to take it. This was, however, as a lever for bringing in other subscriptions. This, I say, was done in the case of floating a new loan at 4 per cent., which never was tendered before for Canada or any other colony.

Mr. HESSON. Will the hon. gentleman state, for the information of the Committee, whether a percentage was required when the loan was made.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I do not think it was made when Baring and Glyn had the allotment. They made an allotment and divided it among their friends and beneficiaries, to use the hon. gentleman's words—and if there was any impropriety or flaw it was on the part of these gentlemen.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman's memory is rather hazy on this question, for he will find on referring to the return that 5 per cent. was required with the tender, and that this was forfeited if they did not take the tender if allotted to them.

Mr. PLUMB. Every one who knows the character of the hon. gentleman and his habits of mind knows perfectly well that their agents must have accepted the directions given by the hon. the Finance Minister of Canada. They were simply his instruments and agents, and it looks very much as if he had apportioned their shares before the competition, because, he says, the public knew how much these gentlemen would take.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I find that this is the statement of the prospectus:

20 per cent.	on allotment.
20 " "	" 10th August, 1874.
20 " "	" 21st September, 1874.
20 " "	" 30th October, 1874.
10 " "	" 1st December, 1874.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I find that I was looking at another page of the book—the prospectus of the loan of 1878, in which 5 per cent. was required.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. So that the error of memory was not on my part.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not wish to prolong the discussion on the previous item, but the hon. gentleman will find I am still right. If he will look at the prospectus of the loan for 1876 he will find that the subscription was to be 91 per cent., payable as follows:—

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. But we were speaking of the loan of 1874.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But it is rather an embarrassing thing that it should be required in the case of one of his loans and not in the other.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I have told the hon. gentleman once, and I repeat, that in floating an entirely new loan at 4 per cent. for Canada debentures, it was necessary to consult the feeling of the Stock Exchange and take every precaution, as it was much more difficult than if the debentures were well known on the market. If, as the hon. gentleman says, he is in correspondence with Sir Francis Hicks, that gentleman will be able to tell him the reason.

4. The Department of Justice. $15,500

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What are the increases, and to whom granted?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The increases are simply those of $50 to certain members of the Civil Service. There is no increase in the number of the employes.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. When we look at the whole Civil Government we find that the Government—the members of which when in Opposition denounced us as extravagant—have been adding an immense number of employes to those previously employed in their departments, with a corresponding increase of expenditure. In 1878 in this Department we had 390 employes; now 507 are asked for, or 117 more. It might be interesting to the House to learn the reason for this increase. The Civil Service Commission direct attention to the fact that the Government is adding to the number of clerks and employes without any practical regard to the work they have to do; that a great number of people are being put on by mere order of seniority at very large salaries, when their work is merely clerical. What the report of the Civil Service Commissioners says is, that the great bulk of the work of the service is purely clerical, which should be performed by clerks of the third class; that under the present regulations they are required to work six and a-half hours per diem, and that they are of opinion that for want of the necessary supervision the hours devoted to actual work do not on the average exceed much over two-thirds of that amount, so that, according to the Civil Service Commissioners Report, we are getting only three or four hours' work per diem out of these employes, and we have 117 more than we had three or four years ago. The total expenditure for the service in 1878, was $812,000, while for the present year $973,000 is demanded, and there, I fancy, is the reason why. Now, I know there are a great many very valuable and very good officers in the Civil Service, some of whom are underpaid; but it is quite clear that a great number of useless additions have been made by these gentlemen, though I do not see how they could add 117 employes and increase the expenditure by $150,000 in the teeth of such a report as that brought down. The system inaugurated by these hon. gentlemen produces two results. In the first place, it is a very serious injury to the good men, whom you cannot pay properly when you are overloading the service in this way; and in the next place, it is a constant inducement for them to shirk the work. So far as I have been able to judge, these gentlemen to whom has been committed the task of reporting on the service, appear to be of opinion that there are a great number of people employed in the service who might be dispensed with, and that a very considerable number of the people who are put over the heads of others ought not to be made first class clerks, but that men should be carefully selected according to their merit, and that the bulk of the employes should be men of the third grade, or thereabouts, who should be compelled to work a reasonable number of hours, and to render the public the services for which they are paid. We find these increases in all the departments, and we have yet to hear first a satisfactory explanation of any of them.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think it is well to take up each case separately. It may be that we shall have a general resolution which will bring up a discussion of this whole question, when I think we shall be able to give a satisfactory explanation of each increase. In the present instance there is an increase in the salary of the chief clerk, who, it appears, is a most valuable man in the Department, and who it has been considered has been underpaid in view of the nature of the services he has rendered; and it is proposed to increase his salary from $1,650 to $2,000. The other additions, with the exception of an additional clerk, are caused by the addition of $50 to the salaries of such as are entitled to it by their length of service.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Well, I never heard that the Department of Justice was less efficiently administered when my hon. friend from Durham (Mr. Blake) was at its head than it has been since. The opinion of the majority of the people of this country is that it never was administered so efficiently. I find that when he left there were nine persons in the Department, and there was an expenditure of $11,700, and in the Penitentiary Branch there were four persons and an expenditure of $33,900; while at present the expenditure in the former place is $15,500, and in the latter $5,450; and I do not believe there is any man here who will rise and say that that Department is more efficiently administered now than it was when the hon. member for West Durham was at its head.

Mr. BOWELL. It is quite as well.

Mr. PLUMB. The receipts of the country have increased about 33½ per cent. since 1878, and there is an absolute necessity for an increase in the staff required to do the increased business; and I can also say that upon a declining revenue, every year of the rule of hon. gentlemen opposite was signalized by an increase in their expenses.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly not in this Department. I would like to know from the hon. Minister of Finance where the new clerk comes in.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think he is a senior second-class clerk. The deputy is very anxious that a man of some little experience in the profession should be there to assist him, and the person who has been entered and is at present acting is a lawyer of some experience, whose services, I fancy, cannot be obtained unless we give him the pay of a senior second-class clerk.

5. The Department of Justice, (Penitentiary Branch). $5,450

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose this is a statutory increase.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the principle adopted of granting those increases in all cases?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not in all cases, unless reported by the deputy-head of the department.

6. The Department of Militia. $36,350

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the expenditure in this Department, particularly in the matter of salaries, indicated by the very high average paid, a higher average than is paid in any other Department of the Civil Service. Why that should be the case I cannot understand. I do not know any technical work in the Department, which requires the very high average salary of $1,350 to officers in that Department. I hope the hon. Minister will find some means of explaining to the House why the Department should not be re-modelled somewhat on the line suggested by the Civil Service Commission. One, two or three chief clerks would superintend the work of the Department, which could be so organized as to obviate the large expenditure of $36,350. The Militia Department, with the few volunteers we have and the small services required, does not require such a heavy staff at such large salaries.

Mr. CARON. The great difficulty that I have had to contend with since I became head of the Department, has been to reduce the staff, which I have to a certain extent succeeded in doing. The only increases that appear in the vote are merely those provided by statute, recommended by the deputy-head and sanctioned by the Minister.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No doubt it would be unfair to hold the hon. Minister solely and individually responsible for the system which has grown up for several years back, but the question after all is not how far this party or the other party are responsible, but as to what is the present state of things. The Civil Service Report calls special attention to the fact, which is a noteworthy one, that while there was a very large expenditure for that purpose our Civil Government expenditure was very small. In 1864-65, the Civil Government expenditure was $15,340 and departmental expenditure $741,942; 1865-66, Civil Government, $22,997, departmental, $1,617,556; 1866-67, Civil Government, $33,655, Departmental, $1,379,276. The Civil Government expenditure having reached the last-named figure, it seems to have remained thereabouts. In 1877-78 the Civil Government expenditure was $35,962; departmental, $618,136; 1878-79, Civil Government, $35,884, departmental, $777,698; 1879-80, Civil Government, $36,396, departmental, $690,018. I am not certainly imputing the special fault to the Minister individually; but attention is very properly called by the Civil Service Commission to this state of things, and therefore it does appear as if a prima facie case had been made out for reducing the expenditure to less than $36,000, or including the Minister's salary, $43,000 for a departmental expenditure of $700,000. I am sure the Minister will agree that it is unfortunate this state of things has grown up, and it requires a serious consideration as to whether the Department cannot be remodelled, either as the Civil Service Commission advises or in some other position, so as to reduce the Civil Government expenditure in proportion to the departmental outlay.

7. The Department of the Secretary of State..... $41,415

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Here also, looking at the Civil Service Report, it appears that the Commissioners specially report that a very unnecessary expenditure is incurred in this Department. In 1878-79, the total expenditure required was $32,370 as against $41,000 required now, and there is an increase of about eleven additional officers. That is an unreasonable increase. There is no amount of additional work to justify the increase. The Civil Service Commissioners say:

"In the Estimates for the Department of the Secretary of State, 1881-82, we find provision is made for five chief clerks and four first-class clerks. We cannot concur in this estimate of the requirements of this Department, and we propose to reduce the number of chief clerks to one, and this we unhesitatingly assign to the Queen's Printer. The large number of chief clerks asked for is probably due to the difference between the estimate of the functions of that class of officers under the present Civil Service Act, and the estimate of them which guided us in framing the scale of salaries submitted in our first Report. The officers in charge of the Correspondence, Registration Branch, and Stationery Branch we propose to make first-class clerks."

After appointing that Commission and receiving their recommendation the Government does not appear to show much respect to these views, if we may judge from the Estimates submitted. The fact stares us in the face that there has been an increase of 25 per cent. in the salaries, and something like 30 per cent. in the number of officers employed in this Department. I am willing to suppose that a moderate increase of business may have occurred, but I see nothing in the reports of the Department to warrant us in supposing that this amount is required. It will be necessary, at a later stage, to see whether any reduction can be made in this excessive expenditure. An increase apparently of three clerks is proposed in this current year, 1882-83, at an increase of about $2,400 of salary. It seems to me that increase is wholly uncalled for, and I think might be avoided by keeping the employes at work to the extreme limit of six and a-half hours instead of allowing them to get off with four or five hours, which appears to be the amount of work they are now expected to perform.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. This small increase is justified by the circumstances. According to the report business has increased considerably and the revenue has increased more than the excessive expenditure. We were obliged to create new functions and voted $800 for two new third-class clerks. The rest of the increase comes from the statutory increases of $50 a year.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. Minister says there has been a very large increase of work. I often look over those reports, and I am always surprised to find how little work is done in that Department. The number of letters to be answered chiefly occupy the clerks and hon. Minister together, but lately some important documents have been issued by that Department, one of which has created intense excitement in one portion of this Dominion. It may be the preparation of that document required a very extraordinary increase of exertion, for it was a very extraordinary document, but taking it all in all the hon. Minister has not shown any large increase in work to justify this extraordinary increase in employes. In 1878 there were 27 employes, last year there were 35, this year another three are added. The hon. member for Niagara would perhaps tell us there is an increase in the Customs Revenue and Inland Revenue, and therefore we ought to be satisfied that no greater relative increase has taken place in any Department, but I think he will find it difficult to establish any proportion between the increase of work and increase of revenue in the Secretary of State's Department, a Department which I have always considered was necessary only to afford a Cabinet position for the thirteenth member of the Government. The hon. Minister says there is a great deal of work to do. I would like to know what work?

Mr. MOUSSEAU. If the hon. gentleman will read the Statutes of 1868, creating the Department, he will know what work is done there. The great document of which he speaks is not to be laughed at, and perhaps in the discussion that will take place he will have reason to repent of what he has said. If the hon. gentleman will look over the Statutes he will find that one of these extra employes is for the stationery, for the work is always increasing, and in the registry and corresponding branches two employes had to be added. It is rather a decrease than an increase, as the number of extra clerks will be diminished, and instead of voting $7,000 for contingencies only $4,000 will be voted. The revenue of the Department has increased $1,700 or $1,800, and the Department is in a very satisfactory state.

Mr. ANGLIN. That is an old plea about the extra clerks, but notwithstanding that there is an increase of not merely three clerks, but eleven clerks in this one Department.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it not wonderful there should be an increase, considering the increase of work, especially in making up the large number of returns asked for? As for the increase of salary, you cannot get men to-day for the wages paid three years ago, owing to the increased facilities for employment and the increased prosperity of the country.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I will call the attention of the hon. member again to the statement made by these Civil Service Commissioners that the great bulk of the work is purely clerical, and that the clerks are required under present regulations to work 6½ hours per diem, but that they actually on an average work not much over two-thirds of the time. I think he will find that a tolerably satisfactory explanation of the reason why 11 clerks are required to be added within three years to this particular Department.

No doubt the hon. gentleman is to some extent right in saying that the iniquitous and unjust system of taxation to which we are at present exposed, does interfere with the purchasing power of persons living on fixed salaries. That is quite true. If those gentlemen were working up to full time, there would be some ground for saying they are crushed and injured by the policy of the Government, and perhaps the $50 does not put them in as good a position as they occupied under the better and wiser system of some years ago. The hon. gentleman has come uninvitingly, I dare say, to the truth in that respect; but all that is no answer to the statement of my hon. friend behind me, nor can I congratulate the Secretary of State on any lucid explanation as to the character of the additional work. There may be many new returns moved for, and some that will take two or three persons and a few hours to prepare; but they may be brought down from some of the other Departments. Many mentioned by the hon. member for West Durham are still missing.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). Seventy-seven have never been brought down.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Yes; seventy-seven were wanting over a week ago, and perhaps more have been asked for since, which are not likely to be brought down. That kind of work hardly requires many clerks. The information as to whether the House requires a few extra clerks can be got readily enough without obliging us to add more than one-third to the total clerical staff of this Department. The explanation of the increase appears exceedingly unsatisfactory, and utterly at variance with the statements made by the hon. gentlemen opposite as to their excellent intentions in the way of economy, and with the attacks that used to be made upon us, when in office, about the number of our clerks.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. I hold in my hand a list of questions and addresses for information on all subjects, showing they are more numerous than ever asked for before. The second cause of employment of these additional clerks is that the correspondence has increased to a voluminous extent—the correspondence first for the High Commissioner of Canada in England, and second, with the Provinces and many parties who apply for letters patent, charters for companies, and lands for sale. Those communications have increased to a great degree. Five or six extra clerks have had to be employed to meet the demands for information, and there has been an increase in the number of applications for lands in the North-West, all of which must be registered in our books.

Mr. ANGLIN. It is something new to be told that the number of motions for addresses and returns is larger than the time of the late Government, when hon. gentlemen opposite were determined to wring and extract every kind of information from it. My impression was that the number of addresses then moved for information was much larger than now. It was the boast of the Premier that the addresses were promptly attended to much more quickly than seen lately. The list of returns asked for goes on to the Commons, and the various Departments are called on to furnish them. The Department of the Secretary of State is merely the medium of communication between this House and the various Departments. A large amount of sheets of foolscap come from that Department with two or three words written on them; that is the work done in it. With regard to the office of the High Commissioner, it seems that is to be a cause of endless, incalculable expense in various ways. I did not suspect that the expenses of the Department of State were to be increased by a High Commissioner with a large salary and little to do, in England. With respect to the lands of the North-West, we really want some specific and definite information—and to know how money is spent there, and the cost of the management of lands. We should know how much is charged for this service to the general accounts, and how much to the Department of the Interior.

Mr. BOWELL. How would the information as to the expenditure for those lands, if you had it, affect the registration?

Mr. ANGLIN. We should know those expenses were to be charged. Whatever expense is attached to that ought to be a separate and distinct charge, and not charged to general expenses. I do not know why that we in the Lower Provinces, for example, should pay a portion of the expense of registering those lands of the North-West. If one-tenth of what we hear of those lands be true, they ought to be able to pay for management and much more besides. Those items are the merest matters of routine, not requiring a large staff of second class-clerks and increasing the number, as we find. It would be difficult for the hon. gentleman to state that the work of this Department has decreased in the three years, in the same proportion as the employes, from 27 to 33.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know what the Department has to do in engrossing deeds? As I understand the matter, the Department of the Interior settles what lands are to be given, and to whom; and the Department of Justice, if there is any question of title, settles the rest.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. And that Department sends the notices to my Department, where the deeds are engrossed and drawn out.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I understood that they were engrossed and drawn first on a report from the Department of the Interior, countersigned by the Department of Justice, if there be any difficulty about them. We know perfectly well that the drawing, such is our present system of survey, is a very small affair. There is usually little difficulty in drawing a map of a section or a quarter section of lands in the North-West. Competent draughtsmen will draw, having instructions given them, an immense number in the course of a month. I do not think the total number of documents, which by the way the hon. gentleman has not mentioned, could be so great as to require any serious addition to his clerical force. In an ordinary law office that class of deeds would be got through with at the rate of twenty or thirty a day.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman has called attention a number of times to the report of the Civil Service Commission. If he had been fair he would have stated that the remarks made by that Commission were not at all confined to the present state of the service, nor have they been for several years past, particularly during the time the hon. gentleman was at the head of a department. I looked at the expenditure of the Secretary of State and explained them two years ago, and I now repeat that there were then gentlemen on that staff who were paid, in addition to that staff, from $1.50 to $2 per day, and when they were regularly promoted to a class which paid them less than they were receiving under the hon. gentlemen, the attention of the House was called to it as an enormous increase. In many cases gentlemen who were employed by the then Government as extras, were paid at a higher rate than the provisions of the Civil Service Act permitted, and kept continually at those rates, and they were afterwards put upon the regular staff as third or second-class clerks at lower rates than they were receiving. I think I may safely say that the Civil Service Law as it now exists was never paid the slightest attention to by the Government of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Fortunately that has been changed, and no one receives a per diem allowance a larger sum than is allowed by the Civil Service Act.

The hon. gentleman has a happy faculty of misinterpreting what another gentleman says if it does not exactly suit him. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) stated that owing to the prosperous state of the country you cannot obtain clerks as cheaply now as formerly. The ex-Minister of Finance says that the reason of that is the iniquitous Tariff on the Statute-book, which increases the cost of living. It is clear, however, that the effect of the Tariff has been to render labor more valuable and work more plentiful than it was under the Administration of our predecessors. In respect to this expenditure there can be no doubt that the issue of patents to-day is a hundred times greater than it was five years ago. No matter whether the document is long or short, it has to be engrossed, drawn and registered, its length does not affect the work necessary in the registering of a deed to a certain person, upon a certain date. We all know that the work of all the Departments has greatly increased of late. I have no doubt that the work in the office of the Secretary of State has increased in the same proportion as the others. I know my own has increased materially. I am certain that when you look minutely into the particulars of the expenditure under this head, you will find that the increase is caused by the statute as it exists, and from the extra work imposed on all the Departments. The hon. member for West Durham said he supposed all the clerks received an increase—he meant to say, I suppose, irrespective of their qualifications. Now, I do not pretend to say that is the fact, but I do know that clerks under the law are prima facie entitled to an increase, and unless they get it they are dissatisfied. The Committee has been told that these Departments should all be reorganized. I was about to ask the hon. gentleman what he would do with those who are on the staff at the present time, and were most of them placed there by the hon. gentleman and his friends by Order in Council. I can fancy the trouble that would be created in this country if any of these were to be removed. It would be declared that these dismissals took place for political reasons, and no other. We are denounced from the other side of the House when a civil servant is dismissed; and if one of them is relieved of the light work he has to perform, then the head of the Department, or those immediately under him, are denounced for dismissing people for political reasons. That is one of the great difficulties under our system that every Minister has to encounter. It requires some little courage to meet the storm of indignation that is aroused when you say to a gentleman, who has been appointed by Order in Council, that his services are no longer required. There is scarcely a dismissal, whether it be for robbing the Post Office, cheating the revenue, or neglect of duty of any kind, which is not made the occasion of a return for the cause of his dismissal, and when the Minister brings down and shows it was properly done, he is soundly denounced by those hon. gentlemen. We have had two such assaults from the hon. member for Gloucester, one because a man was not paid back the amount that was deducted from his superannuation fund, though he had been drawing a salary for two years, and yet had never done an hour's work the whole time. I mention these things to show what the Government has to expect from the hon. gentlemen opposite who think more of making a point for political reasons than the good of the country.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Nothing so delights me as to listen to the hon. gentleman who has just sat down; and I have very great pleasure in finding that he displays a versatility of talent, and exhibits gifts which with all our admiration, we never discovered when he was on this side of the House. When he sat on this side of the House he never admitted that there was any growth in the country and any consequent increase of work and expenditure, but he now finds by virtue of his experience that things which he denied when in Opposition are perfectly true in the true source of Government. It is a sad thing to be a bitter partizan and to see only one side of a question. When the hon. gentleman was on this side of the House his only duty was to find fault and show that everything was wrong; but after spending five years in denunciation and finding himself on the other side, he is able to admit that the public expenses must necessarily increase, because of the growth of the country and the increase of public expenditure. I compliment the hon. gentleman on the capabilities of expansion which he has displayed in acknowledging that the growth of the country involves a corresponding growth in the public expenditure.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The explanation of the hon. Minister of Customs does not touch the fact to which I called the attention of the House—facts to be found in the Public Accounts, in the report of the Civil Service Commission and in the Estimates. Here we have an Estimate calling for $150,000 more than we required three years ago. We spent $823,000 for a service for which they now ask $973,000. We found 390 servants enough for the work for which they now ask 507; we find further that the gentlemen whom they appointed themselves, and in whom they have confidence, report that we are getting very small hours' work for our money. The criticisms made on this side of the House are far less severe than those made by the Civil Service Commission, and I have merely quoted from these gentlemen with respect to the different Departments, and specially the Department of the Secretary of State, which has employed a great many men at high salaries for work which the hon. Minister himself admits to be of a purely clerical character. One point is that these gentlemen have not dealt with the difficulties at all, but that with 25 per cent. more officers than we had they are doing less work than we did. The expenditure on this one item alone has increased something like 20 per cent. I admit that the hon. Minister of Customs—though I admit it is no great compliment to pay him—has administered his Department, in a certain sense, impartially. I do not think he lays himself out to please his supporters or anybody else, if I may judge by the expressions of opinion which I have received. At all events, I do not expect that when we come to his Department we will find the same amount of unreasonable increase that we now complain of in respect to the Secretary of State.

Mr. SPROULE. I may say that I called at the Department of the Secretary of State a few days ago for a deed for a certain party, and I found that the officers of the Department had a very large amount of work on hand in connection with papers of this kind. I would like to ask the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), if it requires the civil servants to work only four hours a day to do the work of the Department at present, how many hours would it require to do the work when his Government were in power? If we consider the fact that under the improved condition of affairs and the better times, all kinds of labor better paid, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the cost of the Civil Service should be higher than it was when the late Government was in power. From 1875 to 1878 things were at a standstill, little public land was being sold and few deeds were required. I submit as a fact, patent to us all, that if you go into any of the Departments at the present time you can scarcely get a man to attend to you, as they are all from morning to night attending to the various returns required of them and the other work of their Departments. The position we took in Opposition was that as the price of labor was going down, as times were not flourishing and the revenue low, and labor could be obtained at a cheap price, it was not unreasonable to suppose that the work of the Departments could be done at a less cost than under a different set of circumstances. But now when labor generally is of more value, it is reasonable to expect that the work of the Departments will cost more money.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. gentleman seems to be really serious in supposing that the cost of the Civil Service is necessarily and properly larger, because there is an improved condition of affairs over that which existed three years ago. The hon. Minister of Customs took up that note, but I thought he was rather amusing himself and the House in dealing with that thesis. But the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) seems to be serious in supposing that the salaries of the civil servants generally, should be reduced when the times are bad. Well, I do not know that the Civil Service of this country ought to be conducted on the principle of raising and lowering the salaries in the Departments in proportion to the rise and fall of wages outside; I do not think that rule has ever been adopted anywhere, and I never heard any idea of that kind propounded in this House during the worst times to which we can look back. The salaries have been fixed on another scale altogether; and although times are better, and there is more employment to day, wages are no higher, and, therefore, there is no reason why the salaries should be increased, unless it be that the amount of labor has increased. This continual harping on the prosperity of the country and the terrible depression of 1878, is being carried entirely too far, and hon. gentlemen need not hope to mislead the intelligent working classes of this country into the belief that they are any better off than they were before, because they know they are not. But we are now dealing with another matter; we find an extraordinary increase both in the number employed and the salaries paid, and we say there is no increase in the work sufficient to account for it.

8. The Department of the Interior..... $51,740

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is $45,150 asked for this service against $47,850 last year. The deputy-head has been superannuated, and the chief clerk takes his place; this is one of the reductions, while the number of officers has decreased by three, and the difference is made up by the statutory increases, and in some cases by transferring first-class clerks to chief clerkships.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The Civil Service Commission, I notice, appear to think that this Department is also very urgently in want of revision. They point out, what is quite true, that here also the work is largely clerical work, and for this enormous staff there are two deputy-heads, I believe, and I do not know how many chief and first-class clerks. It is very odd that the Ministers, who, I suppose, had this report before them, did not appear to pay the slightest regard to it, or take the slightest pains to reduce the expenses of this Department, which we know, to our sorrow, is increasing at an enormous rate. We know that two or three million dollars a year are being swallowed up under the nominal guidance of this Department, and we find that day by day more men and more money are wanted for it, and I believe there is a proposal to create a complete independent branch of the Department at Winnipeg besides. Well, Sir, we will discuss the policy of that, no doubt, when we come to it; but in the meantime, when we know that this is going to be the case, it appears to me that rather less than sixty-six employes ought to be sufficient for the work here, and that of these a much smaller number ought to be in those very important positions at high salaries to which I have referred. I am not quite certain whether the work of the Indian Department is as great as it was during the term of the hon. member for Bothwell; I think, from my recollection, that it is not; the North-West Mounted Police, I believe, were formerly included in it, and they are not now. Now, these are enormous increases, and although there is no doubt a considerable addition of work, we ought to have more information than is contained in the bald statement submitted by the hon. Finance Minister as to the reasons for these increases.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). The Department of the North-West Mounted Police shows a large increase. In 1878 the expenditure was $2,750, two clerks being employed; the Estimates before us are for three clerks, and an expenditure of $4,750. The whole staff required by the Minister of the Interior in 1878 numbered 36; now 66 are required to do the same work. The explanation that would justify the expenditure has not been given, and there is no reason why the item should be hurried through without the Committee being sufficiently informed of the necessity for the large expenditure; there can be no necessity under the head of Indians, for no new treaty has been negotiated since 1878, and there is no greater number of Indians to pay now than then. There was no necessity for an increase in the Mounted Police Branch, as the force has not been increased since 1878, nevertheless there is an increase of $2,000.

Mr. BANNERMAN. Since the boundaries of Manitoba have been extended it has become necessary to increase the Mounted Police to carry out the Prohibitory Law.

Mr. ROSS. I do not object to the Mounted Police carrying out the Prohibitory Law, but I object to an increase of expenditure in the Mounted Police Department without an increase in the force. The extension of the boundaries of Manitoba westward will reduce rather than increase the duties of the Mounted Police, because the Local Legislature will exercise certain jurisdiction, and the area under the supervision of the Mounted Police will be reduced.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand a new officer has been appointed at Winnipeg, in connection with the Department of Interior, at a high salary. I suppose that officer will discharge a portion of the duties heretofore performed at the head office.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes; a portion of the duties. This officer, with the Chief Surveyor, will dispose of questions of doubt that may arise, or claims, or anything of that kind. It has been the duty of many hon. members to visit the Department since the House met, and I think they will appreciate the increased duties involving on its officers. The Department has assumed responsibility of over 150,000,000 acres of land at least, and to say that the work of the Department now is no greater than it was when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was at its head, is to make a statement which will not be believed by any person in the country, who knows anything of the facts of the case. During the last two or three months there have been so many applications pouring into that Department in connection with colonization associations and the locations of land from all quarters, that the clerks have not been able to accomplish one-half of the work, and it is only by attending office after hours that they can at all keep pace with the demands on their services.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentlemen just said they could not keep up with their work.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They are making every effort to overtake the amount of work they have to accomplish, and assistant draughtsmen and others have been called in for the purpose of getting through the business. I do not hesitate to say that there is not an appropriation this House can make that will be so acceptable to the people as an appropriation that would facilitate the location and settlement of lands in the North-West, and there is scarcely an hon. member who did not expect a large increase instead of a decrease in the expenditure of this Department. I have no doubt that by the arrangement now being made to transfer a part of the work to Manitoba, matters will be better disposed of than in the past.

Mr. HESSON. It has fallen to my lot to visit that Department frequently, and I can testify to the pressure of work there, for I have had, to my regret, to wait for hours to get an interview with a clerk, much less than the deputy heads. I must say I did expect a large addition would be made to the vote, but to my great surprise the reverse is the case, and I think that a great deal of time has been wasted by the ex-Minister of Finance in discussing a result which he ought to have desired. With reference to salaries I know myself that the Department has lost a very valuable officer in Mr. Hamilton, who is now receiving $2,500 a year from the Syndicate, when he previously received but $800 a year in this Department, when he had charge of the timber limits.

Mr. BLAKE. I have no doubt that since the Session this Department has been very much overworked, since the philanthropists have taken so great an interest in the North-West lands. The hon. gentleman must not forget that a tremendous jump had to be made to get the expenditure up to the level of last year, when it reached a point which absolutely appalled us all. I deny that there is a decrease in the expenditure because an expensive officer has been appointed at Winnipeg to do practical work which otherwise would have been done at the head office. For comparative purposes it is necessary, therefore, to add his salary and that of his clerk to the salaries of the Department of Interior, in order to compare the present estimate with that of last year.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will find, on looking at the conclusion of the Estimate, that there is a large increase of $29,095 in the Dominion Lands outside service, which is under the control of this Department, and although there is a decrease under one head of $2,700, there is an increase of $4,250 in the next and cognate Department, so that I do not see, taking particularly into account the work done in Manitoba, to which my hon. friend has alluded, that there has been any decrease in the expenditure. On the contrary there would be, even supposing that Mr. Walsh's salary and those of his assistants do not exceed $10,000, a pretty large increase of expenditure. I do not know exactly where that salary is to be found.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). It is $5,000.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. And there are necessary collections, and there will be expenses upon the office at Winnipeg, which is a heavy item, and various miscellaneous expenses, so that I expect $10,000 will be a very moderate estimate indeed. I would like to know how much further in the Estimates the hon. Finance Minister wishes to go to-night, as it is now past two o'clock and several of us have large Committees to attend this forenoon.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I would like to get more than five resolutions passed.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. But they embrace some sixty or seventy distinct items, and I shall want information on some of the following items.

9. Indian Affairs..... $23,315

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It will be better to postpone that item, as I require information with regard to it, and it will occasion discussion. There is an increase of $4,215.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. What will help to explain the difference is the fact that one first-class clerk has been employed at $1,800 and another at $1,100. This will not increase the expenditure for the Indians; it is merely transferring those clerks from the outside to the Civil Service.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the object and policy of making this transfer?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They required the additional assistance in that office, and instead of increasing the expense it was thought proper to take two gentlemen employed in the Indian service, and not rendering, perhaps, that service to the Department which they could render in the new position.

Mr. BLAKE. They have been doing nothing elsewhere.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They were not really earning their salaries for a number of years, and it was thought well to place them where they could do so.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. That is precisely what we ought to have full details about.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Then let it stand.

10. Office of Auditor-General $19,600

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is no increase in the number of persons employed; but one is promoted, and an additional clerk, not appointed this year, is provided for. There is the promotion of one or two upon the recommendation of the Auditor-General, with which the Government has not interfered in any way.

13. Customs $31,345

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. There appears a decrease in this item; so it must have been too large before.

Mr. BOWELL. No, it was not too large before. The reduction is the result of proper economy. The last year the hon. gentleman was in power, and for which they were wholly responsible, the inside service of the Customs Department, including contingencies, cost no less than $44,610.21, while I only ask for the next fiscal year $31,345, and for contingencies, $8,000, making a total of $39,345; showing a saving of $5,265. Notwithstanding the annual statutory increases, over which a Minister has comparatively no control, deduct from the amount asked in the Estimates these statutory increases, amounting to $4,960, and it shows an actual saving of $10,225, as compared with the expenditure of 1877-78, notwithstanding the enormous increase of work which has been thrown upon the Department.

Resolutions ordered to be reported; and (at 2:10 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 29th March, 1882.

INSOLVENT ESTATES.

Mr. BEATY, in moving for leave to introduce Bill (No. 136) for the equitable distribution of insolvent estates, said: The object of the Bill is to provide some means when persons or traders become insolvent, for the distribution of their estates equitably or fairly among all the creditors. The Bill itself is substantially the Bill which was proposed, I believe, by Mr. Colby some time ago, and by a Committee of this House, with such alterations which seemed requisite for the purpose of adapting it to the present object—the equitable distribution of the assets of insolvent debtors. The Bill provides, in regard to certain classes of persons who will come within its provisions or can be considered as in a state of insolvency, within the meaning of the Act, that their property shall be placed, in the first place, in the hands of a guardian who may be appointed for each judicial district by the Government; or, in the case of failure to appoint a guardian, then the sheriff of the county or district shall be the guardian for the purpose of prompt management of the property. But at any time after the trader is declared insolvent, or is unable to pay his debts in full, an attachment against the property may be placed in the hands of the sheriff, and the guardians may come in and apply to the Judge for the purpose of having him declared insolvent within the meaning of the Act. There is no provision whereby persons may be driven into insolvency by creditors except by attachment against them, and except by intervention of the Judge such insolvency is declared. The idea is to protect debtors from their creditors, so that they shall not be driven into insolvency until such time that it is clear that they will be unable to manage their own affairs and to take care of their own business. There are a variety of cases in which persons may be utterly insolvent, and they are chiefly of the same character, which is well known to the House and to professional men and merchants, as the class called insolvency under the old Bankrupt or Insolvency Act. The creditors may at any time after the declaration of insolvency, or the existence of such a state of facts showing the inability of a trader to meet his liabilities, come in and appoint a trustee for the purpose of taking charge of the property, in which case, if confirmed by the Judge, the property vests in the trustee for the benefit of the creditors. When the trustee is appointed, he takes immediate charge and control of all the property and trade of the insolvent, and administers it under a clause provided in this Bill, with the object of distributing it equitably and fairly among all the creditors in proportion to their claims. The object is to facilitate the management and the winding-up of such estates, to prevent delays and to diminish expenses to a minimum, so that there shall be no greater expenses in connection with the management of estates than is possible to have in administering affairs of that kind. The Bill is necessarily lengthy, and hon. gentlemen will understand that a measure of this kind which hands over an estate to trustees, must have full and complete provisions for the purpose of meeting every case which experience has taught us may arise in the administration of estates of insolvents. With that object in view, I have adopted the language of other Acts, so far as possible, with the view of making it perfect, so that the trader whose estate is in insolvency, and his creditors may be protected to the greatest extent, the utmost value of the estate realized, and the distribution made as equitably and with as little delay as possible. There are many clauses introduced into an Act of this kind, which may rarely be needed, nevertheless, they are necessary in order to meet every contingency. The usual provisions are made for the purpose of administering the property by a trustee, in case the creditors appoint a trustee, which they can do, and the distribution of the estate is to be made, and the dividends are to be declared similarly as in the old Insolvent Act. But in this Bill it is provided that less expense shall be incurred in way of publication, which, I think, was unnecessarily large under former Acts, which required almost every notice to be published in the Official Gazette. The Official Gazette being not generally read by the public, I have provided that much of that formerly published in the Gazette shall be brought to the notice of creditors personally, such as all important transactions taking place with reference to the administration of an estate. Then there are general proceedings provided with reference to the powers of Judges. I have endeavored to frame the Bill so as to prevent appeals, unless they are absolutely necessary, and for the purpose of disposing of some important questions of law which might arise in the administration of an estate. Heretofore, in the administration of insolvent estates, those who have sought delay, and who desired to promote litigation, have resorted to appeals from Court to Court, with the view of delaying the final distribution of the estates, or for some other purpose. In this Bill I have provided that no appeal shall be had without the consent of the Judge or Court appealed from. Mere matters of fact not involving large amounts, when once they have been adjudicated upon by a Judge and jury, should not be allowed to be appealed at the fancy of persons who may think thereby to delay proceedings. The usual provisions are made for reaching all the property of the trader, with the view that he shall not, by fraud or collusion with any creditor, or with the trustee or any other person, prevent all his creditors from obtaining the full benefit of all that he possesses, so that, if the estate cannot pay dollar for dollar, they may realize the largest amount possible out of the business. The idea throughout the Bill has been to adhere to the well-known principles of former legislation, in so far as they were found desirable. Another feature of this Bill is that it does not provide for the discharge of the debtor. It is not a Bill for relieving the insolvent. He is simply bound under certain circumstances, to place his property in the hands of the sheriff or a guardian, and the trustees may take it out of the hands of the sheriff or guardian, and so administer it that the creditor may realize pro rata all the estate will afford. There is no provision in this Bill whatever for the discharge of insolvents; it is simply made on behalf of the creditors. In cases where the Government do not appoint a guardian in any county or district, then the sheriff becomes the guardian and takes possession of the estate in the meantime, under the direction of the Judge, and he is subject to the direction of the Judge and of the creditors so long as and in the same way as the ordinary trustee appointed by the creditors. The particular feature which I would emphasize in this Bill is the one that a simple, fair and equitable distribution of the assets of the insolvent may be made for the benefit of the creditors, and it provides that no creditor who may get a prior execution shall have any advantage over other creditors who may get subsequent executions. The next Bill which I hope to introduce will explain why no discharge is provided for, and no provision for making a composition. Of course the creditors may do as they please; they can discharge their debtor, but there is no compulsory power on the part of the trader to force the creditors into granting him a discharge or a composition. The trader, of course, can make a voluntary assignment under this Bill as he can now. Any trader at the present time, whether he becomes an insolvent or not, may make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and this Bill will not prevent him from doing so still. It does not take the matter out of the hands of the creditors. If the trader can come to an amicable arrangement with his creditors, he can still make an assignment and deal with his property just as fully after this Bill comes into force as he can now. I do not think there is much else of a special character, until the Bill is in the hands of members, to which I need advert in order to aid the judgment of hon. members. These are the general purposes of the Bill to which are added the usual clauses to prevent frauds and fraudulent preferences, so that traders may not deal improperly with their creditors, and prevent them from realizing as much as possible out of estates.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk). There is a clause in the Bill, as explained by the hon. mover, which is so iniquitous that the Bill should not be read at all. It is that, after a man's property is taken out of his possession, he is still held to be responsible for any loss that may occur in the management of the property over which he no longer possesses control. Again, it is only a short time since the House, by a very large majority, repealed the Insolvent Act, and the country has not shown any desire to have it re-enacted. I believe trade is in a better position to-day than it has been for many years, and that this is largely due to the repeal of the Insolvent Act. If the hon. gentleman had proceeded in the direction of abolishing all laws for the collection of debts after a certain time, he would have been moving in the right direction. For centuries laws have been enacted to regulate affairs between debtor and creditor, but I believe if the parties were left to settle such affairs themselves, they would be much better arranged, and I hold nothing tended so much to demoralization as the Insolvent Law did in the country. It created a recklessness in giving and in taking credit, because men who obtained credit argued that if they did not succeed in their ventures an appeal to the Insolvency Courts relieved them from their liability. That law acted most injuriously in the interests of the country; yet the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) proposes to enact another such law with a clause in it that is nothing short of iniquitous, for under it a man will be held responsible for the management of property which has been taken out of his hands. This provision is so monstrous that I cannot understand the House entertaining it for a moment.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I think we have got to use a little caution before we introduce any legislation of this character, and I only make this remark to urge on the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill and all those interested in it that they should be very careful that they do not counteract by introducing this Bill, some of the good which I think has been accomplished by the abolition of the Insolvency Law. In opinion I am very strongly with the last speaker, and I think honesty and fair dealing amongst all classes, amongst the commercial classes particularly, are much more likely to be fostered by having no law of this character with respect to transactions between them than by having some elaborate system of law; because when it becomes a mere question of honesty and credit between men doing business, I think it is more likely that honesty will be promoted without an insolvency law than by any artificial system providing for the insolvency of the debtor and the distribution of his assets. My experience, extending over thirty years, as to the distribution of assets by any machinery of the law, shows that it is pretty much abortive. The estate virtually passes into the hands of the sheriff, the assignees or his clerks, and neither the creditors nor the owner get much out of it. I do not believe it is necessary to introduce any such law, especially now, because through the policy which has been inaugurated by this Government, which has had such extraordinary success in bringing about general prosperity, we do not seem to require any such law. No doubt very soon there will be no debts to collect, soup-kitchens are no longer necessary and poor-houses are being abolished; and if the Government remain in power, about which there is no reasonable doubt, I do not think the country will require any law for the distribution of assets, unless it might be for the distribution of the political assets of hon. gentlemen. As far as the commerce of the country is concerned we do not want any putting in of the wedge again, which is likely to bring an insolvent law again into operation. I feel assured that the country has gradually been growing into such a better condition so that faith between man and man in all commercial transactions will be better maintained without a law than by any Insolvent Act or Act for the distribution of assets.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I do not agree with what has fallen from the hon. member who has just addressed the House. I think it necessary we should have a measure through which the equitable distribution of the assets of insolvents will be administered. The Bill is not to take an estate from a man who is able to pay his debts in full, but only when he is not able to pay his debts. It is within my knowledge at all events, if it is not within the knowledge of other hon. members, that boards of trade in Ontario, if not in other Provinces, have had this subject under consideration for several years, and that it is the desire of the great commercial community of the Dominion at large, that there shall be some measure by which the assets of insolvent estates shall be properly and efficiently administered. We find, Sir, that the practice of the profession since the Insolvent Act has been abolished has been this: that there has been generally a race as to who can put a sheriff in possession of the assets of the insolvent first, and the consequence is that the man who is a little quicker and a little sharper than his next door neighbor will run away with perhaps the whole of the estate in order to make his debt, whereas the next man, who has quite as honest a debt, has to go unpaid. Now, that is not a desirable state of affairs. Creditors have a right to the distribution of the estate of an insolvent, pari passu. It is not fair or reasonable to allow one creditor to sweep away the whole of an insolvent estate at the expense of other creditors whose claims are just as honest and just as good as his. I hold in my hand a communication, which I believe has been somewhat widely distributed among members of this House, from the Chairman and Secretary of the Hamilton Board of Trade, with reference to this very matter. I do not know that we can approve, perhaps, of the whole of the Bill, but I certainly should hope that hon. gentlemen will allow it to be read the first time, so that it may be distributed amongst members, and if it is not such a Bill as we can generally approve, we may be able to put it in a shape which will be generally acceptable. The paper I hold in my hand is the report of the Committee of the Hamilton Board of Trade on the distribution of assets of insolvent traders. It sets forth this:

"Resolved,—That this Board is of the opinion that the commercial interests of the Dominion require a statute law which shall provide for the equitable distribution of the estates of insolvent traders; that this Board approves of the Committee's report just read, and directs the President and Secretary to transmit a copy thereof to the hon. the Minister of Justice, with a request that the Government prepare a Bill embodying the provisions of said report, for the action of Parliament during the present Session.

"Your Committee have considered the matters referred to them, and recommend that Parliament be asked to enact a law which shall embrace the following provisions:—

"1. As to when a trader shall be deemed insolvent. Your Committee adopt the provisions of the Insolvent Act of 1875 and amending Acts in this respect. See section 3, sub-sections a to k inclusive.

"2. A trader unable to meet his engagements may make a voluntary assignment of his estate for the general benefit of his creditors, to the Sheriff of the county in which he has his chief place of business. The Sheriff shall be guardian of the estate till the creditors appoint a trustee.

"3. When a trader has committed an act of insolvency, any creditor having an unsecured claim of $200 or more, may apply to the County Judge for a writ of attachment, and the Judge, on being satisfied by affidavits filed that such trader is insolvent, shall direct a writ of attachment to be placed in the hands of the Sheriff of the county in which the trader has his chief place of business. The Sheriff shall seize and attach all the estate and effects of such insolvent trader, and summon him to appear before the Judge to answer said writ. The trader may, within five days after service, petition the Judge to set aside the writ. The Sheriff shall be guardian of the estate till the creditors appoint a trustee."

I do not propose to read the whole document, but I have read the first three or four clauses for the purpose of showing that an important Board of Trade, comprised of gentlemen who are all commercial men, and understand what are the wants of the commercial community in this respect. We know from the time that the Insolvent Act was repealed by this House that there has been a very strong feeling on the part of commercial men that, whether we should have an Insolvent Act or a Bankrupt Act proper, we certainly should have such machinery known to the law as will enable creditors to divide an estate, whatever it may amount to, among those who are justly entitled to it. I hope my hon. friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) will allow, in spite of the principles for which he has fought so sturdily in this House and country, will allow the measure, at all events, to be read the first time, and will give his valuable assistance in promoting such a measure as the country really demands.

Mr. SHAW. I have no objection to the Bill being read the first time. I think it is fair to the hon. gentleman who has introduced it that it should be read the first time and afterwards fully considered. At the same time I am opposed to the Bill, and I take this opportunity of saying so. The difficulty with the late Insolvent Act was not the right or wrong of the Act but the administration of the law, and the same difficulty apparently will exist in regard to this Bill should it become law. There is no doubt that an equal distribution of the assets of debtors should take place, but the taking of property out of the hands of the debtor and dividing it amongst the creditors generally always seemed to me to increase the credit. Every one who observes the working of an insolvency law in this country must see that there will be a difference of opinion between the city and the rural constituencies on the subject. Amongst the latter I have heard no complaint since the repeal of the Insolvency Act, but in city constituencies I have. One must observe that a large quantity of the goods sold through the country are sold by agents who go around from place to place, and whose object is to get purchasers and to sell goods. They foist goods upon their customers, and more goods are sold than can be paid for. The benefit that has arisen from the repeal of the Insolvency Act has been to prevent extensive credit. Wholesale merchants have found it to be to their benefit to make careful enquiries before they made sales, and not so many sales have been made in consequence. There have been much fewer insolvencies since the repeal of the Act. It is to the benefit of the country generally that we should have no insolvency law. We have not a great deal of foreign commerce; we are not largely exposed to the loss of ships, or to great accidents. The necessity for the Act, if there be any, seems to arise from inland trade and in country places, and I certainly feel disposed to oppose the enactment of any Bill of this description, I think it would only be the commencement of further legislation which would be found necessary to discharge debtors. The whole matter is involved in great difficulty, but as there are few complaints that come from the country, and complaints only exist amongst commercial men, who are the sellers, I think we are better without an Insolvency Act. Two parties should be considered in all such legislation, the seller and the buyer. Most merchants seem to desire an Insolvency Act, because it is for their own benefit, but if the purchaser does not want an Insolvency Act, his opinion should be considered as well. He has a right to say in what way goods are to be sold—whether on credit or for cash; and if he believes that the absence of an Insolvency Act will tend to a better system of commercial transactions throughout the country, his view should be considered as well as that of the creditor.

Mr. GAULT. Speaking on behalf of the commercial community of Montreal, I believe it is their desire that such a Bill as the present should become law. It is not an Insolvency Bill, but a Bill for the distribution of the assets of insolvent debtors. I know of many instances myself where failures have taken place and the interests of many creditors swept aside altogether. I may mention an instance of one debtor who came to Montreal and said to his creditors: "I will give you 50 cents on the dollar, and if you do not take that, you will get nothing." The creditors took the estate, and I believe they realized over 60 cents on the dollar from it. I know there are many instances of this kind, and I think this Bill should, at least, be allowed to pass its first reading.

Mr. FLYNN. When the Bill for the abolition of the Insolvent Law was introduced into this House, I opposed it, because I believed then, as I do now, that it was necessary in the commercial interest of this country that we should have an Insolvent Law on our Statute-book. The reason given for the introduction of that Bill was that the estate of insolvents were to a great extent wasted, and went into the hands of official assignees, and not into the pockets of the creditors. If such was the case, I held that it was altogether the fault of the creditors, because the moment a trader became insolvent, he placed his affairs in the hands of an assignee, who called a meeting of the creditors, who dealt with the estate as they saw fit; and, therefore, if the estate was wasted, I contended that it was the fault of the creditors, and that there was an unfair prejudice aroused in this country against the Insolvent Law. Now, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) says that there is no necessity for an Insolvent Law to-day, because this country is so prosperous; he says that there are no longer any soup kitchens in the country. If that is the case, I am glad of it; but let me tell him that many traders who had to succumb to the depression which existed from 1874 to 1878, if they had not been able to take advantage of the Insolvent Law, would not have been able to start again in business, although their failure was due to no dishonesty or fault on their part. Now, under our present system, the debtor can either make a preferential assignment to one of the creditors, thus defrauding the others, or, if he is unable to pay 100 cents on the dollar, and there is a hard creditor who insists on the pound of flesh and will not give him a release, he cannot do business again perhaps for years and years; and the effect of the system is, therefore, to drive many a man out of the country to do business in the United States. Therefore, I say that the prejudice aroused against the Insolvent Law was a meaningless one. While we are not aware of the character of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for West Toronto, I think it is nothing but fair that the House should allow it to pass its first reading, and then we can see what is in it and discuss it intelligently; and I trust that if it is introduced there will be a sufficient majority in this House to restore to this country what I consider a prime necessity, and that is, an Insolvent Law.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope hon. gentlemen on the other side will see that the "brute majority," as they were termed last night, can at least extend an act of courtesy to a fellow member who rises to address the House. I gave way to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, because he seldom addresses the House, and when he does he does it with courtesy and ability. The hon. member who proposes to introduce a Bill providing for the distribution of insolvent estates, in answer to a question of mine, states that he did not provide in it for the discharge of an insolvent debtor. During two or three years of the early part of my parliamentary experience, I always voted against propositions made for the repeal of the Insolvent Law; I thought that during a period of depression such as we were passing through, it was a simple act of mercy to permit an Insolvent Act to stand on the Statute-book, which would relieve the honest debtor when he parted with his property, when there was no fraud, when in many cases he was made insolvent through losses which he could not control. But, in 1877, a material change was made in the Insolvent Act as it then stood; and on that occasion I certainly did reverse my vote; and I remember the courtesy which was extended to me one afternoon when there was no particular excitement in the House, and when I rose on the other side to endeavor in a very few words to explain my course with regard to the Insolvent Act. I remember that the courteous majority on this side of the House kept me standing there for several minutes before I could make myself heard, by the slamming of desks, cat-calls, tin whistles, the playing of a jews' harp by a Cabinet Minister, the squeezing of toy balloons, and the many howls and noises with which I was greeted on that side of the House. I succeeded, however, in stating, what is reported in a few lines, that I had changed my opinion on the Insolvent Act, because I considered that it was a crying injustice that men should be compelled to go into insolvency, and have their property thrown into the vortex of the official assignee's hopper, from which it would never come out again, and that they would never get a discharge unless they paid 50 cents on the dollar and made some special application that they were likely to fail in. I felt that an Insolvent Law containing such provisions was worse than a mockery, and I was glad when it was wiped off the Statute-book. I remember with what unfeeling logic those amendments were used by the hon. gentleman who brought them in—the then hon. Minister of Justice and the present leader of the Opposition. I was struck by the tone of his arguments, and by the evidence that he had apparently no sympathy for those people who were struggling in the darkest hours of adversity, and when bankruptcies were piling up, day after day and week after week, to the extent of about $30,000,000 a year. Among those thrown into bankruptcy there were undoubtedly fraudulent men. There were undoubtedly men who went into bankruptcy for the purpose of cheating their creditors, but there were many more who were unjustly forced into insolvency at a time when no man's estate, suddenly brought under the hammer, would bring 50 cents on the dollar of its valuation, to say nothing of paying 50 cents on the dollar to the creditors. There was a slaughter market in Canada, not only brought about by the competition of American manufactures with ours, but also brought about by the sales by assignees of stock in bankruptcy which made property almost valueless, of that particular kind that comes most frequently into the hands of the assignees. It is well known that many men could have tided over their difficulties had a few months delay been granted them and not have incurred the disgrace of being put into the Insolvent Court; but the law provided that a man could be thrown into bankruptcy upon the default of $100 or $200, and we all know what became of a man's property when an official assignee got possession of it. I believe that in a debt due me of $400, I got something like a dividend of 81 cents, through the courtesy of the official assignee, who, I suppose, got 10 or 15 per cent. out of the estate. A greater mistake could not be conceived than the amendment made to that particular section. That amendment reads as follows:—

"Section 65 is amended by adding thereto the words: Provided always that the Judge shall not grant any discharge under this section, in any case, unless some one of the following conditions be fulfilled, that is to say, that a dividend of not less than 50 cents on the dollar on the unsecured claims has been or will be paid out of the insolvent's property; or that such a dividend might have been paid but for the negligence or fraud of the assignee or inspectors; or that the insolvent had, on some one day prior to the proceedings in insolvency mailed, prepaid and registered, to the address of all his creditors, so far as known to him, a declaration acknowledging his insolvency, and that no proceedings in insolvency had been instituted against the insolvent for more than a month after the mailing of such notice, and that such a dividend would have been paid but for circumstances for which the insolvent cannot justly be held responsible arising more than one month after the mailing of such declaration."

It is evident, from those three propositions, that there was no desire to show any mercy to the unfortunate bankrupt. A dividend of 50 cents on the dollar might or might not have been paid out of his property, but it is evident he could have no possible control over it, and it is well known that when a man is suffering under the depression that arises out of complicated misfortunes which compel him to give his property and place him, as it were, out of the pale of business men, he loses his judgment and his ability, in a great measure, to direct his affairs, while he is also deprived of all sort of control, either by advice or otherwise, over the

rapacious assignee who wants simply to make a fee and close out the affair to his best advantage regardless of the interests of either debtor or creditor. How was he to benefit by the second clause, which throws on him the onus of proving negligence or fraud on the part of the assignee or inspector, the man who has fattened out of the money wrung from him? How is he to reach this man? How is he, in any way, to prove a condition of this kind? Then every one knows that men, particularly those men, fall into bankruptcy through perfect honesty, but through lack of judgment are not likely to sit down deliberately thirty days in advance to mail a letter to each creditor, telling him that the debtor is insolvent. I cannot conceive there could ever be a case of that kind, because every man is hopeful. No man believes, until he reaches the precipice, that he is not going to escape. Those three propositions were the propositions that induced me to vote against the Insolvent Act in toto. At that time I was unable, owing to the extraordinary courtesy which was extended to me by the dominant majority, who always extended those courtesies, abetted and encouraged by the gentlemen who sat on the front benches, to make any extended explanation in regard to my position on that Bill. But the proposition of my hon. friend which has been brought in, and which, upon the questions I asked him, seems to embrace no provision for the discharge of an insolvent, has enabled me, while I propose to urge that his Bill may be introduced—for that is a courtesy due to a gentleman of eminent standing in the legal profession who takes the pains to bring up a measure of this kind—to make clear my position on this question. While I intend to urge that the Bill be brought in, I by no means pledge myself to support the principle of the Bill, or to say that I am in favor at the present moment of renewing the Insolvent Laws on our Statute-books. There are periods of depression when Bankruptcy Acts become necessary, and there are also periods when it is not desirable to have such laws. In fact there are many gentlemen of wide commercial experience, sound views and great legal acumen, who always oppose anything in the shape of a proposition looking to the discharge of a debtor in the Bankruptcy Courts. Many hon. gentlemen opposite are strongly impressed with this view, and we know there was a good deal of prejudice on the part of hon. gentlemen from the Province of Quebec in the former Parliament against the Act, because it did not permit farmers to have the benefit of it. There were propositions, I think, made once or twice to amend the law in that direction. The Act of 1877, as I said before, was passed largely amending the Insolvent Act, making it far more stringent in its provisions. I felt it my duty to reverse my vote upon that occasion, and mainly on account of the more stringent provisions that had been thrown around the discharge of the bankrupt—that the Bankrupt Act might not be a refuge for roguery, which, I conceive, such an Act may be made. But there were thousands of honest men, struggling under misfortune, to whom that Act was the only possible avenue of escape, men with their families depending upon them, men utterly crushed, many of them because they had been weak enough to be sureties for others, without any improper act of their own. I do not think that those men should be kept under the harrow, year after year, when there was a means of relieving them which did no possible harm to any one. The storm passed over. It is a matter of controversy between ourselves and hon. gentlemen opposite what was the cause of the clouds rising so suddenly, of the reappearance of the clear sky, and the return of the old prosperity. There may be honest differences of opinion on the subject. For my part, this return of prosperity was largely owing to the fact that, upon the 17th of September, 1878, the people of Canada reversed the verdict which had been snatched from them in January, 1874, and requested certain gentlemen to retire from the trust; and that verdict stated, in unmistakable tones, that they had not administered acceptable to the majority of the people of Canada. We had an issue that was fairly tested, and that was so clear that no man could mistake it. That issue had been mis-stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, and declared not a fair one. They have attempted to say that we did, as we know they did—deceive the people and filch a verdict from them. But the hon. member for Centre Huron, when the proposition for Protection was brought forward by Sir John A. Macdonald, stated that he was glad that we had now, for once, a direct issue that was known, upon which we were standing, and that the people of Canada could not mistake—upon which we went to the polls. There was no misunderstanding of it at that time; but they were glad to make out there had been such a misunderstanding when they found the people had pronounced against them. The returning weight of prosperity diminished the bankruptcies greatly. The Insolvent Law had been repealed, and although it was falsely charged by certain hon. gentlemen, who are arguing against the fact of returned prosperity, that the disasters of 1879 were to a certain extent chargeable upon the incoming Administration—which they stated had failed to produce the prosperity that they had promised, and which hon. gentlemen opposite insisted should spring up in a night, like Jonah's gourd—those bankruptcies were hastened, accumulated and swollen up by the fear that the Insolvent Act would be repealed; and men who were in a condition which made them fear they would require to take advantage of it, hurried into insolvency, while others were brought into it by their creditors, prior to the final repealing of the Act. Hence the number of bankruptcies in 1879 was swollen beyond the proportions possible under other circumstances. The Bankruptcy Act was repealed; still the iron hand was upon the poor unfortunate insolvent. The section which I have read still held the man who had been ground through the mill of the Insolvent Act powerless. Well, I wish to give all credit and thanks to an hon. gentleman who introduced a Bill to relieve those struggling unfortunates. There was no reason for keeping them any longer under the harrow. They have been stripped of everything, and were comparatively few; for it is almost always the case that the misfortune that attaches to a Bankrupt Act falls upon the honest and not the dishonest man. The crushed and helpless debtors and their ruined families were likely to be tormented by those creditors from whom they could get no discharge, and those poor men were proper objects of the commiseration of this House. My hon. friend from Prince Edward therefore brought in a Bill to relieve them, to his honor be it said, which Bill met with the general acceptance of this House. But the hon. member for West Durham still fastened his relentless grip upon the unfortunate debtors. He opposed in the strongest language the adoption of that humane proposition, employing the strongest language and using much the same arguments offered, with that skill of which he is a master, as a special pleader—he introduced almost the same arguments he introduced before. But the effect upon the hon. gentleman's followers was not what he anticipated. Member after member rose in his place and sustained the proposition of the hon. member for Prince Edward, and at length, after very considerable debate, most of those who spoke on the subject took strong ground in its favor, for there could be nothing that could more appeal to the hearts and sympathies of hon. members than that proposition: an evident fact that they were entirely in sympathy with them. That debate continued. A proposition was brought in for a six months' hoist, which was negatived. A vote was then taken upon the Bill, and in a thin house of 133 members, ninety-nine voted in its favor, and thirty-four voted against it, and I fail to see in that division the name of the hon. member for West Durham.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Read the names.

Mr. PLUMB. I will read the names with great pleasure:

YEAS: Anglin, Bain, Béchard, Bolduc, Brown, Burpee (St. John), Burpee (Sunbury), Cameron (Huron), Cartwright, Chariton, Dumont, Grandbois, Gunn, Hesson, Jackson, King, Landry, La Rue, McCallum, McKay, Malouin, Merner, Méthot, Olivier, Paterson (Grant), Perrault, Pinsonneault, Rinfret, Rouleau, Rymal, Scriver, Trow, Wiser, Yeo—34.

An hon. gentleman behind me says he does not recognize the hon. member for West Durham. Well, the hon. member for West Durham having made a speech against the measure, and finding that it was likely to be overwhelmingly passed, if my eyes did not deceive me, remained somewhere beside the Speaker's Chair, while at least a portion of the division was going on, but did not record his vote. It seemed to me to be one of those occasions when an hon. gentleman should have had the courage of his opinions. I am glad indeed that a large majority of this House took a different view from the hon. member for West Durham, and that among those were some of the chiefest of his followers. I am also much obliged to my hon. friend, my genial friend, my knightly friend, the hon. member for Westmoreland, for requesting me to read the names and giving me an opportunity of reviewing that record. Sir, I would like very much if the House could see its way clear to permitting my hon. friend for West Toronto to bring in his Bill. I do not think it is desirable in any case when an hon. member perfectly competent to do so has taken the pains to prepare a measure—and we all know that my hon. friend is perfectly competent, and would not bring in a measure unless he had taken pains with it—I think as a matter of course the House ought to allow the hon. member to introduce his Bill. It is sometimes the case that the House refuses to accept a new proposition. I know nothing of this Bill, but the general principle has been one that has often been discussed in the House, and I have no doubt that if there are objectionable features in the Bill he will be willing to modify it, and none of us, I fancy, would commit ourselves to the proposed Bill by sanctioning its introduction into this House. I am afraid that in making this explanation I have taken up more time than I intended to when I arose. I do not wish, on any occasion, to have it considered that when I make a speech in the House the 119th Psalm shall be appended by way of making it shorter. I observe that my hon. friend has a notice on the paper to introduce another Bill, the purport of which may, perhaps, obviate or neutralize the objections which have been made against this Bill. This is an Act for the discharge of past insolvent debtors. I do not know exactly who is meant by that. I dare say he will strike out the past tense, and will make a little grammatical correction which is quite in accord with the critical gentlemen on the other side of the House, who are nothing if they are not grammatical, and certainly nothing if they are not critical. My right hon. friend suggests an amendment to my expression; he says they are nothing if they are not grammatical, and they are nothing if they are; but that, I think, might be discourteous, and if I make the statement I withdraw it immediately. However, I may say this: that in a certain grammatical sense they are just now very forcibly in the objective case, and I can tell these hon. gentlemen that I believe I speak the sentiments of the people of Canada when I tell them that they would not be very soon in the possessive. I notice that whenever they make an attack they have to defend themselves before they have got half through with it. I trust it will be the opinion of the House that my hon. friend have leave to bring in his Bills, the one, I fancy, to a certain extent explains the other. As a layman I should apologize to distinguished members of the bar, who wear silk gowns and sit in high places in the Courts, for having ventured to have made an address upon a subject which to a large extent is a technical one, and one which is best dealt with by the profession; but as a man of some experience in business, as one having seen several great crises pass over the country, having seen the operation of Bankruptcy Acts and Insolvency Laws, having been old enough to remember when it was considered the best thing that could be done with a man who was in debt was to imprison him for life by way of recovering the money, having seen that punishment modified into gaol limits one mile square, and that again abolished as a relic of barbarism, and Insolvency Laws enacted by which estates were pretty fairly distributed, I think a measure such as that proposed by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) should always meet with the consideration of the House. I say, in closing, that Insolvency Laws should, upon general principles, be so framed as to give every encouragement to a trader who falls into difficulties to give up his property promptly and fairly, and to feel he is not dealing with an inveterate and implacable foe, but with a sympathizing friend who is inclined to help him as far as possible in his difficulties. But with the Insolvent Act as amended, it was like a death blow to any sensitive man and man of honor to place himself under the operation of the Act. The law has worked very well in the United States. Insolvency Acts have been passed during periods of depression, and have subsequently been modified, and when periods of depression returned they have again been enacted. A sweeping Bankruptcy Act was passed after the crisis of 1826-27, another was passed about 1847. These were periods of great crisis in the commercial history of the country; another was in 1857, another was in 1861, and another, more terrible than all, was in 1873. But there never has been any exhibition of harshness towards creditors there. One reason of the great prosperity of the United States, of the great activity of its business men, is that all men supposed to have dealt fairly and honestly, always meet with a candid response from their creditors when they make an assignment and surrender their property, and those disasters fall upon the most active, enterprising and industrious men, who are promoting large, speculative and new enterprises. It is to the credit of the United States, as it is to its advantage, that those men have not been kept under the harrow, and I can point to some of the most wealthy men in the United States who, having been placed in hopeless circumstances, have, by the generosity of their creditors, and by the beneficent operation of the Bankruptcy Law, have been relieved, and have paid their debts in full, dollar for dollar, afterwards, when prosperity returned to them, which never would have occurred except under the operation of such a law. I trust the hon. member for West Toronto will be permitted to introduce his Bill.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The subject proposed to be dealt with by the Bill is one of great importance and one which Parliament can deal with. We cannot discuss the merits of the Bill because it is not before the House; hon. members may discuss the abstract proposition as regards such a law, and it is therefore only due to the hon. member, who has undoubtedly given a good deal of thought and consideration to the subject, that he should have an opportunity of submitting his Bill to the House. It is due to the hon. gentleman as a matter of courtesy, and I think as a matter of right, as the subject is one in which the country has much interest.

Mr. McCALLUM. I have no objection to the hon. member introducing the Bill; but I understood from his remarks that it was framed in the interest of the creditor not of the debtor, and that it is merely to divide the property fairly among the creditors. There have been great doubts as to the advantage of Bankruptcy Laws formerly. I think the law is all right as far as the collection of debts is concerned; if a trader sells goods to a party the law should enable him to collect the debt if the man is able to pay it. There are, however, a great many wholesale dealers in this country who send out agents, and force goods on the people—in fact, many purchasers buy more goods than they should buy; and the dealers now want the power to place such men in insolvency the moment they are unable to pay and divide the property among themselves. Under the old system of bankruptcy, no one received any money except the assignee. I admit that after great crises a Bankruptcy Law may be necessary, and this practice has been followed in the United States. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) has pointed out that these propositions on the subject have been introduced by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), but this, the fourth proposition, is no better, but in some respects worse than those made by that hon. gentleman. When the Bankruptcy Law was in operation, and notices of assignment were sent me, I would not pay the expenses to look after them, because I received nothing in the end. I do not want a renewal of that system. It was almost a premium, based on rascality, in this way, that when a man entered into business, obtained credit, and succeeded, all was well, but, if he failed, he simply went through the Bankruptcy Court, got white-washed, and commenced business again. Speaking as the representative of a rural constituency, I consider it my duty to oppose, at the present time, the enactment of any Bankrupt Law in any shape. I do not say that, if the circumstances of the country should change, that a Bankruptcy Law might not be desirable, but, under existing circumstances, with the trade of the country prosperous and every man obtaining a fair day's wages for a fair day's work, we do not want a Bankruptcy Law.

Mr. SPROULE. It may appear a little unfair to express an opinion on a Bill which has not been read the first time, but the fact appears to be that from the experience of the past we are disposed to look with suspicion on any Bill which seems to tend in the direction of reviving the Insolvent Act. From the first law of the kind—the one passed I think in 1864—down to the time when the last law was repealed in 1879, the tendency of these laws appears to have been to put a premium on dishonesty more than anything else. They were passed in the interests of two classes—the wholesale men on the one side and the retail men on the other. The wholesale men were then, as now, in the habit of sending their travellers throughout the country, who did their best to sell all the goods they could, and in many cases they sold to irresponsible men, men of low standing and little honesty, and there was a strong temptation held out for men to go into lines of business of which they had no knowledge, the inevitable result being the ultimate ruin of both parties. These men sold the goods on the principle of long credits, and said to themselves that some of the goods would be sold; that they would get, at any rate, a share of the profits, and, if the crash came, they would go in with the others and get their share in the distribution of the assets. Then it was claimed that the Insolvency Act was in the interest of the trader, because there were many provisions of the law which allowed those who were disposed to be honest to take advantage of it, and compromise with their creditors, and the result was that many men became insolvent once, and some as many as three or four times, and that they made money by every operation. On the other hand, the honest man who was struggling with poverty and unable to make his way, who might have accounts with these debtors, had to take his share with the rest so far as the estate would allow. Then the system of assignees who very often absorbed almost the whole of the estate, and the debtor was left without being able to get a discharge. His debts were not paid, and the stigma of dishonesty rested upon him so that he was worse off than before. To what class of men do these remarks apply? We will say that two men start in life. One man is a merchant and falls back on the Insolvency Law. He can whitewash himself from any blame and begin anew. The result was to encourage reckless speculation. Men went into businesses for which they were unfitted, and in which they had no previous experience, without any of the consideration which a judicious and right thinking man would have employed before making such a venture. On the other hand, take the case of the mechanic. He starts in business, and although he, perhaps, does not invest so much money as the other, he has to struggle with many difficulties, not merely in the way of business, but perhaps he has had sickness in his family, and under the pressure of circumstances he is compelled to succumb. The sheriff comes down on him and he is sold out, while the other can always fall back on the benefits of the Insolvency Act. Under that Act no protection was afforded for a very large class compared with the merchant, for whom it was specially intended, and this numerous class had not the chance of starting life de novo as the others had. We are always harping about the few that break down under these circumstances, but there is a very numerous class outside of this, such as farmers, mechanics, tradesmen and laboring men, who are entitled to much more consideration, on account of their numbers, than the class described as traders. There is no doubt that the last decisive verdict given by this House against the Insolvent Acts was such as to leave the impression on the country that it was not believed that such legislation was in the interests of legitimate trade, and that, in short, insolvent Laws had a tendency rather to make men deal in a way not considered honest by respectable people. Moreover, when the Act was done away with, we did not find any strong outcry in favor of its renewal. There was nothing like the objection to its repeal which some led us to expect. Three years have elapsed since that time, and we do not find insolvency increasing. In fact, the reverse is the case, and there is no strong feeling in the country in favor of going back to such a law. Such legislation is intended to benefit the very same class who were largely instrumental in bringing about the disastrous results which they tried to remedy by an Insolvent Law. At all events the principle of a law which affords a protection to one particular class and does not afford a similar protection to a much more numerous body such as the mechanics, farmers, and laboring men, is essentially unjust, and meanwhile it may be unreasonable to raise one's voice against a Bill before it has been read the first time. As I said before, the feeling is so strong against an Insolvent Act that we look with suspicion on anything like an attempt to renew it.

Mr. RICHEY. In common with many other hon. members, I think it is due to the hon. gentleman who has taken the pains to prepare a Bill, which certainly is a response in some measure to the wishes of the commercial community of the country, that he should be allowed to have the Bill read the first time, so that its details may be considered in Committee. The commercial community of the country may not go to the extent of desiring a renewal of a general Bankruptcy Law, but they certainly do go so far as to desire a measure which shall preclude preferential assignments, and at the same time prevent the too active and exacting creditor from reaping the reward of his energy, perhaps to the injury of the honest debtor, or of the creditors at large. These are the reasons which induce me to vote for the first reading of this Bill. It is, of course, unnecessary to say that in doing so I do not commit myself to the details of the measure. With regard to the denunciations which have been pronounced against the Bankruptcy Act which was previously on the Statute-book, I believe that a measure which will not only procure the distribution of the estates of debtors, but will enable them to obtain a discharge from their obligations, so they may be free to again enter into business, is an advantage not only to the debtor but to the country; I hold that it is to the advantage of the country that all the business talent and energy should be free to be expended in the various trades and occupations. One important consideration in connection with measures of this kind is, that under the existing state of the law frauds are frequently perpetrated, as for instance when a man receives credit from friends, who find that soon an old creditor comes along and sweeps away all the goods which the trader has thus obtained. For these reasons, I shall unite with those gentlemen who have expressed themselves as disposed to vote for the first reading of this Bill; and if the hon. gentleman who has charge of it will move at the second reading to refer it to a Committee where all the details may be considered, I think a measure may be arrived at which will meet all the necessities of the case.

Mr. HESSON. I have very little sympathy with a Bill of this kind. It may be necessary in the interest of the trade of the country, but it is not popular in the country, and I have observed that the members who appear the most anxious to promote a new Insolvent Bill in this House, are as a rule from the cities. I know that the rural constituencies of Canada are not in favor of an Insolvent Act; and representing a rural constituency, I feel called upon to say that a measure, such as the last Insolvent Act, which marked so strongly the distinction between men in trade and commerce and others who make their living by the sweat of their brows, but who could not take advantage of an Insolvent Act to wipe out their indebtedness, is highly objectionable. I feel, therefore, that I have a right to take a position on this question which does not vary much, if any, from the position I took when the Insolvent Act was repealed at a former Session of this House. It may be a want of courtesy on the part of hon. members of this House to object to the first reading of the Bill, and I shall not go so far as to do so, because there may be some good points in it which might be worthy of consideration by an intelligent Committee, to whom, I presume, the Bill would be referred; but I take this opportunity to say that I am opposed to legislation in that direction altogether. I do not think the time has come to require such a measure; on the contrary, the improved condition of the country renders it less desirable than when the Insolvent Act was repealed. Upon that ground, and upon the ground that I feel that the introduction of a Bill, such as I understand this to be, in the interest of those in trade and commerce, and not of those in other branches of business, is objectionable; and although I shall not object to the first reading, I must raise my voice against it on the second reading, if it comes before the House.

Mr. McCUAIG. This Bill is only intended to distribute insolvent estates, and not to grant discharges. As the law stands now, a judgment creditor seizes upon the property of a debtor, and sells it at a great sacrifice—perhaps sells property worth ten dollars for one dollar—to get his own money, to the great loss of the other creditors. As the law stands in Ontario at present, it encourages the sharp business man to sue and get judgment over the other creditors, and once he gets judgment, he can recover his money by sacrificing the property of all the other creditors. As I understand this Bill it is to prevent that, and to enable the property to be fairly divided.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

DISCHARGE OF INSOLVENT DEBTORS.

Mr. BEATY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 137) for the discharge of past insolvent debtors. He said: The object of this Bill is simply to provide means for the discharge of insolvents who are such previous to the passing of this Act. It is not contended that the Act should apply to the time during which it is in force, or run concurrently with that which has just been introduced; it is simply intended to apply to cases of persons who have already given up their estate, in order to enable the creditor to find out whether they have any property or not, and, if they have not been guilty of fraud in connection with their business, and obtained the consent of one-half in number and three-fourths in value of their creditors, to obtain a discharge. Under these circumstances the creditors may ask the Court to enforce the discharge against the creditors who do not agree to it; but that difficulty will only arise in cases where a large number of creditors are in favor of a discharge, but two or three may prevent it from having effect, and the debtor is obliged to struggle against difficulties which he cannot overcome. I do not think that there should be an Insolvent Act with a power of discharge running concurrently with the Act. Persons enter into trade and obtain goods from others knowing that they will be able to obtain a discharge and begin business again.

Bill introduced and read the first time.

DRAWBACKS.

Mr. BOWELL on moving the first reading of a Bill to amend Chapter 12, 44th Victoria, for the allowance of drawback on certain articles manufactured in Canada and used by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, said: Under the Act of last Session the rebate could not be paid until the articles had been used on the railway and it was thought better, after a good deal of correspondence, the manufacturers of these articles should be placed in the same position as those of any other articles of which the raw material is admitted free. I propose simply to substitute the words "to be used" for "used by" the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to add a proviso that before any rebate is made to the manufacturer, the manufacturer shall give a bond to the Customs Department that these articles shall be used for no other purpose than that for which they are sold, and in case they should not be so used the Canadian Pacific Railway pledge themselves to pay back to the Government the rebate allowed. The Department obtains from the railway authorities an account of the exact quantity of materials used in the construction of every mile of railway, and according as certain portions of the contract is completed, the Department will ascertain whether a larger amount of goods has been imported free than was necessary, and in that case the railway company under their bond, will be called on to pay the duty on any goods imported in excess of requirements.

Mr. BLAKE. It would be very material to us to have all the correspondence and papers moved for in this connection, in order to discuss this Bill thoroughly, I do not propose--on a mere statement of the hon. gentleman--to enter into any discussion on its merits now. It appears to me, however, from the hon. gentleman's explanation, that the measure is one authorizing him to pay public moneys which, under the Statute, he would not be entitled to pay. It appears to me that a measure of this description, dealing with public funds in that way, was one which ought to be initiated upon resolution in Committee of the Whole, and not on a Bill, and, although it does not appear so, it is a notice, which is a mere notice, to introduce a Bill to amend the Act; and the hon. gentleman will probably find himself, on the second reading of this Bill, in a fatal difficulty, in prosecuting it further, if it turns out that it ought to be initiated by resolution. Therefore I take the liberty of calling his attention to that resolution.

Mr. BOWELL. I followed the course pursued by the hon. the Finance Minister in introducing that Bill last Session. If it is ruled that it must be introduced by resolution, I will not push the motion now. The Bill authorizes the payment of public funds in the shape of drawbacks. The old Bill provided that the manufacturers should be paid a sum out of the public revenue, not exceeding the duty which will be paid, if the articles they used were imported for a certain purpose. It was found in working it practically that we could not pay under that Bill any portion of the money until the article had actually gone into construction. What I ask the House to do is simply to put the Government into precisely the same position they occupy in reference to the Tariff resolutions, which, I think, are introduced by resolution in the first place, and to enable them to pay the money at another period.

Mr. BLAKE. Quite so; but it is an anticipated theory, and it is dealing with public money contrary to law; and, as my hon. friend the member for Lambton says, there is a question of trade involved.

Mr. BOWELL. I am content to let the motion stand as a notice.

Motion allowed to stand.

MILITIA RETURNS.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would like to ask the Government when the militia returns I asked for some time ago are likely to appear. On Monday the Minister of Militia promised to have these papers down to-day. I understand General Luard is leaving the country on a long visit, and these papers have been kept by the Government until he is safely away.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Minister of Militia, who is not present, promised they would be ready to-day or to-morrow. He thought one would be laid before the House to-day; but I think they will be on the Table to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The General will be away to-morrow.

IMPERIAL MEASURE.

Mr. MASSUE, in the absence of Mr. BENNETT, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to prohibit absolutely the use of any measure other than the Imperial measure in the sale of grain, &c.?

Mr. MOUSSEAU. It is not the intention of the Government to prohibit absolutely the use of any other measure other than the Imperial measure; freedom is left to the trader to sell by weight, or by the bag, but when he sells by measure, it must be by the Imperial gallon.

PORT OF ENTRY IN CHESLEY.

Mr. GILLIES enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish a port of entry in Chesley, situated on the Port Dover, Stratford and Lake Huron Railway, and if so, when?

Mr. BOWELL. The application made for the establishing of an out-port in Chesley has been referred to the Inspector of Customs to report, and as soon as he makes his report I shall be enabled to state whether an out-port will be established or not.

MONUMENT TO THE MEMORY OF SIR GEORGE CARTIER.

Mr. HOUDE, in the absence of Mr. Tassé, enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take action in relation to the credit of $10,000, voted last Session, for the purpose of erecting a monument to the memory of Sir George Cartier?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the intention of the Government.

LIGHTHOUSES IN LOTBINIÈRE.

Mr. RINFRET enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to retain lights in the lighthouses constructed in 1880 in the Parish of St. Emilie, county of Lotbinière?

Mr. McLELAN. These lighthouses were erected to serve the new channel that is being dredged. Till it is completed the old channel is served by those lights, which will be removed to the new channel when it is finished.

COMPENSATION TO JOSEPH CHARLES LISLOIS.

Mr. CASGRAIN enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to compensate Joseph Charles Lislois for the burning of his building near the Intercolonial Railway; if so, in what amount; if not, why not?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That matter was referred to the official arbitrator, who has reported that it is proved that the spark-arrester was in good order, and consequently that the Government are not liable.

CLAIM OF LUCIEN MORIN.

Mr. CASGRAIN enquired, Why the Government has not yet paid the claim of Lucien Morin as to expropriation and damages in the Parish of St. Rochs des Aulnets, in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, both as respects last year and the preceding year?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That matter was referred to Mr. Simard, one of the official arbitrators, who reported that the amount of money required to be paid for the claim in this case had been offered to him judicially and had been declined. The claimant has requested permission to appoint an arbitrator, which, of course, cannot be allowed; but the matter has been referred to the full Board for their adjudication.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That was for the past year, but not for this year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is to cover the whole case. The matter being referred to Mr. Simard, he reported in favor of paying for each of the ballast pits $100, and for the right of way to the ballast pits in order to use them, and annual rent of $2; and for 100 feet of length, 40 feet width, during the time it was in use for the removal of the embankment after the track was removed, $30. All this was offered Morin and declined. He requested the Department to appoint an arbitrator, which cannot be allowed. The whole subject, with the evidence taken before Mr. Simard, the official arbitrator, has been referred to the full Board.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That was the previous year, but not for the second year.

WORKS CONNECTED WITH THE APPROACH TO ISLE AUX NOIX.

Mr. BOURASSA enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to complete the works connected with the approach to Isle aux Noix, and, if so, whether they intend to place in the Supplementary Estimates a sum sufficient for the completion of the said works?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not in a position to give an immediate answer to the hon. member, but I can tell him that the question is engaging my attention at present.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bill was read the third time and passed:—
Bill (No. 20) respecting the Portage, Westbourne and North-Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Boulton.)

The following Bills were considered in Committee, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 60) to incorporate the Ottawa, Waddington and New York Railway and Bridge Company.—(Mr. Currier.)

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Canada Mutual Telegraph Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 62) to incorporate the Lake Athabaska and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria.)

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT.

The House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 11) to amend the Criminal Law and to extend the provisions of the Act respecting offences against the person.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The Bill is now presented as amended by the Select Committee, to which it was referred, who took as their basis the suggestions made by the First Minister. As hon. gentlemen have the Bill in their hands there is not much necessity for explaining it. The amendments made by the Committee were made unanimously. I move the adoption of the first clause.

Mr. OUMET. I do not see why we should pass legislation in this House which is in force in no other country. It is legislation which has been deemed unnecessary in other countries, and I do not see why we should adopt such exceptional legislation here which will be, as it is, rather a bad certificate of our people to other countries. I move in amendment that the Committee do now rise.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). My hon. friend is opposing the Bill on the ground that this offence is not made a criminal or statutory offence in any other country. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to look into the laws of other countries he would never have committed himself to such an announcement. There are few countries in the world except England and Canada which have not made this offence a statutory offence. It is a statutory offence in Illinois, Ohio, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, New Jersey, Mississippi, Texas, Arkansas, Maine, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota. It is a criminal offence in India and some of the Continental States. When I moved the second reading of the Bill, I gave some instances which I thought would justify Parliament in legislating in this direction, and to show that it would rather be a disgrace, I was going to say, if we did not pass such a Bill. It has always appeared a marvellous thing to me, that it has never before been made a statutory crime. I think the hon. the First Minister agreed that it was proper that it should be made a statutory offence, that it is an offence of a gross and scandalous character, and that a person found guilty of committing it should receive the severest punishment. The hon. gentleman who has moved the amendment knows that in his own Province, not long ago, a man was tried for having committed murder upon the offspring of a connection of the kind here provided against, and I know of three cases in which the offence has been committed, and the persons tried in a way in which they should not have been tried.

Mr. OUIMET. If there was an instance in my knowledge which would show that this legislation was necessary, I would gladly support the Bill, but I know of no instance in our part of the Dominion which could justify us in adopting such exceptional legislation as this Bill offers.

Mr. IVES. The argument which the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet) has used with regard to this Bill might apply to every provision of the Criminal Law with precisely the same force. He says that to pass such a Bill would give the people of this Dominion a bad certificate of character, and that we should not pass a law which is not in force, as I understand, in the Mother Country. We might say the same thing with regard to the statutory provision against larceny—that it would give a bad impression of our people abroad, that larceny is committed sometimes in Canada notwithstanding the great morality of the people. I do not agree with my hon. friend that the passing of an Act of this kind would have any such effect. If, as he said, there is no necessity for the passing of a law that might be a reason why it should not be passed, but I do not understand that even that would be a very strong reason. If there is no offence of this kind committed, there would be no harm in having the law on the Statute-book. I do not see that either of the hon. gentleman's arguments, that it is not necessary or that it would be a bad certificate of character, is a very strong argument why the Bill should not pass.

Mr. MILLS. This was at one time the law of England; and it was only in consequence of the changes which took place in the functions of the ecclesiastical courts at the time of the Reformation, that there was a change in the execution of the law, which practically did away with the punishment that was attached to the offence. If the power formerly exercised by the ecclesiastical courts had been formally transferred to the criminal courts, this would have been punished the same as other crimes; and it is because we have followed the practice of England since the Reformation, and made no provision for the punishment of this particular offence by official legislation, that it never was a crime here.

Mr. DESJARDINS. If we were revising our criminal code of laws, I would be willing to add this special clause to the general legislation; but I do not see why, there being no cause shown for it, we should make a new law for this special case. Under the circumstances, I approve of the motion that the Committee do now rise.

WITNESSES IN MISDEMEANORS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron), in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 10), to provide that persons charged with misdemeanors shall be competent as witnesses, said: The provisions of this Bill are very short; they are simply that all persons charged with what are known as misdemeanors shall be competent and compellable to give evidence—competent to give evidence in their own behalf, and compellable to give evidence in behalf of the Crown. The provisions of the Bill are confined to misdemeanors. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has a Bill on the paper extending the provisions of the law as it now stands to all crimes of whatever nature. My Bill does not go quite that far; I prefer, in making changes in the Criminal Law, to go slowly, rather than to make changes rapidly, and without, perhaps, sufficient care and consideration. The principle of the Bill is not a new one; it is recognized by Parliament already. In 1878 this Parliament passed an Act making the defendant, in all cases of assault, competent and compellable to give evidence, and making his wife competent and compellable to give evidence also. Two years afterwards the provisions of that Bill were extended to batteries, and that is now the law of the land. That the provisions of that Bill have worked satisfactorily I think is manifest, because there has been no complaint as to its working; it has not been repealed, but still remains the law of the land. Now, I am aware that every change of this kind is opposed at some stage,—if not by a direct issue taken upon the principle of the Bill on the second reading, when the votes can all be recorded and given to the public, so that the public can judge of the conduct of their representatives in Parliament—is opposed in Committee of the Whole, where the votes cannot be recorded, and the public do not know anything about the way in which their representatives vote. I know that provisions of this kind are opposed by a good many lawyers and laymen. Every change that has been made in the Criminal Law for the last hundred years has been strenuously opposed, and it was only by the indefatigable labor of the great law reformers that changes have really been made. There was a time when a prisoner was deprived of the benefit of the clergy and of the benefit of counsel. When attempts were made by the law reformers of that day to make changes in this respect those attempts were strenuously resisted, and it was only after an expenditure of considerable time and labor that these cruel provisions were removed from the Statute-book. There was a time when capital punishment was inflicted for the forgery of a pound note, and when an attempt was made to repeal this provision, an eminent English jurist said that to repeal it would strike a fatal blow at the commercial business and prosperity of the country; and there was a time when neither a plaintiff nor a defendant was allowed to give evidence in his own behalf whether the amount was large or small. That law was changed, but only after a long struggle. Why, only thirty or forty years ago in England, and still later in this country, neither the defendant nor the plaintiff, nor the wife of either, was competent or compellable to give evidence, and no person who had the slightest pecuniary interest in the result of the litigation was a competent witness. If a man had been convicted of a felony, although he might have served out his full term of imprisonment, he was not a competent witness. Having been once convicted, the law assumed him to be for ever after incapable of telling the truth. The law has been changed after a good deal of trouble on all these subjects, and no person would now go back to the earlier system. And so with the evidence in civil cases. Why it was only a few years ago when neither the plaintiff nor defendant could give evidence in civil cases whether the amount were $100 or $1,000,000. But that law has been changed, and no one would think of going back to the old system. I recollect when this question was before the House, a year or two ago, that the then hon. Minister of Justice very strongly resisted the extension of the provision of the Bill of 1878, to any other class of crime than that of common assault. The same argument was used that is always used, when any attempt was made to amend the Criminal Law, that to permit the prisoner in a criminal case to give evidence in his own behalf would be to offer a premium and hold out an inducement to the committal of perjury, and very seriously diminish the chances of conviction. It was said also that the change was contrary to the genius and spirit of the English law. These are the old stock arguments against change. The same arguments were used when it was proposed to allow litigants to give evidence in their own cases, but after discussion Parliament consented to the change. Everybody admits that perjury may be committed. It was committed before the change was made, and will be committed until the end of time or until the millennium. The object of all litigation is to obtain the truth in the shortest, best, and speediest way, and that may best be done by hearing every person who knows anything of the subject, whether he be an interested witness or not. How can we, in all fairness, exclude the testimony of the defendant or the prisoner in the case of a common misdemeanor or petty larceny, when you do not exclude it in other cases of much greater gravity. As to the other objection, that to admit this evidence would seriously diminish the chances of conviction, I attach no weight to that. I believe an innocent man has nothing to fear from an examination in his own case, and those who are accustomed to practice in criminal cases know that, under the test of a rigid cross-examination, a man who is telling an untruth will, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, break down. Mr. Crabb Robinson, an English lawyer of note, and a man of letters, who took an interest in this important question, and went further in his views than I propose to go, went to France to examine into the system that prevailed there, and, after a thorough examination, he came to the conclusion that, if he were a guilty man, he would prefer to be tried under the law of England, but, if innocent, he would prefer to be tried according to the law of France. If that statement is correct, there is no reason why, in this country, in the class of cases provided for in my Bill, we should not allow the defendant to give evidence in his own behalf. The third objection is, that it is contrary to the spirit of the English law. That objection is raised against every change made in the Criminal Law for the last half century. But I do not think it is an argument that amounts to anything or that ought to prevail. It is not a new principle that I am embodying in the Bill. It is on the Statute-book of the Dominion now, and my Bill simply proposes to extend it. It is to some extent the law of England, the principle being recognized in a limited sense. Under Mr. Plimssell's Act of 1871, it was made a criminal offence to send a vessel to sea in an unseaworthy condition exposing the lives of seamen to danger. In an indictment against a party under that Act, the defendant was made a competent witness. There is no reason, therefore, why the principle should not be extended to the class of cases provided for in the Bill. Having recognized the principle, I contend you should carry it a step further, and apply it to all cases—but at all events to all cases of misdemeanor. Now, the right to give evidence is limited to one of the parties in the case, namely, the prosecutor; but there is no reason why the defendant should not also be allowed to give his testimony. Let us say he wants to go into the witness box, and, to put his story in opposition to the story of the prosecutor, he wants to tell the jury all the circumstances that make in his favor, to point out the discrepancies in the evidence, and clear up special circumstances that make against him—why should he not be at liberty to do so? The answer of common sense and fair play is that he be allowed to enter the witness box and tell his own story; but the answer of the law is that it cannot be done. Counsel, of course, is there on his behalf to call the witnesses and explain the doubts and circumstances that make against the prisoner. The counsel may suggest doubts as to guilt, and clear up facts in favor of the defendant; but the man who can tell the whole story can say nothing, and in many cases conviction is improperly obtained through that fact alone. I remember reading the case of an English Church clergyman who kept a school. He was charged by two females, pupils, with having committed an outrageous offence; and the girls went into the witness box and told what appeared a plain, unvarnished story, and their examination could not be broken down. The mouths of the defendant and his wife were closed, and the jury, always sympathizing with female purity, found the clergyman guilty. He was sentenced to transportation for five years. A few months afterwards, circumstances turned out that caused suspicion to rest on the story of the girls; the matter was investigated by the Home Secretary and the attorney and solicitor of the unfortunate man, when the Home Secretary became convinced that he was wholly innocent. The girls were then indicted for perjury, and the clergyman and his wife told their story in the witness-box; it was corroborated, and the result was that the two girls were convicted of perjury. The Home Secretary then pardoned the clergyman, who, had he been allowed to tell his story at first, would never have been convicted. His pardon was no great consolation for his unjust, disgraceful sentence, and the six months lost in transportation. I might give the House scores of cases of men convicted of offences which turned out subsequently they never committed, and also many cases of conviction upon circumstantial evidence—cases which would have been all cleared up had the accused been allowed to tell their own story to the jury. Take the case of simple larceny. A man is charged with stealing a piece of goods which is found in his possession within a week after the felony. The Judge tells the jury that all they have to find is that the goods were stolen, and were found in the possession of the accused within a reasonable time after the theft. The law assumes guilt, and throws upon him the responsibility of self-defence—of explaining how he became possessed of the article, without being able to tell his own story—and the result is, in a great many cases, his unjust conviction. There is now a proposition in England to extend this principle of law—the hearing of the accused—to all cases, both misdemeanors and felonies. A Commission was appointed in England to investigate the whole criminal law with a view to its codification, and they recommended that the defendants should be made competent to give evidence in their own behalf in all cases, whether of felonies or misdemeanors. The Attorney General of England introduced a Bill to that effect in 1879, which received the sanction of Parliament to a second reading. The principle of the Bill was recognized. It went to Committee, and considerable progress was made with it, but before its consideration could be completed Parliament rose. In 1880, the Bill was re-introduced and received a second reading, and was sent to the Select Committee, when it met with the same fate. In 1881 the Bill was not introduced, but it is to be re-introduced this year, and I have no doubt, from the recommendation of the principle by the Commission, and from the strong grounds taken upon the subject by English lawyers, that it will become the law of the land. I ask the hon. the First Minister can he justify the practice of allowing an accused to give evidence in his own defence in a case of assault and battery, and refusing him that privilege in a case of libel? That is a quasi-crime and why should defendant be allowed to be examined. There is no valid reason, and so in a nuisance, such as obstructing the highway—in such cases why should the defendant's mouth be closed? There is no reason in the world for it. Upon the whole, I see no reason why the provision of my Bill should not become law, the principle having been recognized.

Mr. McCARTHY. I agree with almost every word that has fallen from the hon. gentleman opposite, and I am inclined, from the Bill which I have introduced and which is on the Orders, to go still further in the same direction than the hon. member appears desirous of proceeding by his Bill. Now there is only one principle in his Bill that I do not think ought to be sanctioned—at all events without some little further explanation. It is a principle of English law, and a principle which I think we shall not be willing readily to depart from, that a man ought not to be compelled to disclose his own crime. We know that a witness is always excused from answering any question which will tend to criminate himself. Therefore, the objection I make to the hon. member's Bill is simply that a witness ought not to be compelled to give evidence, while at the same time it should be open to him to go into the box to explain the circumstances of the offence and tell the whole story. I hope the Government will permit both Bills to go to the Select Committee, before which this matter can be considered with a view to a report of what it deems prudent with regard to the subject. There can be no doubt at all, it appears to me, that where the object of a criminal trial is to arrive at the truth—and that of course ought to be the great object where it is not a trial in order to obtain a verdict against a man who is innocent, at the same time it is not the object to allow a guilty man to escape—it is the very height of absurdity to say that the person who knows most of all about the crime with which he is charged is not to be permitted to go into the witness-box to explain the circumstances connected with the charge. Now that of itself, I think, is a proposition which requires only to be stated to receive almost unanimous consent; and unless objections can be made to it—and I do not know that any objections can be made except those on the score of antiquity, and that the law of England which prevailed for so many years in a contrary direction is to be cited—unless that is an argument then, I think the principle of the Bill—and I may perhaps include also the object of Bill No. 50—should receive the assent of this House. Now what is the objection to it? We know that not very long ago, perhaps not fifty years, in civil cases not only could no party to a suit give evidence, but the law was so absurd that no person who had any degree of interest in the subject of the litigation was deemed to be worthy of credence. It went still further. The law was, as is well known to all those who are concerned in the practice of the profession to which I belong, that if a man had been convicted of a crime, no matter what the crime might be, but on the ground of infamy he was also prohibited from giving evidence in any trial. The absurdity of that took many years, as my hon. friend has stated, to induce the Legislature to amend the law, but gradually from time to time the law was amended, first, by permitting the opposite party to be called, and finally by allowing the party to give evidence in his own behalf, and I do not think any person who has had any experience in the conduct of civil or criminal matters would now desire to return to the law as it was. If in civil matters it is right and proper that people should be allowed to tell their own story—and the party to a litigation must know more about the circumstances than any one else—and ought not to be excluded from the witness-box, how much stronger is the argument in cases where not merely a man's property but his reputation, and possibly his life, may be in danger. Why should a person charged with an offence, against whom circumstances are managed as pointing to his guilt, why did he not be at liberty to open his mouth and to tell, perhaps in a few words, to explain away circumstances which, unexplained, seemed to tell so heavily against him? It is said it will open the door to perjury. No doubt it will. I suppose the more witnesses are called the more there will be of that offence; but I may say in my little experience, that I do not think there is nearly as much perjury committed as perhaps the public are inclined to believe. When I say perjury, I mean that deliberate and wilful mis-statement, with the knowledge that it is mis-statement, which constitutes the crime of perjury. That people, not merely parties to suits but witnesses in suits, do state facts or do make statements which are not facts, I do not think can be reasonably denied, but they have perhaps reasoned themselves into the belief that they are stating what is literally true. I am satisfied they are not guilty of the crime of perjury, or of deliberately mis-stating facts, or making statements contrary to the truth. Now, even if that were so, is that to weigh against the other consideration? Fancy the absurdity of the position. A man is sued for $10; he can be a witness and deny that he ever borrowed it. A man is charged with stealing $10, and, while the prosecutor can go into the witness box, and say he did steal it, and although not the mere paltry sum is at stake, but the man's reputation and character, and his liberty as an individual are at stake, he is not permitted to go into the witness-box and tell his story about it; and so on, illustrations might be given in the same direction, which I need not weary the House with giving. When we look, therefore, at the broad merits of the matter, and when we see objections that can be made to it—and they appear to me to be very trivial—and notwithstanding what the Mother Country may have done in that direction, we ought to proceed and do what is reasonable and just in the amendment of the Criminal Law from time to time. Since I have had the honor to introduce the Bill, I have been favored with one or two suggestions from learned Judges. One learned Judge says that he has taken for many years, great interest in this subject, but he thinks, perhaps, we should not hasten too swiftly. He thinks it would be better merely to extend the law and make the offence a misdemeanor, not exactly in the direction the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) suggests, but in the direction of the Bill which I have had the honor to introduce; and afterwards if that was found to be successful it could be gradually extended so as to include all classes of crimes. The Chief Justice in one of the Courts in Ontario has also had the goodness to send me his views on the subject, and, strange to say, he concurs exactly in the observations which have been made to me in the first place by the learned County Court Judge. I am quite willing the matter should be thus dealt with. It would be a great advance indeed, I think, to have the law amended, if not to that extent, and the difference between my hon. friend—I do not know that there is any substantial difference—would be avoided, as he objects to depart from that bulwark, so to speak, that particular doctrine of the English law which we have in this country, which compels a man to go in and give evidence of his own guilt, that is the law in some cases of assault, and my hon. friend proposes to extend that to all cases of misdemeanor. Now, I think we should just draw the line there. There are cases, I think, when a man ought to have an opportunity to go into the witness-box and tell his story, because if we amend the law in that direction we would have to repeal many of the laws on the Statute-book; but in no case ought a criminal to be compelled to state what might tend to criminate himself. There is one other observation which I propose to make, I do not claim the credit—if there is any credit in connection with the matter—of having framed the Bill which I have the honor to introduce. I take the sections of the Bill from the part of the criminal code to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and it will be found there that protection is extended to witnesses of this class. The subject has received a great deal of consideration from eminent jurists, who agree that a man who is charged with crime, and who goes into a witness-box, should be protected to this extent, that on cross-examination, in the discretion of the Judge, he should be protected from giving a history of his whole life. It may not be known perhaps to all the hon. members of this House, that when a witness goes into the box he is liable, with a view to test his credibility, to be submitted to an examination as to his whole life; he is to tell what he has not done as well as what he has done; he is bound to disclose, or he may decline disclosing on the ground that it would criminate him in charges which would be made against him; whereas the course they pursue in England—and I am inclined to think they are right in that respect—is that they do not permit a man to be interrogated in such a way, not with reference to the crime, but with reference to other transactions which would create a prejudice against him. The learned justice, to whom I refer, makes another suggestion. He thinks that where a person, charged with a crime, does not tender himself as a witness it ought not to be alleged against him. The House will at once understand that if a man charged with a crime has an opportunity of being a witness, and if he declines to tell his story, that would be a very strong presumption against him; it would look as if he dare not go into the witness-box, or was not willing to commit perjury, or if willing to commit perjury, would not dare to pass cross-examination. Well, I am not, I must confess, altogether of the opinion of the learned Chief Justice, notwithstanding it is well worthy of consideration. He makes a suggestion that there ought to be a declaratory part of the enactment, that where the accused had an opportunity, and did not avail himself of it, of going into the witness-box, no Judge nor opposing counsel should be at liberty to allege that against him as any evidence of his guilt. With these observations, I would suggest that both Bills should be referred to a Select Committee, and then, if the House agreed with the principle of them to that extent, the Committee could work out the Bills in one way or another, according to the suggestions that may be made on the second reading.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman, that both these Bills should receive a second reading and go to a Special Committee, who may report upon them for the information of this House. I am inclined very strongly to agree also with the proposition, that for the present, it will be better to confine the Bill to misdemeanors. It is better to have for a year or two, or for some years, the experience of the effect of having accused persons called as witnesses in their own defence in such cases. In cases of felony, especially of capital felony, I think the House should consider well whether the accused, the person charged with murder say, should be placed in the dilemma suggested by the learned Chief Justice to whom my hon. friend has alluded. No matter whether it is stated in the Act or not that it shall not be alleged against him, jurors will know it is the law. Take the case of a man standing his trial for murder. The circumstances are strongly against him, leading the minds of the jury to infer that he is guilty, but still there is not clear, unmistakable, incontrovertible evidence of guilt. If the criminal standing on his trial does not go into the box to explain away the suspicious circumstances, the jury will give great weight to that circumstance, and will, I am afraid, cause the jury to lean strongly against the prisoner. That will soon be known among criminals, it will pass from jail to jail and from lawyer to lawyer, and counsel will be obliged to let his client know that it is evident from the decision of juries that, if a prisoner declines to give evidence in his own favor, it causes the jury to lean against him, and therefore, prisoners, in order to remove the impression from the minds of jurors, will be forced into the box and swear in his own favor. Thus, I fear, the offence of perjury will be added to the crime of murder or other crime for which the man is on trial. That is the danger which has always occurred to me in regard to serious offences, involving, on conviction, imprisonment for a long period, or for life. For that reason, I think it will be well for the present to limit the Bill to misdemeanors. Again, as to making a prisoner a witness against himself, such a proposal is foreign to the principles that have always governed the administration of Criminal Laws. No man should be forced to swear to his own guilt. The hon. gentleman says, in cases of assault, this practice prevails already; but an assault can scarcely be brought within the Criminal Law unless it is made with murderous intent. In ordinary cases of assault, two persons meet together in hot blood, and blows are struck, and the man who can run faster than the other gets out the first warrant, becomes the prosecutor, and he can give his evidence on oath. That offence is more in the nature of a trespass than of a crime, and might be considered trespass against the person instead of property. But, in cases of misdemeanor or felony, the person tried should not be forced to give evidence against himself. I suggest that the two Bills be read the second time, and referred to a Special Committee, which will, no doubt, be able to present a Bill which will be of practical use to the House.

Bill read the second time, and referred to a Special Committee, composed of Messrs. Brooks, Cameron (Victoria), Ives, Guthrie, Ouimet, Beaty, Mousseau, Laurier, Cameron (Huron), and McCarthy.

ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Ives for the second reading of Bill (No. 12), to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1874, read.

Mr. IVES moved that the Bill be now read the second time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon gentleman had better allow the Bill to stand.

Mr. IVES. It seems to me that the Bill had better be withdrawn or else read the second time. I have taken considerable pains to obtain the views of members on both sides of the House, and, although I do not find any great consent as to what should be done, I find that every one is disposed to make a change in the present law. I think almost every one considers that the present law rests on no sound principle. Many members are in favor of doing away with the deposit altogether, others are in favor of the present Bill, and others would make the deposit still higher. The only sound objection I have heard is, that the Bill places a new impediment in the way of candidates presenting themselves. I cannot look at the matter in that light. The present law requires a payment of $50; the Bill merely requires a deposit of $200 for thirty days. Unless a candidate is so straitened in his circumstances that it would be better to pay 300 per cent. interest than a deposit of $200, the law, as I propose it, instead of being an obstacle will make it easier for persons to present themselves as candidates. Unless 300 per cent. interest in these Credit Foncier days is a legitimate rate of interest, the provisions of the Bill make it easier for the candidate than the present law. I have no objection to withdrawing the Bill if it is the wish of the Government, but it seems to me that the Government have had time enough to consider it. It was introduced early in the Session and the order has already stood half-a-dozen times; but, as I stated, if the Government want it withdrawn I will withdraw it. I am not particular, but I am quite satisfied that a majority of the House desire to have the law amended. I think, however, that if the Bill went into Committee we would have an opportunity of learning where the majority lies: whether the House is in favor of doing away with the deposit, whether it is in favor with my proposition, or whether it would increase the deposit. We shall never learn the position of the House unless the Bill goes to a second reading and is referred to a Committee.

Mr. MILLS. I object to the principle of the Bill, as I did to that of a similar measure introduced some Sessions ago. I think its principle is one which will act as an impediment to persons who may be selected as candidates for election to the House of Commons. My impression is that the provision which requires $50 to be deposited is an objection to the law as it stands. If we wish that candidates shall not be spurious—that they shall be genuine—it might be proper to require that a larger number of names should appear on the nomination paper: but I do not think that we should put any impediments in the way of the choice of the electors—but we shall be doing that if we adopt the proposition which the hon. gentleman submits to the House. I am opposed to the principle of the Bill, and if any proposition were made to do away with the deposit of $50, which is now required, I would support it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend who introduced the Bill, says that he will withdraw it if the Government wish that it should be withdrawn. Well, it is not a question which the Government, as a Government, ought to deal with in such a manner as to have any influence with the House. Every hon. gentleman who has been elected to this House knows what elections are; most of them have had opponents, and they are, therefore, as competent to judge of the matter as the Government or any member of the Government. The reason only $50 was inserted in the Bill originally as a deposit, was obvious. It was found that many places, especially in towns and in counties where there were several towns, an opposition was got up just for the purpose of forcing a contest, and having all the fun of an election; and it was said that in the towns that some tavern-keepers, the keepers of shebeens, got up an election contest just for the purpose of reaping the advantages in the shape of increased custom, cab fares, and so on. That was a reason why this particular sum is put in the Bill. The principle of my hon. friend's Bill is one which I believe obtains in the Province of Quebec, where instead of a candidate paying $50 and losing it, he puts up $200, and if the result shows either by his election, that he had a reasonable ground for offering himself, or by his obtaining half the number of the whole votes cast, that it was not a sham candidature, got up merely for the purpose of annoyance, and from a bona fide desire to become a member of Parliament, then his money is returned. Well, so far as I am concerned, I would rather deposit $200, get it back after a reasonable time, than lose $ 0 altogether. It is a question whether we should act upon the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and make the candidature free or have this check. If you have it free I think you will find a great many more vexatious elections than you have now.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman now proposes that there should be an election in every constituency.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course in every constituency where a Conservative runs there will be a majority for him, and therefore there is no chance of his losing money. There are three points to be considered in the question:—first, whether we shall do away with the deposit of a sum altogether; second, shall we lose our $50; or, third, shall we adopt the principle of this Bill and compel the candidate to deposit $200, and if he shows that there is good faith, then give his money back to him. I would like to have a general expression of opinion on those points.

Mr. BLAKE. There is a fourth point, that we should leave the law as to the amount of the deposit as it now stands and yet provide that the money should be returned on the condition stated by the hon. gentleman.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a matter of amount.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know. Fifty dollars was supposed to be a check, but I believe it will be found that the conditions required before were just as good a check against vexatious contests as the law as it stands to-day; whereas there would not be the sense of injustice that exists at present in a person who has a fair chance of election, and is afterwards elected, being himself compelled to contribute what is regarded as the general public expense of holding the election. I must repeat what I said on a former occasion, that I feel a great objection to interposing what may be very serious obstacles. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the $50 ought not to be deposited with the expectation that it may be lost. I think the law ought to be amended, so that the $50 might be recoverable on reasonable conditions; but to say that there should be $200 deposited will be to interpose a very serious barrier in many cases; and I believe that law will be found to operate prejudicially to the freedom of election in the Province where it exists, as it would operate against the freedom of election in the Dominion, if the change proposed were made. If the whole question is left open, as the hon. member proposes, I for my part will vote for a second reading, in order that we may have an opportunity of deciding at a later stage what the law shall be; but if it is suggested that in voting for the second reading, we are committing ourselves to an increased deposit, I would object to so committing myself. I would vote for the second reading, in order that we might have an opportunity to say either that there should be no deposit at all, or, if it should be $50, that the deposit should be recoverable on reasonable conditions.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The law of the Province of Quebec, which the hon. gentleman desires to introduce into the Dominion, has not prevented candidates from coming forward, but the effect of that law is this: if there is a candidate who really believes that he has a chance of being elected, he does not object to depositing $200, because he knows that, though he may come short of the required number of votes to elect him, he will receive more than one-third of the total vote, and will, therefore, get his $200 back again; but the law in the Province of Quebec has very often prevented bogus candidates from coming forward, merely to annoy the real candidate of the people, because such a candidate knows that he will not receive anything like one-third of the total vote, and, therefore, will lose his $200. We have found, therefore, that the law in the Province of Quebec has been better in that respect than the law of the Dominion. Of course, I am not in a position to say how far we should adopt that law here. I agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that it would probably be better to read the Bill the second time, when, I suppose, it will have to be referred to a Committee, and, after that Committee has considered it and reported to the House, we shall be in a position to decide for ourselves whether we should adopt the principle of the Bill, or leave the law as it stands, or make the change which the hon. member for West Durham suggests, that is to say: to leave the deposit at $50, and adopt the principle of this Bill in other respects.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think this Bill should be referred to a Special Committee. It is not a question of detail, but a general principle, and I think it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. IVES. I am quite willing that the Bill should go to the Committee of the Whole House, and that the majority should regulate its provisions.

Mr. BUNSTER. I have no objection to the Bill going to a Committee; but I think it would be well that each of the candidates should put up $200, and that the winning candidate should take all the money. I think the Committee should take that into consideration.

Mr. HOUE. I think the hon. member for West Durham has not been well informed as to the working of the Local Electoral Law in the Province of Quebec. It has worked very satisfactorily, both for the electors generally and for serious candidates. Hon. members from Ontario do not feel the same necessity for adopting such a provision, for this reason, that in that Province they have the American system of nominating candidates by delegations of the different parties; but it is not so in the other Provinces, especially in the Province of Quebec. I do not think it is either possible or desirable to introduce such a system there, because I contend that the American system of nominating a candidate by a convention does away, to great extent, with the free choice of the electors. It very often happens that nominations are due to the intrigues or to the influence of a small class of the electors; and the members of a party are thus often compelled to agree to some candidate to whom they would otherwise have great objection. Hon. members from Ontario speak of the free choice of the people; but I think the system followed in that Province is contrary to the free choice of the people more than the provision proposed by my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe. That provision cannot be an impediment to a serious candidate, because if a man cannot deposit, or if his friends for him cannot deposit $200, for thirty days, he cannot be a serious candidate for this Parliament, but he must be either a beggar or an office seeker. For that reason I am in favor of the measure proposed by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe.

Bill read the second time.

PROMISSORY NOTES.

Mr. MACDONALD (Lanark), in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 73) relating to promissory notes and other negotiable instruments, said: I do not propose to enter into details of the causes for introducing this Bill. Those who are members of the legal profession know the frauds that are perpetrated by the sale of patent rights. The mode of operation is to obtain a patent for some farming implement then sell the patent to the farmer. It may be a patent for a reaper, or a roller, and the party represents to the farmer that it can be manufactured for a much less sum than he usually pays for the implement in the manufactories. A promissory note is given, but when the farmer takes the patent to the manufacturer he realizes for the first time that the cost of the machine is much larger than was represented, and is in fact so great that it is impossible for him to sell it. The result is that the note he has given for this patent right has been given without value. As the law now stands, the bona fide holder of that note is entitled to recover no matter by what means it was obtained in the first instance. As soon as the vendor of the patent right obtains the right, he goes to a shaver and discounts it, and the latter can force payment when it falls due. The Bill, which I have the honor to introduce, provides that a negotiable instrument given for a patent right must have an endorse on it "for a patent right," and when so endorsed the holder will have no more right to recover than the original holder, and where the patent right has no value a successful defence can be made. The next clause provides that where a man induces another to make a note for the sale of the patent right and does not endorse on it the words "for a patent right," he is liable to be prosecuted criminally. The clauses are as follows:—

1. A promissory note or other negotiable instrument, the consideration for which consists, in whole or in part, of the right to make, use or vend a patent invention, or an invention claimed to be patented, shall have written or printed prominently and legibly across the face thereof, and above the signature thereto, the words "given for a patent right;" such instrument in the hands of any purchaser or holder shall be subject to the same defences as it would be in the hands of the original holder or owner; and any person who purchases or becomes the holder of a promissory note or other negotiable instrument, knowing it to have been given for the consideration aforesaid, shall hold the same subject to such defences, although the words "given for a patent right" are not written or printed on its face.

2. And any one who induces any person or persons to sign a promissory note or other negotiable instrument, the consideration for which consists, in whole or in part, of the right to make, use or vend a patent machine or an invention claimed to be invented or to be thereafter patented, without having printed or written on the face of such promissory note or other negotiable instrument, the words aforesaid, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to be imprisoned in any gaol or other place of confinement for any term less than two years, with or without hard labor.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is a very unusual Bill, and at first sight one cannot see why the consideration of a promissory note in the case of a sale of a patent right should be stamped upon a note more than any other transaction. However, I have been informed, since this Bill has been introduced, that there are serious frauds in the sales of these patent rights and there is special reason for this legislation. That reason being shown can justify the introduction of this clause. The second clause is to introduce a class of misdemeanor with a liability to imprisonment for two years. That, I think, is altogether out of the question. I have no objection that the Bill be read a second time and sent to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bill was read the second time:—

Bill (No. 50) to enable any person charged with an indictable offence to be admitted to give evidence on his own behalf.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

House adjourned at 10:20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 30th March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that for the remainder of the Session Government business shall have precedence on every Wednesday.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman makes this motion prematurely. Heretofore he has been so careful of our healths on private members' day by early adjournments, that we have not done much towards clearing the Order Paper of private business. If this motion is adopted the practical result will be to take all days except Monday, and we know that there are very important private measures likely to come up, and if only one day is left many of these will not be reached for a long time. Then there are other measures to come up afterwards to be developed from the returns to be brought down, and there will be for them hardly any chance at all. The practical result of the motion now will be to put the control of all business, which is not brought forward by the Government, except such as may not go on on Monday, in the hands of the Government. It is impossible to force any measure on the attention of the House, unless with the assent of the Government. It seems to me, therefore, it is too early for the hon. gentleman to propose this motion, from which I must dissent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As I stated when I gave notice of this motion, the Government will take care that every opportunity will be given to every hon. member to bring up motions that stand in his name. But we have had such an exhaustive and long protracted debate on the Budget, that, if we wish to get through before midsummer, we must invite the House to allow the Government to get through with the measures on the Paper. We will give every opportunity for the submission, to the House, of motions and public and private Bills.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does the hon. gentleman mean to give the hour for private business on Tuesday or Friday? That is not mentioned in the motion. On Friday there is an hour for private Bills after half-past seven, and Tuesday there is not. The motion should read for the hour for private business on Friday to prevail.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Very well, I will assent to that.

Mr. MILLS. I think if the Government are going to take every day in the week but one, we ought to have earlier adjournments than we have had. We have been enabled, to some extent, to keep in fair health, by early adjournments on the day for private business, but we have been sitting here to an early hour in the morning on Government days. I do not think it will expedite business to have very late sittings, as it seems to me we ought to have some understanding that there will be earlier adjournments if the Government are going to take four days of the week.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I remember the robust health my hon. friend enjoyed for four or five long Sessions when he sat on this side of the House, and I am happy to observe that he looks as strong and as vigorous as he did then. This House is exactly in the position of a racer—we have been judiciously reserving our strength for the final push at the end of the Session, when we must have whip and spur.

Motion agreed to on a division.

DUTIES ON FUEL AND BREADSTUFFS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. LAURIER moved in amendment:

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that, in the opinion of this House, the public interests would be promoted by the repeal of the duties imposed on coal, coke and breadstuffs (blé et farines), free under the former Tariff, and by these articles being made free.

He said: I propose to call the attention of the House to the iniquity of the taxes which, under the present Tariff, are levied upon coal and breadstuffs. Whatever the idea had been in the past with respect to the intentions of the Government when they proposed their Tariff, there can be no doubt that to-day, after an experience of three years, the duties upon coal, and flour and meal, and upon imported food, constituted a very onerous tax upon a large section of the community without affording any benefit to any other section whatever. I need hardly remind the House that when the duties were imposed they were not imposed with the design and object of levying a tax upon bread and fuel.

Mr. BLAKE.

Whatever may be the opinions of the Government upon those matters at that time, the Government still adhered to the opinion that in matters of taxation duties should be levied first upon articles of luxury, and lastly and only lastly upon articles of necessity. It is true that since that time the Government have advanced in many ways, as we were told by the hon. the Minister of Railways in the Budget discussion. The hon. the Minister, on that occasion, went so far as to say he could not see any reason why coal should not be taxed as clothing is taxed. He argued, with some show of reason, that in a climate like this clothing is just as much an object of necessity as coal. But the hon. the Minister must remember that clothing is a very general expression; it embraces articles of very distinctive qualities, some of them being articles purely of luxury, and others articles of necessity; and as to the latter, if they are, as the hon. the Minister said, to be placed in the same category as coal, the conclusion to be drawn would not be the conclusion drawn by the hon. the Minister, that both should be taxed, but that both should be free. There are, no doubt, occasions when a nation is hard pressed that the taxation of those articles become a necessity, but even in such an event, bread and fuel should be taxed lightly. Three years ago the Government were not so far advanced as they are to-day. When they proposed their Tariff they did not hold out that coal should be taxed as clothing is taxed, with a view of raising the revenue from the bread and fuel of the people. They rather expected that not a dollar would ever come to the Treasury from that source. The policy they proposed was not that the taxes on those articles should contribute to the revenue, but that we would effectually close our doors against foreign importations, and afford the people an opportunity to supply themselves from such parts of the Dominion as produced those articles. Such was the policy proposed at that time, and such was the outcome. As far as breadstuffs were concerned, this idea was clearly expressed in the speech of the then leader of the Opposition, the present Prime Minister, delivered at Bury in the Eastern Townships, in which he said:

"In Canada, however, if by an unfavorable season, the crops are scanty, we are without such resources, and then the farmers of the United States pour in their produce upon us and we are defenceless. You (the farmers) who, in an ungenial season, might get some recompense for scanty crops in the enhanced price they would bring, find that hope gone from you. Even the little harvest the storms have left you, you find valueless when the products of the western States are poured into the markets of the Dominion. Shall we suffer in this way? Shall we not say, Canada is for the Canadians, and protect our markets for ourselves? Shall we not say, if we have a short crop our own people shall consume it, and pay us a fair price for it; and if we have a large crop let us not only have our own markets, but the distant markets of Europe. Let us say to the United States, we allow you to send the products of your country into our market, let us have the same privilege and send ours to your own."

Such was the policy then propounded, such as it was. It was, in my humble opinion, just as indefensible as if it had been proposed broadly and squarely to tax foreign wheat for the purpose of making the bread of the people contribute to the taxation of the country. However selfish it was in its conception, however cruel it was in some of its consequences, it was part of the protective system which was then put into operation. To argue against such a system, under the present circumstances, would be a useless waste of time, because hon. gentlemen opposite, like Rachel, who would not be comforted, would not be convinced, but still adhered to their convictions; but what I want to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to is this: that their policy, as it was originally designed, has altogether miscarried. It has not, at all events, realized the object they had in view. The policy of the Government was to give protection to the farmers. It has not given any protection whatever to the farmers. Their policy was that the duties on breadstuffs should not act as taxation on the people. It has acted as taxation on the people to the extent of $700,000 a year; and this, as I said a moment ago, has not given any protection to any class of the community. First, with respect to wheat, I have no hesitation in saying that the duty imposed on wheat and flour has not contributed one cent to the profits of the farmers of Ontario, though it has acted as a great injury to both Lower Canada and the Maritime Provinces. Why; is there a man in this House to-day or out of it who will venture to say that the duty imposed on wheat and flour has in the slightest degree benefitted the wheat growers of Ontario?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. I hear some one dissenting from that statement. I seems to me, however, there is no reason to dissent from it; but if there is any dissent it is only an example of that human nature which allows disciples to exaggerate the doctrines of the master. What was the doctrine laid down by the First Minister in the speech to which I have referred, but that the duty should and could act only when there was a scanty crop. He never contemplated that the duty would act as a benefit to the farmers of Ontario, or any other section that grows wheat whenever we have a surplus, and since 1879 would have never had a scanty crop but always a surplus, and therefore, there has been no occasion for the contingency which the hon. the First Minister had in view when he spoke. I, therefore, say that to this day the duty on wheat and flour has not contributed whatever to benefit the farmers of Ontario. Experience is the best answer to any such statement. What is the condition of things at present? When we have a surplus on this side of the line, and when there is a surplus on the other side of the line, no one will deny that the market price of this country is regulated altogether by the Liverpool market; and, so long as we have a surplus of wheat, I venture to assert that this state of things will continue. It is true that the hon. the Finance Minister stated, last year, that the effect of the Tariff had been to increase the price of wheat to the grower at least 10 cents per barrel on flour. He made the statement within the recollection of the House, and he attributed that to the Tariff; but I am not aware, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister of Finance ever gave any evidence except the mere statement. This year, however, the hon. Minister of Finance discussed the same question, and he repeated the statement in another form. He said that the Tariff operated to the benefit of the farmer—the grower of wheat—to the extent of 3 cents per bushel. He argued in this way—I do not quote his words, I quote from memory—that on a certain occasion wheat was 3 cents higher in Toronto than in Chicago, and this he attributed to the fact that the cost of transportation from Toronto to Chicago was just a shade less than 3 cents. He said that, if the Tariff did not exist, the millers and buyers of wheat would go to Chicago, and buy their wheat 3 cents cheaper than they could get it in Toronto. Now, I may say, en passant, that this is the best possible evidence of the soundness of our view that, as long as we have a surplus, prices must be regulated by the European market. The hon. gentleman was forced to admit that fact when he argued that there was a difference of 3 cents between the prices of wheat in Chicago and Toronto, and gave as a reason that the cost of transportation from Chicago to Liverpool was 3 cents higher than from Toronto to Liverpool, thereby making the obvious point that both parties must seek the European market, and that the European market regulates the prices. But what was the conclusion derived by him from this statement? He argued, and argued fairly at first sight, that if there was no Tariff the miller or buyer of wheat would go to Chicago and get his wheat 3 cents lower than he could get it at that particular time in Toronto, but he forgot that if the miller had gone to Chicago he would have had to pay the cost of transporting his wheat to Toronto, and, according to my information—although I speak subject to correction—if he bought his wheat in Chicago 3 cents lower than in Toronto, and had to pay 10 cents for transportation, the wheat would have cost him 7 cents more than in Toronto. Even if the duty had not existed, the effect of the transportation is to give sufficient protection to the farmers, and the very fact that there is a freight of 10 cents per bushel to carry wheat from Chicago to Toronto, acts as a protection to the farmer, and makes the duty of 15 cents absolutely useless and of no avail whatever. I am not aware, Mr. Speaker, that any other evidence but this, which I have first quoted from the hon. the Minister of Finance, have ever been given in this House of the effect of the Tariff upon the prices of wheat to the grower in Ontario, and, if this is the only evidence, we need not go further to see that the Tariff does not operate, to any extent whatever, to the benefit of the grower in the Province of Ontario. But we come now to another side of the question. It will probably be said, and I am sure my fellow-countrymen from the Province of Quebec and hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces, on the other side of the House, will say that if the duty is of no avail to the growers of wheat, in Ontario, it cannot act to the detriment of the buyers of wheat in Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, and that, therefore, in point of fact, at the very worst, the duty is inoffensive, and I have no hesitation in asserting broadly, that the duty on wheat has been a grievous taxation to the people of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. The effect of the Tariff on wheat reminds one of the old fable of the dog and the manger. It gives benefit to no one, but it is an injury to some. There were imported in this Dominion, last year, 195,802 bushels of flour and 76,625 bushels of wheat. This quantity of wheat reduced into flour is equal to 15,343 bushels, so that, last year, our total imports of flour into the country was 211,145 bushels, upon which a total duty of $109,397 was paid. One thing is evident. If the price of wheat was the same on either side of the line, and perhaps even if it was a little higher in the United States, and if the price of flour was the same on both sides of the line, it is manifest that the whole of this duty was paid by the consumers of flour in the Dominion. Nothing can be said against that proposition. I quite understand that if it could be made to appear that the price of flour was lower in the United States than in Canada, it might be argued with some show of reason that part of the duty was paid by the Canadian consumer and part by the producer; but if the price were the same on both sides of the line, it is clear that the whole duty was paid exclusively by the Canadian consumer. Now it will be asked, what is the reason? If, as was said a moment ago, there is a surplus in this country, what is the reason that the people have imported such a large amount of flour—something over 200,000 barrels. If the buyers could have got it in this country, why did they find it to their advantage to go to the United States, and buy flour at the prices there, and bring it into this country, paying the cost of transportation and paying the duty? For this there are two principal reasons: The first reason is this—and I give it especially to my countrymen from the Province of Quebec—that the Province of Ontario does not produce a sufficient quantity to supply the market of the brand of flour which is consumed principally in the Province of Quebec. If you look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, you will find that the quantity of flour imported into the Province of Quebec from the United States was 106,391 barrels, for which was paid $459,820, or an average price of $4.33 per barrel. This shows that the flour is not one of the higher grades, but is one of the inferior brands, and on enquiry at Montreal and elsewhere, I find that this flour is of the quality called "middling," it is made of spring wheat after the first quality has been taken. This flour is consumed exclusively by the poorer classes in Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. It is evident, from the mere fact that it is an inferior brand consumed by the poorer classes, that it constitutes upon them a very onerous tax. The people of the Maritime Provinces do not so much consume imported flour; the flour they import is Indian meal. Nova Scotia alone last year imported 112,038 barrels of Indian meal, and New Brunswick 52,606 barrels, and the duty paid on that was $65,857—this again shows that the farmers of Ontario receive no benefit from the duty, because they do not produce Indian meal any more than they produce the kind of flour consumed by the poorer classes in Quebec. Why, then, keep the duty on the Statute-book? Why continue to impose on the poorer classes in Quebec and the Maritime Provinces this obnoxious tax, when the very object you had in view, namely, to benefit the farmers of Ontario, is not attained? With regard to this matter, I would like to call attention to a resolution moved in 1879 by my hon. friend from Maskinongé (Mr. Houde). That hon. gentleman moved to this effect:

"That the said item be not concurred in, but that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of adopting the following resolution: Provided always that any time the Governor General in Council has reason to believe that the supply of wheat produced in Canada will not be equal to the demand for its consumption, then it shall be lawful for the Governor General, by Order in Council, to reduce or take off the duty on imported wheat, for such period as may be appointed and declared in such Order in Council."

This motion was not voted on, but was withdrawn, in consequence of a declaration made by the Prime Minister to this effect:

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it would be exceedingly inconvenient, at this stage of the proceedings and at this stage of the Session, to go back into Committee of the Whole, and therefore he hoped the mover of the amendment would not press it. If he understood it, it was that the Governor-General in Council might deal with the subject. That was reasonable in itself, and would be given effect to."

I recall this resolution, Mr. Speaker, and this declaration of the Prime Minister, in order to invite the action of the mover of the resolution. He intended that if at any time the supply was not equal to the demand, then the Government should step in and remove the barrier which now stands between the producer in the United States and the consumer in Canada. If it is now shown—and the fact cannot be controverted—that in the case of the flour consumed by his countrymen in the Province of Quebec, and the flour consumed by the fishermen in the Maritime Provinces, the farmers in Ontario who produce them do not derive any benefit, because they do not grow these articles, why should the duty be kept on the foreign articles? It is of no benefit to anybody while it is a great injury to those poor people. It may be said that those people who buy the poorer brands can buy the higher brands at $7 a barrel. So they can if they have the means, and I have no doubt they would be glad to do so; but the very duty which is imposed prevents them from buying the higher brands; they have to measure their expenses by their scanty means, and it is to their advantage to buy the poor quality of flour at $4.32 a barrel, rather than to buy the higher quality at $7. It is not on the wealthy classes that the Tariff is oppressive in Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, because the higher grades are supplied in our own markets; but the Tariff weighs chiefly, I might almost say exclusively, on the poor people who have to buy the inferior grades. What is this if it is not a tax on poverty? And can there be, I ask, a more odious piece of legislation than this, which weighs, not upon the wealthier classes of the population, but upon the poorer? Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one reason why, though the prices are the same on both sides of the line, there is still such a large quantity imported from the United States—it is well known to the House and to the country—and that is, the natural facilities which the Maritime Provinces have for trading with the United States. Almost every man in the Maritime Provinces is more or less engaged in navigation; there are all the time small vessels trading between the Maritime Provinces and the United States, and they find it an advantage, when taking a cargo from their own country, to bring back flour and pay the duty, rather than to return empty. But this duty is a tax on their hard earnings—it is a tax on the poorer classes, and it is an impediment to trade. And what is the benefit? Why, the benefit is, in my estimation, nothing at all. But let me give the estimated value put upon it by the Minister of Finance himself. Speaking for the Government, he pretended that the farmers of Ontario were benefitted to the extent of the duty—50 cents a barrel on flour, and 15 cents a bushel on wheat. Why, the benefit conferred on the farmers of Ontario is an addition of 10 cents a barrel on the price of flour—all the year round? No, Mr. Speaker, not all the year round, but during two or three months in the year, and those are the months of July and August, when the new crops have not yet come in. And even if the price of flour is increased 10 cents a barrel during those two months, who reaps that increase? Is it the farmer? It is not, because the farmer has already sold his wheat; but the benefit, if any there is, is simply for the speculators who have been so fortunate as to store their wheat in the elevators. These are the parties who derive the benefit of this 10 cents a barrel, if indeed it is a benefit to anybody. The fact is, that this policy of a duty on wheat was an appeal made in 1878 to what selfishness there might be in the hearts of the farmers of Ontario. The farmers of Ontario have always been the bulwark of the Liberal party ever since the great struggle for liberty and constitutional Government. In 1878, the farmers of Ontario, a wealthy class though they be, were, like all the other classes in the nation, suffering from the depression which then existed. The time was thought to be opportune for the Conservative party to make a desperate bid for their support; they made that desperate bid, and the temptation held out to the farmers was that duty on wheat; they represented to them that if they had power, they would put a duty on wheat to prevent foreign competition, and that the farmers would reap a golden harvest. I think the farmers have now seen that this policy has, in that respect, been totally barren of results. But even if it had been productive of results, I would not hesitate for a moment to appeal to the justice and the patriotism of the farmers of Ontario, because they would see that such a gain as that had been reaped at the expense of the hard labor of their brothers in the east. An appeal to their justice and patriotism in this instance is not necessary, because they must see themselves that this policy, which is injurious to others, has not given them the slightest benefit whatever. What I have said of wheat applies with greater force to coal. In fact, there is not one single article in the Tariff which requires, in the throats of hon. members opposite, such powers of dilation as is necessary to enable them to swallow that duty on coal. There is not one single article which has caused hon. members such frantic efforts to facilitate to their followers that painful operation of swallowing—not one article upon which so many conflicting statements have been made to establish that what is a glaring evil is a great benefit. Why, even in this House we have not heard from the opposite side two statements agreeing completely with each other on the operation of this coal duty. In the first place, we have the statement of the hon. the Minister of Finance, in his Budget Speech, that the duty is paid partly by the American producer and partly by the Canadian consumer. Then, four days later, the hon. the Minister of Railways declared that the whole duty is paid by the American producer. Which statement are we to believe? Can it be that one hon. Minister is wrong and the other right, and if so, which is right and which is wrong? Is it possible that the hon. Minister of Finance does not know to a farthing whence springs the revenue that swells the Treasury of which he is the custodian, and that he is ignorant, to the full extent, of the advantages of the National Policy of which he is the author. If it be true, as the hon. Minister of Railways said, that the duty is paid wholly by the American producer, that fact is a feather in the National Policy of which it should not be shorn. One thing is however certain, and that is that the hon. Minister of Railways is far more advanced in his views than the hon. Minister of Finance was himself last spring. Since then he has made a gigantic stride. In the Pictou election, last spring, we all remember the hon. the Minister of Railways said, not that the coal duty was paid wholly by the American producer, but that the $400,000 paid as coal duty, was a tax on the people of Ontario. Which of these statements are we to believe—that of the hon. the Minister of Finance in this House, that of the hon. the Minister of Railways in this House, or that of the hon. the Minister of Railways in Pictou? For my part, I do not hesitate to say, that the true one is that made at Pictou, and that the duty is paid wholly by the Canadian consumer, by the people of Ontario and the people of Quebec, and, further, that the Nova Scotian miners derive no benefit whatever from it. This is the statement I make and which I believe I can prove.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I thought the hon. gentleman said my statement in Pictou was correct. I do not find that in it.

Mr. LAURIER. I agree to his statement as far as I have said. The hon. gentleman said in Pictou that the duty was paid by Ontario. So far I agree with him, but I add that the Nova Scotian miners do not derive any benefit from it. With regard to the duty, it must be considered in its effects, first, upon Ontario, then upon Quebec, and then upon the Maritime Provinces. With regard to the two former, the duty is a great injury to the consumers, and no benefit to the Nova Scotian producers; and with regard to the Maritime Provinces, it is neither a benefit to the consumer nor producer. The hon. Minister of Railways, as far as I could follow him, devoted the whole of his argument in this House to the effect of the duty in the Province of Ontario, and his argument can be reduced to this proposition—that the duty, instead of being an injury to the Ontario consumer, was a benefit to him, because the American producer, in order to destroy the Nova Scotian competition, was forced to reduce his prices, so that he sold actually cheaper in Ontario than he did in his own market. In order that there may be no misapprehension of the hon. gentleman's meaning, I will quote from what he said:

"So that here you have the fact clearly established that the very moment the duty was imposed the parties who shipped their coals to Toronto and Quebec, put these places into a different category from what they were before they made them competitive points and reduced the cost of coal to a larger extent than the amount of duty paid. It is impossible for any impartial mind to arrive at any other conclusion than that the imposition of a duty of 50 cents a ton has not only not increased the cost to the consumer, but it has lowered the cost to the consumer in Ontario."

Further on, he stated:

"This table shows, first, that prior to the 15th of March, 1879, the Philadelphia dealer purchased his coal at a cheaper rate than the Ontario coal dealer; second, that, after the imposition of the duty, the average price of the Ontario coal dealers was less than that of Philadelphia in 1880, by $1.61, and in the fiscal year of 1881, by 50 cents.

Such was his statement and I repeat my resumé of it, namely, that in his view the American producer, in order to control our market, actually reduced his prices, and sold in Ontario cheaper than he did in the United States. When I heard this statement I could scarcely credit my ears, and read it over in the Hansard to make sure I was not mistaken. Thus we have the statement from the hon. the Minister of Railways that through the National Policy the iniquitous process of which we have heard so much in past years, is still going on, and those wily, astute Americans are using our National Policy to make this country of ours a slaughter market. I do not know by what name hon. gentlemen opposite will qualify this process now, but we all know that during the last Session of Parliament it was denounced as a great injury to our people. Who can forget the lamentations of hon. gentlemen opposite on the fate of the poor country which was so reduced by the former Tariff that Americans could come here and sell their goods? Who does not remember the loud promises they then made that if ever they had the power they would put up such a barrier that the infamous process would not go on any longer. Well, the power has been given them, but lo! now they wheel around and say: "Look at the wonderful effect of our National Policy, which has forced the Americans to come into our country and slaughter their goods amongst us. It has made the Americans come here and sell us their produce cheaper than they sell it to their own people." Who has forgotten the last Session of the last Parliament, that when such an assertion was made—that the Americans were coming here and selling their goods in that way—the answer invariably was that they came and sold their goods under prices, and that we ought to be thankful to them for that course? But I remember very distinctly the torrents of abuse and invective which were hurled at us, because we believed in such a patriotic doctrine. I am glad to see that hon. gentlemen opposite have changed their views upon this subject. It is an advance also, and an advance in the right direction, and one upon which we on this side can heartily congratulate them, because we still adhere to our doctrine, that the Americans come here and slaughter their goods, sell at under-prices, and if this is due to the National Policy, every one on the Opposition side will say bravo to the National Policy. But, unfortunately, the National Policy does not deserve so much credit. It is not a fact that the Americans are coming here and selling goods below prices, owing to the National Policy. The Minister of Railways, stated and quoted figures to show that coal had been sold cheaper in Ontario than in some of the United States markets themselves. I have followed the hon. gentleman's figures closely, and the more I do so the more I am convinced there must be errors in them, and that the same qualities of coal could not have been compared. If those statements and figures, the basis of his theory, are wrong, the effects he attributes to it have not existed. The idea of the Minister of Railways was that the Tariff had made the Ontario market a competitive market between the American and the Nova Scotian producer. I challenge the fact. It cannot be so, for this the best of reasons—that trade has not been as yet established in coal between Ontario and Nova Scotia. What is the extent of the coal trade so far as we know it, from the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite? Do we ever hear from them that a trade has been established between Ontario and Nova Scotia in coal? The only thing we heard was that a cargo of coal had reached Kingston, and another Guelph, but one swallow does not make a summer, and one cargo does not establish a trade. Whoever consigned that cargo to Guelph will not repeat the operation, because it could only be repeated at a loss. The reason why Ontario is not a competitive market between the American and Nova Scotian producers is this—the distance will not allow it as regards Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Niagara, the other day, stated incidentally that whoever made the assertion that coal could not be brought from Nova Scotia to Toronto or Ontario, for $2.40 a ton, disparaged this country.

Mr. PLUMB. No; I stated that it was the contention of Mr. Jones and Mr. Carmichael, who were members of this House, from Nova Scotia at the time, constantly reiterated the statement that coal could not be brought into Ontario except by the imposition of a duty of $2.50 a ton.

Mr. LAURIER. I think Messrs. Carmichael & Jones are perfectly right.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. The difference is only in words after all. I accept the hon. member's correction, and I agree with Messrs. Carmichael and Jones that Ontario cannot be made a competitive market between the American producer and the Nova Scotia producer, unless a duty of at least $2 a ton is imposed on the American coal.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will have the patience to hear the argument, though he will not be convinced by it; it is this: Between the coal fields of Pennsylvania and Toronto the distance is only about 240 miles, whereas the distance between the Nova Scotia fields and Toronto is more than 1,100 miles. What is the freight then upon a ton of coal from the coal fields of Pennsylvania to Toronto, the 240 miles? So far as I have been able to find out, I believe it is $2.40, or 1 cent a mile; I have this information from a business man in Montreal. It is a very high rate, but I take it, though I might have chosen a lower rate, to make it agree with the rate given by the hon. the Minister of Railways. He said that the freight from Buffalo to Toronto was $1 a ton, the distance between Buffalo and Toronto, by the Suspension Bridge, being less than 100 miles; and this, at 1 cent a mile for coal from Pittsburg, the centre of Pennsylvania, to Buffalo, or little less than 150 miles, gives 240 miles from Pittsburg to Toronto. If, then, it costs $1 for the 100 miles from Buffalo to Toronto, it follows that we may fairly argue that the freight from Pittsburg to Toronto would be $2.40 a ton. Against this, what is the freight rate from the coal fields of Nova Scotia to Toronto. The rates of freight by the Intercolonial have been laid before the House in a voluminous return, with a table of the compound rates for coal upon the Intercolonial and Grand Trunk Railway. It is fair to assume that this rate of freight, which was made in 1879, when the hon. Minister of Railways was in the Department of which he is now in charge, was as low as it could be made in accordance with commercial rules. Now, the freight from New Glasgow, which is in the centre of the coal-fields of Nova Scotia, to Toronto, is $39.68 per car of 22,400 lbs., or eleven and one fifth tons of 2,000 lbs. This sum of $39.68 is distributed as follows: $19.80 to the Intercolonial Railway and $19.88 to the Grand Trunk Railway; that makes the rate per ton $3.54. Now, I assume this is the cheapest rate at which coal can be carried from Nova Scotia to Toronto, $3.54 against $2.40, which is the rate on Pennsylvania coal from Pittsburg to Toronto. Now, that is not all, I assume, and I believe the assumption is a fair one, that this Tariff, which was made whilst the present hon. the Minister of Railways was in charge of the Intercolonial Railway, was as low as both the Intercolonial Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway could carry coal. I have no doubt that the hon. Minister represented to the Grand Trunk Railway the great advantages which would accrue to it in the transport of coal from Nova Scotia to Ontario. I have no doubt the Grand Trunk Railway Company took these matters into consideration, and reduced their rates as low as commercial rules would admit. Now, what is the rate on the Grand Trunk Railway? The distance from Chaudiere Junction, which is the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway, to Toronto, is 498 miles, and the rate for this part is $19.88 per car of 22,400 lbs., or $1.76 per ton, so that the rate per mile is just a little more than one-third of a cent, or to put it exactly, .35. That is the lowest rate at which the Grand Trunk Railway can transport coal. Now, I call the attention of the House to the fact that the rate on the Intercolonial Railway by this table is just 34 per cent. less than the Grand Trunk Railway rates per mile. I have shown that the rate on the Grand Trunk Railway per mile is .35, the rate on the Intercolonial Railway, is a little more than one-fourth per cent.—exactly .26; so that a ton of coal which leaves the United States to go to Toronto, on the Intercolonial Railway pays .26 per mile and on the Grand Trunk .35 per mile, so that on the Grand Trunk it pays 34 per cent. more than on the Intercolonial Railway. It is fair to assume that at these rates that the Intercolonial Railway is the loser. If we add these Intercolonial Railway rates, so as to make the Government the loser instead of the gainer by the operation, what is the result? The result is this: take a ton of coal in Pittsburg, Penn., and bring it to Toronto, and take a ton of coal in New Glasgow and bring it to Toronto. The price of bituminous coal in Pittsburg is but $1.22, the freight from Pittsburg to Toronto is $2.40, which would make the coal cost $3.62, now add the duty, 60 cents, and this makes $4.22. Reverse the operation and take a ton of coal from New Glasgow to Toronto. The price of coal at New Glasgow is much higher than at Pittsburg. At Pittsburg it is $1.22, I am informed that in Nova Scotia it is $1.72, but for the purpose of argument I assume it to be equal to the price of coal at Pittsburg. What would be the result? The price of coal at New Glasgow being $1.22, the freight to Toronto at the reduced rates, being $3.54, the price per ton would amount to $4.76. Now, to that we have to add profits to the dealers and other accessories as against the $3.62 for American coal in Toronto, or, with the duty added, $4.22. Now, the difference is this: Pennsylvania coal will cost less in Toronto by $1.14 per ton than Nova Scotia coal, and if you add the duty it will still cost 54 cents less. This, as I have said, is upon the reduced rates on the Intercolonial Railway; but suppose the Intercolonial Railway adopted the same rates as the Grand Trunk, the result would be that the transport from New Glasgow to Chaudiere, instead of being $1.76 per ton, would be $2.31 per ton, so that the coal in Toronto would cost $4.70 per ton. If the same rate had been charged on the Intercolonial Railway as on the Grand Trunk, the result would be that the coal, instead of costing, with the freight, $3.54, would have cost $4.07. So, Mr. Speaker, the result would be that, in order to bring coal to Ontario, in order to make coal an article of competition between Pennsylvania and Nova Scotia, the duty ought to be increased from 60 cents to $1.14, at the very least, even upon the decreased rates of freight, such as they exist. But, in these comparisons, I have left aside, altogether, the cost of coal. It is dearer in Nova Scotia than in Pennsylvania; but for purpose of argument, I have assumed the price to be the same in both countries, though there is a difference of at least 50 cents. But even more. Suppose that instead of decreasing their rates on the Intercolonial Railway the Government had adopted the same rates as the Grand Trunk Railway, that is to say, 35 cents per mile, still the cost in Toronto would be $4.09, so that even upon these rates, in order to bring down coal from New Glasgow to Toronto it would require a duty of at least $2 per ton. Now, Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Jones were quite right when they said it was impossible, with the present duty, to bring coal to Ontario, and that in order to do so a duty of $2 per ton would have to be imposed upon American coal. That opinion is not ours alone. We have heard in this House the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Doull) speaking of the duty of 50 cents, which was then imposed, say:

Mr. LAURIER,

"With regard to coal, he might say that he feared the protection proposed in the Tariff was not sufficient. It was only 50 cents a ton, and he believed it should be 75 cents on bituminous coal, to enable Nova Scotia coal to reach Ontario. Besides that, a duty of 75 cents would be more likely to result in the Americans proposing to take off their duty of 75 cents a ton on Nova Scotia coal entering the New England market, which, if the proposition was carried out, would give Nova Scotia its natural market. Then, if Nova Scotia got its natural market, it did not want the market of Ontario, and Ontario could get its coal without the payment of any duty. A duty of 50 cents was not going to benefit Ontario and Quebec. It was going to be a tax to the people of those Provinces, and as with that duty Nova Scotia could not get the market, it was not going to do Nova Scotia any good."

Such was the opinion of the hon. member for Pictou in 1879. The year following, the duty was increased from 50 cents to 60 cents a ton, but, with the expectation, of course, that this additional duty would enable Nova Scotia coal to reach Ontario. But we have, as a result that not a ton, except two cargoes, has reached Ontario. The reason is this, as Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Jones said: a difference at least of $2 per ton would be necessary to secure that object; and I repeat, with these statements before me, that, unless you are prepared to place a duty of $2 per ton upon American coal, Ontario will never be made a competitive point between Nova Scotia and Pennsylvania. If Ontario has not been made a competitive market between Nova Scotia and Pennsylvania, it follows that all the arguments of the hon. the Minister of Railways must be incorrect, because the very basis on which they were made falls to the ground. But there is something more. Against the hon. the Minister of Railways in the House of Commons, perhaps I will be permitted to quote Sir Charles Tupper in the city of San Francisco. This is what he said:

"Nature has provided that the Atlantic States should receive coal from Nova Scotia, and she has also placed the great coal beds of Pennsylvania in such a position that coal could be better supplied to the Province of Ontario than it is possible to get within these borders. So it was on the Pacific Coast. San Francisco was indebted to Nanaimo, British Columbia, for some of the rights she enjoys. Nature intended that so far as coal was concerned there should be a free interchange between the two countries. He believed the day was not far distant when both countries would adopt a common sense policy in relation to these natural products."

I see the hon. gentleman assents to this position.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do.

Mr. LAURIER. Well then, if the hon. Minister assents to this position and his followers also assent to it, why do they legislate against nature? They will tell me that the Americans also legislate against nature. Can this reason ever be given in a civilized country, that because one nation legislates against nature we should also legislate against nature? The hon. gentleman reminded me of what is said of the Chinese mode of duelling. In Paris where duels are frequent, a man who is offended calls his adversary out, and they settle the matter between themselves, but in China, if a man is offended he commences by opening his bowels and when this is done the bloody sword is sent to his adversary who also opens his bowels, so that instead of one man going to the grave against the laws of nature two men do so. On this continent instead of having one nation legislating against the laws of nature you have two pursuing that course: If anything can show the fallacy of the argument on this question it is such a statement as this. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the laws of nature have provided that coal shall be supplied to the Atlantic States from Nova Scotia. The Americans have taken upon themselves to legislate against the laws of nature, and their people on the Atlantic coast have to bear the consequence and the additional expense. I agree also that nature has provided that coal shall be supplied to Ontario from the Central States of the Union, but because the Americans have inflicted an injury upon their people we must also inflict an injury upon our people and tax them $400,000 a year, so that I think upon this point it can be safely concluded that a duty on coal is not a benefit to the people of Nova Scotia, because the coal owners cannot send their coal to Ontario, but it is a great injury to the people of Ontario who, under the Tariff, have to pay at least $400,000 taxation. Now, what is the effect of the Tariff on the Maritime Provinces? Every one will agree with me that the effect is nil. It cannot affect them, because, as the hon. Minister of Railways has said, the laws of nature have provided they should supply coal to the Atlantic States of the Union and Pennsylvania is too far distant from them. Coal cannot be sent from Pennsylvania to Nova Scotia or the Maritime Provinces, and therefore the duty there is inoperative. What is the effect in Quebec? It is highly injurious. We pay a very large duty upon coal, and there is a petition now on the Table of the House from the boat-owners of Quebec praying that the duty may be repealed. Is it an advantage to the people of Nova Scotia? It is not. Perhaps it might be, and would be, but for one circumstance, and this is the close proximity which nature has afforded Quebec to the coal-fields of Great Britain. So much of the coal used in Quebec comes in ballast from Great Britain, that it has been impossible, under the Tariff, to secure for Nova Scotia the market of Quebec. It is true, it will be said—it has sometimes been said in this House—that the duty will secure the Quebec market for the coal producers of Nova Scotia. It is said that the coal production of Nova Scotia is largely increased, and I admit that it has; but we say, and everybody knows, that this coal from Nova Scotia did not replace any coal from Great Britain or elsewhere, but was only an addition to the consumption of the people. The sales of Nova Scotia coal to Quebec advanced from $3,000 tons in 1878 to over 2,000,000 tons in 1881. This is attributed, of course, to the Tariff.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal). Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. I have just heard a "hear, hear," but if any one will pretend that this increase of the sale of Nova Scotia coal to Quebec is due to the Tariff, why does he not pretend that the increase of the sales of that coal to the United States is also due to the Tariff. The sales have increased in the same proportion. In 1879, the sales of Nova Scotia coal to the United States were 51,000 tons; in 1881, 113,000 tons. If it is contended that the duty has given the market of Quebec to Nova Scotia coal, why not contend that the duty has secured the market of the United States for Nova Scotia coal? There is just as much reason for the one as the other. No; in Quebec, as everywhere else, the duty has not been of any benefit to the miners of Nova Scotia, though it has been to us, as to every one else, a very injurious duty. Taken all in all, what is the result of the policy which the Government have placed on the Statute-book? What is the result of the duty on wheat, on flour, on meal, on coal? Has it benefitted the producer? I say it has not. Has it injured the consumer? It has largely injured the consumer. It has forced him to pay on the prime necessities of life a taxation to the amount of over $700,000. On this point I cannot do better, in order to show the injurious and mischievous effects of this policy, than quote the opinion of a gentleman high in the opinion of the Conservative party just now, and a prominent member of their Government. In 1870, a similar motion to this was propounded in the House, and speaking in the other Chamber, Senator Macpherson used these words—he was speaking of the duties on breadstuffs and coal:

"He believed it to be exceedingly unsound to impose duty on coal and breadstuffs, or any natural products that were now free. He acknowledged that there was a difficulty in forming a Tariff that would be acceptable to all the people of the Dominion; but certainly it would have been an easy task to mature one that would be more just to all sections of the country than the measure now before the House. If it had been the object to devise a Tariff that would set one Province against another—that would create and perpetuate sectional jealousies and antipathies, the Government had certainly succeeded. Breadstuffs were to be taxed to please the people of Ontario, but he believed it was a great injustice to the agriculturists of Ontario to suppose that they were prepared to accept such a Tariff, or that it would be protection to them. The market where their surplus produce was disposed of fixed the price of the whole, and duty could not be of any positive advantage so far as the price of their breadstuffs was concerned. Then duty would be a great obstruction to trade all throughout the country, which should, in accordance with the true principles of commerce, be left as unrestricted as possible. Not only would the Tariff be worthless to the people of Ontario, but it would be most burthensome to other sections—to fishermen and great masses of people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, as well as of Quebec, for it is a well-known fact that large quantities of breadstuffs are yearly taken into the latter Province from the United States. Then, as part of this great 'National Policy,' a duty was imposed on foreign coal as a means of propitiating the people of Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec were taxed to satisfy Ontario; Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick were to be burthened to please a minority in Nova Scotia. Nothing could be more calculated to create dissension and to disturb the harmonious working of Confederation than such legislation."

Nothing can be more pregnant than these words. They are so true, so natural, and express so well the mind of everybody on this side, that I leave them to the hon. members of the House for their consideration in connection with this question.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. mover of this resolution must no doubt have hesitated a good deal when he was asked to present it to the House. The hon. gentleman must have remembered that his ideas, his views, his principles on matters of Protection had changed a great deal. The hon. gentleman must have remembered that at a time when he had not the responsibility of office and was no doubt speaking his own mind, he thought that those who were in office—the present Government, with a very few changes—were not doing their duty towards the country, because, he said, they did not protect the industries and manufactories—they did not, in short, protect the people. The hon. gentleman at that period was a great protectionist, and went as far as any one of us go now. In fact, he went further than most of us would care to go. And why did he change? The hon. gentleman may say to-day that his views were not in that direction but the records are there—the records of his speeches, of the speeches of his friends and allies, and the writings of those who contributed to the press of his party. All these evidences are extant, and they show that the hon. gentleman thought that this country required protection, and protection to a very great extent. I will read a few extracts, not to refresh his memory, because I have no doubt that before the speech he has just delivered he read what he had said in previous times and what the press of his party had said on the same subject. In 1874, this was the opinion of the hon. gentleman:

"L'enquête qui se poursuit en ce moment annonce une idée générale et complète de nos manufacturiers, des causes qui arrêtent leur développement et des remèdes qu'il s'agirait d'apporter à la situation. La plainte universelle provient de deux choses différentes: La différence énorme qui existe entre le tarif américain et celui du Canada, qui nous exclut pratiquement des Etats-Unis, tandis qu'il invite la concurrence américaine au milieu de nous. Ainsi la plupart des produits manufacturés sont frappés d'un droit de 35 par cent à leur entrée aux Etats-Unis, tandis que ce droit n'est que de 15 par cent à leur entrée en Canada. En outre pour maintenir les prix chez eux les américains nous envoient et vendent à sacrifice le surplus de leur productions, ce qui fait à nos industriels une position d'indépendance intolérable.

This is what the hon. gentleman said, though he now reproaches us for saying that the Americans were making a slaughter market of this country, previous to the present Tariff:

"2°. Les manufacturiers anglais, ayant la main-d'œuvre à plus bas prix que nous et un marché plus étendu et produisant d'un autre côté un article inférieur sous bien des rapports, peuvent faire à notre industrie une concurrence féroce. Une taxe un peu plus élevée donnerait aux canadiens le contrôle de leur marché, leur permettrait de fabriquer sur une plus grande échelle et de fournir l'article à plus bas prix que maintenant. Il y a bien quelques autres obstacles soumis. ceux-ci sont les principaux et ils pourront être guéris de la même manière en portant à 20 et 25 le droit de douanes prélevé sur les marchandises à leur entrée dans le pays."

I need not quote more than this to show that the hon. gentleman was, at that period, a great protectionist. He thought that we should protect ourselves against the United States, by putting on a duty nearly as heavy as theirs, in order to prevent their manufacturers from destroying ours by underselling our goods. The hon. gentleman says in his motion:

"That in the opinion of this House, the public interests would be promoted by the repeal of the duties on coal, coke and breadstuffs."

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman wishes us to believe that this duty on breadstuffs is entirely an independent thing from the policy of this country—that it is not a portion of a system, but that it is a great separate burden on the people, and that by removing it we would not touch the Tariff but would relieve the poor people of the country. He says that the people are oppressed by this duty, that the people of the Province of Quebec are suffering greatly from it, that the poor people cannot get good flour, but are obliged to buy flour of an inferior quality; but I would ask the hon. gentleman whether the people of Quebec, previous to the adoption of the Tariff which is now in force, were purchasing different flour from what they are purchasing to-day. They are purchasing the same flour they used to purchase, and there is no difference whatever. Besides, Mr. Speaker, where are the petitions to this House from the people of Quebec or the people of Ontario for the removal of this tax? Are they now so heavily taxed, are they suffering so much, are they so overburdened, that they cannot bear that affliction? If they were, we should hear from them; we should see that Table covered with their petitions; and the hon. gentlemen opposite, when they think they have a grievance, take precious good care to have a number of petitions printed, and to send them throughout the country to be signed and sent back to this House. Why do they not do it in this case? Because they know that the people would not sign their petitions; but that from one end of the country to the other they are satisfied with the Tariff, and are happy and contented. The hon. gentleman said that the duty paid on flour last year was $109,397. Well, divide that by the population of the country, and you will find that the people are suffering to the extent of a little more than 2 cents a head; that is the great burden on the people from this duty, which the hon. gentleman wants removed. Well, Mr. Speaker, when the time for the elections comes round, let the hon. gentleman make the best he can of that fact on the hustings; let him show to the people that, during the whole year they have been paying a little more than 2 cents a head in the shape of duty on flour, and let him ask them whether they would prefer that or to go back to the old Tariff. They will tell him that they remember the five years that hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, when they were not only unable to purchase the bad flour, as he calls it, which they now purchase, but when they had not money enough to purchase any flour. They could not do it, because there was no labor in the country. There were no manufactories, and the laborers and mechanics of the country were poor; but now they would say, as they said on the 17th of September, 1878: "Let us pay one or two dollars more a barrel for flour, but give us labor, because, if we have labor, we shall have money to procure flour." The hon. gentleman spoke also of the duty on coal; he says that it is a great burden upon the people, that they are suffering very much by it, and that those who suffer most are the poor people of Ontario, on whom he takes so much pity; he says they cannot bear this burden of 50 cents or 3s. a ton on their coal, and they are no doubt on the verge of an insurrection or a revolution. The hon. gentleman will remember a period when there was no tax on coal, but did we hear the people grumble then? Yes; they did not complain of a tax on coal, but they complained that there were no industries among them; and if you asked them then if they would pay 50 cents more on their coal, they would say: "If you can give us labor and money and prosperity, we will pay it." The people are reasonable people, and they know that revenue taxes are required for the country; they are required for public works, for the great railway work we are building to connect the two oceans and the eastern and western parts of our country; they know that the Government of the country cannot be conducted without money, and they are perfectly satisfied to pay the taxes they are now paying, because they know this money is not squandered, but remains in the country, and will go back to the people in the shape of public works and improvements which increase the value of their property, give labor to the people, and therefore set money circulating throughout the country. Without entering into all the labored calculations of the hon. gentleman about carrying coal from Pennsylvania to Toronto, and from Nova Scotia to Toronto, I know, and we know, that the tax on coal has had the effect of stimulating the working of the mines, until the production has doubled and trebled and quadrupled. The hon. gentleman says that the tax has produced no good to the miners of Nova Scotia. Well, instead of having 1,000 miners at work to-day, we have 3,000 or 4,000. This, at all events, is a benefit to those 3,000 or 4,000 additional miners who had no work, and now have work and money to spend in the country, and, therefore, contribute to its revenue. Besides this, these men, instead of emigrating to the United States, and carrying their labor and their wealth there, remain in the country, are good citizens, and give value to our soil. They take from the soil the wealth that was there and was unproductive, and the result is, these men are a great addition to our population. But the true reason for imposing this tax on coal and breadstuffs is, that it stimulates a great industry, the coal industry, and the manufacture of flour, giving to the farmers an advantage they had not before. I know that in small grain, for example, in the Province of Quebec the farmers feel it is a benefit to them. But the other and the strongest reason of the two is this: that if we give up this tax on coal and the tax on breadstuffs, which taxes are so light that the people do not complain of them, we shall have nothing to offer to the United States when we wish to have with them a reciprocal treaty. We are always ready to reciprocate whenever they are, and Parliament has given the Executive power to do so at any time. The hon. gentleman must remember that we waited for thirteen years to see whether they would come and do the right thing towards us. Our friends and cousins on the other side of the line thought it was better to use those thirteen years in trying to get as much money from us as they could and give as little as they could in return. The result was that, tired of waiting, we said: "If you tax our produce we will tax yours, and will continue to do that until you find that you should act towards us as good neighbors and give us reciprocity, as we are ready to give it to you whenever you are ready." Therefore, we wish to continue that tax—a small tax if you choose—but one which will be a handle in our hands when the United States are ready to reciprocate with us. Why, in what position were we the other day when we had to negotiate through England and our High Commissioner at London with France? What had we to offer France for the concessions we wished to obtain? We had the duties on wines, and France, after negotiations, said that was not sufficient to offer them; and were we in the same position with the United States we would never have a chance to obtain a reciprocity treaty with them. I shall not delay the House longer, because in the speeches we have had on the Tariff before the House went into Committee of the Whole, all the different stages of the question of Protection and Free Trade have been discussed, but I will say I hope that the hon. gentlemen who support the Government will remember that this is a portion of the policy that has been adopted by the Government with their consent; and we ought not to remove a stone and run the risk of bringing down the edifice. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not care if that should happen because the sooner they destroy it the prouder they will be. But we who wish to continue the protection of our industries and the prosperity that the country enjoys under the regime of this Government wish to continue the Tariff as it is, though, of course, whenever it is shown that an industry is not protected and should be protected, we are always open to conviction and are prepared to give it the necessary protection, feeling assured that the representatives of the people will support the Government in such action. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, wish to destroy the prosperity we enjoy. They say that should they get back to power, they will destroy the protection we have given our industries. The hon. mover of this resolution says that the people were deceived by us in 1878, that they thought we would give them prosperity, but that they had their eyes opened and the next elections would show a different result from that of 1878. Well, the hon. gentleman could not have spoken with the conviction that I have no doubt he has on other subjects. He knew perfectly well that since 1878, the people have had repeatedly, in all the Provinces, an opportunity of saying whether they had been deceived or not, and the result has been that our numbers, instead of being reduced, have increased to such an extent that to-day the Government is supported by a majority varying from 85 to 90. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman will find great comfort in the fact that these bye elections have, as a rule, resulted in additional support to the Government. Under these circumstances I shall vote against this motion.

Mr. BOURBEAU (in French). Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to the motion presented by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), I must claim the indulgence of this House if I speak in French, as I am not sufficiently familiar with the English language to speak it with facility. I am, perhaps, better acquainted than any member of this House with the hon. member for Quebec East, and I have, before to-day, had the opportunity of hearing him make speeches, sometimes in favor of that very Protection which we have adopted, and which his own party neglected to adopt, and sometimes against that very Protection. That hon. member, during the election which took place in the county of Drummond and Arthabaska in 1877, was careful to ask me, in presence of the electors, if I was prepared to vote for the placing of a duty on flour, and he never failed to ask me this question in every parish where we had occasion to address the electors. My answer used to be, that I would do my best to ensure the getting of cheap flour, and on the most advantageous terms. Well, I think that, from our experience of the Tariff, that from what we see throughout the country, no one, except those who are desirous of making political capital, could to-day come forward and tell the electors that there are not to-day greater advantages for getting cheap flour than there was at the time of the election of 1877. But, Mr. Speaker, at the time of the second election which took place in the county which I represent, I was accused of having voted in favor of a motion introduced, I think, by the hon. member for Cape Breton, and which had for its object the placing of a duty on coal. The motion was a partial one, and we failed in obtaining the assent of the majority of the House to it; but I, who had been recently elected, and who had come before my electors as a protectionist, who had presented to the electors of Drummond and Arthabaska a protectionist programme, thought it my duty not to deviate from it, as the electors had seen fit to elect me on its basis. I voted for the motion of the hon. member for Cape Breton, and, when I was afforded the opportunity of explaining my vote, my electors declared themselves satisfied, notwithstanding the efforts of the hon. member for Quebec East to make the people protest against it. Although he pointed out to them that I was the only member of the Province of Quebec who had voted for that motion, the electors did not listen to the fine speeches of the hon. gentleman, and they voted for me; they re-elected me, as they did not consider I had committed the fault imputed to me by the hon. member. The hon. member for Quebec East has a peculiar facility for exhibiting his cause in a good light. His oratorical talents are well known; one is acquainted with his facility of speaking whenever he has the opportunity of doing so; but at the same time, Mr. Speaker, it is oftentimes noticed that his finest speeches lack bottom, a most necessary adjunct. I remember that when he was rendered the honor of being elected in 1877, his friends treated him to an ovation, and went in triumph to Arthabaska, where a banquet was given to him, and speeches were made; yet, I think that, had the excursion to be gone over again, they would not do as much. On that occasion, Mr. Speaker, attempts were made to prognosticate, and the hon. member himself, in order to convince his electors that his cause was good, he who was saying that he had just planted the Liberal standard on the Quebec citadel, he who had just won that victory, was kind enough to allow himself to be presented a piece of blue colored stuff representing the Conservative standard; in presence of an enormous crowd from Quebec East and a few electors of Arthabaska he tore this piece of blue colored stuff in two pieces; whilst his friends rent these pieces still further asunder and trampled them under foot, while saying: "Thus will we crush the Conservative party at the next elections." Such Mr. Speaker, is the mode of prognostication of the hon. member for Quebec East. We know what happened at the elections of 1878; we know that the blue Conservative standards floated over all public buildings from one end of the Dominion to the other in honor of the party to which I belong. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has spoken to us at some length of this duty on flour. I presume he has the intention of coming back into the county of Arthabaska, or into some other county, in order to impress upon the electors the belief that this duty is damaging to their interests. I think that it would prove useless for him to speak at any length on that question; the electors are intelligent, and there is no necessity of addressing them at any length on the subject of the National Policy in order to cause them to admire its principle, and to form an opinion of the position which it occupies to day. In 1877, when I was elected in the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska over the head of the hon. member for Quebec East, there was not any duty on flour, but, as has been said by the hon. Minister of Public Works, poor people had not then the means of buying flour. I am mistaken, Mr. Speaker, they did buy flour, but not flour made from wheat; they more frequently bought flour made from Indian corn because it was cheaper, but we all know what kind of an existence a man has who is obliged to feed himself with flour ground from Indian corn. The hon. member has spoken of the poor kind of flour which poor people use now, owing to there being a tax of 50 cents per barrel on imported flour; but if we consult the Trade and Navigation Returns, what do we see? We see that we, in 1880, exported 5,090,500 bushels of wheat, representing a value of $5,942,042. Last year, we exported 2,523,673 bushels of wheat, yielding the handsome return of $2,593,820. Two years ago, we exported 544,591 barrels of flour, giving the sum of $2,930,950. Last year, we exported 439,728 barrels of flour, returning the sum of $2,173,101. Now, those exports are exclusively the products of Canada, and if we are able to export wheat grown in Canada, I would ask the hon. member for Quebec East how it is that we should have to pay so great a tax on the flour which we import? But that which he calls a heavy tax, is but a small one, for, as has been stated by the hon. Minister of Public Works, that tax does not amount to more than 2 cents per head, and I think that our exports of wheat grown in Canada amply compensate for the amount which we pay in the shape of that small tax. When the hon. member for Quebec East sat on the Ministerial benches, when he had the honor of representing the county in one of the most exalted positions in this House, he attempted to introduce some changes in his Department. It will be remembered that he tried to introduce a Bill intitled the Stamp Act; the difficulty which he encountered when introducing this Bill, will also be remembered; it will likewise be remembered that this Bill, after having undergone all the changes made in it by the House in Committee, was so much altered that the hon. gentleman himself could not recognize it, and this Stamp Act was not passed. What a difference between now and then! To-day the hon. Finance Minister has abolished the stamp duty on bills of exchange, to the great satisfaction of all engaged in the higher branches of trade, and of those in the habit of transacting business by means of such bills of exchange. Now, Mr. Speaker, can a comparison be instituted between the policy of the hon. member for Quebec East and that of the present Government? Can a difference be established? If so, there is a palpable one. To-day we see prosperity reigning everywhere, and at every opportunity we see the Government striving to introduce measures calculated to bring prosperity into the country, and which will favor all classes of society; and if we instituted a comparison with the time when hon. gentlemen of the Opposition were in power, we get at the conclusion that instead of acceding to the wishes of the people, instead of listening to the petitions presented from all parts of the country asking for a change in the administration of affairs, instead of giving a hearing to the requests of electors approaching the Government, they refused to do so; no attempt was ever made to satisfy the people, and what was the result? We found poverty in all ranks of society; commerce was in difficulties; the poor man, on behalf of whom the hon. member for Quebec East appeals to-day for sympathy, was obliged to leave his country to seek for employment in the factories of the United States, our own being all closed. What else did we see, Mr. Speaker? The farmer was compelled to dispose of his produce at the very lowest prices, which far from compensated him for his labors. I have here the compared prices of agricultural products of the Province of Quebec during the years 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880 and 1881. In 1875, the wholesale price of pork was 4½ cents, and, in 1881, it sold for 8 and 9 cents per lb., or twice as much. In 1875, 1876 and 1877, oats sold at 30 to 32 cents per bushel, and, in 1879, 1880 and 1881, at from 35 to 45 cents. per bushel. In 1875, 1876 and 1877, peas sold at from 70 to 75 cents per bushel, and, in 1879, 1880, 1881, at from 75 to 85 and even 90 cents per bushel. In 1875, 1876 and 1877, butter sold at from 10 to 11 cents per lb., and in 1879, 1880 and 1881, at from 12½ to 18 and 20 cents per lb. Now, if we take animals, we find a difference of 50 per cent. in the price of horses; of 25 per cent. in that of horned cattle; of 20 per cent. in that of sheep and poultry, and of 20, 30 and 40 per cent. in that of nearly all agricultural products. Well, with such a difference duly established, when the hon. member for Quebec East shall come before the electors of our rural districts in order to try and make them believe that times are not as good now as they used to be, when he presided over the destinies of the country, I think he will find it a hard task to make himself understood. As I have said, the electors are intelligent, and they know enough to explain why we enjoy so great prosperity to-day, why we can procure money with such facility. They can explain why the poor man has work at wages which are 25 to 50 per cent. higher to-day than when the hon. member was a member of the Government of the country. The poor workingman who earns a remunerative salary, can buy to advantage the agricultural products which he stands in need of, which recompenses the farmer for the labor he has expended in bringing forth these products. The trade resulting therefrom is also in a prosperous condition, because the traders and the merchants have customers who can pay for the goods they require. The wholesale merchant, the importer, is likewise enabled to meet his engagements owing to the remittances which he gets from his debtors. An attempt has been made, Mr. Speaker, to lead us to believe that, as the great majority of the articles affected by the remodelling of the Tariff in 1879, the consumers of this country had suffered a great loss. Well, I am in business, and I certainly do not wish to be blamed for stating things which are not exact. What did we see on the shelves of our town and country merchants? Why, goods imported from the United States. To-day, goods manufactured in Canada have taken the place of those which were imported previous to the time when we enjoyed Protection; and it is impossible now to buy any other cotton than that manufactured at Hochelaga, Cornwall, Coaticooke, and in New Brunswick. It will soon be manufactured in Quebec, and at St. Henri des Tanneries. It is impossible to procure similar cotton from the States or from England; there is none to be had, Mr. Speaker, for the cotton manufactured in Canada is of a better quality and we can sell it at a cheaper figure than that which we might import. Figures have been quoted, and it has been said that the cotton factories have not prevented the importation of a large quantity of cotton from foreign countries. Well, I am in a position to state that if cotton has been imported from foreign countries, it is because our manufacturers have been unable to produce a quantity equal to the demand. I remember that last year it was impossible to get in the wholesale market all the cotton that was required; manufacturers were not able to meet the demand, and the same thing occurred, not only with regard to cotton, but also with regard to tweeds and hats, which are manufactured with great profit in the Province of Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick; and we can to-day obtain these articles at far lower prices than at the time those hon. gentlemen were in power. To-day, as I have stated, farmers sell their products at much higher rates than formerly, and, nevertheless, they can procure the implements which they require to cultivate the soil at much lower prices than they could when hon. gentlemen of the Opposition were in power; these articles which the farmer requires, are assessed with a duty of 25 to 35 per cent., which, however, does not prevent the farmer from buying them at a lower figure than when the duty on them was but 17½ per cent.; this difference is explained by the fact that our manufacturers entering into competition with each other, can produce more cheaply, and the articles which we buy from Canadian manufacturers are not assessed with a duty of 25 to 35 per cent., but their products are free of duty, as they are produced within the limits of the Dominion of Canada. To-day, Mr. Speaker, we see plenty reigning everywhere; money circulating freely throughout our cities as well as through the rural districts; and if the present Government has succeeded in inducing capitalists of foreign countries to invest their capital in our industries, it is due to the good policy of that Government; if also we see the rate of interest decrease, thus enabling borrowers to obtain money on advantageous terms, it is again due to the sound policy of our Government. I well recollect that, in 1875 and 1876, the rate of interest in our rural districts as well as that of the banks, was 9 and 10 per cent. I recollect that banks charged 20, 25, 30 and even 50 per cent; even cent per cent. has been exacted, whilst to-day, the banks are glad to lend at 7 per cent.; capitalists are content to accept 4 and 5 per cent., and the lenders in our country districts are offering their money at 6 and 7 per cent., as against the 25 and 30 per cent. they used to get in 1876 and 1877. These facts are well known to the public; electors know them from experience, for the greater part have had the opportunity of borrowing money at those exorbitant rates of interest; it was at a time when the workingman was compelled to work without being able to procure for himself all the necessaries of life, and was obliged to nourish himself with a kind of flour infinitely inferior to that which he makes use of to-day; but to-day, he has money and can buy and pay for the best flour. Another attempt has been made to create a noise about the duty levied on coal. I think that we will encounter some difficulty in exciting people in our rural districts with regard to this tax, because coal has not increased in price; it is sold to-day as cheaply as it was during the years preceding the remodelling of the Tariff. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if there is a difference, it is that coal is cheaper to-day than it was before the adoption of the present Tariff. The duty levied on coal has produced the same result as that levied on agricultural implements, viz, that it has brought about the offering to the public of a superior article at a lower price. As a proof of the poor reception which would meet any one going into our rural districts to speak against the National Policy, we see every day in the newspapers that some municipal corporation or the other offering a bonus of $10,000, $15,000, $20,000 and sometimes even $25,000 to any company willing to erect a manufacture in its locality, and binding itself to exempt it from taxation for a space of twenty years. If the population were opposed to manufactures, it would be opposed to the system of Protection, and it would assuredly not offer bonuses to manufacturers desirous of establishing themselves in the localities where this bonus is offered. There is, Mr. Speaker, proof that even in certain localities, where either out of pride, me thinks, or out of party spirit, people rant against the National Policy, people see that that policy is a sound one and advantageous to the country. Nevertheless, all the time that they saw this, they continue to cry out against that policy, but they do not object to the erection of manufactures; they do not object to being taxed $10,000, $15,000, $20,000 and $25,000 in order to attract manufacturers to those localities. Here we have unanswerable evidence that the National Policy meets with a general approval, and without wishing to name an hon. member of this House who talks against Protection and the readjustment of the Tariff such as adopted by our Government, I may say that one of those gentlemen said in my presence and in that of several members, and that not so very long ago, that he made every effort to induce the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was in power, to adopt that National Policy which was clamoured for by the majority of the electors of the Dominion and which was refused by the then hon. leader of the Government. The same hon. member nevertheless continues to support his party and to speak against the National Policy. This shows that hon. gentlemen opposite are inconsistent in their speeches, and that what they say is not always what they think, and what they repeat later, as has been seen to-day by the quotations made by the hon. Minister of Public Works from a speech made by the hon. member for Quebec East in 1874, and I think that the hon. Minister of Public Works might have gone as far back as 1871, when the hon. member for Quebec East, at that time member for Drummond and Arthabaska in the Local House, made a speech in favor of Protection.

After Recess.

Mr. BOURBEAU (in French). Mr. Speaker, I endeavor, before the close of the sitting, to prove, and I think that I established pretty clearly, that the National Policy had brought about abundance and satisfaction throughout the whole Dominion of Canada. I think that were we to accede to the desire of the hon. member for Quebec East, who has proposed a resolution to take off the duties now levied on flour and coal, we should, at the same time, be obliged to take off the duty levied on many other articles since the re-adjustment of the Tariff in 1879. But I am of opinion that the electors of the Dominion would be little satisfied with such a change, for it would have the effect, as we said in 1875, of closing our sugar refineries, our cotton, hat and woollen factories, our agricultural implement works; and we would be compelled to purchase from foreign manufacturers, as we did before the adoption of the present Tariff. We would also see our artisans and mechanics, thus deprived of work, leave the country; the farmer would be compelled to sacrifice his products, because trade becoming duller, the demand for them would become smaller; and the consumption of them likewise becoming smaller the farmer would be compelled to sell his products at the same price that he was selling them formerly. Assuredly, Mr. Speaker, the electors of the Dominion do not wish to return to those unhappy times which they had to endure during the régime of our Liberal friends. I have even heard it said by Liberals themselves, at public meetings, but they were Liberals who wished for protection: "Rather tax us and give us the means of earning money than return to the times when we were less taxed, and when we had not sufficient money to buy the necessaries of life." Moreover, were we to adopt the proposition of the gentlemen of the Opposition, we should thereby impede the encouragement given to the colonization of the North-West. I think that we have a great deal to expect from this colonization of the North-West. I think it important to encourage it, and the way to encourage it is to keep in force the Protection which we are enjoying, and to compel settlers to come and buy from the manufacturers of the Eastern Provinces, so that we may in turn buy our grain from the farmers of the west. We must make an exchange with them; let us encourage the farmers of the west, and let them encourage our manufactures; good will result therefrom, and money will remain in the country. But what astonishes me most, Mr. Speaker, is to see hon. gentlemen of the Opposition, in order to reach their goal, in their efforts to gain popularity, depreciate our national enterprises; it is to see them depreciate the quality of our coal, the quality of our soil, and even the climate of our country. To sum up, there is not a thing that they do not say in order to make electors believe that the National Policy is not a beneficial one; but, in my opinion, were they to reflect a little, they would perceive that if they do harm to any one, it is to themselves. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) said in his speech that we were exporting less manufactured articles from the country than we did formerly, since the re-adjustment of the Tariff. The matter was thoroughly explained; he was well answered on that point; but better to depreciate the country, he mentioned the fact that there was an increase in the exports of certain of our products, and he instanced among others the exports of rags. I think, Mr. Speaker, that he might have dispensed with the mention of this, but since he has seen fit to do so, I will take the liberty of answering him, and I will tell him that if to-day we export rags, it is because we have the means of buying stuff of a better quality. When hon. gentlemen of the Opposition governed the country, our artisans were compelled to buy old clothes and old hats; they could not buy new ones as often as they do to-day; but now that through the effects of Protection they have the means of buying new clothes, they can well afford to export their rags. In the county which I have the honor of representing, Mr. Speaker, we notice a large increase in the number of manufactures. Although I belong to a rural country, manufactures are spring up in it, as if by enchantment; it is true, we do not possess manufactures on as grand a scale as those we see in great cities, but the public are surprised to see the aggrandizement of manufactures in our rural districts and to see the prosperity which reigns everywhere. I hold in my hand a statement prepared for me by one of my electors in the county of Drummond, which shows that in Kingsey, Grantham, Durham, Wickham, Wendover, St. Bonaventure, St. Guillaume and Drummondville, in all the parishes in fact, new mills are being erected; everywhere one sees springing up new manufactures, tanneries, foundries, creameries, woollen and saw mills, in a word, industries of all kinds that are bringing abundance into these localities, which are causing the farmer and the workingman to rejoice and which bring prosperity to those who invest in these manufactures. If, from the county of Drummond, we go to that of Arthabaska, we likewise see manufactures springing up there, as if by enchantment, and in the parish of Stanfold, formerly the stronghold of the hon. member for Quebec East, we witness the greatest activity; no less than ten furnaces are putting in motion machinery employed in manufactures of leather, wool, shingles, boots and shoes and many other industries, too numerous to give in detail. The factories of Messrs. Matté and Donovan employ a large number of workmen who prepare leather, not only for the home market, but also for the export trade. Previous to the adoption of the present Tariff, one could not export to England leather manufactured in this country; uppers, for instance, could not be exported; but since the adoption of the Tariff, there is manufactured to great advantage a kind of leather, which allows manufactures, when the local market is glutted, to clear it, by sending it into foreign countries. In that county we consume 2,500 cords of bark, which gives farmers the advantage of selling their bark at a higher price, when the price goes down in the United States. We see also the boot and shoe manufactory of Mr. Belanger as well as the mills of Messrs. Guay, Godbout, Lessard and other manufacturers. If, from Stanfold, we go to Arthabaska, we notice the saw mills of Messrs. Mercier and Crépault, the furniture factory of Mr. Baril, the leather factory of Messrs. Matté, Gravel and McFarley, the saw mills of Messrs. Frotier and Lambert and the Canadian tobacco and cigar factory of Messrs. Théroux and Berwiss. Some of these manufactures certainly existed previous to the adoption of the present Tariff, but all were not in operation one-half of the time, while at present they are all at work every day, and often at night, and they give employment to a great number of operatives. If, from Arthabaska, we go to Warwick, we find the leather factory of Mr. Richardson and the saw mill of Mr. Mercier. Kingsey boasts of a large paper mill, saw mill and shingle factories. I will not undertake, Mr. Speaker, to enumerate all these manufactures; I know that the time of the House is precious, and I do not wish to take undue advantage of the time that has been granted me to speak. I will say, in conclusion, that I have always worked in the common interest of farmers and of artisans, and I would not like to render them liable, through my vote, to an expenditure that would not turn out to be profitable; and it is for that reason that, my views being well known in the county which has done me the honor of electing me against the hon. member for Quebec East, I will vote against the resolution now before the House, because I think that the Tariff is the best we could have for the prosperity of all classes in the Dominion of Canada, and because I believe that the motion of the hon. member for Quebec East is made with the object of deceiving the electors.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened somewhat attentively to the remarkable speech just delivered by the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska, and certainly, if we are to believe him, the National Policy has produced all those wonderful results, which he discovers through its prism. I must, however, be permitted to differ, and not to fully share his views. I do not doubt, and I am ready to admit, that the changes in the Tariff have been, and are the cause of a somewhat considerable advantage to certain classes of manufacturers; but I will not go as far as to say that this is entirely due to the changes wrought in the Tariff. I do not wish to repeat here the arguments so repeatedly heard in this House, and I will only claim its indulgence for a very short time. The question before us amounts simply to this: whether the present Tariff is an equal, equitable and just one towards all the Provinces. I pretend to show that that Tariff is specially detrimental to the Province of Quebec. Any and every tax should weigh equally on all of Her Majesty's subjects in this country. One Province should not be taxed to the detriment of another, and if I look at the effects of that duty, what do I see? Instead of the trifling amount of 2 cents per head, as stated by the hon. Minister of Public Works, that duty amounts to a good deal higher as I am about to demonstrate; moreover, that duty, from the manner in which it is levied, is not equally distributed, because it falls more heavily on the poorer class, that which has to buy its flour. It is useless to say that that duty does not fall more heavily on the poor; I maintain that it does, for I know it from practical experience. Who is there who is not aware of what it costs the settler who goes to establish himself in the townships in order to clear land, to purchase a barrel of flour? Who is there who does not know the price he has to pay, and especially the additional tax of 50 cents, which he pays on a barrel of flour before it can come to his farm? I know personally a large number who complain bitterly of that tax. I have taken the trouble of consulting several influential and competent persons in my county, in order to find out what might be the amount of flour imported into that county, and from letters which I hold, I find that there are imported by the poorer class into the county of L'Islet, at least 5,000 to 6,000 barrels of flour, and this in three or four parishes only. But it will be said that this duty of 50 cents is not felt on these barrels of flour. It will be said that this tax of 50 cents does not amount to 50 but only to 10 cents. Pretend what you will, the tax of 50 cents represents the amount of the duty, and year in and year out, it always remains 50 cents, and in my county, I know full well that it has ever represented and still represents 50 cents. Now, if you calculate that these 50 cents are, in the first place, paid by the settler who goes to establish himself, do you think he is simply paying 50 cents? He is paying more, because to the account debited to him with those 50 cents is added interest; much more, if the trader who sells the flour to him on the appointed day, makes him pay double and treble interest on those 50 cents, so that there are barrels of flour which amount in cost to $12 or even $15, because they have not been paid at the expiration of six or nine months. Such is the advantage which the settler derives from that duty of 50 cents on flour, and if my hon. friend from Drummond and Arthabaska, who is, I think, a trader, wishes to inform his customers of the amount of those duties, let him enter in their accounts the amount of duties with which he charges them, as it is done elsewhere, viz: in Prince Edward Island; thus will the settler know exactly the amount of duties which he is paying, and thus being cognizant of matters, he will know whom he has to thank for them.

Mr. BOURBEAU. Will the hon. member allow me a word in explanation? My customers would receive a very small account indeed, were I to inform them of the duties they pay on the goods I sell them, for nearly all those goods are manufactured in the country and do not pay any duty.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I do not think that that argument will hold good with the people; it may with the House as it is now constituted, but the people will not accept it. Now, it has been pretended that this tax represented only 2 cents a head. I maintain that the Province of Quebec, has, since Confederation, been taxed in excess of the other Provinces, and if I am to believe the tables of Trade and Navigation for the present year, of which I hold an extract, it is clearly shown, that especially since the new Tariff has been in force, from 1878 to 1881, that the difference between the duties paid by the Province of Quebec, as compared with those paid by the Province of Ontario and Nova Scotia, is excessively high. I will now state, in English, to the hon. Minister of Public Works, who spoke in English, what I have to say on the subject. I heard the Minister of Public Works say, in English, what I desire to contradict in English, and in spite of the interruptions of the hon. members opposite I intend to and will say it. That hon. gentleman said this: that the only difference to the people of Quebec, made by the coal, wheat and flour duties were a mere matter of about 2 cents per head. I would thank him for calling his flock to order and procuring silence. I was saying that the Minister of Public Works was totally ignorant—I presume innocently in error—in making this statement; but he did not lead me into his error, in saying that the duties on flour and coal only amounted to that much.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I put the question to the member for Quebec East—whether he had stated that the amount was $109,397, and he said yes, when I replied: "Divide that by the population of the country, and it would be little more than two cents a head."

Mr. CASGRAIN. I understood you to say what I have credited you with. I did not want the statement to go to the country otherwise than I understood it. I will show you the difference between the taxation per head, borne by the different Provinces, from your own return, so that you can compare the contribution of Quebec with those of the other Provinces. I suppose if we in Quebec pay this additional duty it must be assumed that there is an enormous difference between the quotas of the different Provinces. What is the difference between the payments of Ontario and Quebec for 1878?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The hon. the Finance Minister cannot laugh off his own returns. Ontario paid, in 1878, $2.90 per head, and Quebec, $3.79. I think that it is a little more than 2 cents per head. Nova Scotia paid $3.14; that does not come up to $3.79. Now take 1879: Ontario paid $3.06; Quebec, $3.97; Nova Scotia, $3.05, or 1 cent less than Ontario. Now take the next year under this National Policy: in 1880, Ontario paid $3.14; Quebec, $5.03; Nova Scotia, $3.14. What difference did that make? For 1881, Ontario paid $3.33; Quebec, $6.94, or $3.62 more than Ontario, and $3.54 more than Nova Scotia paid. We are willing, in Quebec, to pay pro rata, the same as any other Province; but what do we get in return? A tax on flour and a tax on coal. Well, what has been the immediate effect of that tax on coal? It was exactly the same as in 1869, when the rates for passengers between Montreal and Quebec were raised 50 cents per head. At present they pay this much more between those cities. We are willing to pay any duty provided it be equally divided among the population. What do we get in return for our surplus payments into the Treasury? Do we get a single immigrant that settles in Quebec? Do we not pay a contingent also for the immigration to this country? Does not this immigration for which we pay our share go to Manitoba and the North-West? What do we get for it? The people of my county asked last year and the year before a very small favor, a small station on the Intercolonial, on the Elgin Road, but were refused on the ground that it would cost too much. Our flour tax in the county for one year would build that and two or three more stations besides. I am sorry to say that our Province of Quebec is not treated with due consideration; considering our contributions to the revenue, our treatment should be better. It appears we have been told we must submit to it, and that to a certain extent we are an inferior race, that we are taillables et corvéables à merci. We do not desire to continue in this condition; and I think some of these days the Province will wake up and decide that if it pays the fiddler it will make others dance. When the hon. Minister of Public Works arose, he began his speech by attacking the member for Quebec East. That hon. gentleman is very well able to protect himself; but it is no argument to say to him—at such a time you said this, or if you did not say it, the papers writing for you did, and then to go on to read an extract which pretended to favor Protection. That may establish more or less a writer's state of mind at the time, though I do not suppose he would be bound all his life by what he has written. But, if that style of argument is introduced, we can retort most easily. I hold in my hand a report of the very words of the late Sir George E. Cartier at the time he was a second member of the Administration to which the present hon. Minister of Public Works belonged; and I suppose he will not disavow the language of his colleague. In 1870, speaking of Protection, Sir George E. Cartier said:

“Protection meant the levying of taxes on the agriculturist and land owner for the benefit of a few. Its friends argued for a policy in this respect of discriminating duties which has never been attempted by a Colonial or the British Legislature since the inauguration of the present policy.”

In those days that was the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. They have wholly changed it since. Circumstances alter cases it appears. But they cannot reproach others with having changed their ideas. To come back again to the question under consideration, I recollect the time, not far back, when an hon. member of this House from the Province of Quebec pronounced himself in favor of the principle of this motion. I hold in my hand a motion made on the 18th of April, 1879, by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée). I hope that hon. gentleman will be as consistent this year as he was then. He was speaking, not only for himself, but in the name of the electors of his county, and they bound him to vote down this tax on flour. He moved an amendment, and so zealous was he against this odious tax on flour that he did not give me time to put in a motion I had prepared in the same case. Here are the words of his motion:

“That it is not expedient, in the public interest, to impose a tax of 50 cents per barrel upon wheat flour imported into this country, and that this article should be placed upon the list of commodities imported into Canada free of duty.”

We will see presently how far that hon. gentleman is consistent. In explaining his motion, he said that he was fulfilling a promise made to his constituents. Well, I suppose he is a man of his word, and will keep his promise, as he did then. Not only that, but he said: “Quebec's share of the sacrifices in favor of the Dominion was a little larger than it was necessary it should be.” He was then of the opinion, as I am now, that we are paying a little more than our share of the taxes of this country. I want to say, for my own part, that, in the Province of Quebec, this tax on flour is considered a most iniquitous and odious one. We have no equivalent for it. We are placed between two taxes, one on coal, for the benefit of the Lower Provinces, and one on flour, for the benefit of the Upper Provinces. Both ends of this Dominion combine in order, I may say, to oppress the Province of Quebec. Therefore, I have made up my mind to vote in favor of the motion of my hon. friend from Quebec East.

Mr. HACKETT. In my opinion the hon. gentleman who has introduced this motion has done so for the purpose of making some capital in the Maritime Provinces. As we have to depend to a large extent on the people of Ontario for our breadstuffs the hon. gentleman imagines that he will make a strong point with the people of the Maritime Provinces. If I am credibly informed, I believe that hon. gentleman made a tour of the Maritime Provinces last year. I am told that he went down to Nova Scotia and said there that he intended to convince the people of that section of the country that they were very unjustly taxed. I am also informed that on one occasion the hon. gentleman was addressing an audience at New Glasgow in the county of Pictou, and his platform being a very unsubstantial and rickety one, he was precipitated below and came down at the feet of the people of Nova Scotia. I think the hon. gentleman will find that his present motion is just as unsubstantial and as badly constructed as that platform was, and when he and his party go to the people of this country in 1883, or sooner, they will meet with a similar misfortune, and will find themselves as they did then, scrambling in the dirt. The hon. gentleman has endeavored to make it appear that the people of this country are paying a certain tax on breadstuffs. The fact is that we in this country produce more flour than we can consume, and have to go abroad to find a market for our surplus flour, and while this is the case no one can make it appear that we are paying an exorbitant price for our flour. The price of breadstuffs is regulated by the markets of the world, and when we have to go to Europe to sell our products it is quite evident that we are not paying more for our breadstuffs than we would pay were there no duty upon them. But to prove my position I have only to quote the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He stated in his speech on the Budget that spring wheat was sold in Buffalo at $1.45 per bushel, and in Toronto at $1.26½ per bushel, or 18½ cents lower in Canada than in the United States. Now, Sir, we know very well that if wheat can be bought in Canada 18½ cents cheaper than in the United States flour must necessarily be bought cheaper also. We have the same facilities for manufacturing flour in Canada that they have in the United States. We have as good water power or steam power, as good skilled workmen and as good mills, and what is the reason that, if we can produce wheat in Canada 18½ cents cheaper than the United States, we cannot also have flour at a cheaper rate? Now following out the line of argument laid down by that hon. gentleman, what would be the result, taking as a basis four and a-half bushels of wheat for a barrel of flour? We find that flour manufactured from Canadian wheat could be sold in the markets of the world for 85 cents less than the flour of the United States of a corresponding grade. It is ridiculous for the hon. gentleman to endeavor to make it appear that, with a duty of 50 cents per barrel on United States flour, it is going to raise the price of Canadian flour. I come from a Province that possesses few manufacturing industries. Whether that be owing to a want of enterprise or to our isolated position, I cannot say. But it is impossible to prove that because we are shut out for a great portion of the year from the rest of the Dominion, and have to buy a large portion of the commodities we consume, that we are unduly taxed. Now, with regard to the article of breadstuffs, I will just state what has been done in that line last year. I find, in looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns, that Prince Edward Island, last year, imported 2,200 barrels of flour, upon which duty amounting to $1,100 has been paid. Is that any reason why we should take alarm at this flour tax? The amount collected from the importation of foreign flour amounts only to 1 cent per head of the population of the Island. Is that an exorbitant tax? Hon. gentlemen will agree with me that a tax of that amount, even if the people had to pay the duty, which I deny, would not be alarming. Those 2,200 barrels of flour were imported from the United States. Why were they imported? From the simple fact that we have some citizens of the United States doing business on the Island. They can buy in the markets of the United States a certain brand of flour very much cheaper than they can do in Canada. We have no brand of flour in Canada so low as the brand which they can buy in the United States. Flour that has been cast aside as not capable of bearing inspection is brought to the Island and sold to fishermen. Those 2,200 barrels are altogether of this description; they were of a low grade, so low and poor that they could not be sold to the people of the United States, and they had to be mixed with good Canadian flour before they were saleable. I am of the opinion that a duty of $1 or $1.50 on American flour would be better than the present duty of 50 cents per barrel, so as to shut out the American flour altogether. We have in this country a large extent of fertile land, as intelligent farmers as in the United States, and, with a good climate, we should be able to raise sufficient breadstuffs for ourselves and not be dependent on the United States. For myself, speaking from the standpoint of a Prince Edward Islander, I know the low grades of flour that are imported, and I shall be very glad to see such grades altogether excluded from our market. But apart altogether from the question of flour and wheat, there are other products of Canada that require protection. We raise large quantities of coarse grains, such as barley and oats, and our farmers require to be protected in that particular industry. They require protection against American oats and barley brought into our markets. Our opponents say a duty of 10 cents per bushel on coarse grains is no protection whatever. But what was the condition of things in 1878? We had a very large quantity of those grains imported. We do not say hon. gentlemen opposite did so for political purposes, but an hon. gentleman who is looking at me at this moment introduced a resolution setting forth that it was necessary, in the interest of our farmers, that a duty should be imposed on American oats and flour. Has the hon. gentleman gone back on his position? If so, he is the most inconsistent of individuals. In 1878, 340,491 bushels of American barley were imported to this country. Was it not necessary that Canadian farmers should be protected in some measure against such an influx. Hon. gentlemen will agree with me in saying that it was. What has been the result of the present tariff on barley? While we imported nearly 500,000 bushels in 1878, last year, 1881, we imported only eleven bushels; and that is a conclusive proof that the protective duty had the effect of shutting out those 500,000 bushels. Coming to oats, in which I am more immediately interested, I would remark that, in 1878, 1,633,778 bushels were brought into the Dominion from the United States. Hon. gentlemen may say that the price is low in the United States, and for that reason oats were brought into Canada. That is the very reason why the farmers should have Protection. As opposed to almost 2,000,000 bushels imported in 1878, there were only 2,573 bushels imported last year. Here we clearly see the result of the National Policy, under which our own farmers have the market to the extent of the former importation. What was the result of the policy in force in 1878, on the people of Prince Edward Island. Owing to the fact that oats were imported from the United States, and sold in Ontario and Quebec, the oats of those Provinces were forced into the markets of the Lower Provinces. Before that time we had the markets of the Lower Provinces almost to ourselves. The farmers of Prince Edward Island could send oats to different points in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and sell them at remunerative prices; but, in 1878, owing to the large quantity of oats entering the Upper Provinces these oats were forced down to the Maritime Provinces and reduced the prices to unremunerative rates. On account of the import duty of 10 cents a bushel on oats American oats are not sent into the Upper Provinces, the oats of their farmers are therefore sold in the home market and we command the Lower Provinces. Island farmers can now send their oats to Halifax and St. John, and all along the north shore of New Brunswick, and sell them at remunerative prices, and I therefore contend that I have thoroughly and clearly established that the National Policy has greatly benefited not only Ontario and Quebec but also the Lower Provinces. Hon. gentlemen opposite will argue that while the Islanders are dealing with Ontario and Quebec they should deal with the people of the United States, and that the United States is their natural market. I cannot see that that has been clearly established. As regards certain commodities such as potatoes our principal market is the United States, but they meet us with a duty which almost shuts us out. If that is our natural market it would appear as if we were not the natural suppliers of that market, because the Americans impose a heavy duty before they admit our products. Is it consistent with political economy that the Americans should shut out our products and we allow them to bring in their products? It is an injustice, and hon. gentlemen who support such a policy are not a party who will receive the support of the people. The Province of Prince Edward Island in 1870 supported just such a policy as is at present at force in the Dominion. Looking at the Tariff of the Island for that year, which was three years before Confederation, and when the Island did not think it necessary to enter Confederation, and when every person was opposed to the proposal, the Government of the day imposed a duty on products coming from the United States. I have in my hands the journals of the Legislative Assembly for 1874, and I find that even at that day a tax of 11 per cent. was imposed on bread coming into the Island—a higher tax than is now imposed by the Government of the Dominion. I find also that every article produced by the farmers of the Island was protected. I find that such articles as butter, cheese and many other articles produced by the farmer were largely protected.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. But you imported these articles. Mr. HACKETT. Well, the duty was put on in the interests of the Island, as it has been put on the Dominion of Canada, by a Government desirous of protecting the interests of farmers as well as other classes. I find that a duty of one shilling per barrel was imposed on corn-meal, so that it will be seen that the Island was in favor of Protection long ago, notwithstanding the statements of those who try to make it appear that they speak for the people of that Province, that they are heaven-born statesmen, who can speak for the whole Dominion. I represent as intelligent a constituency as any gentleman in this House, I care not from what part of the Dominion he comes, and when I speak for them I speak their sentiments and views and in their interests. When I say that we are not opposed to this tax, that we are willing to bear our share in common with the rest of the Dominion, I speak the sentiments of my constituents, who believe that this system is in the interests of the Dominion at large. Now, with regard to the tax on flour, hon. gentlemen opposite try to make it appear that the people of the Maritime Provinces are galling under the yoke of the present Tariff. These hon. gentlemen are trying to stir up sectional feelings to turn one Province against another. That is their desire, but the people are too intelligent, and well schooled in the politics of the country for hon. gentlemen of small ideas, of contracted views, to lead them astray on this subject. Now, with regard to the duty on flour, I find that, even at that time, though the Island had not joined the Dominion, the people of that Province felt that they should trade with their brethren in Canada; they recognized that as an act of patriotism, and in consequence they taxed American flour 1s. 6d. per barrel, and allowed the colonial product to come in free. They said we are going to protect the interests of people living under the British flag in all parts of this country; we will let their products in free and impose a tax on the people living south of the boundary line to the same amount as they impose upon us. And who are the hon. gentlemen who were at the head of the Government who imposed this tax. They are gentlemen who still live in Prince Edward Island; they still say that they belong to the great Liberal party of this country, and although they are represented in this House by a not very numerous party, in fact a most insignificant party, still one occasionally meets them down in Prince Edward Island where they claim to belong to the great Free Trade Liberal party of this country. The leader of that Government has now a very snug place in the Senate of this Dominion. He is at present the only gentleman in the Senate from Prince Edward Island who supports hon. gentlemen opposite, and yet he was the man who said that the products of Prince Edward Island should be protected against the products of other countries. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Haythorne. Another was the Hon. Alexander Laird, brother of the ex-Governor of the North-West Territories, who was formerly a member of this House and a great free-trader. Hon. Peter Sinclair was another who was also a member of the last Parliament. Then there was the Hon. Benjamin Davis, who has been ensconced in a fine office in Prince Edward Island, as a reward for his services; and I think it comes with very bad grace from hon. gentlemen here, who pretend to be on the same side of politics with them, to oppose Protection for the industries of Canada. I believe that Protection is the settled policy of the people of this Dominion, and that nothing hon. gentlemen can say or do will change in the slightest degree the minds of the people, for the feeling is too widely spread, too deeply seated. Hon. gentlemen may move want of confidence motions, as many as they please, but the people will regard it as on a par with the clap-trap which these hon. gentlemen indulged in in 1878. Another redeeming feature of the present policy is this: that we are relieved from the pressure of alarming deficits of hon. gentlemen opposite. We are placed beyond the possibility of their repetition. Last year we had the large surplus of $4,500,000, and the present year I hope it will be $3,000,000 at least—a fact that shows that we are now starting on an era of prosperity. The people of this country realize that we are starting on an era of prosperity, and why should they abandon it for a more gloomy state of things. Hon. gentlemen need not imagine that they are going to carry away the people or change their policy by moving these resolutions, as the people are bound that they shall not depart from the prosperity, the peace and plenty which they are now enjoying under the present Tariff by adopting the one advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Mr. Speaker, if my memory does not deceive me very much, not very long ago the hon. gentleman, who has just taken his seat, was not such a pronounced advocate of the policy of the Government as he appears to be to-night. If I am not very much mistaken, within a period of two years, that hon. gentleman declared, upon the floor of Parliament, that the policy of the Government was injurious to the Province he represented. If I am not very much mistaken, he made a most pathetic appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to consider the claims of the Island of Prince Edward, because the Tariff was most injurious to the best interests of that Province.

Mr. HACKETT. No such thing.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Light has dawned on his dark mind, and to-night we find him a pronounced advocate of the policy of Protection. I did not pay sufficient attention to the remarks of the hon. gentleman to be able to follow him through his whole speech, nor do I propose doing so. I paid more attention, a good deal, as I always do, to the speech of the hon. Minister of Public Works. However one may disagree with the propositions that hon. gentleman lays down, or with the conclusions that he arrives at—and sometimes he arrives at extraordinary conclusions—one cannot help, at all events I cannot help, admiring my hon. friend; he is always pleasant, good natured and smiling, and therefore I always pay a good deal of attention, and of deference I may say, to his observations. But I think the hon. gentleman in his opening remarks, was exceedingly ungracious to his colleagues who sat to his right and to his left. He undertook to twit my hon. friend for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) for having changed within the last ten years his opinions on Protection and Free Trade, but the hon. gentleman forgot that there were two of his own colleagues beside him, who, if my memory serves me right, were at one period of their history pronounced Free Traders. It was ungracious of my hon. friend, therefore, to allude to the change of opinion on the part of my hon. friend from Quebec East. If he did change his opinions, of which I know nothing; all I can say is this: that if my hon. friend from Quebec East changed his opinions, he got new light on the subject; he is going onwards, while they are going backwards. The hon. Minister of Public Works, was ungracious also to his colleagues in some of the other observations he made. He admitted that the tax on coal was paid by the people of Ontario, because it was necessary to have a tax of this kind for revenue purposes, as we were constructing great public works. A revenue from what? From the very articles we are now discussing—coal and broadstuffs. The hon. Minister of Finance, when discussing this question some time ago, admitted that the people of Ontario paid one-half of the coal tax—he did not think they paid more than one-half. But the hon. Minister of Railways, who is never at a loss, who never hesitates, and who never doubts, who never has any difficulty about the facts or figures—because if the facts or figures are not there, they can easily be manufactured to suit any line of argument he may adopt—was prepared to establish beyond peradventure that the people of this country do not pay a single farthing of the coal tax, but that it is all paid by the people who produce the coal on the other side of the line. Would it not be wise, Mr. Speaker, for the hon. Minister of Finance, the hon. Minister of Public Works, and the hon. Minister of Railways to get together and settle this difficulty which they have among themselves before they announce their views to the House? They are evidently not agreed on the subject; one says that we pay half, the other says that we pay the whole, and the other says that we do not pay a farthing of the tax at all. There was another observation made by the hon. Minister of Public Works, and perhaps, after all, it was the most effective part of his argument; following the example of his leader, he appealed to his followers on both sides of the House—and I am sorry to say he has followers on both sides—to stick to the policy of the Government and to vote down the proposition of my hon. friend from Quebec East. Whether the proposition was right or not was of no kind of consequence; the taxes in question formed one of the bricks of the great superstructure, and it did not become any of the members on either side of the House who supported him to displace one of the bricks. It was of no kind of consequence to him whether the coal tax or the bread tax was obnoxious or not; that was not the question; the appeal he made to his friends was to vote down the proposition of my hon. friend from Quebec East, be the proposition right or be it wrong; and I have no doubt his advice will be taken. I have no doubt his followers in this House, whenever he raises his little finger and asks them to do a thing, will do it without murmur; there are no difficulties in the way that cannot be got over—no conscientious scruples or conscientious qualms. Now, Sir, I propose dealing with the coal tax as it affects the Province of Ontario. The bread tax has been dealt with by my hon. friend from Quebec East, and he has not been answered, in my judgment, and in fact, no one has attempted to answer him. I propose dealing with the coal tax and taking up a few observations made on the subject by the hon. Minister of Railways; I propose analysing the figures that hon. gentleman gave to the House; I propose to call into question the correctness of the statement made by him that the coal tax was not paid by the people of Ontario, but by the producers of coal on the other side of the line: I propose to challenge the tables he has submitted to the House, and I propose proving, beyond doubt that the figures he presented to Parliament were cooked—I do not mean to say by the hon. Minister of Railways, but by the man who prepared the figures for him; I propose proving that those figures were false and calculated to mislead, and that they did mislead; I propose proving that the premises on which he based his argument were all wrong, and I of course propose following that up by proving that the conclusions which the hon. gentleman arrived at were equally wrong. Now, the hon. gentleman started out with two propositions: one was that the price of coal from the United States is fixed and governed by the competition it has to meet with in the United States, and the other was that the imposition of the duty, or the coal tax, has not increased the price of coal to the Canadian consumer; or, in other words, that owing to this competition, about which the hon. gentleman spoke so vehemently and so loudly the other night, the price of coal has been reduced in the American market, to the Canadian purchaser, and of course to the Canadian consumer. The hon. gentleman said, in his speech, speaking of his colleague, the hon. Minister of Finance, who said that the people of this country paid a portion of the coal tax:

“I am satisfied my hon. friend has not given that subject the close and exhaustive study that I have given to it, or he would have arrived at the opinion I now unhesitatingly state, that the imposition of the duty has not cost the people of this country anything, but the reverse. Now, Sir, my first position is that the price of coal from the United States is fixed and preserved by the competition that coal has to meet with.”

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman's first position is, that the price of coal in the United States is fixed by the competition there. Now, the argument of the hon. gentleman was that, by the imposition of 50 cents per ton on American coal, or coal coming into Ontario for consumption, its cost was necessarily reduced. Let us see what are the facts, and then we will be able to decide whether the premises laid down and the conclusions arrived at by the hon. gentleman are right or wrong. To make his argument worth anything, the hon. gentleman was bound to show that the competition met with by the Americans in the Canadian market was much keener during the past three years than during the three or any number of years preceding the introduction of the National Policy. But competition has not been much keener and the output from the mines of Nova Scotia has not been, to any appreciable extent, increased either by the National Policy or by any other cause in the last four years. As the hon. gentleman has submitted to the House a large number of tables on the coal question, I propose to submit to the House, in answer to the hon. gentleman, a number of tables that, in my judgment, entirely disproves his propositions and conclusions. If the argument of the hon. gentleman amounts to anything, it is this: that the keener the competition the more the price is reduced. If we can prove that the competition has not been any keener during the last three years than during the three years preceding the introduction of the National Policy, that portion of the argument falls to the ground. Let us see how the facts sustain the contention. According to the statement of the hon. Minister the other night, the sales of the production of Nova Scotian mines in 1873 amounted to 881,106 tons. In 1877, as appears by the report of the Commissioner of Mines, they amounted to 687,065 tons; in 1878, to 693,511 tons; in 1879, to 688,624 tons; in 1880, to 954,659 tons; in 1881, to 1,034,800 tons. This shows that, in 1880, with the National Policy, and, I suppose, the Nova Scotia mines in full blast, the increase of sales of Nova Scotia coal was only 73,553 tons over the sales in 1873; and that, in 1881, with the National Policy and the Nova Scotia coal mines still in full blast, and the country prosperous, and everything flourishing, as we hear continually from hon. gentlemen opposite, the increase was only 153,694 tons over the sales of 1873. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that because, in 1880, 73,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal were sold more than in 1873, the price of American coal was thereby reduced in the slightest possible degree? There is still another way by which one can test the correctness of the propositions of the hon. gentleman. If the Nova Scotian coal has come into sharper competition with the American coal, during the last three years than formerly the former must have displaced the latter in our markets to a great extent, and the importation from the United States must necessarily have fallen off. But what are the facts? This table shows that, instead of there being a falling off, the importation of American coal has greatly increased during the last few years, and especially since the introduction of the National Policy. I do not desire to trouble the House with figures, but as the hon. gentleman has submitted to the House figures with the intent of convincing the House and the country that the position he took was correct, I am going to trouble the House by a few figures to show that his position is a false and incorrect one. In 1876, the importations of coal, both hard and soft, into Ontario from the United States, were 472,706 tons; in 1877, they amounted to 607,747 tons; in 1878, to 588,412 tons; in 1879, to 643,385 tons; in 1880, to 667,164 tons; and, in 1881, despite the marvellous competition from the Nova Scotia mines, spoken of by the Minister of Railways, that affected the price of American coal and reduced the price to the Canadian consumer, the number of tons imported from the United States reached 810,970 tons. In other words, we imported from the United States, in 1881, into Ontario, 222,558 tons more than in 1878, before the National Policy was ever heard of. But the hon. gentleman argued that the imposition of this duty stimulated production, that production caused competition, and that competition reduced the price of coal. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell us that because, in 1880, we sold 73,000 tons more than in 1873, that therefore the price of 66,000,000 tons, the coal production of the United States in 1880, was thereby affected in the slightest degree? The hon. gentleman might just as well say that the prices of the 297,000,000 tons, the coal production of the world in 1879, were affected by the extra 73,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal put on the market in 1880 over and above the amount put on the market in 1873. The hon. gentleman must know and admit, if he only has the candor to admit it, that this unappreciable amount of coal which we put on the market in 1880 over 1873, cannot in the slightest possible degree have affected the price of coal in the American market to the Canadian purchaser and consumer. But, Sir, there is still another way by which I propose to show the fallacy of the tables submitted by the hon. gentleman. I do not know who prepared those tables for him, nor do I care. The hon. gentleman is responsible for them as he submitted them to Parliament. I pronounce those tables to be, from beginning to end, false and delusive, calculated to mislead the public, and I propose now to prove that they are false and delusive. To establish this proposition let us take the prices of coal in the three great markets of the United States, to the world—not simply to the United States, but to the world. The coal dealers make no distinction there. They do not ask where the coal is going to, or who is the purchaser, or who is going to consume it. They simply fix their prices and get them. Does the hon. gentleman know that, on the first day of every month in every year, the coal dealers of the United States fix the price of coal, and that price remains fixed until the first day of the next month? Does the hon. gentleman know that the price of hard coal is always fixed in the city of Buffalo, that of soft coal in Cleveland, and that the prices of both classes are, to some extent, fixed in Oswego, the three great coal marts of the United States, where every Canadian dealer, who wants to purchase coal, goes to supply his wants? If I can show you, by the clearest possible testimony, that, for the last three years or since the imposition of the duty, the price has gone steadily up instead of going down, year by year, in the American markets notwithstanding that competition the hon. gentleman has laid such stress on, I have disposed of his argument. I am not submitting these figures without authority. I am not taking the figures prepared for a purpose by the clerks of the public Departments, or the evidence of unskilled or inexperienced men outside Parliament. The figures I am quoting are from the Secretary of the Board of Trade in Oswego, the Secretary of the Board of Trade in Cleveland, and from the manager of the coal companies at Buffalo. I have got their documents and letters in my hand, and their statements are open to the inspection of any body. I find, according to these returns, that the price of the best hard coal, nut coal, in Buffalo, where the price is always regulated, was on the 1st September, 1876, $4.90. What is the price now—is it less? No; it is $5.55 the long ton, and $4.95 the short ton. And, here let me recall another circumstance that indicates the utter dishonesty of the statements submitted by the hon. gentleman—I do not charge intentional dishonesty in the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman took the quotations on the other side of the line for the long ton, while everybody knows coal is sold in Canada by the short ton, and he made no allowance for the difference between the long and short ton. But he ought to have known—I do not know whether he did or not—that, for the last three years, coal in the United States has been sold by the long ton, and he ought to have made proper allowance for the difference. In 1877, the price of the best coal, short ton, in the United States, was $4.60; the price is now $4.95, or 35 cents more in 1878, the price of hard coal, in Buffalo, was $4.40; in 1881, 1st November, it was $4.95, or 55 cents higher. In 1879, the price of this coal had gone down in the United States, when the very best hard coal could be bought for $3.03 a ton. The price of that coal is now $4.95, or an increase over 1879 of $1.92. The price of hard coal, in Buffalo, in 1880, was $4.80; and, in 1881, or now, $4.95, 15 cents more than in 1880. So that, from 1876 down to the fall of 1881—and everybody that knows anything about the coal trade is aware that the season's supply is always purchased by Canadians in the fall, nobody buying in the winter—the price of coal has gone regularly up, and it is higher to day than it was in 1878, by fifty-five cents a ton. I give those quotations from the Secretary of the Lehigh Valley Coal Company, and there can be no mistake about them. I have their circulars for the last six years, which anybody can examine to see whether they are right or wrong. If the hon. Minister's argument were good—if the duty stimulated production, and that caused additional competition, and that again reduced the price of coal, it would be less to-day than in 1878, when the reverse is the fact. There is another way by which I propose testing the hon. gentleman's argument. I do not propose to leave him an inch of ground to stand on or the smallest hole to creep through. I propose submitting to the House facts, figures and statements from undoubted authorities on the other side of the line that even the hon. Minister of Railways, with all his audacity, will be utterly unable to answer. There is another way I say by which I propose testing the correctness of the figures of the hon. gentlemen—by considering the different kinds of coal and the prices of each, a course which the hon. Minister, in presenting his figures, cautiously omitted. Dealers in coal know that there are four or five grades of coal, hard and soft, sold at different prices. You find hard coal at Buffalo sold at one price, while another kind is sold in Toronto at a lower price, the different grades bearing different prices. But the hon. gentleman, to establish his argument, no doubt, took different grades at Buffalo and Toronto, and of course the different grades would be sold at different prices. To see whether the argument of the hon. gentleman is correct, you have to compare the prices of the different grades of coal in the United States with their prices in Canada; and if the hon. gentleman can satisfy the House that these prices have been reduced by the National Policy, I have not another word to say—I will admit that he is right and I am wrong. But till he can do so I will take a different view. The following table will show the correctness of my position:—

BUFFALO—BEST HARD COAL.

Year.	Price.	Price now.	Increase.
1876.....	$1 90	$4 95	$0 05
1877.....	4 60	4 95	0 35
1878.....	4 40	4 95	0 55
1879.....	3 05	4 95	1 92
1880.....	4 80	4 95	0 15
1881.....	4 95

I have still another table that will convince the most sceptical that my position is impregnable and that his position is assailable from every standpoint. This table gives the price to grate coal, egg coal, stone and nut coal, all the different grades sold in the market of Buffalo, which are sold to the Canadian consumer. Let us see whether a single one of these grades brought to the Canadian market has been reduced within the last few years. If those grades have been reduced, the conclusions of the Minister of Railways is correct; if they have been increased his conclusions are false and his deductions misleading, and calculated to mislead. The following table shows the price of the different varieties of hard coal at Buffalo since 1877, on 1st September, each year, 2,000, F. O. B. :—

Years.	Grate.	Egg.	Stove.	Nut.
1877.....	$4 45	$4 45	$4 70	$4 60
1878.....	4 55	4 65	4 90	4 40	} Long ton— short ton, $4 95
1879.....	2 90	2 90	3 12½	3 03½
1880.....	4 55	4 55	4 80	4 80
1881.....	5 20	5 20	5 55	5 55
	Short ton, $4 64.

Take grate and egg, which are sold at same price, and compare price now with that three years ago, and in every year there is increase:—

Year.	Grate, Egg, Price of.	1881.	Price of short ton, long ton, $5 50
1877.....	$4 45	now $4 65	Increase over 1877, $0 20
1878.....	4 55	" 4 65	" 1878, 0 10
1879.....	2 90	" 4 65	" 1879, 1 75
1880.....	4 55	" 4 65	" 1880, 0 10

The same remark holds good with respect to Oswego and the other American markets. There is still another way by which I propose to prove that the hon. gentleman's position is wholly unsustainable. I will prove it out of his own mouth. In the first place, his figures are wrong and misleading; and, in the next place, his conclusions are not warranted by them, even if they were correct. "It is impossible (the hon. gentleman says) for any impartial mind to arrive at any other conclusion than that imposition of 50 cents a ton has not only not increased the price of coal to the consumer in Ontario, but has lowered it." And then he submits a table from which you will find that the price of 1878 is put down $3.85, but in 1881 the price was $4.25, or an increase of 40 cents. He leaves out 1879, however. Is there any reason doing so? There is a good reason—namely, that the price was still lower in 1879. In 1880, he says the price of coal was $3.04; in 1881, it is $4.25, or $1.21 increase. In the first place, I say those figures submitted by the hon. gentleman are wholly wrong. I defy the hon. gentleman to prove that the price of hard coal, in 1881, even the lowest grade, could be obtained in the United States at $4.25. But assuming the statement to be correct, what is the result? Why that his table proves that the price of hard coal, in 1881, was $4.25, and, in 1878, it was only $3.85. Has the price of coal therefore not increased? Is the hon. gentleman correct in saying that the imposition of the duty did stimulate production that that caused competition, and that again reduced the price of coal? But the contrary is the result. The hon. gentleman's figures are all wrong. He put the price of coal, in 1878, at $3.85, but he will find, by reference to the quotations from the Lehigh Valley Coal Company, that the price of coal there was $4.55, or a difference of 70 cents; and, in 1880, he says the price was $3.04, when, as a matter of fact, the price was $4.55, or a difference of $1.41. I refer the hon. gentleman, as to the correctness of these figures, to the Lehigh Valley Coal Company, who give the above quotations. I think that ought to convince any reasonable man that the hon. gentleman's position is not sound. The hon. gentleman's tables are calculated to deceive the House, and they do deceive the House and the country—though I would be very sorry to say that the hon. gentleman knew it—I believe the tables were prepared for him, but he ought to have verified them before venturing in submitting them to Parliament. There is another position the hon. gentleman takes that he cannot sustain. He is not satisfied with dealing with generalities but descends to particulars, and this line of argument is always unfortunate for him. He is always forcible when he deals with generalities but particulars are dangerous to him. He says:

"Here you have facts clearly established that the very moment the duty was imposed the parties who shipped their coal to Toronto and Quebec put these places into a different category from what they were before. They made their competitive points and reduced the cost to a larger extent than the amount of duties paid."

Well, that is an extraordinary proposition, but I will not deal with it just now in the general. I propose showing that his figures are incorrect. He goes on to say:

"At Oswego coal sold during the present year at $5.75; freight from Oswego to Belleville, 40 cents; harbor dues and unloading, 28 cents; if duty were added to cost 50 cents the coal ought to sell at $6.93 cents, while the price at Belleville was $6.50, showing that the duty has been to decrease and not to increase the price of coal."

Now, let us consider on what he bases his argument. In order to fortify his position, what does he do? In order to prove that the competition reduced the price of coal to the Canadian consumer, he puts the price down to $4.75 per ton. In order to prove that the consumer does not pay the duty, he increases the price in the American market to $5.75, or $1.50 more than he placed it at when establishing another proposition. In the same speech, he puts the price of hard coal in the American market at $4.25, when he wanted to prove line of argument. He then wanted to establish the fact that the competition, induced by the coal duty, had reduced the price of coal to the Canadian consumer. Now, Sir, when he wants to show that the Canadian consumer does not pay the duty, he increases the price of coal from $4.25 up to $5.75 a ton. But that proved no difficulty in the hon. gentleman's way. He had two arguments which he wished to establish, and so he manipulates facts to prove his position. The hon. gentleman is never afraid of facts; they never stand in his way. In a struggle between the hon. gentleman and facts, the facts always come out second best, and so they do in the present case. In order to establish his argument that the consumer does not pay the duty, he puts the price of coal at $5.75 at Oswego, freight to Belleville 40 cents, harbor dues and unloading 28 cents, making $6.43, and, he says, that in Belleville this coal sells at $6.50, leaving a margin of 7 cents a ton to cover interest, insurance, warehouse rates, contingencies, etc. The seller gets 7 cents, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, over and above what he paid for coal. Does any man believe for a single moment that that is the case? The thing is absurd. Let me give you the true facts, and I verify these in the same way I verified the facts given a moment ago—by the tables I hold in my hand, from the Secretary for the Board of Trade for the city of Oswego. The hon. gentleman takes Oswego as the starting point. He says, coal sold in Oswego for $5.75 and in Belleville for $6.50: Let us see upon what facts that is based? On the 1st of November, 1881, the price of the very best hard coal in the city of Oswego per long ton of 2,240 lbs., was $5.30; the price per short ton was $4.73. The freight I assume to be correct, 40 cents a ton; harbor dues and unloading, 28 cents; add duty to these three items, and you bring it up to $5.91. The vendor in Belleville sells to his customers, according to the hon. Minister's statement, that same coal at $6.50, leaving a profit, after paying duty, of 56 cents a ton. It is manifestly clear from this that the consumer pays the duty. The hon. gentleman is unable to show to the House that, during any portion of the year 1881, or any portion of the year 1880, hard coal was sold in Oswego, by the short ton, at any such figure as the hon. gentleman has stated, and it was at no period of the year more, by the short ton, than $4.73. Again, the hon. gentleman says that the price of coal is regulated by the competition, and that the increased competition in the Canadian market has reduced the price of coal to the Canadian purchaser on the other side. I say that is wholly incorrect, and I propose to establish that fact by the letter I have in my hand from the Secretary of the Board of Trade, Oswego, which is as follows:—

"I am in receipt of your favor of 10th instant. I am unable to give you the price of coal for the month of September in the years mentioned, but have obtained from A. S. Cook, agent of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Coal Company, the prices for 1st November of the same year, which, I trust, will answer your purpose. Mr. Cook also wishes me to state that your Tariff has not the slightest influence on the coal trade here, as that expense necessarily falls on the consumer. Prices are made here without reference to the Tariff."

That, I think, disposes of the hon. gentleman's statement that the competition the American coal meets with here regulates the price of coal on the other side. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Board of Trade of Cleveland, who, speaking of the same subject, says:

"These circulars are the general ones used for all parties, either Canadian or American, for shipment to the Western United States ports, such as Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, etc., etc., or Canadian ports."

The prices at all those points are precisely the same. It makes no difference as far as the American trade is concerned whether coal is shipped to Canada or to points in the United States. Precisely the same price is asked, and the hon. the Minister of Railways will search among the records of the coal companies of the United States in vain for a justification of the statement he submitted to the House, that the price of coal has been reduced a single cent from the day the duty was imposed up to the present time. The hon. gentleman went further, and he told the House that the price of coal (and perhaps it is as good a way as any to ascertain whether the Canadian consumer pays this duty or not) at Ogdensburg and Prescott showed very clearly that the Canadian consumer did not pay the duty, because the price to the Canadian consumer was no more than the price to Americans on the other side. He said:

"Further evidence is to be found in the fact that coal sold at Ogdensburg in the winter of 1880-81 for $5.90, while at Prescott the retail price was $6 per ton; the cost of freight to Prescott, harbor dues and unloading is 68 cents. If, the duty were added to the cost of the coal it ought to have sold at $5.90 plus 68 cents, plus 50 cents, or, in all, $7.08."

I say that statement is wholly misleading. I hold in my hand a table showing the prices of hard coal at Ogdensburg and Prescott respectively for three years before and since the duty was imposed. It runs as follows:—

Years.	Kind of Coal.	Price at Ogdensburg.	Price at Prescott.	Difference.
Nov., 1876...	Chestnut.	$7.30	$6.10 less by	$1.20
do 1877...	do	6.05	6.10 more by	05
do 1878...	do	5.50	5.60 more by	10
do 1879...	do	4.60	5.00 more by	40
do 1880...	do	5.75	5.60 less by	15
do 1881...	do	5.75	6.15 more by	40

And so it is with regard to the different varieties of coal. Hon. members will find the same result if they take the prices at any Canadian point opposite to an American city of importance. Take Sarnia and Port Huron, and I venture to tell the hon. member that if he will examine the quotations for the last three years at those points he will find that the price at Sarnia exceeds that of Port Huron by the amount of duty. I do not care to trouble the House with figures for all the points in question, but those respecting Port Huron and Sarnia, Detroit and Windsor, Buffalo and Hamilton, and Ogdensburg and Prescott, show, in every instance, the same result, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to take the figures and show that the prices charged Canadian consumers are less than are charged on the other side of the lines.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I know I am touching a tender and raw spot, and that hon. gentlemen opposite do not like the fancy figures of the hon. Minister of Railways to be successfully exposed. If you take Buffalo and Hamilton you will find the same state of affairs there. For the sake of convincing hon. members not in the Government, but who are interested in the subject, I will read quotations at Buffalo and Hamilton, showing, beyond a shadow of doubt, that the condition of affairs is very different from that stated by the hon. Minister of Railways. The wholesale sale prices in Buffalo and Hamilton were as follows:—

Year.	Variety.	Price at Buffalo.	Price at Hamilton.	Difference.
1876—	Grate	$4 55	$5 75	$1 20
1877—	do	4 45	5 25	0 80
1878—	do	4 55	5 25	0 70
1879—	do	2 90	4 50	1 60
1880—	do	4 55	6 25	1 70
1881—	do	4 64	6 75	2 11

The increase has gone on steadily except in 1879, when the prices were very low on the other side of the line. The same thing occurs at Cleveland in regard to soft coal, and perhaps the best way to test the matter is to give the prices of the different varieties, because everything depends on that. The honesty of your argument depends upon whether you are quoting one variety in the United States and another variety in Canada. I do not say the hon. the Minister of Railways has done so, but I mean to say that the tables he submitted are not very clear on this point. The following are the prices of the three classes of coal at Cleveland:—

Year.	Variety.	Price.	Price now, 1881.	Difference.
1876	Massitton	2 80	2 80	None.
1877	do	2 60	2 80	Increase, $0 20
1878	do	2 50	2 80	do 0 30
1876	Brier Hill	3 50	4 00	do 0 50
1877	do	3 40	4 00	do 0 60
1878	do	3 25	4 00	do 0 75
1876	Scranton	5 10	4 95	Decrease, 0 15
1877	do	4 20	4 95	Increase, 0 75
1878	do	3 80	4 95	do 1 15

What are the prices to-day? A large increase in every grade since 1878, and yet the hon. Minister of Railways wants his followers and the country at large to believe that the imposition of his little duty of 50 cents a ton on coal does regulate the price of Canadian coal. It is folly for a person to argue a proposition of that kind any further. I am not disposed to waste the time of the House in arguing against what to my mind is an absurd proposition on the face of it. Hon gentlemen opposite will no doubt question the figures. Why, Sir, if the hon. Minister of Railways said one thing and an angel from the upper world came down and said something else, they would accept the word of the hon. Minister of Railways. But I am going to quote the hon. Minister of Railways against himself, and surely they will no longer hesitate and doubt if I quote Tupper against Tupper they will not object. Here is what the hon. Minister of Railways said at Cobourg:

“Can any person give me a reason why coal in a country where the revenue is raised as we raised ours—by indirect taxation—why coal should not be a source of revenue? I know of none. Is it because the masses of the people are not benefitted by it? I deny it.”

But that is not all; he winds up with this little tit-bit:

“Again Mr. Blake states that I said in Picton the $400,000 collected in coal was paid by the people of Ontario. What if I did? Do you not think Mr. Blake would have acted the part of a candid man, if he had also told you that of the $369,000 of revenue collected on wheat and flour, not one cent had been paid by Ontario, and all was paid by the Maritime Provinces.”

I hope hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces and especially those who laud the National Policy, and who are opposed to any change in this marvellously perfect Tariff, will take note of what the hon. the Minister of Railways admits in his speech—that the people of Ontario do not pay the tax on breadstuffs, but that that it is paid by the people down by the sea. And I hope the people from the other Provinces, who support the hon. the Minister of Railways, will take note of the admission of the hon. the Minister of Railways, that the people down by the sea do not pay the tax on coal, but that it comes out of the pockets of the people of Ontario. I will not trespass longer on the time of the House. I have established my proposition, and I defy the hon. the Minister of Railways or any of his supporters, to controvert my facts and arguments. I have shown the absurdity of the argument that the 73,000 tons of coal which we raised in 1878 over what we raised in 1873 could regulate the price of the 66,000,000 tons produced in the United States market in 1880. I have shown that the tables read to the House by the hon. gentleman are wholly misleading, that they are calculated to mislead, and that they will and do mislead. I have shown that the figures and quotations given by the hon. gentleman as from the American markets are not justified by the reports. I have shown that the tables were cooked by somebody. I do not know or care by whom they were cooked. I have shown that the conclusions drawn by the hon. gentleman from the premises he laid down are wholly fallacious and wrong, and I think I can leave it to the good sound common sense of the members of this House whether or not the position of the hon. the Minister of Railways is correct. At all events, as I have an abiding faith in the good sound common sense of the people of this country, I can leave it to them, and when the hour comes, as come it must—and I do not care how soon—when the people are called upon to pronounce on the policy of the Government, I am greatly mistaken in the intelligence and common sense of the people of Canada, if they do not sweep from power the men who in 1878 attained office by deceptive promises, which they have not fulfilled and are not able to fulfil.

Mr. SPROULE. I would not occupy the time of the House at this late stage of the debate if I did not represent a constituency which would be largely affected if this resolution carried. It is amusing to listen to some of the arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite in their endeavors to convince the people of this country, that the views they advocate are right. In the first place, we have men from the Province of Quebec, one of the Lower Provinces, coming up to Ontario, and endeavoring to convince the farmers of that Province that their judgment and intelligence on questions of this kind is wrong, that they do not understand the situation themselves, and that these hon. gentlemen understand the business of the people of Ontario better than they do themselves. One of these hon. gentlemen says that the imposition of a duty on flour is injurious to the farmers of Ontario. On the same principle the last speaker, a farmer from Huron, went down to the Maritime Provinces, and endeavored to persuade the people there that he knows their business better than they do. That appears to be the method pursued by the Opposition; but I think if, for instance, the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron), who lives in western Ontario, dealt with the side of the question which affects them, that his people would be able to realize how near he comes to the truth, and be able to put an estimate on his arguments, because they deal with matters which affect them in their daily life. On the other hand, if the hon. member from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) would deal with questions which might affect the people of that Province, they would be able to value the worth of his arguments and understand and controvert them. It is strange to see the time that is wasted by hon. members of the Opposition in their endeavors to convince the people of the Dominion that it is in their interests to throw off the duty on every class of articles. In the first place, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) spent a large portion of his time in arguing that the imposition of the duty does the consumer a great deal of harm and does the producer no good. Now, this seems to me to be a contradiction. It is not orthodox to say that the duty does the consumer a great deal of harm and does the producer no good. He says at one time, that the imposition of the duty increases the price to the consumer, but I would like to ask him if the duty raises the prices of everything the consumer uses, and whether by a parity of reasoning it does not increase the price of the product to the producer. It was expected by the present Government before coming into power, that the effect of imposing a duty would be to create a home market, and how far have they justified that assertion we can now judge by the history and experience of the country since 1878 to the present. We are able to show by the Trade and Navigation Returns, by the condition of the country, by the prosperity of the people the effect which this Tariff has had upon the country, and to estimate its value as a factor in producing the wealth of the people. I ask, in the first place, if it has given us a home market? We can satisfy ourselves upon that point by looking at the Trade Returns. I will deal entirely with the agricultural products because, representing as I do an agricultural district, I believe it important that I should keep myself right with those people, that I should defend their rights and oppose anything which I believe to be an infringement upon their interests. I say it has given an increased market to the agriculturists of this country. In 1878, previous to the introduction of this Tariff, we brought into this country 5,635,000 bushels of wheat; in 1881, we brought in only 76,000 bushels, or, in other words we created a home market for 5,558,000 bushels; therefore I say that this Tariff has been operating beneficially for the agricultural interests of this country, and that it has been accomplishing the desirable result which we claimed it would accomplish, of giving an additional market to the farmers of this country for what they had to sell; and it has given them a better market than they had before, because they have been able to save the amount which it would cost to send their produce to foreign markets. Again, in 1878 we imported 2,162,000 bushels of oats, while, in 1881, we imported only 73,000 bushels; or, in other words, we kept out 2,088,933 bushels of oats, and to that extent gave an additional market to the farmers of this country for the oats they had to sell. Now, if that is not a benefit, I would like to know what is. I remember in 1878, when oats were selling for 20 cents in Chicago, and were 40, 50, and even 60 cents with us, the western oats were brought into Collingwood, Owen Sound, and Southampton, and forty-eight hours afterwards the oats in our own market lowered in value 8 or 10 cents a bushel; farmers in the country, who were holding their oats and expecting an increased price in the market, were deprived of it in this way, and I know that men engaged in buying up oats lost money by paying a high figure, and when they got them to market they did not realize one-half of the amount they expected. Again, in the matter of Indian corn, while some say that it would be in the interest of Canada to allow that article to come in, that it would not interfere with us because we do not raise much of it, in our part of the country we find that when oats get dear, if corn is cheap on the other side, it is brought in, and takes the place of oats, bushel for bushel. In 1876, 1877, and 1878 large quantities were brought in. In 1878, we brought in 7,387,000 bushels of corn, which is more than all the corn that is raised in the Dominion of Canada, while, in 1881, we only brought in 2,043,000 bushels, or, in other words we kept out 5,344,000 bushels of corn, and gave our farmers an additional market for the same quantity of oats, besides over 2,000,000 bushels of oats that were kept out. So you will see that this Tariff gave us a market for almost every bushel of oats that we had to export in 1878; and if this is not a benefit to the farming community, I would like to know what is a benefit. How much logic it will require on the part of hon. gentlemen from Quebec to persuade the farmers that this Tariff is not in their interest I cannot say; but whatever standing they may have attained in the community, whatever respect the people may have for their intelligence and integrity, it is fast slipping away by the line of argument they are adopting; for the people know what is for their own benefit. Again, in 1878 314,520 barrels of flour were brought into Canada, and, in 1881, 97,000 barrels, or the farmers of Canada had an increased market for 216,939 barrels of flour; and as every barrel of flour represents four and a half bushels of wheat, we can easily see what a benefit that has been to the farmers of Canada. It requires no argument to prove to the farmer that the Tariff has caused this change, because these grains were coming in year after year, and the natural increase in the population enables us to consume more than we did in 1878. Again, in 1878 we brought in 14,704 swine, but, in 1881, we only brought in 2,447, or kept out 12,257, and got an additional market for that number at home. As an illustration of that, I may tell hon. gentlemen what has come under my own observation. There are a large number of lumbermen in my section of the country, with whom I have been acquainted for some twenty or twenty-five years, and I know for a fact that for several years up to 1878, these men supplied their lumber shanties almost exclusively with pork from the Chicago market; but to-day they come into our own markets and supply themselves there with every pound of pork they require. So with oats: in 1876 a gentleman engaged in lumbering told me that he found western oats so cheap in 1875, 1876, and 1877, that it paid him to buy his oats there and bring them into Canada; and the result was that he never bought any Canadian oats for the horses which he had engaged in his work. To-day the very reverse is the case, and our farmers have a large additional market to supply. In addition to the Tariff, another influence affects us very materially and favorably, and that is the increased demand from Manitoba and the North-West, for our products. Thus the very greatest adjunct to our Tariff has been given in the policy adopted by the Government, in opening up the North-West. The Tariff, by preventing the importation of American horses, cattle and products, has given us control of that market. The result is that, while previous to 1879, we had no market for our horses and cattle, we have to-day a good market for every animal as well as other products. If that is not a benefit to the country I would like to know what is, and our farmers, I believe, see this as plainly as they do the light of the sun when the sky is clear. No amount of logical ingenuity, whether it comes from the high authority of the hon. leader of the Opposition himself, or from the lowest luminary that follows, will convince the farmers that it is not greatly in their interests to have a perpetuity of this Tariff. If the question whether the Tariff should be continued or not was asked on the hustings in every part of the country, the answer would be: "If you desire to promote our interests, do with the Tariff what the Dutchman did with his dog, let severely well alone." It is serving its purpose, and to continue it will be to move in the right direction. In my section, I have clearly shown, the Tariff has given us a better market for our produce. It has also given employment to our people which was deplorably scarce in 1878. No man need be out of employment to-day who is willing to work, and every man is getting higher wages for his work. The wages of the laboring man have gone up from $1 and 90 cents, in 1878, to $1.50 and $1.25, and the wages of mechanics are from $1.75 to $2. I have been employing a large number of men for the last two years, and I know you cannot find a good mechanic willing to work for less than $1.75 or $2 per day, nor a good bricklayer at less than from $2 to $3 per day, and laboring men command at any time $1.25 per day. It was claimed this Tariff would give us additional revenue. Has it done so? A glance at our revenue returns will be sufficient to prove that it has fully accomplished that object. Has it given us more money? Look at the deposits in the savings banks, both of the highest and lowest classes; look at the savings of the poorer classes, and the large amount of money deposited in those institutions to-day is most conclusive proof that the people are richer to-day than they were under the old Tariff. I was very much amused at one of the theories advanced by the hon. member for Quebec East. He said that we were violating a law of nature, because the Maritime Provinces could not import their goods from the United States, nor sell their produce to the United States. I have always thought that in developing our resources and in affording employment to our own people we were obeying the laws of nature. Nature has supplied us with a great amount of coal. Towards Stratford, along the lake shore, there is sufficient for the requirements of the whole Dominion. Is it reasonable we should not avail ourselves of this great natural resource, and allow foreigners to supply us with what we have in our midst awaiting development? Why should we allow foreigners to use our markets for the products of their country when we have these products at home? Why should we deprive our own people of employment to give employment to people engaged in foreign manufactures, when with our water power and raw material and natural resources, we have all that is necessary to supply ourselves with the commodities we use. In almost every paper to-day, of both sides, we find advertisements by small towns like Orangeville, offering bonuses of $5,000 to any man who will establish a manufactory there. Stratford offers $10,000, nearly a dollar a head of its population, to every manufacturer who will start a factory there. If it is not in the interests of those people to have manufactories started in their towns, why are they so anxious to tax themselves to such an extent to have those factories established in their midst? We do not find any clear Grit objecting, because it is not in the line of politics at all, and he believes it to be in the interest of his own locality that manufacturing industries should be established in it, and that the advantages to be derived more than compensate for the amount of bonus paid. In Toronto, Kingston, Montreal—every town and village throughout the Dominion, the people are willing to tax themselves to increase their industries. Is it not, therefore, in the interest of the country to attain the same object by putting on a Tariff that would give the men engaged in these employments a better return for their capital and labor. It is amusing to follow the course of argument pursued by the hon. members of the Opposition in reference to this Tariff since 1878. Early in 1879, when the Tariff was announced to this country, the cry from the Opposition was that it was going to ruin the farmers because it was going to destroy their market; that it would reduce the value of labor by making everything higher, and not give increased employment, and that the lumberman would be taxed so heavily he could not get out lumber at a profit. In short, the National Policy was going to break down the banking and commercial interests of the country. In 1879-80, we find they still pretended, but not quite so strongly, that it would ruin the country. Then they abandoned that cry and asked instead if the country was better than in 1878, before the new Tariff was introduced. They were justified in their assertions of predictions in reference to the results of the Tariff. In 1881, they began to find that prosperity was coming, and early. Now, in 1882, they acknowledge the country is more prosperous. Not a man in the Opposition but says it is more prosperous than in 1878, except the member for West Middlesex. I was very much amused with his logic no less than with his figures the other day. He said that this Tariff affected the manufacturers more injuriously than other classes, and than under the old Tariff of 17½ per cent. To prove that, he said that in 1878 we had 112 failures among manufacturers, and 745 among the traders. Where did he get those figures? I find by the return of Dun-Wiman, which I believe the most reliable, that, in 1878, there were 1,165 failures, or only a difference of 758.

Mr. ROSS. I quoted for 1876.

Mr. SPROULE. 1876 stands still worse in this respect. I believe the hon. gentleman's figures are as nearly correct as his logic, and that instead of proving those classes are now worse, it proved that they are much better off than under the old Tariff. If he only looks at the number of capitalists that were going down and the capital that was rusting in languishing establishments, not able to employ the workmen, and look at them to-day, and note the evidence of their prosperity, he will need no argument to prove their greater prosperity than in 1878. Then the hon. gentleman tried to prove that the Tariff he would adopt would be more in the interests of the manufacturers. He finds his logic for the last three years has failed to convince the manufacturers, the farmers and the laborers that his party are working in their interests, and that they are afraid to go back to the policy of the late Government. He tells those classes: "We will give you a Tariff that will work in your interests;" but, by oscillating between two powers, both affecting them, they hardly know what to do next. But, finally, the Opposition have settled down to their old love again, the Free Trade theory, which they now proclaim throughout the land. I very much mistake the intelligence of the people of this country if they will be deceived by this source, or if they will not return a still smaller number of those gentlemen at the next elections. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down said that if an angel came from heaven he would not convince the people—that they would still believe the hon. Minister of Railways. I have no hope of an angel appearing among the Opposition to convince anybody. We may safely adhere to our political creed, knowing that the men who took charge of the country when on the verge of ruin, had now brought it to the height of prosperity, which prosperity we may safely entrust to them. What stronger argument than this improved condition of the country do hon. gentlemen opposite want to convince them. They find the Government policy has given more employment, a better market, increased remuneration and prosperity to the people. It has given peace and contentment. These facts will not convince them. To use the scriptural simile, they would not believe though one rose from the dead. I believe they now feel themselves on the verge of despair, and that they think it is better to fall back on their old Free Trade principles, from which line to convince the people, after failure from other lines. I was much amused at what I heard from a gentleman yesterday, who has lived for some time in the North-West; he said two things had benefitted the country during the last two years—one, the National Policy, and the next, the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He was liberal; and he said: "I am pleased we are in our present position." He added: "Two things have promoted our interests, mine as an old reformer and those of the men who have gone to the North-West; one is that our party got into power in 1873, because we then got the North-West, with its cheap lands, and men could go up poor and come back millionaires; we got places in the North-West and were able to invest it profitably. From 1875 to 1878, we had the advantage of everything; there was no great increase in the value of property. But the next best thing that affected our interests was the changed policy as to building the Canadian Pacific Railway, which changed the whole position of business and affairs in the North-West, so that men comparatively poor in 1878, find themselves almost millionaires to-day. Though this man was a strong reformer in 1878, he considers his party did him a great kindness in going out of power in that year. Why do we find multitudes from Europe, United States, and other countries going to the North-West to settle and invest, to-day? Why has property there gone up to such an enormous figure? Is it not the assurance that by giving the contract to the Syndicate that vast country will be opened at no distant day by a great transcontinental railway? This is the belief that is making that country so prosperous to-day and giving our farmers so profitable a new market. This and the National Policy have been the two great influences that have done so much for us in the past, and that we hope will do so much for us in the future. I would be sorry to give a silent vote on this resolution that designs a return to the state of affairs in 1878. I would consider myself recreant to my trust if I did not protest against it, knowing as I do, it would be one of the worst things for my constituency and the people of the Dominion at large.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to say a few words in answer to the position taken by the hon. member for Grey. I hope that in his diagnosis of disease, in his practice as a physician he is more accurate than he is in quoting agricultural statistics. If not, I should hate to have him dispense pills to me. One of his first mistakes is to confound the total importation of wheat in the period before the adoption of the National Policy with the importation of wheat for consumption in the period since. He next proceeds to inform us that the importation of oats from the Western States he had known to reduce the price 15 cents per bushel; I think he said, in forty-eight hours. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman in what year, month, or place that was.

Mr. SPROULE. In the town of Goderich, in 1876, and I can give the month and day. I can give the market quotations from week to week.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have in my hand a statement of the price of oats in Toronto the third Wednesday of every month of every year since 1876.

Mr. SPROULE. That is no criterion at all. It is the local demand there that creates the price.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have in my hand a quotation of the market price the third Wednesday of each month in Toronto since the 1st of January, 1876, and there has not been a variation of 15 cents per bushel in any one year—much less in two days—and the variations from month to month range from 1 to 5 cents. The hon. gentleman's assertion is preposterous; it is made without foundation, resting upon no fact whatever but upon the imagination of the man making the assertion, and which is designed to go forth to the country to produce an effect. The assertion is utterly preposterous. There never was a case in any market in Canada where the price of oats or any other grain has been depressed by importation 10 or 15 cents per bushel in twenty-four or forty-eight hours. The hon. gentleman informs us that after 1878 we imported 7,000,000 bushels of corn for consumption; it was 4,300,000, a little nearer than he usually gets it, but still over fifty per cent. astray. He tells us we have a better market for butter, cheese, oats—everything we raise. Why, we are exporting more in the last three and a half years of these articles than we did in the previous five years. The exports of animals and their products and of agricultural products, for the period ending 31st December last, since those gentlemen came into power, is greater by several millions of dollars than it was during the five years of the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton. In not one of these articles have our exports diminished, but in every one of them our exports have increased. Yet the hon. gentleman stands up here and congratulates the country upon the fact, that under the operation of this policy we have had a much better market than we had before this policy was introduced. Then he tells us our people are contented. A great degree of contentment prevails in this country! Well, last year 118,000 were so contented that they left this country. The year before that, this state of contentment led to the emigration of 93,000, and the year before that of 31,000. More people emigrated from Canada during the last year than during the five years the hon. member for Lambton was at the head of the Government. In 1880, there were more Canadians in Dakota and Minnesota than in the Province of Manitoba. Yet they talk about the state of contentment that exists in this country, forsooth, when Canada furnished more emigrants to the United States last year than any other foreign country on the face of the globe. Then he tells us it is very fortunate for us we have adopted a policy that enables us to produce what goods we consume in this country, furnishing employment to our own men in the production; he seems ignorant of the fact that the importation of goods susceptible of manufacture in Canada last year, was some $18,000,000 worth more than the year the hon. member for Lambton went out of office. Well, it is about the first time, for a good while, that I have heard any gentleman on the opposite side congratulate himself on the creation of that home market that our friends opposite are so fond of talking about when they made those roseate promises in 1878 that led to their being installed in the position they occupy. With reference to this home market, as I pointed out some nights ago, the exports of all articles of food or provisions have increased from year to year since the National Policy was adopted. The net export of grain, flour and meal for the five years ending the 30th June, 1878, was $48,750,000. Now, I hoped to-night to have obtained a statement of the exports for the last six months ending 31st December, but was not able to do so. Through the kindness of the hon. the Minister of Customs I did obtain that report last year, and, according to it, the net export of grain for the six months was $10,500,000. Assuming the exports had been as great for the six months ending the 31st December last, the exports for the three and a-half years have been $55,500,000, against $48,750,000 for the five years of the Reform Administration, showing that in three and a-half years the exports have been some 12 per cent. greater than they were in the preceding five years. Yet we have hon. gentlemen here so ignorant of the facts of the case as to congratulate this House upon the increased home market of this country. Why, Sir, take the years of 1877 and 1878, the two last years of the Mackenzie Administration, and compare them with the years 1880 and 1881, and you will find that in animals and their products and in agricultural products, the exports for the first period were $60,750,000, and for the second period, $82,500,000, or $21,600,000 more on those two articles in 1880 and 1881 than in 1877 and 1878. Then, if you look at the returns every fact you see demonstrates to a certainty the assertion I make that, so far from obtaining a home market, we are constantly increasing our exports of food and grain. Now, as I have occasionally stated heretofore, we have had in this matter an experience similar to that of the American farmers. The American farmers, for the last twenty years, have been creating a home market, and they have met with a success still more astonishing than ours. After subjecting themselves for twenty years to enormous taxation to procure this home market in 1880, that country exported $400,000,000 worth of grain and provisions, and a total of nearly $700,000,000 worth of the products of the soil. Of that quantity there were 98,000,000 bushels of corn, 153,000,000 bushels of wheat, 6,000,000 barrels of flour, and other articles in the provision line in proportion—food enough for at least 20,000,000 people, and all this time from 1881 down, the deluded tax payers of that country have been paying millions upon millions annually, under the delusion that they were creating a home market that would absorb the productions of their soil at home. After the American farmer had been protected by duties upon grain for a period of eighteen years, for the purpose of creating a home market, with the success I have pointed out, leaving him only a surplus of $400,000,000 worth of food to export, after this brilliant success attending this policy for eighteen years, our Solons thought proper to protect the Canadian farmer against the American farmer, who himself had been protected against the Canadian farmer for eighteen years. And accordingly they imposed duties upon grain. Let me ask why should the protected Yankee farmer sell wheat and grain to the Free Trade Canadian farmer; why, if the duties upon grain were calculated to make a better market and protect American farmers and increase the price of grain, should Canada be the better market, and, if protection made the United States a poorer market than free trade Canada, why impose a duty on American grain in order to benefit Canadian farmers? The proposition is absurd on the face of it—absurd because any man who will examine into the condition of the trade of these two countries in grain must become aware that whatever surplus of grain the other country has to dispose of, a duty upon that particular grain can do no good whatever. Now, the Americans export no peas and no barley, and a duty on peas and barley unquestionably raises the price of those articles in the United States. The Canadian farmers, on the other hand, raise no Indian corn for export, and we have always admitted that a duty on Indian corn would raise the price on that article; but on all other grains raised in Canada an import duty can have no influence whatever on the prices, because this country has a surplus of those articles to export. With respect to butter and cheese, the country seemed to be ignorant of the fact that duties existed on those articles for many years at the same rates as now provided. I recollect the organ of the hon. member for Welland stating that great hardships existed because there was no protection on butter and cheese, although there was at that time a duty of 3 cents on cheese and 4 cents on butter; but the country never became aware of the fact, for the reason that there being every year a surplus of those articles to export, a duty had no effect on the prices because the prices were regulated by the foreign demand in England. So it has been and ever will be in regard to the protection of articles of which we have a surplus to export. I propose to call the attention of the House to some quotations as to prices ranging over the period from the commencement of the year 1876; and I may take this occasion to acknowledge the courtesy of the Secretaries of the Boards of Trade at Toledo and Detroit, both of whom very kindly responded to the request I made for quotations ranging over those years. The Secretary of the Board of Trade, of Toledo, gave me quotations for the third Wednesday in each month for the years 1876 to 1881, inclusive. The Secretary of the Detroit Board of Trade gave me average quotations for each month, enabling me to arrive at the average quotations for every year. The comparison between the quotations in these two cities is not, however, thoroughly reliable, because it is not made on the same basis. The following are the quotations for five months in the years referred to:—

This table shows that in every year from 1876 to 1881, inclusive, except 1880, the prices of No. 2 winter wheat, at Toledo, were higher than at Toronto; in 1880, the average price in Toronto being 1½ cents per bushel higher. I have selected Toledo because it is the nearest corresponding market to Toronto that I could get. It is a large primary grain market, being, in fact, next to Chicago, and affords a better comparison than any other American port, although the prices should be somewhat higher in Toronto than Toledo, because it is nearer the sea. My next quotations are with respect to No. 2 spring wheat. I instituted a comparison in this grain between the prices at Toronto and Chicago, and find the following:—

Those quotations show that during the two years, 1879 and 1880, the prices in Toronto were higher than in Chicago; but when you take into consideration the fact that the quality of No. 2 spring in Toronto is better than that of Chicago by several cents a bushel, we find that not even in 1880 would the difference in prices between Chicago and Toronto amount to more than the difference of quality and cost of freight. So not in one year during that period could the importation of American grain free of duty have depressed the prices of No. 2 spring in the Toronto market. I next invite a comparison at various points based upon quotations made in the third Wednesday of each month during the years 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, 1880 and 1881 at Toronto Toledo, and Detroit, the quotation at the latter place being the average price each month, and at the two former, being the

So that during these six years there was but one year when the price of our winter wheat was a slight fraction higher in Toronto than Toledo; that was the year 1880, and in that year the advantage in favor of Toronto was one quarter of a cent per bushel. Consequently it is perfectly apparent that there was no possibility of buying wheat in Toledo, which is the corresponding market to Toronto, sending it to Toronto and selling it so as save the costs. If we institute a comparison in the matter of spring wheat, we find the following to be the result:—

So that there was only one of these years out of the entire six, when it would have paid expenses to buy No. 2 spring wheat in Chicago and sell it in Toronto, and in that year the average difference in price would barely have paid the freight, and the difference in the quality of the two grains which are graded No. 2 in Toronto and Chicago respectively. It will be noticed that the year 1880 is the year when this difference in price occurs, and upon examination into the cause of wheat being higher in Toronto as compared with Chicago that year than any other year, I arrive at the conclusion that it was in consequence of the fact that the United States had an extremely large crop; that they exported an immense quantity, and that the price of wheat in the United States was governed by this export demand and wheat was sold in the United States market at a price which justified immediate exportation to Europe at the market quotations then prevailing. Now, Sir, when we come to examine into the difference between the quotations in these two markets in other grains we find a very remarkable contrast. I have shown, and the quotations have shown, that during these six years the imposition of duties could have no effect on the relative prices of wheat in the two markets; that the price was governed by causes entirely outside of the imposition of duties by either country; that the prices in the two markets were in all but one of these six years relatively higher in the American than in the Canadian market, and that in one year only was the price of wheat in Toronto higher than in Chicago, and that even in that year the difference in price was barely the difference in freight and the quality of the grain. Now, I propose instituting a comparison between the prices of coarse grain in the various markets of Canada and the United States respectively, and I shall furnish the markets of Toronto and Chicago. I will give the quotations on the 15th of July, the 15th of October and the 15th December in each year, in order to embrace the average prices as nearly as possible for the shipping season of each year:—

So that the average difference in prices through the whole three years was 12 cents a bushel on oats in favor of Toronto, and yet we are told it was necessary to impose a duty of 10 cents a bushel in order to prevent American oats slaughtering the Canadian markets to such an extent as to make oats lower here than in the United States. Again, take the 15th October and 15th December in each year (for it might be held that the quotation in July is not a fair quotation), we find that the average price in Toronto, each of these three years, was 36½ cents, in Chicago 24 cents, a difference in favor of Toronto of 12½ cents for the whole period. Well, if this was the case—if this market was so much better than the protected market of the Americans, who have been protected by grain duties for twenty years—how absurd it is to impose a duty of 10 cents on oats to make this a better market than the United States when at that moment it was 12 cents better than in Chicago. Now, take the period since the National Policy, and I think we will find a change:—

	Toronto. Chicago.

July 15.....	39	26½
October 15.....	35	29½
December 15.....	51½	39½

1881.
October 15.....	43	44
December 15.....	45	46½
July 15.....	40	41½

So that the average difference in prices through the three years, since the National Policy went into force on the dates named, was 38 cents for Toronto and 35 cents for Chicago, a difference of 3½ cents in favor of Toronto. Or if we take the last two months, October and December, the average price was 37½ cents in Toronto, and 36½ cents in Chicago, a difference of 1½ in favor of Toronto; and yet I suppose the hon. Finance Minister will attempt to delude the farmers with the assertion that the duty of 10 cents a bushel on oats is beneficial to them. In this comparison it must ever be borne in mind that the Toronto bushel of oats is 34 lbs., the Chicago bushel 32 lbs., which swallows up the difference in favor of Toronto for the last three years. Why, oats have risen in Chicago, as compared with the price in Toronto, during the last three years under the National Policy, I am at a loss to say; I presume, however, that the Americans have stepped into a trade formerly done by us, namely, the manufacture of oatmeal for export. Previous to the introduction of this policy our oatmeal millers bought enormous quantities of Western oats for oatmeal exportation; but since its introduction this trade has been destroyed, and the Americans have entered into the business. At Cedar Rapids in Iowa, last summer, I saw a new oatmeal mill, which is said to be the largest in the world, and it is running almost exclusively for this export trade which the National Policy has transferred from Canada to the Western States. My hon. friend from Lambton reminds me that a great many of our oatmeal mills have been shut up by the National Policy.

An hon. MEMBER. Where?

Mr. MACKENZIE. One in Sarnia.

Mr. CHARLTON. And two in Perth. I know that these mills, which had to depend on American oats, have been either shut up or crippled in their operations by the adoption of this policy, while in 1878 we exported 174,000 barrels of oatmeal, in 1881 we only exported 53,000 barrels, showing a falling off in the production of oatmeal of within a fraction of three-fourths. Now, Sir, I propose next to institute a comparison of the quotation prices of barley and rye. The above quotations, made for three years prior to the adoption of this policy, and for three years subsequent to its adoption, show that not in one instance, with regard to either wheat or oats, has the price in Canada been sufficiently high, as compared with the price in the United States, to justify the assertion that the importation of American grain could reduce the price in this country. Now, I think some hon. gentlemen opposite contended, two or three years ago, that the imposition of a duty of 15 cents a bushel on barley would raise the price, and some went so far as to say that it would raise the price to the extent of the duty. The Americans, as I have pointed out before, do not raise barley for export; all that is raised in that country is for home consumption, and they consume more than they raise. Canada happens to raise a kind of barley that cannot be raised in the United States, and that commands a high price among the brewers of that country. On the third Wednesday in September, October, November and December in each year, the average price of barley in Toronto and Oswego was as follows :—

	In Toronto.	In Oswego.
1877	0.66½	0.88½
1878	1.01½	1.22½

This was before the adoption of the National Policy. Now, let us see if the imposition of the duty on barley materially affected the relative position of the prices:

	In Toronto.	In Oswego.
1881	0.91½	1.07½

I defy any man to take any market quotation from 1876 down to this evening, and find that the market quotation for No. 1 barley is not materially higher in the United States than it is Canada; and yet we were told, and are still told, that it is necessary to keep this absurd duty upon barley in order to shut out the American article from our market, and to prevent it from depressing the price of barley in this country. The average price of rye on the third Wednesday of September, October, November and December, in each year, in Toronto and Chicago, are as follows:

	In Toronto.	In Chicago.
1877	0.60½	0.53½
1878	0.5½	0.46½
1879	0.67½	0.66½
1881	0.91	1.03½

And yet a duty is imposed in order to prevent the importation of cheap rye from Chicago to depress the market in Canada. These are specimens of the absurdity of the duty on grain, and I might show the same results with regard to peas, which are invariably higher in the United States than they are in this country. Now, with regard to the importation of wheat and other grains, it is well known to all who have studied the trade returns—although the hon. member from Grey (Mr. Sproule) does not seem to be aware of the facts—that the wheat imported was largely wheat in transitu—wheat passing through our canals for the purpose of being sent to the European market, although it was all entered as imported into Canada. We have spent millions of dollars in building very extensive canals for the express purpose of drawing American grain through these routes, and enabling our own people to handle these grains. I believe this Government received a protest from the Montreal Corn Exchange against these duties on grain, asserting that the effect of them was to deprive our own people of this trade and to lessen the usefulness of these canals, and that is certainly the effect of the duty on wheat. It is clearly evident, from the quotations of prices, that it does the farmer no good. It has raised the price of no article in Canada as compared with the prices in the United States, and it is clear the farmer has received no benefit. In fact, the hon. Finance Minister admitted last Session that the duty had not raised the price of wheat. He reminded me of Mark Twain's story of the beaver that was chased by the dog. The western hunter was describing in a bar-room one day the feats of a dog, and he informed a stranger that the dog chased the beaver so hotly that it had to take to the shore, where it was so closely pressed it had to climb a tree to escape. "But," said the stranger, "beavers cannot climb; your story is very improbable." The hunter looked at him calmly and said: "Beavers cannot climb? Why, stranger, the dog was crowding on him so close he had to climb!" That was the way that the hon. Finance Minister was caught, and he was as loth to admit this fact as the beaver was to climb a tree, but he was so crowded he had to admit it. This year he fortified himself with the assertion that we do not pay more than half the duty on coal; and then proceeded to say that there had been one or two days during which the National Policy had raised the price of wheat 3 cents per bushel, because it happened that the price in Chicago was 3 cents less than in Toronto. The duty upon wheat, although it has no effect upon the price in Canada, and can have no effect as long as this country raises a surplus for exportation, yet it has injuriously effected the various interests in this country. I know of one case, with the circumstances of which I am intimately acquainted, where a miller, in my section of the country, engaged in flouring wheat for the purpose of making merchantable flour for the Montreal market, found it necessary to mix one-fourth red with three-fourths white wheat to make the article which the market demanded. Flour made of white wheat would not answer the purpose, and as no red wheat was raised in that country and he was unable to take advantage of the hon. Minister of Customs' order with reference to bonding, he was obliged to buy American wheat and pay the duty on it or not make the flour his customers demanded. The consequence was in that as in all similar cases, the miller was unable to pay the price for white wheat to his Canadian customers, that he would have paid had he been able to buy red wheat clear of duty. In this case, the operation of the duty was simply to deprive the farmers of that section of some 2 cents or 3 cents a bushel on the price of wheat. In the case of the millers on the Welland Canal, they must buy, to a great extent, American wheat, and they must be allowed to buy American wheat to flour, or be unable to prosecute their business. I believe arrangements have been made to allow them to flour American wheat; but that is an evasion of the law, and should the law at any time be strictly enforced, the consequence to the millers would be serious. While the duties do not, in any case, benefit the farmer, they injure various interests in the country. With reference to corn, we admitted the duty would raise the price because we do not raise all we require and buy largely for consumption. Our admission was only correct to a certain extent. The duty has raised the price of imported corn, but has failed to raise the price of corn produced in Canada one iota.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I can assure the hon. gentleman that I know that is the case. I raise corn myself, live in a corn-growing country, and am intimately acquainted with the state of the market in that corn-growing belt. I know the duty did not raise the price one cent a bushel during the whole of last season in the market town of my county. Why did it not raise the price? Simply because there is a very small quantity of corn raised for sale, the farmers raising but little more than they require for their own consumption. Therefore, as there was but a small surplus and an entirely local demand, the imposition of the duty has not, in the slightest degree, affected the price of corn, in the corn belt in Ontario. The only parties affected are those that purchase American corn, as they have to pay the duty. The price of corn in my own county, which is all within the corn belt, is now lower than in Chicago, and has been for months. With regard to the corn question, I wish to show why the importation of corn is a benefit to Canada. The stock-raiser in the Western States can buy his corn to fatten his cattle where he can get it cheapest, but the Ontario stock-farmer is in this respect placed at a disadvantage with the Western farmer—a disadvantage to the extent of $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents a bushel on the price of corn. The reason the country largely imported corn during all the years it has imported it is simply this: Corn can be bought at a lower price relatively than other coarse grains. The farmer can sell his oats, or his barley or rye at a price that enables him to buy a corresponding amount of corn, and have a large sum to boot. I have two tables here, one made on the normal prices of different grains, including corn; and one on the abnormal price of corn this year. I found that the average price of corn in years past was 54 cents; and the price laid down at Toronto before the close of navigation, last year, free of duty, 66 cents. I find that if the farmer sells 34 lbs. oats at 39 cents a bushel, the average price for years past, and buys 56 lbs. corn at 54 cents, he makes in the exchange between 56 lbs. corn at 54 cents and 56 lbs. oats at this price, 10 cents. By selling 48 lbs. barley at 70 cents, he will make in the exchange between 56 lbs. barley and 56 lbs. corn, 27 cents. On 60 lbs. rye at 80 cents, he will make in an exchange of 56 lbs. rye and 56 lbs. corn at 54 cents, 20 cents. In the exchange of 56 lbs. of peas at 68 cents for 60 lbs., for 56 lbs. corn at 54 cents, he makes $9\frac{1}{2}$ cents; that is the simple reason why we import corn.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have heard it before.

Mr. CHARLTON. I dare say you have; but the truth makes very little impression upon the hon. gentleman; he is perfectly obdurate. But let me assure my hon. friend, whose practical knowledge is so small, that that is the reason why the farmer sells his coarse grains and buys corn, because he makes money in the exchange; and if he does not know that the man who can make money in such exchange, does not fail to do it, he had better learn the contrary as soon as possible. Assuming corn to be worth 66 cents a bushel, the exchange of 34 lbs. of oats, at current prices, for an equivalent amount of corn, will net the farmer 9 cents; the exchange of rye will net him $11\frac{1}{2}$ cents on every 56 lbs.; the exchange of barley will net him 32 cents on every 56 lbs., and peas $8\frac{3}{4}$ cents on the same quantity. It is absurd, then, for the Government to interfere with a business so profitable to the farmer by lessening his profits to the extent of $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents a bushel on the exchange of those coarse grains. The hon. member for Grey alluded, some time ago, to the enormous importation of Indian corn in 1877. Now, in 1876, we had a short harvest, we fell \$2,137,000 short of raising our own breadstuffs; consequently we imported a large amount of coarse grains that year. I have a tabular computation of the quantity imported, which will show the gain to Canada resulting from the importation of corn and corn-meal in 1877; we imported that year 6,348,000 bushels of corn or meal, counting four bushels of corn to a barrel of meal. The value of all the exports of grain, flour and meal, in 1879, was \$2,597,659. The average cost of the meal imported, was \$3 per barrel, and of corn, 51 cents per bushel. Average price of flour exported, \$5.50; oats, 42 cents; barley, 71 cents; peas, 85 cents. I would respectfully ask the attention of the hon. Finance Minister to this interesting statement, which I think will throw some light on the corn question.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I do not imagine the hon. gentleman wishes to enlighten me.

Mr. CHARLTON. The total import of meal was 294,342 barrels; less exported, 1,499, net import, 292,843 barrels. The approximate gain to the country by substituting 292,843 barrels of meal for the flour, at \$2.50 per barrel on the increased amount we were thus able to export, was \$632,107. Now, the net import of corn, after deducting the meal, was 5,176,000 bushels. We exported that year 2,970,000 bushels of oats, equivalent to 1,800,000 bushels of corn, of which we imported 1,800,000 bushels more than we would have, had we consumed the whole of our oat crop. We received for the oats exported the price we paid for the same weight of corn imported, and \$252,000 more. We exported 1,745,000 bushels of peas. Had we not imported the corn that replaced those peas, we would have consumed them. As it was we received \$523,000 more for the peas than we paid for an equal weight of corn. Having imported enough corn to enable us to export our entire surplus of peas and oats that year, we still had 1,536,000 bushels of corn left, which enabled us to export 1,736,000 bushels of barley, which we should have been obliged to consume if we had not imported the corn. The profit on the exchange of barley for corn amounted to \$466,860. The result of this trade to the country was a gain; in the exchange of our flour for corn, was \$632,000; gain in the export of oats and import of corn, \$252,000; gain in the export of peas and import of corn, \$523,000; export of barley and import of corn, \$466,000, or a total gain to Canada of \$1,873,000. If we allow \$435,000 as the cost of freight on the corn purchased and sent to the interior, and the freight from the place of growth to the port of shipment on the coarse grains exported you have a net gain of \$1,435,000 to Canada in consequence of the importation of 6,348,000 bushels of corn; and yet we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that it was a great disaster to import that corn. If we had not imported it our net exports of grain and meal that year, in place of having been \$2,597,629, would have been but little more than \$1,000,000 worth. So much for the corn question. I repeat, the duty on corn has not raised the price to the producer of corn in Canada one iota. It has only raised the price to the importer for consumption. The importation of corn at low prices, enabling farmers to sell their coarse grains for prices relatively much higher, is a great gain. I have shown that for one year that gain exceeded \$1,400,000; and hon. gentlemen opposite, in opposing a duty on corn, were trifling with the public interests, and inflicting a very great injury on the farmers outside the corn belt. I now wish to call the attention of the House to the current quotations of farm produce on the 27th day of this month, and to ask those hon. gentlemen whether they think that, under the circumstances, the duty upon grains is necessary in order to keep them out of our market for fear that it would be slaughtered. By these quotations I find, on 27th March, the price of No. 2 winter wheat in Toronto was \$1.27; in Toledo, \$1.37, or 10 cents higher there; in Buffalo, \$1.40; Oswego, \$1.40; in Montreal, \$1.43; in New York, \$1.44. The same day the price of spring wheat was, in Toronto, No. 2, \$1.28; Chicago, \$1.35, or 7 cents higher there; Buffalo, \$1.48; Duluth spring wheat, No. 1, Buffalo, \$1.60; Toronto, \$1.30; barley, Toronto, 84c.; Chicago, \$1.00; Buffalo, \$1.07; Montreal, 65c.; New York, \$1.17. Oats, 34 lbs., at Toronto, 40c. to 43c.; Chicago, 43c. to 44c.; Toledo, 48c.; Buffalo, 54c.; Oswego, 50c.; New York, 63c.; against 37c. in Montreal. Rye, Toronto, 83c.; Chicago, 88c.; Montreal, 90c.; New York, 95c. Peas, Toronto, 80c.; Buffalo, \$1.00. Butter, best grade, Toronto, 30c.; Chicago, 36c.; Buffalo, 40c.; Montreal, 26c.; New York, 43c. Cheese, $13\frac{1}{2}$ cents at Chicago, $13\frac{3}{4}$ cents at Buffalo, 13 cents at Montreal, and 13 cents at New York. There is not one article in that list that would be in the slightest degree effected by the imposition of a duty upon their importation from the United States. In every case the duty is useless and has no effect whatever in raising the price of grain. None of these grains can be bought at the prices I have quoted, and imported into Canada for consumption, if the duty stood entirely out of the way. The benefit the farmer derives from these duties it would require a very powerful microscope to perceive. They remind me of the story of an old Scotch beadle, who wanted his minister to allow him to preach. The minister asked him if he thought he could draw an inference from a text. He replied that he thought he could. The minister said: "The text I will give you, John, is this, 'And the wild ass snuffeth up the east wind.' What inference would you draw from that?" Said John: "The inference I would draw would be this, that he would snuff it up a long time before he got fat upon it." That is the case here. The farmers will be protected by these duties a long time before they get any benefit from them. Now, with regard to the duties in the Maritime Provinces, although that is somewhat beyond my province, I believe their operation injuriously affects the consumers in that section in this way—it obliges them to confine their trade to an unnatural channel. Their natural trade is to buy their breadstuffs where they sell their productions, in order to have return freight. If they send their vessels to New York or Boston with cargoes of lumber and coal, it is natural that they should be allowed to bring back flour, meal and provisions; and if they are obliged to buy these articles in Ontario it is an unnatural mode of prosecuting their business. The duty probably injures them and confers no benefit whatever upon the Ontario producer. I am happy to see the hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault) in his place. I had the pleasure this morning of visiting a cotton mill in which he is interested. I heard that hon. gentleman the other day say that he had not received 3 per cent. dividend on his cotton stocks yet.

An hon. MEMBER. He withdrew that.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am happy to hear it; I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. However, I found what would be the true inwardness of the matter, and while large dividends are not declared, I think they are payable, but they are used in doubling the capacity of the mill and doubling the value of the property. It reminds me of the case of the cotton mill up west which gave the information that it returned no dividend, in 1878. I ascertained by private enquiries that they had spent 10 per cent. of their earnings in increasing their plant, in order to meet their increased business. That is the case with the cotton mills that do not declare dividends just now. They are enabled to set at rest 30 or 40 per cent. in order to increase their capacity for earning great profits. I will not detain the House longer. I think that an examination of the quotations that I have presented will convince anyone that the operation of the duties upon grain has not been to the advantage of the farmer of Canada. I think it will also be apparent to any impartial observer that we are not realizing that home market promised to us very rapidly, inasmuch as our exportation of grains and flour is rapidly increasing. So far as the farmer of Ontario is concerned, the operation of this National Policy has not been to his advantage. It has increased the cost of various articles he purchases, and has not bestowed upon him the slightest advantage in the way of increasing the prices received by him for any article he produces for sale; and for that reason, as a representative of an agricultural constituency, and sent here by farmers to represent their interests, I shall vote for the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Quebec East.

Mr. TELLIER. The resolution submitted to the consideration of this House, by the hon. member for Quebec East, asks for the abolition of duties on coal, coke and breadstuffs, which were admitted free of duty under the former Tariff. In other words, it amounts, Mr. Speaker, to an attempt to destroy a part of the National Policy which was inaugurated on the 14th March, 1879, with the object of fostering and protecting the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of Canada. The question of protection was fully discussed in the presence of the electors at the last general election, and we all know and remember the verdict rendered by them on the 17th September, 1878. On that day the people declared themselves by a large majority in favor of Protection, not only for the agricultural but also for the mining and manufacturing interests of the country. Our farmers, previous to the remodelling of the Tariff in 1879, sorrowfully witnessed our markets flooded with American products, admitted free of duty, whilst Canadian agricultural products entering into the United States were heavily taxed. They clamoured for a protective system that would keep a home market open to home products, and asked that the same duties shall be levied on agricultural products imported from foreign countries into Canada, as those levied on our products by those same countries. They complained of the unjust and unequal Customs relations existing between Canada and the United States with regard to the exchange of agricultural products. In this country, which supplies more agricultural products than the national consumption can absorb, we were importing every year from abroad a considerable quantity of grain and flour, which was offered for sale on our market, and which usurped the place of our Canadian products. We no longer held possession of the home market, for without paying any duty, foreign producers could sell there as readily as our own farmers. In that, Mr. Speaker, there was an injustice, a grave injustice, to our farmers. During the last Parliament, the Conservative party noticed the injustice and became the interpreter of the complaints uttered outside the House, and of the request that a remedy should be furnished against these existing evils. Several motions were made in this House, to obtain this much-wished-for Protection, but they were all defeated. The hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), a fervent Liberal, attempted, but without success, on the 9th April, 1878, to have a duty imposed on Indian corn and oats imported into the country. The Hon. Mr. Joly, the leader of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, declared himself in 1876 in favor of levying duties on all foreign products, if not also on all raw materials required for our manufacturers. Yet the Liberal Administration turned a deaf ear to these legitimate requests, and persisted to the end in its refusal. The question was brought before the people in 1878, and the electors declared themselves in favor of a National Policy and of a system of general protection, and they elected representatives favorable to their interests in that respect. The electors relegated to the cold shades of Opposition the members of the Mackenzie Administration, which had persistently refused to render justice to agricultural and manufacturing interests. The Conservative party came to power with a programme approved of by the mass of the people of Canada. Its bounden duty was, therefore, to put into operation the sound policy which it had announced before and during the elections. Its first care has consequently been to fulfil the promises which it had made to the people, and to adopt a National Policy which, by a judicious readjustment of the Tariff, was to be of advantage to and foster the manufacturing, mining, agricultural, and other interests of Canada. What was, Mr. Speaker, the principle that was to preside at this readjustment of the Tariff? It was the principle of protecting everything that we could produce. The present Government set itself to work, and after laboring conscientiously, it gave to the country, on the 14th March, 1879, a Tariff which is essentially protective, and which has largely contributed to restore prosperity to all our languishing industries. Our agricultural interests have not been overlooked in this Tariff. They were suffering from a ruinous competition with foreign producers. In order to destroy that competition and to insure to our farmers a home market, the following Customs' dues were imposed on foreign agricultural products, which formerly were admitted free of duty: on wheat, barley and beans, 15 cents per bushel; on rye, oats, buckwheat and peas, 10 cents per bushel; on maize, 7½ cents per bushel; on wheat and rye flour, 50 cents per bbl.; on Indian meal, 40 cents per bbl.; on buckwheat flour, ¼ cent per lb.; on oatmeal, ½ cent per lb.; and all other kinds of flour, 20 per cent. ad valorem. These duties have had the effect of decreasing imports for consumption of foreign grain and flour, without injuring our export trade. The present Tariff has operated successfully in the agricultural interests. Nevertheless, the Reform party, in the ruthless and injudicious warfare which was carried on against this Tariff, would wish this House to declare that it would be better to re-establish the former state of things. In my opinion, that would not be a sound policy. I have said, Mr. Speaker, that previous to the adoption of the present Tariff, the Canadian farmer was placed in an unjust position. If we consult the Trade and Navigation Returns for the years previous to the new Tariff, we find that Canada exported every year to foreign countries large quantities of grain and flour, whilst every year also Canada imported for consumption considerable quantities of foreign grain and flour. We did not require these products, for each year our exports of grain and flour of Canadian production were in excess of our imports for consumption. Our market being thus invaded by these foreign agricultural products which we did not require, we were compelled to send our own products to foreign countries, and the greater part of our exports found their way to the United States. The Americans, who were sending us a large quantity of their agricultural products, had no duty to pay to come into our market; whilst we, to take advantage of their markets, were compelled to pay into the Treasury of the United States some considerable amounts. Under the Tariff formerly in force in Canada, foreign wheat as well as barley was admitted free of duty; beans, buckwheat, maize, oats, peas, rye, buckwheat flour, Indian meal, oatmeal, rye and wheat flour, all these products were admitted free of duty from foreign countries into Canada. Yet we were exporting the same products abroad, and when we did so to the United States, we had to pay on wheat, a duty of 20 cents per bushel; on barley and rye, a duty of 15 cents per bushel; on beans and buckwheat, a duty of 10 per cent.; on maize and oats, 10 cents per bushel; on peas and buckwheat flour, a duty of 20 per cent; on Indian meal, a duty of 10 per cent; on oatmeal, a duty of $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per lb; on rye flour, a duty of 10 per cent.; and on wheat flour, a duty of 20 per cent. You see, Mr. Speaker, that to be allowed to take these products to the American market, we were mulcted in heavy taxes, whereas Americans could bring those same products into our markets and offer them for sale without paying a cent of duty. This was most unjust to our farmers; attention was drawn to it by the people, previous to the elections of 1878, and the electors declared by their votes that they wished to see this state of affairs cease. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that our farmers were nursing the idea of a commercial reciprocity, between Canada and the United States, but was it possible to entertain such an idea in the peculiar circumstances wherein we were placed? On the one hand, the United States could freely bring their products into our markets, whilst, on the other, we were paying them on the same products, sent into their markets, large duties, wherewith to enrich their Treasury. Still we could not expect that the Americans would give up the advantage they had over us. On the products that I have enumerated, the duties which we paid to the United States, in 1877, amounted to about \$2,000,000. By whom was this enormous sum paid? By the Canadian farmer; and to prove this, I am going to make use of the argument used by our opponents in this House and elsewhere. They have contended that we had not the command of the market prices for grain. Very well; let us assume that such is the case and that we must accept for our grain the prices of the Liverpool, Boston and Chicago markets, or of other localities. In order for us to get the prices ruling in these markets, we must deduct from them the cost of transport, insurance and storage, as well as the Customs duties, which we have to disburse to reach these markets. There is, consequently, a considerable loss on the price of grain sold in Canada for export to foreign countries. Who is it that had to bear this loss? Why, the Canadian farmer, and no one else. It is a most interesting study, that of the Trade and Navigation Returns for the fiscal year 1876-77, to find out what were at the time our exports of agricultural products into the United States. During that year we exported into the United States the following Canadian products: 6,243,033 bushels of barley, representing a value of \$1,503,117, on which was levied a duty of 15 cents per bushel; 470,472 bushels of peas, representing a value of \$379,841, and charged 20 per cent.; 348,946 bushels of wheat, representing a value of \$376,019, and charged 20 cents per bushel; 118,281 bushels of beans, representing a value of \$117,320, and charged 10 per cent.; 405 bushels of Indian corn, representing a value of \$167, and charged 10 cents per bushel; 72,378 bushels of oats, valued at \$24,906, and charged 10 cents per bushel; 95,065 bushels of rye, valued at \$65,163, and charged 15 cents per bushel; 3,928 bushels of other kinds of grain, valued at \$3,018, and charged 10 per cent.; 30,405 barrels of flour, valued at \$173,989, and charged 20 per cent.; 11,991 barrels of oatmeal, valued at \$48,753, and charged $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per lb.; 2,377,120 lbs. of wool, valued at \$681,978, and charged 10 cents per lb. and 11 per cent. ad valorem; 26,195 cwt. of flax-seed, valued at \$182,979, and charged 2 cents per lb.; 7,496 horses, valued at \$668,467, and charged 20 per cent.; 13,851 horned cattle, valued at \$268,317, and charged 20 per cent.; 198,820 sheep, valued at \$536,648, and charged 20 per cent. The total amount of duties paid to the United States on the exportation of those articles reached about \$3,000,000. Yet, similar articles imported in considerable quantities from the United States during that year 1876-77 had nothing to pay to come into Canada, excepting, however, animals, which were charged 10 per cent. Thus, the American treasury was enriched to the extent of about \$3,000,000, to the prejudice of the Canadian farmer, whereas the American farmer had nothing to pay to the Canadian Treasury in order to get the privilege of our market. Thus did the Americans yearly largely take advantage of the privileges conferred on them by the former Tariff, which allowed them to flood our market with their agricultural products. They enjoyed the convenience of our market; they reaped the advantage of our prices, and they did not pay anything into the Canadian treasury. Well, it became necessary to bring an end to such a state of things. The Conservative party bound itself to do justice, and it did so liberally in 1879. The means employed by it were to impose the duty which the hon. member for Quebec East is desirous of removing to-day. This tax is advantageous to the Canadian farmer; it is therefore undesirable that it should be removed. It has had the effect of doing away with the ruinous competition from which our farmers suffered under the old Tariff. It is true that we still import agricultural products from abroad; but their importation has considerably decreased, and those which come into Canada for consumption are charged with a duty which goes to the public Treasury. The amount thus paid in is that much that the Canadian people are exempted from paying so. The present Government has fairly carried out the ideas it expressed previous to 1879 and the promises made during the elections. Those ideas and those promises have been realized by the protective Tariff given to the country in 1879. Our opponents have much criticized that Tariff; they have sought to ridicule it. At the time when it was adopted, Mr. Speaker, we could merely express our opinion as to its results, but to-day, our opinion is confirmed by what has happened since. If we consult the public records, we find therein the proof that the Tariff has produced the results which we expected. Have our imports of former times diminished? I have taken the trouble to prepare a statement with regard to the agricultural products which have been affected by the changes made in 1879. From it

I see that a considerable portion of our market which was occupied by foreign products has been kept for the benefit of our farmers. They have supplied for home consumption during the past two years an amount of $23,298,005, representing articles which were formerly supplied by foreigners. This amount may appear extraordinary, but it is nevertheless correct. As a basis for my calculations, I have taken two years under the Liberal and two years under the Conservative regime. For the former, I have taken the years 1877 and 1878, and 1880 and 1881 for the latter; I have compared the exports and imports during these four years, so as to be able to form an opinion, and the following is the result I have attained. I will commence with wheat which has been affected by the present Tariff. Foreign wheat, which was admitted free of duty before the present Tariff, has been charged a duty of 15 cents per bushel. What has been the result of this duty? We are going to examine. Our imports for home consumption have been considerably less in 1879 than our opponents thought they would be. Thus, during the years 1877 and 1878, the total imports of wheat amounted to $11,356,972, and the whole of this amount was imported into the country for consumption. Under the new Tariff, our total imports have amounted to $15,880,666 for the years 1880 and 1881, but of that amount a value of $62,000 only was imported for consumption. Such is the difference, Mr. Speaker. If we pass on to wheaten flour we find the same result. During the years 1877 and 1878 there was imported in all for consumption, wheaten flour to the value of $4,830,374 as against $1,703,306, whereof $1,453,985 for consumption during the years 1880 and 1881. We also find that we imported all kinds of flour (with the exception of wheaten flour), during the years 1877 and 1878 for an amount of $1,582,933, whereof $1,582,431 was for consumption, and during the last two years, to an amount of $926,929, whereof $923,474 was for consumption, which shows a considerable decrease in favour of the present Tariff. Whilst I am on the subject of flour, I have a remark to make. The hon. member who has just addressed this House, has told us that several mills had closed since 1879 as they could not find employment. That assertion has been disputed, and I do not think it is exact. The figures which I have just quoted show that since the inauguration of the present Tariff, our imports of flour have decreased, and we have increased our exports of the same commodity. Thus, in 1880 and 1881, our exports of flour of all kinds exceeded those of 1877 and 1878 by $640,068 worth of Canadian flour, and of $373,563 worth of foreign flour. Our mills have, therefore, ground more grain and made more flour since the change of Tariff. If we look at the effect of the Tariff on maize, we find that during the years 1877 and 1878, maize was imported to the value of $7,795,162, and the whole of this amount seems to have been consumed in the country. During the past two years, our imports have amounted to $6,594,031, whereof $1,639,169 for consumption. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us take oats. During the years 1877 and 1878, oats were imported to the amount of $1,262,123, and the whole of this amount appears to have been consumed in the country, whereas during the last two years, we only imported to the value of $91,858, whereof $60,452 was for consumption. As to peas, and beans, we find that our imports in 1877 and 1878 amounted to $34,399 for consumption, whilst during the years 1880 and 1881 we only imported $26,834, whereof $23,996 was for consumption. If we take barley, we find that for the years 1877 and 1878, the imports reached $324,387, and this amount appears to have been consumed in the country, whilst during the years 1880 and 1881, we imported barley to the amount of $15,804, whereof $14,926 was for consumption. Bran, rye and other grains imported in 1877 and 1878 amounted to $142,114, and they appear to have been totally consumed in the country, whereas, in 1880 and 1881, but $58,376 was imported, whereof $48,709 was for consumption. The imports of hay, straw, potatoes and other vegetables amounted to $194,922, whereof $193,922 was for consumption during the first two years, and $217,629, whereof $218,377 for consumption during the last two years. We imported, in 1877 and 1878, $852,550 worth of animals, whereof $785,976 was for consumption, and, in 1880 and 1881, $609,345, whereof $544,329 was for consumption. The trade in grain, flour and vegetables during the two years of 1877 and 1878, amounted to $27,522,386 for imports; of that amount, $27,521,488 was for consumption; and during the years 1880 and 1881, we imported in grain, flour and vegetables to the extent of $26,533,899, whereof $4,465,526 only was for consumption. These figures show that for the years which I have compared, we have diminished our total import trade to the extent of $1,989,487, and our imports for consumption to the extent of $23,056,358, in the matter of grain, flour and vegetables. This is a satisfactory margin for our farmers. Previous to the change of the Tariff, Mr. Speaker, we were compelled to seek abroad grain, flour and vegetables to the amount of $27,521,884 consumed in the country, whilst since the change of Tariff, we have only sought these products to the extent of $4,465,526. To what is due this decrease of our imports for consumption? I have heard our opponents speak of the Tariff. I have heard the doubts expressed by them as to its results. Each one of them admitted the prosperity that has reigned since its adoption, but each one became pious and thanked Providence for what has taken place, never attributing the result to the Tariff. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that we have much to thank Providence for. Providence has granted us good crops, has assisted us in giving us a number of representatives favorable to the National Policy, and especially in giving us good Government which has had the power to reverse the policy followed previous to 1879, and which has thereby contributed to bring about that prosperity which we are so glad to see reigning everywhere to-day. Were we to listen to our opponents, it would have been sufficient to fold our arms and wait. These gentlemen have so great a confidence in Providence, that in their eyes it is not necessary to pass new fiscal laws; it is sufficient to raise one's eyes heavenwards and to open one's mouth, to have food ready cooked dropped into it. As for me, I have always thought that one should help oneself. Thus did the electors help themselves by sending to this House a majority inclined to look after their interests, after the national interests, and we may say to-day that they did right in electing a majority which has labored here to protect industries in general, and the agricultural industries especially. With the figures that I have just quoted, Mr. Speaker, I have shown but a part of the question which engages our attention at present. I have shown that the predictions that were made to the people to the effect that a change of the Tariff would diminish the imports for consumption have been realized. Who are those that have been benefitted by the decrease of imports of agricultural products? It is our farmers who have found on our market a place formerly occupied by foreign products. In 1880 and 1881 they supplied grain, flour, hay, vegetables and animals to the value of $23,298,005 in excess of that for the years 1877 and 1878. If we compare the last two years with the first two, we find that we have diminished the imports for consumption by an amount of $11,294,932 for wheat; by $3,376,389 for wheaten flour; by $658,957 for other kinds of flour; by $6,155,993 for maize; by $309,461 for barley, and by $93,045 for bran, rye and other grain, or a total of $23,090,211. If to that we add an amount of $241,647, or the decrease on the import of animals, and if we deduct $24,415 for the increase of our imports for consumption of hay, straw, potatoes and other vegetables, and $18,438 for imports of damaged grain and flour, we find that we have eliminated from our home market a value of $23,298,005. Here is the statement which I submit to the consideration of this House and of our opponents. It will be seen from this statement that we have increased the imports for consumption of certain products to the extent of $42,853, but, on the other hand, we have secured to the Canadian farmers a market for an amount of $23,298,005 by the decrease of our imports. Well, this seems to me a satisfactory result for which the farmers will not blame us when we acquaint them with the result. Mr. Speaker, I have merely spoken of the effects of the present Tariff on our imports for consumption. Our opponents have contended that our total import trade would be diminished. This decrease is not as considerable as our opponents are willing to believe; the decrease actually amounts to but $2,232,692. Our opponents also prophesied that our export trade would be largely effected. I have examined the question from that point of view to find out if their predictions had been realized, and I have found that during the years 1877 and 1878 as compared with 1880 and 1881, our exports of Canadian agricultural products instead of decreasing, have increased by $9,574,876, and that our exports of foreign products have increased by $6,114,981. Here is the statement which proves my assertions:

Now, where are our opponents with their predictions? We have succeeded by means of this Tariff in securing to Canadian farmers the Canadian market to a considerable amount. Our total import trade only suffered a loss of $2,000,000, and our export trade has increased in the proportion that I have just mentioned. It seems to me that the Government has reason to be generally satisfied with its National Policy, and especially in so far as it concerns agricultural protection. There is yet another point on which our opponents sought to become prophets. They contended that the change of Tariff would be detrimental to our trade with England; that this change of Tariff would have the result of affecting injuriously our credit in that country. Well, if we consult the public records, we find that our trade with England has, instead of decreasing, increased, and that the present Tariff has specially operated against the United States, and in favor of England. Our credit has never stood higher. So there is another of our opponent's predictions that has not been realized. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) has just made an appeal to this House; he asks us by the resolution which he has put into your hands, to give a vote that would have the effect of upsetting that National Policy adopted in 1879. But who complains against this Tariff? Is it the farmers or the consumers who complain? I represent a county in which the agricultural production is somewhat considerable. Sir, in that county political opinions are pretty equally divided. I have had the opportunity of meeting frequently both friends and foes; I have had the opportunity of speaking to them of the National Policy, and of the effect that it would have on agricultural productions, and I can say that not a single farmer has complained of that policy. Liberals and Conservatives alike endorse it. Were we to-day to ask of them a frank and square answer to the following questions: Do you wish to return to the former régime? Do you wish that we should abolish the duties levied on agricultural products? I am certain there would be but one voice in the county of St. Hyacinthe, to reply that we should keep in force the present system. Is it the consumer who complains? I have not heard any complaint from that quarter in the county of St. Hyacinthe or elsewhere; and why should the consumer complain? Is it because he is paying dearer for his purchases? As has been remarked in this House, the consumer earns more money now than in 1878, and he has now the means of buying the necessaries of life, which means he did not possess previous to the inauguration of the National Policy. No more than the farmer does the consumer wish to go back to the policy of 1873. I have listened to the discussions which have taken place in this House with regard to the question of prices. We have been told that we had no control over the prices of grain and flour, and that they were regulated by the Liverpool, Boston and other markets. Supposing such to be the case, are our farmers not in a position to supply us with the grain upon which it is sought by the resolution now submitted to abolish the tax? Are our farmers not in a position to supply us with this grain as cheaply as foreign farmers? I maintain that they are. If we have no control over our market quotations, and if we are obliged to accept foreign ones, we must add thereto the cost of transport, insurance and storage, and those foreign products will cost us dearer than if we bought them in the country. The consumer has not, therefore, any reason to complain. On the other hand, if foreign grain comes and takes the place of our products on our own markets, our farmers will suffer therefrom, for they will be driven to seek a foreign market to sell their products, and they will lose, as I have said, the cost of transport, insurance, storage and customs' dues. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the Canadian farmer, not having any foreign competition to fear, will be able to sell us his products as cheaply as foreign farmers, and even cheaper, and the consumer will not have any reason for being dissatisfied with the present policy, the effect of which is to create work for him and give him money. The results of the National Policy have, therefore, not done any harm to either the farmer or the consumer, whilst it has contributed to fill the public coffers. The Americans having refused to admit our agricultural products free of duty; efforts to bring about this result having been fruitless, it became absolutely necessary to protect ourselves against them and to change the Tariff. It was only fair to make them pay duties equal to those which they were compelling us to pay when we wished to take advantage of their markets. The imports made after they change of the Tariff, have had the effect of pouring into the public Treasury a considerable amount, which has been employed in the expenses of Administration, and by this means the Government has been put in a position to put an end to deficits and to diminish the taxes on the necessaries of life which we do not produce in this country. Thus we have during the present Session seen the Government take the tax off tea and coffee. It was a considerable tax which weighed on the people, but owing to the Protection which has been established, owing especially to the amounts paid into the public Treasury through the importation of agricultural products, the Government has been able to take off these taxes. There was another tax which weighed heavily on the people; it was the tax on promissory notes. The Government has taken it off altogether, and has thereby eased the burdens of the people. The Government has also diminished the tax on Canadian tobacco, and the result of this will be to protect the farmers in a special manner. It therefore seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are specially interested in maintaining the present state of affairs. The change of Tariff has also had the effect of uniting more closely the different Provinces forming Confederation by establishing commercial intercourse amongst them. The complaints we have heard against the present Tariff had a tendency to bring the various Provinces into antagonism. Thus we have heard it said in this House that the wheat of Ontario was protected in an unjust fashion, and that the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces were compelled to pay considerable taxes on flour and wheat. It has also been contended that the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec were compelled to pay a considerable tax on coal for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces. All these utterances were calculated to create prejudices and to snap asunder the bond which unites the various Provinces, and it seems to me that they should be answered in the interests of the union of the Provinces. The duties imposed on foreign products have had the effect of increasing the trade between the various Provinces of Confederation; these Provinces are each existing under different conditions and produce different commodities which they must exchange among themselves. They continually supply each other with products and avoid going to foreign countries for a great many things. That has been the result of the National Policy, and I am certain that the complaints made in this House will not find an echo among the people. Protection has been granted for the mutual benefit of the Provinces. The Province of Quebec has received its share of the benefits of the National Policy, through the Protection granted to its agricultural products, and it is only fair that it should bear its part of the tax levied on coal in favor of the Maritime Provinces. To conclude, Mr. Speaker, justice having been meted out to all the Provinces, and the country being all the better for it, it seems to me that it is our duty to continue the policy inaugurated in 1879. As for myself, I intend to vote against the resolution now submitted to the House, and which, if adopted, would have the result of destroying a part of that National Policy.

Mr. HESSON, I desire to say only a few words in answer to the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk, which was to my mind a very marvellous speech. The resolution before the House, as I understand it, is that a tax upon bread is an injustice to the working people of this country. The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk disposed of that proposition, and, if his speech could be made out, it would damage the position of the hon. member for Quebec East who moved the resolution. I think the hon. member for North Norfolk is entitled to the laurels. His whole effort for a full hour, in what I call a diarrhoea of figures, was simply to prove that the National Policy had not increased the price of corn, wheat, flour, oats, barley and rye. Yet the hon. member for Quebec East moves that the National Policy is putting a duty of 50 cents on the barrel of flour and the barrel of meal, and that it is a tax upon the poor man. When these hon. gentlemen can settle this difficulty between themselves, it is not worth while for hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to dispute their proposition. I suppose the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk is now defending the position he once before sustained in this House, that a duty on farm products does have the effect of raising the value of those products in the market. If that hon. gentleman is consistent, I think he is in duty bound to vote against this resolution. However, I venture to say that he will be found sustaining the proposition that there is a tax on flour and upon corn, and yet his whole effort was to prove that the farmers of Canada did not reap a single cent of advantage from the Tariff that was imposed upon them in 1879; and I am surprised that in this House a gentleman should take such a position as that. He may quote his figures from now till this time next year, but he will not succeed in convincing the farmers that they are not better off under the Tariff. I know for a fact that it has had the effect of keeping out thousands of bushels of grain from my own county and other counties, that otherwise would have come in to compete with the products of our farmers. Still the hon. member for Quebec East may be correct in saying that the imports of flour from the United States are paying a duty of 50 cents a barrel. We give the poor man labor and he can afford to buy flour, and he is not obliged to buy the American product. The farmers of the west can supply him with good flour, and he is not compelled to buy American trash and pay 50 cents a barrel duty. While we consume the coal of the United States we are willing to pay the duty, because we happen to be nearer the American market. I know for a fact there is no complaining in my part of the country in regard to the duty on coal. If there were complaints in the Lower Provinces because of a duty existing on meal and flour, we would have had the Table of the House covered with petitions. I am surprised that this subject should have detained the House six weeks, and there is not a single sensible man in the Dominion who is not satisfied that the country is in a happier and more prosperous condition than was ever anticipated with all our brilliant expectations of the future. Our broadest idea of what the National Policy would accomplish has been more than realized, and I am glad to say I can stand up and defend the National Policy with much more heart and sincerity, because I have seen its beneficial effects. I know what it has accomplished in my own part of the country. We had a wollen mill where the hands used to gaze at the shut doors and the closed windows, because it was in possession of the sheriff; but now it has more than double its capacity to do, and the proprietors are placing in it more than $10,000 worth of improvements. The same statement applies to many other industries in the town. If time be given to the National Policy, great work will be accomplished by it.

Mr. FLEMING. I do not wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite speak with some feeling, as the matter before the House is a tender one for them. They feel as if the citadel were in danger. The duty on breadstuffs is the cornerstone of the edifice; remove that and the protectionist policy will crumble to the ground. I contend, as I have long contended, that the reason why the protectionist system has existed so long in the United States is because the farmers of the Western States still retain the nominal and so-called protection for their agricultural products. So long as they retain this so-called protection, so long will the protectionist system exist there. No hon. member will venture to say that the duty of 20 cents a bushel on Canadian wheat entering the United States is a protection to the American farmer. It is no more a protection than the protection of 3 cents a pound on raw cotton was to the planter of the Southern States; it is a duty which affords no more protection to the wheat-grower than did that on cotton, and makes no more difference in the importation of wheat than did the duty on cotton to the importation of raw cotton in the United States. If the farmers of the United States will accept this so-called protection, they are giving the manufacturers an argument to sustain the position they hold that they should be protected. Only a few days ago I saw in a paper, The Protectionist, published in the United States, an organ of the American manufacturers, a statement that it is absurd to say the farmers are not protected, and it points to the duties on agricultural products. That is as much as to say, that those duties are an equivalent for the high prices they are called on to pay for manufactured goods. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) declared that we on this side of the House contradicted ourselves by saying that in some sections the duty had not raised the prices, and that in others it had raised the price. Those positions were not inconsistent because it is quite possible they may exist together. From the conformation of the country it is quite clear that the duty may enhance the price in one district, although it may not do so throughout the Dominion; and I shall be able to show that the farmers have not obtained better prices because of the duty placed on grain, or that they have received better prices than the farmers of the United States. The hon. member for North Perth spoke of American grain and flour as trash; but how does it come to pass that the Americans get a higher export price for their trash than we do for our good article? This will be seen by the following table:

EXPORT PRICES.

Wheat	United States.	$1.12	$1.24	$1.16	$1.33	$1.06	$1.24	$1.11
	Canada.....	1.13	1.12½	1.15	1.22½	1.16½	1.02
Flour	United States.	$6.00	$6.20	$6.47	$6.35	$5.25	$5.87	$5.27
	Canada.....	5.24	6.17	5.38	4.94

The average price of Canadian wheat for the four years, 1874-78 was $1.15½, and for the two years, 1879-81, $1.09½, thus showing that the price was less under protection than previously. The hon. gentleman spoke about a better market; it cannot be a better market unless there are better prices; it does not matter whether the article is consumed here or a thousand miles distant. I know a miller who is doing business in the Lower Provinces, and near him is another miller grinding for the Glasgow market. The prices are the same; better prices are not obtained from the miller grinding for the Maritime Provinces, for the price is regulated by the rates ruling at Liverpool. There is an important point which has been frequently referred to by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who showed it very clearly in one light, and I will endeavor to show it in another—it is in regard to the home market. In 1876, the First Minister, in a speech he made in favor of a duty on grain and in favor of protection, said: "We should encourage the growth of coarse grains and foster manufactures that will create a consumption for all our farmers can raise." This was an intimation to the people of the country that if they would support a National Policy and restore that hon. gentleman to power he would bring about a state of things by which all the products raised by the farmers would be consumed. How long will it be before the hon. gentleman fulfils his promise; how many years before the manufacturers of this country will consume all that the farmers can raise. If we look at the state of matters in the United States, we will have some idea in regard to a home market. By looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns of that country it will appear that they had a better home market and that they consumed a greater proportion of the products of the farm sixty years ago than they do now, they had a better home market at that time. In 1820, the exports of breadstuffs from the United States represented 53 cents per head. In 1880, they represented $5.74, so that at this rate it would be several generations before the population would increase so as to consume all they raised. If we take a period of thirty years, from 1850 to 1880, the increase in population was 116 per cent., while the increased production of breadstuffs was 2104 per cent. Were the production of breadstuffs to increase at the same rate for the next thirty years, and the value of them to continue the same, the exports would amount to $6,336,000,000. Supposing that was the limit of production, the rate of increased population to continue at 116 per cent., there would then be a population of 108,000,000, leaving the breadstuffs to be exported to be equivalent to $58 per head, so that, if we followed in the same course, it would be a long time before we will have a home market for our own produce. If we take the exports of wheat and flour from the United States and reduce the flour to wheat at four and a-half bushels to a barrel of flour, we find that in 1850-51 the exportation was 5,641,526 bushels, or half a bushel per head. In 1881, it was 187,561,000 bushels, or over three and a-half bushels per head, or enough to support a population of 37,000,000 of people. This would be an increase of 3,224 per cent. on wheat alone, and if the production of wheat should increase in the United States at the same rate as it has in the last thirty years, there would be, in the year 1910-11, a surplus of 6,234,000,000, or 57 bushels per head for a population of 108,000,000. We are frequently told what a large extent of fertile country we have. How long would it be before we could export thirty or forty millions of bushels if the country is to be peopled as hon. gentlemen say it will be? It will not be long until at least ten millions of acres are sown in wheat, and at fifteen bushels per acre we would have 150,000,000 bushels, and where would we find a home market for the consumption of that amount? Yet these hon. gentlemen have undertaken to supply this home market by the promises they made to the people of this country. When hon. gentlemen go back to their constituents it will not do for them to say, "Look at the prosperity we have brought to the country." The farmers have been deceived once, it is true, but they are not very likely to be deceived again. They can see very plainly that it is to their own labor, under the blessing of Providence, that they are indebted for the better times they now enjoy. I conceive that the duties on grain and coal, in a country like this, are most impolitic. Grain is the staff of life, and we should try by all means to endeavor to have food placed within the reach of the humblest and poorest amongst us. The rich can buy all they require. It is no matter, so far as they are concerned; but the poorer classes should be able to obtain their food at the lowest possible rate. In our climate, the article of fuel is a matter of life and death in the winter season, and to put a duty on that article and thereby raise the price to the poorer classes is an act of cruelty and injustice. But this duty presses not only upon the poorer classes but upon all classes. All our manufacturers, except those who use water-power, require coal, and as the extra duty compels them to pay a higher price for their coal, they reimburse themselves for the outlay by imposing a higher price on their manufactured products. This duty is also a great injury to the farmers, because it puts an extra tax on the railways. They have to buy coal at an enhanced price, and as they have to compete with the American railways, which get their coal free of duty, and as they cannot compete for the through traffic, they have to impose an extra charge on the local traffic, and for this the farmer has to pay. Living as I do amidst an agricultural population, I think I know the sentiments of the people on this subject. I had a letter from one of my constituents to-day, in which he says: "Talk about the National Policy giving us protection, I wonder at anybody, much less members of Parliament believing any such thing." I am satisfied that when the case is fairly stated to the people, and they consider it in all its bearings, giving due credit to their own industry, and giving no more credit to hon. gentlemen than they deserve, they will declare the National Policy a delusion and a snare.

SUPPLY.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

14. Post Office Department..... $116,120

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I perceive that $4,720 additional are required for this Department, and notwithstanding all the declarations which, in former times, were made touching the enormous expenditure of this Department, and the enormous number of clerks that were employed—I perceive that in the space of the current year there has been an increase of no less than ten clerks. The expenditure appears to have gone on increasing in a remarkable ratio. In 1879 we only required 92 clerks, and the cost of the Department was $87,850, while now there is an addition of 30 clerks and $28,000 or $23,000. Now, making all reasonable allowance for the increase of work, I cannot see that there has been such an increase as to warrant such a large addition to the staff and to the expenditure. Besides all this, there is a very large figure for contingencies, involving a considerable number of extra clerks. I should be glad to get some detailed information from the Postmaster-General or the hon. Minister of Finance as to the reasons for this very heavy additional demand.

SIR HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry that the Postmaster General is not here, but the state of his health did not permit him to remain. I have had some data placed in my hands relating to this Department. The total increase is $4,750. This is caused by the addition of several clerks, probationary clerks, except in the Money Order Branch, where the increased work necessitated the appointment of an assistant superintendent. The new clerks are three third-class clerks, and six probationary clerks. The other increases are caused by the increased $50 allowed to such officers, as are entitled to it by law, and by the promotion of certain officers who have been a number of years in the Department. The work of this Department has increased very much, both in the Savings Bank Branch, the Money Order Branch, and the Accountant's Branch. The hon. gentleman will see that the new clerks, as a rule, are probationary clerks. The object of bringing in these young men is to make them accustomed to the work, so that they can replace the old men when the latter become unfit for the work. In a large Department like this, it is necessary there should be always a few provisional clerks prepared to fill the higher offices.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are besides a considerable number of promotions to the higher grades which the hon. gentleman has said nothing about.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have explained that. Not only were a certain number of officers entitled to the $50, but besides there was a number who by length of service and by efficiency were entitled to higher offices.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am sorry that the Postmaster General is not at his seat. I learn that certain promotions have taken place in his department, in which a certain number of French Canadians were set aside. If such be the case I do not think he can justify such conduct, and I would like to have some explanation on the subject.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In reply to the hon. member, I must say that I do not know that any injustice has been done to any one in that department. An employé may sometimes be the senior of another but possess less ability, and be less qualified to fulfil his duties than another, who by his abilities and aptitude is more deserving of promotion. The hon. member must bear in mind that promotion is not a right, that it is a reward for the services and the abilities of an official; but I am convinced that the Postmaster-General will not do an injustice to any of his officials.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I see that the Civil Service Commission particularly reports that in the Post Office Department a much smaller number of second-class clerks are required, and that twelve would be sufficient. There are more than double the number of senior second.

class clerks that the commission recommends. There is great force in their recommendation that, the work being largely of a clerical routine character, the work of the Department should be confined to third-class clerks with a moderate number of first and second-class clerks. Their recommendations are steadily disregarded. Do the Government intend having the slightest regard for the recommendations of their own Civil Service Commission or not?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not think the gentleman is entitled to make that enquiry on the general question now. If he wants a question of that kind he should put it on the paper. Because the Civil Service Commission has made a report, these officers are not to be deprived of their promotion. When the Civil Service Bill passes the House, the Government will have to act on the new law, but until then the Government must follow the present law.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. This is the time this should be discussed. In the Money Order Branch, nine promotions have been made at once from junior to senior and second class. There ought to be some reason for that.

Mr. BLAKE. There is also the serious point that not less than three new appointments are made in a class higher than the third class. No attention has been given to the report of the Commission which states that the work can be efficiently done by third-class clerks under the supervision of a few of a higher class. That their services are not of a character which gives to the clerks who are of a higher rank the right to a higher rate of pay, and the duties which will be discharged by the clerks of a lower rate of pay; that the great bulk of the service is, after all, of a routine and clerical character capable of being discharged by persons who are good, mechanical hands at writing, and who will get, perhaps, very much better and apt for their work after three or four years; that the system which involves as a proposition of right, as the hon. gentleman has allowed, it has done, the promotion of such persons from class to class, and salary to salary, is one which involves a constant increase of expense. I say, of right, provided there is good conduct and diligence in the performance of duty. The whole of these items are formed on the old supposition, that that system is to continue—that point of weakness which the minority concur in describing as exceedingly undesirable, is to be continued. They all agree that there is a weakness in the culmination from time to time of claims and demands on the part of those employees, although the class of services on which they are called on to perform does not certainly entitle them to higher rank and salaries; and we have in this Department an instance of this evil when you find it over-staffed, according to the statement of the Civil Service Commissioners, far beyond what is required. I think they may give twelve second-class clerks, if I judge rightly. My hon. friend says the number proposed is fifty-nine, of whom about three are turned into seconds on this occasion; so that we are not keeping up the system in entire conformity with the law with reference to the Department, in reference to which the remarks of the Civil Service Commission have their strongest application.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think that the interpretation the Minister of Public Works has put on the Civil Service Act is one it will bear. I think he is wholly mistaken in his construction of the law; and I am satisfied it never was contemplated that everyone who enters the service, if he only remains in it long enough, should become a first-class clerk, wholly irrespective of his duties. What is the object of calling some first-class, others second-class and some junior clerks? Is it not that they are to be classed not merely as to the period of their services, but the nature of their work? It is a common idea in the service that after a sufficiently long period, clerks are entitled to promotion into the next class above them. That was never the intention of the law, and it is wholly improper to act upon any such theory. If that principle were acted upon, the longer a Department retained its clerks the more expensive it must become, and the expense would ultimately become enormously great. I prefer the English system which recognizes third-class clerks as simply writers not entitled to promotion, but to increased remuneration. The present Canadian practice is wholly opposed to the spirit and letter of the law, and is entailing upon the public a constantly increasing charge.

15. Expenses in connection with the Department of Agriculture..... $33,780

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Why have we additional messengers and clerks, and what are these various increases?

Mr. POPE. The work of the Patent Office is increased—doubled within the last three or four years; the extra expense, excepting the $50 given as statutory increase, is on that account.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Three messengers are asked for instead of two.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are messengers for the whole Department.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The increase is not for the patent branch.

Mr. POPE. There were always three messengers until last year, when we had only two.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I understood there was an increase of clerks to replace others displaced. Some three or four were displaced when the present Government took office, but were replaced by more than three others, and are still in the Department.

Mr. BLAKE. There were also in this case, so far as I can judge, some appointments in the higher ranks, either probationary clerks or promotions. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would explain the promotions.

Mr. POPE. I cannot explain it now; there have been several promotions in the ordinary way.

Mr. BLAKE. We observed the clerks in the vote in 1882-83 are of different ranks with the clerks in the vote of 1881-82, and without explanations it is impossible to tell whether there has been a vacancy.

Mr. POPE. The clerks had come to the maximum of their class, and were put into the other class.

Mr. BLAKE. That is a perversion of the rule. I do not think that because a clerk has come to the maximum of his class he can keep on ascending, not merely by his conduct but as to pay also; that the nature of his case is such that there is a progressive value in his services, and that the system, as the hon. gentleman supposes, will bring everybody up to the rank of chief clerk.

Mr. POPE. I said that certain men, for their services and ability, were put into another class.

Mr. BLAKE. No; the hon. gentleman said that they had come to the maximum of their class and their abilities were such that they were entitled to that promotion. What are the promotions?

Mr. POPE. I cannot tell now.

Mr. BLAKE. This would be the proper time to tell.

Mr. MILLS. We, when in office, were obliged to go into the most minute details, and tell what new services clerks performed that entitled them to an additional compensation and a superior rank. The hon. gentleman said that these parties, from their ability, are entitled to this promotion.

I did not understand that was the intention of the law. A man who enters as a third-class clerk may be superior in point of ability to a man who occupies a much higher position. We want to know what increased importance there is in the service which entitles these men to this promotion. Where the office work continues the same I do not see that the fact that a man has served a certain number of years entitles him to go into another rank.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture why there is such a large increase in the officers? In the Estimates of 1878 and 1879, I see the number was 25, and their salaries $28,890. In the Estimates brought down now he is asking salaries for 33 officers, amounting to $35,788. Now, it is a well-known fact that we have not got the report of that Department yet, and surely with the increased number of officers we ought to have that report down within, at least, six weeks after the meeting of the House. Besides, I do not know that we have had any explanations as to the increased services to which he referred. Is he giving more attention to the agricultural resources of this country than were given some years ago, or is the patent branch overcrowded? The cavalier manner in which the hon. Minister of Agriculture refuses to give the Committee information is something that never occurred in days gone by, or if it did was warmly resented.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. We ought to know who these gentlemen are. We are asked to increase the salaries by $300 or $400 a year. The hon. gentleman ought to know who he is promoting.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman will get all the information he wants. I will give him the name of every man, but I have not them here to-night.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. This is the time when all these items of information are brought down and ought to be brought down. It is a perfect farce to talk of passing the Estimates when the responsible head of a Department cannot give us information about details and the character of the men whom he is promoting.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I fancy these names were never asked for.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It was asked upon all occasions, over and over again. I never knew it refused.

16. Expenses of the Department of Marine and Fisheries..... $31,020

In reply to Mr. BLAKE,

Mr. McLELAN. $630 of the increase is under the statute, and $200 is for the promotion of the engineer who was formerly at a lower salary. His name is Mr. Anderson, and he replaced Mr. Tomlinson.

Mr. BLAKE. There appears to be two new appointments of first-class clerks.

Mr. McLELAN. One of them is called an engineer. He was last year a senior second, and this year doing the duties formerly performed by Mr. Tomlinson, who is now in the Railway Department. He was formerly in this Department at $2,200, Mr. Anderson, who is a senior second, now taking his place. The other one is a promotion, Mr. Gourdeau.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I observe an increase in the officers of this Department since 1878. In 1878, we asked for salaries for 20 officers, $25,070; he is now asking for salaries for 25 officers, $31,020.

Mr. McLELAN. I understand it was the appointment of some clerks who were on daily pay in 1878.

17. Department of Public Works..... $31,010

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Decreases have occurred amounting to $1,690; promotions involved $1,550, leaving a difference of $140. The statutory increases accounted for the gross increase of $510.

Mr. MILLS. I understand the architect who has recently retired has been placed on the superannuation list. He is not an old officer, and seems to be in the full vigor of manhood. It would be interesting to know why he was retired.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Chief Architect (Mr. Scott) asked to be relieved of his duties, on producing a certificate from his medical man that he had disease of the heart, and could not be confined to office work. The fact is he was very ill, therefore by Order in Council he was allowed to retire, and a retiring pension was granted him amounting to $650.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Since 1878 the Department of Public Works was divided into the Public Works and the Railway Departments. With one head in 1878 the number of employes was 32, and salaries, $49,780. With two heads of Departments there are 48 employes at salaries of $72,280. I notice, however, that the salary of the Chief Engineer of the Government Railways is charged in the Estimates of 1881-82, giving an excess of $15,500 over 1878. Perhaps the hon. Minister will explain this large increase.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is true the hon. member for Lambton was at the head of the Department of Public Works that comprised also the Railways. I would not have consented to have been his successor with those two Departments under me, and judging by the state of the hon. gentleman's health it is not desirable that such heavy work should be placed on any man. When we acceded to office the Department was divided by the sanction of Parliament. The works under my control have increased very largely, as also have canals and railways. Under the previous regime the staff for the building of the Pacific Railway was not considered a portion of the regular staff of the Public Works Department, but now the two engineers of the Government Railways in operation, now form part of the regular staff.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. Minister might have added that some officers formerly on the staff at Miramichi have been transferred here. By this means the hon. Minister was able to say that he had reduced the management of the Intercolonial and that he had not increased the expenses at Ottawa.

18. The Department of Railways and Canals..... $41,270

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Here also there are some increases to be explained, and apparently some promotions or an addition either of a messenger or a clerk. What is the present salary of Mr. Schreiber?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There are several statutory increases, and there were also two promotions. One from a junior second to a senior second, and if my memory serves me, an additional messenger promoted from the Department of Public Works, where he received $17 per month, which was charged against the contingencies of the Department. His age now entitles him to receive $300 a year. The other promotion is from a junior second to a senior second. These with the statutory increases make up the difference.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What is the total amount of Mr. Schreiber's salary?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. $5,500, which includes $1,500 for services in connection with the Pacific Railway.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to know if the Order in Council referred to in the Government note prescribes that this sum is to be paid during the construction of the whole work.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It applies simply to the time when he was engaged superintending the work under contract.

19. Civil Service Board, amount required to cover salaries $600

Mr. CASEY. It was admitted during the discussion last year that there was absolutely nothing to do by this Board, and that admission is backed up by the report of the Civil Service Commission. I would like to know, therefore, why the amount continues to be asked.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Board was constituted and has been continued for years. This is the usual annual vote; but I presume that when the Civil Service Bill is passed the vote will cease.

20. Departmental Contingencies $140,000

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Our hope is that we will be able to reduce the expenditure below that of last year. I may take this opportunity of mentioning that one of the great difficulties with which the Department has to contend is the steadily increasing expenditure for telegraphing through all the Departments. This is an exceedingly difficult question to deal with, because public men and others outside the Department are in the habit of telegraphing frequently what really amounts to a letter, and the Departments are expected to answer. There are many such cases in which communication might as well be had by letter; but I venture to say this is one of the difficulties which hon. gentlemen opposite had to contend with when they were in office, and it largely explains many of the increases.

Mr. BLAKE. My experience is that there is a great disposition to make a wanton use of telegraphing in matters not of the slightest urgency, and which might be dealt with just as well by letter. One cause of it is that people often delay writing, and the result of their procrastination is that long telegrams are sent requiring lengthy answers. It seems to me, however, that this need not continue long if proper remonstrances were made by the officers of the Departments.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The difficulty is that persons outside of the Departments communicate in this way by telegraph.

Mr. BLAKE. But if a person uses the telegraph wantonly in this way, the telegrams should not be paid. I do not see any reason why they should be paid. I think it is extremely improper for them to telegraph in the way the hon. gentleman states, to write a letter by telegraph at their own will and pleasure, at the public expense.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Do the sums put down for contingencies cover cable-despatches.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think so.

Mr. KILLAM. I have been informed that it is impossible to send a telegram, even on urgent public business, without prepaying it. I should like to know if there is a rule in regard to telegrams of this nature, or if it is simply a question of whether the sender is a friend of the Government or of the Opposition.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is no rule laid down as to whether a person sending a telegram is a supporter or an opponent of the Government. If my own friend wanted to send a telegram from Yarmouth on public business it would be taken.

Mr. KILLAM. I am glad to know that; but I have been informed, when I wanted to send a telegram on strictly public business, that no such telegram would be sent without being prepaid, because a rule had been made in the Departments to that effect.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to know whether the speeches and pamphlets of hon. gentlemen opposite, in the interest of the Administration, which have been circulated since we met last year, were charged to the public in these contingencies. Strong objection was made last year in Committee of the Public Accounts to what we regarded as an abuse. We found that speeches of the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), of yourself, Mr. Chairman, Mr. White (Cardwell), and others were printed and circulated at the public expense, and I believe the same practice continues to prevail. Now, it seems to me that this is a very great abuse of the position of hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches; and if they are going to persist in that policy instead of voting an indefinite sum for this purpose, they ought to bring down a specific estimate and state what amount they are going to expend for the circulation of literature in the interest of the Administration.

Mr. BOWELL. I would like to point out to the hon. member for Middlesex, who is always comparing our expenditure with that of 1878, that the contingencies asked for, for 1876 and 1877, were $175,000, while we ask $140,000. In 1878, when they were going to the elections and thought it necessary to make some show of economy, they reduced the estimate to $170,000. I find also that for three or four years they asked $25,000 for contingencies in the Customs Department, and in the last year of their Administration they spent $111,000 while I managed to get along with six or seven thousand dollars.

Mr. MILLS. We expended $825,000 for the whole purposes of Civil Government. The hon. gentleman now demands $975,000 or an increase of $150,000. I submit to the Committee that the actual expenditure is a better criterion of economy than even Estimates. Last year the hon. gentleman expended $915,000, not quite $100,000 over our expenditure.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Let the hon. gentleman go a little further back and he will find the amount expended for contingencies was reduced under the late Administration. In 1873, the amount was $223,802.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. In four months.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). The greater portion of it may have been expended during those four months. But take the year before, for which the late Government cannot be at all held responsible, the amount of contingencies was $170,611, while under the Liberal Government, in 1877-78, it was $158,366, or $21,000 less than in 1872-73. In 1873-74, the departmental expenditure was $823,685; last year it was $915,000; now nearly $1,000,000 is asked for Civil Government.

Mr. CASEY. The contingencies are a very large percentage of the expenditure. The estimated expenditure is $990,000, of which contingencies are $140,000, or nearly 25 per cent. of the annual expenditure. It seems to me a closer estimate should be arrived at.

21. Stationery Office, for stationery $7,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. This is an increase of nearly 30 per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I did not see the balance, to learn the loss on the operations of last year, but the whole account is $78,999. This does not represent a tithe of the whole expense; it is a profit and loss account—in order to meet any loss that may be sustained, for instance, the expenses of the Department. It is supposed this will meet any loss in connection with the operations.

Mr. BLAKE. It practically amounts to this, that the specific charges contained in the Public Accounts, and for the stationery supply, are under the cost of the operation of providing the stationery, by an assumed amount of $5,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. It would be better if the Departments showed what the stationery actually did cost.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They do so as nearly as possible; sometimes the difference is not over $2,000. We might show a profit account by adding a little the other way.

Mr. BLAKE. After an experience of a large number of years in the expenditure of this item, $7,000, it should be possible to come closer than five or six thousand dollars to what the actual amount is.

23. Amount for contingent expenses of the High Commissioner of Canada $1,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Is this for the rent of his house?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. For the rent and to cover all contingencies.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not understand that this covers all contingencies.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not of his office. Instead of keeping the account as it was before, amounting to $5,000, for his house rent, &c., it was proposed he should have received $4,000.

Mr. BLAKE. No. This was contingent upon the original appointment—there was to be given to Sir Alexander Galt, as an allowance for these objects, a fixed sum of $5,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. At first it was accountable by the first vote.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not now accountable, I understand.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is.

Mr. ANGLIN. Are the expenses of the High Commissioner on the trip to Canada and Manitoba, last summer, to be paid by the public.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that this is or is not an accountable allowance?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is and originally was.

25. Dominion Police $12,500

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a decrease this year of $1,000 owing to the force being reduced by two men.

Resolutions ordered to be reported; and (at 3 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 31st March, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 138) to authorize the Canada Co-operative Supply Association (Limited) to issue preferential shares.—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 139) to incorporate the Rapid City Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Bannerman.)

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient further to amend The Pilotage Act, 1873, and the Acts respecting the Montreal Harbor Commissioners and the Trinity House of Quebec, as pilotage authorities under the said Act.

He said: One clause of the proposed Act provides that the pilotage authorities may examine witnesses on oath in case of complaints made against pilots. Another clause provides that any Pilotage Commissioner, in the pilotage districts of Halifax and St. John, who may be absent during twelve months without leave, shall forfeit his office. It also extends the time within which complaints may be made against a pilot. Under the present law a captain is limited to four days, within which he may make complaints, and it is proposed by the Bill to extend the time to one year. It is also proposed that the pilotage authorities may fix the period for which a pilot's license shall be good. These are the principle changes proposed.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me that while it may not be unreasonable to extend the time within which complaints may be made against pilots, still it is a question if the extension may not be an unreasonably long one. It is pretty well known, I believe, that there are a class of investigations in which the evidence is very often extremely contradictory. If a complaint which initiates the investigation may be made within a year the investigation itself may extend beyond the year, and it might be very difficult to obtain all the evidence otherwise available at the end of so long a period. I should be inclined to think that the period of a year would be too long, unless indeed the hon. Minister, who, I know, possesses a special knowledge of these matters, can assign a very good reason derived from practical experience. Of course, I presume, if a complaint is not made during the stay of a vessel in a harbor it cannot be made until the vessel returns, and while a period of one year might not be too long in the case of sailing vessels which go on long voyages, it might be well to allow a shorter time in cases of ordinary steamers and other vessels making a number of trips during the year, and I think it is very desirable that the investigation should take place as soon as possible after the occurrence of the fault, though, at the same time, a reasonable period should be given for investigation in all cases.

Mr. McLELAN. It often happens that a captain may be away at sea for a year, and yet he may have just cause of complaint against a pilot. Again and again, some captain may be in a position to make the complaint, which he would do, as a matter of course, as soon as he arrived at port, but the period of one year is fixed so as to afford an opportunity for captains going on long voyages to make complaint after their return.

Mr. ANGLIN. This is another attempt to pass a measure which was very strongly opposed in this House when it was introduced a year or two ago, by which the pilots of the Dominion would be placed absolutely under the control of the Pilot Commissioners of the various ports. It provides that pilotage certificates, instead of remaining in force during good behavior, shall be renewable annually only at the will of the Commissioners. I believe it is of very great importance that the independency of the pilots as a body should be maintained; that they should not be made mere dependents of the Pilot Commissioners who in most cases in the various cities and towns on the sea-board and great rivers are merchants and shipowners and who desire very much to secure control of the pilots. It is quite sufficient, after a pilot's competency has been ascertained and he has been admitted to practice as a pilot, that he should be held responsible for his conduct in all cases, and the Commissioners should have power, if he has been convicted on sufficient evidence of a serious fault, to suspend him or deprive him of his certificate. Further than that I think we should not go, and the Commissioners should not have any power to control pilots. It is important that pilots should be as respectable men as can be induced to engage in that very perilous business, and it will not conduce to rendering the pilots more respectable as a body than they now are if they are made absolutely dependent on the good will of the Commissioners, as the measure proposed would, I believe, make them.

Mr. McLELAN. In practice it is found that the Commissioners are not shipowners and merchants, but are persons independent of the trade. Some of the ports have pursued the course of fixing the time during which pilots may hold their licenses. In other cases the certificates run until the pilots are sixty-five years of age, then they are renewable yearly. I thought it desirable, on the representation of the pilotage authorities of the different ports, they should have the power to say for what time the licenses should hold good.

Mr. KILLAM. What pilotage authorities made those representations?

Mr. McLELAN. St. John, and I think Halifax also, and, indeed, several ports have made the same representation, that it would assure greater efficiency if they had that power.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand the hon. the Minister will bring down any written representations from pilotage authorities before the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 1.9) further to amend the Pilotage Act, 1873, and the other Acts therein mentioned.

Bill read the first time.

MONTREAL HARBOR COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient further to amend the Acts respecting the Trinity House and Harbor Commissioners of Montreal by enabling the Commissioners to commute the dues on steamers in certain cases, to restrict the use of certain channels of the St. Lawrence to rafts and small craft, to make certain arrangements with railway companies, and to make by-laws for carrying out those provisions.

He said: The object of the resolution is to give the Harbor Commissioners power to commute the harbor dues on grain elevators and on vessels plying within the harbor, and to make regulations reserving the channels provided for large ships in the harbor for the use of those large ships, and compelling the smaller craft, except under stress of weather or circumstances they cannot control, to use the channels that have sufficient water for them. The Commissioners consider that the smaller craft, in using the channels intended for larger vessels, obstruct the navigation of the river, and they propose to make regulations to meet this case, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. They also ask for power to make arrangements with railway companies to extend their lines down to the wharves, and thus to connect with the shipping.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I suppose it is the Harbor Commissioners themselves who are asking for these changes?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman's explanation is in one point in direct contradiction to the terms of the resolution. The resolution stated that the object is "to restrict the use of certain channels of the St. Lawrence to rafts and small craft," but the hon. gentleman states that he wants to restrict the use of certain channels to large craft.

Mr. ANGLIN.

Mr. McLELAN. That is the reason for restricting the small craft to certain channels, in order that other channels may be left to large vessels.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think it would be well if the hon. Minister told us what the present dues on steamers in port are, and in what point it is intended to reduce those dues. I have an impression that I saw some time ago in the Montreal papers a discussion of this question, in which some parties held that small steamers should be specially encouraged to come to the port of Montreal, on the ground that the trade of the port would be promoted, and that probably the decline in the shipment of grain and other articles of produce would thereby be arrested. I think it is doubtful whether such results would be arrived at by the proposed change.

Mr. McLELAN. It is not proposed to deal with the dues on vessels sailing to and from the harbor. The resolution only refers to small craft plying in the harbor.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MACKENZIE. Are there to be any changes made in the schedule of fees in the harbor?

Mr. McLELAN. No.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The hon. gentleman is mistaken; he proposes to commute the fees on steamers.

Mr. McLELAN. The present Act gives power to commute the fees on elevators and other vessels plying in the harbor, and I think the Commissioners have, at present, power to commute the fees on ferry boats. The object is to enlarge that power.

Mr. ANGLIN. The power to make arrangements with railroads may be much more extensive than the wording of the resolution implies. There is one railroad entering the city of Montreal on the east side, which is now intended to be extended to the old Quebec Gate Barracks, and the Grand Trunk enters on the west side running to the Bonaventure station, and I am not aware that there is any means of communication between these two systems of railway, and I think I have seen it stated that it was desirable, perhaps, in the general interests, that some mode of connection should be established. This may be indirectly the means of bringing that about and, perhaps, in a manner that would not be acceptable to the citizens of Montreal, or to the general advantage. We ought to have that whole question very fully stated, and be placed in a position that will enable us to judge for ourselves whether any contemplated mode of connection between those lines will be such as we ought to approve of.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal). I may inform the hon. gentleman that the Grand Trunk and the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental, are already connected at the lower wharf, and at present negotiations are going on between the Harbor Commissioners and the city corporation with the view of having connection established during winter months on the upper level, Commissioner street, because during the winter months the lower level cannot be used owing to the rise of the water. The Harbor Commissioners are anxious to do everything possible to bring about such an arrangement. The proposition is one which generally meets with the approval of the citizens of Montreal, and is in the interest not only of Montreal trade but of the whole country. The Harbor Commissioners require this power in order to deal with this matter and compel the Grand Trunk to give other railways entering the city, traffic facilities over that track with the view of advancing the interests of the port and the city of Montreal.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the object to obtain power to deal compulsorily with the Grand Trunk Company?

Mr. McLELAN. No; it is only for the purpose of making and carrying out arrangements with the several companies, not for the purpose of compelling them to come to any arrangement.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it proposed that this scheme of commuting dues is to be on some general scale applicable to all, or to give the Commissioners power to make arbitrary arrangement, I recollect that some years ago complaints were made of favoritism against the Harbor Commissioners by an elevator and transportation company.

Mr. McLELAN. Anything done will be on some general principle. There was a dispute between an elevator company and the Harbor Commissioners on account of measurement, and the difficulty was settled by the elevator being remeasured.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There was more than that. There was the allegation of Mr. Ingle that the elevators which belonged to a company had privileges given them which were refused to him, that they were afforded accommodation denied him. I do not say there was anything in the complaints, but they were made.

Mr. McLELAN. No complaint of that nature has any bearing on the commuting of dues.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 126) further to amend the Act respecting the Trinity House and the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal.

Bill read the first time.

THE ONTARIO BOUNDARY.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply,

Mr. PLUMB. Before you leave the Chair, Sir, I wish to address the House on a subject which has engaged the attention of the country at large, and is of special interest to the Province to which I belong. It is a question which has been largely discussed in the public prints and in the Ontario Legislature, it was the subject of a voluminous report of a Committee of this House in 1880, and is one of great magnitude and importance both to the Dominion at large and the several Provinces of which the Dominion is composed. The subject is one that concerns the territorial limits of the Province of Ontario and of the Province of Manitoba and of the North-West. Perhaps I cannot better open the discussion upon it than by reading the calm, dispassionate, judicial review of the question which has appeared as a document emanating from this Government through the hon. Secretary of State. In commencing this discussion, I wish to say that, in any remarks I may make, I hope I shall not be led into anything that will look like partizanship, and I hope that when this question comes to be generally debated, hon. members will set aside all party prejudices and treat it with the dispassionate calmness befitting a subject that affects the interests and rights of the whole Dominion and of its greatest Province. The acquisition of vast territories in the North-West entailed new responsibility on this Dominion. It brought about also the consideration of questions which might otherwise have been long held in abeyance. It became necessary to ascertain precisely what were the true boundaries of the Province of which I have the honor to be a representative here. The proceedings of the Government of Canada in reference to the ascertainment of that boundary and its attitude towards Ontario, are succinctly but clearly and forcibly stated in the paper which I shall now have the honor to read to the House. It is dated 22nd January, 1882, and is a reply to a paper which emanated from the Ontario Government bearing date, containing a series of serious charges against the Government of Canada, and an urgent insistence that we should accept the boundary award made by Sir Edward Thornton with his associates on the 3rd day of August, 1878. It reads as follows:—

"2. DESPATCH FROM THE HONORABLE THE SECRETARY OF STATE OF CANADA TO HIS HONOR THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF ONTARIO.

"OTTAWA, 27th January, 1882.

"Sir,—I have the honor to inform you that His Excellency the Governor General has had under his consideration in Council your despatch bearing date the 31st December, 1881, relating to the disputed territory west and north of the Province of Ontario.

"I have now to state for the information of your Government as follows:

"1. The position of His Excellency's advisers has been uniform from the beginning. They have on all occasions been anxious to obtain from the highest tribunal approachable, an authoritative decision of the question in dispute, but have been unwilling, and have considered it inconsistent with their duty to treat the matter as one which might be dealt with by arbitration.

"2. There is a legal boundary between Ontario and the recently acquired North-West Territories; and as representing the various Provinces of the Dominion who have acquired that territory, it is the duty, it is considered, of the Government of the Dominion not to give away any part of it, nor to agree to arbitration upon its boundary, but to ascertain what its legal extent is.

"3. This disposition on the part of His Excellency's advisers was also the conviction of the Government in office at the time the territory was acquired, and for some years afterwards, and the anxiety which is felt now was expressed then by the several Orders in Council which are referred to in your Honor's despatch.

"4. The North-West Territories were acquired in 1870, and on the 9th of April, the 1st of May, and the 17th of November, 1872, the importance of settling the boundary, and of settling it as a question of law, which could be determined by a Judicial Tribunal, was pressed upon the consideration of His Excellency's predecessor, and communicated to the Government of Ontario by the several Orders in Council referred to in your despatch.

"5. Had the proposal then made for the submission of the dispute to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council been accepted by Ontario, the delays and inconveniences alleged in the communication under consideration to have occurred would have been avoided. The matter would long since have been settled by the highest authority in the Empire, and the boundary between Ontario and the then recently acquired North-West Territories authoritatively and finally settled.

"6. His Excellency's advisers believe that it is much to be regretted in the interest of Ontario, as well as of the Dominion at large, that a proposal so reasonable in itself, and which would have brought to the consideration of the legal question involved the most learned and accomplished minds in the Empire, and given every assurance of a speedy and satisfactory decision, and one which would have commanded universal assent, was not accepted by the Government of Ontario.

"7. It does not appear that any response was made by the Government of Ontario to the proposal to submit the question to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

"8. The proposal of 1874 referred to in your despatch, that the question should be referred to arbitration, does not seem to have been treated by either Government as a mode of seeking an authoritative decision upon the question involved as a matter of law, but rather as a means of establishing a conventional line without first ascertaining the true boundary. In corroboration of this view it is to be noted, that of the three gentlemen who made the award referred to in your despatch under the reference of 1872, two were laymen, and only one of the profession of the law.

"9. His Excellency's advisers are of opinion that in advance of Parliamentary sanction, it was not only highly inexpedient, but transcended the power of the Government of the day to refer to arbitration the question of the extent of the North-west Territories acquired by the Dominion by purchase from the Hudson's Bay Company.

"10. That territory had been acquired on behalf of, and was in fact held for, all the Provinces comprised in the Dominion, and the extent of it was a question in regard to which, if a dispute arose, Parliament only could have absolved the Government of the day from the duty of seeking an authoritative determination by the legal tribunals of the country. Such a decision having been once obtained, if it had been found that it promised more to the convenience of Ontario and the adjoining Province that a conventional boundary should be established in lieu of the legal boundary, authority might have been sought from the Legislatures of those Provinces and from the Parliament of the Dominion for the adoption of such a conventional line.

"11. That the course pursued was not intended as a means of seeking a legal boundary is further shown by the course pursued by the Legislature of Ontario, who, under the provision contained in the Imperial Act 34 and 35 Vic., Cap. 38, enabling the Parliament of Canada to increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of a Province, with the assent of its Legislature, passed an Act giving their assent to the limits of their Province being changed by Parliament to meet the award, whatever it might be. The passage of such an Act shows that it was not sought that the true boundary line should be ascertained, but that a conventional one should be laid down.

"12. It must further be observed that a Committee of the House of Commons has reported as follows, viz :—

"In reference to the award made by the arbitrators on the 3rd day of August, 1878, a copy of which is appended (page 2), your Committee are of opinion that it does not describe the true boundaries of Ontario. It seems to your Committee to be inconsistent with any boundary line ever suggested or proposed subsequent to the Treaty of Utrecht (1713). It makes the Provincial boundaries run into territory granted by Royal Charter in 1570 to the Merchants Adventurers of England trading into Hudson Bay, and it cuts through Indian territories which, according to the Act 43 George III., Cap. 138, and 1 and 2 George IV., Cap. 66, formed 'no part of the Province of Lower Canada or Upper Canada, or either of them,' and it carries the boundaries of Ontario within the limits of the former colony of Assiniboia, which was not a part of Upper Canada," showing how unwarrantable it would have been for the Government of the Dominion to have undertaken to ask Parliament to adopt the award as one defining the true boundaries.

"13. On assuming office His Excellency's present advisers found that no authority had been obtained from Parliament for the reference made in 1874 of the dispute to arbitration. They themselves were opposed to that mode of disposing of the question, conceiving it to be inexpedient and lacking in legal authority, and that the duty of the Government was to seek for the disposal of the matter as a question of law.

"14. It is to be borne in mind that when the proposal of the reference to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was suggested, and its expediency enforced by the Dominion Government in 1872, the Supreme Court of Canada had not been brought into existence, and there was therefore no high tribunal other than the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England by which the question in dispute could have been authoritatively settled.

"15. In 1875 the Act creating the Supreme Court was passed by the Parliament of Canada. The British North America Act, 1867, authorizing that Court to be created inter alia for the purpose of dealing with interprovincial constitutional questions, and upon the creation of that Court it would seem to have become the tribunal to which both Federal and Provincial Governments should have resorted for the decision of the question now under discussion.

"16. As in 1872 the Government of the day was anxious to submit the question to the then highest tribunal, so now His Excellency's present advisers would readily consent to use the influence of the Dominion Government with that of Manitoba to offer a submission of the whole question as to the boundary to the Supreme Court of Canada under the 52nd section of the Act of 1875, establishing the Court. They trust with confidence that their exertions with the Government of Manitoba would be attended with success, and that such submission would be agreed to by that Government.

"17. Another method of obtaining an authoritative decision was pointed out to the Attorney-General of Ontario at an interview sought for that purpose with him by Sir John Macdonald and the Minister of Justice, who, on the 21st of November last, proposed to Mr. Mowat, at his office in Toronto, that the Government of the Dominion and that of Ontario should unite in soliciting the good offices of some eminent English law functionary for the purpose of determining the true boundary line. The names of Lord Selbourne, who was then, it was reported, likely to seek relief from the fatigues of his office, and of Lord Cairns were suggested by Sir John Macdonald, who proposed that one or other of these noblemen, or some other distinguished legal functionary, should be invited to come to Canada, to sit in Toronto or elsewhere, for the purpose of hearing the evidence and deciding upon the boundary question, as one of law susceptible of being determined by evidence as other important questions are.

"18. The great advantage in such a submission would be that whilst legal ability and learning of the highest character would be secured for the decision of the question, it would have given both parties the opportunity of submitting such evidence as they might think proper, and the difficulty of agreeing on facts, and settling a case to be submitted to the Privy Council, would have been avoided. Evidence would be heard upon the spot, and the fact of the hearing and the argument of counsel taking place in the country would have tended to command general assent.

"19. This proposition was taken into consideration by Mr. Mowat, and it is only recently that he conveyed to the Minister of Justice his indisposition to accede to that proposal; but it is one which His Excellency's Government is still ready to adopt, if their previous suggestion of a submission to the Supreme Court of Canada should not command the assent of the Government of Ontario.

"20. As regards the assertion in Your Honor's despatch, that the enlargement of the boundaries of Manitoba has complicated the present question, this Government are unable to adopt the view put forth in the despatch. The original confines of Manitoba were very small, and the rapidly augmenting population of that Province had made the fact a ground of continued complaint, and the Local Government had urged upon the Government of the Dominion that the limited extent of their Province paralyzed their efforts in the development of the Province, in the establishment of municipalities, and the creation of means of communication, and otherwise. It was uncertain how long the disputed boundary question might remain open, and His Excellency's Government felt themselves constrained, finally, to recommend the enlargement of the boundaries of Manitoba, but Parliament did so in such a manner, and in such language, as carefully guarded against the steps constituting any interference with the disputed question of the western limits of Ontario.

"21. It is believed that the Government of Manitoba would readily acquiesce in the question of the boundary line being brought for decision either before the Supreme Court of Canada or the high legal functionary, as suggested by Sir John Macdonald and the Minister of Justice, to Mr. Mowat, on the occasion referred to.

"22. His Excellency's advisers look upon the question as one which should be considered rigidly as one of law, on account of the fiduciary character which they hold in regard to the various Provinces of the Dominion, where money was expended in the acquisition of the territory, and who are now largely exerting and taxing themselves for the purpose of constructing a line of railway through it, to which the Government of Ontario (although the railway passes for upwards of 600 miles through its territory) have refused to contribute any aid in land, as has so largely been done out of the North-West Territories by the Dominion.

"23. The Government of the Dominion believe that the interests of the Province of Ontario are considered by the action which they advise as much and as strongly as the interests of any other Province. Their only anxiety is that a legal question in which Ontario is interested by itself, and in which it is interested also as a member of the Confederation, should be disposed of by a legal tribunal.

"24. They heartily wish that the proposal urged by the Dominion Government in 1872 for a submission to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but attribute much of the inconvenience and delay alleged in your despatch to have occurred to the refusal of Ontario to unite in such a submission.

"25. To the arbitration of 1874 His Excellency's Government was unable, for the reasons assigned, to give their adhesion; but with Ontario they believe it to be of the greatest importance that the dispute should be settled; and they will be anxious to further, in every way in their power the submission of the question either to the Supreme Court of Canada or to an eminent legal functionary, to be mutually agreed upon; or if it be referred by the two Provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, although His Excellency's advisers would prefer that it should be decided in Canada, either by the high legal functionary, as suggested, or by the Supreme Court, with the right of applying to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for an appeal to the Queen from any decision that may be arrived at, should either Province desire it.

"26. The question of the title to the land in the disputed territory should not be confused or mixed up with that relating to the boundaries.

"27. The Indians, and the Crown, and those claiming under them, have rights which cannot be decided by the ordinary tribunals of the Province within which the land in dispute may finally be found.

"28. With respect to the timber, of which it is said in Your Honor's despatch that enormous quantities are being cut and removed by trespassers and others, this Government have ascertained that no licenses have been issued to cut timber east of that boundary since the establishment of the Conventional line in 1870. Information regarding all permits, licenses and other transactions would be readily furnished to the Government of Ontario as any time.

"29. The assumption in your despatch that the Conventional boundary terminated on the 3rd August, 1878, the date of the award referred to, seems to be without foundation; but if the Conventional line is to be considered as having been then abrogated, it must be considered as at an end for all purposes, leaving both parties to assert their own rights in reference to all the questions involved.

"30. As regards the Government of the country, and the enforcement of law and order in the meantime, it was intimated to Mr. Mowat, at the interview above referred to, that the Government of the Dominion would be ready to agree to such measures as were necessary to prevent confusion in these important respects. The suggestion was then made that all Justices of the Peace residing in the disputed territory should receive commissions from both Ontario and Manitoba, and that all the Judges of Ontario and all the Judges of Manitoba should be put in a joint commission as regards the disputed territory. The laws of Ontario and Manitoba being alike in most respects, no confusion would probably arise. That in criminal matters the Act 43 Vic., Chap. 36, had made, it was thought, satisfactory provision; or if there was anything deficient, the Government of the Dominion would be ready to supply it. That where there was found to be a practical difference between the laws of Ontario and those of Manitoba, the Government of the Dominion would use its good offices with the Government of Manitoba to induce them to consent that the law to be administered should be that of Ontario, as regards all matters of Provincial jurisdiction, until the legal limits of both Provinces should be finally ascertained.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"J. A. MOUTSEAU,
"Secretary of State."

That, Sir, was the despatch of the Dominion Government sent in reply to a despatch from the Ontario Government, in which the grievances were set forth that are answered in that despatch, and in which it was claimed that the award which was made by the referees was binding both upon the Dominion and upon the Province of Ontario. It will be found by examining the documents that there is no foundation for the assertion that that award was so binding. The Province of Ontario, it is true, before the award was brought in, passed an Act which would have bound them to its acceptance, but it was necessary that proclamation should be made in order to bring the Act into effect. The Dominion Government, I believe, were applied to pass a similar Act, and the Dominion Government, at the head of which at that time was a gentleman who was in political sympathy with the Premier of the Province of Ontario, steadily and persistently refused to be bound by that award, or to pass a similar Act, and that is of itself, as can be proved by reference to the documents a sufficient answer to the question that the award should have been claimed in any degree as binding upon the Dominion of Canada. It is certain that in a dispute which involves an enormous amount of testimony, involves 400 or 500 different documents that are to be examined, involves great historical research, involves close legal examination, it is absolutely necessary, for the satisfaction of the people of Canada, that the decision which shall be arrived at shall be founded on absolute legal evidence and the absolute legal merits of the case. I think it will be found, upon examining the documents, that a legal boundary was not obtained by the gentlemen who composed the Commission that sat in August, 1878. I think it will be found that the voluminous documents which had been prepared were then brought before them, that they sat the first day for only a short time, that they met again, to hear the arguments on the second day and on the third day they gave in their decision. By whom was the case of the Dominion and by whom was the case of Ontario presented? The case of the Dominion, if I am correctly informed, was presented by a gentleman, who, however eminent he may be in his profession, will probably be unknown even by name to most of the hon. gentlemen who sit in this House—Mr. McMahon, then residing in the city of London, Ontario. The case of Ontario was made up by documents which were contained, a large number of them, in a report made by a gentleman of eminent ability, of great powers of research, but a gentleman not belonging to the legal profession—I refer to the late hon. Minister of the Interior; and I think when the report of his argument for Ontario was presented that he was Minister of the Interior for the Dominion, and was representing, or should have represented, the interests of the Dominion. It is upon record in the documents which I hold in my hand, that he received from the Government of Ontario the very handsome honorarium of $4,000 for the preparation of their case, and in that case the hon. gentleman claimed that Ontario could claim to have its boundaries extended to the Rocky Mountains on the west. In fact I am not sure that in stating the case, from his point of view, he might not have extended the boundary of Ontario to the Pacific slope. The statement made by the Deputy Minister of the Interior, Colonel Dennis, which is cited as an argument in favor of the claim which was maintained and is defended by his then superior officer, the late Minister of the Interior, was made by Colonel Dennis while the hon. gentleman had already prepared his statement; it was probably made under the direction of that hon. gentleman, and we cannot suppose that Colonel Dennis, as to whose honor and integrity there can be no question, could have done otherwise than have recorded the views, the wishes and the decision of his chief. Therefore, his part of the argument goes for very little. The argument of the hon. gentleman is a very voluminous one, and it is characterized by all that ingenuity with which that hon. gentleman is known in this House to be able to present his side of the question. But the hon. gentleman was pleading a case, he was a paid advocate, he was hired for the purpose. Whether or not it was proper for that hon. gentleman, either before or after, to have taken an office in which he was the trustee and guardian of the rights of the Dominion in respect to the North-West, remains not for me to say, but remains for others who are acquainted with the circumstances to decide, I will say nothing more about it than that the decisions at which that hon. gentleman arrived, and which have formed, very largely, the basis of the claim which has been made by the Ontario Government, and have been used as a basis for most of the argument which has been presented by the Attorney-General of Ontario, are entitled to just that consideration which should be given to those of an hon. gentleman who was employed to make the most favorable presentation for his employers, and who probably desired to earn his honorarium. Now, Sir, it is perfectly certain to any one who looks at the documents, that there was no absolute and legal western boundary of the Province of Ontario ascertained by that Commission. It is perfectly certain that in drawing the line defining the western boundary they drew a conventional and arbitrary line which did not comprise any particular line that had been claimed in any controversy in respect to boundaries. I can show the House that in running that line the Commissioners trenched upon territory that absolutely never could have been covered by the old Province of Canada or even by the United Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada; I can show that they trenched upon the Province of Assiniboia; that they trenched upon territories which absolutely belonged to the Indian rules or and to which they had unsatisfied rights. I can show by evidence which was taken by the Committee appointed two years ago, and whose report I hold in my hand, that the Colony of Assiniboia was recognized by the Imperial Government. In Hon. Donald A. Smith's evidence I find the following:—

"193. With regard to the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company, I believe that part of the condition on which it was granted was that the Company should establish colonies within the territory which it covered. I believe that in carrying out this condition the Company established a colony called the Colony of Assiniboia. Is not that the case?—It is.

"199. As to whether that colony was recognized by the Imperial Government or not, that is an important question? I believe that on two occasions the Imperial troops were sent out to maintain order in the Territory; is that so?—Yes; that colony was recognized by the Imperial Government, and Her Majesty's troops were sent out there. The 6th Regiment and the Canadian Rifles were there at different times.

"By Mr. Weldon:

"200. At what time was the 6th Regiment there?—I think in 1856, under Colonel Crofton.

"201. And the Canadian Rifles, when?—In 1857 the Canadian Rifles were sent there under Major Seaton, and afterwards under Captain Hibbert. The Home Government also assisted in forming a body of pensioners for service in Red River after that time. Those pensioners were sent out there, and I believe some of them are, at this moment, in the Red River country, although not employed as a force.

"By Mr. De Cosmos:

"202. Who paid the force?—The Imperial Government paid the troops and the company contributed to their sustenance.

"203. Did the Imperial Government also contribute to the expenses of the pensioners?—Not further than their pensions.

"By the Chairman:

"204. The Imperial Government corresponded with the Governors and the Government of the new colony of Assiniboia, I presume?—With the Governors of the Hudson's Bay Company.

"205. Had the Government of that colony courts established and power to administer the law; had it, for instance, the power of life and death?—It had the power of life and death. There was a Council of Assiniboia, and a Recorder who was Judge—Judge Thom.

"By Mr. De Cosmos:

"212. What was the ascertained boundary of the Colony of Assiniboia?—I don't recollect exactly. I should state that I have given no particular attention to this subject for many years past."

The boundaries are given in another part of the evidence and fully sustain my position, and, I dare say, the hon. member for Bothwell was able to explain why it was that the award in question infringed upon the territories both of the Hudson Bay Company, of this colony, and of the Indians of the North-West. He may be able to explain why, in his report, he claimed there was a valid right in Ontario to those properties; but I can tell the hon. gentleman that there is a report in my hands, containing a statement made by Mr. Herman Merrivale, in England, which, I think, has a very important bearing upon that question, and which he may possibly have overlooked. On May 27th, 1878, a memorandum was published which was prepared on 9th June, 1857, in which Mr. Herman Merrivale says :

"That the statements of Hudson Bay Company rights as to the territory, trade, etc., made by them to Earl Grey, on the 13th September, 1849, was submitted to the then law officers of the Crown, who reported that they were of opinion that the rights so claimed by the Company properly belonged to them."

The claim of the Hudson Bay Company thus explicitly acknowledged embraced an area north of the water shed, part of the territory which was included in the award upon which the dispute between Ontario and the Dominion is now going on.

Mr. MILLS. From what is the hon. gentleman reading ?

Mr. PLUMB. I am reading from a despatch. I have a portion of it here. It is a despatch published by the Ontario Government, I think.

An hon. MEMBER. Not much.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman will find it on the 25th and 26th pages if he looks for it. I presume it has escaped his eye. The Parliament of Canada, in declining to accept the award, was actuated by what I believe to have been a deep regard for the interests of the Province of Ontario, as well as of the interests of the Dominion at large. I believe that it could have answered no good purpose for the Parliament of Canada to be forced by any menace, or any threat, or any improper pressure into accepting a decision which was not one that could be defended on strictly legal grounds. I believe, Sir, that all of us here who represent the Province of Ontario are jealous of the rights of our Province; I believe that every one of us who support the Government is quite as desirous of keeping for Ontario anything which may belong to it that we are quite as anxious to protect its rights as any other gentlemen who are in public life or any other people interested in the matter, and I do not believe that we would have been acting in the true interests of that Province if we had hastily accepted, as we were asked and urged to accept, an award which cannot be shown to be based on any legal right—an award which was a conventional award; which fixed a conventional line, and which it is explicitly urged by one of those who made the award surrendered important of claims of Ontario, and did not attempt to define precisely what the rights of that Province were. I say that, for the harmony of this Dominion, for the peace and comfort of its people, there should be no question about the territorial rights of the different Provinces; and I believe that nothing could be more inimical to the true interests of the Province than that an award which was not satisfactory to all parties, to the acceptance of which no Legislation had previously bound it should have been accepted, and which, even under any circumstances, would have created dissatisfaction if it was known that the award was conventional one. We can trust—the whole country can trust—to the patriotism and generosity of the great Province, which is the main factor in the Union of these Provinces if there should be any necessity—after ascertaining the true legal limits of the territories in question to appeal to that Province and ask its aid in the fair and liberal adjustment of any questions in which its rights are concerned. And it is impossible for me to be able to say why upon considerations of justice, considerations of what is due from one Province to another, considerations of what is due to the interests of the whole Dominion, there should have been an undue pressure exercised elsewhere to compel the acceptance of the award by the present Parliament of Canada when the late Government were very careful never to put themselves in the position where they were committed to accept it. The argument that a vote of $15,000 towards defraying the expenses of the reference bound Parliament to accept the decision of the referees forcibly, illustrates the flimsy character of the contention. It was to the credit of the hon. gentleman who led the Government from 1873 to 1878, it was characteristic of the prudence with which he carried on public affairs, that he did not take a leap in the dark, that he did not commit himself to accept the award beforehand; and that hon. gentleman, I believe, if the secret history of the transaction was known, when he was asked to take the same sort of action that was been taken by the Legislative of the Province of Ontario indignantly refused to do so. Sir, if it is proper to refer to what takes place in other legislative bodies beyond our purview, I venture to say that a most exciting discussion has lately occurred, in the Legislature of the Province of Ontario, on this very question—a discussion which was based on certain documents presented to that House by the Attorney-General of the Province—documents upon which it was urged that great injustice had been done to the Province of Ontario. But it is noteworthy that the ex parte statements which were made on that occasion—I wish to speak with all due respect of the discussion, and of the manner in which it was carried on, but I am constrained to say it was noteworthy that ex parte statements were made on that occasion and were made with a heat, with a passion, with a violence that did not at all comport, in my humble judgment, with the magnitude and the dignity of the subject. In that discussion, and other debates which ensued in another place, if I may judge from the newspaper reports, there does not appear to have been manifested an earnest desire to arrive at the truth of the question upon the part of the dominant majority, but it rather looked as if the subject was to be made one of a party character, and that it was to be used for party purposes at a struggle which might then be considered to be impending. I noticed with pain the tone that was adopted in that discussion. I found that when the leader of the majority was asked, in the course of the debates, whether he stood by his menacing assertion that if this award were not accepted he would be in favor of having Ontario retire from the Confederation of these Provinces, he replied: "Well, if the award is not accepted, so much the worse for the Confederation." It seems almost impossible to suppose that language of that kind could have been used in connection with a purely legal question—one which should be removed wholly from the arena of party politics, one which should be judged dispassionately, with the earnest wish on both sides to ascertain exactly what are the rights of the parties concerned. And it always leads one to suspect that there is weakness in a case, when so much passion and so much excitement is exhibited. Sir, my hon. friend the leader of this Government, and those gentlemen who sit with him, are entrusted with the solemn duty of equally maintaining the rights of Canada, and the rights of the several Provinces of this Dominion. It is certain that the newly-cemented Confederation requires delicate handling; it is certain that no man in public life should in any way attempt any course of action which might imperil or weaken the bonds which hold these Provinces together; and I cannot think that there has been any occasion or any excuse in a matter of this character, which is one of judicial consideration, for the violent harangues which have taken place in a public assembly, or for the inflammatory appeals which have been made in the public press; and I trust that the discussion which will arise here will be conducted in a calm and dispassionate tone, which will afford a contrast to the violence of the discussion which has occurred in another place. I believe the Parliament of Canada were fully justified in refusing to accept a conventional line as the western boundary of the Province of Ontario; I believe that if they had accepted it, they would not have been true to the interests of Ontario, or of the Dominion at large; I believe that it is possible to arrive at such a solution of this question as will fully satisfy the most exacting among those who have claimed to be exclusive defenders of the just rights of the Province of Ontario; and, Sir, I cannot conceive that it is patriotic to refuse to accept the propositions which were made by the Dominion Government in regard to the reference of those claims. It is impossible that, either in the Legislature of Ontario or in the Parliament of Canada, a question involving the most laborious research, involving the most careful study, involving the nicest legal acumen and discrimination, involving labor such as cannot be conveniently performed by an assembly like this, can be fairly treated and fairly settled on the floor of either House; it must necessarily be left to the decision of those who can examine and weigh all the evidence. All that Ontario can claim, all that the Dominion can claim, and all that the Province can claim whose eastern boundary is dependent upon the final decision of this question, is that it shall receive the strictest attention of a competent tribunal, and that the exact legal status of all the parties to this issue shall be defined by that tribunal. Sir, I believe there is no gentleman sitting in this House who will not acknowledge when he examines the question that that legal status has not yet been authoritatively ascertained; and if not, it is evident that no award can be satisfactory to all parties to this controversy, and I doubt very much whether the claim, made by the gentlemen who have urged that it was in the interest of Ontario to take this award, is a just one. It looks to me as if there had been thrown into this question an element which should be carefully eliminated from it in this House; it looks as if it had been made, and designedly made, a question which should form part of a political issue; but I believe we owe it to ourselves, not only as the representatives of the Province of Ontario, but as the trustees of the entire Dominion, that we should insist that, before this Parliament consents to an award, it should be based upon a strict legal examination, conducted on strict legal principles. There can be no difficulty, with all the evidence which has been prepared, in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. That the conclusion which was arrived at by the referees was not satisfactory, is evidenced by the vote of this House to appoint a Committee to report upon the case, and by the conclusions of that able report and their adoption here; and, under these circumstances, it would be impossible for the Government of the day, no matter upon what considerations, to have accepted that award—an award which the late Government was very careful not to commit itself to accept. I can remember that, not very long ago, an argument was made use of in this House, in respect to a solemn agreement entered into by the Government, with the consent of the Governor General, and brought before this House, that the act of the Governor in Council had no sort of weight, and should have no sort of weight, in influencing Parliament to ratify the agreement. It was argued by an hon. gentleman who sits opposite that we should not be bound by any such considerations; and that hon. gentleman went so far as to say to those whom he was anxious to persuade to take the same view as himself, that, if the engagement was repudiated by this House, he, for his part, would take no advantage of the defeat of the Government, and that, Sir, should be, with the supporters of the hon. gentleman, a strong argument in favor of the position which I have endeavored feebly to lay before the House. I believe that the Province of Ontario wishes to obtain nothing more than her just rights. I believe that Province is true to the Union into which she has solemnly entered, and I believe, also, that it is in the interest of the whole of this great community that a speedy means should be found for arriving at the final and just conclusion, in respect to those rights which is pressed upon us by the rapid growth and increase of the great North-West. It was stated, in support of the view, that the Hudson Bay Company had only a shadowy claim over the North-West; that the rights of that Company were sold for but one-fifth of the sum which the American Government paid for Alaska. If that means anything, it means that my hon. friend the First Minister made a negotiation of such value to the country, made such an advantageous bargain for the country, that the bargain of the United States with Russia could not for a moment be compared to it. It shows that the hon. gentleman negotiated so successfully for the interests of the country, that he has obtained for us a territory the value of which is absolutely incalculable, by the payment of £300,000 to the Hudson Bay Company, and I am very glad that the important admission stands on record in the documents of the Attorney-General of Ontario now before us. But it is no argument with regard to what the territorial rights of that Company were—it is entirely beside the question—because the arrangement between the United States and Russia for the purchase of Alaska, was for a special political object, and the amount paid was absurdly great, and was ridiculed throughout the United States when the character of that ice-bound, desolate, uninhabitable territory became known. I believe nothing could be worse than to attempt to force this House, in the present condition of the controversy so persistently and angrily forced upon us, to assume the momentous responsibility of deciding upon the question involved in that award. I believe that it would be impolitic in the highest degree to ask this House to decide that it would be proper for it to take an arbitrary boundary line, which is only a compromise without foundation or legal evidence, and assume that as a final settlement of the question. I think it has got to rest on a much stronger basis. I think that, in view of the grave considerations which would be involved—of the dangerous dissatisfaction that would be felt both by the Province itself and by the Dominion at large, if that question were settled in the way in which the award proposed to settle it, that it would be most desirable that the House should adopt some other method of endeavoring to reach the Government of Ontario, and of endeavoring to put this question to rest. I believe that on this side of the House there is an earnest desire to have this question definitively closed. I do not believe that there ever has been the slightest intention to delay it. I think that nothing could have been in worse taste, nothing could have been more improper than the assertion which has been made from time to time, that my hon. friend the First Minister has delayed or dallied with it at the instigation of his supporters in a sister Province—has played with this question, because, forsooth, he means to revenge himself on the Province of Ontario, a Province that has sent to the support of that hon. gentleman sixty-four Conservatives to represent it in the Councils of Parliament. I do not think the hon. gentleman feels very much like revenging himself upon the Province for giving him such a noble backing; and I venture to say that he will have an equally good support in Ontario if he appeals to the country again, whether this question is kept in abeyance, as a political element, or whether it is settled, as I trust it may be, by the acceptance by this House of a resolution which I am about to propose, and by the acceptance, by the Ontario Government, of the terms which are offered to it in that resolution: I move

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved,—That in the opinion of this House it is expedient that the western and northern boundaries of the Province of Ontario should be finally settled by a reference to, and an authoritative decision by, either the Supreme Court of Canada, or the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Great Britain, or by the Supreme Court in the first place, subject to a final submission to the Judicial Committee as the Province of Ontario may choose; that such decision should be obtained either on appeal in a friendly action brought for the purpose, or by reference to the said courts, or either, or both of them, by Her Majesty, under the powers conferred upon her by the Imperial and Canadian Parliaments, as the Government of Ontario may prefer, and that the said reference should be based on the evidence collected and printed with any additional documentary evidence—if such there is—and that pending the reference the administration of the lands shall be entrusted to a Joint Commission appointed by the Governments of Canada and Ontario.

I think, Sir, that in dealing with this question we must not forget that we of Ontario are the representatives of a great Province that can well afford to be generous, that we are else the representatives of the whole country, and that by sinking sectional issues and provincial differences and jealousies, we can best promote the peace, harmony and prosperity of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE. One thing which strikes me as very remarkable in this matter is that last year the Government, instead of dealing with the matter themselves, put up one of their supporters to move for a Committee and have a so-called investigation into this matter. Now, their man-of-all-work, the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), is put up to make this motion in order, apparently, to relieve hon. Ministers from doing that which naturally devolves upon themselves. The hon. gentleman, in moving his motion, was kind enough to compliment me upon a supposed intention of mine, and he was good enough to say that he had no doubt, if all could be revealed that had taken place behind the scenes, I would be found to have taken strong ground indeed against any preliminary action by this Parliament. Sir, I was called upon as a member of the Government of Ontario, in 1872, to deal with this subject, while Chief of the Government, the hon. member for West Durham being absent in England, and an arrangement was made by which we obtained the services of Mr. Mills, the present hon. member for Bothwell in this House, to go to Washington to search for maps, papers and documents relating to the boundary question. I was somewhat surprised, if not pained, that the hon. member for Niagara should have alluded to this in terms which are not respectful towards my hon. friend for Bothwell. Every one who knows that hon. gentleman knows that he is quite incapable of engaging in any service of that kind for the sordid reasons ascribed to him by the hon. member. He rendered services that were of great value; he spent months in the research he was engaged in, besides doing a great amount of literary labor in preparing the documents which he had procured during his visit to the Washington libraries. Instead of reflecting upon that hon. gentleman, every member in this House, as well as in the Ontario Legislature, is under great obligations to him for the services he rendered in this boundary matter. But, Sir, it is assumed that I was hostile to making good the award of the arbitrators selected, and stress is laid upon the fact that I did not take any action to secure the assent of the Legislature to that award of theirs. Well, it would have been somewhat difficult for me to do that, as I had no Session of Parliament at my command after the arbitrators had made their award. The hon. gentleman seems to think the award was made before the last Session of Parliament during which I held office.

Mr. PLUMB. I knew it was not.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Of course, the hon. gentleman must have known it if he had thought for a moment. How could I have ratified the award by legislation if I had no control of the House? The hon. First Minister knows very well I was prepared to assist him to give effect to that award if he chose to bring in a measure to do so. I never dreamed for a moment—whether I had succeeded again in controlling the legislation of the country or not—I did not believe that any Government would have dared to avoid giving effect to any arbitration solemnly entered into between the two Governments. Such action was wholly unprecedented. I can only tell the hon. member for Niagara that if I had been fortunate enough, or those who acted with me had been fortunate enough, to control the present Parliament, not one Session would have passed over without having that award properly ratified. Now I cannot conceive anything that is more dishonorable in a Government—in a political sense, of course, I mean—than to refuse to ratify the solemn engagements entered into by their predecessors. What would be thought of Great Britain if she had acted in that way regarding the Geneva arbitration as to the Alabama claims? There was not an Englishman of average intelligence, no legal man in England probably, who did not believe that the award of that arbitration was an unjust one; that to give the sum of $15,000,000 to pay for the depredations of the Alabama was an outrage upon the very evidence submitted to them. But Great Britain never hesitated a moment to pay over the award according to the agreement made before the arbitrators commenced their investigations. So, similarly, did Great Britain believe, and we all believed, that the decision of the German Emperor with regard to the San Juan boundary in the far West was not according to the treaties that existed or according to the evidence submitted. But who dreamed of refusing to ratify that award on that ground? Would it not, in an independent nation, be a cause of war, if the Government of Great Britain had refused to ratify either award? But the hon. gentleman now at the head of the Government, and his colleagues, seem to think that it is perfectly right and just to repudiate the action of their predecessors in the solemn engagements they entered into with the Government of Ontario, in order to settle a question which the hon. gentleman kept unsettled for many years, as he does other very important matters, hoping that they may in some way or other inure to his own benefit in a political sense. Such were the views I held. But the hon. gentleman, following his leader, refers to the counsel employed. The hon. First Minister was unkind enough, and I think uncandid enough, to say that we gave away the case of the Dominion by not employing a more competent gentleman than Mr. McMahon. Now, Sir, we must remember this with regard to counsel, that the present Judge Armour was first employed by the Dominion Government, that he spent months in making investigations at the expense of the Dominion Government, that the present Administration have paid him $2,000 for those services; and the first thing that was done with Mr. McMahon was to place him in communication with Mr. Armour and obtain from that gentleman the result of his enquiries. Mr. McMahon is a man of very great ability, whatever may be the opinion of the member for Niagara and the hon. First Minister. He had associated with him a young and promising lawyer of Montreal, Mr. Monk, and I have no hesitation in saying that they performed their work well. I have no reason to doubt that every exertion was made to place the case of the Dominion in the best possible light before the arbitrators chosen. Now, no objection has been taken to the names of the gentlemen selected for that purpose. The selection was that of Mr. Richards, then Chief Justice of Ontario, Judge Wilmot, the late Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, and the English Minister at Washington. Justice Wilmot, after spending considerable time on the subject, died suddenly, and we were deprived of his valuable services by his untimely death. When Mr. Richards became Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada he ceased of course to act for the Ontario Government, and Chief Justice Harrison, a gentleman whom we all remember as a very distinguished lawyer and a popular and prominent member of this House for some Sessions, was selected to take his place. They both agreed, as did the two Governments, upon selecting again Sir Edward Thornton, British Minister at Washington. No three men could probably be found better qualified than were they to discharge those duties. After Justice Wilmot's death we had to select some one who was not associated pecuniarily with Ontario interests. Our selection fell upon Sir Francis Hincks, who had long been Prime Minister of this country, who occupied an independent position as regards political views and parties, and who, at all events, was not believed to be friendly to us politically, though I have no reason to think Sir Francis Hincks had any very strong political opinions that would make him take a prejudiced view of any question on that account. Those were the three men who met here, as the hon. member for Niagara has been careful to point out, and spent two or three days in hearing the case. He assumes that this time was all that was given by the three arbitrators to the discussion of the subject, or to exchanging views, or to studying the question for themselves. The fact is, however, Sir Edward Thornton had all the documents that could be sent to him—that of Judge Ramsay, Mr. Mills, Mr. Lindsay, and all other documents—for years indeed, as had the other arbitrators, and there is no doubt whatever after perusing the books and documents sent there, they came to a conclusion on the subject. They had counsel, as they were bound to do, in order to see whether their arguments would affect their decision in their own minds before that time. These being the facts of the case, what reason is there for the Government refusing to give effect to the conclusions they reached. I can only say that I look upon it as a wilful violation of Government rights, of the rights of Ontario, and of the obligations which should exist between a Government and its predecessor in its management of public affairs. Every obligation of that kind should be held to be as sacred as an obligation between individuals. As the Government of Ontario seem determined to resist the spoliation of the Province, they were dealt with in severe terms by the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). They are bound to defend their own Province and their own territory, and they are bound as guardians of that territory to keep the peace and to prevent interlopers from entering upon and taking possession of the property. The attempt to prove that Ontario is generous is needless, as everybody knows the generosity of that great Province. Every one knows the burden that Ontario bears to maintain the Dominion Government. Why should Ontario be called upon to do more than that and give up territory to the Dominion, territory which hon. gentlemen opposite claimed themselves twenty years ago and more, to belong to the Province of Ontario; that is to say, they claimed it belonged to United Canada, and whatever belonged to Canada then belongs to Ontario now? But the reasons which actuated the leader of the Government are to my mind utterly inexplicable. The hon. gentleman has not yet deigned to give those reasons to the House, he has not ventured to defend his conduct in refusing to give effect to the award consequent upon the arbitration entered into by the two Governments, and I cannot believe that on the motion of the hon. member for Niagara he hopes to obtain the sanction of the people of Ontario to one of the most gross acts of injustice which has ever been perpetrated in the history of this or any other country. The hon. leader of the Government on a former occasion stated, as indeed he did in a written document some years ago, that he objected to settle the question by arbitration. I give him credit for having taken that ground quite early, and if he had adhered to that contention his position at the present time would have been somewhat stronger. But having entered into an arbitration in which the British Minister at Washington, the Chief Justice of Ontario and a former Premier of Canada were the arbitrators, he now refuses to acknowledge that arbitration on the ground that it should not be settled by arbitration. The hon. gentleman has proposed to the Ontario Government to leave the question to the arbitration of one Englishman, but he would not acknowledge the award of three of the most distinguished men on this continent.

Mr. IVES. The question before the House is one of such great importance that I consider we should all approach its discussion in as near a judicial spirit as it is possible for members of Parliament ever to assume. I do not think that it is necessary or desirable, while we are discussing the resolutions before the Chair, to advert to the fact that this may be made a political question, or that political capital may be made out of it, with advantage to one party or the other; but we should rather approach the consideration of the propositions contained in the motion with a view to determining in a judicial capacity whether those propositions are fair, reasonable and just, and such as are calculated to settle the difficulty which has arisen between the Governments of Ontario and the Dominion. I am aware that in rising to follow the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), I am laying myself open to a taunt similar to that which was applied to the hon. member for Niagara, who introduced the resolution. But, Sir, as this question is a legal question—as it is almost entirely a legal question, as its just determination depends almost entirely on a right understanding of the legal questions which are presented, I think that perhaps it is as well that I should speak at this stage, and discuss those legal questions, as I understand them, as at any other stage of the debate. I promise you that I shall not detain the House very long, and I shall confine myself almost entirely to what I consider to be the legal questions presented in this case. The first question which arose in my mind when I began to study this subject, was this: Did a legal boundary separating Ontario from the North-West Territory of Canada exist—a legal fixed boundary—at the time of the reference of this question to arbitrators, and if such a boundary did exist, where was it? Now, Sir, it has been generally admitted, in fact, I have not heard it denied in the public press, or in the voluminous discussions that have taken place between the two Governments, that a legal boundary actually existed at that time. There has been a good deal of discussion as to the legal interpretation of the clause of the statute which makes that boundary, but I have not heard it denied, nor do I think it will be denied in the House during this discussion, that a legal boundary existed both to the west and to the north of the Province of Ontario in 1874 when this question was referred to arbitration. Now, where was that boundary, and by what statute or enactment was it fixed and determined? That boundary was fixed by the Imperial Act of 1774, commonly known as the Quebec Act—an Act passed to determine the boundaries of the new Province which was then constituted by the Imperial Parliament—namely the Province of Quebec. That Act, an extract from which is to be found in the report of the Boundary Committee appointed by this House, describes the boundaries of the new Province then created, and, as I said before, it is not denied that it then fixed the bounds—completely fixed the bounds of the Province of Quebec then constituted, and the only dispute is as to the correct understanding of what those bounds are. Now, Sir, if we refer to that Act we find the following description, and as it is very important that we should understand the starting point or the basis of this discussion, I shall take the liberty of quoting it. It is to be found on page 15 of the report:

“That all the territories, islands and countries in North America, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the River St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty-five degrees northern latitude, on the eastern bank of the River Connecticut, keeping the same latitude directly west, through the Lake Champlain, until, in the same latitude, it meets the River St. Lawrence; from thence up the eastern bank of the said river to the Lake Ontario; thence through the Lake Ontario and the river commonly called Niagara; and thence along by the eastern and the south-eastern bank of Lake Erie, following the said bank until the same shall be intersected by the northern boundary granted by the charter of the Province of Pennsylvania, in case the same shall be so intersected; and from thence along the said northern and western boundaries of the said Province, until the said western boundary strikes the Ohio; but in case the said bank of the said lake shall not be found to be so intersected, then following the said bank until it shall arrive at that point of the said bank which shall be nearest to the north-western angle of the said Province of Pennsylvania; and thence by a right line, to the said north-western angle of the said Province; and thence along the western boundary of the said Province until it strikes the River Ohio; and along the bank of the said river, westward to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England, trading to Hudson's Bay.”

The dispute which has arisen in this matter is more particularly confined to what is the western boundary of the old Province of Quebec, as stated in this Act of 1774, and the northern boundary of that Province. Now, as to the western boundary, as the House will at once perceive, everything depends upon the interpretation which is given the word "northward," which occurs in this description. After you have reached the point of junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and when you commence to form the boundary by proceeding northward, you will perceive that the only word used is "northward." It has been contended on the one hand, that "northward" means due north until a line produced due north intersects the southern boundary of the Hudson Bay Territory. It is contended, on the other hand, that "northward" does not mean due north, but that the words in this description should have been, and were intended to be, "northward along the bank of the Mississippi River." Now, Sir, there are two questions to be considered right here. The first is, the legal interpretation of the word "northward," and the next is, whether there is anything to indicate what was the intention of the Imperial Legislature at the time this Act was passed. I have no hesitation in saying, and I fancy all the legal hon. gentlemen in the House will agree with me, and not only the legal gentlemen but hon. gentlemen acquainted with boundary lines—surveyors, engineers, and scientific men of that description—that the legal interpretation of that word "northward," when occurring in a description like this, or a deed of sale, or other similar document, when used in unqualified or unlimited sense, means due north, and nothing else. And I venture to say that the expression "northward," in this connection, or in a deed of sale, unlimited and unqualified, is as definite, scientifically speaking, as the words "due north," because northward unlimited can mean nothing but due north. There is precisely the same probability of one angle to the right or left of due north being the meaning as any other. For instance, if we urged that northward meant a degree west of north it might with the same force be urged to mean a degree east of north, and if you were to take any one of the 45 degrees to the east or west of due north you would find precisely as strong probabilities in favor of one degree or one direction as you would find in favor of any other, and, therefore, scientifically speaking, "northward" means due north and nothing else, and it can mean nothing else, where it occurs without being qualified or limited. Of course, there are a variety of ways of limiting the meaning of that word; if it had said northward to a certain point which was east or west of north, that would have effectually limited the word northward; if it had said "northward" along a certain line, or a certain shore, or a certain river, then these words would have limited the meaning of the word "northward," and it would have been easy to conceive that northward was not due north; but as it stands in this connection, under no limitation whatever, I hold that it means due north or it means nothing; and I undertake to say that there is as much definiteness and positiveness, scientifically speaking, in the expression northward as in the expression due north, the only difference being that one may be limited and qualified, and the other may not. Then, Sir, looking at this description from a legal point of view, giving a legal interpretation to the word, giving the interpretation to it that would be given by a bench of judges if they were deciding upon a question of title or a question of boundary, I say the meaning of this description is due northward from the point of junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers—a line produced until it intercepts the southern boundary of Hudson Bay. But it is urged that, although legally and technically speaking this description means a line due north, there is evidence that something else was the intention of the Imperial Parliament—that what they intended was northward along the bank of the Mississippi River. Now, we have to enquire, in the first place, what was the object which Parliament had in view in passing this law—in creating this new Province. The object was, as we gather from the debate at the time, to create a new Province, a Territory which should include within its limits the bulk of His Majesty's French subjects. These people were scattered along the shores of the St. Lawrence River, and were settled in the central part of what is now the State of Illinois, and the plain object of the Parliament of Great Britain, in creating this new Province, was to separate the English colonists of New England from the French colonists of the north and west. Now, let us enquire whether a line drawn due north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers would as well accomplish such an object as a line running along the bank of the Mississippi. We find from history and from the location of settlement in Illinois, that it would. Then, Sir, when we are discussing intention, and when we find that intention is opposed to the strict wording of the description, it is fair to look into the description and enquire whether there is anything loose or careless about this description. If you look into it, you will find that far from there being any looseness or carelessness in its wording, it is worded with the very greatest precision; in several places you will find a line limited as it is said it was the intention of Parliament to limit the western boundary; you will find that it speaks of a line along a watershed, a line along a parallel of latitude, a line brought to the east side of a certain river, distinguishing between the east side and the west side, a line brought to a certain side of a lake, and you will find that when the Ohio is reached and it is proposed to proceed westward, the description is westward along the Ohio River; and I ask, after such great care has been taken in other parts of the description, how can it be argued that there was any looseness or carelessness in the last clause, which fixes the western boundary of the Province. Not, only, Sir, was there care used, but there was extraordinary care used. An amendment was moved by Mr. Burke during the discussion in the House of Commons, as representing William Penn and the Province of Pennsylvania, and his amendment was incorporated with the Act; and the greatest care was taken that the description should accurately describe what was intended to be included in this new Province. But, Sir, there is a reason, and a very strong reason, why Parliament should have adopted a meridian line rather than the course of the Mississippi River; for a very large part of it, was then unknown. If you will go into the lobby which leads to the library, you will find an old map of New France, dated about that time or a short time before, in which the rise of the Mississippi is marked as being very near to the western extremity of Lake Superior, and hon. gentlemen who claim that the boundary should be where the award places it, should surely be bound by what was then believed to be the source of the Mississippi River. There was the greatest uncertainty of the position of lakes and the course of rivers west of Lake Erie, and there was therefore the strongest reason why Parliament should have adopted a parallel of longitude rather than the course of a river when the course of that river was imperfectly known. But, Sir, if the course of the Mississippi River had really been adopted as the boundary, it would have been an incomplete description, because the Mississippi River came very far short of rising as far north as the southern line of the Hudson Bay territory, and there would have been a hiatus in the description. In the later part of its course, the Mississippi River runs for about forty miles due west; and if Parliament had taken that river as the boundary, when it approached the head of the river they would have found it turning off at an angle to the west, and there would have been no certainty where it would have gone. Therefore I argue that, whether you consider the legal meaning of the word, whether you consider what may be gathered from the intention of the Legislature which passed this law, or whether you consider the remaining portions of the description, from whatever point of view you look at, you must come to the conclusion that the true boundary of the Province of Quebec as constituted by the Imperial Act of 1774, was a line produced due northwards from the point of junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers to a point where it touched the southern boundary of the Hudson Bay territory. This matter has already been before the Courts of this country. It has been formally decided in the sense in which I argue by the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Quebec, held at the city of Quebec, in a criminal trial of murder—a trial of very great importance held years ago, at a period when our publicists and jurists were better acquainted with questions of this kind than they are to-day, and it was decided by no less able and distinguished a Court than one presided over by the late Chief Justice Sewell. In that case a murder had been committed, known as the de Reinhardt murder, at a place near Lake Winnipeg. The accused being tried at Quebec under an Imperial Act which has given the Courts of the Province of Quebec jurisdiction over the Indian territories forming part of British America. The plea of the prisoner's counsel was want of jurisdiction on the ground that the crime had been committed in the Province of Upper Canada, as it was then called, and that the boundaries of Upper Canada included this territory. The question was brought fairly and squarely before the Court, and the decision of Chief Justice Sewell and his associates was that this point which, by the present award, is included within the Province of Ontario was not within that Province, but was in the Indian or unorganized territories of Canada. We have, therefore, a judicial decision of the most careful and painstaking and reliable character that this point which is included within the present award is not within the Province of Ontario. I will not trouble the House with the reading of this decision. It is to be found in the records of the Committee of this House which had this matter in charge. But I would like to add that, so far as I can gather from this volume, the weight of authority is entirely with the view that the boundary of old Upper Canada was where I fix it, namely, a line drawn due north from the junction of these two rivers. Thus we have in favor of our contention the strict legal meaning of the word; we have in our favor probabilities that can be gathered from the other parts of the description; we have with us the fact that the Mississippi River would have been an uncertain and an improper boundary, and the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench of Quebec and the weight of all the scientific authorities which have been examined in this case as witnesses is with us. Therefore, I think I am safe in taking as my starting point the fact that the western boundary of the old Province of Upper Canada was fixed by the Act of 1774, and that it was a line due north from the junction of those two rivers.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 6) to amend and extend the Act to empower the Stadacona Fire and Life Insurance Company to relinquish their Charter, and to provide for the winding up of their affairs.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

Bill (No. 41) to incorporate the Tecumseh Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Macmillan.)

Bill (No. 90) to incorporate the Ocean Mutual Marine Insurance Company.—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 23) respecting the Exchange Bank of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia.—(Mr. Killam.)

BOUNDARIES OF ONTARIO.

House resumed the consideration of Mr. Plumb's proposed amendment to Sir Leonard Tilley's motion for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. IVES. With regard to the northern boundary of the Province of Quebec, as determined in 1774, there has been but little contention. And I do not propose to occupy much time in discussing that question, or arguing that that boundary is the watershed which divides the waters flowing south into the great lakes and the St. Lawrence, from those flowing north into the Hudson's Bay. I am inclined the more to deal thus briefly with this part of the case because in one of the resolutions of the Ontario Legislature, passed at Toronto during last Session, on March 9th, it is stated that it is on the westerly side of this Province, independent of the award, the title of Ontario to the territory is most clear, and the territory is most valuable, and so on—admitting that the title to that part of the territory which is covered by the award, north of what the Dominion contend is the true boundary, is still weaker than their title to the western part of the territory. The original concession by the Crown to the Hudson Bay Company, which was prior to the organization of the Province of Quebec, and which fixed as the southern limit of that territory the watershed, which I have mentioned, dividing the waters flowing south from those flowing north, is my authority for saying that the northern boundary of Ontario, or the Province of Quebec, was that line. Having disposed of the questions as to the western and northerly boundaries, the next important matter, to my mind, to consider is the question as to when and how those boundaries as established in 1774 have been modified or changed. Of course they were changed by the treaty between Great Britain and the United States in 1783. The results of the War of the Revolution led the Imperial Government to cede to the United States not only that portion of the territory which was occupied by the thirteen colonies, but also a very considerable territory to the west of the then settled part of what is now the United States. Hon. members will find on page 17 of the Report of the Committee on Ontario Boundaries a description of the southern line of British America, and the northern line of the United States, as settled by the Treaty of Paris. This new boundary, of course, deprived the Province of Quebec, as constituted in 1774, of all the territory south of the great lakes. The description in the Treaty of Paris reads as follows:—

"From the north-west angle of Nova Scotia, viz., that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north, from the source of the St. Croix River to the highlands, along the highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the River St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the north-westernmost head of Connecticut River; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; from thence by a line due west on said latitude until it strikes the River Iroquois or Cataraguy; thence along the middle of said river into Lake Ontario, through the middle of said lake until it strikes the communication by water between that lake and Lake Erie; thence along the middle of said communication into Lake Erie; through the middle of said lake, until it arrives at the water communication between that lake and Lake Huron; thence along the middle of said water communication into Lake Huron; thence through the middle of said lake to the water communication between that lake and Lake Superior; thence through Lake Superior, northward of the isles Royal and Philippeaux, to Long Lake."

I understand that to be Rainy Lake.

"Thence through the middle of said Long Lake, and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the said Lake of the Woods; thence through the said lake to the most north-western point thereof, and from thence on a due west course to the River Mississippi."

Allow me to remark here, before passing on with my argument, upon the ignorance not only on the part of the Imperial authorities, but on the part of the American colonies with respect to the geography of that country as late as 1783; because you will observe that a line produced due west from the North-West Angle of the Lake of the Woods, would not come within 150 miles of the Mississippi River, and would pass 150 miles, certainly more than 100 miles, north of the sources of the Mississippi, the House will therefore see how much reliance is to be placed upon descriptions and titles as derived from descriptions when the parties furnishing the descriptions had such little knowledge of the physical features of the country to which they were referring. This treaty cut off, as I have said before, a very large portion of that territory which had been conceded to the Province of Quebec. Another change which was made was the division in 1791 by Imperial Statute of the Province of Quebec into the two Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. That division commenced near Montreal, and it is described by lines, parallels of latitude and degrees until it reaches the Ottawa River. It then follows the Ottawa River to Lake Temiscamingue, and then the description continues, as if there were doubt whether Lake Temiscamingue was sufficiently far north or not, in this way: by a line produced due north from Lake Temiscamingue to Hudson's Bay.

Mr. DAWSON. To the boundary line of Hudson's Bay?

Mr. IVES. To Hudson's Bay, or the boundary line of Hudson's Bay, as it is stated in some descriptions.

Mr. DAWSON. In the later descriptions?

Mr. IVES. I am unable to find, in the course of my reading of this correspondence and of the report, any title to territory beyond the watershed, except these descriptions which mention a line produced north from Lake Temiscamingue to Hudson's Bay or to the line of the Hudson's Bay territory. What would you think of a farmer who claimed all of the land on one side of a concession line simply because one of his boundaries was on the concession. In such a case would it be said that a line produced so as to go altogether beyond the boundaries of the farmer's land would give him a title to land all along the concession line? I repeat again—and I am sure if there is anything more we shall hear from the other side on this point—I have failed to find any excuse for the Province of Ontario, claiming that their territory runs north of the height of land, except the fact that in the descriptions of the boundary dividing Ontario from Quebec it mentions a line from Lake Temiscamingue produced north to Hudson's Bay. I say that they had no more right to claim a territory of that kind than a farmer would have to claim a territory because a concession bounded one end of his land. These, Sir, are the changes which have been made, so far as I can discover, in the boundaries of this territory. In fact the only change which really affects the magnitude of Quebec as constituted in 1774, was the Treaty of Paris which cut off the southern part of the Province and gave it to the United States of America. But hon. gentlemen mention certain Royal Commissions from His Majesty to various Colonial Governors, and they refer to the descriptions of territory which are found in these Royal Commissions. The first of these Commissions bears date in 1774, only a short time after the passing of the Quebec Act. That description, I am free to admit, while it follows the description found in the Quebec Act until you reach the point of junction between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, then varies from the description in that Act, and says: "Thence northward along the Mississippi River to the territory of the Hudson Bay." Now, I would ask whether it can be conceded that as late as the last quarter of the 18th century that the King, by virtue of his prerogative alone, could extend or alter the boundaries of a Province which had been recently fixed by Imperial Act of Parliament to which he had assented. But, Sir, without stopping to discuss that proposition, I would ask hon. gentlemen—I would ask you, Sir—whether there is anything in the reading of this Commission out of which can be gathered the intention to increase or enlarge the boundaries of the Province of Quebec. The only possible thing that can be made out of this Commission of 1774 to Sir Guy Carlton is this: It may be said, and very fairly said, that it is proof that it was the intention of Parliament when they passed the Act, to make the Mississippi River the boundary. That may be argued, and I am free to admit it is a fair argument, and it is about the only confirmation of the statement that such was the intention of Parliament. But it should not be forgotten that the functionaries who drew the Royal Commission—the functionaries who varied the description in drawing Sir Guy Carleton's Commission—were not the same parties who passed the Act of Parliament. The Imperial House of Commons passed the Act of Parliament. It was a matter which was debated and discussed by the persons interested; it was a matter with reference to the description upon which Mr. Burke moved an amendment which was adopted, while, Sir, the Royal Commission was drawn by the King himself, or by his Ministers and not by the same functionaries who had passed the Act. Now, Sir, if it had been the Imperial Parliament which had adopted this form of description, which was used in the Commission, it might be fairly urged that they intended in the Act to have followed the Mississippi River, but how can it be fairly argued that they are bound by a description which was adopted by other persons over whom they had no control. But there is an inconsistency here. The same hon. gentlemen who urge that this is confirmation of their statement that the Mississippi River was intended as the western boundary will urge that the confines or boundaries of the Province are extended by virtue of that same Royal Commission and other Royal Commissions. Now, it cannot be said that it is both a confirmation of the view that the original boundary was the Mississippi River and also that it extended the boundaries from a line due north of the Mississippi River. The hon. gentleman must stand by either one or other understanding of these Royal Commissions. If these Royal Commissions per se altered the boundaries of the Province, then certainly they cannot be referred to as a confirmation of the original intention of the Statute of 1774. I cannot, for my part, see why it was impossible that the Government of England—the Imperial authorities—should have seen fit to have enlarged the jurisdiction of Sir Guy Carleton beyond the Province of Quebec. The whole territory then, west of the Mississippi River—west of a line drawn due north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers was territory claimed by England, and the Imperial authorities might have thought best, while giving Sir Guy Carleton jurisdiction over the Province of Quebec, to have extended that jurisdiction to the Mississippi River. We next come, Sir, to the Royal Commission of the year 1786—the new Commission issued to Sir Guy Carleton after the Treaty of Paris. In this Commission the description follows the description of the Treaty of Paris. It takes the southern boundary to the North-west Angle of the Lake of the Woods, and I apprehend that that is the only excuse which the arbitrators had for taking the North-west Angle of the Lake of the Woods as one of their starting points. I would ask you, Sir, what other authority is there for starting from the North-west Angle of the Lake of the Woods except this Royal Commission of the year 1786? If you were to follow the Mississippi River you would strike west of that point; if you were to follow a line drawn due north of the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi you would strike far east of that point. Then, I ask, where is the authority for commencing this boundary, as the arbitrators commenced it, from the North-west Angle of the Lake of the Woods, unless it is to be found in the description in the Commission to Sir Guy Carleton, in 1786. I entirely repudiate that it was ever the intention of the King, or that he had the power to alter the boundaries of the Province as constituted by an Imperial Act of Parliament, by means of a Royal Commission issued to a Governor General. The next Commission is a Commission to Sir Guy Carleton, then Lord Dorchester, which was given several years later, and which is to be found on page 21 of this report. You will observe—and it is a very important matter—that this Commission in specific language revokes the former Commissions, which are here termed letters patent, in all their particulars; therefore, if the fact that the Commission of 1786 took the boundary to the North-west Angle of the Lake of the Woods is a reasonable foundation on which to base a claim, I say that the later Commission of 1791 completely and entirely revoked that authority. All the other Commissions are precisely the same in description until we come to the Commission issued to Lord Durham, which is to be found on page 25; and here, Sir, is a most important variance from the descriptions found in the previous Commissions, so important that I must ask the indulgence of the House while I read it:

"The said Province of Upper Canada being also bounded by a line drawn due north from the head of the said lake until it reaches the shore of Hudson's Bay; the said Province of Upper Canada being bounded on the south, beginning at the said stone boundary between Lancaster and Loagueuil, by the Lake St. Francis, the River St. Lawrence, the Lake of the Thousand Islands, Lake Ontario, the River Niagara, which falls (leads) into the Lake Erie, and along the middle of that lake on the west by the channel of Detroit, Lake St. Clair, up the River St. Clair, Lake Huron, the west shore of Drummond Island, that of St. Joseph and Sugar Island, thence into Lake Superior."

Well, Sir, if Royal Commissions changed and altered the boundaries of this Province, the latest change made is that which abides. The latest change is that made in the Commission to Lord Durham, and the same description is followed in all subsequent descriptions up to the Commission of Lord Elgin, which, I believe, was the latest which contained any description of territory. If these Commissions change and alter the boundaries of the Province, the last one must prevail, and the last one takes the boundaries of Ontario to the east end of Lake Superior, and if hon. gentlemen rely on these Commissions, they must be satisfied with the boundary which stops there. Then there will be two bounds—one where a line produced from Lake Temiscaming would reach a point on Hudson's Bay, and another at the outlet of Lake Superior. I think that is a point which it will be difficult to get round, provided it be admitted that the Royal Commissions affect the boundaries of the Province; but it is my opinion that these Royal Commissions do not affect the boundaries of the Province; it is my opinion that that boundary remained as it was originally established by the Statute of 1774, and the whole question depends on how that Statute is read and understood. Therefore, Sir, the conclusion to which I have arrived is this—that when this matter was referred to arbitration, there was a legal boundary, both to the west and to the north of Ontario, that the western boundary was a line produced due north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and that the northern boundary was the height of land—the watershed—separating the waters which run south from those which run north into Hudson's Bay. If I am right in that view, the next important matter to consider is whether an order of the Privy Council of Canada, or even an Act of the Parliament of Canada, can legally change the boundaries of Upper and Lower Canada as they existed at the time of Confederation. If you look at section 6 of our Constitutional Act, you will find a positive affirmative enactment, providing what shall be the boundaries of the Province of Ontario, the Province of Quebec, and the other Provinces which originally entered into Confederation. Section 6 reads as follows:

"The parts of the Province of Canada (as it exists at the passing of this Act) which formerly constituted respectively the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, shall be deemed to be severed, and shall form two separate Provinces. The part which formerly constituted the Province of Upper Canada shall constitute the Province of Ontario; and the part which formerly constituted the Province of Lower Canada shall constitute the Province of Quebec."

Now, Sir, I take this ground, that whatever has been positively and affirmatively enacted in our Constitutional Act, it is beyond the power of the Privy Council of Canada or of the Parliament of Canada to change or repeal. But it will be argued that power has been given subsequently, by Imperial Statute, to alter the boundaries of the Provinces, by chapter 28 of the Statutes of 1871. But if you look at the preamble of that Act, you will find that it was passed for the purpose of establishing the Province of Manitoba; and the clause under which it is claimed power has been given to alter the boundaries of Ontario is the third clause, which is in these general terms:

"The Parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the Legislature of any Province of the said Dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such Province, under such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said Legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any Province affected thereby."

Now, Sir, the position which I take, and on which I can safely appeal to all legal gentlemen in this House to support me, is this: that the positive enactment in the British North America Act that the boundaries of Ontario shall be as they existed at the time of the passing of that Act, is not repealed or modified by a general clause in a subsequent Statute, like the third section of the Act to which I have just referred. I base my position on the maxim, generalibus specialibus non derogant, and I would refer, for my authority to Maxwell on the interpretation of Statutes, page 157, which I will read:

"It is about a particular application of the general presumption against an intention to alter the law beyond the immediate scope of the Statute, to say that a general Act is to be construed as not repealing a particular one by mere implication. A general later law does not abrogate an earlier special one. It is presumed to have only general cases in view, and not particular cases which have been already provided for by a special or local Act, or, what is the same thing, by custom. Having already given its attention to the particular subject, and provided for it, the Legislature is reasonably presumed not to intend to alter that special provision by a subsequent general enactment, unless it manifests that intention in explicit language. It is, therefore, a received maxim of statutory interpretation that generalibus specialibus non derogant. The general statute is read as silently excluding from its operation the cases which have been provided for under the special one."

Now, Sir, the boundaries of the Province of Ontario have been provided for by the Constitutional Act in the most special and marked language, and the position I take—and I have no doubt it is a sound position—is that a provision in general language does not repeal the special provision of that Act, but only applies to those general cases which are not specially provided for by previous legislation. There are a large number of examples which it was my intention to read to the House, but as I have already occupied too much time, I shall not do so. But those cases are exactly in point as showing, beyond any question, that section three of this Act gives no legal authority whatever for altering the boundaries of Ontario. You can see of what vital importance that principle of law is as applied to the facts of this case. If Ontario had a defined legal boundary at the time of Confederation, that boundary still remains as it was in virtue of the Imperial Act, and there is no power in Canada which can alter the boundaries of the Province of Ontario any more than of the Provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick. There are only two courses to take. The one is to seek Imperial legislation, which unquestionably would have the right, on memorial from the Provinces of the Dominion, to alter the boundaries of those four original Provinces whose limits are specially stipulated for in the British North America Act. But with respect to those Provinces, neither that Statute nor any other provision of law that can be found affords any authority which would justify the Privy Council of Canada or the Parliament of Canada in altering the boundaries of any one of them. Then the reference to arbitrators, in so far as it proposed to leave to them the finding of the real boundary and the existing boundary, was all well enough, but the proposal to leave to arbitrators the finding of a conventional boundary, or the proposal that this House should approve and ratify a boundary—admittedly not the real but a conventional boundary—is entirely ultra vires, entirely out of the power of this Parliament. If that matter is settled, it is a very good answer to make to the Legislature of Ontario, and when that Legislature expostulates against the neglect of this Parliament to take action in this matter, we can reply that the award is a conventional and not a real boundary, and that we have no power to confirm that award. That ends the whole question. It is to be borne in mind also that there is a very good reason why the boundaries of the original Provinces should be fixed in a constitutional manner. The various Provinces of this Dominion have a vital interest in maintaining the boundaries of the original Provinces in their entirety. Were it otherwise, could a majority in Parliament alter the boundaries of any Province, and aggrandize it to the diminution of any or all of the others, where would be the safety of our system of Confederation. Will it be said, forsooth, that with the consent of the particular Province that is getting the increased territory, the Parliament of Canada may do what it likes with the boundaries? I could understand the claim that the boundaries of any Province could be altered with the consent of those that suffer by the change, but it is argued that with the consent of Ontario, Parliament may ratify an award which gives her a few hundred thousand miles of additional territory. I can understand there would not be much doubt about getting the consent of the Province to be benefited. I take it that the meaning of section three is that the change may be made with the consent of the particular Province that suffers by it, but not of the Province that is the gainer. This is not purely an Ontario question. It is one in which the other Provinces have a very large interest. Of course, under our system the Province of Quebec is the pivot Province so far as representation goes, the other Provinces having an increased representation as their population increases over that of Quebec; but not only Quebec, but all the other Provinces are interested in seeing that the great Province of Ontario, which we are all glad to see great, powerful and wealthy, should not become overpowering in its greatness. Therefore it is not to be wondered at that the hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues hesitate, when the authority is, to say the least, so doubtful, to confirm a conventional boundary which gives to Ontario this great increase of territory. I say, then, if I am right in my law, that there is only one way of increasing the boundaries of Ontario beyond the legal boundary as established in 1774, and that is by Imperial legislation. There are two or perhaps three ways of defining what is the legal boundary, and of laying it down across the country and on a map, and one of these would be by a reference to the Supreme Court, another by a reference to the Privy Council, and another a reference to arbitrators. And I find that the late Administration of which the member for Lambton was Premier, did not give the power to those arbitrators, in the Order in Council which appointed them to fix a conventional boundary. I also find that that position is taken by the Province of Ontario in their communication to the Privy Council. I can therefore easily understand why the late Government did not take immediate steps to bring about a ratification of an award which had been made without any authority in the reference to arbitration. The position which I take is this: that the late Administration, properly enough from that point of view if it was to be referred to arbitrators at all, empowered those men to determine what was the legal boundary, and nothing more, and these arbitrators taking that as their authority went to work to find a conventional boundary which began where no one ever dreamt of its beginning, which ran where no one ever claimed it should run, which ended at Hudson's Bay. Are the Dominion Government and Parliament to be blamed for not immediately taking steps to confirm, ratify and give effect to a conventional boundary, when the arbitrators never were asked or empowered to fix a conventional boundary, when the Order in Council forbade their undertaking to do so? I say, therefore, that the award is beyond the order of reference, that it was ultra vires of the arbitrators, that the award is illegal, that the matter was never left to them in that way, that the late Government was right in never ratifying it, and the present Government has certainly not been lacking in its duty in not taking any steps to confirm it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman is aware that the late Government had not the opportunity of dealing with the question after the award was made.

Mr. IVES. I am quite aware of that; but I am also aware that the hon. member for Lambton, when leading a former Administration, had so little confidence in the arbitrators he named, and had such good reason to believe that his Minister of the Interior would act for Ontario rather than for the Dominion, that he never took power during two or three Sessions, or never gave power by Statutory enactment to the arbitrators to go on and act for the Dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We held that such an Act was not necessary; and the hon. member for Bothwell was not in the Government for two years after the reference was made.

Mr. IVES. The Province of Ontario thought it was necessary, and some of the correspondence includes a communication asking the Administration, or suggesting that they had better pass such an Act; and it seems to me it was only a proof of the hon. gentleman's prudence, foresight and caution that he did not commit himself to any action those arbitrators might take. What is the history of this correspondence? We find that it began in 1871, and that the Dominion Government, not the Government of Ontario, were the first to urge the necessity of having this boundary surveyed and settled. The Dominion Government on July 17th, 1871, called attention to the necessity of settling the true boundaries of Ontario, that is to say, the legal boundaries. On the 28th July the Privy Council adopted a report appointing E. E. Taché a Commissioner, &c., to settle and determine the boundaries of Ontario and survey the same, and appropriated the sum of $15,000 to pay half the cost of the surveys; and the Ontario Government, on their part, appointed the Hon. Wm. McDougall as Commissioner, to act with Mr. Taché, to settle the true boundary line. In January, 1872, the Ontario Government, in the mildest sort of way and in the most insinuating manner, suggested that the Dominion Government should furnish them with a copy of the instructions given Mr. Taché, and such was furnished to Ontario; and they are very important in this connection. The following is the paper in question:

"Draft of Instructions to be given to the Commissioner appointed to act on behalf of the Dominion of Canada in the survey and location of the Boundary Line between the North-West Territories and the Province of Ontario, in conjunction with a Commissioner to be appointed by the Government of Ontario.

"1. The boundary in question is clearly identical with the limits of the Province of Quebec, according to the 14th Geo. III., cap. 83, known as the 'Quebec Act,' and is described in the said Act as follows, that is to say: Having set forth the westerly portion of the southern boundary of the Province as extending along the River Ohio 'westward to the banks of the Mississippi,' the description continues from thence (i.e. the junction of the two rivers), and northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England trading to Hudson Bay.

"Having determined the precise longitude west of Greenwich of the extreme point of land marking the junction of the north and east banks respectively of the said rivers,

"You will proceed to ascertain and define the corresponding point of longitude or the intersection of the meridian passing through the said junction, with the international boundary between Canada and the United States

"Looking, however, at the tracing enclosed, marked A, intended to illustrate these instructions it is evident such meridian would intersect the international boundary in Lake Superior.

"Presuming this to be the case, you will determine and locate the said meridian, the same being the westerly portion of the boundary in question, at such point on the northerly shore of the said lake as may be nearest to the said international boundary, and from thence survey a line due south to deep water, marking the same upon and across any and all points or islands which may intervene, and from the point on the main shore found as aforesaid draw and mark a line due north to the southern boundary of the Hudson Bay Territory before mentioned.

"This will complete the survey of the westerly boundary line sought to be established.

"You will then proceed to trace out, survey and mark, eastwardly, the aforementioned southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England trading to the Hudson Bay."

"This is well understood to be the height of land dividing the waters which flow into the Hudson Bay from those emptying into the valley of the great lakes—and forming the northern boundary of Ontario—and the same is to be traced and surveyed, following its various windings till you arrive at the angle therein between the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, as the latter is at present bounded—having accomplished which, the service will have been completed.

"Your requisition for such assistance, scientific and otherwise, as may be necessary to enable you to determine the necessary longitudes with precision, and to effect the practical surveying operations in the field and for such instruments as may be required, will receive due consideration.

"Further instructions relating to the character of the boundary marks to be erected, and conveying other information which you will probably require will be duly sent you."

After these instructions had been received by the Ontario Government, there seemed to be a sudden change of mind with regard to the advisability of settling the true boundaries of Ontario; and the next thing we know is that Ontario notified the Dominion that they had instructed their Commissioner to take no further action under his Commission. The Dominion then asked the Government of Ontario to state their views as to what was the legal boundary. They complied with that request, and for the first time proposed a conventional boundary. On page 9 of the return is found the boundary which Ontario proposed, and they proposed it in the most diplomatic language, and, as we say in legal proceedings, without waiver of objections. The following is a description of the boundary proposed:—

"The boundary line of Ontario is the international boundary from the mouth of the Pigeon River, on Lake Superior, to a point of the Lake of the Woods, where the boundary line would be intersected by a line drawn north from the source of the Mississippi River; thence the boundary line of Ontario runs north to the point of intersection of the southern boundaries of the Hudson's Bay Territories; thence the boundary line of Ontario is the southern boundary of those Territories to the point where that boundary would be intersected by a line drawn north from the head of Lake Temiscamingue."

And they say in the despatch which accompanies this proposition, that they do not see any other way except to establish a conventional boundary to the north, and they think the boundary they suggest ought to be accepted as the western boundary. On the 9th May, 1872, the Dominion replied that a conventional boundary would not be legal or binding and would not settle the difficulty. They proposed a reference to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. You will remark that that was on the 9th May, 1872, and you will remark further that if that suggestion had been adopted, the matter would have been settled years ago, and we should not have been discussing the Ontario boundary question to-day. Ontario then called attention to the Imperial Act, which I have referred to, chapter 28 of the Statutes of 1871, and argued that under that Act a conventional boundary would be legal, and they suggest that a Commission sitting here would be better than a reference to the Privy Council, but they do not refuse submission to the Privy Council. The Dominion then replied that the other Provinces have interests to be considered in this matter, and that if a conventional boundary is agreed to, it would be unfair to the interests of the other Provinces. Here the matter rested till the defeat of the Administration of the right hon. leader of the Government, and the incoming of the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton. On the 12th November, 1874, the reference to the arbitrators was made by the Mackenzie Government, but that reference was to find the true boundary, and not a conventional boundary. On the 3rd August, 1878, the award was made. Ontario, in the meantime, having passed legislation empowering these arbitrators, and the Dominion Government having declined to introduce any such legislation. The conclusions to which I have arrived in applying the law to the facts are these: first, that Ontario had a legally prescribed boundary at the time of the Confederation; second, that the western boundary was a line due north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and the northern boundary was the watershed dividing the waters flowing south to the great lakes, and the St. Lawrence from those flowing north to the Hudson Bay; third, the British North America Act declared that the existing boundaries of Ontario should continue to be the boundaries of Ontario; fourth, that enactment has not been repealed and cannot be, except by the Imperial Parliament, and neither the Parliament of Canada nor the Privy Council of Canada can legally accept any change of the boundaries of Ontario, as existing at the time of Confederation; fifth, the boundaries awarded by the arbitrators are not the legal boundaries of Ontario, and were never claimed to be such until after the award was made, and neither the Privy Council of Canada nor the Parliament of Canada have any power to confirm that award or make the proposed boundaries the legal boundaries of Ontario; sixth, the difficulty can be settled only by the legislative intervention of the Mother Country, moved by joint addresses of this Parliament and the different Legislatures, or by judicial decision as to what the legal boundaries are, and as this would settle the difficulty, I am glad to see it is the course proposed by the hon. member for Niagara in his resolution. Now, Sir, it seems to me, in conclusion, that if there is any fault to be found with this proposed amendment, it is to be found by the representatives of the other Provinces than Ontario. It seems to me that if this proposition errs at all, it errs by being partial to the great Province of Ontario. It is proposed that Ontario shall have the choice as between a reference to the Privy Council and a reference to the Supreme Court. It is proposed that that Province shall have the choice as to whether that case shall be a case made up by mutual consent between Ontario and the Dominion, or whether it shall be a case submitted by Her Majesty herself. Ontario has not, I am sorry to say, acted in the same spirit. I cannot help comparing the resolutions which were passed on one of the last days of the Session of the Ontario Legislature, with the language of those resolutions, with the moderate and conciliatory language which is used in the proposition now before the Chair. In the one case there is even a threat of secession or rebellion, and, in the other case, there is a proposition to leave the settlement of the matter with the highest judicial tribunals here or the highest judicial tribunals in the Empire, and to leave the territory and the right of parties in statu quo until that decision can be obtained. What, I ask, could be fairer? What could be more partial to the great Province of Ontario than this proposition? They say they propose to protect their interests from spoliation. But who has attempted spoliation? The Government of the right hon. leader has always been opposed to a conventional boundary, has always urged that a conventional boundary would be illegal, has always contended that the only way to settle this question was to get a judicial determination of what are the legal existing boundaries. These were his views before his defeat in 1873, and these have been his views since his accession to office in 1878. But because the Province of Ontario, by some reason or other, have obtained a larger portion of territory than, according to my view, they are entitled to, they are of course in a great hurry to have that boundary confirmed, to have that territory conceded to them; but I think it would be at least fair to the other Provinces that the people of Ontario should defer their rebellion, should defer their civil war till the highest courts in the country, at least, should have an opportunity of declaring upon this matter, particularly as long as the Dominion proposes that the rights in the territory, to the timber limits and the laws should remain in statu quo till the matter is settled. I am sorry to see a disposition evinced in the Province of Ontario, in the Legislature of Ontario, to make what I must suppose political capital out of this question, to raise a sectional cry, to attempt to obtain a sectional advantage by making the most of that cry. Sir, I have only to look to the history of our neighbors in the south, to see what fatal results may follow from indulging in a course like that. We there saw from year to year an agitation, with respect to the question of slavery, an agitation which was kept up for the mere purpose of obtaining advantages at elections, and it resulted in a war which devastated that country, which caused the expenditure of millions of money, and the loss of thousands of lives. Sir, that is the very course the Legislature of Ontario proposes to adopt, to bring about a settlement of this question. They do not propose to leave this matter to the settlement of the Courts. They stand by their bond, and they demand their pound of flesh. They say: "We have got an award; you agreed to an award." It is true it is only the Privy Council that agreed to it; it is true the Privy Council only agreed to an award which should find the true boundaries; it is true the arbitrators went beyond their power. It is true they found a conventional boundary; it is true that that award is illegal; it is true the Parliament of Canada has no power to ratify that award, but we have got the bond, we have got the award, we have got the power and we mean to keep up the agitation, and we mean to obtain all that award has given us. I think that the better sense of the people of the great Province of Ontario will concur in the principles of this resolution, will concur in the view of the right hon. leader of the Government, that it is better to keep cool, that it is better not to get excited, that it is better not to take up arms at the present moment, but to make one further effort to have this matter settled by a tribunal which shall have the confidence of all parties. I believe that the resolution offers the only reasonable course that can be taken, and I shall support it with very great pleasure.

Mr. MILLS. It is not my intention to undertake to combat the observations made by the hon. member for Niagara in relation to myself. I do not think it is necessary to enter into any defence of my conduct in becoming a Minister of the Crown after having been an agent of the Government of Ontario, in preparing a case in their behalf. I think I need not before this House enter into any discussion of that subject, especially when we have one so important as that submitted in this particular resolution. The subject is one of very great interest to the people of Ontario, not only those opposed to the present Government, but to people of every shade of political opinion throughout the Province of Ontario. When the Prime Minister announced, in 1872, that the boundary of Ontario on the west was to be determined by a line drawn due north from the junction of the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers, and on the north by the watershed which separates the lakes from Hudson's Bay, the country was taken by surprise. The contention was wholly at variance with that put forward by the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues not long before. If the line taken was not the subject of a great deal of controversy, it was because the people of Canada had, from the beginning, been led by merchants, by traders, by newspapers, and by public men of every shade of political opinion to believe that the Hudson's Bay Company were trespassers in the North-West, and in the whole interior country, and were at best possessed of but a doubtful title in the vicinity of Hudson's Bay. And the public of Ontario had no doubt, and could have none, as to the conclusions which must ultimately be reached. It is true that the highest court of Quebec had, at one time, decided that the boundary of Ontario upon the west, was a meridional line drawn due north from the junction of the Ohio with the Mississippi; but it did so with a view of upholding its jurisdiction in a case which was before it. The purpose of the Act was wholly lost sight of. The true grammatical construction of the section of the Act under consideration, was wholly overlooked, both by counsel and by the court. It can be conclusively established, by surrounding circumstances, as well as by a careful examination of the Act itself, that, if that Act is still to be regarded as marking the limits of Ontario, it extends the boundaries westward, at least as far as the meridian of Lake Itasca, the source of the Mississippi, that if the word "northward," as used in the first section of the Act, applies to the direction of the countries, territories and islands from the boundary on the south, then the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, make the northern boundary. But if it applies to the northern deflection of the southern boundary as a liminary line on the west, then there is no boundary given to Ontario on the north, and we are left to seek for a northern boundary from some other sources, and the present Province of Quebec would still retain as its northern boundary the line drawn by the proclamation of October, 1763. It is well known to every one who has studied the history of the fur trade, that the whole country from Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains, as far north as Lake Athabaska, and eastward in close proximity to Hudson's Bay, was occupied and held by France from the time that she first took possession, down to the surrender of Canada by the Treaty of Paris; that after the cession of Canada to Great Britain the country was, for several years, occupied by numerous fur traders, from Montreal, from Albany, and from Illinois; that after the United States had acquired their independence, this trade was carried on by merchants of London and of Montreal. That they ultimately formed themselves into a single company; that they had in their employment about two thousand voyageurs and traders, who were scattered over this immense region; that it was not until the beginning of this century that the Hudson's Bay Company ventured away from the shores of the Bay, and began to set up a claim to the whole basin of Hudson's Bay. I shall undertake to show you that the Government of Canada, having cognizance of these facts, disputed the pretensions of the Hudson's Bay Company, not only to a large section of country north of the watershed, but to the whole North-West Territories. I shall endeavor to make it clear that the Crown did not possess the territories professedly granted to the Hudson's Bay Company, at the time the charter was given; that it was by the due diligence of the Company that the Crown expected to acquire the sovereignty of the country; and that the sovereignty of the Crown and the property of the Company depended entirely upon the activity and enterprise of the Company in exercising authority and dominion over the territories formally granted. I will undertake to show you that not only was there no conveyance of the country which was in the possession of any other Christian Prince at the time the charter was given, but there could be no valid exclusion of France, or of any other country, from the unoccupied territories of North America by this grant. I shall endeavor to show you that by the charter the Crown professed to grant a title in fee simple to one portion of the country in the vicinity of the Bay. That it professed to grant an exclusive right of trade over another portion of the country of which no title to the soil was given. I shall undertake to show you, that the claim to the whole basin of Hudson's Bay, is a modern claim; and that before the Treaty of Utrecht, the treaty upon which the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company are wholly dependent, they made no claim to any territory south of the fifty-first parallel. I will undertake to show that in appointing arbitrators to ascertain and determine the boundaries of Ontario, when those boundaries were contested by the Government of Canada, the Crown acted within its authority; that it was properly advised; that an award was properly made; that Ontario did not receive by that award a larger extent of territory than she was entitled to; and that that award ought to be affirmed and acted upon as setting forth the true limits of the Province of Ontario. The Government have said, in a recent communication to the Government of Ontario, that the territory has been acquired on behalf of Canada from the Hudson's Bay Company. That is a misstatement of the case. Canada has always disputed the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company, not only to the lands now in question, but to the whole North-West country. When the North-West Company amalgamated with the Hudson's Bay, the disputed territories lying far beyond the bounds of settlement, ceased for a time to be the subject of controversy, but it was not because the pretensions of the Hudson's Bay Company were admitted to be well founded, but only because the Province had no present interest in actively enforcing its claim against the Company. As early as 1857, an elaborate report was made by an hon. member of the Government, of which the present hon. Prime Minister was the Premier, in which the right of the Hudson's Bay Company to the territories in question was disputed, and the claims of Canada, on behalf of the present Province of Ontario, was asserted over the whole country to the Pacific Ocean. The Colonial Secretary informed the Government of Canada that an enquiry was to be made by a Committee of the House of Commons into the affairs of the Company, and into their claims to the North-West, and that Canada might desire to be represented before that Committee. The Colonial Secretary would not have given such an invitation had he not known that the people of Canada had long before disputed the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company to the country. The Government acted upon this invitation, and Chief Justice Draper was sent to represent Canada before a Committee of the House of Commons. He informed the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues that it was desirable to have a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as to the western limit of the Province of Canada, as well as of the northern boundary; and that he confidently hoped a decision would give to Canada a clear right west to the line of the Mississippi, and a considerable distance north of the watershed. In fact, Chief Justice Draper, who was a most able judge—and competent to form a correct conclusion—after a very careful consideration of the subject, intimated as his view, that the boundaries of Ontario were those which the arbitrators subsequently declared them to be by their award. In 1865, a member of the Government, of which the right hon. gentleman was the leader in the Legislative Assembly, still claimed the country as a part of Upper Canada, and only agreed to compensation to avoid the mischiefs of delay consequent upon a protracted suit before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. When the Federal Union of the four Provinces was consummated, the Government of the right

hon. gentleman declared their determination to acquire not only the territories hitherto claimed as a part of Upper Canada, but those formally granted to the Hudson's Bay Company in the vicinity of the Bay; and so little value did he place upon the title of the Company that he invited the Government of the United Kingdom to transfer the whole country to Canada, leaving the Hudson's Bay Company the privilege of upholding their rights, if they had any, not before the Judicial Committee but in the Canadian courts of law. The right hon. gentleman knew that the Company were a proprietary Government; that by their charter they had professedly conferred upon them the power to govern the country; and that the Crown had not the power to do what he wanted to have done, in the manner he proposed. The right hon. gentleman said, in defence of his policy:

"That we wished to take possession of this territory, and would undertake to legislate for it and to govern it, leaving the Hudson's Bay Company no right, except the right of asserting their title in the best way they could in courts of competent jurisdiction. And what would their title be worth the moment it was known that the country belonged to Canada, and that the Canadian Government and Canadian courts had jurisdiction there, and that the chief protection of the Hudson Bay Company, and the value of their property, namely, their exclusive right of trading in those regions, was gone forever? The Company would only be too glad that the country should be handed over to Canada, and would be ready to enter into any reasonable arrangement. The value of the Company's interest would be determined by the value of their stock; and what would that be worth when the whole country belonged to Canada?"

The right hon. gentleman proposed to deal with the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company, whatever they were, as he now undertakes to deal with the rights of Ontario. I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman expected to succeed in the course he had marked out for his Government. He was informed that the Crown had not the power to do what he proposed, but he certainly did succeed in incurring the ill-will of the Company's agents, as well as of the settlers, in the North-West. He succeeded in stirring up a rebellion, which cost the country more than a million of dollars, and which has impeded the progress of the country ever since. The right of the Hudson's Bay Company, to the whole country, was energetically denied by his colleagues; and if compensation was granted to the Company it was in order to avoid protracted litigation, and not because it was supposed they had any claim beyond their property in their farms and posts which could be successfully upheld in a court of law. So far was the right hon. gentleman from recognizing any title in the Hudson's Bay Company, that, in January, 1869, two of his colleagues who had gone to England for the purpose of securing a transfer of Rupert's Land and the Indian Territories to Canada, informed Earl Granville that:

"The boundaries of Upper Canada on the north and west were declared, under the Constitutional Act of 1791, to include all the territory to the westward and southward of the boundary line of Hudson's Bay to the utmost extent of the country, commonly called or known by the name of Canada. Whatever doubt may exist as to the utmost extent of Old or French Canada, no impartial investigator of the evidence, in the case, can doubt that it extended to and included the country between Lake of the Woods and Red River. The Government of Canada, therefore, does not admit, but, on the contrary, denies, and has always denied the pretensions of the Hudson's Bay Company to any right of soil beyond that of squatters in the territory through which the road complained of is being constructed."

This shows very clearly that the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, down to the time the country was surrendered to Canada, claimed it as a part of the Province of Ontario; and that when compensation was granted to the Hudson's Bay Company, it was not granted to them because they had any proprietary rights in the disputed territories, but in order to get immediate possession of the country. But what I have said does not apply to the territory south of the watershed and west of Prince Arthur's Landing. The Hudson's Bay Company never made any claim to that country, and it has been uniformly dealt with as a part of the Province of Ontario. As early as 1856 the Government negotiated with the Indians for the surrender of the country westward of Thunder Bay, as far as the source of the Pigeon River; and before the Federal union of the Provinces no fewer than 35,000 acres of the territories so surrendered had been patented to private parties. When representation was given to the Algoma District it was included in that district, and the hon. member for Algoma claims to represent those people. They are electors within his district, although, if I understand his present views upon the question, he has no business here as a representative from Ontario. As late as April, 1872, I find the hon. First Minister sending accounts to the Government of Ontario for cash advances made for the erection of court-houses, and for the maintenance of a police force beyond what, he says, are the limits of the Province. He has also presented accounts for the amount due the Indians under the Robinson Treaty, although he holds that the territory does not belong to Ontario, for which he is demanding from it the amount promised the Indians for its surrender. In the ninth and tenth paragraphs of the despatch sent to the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, on the 27th of January last, the Secretary of State says:

"His Excellency's advisers are of opinion that, in advance of Parliamentary sanction, it was not only highly inexpedient, but transcended the power of the Government of the day, to refer to arbitration the question of the extent of the North-West Territories acquired by the Dominion by purchase from the Hudson's Bay Company. That territory had been acquired on behalf of, and was, in fact, held for all the Provinces comprised in the Dominion, and the extent of it was a question in regard to which, if a dispute arose, only Parliament could have absolved the Government of the day from the duty of seeking an authoritative determination by the legal tribunals of the country."

I deny the doctrine laid down in both these propositions. I will allude to the second proposition first, and I will say that, as to the question of the extent of the North-West Territories, and the fact that they are the common property of the Dominion does not limit the authority of the Crown with regard to their boundaries any more than it is limited in dealing with the Provinces—if there is a difference it is in favor of a Province—and the right hon. gentleman as First Minister did not fail to deal absolutely and finally with the disputed boundary of a Province, without the prior sanction or subsequent ratification of Parliament. The hon. gentleman knows that, in referring a boundary question to the Judicial Committee, he is asking for a decision not from a Court but from a Council of State.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Is it not a Court of Appeal?

Mr. MILLS. It is governed by legal principles, but it is a Council of State and not a Court of Appeal. If the hon. gentleman will look at Mr. Finlayson's book on this subject, he will find that very fully discussed, but whether it is so or not, it proceeds, on all questions of disputed boundaries, as a Council of State, and the hon. gentleman will find, in the cases of the disputed boundaries of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and the Plymouth Colony, that these questions were considered, not by any Court, but by the King in Council.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At that time there was no such thing as a Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Mr. MILLS. Exactly so. But the function of the King, in this particular, has never been changed. I remember very well the one case that I mentioned, the New Hampshire case, the claim of Captain Mason. The Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, as members of the Council, gave advice precisely as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council do now. They entered into an elaborate discussion and proceeded upon judicial principles, but still they sat as a Council of State and concluded by advice and not by a judgment. Will the hon. gentleman mention any case in which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council proceeded otherwise than by advice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Committee of the Privy Council is expressly declared to be a Court of Appeal for all ecclesiastical and all colonial questions. If the Queen passes an Order in Council which is a mere form, the hon. gentleman says it is but a matter of advice. It is by way of a solemn decision of a High Court of Appeal, and is unanimous, as decisions in appeal should be; there ought to be no dissenting voice.

Mr. MILLS. I am not going to discuss the question as to what ought or ought not to be the custom of Courts of Appeal. I am dealing with facts as they are. I stated that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council cannot do more than advise the Queen. They may possess some of the powers of a court, but they are still as they were from the beginning, a Council of State. The Judicial Committee does not render judgments; it gives advice. You do not know what the views of the individual members of that body are. They hear arguments, they deliberate in secret. But because its members constitute a Council, and not a court, there are no dissentient opinions permitted. The conclusion come to is the advice of the whole Council. And, were it necessary, it could be shown that the settlement of political boundaries have always been regarded as acts of State belonging to the political Department of Government, and not as judgments falling within the cognizance of the Courts. The first part of this paragraph is equally untenable, and it is all the more remarkable, coming from a First Minister, who has made it a point, all his public life, to act upon a wholly different rule. The hon. gentleman was a party to a treaty which ceded to the United States a right to navigate the St. Lawrence River, and who abandoned the right to navigate some of the rivers upon the north-west coast, and consented to the restriction of our rights in the navigation of others, without the prior sanction, or the subsequent confirmation of either the Parliament of this country or the Parliament of the United Kingdom. It is well known to the House that the boundaries between British Columbia and Washington Territory, as laid down by the Washington Treaty of 1846, were in dispute. The First Minister was a party to referring the question, not to eminent jurists, but to a powerful potentate, who was authorized to give an absolute decision by which this country was bound. He did not then seek Parliamentary authority or Parliamentary absolution for himself or his government. So far was he from referring the article in the Treaty of Oregon to the Emperor of Germany for judicial construction, that he was a party to an agreement which prevented the question coming before the Emperor on its merits. He was never asked where the provisions of that treaty required the boundary line to be drawn. Whether it was because the Emperor was not a jurist, and was not considered competent to construe the treaty, I cannot say, but I can say, he was not permitted to do so. He was told that the English contended that the boundary between Vancouver Island and the Mainland should be drawn through one channel, and the United States held that it should be drawn through another. He was asked to decide which of these two best comports with the provisions of the treaty. The Emperor decided in favor of the American view, but we know that, had he been free to have laid down the boundary under the treaty, he would have followed neither of those channels; he would have taken a line between them, which would have left the disputed island a Canadian possession. The right hon. gentleman, by his statesmanship, made San Juan a possession of the United States. In fact, the Island of San Juan, which, in the opinion of the German Emperor, was a part of British Columbia, by the Treaty of 1846, was made a part of the United States, by the Treaty of 1871. We know that in everything which specially concerned Canada, the other British Commissioners deferred to the wishes—they followed the lead of the right hon. gentleman. Will the First Minister contend, that the Crown may enter into arrangements and compacts by which a British possession may be lost—by which it may be transferred to a foreign State by which it may be dismembered, without the permission of Parliament, but that it would be unconstitutional, that it would be beyond the power of the Crown to ascertain and determine the boundary between two Provinces of Her Majesty's dominions, without first having obtained the approval of Parliament to such a line of executive action? I will undertake to show that the late Government did not transcend its authority when it referred the question of the disputed boundaries to arbitration. The Secretary of State suggests, in his despatch to the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, that there was a conventional boundary formed by the arbitrators. Now, there is not a shadow of authority for such a suggestion; neither in the Orders in Council nor in the correspondence between the two Governments, nor in the case stated by each, nor in the arguments by counsel, nor in the award of the arbitrators, is there any other boundaries sought for or spoken of than the legal limitary lines which separate upon the north and on the west the outlying territories of Canada from the Province of Ontario. The question put in issue by the case of each party, the question argued by the counsel, the question upon which the arbitrators gave a decision, was this one,—where are the legal boundaries of the Province of Ontario upon the north and on the west? They said that the boundary line of Hudson's Bay mentioned in the proclamation of 1791 meant the shore of Hudson's Bay, and the law officers of the Crown of England had before said the same thing. They were of opinion that the Act of 1774 made the Mississippi the boundary of the Province of Quebec in the west as far as the Mississippi River extended, and Lord Camden, Lord Thurlow, Lord Loughborough, in England, and Chief Justice Draper, here, had also held the same view. In starting from the North-west Angle to draw the western boundary, they started from a point to which the International boundary of Upper Canada had before been set out in the Governor's Commission. Had the source of the Mississippi been further west the boundary would have been, no doubt, carried further westward; but the source of the Mississippi and the North-west Angle are so nearly upon the same meridian, that they may be taken as identical, according to the legal maxim, that "the law does not take notice of trifles." I shall in this connection refer to two classes of cases which involve the same principle as the action which the Government here contest. The first of these classes may be held to assert with much greater emphasis, than the action of the late Government in this case, the right of the Executive to deal with all such questions, limited only by the responsibility of Ministers to Parliament. Blackstone lays down the proposition that the Sovereign alone deals with other powers and that there can be no doubt, that at the conclusion of a war, the consent of Parliament is not necessary to enable the Crown to alienate British territory to a foreign State. Whether it has power to alienate territory in time of peace, has been a debated question, but it is, I think, now generally conceded that where the full dominion is in the Crown, where the territory has been acquired by conquest or by cession, the Crown has power to cede without either the permission or sanction of Parliament. It has been argued by Mr. Forsyth and others, that where the Parliament has extended its authority over the dominions of the Crown, and also where Provincial Legislatures have been created, that the Crown, no longer having full dominion, has not the power of cession. This I will show you is not in accordance with usage; and it will be difficult, on any constitutional theory, to maintain that the Crown possessed, for the purpose of negotiating peace, powers, which, at any other time, would be held to be an encroachment upon the authority of Parliament. The Judicial Committee seemed to favor the views of those who contended that the power of the Crown in this particular was unlimited except perhaps with regard to those districts or colonies in which representative Government was established.

Mr. MILLS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The power of the Crown is paramount.

Mr. MILLS. I do not know that the powers of the Crown paramount are at all different so far as this question is concerned from the powers of the Crown in other respects. Where the Crown has full dominion, as it is called, there can be no question as to its right to cede a territory. There are numerous instances of the exercise of this power. But even where the power of the Crown is limited by the intervention of the Imperial Parliament, or the creation of a Local Legislature, there are many instances where the Crown has undertaken to deal with a territory, and where it has ceded it and altered boundaries without the prior sanction or subsequent ratification of Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the Crown, on the advice of the Canadian Ministry, could give the Manitoulin Islands to the United States?

Mr. MILLS. I am not arguing that question; but I shall answer the right honorable gentleman by-and-bye.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Crown paramount could do it, but the Canadian Crown could not do it.

Mr. MILLS. I am not now discussing what ought to be, but what is the prerogative of the Crown in this particular. There is no doubt a strong tendency in our own day to restrain the prerogatives of the Crown by holding Ministers more strictly responsible for their exercise. Parliament is more active and more interested in the work of Administration than formerly. Behind it and outside of it there is the great power of public opinion which will not permit it to remain an indifferent spectator of Administrative Acts in which the public are deeply interested. Parliament may insist upon being consulted with regard to any negotiations with a foreign State. It may insist upon controlling all negotiations. It may insist upon all matters being submitted to it before they are finally ratified. It may do this because it is the supreme authority in the State; and if it did so no Ministry would be likely to disregard its mandates. But it has not hitherto in such matters asserted its supreme authority. This has not, heretofore, been the practice. It is not the practice now. Parliament has left the administration of the public business to the Executive just as it has left the interpretation of the law to the courts. The negotiations with the North American Colonies are, in fact, no exception. When the Crown was about to make peace with the North American Colonies, it sought the authority of Parliament, but it did so because an Act had been passed expressly forbidding negotiations. There were also numerous Acts which extended to the North American Colonies forbidding their trade with foreign States. A statute of Charles I. expressly denied that the Crown had a dispensing power. Parliament legislated in that case, to vest in the King power to repeal and make void Acts of Parliament relating to America. The Crown could not recognize the independence of America without an immense cession of territory, yet the Act which conferred upon the King power to negotiate did not confer upon him power to cede any territories, much less other portions of his dominions. He, nevertheless, did cede the old colonies, as well as other portions, without the sanction of Parliament. Let me invite your attention briefly to what the Crown has done. Dunkirk was sold by Charles II. to the King of France without the sanction of Parliament. Parliament, when the fact became known, impeached Lord Clarendon, who was held responsible as the King's principal adviser, but it did not question the validity of the act. By the Treaty of Breda in 1667, and by the Treaty of Ryswick in 1697, cessions and retrocessions were made by the Crown without the sanction of Parliament. In 1633 the Island of Tangiers was abandoned by the Crown in time of peace. The Island of Minorca was ceded to Great Britain by the Treaty of Utrecht, in 1713. It remained a British possession until 1783, when, by the Treaty of Versailles, it was, without the authority of Parliament, ceded to the King of Spain. The Island of Tobago was ceded to the Crown of Great Britain by the Treaty of Paris. It remained a British possession for twenty years, when, by the Treaty of Versailles, it was ceded to the Crown of France without the sanction of Parliament, the only stipulation being that the King of France should respect and maintain the titles of British subjects to their property within the Island. In 1763, both East and West Florida were ceded by Spain to the King of England, and were, in 1783, retroceded to the King of Spain, for which no Parliamentary sanction was sought. By the Treaty of 1763 the King of France ceded Canada with its dependencies to the King of England. In 1774, the whole of the country to the Mississippi River was brought under the control of Parliament, and a Constitution was given to the population by Parliament itself; and yet, in 1783, the King, without the authority of Parliament, ceded a large portion of the Province to the Republic of the United States. While the Floridas were in the possession of the King of England, he established in each a Colonial Government. British subjects were encouraged to settle in East Florida. The Colonization of the Interior of the Continent was prohibited, the better to encourage this object. It was this fact mainly, that induced Lord Loughborough to question the authority of the Crown to transfer the Floridas to Spain. He was answered by Lord Thurlow. I shall refer to this subject again at a later period. In 1824, the King of the Netherlands ceded to the King of Great Britain all his establishments in India, and the Town and Fort of Malacca and its dependencies, and His Britannic Majesty in turn ceded to the King of Netherlands Fort Marlborough, Bencoolen, and all the English possessions in the Island of Sumatra. The cession by the Crown was tacitly admitted by Parliament. The treaty was recognized as valid by (George IV., chap. 85), by which Singapore, one of the possessions ceded by the Dutch, was transferred to the East India Company. I will now refer to the South African case. In 1836, the Dutch Boers of Cape Colony were dissatisfied with the mode of compensation adopted under the Act of Emancipation. They believed the compensation provided was quite inadequate, but they were disposed to submit. But when the Government provided that payment should be made in London only, and when the population found themselves obliged to sell their claims to brokers at the Cape for a mere fraction of the amount awarded them, they became greatly dissatisfied. Many were so exasperated that they were resolved to expatriate themselves from Cape Colony. They took with them their personal property, and retired into the interior beyond the Drakenburgh Mountains, so as to get beyond the limits of the British possessions. They settled in the valley of the Orange River and in Natal. They occupied Natal with a view to opening up a trade with Holland, and with other countries on the continent of Europe. The British at once took possession of the Natal coast to control their trade. The Boers resisted, were defeated, and were driven back into the Orange River country. There could be no question but that the Orange River country was beyond the limit of the Queen's dominions. The Government of Cape Colony had from time to time entered into treaties with Griqua Chiefs, who resided at Orange River, to protect the northern frontier of the colony against invasion. When Sir Harry Smith, in 1847, went out as Governor to the Cape, he informed Earl Grey, the Colonial Secretary, that both the Boers and natives desired that British rule should be established over them. He intimated that his position at the Cape was like that of many of the Governors who had gone out to India resolved not to further extend the British dominions; but who had ended by greatly enlarging the borders of the Indian Empire. His own view, he said, had been against the extension of the British dominions in South Africa; but he found its extension demanded both by Dutch and natives, and he recommended the Colonial Secretary to annex the Orange River country to the possessions of the Crown. The Earl Grey acted, contrary to his own judgment, but in deference to the earnest representations of Sir Harry Smith, and advised the Queen to assume the sovereignty of that country. It was soon manifest that the Colonial Secretary had been misled. Lord Grey quitted office before any change of policy could take place, but he left on record his opinion that the Crown should abandon the sovereignty of that country. He sent out Major Hogg and Mr. Owen as Commissioners to report upon the subject, and he awaited their report in order the better to accomplish his purpose. Sir John Pakington succeeded him. He concurred in the views of Lord Grey, but deferred action until the report of the Commissioners should be received, which was not done before he quitted office. The Duke of Newcastle was the next Colonial Minister. Holding the same views as his predecessors, he advised the abandonment of the Orange River country. He took the advice of the law officers of the Crown, as to the proper method of giving effect to this policy. The views of the legal advisers of the Crown are indicated by the course taken. The letters patent, which were issued under the Great Seal in March, 1851, constituting the Orange River country a distinct Government, were revoked by other letters patent, and Her Majesty, by Order in Council, approved of a proclamation which "Declared, and made known the abandonment and renunciation of Her dominion and sovereignty over the Orange River country, and over the inhabitants thereof."

The question which presented itself for discussion in the two Houses of Parliament was, whether the Crown had the power to divest itself of the sovereignty of the country, once that Sovereignty had been assumed? It was admitted by all that the Crown might give up places of arms, military forts and trophies of war, such as Calais, Dunkirk and Tangiers; but it was denied, by Mr. Adderly and others, that this could be done with an ordinary possession of the Crown. It was argued that if the Crown could transfer its possessions to a foreign power, it could release parties of their allegiance, it could convert its subjects into an alien population. The Duke of Newcastle, in a despatch to Sir James Clark, the then Governor of Cape Colony, expressly denied that the withdrawal of the sovereignty of Her Majesty from the country at all affected the allegiance of those who were by birth Her Majesty's subjects. The law officers who advised the Crown at the time were Sir Alexander Cockburn and Sir Richard Bethell. The Attorney General said that Colonies acquired by conquest or by cession were subject to the absolute and undisputed sovereignty of the Crown, and those who settled in such possessions did not acquire any right to take with them the laws and institutions of England, and the Crown could cede or abandon such possessions without the sanction of Parliament. With respect to territories acquired by occupancy considerable difference of opinion existed as to whether the Crown had the power of getting rid of those territories otherwise than by an Act of the Legislature. Much might be said on both sides; but it was not necessary to enter on the question in the case of the Orange River Territory, because the mode of proceeding in that case rested, not upon the principle which regulated territory by occupancy, but upon those principles which regulated territory acquired by conquest. Sir Harry Smith proclaimed the sovereignty of the British Crown over the country which the Boers occupied. They resisted his authority. They were subjugated. The Crown, without the intervention of Parliament, established its authority, and finding that it had been misled and deceived, as to the wishes of the Boer population, abandoned the sovereignty over the country without the intervention of Parliament. Sir Alexander Cockburn said that the legal proposition upon which they had proceeded was this, that what the Crown had acquired by cession or by conquest, and over which it still retained full dominion, it could deal with without the intervention or co-operation of Parliament. In the same discussion Sir Frederick Thesiger, a distinguished lawyer, said he would not offer an opinion upon the general question as to how far the Crown could constitutionally dispossess itself of any of its dominions without the assent of Parliament. He admitted the question was one of very great difficulty. Lord Loughborough had expressed an opinion one way and Lord Thurlow another; but he admitted that in the case before them it was not essential that the sanction of Parliament should be had in order to give validity to the abandonment. Mr. Phillimore, a very high authority, expressed strongly the opinion that the Crown had clearly the right to abandon a colony. The real check he said against abuse was the responsibility of Ministers to Parliament. He contended that the point admitted of no dispute; that English history furnished so many examples of its exercise, that it was to him a matter of surprise that any lawyer could entertain doubt upon the subject. During this discussion, Mr. Adderly contended that the Boers were British subjects and the Crown could not, by virtue of its prerogative, constitute part of its subjects an independent State. That allegiance was a contract between the Crown and its subjects. That its obligations were reciprocal; and that neither party could relieve itself from these mutual obligations—a doctrine which Sir Fitzjames Stephens expressly repudiated in a most able argument before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in an appeal case from the Bombay Presidency, and in his view the members of the Committee seemed to concur. Subsequently, the Crown entered into treaty obligations with the Boers, dealing with them as a foreign and independent Government; in this way doing the very thing which Mr. Adderly contended the Crown could not do. I have already referred to the fact that after the acquisition of Florida from Spain, the British Government put forward special efforts to secure its colonization by British subjects, the more effectually to protect it against the possibility of again falling into the hands of the Spaniards. In February, 1783, the King again ceded it to Spain. The treaty was made a subject of discussion in the House of Lords. Lord Loughborough concluded an elaborate speech against the terms of the treaty by particular reference to the cession of the Floridas, denying the right of the Crown, without the authority of Parliament, to alienate a portion of the British Empire, and to transfer the allegiance of British subjects to a foreign State. The report of this part of Lord Loughborough's speech is very brief, and we learn from the reply of Lord Thurlow, that much of what he said is not reported, but it is pretty clear that the point which he pressed against the Administration was this one: "You have encouraged Englishmen to colonize Florida. You have adopted a policy which led them to believe that they were not laying aside the common heritage of Englishmen when they complied with your wishes. You have by the treaty transferred Florida to the King of Spain. You have undertaken to transmute Englishmen into Spaniards. The Crown cannot transfer the allegiance of British subjects to a foreign State. That is the doctrine of Lord Loughborough, as I understand him. A doctrine from which Lord Cairns seemed to dissent during the argument of the Indian appeal case to which I have already adverted. Lord Thurlow answered Lord Loughborough, and his thundering tones and impressive manner produced such an effect on the House of Lords at the time that he was long supposed to have effectually settled the point against his antagonists. He said:

"The noble and learned Lord had thought proper to allege, that the royal prerogative does not warrant the alienation by a treaty of peace, of territories which were under the allegiance of the Crown of England. If this doctrine be true, I must acknowledge myself strangely ignorant of the constitution of my country. Till the present day of novelty and miracle I never heard of such a doctrine. I apprehend, however, that the noble and learned Lord has thrown down the gauntlet on this occasion more from knight-errantry than patriotism, and that he was more inclined to show the House what powers of declamation he possesses in support of hypothetical propositions than anxious gravely to examine a power wisely lodged in the Crown, the utility, much less the existence, of which has never hitherto been questioned. One would have thought that when a great, experienced, and justly eminent lawyer hazarded an opinion respecting a most important point relating to the Constitution of this country, he would deem it fit to produce proofs from our legal and historical records, or at least that he would attempt to show that the common opinion and consent of Englishmen went with them; but instead of this the noble and learned Lord resorts to the lucubrations and fancies of foreign writers, and gravely refers your Lordships to Swiss authors for an explanation of the prerogatives. For my own part, I at once reject the authority of all foreigners on such a subject; however full of ingenuity Mr. Vattel and Mr. Puffendorf may be on the law of nations, which cannot be fixed by any permanent or solid rule, I deny their authority. I explode their evidence when they are brought in to explain to me what may or may not be done by the Sovereign I serve. Speaking from my own judgment, from the records of Parliament and the annals of the country, I do not think the cession of the Floridas at all a questionable matter. Let the noble and learned Lord bring forward the subject regularly and I will establish a doctrine clearly contrary to the extraordinary notion now sported by him, or confess my ignorance. I will not combat the noble and learned Lord with vague declamation and oratorical flourishes—these I contentedly leave to him with the plaintiffs they are calculated, perhaps intended, to gain—but with undecorated sense and simple argument. In my opinion, it is safer to stick to the process by which we arrive at the conclusion that two and two make four, than to suffer our understandings to be warped by the fashionable logic which delights in words, and which strives rather to confound what is plain than to unravel what is intricate."

Lord Chancellor Campbell observes, that in the discussion of the Ashburton Treaty, by which the Madawaska Settlement was ceded to the United States, he endeavored to raise the question, as to whether an Act of Parliament was necessary to give it validity, but was told that the prerogative to effect the transfer had been established by the unanswerable arguments of Lord Thurlow. In 1863, the subject of the cession of the Ionian Islands, which, by the Treaty of Vienna, had been placed under the protection of the British Crown, and which had, by the Crown, been transferred to Greece, was discussed. In many respects the Islands had been dealt with as a dependency. Possession of six of them had been obtained by force of arms during the war with France. Corfu, which was held by a French garrison, was surrendered shortly after the fall of Napoleon. While they were in the possession of the British Government, expensive fortifications were erected upon them, and for which Parliament had voted the money. They had no external political relations, except through the Government of the constitutional power of ceding them to a foreign nation. He said nothing as the advisability of such a course. All negotiations and conclusions of treaties rested with the Crown. If the Crown abused its authority the advisers of the Crown were responsible, and were liable to the censure of Parliament, and even to impeachment, if they advised the Crown to adopt a measure injurious to the Empire. There were precedents of cession made by treaty. The magnificent Island of Java was thus ceded, and, injudiciously, in his opinion, but he believed that in respect of that transaction it never was asserted that the authority of the Crown was overstepped. I will now refer to the most recent transaction of this class, the attempt to extend the authority of the Crown over the Boers of the Transvaal, their resistance, the negotiations of the Government with them, and the agreement of Her Majesty to recognize them as a protectorate instead of a possession of the British Crown. The history of this transaction bears in every particular a close resemblance to that of the Orange River Free State. Sir Theophilus Shepstone misled Lord Carnarvon, as Sir Harry Smith had before misled Lord Grey. The Boers of the Transvaal resisted the attempt to treat them as colonists just as the Boers of the Orange Free State had done twenty-four years earlier. The Government of Mr. Gladstone, when it learned the real feelings of the Boers, adopted towards them the same policy that had been taken towards their western neighbors. They were more successful than their neighbors had been in resisting the British troops, but this did not prevent the Government from meeting their wishes as soon as it was known, beyond all doubt, what their wishes were. Her Majesty decided that negotiations should be opened, and treaty stipulations were made with those who were technically her subjects. The policy of the Government has been fiercely criticised; but the authority of the Crown to make these treaty stipulations and to give up the country as a possession without the sanction of Parliament, has not been raised. In the discussion which took place before the Judicial Committee in 1875-6, but which was ultimately disposed of on other grounds, Mr. Forsyth, who was arguing against the right of the Crown to cede territories in the time of peace, said, that in order to insure peace the Crown might cede possessions which had never been the subject of Parliamentary legislation, but could cede no others. Lord Chancellor Cairns asked him if he had any authority for that proposition. He said nothing beyond this fact, that to admit it involved the power to interfere with Parliament. He argued that the right to cede a territory at the conclusion of a war, was a right based upon supreme necessity, and he quoted Puffendorf to the effect that the power of a Sovereign is not such as to enable him to transfer his kingdom or his people without their consent; and that in the case of a partial alienation of territory, the consent of both the inhabitants of the parts retained and the parts ceded are equally required. When Savoy and Nice were ceded by the King of Sardinia to the Emperor of the French, the people were asked to consent to the cession. Lord Selborne pointed out to Mr. Forsyth that, if that doctrine were recognized, Parliament, no more than the Crown, would have a right to make a cession. The people themselves must be consulted. Lord Chancellor Cairns said that—

“The gist of the authority was this, that, if the inhabitants of a territory, cut adrift, are physically strong enough, they are morally justified in asserting their independence.”

Sir Vernon Harcourt and Sir Fitzjames Stephens cited several cases of colonies for which Parliament had legislated, or in which the colonies had Legislatures of their own, where the Crown had ceded the territory without the sanction of Parliament. There was the case of the cession of Bencoolin to the Dutch, of parts of Nova Scotia and Quebec to the United States, of parts of Newfoundland—St. Pierre and Miquelon—to France, and of the Gold Coast in 1867 to the Netherlands. Mr. Stephens instanced at least twenty-three cases in the British East Indies where the Governor General, not possessed of that paramount authority which the First Minister alluded to, possessed but a limited authority, entered into negotiations with the native princes, and, by transferring territory to them, obtained cessions of territory from them, altered boundaries of States and Provinces which were adjoining, which was establishing a better boundary where necessary—I say he instanced twenty-three cases of this sort as having occurred in India alone, and there were many cases where Parliament had legislated and where Legislatures had been established, and where the Crown had not paramount authority.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Had not paramount authority?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly not, because where Parliament is fully established the plenary jurisdiction is in Parliament and not in the Crown, and that distinction, the hon. gentleman will find, is made through all these cases. It was upon that, principally, that the parties, who were denying the power of the Crown of its own motion to cede territory in the East India cases, relied. Now, there is another class of cases in which the Crown has acted without the consent of Parliament, and where its power to act has never been called in question. I refer to the class of cases to which this one more particularly belongs—the class of disputed territory. I will refer briefly to a few of these upon this continent. The territories on the north-western coast of America were, for some time, in dispute between the United Kingdom and Russia. The English Government claimed the whole coast south of Mount St. Elias to the forty-second degree of north latitude. This claim was based upon prior discovery, and upon the partial occupation of the country by Canadian fur-traders. Russia claimed the coast as far south as the Portland Channel, basing her claim upon discovery and actual occupation. In 1825 the claim of Russia was conceded, subject to the right of the British people to navigate the rivers which flow from the interior country to the sea. This concession of territory in the settlement of the boundary was made without the prior authority or the subsequent ratification of Parliament. And let me here call your attention to the provisions of the Treaty of St. Petersburg for another purpose. England and Russia occupy, under the Treaty of St. Petersburg, very nearly the same position that France and England occupied under the Treaty of Utrecht in reference to Hudson's Bay. Upon the western coast, under the Treaty of St. Petersburg, Russia holds the shore and England the interior of the country. In the vicinity of Hudson's Bay, under the Treaty of Utrecht, England held the coast and France occupied the interior of the country. Let us see what principle was recognized and acted upon in the Treaty of St. Petersburg. To Russia was ultimately conceded the coast, on the ground of prior occupation, but did this admission entitle Russia to claim the whole country to the sources of the rivers? The treaty itself negatives any such doctrine. The treaty did not admit the right of Russia to so wide an expanse of country. In most cases the rivers rise far in the interior—beyond the mountain range which girds the coast. That range is, in fact, not the watershed. The treaty simply conceded the principle that the Russian authorities only could claim a reasonable extent of country in the vicinity of the shore. In no case was it to pass the coast-height, and if the height was more than thirty miles from the shore, then the boundary was to be drawn at the distance of thirty miles and not upon the height. I shall undertake to show that the principles of public law which underlie the provisions of the Treaty of St. Petersburg, are to be observed also in reference to the respective claims which once existed of the two Crowns to the basin of Hudson's Bay; that what was done in the Treaty of St. Petersburg by express words was done at the Treaty of Utrecht by lines drawn upon a map; and that wholly apart from any express treaty stipulations and from the principles of public law applied to the varying fortunes of the Company, that the Government of Great Britain, in granting charters by which dominion was to be acquired for the Crown, and property and powers of Government for those to whom the charter was granted, no matter how extensive the dominions formerly granted might be, the limits were determined by the actual occupation and dominion of those to whom the grant was made. I will now refer to the disputed boundaries between the Provinces of Lower Canada and New Brunswick on the one side, and the State of Maine on the other. By the Treaty of 1783, the boundary between the British Possessions and the United States in this region was to be a line drawn directly north from the source of the St. Croix River, to the highlands at the north-west angle of Nova Scotia which divides the rivers that fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which fall into the River St. Lawrence; thence south-westerly along the said highlands to the source of the Connecticut River, and down that river to the 45th parallel of latitude, and thence due west to the St. Lawrence. At an early day, differences arose as to the location of the highlands and the north-west angle referred to in this article of the treaty. Great Britain claimed that the highlands mentioned were south of the St. John River. The United States insisted upon going north to the highlands near the St. Lawrence. Shortly after the signature of the treaty, doubts also arose as to the river referred to by the name of the St. Croix. In 1798, it was agreed the one now so designated was the river meant, and that the north-east source of that river should be taken as the starting point of the line which the treaty required should be drawn directly north to the highlands. An exploration of the country soon made it obvious that a great deal of difficulty would be experienced in finding a line conformable to the words of the treaty. During the Government of Thomas Carleton, about the year 1790, many settlers from New Brunswick moved into the Madawaska District, and had, there, grants made to them by the Governor of New Brunswick. The Government of the United States earnestly protested against the occupation and government of the country by the English. The position taken by the British Government was this: disputed territory remains with the original party until the cession is made absolute. There could be no doubt that the territory once belonged to Great Britain; that she had not actually transferred more to the United States than she admitted by her own construction of the treaty; that she was, therefore, still vested with the exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed country; and that she could not consent to lay it down until it was shown that her construction of the Treaty of 1783 was wrong. She said that neither the question of title to the sovereignty of the country, nor the rights of either party, were prejudiced by this rule. Upon these principles she took her stand, and to them she adhered. The United States, on the contrary, maintained that the disputed territory was wholly unoccupied at the time the Treaty of 1783 was made; that the rule laid down by Great Britain was a rule applicable to ports, military towns and garrisons where there was actual occupation, and where because there was actual occupation, there must be an actual formal cession. But this rule has no applicability to an unoccupied country; that the possession of the Crown of Great Britain to the territory in dispute was at the time of the treaty a constructive possession, because the territory was unoccupied, and the renunciation by treaty was an adequate transfer of the country; that the United States did not acquire their rights to the territory by the Treaty of 1783, but by a force of arms. The Treaty of 1783 recognized, but did not confer territorial rights. It provided for a mutual partition; and the boundary set forth simply marked the limits between the territories of the two nations. In a case not long since, before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, Lord Cairns expressed opinions in consonance with the views enunciated in this discussion by the Americans, and there can be little doubt that the right of England to hold the disputed territory was not because it was not actually ceded until she gave formal possession, but because the settlement was hers. The actual dominion was hers, and it was necessary to prove her to be in the wrong, before she would be called upon to make a surrender or to submit to joint occupation. The position in this respect of Great Britain in the valley of the Upper St. John, is the position of Ontario in the disputed territories. She has always claimed them, she has exercised jurisdiction for more than thirty years over the population. They are represented in this House as belonging to her, and she has a right to maintain her authority, apart from any award, against all encroachment, and by whatever means is necessary to make her defence of her dominion effective. In 1842, a compromise line was agreed to between the Government of Great Britain and that of the United States. Instead of following a height of land they followed the St. John River. According to the English view, a large extent of territory was surrendered to the United States. Mr. Campbell, afterwards Lord Chancellor, suggested that as a large extent of territory which had for half a century been held by the Province of New Brunswick, and legislated for as a part of that Province, was about to be given up, the consent of Parliament ought to be had. But the law officers of the Crown dissented from his view. They held that such consent was unnecessary, and upon the authority of the Crown alone, the Madawaska Settlement, and all that section of country west of the meridian of the St. Croix River, and lying between the St. John and its southern watershed, was surrendered to the United States. The territory west of the Rocky Mountains, between the forty-second parallel and the parallel of fifty-four degrees forty minutes north latitude, was, for many years, claimed both by the United States and the United Kingdom. By conventions, to which the Crown alone was a party on the side of Great Britain, the whole country was opened to colonization and settlement by both Governments. By the Treaty of 1846, the Government of Great Britain surrendered to the United States her claim to the whole country south of the forty-ninth parallel, without the sanction of Parliament. I might before have referred to the fact that the boundary between Canada and Louisiana under the Treaty of Paris, between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains was beyond all doubt the parallel of Lake Itasca, and yet by the Convention of 1818, the Crown agreed to a boundary nearly one and a-half degrees further north, surrendering to the United States by this convention and by the Treaty of 1846 a strip of country more than ninety miles in width, and extending from the source of the Mississippi to Vancouver Island, without any Parliamentary sanction in either case. I need not refer to other cases. The instances which I have given show, beyond question, what has been the practice and what has been the law in the case. They show that it was the business of the Administration to deal with the question. That the prior sanction of Parliament was not in any of these cases deemed necessary, and that subsequent ratification has never been sought. It would have been an unprecedented course to have taken the line which the right hon. gentleman says was the only one which we could constitutionally follow. So far as I know, there is not an instance in the whole history of the United Kingdom in which the views taken by the Prime Minister and his Government in this case was ever acted upon. I am sure he will not find a single precedent to support him, and the uniform usage of two hundred and twenty years has settled this point, at all events, against him. I do not say that what the Crown may do in the United Kingdom the Crown can do here: but I say the relation between the Crown and Parliament is the same here as there. I have shown on this class of questions the Crown acts without the direct sanction of Parliament, and so far as our powers extend the relation is the same. But, Sir, even though it were true that the sanction of Parliament was necessary to give validity to the arbitration, that sanction was obtained before the arbitrators sat. The Government came down to the House and asked for an appropriation to pay the expenses which would be incurred by arbitration. If any one was opposed to arbitration it was open to him to take that line. No one did object, and Parliament expressed its approval of settlement by arbitration, by voting the necessary monies for the purpose. At least two years elapsed after that money was voted before the arbitration sat. It was open to the right hon. gentleman, or to any of those who then sat in Parliament, and who now support him, to have taken exception to that mode of settlement, but it was not done. If the right hon. gentleman believed that Parliament did not favor arbitration, why did he not move against it when the appropriation was asked for? Was it because he believed it could not succeed? It may be so. I have no doubt he could not have succeeded. But what does this establish? Why, that Parliament knew what it was doing, That it approved of the mode of settlement, and voted the necessary means to enable the Government to give effect to its policy. The sanction, then, which the right hon. gentleman says the Government ought to have had, it in effect did have; so that it is obvious that on none of these grounds can the award be successfully attacked. The right hon. gentleman, in pressing through the Manitoba Bill during the last hours of last Session, told us that there was no award; that the arbitrators had set out a conventional line; that this was outside the order of reference; and that, consequently, they had not done what they were alone authorized to do; and he referred to the award made by the King of the Netherlands in the case of the Maine boundary, in confirmation of the doctrine which he enunciated. Now, I deny that there is any similarity between the award made in that case and in this. And I also affirm that if there was, that that case does not sustain the line of action which he has taken or proposes to take. Let us look at the facts in that case. On the 29th September, 1827, the English Government and the Government of the United States agreed to submit the points of difference between them to an Arbitrator; and by a subsequent convention they agreed that the Arbitrator should be the King of the Netherlands. They submitted three points under the Treaty of 1783 to the King for his decision. I will read them to the House:—

"1st. Which is the spot designated in the Treaty as the north-west angle of Nova Scotia, and which are the highlands dividing the rivers that empty themselves into the River St. Lawrence from those falling into the Atlantic Ocean, along which highlands is to be drawn the line of boundary from that angle to the north-west head of the Connecticut River?"

"2nd. Which is the north-west head of the Connecticut River?"

"3rd. Which is the boundary to be traced from the River Connecticut along the parallel of the 45° of north latitude to the River St. Lawrence, called in the Treaties Cataract?"

The King of the Netherlands decided the second and third points absolutely; but as to the first, he declared it was impossible to find a north-west angle conformable to the words of the treaty. He held that the highlands sought for might be simply a summit level from which the waters flowed in different directions. 2nd. That the ancient boundaries of the North American Provinces were not maintained by the treaty of 1783; that they had never been distinctly ascertained, and in no way aided in the determination of the question. 3rd. That the highlands contemplated in the Treaty should divide immediately, not mediately the rivers flowing into the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic. That the word "divide" required contiguity in the things divided. That the northern highlands divide rivers falling into the Bay of Chaleur, from rivers falling into the Bay of Fundy. That the southern highlands divide the rivers flowing into the Atlantic from those flowing into the St. John; that neither height of land answers the description in the treaty; and that no award can be adjudged without departing from the principles of justice as between the two parties. The King adjudged the St. John River, lying midway between the two heights of land, as an equitable boundary. When the award was made and a copy of it given to Mr. Preble, he addressed a letter to Baron Verstolk de Solen which he concludes with the following observations:—

"It is not the intention of the undersigned, in this place, to question in the slightest degree the correctness of His Majesty's conclusions. But when the Arbitrator proceeds to say that it would be suitable to run the line due north from the source of the River St. Croix, not to the highlands which divide the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which fall into the River St. Lawrence, but to the centre of the River St. John, thence to pass up the said river to the mouth of the River St. Francis to the mouth of its south-westernmost branch, and from thence by a line drawn west into the point where it intersects the line of the highlands as claimed by the United States, and only from thence to pass along the said highlands which divide the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from those which fall into the River St. Lawrence to the north-westernmost head of the Connecticut River, thus abandoning altogether the boundaries of the treaty and substituting for them a distinct and different line of demarcation, it becomes the duty of the undersigned, with the most perfect respect for the friendly view of the Arbitrator, to enter a protest against the proceeding as constituting a departure from the power delegated by the High parties interested, in order that the rights and interests of the United States may not be supposed to be committed by any presumed acquiescence on the part of their representative near His Majesty the King of the Netherlands."

The award made by the arbitrator was submitted by the President to the Senate, who declined to confirm it, and recommended further negotiations. The technical ground upon which the Senate based their refusal, was, that the decision of the King was outside the order of reference; that he had abandoned the character of arbitrator and assumed that of mediator; and that the decision, not being in conformity with the submission, could not be carried into effect. The real ground of the Senate's refusal, as stated by the Secretary of State, was, that the State of Maine refused its consent to any compromise and insisted upon the boundary given to it by the Treaty of 1783, whatever that boundary might be. I refer to this part of the history of that disputed boundary, because the First Minister has undertaken to drag it into the discussion for the purpose of showing that the Government were warranted in repudiating the award made by the arbitrators. It in no way sustains his position. The King of the Netherlands was asked to construe the Treaty of 1783; he was asked to indicate a boundary in accordance with its provisions, and in his award he says: "This cannot be done, and I advise the parties to accept something else." The American Secretary of State does not object to the King's recommendation; he does not say that it is unfair; but he says, "We cannot get the State of Maine to agree to it;" and he intimates his regret that the arbitrator did not make his award without stating that it was not in conformity with the treaty. The arbitrators in this case made no declaration like that made by the King of the Netherlands. They did not say that they could find no boundary in accordance with the principles of public law, and with acts of State upon which a proper decision must rest. The whole subject was discussed. Everything which could be found bearing upon the case was considered. The contention of the right hon. gentleman and of the Hudson's Bay Company were known. The cases submitted by each party showed beyond all question what the issue was. The arbitrators do not suggest a conventional boundary. They do not say that they have been unable to find the true legal limits of Ontario. On the contrary, they say they were appointed for this very purpose, and they determine and decide that the northerly boundary is the Albany River, and the meridian of the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods is the boundary upon the west. They keep themselves strictly within the order of reference. They do not give advice; they pronounce a decision. It is perfectly clear, then, that this award is in no particular like that made by the King of the Netherlands, and yet in that case the United States Government did everything in its power to persuade the State of Maine to consent to the line suggested by the arbitrator. It is plain, then, that the contention of the First Minister is wholly erroneous. Let me here, however, remind him what was done in another case. By the terms of the British North America Act, the excess of the debt of old Canada beyond the amount assumed by the Federal Government was to be charged to Ontario and Quebec. Each was to appoint an arbitrator, and the Dominion Government was to appoint a third, and these three were to decide what portion of this excess was to be assumed by each of these Provinces. The arbitrators were appointed. They sat, and the subject submitted to them was investigated. Quebec was dissatisfied, and instructed her arbitrator to withdraw; and her Government said then, in that case, what the right hon. gentleman says in this, that there was no award. What was done? Did the Governments of the two Provinces throw the award to the winds, and go to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for a second examination into the merits of the case? Not at all. But they did submit this question: "Has there been any award, and is it binding upon the parties?" And the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council advised the Crown that a valid award had been made, and that the parties were bound. That is a precedent which the hon. gentleman might follow, if it can be possible that he has any doubt upon the subject. I do not say that it justifies an appeal, because that arbitration was not a voluntary one; but I say if he is resolved to break faith and appeal it points to what the issue should be. I do not speak for the Government of Ontario, but as a member of this House, and I ask the right hon. gentleman why he does not say to Mr. Mowat:

"I do not regard the award made by Sir Edward Thornton, Sir Francis Hincks and Chief Justice Harrison as a valid award. I do not think the Crown had power to appoint arbitrators to deal with this question without the direct and formal sanction of Parliament. I think the arbitrators went outside of the order of reference in making a decision, and I wish, for these reasons, to have a decision of the Judicial Committee upon the validity of the award."

My impression is, his wish would be gratified. The right hon. gentleman knows that that is the issue, and the only issue which he can raise at this moment. It blocks the way to every other, and if he believes he is right in his contention, he ought not to hesitate. If the decision is against him, the question is settled. If it is in his favor he will have cleared the way to the consideration of the whole question again upon its merits.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But Ontario offers to leave that to the Privy Council.

Mr. MILLS. There may be some offers made that have not been brought down to us. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Read the last despatch.

Mr. MILLS. I have read that. The Government in their despatch referred to a report made by a Committee of this House, and make a paragraph in that report an excuse for repudiating an award which cannot be disregarded without dishonor. I regret that time will not permit me to make a minute analysis of that report, and to show how utterly worthless it is. We know that a minority of the Committee declared that they had not even an opportunity of reading it. The chairman again and again put arguments instead of questions, secures from the witness an echo of his own views, and is almost invariably wrong both in point of fact and in point of law. The book, too, contains an immense mass of matter upon points wholly irrelevant. It contains opinions which are of no value, which are not evidence, and the men who gave them are separated by a hundred years from the events about which they testify. Let me invite the attention of the House, in the first place, to the testimony of some of the witnesses, and I will begin with that of Mr. Justice Johnson. I have no hesitation in saying that the evidence which he gave before that Committee was in the highest degree discreditable to him. He seemed to think that it mattered not whether his statements were true or false. Had an ordinary witness gone before Mr. Justice Johnson's Court and talked as loosely and as inaccurately, he would have been utterly discredited. He told the Committee that Lord Selkirk, in the first instance, acquired his title to the country which he claimed, from the North-West Company. Now, this was not true. Lord Selkirk obtained in June, 1811, a grant from the Hudson's Bay Company for the whole Basin of the Red River. The North-West Company never pretended to have any title to the soil. They contented themselves with denying the pretensions of the Hudson's Bay Company, who came to the country many years after the North-West Company had been established there. Mr. Justice Johnson informed the Committee that the "boundary of Upper Canada on the west was always considered to be the line running north from the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi. He told the Committee that the boundaries of Assiniboia extended to the boundary of Upper Canada, and that that was the Height of Land, a statement wholly at variance with the one which he had made before as to the boundary of Ontario upon the west, and wholly at variance with the grant. Mr. Justice Johnson said that the two law officers of the Crown in England stated that if the Crown saw fit it could establish Courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction in Assiniboia; and he argued that this declaration was entirely at variance with the possibility of its being a part of Upper Canada, because Upper Canada having been granted legislative powers, was vested with the right of constituting Courts for itself. Will the House believe that the law officers of the Crown do not make the slightest allusion to the colony of Assiniboia. The subject was not for one moment under their consideration. The law officers of the Crown discussed, in the communication referred to, the powers of the Hudson's Bay Company within their chartered limits; but they do not venture to state what those limits are. Mr. Johnson showed himself, indeed, strangely ignorant of the boundaries of the district which the Hudson's Bay Company in 1811 professed to convey to Lord Selkirk, and which he again, in 1839, surrendered to the Company. So much of Lord Selkirk's grant as was north of the United States boundary, they created into a colony, and the eastern limit was the Winnipeg River. Mr. Johnson says that the Colony of Assiniboia was recognized as a de facto Crown Colony, and this seems to have been an opinion which the Chairman was most anxious to elicit from several of the witnesses. Now, let me ask what is a Crown Colony? It is neither a charter nor a proprietary Government. It is an ordinary Provincial establishment, ruled by a Governor, appointed by a Royal Commission, and the extent of whose authority is set forth in the Commission and in the instructions which usually accompany it; and he is assisted in the discharge of his duties by a Council appointed by the Crown, but not by a representative Assembly. This was not the character of the Colony of Assiniboia. Lord Selkirk had obtained a grant from the Hudson's Bay Company in 1811, which included 116,000 square miles. The Company assigned to him not only their title to the soil, if they had any, but along with it, their powers of government within the limits of the district so conveyed. Could they do this? Could they, having been made by the Crown a charter government create another charter government for a part of the territory so conveyed? Was the colony of Lord Selkirk a proprietary colony, or was it a mere voluntary association. If I were compelled to choose between the opinions of Mr. Justice Johnson and the hon. member for Algoma upon the one side, and Mr. Spankie, Sir Arthur Pigott and Lord Brougham on the other. I should prefer to follow the latter. These distinguished lawyers say that—"The Company could not confer power upon Lord Selkirk to appoint Governors, Courts of Justice, or exercise any independent authority, nor could they, directly or indirectly, transfer their authority to him to be exercised by him in his own name. Supposing the grant of land to be such a grant as falls within the power of the Company to make, their superior Lordship and authority would continue as before and must be exercised through them."

This opinion is not only upheld by a consideration of the legal principles involved, but also by decided cases. In the year 1620, James I made a grant to the Duke of Lennox and others, known as the Plymouth Company of New England. The religious sect known as Brownites were driven out of England by persecution. They purchased from the Plymouth Company all the country along the coast from three miles north of the River Merimac to three miles south of the River Charles. They obtained from the Plymouth Company not only a transfer of the land, but an assignment of the Company within the limits which they had purchased. They were advised that they could not exercise, legally, the powers of Government which had been conveyed to them. They applied to Charles I and obtained a charter from him conferring upon them power to govern the colony. In the year 1628, the King granted a charter to Sir Henry Rosewell and others making them a body politic by the name of "The Governor and Company of Massachusetts Bay in New England." By their charter they were to exercise their powers of Government in England. They transferred them to America, to the actual settlers, which some years later was held to be ultra vires. In 1621, Captain John Mason obtained from the Plymouth Company a grant of the country which afterwards was called the Province of New Hampshire. The Colony of Massachusetts claimed the same country as included within her limits. She established her jurisdiction over it, and governed it for forty years. The contestants brought the case before the King in Council, in 1679. The case was decided against Massachusetts, but the Council advised the King that the Plymouth Company could not assign or delegate away their powers of Government, and that the consent of the Crown not having been given, Captain Mason had no political authority. The Crown recognized him as proprietor of the territory, and issued a Commission for its Government. I might give other cases, but these are sufficient. Whatever Government existed then in the Red River settlement was simply a voluntary association. There have been several such within the British dominions. After the re-assignment of the Red River Company to the Hudson's Bay Company, they might, no doubt, establish a Government professedly under their charter, which the Crown did not question, just as it did not question the authority of Massachusetts in New Hampshire, or in Maine, nor the authority of Lord Baltimore in Delaware, until a decision was sought; but I will say here that its authority never entered there, and if it did it was forfeited by an attempt to convey it away. The hon. member for Algoma asked the Hon. D. A. Smith a number of questions and addressed to him a number of arguments, many of which were wholly irrelevant. He said: "You, then, consider the height of land on the St. Lawrence watershed to be the southern boundary of the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company?"—Ans. "The Hudson's Bay Company have always held it to be so." Mr. Smith no doubt spoke of the contention of the Hudson's Bay Company of late years; but down to the period of the Treaty of Utrecht, they never put forward any such contention, nor did they for many years later. The hon. member for Algoma has undertaken to show that the whole of the country west of Lake Superior was called the Indian country, and the Act of 43 George III, which gave to the Courts of Upper and Lower Canada jurisdiction over crimes committed in the Indian territories, was enacted to meet the case of crimes committed in the territories awarded to Ontario. But no such instance can be found: both Lord Selkirk and the Right Hon. Edmund Ellice declare that the Act was passed in consequence of crimes which had been committed in the vicinity of Lake Athabaska. They said it was passed in consequence of contests between the two North-West Companies. Mr. Woden had been shot by one Pond, and was acquitted on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction in the place where the crime was committed. Lord Selkirk says that the immediate cause for the passage of the Act was the shooting of one King by Lamotte in the vicinity of Lake Athabaska. He describes the event as follows:—

"In the winter of 1801-2, Mr. John McDonald managed the affairs of the old North-West Company in the Athabaska country; Mr. Rocheblave, those of the new company in the same district. Mr. McDonald had under his command a clerk of the name of King, an experienced man, of a bold and active character, and of a herculean figure. Mr. Rocheblave's assistant was Lamotte, a young man of a respectable Canadian family, of a spirited and active disposition, but much younger and of less experience among the Indians, and not to be compared to King in point of personal strength. In the course of the winter two Indians arrived as deputies from a band with which both parties had had transactions, to inform the traders that they had furs ready at an encampment at the distance of four or five days march. King was sent with four men to collect those due to the old North-West Company—Lamotte with two men for those due to the new Company. Both of them were charged to use the utmost diligence and to defend the rights of their employers with courage. They set out accordingly on their mission, and great activity and address were used by each to get the start of the other, but without success on either side. When they reached the Indian encampment, both parties proceeded to collect the furs due to them, but King, by means of the superior number of his assistants, got possession of all the furs except one bundle which was delivered to Lamotte by the same Indian who had come as a delegate to the new Company. King then came to Lamotte's tent, accompanied by all his men, armed, peremptorily demanding that bundle also; threatening violence and declaring his intention to take the furs by force if they were not given up to him. Lamotte was determined to defend the property of his employers to the last extremity, and warned King, that if he ventured to touch the furs, he should do so at his peril. King, nevertheless, was proceeding to put his threats into execution and to seize the bundle when Lamotte pulled out his pistol and shot the robber dead on the spot. King's men would have revenged his death, but the Indians interfered and expressed their opinion that he had merited his fate. Though it would be difficult to quote an instance of homicide more decidedly justifiable, all Canada rang with the claims of the old North-West Company against this murder, as they chose to term it. It was upon this occasion that the Act of 1803 was obtained, under the idea that the case could not be brought to trial, though it might undoubtedly have been tried at Westminster under the Act of Henry VIII."

I think this is sufficient to show where the crimes happened which gave rise to the Act 43 George III. The hon. member for Algoma refers to the killing of McDonnell by Mowat, but that was six years after the passage of the Act, and the question of jurisdiction was not raised. The name Indian Territories was a name given to the British possessions in North America not included within the limits of any Province. The country between Georgia and the Mississippi was called Indian Territory, and so too was the country beyond the Alleghany Mountains. After the Province of Quebec was carved out of Canada by the proclamation of 1763, the remaining portion was called the Indian country; and when the Province of Quebec was enlarged by the Act of 1774 the Indian country was the British possessions which lay to the north and north-west beyond it. The Act of 1803 provides for the trial of persons who have committed crime in the possessions of the Hudson's Bay and in the Indian Territories, by the Courts of Upper Canada or Lower Canada. I shall not waste the time of the House by discussing the question of jurisdiction under the Act of 1803 or of 1821. Those Acts were passed for the purpose of providing for the punishment of crime committed in distant parts of North America, and it was no part of the duty of the Courts to enquire into the question of territorial limits where those limits had not been actually marked out, and especially when traders going to the unpeopled parts of the Provinces were exposed to the same dangers as in the country for which the Act was intended to provide. It is not by considerations of this sort that we can arrive at any conclusion as to the boundaries of Ontario. I purpose now to consider the limits given to the Province of Quebec by the Act of 1774. The right hon. gentleman has given to that Act a construction which, in my opinion, it will not bear, and which it can be shown would have defeated the object of Parliament, as set forth in the Act itself. It is a sound rule of construction that to interpret a law properly, it is necessary to look at all the surrounding circumstances. Let us do so in this case. Let us notice how this territory came to be a British possession; and how the Government proposed from time to time to deal with it, until they established the Province of Upper Canada. Both Great Britain and France claimed the country between the Alleghany Mountains and the Great Lakes. The dispute led to a war, and the war ended in the cession of Canada,—not precisely as it had been held by France, but as it was marked out by the 4th and 7th Articles of the Treaty of 1763. While Canada was a French possession, it included the country west of the Mississippi and north of the Missouri River. At the cession France retained that part of Canada west of the Mississippi River as a part of Louisiana, and gave up so much of Louisiana as lay east of the Mississippi, as a part of Canada. But all the territory claimed by France to the north and west of the source of the Mississippi, and over which the Governor of Canada had exercised jurisdiction, was surrendered to Great Britain, and when the Province of Canada is spoken of by the English Government, or in Acts of the Imperial Parliament, it is the territory that France surrendered, to which this appellation is given. After Canada had been ceded to Great Britain, and before the King, by his proclamation, established the Province of Quebec, that is between the 10th February, 1763, and the 7th of October of the same year, the country was called the Province of Canada. On the 30th April, 1763, the King issued a Commission to Henry Ellis, granting him the offices of Secretary and Clerk of the Council of the Province of Canada; and on the 23rd of September Nicholas Turner received a Commission granting him the office of Provost Marshal of the Province of Canada. In October, 1763, the King, by his proclamation, established the Province of Quebec, which was carved out of the Province of Canada with the following limits:—

“Bound on the Labrador coast by the River St. John and from thence by a line drawn from the head of that river through Lake St. John to the south end of Lake Nipissing, from whence the said line, crossing the River St. Lawrence and Lake Champlain in 45 degrees of northern latitude, passes along the highlands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said River St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, and also along the northern coast of the Baie Chaleurs and the coast of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosiers, and from thence crosses the mouth of the River St. Lawrence by the west end of the Island of Anticosti, terminates at the aforesaid River St. John.”

These were the original boundaries of the Province of Quebec. The intention was to limit as much as possible the territories within which the peculiar laws of France should govern the population. It was intended that the French settlements which were scattered over the remaining portions of Canada should be put an end to, and the inhabitants transferred to other colonies. Sir William Johnson, on behalf of the British Government, had promised the Indians that this should be done; and the Indians pressed upon them the fulfilment of their engagement. Lord Shelburne had proposed to establish three more colonies, one having its centre at Detroit, one upon the Upper Ohio, and a third in the Illinois country. But this view was resisted by the Lords of Trade and Plantations. Captain Pittman was sent to the Illinois country to take the Census, and to report upon its condition; and the Commandants at other points were required to give like information. In 1772 proclamations were issued commanding the French to retire within the jurisdiction of the other colonies. A considerable number of the French had retired west of the Mississippi. They built forts; they supplied themselves with ammunition and arms; and it soon became evident that they could be more easily controlled within the territory than outside of it, and the policy of driving them from the country was abandoned. Between 1763 and 1791 we have three distinct phases of English policy. First, the restriction of that arbitrary system of Government which had prevailed during the regime of France and which was confined in the Province of Quebec, within very narrow limits. Second, its extension by the Quebec Act to a large part, if not to the whole of Canada; and in the third place, its limitation again by the establishment of the Province of Upper Canada. It was the policy of most English Ministries to confine the English colonists to the east of the Alleghanies, and it was thought that this could in no way be so effectually accomplished as by the extension of French law over the whole country to the Mississippi. The French and English colonists had, for nearly a century, been engaged in border warfare, and the prejudice of the English colonists had been intensified by their long animosities. The State papers of the period also disclose that, as the English colonies grew more dissatisfied with the English colonial policy, the Imperial Government were more anxious to conciliate the French people. And, as indications of revolt became more marked, the Government at home resolved, in the end, to put themselves in a position by which the insurrection could be attacked on the one side by the fleet and in the rear by the French and their Indian allies. The English Government believed what had again and again been said, that, however much the French disliked England, they disliked her colonies still more. The policy upon which the Government had determined is as plain as noonday. Their reasons for that policy are equally obvious, and the preamble to the Quebec Act states this explicitly. It says that:

“There is a very large extent of country within which there were several colonies and settlements who claimed to remain there under the faith of the Treaty of Paris, who were left without any provision being made for the administration of civil government, &c.”

We have here a distinct indication of the purpose of the Act. It was to provide a Civil Government for the French settlements which were not provided for by the proclamation of 1763. As the Quebec Act was carried through the House of Lords it extended the boundaries of the old Province in this way:

“All the said territories, island and countries heretofore a part of the territory of Canada, in North America, extending southward to the banks of the River Ohio and westward to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward to the southern boundary granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay, &c, are hereby, during His Majesty's pleasure, annexed to and made part and parcel of the Province of Quebec as created and established by the said royal proclamation.”

When the Bill reached the House of Commons two objections were made to it. The one was that they admitted in this Bill that the territory which they proposed to annex had formed part of Canada, which they had denied in their controversy with France; and the other was, that they might embrace in such an indefinite description portions of New York. There was no attempt whatever to vary the policy of the Government. There was no attempt to give to the Province more restricted limits than those which the Government had resolved on. To meet the first objection they struck out the words, “heretofore a part of Canada,” and substituted the words, “belonged to the Crown of Great Britain;” and to meet the second objection, they defined a boundary on the south throughout its whole extent and described the country by its direction from this boundary to the country limiting it upon the north. Mr. Burke, the agent of New York, insisted upon having the southern boundary defined. New York had ceased to be a chartered Government, and had become a Provincial Establishment. A treaty not long before had been made with the Indians which made the whole western part of the Province an Indian reservation, and it was to prevent the western part from being included in the Province of Quebec that Mr. Burke insisted upon the boundary being laid down upon the south. Virginia claimed a large section of country north of the Ohio River as being within her charter. But the Bill, in order to protect her claim, provided that—“Nothing therein contained should in anywise effect the boundaries of any other colony.”

There is no room to doubt the meaning of this section as it originally stood. It is the territories, islands and countries that are extended southward, westward and northward. It will be seen, too, that from the word “Mississippi” to the end of this section, except a proviso of exclusion, no change was made in its original form. Now, to what does this word “northward” apply. Is it applied to the direction of a boundary line, or is it applied to the general direction of the country from a boundary laid down upon the one side to another British possession upon the opposite side? To me it seems plain that it does not apply to a boundary line. The first proposal was to describe the country, by describing its extension towards the four points of the compass, to ascertainable boundaries, southward to the Ohio, westward to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward to the Hudson’s Bay Territories. Now the only change made in the description, is this—instead of an extension in three directions you have an extension in one. You have a line drawn from the Bay of Chaleurs, which is to mark the eastern limit, to the Mississippi, the western limit, and between these two limits from the boundary so described upon the south, to the territories of the Hudson’s Bay Company, the territories, island and countries are to be annexed to the Province of Quebec. This gives an ascertainable northern boundary to the whole Province. Any other construction would leave the whole of the annexed territory without any boundary upon the north, and would leave the Province of Quebec with a boundary fixed by the proclamation of 1763. Let me make this further observation. If the word “northward” applies to a liminary line, it must apply to a line upon the south. No other line is spoken of in the section. The words are, “bounded on the south by a line.” Now, the word “northward” applies either to the countries, territories and islands, in which case the Mississippi must be the boundary upon the west, or it applies to the direction of this southern boundary line, the only one mentioned. If it applies to a line, then this is the construction, that the territories, islands and countries to be annexed are bounded on the south by a line which at first extends westward as far as the Mississippi, and from that point to the Hudson’s Bay Territories it extends northward. Hon. gentlemen cannot import into this section words which are not there, for the purpose of giving to it a meaning, which, without them, it will not bear. The direction of a western boundary cannot be given in the Act, for no western boundary is named. We point out the direction of what is set forth, and not of something not mentioned. We know that the word “westward” describes the direction of the southern boundary; and the word “northward,” if applied to a line at all, must describe the direction of this same line continued, because the Act speaks of no other. It is too plain to require argument that a southern boundary, deflected northward, cannot be a due north line; so that, whether this expression refers to the direction of the country, or to the direction of a boundary line, it cannot mean a line running directly north. To my mind the language of the section is perfectly plain. The plan of description in the section is easily understood; and if a long and parenthetic clause had not been introduced, to describe the southern boundary, the meaning could never have been mistaken. I have already pointed out that if the word “northward” is applied to the direction of a line, instead of to the direction of the whole country from a given base, the Province of Quebec, under the Act, from Lake Nipissing westward, would be left without any boundary upon the north. Now, you have, in a matter of doubt, this rule of construction, when one interpretation would leave an instrument imperfect or defective, and another would make it perfect, the latter is to be preferred; so that, if there is doubt, the construction which will give you a boundary upon the north is to be preferred to that which leaves the country on the north wholly undefined. I might let this question rest upon this rule of construction; but I will say further, that another rule of construction is, you must interpret a law so as to give effect to the intention of Parliament. What was the intention of Parliament in this case? It is stated in the Act itself; it says the object is to embrace, in the Province of Quebec, “all the French colonies and settlements in British North America who had been heretofore left without any civil government.” The number without civil government were 4,613. If a meridional line were made the boundary, 2,600 of this population would have still been left without civil government. By following the Mississippi all the French colonies and settlements are included in the Province of Quebec. The purpose of the Act is accomplished. By drawing a due north line more than half of them are excluded; the purpose of the Act is defeated. This, too, taken by itself would be sufficient to determine the proper construction. Then it is also a recognized rule that when a natural boundary is reached, it is to be followed unless there is an explicit direction to the contrary; in other words, natural boundaries are preferred to artificial ones. The Mississippi is a natural boundary, it was also an international boundary, and it is to be preferred to an astronomical line. The word “northward” embraces the whole sector of a circle, that is, any direction between north-west and north-east; if there is no reason for preferring one point of the compass to another within this sector, then the middle must be taken; but if there is, no matter how slight, the direction will be varied within these limits accordingly. Now, we have seen that the centre of this sector, here, is a due north line, and we have, as reasons for departing from this line, first, a natural boundary is reached. We begin at the Mississippi River. Second, it is required in order that the purposes of the law shall not be defeated. And third, this Act differs from an ordinary Statute in this—that it is an Act of State, and reasons of State must be given due weight in its construction. Now let us remember this fact, that the Mississippi River was the boundary between the possessions of England and of Spain. Can it be supposed for one moment, that Parliament would have provided a Government extending the territories westward for a thousand miles, to the very borders of the Spanish possessions, to the international boundary at one point—within sight of several important colonies and settlements—and yet so draw the boundary line, as to leave these colonies and settlements without a Government; leave a strip of country several hundred miles in length and, in many places, not fifty miles in width, wholly without any established civil authority. Such a supposition is possible in conception, but it is not reconcilable with reason, and, therefore, not reconcilable with law, especially the institutional law of the Empire. I have said that the Quebec Act is not an ordinary Statute, regulating the acts of private individuals. It is a great Act of State, established by the supreme authority, marking out limits within which a Government is to be established and over which it is to exercise authority. The great officers of State have construed the law. The King, under the advice of his law officers and Ministers, declared the boundary upon the west followed the Mississippi River to its source. When a large section of this Province was ceded to the United States, and it became necessary to issue a new Commission to the Governor of what remained still British territory, the new boundary upon the south was again declared to extend westward to the Mississippi River. I refer to these Commissions to show you how the King and his advisers interpreted the law. I shall say no more upon the subject of the western boundary. I have said enough to show you that from the confluence of the Ohio northward to its source the Mississippi was the boundary of Quebec upon the west. Before proceeding to indicate the northern limit it will be necessary to learn something of the dominion of the Hudson's Bay Company. If the word "northward" in the Quebec Act is made to refer to a limitary line, then that line is carried to the Hudson's Bay Company's possessions, and it there stops. No boundary upon the north is laid down between this point, wherever it may be, and the southern shore of Lake Nipissing. Quebec would still be bounded upon the north by a line drawn from the source of the St. John River to the southern shore of this lake, and there would remain, south of the possessions of the Hudson's Bay Company, and north of Quebec, a very large extent of country which was never transferred to Canada until effect was given to the proposal which I had the honor to submit to Parliament in 1878. I might, for the purpose of showing that this construction was never put upon the Act, refer to the separating line by which Quebec was divided. The extension of this line shows that there was a boundary upon the north. The Hudson's Bay Company received from the King a charter which professes to do two things, to give and grant to the Company the sole trade and commerce of all those seas, straits, bays, rivers, creeks and sounds in whatsoever latitude they shall be that lie within the entrance of the straits commonly called Hudson's Straits, together with all the lands and territories upon the countries, coasts and confines of the seas, bays, lakes, rivers, creeks and sounds aforesaid, that are not already actually possessed by or granted to any of our subjects or possessed by the subjects of any other Christian Prince or State.

"And that the said lands be from thenceforth reckoned and reputed as one of our plantations or colonies in America, called Rupert's Land; and, further, we do by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors make, create and constitute the said Governor and Company for the time being, and their successors, the true and absolute lords and proprietors of the same territory, limits and places aforesaid, and of all other their premises hereby granted as aforesaid, with their and every of their rights, members, jurisdictions, prerogatives, royalties, appurtenances, whatsoever, to them the said Governor and Company and their successors, as of our manor of East Greenwich, in our County of Kent, in free and common socage, beside the land so granted and beside the privilege of trading, and from the limits and places aforesaid. The charter goes on to say that they are to enjoy the whole and entire trade and traffic to and from all havens, bays, creeks, rivers and seas into which they find entrance or passage by water or land, out of the territories, limits and places aforesaid, and to and with all the natives and people inhabiting within the territories, limits and places aforesaid, and to and with all other nations inhabiting any of the coasts adjacent to the said territories, limits and places which are not granted to any of our subjects."

Now, there are two things spoken of: there are "the lands and seas conveyed in fee simple, with the right of exclusive trade," and there is "the whole and entire trade of other seas and waters, and with nations inhabiting the coast adjacent to the said Territories." We have these two enquiries: which lands within the Straits of Hudson were conveyed in fee simple by this charter, assuming it to be valid, and which lands lie upon coasts adjacent to the said Territories, and of which no conveyance was made, but over which a right of exclusive trade was granted? It is worthy of observation that the Hudson's Bay Company have for a long time so interpreted their charter as to leave no country upon which the second provision could operate. Their claims of territory granted has grown larger by degrees, until not only the whole coasts of Hudson's Bay, but also the whole basin drained into the bay has been absorbed. The grant in their charter to the property in the soil, has swallowed up all other provisions, as the rod of Moses swallowed up the rods of the Egyptians. We have several questions to consider in order to arrive at a correct conclusion as to the boundaries of the Hudson's Bay Company's possessions. Could the King grant the territories not in his possession? If this question is answered in the affirmative, could he make a grant that would stand in the way of any other monarch acquiring possession and sovereignty over any portion of the country so granted? The grant itself professedly excludes: 1st, any portion of the country possessed by any British subject; 2nd, any territory granted to any British subject; and 3rd, any territory possessed by any other Christian Prince or State. It has been argued that the King could not make a valid grant, because the country was not in his possession at the time the grant was made. When the French Government pointed out to the English that the French King had many years before granted a charter to his subjects of the same country, the Hudson's Bay Company replied that he could not make a valid grant. The maxim nemo dat quod non habet applied. I do not care to discuss just now the question of the validity of the grant. There can be no doubt of this, that no title passes by such a grant until the sovereignty of the country is acquired. We must look at the object and policy of such grants in order to understand their effect. They were invariably accompanied by a grant of political authority; and the private right of property was always held subordinate to the public trust which accompanied it. The policy of making these grants began with Henry VII and were continued until the time of George II. In many cases they were powers rather than grants of property already in the possession of the Crown. Where the Crown had not already the sovereignty of the country these grants, in form, profess to convey very extensive tracts of country; but they were held not to convey more than the parties to whom the grant was made succeeded in reducing to possession. The law and the usage have been so well established with regard to these formal grants, that I need but refer to a few instances to sustain this principle. In the time of Henry VII, in 1495, the King granted a charter to John Cabot empowering him or his deputies to sail into the eastern, western or northern sea to search for islands and countries before unseen by Christian people; to affix the banner of England on any place that he or they might discover, and to possess and occupy the country so discovered as the vassals of the English Crown. The patent was one by which Cabot was to acquire a paramount title for his master and a lordship for himself. At the time America was discovered feudal usages still strongly marked the political and social structure of western Europe. England had recently held extensive possessions in France connected with her according to feudal principles. Ireland and Wales were subordinate Governments, and within England herself there were several Palatine counties which suggested the method by which the dominions of the King were to be extended. Cabot sailed along the coast of North America from 56° to 38° north latitude. He made no settlement, and his patent was not held to have conveyed to him anything. Elizabeth, in 1578, granted a charter to Sir Humphrey Gilbert. By it he was authorized to discover and take possession of all remote and barbarous lands in North America not occupied by any Christian Prince or people. But this was not held to rest in him the whole of the unsettled portion of North America, but so much only, as he secured to his Sovereign by settlement and dominion. Under this charter he took formal possession of Newfoundland in the name of the Queen. He and his associates endeavored to carry out the objects of the charter. He failed; and he was not regarded as having any right of property in the Island, in consequence of this grant. The grant which was made to the Plymouth Company and to the London Company, extending from the Atlantic to the South Sea, were not supposed to convey to them more territory than they reduced to possession. New York, which was patented to the Duke of York, lay within the limits of the country formerly covered by the charter of other parties. The principle which I have stated shows that the title of those parties was not so much the patent from the Crown as their arms and their merchandise; and we must look, not to the charter, but to what they accomplished under it, to ascertain what their title was, for it is not simply the extent of territory which they claimed, but the extent of dominion which they secured for the Crown by their energy and enterprise, that we have to consider. The Hudson's Bay Company had upon the shores of Hudson's Bay at the time their charter was granted but one post, Fort Rupert, on Rupert River. The King's patent, I suppose, may have conveyed to them this post with a reasonable area of territory within its vicinity. What more they acquired down to the time that their possessions were seized by France must be determined by a careful consideration of what they did and of what was done by France. I deny altogether that the King could convey to them by this charter a title to territory which was not only at the time not in possession of the Crown, but of which the company before the Treaty of Ryswick had not reduced to possession. From 1697 to 1713 the country along the coasts was in the possession of France. It was not possible, after this period, for the Company to acquire any fresh dominion on their own behalf. All the country which they had ever held looking towards Hudson's Bay was to be restored and no more. What they had held then at any time before 1697, was ever after the extent of their possessions. Their grant was a grant within the Straits of Hudson. They claimed it as extending from Grimington Island to Lake Mistassin. Before the Treaty of Utrecht, they made no claim to the ownership of the country south of the Bay. They were content with a claim to the exclusive trade.

Mr. BANNERMAN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if this Treaty of Utrecht that he is talking about was not later than that?

Mr. MILLS. What I stated a moment ago was a proposition of the Hudson Bay Company. It was accordance with the line drawn upon the map. The instructions of the English Commissioners were also in accordance with a similar line. The opinion given by Sir Arthur Pigott, Mr. Spankie, and Mr. Brougham, is a most carefully considered opinion. They say that the grant was not intended to comprehend all the lands and territories that could be approached through Hudson's Straits; that it is limited by its relation and proximity to the Straits; that it is not a grant of all the lands and territories upon the countries, coasts and confines of the seas and rivers within the Strait, to an indefinite extended distance. Still less is it a grant of all the lands lying between the seas, straits, rivers, &c., hundreds of miles away from the Straits. There is a point stated in the opinion of Mr. Holroyd which is of vital consequence in the consideration of this question, and which has been wholly neglected by those who are working to uphold the authority of the Hudson's Bay Company. They assume that the whole country must belong to the Hudson's Bay Company, unless it was previously held by the French King. Now, that is not the fact. If the doctrine, which I have already stated as the policy of those charters, is well founded, then the charter given to the Hudson's Bay Company could no more stand in the way of the French subsequently acquiring dominion, than the former charter, given by the King of France, could prevent the English reducing any part of the coast to a British possession. Mr. Holroyd says the charter will include all the country within the grant not at the time actually possessed by the subjects of any foreign Prince, and which have not been subsequently possessed by any foreign State previous to actual or virtual possession being taken under the charter. The charter could not convey the North-West Territories until the Company had actual or virtual possession of them on behalf of themselves or the Crown, and so as, by the law of nations, to vest the Sovereignty in the Crown. It could not stand in the way of France extending her dominion over this country. The charter to the London Company extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific, but whoever heard of that that charter prevented Spain from extending her sovereignty over Northern Mexico, or France from acquiring possession of Louisiana? Who will undertake to show the boundaries of Virginia by looking to the charter by which the Old Dominion was first constituted? It is absurd to do so. North America was open to all Europe to acquire. Each nation might undertake to establish its Sovereignty over any portion of it, in conformity with the law and usages of nations. Any monarch might say to a number of his subjects: "I will give you an exclusive charter to the whole continent, between certain parallels, subject to rights already acquired by other of my subjects, subject to rights already acquired by another Prince and another people." But while he excepted, as he was bound to do, vested interests, his charter had no force against subsequent settlement within these limits by any foreign Government. Another Prince might give a charter of exactly the same character to his own people either before or after; and if, under that charter, his subjects did not enter upon territory in actual or virtual possession of another State, they were acting within their rights. France was as free to take possession of the North West against the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company as she was to take possession of Louisiana within the chartered limits of Virginia. By the Law of Nations a title by discovery is an imperfect title; a title recognized by courtesy, by forbearance, and it must, within reasonable time, be supported by possession in order to make it valid and to establish the sovereignty of the discoverer. This is the doctrine of England. It was asserted in the time of Elizabeth. It was asserted by England in reference to her disputes with France relating to their possessions in North America. Mendoza, the Spanish Ambassador, when he remonstrated against the expedition of Drake, was told by Elizabeth:—

"That she did not understand why her subjects or those of any other European Prince should be deprived of the traffic in the Indies; that as she did not acknowledge the Spaniards to have any right by the donation of the Bishop of Rome, so she knew no right that they had to any places other than those they were in actual possession of. For that their having touched here and there upon a coast and given names to a few rivers and capes, were such insignificant things as could in no wise entitle them to a proprietary further than in parts where they actually settled and continued to inhabit."

The Lords of Trade deny that the mere grant of a charter, without possession, can be admitted as having any force. In a communication to the King in 1721, they say that—

"A charter without possession can never be allowed to change the property in the soil."

And they point out that the French are now seeking to extend their territory by the erection of forts instead of relying upon their charters. In the year 1719, Commissioners were appointed to settle the boundary agreed upon under the Treaty of Utrecht, and they were specially instructed—

"In wording such articles as shall be agreed on with a Commissary of His Most Christian Majesty upon this head, that the said boundaries be understood to regard the trade of the Hudson's Bay Company only; that His Majesty does not thereby recede from the right to any lands in America not comprised within the said boundaries; and that no pretension be thereby given to the French to claim any tracts of land in America, southward or south west of the said boundaries."

This statement is as explicit as it can well be, that the boundary line which the Government proposed to draw under the Treaty of Utrecht, was not to be a line separating the dominions of England from those of France, but a line relating to the trade of each with the Indians. The English Government took, in fact, this position that the country between the settlements of Canada and those of Hudson's Bay was still an unoccupied wilderness, one which was still not so far possessed by either as to be under its dominion, and that this question of dominion was one to be settled by the energy and enterprise of Frenchmen and of Englishmen in the future. Now, with this rule before us, as to the means of acquiring and extending sovereignty, let me look at the facts dealt with by the Treaty of Utrecht. By the tenth article of that Treaty the King of France agreed to restore to the King of England, to be possessed in full right forever, the Bay and Straits of Hudson, together with all lands, sea coasts, rivers and places situate in the said Bay and Straits, and which belong thereunto. No tracts of land or of sea being excepted which are at present possessed by the subjects of France. It is agreed on both sides to determine within a year, by Commissioners to be forthwith named by each party, the limits which are to be fixed between the said Bay of Hudson and the places appertaining to the French; which limits both the British and French subjects shall be wholly forbidden to pass over, or thereby to go to each other by sea or by land. These are the provisions of the Treaty of Utrecht which relates to the surrender of the country in the vicinity of Hudson's Bay to the English. Was this to be a division relating simply to trade, or was it a division relating to the sovereignty of the country? I shall assume that the parties to the Treaty intended that the sovereignty of the country should be divided and that the surrender to the English was a surrender of the sovereignty of the shore of Hudson's Bay, and I shall undertake to show that the places retained by France, called in the treaty places appertaining to the French, were north of the watershed, and the boundary was to be a line drawn between them and the English places on the shore of the Bay. The French plenipotentiaries at first objected to this clause of the treaty, because it might receive a more comprehensive meaning than the parties intended. Mr. Prior, in writing to his Government, said:

"As to the limits of Hudson's Bay Company, and what the Ministry here seem to apprehend, at least in virtue of the general expression, tout ce que l'Angleterre a jamais possédé de ce côté là (which they assert to be wholly new and which I think is really so since our plenipotentiaries make no mention of it) may give us occasion to encroach at any time upon their dominions in Canada, I have answered, that since according to the carte which came from our plenipotentiaries marked with the extent of what was thought our dominion, and returned by the French with what they judged the extent of theirs, there was no very great difference, and that the parties who determine that difference must be guided by the same carte. I thought the article would admit of no disputes."

Now this letter assists us in rightly interpreting the tenth article of the Treaty of Utrecht. It shows that the French were afraid that the English might claim under the expression, "all that England ever possessed on that coast," a part of their dominions of Canada. They were not afraid that the English would cross the watershed; but they were afraid that the country between Abbitibbi and the Bay; between their ports upon the Albany and the Bay, and other sections of the country which the French held as part of Canada and the shores of the Bay, would be claimed by the English. The plenipotentiaries had before them a map by which those who determined the difference, were bound to be guided. They were not to draw a line nearer to the Bay than that drawn by the French, nor further away than that drawn by the English. Mr. Prior tells us that there is no great difference between those lines. The line drawn by the French is described as follows:—

"The line of separation should commence at Cape Bouton, pass through the middle of the territory which is between Port Rupert and Lake Nemiskaw, of which Père Albanel Jesuit and Mr. De St. Simon took possession in the name of the King in 1672, follow at the same distance from the Bay along the eastern side in such manner as to divide in the middle the territory between the Lake of the Abbitibbis and Fort Monsipi or St. Louis, continuing at a similar distance from the shores of the Bay at the western side until beyond the river of St. Therese and Bourbon."

Cape Bouton is about the 61° of north latitude. The line drawn by the English was from Grimington Island in 56½° north latitude, south-westward to Lake Mistassan; beyond this no line is described. When the negotiations were opened in 1719 the English Commissioners disregarded their instructions, and demanded that the line should commence upon the coast 2° farther south, and should be continued to the 49th parallel. The negotiations came to nothing, nor was it expected they would. The lines upon the map by which the Treaty of Utrecht was to be interpreted, were wholly disregarded in the English demands. Mr. Pultney, in writing to Secretary Craggs, admitted that he never expected any success, that the French view were opposed to the English; that their interests were directly opposite; and that the French knew that they (the English) were prepared to reject all their demands. If we look at the settlements, or trading ports, it becomes pretty clear that the line which it was proposed to draw, was a line similar to that drawn by the Treaty of St. Petersburg upon the western coast, a line which would leave to the English a moderate extent of country in the vicinity of the bay for the protection of their post, but which would not encroach upon the French posts in the interior. The line was one which neither was permitted to cross for the purpose of trade, but which was not intended to interfere with the freedom of trade by the Indians, remaining in the possession of either party. The charter of the Hudson's Bay Company was put an end to by the Treaty of Ryswick. The restoration of their possessions would not restore to them the franchises or the rights of property which that charter gave them. The mere possession acquired by the success of arms during a war does not amount to absolute sovereignty, but when it is followed by treaty there is a complete change of sovereignty and the political rights, the special privileges and the right of property, which reposes upon dominion, all go together. The Hudson's Bay Company claimed of late years, the whole Basin of Hudson's Bay; but they have not ventured to contest the possession of the valley of the Red River in Minnesota and Dakota. The Treaty of Ryswick terminated their chartered rights. The restoration of the Bay, and the land upon its border, to the Crown, could not revive the charter of the Company. The case of the Duke of York is a case in point. A patent had been given to James, of New York. He governed the country under it for nine years. The Dutch obtained possession of it, and established there a Civil Government. At the Treaty of Westminster it was restored to the King of England. The Duke again claimed the country, but it was held that his proprietorship had been extinguished by the Dutch conquest and Government; and that the title, after restoration, was in the King alone; and a second patent was necessary to give him any title to the country. Great political corporations are, by the Law of Nations, put upon a wholly different footing from private non-political holders. Their right of property and their powers of Government are inseparable, and they pass away together. Whatever dominion the Hudson's Bay Company subsequently acquired was a dominion for the Crown. I will rest content with simply stating this proposition, which, if time permitted, could, I think, be easily established. In 1809, when the country on the east of the River St. John, as far as the Labrador shore, was, by an Act of the Imperial Parliament, again severed from Lower Canada, and re-annexed to Newfoundland, it embraced the whole country northward to the Hudson's Straits. It included the whole coast to the 61° of north latitude. So far as I know, the Hudson's Bay Company never made any protest against this Act, and yet it included a large section of country which they have always claimed was granted them by their charter. After the Treaty of Utrecht the Hudson's Bay Company had no other claim than that which actual occupation of certain posts gave them. They had again and again offered to accept the Albany River as a boundary. They say that rivers are more certain and obvious than lines of latitude, and can be better laid down in a wild country. They had at no time before the Treaty of Utrecht, proposed to extend their boundary further southward than Lake Mistassin, which is in the latitude of James Bay. They proposed that the French should not come beyond the 53° of north latitude or the Albany River on the west. When the British Government hoped to again so obtain a controlling influence on the North American Continent, they proposed to establish a great Province in which the people would be governed according to the principles of the British Constitution. The customs of Paris were to be confined to the country east of the Ottawa River. A boundary line was extended northward to Hudson's Bay, and all that portion of Canada to the westward and southward of this line to its utmost extent was to be included in the new Province. The deadly wound which had been received by the loss of the American colonies was, by this new establishment, to be healed. It was the first step in beginning colonization anew, by which a great British power was again to be founded. The description does not say that all Canada is to be embraced, but all to the westward and southward of the boundary named, and you have but to look at the map to see that the Albany River is a natural boundary upon the north. The expression is not due west or due south, but westward and southward. Due west and due south are directions which would exclude the whole peninsula west of Cobourg to the Detroit River, and on the north the boundary would cross the Albany River at about its middle distance. But the rule which I have already mentioned makes the Albany River, as a natural boundary, preferable to an astronomical line, and justified the arbitrators in declaring it to be the boundary. I shall not detain the House longer. I have said enough to show that the course taken by the arbitrators was a reasonable one. To show that if they erred at all it was in limiting Ontario on the west to the meridian of the North-west Angle; to show that in making the award they set forth what they believed to be the true legal boundaries. The Province of Ontario will stand by that award. She is entitled to do so. What it gave her the law itself gives her, for that award is final and concludes the parties to it. It cannot be repudiated without dishonor. No man will consent to have his property ruthlessly and illegally taken from him. No more will two millions of people. There is not a man from one end of the Province to the other who does not know that the Prime Minister has been driven on in this policy of spoliation by his Quebec colleagues. They refused to recognize that we are one Dominion, and that the growth and prosperity of any Province is an advantage to every other part of the Dominion. They envy us our rights, and they would filch from us a portion of our heritage. I can tell the First Minister that whether the people of Ontario be for his policy of high taxation or whether they be against it, whether they approve or disapprove of his land policy in the North-West, they will disregard all these to protect their Province against robbery to gratify the envious. There will be no two parties upon this question, and the very same feelings and impulses, which make us all one people to resist foreign invasion, will make us one people to resist to the death this attempt at dismemberment; and the man from Ontario who upholds the policy of the Government, no matter what his views may be on the question of the Tariff, will be regarded as an enemy of his Province, and when the day of election comes will receive at the hands of the people an enemy's reward.

Mr. DAWSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. MILLER

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 3rd April, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE OFFICIAL REPORTS.

Mr. BÉCHARD, in the absence of Mr. STEPHENSON, moved that the first report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Reports of the Debates of the House be adopted. He said: I may explain that the Committee at their last meeting decided that hereafter the French translator shall be paid on the completion of his translation on the deposit of his manuscript with the Clerk of the Committee, less 25 per cent. to be retained until the completion of the work. It was also decided that the French manuscript be sent to the printers through the Clerk of the Committee, who shall take a receipt therefor from the printers. It appears that the printers are behind in their work, and it was thought better to adopt the plan I have mentioned, so that Mr. Audet may be paid as his work proceeds, less, of course, the 25 per cent.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is a change in the contract, is it not?

Mr. BÉCHARD. It does not affect the contract with the printers.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. But Mr. Audet, as I understand, has to revise the printing and attend to the matter when it is printed.

Mr. DESJARDINS. By the contract there is a drawback of 20 per cent., and it is now proposed to have a drawback of 25 per cent., in order to secure the fulfilment of the contract in its entirety.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But, as I understand, this report from the Debates Committee recommends a change in the contract. I suppose the Committee carefully considered the question as to whether any change of that kind would invalidate the contract in any way.

Mr. BÉCHARD. The Committee were unanimous.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The translator himself also consented.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It appears to me, from what the hon. gentleman says, that the change suggested is a reasonable one, and is only carrying out the original design of the contract, which was to pay for the work done as it progressed, and if any party outside of and unconnected with the translator delays the work, of necessity or from any cause whatever which the translator cannot control, I think it is only reasonable that he should be paid as he completes his part of the work. The proposition, I may say, entirely commends itself to my judgment as one that is only fair; but I ask the hon. gentleman whether the Committee had considered the effect that this alteration would have on the contract itself?

Mr. McDONALD (Cape Breton). The change does not affect the validity of the contract at all. At present 20 per cent. is withheld from the French translator until the printers work is finished. That was found to be inconvenient to the French translator, and it is suggested that, on the completion of his work in manuscript, and on the certificate of the Clerk of the Debates Committee, he be paid three-fourths of his money, the remaining one-fourth being paid on the completion of the work by the printer.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I may say that the Chief Translator has agreed to this change, so that the contract is perfected by the consent of both parties.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Has the translator given security?

Mr. DESJARDINS. He is at present leaving a drawback of 20 per cent. as security that he will complete the work; but the Committee, with his consent, agreed that a further 5 per cent. should be kept as security for proof-reading, correction of the printing, and the completion of the whole work.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I call attention to a proposition in the report to add $300 to his compensation.

Mr. DESJARDINS. That is not for the Chief Translator. That is for Mr. Boyce, who was employed to assist the head of the Hansard staff; and for the work he is doing, such as the making of an alphabetical index, proof-reading, and so forth, it was thought that it would be fair to add $300 to his salary, as he has been receiving only $500.

Mr. STEPHENSON. In connection with this matter, I may say that Mr. Boyce is a practical man, thoroughly up in his business, and it is thought that we should have a first-class index. Letters have been sent to me as Chairman of the Committee, recommending certain gentlemen who have made indexes. Last year the index was not as satisfactory as it should have been. Mr. Boyce understood that he was employed during the Session only, at a salary of $500. We took the matter into consideration, and we decided that, in order to have a first-class index, he should be retained long enough after the Session to complete it, and in consideration of the extra work he would have to perform, and the ability he has manifested, we recommend that he should have an increase of $300. We think that by doing that we are doing what is right and proper, not only towards Mr. Boyce, but towards this House, because we think we shall save the money we give him by the amount of work he gives us. Therefore, the Committee unanimously agreed to recommend that Mr. Boyce should have this increase of salary.

Mr. BLAKE. I observe that the report calls attention to the plan of reporting, on which I should like some explanation from the chairman. I should like to know whether in the type which is kept standing for three days subject to any corrections that a member sends in, there is any correction or revision by the Hansard staff or the editor, supposing no corrections are sent in by a member. I make that enquiry, because I observe that the same difficulties exist this Session that I called attention to in a former Session, namely, that, so far as I can judge, either in the transcription of notes or the proof-reading, there are a vast number of errors in those copies sent round, and those members who happen to be in the position which I have been in this Session, of not having time to correct these errors, will find the record of what they have supposed to have said very different indeed from what they did say.

Mr. STEPHENSON. This matter was before the Committee at its last meeting. On investigating the whole matter we found that the printers were in fault, and also that the delay in publishing the revised edition was due, in a great measure, to the delay of members in sending in corrected proofs of their speeches. If hon. members would send in revised proofs in accordance with the plan devised by the Committee—which is the plan adopted at Washington in the publication of the United States Congressional Report, our revised Hansard would be got out much earlier and in better form than it can be otherwise. I must say that the first copy set up had not that careful correction, so far as typographical errors are concerned, and we have endeavored, as much as possible, to have that defect in the printing remedied. I think hereafter the first copy will be, in that respect, more correct than in the past.

Mr. BLAKE. I was not at all complaining of the restriction as to the time in which members should send in their corrections, but I was pointing out that there were a vast number of mistakes in the daily issue, as far as I could judge, both in the writing out of the reports and in the printing, through imperfect proof-reading; and I was enquiring whether any, and if so, what steps were taken by the Hansard staff or the editor to correct those mistakes in the case of members who, like myself, have not sufficient time to make their own corrections.

Mr. STEPHENSON. I have endeavored to put this matter in proper shape, and I think that the chief of the Hansard staff understands the matter. If the first issue be not more correct in the future than it has been in the past, we will take what steps we can to have any defect remedied.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, I will take the opportunity offered by this motion to call the attention of the House to the considerable delay existing in the translation, and especially in the printing, of the French portion of the debates. I think that at the present time the French translation is more than a month behind, and as the debates of this House are public documents, which are distributed not only among the members, but which are sent to the representatives of the press, and which circulate throughout the whole of the country, I am of opinion that those who speak the French language, for some reason or the other, are not served with the same punctuality and the same good-will apparently exercised in serving those belonging to another nationality. I do not say that any ill-will is shown, but the system is certainly defective, and it ought, I think, to be remedied. I have not the intention of suggesting a remedy, but all that I have to say is that if this system continues to be carried out, a decided opinion will be given expression to in this House against a system hampered with so much inconvenience. As for myself, when this question comes before the House, if the evils I have pointed out are not seen to, I will consider it my duty to vote against the existing system.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). My hon. friend from Montmagny is quite right as to the delays in issuing the French copy, but to remedy that we have called attention to the delay on the part of hon. members in sending in their revision of their speeches. The reports are supposed to be put on our table by three o'clock the next day. Every hon. member then, who has interest enough in what he has said, or whose time is not too much taken up otherwise, is supposed to make the necessary corrections in his speech, and send it back to the Hansard room, whence it is sent to the printers, after which the editor compares the corrected copy with the proofs, in the revised form. Then only can this copy go to the French translator. If the rule laid down, and referred to in this report, were followed, there would be but little difficulty in getting out the French issue. If the corrected reports went back to the printer within three days after the revision of the speeches, the corrected reports would be immediately put in the hands of the translators, who could translate them the next day, and within a week at the latest, the French copy, completed, would be in the hands of the members. The difficulty has arisen from the fact that the printers and the Hansard staff have been unwilling to authorize the final printing of those speeches, the revision of which had not been sent by the hon. members who delivered them. The object of calling the attention of the House now to this is that the House may be made aware of the determination of the Committee to have the rule hereafter as strictly observed as possible. I may say, in answer to the hon. member for Durham, that even where an hon. member does not send in a revision of his speech, it is the duty of the Hansard editor to carefully revise that speech before it is finally printed, but it will be seen at once that no editor can possibly correct errors of fact or figures that may occur in the report of a speech. He can only correct the typographical errors or incorrect phraseology. Therefore, it is desirable that hon. members should, at least, glance over the first report of their speeches, not to correct typographical or other minor errors, but to see that any figures or statements of facts have been correctly reproduced. As to this increase of $300, the object is to have more efficient indexing and editing. In the first instance, Mr. Bradley, the head of the Hansard staff, was supposed to revise the reports, edit them, and make an index. It was afterwards found desirable that he should take his place at the reporting table on the floor, and as no one person could do the work of reporting and the other work as well, all this other work devolved on Mr. Boyce, who had previously been engaged for the Session, at a salary of $500, as assistant to the Chief Reporter, to do the routine work of the office. Mr. Boyce, therefore, last Session read the proofs for press, finally revised the reports before they went to the printers, and made up the index from day to day. At the end of the Session he left, as he had a perfect right to do, having been only engaged for that period. But, at that time, the printing of the revised English copy was nearly a month behindhand, and the index had, therefore, to be completed by Mr. Bradley, who, not being familiar with the plan adopted by Mr. Boyce, continued it in a different way, and on that account the index was not as satisfactory as it ought to be. The object now is to have Mr. Boyce continue at work on the index after the Session, until the Hansard is got out in its finished form, and we believe that the index will then be much more satisfactory than it has been in the past. To enable the French copy to be got out promptly, but one thing is necessary, and that is that the members should understand that their speeches will go to press within three days after delivery. If, through want of time, or through indifference, they do not revise their speeches, and those speeches should contain, in their final form, any errors, hon. members will have only themselves to blame, because, with the difficulty of hearing, through the noises that sometimes prevail, and from any other cause not blameable to the reporters, it is exceedingly difficult for the reporters to follow with absolute accuracy the arguments of hon. gentlemen. I do not think it is too much to ask of hon. members that they should glance over, within those three days, their speeches; though, should they not do so, the duty of the editor is to read them over a second time with the view of making them as perfect as possible. I believe a very considerable degree of blame this Session is due to the printers. They have been overcrowded with work, as we can see by their delay in furnishing returns. It is with great difficulty, apparently, that they have been able to accomplish that work. I do not think they have a large enough staff. They may perhaps be unable to get all the men they want. They have the contract at very low prices, and as the wages of printers, like other wages of skilled mechanics, are going up, they may find difficulty in getting the work done as cheaply as they think necessary. There are twelve days' of corrected proofs in the hands of the Hansard editor which have not gone to the printers. From that fact it will be seen that the printers themselves are largely to blame for this delay.

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker, I am not acquainted with the details of that contract with the stenographers; I merely look at the results. For my part, I must say that I admire the zeal and the devotion of the stenographers who report the debates in this House, but, on the other hand, I think that the existing system is very defective. The Hansard should not be the verbatim report of everything that is said in this honorable House; there is no country in the world where such is the case. The Hansard should be a succinct and complete résumé of all that is said; thus, at the end of the Session, we should not have an immense volume, and we should not be compelled to wade through seven or eight pages when we wish to find an idea. I think it is the duty of hon. members of this House to revise their speeches in such a manner as to eliminate therefrom all that is not absolutely necessary. I might quote as an instance of this what takes place in the Province of Quebec. We have there a Hansard prepared by a single man, Mr. Desjardins, and, en passant, I regret that our librarian should not have seen fit to procure a copy of it for our use, but I would fain believe that this is quite an involuntary omission on his part, and that it is shortly to be remedied. That report is not a complete reduction of what is said; it is a résumé, but we find all that we require. After all, what is the Hansard? It is a faithful record of the opinions of members as expressed in this House, which is to be of use to us next year and in years to come. Now, I think that were this better understood by hon. members of this House, we should have at the end of the year a more useful and less voluminous book to refer to. I must add that we have ever found that the Hansard staff show both zeal and capacity in reproducing the speeches made in this House. As to the French version, we are told that it is in the hands of the printer, and that it is he who is behindhand. This, no doubt, does credit to the French translator, but there should be a way of compelling the printer to better execute his contract. The Province of Quebec is desirous of having its reports as early as the other Provinces; I hope that the Committee which looks after this matter with so great a care, will henceforth be more watchful than ever, and will give the printer to understand that if he cannot fulfil his contract, steps will be taken to relieve him of it and to give it to one who will do his duty better.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I wish to say one word with regard to the Quebec Hansard. This is no doubt a very excellent publication, and one of very great value; but it by no means is a report of what takes place in the Legislature, and, moreover, it does not appear for three or four months after the Legislature rises; in fact, it is made up from reports in the newspapers and of speeches which are handed in by hon. members themselves to a very large extent, with, of course, some work done by Mr. Desjardins as well. I may mention, in this relation, that I had occasion, the other day, to look into the Quebec Hansard for the report of a very interesting discussion which took place on the subject of disallowance in connection with the Mines Bill of the Province of Quebec. It was a matter of very great public interest at the time, but I found the whole thing disposed of in about half a column, which was really not a report at all. I judged from this, that the gentlemen who spoke on this subject were gentlemen who were not in the habit of writing out their speeches and sending them in, and consequently they were not fully reported, although a description of the debate, as given in the newspapers, appeared. Besides if we adopted the Quebec plan, we would not probably get our reports for six months after the Session closed.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I wish to call the attention of my hon. friend, the member for the County of Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) to the following fact: The object of the House, in having reports made of the debates, has been to have a daily and complete record of its sittings. No doubt it was found that there were some inconveniences arising from this publication, but when it was sought to try another system, that of getting the reporter to give a résumé of the debates, greater difficulties were encountered, and the complaints made by members at the time, had the effect of causing that plan to be abandoned. So to-day, in conformity with the instructions of the House, we are determined to give as much as possible an authentic report of the sittings, and this report, when corrected, forms the volume which is published at the close of the Session. Were we to adopt the suggestions of my hon. friend, we should be compelled to give up the daily record which is of great use. Moreover, I may observe that it has been decided that the speeches should be published in this record, in the language in which they were delivered; thus it becomes impossible for us to have the report of the speeches in French day by day, as is done in the case of the English speeches.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. Speaker, I may say that the principle has been well settled in this House, that we are to have full reports of our proceedings; and if this is the case, I think that it is money well spent to ensure the perfect accuracy of these reports, and also to ensure their being promptly printed and laid before us. There are objections to the present system of having roughly drafted reports first published, and then placed in the hands of members for revision. This is, however, I think on the whole, a better plan than to put the manuscript in the hands of members. One will not be likely to improve as largely upon printed reports as they might if the manuscript were in their hands. There are, of course, enormous difficulties attending the translation of the notes and the editing of Hansard, unless it is done by those gentlemen who take the notes themselves. It is obvious to every one, who has had reports of his speeches in his hands, that there are extraordinary mistakes which take place from the fact that those who afterwards correct the reports were not present at the time that the debate was in progress. It would be almost impossible to obviate this disadvantage unless some person skilled in the political questions of the day were retained for the purpose of revising these reports. The Quebec system, to which the hon. member for Cardwell has referred, would be simply of no use at all here. It would be of no value. It would be much better to depend upon newspaper reports—to take partizan reports on one side, and partizan reports on the other side, and then to strike a happy medium between the two, and consider this the authority which we should follow, than to adopt such a plan. When questions so important as are discussed in the Parliament of Canada are before us, I think it is desirable that there should be an authentic record of the utterances of members. I also think it is desirable that the original first draft of the report should go into the hands of members, and this should be promptly returned, with such variations as it may be absolutely necessary to make. I have no doubt that any gentleman who has been in the habit of trespassing on the labors of the reporters—and I may be considered one—will be very glad to hurry over the report, and get it back into the hands of the reporters as soon as possible. I wish, while I am on my feet, to bear general testimony to the accuracy of the reports, and I desire to warn hon. gentlemen, if we are to depend on this system, and have made up our minds to make it a permanent system and a permanent establishment in this Parliament, that we must be prepared to pay for the first-class talent which we employ remunerative and fair prices. There is no reason in the world why these gentlemen, who are at our bidding, and who are engaged in a most laborious duty, which involves special knowledge, which is a very rare talent, and a talent that very few possess—reporting accurately by sound—should not be fairly and liberally compensated, and it is not fair to them if this is not done. It is a very small matter to the country at large, while it is a very important matter to us, that we should have, and ensure as far as we possibly can, the utmost accuracy in regard to the reporting. It is, and must be, quite evident, that if there is any lack of that accuracy, the largest abuses may occur in tampering with the text after it is produced and sent to the speakers; but if the very best and most accurate reporters are employed—and I wish to say that we have been enabled to secure very accurate reports—no man would presume to interfere with the text to the extent of making any important change in the meaning, or too extensive interpolations; but without the employment of first-class reporters, men were compelled to fumble for one's meaning and drift through sentence after sentence, as many are probably compelled to do, and then the report was still imperfect, leaving the whole matter open to the same objection that lies with regard to compiling reports in the manner which my hon. friend from Cardwell has just stated. I think that nobody could lay down a better plan than that which now obtains—as nearly as possible the securing of a written photograph of the debates which take place on the floor of this House; this is of the greatest use to gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber. It fastens—absolutely fastens—the responsibility, which we ought all to be willing to assume for any of our utterances here, although an exception may be made in the case of the gentlemen who claim that they are not bound this year by what they said last year. But we, on this side of the House, do not make any such contention. We are willing, whatever we say, that it shall be put down with the utmost accuracy, and to abide by it afterwards, although, of course, in the symbols used by shorthand writers, the negative is often stated in the place of the affirmative. It is also known that unless there is great attention paid to the connection of extracts and figures and of such statements as the reporters depend upon being furnished with, confusion will ensue; and it ought to be impressed on the gentlemen who sit on this floor and take down the debates, that they should use the utmost care whenever an extract is read, and whenever anything bearing on the question under discussion is produced, that they should note such catchwords as will enable them to trace out these extracts and identify them; so that no abuse may be perpetrated on us by having the authentic record, or what ought to be the authentic record, garbled, or in any way tampered with, while in the hands of those who may find it in their interest to make statements of one kind, and then to change them, as was the case in one instance, which may be familiar to many of us—where reports, which were read studiously on the floor of this House for one hour, were as studiously repressed in the edition of Hansard—as we found was the case when we came to look for those extracts. This is a kind of abuse to which Hansard is liable, if such guards as reporters well know how to use are, notwithstanding, thrown about it, in order to prevent the occurrence of anything of this nature. I observe that my hon. and genial friend opposite (Sir Albert J. Smith) smiles at this statement; and this is the reason why I shall be compelled to explain what I did not intend to say. I say now, Sir, that the hon. gentleman, by the complainant smile his features wear has compelled me to state that a gentleman who is not in this House at the present moment, but who sits besides the hon. member for Westmoreland, suppressed in Hansard page after page, extracts from Blue-books, in which he endeavored to belittle and decry the condition of things in the North-West. Only Archbishop Tache's extracts remain. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will smile a little more, but I will tell him that of nearly one hour's studious reading in this House, absolutely no trace appears in Hansard that came out the next day or the day after that. If the hon. gentleman admires that kind of thing, and feels like laughing at it, he is perfectly welcome to his satisfaction. The hon. gentleman is always happy and always genial, and we are always glad to see him enjoy himself, and no doubt he is glad and enjoys the fact that he has brought out from me this statement with regard to his quondam leader. This statement is within the memory of every hon. gentleman in this House, who listened with pain to the studious attempt of that hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) to make an under bid for the support of his party, when he found that power was slipping out from under him, and that a cabal was working against him. These are the facts, and perhaps the hon. gentleman, having heard this explanation, will favor the House by rising to explain, or to contradict the statement. We shall be very glad to have an explanation or a contradiction from the hon. gentleman on that side of the House. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman is not in his place when I make this statement. He is fully able, I presume, to make the explanation which occurs very readily to him when any case of this kind presents itself against him. I also regret that the attitude of the hon. member for Westmoreland was such that I was compelled to say what I did not intend to utter with respect to his quondam leader, when I rose to my feet; but I wish again to state, I think that this side of the House is in perfect accord with any liberal measure which may be made in order to secure the most accurate record of our debates. I believe that the Committee have taken every pains to employ the very best men that can be found in the country; and I say that the fault rests with ourselves if, having these gentlemen, we are not able and not willing to pay them sufficiently, and have to depend upon lower qualifications for reporters, because there are reporters and reporters; there are some who understand public matters; who have a quick intelligence; who are perfectly accurate in the manner in which they are able to reproduce the words of the speaker, and who have sufficient practical knowledge and intelligence with regard to the public questions of the day to enable them, if they accidentally do not catch accurately the literal phrase of the speaker, to supplement it with sufficient accuracy as to express his meaning; and this is all we want. I would be very glad if it were possible to have a report put into my hands of anything which I may utter on the floor of this House, so perfect that it would not be necessary to touch it either with pen or with pencil. But, of course, there are always small inaccuracies which must be corrected, and most gentlemen who speak in this House will agree with me that it is an immense labor to read word after word, and line after line, and correct technically the proofs of our speeches, as we are sometimes compelled to do, and I think I may state here, that much inaccuracy and immense difficulty in connection with the report must arise in the compositors' department. There should be an accuracy in the proof-reading, which I think we ought to insist upon with the publishers of the debates, and I am of opinion that my hon. friend from Cardwell will appreciate that, and agree with me, when I say that the greater part of the trouble we have in looking over and revising the reports lies in correcting the technical errors which we cannot allow to pass, which are obvious and which every man ought to be able to correct himself. No man in reading a proof like that ought to let the word "scenes" stand for "seeds" or the word "grave" for "grain," or any words of this kind to remain unchanged, for we know perfectly well that if we do not revise them they will not be corrected in the final issue, and will thus escape alteration. I believe I utter the sentiments of both sides of the House when I say I wish to put on record the great confidence we have in the present staff and in the editor, who is a very painstaking and competent and intelligent gentleman, and I believe that it is money well spent—if we are to have the system at all—to get the most perfect accuracy that can be possibly obtained; and any gentleman who has had occasion to look back to the Debates of 1874, and go through that bulky volume, will perceive the comfort experienced by those who like occasionally to look back and refresh themselves regarding what has happened during the last eight or ten years, in having a big volume, with a good index, knowing exactly where to turn in order to find the little inaccuracies, on the part of our enemies, of which we like to make use when we are making political speeches. The Committee, I am satisfied, are endeavoring in the very best way they can find, to remedy any of the slight difficulties which may still occur, and I am satisfied that this House is only doing its duty towards those hon. gentlemen in sustaining them in any of the propositions which they may make, and in sustaining them in the very moderate demand which they have made on the House.

An hon. MEMBER. The member for Lambton has entered the House and you had better repeat your statement.

Mr. PLUMB. I am challenged to repeat the statement which I made on the floor of the House a few moments ago, in the presence of the hon. gentleman who has just come in, and who says, in that complimentary manner which is habitual to him and which has characterized all his utterances towards me during the last five years, that I am put up to make speeches in this House. This is the first time that this has been said, and that hon. gentleman is the only hon. gentleman who has ever ventured to state that an independent member of Parliament was put up to speak on a subject, which is a subject of great public importance, and a subject about which every man has a right to speak, and to form an opinion, and concerning which every man who is an hon. member of Parliament may be presumed to have formed his independent opinion, as the hon. gentleman himself, I have no doubt, has formed his independent opinion on it, without any party bias. I will say before the hon. gentleman himself, what I was induced to say by the superserviceable interference of his hon. friend who sits at his left hand, that, in reference to the reports, there should be the greatest care taken by the reporters to use certain catch words in respect to extracts, so that they could be easily identified and easily found; and I stated also that it had happened, probably for the sake of economy and making the report smaller, possibly for the sake of not trespassing on the patience of those who were to read them, large and copious extracts from the Blue-books which were produced in the House of Commons upon a memorable occasion by my hon. friend who is looking toward me, were suppressed in the Hansard and not published, and I never say anything behind a man's back that I am not ready to say to his face.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have not the slightest intention of replying except to one statement of the hon. gentleman, that I suppressed some report. I have never looked at the Hansard report this Session since I came into the House.

Mr. PLUMB. It was not this Session at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Then I say the same as to the last Session.

Mr. PLUMB. It was not the last Session at all. The hon. gentleman sometimes protests too much; this time he has protested too little, and I can only say that it is useless for him to attempt to make any statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I did not at first know to what the hon. gentleman referred. I supposed he referred to some report in the present Session, and then to some report of the last Session. In regard to the passages the hon. gentleman refers to, when I received the report from the Hansard there was not a single word of those extracts in the report sent me, and I was not going to search from the volumes again to find these extracts for the sake of putting them in.

Mr. PLUMB. Well, Sir, those extracts had a most important bearing upon the value of our great public domain in the North-West, as they were based upon the arguments of the hon. gentleman who was then leader of the Reform party; an argument of the utmost importance, as it had reference to the whole question of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway and of the policy of his party; and I say that the hon. gentleman ought to have seen that those reports were properly put in the public records. I say the hon. gentleman owed it to himself, having produced those reports and having read them for nearly an hour—and the hon. gentleman does not pretend to deny it—I say he ought to have seen that they were properly put in the record for the House. The hon. gentleman never would have condescended to have read these reports unless he wished to have them form a permanent record of his statements in respect to the value of the North-West lands. Oh, no! it was not necessary afterwards that the value of those lands should be stated. It was seen afterwards that they should be called worth $4 per acre, as my hon. friends opposite called them, or $8 or $10, as they have been called by ourselves. It was necessary to show that the Conservative Government was squandering millions upon millions by giving away the North-West, bound hand and foot to a grasping, soulless monopoly, who had 25,000,000 acres out of 200,000,000 acres, and were compelled to open their lands by the railway, and make over 640 acres which they got to give value to the 640 acres that the Government alongside of them had reserved. The hon. gentleman should have seen to it, when he observed, when the Hansard was brought back to him next day, that these reports were not in it—not even a word of them—he ought to have reprimanded the reporters; he ought to have insisted that the reporters should put in his utterances. I can tell the hon. gentleman that there was a surprise on this side of the House, which I can scarcely characterize or describe, when it was found finally in the Hansard that not one word of all the statements, except Archbishop Taché's, was left in the Hansard at the time he occupied three-quarters of an hour in the reading of them; and it was melancholy to see him do so at that time, when the present hon. leader of the Opposition, his successor, brought in his famous resolution, when he moved down from the back benches, where he had sat alongside of the hon. member for East Northumberland, where he took his seat in proud humility until the opportunity arose for him to strike. I thank the hon. member for Westmoreland for having, with that bland smile of his and that incredulous look towards me, compelled me to say what I am now saying on the floor of the House. I was not intending, of course, to do so—I was provoked to do so—and I can tell the hon. gentleman that some day or other they will find nemo impune lacessit.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). I am sure, as a member of the Debates Committee, I am exceedingly thankful to the hon. member for Niagara for the number of valuable hints he has given us as to the proper method of managing that Committee, also for the compliment he has paid us for its management thus far. Were I a reporter on the floor of the House I would also, in my heart, be very thankful to the hon. member for Niagara. I think if the reporters are only amenable to the influences which actuate the ordinary mind, the chances are that after being bespattered with so many compliments, the speeches of the hon. member for Niagara will be reported even better hereafter than before; and the reporters also will not be troubled with so many emendations as he has usually made in his reports, and, as a matter of consequence, the hon. gentleman's name will go down to posterity associated with all that is elegant in diction, all that is chaste and polished in composition. I know that the hon. gentleman wishes to leave not only the impression in this House that he is an orator of the first water—if I can use such a term in this connection—but he wants to leave the impression upon the face of the Hansard that he is also a literary genius of the very highest order. As a matter of course every proof that the hon. gentleman receives of his speech is emended, polished and gilded, shall, I say, until it will put Longfellow to the blush. I do not know that even Thackeray, in his most polished sentences, could place in type, in gold or metal, such classic, chaste and exquisite utterances as they fall from the pen of the hon. member for Niagara after he has delivered his speech. That is, of course, a liberty that few hon. gentlemen in this House take to the same extent which my hon. friend does. Speaking for myself, of course, I am full of weaknesses, and, like my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, of grammatical errors. I sometimes have to plead guilty to faults of that kind, but there are no such errors in the speeches of the hon. member for Niagara, not after they appear in the Hansard, but of weaknesses as they fall from his eloquent tongue. Whatever lack of unity there may be in the structure of his sentences, or whatever want of force there may be in the adjectives with which he qualifies his statements, when these are all adjusted and readjusted, and put in the crucible of that brilliant intellect which is encased in the cranium of my hon. friend, they come forth chastened and refined, like gold the seventh time, and thus they appear in the Hansard with such force that, if the Hansard should be blotted out from the records of this House, or should disappear from the shelves of our libraries, it would be a greater loss to the world than the burning of the Alexandrian Library. I hope no such calamity will befall future generations. I hope no such calamity is in store for myself, for in my leisure hours, when I want to delight, as I sometimes do, in reading entertaining literature, I shall want to place my hand upon the volume containing the speeches of my hon. friend for Niagara where I shall find, upon all subjects interesting to humanity, everything that is pure, chaste, noble and refined. I shall be very sorry if the hon. gentleman's name should not appear on the pages of Hansard. However, in passing from the character of the hon. gentleman's speeches, I am afraid I shall not be able to make the same remarks as to the statement he has made in reference to the speech of the hon. member for Lambton. That hon. member charged the hon. member for Lambton with suppressing his speech. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. If the speech was suppressed the reporters suppressed it.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not say he suppressed it.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). The hon. gentleman made that statement. I took it down, and he reiterated the statement.

Mr. PLUMB. No.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Unless it is expunged from Hansard it will appear as the statement of the hon. gentleman, who now wants to take it back. It is not true. The hon. member for Lambton said it was not true. I wish to repeat the denial in order that the hon. gentleman may be careful as to the accuracy of his statements in future. If the hon. member for Niagara would do what he charged the hon. member for Lambton with doing, it would be sometimes an advantage. Instead of suppressing an extract, the hon. gentleman, if I mistake not, inserts extracts in his speeches or enlarges extracts as compared with those delivered on the floor of the House.

Mr. PLUMB. It is not so.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). There was a certain speech delivered by the hon. member which was printed and circulated extensively over and above the edition we have in the form of the debates, in which extracts were inserted at much greater length than were any extracts read by the hon. gentleman on the floor of the House. I have a very distinct recollection of that fact; I hope I am not misrepresenting the hon. gentleman by stating what is my recollection of his speech. If that statement be accurate, I think the hon. gentleman is much more to blame for inserting lengthy extracts in his speech than was the hon. member for Lambton in refusing to give quotations which he could not be expected to give, and which the reporters might have taken down themselves. The hon. gentleman claimed, in criticizing the hon. member for Lambton—and it is very kind on his part to notice us on this side of the House—that he (Mr. Plumb) occupied the position of an independent member. I never heard the hon. gentleman make that claim before. I do not think the claim is a good one. If I mistake not, the hon. gentleman moved a resolution the other night at the suggestion of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. I may be mistaken, but I have an idea it was suggested by the hon. gentleman. I know his imagination is brilliant, but I do not think he is original, and that the idea of moving it would have entered his mind; as a matter of political tactics he could not have conceived it. So if my premises are correct, the hon. gentleman is scarcely an independent member. I think he was set up to do that work. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will rise and explain, and perhaps he will deny that statement; but I have another proof that the hon. gentleman is not an independent member. I remember last Session when the resolution was moved by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby), in favor of machinery for the manufacture of beet-root being imported free, the hon. member for Niagara supported very strongly the resolution as being in the interests of the country, and of a very important industry; I remember with what eloquence he appealed to the House in behalf of a new and rising industry, the manufacture of beet-root sugar, and the matter was very well put, as is the hon. gentleman's practice. However, when the leader of the House came into his place and cracked his parliamentary whip, one of the most ready members to fall into line was the independent member for Niagara. The very resolution which he defended on the floor of the House with his usual eloquence he voted against, and if hon. members will look in the Hansard, that repertoire and depository of great sayings and of epigrammatic statements, they will find that the hon. gentlemen spoke on one side of the question and voted on the other. Of course, the hon. gentleman is an independent member; of course, he is so independent as to be perfectly justified in speaking on one side of a question and voting on the other. I am sorry to occupy the time of the House unnecessarily, but I could not refrain from following in the same merry mood that was adopted by the hon. member for Niagara. I hope in the future, when the hon. gentleman refers to members of the Opposition, he will be sufficiently considerate not to charge men with acts they have not committed.

Motion agreed to.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER announced that he had received from the Returning Officer of the Electoral District of New Westminster a certificate that Joshua Attwood Reynolds Homer, Esq., had been duly elected to represent that district in this House.

The hon. member was introduced by SIR LEONARD TILLEY and SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that in admitting Joshua Attwood Reynolds Homer, Esq., to take his seat upon the certificate of the Returning Officer, this House still recommends a strict adherence to the principle of requiring the production of the usual certificate of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, of the return of the writ of election.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

THE TEMPORALITIES FUND.

Mr. SHAW moved the third reading of Bill (No. 66) to amend the Act intituled: An Act to incorporate the Board for the management of the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, and the Acts amending the same. He said: Although this Bill has been discussed at considerable length in Committee, and has been before the House for some time, I find that in regard to it there seems to be some misapprehension respecting the facts. I shall, therefore, make a short statement of those facts without reference to the several provisions of the Bill. It is well known, I dare say, that this fund, which is in dispute, arose from the settlement of the Clergy Reserves in this country—a fund which at one time amounted to $509,000—and that it was the property of the Presbyterian Church in Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. After the Clergy Reserve Act was passed, on the 18th of December, 1854, by which the Government granted the money to the church, the Synod of that church met and determined that the fund should be commuted. The Government of that day had a provision in the Bill, permitting a commutation to be made by each clergyman, but they desired that that commutation should take place through the church, and not through the individual members. The Synod formed a basis on which the fund should be commuted, and appointed commissioners to take charge of the fund and administer it, as that could not be done by the church, because it was not a corporation, but a voluntary body. In order to carry out their views, an Act of the old Province of Canada, 22 Victoria, Chapter 66, was obtained, incorporating the Temporalities Board for the management of this fund, and that Board managed it for several years. Under the arrangement agreed upon among the clergymen entitled to a share of the fund, each received an annuity of $450, those clergymen who became beneficiaries between the time of the passing of the Clergy Reserve Act and the time of the passing of the Act incorporating the Temporalities Board, that is, between 1853 and 1858, some eleven in number, received $400 each; and those afterwards put on the roll received $200 each. The original commuters, who received $450 each, were seventy-three in number. Negotiations afterwards commenced amongst the several churches in favor of a union, and after Confederation of the Provinces, it was determined, if possible, to form a union of all the Presbyterian Churches in the Dominion. After a discussion of the subject for several years, the Synods of all the different churches finally resolved upon it. It was determined upon by a large majority of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, and was agreed to by all the presbyteries of that church, with the exception of one in Nova Scotia; it was also agreed to by 140 out of 150 congregations of that church, so that it may almost be said to have been determined upon unanimously. It was known, however, that this fund, which was managed by a particular Board appointed in a particular way, could not be legally administered by a Board appointed by the new church without legislation, and, therefore, previous to the completion of the Union, application was made to the Province of Quebec in February, 1875, and to the Province of Ontario in December, 1874, for the necessary legislation; they believed that these were the proper bodies to whom to apply for such legislation. Under clause 92 of the British North America Act, relating to property and civil right, the legislation was obtained in both cases, and the Union was formed on the 15th of June following. I wish hon. members to bear this in mind—that they did not form a Union and afterwards apply for legislation to confirm it, but they applied for legislation first, and never would have gone into the Union had they not obtained that legislation and, as they supposed, power to control that fund and to appoint the Board to administer it. They contended then, and they contend still, that the fund was carried into the Union by the Synod of that church, that they retained control of the fund, but they knew that they could not administer it, and that the new church could not appoint members to the Board, because that Board was formed under an Act of Parliament, and the fund had to be administered in a particular way; and the Privy Council, the highest Court in the empire, decided that the members of this Board appointed by the new church had no power to control the fund. They did not determine, however, to whom or to what church the fund belonged; they carefully excluded that point from their judgment. The judgment of the Privy Council states:

"The appellant also seeks to have it declared that six reverend gentlemen, who, at and prior to the Union of 1875, were members of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, have ceased to possess that character, and that they have no right to the benefits of the temporalities fund; and he concludes for an injunction against the respondent corporation making any payment to them. Their Lordships are of opinion that these are matters which cannot be competently decided in the present action. Their decision depends upon the answer to be given to the question, which church or aggregate of churches is now to be considered as being or representing the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, within the meaning of the Act 22 Victoria, Chapter 66."

It will be observed that the Privy Council did not determine that question. We contend that that fund went with the Synod, and that the Synod had control over it; and we say that that position is fortified by the Act 22 Victoria, Chapter 66, which constitutes that property the property of the church and not of private parties. The preamble of that Act states:

"Whereas it hath been represented to the Legislature of this Province, that it is desirable that provision should be made for the management and holding of certain funds of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, now held in trust by certain Commissioners, hereinafter named, on behalf of the said church, and for the benefit thereof—"

The enacting clause, after mentioning the names of the Commissioners appointed under the Act, provides:

"And they and their successors shall be able in law to take, have, and hold and enjoy, possess and retain, and shall henceforth have, hold, enjoy and possess, in trust for the said church, and for the aforesaid firstly hereinabove specified uses, all moneys, debentures, bonds, bank or other stock and securities, which are now held by the said hereinbefore named parties as trustees or commissioners of the said church, in trust for the said church."

We say, therefore, that that fund belonged to the church and that the Synod controlled it; we say further, that the amounts of stipend paid to the several clergymen are guaranteed by that Act, as well as by this Act which we have introduced; and it was upon the faith of these Acts that these parties went into the Union. At the end of seven years it is found, by the decision of the Privy Council, that the opinion formed at the time of the Union by the different Legislatures, as to the extent of their powers, was unfounded, and we have to accept the situation. We ask to have this Act of 1858, by which this fund was placed under the control of Commissioners, amended in the same way as it was asked to be amended by the Acts of the Legislature of Ontario, passed in 1874, and of Quebec in February, 1875. We say that it is fair to these parties that this should be done. We relied upon the action of these Legislatures, and the Board entered upon the administration of this fund, and have administered it ever since, in accordance with these several Acts. The faith of the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario are respectively pledged to that body to carry out these several Acts. Any deviation from that would be looked upon by that large body as having placed them in a very unfair position. The only objection that I have heard used in regard to this is, that it trespasses upon private rights; but my view of that position is, that it is very different to interfere with the right of a private party to his own money, or his own land or goods, than to interfere with a fund which had been dedicated for specific purposes. This fund was not private property. It was handed over to a particular church, with the object, no doubt, of teaching a particular doctrine; and when that church, by change of opinion, or by desire to unite with other churches, does so, the trust is not placed in a position different from that originally intended. There is no difference in the doctrine of the different Presbyterian bodies, and the object of this fund was to promote the teaching of the doctrine expounded in those churches. If the position is so altered that those doctrines could not be properly taught unless this fund go in the direction of the vast majority, Parliament should intervene and see that the fund be not misappropriated; and if it were not applied to the purposes of that large body it would be destined to go in a direction not originally intended. We know that in any country where a fund is provided for a specific public purpose, Parliament may intervene to see that the original intention of the founder is carried out. We ask that, and we think the request is a fair one. They say this is a robbery and spoliation of the fund. These are very strong terms, and I most certainly regret that they should be used, because I think there was no attempt on the part of this large body to do anything but that which was fair and right towards the minority. The Bill goes far in that direction. It makes the annual stipends of these parties the first charge. If I am right in supposing that when the Synod went into the Union the property went into the Union, and that those who remained out had no title to the funds, and the fact that this Act provided that although they did remain out they should get their stipends, be protected in their rights, and have the first lien on the trust fund, sufficient is shown to prove there is no desire on the part of the majority to act unfairly by the minority. It is said the minority want a division of the fund. But the different commutators and beneficiaries have to be protected out of this fund. It is made a first lien. If a certain portion of the fund is handed over en bloc to the minority, that would be unfair to the majority. The latter could not use this in the way they would desire; they must use it, under the Act 22 Victoria, Chapter 66, for the purpose of paying the stipends of the original commutators, and subsequently the beneficiaries who were placed on that fund, and it would be unfair towards the majority to place the minority in a better position than the majority. On the other hand, it has been said the fund should be divided according to the numbers that were upon the roll in 1875 at the time of the Union.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). Hear, hear.

Mr. SHAW. I hear the hon. member for Hastings say, "hear, hear." I hope he will listen to what I have to say in respect to this, and if he does I believe he will come to the conclusion that the position I take is the correct one. If the fund should be divided, as they desire, seven to twenty-seven, and if there were 73 when the fund was created, it would be unfair towards the twenty-seven. They seem to go upon the principle that those who survive are the heirs of those who died. We say that the church is the heir of those who died, and that the survivors have only a right to their life interest. Supposing that it was divided the other way, and, I think, all went in but seven, then it would be seven to seventy-three, and, divided in that proportion, would give them about $32,000. Now, that would not pay the stipends of the seven commutators, and I do not believe they would consent to it, except, perhaps, one or two who would be willing to take a sum en bloc, and desire to cease connection with the church. But the interest on $32,000, capitalized at 6 per cent., would only be some $300 each.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings). You admit they are entitled to $33,000.

Mr. SHAW. I do not; I have not admitted that at all. I am speaking of an argument that has been used in favor of a division. I say they are not entitled to anything; they are not entitled even to the stipend of $450 a year, but the Bill provides they shall have it, that it shall be made the first lien upon the fund. Now, divide it according to churches, divide it according to congregations, and the same difficulty arises. We therefore say that the only fair way of treating these commuters is to provide for the payment of their salaries; in fact, place them in the position that they occupied before in regard to the fund. Now, we should give them representation upon the Board of Management; they are not entitled to that, but we concede it to them in order that there may be no complaint of hardship. Now, I have heard something about pending lawsuits in regard to the appointment of these Commissioners, and I understand a writ of quo warranto has been issued requiring the Board to show under what authority it administers this fund. We contend the United Church owns the fund, and as it is administered under an Act of Parliament by which the appointments are made in a particular way, appointments made in any other way cannot be legal, that is the reason we are here, so that so far as these suits are concerned they need not be taken into consideration. These two writs I understand were served before the beginning of the proceedings in this House, and I understand other actions have been commenced, but I do not think we should consider them after we have commenced legislation. Another objection is that it interferes with the property of private congregations throughout Ontario; that in cases where the church is conveyed by deed to certain trustees for the benefit of the Presbyterian Church in Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, it may be difficult to decide to what church the property belongs. Now, I do not think there is any difficulty on that point. I believe the Ontario Act provides for cases of that kind; at all events this House has no power to legislate in that direction. That property belongs to congregations in Ontario, and any legislation that will affect their position must be obtained in that House. All we are doing here is to legislate in regard to that particular fund. The proposition we make in this Bill goes no further than that, it does not refer to any other property. Those difficulties may be overcome in the Legislatures of Ontario or Quebec, as the case may be; but I take it there is no power here to legislate respecting it. With these remarks I move the third reading of this Bill.

Mr. AMYOT (in French) moved in amendment:

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with instructions that they have power to amend it—

1st. So as to give the petitioners a corporate or legal existence, and everything necessary thereto or resulting therefrom.

2nd. So as not to adjudicate in relation to the property in, or the administration of the fund claimed by the petitioners (the Temporalities Fund), and so as to leave to the tribunals of Justice duly constituted and competent in that behalf, the duty of declaring to whom the property and administration of the said fund belong.

Mr. Speaker, the motion which I have the honor to make, has been for me the subject of special study. We have before us a most important question which affects an amount exceeding $500,000 and about 500,000 of our population. We are asked to decide once for all to whom is to belong the principal part of the property of an old established church. The speaker who preceded me, gave us the historical aspect of the question, but I do not intend to follow him in all these details. I think that the whole question can be summed up in a few words. There was a church styled

Mr. SHAW.

"The Presbyterian Church in Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland." This church came into possession of property derived from the Crown. The clergy of this church were free to appropriate this property to itself, but instead of so doing, it resolved to leave this property forever in the hands of the church, for a special purpose, for determined objects. A kind of contract was entered into between the several parties constituting that church. Later, a part of that church—the majority, I must admit—expressed a wish to form a union with other churches; steps were taken, the question was gone into, and, finally, the Union was accomplished by the majority, but not with the unanimous consent of the church. The question then arose whether a majority that forms an alliance with, or a kind of coalition, or of union with other churches, can compel the minority to follow it, or whether, if the minority which remains firm and steady in its own church has the right to say to the majority: "Change if you will, but I remain as I am." The question, therefore, to be ascertained, is whether the majority, in thus withdrawing its allegiance from the Metropolitan church, can compel the minority to follow it. The question has come before the Local Legislatures under most extraordinary circumstances. At first an Act was entirely refused, owing to certain influences unknown to the public, but at last Acts of incorporation were granted. The minority was not prepared at once to give up its rights and claimed protection from the Courts of law. The case has gone through all the Courts. In the Court of Appeal of the Province of Quebec, two Judges expressed themselves as strongly as possible, and held that the majority, in consummating the Union, had not taken with it the property of the church, what is called the Temporalities Fund, but that, on the contrary, the minority which had remained intact and complete, had preserved its rights over the property. The matter was taken to England, and there it was decided that the laws passed by the Local Legislatures were unconstitutional. In deciding this question, the Privy Council took care to remark that it did not decide to whom belonged the property of that church. This is what it said:

"The appellant, in his application to the Court below, asks a declaration to the effect that the fund in question is held by the respondents 'in trust for the benefit of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, and for the benefit of the ministers and missionaries who retain their connection therewith, and who have not ceased to be ministers thereof, and for no other purpose whatever.' It is obviously inexpedient to make any declaration of that kind. It would be a mere repetition of the language of the Act of 1858, by which the trust is regulated, and would decide nothing as between the parties to the present suit."

Consequently, the Privy Council declined to decide as to the property, but it tells us that the question is a judicial one, and that there will be cause for much litigation if the Federal Parliament does not interfere. The majority now comes to us and says: "The Privy Council has decided that legislation is necessary, so now it is your duty to give all to the majority." This is a strange interpretation. Has the minority not the right to come to this hon. House and say: "The Privy Council has decided that legislation is unnecessary, so now it is your duty to give all to the minority." And why should it not enjoy a like privilege. The majority having failed before the Privy Council, now comes before this Parliament and asks it to legislate. It says: "Give us a legal existence, give us the Temporalities Fund, and approve and confirm all that we have done since we have acted illegally." For my part I am not ready to pronounce on that point. I am not prepared to say whether the majority is right or wrong, nor am I ready to say whether the minority is. When we are sitting on Private Bills, we hold a legislative and at the same time a quasi-judicial position. Now, I will ask hon. members what information they are in possession of with regard to the past of these churches, to enable them to adjudicate on this property which is worth half a million. Which of the hon. members of this House, even those who have followed the discussion in the Private Bills Committee, is now in possession of facts, of authenticated figures, concerning these churches which will enable him to render judgment in a judicial capacity and render a judgment worthy of a judge presiding over the tribunals of our country. Mr. Speaker, we are asked to use our power to take the property of the one and to declare that it belongs to the other. We are asked to do that which does not exclusively, but almost exclusively, belongs to the Courts of law. I am too great an admirer of constitutional and representative institutions to wish in any way to take from the rights and prerogatives of this Parliament. I admit that this Parliament, according to the expressed opinion on that very question, would have the right to abolish that which is noxious, and to create anew that which is in danger of perishing, to direct towards new ends that which time has rendered useless, and that notwithstanding the customs and the express desire of the founders who gave this property to that church. I admit that there are certain cases where Parliament should interfere, and on that point, I can refer to an author well-known to hon. members of this House. The author is one of the few who has treated that question. I quote Amos' English Constitution, 1880:

"It is scarcely possible to appreciate the new attitude which Parliament has assumed towards endowments and endowed institutions generally, without studying some of the deep-rooted objections or prejudices by which parliamentary activity in this matter has been hindered. These objections still exist in a weakened form in many respectable quarters; but the whole force of them can only be understood by attending to the grounds upon which any legislative interference whatever was resisted, at the time when the passing of the Reform Act of 1832 had prepared men's minds for novel and courageous experiments which at an early date would have seemed, even to the most sanguine minds, to be a hopeless kind.

"It was said generally, in answer to any scheme for amending endowments, that the existing law, as administered by the Court of Chancery and the Ecclesiastical Court, provided sufficiently against scandalous abuses, and against any signal departure from the original purpose of the trust as declared by its founder; that the intention of the founder, strictly interpreted in accordance with the current modes of legal interpretations, ought, if the national good faith were to be maintained in its integrity, always to prevail, in the face of any new aims or purposes which the requirements of the present age seem to suggest; that if its intention were liable to be over-ruled by legislative interference, all security for property itself was gone; and that the casual and temporary advantages, which might be purchased by a new adjustment of a trust, would be dearly paid for at the price of encouraging all endowments for the future, and of introducing an instability in the most solid parts of the framework of the nations which could not be regarded without serious apprehensions.

"These arguments were met, not by ignoring their reality, nor by denying their cogency within the area to which they truly applied; but it was said that there were large classes of endowed institutions, the abuses and corruption of which were wholly beyond the power of the existing law to reach. That the legal rules for interpreting the intention of founders, being applicable mainly to the actual language used in wills and deeds, were wholly inadequate to determine the real spirit and meaning of the foundation in a state of society which the founders could never have contemplated; and that without in the least degree weakening the confidence which future testators would have in their general designs being strictly complied with, it was yet within the power of legislative art to reconstruct all existing endowments, especially those of ancient date, in such a way as to maintain all that was most characteristic in the wishes of the founders, and at the same time to confer on the objects of their munificence a far higher advantage than had long been possible. The question thus ultimately turned on matters of fact—that is, on what were the kind and amount of abuses to be remedied, on the nature and limits of the remedies proposed, and on the instrumentality of which the Legislature could avail itself for the purpose in view. The answer to the question is contained in the history of the passing of the various measures of the present and preceding reigns, for the reform of (1) ecclesiastical and religious foundations, (2) educational institutions, (3) endowed charities, and (4) municipal corporations."

It will thus be seen, Mr. Speaker, that the English authors who discuss this question tell us that it is purely a question of fact. We must first consider the abuses to be repressed, and, secondly, the remedy which is proposed. Now, I will ask the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Shaw), what are the abuses created by the minority in the present case? No abuse can be laid at the door of that minority, and there is consequently no ground for asking the exercise of this violent, unusual, and I may say tyrannical means to ask the Legislature to take the property of the one to give it to the other. In a case where an abuse exists one may do so, but in the present case there is no abuse. It has been admitted before the Committee that the minority has contrived to exist in all its force, with all its convictions, and with all its guarantees of intelligence and instruction as in the past. Secondly, we are asked a remedy—a remedy to cure what? Is there anything wrong anywhere? I can understand that the majority, owing to its large number, may demand this property, but is that any reason for us to grant it to them? The minority remains; it constitutes the original church; it has ever continued holding its Synod; it has always been in possession of the property, and by virtue of what right does the majority come and say to us: "Give us this property. It is a most extraordinary request, and I do not find in this country a single precedent in favor of the majority; on the contrary, I find one in favor of the minority. I find, moreover, that the English authors who have written on the subject are unanimous in favor of possession by the minority, and with the kind permission of this House, I will quote Innes' Law of Creeds in Scotland:

"The Lord Justice-Clerk gave his opinion distinctly that, in the ordinary case of our church tenures, if one congregation of a church simply objects to its forming a union with another body, it is not bound to follow the church into that union under the penalty of losing its property. 'The right to refuse to submit to any such changed government, or to concur in any such union,' is, in his opinion, the leading and fundamental principle of all such associations, which he afterwards expresses as 'the desire to keep separate—to keep up a sect apart from all others.'

"Be the objection (to union) in the opinion of others valid or fanciful, it is a change to which no congregation is bound to submit. For separation, then, when such union is to be entered into, no reasons, in my opinion, need be assigned. The right to refuse is absolute; and the notion that the majority of the congregation 'is to forfeit their property is, in my judgment, perfectly extravagant.' These very strong statements are slightly qualified by the words that immediately follow; for his Lordship adds, that such an idea is 'extravagant,' and without the slightest support from any evidence that such is a condition of the trust. Indeed, I did not hear it maintained that obligation to unite with other sects was an original condition of this trust held for a congregation of seceders. It would be a very strange condition to incorporate with any trust for a congregation of old seceders. This shows us the exact position upon this point of the Lord Justice-Clerk. He held that an obligation to unite with a separate body was not an impossible thing, but extremely improbable—not to be presumed, but to be clearly proved—and that union might be resisted by a particular congregation, which would still retain its property unless it were specially averred and proved that it was bound by the trust of its title deeds to go into it. Lord Cockburn objected to this doctrine, and to the principle of separation on which it presumed churches to be founded, holding that union—that is, the extension of what it thinks right—seems a necessary principle with every rational religious society."

And further on he adds:

"It may be that these principles have been laid down not as rules imported into all possible church trusts, but merely as presumptiones juris; but they are laid down very strongly, and with great authority.

"And they have been since reasserted, enlarged, and acted upon in extreme cases. In the last important case on this branch of the law of trust, that of Thurso (Cowper v. Burn) in 1850, where two church bodies united—the 'United Associate Synod of Original Seceders' merging into the Free Church by a vote of majority—the congregation of the former body at Thurso joined the union, also by a majority. An action was brought by the minority of the congregation to have it declared that they were entitled to the property of the Chapel, notwithstanding their dissent from the majority of the Synod and from the majority of the congregation. In this, as in the Kirkintilloch case, in the chief stress was laid on the fact that the majority, by union, had departed from the original principles of the congregation, and that those adhering to these principles, whether majority or minority, were, as doing so, entitled to retain the property—a view confirmed by the Court in their decision. But Lord Wood, in delivering the unanimous judgment of the Court to this effect, founded it upon the views of Lord Justice-Clerk Hope in the Kirkintilloch case, and held that not only a proved departure from principles by the majority of the church, but their mere union with a body hitherto separate, even were its principles the same, was a thing to which no congregation was bound to submit, and against which even the majority of a congregation could successfully reclaim. After stating the question, he says, 'Had the pursuers here been a majority of the congregation, instead of a minority, a direct answer would, we apprehend, be afforded by the judgment in the case of Craigie v. Marshall.' But on principle the case is the same when only a minority reclaims. 'A resolution to form a union with a separate body is not an act of management properly falling to be regulated by the voice of the majority of the congregation. It is one affecting and altering the use, possession and destination of the property of the body."

Mr. Speaker, the quotations I have made are as direct and to the point as can be; they are based on all English precedents, and they tell us that when a Protestant church abandons either its principles or its identity to ally itself with other churches—in other words, when it forsakes the principal body to become part of another church, it therefore loses its rights to the church property. That is exactly the present case. I have given you, Mr. Speaker, the English law, but we have also the Canadian law. We have numberless decisions in our own country. I will quote amongst others the case of the Attorney-General vs. Christie, reported in the 13th volume of Chancery Reports (Ontario), p. 495, where the following was decided:—

"Held by Vankoughnet that so long as one remained to claim the property on behalf of the Free Church that body could hold the property."

The same decision is given in the case of the Attorney-General vs. Jeffrey, reported in the 10th vol. Chancery Reports (Ontario). Thus, according to the law such as it exists at present, such as it has been established by various precedents in the country, such as it has been applied by the Privy Council in its last decision to which I have referred, we can affirm that the property in question belongs to the minority which has never forfeited its rights to it. The minority has ever remained at its post, having in its favor all the rights that its past has given it, the statutes of the country, the union that exists between the members of that church, in a word, all that constitutes the code of legislation applicable to that church: and what are we asked to do now? We are told, notwithstanding this legislation, notwithstanding precedents, notwithstanding law, notwithstanding the unceasing claims put forward by the minority, you must take away its rights from it, as there are numbers on our side, and give them blindly to the majority. Well, for myself, I am not prepared to do it without having previously made a legal study of the question. I am not ready to vote to give to one what is ostensibly the property of another. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a far more important reason, if possible, which should prevent our voting in favor of that measure. It is a principle recognized by all Constitutional Governments—that a Government must never interfere with private affairs when there is litigation going on about them. Now, in the present case, the rights on which we wish to legislate are before the Courts, which are going to be called upon to give a decision, and it would be iniquitous on our part, it would certainly not be understanding the onus of our duties and of our responsibility, to interfere nevertheless and settle in advance these suits by a hasty legislation, when, so to say, we are not cognizant of the respective rights of the parties, when it has been quite impossible for us to study these rights. I will quote, with regard to the obligation under which Governments lie not to interfere when there is litigation going on, an author well known to this honorable House, Todd, page 282. In the foot note to this page he refers us to a large number of English precedents. I have myself referred to those precedents, and they all unanimously show that each time that a question has been brought before the United Parliament, and that it has been discovered that it was being submitted to Courts of law, Parliament has at once declined to take cognizance of it in any shape or form. It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that it would be spoliation to give that property to either one side or the other. When the minority says: "If you take this property from us it will be spoliation," the majority cries out loudly; and when the majority says the same thing, the minority acts likewise. Well, as they cannot come to an understanding, let us leave the question to be decided by competent tribunals; the parties have existed six or seven years without the interference of Parliament, and I think that in the present state of things they can still exist for a couple of years. Let us leave to the Courts of law to decide to whom this property belongs, and then we shall be certain that Parliament has not committed any injustice.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. AMYOT. I think it is desirable I should say a few words in English on this subject. There are many reasons why this House should hesitate before granting the petitioners who have presented this Bill the power asked for. We are asked first to incorporate the Board of management of that church. For my part I have no objection to the legal existence of that or any other church; although I do not belong to that church, I have the greatest respect for all Presbyterian churches, and I think if any of them should come before Parliament and seek incorporation it should receive from Parliament legal existence. But the Bill goes a step further. It asks not only for legal existence on behalf of the church, but that Parliament should ratify all the acts of the United Church in relation to the Temporalities Fund, and that the United Church should take the whole fund into its possession. I ask the hon. members what they know about the management of that fund? In the judgment given by the Privy Council, it was expressly stated that the moneys of the fund should not be applied to pay expenses of law costs. Do hon. members know, for they have not a balance sheet before them, whether something has not been paid for law costs out of this fund. The House does not know in regard to costs paid, and, indeed, knows nothing in regard to the administration of the fund; nevertheless, the House is asked to ratify that administration. In the second place, the House is asked to give to the United Church all the property that formerly belonged to the Temporalities Fund. It is asked to do that not only in its legal capacity, but as exercising judicial power. If any law Courts were asked to decide on the same question, a decision would not be rendered until after witnesses had been heard, the law in Scotland and England examined, and the authorities investigated; but this House is called upon to decide this question in one or two evenings. The House is supposed to be able to adjudicate on that important question without any study or special knowledge of the question. Because there is a majority on one side we are called upon to apply this wrong and false principle that a majority is always right whenever private rights are concerned? I say the property belongs either to the United Church or it does not. If it belongs to the United Church, I do not see why that church should come before Parliament and ask it to give the church that property; and if it does not belong to that church, what right has Parliament to give it to that church? Parliament has undoubtedly the right to legislate on that subject, and, I admit, circumstances might occur where Parliament might interfere. Those circumstances are set forth by a writer, whom I have consulted, who says Parliaments have power of:

"Abolishing what is noxious, recreating what is perishable, and directing to novel ends what time has rendered obsolete in its older shape in the very face of customs however tenacious, and of the express language of founders however emphatic."

That I admit; but is it any reason why Parliament should interfere under all circumstances? Is it any reason why Parliament should in every case deprive one party of its property, and give it to another? Is it because we are asked to do it that we are bound to do it, or that we will do it in every instance when asked? To-day we are asked to do so by one church, to-morrow we may be asked to do so by another church, the next day by another institution, and when once this wrong principle is established and pursued, we do not know what will be the consequences. We notice, too, that the general principle is that when Parliament uses its strength to commit an act of injustice, it is very apt to prove an act of suicide. This is not the first time that questions of this sort have arisen in Parliament. They have arisen in England and Scotland; discussions have taken place and decisions have been arrived at. I take the liberty of reading from Amos' English Constitution :

"It is scarcely possible to appreciate the new attitude which Parliament has assumed towards endowments and endowed institutions generally, without studying some of the deep-rooted objections or prejudices by which parliamentary activity in this matter has been hindered. These objections still exist in a weakened form in many respectable quarters; but the whole force of them can only be understood by attending to the grounds upon which any legislative interference whatever was resisted, at the time when the passing of the Reform Act of 1832 had prepared men's minds for novel and courageous experiments which at an early date would have seemed, even to the most sanguine minds, to be a hopeless kind.

"It was said generally, in answer to any scheme for amending endowments, that the existing law, as administered by the Court of Chancery and the Ecclesiastical Court, provided sufficiently against scandalous abuses, and against any signal departure from the original purpose of the trust as declared by its founder; that the intention of the founder, strictly interpreted in accordance with the current modes of legal interpretations, ought, if the national good faith were to be maintained in its integrity, always to prevail, in the face of any new aims or purposes which the requirements of the present age seen to suggest; that if its intention were liable to be overruled by legislative interference all security for property itself was gone; and that the casual and temporary advantages, which might be purchased by a new adjustment of a trust, would be dearly paid for at the price of encouraging all endowments for the future, and of introducing an instability in the most solid parts of the framework of the nations which could not be regarded without serious apprehensions.

"These arguments were met, not by ignoring their reality, nor by denying their cogency within the area to which they truly applied; but it was said that there were large classes of endowed institutions, the abuses and corruption of which were wholly beyond the power of the existing law to reach. That the legal rules for interpreting the intention of founders, being applicable mainly to the actual language used in wills and deeds, were wholly inadequate to determine the real spirit and meaning of the foundation in a state of society which the founders could never have contemplated; and that without in the least degree weakening the confidence which future testators would have in their general designs being strictly complied with, it was yet within the power of legislative art to reconstruct all existing endowments, especially those of ancient date, in such a way as to maintain all that was most characteristic in the wishes of the founders, and at the same time to confer on the objects of their munificence a far higher advantage than had long been possible. The question thus ultimately turned on matters of fact—that is, on what were the kind and amount of abuses to be remedied, on the nature and limits of the remedies proposed, and on the instrumentality of the Legislature could avail itself for the purpose in view. The answer to the question is contained in the history of the passing of the various measures of the present and preceding reigns, for the reform of 1) ecclesiastical and religious foundations, (2) educational institutions, (3) endowed charities, and (4) municipal corporations."

This is an important point as showing that the Legislature should only interfere when there is abuse or corruption—or when there is no way of applying to any one the funds that may have been held by a church. In England, Parliament has appointed Commissioners to decide all these questions. Here, we are called upon to decide the matter immediately in spite of all the claims of the minority of the old church. I shall read from a very high authority in England to show that it has been held over and over again that the majority has no right to carry the minority with it, and that the minority has a right to resist if it wishes, and that the church remains with the minority. The Lord Justice Clark said :

"He held that an obligation to Union with a separate body was not an impossible thing, but extremely possible—not to be presumed, but to be proved—and that Union might be resisted by a particular congregation, which would still retain its property, unless it was specially averred and proved that it was bound by the trust of its title-deeds to go into it. Lord Cockburn objected to this doctrine, and to the principle of separation, of which it presumed churches to be founded, holding that 'Union—that is, the extension of what it thinks right—seems a necessary principle with every rational religious society.'

In the present case, so far from having agreed to any such Union, the express understanding of that church—its fundamental principle at the very beginning, was the very reverse, for it was applied constantly to that old church, and nobody else. But I hear it stated very often that, when the majority of the three churches entered the Union, they did not change their faith. That is no justification according to the Judges I quote :

"According to the obvious spirit of the kirkintilloch principle, the like circumstances and reasons which are of sufficient potency to entitle an adhering and resisting majority to refuse to join a minority in a union with another religious body, without its being necessary to establish that the minority by the union would be departing from original principles, must also be available to an adhering and resisting minority."

That is the law as stated by our best authorities, and the law cannot be changed by a majority of a church. Whenever the minority remains, the church remains, and the funds remain with that minority; and to act contrary to that principle would be the mere crushing of a minority by force, would be a violation of the law, and would be tyranny

"We therefore hold that the principles and views recognized in Craigie vs. Marshall are sound in themselves, and, when duly followed out, legitimately lead to the same result where it is a minority of the congregation that refuse to unite, and thereby sink their distinctive name and testimonies, and their very existence, in a separate sect, which was arrived at when it was the majority that did so. Yet, upon the principles already quoted, and more fully detailed in the appendix to this charter, it should seem that a single individual in any dissenting congregation in Scotland may prevent that congregation from joining in a union with another church whose principles are alleged and not denied to be identical with its own—that, in short, not only unity of principle, but unanimity of individuals is required before any such union can take place, or at least, before it can take place without forfeiture of property."

There could be no stronger legal authority applicable to this case than these citations. Must we endorse the course of a majority which says: "Let us crush the minority; we do not care about the laws of the country, nor for the authors who have written on this subject, nor for the decisions of the Courts, nor for acquired rights—we want to have peace." It is very easy to have peace on this principle. Here are two contending parties, the majority and the minority. Say to the majority: "Take the whole," and you will have peace. Is that the way we should use the powers entrusted to us? I think not. For my part, if I were to use my vote to give to the majority or minority what does not belong to the one or the other, I think I would be betraying my trust as a member of this House. The minority could not, under the law, have been forced into the Union. The following are the general principles as laid down in "Innes' Law of Creeds in Scotland":

"(1.) That in the ordinary cases the trust is a trust for the congregation.

"(2.) That therefore the destination and use of the property must be regarded by the principles of the congregation—not of the ecclesiastical body with which it is connected.

"(3.) That when the church, or general ecclesiastical body, changes its principles, it cannot compel the congregation to go along with it.

"(4.) That when the church, without changing its principles, merges its separate identity by union with another body, it cannot compel the congregation to go along with it.

"(5.) That not only a majority, but even a minority of the congregation has a right to vindicate the congregational property in the two cases last mentioned. The minority of the congregation may demand the property in the event of the majority acquiescing in the departure of the whole church from (1) its principles, or (2) its separate identity."

In the present case, the Union or the majority have merged their identity with the other churches. What I have quoted is taken from the decisions in the highest Courts of England, and I am sure any one who will take the trouble to look at them will be convinced that, under the law, the minority could not be forced into the Union. The minority have always existed, they have always been going on with the organization of their church, and have still the same legal existence as they had then. I find that whenever any question of this kind came before a legal tribunal the decision invariably was in favor of the principles I have just expounded. I will call the attention of the House to the opinion of two hon. judges of the Quebec Court of Appeals, Mr. Justice Ramsay and Mr. Justice Tessier. They held that the Appellant was entitled to an injunction on the ground that the Act 38 Victoria, Chapter 64 was invalid, and that the majority of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland had no power to communicate any interest in the Temporalities Fund of that church to the religious bodies with whom they had chosen to unite themselves in 1875. It had been often decided that a majority could not force a minority, and in this instance two of the most learned and respected Judges of the Province of Quebec were emphatically of the opinion, after having carefully studied the question, that the majority could not claim this Temporalities Fund. But we hear this great argument that the Local Legislatures have passed certain laws, and that if those laws had not been passed, these churches would not have joined the Union. I have too great respect for the majority to believe, for one moment, that they joined the Union for the sake of the Temporalities Fund. I presume they had a higher object in view than that. Why should they not join the Union? The Court did not hold that the Union was bad. It may be for the interest of the church and for the enlightenment of the country, but that is not the question. The question is: to whom does the Temporalities Fund belong. The Privy Council have decided that the law passed is of no value. We are just in the same position as if no law had been passed. If those who went into the Union find their course was not a proper one, they may withdraw from it. But the minority say: "We give you all possible liberty, but give us also the same liberty." They say to the Unionists: "Join any church you like, but leave us our church." I do not see what obligation this Parliament is under to commit an injustice, because a blunder or an unconstitutionality has been committed. If the Unionists have suffered harm through the action of the Local Legislatures, they can apply to those Legislatures for redress. I am sure the minority would not hold the Union responsible for any expense incurred when they were of opinion that the Acts of the Legislature were valid. The question is, does the fund belong to the majority or the minority? I find, on the one side, that all the authorities are in favor of the minority, and that none are in favor of the Union. We are asked, in spite of that, to give what belong to the minority to the majority. We should not do that. We should give these parties a legal existence and then let them fight out the battle before the proper tribunal. It is not our duty to shoulder the immense responsibility of deciding to whom this fund belongs. There is another reason: that of public decency. The whole question is now before the tribunals of the country, and it is a well settled principle in England that Parliament must never interfere to decide questions that are before the Court. This is a question of private rights in which the public interest is not concerned in a general point of view. It would not be right to use our strength and power in such a way that we would be in danger of committing an injustice, and, secondly, we ought not to take this question away from the tribunals of this country. So, Mr. Speaker, in résumé, I would say this: I believe that we are not sufficiently informed to enable us to pronounce a verdict that would be good in a Court of law, and we cannot properly vote upon this Bill, granting this property to the one or the other party, without being possessed of such information, not only on points of facts but also on points of law. We have not before us all the necessary statements for giving an impartial verdict according to the law and evidence; and, secondly, we have nothing with which to reproach the minority. There is no reason why we should interfere against the rights of this minority with the view of taking from them by force this fund which probably belongs to that minority and to the old church which still exists. Thirdly, we should not legislate in such a way as to interfere with private rights; we should not legislate against the whole tenor of the legislation of this country, and contrary to the whole tenor of the courts of justice, nor should we take away from the consideration of the courts of justice a question which has been properly laid before them. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I have the honor of proposing the amendment which I have placed before the House.

Mr. HAGGART. As a member for a constituency in which there is a large Presbyterian vote, and as a Presbyterian myself, I wish, before I vote, to give my reasons for so doing, on the extraordinary Bill—for certainly it is of an extraordinary nature—which is under the consideration of this House at the present moment. This Bill purports to be an Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Board of Management of the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, and Acts amending the same. Now, in order to obtain the full consideration of this Bill, and in order to understand the subject, it will be proper for me to explain, Mr. Speaker, on what principle this fund was formed. It was founded by a number of ministers about the year 1854 belonging to the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, who were entitled to receive from the Clergy Reserves a sum of money amounting to between $8,000 and $10,000 each, with which they decided to make a permanent endowment trust fund, which was managed by a board incorporated in the year 1858, by an Act of the Parliament of the Provinces of Canada. The interest and revenue of the trust so consolidated were to be employed first in the payment of the commuting ministers' £112 10s. per year, and then for aiding the missions of the church and for purposes therein mentioned, but under no circumstances was the principal of the fund to be entrenched upon. The interest and revenues were solely and only to be used to pay the commutators a certain amount per year, and for the other purposes specified, and if the interest and revenue derived from the fund were not sufficient to pay the commutators, they were obliged to take a reduced amount. The evident intention of these ministers was to form an endowment in perpetuity, which, with bequests from different Presbyterians throughout the country, would constitute a fund which would furnish salaries for the ministers of the church for all time to come. Now, what does this Bill propose to do? It proposes to legalize the acts of parties who had charge of this trust who entrenched upon it or applied it to different purposes from those for which the trustees intended it. The amount of this fund when the Act of 1858 was passed, was $508,000, while on the 1st of May, 1881, it was reduced to $332,000, showing a loss of $175,807. This loss was not only due to investments, which turned out unfortunately, but cash was actually drawn from it to the extent of nearly $60,000 between the years 1875 and 1881, and we are asked by this Act to legalize this illegal management, and to apply this trust to purposes which are entirely different from those of which the original parties intended. What does this Act contemplate? First, payment to a number of ministers $150, $400, and $200 respectively during their life-time and good-standing in the church; and second, to the annual payment of $2,000 in perpetuity to the Treasurer of Queen's College, for the use and benefit of such college, and this is an added amount which was not in the original Trust Act of 1858. There were several ministers—four I think—who were professors of Queen's College, and who were entitled to $1,950, but instead of taking this sum from the fund, an arrangement was made with the Synod, according to which the College received $2,000, and the ministers gave up the amount to which they were entitled from this fund. They have now been reinstated as participators in the fund and the College retains its grant. It provides the payment of $200 to all ministers on the Synod roll and to all recognized probationers and licentiates engaged in active service at the time of Union, during their lifetime and good standing in the church, and all salaries of $200 are to be increased to $400, and they shall also be entitled to the same when they have retired with the consent of the church from the active duties of the ministry. It is also provided that the Temporalities Board shall, if necessary, draw upon the capital of the fund, in order to meet the aforesaid requirements. This is another proposition directly contrary to the objects of the original trust as created conferring the power of payment of these certain sums to these different beneficiaries and of trenching upon the capital. Now, let us see what effect this will have on the fund. According to the amount returned in the report which was presented to the Committee, the other day, on the 1st May, 1831, it was reduced to $332,192, and the total yearly expenditure from the fund, according to the report, of $28,727. The total income of the fund from all sources was, per same report, $20,139, showing a deficiency in the income necessary to meet the expenditure of $8,588 yearly. But what does this Bill propose to do? To recognize the following annual payment as vested rights: to twenty-nine commuting ministers, $450 each, $13,050; to thirteen privileged and retired ministers, $400 each, $5,200; to ninety-two non-privileged $200 each, $18,400, or in all $36,650; and to meet these annual payments the income derived from this fund, according to the report, independent of the amount due to Queen's College—which may be withdrawn and capitalized—as I have already stated was $20,139, consequently the deficiency which is to be drawn from the capital under this Act is for each year $16,510, which will dissipate the fund in a few years, and leave the original commutators without any security that they will be properly provided for or paid. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown what the effect of this Act upon this fund will be. It has been argued that this fund passed over with the Synod to the United Church. But the Synod of the church has no right to legislate or act in any such manner for the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, this is forbidden by the Confession of faith, they have nothing whatever to do with the practical affairs of the church. So much is this the case that they could not receive the fund which was provided for under this Act. In 1834, Sir John Colborne, the Governor, desired to throw the responsibility of appropriating all salaries from the Clergy Reserves in the Synod, but the Synod remonstrated, and submitted that it was purely a spiritual body, and must decline the distribution among its members of any bounty which the Government might be pleased to confer, and which ought to be managed by the Government itself, as heretofore, or by lay Commissioners appointed for that purpose. Again, in 1837, they sent to the Government a refusal to the same effect, and Commissioners were appointed to receive the fund. The Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the church of Scotland is purely a spiritual Court. It is said that this church went into the Union. But whose opinion are we to accept as to the going into the union of this church. The question has been tried in several Courts of this country. It was heard in the case of McPherson vs. McKay, before Judge Moss. It was appealed to the full Court which decided that the present parties, who are protesting against the present proposed legislation, are the parties who belong to the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. There can be no doubt about it,—that although a small minority, if they were left to carry on the case before the Courts and tribunals of the country, it would be decided that they would be entitled to the whole of this trust, and their representatives to its management, the trust being solely and only for the Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that there is any legal doubt about this, or that any legal gentleman in this House who will say that this fund passed over with the majority when they decided to enter the Union; the Courts have decided that there is no identity, and that the very fact of a large and respectable minority having refused to enter into the Union shows that they differed, and, according to the quotation of my hon. friend the member for Bellechasse, from the laws and creeds of the Church of Scotland, the Lord Justice Clerk lays down: "The right to refuse to submit to any such changed Government or to concur in any such Union" is, in his opinion, the leading and fundamental principle of all such associations, which afterwards expresses as "the desire to keep separate, to keep up one section apart from all others." "For separation, then, when such Union is to be entered into, no reason, in my opinion, need be assigned." And afterwards the report says:

"Lord Wood, in delivering the unanimous judgment of the court, founded it upon the views of Lord Chief Justice Hope in the Kirkcilloch case, and held that, not only a proved departure from principles by the majority of the church, but their mere union with a body hitherto separate, even were its principles the same, was a thing to which no congregation was bound to submit, and against which even the minority of a congregation could successfully reclaim."

And, further, in the principles laid down in future for the government of these questions, as an absolute rule, it is stated:

"That not only a majority, but even a minority of the congregation has a right to vindicate the congregational property in the two cases last mentioned. The minority of the congregation may demand the property in the event of the majority acquiescing in the departure of the whole church from (1) its principles, or (2) its separate identity."

It is not at all necessary to prove a change of doctrine between the two parties, the simple fact that one church has joined another is sufficient to change its identity. Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who thought that a compromise would be arrived at between the different parties to this legislation. I believed that these difficulties ought to be settled outside of this Parliament. I know that there is no Presbyterian—I believe at all events that there is hardly a Presbyterian throughout Canada—who would not prefer that it should be settled, and there is not one of them but acknowledges that although this minority did not go into the Union, it at least is entitled to a fair share of this fund and they object to this holding out for the extreme rights of parties to the contest, and I venture to say that notwithstanding what certain parties who choose to consider themselves as representing the Presbyterian body may say, no minister of the Presbyterian Church has the right to speak of anything except of things spiritual, and he is doing what the church does not authorize him to do when he interferes with the financial affairs of the church. But every layman has the right to speak of these principles, and to speak more freely than any minister; and I will venture to say that all the Presbyterian electors throughout Canada want to have a fair and equitable distribution of the fund. They have no desire that the one body should have the whole fund; and any minister who comes here and asserts anything to the contrary, I venture to affirm would not be sustained in any such preposterous or monstrous doctrine by any body of Presbyterian electors throughout the country. The minority have the right to hold their own opinions. The difference between the two bodies in point of doctrine may, perhaps, not be distinguishable, but they honestly believe there is a difference of doctrine. They believe that the old church holds different principles from the new church. They may be mistaken. I myself was favorable to Union, and would like still to see all the Presbyterian bodies united in one; but when one party refuses to enter the Union, and believes honestly that there is a different doctrine involved, I do not believe that the majority should have the power to say: "If you do not follow the majority all the funds to which the original church was entitled shall follow the majority into the Union." I do not believe that is according to the first principles of religion. They are not honest men who come here to take the funds of that minority. Those men in equity are as much entitled to their share as the majority are. They are as much entitled to their opinion as the majority are, and I do not think this Legislature has any right to interfere; but if it does I hope that there is some power superior to this that will see that minorities are protected in their rights, that private individual's rights are not interfered with, and that where a trust is solemnly accorded the majority cannot come and overawe the House by telling us that there are a certain number of electors throughout the country, and that these electors are anxious the whole fund should go to one particular church, and those who support that principle will receive their support at the next election. My countrymen are not such. They will do right. They will ascertain, what is just, and they will support the right, and they will say that no person, for the purpose of enriching a church, shall do wrong to a minority. I hope that this House will see that there is a provision in the bill by which the rights of the minority shall be respected, and that any legislation that passes this House will secure to the minority their rights. I have been home to my county and have asked the Presbyterians belonging to the Union church about this matter, and they all stated that in equity and justice the fund should be divided between them; they The seven or eight commuting ministers in the minority paid a large sum of money out of their own pockets for the purpose of constituting this fund, the first charge upon which was to be the payment of their own salaries, and surely they have a right to control some portion of the fund. I believe the principle of the amendment which the hon. gentleman has introduced will cover the case. Give both of them legislation in order that they may hold their own funds, and if they cannot come to an agreement to divide that fund equitably between them let this Parliament distribute it equitably, and the only way of doing so is to distribute it according to the numbers belonging to the different congregations.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I do not propose entering into a full description of this subject, but I feel it right to say a few words on that special amendment. I think I ought to begin by expressing, on behalf of the Presbyterian body in connection with the Church of Scotland, their thanks to the hon. member who has moved this amendment, for the great industry with which he has devoted himself to this subject, and in which he has no personal interest, not belonging to that faith, and more especially as he tells us there are no Presbyterians in his county. I think every man ought to feel that there is a large and important principle of legislation involved in this Bill before the House, and that before we take upon ourselves the functions of Courts of Justice, we ought to pause and consider what we are doing. This is a case of such overwhelming importance that the ordinary tribunals for the administration of justice are alone competent to dispose of it. I think the latter part of the amendment my hon. friend has proposed strikes the proper key-note to this discussion at the present time when he moves that our legislation ought to be such as not to adjudicate in relation to the property nor the administration of the fund claimed by the petitioners, meaning the Temporalities Fund, but to leave to the tribunals of justice, duly constituted, the duty of declaring to whom the proper administration of said funds belong. Well, I had occasion to address the House the other day on this subject, and, perhaps, in too forcible terms, entered an energetic protest against this House constituting itself a court of law for the administration of justice. I feel that no more dangerous principle can be introduced than that whenever a dispute arises between parties as to the ownership of property they should come here to Parliament and seek by the influence of power over the majority to get Parliament to settle to whom the fund or the property belongs. I say, with all confidence in the prudence, honesty and good sense of Parliament, and I am only expressing the sober opinion of every hon. member of this House, that this Parliament is not the proper tribunal for adjudication upon legal or equitable rights. It is not for us to decide whether the fund or property belongs to one or to the other; we are not able to approach the subject in that dispassionate manner in which the Courts of Justice do; we have not the machinery for eliciting evidence and thoroughly investigating the question, and if we are to become the supreme judges of the country, as well as the law-makers, we shall be travelling out of our proper functions and introducing danger and uncertainty in the tenure of property and in the enjoyment of civil rights and property throughout the Dominion. I feel it is my duty to enter a solemn protest against Parliament assuming any such functions as are sought to invest it with in this particular case. My hon. friend from South Bruce (Mr. Shaw) has told us, just now, that the litigation which is going on on this question is unimportant. He is entirely mistaken in that statement. There are suits now pending which were brought last fall, in the month of October, before the judgment of the Privy Council was rendered, in which the vital point in issue is before the Courts for adjudication, suits that were brought in the city of Montreal to decide who were the proper administrators of this fund. At the session of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, held last summer, that body elected trustees who, under the terms of the Act of 1858, for the continuation of the old church, is the correctly and legally authorized body of trustees to administer that fund. They have commenced a suit in the nature of a quo warranto in order to have it declared that they are the administrators of this fund, and that the present trustees elected by the United Church have no right to meddle with it. Now, if the Privy Council have decided that point, they have decided that the trustees elected by the United Church since the Union have no right to interfere with nor manage this fund, and they granted an injunction to restrain them from doing so, but they did not decide the other point as to whether the trustees elected by the old church were the proper parties, because that point was not brought before them. Since the case was before the Privy Council the necessary steps were taken to elect a board which are the representatives duly elected by the old church to administer this fund. Now the whole question of the ownership of that fund necessarily comes up for decision in that case. It also involves the necessity of a decision by a Judge of the broad question as to whether the old church is the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland now, or whether that body is merged in the Union Church. While this question is fairly and squarely raised Parliament is asked to step in and say the Courts have no power and no ability, and are not competent to decide this question; but we, Parliament, by our prerogative right, and by our mighty hand, will settle it, and say which is the Presbyterian Church in connection with the Church of Scotland, whether that church went into the Union or not, and who were the duly elected trustees to whom the fund belongs; in a word, we will take the case out of the Courts and decide it ourselves. I ask every hon. member if he feels himself as competent, or the House, as a body, as competent to decide that question as the legally constituted Courts of the country? Hon. members should, moreover, remember that this question does not concern only the interests of the Presbyterian churches but that it may come home to themselves at any time. The Church of England is divided into two parties, the High and Low Church; far more apart in opinions and doctrines probably than any two sections of the Presbyterian Church. Suppose a disruption should occur in that church, and it has been very near disruption on many occasions, and the majority belonging to the High Church chose to say that their opinions, their ceremonies and their ritual are more in accordance, or are so nearly in accordance with those of the Church of Rome we will join it; that the old differences of the time of the Reformation should be put aside, and they would unite in Christian harmony and go back to the old faith and church, would the minority, the Low Church, think it right and proper for Parliament to step in and say the majority of the Church of England has chosen to say it was so near in accord as to the doctrines, ritual and ceremonies with the Church of Rome that there was no reason why they should not unite and make a large and harmonious Christian body, and at the same time they should have the right to take with them all the endowments and property of the Church of England. Does the House think that minority, supposing the minority was the Low Church, would acquiesce or Parliament would be justified in saying: "Take away all the property of the Low Church and hand it over to the Church of Rome, because the majority of the Church of England have thought fit to join the Church of Rome." Or just a converse case. Suppose the Low Church comprised a majority in the Church of England, and decided they would join the Methodist or Reformed Episcopal Churches, and take with them all the property and call it the United Protestant Church or some other suitable name, what would the High Church Party say? Would they not be right in declaring that the proposal would be one which would destroy the very existence of the Church of England by merging it in the Reformed Episcopal Church or uniting it with the Methodist or any other sect with which it has no allegiance? But that is exactly the principle in the present Bill. The principle asserted is that a majority can control the very existence of a church, and because the majority agree they should be united with another church they have the right to take all the property and leave the minority stripped of everything. It seems monstrous for Parliament to be asked to step in and say that it will decide this question and not leave it to the Courts to say whether the property belongs to the larger or the smaller body, or whether it is so edged round with trusts imposed upon it dedicating it for the use and purposes of a particular church, that the Union should continue, and that the majority should not have the power to destroy its existence and wipe out the name of the church with which it was connected. That is the whole proposition. The minority are attached to the Presbyterian Church in connection with the Church of Scotland, it was their church, the church in which they were born and brought up, and they objected to having it destroyed. They objected to its Union with the Free Church and with parties with whom they had religious differences, though they had not of creed yet certainly they had of doctrine in many respects.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Tell us one.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). A most vital difference existed upon this very important subject of the connection of the Church with the State, one holding the doctrine that the State, as represented by the Crown, was paramount. The other holding that there should be no connection whatever between Church and State. It was proposed to destroy the name of the old church, to form a union with an overwhelming majority, about five-sixths of the body, with which they had never before been connected; they said that although they entered the Union a miserable minority yet still they had the right to take with them all the property and endowments of the Church of Scotland. However, to confine myself to this particular amendment before the House, I venture to say that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has simply done his duty as one who has contended that Parliament should keep within its proper functions, and in expressing the hope that this House will pause before assuming to itself the functions of judge and jury, and deciding whether property belonged to this man or that man, to this church or that church.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I was quite surprised to hear the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) commend the amendment now before the House. It is a motion to perpetuate litigation, and to set at defiance the right of the majority. It is a motion which, if adopted, would introduce discord over the whole country; and I have no sympathy with the hon. gentleman when he says this House is not competent to pronounce an opinion on a matter of this kind. The hon. member for Perth declared that none of the clergy had any right to express opinions on this matter of the Temporalities Fund, and now the hon. member for Victoria declares this House has no right to express an opinion. Who then are to express opinions on the question; who should deal with it but Parliament? The church has applied to it because it was found that the legislation obtained from the Local Legislatures had not been enacted in accordance with the Constitution. We are only called upon to give effect to what was agreed to by all parties some years ago. What was the position prior to this Union? In 1844 a large portion of the Presbyterian Church seceded, or rather the majority formed a new church in connection with the Free Church; if there was any connection with the Free Church or the Established Church, it was a mere myth and nothing more. In 1875 it was found desirable by all parties in the two branches of the church that they should unite. It is one of the pleasing features of Christianity, seen in all the Provinces during the last few years, that there has been a desire for union among Christians of various denominations. The Methodists have generally united, the Presbyterians have generally united, and I have no doubt the operations of the churches will be greatly strengthened and benefitted by the union of the different sects, holding no differences of opinion of any material consequence. The hon. gentleman who spoke last declared that there were vital points of difference between what he calls the Free Church and the Established Church sections of the Presbyterian Church. I called upon him to name one single doctrine to which they disagreed, for there is none that I am aware of—none that I ever heard alleged. As to the mere question as to whether it is wise or not to have church establishments, that is an abstract doctrine of little consequence nowadays in Canada or Scotland either, because here there can be no Established Church and in Scotland there will be none in a short time, more than in Canada, and I think within the lives of many of us present there will be no Established Church in England. That is a step in advance which we may be allowed to contemplate without any of that horror which has been expressed by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron). Eight or nine years ago the question of uniting the Presbyterian churches came prominently before the people, and there was a sincere and anxious desire on the part of both of the great bodies to form a united church. Several years were spent in discussions, and finally it was resolved by the assemblies, or the Synods of both churches, that such a union was desirable. The question was sent down, according to the practice of those bodies, from the Synods or assemblies to the various Presbyteries, and I believe that all the Presbyteries agreed to the overture for union. From the Presbyteries, it was sent to the various congregations, and with, I think, but two exceptions in the Free Church and six or seven in the other, they declared themselves in favor of union. The Temporalities Fund is still in the hands of the section of the united church that held it formerly—what is now known as the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. There was no attempt made, as I am informed, by any of the members of the church called the Free Church, previously to obtain the slightest advantage from the money in this fund. None of them have ever touched it, and none of them ever will. It will be distributed amongst those who are either the parties who originally commuted, or those who have come in since into that branch of the church. Every one has been given his share and every one will be given his share, and there is simply a small minority of less than a dozen ministers and congregations who actually desire—and the hon. gentleman who has moved this amendment, promotes that desire—to take from them the entire property they possess, their churches and parsonages, their college and all the money that is let out at interest to produce the stipends they receive. Could anything be more monstrous than this proposition—that, because this small number did not go into the Union, they shall become the inheritors of the entire patrimony of the whole church. And now, when they find that a strong feeling exists in the country, and I am happy to say a strong feeling in this House, that no such outrage shall be permitted, they demand something else. They demand a division on such grounds as would not be equitable or right, and when that is not likely to be given, they pretend that we have no right to make any division at all, that we have no right to express any opinion. Now, Sir, I have no doubt whatever that the proposal submitted in the Bill by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Shaw), is one which commends itself to the thoughtful sense of justice of every hon. member, and I am surprised that any hon. member should consent to promote discussion such as some hon. members seem to be promoting by the speeches they are making. The hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution, pretends to be learned in Scotch ecclesiastical law. Why, Sir, nothing could be more ludicrous than his quotations, and nothing could be more absurd than his pretensions. It was quite manifest from the first, and all the time he was quoting from those books, that they had been put into his hands by some industrious churchman who had rummaged the library to get authorities for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. AMYOT. I defy the hon. gentleman to prove that.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I can tell the hon. gentleman that it takes more than a few hours to post up even on Scotch ecclesiastical law, and that even if he were right in his interpretation—which I deny—we are not to be governed here by the ecclesiastical law of any other country, but we are to do what is just and right between the parties before us. The sole object of the Bill is to render valid what was formerly agreed to, and the legislation which is now desired is in consequence of the decision of the Committee of the Privy Council with regard to the Acts passed by the two Provinces on this subject. Now, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) knows very well that this legislation was suggested in the deliverance of the Privy Council judges. They said they had no doubt that the Dominion Legislature would make the matter all right, or some phrase of that kind, and here we are entrusted with the task which we cannot shun and which we should not desire to shun. The operation of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Shaw) would have the effect of putting an end to the divisions which distract a small section of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, and would promote that unity and harmony which every one desires to see prevail in every branch of the Christian church in this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. McDUGALL (Halton). I think it is impossible that the House should adopt the motion which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Amyot) has put in your hands, and for a very simple reason. We know, Sir, from the discussion which took place before the Private Bills Committee—and as they were continued for several days, all the parties contesting this matter had every opportunity of stating their case—that if the motion should pass the position of the matter will be simply this: that the Committee will be instructed to leave the question of the rights of the parties to these temporalities to the Courts of law. We know that if the matter goes to the Courts of law these Courts will be governed by the Statute of 1858, an Act of the old Province of Canada. There was at that time no church body which had these temporalities, but the body then known as the Presbyterian Church in Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland; and the Courts, if they come to deal with the matter now, will find only the small body now calling themselves the Presbyterian Church in Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, answering the description of the Statute which governs the Temporalities Fund. That being the case, the broad question to be settled by this Parliament is, I apprehend, whether this small remnant of the Presbyterian Church in Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, the greater part of which is recognized now as part of the United Church, is to be recognized as the owners of this property, which, if we do so recognize, shall pass out of the hands of the United Church. I think, on the bare statement of the case, we are compelled to deal with the question as a matter of law, as a matter of justice, and as a matter of equity. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, before whom the case was carried, hinted, and more than hinted, they stated, if I recall their judgment aright, that the question, as a legal question, was in the direction the hon. gentleman contends for, but they admitted that the Dominion Parliament was competent to deal with the question, and I think their admission clearly implies what their mind was on the matter. It was felt that, the Parliament of Canada being the only body competent to deal with the question, we should deal with it and do justice between the contending parties. Now, the question is before us, and I think we have simply to consider whether, under all the circumstances, it is proper to recognize the action of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, when they, in their highest court, their representative body, determined to enter into union with other Presbyterian bodies in this country. That is my view, notwithstanding the citation of Scotch authority and Scotch ecclesiastical law, which might be very proper if we were in Scotland; but they have no bearing upon the question submitted to us. In this country we have had questions of this kind to deal with before; they have been before our Courts of law; and so far as my observation and investigations have gone, and so far as the suggestions and arguments made before the Committee influenced me, it is clear to my mind—and I believe I am supported by the decision of the highest Courts in this country—that it was competent to the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland to do what they did, to unite with other churches, according to their own rules and practices. If, therefore, as a voluntary association they were competent to make that arrangement, it follows that their churches, their colleges, their property of every kind, was carried along with them into that Union. We know that in a celebrated case analogous to this—the Union of the Episcopal Methodist body with the Wesleyan Methodists—this question came up: whether the conference of the Methodist Church was legally entitled to make this Union, and whether, in making it, they retained their property which they had as the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada. In that case there was a feature which we do not find in this; there was a change in the very polity of the church; episcopacy, that peculiar feature of their church organization, was abandoned, and a large minority in this country declined to agree to that change, and they remained the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada. Disputes, therefore, arose as to property held under trust deeds in various parts of the country; and although the Judges were divided at first, when the question was finally decided in the Courts, it was held that, notwithstanding that change, not a change in doctrine, but in an important feature of church government—yet the conference, representing the whole church, was legally entitled to say whether they would go into this Union or not. They did decide to go into the Union, that Union was held to be a legal act and the property went along with them.

An hon. MEMBER. Not in all cases.

Mr. McDUGALL. Not in all. There were certain cases in which property was deeded to trustees remaining in the original church, and it was held that under the peculiar circumstances and terms of these trust deeds, the congregations should hold their property as against the Wesleyan Conference. A case was cited before us of a Presbyterian Church, or congregation as it is called, in Cobourg, in which Mr. Chancellor Spragge, one of our ablest Judges, held that that congregation were acting within their right, under the supposed Act of the Province of Ontario, in voting themselves out of the Union, and that they should hold their church. Provision was made for that in the Local law, and that law being supposed to be in force, the learned Chancellor simply applied the law. But it now turns out that it was not competent to the Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec to pass any law relating to this matter, for the reason that the body extended over several Provinces, and for the reasons given in the judgment of the Privy Council. In consequence of that unfortunate result the parties are obliged to come before this Parliament, which is the only power competent to deal with the question, and I think, after the discussions which have taken place, after the representatives of the people in the Local Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec, having enabled the parties to display their respective claims to have the control of this property, held that it was just and right and proper to grant to the new church the powers which they claimed. That fact should have considerable influence upon our decision. I do not urge that as a precedent which should absolutely guide us, but I say it is entitled to great respect at our hands. Now, what is asked of us is that we should so alter the machinery of the Temporalities Board as to enable the new church to administer this fund, and I do not see how we can escape from that action. I do not speak here as a member of the Presbyterian Church; I have nothing to do with the Presbyterian Church or any church as a legislator, except to secure to them those rights and powers which are necessary to enable them to legally conduct their affairs. That is all that they ask at our hands. I felt, as I stated at the Committee, that it would be a graceful and a proper act of the majority in this case, to so far respect the origin of this fund, and the position of the respective parties entitled to it, to agree to a division of the fund after providing for the beneficiaries, who are now nearly all advanced in life. It was stated in the Committee that about $90,000 would be sufficient to pay annuities to secure to all the beneficiaries of this fund the amounts due them during their lives, so that there would be a considerable sum remaining to be disposed of after satisfying all these parties who have these claims. I think, therefore, it would have been a generous and proper thing on the part of the representatives of the United Church to make such a proposition, with the view of establishing harmony at present and of ultimately bringing about that Union and agreement among all the congregations which, I am sure, every one desires to see prevail throughout our country. If the representatives of the United Church had felt themselves authorised to agree to such a proposition, I would have been only too happy to confirm that arrangement by putting a clause in the Act, to that effect. But they did not make that proposition, and we have to deal with the question whether it is our duty to legalize this change in the Temporalities Board which will enable the United Church, as it now stands, to manage and secure the payment of the various stipends due under legislation of this country, to those gentlemen who are still living. I do not think it is the duty of this Parliament to concern itself about the internal organization or denominational policy of the various religious bodies which exist in this country. In 1859, the Parliament of old Canada, dealing with the clergy reserve question, adopted this resolution:

"To remove all semblance of connection between Church and State, and to effect an entire and final disposition of all matters, claims and interests arising out of the Clergy Reserves, the Governor in Council may, whenever he deems it expedient, with the consent of the parties and bodies severally interested, commute with the said parties such annual stipend or allowance."

It may be proper to remind those who have not given so much attention to this question as some of us older politicians have, that this fund arises out of the appropriation made by the Crown many years ago for the purpose of supporting the Established Church in this country. Great difficulties were experienced in the course of legislation in respect to this large reserve of land in this country for such a purpose, and ultimately the opinion of the people was so decidedly expressed at various elections that it became necessary for the Government to deal with the question. It was necessary, at that time, in the view of the lawyers, to obtain the consent of the Imperial Government to change the law so as to enable the Parliament of Canada to deal with the question. The Imperial Parliament assented to the proposition that in Canada hereafter there ought not to be any semblance of connection between Church and State, and so long as the Clergy Reserves were appropriated there was, not the semblance, but direct, practical connection. The very difficulties which have occurred here with reference to this very matter shows how impolitic and injurious it was that the State should have made appropriation for particular sects to sustain them in their operations in this country, leaving all the others without any special support. The original vice of this appropriation is seen through the whole history of this question down to this hour. Let us dispose of this at once and forever, as I hope we will when we will have handed over to this church this remaining portion of the Clergy Reserves. The Imperial Parliament, when asked to transfer to the Parliament of Canada the right to deal with the whole question, made the reservation that the stipends, which had been, under the previous system, appropriated to be given to certain clergymen of the Church of England, and the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, should be secured to them, because the faith of the Crown was pledged to those clergymen. In order to preserve the faith of the Crown to those individuals, this reservation was made. That is the origin of the Temporalities Fund, and that is why the question is a proper one to be disposed of, I hope, finally, by this Parliament. I cannot understand the reasoning by which some hon. gentlemen endeavor to persuade us that it would be our duty to leave this question to be decided in the Courts upon the technicality that the Act of the old Province of Canada still governs this subject, when it is clearly our duty to step in and prevent those disputes which cause so much irritation and bad feeling. If we permit those bodies to go to law and fritter away the balance of the fund in legal contestation, we would not act prudently, or justly, or in the public interest. I am disposed to vote against this motion and to support the Bill as it now stands for the third reading. I do not know if the Temporalities Board, or, rather, the beneficiaries, as the law would stand if it should pass in its present form, would be competent to make a division of the residue fund, so as to secure to the dissenting congregations their share, but if there is a doubt I would be disposed to put a clause in the Act which would enable the beneficiaries—because the principle upon which this argument rests is that the fund belongs to the commutators or beneficiaries—their just share. The fund was not given to them separate from their church. They were to be secured in the whole amount of stipends during their lives, but many of them voluntarily surrendered a portion of their annual stipends for the purpose of creating a fund for the benefit of their church. That is the reason there is a larger sum of money accumulating in this church than would otherwise have existed, because the whole sum would have been annually consumed by the commutators themselves. Their generosity ought to be acknowledged, and one might come to the conclusion that those who survive ought to have some voice in the disposition of that residue which is the result of their voluntary and generous action in the past. I think it could be left to the commutators or beneficiaries, at their first meeting under the provisions of this Act, to provide for the disposition of this fund after the rights of the beneficiaries had ceased. I am glad, since this question has been before Parliament, that there does seem to be a disposition, even on the part of those belonging to the United Church, to deal generously with this smaller body, and if a clause were inserted in the Bill to give to these gentlemen, when they assembled, as provided in the fourth clause, power to arrange how that residue should be divided among the congregations which remained after the extinction or disappearance of the last commutator, it would be a very desirable power to give them. I refuse to assent to the doctrine of my hon. friend from Lanark, that it is our business to interfere and manage matters for this church. I hesitate to agree that Parliament should intermeddle in any way whatever in the internal organism or management of any of our churches. They have to come to us when they want legal enactments, and we should make those enactments when they do not injuriously affect the public; but we have no right to interject our views or express our individual opinions as members of Parliament on such matters. I do not know what course the discussion may take, but at the proper moment I shall be prepared to offer suggestions in the form of an amendment that I may deem necessary to the Bill.

Mr. McLENNAN. Before proceeding with my remarks I would ask the hon. member for Bellechasse to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. AMYOT. My hon. friend who represents the interests of the minority, asks me to withdraw my motion. As nobody has entrusted me with that amendment, I am at perfect liberty to withdraw it without asking anybody's consent. Before doing so, I must say I have been very much surprised at the way in which my humble remarks have been received by the hon. member for Lambton, though, if I were to judge by the way he used to treat his partizans, I should not be surprised at the way in which he treats his enemies. If he thinks that with his schoolmaster's rod, he will prevent us from doing our duty, he is greatly mistaken. I have expressed my views in the best way I could, and as the hon. member for Lambton has been so very kind as to ridicule my remarks, I will tell him that if he knew as much about my religion as I know about his, he would not assert before this House things that he cannot prove.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken if he thinks the amendment is put in my hands. I said some books of Scotch Ecclesiastical Law were put in my hands. I had no conception the hon. gentleman was learned in Scotch ecclesiastical law. I will compliment the hon. gentleman in saying that I think he spoke exceedingly well from his point of view. I had not the slightest intention to cast any ridicule or contempt on the hon. gentleman's speech in the least.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. McLENNAN. In rising to propose the amendment of which I have given notice, I do not propose to go over the ground that I did in the Committee of the Whole. I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Halton, and to the statements that have been made during this long discussion, both in the House and in the Committee. I am glad to see that my opinions are confirmed by one so well versed on the subject as the hon. member for Halton, who says that, in legislation for these voluntary bodies that come before Parliament, we must be guided in a great measure by the proposals in which they themselves concur. I think, after all we have heard, it would be very difficult to believe that this House can come to a decision of this question upon a judicial basis or a pure basis of right and wrong, as between the contending parties. If the question is to be decided upon such a basis, it is very clear that it must be decided in the Courts of law. There is a basis upon which we can decide it, and that is the basis of that gospel of peace upon which line this question ought to be decided. I think it is the function of this House to preach a sermon of peace to this Presbyterian Church and to mediate between the contending parties, if there is any possible basis upon which we can mediate in a manner satisfactory to ourselves. I believe we can find such a basis that will be satisfactory, not only to ourselves, but to the contending parties. The minority have already given a fair acknowledgment that they will assent to such terms, because it is in the interest of peace and of the progress of the church, the only basis upon which churches can exist and prosper. I would ask you and those hon. gentlemen who are contending for what they conceive is a principle, what the effect has been during the seven years that have been devoted to this contest? All for what? For some great principle? The principle in this is a sum of $500,000 or $300,000. It is simply a question of money, and nothing more. It is folly to tell us that there is some great principle at stake which cannot be conceded. If there is it is one with which this House cannot deal. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Shaw) has stated the case very fairly so far as the law is concerned. Legislation was carried through the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and these Acts have been declared illegal. The result is that this church finds itself in possession of a fund to which it has no right. That is the only result. There can be no other; and it comes to this House to ask us to deal with this question—upon what basis? Well, every basis under heaven. We have been asked to deal with it judiciously, wisely, religiously: to consult the law of Ecclesiastical Courts of which we have heard, but of which we do not know anything. It seems to me we shall have to apply our plain common sense to it, simply, if we deal with it at all, and try to reach such a basis as we think will accomplish the end that I propose thus to bring peace into the church and so settle the question. Clearly it will not settle the question to pass this Act giving this property to the larger body, because the minority who have fought the majority will follow the indication given to them by the Lords of the Privy Council and continue that contest. If we could accomplish the end sought to be accomplished we can only do it by suggesting a compromise which, we have reason to believe, will meet with acceptance. It is in that sense that I propose the following amendment:—

to amend the first clause so as to provide that, whereas the Union of churches referred to in the preamble was not complete, but left a minority of eight members out of thirty-three who had a vested interest in the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, which minority declined to become a party to such Union, it be resolved that before any disposition of this fund is made by this House, the right of the said minority should be maintained to a division of the capital of the said fund in such manner that the said minority shall control its proportion thereof.

Mr. SHAW. Before the motion is put, I desire to make a few remarks. The amendment of the hon. member for Glengarry, as any one will see by examining it, is very similar to that which has been withdrawn. It is an amendment to carry the Bill back to the Committee, but it lays down no principle on which the Committee shall proceed when it is referred; it is only an assertion that the fund should be divided. Now, suppose this amendment is adopted, we would be no further advanced than we were before. It would go back to the Committee, and I suppose the Committee would act as they have already done, because this matter has been discussed before the Committee for several days, and the Committee decided that the minority had no right to that fund, that the fund, as a fact, went with the church. Now, I dare say the Committee would arrive at the same decision again. To refer it back to them in such an indefinite way, would simply be to put this Bill off to another Session of Parliament. I think the hon. member for Glengarry is wrong in saying that the church is in possession of a fund that it has no right to. We say that we have as a corporation no right to administer this fund, but we claim that the united body of Presbyterians has a right to it. The act which was found ultra vires simply referred to the corporation, it had no reference at all to the fund itself. But here we are dealing with the corporation and not with the fund. If the Synod of the Old Church had made the appointments, instead of the united body, the Board would have been properly constituted, but unfortunately the united body made the appointments, and consequently they are illegal. We admit that the Board was illegally formed, because the Act under which it was formed has been declared ultra vires. I trust, therefore, my hon. friend will see that it is in the interest of the Presbyterian Church to withdraw this amendment. The hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) says that he desires to see the parties come to a settlement, but certainly if it goes back to the Court, far from being settled, the matter will probably be the subject of prolonged litigation. I think it never could have been contemplated by the original commutators that this fund should pass from the control of the church. The object of the amendment is further litigation and further trouble, and the friends of the Presbyterian Church in this country would do well to prevent it by passing the Bill. I hope, therefore, the hon. member will either withdraw his resolution or that it will be negated by the House.

Mr. SPROULE. I think whatever merit the amendment might have in principle, it is destroyed entirely by the fact that it will be leaving the question just about where it was when the Session of Parliament opened. It is a well-known fact that this has been a burning question between those religious denominations for over three years. They have been unable to come to any terms of settlement. They have appealed to Courts one after another until the case had been carried to the highest Court of the realm; they have spent a very large amount of money in appealing to Courts to decide as to their rights—nevertheless, they stand to-day in about as unfortunate a position as seven years ago. I was very much amused by the line of argument advanced by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron), and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), namely, that this House would not deal with the question because it was sub judice. I think, whatever they may say in regard to the matter, that this argument, coming from such a source, is susceptible perhaps of two interpretations. At least, one of the hon. members has been retained for some years, and as a lawyer on one side of the case, has been reaping a very rich harvest from it. We know there has been spent up to the present time something like $20,000 in litigation over the question. How long will it be before the lawyers and the Courts will swallow the whole fund and leave nothing for the church. I do not wonder at lawyers opposing Parliament in taking up this question and settling it, because it affords a large harvest for them. It was originally believed that the Provincial Governments had the right to legislate in that direction, but unfortunately for both denominations, when the case went before the Privy Council, the Provincial Acts were declared to be ultra vires, and the hint was thrown out that Parliament should take up the question and make a final settlement. It is now creating much disturbance between the denominations; they cannot advance either spiritually or temporally, and although the dispute may be interesting to those lawyers who have the case in charge, it cannot be interesting to the country. Besides, a settlement of the question will enable the denominations to settle down to work again, and at some future time arrive at an amicable settlement. There may be a claim for the division of the fund among those parties who represent the two distinct sections of the church, but the amendment is not in that direction, it only asks the House to send back the case to the Courts where it has been ineffectually dealt with for seven years past.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The hon. gentleman has thought fit to say that the reason why the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) and myself support the amendment now proposed by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) is that, as lawyers, we wish to see litigation continued. I believe, although I did not hear it myself, the hon. gentleman remarked that I adopted that course because I was professionally concerned in the case. If he made that statement it was a most unwarranted one.

Mr. SPROULE. I said it was susceptible of that interpretation, when hon. members were aware of the fact that one of those hon. gentlemen had been engaged in the case.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). It should neither have been said nor insinuated as a motive that would influence me or any other hon. member on the floor of Parliament in deciding what he thought was right and proper in respect to matters before the House. The hon. gentleman has shown, however, he does not know what he is talking about, because he has not the slightest idea as to what is the amendment of the hon. member for Glengarry. His whole speech might have been appropriate on the motion of the hon. member for Bellechasse; but considering that motion was withdrawn, and the motion of the hon. member for Glengarry is emphatically one to prevent litigation and settle this matter once and forever, the House will see that the remarks of the hon. member who has last spoken were entirely inappropriate to the amendment now before the House. The hon. member for South Bruce (Mr. Shaw) has fallen into a similar error, because he has not read or does not understand the motion of the hon. member for Glengarry; nor does he seem to understand much better the scope and character of the Bill of which he has charge. The hon. gentleman spoke of the motion as tending to continue litigation, whereas it is to settle litigation; he also said his Bill did not deal with the fund, but only with the administration of it. I would ask the hon. member for South Bruce if he has read the Bill, if he knows what the first clause provides for, if it does not deal with the whole capital of the fund and with the disposition of it; yet he says he does not deal with the fund, but only the administration of it. Surely he could not have read the Bill which he asks the House to read for the third time. That hon. gentleman has stated that the object of the Bill was to deal fairly with the minority, and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) made the statement that there was a disposition on the part of the majority to deal generously with the minority. I fail to see fairness or generosity in this transaction. The object of the Bill, as it now stands, is to take the whole capital of the fund and give it to the United Church, subject to the payment of existing charges to them. I ask if that is fairness to the minority. It says to the commutators who established the fund: "It is true you put in your money on a certain trust and gave up your property; you will be paid your annuity so long as you live, but when you all die the capital of the fund will pass to another church of which you were not members and which you expressly refused to join." That is what hon. gentlemen called dealing generously with the minority—taking the whole capital of the fund and giving seven surviving old men diminished annuities. Under the original commutation they received $600 a year, but they have only been receiving $450 since 1855, when they established this fund. The total amount of the fund was $509,000, the seventy-three original commutators contributed an average of $7,000; so the seven old men contributed about $49,000, and the eighth man, who went out at the time of the Union in 1875, would make the account $56,000. Now, inasmuch as they have survived, I think we might reasonably assume that their annuities were worth more, and that they commuted a larger sum than those who died. We may assume that the oldest man died first, and that the volume of the annuities was calculated by the age of the annuitant, and the probable duration of his life. We may therefore conclude that the annuitants that now survive must have put in more than the average of $7,000, and that they put in $8,000 or $10,000 each, as stated in Committee. It is proposed to confiscate $70,000 or $80,000 capital of their money, and to hand it over—not to the purpose for which it was dedicated but to the United Church. Still they say this is dealing generously with the minority. But what do those who commuted and who still survive say about the matter? A petition has been presented which was read at the Table of the House and circulated amongst members, a petition signed by twelve of the surviving commutators, in which they expressly protest against this alteration of the purposes of the fund. They say they entered into arrangement, a solemn compact with a fundamental principle, which was that the fund was to be reserved for the benefit of the ministers of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, to be enjoyed by them only so long as they held their position as ministers of that church. They say that the capital amount was not to be trenced upon but only the interest; but we find that the capital has been reduced, that it has been trenced upon for the purpose of paying the annuities, and it is now proposed to divide it, a part of it to be devoted to Queen's College, and the balance to be handed over to the United Church for the general purposes of that church, a church to which it never belonged. The proposition of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) is to divide the fund in proportion to the number of ministers who survived at the time of the Union, and as there were thirty-three then surviving, eight of whom refused to go into the Union, the proportion will be eight to twenty-three. That is conceded on the part of my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. McDougall). If I apprehended his meaning aright, he expressly conceded that this fund belonged to the beneficiaries, as he called them, and if so, they should decide what is to be done with it. If we should divide this sum according to the proportion of those who survived at the time of the Union, he should be carrying out his opinion consistently, and therefore we should vote for the motion of my hon. friend from Glengarry. It is proposed by this division of the fund to leave the annuities of those who have gone out of the church a charge on the united body or on the major portion of the fund. Of course when the minority take their share, as they would under the division, they would look to the minority fund for payment of their annuities so long as they lived, and those who went into the Union would look to the major part of the fund for their share, so that in reality, the proposition of my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. McDougall) is the same as that of the hon. member for Glengarry, viz.: that the fund should be divided according to the proportion of the commutators at the time of Union. There is one of the hon. gentleman's observations in which I cannot concur. He says it is competent for the Synod to go into Union as it was a mere voluntary association, and he referred to the Union, of the Methodist bodies, which took place some years ago, as a parallel case. With all the hon. gentleman's clearness of view in reading any legal decision or authority, I am of opinion that he has misread or misunderstood the two cases decided on that subject. I wish the hon. gentleman to notice that the property that was in existence in the case of the Methodist Church was held in trust for the Methodist Episcopal Church according to the rules and constitution adopted by the General Annual Conference; and the Court held that the Conference had the right to alter the character of the church, and that whatever it decided was the principle on which that property had to be held. It was not necessary to be held by the Methodist Episcopal Church as constituted, but the Methodist Episcopal Church according to the rules to be decided from time to time by the General Annual Conference. The General Annual Conference, by a large majority, decided that they would abolish Episcopacy in reference to the Methodist Church, and would adopt a form of government by which a chairman or president was elected from year to year, and to become associated with the Wesleyan body in England. They were an offshoot from that body, and it was owing to the circumstances of the country that John Wesley himself constituted Episcopacy by sending out the two first Bishops of the Methodist Church to found the church in this country. So it will be seen that these cases are no authority for the view expressed by the hon. member for Halton, that it was competent for the Synod to go into Union, as it was a voluntary association, and that their property went with them. The hon. member for Lambton spoke as if I was a supporter of disunion. I do not support disunion; and it was a matter of regret to me that the minority did not see their way to going into the Union Church. It would have been a great deal better if these questions had never arisen. I do not see, personally, what necessity there was for the minority remaining out of the Union, but they had reasons for remaining out, and it is not for me to dictate as to what church the minority shall belong. But while I should be delighted to see these congregations enter the Union, I do not think it is for me or for Parliament to insist upon them doing so, as they themselves were the best judges of their acts, and they should not be forced into a Union under penalty of losing all their rights and property. If Parliament passes this Bill it will practically be saying to these people: "You must either go into the Union or you must remain out stripped of all your property and possessions." Have we the right to say to them that they should not remain attached to the church of their forefathers, if they choose to remain connected with it? I feel that we have no right to impose such a penalty as the loss of their property, which is practically the same thing. The hon. member for Halton says that the majority had a right to go into the Union and to take their property with them, which is the same in effect as the majority coercing the minority by telling them that they shall lose their property if they do not join a religious association from which they dissent. They have a right to dissent, and they say they have a right to hold their property, and we are acting unjustly, unfairly and unconstitutionally if we take away the property from them, because they did not choose to be dictated to as to what church they should belong, for that is the plain result of the legislation now before the House. The question has been raised as to what are the relative rights of the parties to this fund. I have no hesitation in saying, as a lawyer who has given some attention to the matter—having been professionally engaged in some of the cases which have arisen as to the ownership of the property—that as a matter of law I believe the Courts would be bound to decide that the fund belongs to the minority of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. I do not express my own opinion upon that point. I can refer to the opinion of the highest Courts in Ontario and the most able Judges in support of it; and they expressly hold that the minority who remained, continue to be the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland; and that the majority did not take that church into the Union with them. In the case of Macpherson vs. McKay, which was in relation to a church in the township of Eldon, in my own constituency, the late Chief Justice Moss, who decided the case, expressly held that after the Union, the Old Church remained as it had been before—that this dissentient minority remained the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. The property in dispute in that case was held under patent from the Crown, in trust for the minister of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, in the township of Eldon. Under the Act of the Ontario Legislature, the congregation were called upon to vote whether they would go into the Union or stay out; by a large majority, they voted to stay out, but the minister, who was a Unionist, went to the assembly and tried to suppress their vote and force his congregation into the Union. A suit was brought against him to eject him on the ground that he had ceased to be a minister of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland; and the Court so held, and he was turned out of his church and deprived of his manse, which was handed over to the trustees of the church of which it was declared he ceased to be a minister. That was the express decision of the late Chief Justice Moss. The minister was not satisfied, however, with that decision, and he carried the case to the Court of Appeal, composed then of Mr. Justice Burton, Mr. Justice Patterson, Mr. Justice Morrison, and Vice-Chancellor Blake, who decided unanimously that the decision of Chief Justice Moss was right; and when I tell you that the case was argued on behalf of the minister by a no less legal authority than my hon. friend from West Durham, you may feel satisfied that every possible point that could be taken was taken before the Court, and that the case was very ably argued. In giving judgment, Mr. Justice Patterson comments on the decision given in the case of the Methodist Episcopal Church which my hon. friend from Halton (Mr. McDougall) has referred to, as follows:—

"The question so elaborately investigated in Doe vs. Bell, and the other cases which arose out of the change in the Methodist body from its Episcopal government to a different kind of superintendence, and its connection with the English Wesleyan Methodists instead of with the church in the United States, was not the same which is involved in this controversy."

I think that sufficiently shows that the hon. member for Halton is in error in quoting this case as an authority for the position he has taken on this question. The learned Judge then goes on to say:

"If we set aside the consideration, and assume a substantial agreement between the different churches in all material particulars, we are still far from establishing their identity or proving that after a union each can be treated as still in existence. * * * It seems to me that the principle of entire independence which the defendant has proved, by the evidence he has adduced, to have been a fundamental principle of the church of which he was a minister, forbids us to recognize the same church in a body in which the jurisdiction is shared with several other churches. If we recognize one of the united churches as still existing we must recognize them all, and the result I have just indicated follows. If we are to treat them all as merged in one united church, cadit quæstio. * * * Yet we cannot think of a Presbyterian congregation unattached to some Presbyterian church, and there is no suggestion to be gathered from the Statute that the dissenting congregations were regarded as ceasing to be Presbyterian congregations, or as ceasing to belong to the churches of which they had hitherto formed portions. * * * This seems to me to have been the essence of the scheme presented to the Legislature and acted upon in passing the Statute, and in my judgment it involves the recognition by the petitioning Synods of the dissenting congregations as continuing in communion with their original churches. * * * I think that from whatever point of view the question is approached the result is the same; and then we must hold that the defendant is no longer the person described in the patent as incumbent of the Church of Scotland erected in the township of Eldon, as he has ceased to belong to the church thus described."

Now, if that is good law, and it has never been questioned, does it not follow that this dissentient minority continue to be, and are, the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland? If they are, this whole fund legally belongs to them; but they do not come here and ask for the whole fund. The proposition made by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) is a peace offering. It is true, the United Church, feeling the strength of numbers, says: "We will not agree to any compromise; we will not hold out the olive branch; we will have the fund, the whole fund, and nothing but the fund." If they are strong, however, they ought to be merciful, even if they are not just and honest. They have abstained from evincing the first desire to compromise this matter or divide the fund on an equitable basis, and have said: "We are strong, we have a majority here, we will give these old men their annuities as long as they live, as long as they are entitled to them, and then we will leave this struggling minority out in the cold without any endowment, and will take the whole fund ourselves;" therefore, I say, that position is neither just nor honest. We do not propose to take the whole of the fund. We say we are legally entitled to it; but such a large majority went into the Union, we are content that we shall have the major part of it. We will divide it according to the number of commutators who were alive when the Union took place. They can take twenty-five parts and we will take eight. Give us an Act of incorporation, and let us deal with our share as we like, and you can deal with their share as you like. Let each party assume their proportion of the annuities which belong to the respective bodies, and let us go on in our work and live in harmony." Being in favor of this Union, I feel I am supporting what is a just and legal claim which, if granted, will lead to a just and permanent establishment of the best possible relations between the two churches in Canada, and I trust that the House will see that it does what is just and right and honest in supporting the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Glengarry.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I believe the motion which is before the House should not be allowed to pass, for two reasons: First, because it is not an amendment to the first clause of the Act. The hon. member should say, I move that a certain portion of the clause, which may be contrary to his views, shall be struck out, and the following words be inserted. This motion determines the exact manner in which this fund should be divided, and it should not be adopted, because it is not an amendment to the first clause. In the second place, the principle which is laid down in this motion is wrong. The hon. member lays down the proposition that this fund belongs to the commuting ministers, and should be divided amongst them pro rata. I hold, that if does not belong to them, but to the church, and without going back to the origin of the fund, I find in the Statute of 1858, of which this Bill represents a proposed amendment, the express declaration of the late Parliament of Canada, that the said fund was not the property of the commuting ministers, but of the church. Here is the preamble:

"Whereas, it hath been represented to the Legislature of this Province, that it is desirable that provision shall be made for the management of certain funds of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, now held in trust by certain Commissioners, hereinafter named, on behalf of the said church—

Not, you will observe, on behalf of the commuting ministers—

"for the benefit thereof; and also of such other funds as may from time to time be granted and given, bequeathed or contributed in addition thereto; and whereas the said funds are so held in trust, and the revenues thereof are to be appropriated for the encouragement and support of ministers and missionaries of the said church, and for the augmentation of their stipends and towards making a provision for those who may be incapacitated by age or infirmity; and whereas, secondly, when and if it shall so please the said church, and so soon as other funds hereafter shall be contributed, subscribed or paid in from any source for the purpose, to the corporation hereby erected, it is desired that such other funds shall be appropriated for granting aid towards the erection and maintenance and endowment of churches and manses in connection with the said church, and the aiding of young men to study for the church, &c."

The first clause of this Act speaks of the incorporation of the Board of the Temporalities Fund which is now in question, and mentions the names of the Commissioners, who "shall have and enjoy in trust for the said church, and for the aforesaid firstly hereinabove specified, use all moneys, debentures, bonds, and bank and other stocks and securities which are now held by the said hereinbefore named parties as Trustees or Commissioners of the said church, in trust for the said church."

There is only one meaning to this: that this is a church and institution held on behalf of the church and for the benefit of the church, and there is appended this special condition:

"But such holding is subject always to the special condition that the annual interest and revenues of the said moneys or fund now in their hands shall be and remain charged and subject, as well as regards the character or the extent and duration thereof, to the several annual charges in favor of the several ministers and parties entitled thereto, of the several amounts and respective characters and durations as the same were constituted and declared at the formation of the said fund."

We have in this Bill a clause respecting this condition, and especially providing for the same. This clause provides that a certain sum shall be paid as annuities to certain Ministers, and, therefore, this condition attached to the fund in the Statute of 1858, has been properly observed. As to the division of this fund, the motion of the member for Glengarry states that it shall be divided according to the number of the commuting ministers at the time of Union. I say that it should be divided according to the number of the congregations at the time of Union; if this fund is the property of the church, then it is not the property of the ministers, and it must be divided among the congregations pro rata, and not according to the number of the commuting ministers, who had only a life interest in this fund. Before the Private Bills Committee, the suggestion was made, by one of its members, that the fund should be divided according to the number of congregations, but the minority said no. Then we had a kind of Dutch auction, the figures commencing at $125,000 and falling successively to $100,000 and $75,000. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is no way in which to fix the amount. It should be fixed according to certain data, and this principle is to be found in the Statute of 1858, which declares that the fund is the property of the church and not of the ministers. This is the second reason why I believe the motion of the hon. member for Glengarry ought not to be accepted. I am not prepared to say that this Bill deals fairly with the minority, and I regret that the amendments which were proposed by the leader of the Government were not moved to-day. I believe that the fund ought to be divided pro rata according to the number of the congregations at the time of Union. It was then 108 or 104, 96 entered the Union, and a small minority, some seven or eight, remained out, and in this proportion the fund should be divided. This is the reason why I wish that the amendments of which notice has been given by the leader of the Government, had been made. The member for Glengarry proceeds from a basis which is altogether wrong, and which is not consecrated by the Statute of 1858, and until an amendment is moved which will propose to divide this money among the different congregations according to their number I shall certainly vote against the motion of the member for Glengarry.

Mr. ROSS (Dundas). Not being a Presbyterian it does not become me to offer any particular views with reference to this matter to the House, but I have the honor to represent many excellent Presbyterians who are very liberal-minded, and who belong to both sections of the church; some are in the Union, and others did not see their way clear to taking this step. I have also had the honor of presenting petitions from both parties to the House. Now, you can very well understand that I wish to do on this as on all other occasions, cast a candid vote, and not act in the interest of either one or the other party. I may here say that I advocate and admire the spirit which actuated the Presbyterian body in this country in entering the Union in question, because union is strength; therefore my judgment is with them in taking measures to increase their power for doing good. But, Sir, there is this to be remarked: what is the contention about? There is a very serious dispute. It seems to me that it does not concern Presbyterianism, but a certain fund. In fact, this trouble is all about a certain sum of money, and the question which arises in my mind is this:—and being on the Private Bills Committee, I tried to inform myself and take an impartial view of the matter—does this Church to-day exist as the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland? Now, Sir, either it did exist or it must be blotted out. But the United Church did not take the name of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, consequently those who remained out of the Union continued to be that church. We are indeed told that there is a living vital church known as the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. We have had its Moderator before us, who told us that the Synod had continued up to this day, that it had never discontinued. Now then shall we, by Act of this House, undertake to say who shall be the Presbyterian body of this country in connection with the Church of Scotland? Does it belong to us as a legislative body to decide a question of that kind? I am not a lawyer, but I hope I have common sense, and I would like to know where that church exists. Now, if that church exists, it must be the church to which the Clergy Reserve Fund was given. That fund was given so much to each individual minister, and they commuted their rights for the purposes of the church as a body in order to be more useful. The hon. member from Jacques Cartier says that this fund belongs to the church, not to the individual commutator. That may be, but who makes up the church? Who made up that fund? It was the Presbyterian Church of Canada that the Government commuted with; it was the individual ministers that it commuted with, and they by their own motion resolved to form a general fund. In 1875, when the Union was formed, a certain number of clergymen and of laymen decided not to go with that church. Did they cease to exist as a part of that church? Did they thereby forfeit their right to this fund? Now, I contend that those who went out from the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, have no right to participate in the fund, they have become something else. I do not know what they are, but we are told that the Old Church is still in existence. Now, under these circumstances, what is our duty, and for what purpose do these parties come before us? The Union party ask for a certain Act to enable them to control the fund. Now, Sir, there is no objection to that I would be sorry to injure them in any way whatever, but my opinion is that they are not entitled to the whole of that fund. Now, it does seem to me that we must do justice between the parties, and I think it would be just that we should decide the distribution of this fund according to the number of the living commuting ministers. Let the Church of Scotland, if it is in existence, take their fair share and do with it as they see fit. I believe that if the majority consented to such a decision they would have the sympathies of the people with them. They are a strong body and can afford to be magnanimous. It seems to me, however, that they do not want to have another branch of that church to exist. Now, is that a proper Christian spirit? If any one can satisfy me that, when the majority went over into the Union, they carried the whole body with them, and that the minority were bound to go with them, then I will give up my contention and say that the money ought to be divided. But after all I have heard in the House and in the Private Bills Committee, where the question was argued on both sides with an ability perhaps unequalled in this country, I fail to be convinced that the minority is bound by the action of the majority. I think we ought to take this matter into our own hands, and make a just and fair apportionment between the two contending parties. I know very well that in my own county, where I have both Unionists and non-Unionists for my constituents, I have failed to meet a single one who is not heartily desirous that the United Church should hold no fund and make use of no money that is not justly and fairly theirs. It does seem to me that the ministers, those who ought to be our teachers in inculcating peace and goodwill, are the hardest to bring to a reconciliation. I believe if it were left to the laity, without the interference of the clergy, the matter would be settled in twenty-four hours. If a vote was taken by the entire Presbyterian body they would say: "Let the money be divided." The hon. member for Jacques Cartier says it should go to the congregations. If I am rightly informed, the clergyman who was a commutator at that time, if he removes from one congregation to another, he carries that money with him. Then I would ask by what right he should leave it to the congregation to vote on a question of that kind, when they have really nothing to do with it? If they are fortunate enough to have a minister who is entitled to receive such money, then they may benefit by it, but not otherwise. I think the House will be doing wrong if they adopted the Bill, as it is now asked for, in its entirety; and I think it would be doing an injustice to an important branch of the church—a church that has existed for so long; and I would be sorry to be a party to blotting out that old historic church by my vote in that direction. I think it would be a mistake and an injustice to take such action against the Old Church. The United Church have my best wishes, and I will do everything I can for its members, if they show the spirit which they should show, of being fair and just to their brethren, and thus do good works of peace and goodwill.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I propose to answer one or two statements made by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron), a night or two ago, and which he repeated to-night. He stated, when the matter was up before, that the United Church was guilty of highway robbery, and that their generosity was somewhat similar to that of the robber, who steals a person's money and afterwards returns a portion of it. To-night he was good enough to tell us that the fund, to a large extent, was confiscated by the Board of Management, and had been reduced to a very considerable extent since the re-establishment of the Board since the Union. It is true, that in 1853 when the fund was established it amounted to $509,000. At the time of the Union it was about $400,000, and it has declined since then by about $50,000. But the hon. member for Victoria should have stated to the House, in all candor, and not have allowed the impression to go abroad through the country that the fund had been mismanaged, that the fund was invested by the old Board in banks, the shares of which became very considerably depressed before and since the Union took place, and it was owing to the depression of the shares that the fund declined to the extent I have named. There was another cause for the decline of the fund to some extent in addition to that already given. It is not correct to state that no portion of the principal of the fund can be trenced upon for the purpose of paying annuities to those who are entitled to receive $450 each. Under the 4th section of the Act of 1858 the Board of Management had the right, if the interest was not sufficient to pay their annuities to each of the seventy-four commutators, to trench on the capital for the purpose of making good that payment. I am told, I do not know whether it is correct or not, that to some small extent the capital had been trenced upon for that purpose before the Union. If so, it was clearly within the power of the Board to do so. At the time the Union took place a large portion of the fund was invested in the shares of these banks, which I will not name at present. After the union had taken place the opponents of the Union obtained from the law Courts at Montreal an injunction against the Board of Management to prevent their dealing with the fund. Pending the injunction the stocks of the banks in which the funds had been very largely deposited and invested became still further depressed, until now the fund only amounts to $332,000. If the fund has declined from $509,000 to $400,000 at the time of the Union, and has since declined to $332,000, it is certainly not the fault of the Board; and I only mention this for the purpose of showing the House and the country that if the law, as it was enacted by the Legislatures of Quebec and Ontario, and was proposed to be enacted here, prevailed, there was no danger whatever but that the annuitants would receive $450 each annually, because the Board had the right to trench on the capital for the purpose of paying these annuities. A word or two in regard to the hon. member for Glengarry. What principle is involved in the motion he has submitted; how does he propose to divide the fund? The hon. gentleman proposes to divide it between the thirty-three commutators, who were surviving in 1875. Why should we limit the division to that particular class? One would imagine from the resolution that no other person was interested in the fund; in fact, the resolution sets out that they, and they only, have a vested interest in the fund and in the annual revenue derived from the fund. The hon. mover, as a leading Presbyterian, should know there were others than those thirty-three individuals who had a vested interest in the fund. When the fund was first created in 1853 there were seventy-four commutators; between 1853 and 1875, seventy-four additional clergymen of the Presbyterian Church in connection with the Church of Scotland were added to the fund, and of course a number of those who were in existence at the time of the creation of the fund had departed this life and just as additional annuities fell in the names of other ministers in connection with the Church of Scotland were added, until, in 1874, the additional number of names amounted to seventy-four. Between 1874 and 1875, when the Union took place, forty-nine additional names were added, not as annuitants then entitled to rank in the Board, because there was not sufficient money to enable them then to participate, but they were put on so that when the annuitants died they would be placed on the list. So when the Union took place there were 107 commutators or beneficiaries who were all entitled to participate in the fund and the annual increase thereof; yet the hon. gentleman who proposed this amendment wishes the fund to be divided among thirty-three commutators alone, excluding the beneficiaries. There was no fairness or fair play in that proposition. It would afford still further room for additional litigation and expense unless provision were made not only for the original commutators but for the beneficiaries who were just as much entitled to share in the fund as the original commutators. For my own part I cannot see any reason why there should be any division of the fund now at all. The men who remained out of the Union had I suppose reasons best known to themselves to remain out of that Union—reasons which, in my judgment, were not in the interests of Christianity or the Presbyterian Church—that is a matter between their consciences and their Maker, and I do not care to deal with them; but there is no reason why the seven or eight men who remained out of the Union in 1875 should now be entitled to share any proportion of the capital itself and especially to share it now. If the Union had not been consummated at all; had the Presbyterian Church in Canada not joined the Presbyterian Church in connection with the Church of Scotland—and we have as good a right to put the matter in that way as in the other—these seven men would not have been entitled to any portion of the principal, and all they were entitled to was the sum of $450 a year as long as they lived. Where did the capital go when they died? They did not take it with them, it went back into the hands of the church, to sustain the missionaries and the ministers of the church. Why, then, should the dissentients get any proportion of the capital represented by their annuities just now? No one else interested in the fund gets it. It was not pretended that the portion of the Presbyterian Church in Canada in connection with the Church in Scotland that went into the Union, could get the capital now, and so on what principle could these seven that remained out get it now?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. For the benefit of the church.

Mr. CAMERON. They represent no church. Seven men remained out, as they had a perfect right to remain out, but the church as a church joined the Union. If any one will take the trouble of examining into the matter, they will find that one of the principles on which they joined the Union was, that the Presbyterian Church in Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland should in no sense lose its identity with the Church of Scotland, when they joined the uniting churches. My hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Ross) says, that if he were satisfied that the Presbyterian Church in Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland has not lost its identity, that it is there still as a living, vital body, he is prepared to support the Bill of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Shaw). Let me read him the resolution which was passed by that church before it united:

"The Synod, in resolving to consummate the Union, does at the same time declare that the United Church shall be considered identical with the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, and shall possess the same authority, rights, privileges and benefits to which this church is now entitled, excepting such as have been reserved by Acts of Parliament."

That is the very foundation and ground upon which the Union was consummated, and, as I have said before, there is no ground for the amendment of my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) that the fund should be divided in the proportion of seven to twenty-seven. It would be a manifest and gross injustice if that were done. If there is to be any division of the fund at all it should not be on that principle, although I am not now

arguing the question as to whether or not there should be a division. We all know perfectly well that the condition of the fund as it now stands is such that with the investments we can now make we cannot pay the commutators or the beneficiaries under the law, out of interest or revenue derived from $332,000, the amounts to which they are entitled, and we would have to trench on the principal in order to enable the Board of Trustees to pay these amounts; and if you have to trench on the principal now you have to do so until the last of the beneficiaries has departed this life, and by that time no living man can tell how much may remain when all the charges are satisfied. If we divide it on the principle advocated by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) the seven men who remained out of the Union would get nearly $100,000, while the twenty-seven who joined the Union would get a little over $200,000. If that be so, what guarantee is there that the fund and increase will be sufficient to pay these beneficiaries and commutators the yearly sums which should be paid to them under the provisions of the law and the rules of the United Church. So far as I am individually concerned as a Presbyterian belonging to the United Church formerly belonging to the Free Church, I do not care a farthing about the division of the fund. As a church, we have nothing to do with it until after the death of the commutators; the funds remain under the control and management of the Board of Management, as the law directs, and I say that if any division is to be made it should be on the principle that commutators and beneficiaries should be entitled to the fund and share in it in proportion to their members after all the charges are satisfied. That proportion would be as seven to 107, but it would be a still fairer principle to adopt the plan laid down by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), that the fund should be divided, if divided at all, according to the number of congregations that went into the Union and the number that remained out of it, that would be in the proportion of 10 to 150—but in no case should the capital be divided until the last commutator, the last beneficiary, has departed this life. If it is divided now what guarantee have we that the body which remained out of the Union shall have the share allotted to them fairly according to law. Let me ask the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron), who appears to take such an interest in this matter, whom does he represent? Does he represent any of the seven commutators? Whom does the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) represent here? Has any petition been presented to Parliament in favor of a division of the fund at the present time? We have had applications against the original Bill; but we have had no petition in favor of the proposition that the fund should be divided in the proportion of 7 to 27—and handed over to whom? To six or seven men who are not represented here at all? If these six or seven men petitioned Parliament for a division of the fund, there might be some reason in asking Parliament to divide it; but until they do that, I am not prepared to vote that this fund shall be broken up, and a portion of the capital handed over to men whom we know nothing about, and who are not members of the Board of Management at all. I am opposed to the resolution of the hon. gentleman, and I am opposed to every resolution in favor of dividing the fund without the sanction or approval of the seven commutators who remained out of the Union. My opinion is, that it would be better for those who remained out, as well as those who remained in, to have the fund kept intact, and to have every man paid $450 a year until he is called hence. No man who knows anything about the Presbyterian Church in Canada will, for a single moment, say that this Union has not been of the first possible consequence to that church. The progress which it has made during the last few years have been simply marvellous, and I would regret that anything should take place to impair the harmony and success of the Union so happily consummated.

Mr. CHARLTON. As a member of the Ecclesiastical Court that sanctioned this Union on the part of the old Kirk of Scotland, I desire to call the attention of the House to certain plain facts which I think will lead to a proper decision of this question if they are borne in mind. The great mass of the members of the old Kirk, as it was called, for many years felt, in common with the members of the other Presbyterian bodies of the Dominion, that a Union of these bodies would be greatly to the interest of the whole church, and the matter was discussed for several years. In the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland this question was brought forward as early as the year of 1870. Finally, action was taken to obtain the sentiment of the church in the matter, with the result that of the 150 congregations, but ten voted against the Union, and in each of those ten congregations there was a very large minority in favor of it, and the eleven Presbyteries of the Church voted unanimously for Union. The parent Church of Scotland was also consulted, and it gave its hearty approval of the proposed Union. Our position, as members of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, was this—that, if this Union was brought about, it should be brought about by the action of the church and the consent of the parent church, and with the consent of the other Presbyterian Churches in Canada, and that the legislation necessary to the consummation of this Union should be secured. All these conditions were fulfilled; and, having thus laid broadly and securely the basis of Union, the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, in connection with the Church of Scotland, proceeded to take final action on this matter, and by a vote of 90 to 7 decided to join the other Presbyterian Churches, and form a church to be known as the Presbyterian Church in Canada. I hold that, by the action of the congregations, the Presbyteries, and finally of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, that church entered this Union, and all the rights, funds and privileges that belonged to it in its separate position belong to the United Church of which it forms a component part. But the rights of those who declined to enter into this Union were carefully guarded and looked after. All the beneficiaries of this fund who declined to enter the Union had their rights as carefully secured by the Act of Union as the beneficiaries who became members of the United Church. The Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland had a college—Queen's College—and an arrangement was made by which a certain proportion of this fund should be devoted to this college, and the balance to the mission work of the church. I hold that, in the consideration of this question, we have no right to assume that those who remained out of the Union, who were not sufficiently numerous to form a Synod under the laws of the church, who were merely dissenters, and whose rights were carefully guarded and looked after, had any right to constitute themselves a church, or declare themselves to be the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. I hold that, when this Union was consummated, the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, as a church, went into the Union, and that in its present position it continues to be invested with all the property, funds and rights which belonged to it before. This United Church is now before the House of Commons to ask it to confirm certain legislation given by the Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec in good faith, in the belief that that was all that was necessary to consummate the Union then effected; and I hold that all we have to do, as the House of Commons, is to enquire as to whether this Union was duly consummated, and if so, to ratify it, as was done by the Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec. I may say that the gentlemen who refused to go into this Union have shown a spirit which cannot fairly be called a Christian spirit. In their litigation and in their attempts to secure this whole fund, they have inflicted great hardship on the beneficiaries of this fund, who look to it as their means of support. The matter is still in litigation, the fund is locked up, and the men who have to depend on it for their livelihood are unable to draw from it. I think, therefore, that it is high time that the Bill now before the House, which is an honest and fair measure, securing to all the parties their rights, should pass.

Mr. SHAW. I rise to correct an improper impression arising from the speech of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron). The hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) referred to certain cases as showing that when a body entered a union, the church property went with it. The hon. member for Victoria referred to the case of Macpherson vs. McKay as maintaining the contrary view, but that hon. member forgot to tell this House that that decision proceeded upon an Act of the Legislature of Ontario, which reads as follows:—

"The Legislature of Ontario provided: As soon as the Union takes place, all property, real or personal, within the Province of Ontario, now belonging to or held in trust for or to the use of any congregation in connection or communion with any of the said churches, shall thenceforth be held, used and administered for the benefit of the same congregation in connection or communion with the united body, under the name of 'The Presbyterian Church of Canada.' Provided always, that if any congregation in connection or communion with any of the said churches shall, at a meeting of the said congregation regularly called according to the constitution of the said congregation, or the practice of the church with which it is connected, and held within six months after the said Union takes place, decide by a majority of the votes of those who, by the constitution of the said congregation, or the practice of the said church with which it is connected, are entitled to vote at such a meeting, determine not to enter into the said Union, but to dissent therefrom, then and in such case the congregation property of the said congregation shall remain unaffected by this Act or by any of the provisions thereof."

The learned Judge gave his decision upon that Act. He said:

"If this is congregational property I think that, under the second proviso in the Act, as I have already intimated, it remains where it was, and has not become part of the property of the united body."

The same learned Judge says, further on:

"I confess I found some difficulty in arriving at any conclusion as to the exact status which is occupied by what may be termed, for convenience sake, the old church, but I do not think that is material in the view which I take of the case. The question is, has the property to the united body so as to entitle the defendant to it as a minister of that body. I think it has not so passed, because I am of opinion that this was congregational property within the fair meaning of the Act to which I have referred."

Fulton,

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved in amendment :

That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the preamble by inserting in the first line, after the word "that," the words "a majority of the;" and in the fifth line, after the word "Scotland," the words "the Synod;" and in the twenty-fifth line by inserting after the word "by," the words "a majority of."

He said: The object of this amendment is to provide that the preamble of this Bill corresponds with the truth. It is asserted here that the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland have gone into the Union. What the minority say is that the whole Synod did not go into the Union, but only a majority of it, and that consequently, to accord with the true state of the facts, the amendment I have proposed should be adopted. The Privy Council in their judgment expressly spoke of the Union of the churches in that way. They say that on the 15th of June, 1875, the majority of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland united with the other churches in general assembly. There is a further reason for the amendment. The Bill that was introduced asking for a simple incorporation on the part of the dissenting minority, was rejected by the Private Bills Committee on the ground that its passage would be inconsistent with the preamble of this Bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman cannot tell us what took place in the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. CAMERON. I did not do so. I repeat to the House only what is stated in the report of that Committee which formed the basis upon which the preamble was rejected. The Committee reported that the reason why they could not pass the present Bill was that it was inconsistent with the legislation which they had already passed in the Bill now before the House. I am, therefore, only stating what is recorded in the Journals of this House. The importance of my amendment is this—that this House may be entitled, without inconsistency, to do what is simply just. As the Bill now is you could deny to the minority the right to manage their own affairs. You could say to them: "You shall no longer be a church; you shall have no property nor power to manage property." I am only asking that common justice which is given to any religious body, no matter how small it may be. Any such body obtains incorporation when it asks to be incorporated. You have incorporated the Synod of the Diocese of Saskatchewan, which is a much smaller body than the Synod of the Presbyterian Church in connection with the Church of Scotland. This Synod has certain property which they ask to be allowed to manage in their own way, and they wish to retain their own name. They do not want to be deprived of that right by what, with all respect, I call an arbitrary exercise of the powers of Parliament. If the Bill should pass in its present state, the former Bill could not pass, and, as I submit, with all respect to the House, common justice requires it, I propose that the preamble should be amended. Speaking of the measure, I wish to correct the hon. member for South Bruce in the statement he made—a statement which has been generally accepted, that an overwhelming majority of the whole Presbyterian Church in connection with the Church of Scotland voted for the Union. As a matter of fact, there never was an absolute majority of that church, or the members of the Synod, who voted for the Union. On the last occasion when a vote was taken there were only sixty-eight out of some 270 members of the Synod who were entitled to be present and to vote, and who voted for the Union. It is stated that the whole of the congregation of 138 who then composed the church voted for the Union except a dissentient ten. That is not correct. There were forty-six congregations that did not vote at all. But the majority say those forty-six must all be taken as assenting to the Union. I deny that. Had they been in favor of it, they would have voted in favor of it. Because they did not vote, is not a proof that they were in favor of it. Another matter to be considered is the number of congregations. Four or five, to my knowledge, have shown, by the proceedings in Court, that they tried to vote themselves out of the Union, and by a large majority did vote themselves out of it, but their vote was declared illegal on technical grounds. Take the case of the congregation of London, Middlesex, and Mayfield and many others which had voted themselves out of the Union, but were not allowed to go out on technical informalities. There was not an absolute majority in favor of the Union. Out of the 133 only sixty-eight in all voted for the Union; yet they say an overwhelming majority voted for it. Why, the whole Synod numbers 270. Forty-six congregations did not vote at all; ten voted themselves out, and a much larger number tried to do so but failed through irregularities in the mode of voting. I say, therefore, the amendment is one that is fair and right, to enable the ministers to manage their own affairs. Are you going to deprive them of their property and existence as a church? That will be the result of passing this preamble in its present state.

Mr. MACMILLAN. Before the motion is put, I desire to make a continuation of the remarks I made the other night on this, to us, important subject. Had I known that the member for North Victoria was going to move an amendment in connection with this matter, I might have consulted and joined him in the amendments I was desirous of making and one of which I had actually given notice in connection with this question. It is stated by many of the members here that, when this portion of the Church of Scotland which went into the Union took this step, although it actually became part and parcel of the Union Church, nevertheless, it retained its original position of being the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, and this seems to me to be an extraordinary position for any Board to take—that it can be two separate and distinct bodies and yet be one and the same body. It is a well-known fact that a very large majority went into that Union, but the point is—and it is one which has caused considerable discussion—as to whether when a very considerable number of the body went into this Union, the entire body of the church entered the Union or not; and I am one of those who are prepared to contend that it did not go in, though a large portion of it went in; and though the portion that remained out of the Union still is entitled to the name that we are asking to get, and that I brought in a Bill this Session for the purpose of having it established to us by a vote of this House; namely, that we were entitled still to be called the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, because, as a matter of fact, we belong to the same church. By a Statute of the Province of Ontario, those who remained and who voted themselves out of the Union, were not supposed to form part of the Union Church. Well, if we are not part of the Union Church, I would like to know to what church we really belong. It seems to me quite clear that we certainly belong to the church to which we originally belonged, namely, to the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. Now, Sir, it is with reference to this fund, or rather with reference to this Union Church, that I desire to say a few words. We are told that the Free Church of Canada and the United Presbyterian Church seceded from the Kirk of Scotland, simply owing to the fact that they did not wish to have any endowments for their clergymen and no grants to be made them in any way whatever. They wished to have no connection between Church and State at all, and went out simply owing to the fact that they were not desirous of having any fund receivable in that way at all. They now have formed a Union with the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, but they—the Free Church and the Union Church, said: "Oh, we have nothing to do with that fund." Well, all I have to say to you, Sir, is that this Bill then contains something which is very very false on the face of it, because as soon as the present incumbents, and as soon as the clergymen who were the original commutators to this fund die away, what becomes of this fund? Does it not go into the Home Mission Fund to be governed by the Trustees of the Union Church? This is stated clearly on the face of the Bill, and how hon. gentlemen can say that they are not desirous of being participants in this fund and that they have no interest in it, whereas, as a matter of fact, on the face of the Bill, it appears directly the contrary, is to me something remarkable. Now, this is as clearly a State Fund as anything possible can be. It was created a State Fund in the first place. A Statute of George III, set the Clergy Reserves apart for the special purpose of the promotion of Protestantism in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. After a while the lands that were set apart in this way were sold and the amount that was realized from them was known as the Clergy Reserve Fund, and the Kirk of Scotland got some $509,000 as its share; but this amount has been depleted to a very considerable extent, namely, to the sum of $332,000. Now, Sir, I do not say the present Board of Management are to blame for that at all. I do not say that anybody is to blame. It was a misfortune; but it nevertheless was a State Fund which was received by the Church of Scotland from the Clergy Reserve Fund, and that is given and brought into this amalgamated church. My Bill was simply this: it was, as my hon. friend from Victoria stated, to enable us to become incorporated under the name we sought for, under the name to which we were entitled, and under the name we have always had, because the other Board certainly is not entitled to it. They have become the Presbyterian Church in Canada and as such why should they not have control of their funds under the same name, which they themselves bear. Surely, if it is such a happy union as they speak of, they cannot be ashamed of the name, and yet one can barely see for what other reason they refuse to have anything to do with a Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, unless it is because they are ashamed of it. This seems to be the only reason why they do it, because they still affect the old name of the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland. Now Sir, as to the union that is created in this church, this family union that is spoken of throughout this country, I can say to you, Sir, and I have certainly a small knowledge, in connection with this subject, that these bodies are as separate and as distinct in this country, at this moment, as they were the day before they were united by Act of Parliament. They are just as separate and distinct. You go to any city in Canada, where there are and have been different churches, take the Free Church and the United Presbyterian Church and the Kirk of Scotland, which separated from us, and what is the result? Do you find that they associate with each other? That they are to be found in each other's churches, and are one family, as it is represented, dwelling in unison—as some of the clerical gentlemen would wish us to believe is the case? No, Sir; I can say from my own knowledge that in the case of the original Free Church, for instance, when any of the clergymen of that body, through ill-health or from any other cause, have their pulpits unfilled, instead of the people of their congregations going to one or other of these Presbyterian bodies, they do nothing of the kind, but go to the English Church, or to the Methodist Church, or to the Congregational Church, rather than to one of these other churches; and yet we are told by hon. gentlemen here, what a family union there is, and what a great bond of union exists throughout this country. It appears on paper and on paper solely. Now, if this great majority is desirous, if they had either the feeling and the desire to create a Union, would they have pursued the course which they are pursuing at this present moment? To my mind it is a great oppression. The vote, to-night, has been that way; but I am inclined to think the time will come when we will see things take a different turn, and that body which is attempted to be crushed now, will come forward and exist as a very respectable body in this country. It is stated now that they are only ten or fifteen clergymen, but it is also stated by our people that we have thirty-three congregations in this country that are not in the Union, and I think that is a very respectable number, more especially when we have had our friends taken away from us, as has been done by the Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec and confirmed by this House to-night. It has also been stated that these Acts were declared ultra vires by the Privy Council, who suggested legislation in connection with this matter. Such was the case, but not such legislation as we have had here to-night. All that the Privy Council suggested was that the House of Commons in Canada was the proper place to go for legislation, but they did not suggest any special Bill. It seems an extraordinary thing that we should be asked to confirm Acts that were declared ultra vires. To my mind, if the conclusion of the hon. member for South Lanark is at all correct, we are confirming legislation to-night that it is really impossible to confirm, for the simple reason that the funds of the church as they exist at present will not carry out the suggestion that is being made by this Bill. Under the circumstances, although we have been defeated by a very considerable majority to-night, I still have hopes that we will get our rights in some other locality. In the meantime I must state, as I have stated before, that it is my intention still to try to get our body incorporated under the name of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, in order that we may have control of our own funds and be a separate and distinct body.

Mr. SCRIVER. While I think a good deal that has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, has not been at all relevant to the motion before the House, still I do not like to allow some of his observations to pass uncontradicted. He has ventured to tell this House that this so-called Union of the Presbyterian bodies in 1875 has not been a real Union, that the distinctions which existed between the different bodies before that time continue to exist; that there is nothing like real harmony of sentiment or unity of action among those bodies now. Well, that may possibly be true in the neighborhood in which the hon. gentleman resides, but I can assure him it is far from being true in many parts of this Dominion. It was quite natural, perhaps inevitable, that some large and wealthy congregations in the cities should continue to exist as they did previous to the Union. Those who were members of those two churches at that time will continue to remain members of them for some time to come. Ministers who were in charge of these churches at that time will very likely remain so as long as they live, but it is quite possible that when these ministers die, the members of these churches will consult their own opinions in choosing their successors. But I know that in my county where two such churches existed before the Union, the result has been a United Church comparatively strong. What is more important still, in the missionary operations in the North-West of ours there has been, and there will be for all time to come, united action on the part of this body; and it was with this object in view, the object of uniting with regard to these missionary transactions in the North-West, perhaps more than any other object, that this Union was formed in the first place. As to the motion of the hon. member for North Victoria, the House will remember that it has already approved by a large majority that the Union which took place in 1875, so far as concerned the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, took that body from its former ecclesiastical relations into the new ones, that the Synod of that church united with the other churches at that time. To affirm his motion would be an indirect way of contravening what has already been done in another place.

Mr. CASEY. With reference to the motion of the hon. member for North Victoria, I think we cannot accept it without declaring, as a House of Commons, that no church can act as a body. It has been clearly shown to us that the Synods of the different churches which formed the present Union took all the necessary constitutional action, according to the established forms of those churches, to secure the assent of a majority of their members to such Union, and a majority as was essential under these forms and constitutions to carry any action that they might take as a Synod. The action they took was taken, not as individual members or members of the church, but as a body. I think that we, who are members of other churches not directly concerned in this dispute, should be very careful before we assent to the proposition that no church body can act as a body in changing its constitution or forming a Union with other churches. I think, instead of making the preamble of the Bill consistent with truth, it would be making it inconsistent with truth unless we are to accept the proposition that no church can act as a body. My hon. friend is very particular about the language; he says we must state the majority did so and so. Well, if we carried out the principle, the minority might dissent to any action that the governing body of a church might take. Nay, we might object to use the form of words that precedes every Act of the House, that Her Majesty enacts so-and-so with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons. We know it is very seldom that it is done with the unanimous consent of the Senate and House of Commons, and if we accepted the hon. gentleman's proposition we should have to change the preamble of all the Bills and say that Her Majesty enacts with the advice and consent of the majority of the Senate and House of Commons, so-and-so. I think my hon. friend will hardly be prepared to go to that extent. Like my hon. friend from West Middlesex, I can only corroborate what has been said by the hon. member from Huntingdon, that in the country parts of my county that Union has been a real Union and has promoted kindly feelings and put an end to dissensions.

Mr. CAMERON (North Victoria). I have given another notice of motion which I desire to put in the minutes, because it seems to me it is the only logical way of disposing of this matter. I do not intend to press it to a division because it is analogous to the amendment of the hon. member for Glengarry, and I therefore move in amendment—

That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the same by providing that the amount of the Temporalities Fund shall be divided in proportion to the number of the now surviving founders of the fund adhering to the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, and to the Presbyterian Church in Canada, to wit, seven twenty-seventh (7-27th) part to the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, and twenty twenty-seventh (20-27th) part to the Presbyterian Church in Canada, and that the said Committee be instructed to give the necessary powers to said churches separately, to enable each of them to manage the portion accruing to each of the said churches."

Amendment negatived on a division.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Halton) moved in amendment:

That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend Clause 4, by adding thereto the following: "At a meeting to be called and held as aforesaid, the Beneficiaries, or a majority of them may make provision for the disposition of the residue of the 'Fund' after the three classes of payments named in section 1 have been satisfied and extinguished, and they shall have power to determine that the congregations which declined to enter the Union, and which may not subsequently enter it, shall be entitled to a share of the said residue, such share to be proportioned to the whole number of congregations on the Synod Roll on June 14th, 1875. And if a majority of the said beneficiaries shall agree to an appropriation of the said residue as aforesaid, at the meeting so called and held as aforesaid, the said agreement and appropriation shall thenceforth be binding in law upon all parties concerned.

The object of this amendment is to enable the beneficiaries, who I think are entitled to express their opinion upon the destination of the fund after their claim has been settled, as is provided for in the fourth section, and if the majority of the beneficiaries are disposed to agree that the congregations which remained out ought to possess or are entitled to have and shall have their proportion of the residue of the fund, then if they so decide the congregations shall be entitled to their proportion of the residue. The difference between this motion and other motions made here is that it is merely an enabling clause; it merely places it in the power of the beneficiaries themselves to deal with the matter in the manner set forth. It is not forced on them, but it is rather an expression of the opinion of the House, that if those congregations so wished it, it would be a proper and just thing to do. They are empowered to do it by this motion, and if the action is taken it will become a legal act by all parties.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. SCRIVER. While I do not object to the distribution to which the resolution points, I am opposed to the principle on which it is founded. I do not recognize the rights of the beneficiaries to determine this matter. I quite agree with the opinion which has been expressed that the beneficiaries long ago surrendered their rights to the fund, that it became part of the church and that the church should dispose of it. I question whether any practical good could result from the passing of such a resolution; there is nothing binding in it, and I doubt if it is practicable to get any considerable portion of the old gentlemen together at a meeting, and if they assembled a large majority would decide to keep the fund where it is going. While I agree with the hon. member for Halton, with regard to the distribution at which his motion points, which would not be unequitable, but rather equitable, I am quite satisfied the end would not be reached.

Mr. McDUGALL (Halton). The motion cannot do much harm, and it will give a better opportunity of discussing the question and deciding one way or the other. If they do not choose to deal with it, or if a majority be opposed to it, there will be an end of the matter; but Parliament enables them to take the action covered by this motion. It is merely leaving to those parties who have an interest in the fund to do a gracious act towards the ten congregations left out, and I hope that before the time comes for the question to be considered, if this resolution were adopted, the whole matter would be finally settled. But in any case it would be an act of equity and of broad justice if Parliament gave these beneficiaries the power indicated in my motion. We did not impose it on them, but we gave them the opportunity of making the act when it is performed a binding legal act.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I am of the opinion that it would be prudent to settle this question now and not to leave it open to create discussion and keep up the divergence which now exists between the churches. I voted against the motion of my hon. friend from Glengarry on the ground that it was giving the minority church entirely too much. He suggested that they should get about one-fourth of the fund. I do not think they should have such a proportion. So far as I can understand there were thirty-three commutators, seven of whom dissented from the union; and in addition to these there were thirty-four beneficiaries, some receiving $400 a year and some $200. I have looked into the question to be just and equitable to all parties, and I think the minority church should get about $30,000 out of the fund; and I think the majority should be willing for the sake of peace, for the sake of the church, and I might say for the sake of religion, should be willing to give some consideration to the minority. Both parties, it seems to me, should agree on these terms to discontinue litigation: the minority should abandon their claims with regard to Queen's College. I take this opportunity of arriving at what I consider an equitable arrangement of the fund.

Mr. BLAKE. I think, Sir, the principle laid down by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) for the division of the fund is the nearest we can approach in reason to a settlement, but I agree with the observation of the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) that we are adopting an erroneous mode of reaching a conclusion. So far as I can judge the fund at this time possesses two characters, first, the character of a trust for the lives of those who are specifically and individually interested in it. We are preserving by this Bill those life interests but subject to a sacred discharge out of the fund, of those life interests, it seems to me the beneficiaries have no voice or part in the matter; that the fund became a church fund subject to them; but if we are to recognize the proposition that those who are in the majority are not entitled to the whole of this residue which we are now dealing with, then we have to consider in what proportion it could be disposed of. It seems to me, having discussed the matter a good deal with my friends here, that the conclusion which the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) has urged is the best mode of dealing with the fund, viz.: that the surplus or residue, whatever it may be, after the satisfaction of the claims of individuals, should be divided in proportion of the number of congregations remaining out at the time of the Union with the number that went into the United Church at that time; therefore I feel disposed to adopt that conclusion. But, I confess, I feel a good deal of difficulty in assenting to the view that this is to be done at the will of the beneficiaries, because I do not think that they have anything to do with it, and because, if it be just to act on the conclusion I have mentioned, I think we should do it. It is our right, and in fact we are exercising in this matter the delicate duty of adjusting what the rights of the parties were or ought to be, and if we decide that those outside have any rights, I think we should say that they have such rights and give them to them at once. If they do not choose to take them, that is another question, and, of course they need not accept them. But is it right for us to pass the Bill without giving them what we consider to be their rights. I should, therefore, prefer that when the various classes of payments that are provided for shall have been made out of the fund, the residue shall be divided in the proportion I have indicated, viz.: that each congregation which, having declined to enter into the Union, still remains out, shall be entitled to such a share as one bears to the whole number of congregations on the Synod role at the time of the Union. That would be as near an adjustment as we could make, and it would avoid the necessity for the proposed gathering of those elderly persons. It would avoid putting in their hands the decision of the burning question of whether the minority should have anything or not. It would affirm the view that the minority should have something, and give them that something on the nearest approach to justice which we can arrive at, and on the principle which the House is willing to assent to as the foundation of that discussion.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The proposition is substantially the same as the one which the right hon. leader of the House proposed the other day, but which the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) objected to at the time as not being in accordance with the rules of the House. The only difference is, as I have already pointed out, that the motion of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) leaves the matter contingent on the wish of the majority of the commutators when they assemble, whereas it is now proposed to do it absolutely by a provision of the bill. I do not profess to have any authority to speak for the minority. My hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. Cameron) asked me whom I represented here. I represent the North Riding of the County of Victoria, and I am sent here to vote for and speak in favour of such legislation as I think right and proper. I have no interest in this matter other than that, nor, I presume, has the hon. gentleman. I am not here as the advocate of any particular church or body, but I have a special interest in this matter from the fact that one of the congregations that dissented from the Union is seated in my constituency. What I desire is not only to do justice to them, but to do parliamentary justice in the whole matter. I have taken the position I occupy in this matter; I have made the observations which I made, and I have moved the amendment which I moved from that simple desire. I do not, as I said, profess to speak for the minority church, nor do I say that they will accept the proposition. My own opinion is, and I have no doubt theirs is, that it offers most inadequate justice, and that it does not cover the true facts. If a majority of the House deliberately says that they will do no more the majority must do as they think fit.

Mr. McDUGALL (Halton). With reference to the objection raised by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), the Bill as it now stands provides that:

"The said Board of management shall, within twelve months after the passing of this Act, call a meeting of the said beneficiaries at such time and place as may be found most convenient, and at such meetings the said beneficiaries shall have power to make by-laws regulating all matters relating to the mode in which notice of vacancies occurring as aforesaid shall be given to them."

and so on. It seems to me that that meeting would be a fit occasion to enable them to come to this decision; and now, with respect to the statement of the hon. gentleman that the beneficiaries have nothing to do with the fund. The committee must remember that this fund was created by the commutators, that it was money which was assigned to them out of the Clergy Reserve Funds; that they had a personal and individual right to it, that there would have been no residue if they had not yielded up a portion of that to which they were entitled for the benefit of the body to which they belonged. If they had refused to commute there would have been no residue except the fund appropriated to meet these payments, and the annual amounts they would have drawn would have extinguished the fund. Since by their own act there is likely to be a fund remaining it seems to me there is a reasonable ground for saying that their decision in this question is a proper one, and I do not know who else is to make it. I repeat my objection on parliamentary or constitutional grounds to any interference by parliament in the arrangements of churches in matters of this kind. If the Synod of the church is a more proper body to deal with the matter I would be willing to substitute it; but, after discussing this matter with several gentlemen, who are thoroughly conversant with the whole question and with the feelings and views of a large number of prominent men in the United Church, it seems to them, as it seems to me, that by adopting this course we would put no coercion upon them, but would be putting before them our view of what we think ought to be done, and leave them to say whether they will do it or not. If they do not choose to exercise the power proposed to be given to them, no harm is done, and the Bill remains as before; but if it is adopted I believe this dissension between those two bodies will be composed by it.

Mr. SHAW. I have had some conversation with some of the parties interested in this legislation, and they have come to the conclusion that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Halton would be a method of solving the difficulty. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Durham is very similar in its terms to that proposed by the right hon. leader of the Government the other day, which I objected to at the time, but which, on obtaining a copy of it and examining it, those proposing this Bill think would not be objectionable. It does seem to me, however, that the amendment now proposed would have a better effect than that one. It is quite true, as the hon. member for Halton remarks, that these beneficiaries will have to meet; they were connected with the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, and none have been placed on the list for the United Church, so that this fund will really be disposed of by the members who were connected with the Old Kirk. I therefore express not only the opinion of those with whom I have consulted, but my own opinion, when I say that we are in favour of the proposed amendment as a means of overcoming this difficulty which has sprung up in the Presbyterian body.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Halton, that the fact that there is to be a meeting of the beneficiaries obviates all difficulty, provided that action is taken at that meeting; but I do not agree with his view that the circumstances that this was the gift of the original commutators gives them the right to decide upon the division of the fund ultra their life interests. They had given up the fund to the church, subject to their life interests, and their life interests having been disposed, I maintain that they have no more right to say how that fund shall be disposed of than anyone else in the church. The quasi title supposed to belong to them, because they happen to be the donors, does not now exist in effect, because, as I understand, there are 107 beneficiaries, of whom only thirty-three were original commutators, so that the body proposed to deal with the subject would be composed of one-third of original commutators and two-thirds who are not. There seems, therefore, the less pertinence in the proposition to place in their hands the power of deciding that justice shall be done; if it be in the mind of the House that justice should be done, it seems to me that we should better perform our duty by doing that act of justice by disposing of the fund in the way we propose it should be disposed of. Of course we do not finally dispose of it; we do not oblige the majority even to take our Bill on these terms. If they think they have a legal right to this fund they are not bound to accept this legislation; but if we conceive it right to confirm them in the possession of this fund and to give the minority some compensation, it does seem to me that it would be a more reasonable thing than to leave this question in doubt, depending upon it being settled at the proposed meeting of the beneficiaries, who have nothing to do with the question, to dispose of it at once by such an alteration as I have suggested, which would in effect provide:—

“After the first and third classes named in the Bill of payments made in extinction shall have been extinguished, and provision shall have been made for the annual receipt, in perpetuity, of the sum provided for in the second class of payments, each congregation which declined to become a party to the Union and which shall not have entered the Union before the time of the extinction of such payments, shall be entitled to a share of the residue, such share to be in the proportion of one to the whole number of congregations on the Synod roll on the 14th day of June, 1875, the date of the Union.”

Mr. BLAKE. We will so dispose of the question. We will leave nothing to the beneficiaries to decide, but will decide it on principles which appear to commend themselves generally, not indeed to the minority, but to the impartial members of the House, as principles just and applicable to the solution of the question.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The wording of the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham hardly meets what he apparently intends, because the first clause of the Bill provides for the annual receipt of $2,000 in perpetuity. According to the phraseology of this amendment, this appropriation to the different congregations would only be when perpetuity came to an end.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not mean to propose that the capital fund should be dealt with until the life interests which are charged on that fund should be extinguished. I do not mean to propose such a deviation from the scope and view of the Bill as that would involve. I suppose some adjustment ought to be made of the payment which is to be in perpetuum, but I do not intend to propose that there should be a distribution of the capital of this fund until the life interest charged upon it has been satisfied.

Amendment agreed to and reported.

On motion for third reading of the Bill,

Mr. MACMILLAN moved in amendment:

That the Bill be again re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the Preamble so as to provide that the said Board, heretofore known as the Board for the management of the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church of Canada in connection with the Church of Scotland, be amended by changing the title of said Board to that of the Board for the management of the Temporalities Fund of the Presbyterian Church in Canada.

The Amendment was negatived on a division, and main motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed; and (at 1:20 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 4th April, 1882.

THE MANITOBA SUBSIDY.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that, to-morrow, the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That, in view of the greatly increased extent and population of Manitoba, since the subsidy to that Province was fixed by the Act 33 Victoria, Chapter 3, and of the fact, that its public lands are administered and the proceeds appropriated by the Dominion Government, it is expedient that the said subsidy be increased and the following amounts allowed therefor, yearly, on and from the First day of January, 1882, viz.: For the support of the Government and Legislature, $50,000; on an estimated population of 150,000, at 80 cents per head, $120,000; as an indemnity for the want of public lands, $45,000; the said sums to form the yearly subsidy to be paid by the Dominion to the said Province during the ten years next after 1881, in lieu of the subsidy allowed by the said Act 33 Victoria, Chapter 3.

Motion agreed to.

GENERAL BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would suggest that the Government announce their intention with reference to the Easter adjournment. Before asking the hon. gentleman to make that announcement, I would again call the attention of the Government to the fact that the papers moved for in connection with the disallowance of the Streams Bill, have not yet been brought down. That measure was adverted to on the earliest possible occasion, namely, on the debate on the Address. It was said by myself, and agreed to by the hon. Minister, that the question was one which ought to be discussed early this Session. The papers, which cannot be very voluminous, have not yet been brought down. It seems to me no further delay should take place in bringing them down. With reference to the North-West lands, the newspapers state that from 300 to 500 colonization companies have been organized, but we have been unable as yet to obtain even a list of the names of the various companies. The extensive information asked for in the first instance has been reduced to the narrowest compass, with the view of our obtaining even a tabulated statement of the names, quantities, &c., yet we are without even that information. I would also direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to the questions connected with the Pacific Railway Company on the subject of contracts, sales of lands and surveys. I observe in the report brought down, Railway Statistics, an official map at the end gives a route for the Canadian Pacific Railway, which appears to be entirely different from that which we were led to believe, from the hon. Minister's speech shortly before the Session, would be adopted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. With reference to the information from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, I find, on looking at the law, that the hon. gentleman is, as I was myself, under a misapprehension as to the obligation of the Company to furnish information. If he will refer to the Act to which he drew the attention of my colleague in my absence, he will find that section 30 is amended by striking out the words "three months after the end of the calendar year," and substituting "three months after the first of July in each year." Thus we are only entitled to the information provided for in the Act for three months after the first of July each year. I lost no time in communicating to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company my desire that they should furnish all the information asked for; but, at the same time, I draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to this to show that we are not, by law, entitled to all the information he has asked for.

Mr. BLAKE. I was quite aware that the regulation to which the hon. gentleman alludes makes a return compulsory up to a fixed period in each year, but the objection that the hon. gentleman suggested on the last occasion when this subject came before the House was not to the character of that return, or the date which it should embrace, but to the principle of our asking this Company to give us information up to any date on this particular subject, or copies of contracts for the construction of their line. That objection is completely met by the fact that Parliament adopted the policy that the information shall be furnished of that character, and having laid down this policy in the Statutes, we are to get that information up to a particular date. There is no difficulty at all in reaching the view that if the public interest require later information of the same description we can call upon the Company to furnish it. The principle is in the Act that the Company is bound to give us the information before the 1st of July, and as there can be no objection on the point of principle, I cannot doubt for a moment that the Company will comply with the unanimous order of the House, and give us earlier that information which it is in the highest degree in the interest of the public we should receive this Session.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no controversy as to the obligation of the Company to furnish this information, but that obligation is confined by the Statute to a particular period of the year, and, of course, the House and the Government are only in a position to ask of the Company that which the law defines. I merely draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that the Act of Parliament does not give us the authority to compel the Company to make the return which he demands. I have lost no time in calling the attention of the Company to this demand, and have no doubt the information sought for will be obtained. With reference to the map submitted yesterday and the location of the railway, the hon. gentleman will understand that all the officers of my Department whose duty it is to draft a map of that description can do so, when the map is made, to lay down as nearly as possible the expected, or proposed, or intended line of the railway. The hon. gentleman knows well that last Session it was contemplated the line should be carried to Callander, north of Lake Superior, going to a point fifty miles west of Callander. Down to this moment the Government have not authorized the proposed alteration in such a manner as to enable an officer of the Department to lay it down authoritatively on the map. I have no wish to withhold the fullest information from the House on this subject. We have been waiting in order that the Company might complete their survey and location of what was expected to be a part of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch and main line of railway. That survey having been completed, the Company have sent in applications for permission to locate the line in the mode indicated.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I may say that, before the adjournment of the House to-day, the Government will be in a position to state till what day we propose to adjourn for the Easter holidays. With reference to the papers required by the hon. member opposite, respecting the disallowance of the Streams Bill and the boundaries of Ontario and the North-West, I will make enquiries at once. With reference to the colonization companies, I may say we cannot give the information yet, for the Government have not yet dealt with the applications.

Mr. BLAKE. It is the applications we ask for.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They will probably be dealt with before the House meets on Tuesday next.

Mr. BLAKE. We want the applications refused as well as the applications granted.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The matter will be attended to at once.

BOUNDARIES OF ONTARIO.

House resumed the adjourned debate on Mr. Plumb's amendment to Sir Leonard Tilley's proposed motion: That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, the resolutions now before us will, I have no doubt, be largely supported in this House and in the country. They are so moderate in tone, and so reasonable in what is proposed to be done, that it is difficult to see on what grounds they can be opposed. Here is a question on which there are wide differences of opinion; a question involving points of law, of history, and of fact, which is not likely to be settled except by reference to a legal tribunal. And in these resolutions it is proposed, in the first place, to refer it to the Supreme Court of the Dominion, and, in the next, to the very highest judicial tribunal in the Empire, where it is sure to receive calm consideration, and be adjudicated upon without reference to party politics; while, in the meantime, it is proposed that the management of the disputed territory shall be entrusted to a Joint Commission, appointed by the Governments of Canada and Ontario. Nothing could be more fair or reasonable, and faction only, intractable and virulent as it always is, is likely to raise a voice against a proposition so just. Referring to me, the hon. member for Lambton has said that the leader of the Government had put up one of his supporters to call for a Committee. I may say in this regard that no one put me up to call for a Committee. The disputed territory was chiefly, if not wholly, within the district which I had the honor to represent. I happened to know something of this question of the Boundaries, and seeing that a most extraordinary award had been made, I considered it to be my duty to call for a Committee which should collect all available information and lay it before the House. This course appeared to me to be the more necessary, because, as it appeared to me, only one view of the case had been laid before the arbitrators. The Government supported me in this; but I was not interfered with even in the selection of the members of the Committee, and I think the Opposition have no reason to complain of that selection, for it was fully represented, as to numbers, in proportion to its strength in this House, and more than fully represented in the experience and ability of the members chosen. Of course, I could not choose from among the immediate leaders of the Opposition any more than I could from the members of the Government, but, next to them, I believe I selected the ablest members on the Opposition side. Let any one go over the evidence and notice the close and searching questions put to the witnesses by the hon. members of West Middlesex and South Perth, and he will see that the Opposition in Ontario was at least well and ably represented. On the Committee there were four members from Ontario, four from Quebec, and one from each of the other Provinces, making, in all, thirteen. I believe the present Government does not, as a general rule, interfere with its supporters in proposing measures or adopting action which they believe to be for the public good, and it certainly did not do so in my case. The hon. member for Bothwell has favored the House with a long speech, in which he has gone over much of the ground covered by his reports, and, before I have done, it is my intention to notice some of his statements. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman has allowed his fancy too wide a scope, and that he has wandered from his subject a good deal in calling attention to matters which are, in some cases, quite foreign to it, and which, in others, have but a very remote bearing on it. The hon. gentleman, evidently with the view rather to show the extent of his researches and reading, than to throw light on his subject, has ranged over the wide world. You find him at one moment in the torrid zone, dealing with Indian treaties and conventions, in the next, at Vienna, then at the Ionian Islands, and from these he takes his flight to Africa, where he enlightens us as to the boundary disputes of the Boers of the Transvaal. Savoy and Nice are next visited, but he does not stay long there, and we soon catch a glimpse of the hon. gentleman on the Gold Coast, thence he wings his way to Alaska, where he lingers for a moment, and then darts off to the sweltering shores of Florida. In his flight he takes in New Brunswick, and finally swoops down on Hudson's Bay and the icy regions of the north. Really, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that an over-weight of boundaries has put the hon. gentleman somewhat by himself. At all events, I think that but few hon. members of this House will see any analogy between the international arrangements to which the hon. gentleman refers, and our domestic question of the boundaries between Ontario and the Dominion, which is not an international matter at all. Some of the hon. gentleman's remarks I shall notice before I have done. In the meantime, I may say, generally, that a great deal of misconception has arisen in regard to this subject, from the persistent efforts of partizan politicians in this House and out of it, in their writings and speeches and otherwise, rather to embarrass the Government than to advance the true interests either of Ontario or the Dominion. A strenuous effort has been made to produce the impression that Upper Canada, previous to Confederation, covered the whole of that part of the continent claimed as Canada to the westward and north-westward of the dividing line between the Provinces of Upper Canada and Lower Canada, and expression was recently given to this view in a neighboring Legislature, by several of its hon. members, without any one being able or willing to set them right, or at least taking the trouble to do so. No one could be more ready than I have always been to stand out for and assert the rights of Ontario in this matter of the boundaries, but her interests cannot be advanced by bringing forward claims that have nothing in history or in fact to support them. The Act of 1774 gave boundaries to the old Province of Quebec, and the Act of 1791, commonly known as the Constitutional Act, simply divided that Province in two, and Upper Canada thenceforward, embraced that portion of the old Province of Quebec which lay to the westward of the dividing line. No other view can reasonably be taken unless we are to be guided by the descriptions in commissions to Governors, which, however much they may have extended the boundaries of Upper Canada to the north, certainly did not, as I shall show before I have done, enlarge them to the westward. When the matter was first agitated in 1857, the Government of the united Provinces, in order to prevent a renewal of the lease, then about to expire, of the Indian territories to the Hudson's Bay Company, claimed that Canada covered the whole country to the Saskatchewan, and even to the Pacific Ocean, but that was a claim made on the part of united Canada, not on the part of Upper Canada alone, and had that claim been made good, which it never was, all the territory beyond the limits of the old Province of Quebec, or, in other words, beyond Upper Canada, which was cut out of that Province, would have been as much the property of the one Province as of the other. It would have been the property of united Canada, not of Upper Canada alone. This is a distinction which the present agitators deem it to their advantage, for party purposes, to ignore. But the claim, whatever its merits might have been, was never allowed by the Imperial Government and never in any way made good, and many eminent men, the highest law authorities in the Empire among the number, have expressed the opinion that it never could have been allowed. Any unbiassed person who studies the evidence and documents accompanying the report of the Committee of 1880, will be of the same opinion, for it is in that evidence clearly shown that the Indian territories which were always treated as adjoining the Provinces and covering the country immediately to the westward and north-westward of the watershed at Lake Superior, had been declared by two Imperial Acts, those of 1803 and 1821, to be beyond the limits of the Provinces, although adjoining them. It is therein also shown that the colony of Assiniboia, which was within the Indian territories, had, as stated by Judge Johnson and the Hon. D. A. Smith, been recognized by the Imperial Government, and its boundaries came up to the height of land at Pigeon River. Moreover, the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, which, according to their claim, covered these Indian territories, as they no doubt did by lease, at least, had to be taken into consideration, and in view of all the circumstances it is highly improbable, indeed quite evident, that the Imperial Government could never have admitted the claims advanced by Canada, and in fact it never did. The hon. member for Bothwell has quoted from a squib put forth by that erratic nobleman, Lord Selkirk, to show that the Indian territories of the Acts of 1803 and 1821 were on the Arctic watershed, but that absurdity was long since exploded, and I shall show presently what countries were always dealt with as Indian territories. In the meantime, to continue my argument, I may repeat that the Province of Quebec, as enlarged by the Act of 1774, had certain defined boundaries, and the Act of 1791 simply divided that Province into the two Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, giving to Upper Canada so much of it as remained to Great Britain after the war of Independence west of the dividing line, and to Lower Canada all to the east of that line. Upper Canada, therefore, as first constituted, embraced that portion, and that port on only, of Canada which remained to Britain and was within the former Province of Quebec, to the west of the dividing line. It has, as I have said, been claimed that Canada extended to the north and west, far beyond the limits of the enlarged Province of Quebec—I mean as enlarged by the Act of 1774—and for my part, I still maintain that it did so; but I fail to see that there is any inconsistency in saying that Upper Canada did not embrace the whole of that country, but only such portion of the former Province of Quebec as was defined in Imperial Acts. In 1857, the Government of the day was perfectly consistent in claiming, as part of Canada, limits far beyond the boundaries of Upper Canada. But the Attorney-General of Ontario is far from being consistent now in claiming, as he does in every document his Government sends in, that the claims advanced by the Government of that time were made on the part of Upper Canada alone, and that the Government of the Dominion, now that the country has been acquired by purchase, should hand over to Ontario the territory, or any portion of the territory, which was then and is now beyond the boundaries of the former Province of Upper Canada. But then the proclamation of General Alured Clarke, according to the hon. member for Bothwell, covers everything, and carries Ontario to the westward and southward, to the utmost extent of the country called or known by the name of Canada. But this proclamation, for which so much was at one time claimed, is meaningless in itself, except in so far as the divisional line is concerned, for it describes a mere geographical "line, as including all the territory to the westward and southward of the said line, to the utmost extent of the country called or known by the name of Canada." The instructions which General Clarke had, or rather which his superior officer, the Governor-General, for whom he was acting, had authorized him to describe the line of division only as will be seen from the commission and instructions which I shall read:

" COMMISSIONS.

" 12TH SEPTEMBER, 1791.

" GUY, LORD DORCHESTER—Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief of the Provinces of Upper Canada and Lower Canada.

" GREETING :

" Whereas, We did by Our Letters Patent, under Our Great Seal of Great Britain, bearing date the twenty-second day of April, in the twenty-sixth year of Our Reign, constitute and appoint you, Guy, Lord Dorchester (then Sir Guy Carleton), to be Our Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief in and over Our Province of Quebec in America, comprehending all Our Territories, Islands and Countries in North America, then bounded as in Our said recited Letters Patent was mentioned and expressed.

" Now Know Ye, that We have revoked, determined, and by these presents do revoke and determine, the said recited Letters Patent, and every clause, article or thing therein contained.

" And whereas, We have thought fit by Our order, made in Our Privy Council on the nineteenth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, to divide Our said Province of Quebec into two separate Provinces, to be called the Province of Upper Canada and the Province of Lower Canada, by a line to commence at a stone boundary on the north bank of the Lake St. Francis at the Cove west of the Pointe au Baudet, in the limit between the Township of Lancaster and the Seigneurie of New Longueuil, running along the said limit to the direction of north thirty-four degrees west of the westernmost angle of the said Seigneurie of New Longueuil; thence along the north-western boundary of the Seigneurie of Vaudreuil, running north twenty-five degrees east, until it strikes the Ottawas River, to ascend the said river into the Lake Temiscaming, and from the head of the said lake by a line drawn due north until it strikes the boundary line of Hudson's Bay; the Province of Upper Canada to comprehend all such lands, territories and islands lying to the westward of the said line of division, as were part of Our said Province of Quebec.

" And whereas, by an Act passed in the present year of Our Reign, intitled: 'An Act to repeal certain parts of an Act passed in the fourteenth year of His Majesty's reign, intitled: 'An Act for making more effectual provision for the Government of Quebec, in North America, and to make further provision for the Government of the said Province,' further provision is hereby made for the good government and prosperity of our said Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.

" Further Know Ye, that We, reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, courage and loyalty of you, the said Guy, Lord Dorchester, of Our special grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, have thought fit to constitute and appoint you, the said Guy, Lord Dorchester, to be Our Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief of Our said Province of Upper Canada, and of Our said Province of Lower Canada, respectively, bounded as hereinbefore described.

" EXTRACT from His Majesty's Instructions to His Excellency Lord Dorchester, dated at St. James', the 16th September, 1791, viz:—

" 1st. With these Our instructions, you will receive Our Commission under Our Great Seal of Great Britain, constituting you Our Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief in and over Our Provinces of Upper Canada and Lower Canada, bounded as in Our said Commission is particularly expressed. In the execution, therefore, of so much of the Office and Trust we have reposed in you, as relates to Our Province of Lower Canada, you are to take upon you the Administration of the Government of the said Province, and to do and execute all things belonging to your command, according to the several powers and authorities of Our said Commission under Our Great Seal of Great Britain, and of the Act passed in the present year of Our Reign therein recited, and of these Our instructions to you, and according to such further Powers and Instructions as you shall at any time hereafter receive under Our Signet and Sign Manuals or by Our order in Our Privy Council.

" 2nd. And you are with all due solemnity, before the Members of Our Executive Council, to cause Our said Commission to be read and published, which being done, you shall then take, and also administer to each of the Members of Our said Executive Council, the oaths mentioned in an Act passed in the first year of His late Majesty King George the First."

It will be seen from this commission and the accompanying instructions, that General Clark had no authority for the concluding words of his proclamation, and it is only valid in so far as it describes the dividing line. If the concluding words had any meaning at all they could only be construed as including in Upper Canada all that portion of Canada, or, in other words, of the old Province of Quebec which had been ceded by the Treaty of 1783, to the United States. Read in this way, and, if it is to be taken in the sense claimed for it, it admits of no other interpretation, it would have been tantamount to a declaration of war against the United States, inasmuch as it would have amounted to an abrogation of the treaty; and it is reasonable to believe that if the Imperial Government had contemplated a renewal of hostilities, it would have taken a more formal and less unusual way of promulgating the fact, than that of adding a large portion of United States territory to a British Province by an ambiguously worded proclamation. This proclamation, meaningless as it is, from its wording, except in so far as regards the dividing line, has been largely made use of in claiming that the Province of Quebec, or that part of it of which Upper Canada was formed, extended beyond the limits assigned by the Act of 1774; but other grounds for claiming extended boundaries on the west have been put forward in a lecture, now in pamphlet form, delivered by Sir Francis Hincks, one of the arbitrators at Toronto, and with some of the statements contained in that lecture I propose now to deal. Under ordinary circumstances, in discussing a matter of such grave importance, it would scarcely be worth while to notice in this House a mere partizan lecture, delivered for party purposes, under the auspices of leaders of a political party. But as this lecture has been referred to by the Government of Ontario in an official document addressed to the Secretary of State, and treated, in fact, notwithstanding its erratic statements and weak argument, as if it were the judgment of the arbitrators, of whom the author was one, I believe there can be no impropriety in noticing it. Taking it, then, as a full and elaborate exposition of the grounds on which they arrived at their decision, as its author claims it to be, this House has good reason to congratulate itself on declining to sanction the award. Assuming the grounds of the decision to have been as stated in this pamphlet, it is evident that the arbitrators made an award without a due, I may say without any, consideration of the principal points at issue. The Hudson's Bay Company's claims which had been acknowledged for a century and a half, or more, by the Imperial Government, are practically left out of account, and the Indian territories which adjoined the Provinces, and covered the country immediately to the north and west of the watershed, and were declared by two Imperial Acts as well as by judicial decisions to be beyond the limits of Upper Canada, are barely alluded to, while the clearly defined boundaries of the ancient colony of Assiniboia, notwithstanding that that colony had been fostered and recognized by the Imperial Government, are cut through in the most arbitrary manner without a nod of recognition or the least acknowledgment of its existence. But let us examine this precious pamphlet a little more closely. Stated in few words, the contention of Sir Francis Hincks amounts to this, namely: that two legally established points for a boundary were found—one on the east, the other on the west—which they (the arbitrators) connected by a line drawn from the one to the other, as a boundary on the north. But if the points on the east and the west are wrong what becomes of the line on the north, and if the line on the north is wrong what becomes of the points on the east and the west? The fact is, that there has been horrible blundering to say the least, and I do not hesitate to say that the points on the east and the west and the line on the north are all alike astray. Let us look, first, at the point on the east, and examine the grounds on which Sir Francis Hincks says it was adopted; but first let me state a few historical facts. The Hudson's Bay Company, as is well known, for a period of thirty years or more, after they had obtained their charter had great difficulty in maintaining their posts at Hudson's Bay. There existed a chronic state of war between the French and English in that quarter, which treaties of neutrality or of peace seemed to have little effect in putting an end to, and in these contests the Hudson's Bay Company became so reduced that at the time the Treaty of Ryswick was concluded (in 1697) all their posts on Hudson's Bay, except one, were in the possession of the French. Their condition about this time may be gathered from a memorandum which they addressed to the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations. I quote from Mr. Mills report, page 149:

[“Memorandum from the Hudson's Bay Company representing the state of their affairs at present, and what they desire.”]

“To the Honourable the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations.

“The humble representation of the Governor and Company of Adventurers of England trading into Hudson's Bay—

“SHEWETH:

“That the said Company being required by your Lordships to give in what they thought necessary in relation to their trade, and the security of their factory in Hudson's Bay, do with all submission lay before your Lordships the true state and condition thereof.

“They will not trouble your Lordships with a repetition of their undoubted rights to all Hudson's Bay, and that the French never laid claim to the same, or ever sailed a ship or vessel into those parts since the creation of the world, till the year 1682 (many years after the incorporation of this Company), and then in a piratical manner, without any commission or authority from His Most Christian Majesty, who was afterwards pleased to disown the said proceeding, as the Company have and are still ready to prove.

“These matters have been so fully and clearly made out by them, that even the French themselves, with all their sophistry and equivocation, have not been able to disprove.

“Therefore we shall proceed to inform your Lordships of the present melancholy prospect of their trade and settlement in Hudson's Bay, and that none of His Majesty's plantations are left in such a deplorable state as those of this Company, for by their great losses by the French, both in times of peace as well as during the late war, together with the hardships they lie under by the late Treaty of Ryswick, they may be said to be the only mourners by the peace.

“They cannot but inform your lordships that the only settlement the Company have now left in Hudson's Bay (of seven they formerly possessed) is Albany Fort, vulgarly called Chichean, in the bottom of the said bay, where they are surrounded by the French on every side, viz., by their settlements on the lakes and rivers from Canada to the northwards, towards Hudson's Bay, as also from Port Nelson (old York Fort) to the southward; but besides this, the Company have, by the return of their ship this year, received certain intelligence that the French have made another settlement at a place called New Severn, 'twixt Port Nelson and Albany Fort, whereby they have hindered the Indians from coming to trade at the Company's factory, at the bottom of the bay, so that the Company, this year, have not received above one-fifth part of the returns they usually had from thence, insomuch that the same doth not answer the expense of their expedition.

“The Company being by these and others, their misfortunes, reduced to such a low and miserable condition, that, without His Majesty's favor and assistance, they are in no ways able to keep that little remainder they are yet possessed of in Hudson's Bay, but may justly fear in a short time to be deprived of all their trade in those parts, which is solely negotiated by the manufacturers of this kingdom.

“Upon the whole matter, the Company humbly conceive they can be no ways safe from the insults and encroachments of the French so long as they are suffered to remain possessed of any place in Hudson's Bay, and that in order to dislodge them from thence (which the Company are in no way able to do) a force of three men-of-war, one bomb-vessel, and 250 soldiers, besides the ships' company, will be necessary, whereby that vast tract of land which is of so great concern, not only to this Company in particular, but likewise to the whole nation in general, may not be utterly lost to this kingdom.

“All which is humbly submitted to your lordships' great wisdom and judgment, by the Governor and Company of Adventurers of England, trading into Hudson's Bay.

“WM. POTTER,

“Hudson's Bay House,
“The 19th January, 1701.”

Mr. HAGGART. When was that?

Mr. DAWSON. In 1701. In this, their dire extremity, they were willing to accept Albany as their southern boundary on the west coast of Hudson's Bay, and at the same time they protested in this way:

“But should the French refuse the limits now proposed by the Company, the Company think themselves not bound by this or any former concessions of the like nature, but must, as they have always done, insist upon their prior and undoubted right to the whole Bay and Straights of Hudson, which the French never yet would strictly dispute, or suffer to be examined into (as knowing the weakness of their claims), though the first step in the said article of Ryswick directs the doing of it.”

“By order of the General Court of the said Company.

“(Signed)

WM. POTTER,
“Secretary.

“January 20th, 1701.”

But the Albany boundary, although proposed under the circumstances I have mentioned, after a treaty which the Hudson's Bay Company said, left them the only mourners, was in fact never accepted nor in any way confirmed, and this is the boundary which Sir Francis Hincks calls a legally established one. Some years subsequent to the occurrences to which I have referred, or to be more precise in 1713, the whole Bay and Straits of Hudson were restored to England by the Treaty of Utrecht, the 10th Article of which I shall read :

"ARTICLE X.—The said Most Christian King shall restore to the Kingdom and Queen of Great Britain, to be possessed in full right, the Bay and Straits of Hudson, together with all lands, seas, sea-coasts, rivers and places situated in the said bay and straits, and which belong thereunto, no tracts of land or sea being excepted, which are at present possessed by the subjects of France. All which, as well as any buildings there made, in the condition they now are, and likewise all fortresses there erected, either before or since the French seized the same, shall within six months from the ratification of the present treaty, or sooner if possible, be well and truly delivered to the British subjects having commission from the Queen of Great Britain to demand and receive the same, entire and undemolished, together with all the cannon and cannon-ball, and with the other provisions of war usually belonging to cannon. It is, however, provided, that it may be entirely free from the Company of Quebec, and all other, the subjects of the Most Christian King whatsoever, to go by land or sea, whithersoever they please out of the lands of the said bay, together with all their goods, merchandizes, arms, and effects of whatever nature and condition soever, except such things as are above reserved in this Article. But it is agreed on both sides to determine within a year by Commissaries to be forthwith named by each party, the limits which are to be fixed between the said Bay of Hudson and the places appertaining to the French, which limits both the British and French subjects shall be wholly forbidden to pass over, or thereby go to each other by sea or by land. The same Commissaries shall also have orders to describe and settle the boundaries between the other British and French colonies in those parts."

From the date of this treaty until the purchase of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories by the Dominion Government in 1870—a period of 157 years—the Hudson's Bay Company were in quiet possession of all the country bordering on Hudson's Bay, and by the Act of 1774, the southern boundary of their territories became the northern boundary of the Province of Quebec, out of which Upper Canada was formed. The Commissioners mentioned in the Treaty, although appointed never met to determine the precise boundary line "between the said Bay of Hudson and the places appertaining to the French," but that is not material to my argument. The line of division known as the "boundary line of Hudson's Bay" was an inland line. The maps of the period, have it marked as such, the French maps placing it somewhat nearer to the coast than the English maps, but both purporting to give it as the line "between the said Bay of Hudson and the places appertaining to the French." This boundary line of Hudson's Bay is given in all the commissions to Governors, from 12th September, 1791, till 30th March, 1838, when an entirely new description was adopted, as the limitary line of Upper Canada on the north. The wording of the commissions, in describing the eastern boundary of Upper Canada, is "to ascend the said River (Ottawas) into Lake Temiscaming and from the head of the said lake by a line drawn due north, until it strikes the boundary line of Hudson's Bay." There is not one word said of the Albany either in the Treaty of Utrecht (1713) in the Act of 1774, or in commissions to Governors, and yet the arbitrators adopted it, because, according to Sir Francis Hincks, the Hudson's Bay Company had been willing to accept it, although, as I have shown, they never did. The Treaty of Utrecht, as the Attorney-General for Ontario justly remarked in his statement of the case in 1878, really settled all matters as to boundary between the English and the French, and that Treaty defined an inland line as the boundary "between the said Bay of Hudson and the places appertaining to the French," and yet the award cuts through this boundary and goes several hundreds miles north of it, on the flimsy pretext that the Hudson Bay Company, when driven to the last extremity in an early period of their history nearly two hundred years ago, were willing to accept (but really never did accept) the Albany as their southern boundary on Hudson Bay. In modern times the commissions to Governors, commencing with that of 1838 to Lord Durham, carried the boundary line on the east to the shore of Hudson Bay, and these Sir Francis Hincks says :

"For a considerable time were in the precise words of the proclamation 'to the boundary of Hudson's Bay,' but in 1838 Lord Durham's Commission contained the words 'until it strikes the shore of Hudson Bay.' Now, I wish it to be clearly understood, as Mr. Wm. McDawson seems to imagine, that the decision of the arbitrators was founded on the commission that such was not the case."

So that it was not on commissions to Governors that the decision was founded, but merely on the opinion that the words "boundary line of Hudson's Bay" was identical with the shore, and the absurdity of this contention is self-evident. Sir Francis Hincks says :

"Still the fact that the Hudson's Bay Company made no claim to any country south of the Albany River is confirmatory of the correctness of the award."

This is falsifying the record with a vengeance, for the Company, as I have already shown in the extracts I have read, protested loudly against being driven so far north as the Albany. It, therefore, follows that the arbitrators had no authority whatever for adopting the Albany as the southern limit of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory, on the west coast of Hudson's Bay. From the date of the Treaty of Utrecht up to the transfer of the territory to Canada—a period of 157 years—the Company were in quiet possession of all the country bordering on Hudson's Bay, and that too for a very considerable distance inland, and surely if the Company had no other claim to the territory so long a period of peaceful possession should not be lightly thrown aside. In reference to the point which they chose on the west, the arbitrators, if we are to adopt Sir Francis Hincks' statement as an exposition of the grounds on which they arrived at their decision, were quite as unfortunate as they were on the east. Admitting for the moment that the Mississippi was the western boundary of the enlarged Province of Quebec, as it perhaps was, the fact of its being so did not at a subsequent date make the North-West Angle of the Lake of the Woods the western boundary of Upper Canada. The first commission issued under the Act of 1774 carried the boundary along the Mississippi, and I shall read it :

"27TH DECEMBER, 1774.

"SIR GUY, CARLETON—Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief of the Province of Quebec.

"And further know you, that We, reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, courage and loyalty of you, the said Guy Carleton, of Our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have thought fit to constitute and appoint you, the said Guy Carleton, to be Our Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief in and over Our Province of Quebec, in America, comprehending all Our Territories, Islands and Countries in North America, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the River St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty-five degrees of northern latitude, on the eastern bank of the River Connecticut, keeping the same latitude directly west, through the Lake Champlain, until in the same latitude it meets with the River St. Lawrence; from thence up the eastern bank of the said river to the Lake Ontario, thence through the Lake Ontario, and the river commonly called Niagara, and thence along by the eastern and south-eastern bank of Lake Erie, following the said bank until the same shall be intersected by the northern boundary granted by the charter of the Province of Pennsylvania, in case the same shall be so intersected, and from thence along the said northern and western boundaries of the said Province, until the said western boundary strikes the Ohio; but in case the bank of the said lake shall not be found to be so intersected, then following the said bank until it shall arrive at that point of the said bank which shall be nearest to the north-western angle of the said Province of Pennsylvania, and thence by a right line to the said north-western angle of the said Province, and thence along the western boundary of the said Province until it strikes the River Ohio, and along the bank of the said river westward to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward along the eastern bank of the said river to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay; and also all such Territories, Islands and Countries which have, since the tenth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland as aforesaid, together with all the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever thereunto belonging."

This description was repeated in the Commission of 1777, to Sir Frederick Haldimand, and it will be observed that while these commissions carried the boundaries of the Province of Quebec to the Mississippi, they at the same time explained and interpreted the Act as to the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories. The Province of Quebec, as explained by these commissions, met the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory, on the watershed of Hudson's Bay, clearly showing the views of the framers of the Act as to where the northern limit of Quebec and the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territories should be held to be. The Treaty of 1783 cut off a very large portion of the Province of Quebec, but it in no place added to it. Instead of the Mississippi, Pigeon River, the present boundary, became the western limit, and according to the Act, as interpreted by the commissions I have read, the Height of Land or Hudson's Bay watershed is the northern limit of the Province of Quebec; but in 1786 another commission was issued, and it unquestionably did carry the Province of Quebec into the Hudson's Bay watershed and to the North-West Angle of the Lake of the Woods. Thus:

"22ND APRIL, 1786.

"SIR GUY CARLETON, K.B. [afterwards Lord Dorchester]—Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief of the Province of Quebec.

"And further know ye that We, reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, courage and loyalty of you, the said Sir Guy Carleton, of Our especial grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, have thought fit to appoint you, the said Sir Guy Carleton, to be Our Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief in and over Our Province of Quebec, in America, comprehending all our Territories, Islands and Countries in North America, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the River St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the north-westmost head of the Connecticut River; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; from thence by a line due west on said latitude until it strikes the River Iroquois or Catarqui; thence along the middle of the said river into Lake Ontario; through the middle of said lake until it strikes the communication by water between that lake and Lake Erie; through the middle of said lake until it arrives at the water communication between that lake and Lake Huron; thence through the middle of said lake to the water communication between that lake and Lake Superior, thence through Lake Superior northward of the Isles Royal and Phillipaux to the Long Lake; thence through the middle of said Long Lake and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods to the said Lake of the Woods; thence through the said lake to the most north-western point thereof, and from thence on a due west course to the River Mississippi; and northward to the southern boundary of the Territory granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England, trading to Hudson's Bay; and also all such Territories, Islands and Countries which have, since the tenth of February, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland, together with all the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever thereunto belonging."

But this commission only held good until 12th September, 1791, on which date it was absolutely and completely revoked in these words:

"GUY, LORD DORCHESTER—Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief of the Provinces of Upper Canada and Lower Canada.

"GREETING:

"Whereas, We did by Our Letters Patent, under Our Great Seal of Great Britain, bearing date the twenty-second day of April, in the twenty-sixth year of Our Reign, constitute and appoint you, Guy, Lord Dorchester (then Sir Guy Carleton) to be Our Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief in and over Our Province of Quebec, in America, comprehending all Our Territories, Islands and Countries in North America, comprehending all Our Territories, Islands and Countries in North America, then bounded as in Our said recited Letters Patent was mentioned and expressed.

"Now Know Ye, that We have revoked, determined, and by these presents do revoke and determine, the said recited Letters Patent, and every clause, article or thing therein contained."

Now, the commission of 1786 was the only one in the whole series of official documents which carried the boundaries of the Province of Quebec into the Hudson's Bay watershed, at least, to the north or west of Lake Superior, and when it was revoked the matter rested precisely where it did before. Upper Canada thenceforward embraced just so much and no more of the former Province of Quebec, as remained to Great Britain after the war of Independence, that is west of the divisional line. I have been accused of ignoring the Treaty of Amity of 1794, by which it was provided that if on survey it should be found that the Mississippi "would not be intersected by a line drawn due west from the Lake of the Woods, the two parties will proceed by amicable negotiation to regulate the boundary line in that quarter as well as the points to be adjusted by the said parties according to justice and mutual convenience, and in conformity to the intent of the said treaty," (that of 1783.) But this was a treaty giving power to regulate an international boundary, and it neither added to nor took away from the Province of Upper Canada, which only embraced what remained of the Province of Quebec, west of the divisional line, so that the authority for going to the North-West Angle of the Lake of the Woods at all, rests on nothing better than that of a revoked commission. There is absolutely nothing besides that revoked commission which carries the boundaries of Upper Canada to the Lake of the Woods, and yet the north-west angle of that lake is, according to Sir Francis Hincks, who utterly ignores commissions when it suits his convenience, the legal boundary which the arbitrators took as their starting point on the west. They do not, however, stop at that point, but run up north of it beyond the 50th parallel of north latitude to another point which they connect by what they call a natural boundary with the mouth of the Albany. But I think I have shown, however imperfectly I may have explained myself, that neither the points adopted on the east or the west have anything whatever to sustain them. Now, let us see what is said of this natural boundary on the north, which runs across no less than 15½ degrees of longitude—a very considerable portion of the earth's surface. Sir Francis Hincks has published a series of letters, as well as a pamphlet, and as his letters seem to me to be more explicit and less carelessly written than his pamphlet, I shall quote from them. In his letter of 10th February last, published in the Globe newspaper of 4th February, Sir Francis Hincks says:

"What the arbitrators made up their minds to was as to the south-western and north-eastern boundary. They further 'made up their minds' that there were no data whatever for declaring any particular place in the North-West as the north-westerly boundary."

And in his letter of 25th February, published in the Globe of 28th February, he remarks as follows:—

"I have always admitted that while the arbitrators determined all points in dispute, and found true and legal boundaries on the west and north-east, they had no data to guide them as to the mode of connecting the points established."

This is what Sir Francis Hincks says, but what does the Act say? Why, that all the territories, islands and countries, within certain given lines therein described, shall extend northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchant Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay. Sir Francis Hincks says that there existed no northern boundary; the Act says that a northern boundary does exist, and that it is the southern boundary of the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company. But, instead of reporting this untoward discovery of no boundary, he and his co-arbitrators set to work to make a boundary, and ran it across 15½ degrees of longitude. I was much criticised and somewhat abused for saying that the arbitrators did not find a boundary, but had made one. Sir Francis now comes to the rescue and acknowledges the fact. In his pamphlet, Sir Francis claims that he received a letter from Judge Harrison, in which this passage occurs:

"Singular to say, since the award was made, I have received from Judge McDonald of Guelph, an old lithographed map without name of date, but evidently made long before the Constitutional Act of 1791, which indicates the northern boundary of Upper Canada to be on the precise line where we have placed it."

Sir Francis should really have said nothing about this letter, knowing as he must have done that Upper Canada had no existence "long before the Constitutional Act of 1791," for it was by that Act that Upper Canada was first constituted. But what is the inference to be deduced from this pamphlet and these letters of Sir Francis Hincks? Simply, that the arbitrators had given little if any consideration to the subject before meeting in August, 1878; that when they met they found the Attorney-General of Upper Canada and the Minister of the Interior in perfect accord as to the boundaries; and that, under these circumstances, they considered it superfluous to go into any lengthened investigation of the subject. They heard the arguments of counsel, as a matter of course, and proceeded to lay out a boundary with the assistance of Colonel Dennis, Deputy Minister of the Interior, who was, of course, acting under the instructions of his chief, the Minister, which met the views of the contending parties, or rather of the parties supposed to be contending, and this accounts for the unanimity of their opinions in reference to a subject about which no two people had ever agreed before. As to where the true boundaries are, I shall find another opportunity of giving my views. In the meantime, I would refer hon. members to the report of the Committee of 1880, and recommend them to study well the evidence therein contained, and I would draw their particular attention to the opinions of the English law lords and other eminent lawyers accompanying the evidence of the Hon. Donald A. Smith. They are at least quite as valuable as the opinions of the hon. member for Bothwell, or those of Sir Francis Hincks, who is a mere pupil, and not a very apt one, of the hon. member, for all his reasoning is taken, and very clumsily taken, from the reports of the hon. gentleman. I shall now notice very briefly, Mr. Speaker, some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Bothwell. He dwelt a good deal on the claims made by Canada previous to the acquisition of the North-West Territories, but these claims, as I have shown, were made on the part of United Canada, and not for Upper Canada alone.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It would have fallen to Upper Canada.

Mr. DAWSON. Certainly not, for the reason that Upper Canada was always supposed to have clearly defined boundaries. Any claim or interest to the North-West Territories beyond these boundaries, arose from the old French occupation, and if more territory had gained you might have formed a new Province out of it, but certainly it would not have formed part of Upper Canada. The hon. member for Bothwell, refers to the opinions of Judge Draper, but it should be borne in mind that Judge Draper was then acting as the advocate of Canada, in which capacity it was his duty to advance all he could in favor of his client.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). He was the Chief Justice of the Province.

Mr. DAWSON. We employed him as an advocate; he was there to advance the claims of Canada, and any man, even a Chief Justice, when he goes to advocate the claims of a nation, will not be likely to make them any less than they are. If he had been giving a judgment from the Bench, he would have considered both sides of the question, and I venture to think that he would then have given a judgment which would have commanded general assent. But his opinions, expressed as an advocate, are at least open to criticism. He (Mr. Mills) says the member for Algoma, from the views he has expressed, has no business here. I venture to differ with the hon. gentleman. My views have been perfectly satisfactory to my constituents in the past, and I have no doubt they will be so in the future. The hon. gentleman says that the payment of the arbitrators and counsel was tantamount to accepting the award, on the part of the Dominion Government, but I think few will agree with him. The laborer is worthy of his hire, and it would have been an extremely shabby proceeding on the part of the Government to withhold the allowances made to the arbitrators and counsel who came here at the instance of a previous Administration. In reference to the Indian territories the hon. gentleman has brought forward and read an old squib put out by the Earl of Selkirk when he was contending with the North-West Company, at whose instance the Act of 1803 was passed, to show that these Indian territories were on the Arctic watershed. Lord Selkirk subsequently gave the best practical contradiction to this assertion by having himself sworn in as a magistrate, under the Act of 1803, and issuing warrants under its authority as far east as Fort William. I have here a lot of documents dated Fort William, August, 1816, and signed Selkirk, J.P. The hon. member for Bothwell says that in the case of Mowat, who was convicted and punished for crime committed within the Indian territories, the question of jurisdiction was not raised. But the position of the Indian territories was so well understood and established at that time that no one thought of raising it. It was, however, raised subsequently, and it was decided by the highest judicial tribunal then existing that the country immediately west of the height of land was Indian territory, and that was the opinion too of Mr. Spankie, Sir Arthur Pigott and Lord Brougham. The hon. gentleman is fond of quoting from them, because they were hostile to the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company, but he does not quote what they say about the district to which the Act of 1803 applied. This question was, however, so fully dealt with by the Committee of 1880, that I cannot do better than read from its report:

"The Act 43 Geo. III, Chapter 138, was passed for the purpose of extending the jurisdiction of the courts of justice in the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada to the Indian territories. These Indian territories are described in the preamble as being 'not within the Provinces of Lower or Upper Canada, or either of them,' and there can, in the opinion of your Committee, be no question as to the localities where the 'crimes and offences' which gave rise to the Act were committed. It is a matter of well-known history that the disputes and rivalries between the fur traders culminated, towards the close of the past century and in the beginning of the present, in feuds which had their manifestation in numerous acts of violence and bloodshed on the upper waters of the Albany and on the Rainy River and the Winnipeg. On the Assiniboine, too, and even on Lake Superior, between the River Pic and the Grand Portage, outrages were of frequent occurrence. The Act was passed to provide the means of restraining and punishing such outrages, and it was subsequently applied and acted on in these districts. Your Committee are of opinion that the whole of the country, at least, west and north of the St. Lawrence watershed, was Indian territory, although, in part, no doubt, also Hudson's Bay Company's territories, and they are not certain that the country bordering on Lake Superior was not considered at that time to be Indian territory. At all events, cases arose both on Lake Superior and inland from it which were tried under the authority of the Courts of Quebec, conspicuous among which was that of one Mowat, who killed a gentleman of the name of McDonnell at Eagle Lake, a place on the route between English River and the Albany. This man (Mowat) was taken to Montreal, tried and found guilty of manslaughter and punished accordingly, by being imprisoned and branded, as was the custom of those times. This was in 1809, but the troubles still continuing, in fact getting worse, in the district intervening between Lake Superior, on the one side, and the prairie region about the Assiniboine and Red Rivers, on the other, the Governor General issued a proclamation, of which the following is a copy:

"By His Excellency SIR JOHN COOPER SHERBROOKE, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath, Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief in and over the Province of Lower Canada, Upper Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and their several Dependencies, Vice-Admiral of the same, Lieutenant-General and Commander of all His Majesty's Forces in the said Provinces of Lower Canada and Upper Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and their several Dependencies, and in the Islands of Newfoundland, Prince Edward, Cape Breton, and Bermuda, &c., &c.

"A PROCLAMATION.

"Whereas in and by a certain Statute of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, made and passed in the forty-third year of His Majesty's Reign, intituled: 'An Act for extending the Jurisdiction of the Courts of Justice in the Provinces of Lower Canada and Upper Canada to the Trial and Punishment of persons guilty of Crimes and Offences within certain parts of North America, adjoining the said Provinces, it is amongst other things enacted and declared that from and after the passing of the said Statute, 'All Offences committed within any of the Indian territories or parts of America, not within the limits of either of the said Provinces of Lower or Upper Canada, or of any Civil Government of the United States of America, shall and be deemed to be offences of the same nature, and shall be tried in the same manner and subject to the same Punishment as if the same had been committed within the Province of Lower or Upper Canada.'

"And whereas, under and by virtue of the above in part recited Statute, Justices of the Peace have been duly nominated and appointed with power and authority to apprehend within the Indian territories aforesaid, and to convey to this Province of Lower Canada for trial all and every person and persons guilty of any crime or offence whatever :

"And whereas there is reason to believe that divers breaches of the peace, by acts of force and violence, have lately been committed within the aforesaid Indian territories, and jurisdiction of the aforesaid Justices of the Peace :

"I have therefore thought fit, and by and with the advice of His Majesty's Executive Council, of and for the Province of Lower Canada, to issue this proclamation, for the purpose of bringing to punishment all persons who may have been or shall be guilty of any such act or acts of force or violence as aforesaid, or other crime and offence whatever, and to deter all others from following their pernicious example, thereby requiring all His Majesty's subjects and others within the said Indian territories, to avoid and to discourage all acts of force and violence whatsoever, and all proceedings whatever tending to produce tumults and riots, or in any way to disturb the public peace.

"And I do hereby strictly charge and command all Justices of the Peace as aforesaid nominated and appointed under and by virtue of the above-mentioned Statute, and all Magistrates throughout this Province, and do require all others of His Majesty's subjects generally in their several and respective stations, to make diligent enquiry and search to discover, apprehend and commit, or cause to be committed to lawful custody for trial, in due course of Law, pursuant to the provisions in the above-mentioned Statute contained, all persons who have been, or shall be guilty of any act or acts of force or violence as aforesaid, nor of any other crime or crimes, offence and offences within the said Indian territories, to the end that the laws may be carried into prompt execution, against all such offenders, for the preservation of peace and good order therein.

"Given under my Hand and Seal at Arms, at the Castle of St. Lewis, in the City of Quebec, in the said Province of Lower Canada, this Sixteenth Day of July, in the Year of Our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Sixteen, and in the Fifty-sixth Year of His Majesty's Reign.

"J. C. SHERBROOKE.

"By His Excellency's command.

"JOHN TAYLOR,
"Deputy Secretary."

"Those who argue that Lieutenant-Governor Alured Clarke's proclamation extended Upper Canada to the northward and westward of the St. Lawrence watershed, will here see that a proclamation of at least equal weight issued by the Governor General described the disturbed district of which Red River was the very centre, in 1816, as being Indian territory 'not within the limits of Lower or Upper Canada, or either of them.' The contention that the Act of 1893 was intended to apply to the Arctic watershed, is, in the opinion of your Committee, undeserving of serious notice.

"The suggestion seems to have had its origin with Lord Selkirk, who, when in England in 1815, wished to produce the impression that the Red River country which he was then attempting to colonize, was neither Canadian nor Indian territory, but, notwithstanding this, he, on his return to Canada, had himself and some of his adherents sworn in as Justices of the Peace under the Act, and they subsequently issued warrants as such, not on the Arctic watershed, but within the disturbed region west of Lake Superior.

"In 1816, the Government of Quebec appointed two Commissioners, Messrs. Coltman and Fletcher, to investigate the causes of the disturbances within the Indian territories. These gentlemen went to the Red River settlement, where they held investigations, not in regard to disturbances on the Arctic watershed, of which they had probably never heard, but in regard to the lamentable occurrences of which the Red River settlement was then the focus.

"That the country west and north of the watershed and west of the due north line, so often referred to, was Indian territory, was decided by the Court of King's Bench, Quebec, in the de Reinhardt trial.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Bothwell should have stepped out of his way to abuse Judge Johnson, for no better cause than that he had, in his opinion, made a mistake in answering a question in reference to Lord Selkirk's first advent to Red River. The question was this :

"By Mr. Ouimet :

"319. How did Lord Selkirk come into the possession of that vast territory called Assiniboia, and how did it pass afterwards into the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company?—The old Canada Company, called the North-West Company, gave certain rights in the first instance; what they were I do not know, and I have never seen any instrument attesting them to Lord Selkirk, who brought out a number of Scotch and Shetland Island emigrants and settled them there."

Now this is not, after all, a very great error, for it is well known that Lord Selkirk had entered into certain negotiations with the North-West Company long before he joined the Hudson's Bay Company, and I believe he was trying, with their assistance in the first instance, to get possession of a tract for his pet idea of a settlement at Red River. Of course, the North-West Company could not give him rights, but if we are to believe the hon. gentleman, neither could the Hudson's Bay Company. However, it was with the Hudson's Bay Company that Lord Selkirk finally allied himself. The mistake, if mistake it be, was hardly worth noticing. As to the unmerited abuse which the hon. gentleman has heaped on the Judge, I think he will be able to stand it. He stands in a position which any hon. gentleman here might be proud to reach. When the Government, in 1870, wished to send a person of pre-eminent ability to the North-West as Lieutenant-Governor, they selected Judge Johnson, and he did a great deal to allay the angry feeling then existing in the distracted settlement of Manitoba. He is a gentleman everywhere esteemed, not only for his talents and his knowledge of the law but for his personal qualities, which render him a favorite with all who have the pleasure of his acquaintance. At all events, no trust betrayed darkens his fair fame, and it ill becomes the hon. member for Bothwell to abuse him in this House. The hon. gentleman has criticized the report of the Committee of 1880 of which I was chairman. No doubt, it is somewhat imperfect, and there may be a good deal left out which should have been in it; but he should remember that our time was limited, that within a few weeks we had to collect documents and evidence, and many believe that we did remarkably well considering the circumstances. The Ontario Book of Documents is not the most perfect work in the world, it is open to criticism in many ways, and knowing this the hon. gentleman should manifest some little reserve in criticising the work of others.

Mr. CAMERON (South Huron). I think, Mr. Speaker, it was not in good taste for the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat to lecture my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as to the way in which he dealt with Judge Johnson. Judge Johnson is still in the land of the living, and able to answer for himself. The hon. gentleman himself, about ten minutes before, undertook to cast an unwarranted and unjustifiable reflection upon one of the ablest and best Judges that ever graced the Bench of Ontario, who is now in his grave and unable to answer for himself. He ventured to tell us that the able paper of the late Chief Justice Draper, upon the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company to the territory now in question, was the statement and argument of an advocate—a paid advocate—

Mr. DAWSON. Allow me to contradict the hon. gentleman. I said nothing about a paid advocate, and I cast no reflections, and meant no reflections, upon Mr. Justice Draper, a gentleman for whom I always entertained the highest esteem, and I entertain now the highest regard for his memory.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not know the amount of respect the hon. member entertains for the memory of the late Chief Justice Draper. All I know is that the hon. member, in my hearing, did cast reflections on the honesty and integrity of a Judge who, he said, was an advocate. Why was he an advocate? And why should the hon. gentleman speak of him as an advocate except that this House and the country might be led to believe that very little reliance could be placed upon his opinions, and it was possible he might have advanced claims more than he was justified in advancing? If that is not a reflection upon the late Chief Justice Draper, I would like to know what is a reflection. Now, I do not desire to enter into a long argument on the merits of this question; I do not desire to go back 200 or 300 years and ransack all the old Acts of Parliament, proclamations and commissions that have any bearing on the present controversy. They are all important in their way, but the hon. member for Bothwell has dealt so fully and so exhaustively with that branch of the case that I do not propose troubling the House with any lengthened dissertations on that part of the early history of the North-West. I may say, however, that after having looked into these documents myself, I have satisfied my own mind, at all events, that the western boundary of Ontario is as far, if not farther, west than that fixed by the award; but these are not the only documents to which I wish to refer. There are other documents to which I shall have occasion to draw the attention of the House before I conclude my argument. I may say, Sir, that this is not the first time, and this is not the first Parliament, in which this important question has been up for discussion. It was a living issue in the old Province of Canada, years before Confederation took place. The Government of the Province of Canada, for a number of years, for at least a quarter of a century, was vigorously and steadily pressing the claims of the Province of Canada to the western boundary, as far, if not farther west, than the boundary fixed by the award. Upon that subject we have many valuable contributions, many valuable reports, and many valuable state papers; and I venture to say that any person who takes the trouble to peruse those documents submitted to Parliament in days gone by, will rise from their perusal with the conviction firmly impressed on his mind that the claims now advanced by the Province of Ontario are well founded claims. I must confess, Sir, that my own mind was led irresistibly to the conclusion that the claims of Ontario were well-founded claims, by the documents submitted to Parliament and the arguments and statements advanced by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the House, through his colleagues in days gone by. If the arguments so advanced twenty years ago were then valid and sound, they are equally valid and sound to-day; there is no pretence, so far as I have heard, that any new light has been thrown on the subject since Confederation. The hon. member who has just taken his seat, who has made this question one of his hobbies, and who understands it perhaps as well as most men in the House or out of the House, does not pretend to say that any new light has been thrown on the subject within the last twenty years. The hon. member referred to the report of the late Chief Justice Draper on this question. Let me also direct the attention of the House to that report. In 1857, the hon. member who now leads the House was leader of the Government of the old Province of Canada. Questions then arose as to the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company to the vast territory to the west of us, and as to the western boundary of the old Province of Canada; and the late Chief Justice Draper, than whom no abler man could be found to deal with the subject, was selected by the Government of the day to make an exhaustive inquiry into the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company under their charter, and into the subject of the western and northern boundaries of the old Province of Canada. With a zeal and vigor which were always characteristic of that distinguished Judge, he set to work on the duty assigned him. He made a thorough investigation, and what conclusion did he arrive at? The conclusion he arrived at was approved of by the hon. gentleman who leads the Government. And what was that conclusion? The conclusion he arrived at with respect to the claims advanced by the Hudson's Bay Company was that the right to the territory then claimed by the Company was more than problematical. It was extremely doubtful. The conclusion arrived at, with respect to the western boundary of Ontario, will be found in the document that the Crown published and such conclusion fully justifies the award. If his conclusion upon that subject is correct, the western boundary of Ontario extends, at all events, westward as is described in the award of the arbitrators. That conclusion has never been repudiated by the Government of the day. It has never been repudiated by the First Minister. It has never been repudiated, so far as I am aware, until lately by any of the followers of the present Government. That is not all. Recollect, Sir, that in the statements I am presenting there is nothing original. There is nothing new; my arguments and statements are the arguments and statements of hon. gentlemen opposite when they considered this question from an impartial and non-political standpoint. If the arguments were right then they have equal force now. If the arguments presented by the right hon. leader of the House, through his colleagues, twenty years ago were correct, they are equally correct now. In 1857, a colleague of the present leader of the House, then Commissioner of Crown Lands was appointed by the Government to make an enquiry similar in character to the enquiry of the late Chief Justice Draper. After having exhausted all the material then at his command, and which was substantially the material and evidence submitted to the various Committees which have dealt with this subject up to the present day, what conclusion did he arrive at? He pointed out that in 1670, when the English Government granted the charter to the Hudson's Bay Company, about which so much has been heard in the last eight or ten years, the English Government had no right and no power to grant that territory, simply because the territory did not belong to the English crown. He further points out that by virtue of that charter the Imperial Government undertook to grant to the Hudson's Bay Company vast territories in the west which they did not own, and undertook to grant to the Company any undiscovered territories that they might discover which were not in the possession of any Christian Prince. He deals with the latter branch of the case summarily in his valuable state paper, from which I take the following extract, in reference to any supposed rights that the Company might have acquired by virtue of discovery. He says:

"In fact, except the Copper Mine River the Company never discovered anything or penetrated beyond the coasts and confines of the Bay to which, perhaps they at that time justly considered their rights restricted) for upwards of one hundred years after their charter, and that when they did so penetrate, the only discovery they made was that the whole country in the interior had been long in the peaceable possession of the subjects of another Christian prince."

The leader of the House through his colleague thus clearly points out that as discoverers of unknown territory the Hudson's Bay Company acquired no rights to the vast region under discussion, and that the claim of the Company depended on whether or not the Imperial Government had the right to convey the territory to them, and that right depended on a series of disputed facts. He then deals with the respective rights of England and France to the territory. He points out that in 1497 the Cabot brothers were supposed to have discovered this portion of the new world, but he points out also that no reliance whatever can be placed on the discoveries made by them, because no record was kept of what they did. No evidence appears at all events to-day, no evidence ever appeared that they ever landed on the shore, or took possession in any formal way, or if they did that they retained possession of any portion of that country. Therefore, so far as their alleged discoveries are concerned, no importance could be attached to them as giving to the English Crown the power to convey to the Hudson's Bay Company, and that no evidence existed of any specific territorial claims vested in the English Government in 1670. Then the colleague of the right hon. First Minister points out upon what ground the French based their claims. He says that in 1504 the fishermen of Brittany established fisheries on the shores of Hudson's Bay; that in 1506 a French map was published by Jean Deny, indicating this possession by the French; that a geographical work was published in 1677 to which was attached a map which fixes the point of possession by the French fishermen at Hudson's Straits; that in 1523 a certain navigator named Jean Vereyzani, under instructions from Francis I. of France, visited the country and, for the Crown of France, took possession of the country and called it New France; and that then no one was in possession, unless it were the French. If the Cabots did discover the country they abandoned their possessions, and no one was then in possession of this vast section of country unless it were the French, clearly no one under the English Crown. Then the colleague of the right hon. gentlemen points out, in this valuable and important State paper, the fact of the discovery and the possession by the English, but subsequently abandoned, and the important fact of the discovery by the French and of the possession and retention of such possession by the French, and he then uses the arguments made use of by the English with respect to the Oregon boundary. He says:

"It is a circumstance not to be lost sight of that it (the discovery by Gray) was not, for several years, followed up by any Act which could give it value in a national point of view; it was not, in truth, made known to the world, either by the discoverer himself or by his Government."

Then the hon. First Minister, through his colleagues, goes on through a series of events subsequent to that, pointing out that all this country was in the possession of the French from the first discovery until the territory was ceded by France to Great Britain. He points out that, in 1540, de Roberval was made Viceroy of Canada, and that the description in his commission covered the Hudson's Bay territory; that in 1598 de la Roche was made Governor of Canada over precisely the same territory as that over which de Roberval was made Viceroy, and that these voyages and early discoveries by the navigators clearly show that the French were really in possession of the country and entitled to hold it at the very time the English Government granted it to the Hudson's Bay, and that therefore nothing passed under that charter. Then the hon. First Minister, through his colleague, goes further and contends vigorously that France was entitled to the territory by virtue of treaty obligations. He points out that by the treaty of 1632, the treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye, Canada was relinquished to the French, and that the territory in question was covered by that treaty. He points out still further, in confirmation of the views of the Government of that day, that in 1629 Champlain, who was the Viceroy of France, was captured in Quebec and carried to England as a prisoner of war, and that while he was such prisoner he published a map showing that the Hudson's Bay's country formed part of New France. He further points out that through all these years and down to 1670 when the English Government granted the charter to the Hudson's Bay Company, France and not England occupied this territory, and that, therefore, no rights were legally granted to the Hudson's Bay Company over the land in dispute. This condition of affairs remained unchanged for half a century, and during all that time France remained in undisturbed possession of the country. Then war again broke out between England and France. That war was ended by the Treaty of Ryswick in 1697; at that time England had possession of Fort Albany only—all the rest of the territory was in the possession of the French. But under the provisions of that treaty each nation was bound to deliver up to the other all the possessions they had prior to the war and especially in Hudson's Bay, and so under that treaty Fort Albany alone of all the vast territory claimed by the Company was held by it down to the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713. And so, Sir, it may be said that the rights of the respective Crowns of France and England continued unchanged until the treaty of 1763, when the territory was ceded, with whatever rights and franchises belonged to it, to Great Britain, up to the Mississippi River. But these are not all the arguments advanced by the right hon. gentleman's colleague on this important subject, and as the head of that Government he must bear the responsibility of the position then taken. He pointed out with great force and vigor, and with great energy, the fact that the Quebec Act of 1774 gave Quebec all the territory I have just spoken of, and that is covered by the description in the commission that was issued to Sir Guy Carleton in that year. It may be well to refer for a moment to what that description does cover, because it covers a good deal more territory than hon. gentlemen opposite are now willing to concede to the Province of Ontario, or to admit belonged to the old Province of Quebec, and as a consequence, to the new Province of Ontario, although not more than they themselves at one time contended for. After describing at some considerable length the boundaries of the territory over which Sir Guy Carleton was appointed to govern, the description in the commission thus proceeds:

"And thence along the western boundary of the said Province until it strikes the River Ohio, and along the banks of the said river to the southern boundary of the territory granted by the Merchants Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay, and also all such territories, islands and countries which have, since the 10th day of February, 1763, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland as aforesaid, together with all the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever hereupon belonging."

In the paper to which I have referred, and from which I have just quoted, the Commissioner of Crown Lands, who was a colleague of the present hon. First Minister, contended vigorously and strongly for that boundary. The argument presented is strong, forcible, and conclusive in so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned; but that is not all. At a much later period than that to which I have referred, hon. gentlemen opposite took equally strong grounds on this question. Some twelve years ago, two colleagues of the hon. gentleman who leads the House were entrusted with the important task of ascertaining the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company to this vast territory, and of ascertaining the boundaries of old Canada—the late Sir George Cartier and the member for Halton. They examined into this matter with very great care and upon that examination took stronger ground on this question than we on this side take now. It may be worth while drawing the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the strong grounds taken by the two colleagues of the First Minister, when acting for the old Province of Canada; it is also important to consider the matured judgment of these distinguished statesmen at a subsequent period. What did the hon. gentlemen say in their correspondence with Sir F. Rogers, of the Colonial Office, in 1869, on the subject. They said:

"The assertion of the Deputy-Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company that the country between Lake of the Woods and Red River is 'the freehold territory of the Company,' and that the so-called 'trespass' of the Canadian Government in sending provisions to the starving settlers, and assisting them to make a road for their own convenience and safety hereinafter, is 'an actual encroachment on the soil of the Company,' might, if unnoticed by us, be claimed by another proof or admission of the rights of the Company in that part of the continent. We, therefore, beg to remind His Lordship that the boundaries of Upper Canada on the north and west, were declared, under the authority of the Constitutional Act of 1791, to include 'all the territory to the westward and southward' of the 'boundary line of Hudson's Bay,' to the utmost extent of the country commonly called or known by the name of Canada. Whatever doubt may exist as to the 'utmost extent' of old, or French Canada, no impartial investigator of the evidence in the case can doubt that it extended to, and included, the country between Lake of the Woods and Red River."

When the correspondence between the Colonial Office and the First Minister's colleagues had gone a step further, another letter was addressed by them to the Colonial Office, and as the arguments in this letter are cogent I will trouble the House with the following extracts from it:—

"1. The Charter of Charles II. (and for the present we raise no question as to its validity), could not and did not grant to the Hudson's Bay Company, any territory in America which was not then (1670), subject to the Crown of England.

"2. The Charter expressly excluded all lands, &c., 'then possessed by the subjects of any other Christian Prince of State.'

"3. By the Treaty of St. Germain-en-Laye (1632), the King of England resigned to the King of France, the Sovereignty of Acadia, New France, and Canada generally, and without limits.

"4. 'La Nouvelle France' was then understood to include the whole region of Hudson's Bay, as the maps and histories of the time, English and French, abundantly prove.

"5. At the Treaty of Ryswick (1697), twenty-seven years after the date of the Charter, the right of the French to 'places situated in the Hudson's Bay,' was distinctly admitted; and although commissioners were appointed (but never came to an agreement) to 'examine and determine the pretensions which either of the said Kings hath to the places situate in the Hudson's Bay,' and with 'authority for settling the limits and confines of the lands to be restored on either side;' the places taken from the English (i.e., from the Hudson's Bay Company), by the French previous to the war, and 'retaken by the English during this war, shall be left to the French by virtue of the foregoing (the 7th) article.' In other words, the forts and factories of the Hudson's Bay Company, established in Hudson's Bay under pretence of their Charter, and taken possession of by the French in time of peace, on the ground that they were an invasion of French territory, were restored, by the Treaty of Ryswick, to the French, and not to the Company.

"6. By the Treaty of Utrecht, 1714, 'the Bay and Straits of Hudson, together with all lands, seas, sea coasts, and places situate in the Bay and Straits, and which belong thereto,' were finally ceded to Great Britain.

"7. As no definite boundary was ever established between the possessions of the French in the interior and the English at Hudson's Bay, down to the Treaty of Paris, 1763, when the whole of Canada was ceded to Great Britain, the extent of the actual possession by the two nations for some period, say from the Treaty of Utrecht to the Treaty of Paris, affords the only rational and true basis for ascertaining that boundary.

"8. The evidence is abundant and conclusive to prove that the French traded over and possessed the whole of the country known as the Winnipeg Basin and 'Fertile Belt,' from its discovery by Europeans down to the Treaty of Paris, and that the Hudson's Bay Company neither traded nor established posts to the south or west of Lake Winnipeg, until many years after the cession of Canada to England.

"9. No other or subsequent grant to the Company was ever made which could possibly extend their territorial rights under their Charter. The license to trade in the Indian territories, which they obtained in 1821, was revoked in 1858, and has not been renewed.

"10. The country which, in view of these facts, must be excluded from the operation of the Charter, includes all the lands fit for cultivation and settlement in that part of British America."

It would have been well for the member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) before taking the ground he did, to refer to the arguments and the statements of the hon. gentleman that he with so much fidelity supports. He then took stronger and higher ground on this subject than we take now. He pointed out what the charter of King Charles the II. granted to the Company and exactly what the Company held under it. Now, I say that is conclusive against hon. gentlemen opposite. They are not my arguments, they are the arguments of the hon. gentlemen opposite, of the hon. First Minister and of his colleagues. They are powerful, they are unanswerable, and if they were strong and powerful in 1869 and 1857, they are equally so to-day. No new light has been thrown on the subject since. Nothing has taken place to warrant a change in the opinion of hon. gentlemen on the subject. Sir, if they were right then, they are clearly wrong now. To my mind these arguments carry conviction beyond a doubt, and if hon. gentlemen have changed their opinions as to the western and northern boundaries of the Province of Ontario, if they have arrived at a different conclusion now to what they entertained twelve years ago, it is not in the interests of Ontario or of the Dominion that such charges of opinion have taken place but to serve some political purpose best known to themselves.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. CAMERON. When you left the Chair at six o'clock I had pointed out to the House that the Conservative party, led by the present Premier, was committed, as far as they could be by their solemn declaration, to the fact that the boundary of the old Province of Quebec was, at least, as far west, if not farther west, than the boundary given to Ontario under the present award. I pointed out that at least four eminent Canadian statesmen who had occupied for years, and some of whom still occupy, a prominent place in the councils of the Sovereign, had given expression in no unmistakable manner to their opinions on this subject. I now propose submitting for the consideration of this House the opinions of two other Canadian gentlemen of eminent ability, men who perhaps above all others are supposed to be conversant with this question, men who are eminent in their own profession, and who have occupied for some years a distinguished place in the history of Canada—I allude to the Dawson Brothers, who have, in documents that are now public property, given expression to their opinions on this question in a manner that no man can misunderstand. I will first submit to the House the opinions of Mr. Wm. McD. Dawson. Of course, I do not suppose that either of them is any relation to the gentleman who has just addressed the House. I regret the hon. member for Algoma is not now in his place, because I am sure he would be very much interested in this part of my argument. I am sure those old historic reminiscences would be agreeable and pleasant to his cultivated mind. Mr. Wm. McD. Dawson, in giving his evidence before a Committee of the Legislative Assembly of Canada, on the question of the boundary of the old Province of Quebec, and the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company to the territory that was claimed by them, on the 8th of June, 1857, said, among other things:

"The result of my investigation has been to demonstrate that in the Red River and Saskatchewan countries, the Hudson's Bay Company have no right or title whatever, except what they have in common with other British subjects. Wherever they have any possession or occupancy, there they are simply squatters, the same as they are at Fort William, Lac Cloche, Lake Nipissing, or any of their other ports in Canada."

Again, he says with respect to the judicial decisions that the hon. member for Algoma referred to, and which, according to his view, placed this question beyond the region of parliamentary or other discussion. With reference to the judgment of the Court in the Reinhardt case, he says:

"In May, 1818, Charles de Reinhardt was tried at Quebec, for murder committed in 1816, on the River Winnipeg, under the Canada Jurisdiction Act. Exception was taken to the jurisdiction of the Court on the ground that the locality was not in the Indian territory, but within the limits of Upper Canada. The Court overruled the objection, and decided that the westerly boundary of Upper Canada was a line on the Meridian of 88° 50' west longitude from London."

Mark what the hon. gentleman says with respect to that judgment. Now, here is a man, eminent in the profession of Civil Engineer and Surveyor, who says about this judgment which the hon. member for Algoma accepts with such confidence:

"I hardly think that any surveyor, geographer or delineator of boundaries, of any experience or scientific attainments, would concur in that decision."

He goes further and says:

"I confine myself, in the foregoing remarks, to the Red River and Saskatchewan country. It will be seen that the Imperial authority, the military authorities and the Courts of Justice, have all ignored the pretensions of the Hudson's Bay Company as regards those countries."

Now, Sir, if Mr. Dawson was correct, when he gave his testimony as a witness before a Committee of Parliament appointed to investigate this question, I submit that that opinion is entitled to the utmost weight in a discussion of this subject. That is not all. There is another Dawson who occupied an equally prominent place in the history of this country, who has been in the Legislature of Ontario, and who occupied a seat on the floor of this Parliament. Anybody who has watched the course of events in the Legislature of Ontario between 1875 and 1878, knows exactly the pronounced opinion of that hon. gentleman on this question. His contention has always been that the western boundary of Ontario extended considerably beyond the boundary assigned to it in the award. I contend that in giving expression to his opinion, I believe upon more than one occasion in the Local Legislature of Ontario, that hon. gentleman put his views on record, in the shape of a resolution, urging with the utmost vigor upon the Government of Ontario the propriety, nay the absolute necessity, of taking immediate and active steps to secure for Ontario the recognition of her boundary extending beyond the Lake of the Woods westward according to his then contention. Let us see what he said upon that subject in a famous state paper I hold in my hand. It is well to remind hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House of these expressions of opinion given by themselves or their colleagues and their followers in and out of Parliament, because if these expressions of opinion were correct in the days when they were given they must be equally correct now. On 8th June, 1857, S. J. Dawson, Esq., published a document of considerable importance in which he entered at length into the subject of the boundaries. Permit me, for the edification of the House, and for the information of the hon. member for Algoma, whom, I think, knows something of the document, to refer to it for a moment. After discussing the question for some time, and pointing out upon what slender foundations the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company were based, and how strong were the claims of Canada, he went on to say:

"The vast region now forming, in whole or in part, the States or Territories of Nebraska, the western portions of Minnesota and Dakota, Iowa, Montana, Wyoming and Colorado to the summit of the Stony Mountains, with several other States to the south, and a portion of the Dominion of Canada near the Rocky Mountains to the north, are within the territory which, at the date of the Treaty of 1783, was known as Louisiana. By the second article of the Treaty of 1783, the boundary established between the British possessions and the United States, in as far as regards the part of the continent under consideration, was a line 'from the most north-western point of the Lake of the Woods, on a due western course to the Mississippi'; and in a Royal Commission issued to Governor Lord Dorchester, in 1786, the part of Canada forming the then Province of Quebec is described as being bounded by a line 'from the most north-western point thereof (i. e. the Lake of the Woods) a due west course to the River Mississippi, and northward' to the southern boundary of the territories granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay.

"It will then be seen that the western limit of Canada, on the line running due west from the Lake of the Woods, was at that time a matter of interest to three nations. The United States could not go west of the Mississippi, or this boundary recognized as representing that river, nor the nation possessing Louisiana come east of it; while as regards Canada the Province of Quebec was to have both her western limit on the due west line, and her entire western boundary running north to the territories granted to the Merchants Adventurers determined by the point at which the boundary between the United States and Louisiana should meet the due west line from the Lake of the Woods.

"It is well known that the tributary of the Mississippi system, now called 'the Mississippi' is but a small stream in its upper reaches, having its source a little to the north of the parallel of 47°, in numerous brooks and countless lakelets far to the south and east of a due west line from the Lake of the Woods.

"It does not, therefore, meet the description, and the question arises as to whether it really is the Mississippi meant by the diplomatists who framed the Treaty of 1873, or whether it is not more reasonable to believe that both they and their predecessors who negotiated the Treaty of 1873 had in view the main artery of the vast river system to which the comprehensive name of the Mississippi was applied in those days."

What does the hon. gentleman mean by the statement published in this document? Does he contend that the western boundary of the Province is east of the Lake of the Woods? No; his whole argument in this paper is that the boundary line of the Province of Ontario is west by nearly 400 miles from the point at which the arbitrators fixed it. He says that the western limit is where a line drawn from the most western point of the Lake of the Woods would intersect the Mississippi river of the earlier geographers. That in those days the whole of the river system of that region was known as the Mississippi; that the line in question would not intersect the Mississippi of to-day, but it would the White Earth river, a tributary of the Mississippi, and that this tributary is undoubtedly what the statesmen and geographers of that day meant. The hon.

gentleman not only analyses the testimony, but also the maps of the early days. No member regrets more than I do the necessity of reading extracts from parliamentary documents or from State papers to the House, but when I find an hon. gentleman declaring that the award in favor of Ontario is improper and gave her too much territory, when at a former period, and after calm deliberation, he entertained an entirely opposite opinion on the same facts, I think it is desirable that the country should know the fact, in order that they may be able to attach just as much value and importance as they deserve, and no more, to expressions of opinion given to-day on the floor of Parliament on those questions. Let us see what the hon. gentleman says on this question. After having analysed the maps, he said:

"3rd. That a branch or tributary of the Mississippi (or Missouri, rather, which is itself a branch of the Mississippi) called the White Earth River, is actually intersected by the due west line in question, within a comparatively short distance of the point at which the supposed river, represented on the maps as the boundary of Louisiana, and which it is evident they had in view, would have been intersected by that line.

"Judging from these maps, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the true intent, meaning and spirit of the Treaty of 1783 was that the western boundary of Canada and the United States and the eastern limit of Louisiana, on the due west line should be at a point upwards of 450 miles west of the Lake of the Woods."

But what need to make or adopt imaginary lines, or quibble about the word "Mississippi," which is in fact the name of an immense river system, when the true spirit and even letter of the treaty can be met by adopting the line already run on a due west course, as expressed in the Treaty, "to the Mississippi," or at least to its first waters at the White Earth River, which this "due west line" does intersect only a little way to the west of the supposed Mississippi which the representatives of the nations interested, as shown by the maps of the time, intended as the western boundary of Canada and the United States, and the eastern limit of Louisiana, on a "due west line from the Lake of the Woods."

What, Sir, has changed the hon. gentleman's opinion? What has come over the spirit of his dream? Why does the hon. gentleman object to the award? Does Ontario get more than she is entitled to? The hon. gentleman has not condescended to tell us what are his objections to the award, only he says it is an absurd boundary; that there is no justification, in fact, or law for it; and that there is no statesman or geographer, that ever studied the subject, would have dreamed of laying down a boundary such as the arbitrators have laid down. But let me go a step further. In order to fix the western and northern boundaries of Ontario, I attach great importance to the description given in the Quebec Act of 1774 and the commissions issued under it. The hon. gentleman says that these commissions do not aid us to an interpretation of the meaning of that Act. He points out that the first commission to Sir Guy Carleton cannot avail us, because it was rescinded within a few months of its issue. It is true the commission was so rescinded, but not by reason of any defect in the description of the territory over which he was appointed Governor. The hon. gentleman does not explain the reason of this rescission, nor why he changed his mind as to the effect of it. I do not know what has changed the hon. gentleman's mind, but I do not think it was the recession of the commissions, but rather the non-issue of a commission, about which the hon. gentleman knows something, at a much later day than the period of Sir Guy Carleton. I have disposed of the views of the eminent statesmen who have given their opinions on this subject, and amongst others, the Dawson brothers, and I wish now to refer to another question touched upon by hon. gentlemen opposite, and notably by the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives). That hon. gentleman started out with the proposition that the Quebec Act did fix a definite boundary—a proposition which is denied by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) and in this I am disposed to agree with him. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) said that the two commissions which were issued, one on the 27th Dec., 1774, and the other in 1786 to Sir Guy Carleton, and the one to Sir Frederick Haldimand in 1777, do not help us to an interpretation of the Act of 1774. He says there was a definite boundary fixed by that Act, and that commissions issued under it cannot be used to contract or extend the limits given by the Act. No one proposes to use these commissions for the purpose of extending or contracting the boundary fixed by the Act; but if there is any ambiguity in the wording of a Statute—any difficulty in defining its proper interpretation—these commissions may be used for the purposes of putting an interpretation on it; and, if there is any difficulty in putting a proper proper interpretation on the Act of 1774, we have a perfect right to consider the history of that enactment, what took place when it was passed in the Imperial Parliament, the surrounding circumstances, and what was done under it. These commissions were issued immediately after the passing of the Act, issued under the advice of the same law officers who advised on the passage of the Act, and the surrounding circumstances threw a flood of light on the interpretation to be put on the Statute. And if the interpretation we put on the Statute, aided by these commissions, proclamations and surrounding circumstances are correct, it is clear to every intelligent man that the western boundary of the Province of Ontario is at least as far west as that mentioned in the award. In the first commission to Sir Guy Carleton, in 1774, the description of the territory over which Sir Guy was appointed to rule, is clear, and it is equally clear that the territory now in dispute is within the limits of the old Province of Quebec—the old Province of Canada—and in consequence within the limits of the Province of Ontario. The description in that commission as follows:—

"Thence along the western boundary of the said Province until it strikes the River Ohio, and along the bank of the said river westward to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward along the eastern bank of the said river to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay."

The Commission issued to Sir Frederick Haldimand in 1777—three years afterwards—was issued when the aim, object and scope of the Bill was fresh in the recollection of those who were engaged in passing it, and those who were interested in passing it. These two commissions were issued under the direction of the same law officers of the Crown who advised on the Act of 1774—men whose peers have seldom sat in the House of Commons—and they afford the strongest possible argument in favor of our contention that the boundaries westward and northward were, at all events, as far west and north as the boundaries fixed by the award. The second commission issued to Sir Guy Carleton in 1786, does not give precisely the same description as that of 1774, but it is the same in meaning and in substance. The description of that Commission is in the following terms:

"Thence through the middle of said Long Lake and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods to the said Lake of the Woods; thence through the said lake to the most north-western point thereof, and from thence on a due west course to the River Mississippi; and northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England, trading to Hudson's Bay."

This description to and beyond the Lake of the Woods, overlaps the due north line of modern days. In that commission is a description to the Mississippi River. Now, it is a clear principle of the law, as laid down by Vattel in his law of nations, that where the description of territories extends to a stream, the boundary of that territory is limited by that stream, and only limited by that stream, and I think that Vattel, on a subject of that kind, is entitled to as much weight as the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), or the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), the latter of whom made such a powerful and eloquent speech on the subject. Vattel says:

"In case of doubt every country terminating on a river is presumed to have no other limits than the river itself, because nothing is more natural than to take a river for a boundary; and wherever there is a doubt, that is always to be presumed which is most natural and most probable."

This question came up for adjudication before the United States Courts in the case of Hadley vs. Anthony, 5 Wheaton 696, and an eminent Judge of the Supreme Court said on the point:—

"In great questions which concern the boundaries of States, where great natural boundaries are established in general terms with a view to public convenience and the avoidance of controversy, we think the great object, when it can be distinctly perceived, ought not to be defeated by technical perplexities."

In other words, we are to deal with questions in which States are concerned, and this present question is in reality one between two States on a different principle from that in which we would deal with a question where the rights of private individuals alone are concerned. I now come down a little further in the history of this important question, and I find that, after the separation of the Province of Quebec into two Provinces, namely, Upper and Lower Canada, there is a description given of the boundary of the Province of Upper Canada, and that description is as follows:

"To commence at a stone boundary on the north bank of the Lake St. Francis, at the cove west of Pointe au Beaudet in the limit between the Township of Lancaster and the Seigneurie of New Longueuil, running along the said limit in the direction of north 34° west to the westernmost angle of the said Seigneurie of New Longueuil, thence along the north-western boundary of the Seigneurie of Vaudreuil running north 25° east until it strikes the Ottawa river, to ascend the said river into the Lake Temiscaming, and from the head of the said lake by a line drawn due north until it strikes the boundary line of Hudson's Bay, including all the territory to the westward and southward of the said line to the utmost extent of the country commonly called or known by the name of Canada."

Why, the hon. gentleman tells us that to adopt a description or that kind would be to declare war against the United States, because in 1783, when the treaty between England and the United States took place, a large portion of this territory which was then necessarily claimed by Great Britain was ceded to the United States, and he says that this description would cover a large portion of the territory so belonging to the United States. But the hon. gentleman forgets to tell us, what is manifestly clear, that all the Imperial Government intended by this description was such portions, south and west, as belonged to England at that time. Now, I have shown by documentary evidence, by expressions of opinion on the part of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and by expressions of opinion by some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that what we are now claiming for the Province of Ontario is not at all more than we are entitled to get. I have shown, I think, very conclusively, what interpretation was put upon the Act of 1774 by the framers of that Act, by the proclamations and commissions issued under it; and it does appear to me incomprehensible how any other interpretation can be put upon it than the one assigned to it by us. But that is not all. This matter was considered by the late Province of Upper Canada long before the union took place between Upper and Lower Canada, in 1841. After these Provinces were separated, in 1793, the Province of Upper Canada was entitled to Parliamentary Government, not to responsible Government, but still to a Parliament composed of the elected representatives of the people; and for that purpose the old Province of Upper Canada was divided into nineteen constituencies, with boundaries clearly defined in the Act, and proclamation creating the same. In 1792, or thereabouts, an Act of the old Parliament of Upper Canada was passed with respect to the representation of the people in Parliament; and we find that on the 16th of July, 1792, a proclamation was issued under the Great Seal, dividing the Province into counties, which were described in the procla-

"That the nineteenth of the said counties be hereafter called by the name of the County of Kent, which county is to comprehend all the country, not being territories of the Indians, not already included in the several counties hereinbefore described, extending northward to the boundary line of Hudson's Bay, including all the territory of the westward and southward to the same line, to the utmost extent of the country, commonly called or known by the name of Canada," and that the said County of Kent as hereinbefore described shall and may be represented in the said House of Assembly by two members."

I find also that the Surveyor-General of that day, a man named Smith, in 1799 published a topographical description of Upper Canada for the Governor of that Province, in which he reported that Canada on the west extended to the Lake of the Woods and the Mississippi River; if that is so, and it is not denied, the northern boundary of Canada extended to Hudson's Bay and the western boundary to the Lake of the Woods, practically the boundaries fixed by this award. Then the hon. member for Algoma tells us that the western boundary of Ontario is altogether too far west, and both he and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe referred to the De Reinhardt case in confirmation of this view. I have read that case several times, and I think I can challenge any gentleman who reads it intelligently, to rise from its perusal with the conviction on his mind that that case settled the question in any way. Not one of the proclamations or commissions to which I have referred, was laid before the Judge who tried that case; all the documents were as completely ignored as if they had no existence. It is true, the defendant was defended by able lawyers; but strange to say all the documents to which I have referred were absent from the Court. In that case an eminent expert named Saxe was examined for the Crown, and he swore that the word northward did not mean due north, the Judge said that he could not understand that—that the man was talking nonsense. The witness repeated his statement, the Judge bullied him into silence. The Judge assumed to deal, and did deal, with the facts instead of leaving them to the jury. The question of the jurisdiction of the Court to try the prisoner was then raised by his counsel—that question was reserved by the Judge for the consideration of the highest court in the realm; and the only question submitted for the consideration of the court of appeal, was the simple question of jurisdiction. De Reinhardt was convicted; he was not executed, he was pardoned, but on what ground? The only ground, so far as one can judge, from the history of the case, was that the Court had no jurisdiction to deal with the case at all. So far, that case settles nothing; it simply leaves the question where it was; but if it did settle anything, it would be in direct conflict with the expression of opinion of some of the Judges in Upper Canada on the question under consideration, and so as a judicial decision it in no sense settles the controversy. So much for the De Reinhardt case as an exposition of the law and the facts. We have now reached a stage of this question which brings us down to the reference to arbitration and the award. We found gentlemen on both sides of the House pronounced in favor of the position of Ontario, nay, more, of an extension of the western boundary beyond the point where the arbitrators have fixed it; the Conservative party, in days gone by, were as pronounced in that position as the Liberal party; but the Liberal party adheres to its position; the Conservative party hesitates and doubts, nay, more, now claims that Ontario is not entitled to go farther northward than the height of land, nor farther westward than to a line drawn due north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. As I stated, that brings us down to the initiation of the proceedings before the arbitrators. The first intimation the people of Ontario or the people of this country had that these gentlemen were deviating from and going back on the record of the past quarter of a century, was upon the 12th March, 1872, when the Dominion Government intimated to the Ontario Government that they were not disposed to yield to their views with respect to the western and the northern boundary. It was then proposed that a commission should be appointed, with the view of settling the boundary to which I have just referred. The Ontario Government at once assented to such a commission for the purpose of settling the boundaries in dispute, but the Dominion Government would only agree to it on certain conditions to which the Government of Ontario could not consent. The Dominion Government made the reference to such Commissioners conditional upon a certain line being agreed upon, namely, that the western boundary should be a line due north from the Ohio and Mississippi, and the northern boundary the height of land—and that the duty of the Commissioners should be limited to fixing such boundaries on the ground. The Ontario Government could not agree to this, and thus the matter stood until the hon. member for Lambton acceded to office, when correspondence between the two Governments was renewed. This correspondence culminated in the Order of Council of 12th November, 1874, agreeing to reference to three distinguished gentlemen of the whole matter in dispute. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe strenuously contends that the reference was only intended to fix a conventional line and only did fix a conventional line. I contend the reference says nothing of the kind. I hold in my hand a copy of that reference. What does it say? It says:

"That the Ontario Government having named the Hon. William Buell Richards, Chief Justice of Ontario, as one of the referees, he submits the name of the Hon. Lemuel Allan Wilmot, formerly Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of New Brunswick, to act in conjunction with him, and advises that authority be given them to agree upon a third person, not being a resident of Canada, and that the determination of a majority of such three referees be final and conclusive upon the limits to be taken as and for such boundaries respectively."

Does that reference point to a conventional line? Not at all. If you will turn to the award itself, you will find it is equally clear, definite and distinct. There is, therefore, no ground for the objections raised by hon. gentlemen opposite, that this reference was only intended to be conventional, and that the award itself only fixed a conventional line. I have a few words to say with reference to this award, and its binding affect upon the Dominion Government. I lay it down with great confidence that the award is binding both at law and equity. This arbitration was agreed to by both Governments. The Dominion Government agreed, by an Order in Council, dated 12th November, 1874, that this reference should take place; and that the boundary lines of Ontario should be settled by this arbitration. The Ontario Government agreed to the same reference, and the arbitrators entered upon the discharge of their duties. The award was made by the arbitrators on the 3rd August, 1878, shortly before the defeat of the late Government. It was the unanimous award of the three arbitrators; it was made after a most thorough and exhaustive investigation of all the evidence that could be submitted on both sides; it was made after having heard the arguments of able counsel; it was made after due weight had been given to every argument that could be advanced for or against the position of Ontario. Who was it made by? Do hon. gentlemen opposite challenge the arbitration or the arbitrators? Are they bold enough to cast any reflection on the honesty and integrity of the arbitrators? No, Sir, they have not the courage to do so. It is true they challenge the award, but they do not question the honesty of the arbitrators; they could not do so—more eminent or distinguished men could not well be found. Every one who knew the late Chief Justice Harrison knew him to be a man of transcendent ability and indefatigable labor—a man, who when he once entered on the discharge of any duty, stuck to it with unflinching ardour until he understood it from beginning to end. I am satisfied that when Chief Justice Harrison undertook to deal with this question, he dealt with it thoroughly and exhaustively; and those of us who know Sir Francis Hincks, and Sir Edward Thornton, know they were eminently qualified to deal with a question of this kind—a mixed question of law and fact. The arbitrators made their award in August, 1878. Did hon. gentlemen opposite, when they came into power, repudiate the award? No, they did not. On the contrary, they ratified the award as far as they could do so without Parliamentary sanction. The Ontario Government drew the attention of this Government to the award on the 1st November, 1878. Was the answer a repudiation? No, Sir; it was simply an acknowledgment of the receipt of the communication, without any protest. On the 31st December, 1878, the Ontario Government again drew the attention of the Dominion Government to the award with the view of securing the ratification, at the ensuing Session of Parliament, and the answer again was a simple acknowledgment. On the 3rd September, 1879, and the 19th December, 1879, the Ontario Government again communicated with the Dominion Government, asking for a ratification of the award and pointing out the injurious effects in the territory of the unsettled condition of affairs. The reply was a mere formal acknowledgment, nothing more. The first intimation the people of Ontario had of the repudiation of this award was not until recently; and then for the first time the Government submit that this award should not be confirmed, on the ground that the Executive Government transcended their authority in agreeing to the reference. I do not propose entering on an exhaustive argument on the power of the Executive to agree to this reference without the prior consent of Parliament. The hon. member for Bothwell, than whom no man is better able to deal with a question of this kind, has dealt with it exhaustively, and I think no man, open to conviction, who has listened to his able argument, can fail to be convinced of the correctness of the position taken by my hon. friend. I, therefore, assume that the Executive had the authority. It is clear that this executive power has been exercised without question in many modern instances—the boundary between Maine and New Brunswick, the Oregon Boundary, the Geneva Award, the Washington Treaty, were all the result of executive action alone, in some instances subsequently ratified by Parliaments. Assuming, then, that the Executive had the authority to consent to a reference, the award should at once have been ratified—but even assuming that the Executive had no such power, still are we to be told now that when one Government, acting in good faith, and in the exercise of its functions, consented to a reference, in order to settle a question that remained unsettled for a quarter of a century, and the importance of which one cannot over-estimate, that the successors of that Government are not to be bound by the reference? No man and no Government would be safe in dealing with a Government that entertained such extraordinary views as hon. gentlemen opposite now contend for. Sir, I take the ground, and I take it with confidence, that it was within the competence of the Executive to make the reference, and that the Executive having consented to it, and both Governments being represented before the arbitrators, this country is legally, morally and equitably bound to confirm that award. But there is something further—I say that hon. gentlemen opposite have recognized this award; that the Government and Parliament have acquiesced in it. There is no clearer legal principle than this, that if two persons agree to a reference, even though the reference should be irregular, or void, yet if the parties, with a knowledge of the facts, appear before the arbitrators and take their chances, such parties are for ever estopped from questioning the award on such grounds. The point I desire to make here is that even if the reference were illegal, both Governments having taken their chances before the political bias. Sir, if there is one thing more than another arbitrators, both are equally bound by the award; but in addition to all this, this very Parliament and Government have expressly recognized the award by voting $15,000 to pay the cost of the reference. If this reference was illegal, and if this award is so much waste paper, it was the bounden duty of the Government to repudiate it at once and to repudiate any liability for the expenses; but the Government of the day fully recognized the validity of this award in the way I have suggested and otherwise. Why, Sir, the hon. member for Algoma sits to-day in Parliament as a representative of a portion of this very territory, as part of Ontario. By allowing him to sit in Parliament as a member from the Province of Ontario, representing a portion of this very disputed territory, the Government thereby recognizes that this portion of the country belongs to Ontario. If it does not belong to Ontario, the hon. gentleman has no business here, and he had no business to sit in the Ontario Legislature for four years, as a representative in it of that section. If the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite is correct, the hon. member is an intruder, a stranger, here, and it is your duty, Mr. Speaker, to eject him from Parliament. What is the true secret why hon. gentlemen have changed their opinions on this boundary question, and now exhibit such marked hostility to the interests of Ontario? What is the true inwardness of this sudden and extraordinary change of base on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite? What new light has dawned on their dark minds? What additional facts have been brought to light and that has induced them to change their views? If there is anything to account for this change, no one has informed the House on the subject. Does not the Mail give the key-note to the motives and mainsprings that actuate hon. gentlemen opposite in resisting this award? Has the respectable politician who leads the Opposition in Ontario not given the key-note to the actions of hon. gentlemen opposite? Has the true inwardness of the movement not been unwittingly disclosed by the Ontario leader of the Conservative party and by the organ of the party? No doubt they have. Let us see what the Mail, that re-echoes the views of the leader of the Ontario Opposition, and that speaks the sentiments of hon. gentlemen, says on the subject, and when you hear its remarks you will say that I am about right in saying that it not is the merits of the case, or the interests of the country that actuates hon. gentlemen opposite, but the interests of the Conservative party. The Mail says:

"The Grit party has no possible hope of getting into power in 1883. If then it is essential that in order to obtain a settlement of the boundary question, parties in Ottawa and Toronto must be at one with each other, the public will probably think that it is better that Mr. Mowat should go out in order that Ontario should get all these millions rather than that he should remain in and sacrifice them. . . . If the people of Ontario are in earnest, they will speedily teach Mr. Mowat that he and his cabal must not stand between the Province and the acquisition of a territory which is declared to be of such inestimable value." Prodigious!

Does that article not give the key-note; does it not show that, in order to manipulate the elections in Ontario, it is necessary to convince the electors that they cannot get justice from the hon. gentlemen opposite while Ontario is controlled by the Liberal party, but that a change of Government in Ontario will be followed by a change of policy in Ottawa? Hon. gentlemen make a terrible mistake if they suppose that, by threats of the kind, they can influence the independent electors of the great Province of Ontario. Let me advise hon. gentlemen opposite to pursue the policy that statesmen ought to pursue, and to remember that honesty in politics, as in everything else, is the best policy; if the Province of Ontario is right in her contention, let that right prevail, and let this award be confirmed. Hon. gentlemen opposite never made a greater mistake than when they allowed the organ of the party to publish the extract I have just read, and to have it go abroad to the world that justice is dealt out according to calculated to arouse the people of Ontario it is the conviction that wrong is being done them by political wire-pullers for political purposes. I believe they are aroused, thoroughly in earnest, and that when the time comes to pronounce on this subject at the polls, as come it soon will, the indignant voice of outraged Ontario will make itself heard—loud and clear—from Ottawa to the Hudson's Bay. There is one way, and one only, by which hon. gentlemen can escape. Let them carry out this award, and then they may expect to command the respect of this House and secure some share of the sympathy of Ontario.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I am afraid that there is something about the atmosphere of this question that has disturbed the mind of the member for South Huron, and deprived him of the ability to discuss this matter in a calm, judicious way. This is a question that should appeal solely to our reason. We should deal with it equitably and calmly and in a judicial spirit. The hon. gentleman scarcely displays that spirit to-night. He threatens us with the Province of Ontario, if certain results should flow from our action here, and he also threatens us with the results of the action of the Mail. So far as the Conservative party is concerned, it has had no special reason yet to complain of the action of the Mail. We are under the impression that the largely increasing circulation of that paper in diffusing sound views among the people, has enabled us somewhat to disabuse them of an erroneous impression they had of the merits of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and of the merits of his political friends. No doubt those hon. gentlemen hold a very hard position in Ontario, and it has been produced to a great extent by the diffusion of sound information and opinions through the Mail. But, asks the hon. gentleman what is the true inwardness of this question? I feel it my duty to tell him that this question has come before us under somewhat extraordinary circumstances. It appears that a sort of blasting wind seems to blow in the faces and disturb the peace of the hon. gentlemen opposite, when this resolution was moved by the member for Niagara. Why were they so disturbed—why were they so humiliated—why so utterly destroyed so to speak—and why did they lose their presence of mind? If I were like the member for Centre Huron, to make insinuations, I might take the position that those gentlemen rather hoped that this question would not be settled. They hoped it would remain a burning issue at the next elections, one in which they might stir up the people of Ontario and try to make them believe their rights were being trampled upon, for certainly I never saw such consternation among any set of gentlemen as I did on the faces of those hon. gentlemen when a satisfactory and legal solution of this difficulty was offered on the floor of this House. They were astonished to see a gentleman on this side of the House act as they expected to act. They mistake altogether the temper of the party on this side of the House. The Government and those supporting them believe that it is a highly desirable thing that this question should be settled, that is, should not remain a living issue. Hon. gentlemen opposite have found another element of difficulty in dealing with this question: that is that the people are not excited on this question, and it is difficult to excite them. They are not boiling over with the indignation described by the hon. gentleman and his friends. They are taking it very easily, because, in fact, they do not think the Province of Ontario is in danger, and they think it would be about as well to have this question settled. They are perfectly satisfied their rights will not be injured in any particular by this Government and by those who support it. They believe the true friends of Ontario are to be found behind the Government and not in front of it. They have no confidence in those men, and there are no signs in the political atmosphere at present that the verdict pronounced in 1878 will be reversed. I take it that every evidence that we can gather shows that the people of Ontario, as well as of the rest of the Dominion, are in favor of the present Government and of their policy. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down wishes to give great effect to the finding of the arbitrators, whose finding, by the way, was to have no effect till it was ratified by Parliament; it is not ratified by Parliament and therefore it has no effect. He was wrong in his law also when he stated that the award that has been made cannot be impeached. An award can always be impeached if the arbitrators exceed their powers as they did in this case. The people of Ontario are not satisfied with the attempted settlement unhappily made by the hon. gentleman who used to lead the Opposition. It was not a happy one, it was not a fortunate one, it was not satisfactory to the people of this country. I have yet to learn, as a member of this House and as a lawyer, though perhaps not as eminent as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, that there are circumstances surrounding the finding of these gentlemen that entitles it to the respect he would have us show to it. This is a question that we have been debating now at great length, and yet we are only able to treat it on the surface; so many are the details and so abstruse are the principles now involved in this question that with all the enormous research and labor that have been given to it, with all the material we have before us, we are only able to treat it superficially. And yet we find that when these three gentlemen met, they met on one day, heard the argument on the next day, and they gave their decision on the third. I say that it was impossible for any tribunal composed of men far superior in talent to these men, even the Privy Council of England or the Supreme Court of our own country, to determine this question, or any such cursory examination as was involved in hearing the argument, in one day. He says it was put before them by one of the ablest lawyers in Canada. I should be the last man to impeach the standing of a brother professional man, but I say no unfair thing, I make use of no illegitimate argument, when I say that the gentleman who presented the case to these arbitrators, Mr. McMahon of London, had no such standing in the profession in this country as to entitle him to the remarks that have been made, for, comparatively speaking, he is an unknown man and was unfitted to present such a case as that. But the effort of the gentleman who presented the case for Ontario was supplemented. It was supplemented with enormous advantage and an unfair advantage by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)—I say Mr. Mills, because he was employed by the Ontario Government and well paid, and he should be well paid for what he did. But there was something wrong in his endeavoring to support his view of the case before those hon. gentlemen to whom this reference was made, when he was Minister of the Interior for this Dominion, for he was not unbiassed and was engaged and paid by the Government of Ontario. I have here the report he made and issued by himself, and in the front of it are these words: "Report on the boundaries of the Province of Ontario, containing in part the substance of a report prepared for the Government of the Province in 1872, by David Mills, Esq., M.P." Now mark these words that follow: "and afterwards revised and considerably enlarged by the author,"—by Mr. Mills, the gentleman who got up this work, for which he was well paid,—"for the purposes of the arbitration between the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario." There, on the front of his report, we see the animus with which he was acting on that occasion. Sir, I do not think it was a fair course for him to take in the matter. I take the position in reference to this question, that the boundary of Ontario on the west and on the north have not been defined and settled, that the action of these gentlemen not having been confirmed by Parliament, is of no effect, therefore this question is still unsettled. I say that there is every reason why this question should be settled now, distinctly and forever settled, on a strictly legal and constitutional basis. I say that is a view that no fair or honest man can oppose, and it is with wonder that we see the indignation and alarm in the faces of hon. gentlemen opposite when they see a satisfactory solution of this question offered. What was it that was referred to these three gentlemen? They were to ascertain and define the boundary of Ontario on the west and on the north. Well, Sir, I say they did not ascertain and define that boundary, and it is open and patent to every one, not only in the discussion that has taken place, not only from the opinions and expressions of experts, not only from the facts which are patent to us all, but from the utterances of those very gentlemen themselves, it is evident that they did not settle and define the legal boundary, but they agreed only to support their own convenience, or the conveniences of the Provinces, as they thought, and they had no right to do. Now, supposing them to be legally appointed—and with that question I do not wish to deal at any great length, it has been dealt with by abler hands than mine—then I say that it was a most unhappy mode of endeavoring to arrive at a solution of this vexed question. It was not a question that should properly be submitted to an arbitration, arbitration is not an improper mode of dealing with the rights of private parties. It is not a bad thing when a dispute arises between men, as to the rights of property, to refer it to arbitration. It may be often a very convenient mode of settling such a difference. But that is not the proper way of determining matters when provincial rights are in question, and when it involves the determination of boundary lines between two Provinces; then there is but one proper mode of arriving at a conclusion, and that was to define the strictly legal and constitutional boundaries; because when you go into a compromise on a question like that, if you allow the mere reason of convenience to prevail with men vested with the power of arbitrators, and who may feel disposed to come to some decision as quickly as possible and split the difference as is done in cases of private parties, no satisfactory conclusion is arrived at; but when the rights of Provinces are in question, the result will not be satisfactory until the strictly legal and constitutional boundaries are determined. If we do not do so, if a settlement, such as is proposed in this case, becomes a precedent, trouble may arise between the Provinces when it is shown that a compromise was made. I have heard it urged at considerable length, that, because questions of an international character arose between nations, which are sometimes submitted to arbitration, a policy of arbitration is the proper one in this case. There is no parity between the two cases. When disputes arise between nations, there is no mode of settlement except by arbitration, which is sometimes very happily adopted, or by war, because they have no Courts to which to make a final appeal. But here we have no difficulty of that kind. We have a Supreme Court and the Privy Council, which is the highest tribunal in the Empire, presided over by men who are inferior to none in ability, and, perhaps, superior to all juries. By that tribunal we can have it settled as to what are the legal boundaries. There is no difficulty in the matter, and no danger of bloodshed in this case—at least, I do not think any substantial danger. It is true the Premier of Ontario has threatened he will fill this much-coveted land with gore, but all who have known that gentleman through a long and peaceful life, are aware that he carefully avoids strife, and that he must have been urged forward by much more warlike minds than his own. It was understood that the leader of the Opposition at about the time the discussion occurred in the Local House, was in hourly consultation with Mr. Mowat, and we rather think that hon. gentlemen suggested the very warlike attitude assumed by the Provincial Premier. And it was not an attitude without precedent. There is a fable told of a monkey using an animal for the purpose of getting nuts out of the fire. The hon. leader of the Opposition was well aware that the blame would recoil on the head of Mr. Mowat, not on his own. I asserted that the finding of the arbitrators, which has not the force of an award until it is confirmed by Parliament, was not an ascertaining of the true line, but the settlement of a conventional line, and I said that the consensus of opinion sustained that view. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is not satisfied with the award in the abstract, for he holds that Ontario should have received much more territory. The Province of Ontario has a right to receive the last acre of her domain that properly and legally belongs to her. It is the right of the other Provinces that Ontario shall not receive an acre that does not belong to her; and no honest and fair-minded man in the Province of Ontario asks that the power of our own Province, of which we are justly proud, shall be added to by claiming a rood of land to which it has no proper title. We believe that to be the feeling of the people. Were she to take one square mile which does not belong to her, a wrong would be done to the other Provinces; were she to lose a mile, a wrong would be done to her to which none of her sons would willingly submit. They want right done and the proper and legal boundary established and nothing more. I will read to the House a paragraph from a letter written by Sir Francis Hincks, one of the chief of those gentlemen who so hurriedly made this finding, who suggested the reconciliation of existing difference, which was an objectionable proceeding in an arbitration between Provinces, for which action no power was given then, and if it were given the Executive had not the right to give it. Sir Francis Hincks stated:

"My object in referring to the proclamation, as I have already stated, was simply to prove that no precise boundaries were laid down, and that the arbitrators were compelled to determine them between certain established points in the manner most advantageous to the contending parties."

Here is this unimpeachable authority, stating in his own letter that practically they had no time to give to the matter, that they split the difference, and arrived at a result which was most convenient, taking only a day to hear the argument of counsel and giving a decision on the following. That being the state of the facts, there is no finding that has the effect of an award. The Opposition seem rather to desire that this matter should remain as it is; they wish the dispute to remain; they wish, if possible, to excite the public mind on this question. I do not think they will succeed because the country does not take sufficient interest in the few hundred or thousand square miles of barren land in that territory, which would cost more to administer than its revenues would amount to. I do not think the people of Ontario can be excited on this question, because they are very practical people engaged in the busy affairs of life, and are not to be disturbed unless they are suffering some actual wrong, or unless some of their rights are in danger. The people of Ontario do not feel in any such position. The only anxiety displayed appears to be on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who are much disturbed because there seems likely to be presented some satisfactory means of settling this question. What we have to consider here is the best way of getting at the true legal boundary of the Province of Ontario—that is paramount to every consideration of convenience. No question of convenience arises here; there is no interest that will be imperilled; no damage to be done; no trouble that can arise. Yet it is better that the question should be settled now once and for ever, and settled on a strictly legal and constitutional basis. I urged before, and I urge again, that there is no necessity for getting a compromise. Let us have our rights; we ask for nothing more, and then no one will have any cause of complaint. No matter what disputes may arise in after years between the Province of Ontario and the Province of Quebec, or between Ontario and the Maritime Provinces, or those Provinces that are growing up in the North-West, there will be nothing to show that there has been a dispute between the parties. But in after years it might be said, on the other hand, that the question was settled by arbitrators; that the parties were entitled to their strict legal rights, and they would insist on their strict legal rights as they should be insisted upon. But no such question can arise if the matter be settled as it is now proposed to settle it. Let us see what is proposed in this motion; whether it suggests a settlement to which no reasonable-minded man can object; a legal settlement—and whether anything can arise out of this mode of settlement which can be injurious to the interests of either party. Here are the proposed terms of settlement:

“That in the opinion of this House it is expedient that the western and northern boundaries of the Province of Ontario should be finally settled by a reference to, and an authoritative decision by, either the Supreme Court of Canada or the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Great Britain, or by the Supreme Court in the first place, subject to a final submission to the Judicial Committee as the Province of Ontario may choose, that such decision should be obtained either on appeal in a friendly action brought for the purpose, or by reference to the said Courts, or either, or both of them by Her Majesty under the powers conferred upon her by the Imperial and Canadian Parliaments, as the Government of Ontario may prefer, and that the said reference should be based on the evidence collected and printed with any additional documentary evidence—if such there is—and that pending the reference, the administration of the lands shall be entrusted to a Joint Commission appointed by the Governments of Canada and Ontario.”

Now, Sir, I fail to see what objection hon. gentlemen opposite, or, indeed, any fair-minded man in Ontario or anywhere else can bring forward against such a reference as the one proposed—namely, to either our own Supreme Court, or to the highest tribunal in the Empire, or to both these tribunals, just as the people of Ontario may prefer. If these hon. gentlemen were fair and honest in what they say, if they really wanted a quiet and peaceable settlement of this question, which has not become a vexed question, but which they are trying their best to make a vexed question, they would join hand in hand with us I say. Here is an easy and satisfactory statement of this question. But, Sir, they want nothing of the kind; they want to be able to go to the country at the next election, whenever it may come, and thunder forth the trampled rights of Ontario from every stump in their constituencies, and try to stir up the people and make them believe that they are being deprived of their rights. But to use a common, though vulgar expression, the people of Ontario have not stirred worth a cent yet. They do not see anything solid in the matter; there is nothing there worth having, and the territory is of such a character that it would cost more to administer it than the revenues would amount to; and I know this, that if the people of Ontario were to wake up, and take a live interest in this question, and bring it forward as a strong issue, whether the territory were of value or not, whenever the rights of that Province were in jeopardy, the people would resolve upon having their strict legal rights, and that is what we now propose to give them. If Ontario, under the award, does not get a sufficient amount of territory, then let her have her fair share. If she has more than she is entitled to, there is not a man in that Province to whom the question may be fairly presented who will wish one acre more, than belongs to that Province. It is a resolution which I hope will be read widely by the people of that Province, as well as the debate which is taking place upon it, in order that the people may see what the Government are prepared to do, and that they are anxious to settle this question in a strictly legal and proper manner. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has referred to what Sir Francis Hincks said upon this question—that we did not get enough land; but the facts are, that the arbitrators found what they thought was the convenient boundary; but, Sir, not a legal and true one, and that is what we want whether we gain or lose land. That is what is proposed to be done by the resolution before the House. They say we want no settlement; we say we do; and if the people of Ontario and the people of the Dominion have anything to say on the subject, they will say they want a settlement too. This motion suggests a settlement in a strictly legal way, by which right will be done on the strict legal status of the case, so that no complaints will arise afterwards; that is what the people of Ontario and the people of the Dominion want, and all the sophistry of hon. gentlemen opposite will not avail to convince them to the contrary. Then there is the forum to which this case is to be submitted. Is there any man bold enough, unfair enough, unpatriotic enough, to say that the Supreme Court is not a fitting tribunal to submit this case to? If there be a scintilla of a reason why the case should not go to the Supreme Court, that can have no reference to the Court which is out of the country altogether, which has nothing to do with our local interests, in which the Judges do not belong either to Ontario or Quebec, and have only a common interest in preserving the integrity of this great Dominion, and promoting harmony among our people. If they are not satisfied to leave the question to the Supreme Court, is there a man bold enough, unfair enough, and illogical enough, to say that we cannot get a satisfactory solution of this question before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the highest Court of Appeal in our realm? I do not think there is any man who can say that the final result of such a reference would not be a proper one. What would the final result be of submitting the question to either of these high courts? It would be, as I said before, that we would get a strictly legal adjudication of this question, that we would get it settled on its legal merits as it should be; and I have yet to learn that an argument can be advanced to show that that is not the proper mode of settling the question. I do not think any man who wishes to do what is fair and right, who wishes to remove difficulties, who wishes to smooth down any little feelings of acerbity that may possibly grow up between the different Provinces, can fairly oppose the settlement of this question in such a way. I say, Sir, that such an adjudication of this question cannot be distasteful to any man, or any set of men, unless to a man or a set of men who do not want to see it satisfactorily settled, so as to do away with any angry feeling that may possibly arise out of it. I say such a mode of settlement can only be distasteful to those gentlemen who sit on the opposite benches, who have long hugged themselves, apparently with the idea that when the next election comes, they will be able to make some small, petty, miserable political capital by stirring up the Provinces, and that they may carry a few votes, or perhaps a constituency or two. I say, if such a consideration prevails among them, it is a miserable, paltry consideration, unworthy of any men sitting in this House. But these hon. gentlemen have shown before this that their highest object, as representative Canadian politicians or statesmen, is not to bind this Confederation together, to make it a strong and great Dominion, inhabited by a happy, prosperous and contented people, but in every way that they seem to be able, they appear to me to be throwing aside every such regard, and to miss no opportunity to excite discontent and ill-feeling between one Province and another. In their discussions on the National Policy—a policy which is so deeply entrenched in the affections of the people of this country, that before long they will cease to buck their heads against it—what do we find them doing throughout the country? We find them trying to excite the Maritime Provinces against Ontario by telling them that the tax on breadstuffs is only intended to injure them in order to put money into the pockets of the farmers of Ontario, and then coming up to Ontario and saying that the tax on coal was put on in order that a few dollars may be put into the pockets of these hungry people in the Maritime Provinces. But thanks to the intelligence of the people of Canada, their efforts have been abortive. The people of Ontario are willing that a tax should be placed on coal if the interests of Confederation are subserved thereby; and the people of the Maritime Provinces are patriotic enough to support the tax on breadstuffs in order that the great principle underlying the policy of this Government may have its full effect. Our wealth and prosperity are increasing on every hand, and the principle underlying this policy is becoming fully to be understood by the people. They had enough of the miserable principle which hon. gentlemen opposite were trying to develop, that the people should buy in the cheapest market; their market was cheap enough, but the people were becoming so poor and so embarrassed that things would have to be cheap, indeed, before they could buy even the ordinary necessaries of life. Not only have these gentlemen tried to excite the different Provinces against each other, but they have tried also to show that it would be better that we should deal with the United States than with each other. Thus they have been seeking in every possible way to excite a feeling of dissatisfaction with the present system of things, which I maintain is of great and inestimable benefit to this country; and I say that if, in the settlement of this little question—little, so far as the substantial issues are concerned, but great in its importance on the question of Provincial rights—I say, if we give effect to the terms of this common-sense resolution, we shall have performed another Act which will have entitled this Government and this House to the gratitude of the people of the Dominion.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I do not know, Sir, whether I myself or my friends in the Opposition will be able, in considering this question, to attain to the extraordinarily lofty moral standard of the hon. member for East York. The precepts and the practices of that hon. gentleman both involve a purity of life, a purity of thought, and a purity of motives and actions, which I fear are beyond our reach. We shall be contented, on the present occasion, to consider the subject from a more practical point of view than that from which he has looked at it. There is one point, and possibly one point alone, on which I am disposed to agree with the hon. gentleman. He is right enough in saying that as regards the law on this question, that depends on a great variety of technical and highly complicated details, on which it is scarcely possible for a House constituted like this to form an accurate opinion. It must be settled by, and was properly referred to, a properly constituted tribunal, which gave a decision on the question. Now, this is a very remarkable proposition which has been laid before us, and I may say that it is rather unusual to have a proposal brought in this manner by a firm supporter of the Government on entering into Committee of Supply. It would seem to indicate that this question is looked upon as a vastly more serious and burning question by hon. gentlemen opposite than any other question with which they are called upon to deal. Strip this proposal of the verbiage in which it is robed, and what does it mean? This resolution, if passed, seeks directly to commit this Legislature, this Dominion House of Commons, to a conflict with the largest Province of the Dominion, which has already, within a few weeks, almost within a few days, by an overwhelming vote, after full and ample discussion, declared its purpose and recorded its resolution on this very question. And I say that that, at any rate, as far as the hon. members from Ontario are concerned, deserves double respect, because, in the first place, the Ontario Legislature takes its mandate from the people at a later date than the hon. members for Ontario in this House; and because, in the second place, they are specially called upon and qualified to deal with questions in which the interests of Ontario are involved; and, as I have said before, they have, very recently, by an overwhelming majority, recorded their opinion as to what the rights of Ontario are, and what alone they can recommend the Government of Ontario to adopt. Then, I say, this resolution is, at least, three years too late. If this was to be the policy of the Government, it ought to have been announced at once, and all kinds of evasions would not have been resorted to by the Government to avoid being called on to commit themselves on the question which is now brought up at the eleventh hour, after serious mischief has been done to Ontario, after grave complications have arisen in dealing with lands and timber over this valuable tract of country in dispute. Although the resolution is a remarkable one, the choice of the champion to bring it forward was perhaps more remarkable. There was some significance in the choice of the hon. member for Niagara as the member, out of the sixty-four from Ontario that are said to support the Government, best fitted to deal with a question specially affecting the rights of Ontario. Was it due to a touch of disgrace on the part of the other members that an alien in birth, breeding and instincts should be called on to deal with a question peculiarly affecting Ontario? I trust it was so, and that no native born member from Ontario could be found to lead the attack on the rights of his Province. It may be as well to sweep away the legal cobwebs with which this question has been enveloped. I do not say that it was not necessary to deal with these legal questions, but these have been thoroughly dealt with by the hon. members from Bothwell and South Huron. But, after all, there are a few straightforward facts to which the attention of this House had better be directed than to all the technicalities which envelop the consideration as to whether this or that particular stream or branch of the Mississippi is or is not the point from which our boundary should run. What are those plain facts? First of all, let us consider them in the broad light in which they will strike every voter in the Province of Ontario, in which, I believe, they will strike every voter of ordinary intelligence throughout this Dominion. We find that a considerable portion of this territory with which the Government are now undertaking to deal, over which they are professing, in defiance of the Government of Ontario, to exercise their rights, has for many years back been in the possession and under the jurisdiction and authority of the Province of Ontario. Next we find that the rest of the territory was formerly awarded to that Province, that the award was made with the fullest knowledge of the late Parliament, that their consent was given in the most distinct and emphatic way, by voting, after a full explanation from the hon. member for Lambton, a considerable sum of money for the express purpose of paying the expenses of this Commission, on whose award the claim of Ontario now rests. We find also that it was accepted distinctly and clearly by the late Government of the Dominion. Now, I ask, looking at those broad facts which no man can deny and every voter can understand, the House to consider what the present Government has done. They have disregarded the solemn agreement entered into and agreed to by the late Administration. They have, after doing that, delayed further action for several years, although they knew that every day and hour and moment was adding to the complications and increasing the difficulty of dealing with the question. Then, Sir, last of all, they have deliberately usurped possession of that disputed territory. They have given rights upon it, they have allowed parties to exercise the right of dominion upon it, despite the protests of Ontario, to the great loss of the Government and people of Ontario. And what is almost worse, they have attempted to drag in Manitoba to the quarrel. They have attempted to create a quarrel between Manitoba and Ontario. They have attempted, although it is in no way to the interest of Manitoba which gets the land and the timber, to make this the ground of quarrel or contention between Ontario and Manitoba. These men have done what the law forbids to be done in the case of the most ordinary, humble litigant. They have arbitrarily taken possession of property and land which was awarded to Ontario by a formal award, and which had been for years in her possession. Is there a single individual here who does not know that one of the most well defined, clearly pronounced rules of law is this; that when a party has obtained possession of any piece of real estate and enjoyed possession for a considerable time, he cannot be disturbed in the enjoyment of it until it is decided otherwise by some Court of competent jurisdiction. The humblest individual in the Dominion is not denied rights which are refused to the Premier Province of Canada, and then they presume to complain if the Government of Ontario remonstrates against this gross wrong and oppression. Let us consider for one moment what would have been the result had this case been reversed. I ask the Secretary of State what he thinks would have happened had this thing been done to the Province of Quebec. Let us suppose for one moment that Quebec possessed this territory by solemn award, and had retained it for years, undisturbed—I ask any hon. member, and especially any hon. member from Ontario, if this position had been reversed, would this or any Government have dealt with the rights of Quebec as they have not feared to deal with the rights of Ontario? I commend highly the attitude which Quebec members have always maintained when the rights of the Province were at issue, and I wish that the people of my own Province were so well united and determined to preserve her rights. Had that thing been done in the case of Quebec, within twenty-four hours after the Council had determined on such an act of usurpation and tyranny not one of the Quebec members would have remained in it, or would have supported a Government guilty of such a wrong. If the Ontario members would take such a stand, not twenty-four hours would elapse before Ontario would receive the justice which in the case of the sister Province the Government would never have attempted to take away. Let me say that we on this side of the House have always desired, and always will desire, to give Quebec everything she is entitled to. We wish to respect her rights, laws, language and institutions; we would not take away from her one jot or tittle of what she possesses. But I ask that our friends in Quebec would be willing to do likewise with Ontario. Why this extraordinary action? Why have the Government refused, in these circumstances, to do justice to Ontario? I do not believe that the majority of the people of Quebec grudge us our rights, but I do fear, from past experience, that there is a small selfish clique in Quebec who do desire to deprive Ontario of her rights in this matter; and I fear they have had far too much influence in deciding this question in the councils of the Dominion. I would warn these people of the folly they are committing. It is true it has been said here and elsewhere that Ontario is very slow to act. It is very long suffering of wrongs like this; and I do not say that even at this moment she is as fully alive as she is coming to be to wrong and injury done here. But it will be all the worse and most dangerous when our people do begin to move. I would warn the House there are limits to the patience of the people of Ontario. I can remember, twenty years ago, when I first had the honor to sit in the Legislature of the two Provinces, how Ontario had been aroused and goaded to an extent which put her on the verge of separation, through the refusal of her just demands. I hope that the House will avoid any action leading Ontario to suspect that there is a disposition to deny her her rights in this matter. It is known that the present right hon. leader of the Government has, on many occasions in the past, yielded unduly to the pressure put upon him by a small section of his supporters from Quebec—a small but mischievous section; and I fear that in the present case that this pressure has been put upon him, and that he has yielded to it—I do not say voluntarily or willingly, but most improperly, notwithstanding—although he knows right well that in doing so he is injuring, not merely his own Province, but the whole Dominion. It is in the highest degree in the interest of Canada that every Provincial right should be respected. It is even more the interest of the smaller than the larger Provinces, and I say for my own Province that we ask no favors; all we want is bare justice, our barest legal rights. Is the House prepared, at the instigation of the hon. member for Niagara—who, we must suppose, is not a mere tool or mouthpiece of the Government—to trample on the rights of Ontario; and are the members of Ontario prepared to endorse him in that direction? I think there is one just and honest course for the Government to pursue: let them, if they actually condemn the award, and say it ought not to have been made or accepted by the late Government, assume the responsibility of that opinion. We did not shirk or shun that responsibility. We did our best to obtain a fair and honorable conclusion. Hon. gentlemen may say what they like that they will never agree to this award; that they found, when they came into office, that the award was made and that the reference was completed, but I say, according to every sound principle of constitutional law in practice, it was their bounden duty to have accepted that award loyally, and to have acted upon it and given Ontario her due. If they cannot rise to this level—if they cannot do what is just and right—they might do what Mr. Mowat has proposed: leave Ontario in possession of the lands, to exercise full control over them, and refer the proposition for the decision of a proper tribunal, and if there be ground to dispute the validity of the award, the Courts are open, the Dominion can go before them and upset it; and although I do not think it a wise, generous or constitutional course, at any rate there would be infinitely less to complain of than when the Dominion Government constitutes itself judge and jury and violently takes possession of property which has been under the control of the Ontario Government for many years already. I maintain that in the highest degree loyalty to Canada means loyalty to provincial rights, and Mr. Mowat and the Local Government are not permitted to allow the rights of Ontario to be trampled on. It would be the worst policy if they were to allow themselves to be tamely trampled on by the Dominion Government or any other authority whatever. If we were looking at this matter merely from a party point of view, I would say to hon. gentlemen opposite: Vote for this motion, refuse the Parliament and people of Ontario their just rights, and see whether you have or have not miscalculated in thinking that the people of Ontario are not aware of the practical importance of the point involved, and of the magnitude of this important issue. Sir, I repeat that there is danger, there is grave danger, lest, by the action you are undertaking now, you may convince the people of Ontario that they are not likely to obtain justice at the hands of the Dominion Parliament, and as one who always advocated Confederation, I would regret it, and deeply, because I can see nothing more certain to bring about the ruin of the Confederation than that a great Province like Ontario should come, even if it come hastily, to entertain that conclusion. I believe that the line I have taken, the views I have presented are those I have presented, and are present ing themselves to the minds of ninety-nine hundredths of the people of Ontario, whatever their peculiar political complexion may be, and I believe hon. gentlemen will find it so and find it soon. Sir, there is but too much danger. I believe that this is but part of a plot—whether a defined plot, or whether a plot at present in embryo—on the part of many men on these benches against the provincial rights of the various Provinces. We know right well, because they are constantly betraying themselves in various ways, that many of those persons who entered into Confederation did so grudgingly, that they really desired a different form of Union. Sir, even if it had been possible, twenty years ago, in the case of the four original Provinces, to have had Legislative Union, that time has past and gone forever, and you may depend upon it that no greater injury can be done to our present form of Government than to attempt to belittle our Provincial Legislatures, to attempt to disregard our provincial autonomy and to attempt to interfere with provincial rights. Sir, I do not want to say anything which we cannot prove by fair grounds, but when I remember the language used by many of these hon. gentlemen's supporters, by many of their organs, and particularly by the organ to which the hon. member for South Huron referred, I cannot but feel that there is unfortunately too much truth, too much foundation for the statement which he made on the authority of these organs, and on the authority of these hon. gentlemen themselves, that the main reason why Ontario at present cannot get her rights is because Ontario at present is under a Liberal Government, because Ontario is at least a Liberal Province, because Ontario is known not to be likely to continue much longer to support the hon. gentlemen opposite, and because they feel convinced that they are insecure in their ill-gotten power so long as Ontario and the Government of Ontario are not within their grasp.

Mr. ROYAL (in French). Mr. Speaker, there is something in this discussion which must strike the members of this House; it is the wisdom shown by the Government in deciding to remove this question from the arena of those constitutional debates which have put their stamp on the discussion from the time it was begun. It is important that the settlement of this question should be made by a tribunal whose rendering shall be above all suspicion. It is of the highest importance, and the Government has full well understood it, that the decision which shall settle this burning question shall be rendered by men whose knowledge, impartiality, and position will place their judgment beyond the merest suspicion. Mr. Speaker, the Province of Manitoba has just as great a right to take an interest in this question of the boundaries of Ontario as any of the other Provinces of the Dominion. We are directly interested in it because we hold that if the affair is settled according to the legal interpretation of the Statute of 1774, the Province of Manitoba, besides its intrinsic importance, besides the riches insured to it by the fertility of its soil and the development of colonization taking place within its territory, Manitoba, I contend will receive, by virtue of such settlement, a share of Lake Superior and its importance will not be merely limited to its agricultural products, but it will take rank by the side of the other Provinces in the system of navigation of Canada. But, leaving aside local interests, there is a higher interest which we should have in view; it is that of justice. In the light of justice, the interests of this or that Province must stand aside, especially when we see that in one of the Provinces, the public mind has been excited to such a degree that track has been lost of the principal question at issue, and that one has even endangered the fate of our young constitution. I have not the intention of making a very lengthy speech on this question. I will content myself with touching on certain points which have originated during the debate which we have heard for the last few hours in this House, especially certain points in regard to the legal and constitutional aspect of the country. I will be brief, and shall have to refer to notes somewhat copious in order not to lose the thread of my argument. In the first place, there is a proposition, which is self-evident and every one will admit that Ontario has defined and legal boundaries. To assert the contrary would be to do so in spite of sound sense. The territory known to-day by the name of the Province of Ontario, came into the Confederation with a defined and legal boundary, otherwise the clause of the British North America Act would be stating a thing that had no existence, for that Imperial Statute says that the Provinces, at the time of their entry into Confederation, and to wit the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, shall keep the boundaries they had on the 1st July, 1857. Well, if at that date the Province of Ontario had defined and legal limits, what are those limits? Were those limits assigned to it by law, by Royal Commission, by Order in Council or by proclamation? As you see, Mr. Speaker, the question is not now, at least directly, of the effects which may have had the more or less serious occupations of the territory by the Hudson's Bay Company, by virtue of its Charter of 1670. Nor is it the effect which may have had the negotiations with regard to the treaty of Ryswick, in 1697. Nor is it, at least I think not, of the effects of the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, because the Commissioners who had been appointed could not sit by virtue of claims of the Hudson's Bay Company, and were never able to come to an understanding. Nor is it a question at present of the negotiations entered into in 1857, by the Government of Canada, claiming as its own the Hudson's Bay territory. The lawyers who defend the claims of the Province of Ontario, do nothing but repeat the arguments adduced by the delegates of the Canadian Government, in 1857, claiming as its own the Hudson's Bay territory. It has been lost sight of; it seems to me that at that time, like in all similar cases, any one who defends a cause, any one who has claims to submit to a higher tribunal, is like a lawyer who pleads a case; he is not acting as a Judge, but as an advocate, and moreover, the fact that the Imperial Government has refused to recognize the claims of Canada, and which has compelled us to pay $1,500,000 for the expropriation of the Hudson's Bay territory in addition to the transfer of a twentieth part of that vast stretch of land, proves that the claims of Canada, however exaggerated they were at the time, were not recognized by the Imperial Government. If, therefore, those claims were not recognized at that date, it is in bad taste and illogical to contend that the Province of Ontario must hold the same argument in upholding that question of the western and northern limits of that territory. Nor is it the question in the present case whether there is a contract in existence, but the question is the interpretation of a law affecting rights to a property and which must consequently be settled ex æquo bono. Consequently, if we place the question on that basis, we leave far behind the learned and diffused speeches made on the early days of the colony. We find in them, no doubt some very interesting historical facts for those who are interested in the early times of the colony; but I think that in calling into play these historical documents, all this historical research, in compiling these voluminous records, one has had but one object in view, that of causing the principal question to be lost sight of, and to render extremely difficult and ungrateful the task of examining the question to those inclined to study it. We have neither more nor less to do than to interpret the Statute which has determined the boundaries of Ontario or the Commissions which have established them; for in both cases Ontario has had boundaries and those boundaries were given to it by a superior authority. If, therefore, Ontario had legal and defined boundaries at the time of its entry into Confederation, it is of the highest importance to ascertain what they were, and the search made in that direction by the Committee which sat in 1880, will prove of the greatest interest to us. Of all the Provinces Ontario is perhaps the one which has had its boundaries established more frequently than any other of them. We find no less than eight different boundaries between 1774 and 1878. In the first place, we have the famous boundary established by the arbitrators in July, 1878. It is that boundary which the arbitrators discovered and, which volens volens, one seeks to impose on us. That boundary is a purely conventional one. It is the determining of a new territorial boundary of a Province, and is consequently in contradiction to the clauses of the British North America Act, which says that the Provinces, on entering into the Confederation, shall preserve the same boundaries as theretofore. The result of accepting this arbitration would be to change, to amend a clause of an Imperial Act. Now, do we possess such a right? We know that the limits determined by the arbitrators, in 1878, placed the western boundary of Ontario some 400 miles further west. Instead of letting it remain at the entrance of Thunder Bay, at the extreme end of Lake Superior, as indicated by the Act of 1774, the arbitrators decision gives to Ontario, as its western limit, the Lake of the Woods. We next come to the boundary claimed by the Ontario Government in its despatch of the 18th April, which is to be found in a report brought down by the hon. the Secretary of State. This boundary is somewhat different from that of the arbitrators. It is as follows:—

“The boundary line of Ontario is the international boundary from the mouth of the Pigeon River, on Lake Superior, to a point west of the Lake of the Woods, where the boundary line would be intersected by a line drawn north from the source of the Mississippi River; thence the boundary line of Ontario runs north to the point of intersection of the southern boundaries of the Hudson Bay territories, thence the boundary line of Ontario is the southern boundary of those territories to the point where that boundary would be intersected by a line drawn north from the head of Lake Temiscaming.”

We now come to a third boundary, which is, I think, a paradoxical one, invented in an hour of good humour by the well-known author of the report on this question of the boundaries of Ontario. I am speaking of the boundary assigned by Mr. Mills the present member for Bothwell. Mr. Mills had been commissioned by his Government to study the subject and to go into researches in order to try and throw some light on it. By dint of search and of hunting up books in libraries, Mr. Mills came to the conclusion that if the Province of Ontario has a western boundary, it is the Rocky Mountains. Now, I think Mr. Mills showed himself to be logical; if it is true that one must give to the Province of Ontario as a western limit that determined by the Statute of 1774, i.e., a line starting from the Mississippi and following the course of that river, it is equally true that that line will necessarily strike, not the line south of the Hudson Bay territories, but the Rocky Mountains. Mr. Mills was not only paradoxical, but I think that he came nearer the truth than many others. Then comes the boundary fixed by Lord Durham's commission in 1838. With regard to that boundary, one will do well to bear in mind that it is the last one that was given to Ontario, and it is a fact that Ontario upon entering into the Confederation had no other boundary than that defined in the Royal Commission delivered to Lord Durham. He was sent hither as High Commissioner in 1838, and we must go back to that Commission to find the last prescribed limits of the Province of Ontario. Lord Durham's Commission fixes the western boundary of Ontario at the entrance to Lake Superior, and the Commissions delivered to the Governors who succeeded him, all contain the entrance to Lake Superior as the western boundary of the Province of Ontario. Previous to 1838, we find a period of forty-seven years during which the prescribed limits of Ontario remain the same, i.e., since 1791. When the old Province of Quebec was divided into Upper and Lower Canada, the officers of the Crown fearing, I suppose, to commit some error with regard to this portion of our territory, which was then but slightly known, abstained from giving any precise and geographical boundary to the Province of Upper Canada; they contented themselves with saying, after having defined in a most minute manner the boundaries of Lower Canada, that Upper Canada was to be all that portion of the territory of the old Province of Quebec that was to be found westward of the Province of Lower Canada. This boundary existed forty-seven years, and we see it appear in all the Commissions granted to the Governors who administered the affairs of the country during that period. We now come to Lord Dorchester's commission in 1786, which speaks of the Lake of the Woods as being the western limit of the old Province of Quebec. After an interval of twelve years, we come to the Commission of Sir Guy Carleton, in 1774, which was issued a few months after the passing of the Imperial Statute of Quebec. The terms expressed in that commission to define the western boundary of the Province of Upper Canada differ from those made use of in the Imperial Statute; in that Commission are added certain words which completely change the meaning of the Statute, and it is precisely that Commission of Lord Carleton, which, it appears, furnishes the present basis of the claims of the advocates of the Province of Ontario. Lastly, Mr. Speaker, the eighth boundary of the Province of Ontario is found in the Imperial Statute of 1774. That Statute, which was enacted to enlarge the Province of Quebec, says expressly that the western boundary of Upper Canada is a line drawn northward from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers to the southern limit of the Hudson's Bay territory. In presence of so clear an establishing of the boundary, one is surprised to see paradoxical systems which have sprung up during the last twelve years with regard to those limits of the Province of Ontario. Now, Mr. Speaker, among these numerous boundaries, which are the true ones? Are we to take the boundary determined by the Imperial Statute, or are we to take the last Commission, that issued to Lord Durham in 1838, which fixed the limits at the entrance to Lake Superior? There is a great difference between those two boundaries and a distance of 700 miles. Which one are we to accept, the last named one or that determined by the Statute of 1774. Therein lies the whole question. With regard to the exercise of the Royal prerogative as to the rectification of the limits of a province, there are two well defined opinions. There are those who contend, and that is the contention of Ontario's advocates only, that the Crown may at all times, whatever may be the Statute, alter, modify, enlarge, or diminish the extent of a province, and this at its simple pleasure. There is no need for me to prove the assertion that I am making as it is to be found in all documents and official reports published in the Province of Ontario, and in the report of the Committee appointed by this House in 1880. But if the Crown has the power to determine the limits of a province by increasing its territory, it can also diminish it. The greater includes the less. Thus, if the Crown, in issuing Lord Carleton's commission on the 27th December, 1774, increased the territory of the Province of Quebec by about 400 miles, it had the right in 1838 to diminish it by some 700 miles, and to establish at the entrance of Lake Superior that same western boundary of Ontario. It is impossible to suppose that one can make use of an argument for the benefit of one side of the question only; the argument holds good for the whole of it, and if it is by virtue of the Commission issued to Lord Dorchester that it is contended that Ontario can justly claim the Lake of the Woods as its western boundary, why should one not with equal force say that the Crown has cancelled all the Commissions existing previous to that one, and that that boundary is to be found at the entrance of Lake Superior? It has been said that to examine that boundary fixed by the Statute of 1774 in the light of all the circumstances which at that time made that country a legendary one, one must examine under what circumstances the cession of the country was made; one must not lose sight of the fact that the rights acquired in the past by the discovery of the country, did not make the discoverer the owner of the country, but occupation only gave that ownership to another, and so forth. Now, if ever there were solemn circumstances in which that Commission was issued to Lord Durham, it was assuredly in 1838. What was his mission in those days? You have not forgotten, Mr. Speaker, and none of the members of this House have forgotten, that this eminent statesman was sent to Canada in the wake of serious troubles, and he was consequently instructed to study the state of the country, to obtain information about its economical condition, of the state of the spirits and disposition of the population of the two Provinces of Lower and Upper Canada, and he was no doubt told that he had the power to unite Lower and Upper Canada, if he wished so to do. Well, the boundary was established with the greatest care at a time when the geography of the locality was well known, and the western boundary was placed at the entrance of Lake Superior. We can accept the fundamental doctrine upon which the advocates of the claims of Ontario base their plea, and say: "We accept your doctrine and we tell you that the commission of Lord Durham in 1838 is to be that which is to determine the western boundary of Ontario." Yet, Mr. Speaker, there are lawyers who are of opinion that when an Imperial Statute exists, that the Imperial prerogative cannot be exercised in contradiction with that Statute; that one Statute cannot be altered but by another. It is not necessary for me to name the eminent men of this country who hold that opinion. I will merely say that one of the eminent lawyers who formed part of the Commission appointed in 1880, Judge Ramsay, declared squarely and without any hesitation, that for him there was nothing doubtful about the question, that when there is a Statute defining a certain position, it cannot be set aside but by a statutory amendment, and that the Crown cannot deviate from it neither by instructions nor by proclamations, unless such power is reserved to it by a clause of the Statute. Now, there exists a law by virtue of which the old Province of Quebec was created; it is the Imperial Statute of 1774, and if later on, in 1791, that Province was divided into two parts, it gave to Upper Canada the boundary which the Province of Ontario has to-day, and the latter cannot have any other. Such is the certain and legal boundary of the Province of Ontario. Besides, the legal question has already been gone into and we can refer to jurisprudence in the matter. In 1873, the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Lower Canada had to try a case of murder. I am not going to recall the circumstances of the case, which are familiar to all the members of this House; I will merely say this, that being called upon to give the interpretation of the law on that same point of the western boundary of the Province of Upper Canada, Chief Justice Sewell, who is still a great authority in Lower Canada, declared that the Imperial Statute of 1774 did not admit of any doubt, and that the western boundary of Upper Canada was a meridian line drawn northward from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, until it met the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories. If, Mr. Speaker, the Province of Ontario occupies in this case nothing else but the position of an unfortunate litigant, if Ontario is discontented, if Ontario feels itself aggrieved by the judgment of the highest court of the country at that date, there is a very simple remedy; a litigant who is dissatisfied with a first judgment must carry his cause to a higher tribunal. Such is the only proposition which the Province of Ontario could entertain, and in that I cordially approve the policy of the Government as expressed in the resolution submitted to this House. I admire the attitude taken by the Government when it asks a decision of the highest tribunal, the Supreme Court of Canada, or of the highest tribunal of the Empire, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. One understands now, why those who are the determined defenders of Ontario, in spite of everything, call for arbitration and nothing else. It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that the present Government were repudiating the engagements entered into by a former Government; that the present Government did not wish that there should be any solidarity between its acts and the acts of its predecessors. But, Mr. Speaker, when the act of its predecessors has been declared illegal and unconstitutional, I think it is a sacred duty for the present Government to set it aside and not to hold itself bound by the decision of a tribunal of arbitrators. I have said that this arbitration was unconstitutional. The British North America Act says expressly that the limits of the several Provinces are to be those which they had on the 1st of July, 1867. By what right, then, does an arbitration come and change the limits thus existing? It is a well admitted fact that the decision rendered by the arbitrators in July, 1878, does not determine the law; it does not interpret the law, but it fixes new boundaries for Ontario, both west and north. Well, it is this British North America Act, which we cannot alter, neither by a Federal or by a Local Act, much less by an arbitration, but that can only be altered by an Act of the same Parliament which passed the first Statute; we must, therefore, go back to the Act of 1774. We must admit that the method of judging the question is not to change the law, but to cause the highest tribunal to define what the law is. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, all the Provinces of Confederation are interested in it. It is not an Act which concerns Ontario alone. Nova Scotia as well as British Columbia are interested in seeing that we should not have in our midst a Province seeking to aggrandize itself at the expense of the other Provinces, and which takes advantage of the preponderance it enjoys owing to its riches and to its commercial and agricultural prosperity to assume an over-important role. On the other hand, the Province of Manitoba, which I think, does not at present receive any fresh accessions of territory to increase its property, and the Province of Quebec are interested in the same degree that Ontario should not intrude upon the rights of the other Provinces. Those who, in the Province of Ontario, have heaped sophisms upon sophisms, paradoxes upon paradoxes, fiery speeches upon fiery speeches, desire that above all justice should be done, and that on that question Confederation should get what the law gives it, neither more nor less. Why will they not abandon that award of the arbitrators whose constitution we all know to have been unconstitutional in its formation, and ultra vires from beginning to end? Is the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of Canada, is the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England, in its composition, in the men forming that magistracy, not above all suspicion? Are the decisions of the Privy Council in England not accepted throughout the whole British Empire with the respect and deference they are entitled to? Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if the Province of Ontario really wishes to have its rights only, it must be of the opinion, and so must its representatives be, to refer the question to the highest tribunal and to the highest jurisdiction of the British Empire. The tone of the official despatches of Ontario is not in harmony with the quiet and dignified tone of the despatches of the Canadian Government on the same subject. It is clear to everybody that it is sought to make election capital out of it. Is that, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, the way of obtaining justice? Is that the way to put the country in a position to decide so important a question? I do not think so, and I do not think that any one here is deceived as to the effect which the local Administration of Ontario has attempted to produce during the last days of its Session by the fiery speeches that were made in it; no more is any one deceived with regard to the somewhat excited perorations which we have heard within these precincts. To resume, the following are the conclusions to which an investigation of the question as a legal and constitutional one logically brings us: 1. Ontario has clearly defined and legal limits; its limits to the north and to the west are those fixed in the Commission of Lord Durham, i.e. at the entrance of Lake Superior and the shores of the Hudson's Bay, or those which are mentioned in the Commissions of Lord Dorchester in 1774 and 1786, i.e., the Mississippi and the Lake of the Woods to the west, and the height of land between Hudson's Bay and Lake Superior to the north, or lastly those given in the Imperial Statute itself. 2. If Ontario professes as an absolute doctrine that the Crown has the right to alter the boundaries of a Province, independently of any express law on the point, its limits are defined in the commissions of Lord Durham, and its western boundary stops at Sault Ste. Marie, at the entrance of Lake Superior. 3. If, on the contrary, Ontario admits the doctrine which does not recognize to the sovereign the right of altering the boundaries of a Province except in the case where no law exists to govern the matter, that Province is perforce compelled to accept as limits those given to it by the Act of 1774. 4. Ontario became a party to the Federal compact of 1867 with the boundaries which it possessed at the time, and which was specially confirmed to it by the British North America Act; neither the Province of Ontario, nor Canada, much less a simple arbitration, can change an iota of them; it would be totally unconstitutional and ultra vires. 5. Only a high tribunal, the Supreme Court, or the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, has jurisdiction to determine, not conventional limits, not new limits, but to declare if the matter as decided by judgment in 1818, shall remain so judged, or, in other terms, if the Imperial Statute can suffer any different interpretation from that placed on it in 1818 by the Court of Queen's Bench of Québec. Such is the opinion of the Government; such is the only attitude which should be taken with regard to so important a question; it is the sense of the resolution before the House, and it is the line of conduct clearly traced to us by our duties as legislators for the good, the consolidation, the peace and the prosperity of the Confederation of Canada.

Mr. LAURIER. The resolution now in your hands, and all the hon. gentlemen who have addressed you from the opposite side of the House, strongly insist upon the propriety of treating this question from a purely legal point of view. Acting themselves upon this principle, they have attacked, at great length, the award rendered by the arbitrators to whom the decision of this question was confided by the Governments of Ontario and of the Dominion. They have dissected this award minutely and have come to the conclusion that, had they sat on the Commission they would have reached a different decision from the one rendered by the arbitrators. They have piled up arguments, disquisitions and opinions, to establish that the arbitrators greatly erred when they decided that the word "northward" in the Act really means towards the north, whereas, in their opinion, it means simply north and nothing more. Well, everybody knows that in the past there has been no more prolific cause of discussion than the signification of words. In listening to-day to the learned and elaborate disquisitions of the hon. gentlemen opposite upon the meaning of the words "downwards," "northwards," and "due north," I was strongly reminded of a letter which is to be found in the appendix to the book of the hon. member for Bothwell, which was addressed by the Marquis De Torcy to Lord Bolingbroke, on the 25th Dec., 1712, at the time when the negotiations for the Treaty of Utrecht were going on. The letter of the Marquis De Torcy complained that too much weight was put by the British plenipotentiary on mere words. He wrote:

"In the name of God, Sir, order your Plenipotentiaries to be less excellent grammarians. Ours, who also understand the force of Latin expressions, are out of patience when they see difficulties, which have been long adjusted, started again, and the difference between cession and restitution, and the meaning of those terms. In truth, Sir, such questions ought not to be the amusement of honorable men. They are, at best, excusable to those to whom we may apply, amantium ira. Finish these disputes which, if they continue longer, will only profit our enemies."

Well, there is nothing new under the sun, and one would really think that this letter was written expressly for the purpose of the present discussion, and if we substitute the words "north" and "due north" for the words "cession" and "restitution" it would exactly apply to the present case. In truth such questions ought not to be the amusement of honorable men unless they are excusable as being amantium ira. On this side of the House I may say that we have no patience when we see difficulties which have been long since adjusted, revived again by hon. gentlemen opposite on the perilous pretext that the meaning of the words "north" and "due north" were not properly understood by the arbitrators. This question has been settled. Why should it be opened up again? But what would be the benefit of opening the question? If, however, it is to be opened we are just as anxious as are hon. gentlemen opposite that the question should be treated exclusively as a legal one and should be approached in no other spirit, except a judicial one. But let me ask those hon. gentlemen who have urged on the House the propriety of treating it as a purely legal one, whether in such an event they have the right to criticise the award rendered. If they are sincere in their opinion, and I believe they are, that the question shall be treated simply as a legal one, and be approached only in a judicial spirit, can they ignore the great fundamental principle in matters of arbitration, that an award is binding on both parties and cannot be questioned, except for cause. And what is the cause in this case—what will be causes added to it to justify the award? The answer is, that the arbitrators have erred. The only cause adequate to contest the award is this: it lies with the party challenging the award to show there has been fraud on the part of the arbitrators, or that it is grossly unjust. This is a fundamental principle which no one will gainsay. Yet no fraud is charged against the arbitrators—they are above suspicion. No substantial injustice is charged. What is charged against them is this: that they may possibly have erred and taken a wrong view of the case before them. This cannot be brought as a charge against the award, and unless hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to say there has been fraud on the part of the arbitrators, or shocking injustice has occurred, they have no right to review and criticise an award as they have done. Although no charge of injustice is brought against the award, or fraud against the arbitrators, yet some objections are made by hon. gentlemen opposite. What are those objections? The first is that the reference of the question to arbitrators, which was made by the late Government, was made without the sanction of Parliament; and this they hold to be a fatal objection. In law and in fact this contention is unfounded. The hon. member for Bothwell has shown conclusively that it was within the power of the Crown to make such a reference. It may be said that such a prerogative of the Crown would hardly obtain under our Constitution; the most punctilious will reply that the reference was made with the authority of Parliament. It was, however, not made with the authority of Parliament, couched in an Act; but the authority given by Parliament was just as clear and as manifest as if it had been given by an Act. It is within the recollection of many hon. members, that during the late Parliament the question was often referred to on the floor of Parliament. Not only so, but in the Session of 1878, $15,000 were voted by Parliament for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the Commission which had been charged with the settlement of the Ontario boundaries. I ask any fair-minded man if Parliament could have sanctioned anything on more binding terms than it did when it voted the necessary money to carry out the expenses of the Commission. Could any authority be more binding if Parliament had passed an Act to refer the case to arbitration? If these hon. gentlemen will look upon the question as a purely legal one—if they will look upon it in a judicial spirit, such as they invite us to do, they cannot come to another conclusion but that Parliament could sanction the action of the Government, and therefore the argument which we have heard so often repeated in this debate falls to the ground. It remains indisputable that Parliament gave its authority in the most open and binding manner that it was possible for Parliament to do. Another objection made against the award is this: it is said this is a legal question, and being a legal question it ought to have been settled by lawyers and Courts. Now, Sir, I cannot concede that the authority of the gentlemen who rendered the award is to be questioned because they did not all happen to belong to the legal profession. No one will presume to assert that justice, fairness and knowledge are the exclusive endowments of lawyers. We saw, a few days ago, in a Committee of this House, Doctors of Divinity arguing questions of law as ably and as skilfully as lawyers could have done, and I am satisfied that every one must admit that the arbitrators were endowed with all the qualities necessary to render such an award as would satisfy the most punctilious. First we have Mr. Justice Harrison, whose lofty character and clear and cool legal acumen shone so conspicuously in his career; then we have Sir Francis Hincks, whose fertile and versatile talents eminently fitted him for such a position; and then we have the British Ambassador, who, by his profession, his occupation, by his knowledge and character, was just as well fitted to deal with such a question as any professional man could have been. For my own part, I protest against the assertion that questions of law should always be settled by the law Courts. I say that the interests of society do not require that questions of law should always be so decided. The most trivial disputes that arise between men involve questions of law, but the interests of society demand that these disputes should be settled, if possible, by the contending parties, or, failing in this, by arbitrators appointed by mutual agreement, but that only as a last resort should they have recourse to Courts of law. Another objection is made against the award. It is said that the arbitrators have not solved the questions, but that they have made a compromise between the questions submitted by the respective parties. Mr. Speaker, it is very strange to me that such an assertion should be made, and so often made on the floor of the House, when every man should now know better than to make such an assertion. Sir Francis Hincks declared in his lecture, delivered at Toronto, that no compromise was made; that the arbitrators had applied themselves to the task which devolved upon them; that after hearing the arguments each separately took the case and separately came to the conclusion which was come to in the award, and that that award was therefore the unanimous expression of the conclusions arrived at separately by each arbitrator. I do not cite this declaration of Sir Francis Hincks because it can have any bearing on the case, but simply for the purpose of protesting against assertions which are persistently made when they should not be made, because they have no foundation in fact. It is impossible to carry on the public discussions of this country if the hon. gentlemen persist in basing arguments on assertions which are denied by the facts. But what, after all, is there in the assertion, if true, that the arbitrators have made a compromise? Supposing they made a compromise on the contentions submitted to them, what objection can the hon.

Mr. ROYAL.

gentlemen make to that fact. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem very tender-skinned on that question. They say that the boundaries between Ontario and Canada exist by law, and that the Parliament of Great Britain alone is the power that can change these boundaries. To this proposition I am disposed to assent, but if this boundary exists by law, where is it to be found? It exists by law, but the law is not clear upon that point; and supposing the arbitrators made a compromise, does anyone pretend to say that they thereby sacrificed the rights of Ontario or the rights of Canada? If the arbitrators had taken the contentions of either party and had said: "We will not admit the one proposition or the other; but will take a little from one side of the case and a little from the other," who can say that they took away any rights that belonged to either? But whether or not this view be correct—whether the question was solved as a compromise or as a question of law—at all events there is the award, and it is binding unless you can show a better objection to it than has yet been brought forward. Of the award itself I will say nothing; it has been so ably defended by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that it would be preposterous in me to add a word to what he has said. Moreover, I do not see the necessity of defending it. It does not require to be defended, and the objections offered against it are of the most frivolous character; and supposing the proposition now before the House should carry and that the question should be referred to the Supreme Court or Privy Council, does any one suppose that the decision of whatever tribunal it might be brought before would satisfy every one concerned? No, Mr. Speaker; there are objections to the award now, and there would be objections brought against the decision of any other tribunal before which it might be carried. I think it is Jean Jacques Rousseau who said that no two men ever discussed a question without each remaining more convinced of his own opinion than before the argument began. So it is in every law Court. Where is the Judge that can satisfy both parties? The loser always thinks that he has been wrongly treated. So it would be if this question were referred to the Supreme Court. I shall not touch upon the merits of the award, but I say it is an award binding on both parties, and that it is the duty of both parties to receive it and carry it out in its entirety. In speaking thus, I am perfectly well aware that I shall be violently attacked in my own Province by the members of the Conservative party—

Hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. I see that I have not mistaken the spirit of hon. gentlemen opposite. I see that I have not mistaken the views of my hon. friends opposite. I know their prejudices too well, not to know in advance what their argument will be; I know that it will be an appeal to the baser prejudices of my fellow-countrymen. But, Sir, I have too much respect for the justice of my countrymen to fear the effect of those appeals. Two years ago, when a motion was made to appoint a Committee to investigate the award, I, in common with some of my friends on this side of the House, voted against such a Committee, because we believed then, as we believe now, that the question had been settled, and that it should not be again opened. We were attacked then, as we shall be attacked now; it was represented that we had sacrificed the interests of our Province for the sake of Ontario. It would seem to these hon. gentlemen that to do justice to Ontario means to sacrifice the interests of Quebec. It must be remembered that this award grants nothing to Ontario but what Ontario had before; it does not pretend to give any additional territory to Ontario; it pretends simply to award to Ontario the territory to which she is entitled. But we were represented as the enemies of our Province. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite, what I have often said elsewhere, that the Conservative party of to-day are not the party that were led at one time by Sir George Etienne Cartier.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentlemen who now take so strong objection to my language, pretend that on this question they hold the views that were held by Sir George Cartier? Do they not know that Sir George Cartier, in many State papers signed by himself, granted to the Province of Ontario far more territory than is granted to her by this award? In order that there may be no doubt on that point, let me refer them to the despatch signed by Sir George Cartier and his then colleague the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) on this very question. As hon. gentlemen remember, when the Dawson route was opened in 1869, strong objection was made by the Hudson's Bay Company against the Canadian Government opening a route through the territory between the Lake of the Woods and Red River, because they said it was invading their rights. To this Sir George Cartier and Mr. McDougall made a reply, in which they declared that whatever doubt might exist as to the limits of old or French Canada, no impartial investigator could doubt that they extended to and included the country between the Lake of the Woods and Red River. I have no doubt that if Sir George Cartier were still leading his party he would hold the same opinion, and I venture to say that this question would never have been raised, but the award would have been carried out. If there was a quality for which Sir George Cartier deserved to be admired it was his courage, and next to his courage his fairness to an adversary; and knowing him as we once knew him, I say he would not have gone back on his word, but would have given whatever justice was due to Ontario; and I repeat again, that those gentlemen who are proposing to erect a monument to Sir George Cartier are slapping that very monument whenever they raise any objection against the award. I find that the hon. member for Halton, a few months afterwards, as well as Mr. Cauchon, in 1867, when he was a member of the Canadian Government, also took the ground that the territory extended as far as Red River. If this question is referred to the Privy Council, in what position will the Canadian Government stand? They will stand in this position—that when it was to their interest, when they were fighting the Hudson's Bay Company, to claim that territory, they did so, and that now, when it is to their interest, they are asserting the very reverse. It may be that the Privy Council will hold their position to be legal, but certainly if it is legal, it will be neither honorable nor dignified. But let me refer to the position of my fellow-countrymen from the Province of Quebec. When it was asserted we were sacrificing the rights of our Province, it was objected that the territory of Ontario was already great, and that this award made it still greater; and it was added that if a large population settled there Ontario would have a large preponderance of power in the Dominion. Now, let us suppose that the question is opened anew. The award may be set aside, and it may be that Ontario will be increased to the extent claimed as her right by the Dominion Government, or it may be that the territory of Ontario will be increased to the extent claimed by Ontario, and granted by Sir George Cartier, namely, to Red River—what then? You will have the Province of Ontario made greater than it is by the award. As for a large population settling in that territory, does any one suppose that this will be realized for a hundred years to come? What immigration will go into that rocky country so long as the vast prairies in the North-West are to be filled up? The fear is perfectly chimerical. The whole dispute lies in the interpretation of the Act of 1774. The hon. member for Bothwell argued that the Province of Quebec, as constituted in 1774, was comprised within the following limits: To the east by the ocean, to the west by the Mississippi River, to the north by the Hudson Bay Territories, and to the south by the lines which have been described. On the other hand, it is contended by the hon. members for Niagara, Richmond and Wolfe, and Provencher, and in fact by all hon. members opposite who have spoken on this subject that the term "northward" applies to a line to be drawn due north from the junction of the Mississippi with the Ohio, and that this astronomical line was to be the western boundary of the Province. The hon. member for Bothwell argued forcibly that if that contention were admitted, the Province of Quebec, which was then constituted, was left without any boundary on the north. If this contention be true, where is the northern boundary of Quebec to be found? If none was provided in that Act of 1774, it must be that established by the Royal Proclamation of 1763. In that case, it would be a line passing through the middle of Lake St. John. This territory has always been claimed by the Province of Quebec, and at this moment the Government of that Province are making great efforts to settle a large population there. I do not say the contention of the hon. member for Bothwell is right, but I say that if you deny Ontario the boundary she claims, she may deny Quebec her northern boundary, and those sectional cries which at one time were thought to be forever destroyed, would be renewed. This question having been settled, ought to remain settled. There is no occasion to open it anew. I do not fear the appeal that will be made against me in my own Province on the vote I intend giving. I have no hesitation in saying this award is binding on both parties, and should be carried out in good faith. The consideration that the great Province of Ontario may be made greater I altogether lay aside as unfair, unfriendly, and unjust. This is not a question of expediency, it is a question of justice. I do not grudge to Ontario the extent of territory declared hers under this award, and which does not constitute even the whole of what she is entitled to, according to the opinion of one of the most learned and industrious of my countrymen. The eternal principles of justice are far more important than thousands or millions of acres of land, and I say, let us adhere to those principles of justice, and in so doing we will have the surest foundation for securing justice on every occasion.

Mr. HAGGART. At this late hour I will be as brief as possible in answering the arguments of several hon. gentlemen opposite on this question. The most concise and logical argument on that side, and the only one to which I shall pay much attention, is that of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) but I cannot permit some of the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down to pass unnoticed. He assumes that there has been an award and a legal one. I will discuss this point afterwards, and, in my humble opinion, prove conclusively there was no such thing. As to the boundaries of Ontario, the hon. gentleman has fallen into the error into which the hon. member for Bruce fell in quoting the remarks of the late Sir George Cartier, who said: "There was no doubt the boundaries of Ontario extended at least to that country between the Lake of the Woods and Red River." If the hon. member paid particular attention to those remarks and the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell, he would remember that the old Province of Quebec was carved out of Canada and did not extend to the whole extent of that country; and the late Sir George Cartier, in his address to the Colonial Minister, did not claim that Ontario extended from the Lake of the Woods to the Red River. He said: "Whatever doubt may exist as to the utmost extent of old or French Canada, no impartial investigation into the case can doubt that it extended to and included the country between Lake of the Woods and Red River." That is the argument of the hon. member for Algoma, perfectly consistent with his remarks made long ago, and his argument to-day, that the Province of old Canada extended far beyond what is now claimed for the Province of Ontario. But before passing to the argument on that question, I will make a few remarks on the speech of the hon. member for South Huron. He seems to believe that the Dominion has deprived Ontario of some territory of which it has been in possession. I am not aware that the Dominion Government has in any way deprived Ontario of any territory of which it has been in possession, or that it is selling the lands or granting licenses on the disputed territory. The right hon. Premier, the other evening, declared that the Government had carefully abstained from granting licenses, or selling lands, or granting mining leases in any part of the disputed territory, except to the extent provided in the Pacific Railway Act, namely, the right of cutting timber for the construction of that road. The member for South Huron fell into the same error as the hon. member who has just spoken. The member for Algoma has held, and still holds, that old Canada extended far beyond the limits of the present Province of Ontario; that the Act constituting the Province of Ontario took that Province out of the Province of Quebec, and left a large extent of country beyond it which formerly belonged to Canada, and that the limits of Ontario are not further than that portion of Upper Canada carved out of the Province of Quebec, which is quite correct. I will now answer the member for Bothwell, who seemed to state his premises pretty logically. He says that is an award that we ought to submit to; that it is a legal award; that if the proposal was made, he thought that very many of the Opposition would have accepted it. Perhaps I may be mistaken, but that is how I understood the hon. member—that if the award is not a legal or binding one, he was perfectly willing, as were also his friends, to leave that question to be considered by a Court, and that it should be the first question to settle, and if disposed of it would have been a settlement of all the difficulty between the two contending parties—Ontario and the Dominion; that if that proposal was first submitted and the decision was found to be legally binding, that it should be considered an end of the question, but if not legal and binding, then the Court should find what was the true and legal boundary. I may be mistaken as to the time—perhaps he said it would not possibly be entertained now; but that if the proposition had been made a certain time ago there was not the slightest doubt it would have been accepted. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to prove that the award is perfectly binding and that it was a perfect award; that it was submitted to properly by the contending parties; that the Dominion Government, or the Crown, had perfect power to submit the question to arbitration, as had also the Ontario Government. He finds it requisite to prove that the Crown has the power of parting with territory in the Dominion, the same power being required to decide what the true boundary or lines between two different countries are as to part with a portion of the territory. He stated that the Crown had exercised several times in Great Britain the power of parting with territory without the consent of the Imperial Parliament, and he adduced several cases to prove that proposition. I admit that several learned and eminent lawyers in Great Britain have held that that position is right. Indeed, Lord Thurlow has held that it is the prerogative of the Crown to cede territory without the consent of Parliament. The opposite doctrine was held by Lord Loughborough and by several of the most eminent legal authorities in Great Britain—that even the Imperial Crown has not the power of parting with any territory without the consent of Parliament. At least it is a moot point whether the Crown in Great Britain has the power or not. The hon. gentlemen proceeded to argue, that not only the Crown in Great Britain had power to do so, but the Crown in the different Colonies. He was prepared also to cite twenty-three or more cases in India where the Crown had parted with possessions belonging to the British Empire, and that it was held in England that the Crown could do so. I deny that a single case can be cited of the Crown parting with any property in India without the sanction of the Imperial Parliament, or that it had the power to do so. I will cite the case which, perhaps, the hon. gentleman was looking at. It is a judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Deoram Kanji, plaintiff, and Damodhar Gordhan, defendant. It was held in appeal from the High Court of Judicature, at Bombay:

“That the transfer of British territories from ordinary British jurisdiction to the supervision, laws and regulations of a political agency, by excluding such territories from the British regulations and codes theretofore in force therein, and from the jurisdiction of all British Courts theretofore in force therein, and from the jurisdiction theretofore established therein, with a view to a substitution of a native jurisdiction under British control, cannot be made without a Legislative Act. Such a transfer of jurisdiction, even if valid, would not amount to a cession of British territory to a native State, nor would it deprive the Crown of its territorial rights over the transfer districts, or the persons residents therein of their rights as British subjects.”

It has been held in this case that when the Crown has once exercised jurisdiction over a place—when they have passed Acts affecting that territory, when the people have become British subjects—that the power the Crown cannot deprive those subjects of their allegiance without the consent of Parliament. No central authority, no Governor of a colony or province can deprive any British subject of his allegiance to the Crown, except by Imperial enactment.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman has misapprehended my line of argument. My statement was not that the Crown as represented by a Governor General has the power of the Crown in England; but my contention was that the relation between the Crown and Parliament in Great Britain was exactly the same as the relation between the Crown and Parliament in this country. But I refer my hon. friend to the case of the cession of that part of the Province of Quebec included in the Quebec Act, south of the lakes, which took place without the sanction of Parliament, by the Act of the Crown.

Mr. HAGGART. I contend that the Crown has no power in any colony to take any one part of a Province and add it to any other. I remember, when the hon. gentleman was making his arguments, that he was interrupted by the leader of the Government and asked, could the Crown part with a portion of Ontario and give it to the United States, when he denied, of course, that proposition.

Mr. MILLS. I know the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me. I told the right hon. gentleman I would answer him later, but he left the House before I came to that particular part of the subject.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand the scope of the hon. gentleman's observations. He says the Crown in Canada has the same power in relation to Parliament that the Crown in England possesses, and he argues that the Crown can part with British territory without the consent of Parliament. I deny that the Crown in Canada can part, alter or change any part of a Province without the consent of the Legislature. I deny further, that without the consent of the Local Legislature, and without the consent of the Dominion Legislature, the Dominion Government can alter or amend the limits of any Province in the Dominion; and I hold that when there is a dispute between any of the Provinces, that the only power capable of altering or amending the bounds of any Province in the Dominion, is the Imperial Government. Lacking an agreement between these two parties, the only course to be taken to secure a settlement of the boundary between one Province and another, is to get a judicial decision. My argument is that there is no power in this country that can submit to any arbitration, the finding out of what is the boundary between one Province and another; that that power exists only by mutual legislation of the Provinces interested. If they do not agree, it can only be done by the Courts or Imperial legislation.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Why don't they fix it by legislation?

Mr. HAGGART. I say the Ontario Government may fix it by legislation, with the consent of the Dominion Government.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Why do not they do it?

Mr. HAGGART. I suppose they cannot arrive at what is the true and legal boundary between the two countries, that there is a difference of opinion between them, and my contention is that there was no legal submission to the award of the arbitrators, and that there is only one power in this country that has a right to change the boundaries, and that is the Governments of the two countries interested. I may now go on to state what I consider is the true boundary of the Province. I do not think there is the slightest doubt about it. I think, when it is left to the Supreme Court or the Privy Council, there will be no difficulty in arriving at it, and that it will not be such a boundary as the arbitrators have awarded. In connection with that, I may answer the hon. member for South Huron, who says the people of Ontario will rise in their might and see that justice is done to them in the premises, or, if not, that they will punish the party on this side of the House. The people on this side of the House who represent Ontario are as much interested in her welfare and as able to look after her interests as the hon. gentlemen opposite. They are just as responsible to the people, and they will see that every inch of territory, every foot to which she is legally and justly entitled, she shall have. All we want is justice, all we want is an honest and legal decision of what the Provincial boundaries are, and that we will have and we want no more. Now, there is no doubt in my mind as to what the western boundary of the Province is, where the point to start from is the junction of the Ohio and the Mississippi. It says: "Along the Ohio and the Mississippi and northward;" and taking all the circumstances into consideration I do not think there is any doubt as to what the intention of the Legislature was. The intention of the Act of 1774, as was well observed by my hon. friend opposite, was for the purpose of providing some form of Government for the French inhabitants, of whom there were a large number on the banks of the Mississippi, and it would be absurd to suppose that they intended to leave out that small wedge portion which would be caused by a line due north between there and the Mississippi River without any form of Government, especially as on the other side of the River Louisiana was in the possession of a foreign country. It was the evident intention of the Legislature in that Act that Quebec should extend at least as far over as the Mississippi River, and the Act as introduced into the Imperial Parliament mentioned it specifically. It is said, "along the bank of the Mississippi northward," and in all the debates on the question. The Bill passed was changed at the instance of Mr. Burke, who represented New York at the time, not for the purpose of affecting the western boundary, and the evident intention of the Legislature was to follow the bank of the Mississippi to the Hudson's Bay Territory.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH.—Does the award give too much or too little.

Mr. HAGGART. I am going to define what I think it ought to give. My opinion is it should follow the bank of the Mississippi northward to the height of land, that is the dividing land between the Hudson Bay Territory and the Province of Ontario. I think there is not the slightest doubt that that was the intention. A legal gentleman may interpret "and northward" to mean due north, but the instructions to the Lieutenant Governor afterwards in the same year, shows what evidently was the intention of the parties who introduced the Act into the Imperial Parliament. They said "and along the banks of the Mississippi northward." Then when we find what was the dividing land between Hudson Bay Territory and Quebec, we see that the Hudson Bay Company always claimed to the height of land. It is true that after the treaty of Ryswich they were content to take the Albany River. They proposed to the French Authorities that the Albany River should be the dividing line between them, but you must remember the country then was conquered by the French and was in their possession, but after the Treaty of Utrecht it was restored to the British, and you will see in the correspondence between the Hudson Bay Company and the Imperial authorities that the Imperial authorities were thanked for looking after their interest, and for restoring St. James' Bay and the territory adjoining it, and how they proposed in two or three years afterwards, as there was some difficulty as to what was the exact dividing line between the Hudson Bay Territory and the Province of Quebec, that the line of the 49th parallel should be the dividing line.

Mr. MILLS. That was after the treaty of Utrecht.

Mr. HAGGART. Three or four years after. It shows that after the Treaty of Utrecht, the British Government gave back again to the Hudson's Bay Company the territory which they were deprived of by the Treaty of Ryswick, that they occupied it and owned it, and that they claimed from the Imperial authorities that the dividing line between the two parties should be the parallel of 49, being as near as possible to the north of Lake Temiscaming, the dividing line, or the Height of Land between the Hudson's Bay territory and the Province of Ontario. It is the line which they suggested in the statement of their case to Earl Grey, who submitted it as late as 1849 to the law officers of the Crown, and the law officers of the Crown decided that the Hudson's Bay Company were entitled to the possession of the country from Hudson's Bay to the Height of Land. There is no dispute about that. It was always claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company—that portion of the country bordering the rivers which flowed into the Hudson's Bay to their source. There is no single argument to justify the decision of the arbitrators who say the Province of Ontario extended from Lake Temiscaming up to James' Bay, then following James' Bay up to the Albany River. Surely, the Hudson's Bay Company were entitled to the shores of the Hudson's Bay? Surely, they were entitled to it after the peace of Utrecht, when the fortresses taken from the French on this Bay were redelivered to them, and when they were repaid by the Imperial authorities a certain sum of money for the losses they had incurred after the Treaty of Ryswich, for certain properties taken from them by the French, and, that there is not the slightest doubt, if they owned any territory at all, they owned that portion of Hudson's Bay and of James' Bay which extends along the shores of Albany river to the south of James' Bay. The contention of the hon. gentleman is that in the Act of 1791, which made a dividing line between the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada it extended the country to Hudson's Bay. It does not mean anything of the kind. It describes it as the boundary line drawn north of Lake Temiscaming to the boundary line of Hudson Bay. That surely does not mean that it extends the country to Hudson Bay. The instructions to Governors for two or three years afterwards followed the same line. I admit that in the instructions to later Governors it said "to Hudson's Bay;" but no instructions to any Governor would convey property from the Hudson's Bay Company to other parties; the Act was merely for the purpose of dividing the two Provinces—Ontario and Quebec. I think there is not the slightest doubt as to what will be found to be the true boundaries of Ontario. The only point which will be in dispute, will be whether you follow the bank of the Mississippi northward to the point of junction with the Ohio, or whether you take a due north line. The other part of the boundary will be decided to be the height of land between the two countries. What is the territory about which all this quarrel has arisen? It is a portion of land near English River and Rat Portage, the distance not being more than 67½ miles. In regard to that strip of territory, the hon. member for Lambton said it was not worth the annuities paid to the Indians in that territory. The proper manner of deciding this question is by the mode proposed. There is no power possessed by the Governor or anyone else in this country to change the boundaries of a province or of the Dominion; we will not, to use the language of the leader of the Opposition, submit even to the Imperial authorities parting with any portion of our territories without the assent of the people of this country. We will allow no alteration or limitation of the Provinces by the Governor in Council. Any alteration to be made hereafter must be made with the consent of the Province interested and with the consent of Parliament, and failing an agreement between the parties there is only one true and proper course to adopt in order to ascertain the proper boundaries of any Province or of Canada, namely, to submit the question to parties who will enquire carefully and legally into it and decide upon the legal merits of the case. We in Ontario want nothing more than that; we want every inch of territory to which the Province is entitled, and we will have it; but we do not desire any more territory than was given to it by the British North America Act.

Mr. WELDON. Being one of the minority which dissented from the report of the Committee on Ontario boundaries, I desire to state why I so dissented and at the same time I wish to express my views as a member from the Maritime Provinces. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton), said he would approach the matter in a calm and judicial spirit as was the duty of hon. members, but while I agree with his theory I certainly do not think he carried it into practice, because if he had dealt with it in a judicial spirit and with his legal acumen he would have arrived at the same conclusion as is reached by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The question before the House has two aspects. First in regard to the award made on the 3rd of August, 1878, by the Arbitrators agreed upon by the Dominion and the Province of Ontario, and if that award were properly made it is binding upon the Dominion, both legally and morally. Second, assuming that the question arises whether under the law and facts the decision of the arbitrators is not applicable to the facts and circumstances of the case and according to the law and the true and proper construction of the Quebec Act, 1774. First, as to the award made by the arbitrators; a primary question which arises is whether the Government had power to pass an Order in Council referring the matter to arbitrators. This power, I contend, is vested in the Executive Government of the Dominion. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) held that under the B.N.A. Act, the boundaries being fixed by that Statute, they would not be altered except by legislation. I agree with that point; but the answer to the hon. member's argument is that this arbitration was not to change and alter the boundaries of Ontario, not to create new boundaries which never before existed, but to define the boundaries fixed by the Quebec Act of 1774, that power is simply the same power which is vested in the Crown, which has been so exhaustively stated and commented on by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and it is precisely the same power which was exercised by the Crown in dealing with questions of boundary. The San Juan boundary was referred to the Emperor of Germany. The New Brunswick boundary question was submitted to the King of the Netherlands, and although the award was not assented to by the United States, it was not on the ground that the Crown had no right to refer the matter to the King of the Netherlands, but that one of the principal points had not been dealt with. When a final decision was arrived at with respect to the Ashburton Treaty, to which we assented, although great injustice was done to the people of New Brunswick, an agreement between Lord Ashburton and Mr. Webster was arrived at by which the Province was deprived of a large portion of its territory. The honorable member for Lanark contended that in order to change the boundaries we would require to obtain Imperial legislation; but Imperial legislation had, to a certain extent, been given to the Dominion and provinces by the Act of 1871, by which the Dominion, with the consent of any province could change its boundaries. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) seemed to argue that this would only apply to new provinces, not to old provinces, because it was general legislation. I dispute the proposition laid down by the hon. gentleman, and hold that the legislation was not general, but specific, and that power is given by the Imperial Parliament to the Dominion Parliament, to change and alter the boundaries of any portion of the Dominion. But it is not necessary in this case, because we take up the Order in Council on which the arbitration was founded, and we find it was to ascertain the legal boundaries of Ontario, not to create a new boundary, but to fix the boundaries between Ontario and territory claimed by the Dominion. The hon. member for Lanark declared that the Executive Government had not the power to submit the subject to arbitration, and that legislation would be necessary before such an arbitration would be made. I admit that after an award has been made, after the parties have agreed to be bound by quasi-judicial decision—not binding as that of a Court of Justice—it will require legislation in order to carry it out; but it is within the power of the Executive Government of the Dominion and of each of the Provinces to refer questions to arbitration, and that being done by them it was binding on their successors in office as are acts done by the Crown on the advice of responsible Ministers. Hon. members are aware that for many years the line run by the Act of 1774, which divided Nova Scotia from Lower Canada, came in question. The dispute occasioned vast trouble and difficulty not only between the two Provinces. That formed a subject of deliberation in the two Houses of Old Canada, culminating in an address to Her Majesty with a view to having the dispute settled; and finally in 1850 it was suggested by Lord Grey that the boundaries should be left to arbitration as boundaries under the Act of 1774. As the result of Lord Grey's despatch on the 30th September, 1850, a Minute of Council was passed under which the Governor General (Lord Elgin) referred the dispute to arbitration. By that reference two of the arbitrators might be laymen, while the third was either to occupy a judicial position or be a barrister of a certain number of years' standing. Under that Minute of Council arbitrators were appointed. And the award was made defining the boundaries of New Brunswick at the time. Be it remembered, that that province was an independent province, with the constitution which it enjoys to-day, and subject to the Federal power as at the present moment. The award was made by two of the arbitrators, and an Act was passed by the Governor—not by and with the advice of the Legislature—but by and with the advice of his Council, declaring the boundaries of New Brunswick to be those described in the award. And not only so, but we find that this was done under the same Act that is in question in the present case, viz., the Act of 1774. The despatch from the Dominion Government to the Government of Ontario, says:

“9 His Excellency's advisers are of opinion that in advance of Parliamentary sanction, it was not only highly inexpedient, but transcended the power of the Government of the day to refer to arbitration the question of the extent of the North-West Territories acquired by the Dominion by purchase from the Hudson's Bay Company.”

This is an assertion that the Act of the Government of that day was illegal; that they had no power to refer, and that, therefore, the award is invalid. If that view is in accordance with sound constitutional principles, why do hon. gentlemen opposite hesitate to refer the question on that ground. If the Privy Council or whatever tribunal they might choose, should decide that their arbitration was valid, then the question would be as to whether the award could be sustained. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the award was a conventional one, but apparently the only reason they have for saying so is that they do not agree with it, just as the lawyer against whom a judge may decide imagines that the judgment is not a sound one. But his opinion does not alter the law or the facts. The evidence in the present case seems fully to justify the award, and the arbitrators declare that they did not agree upon a conventional boundary but that they discovered and laid down the line under the Act. With regard to the action of the Parliament of Ontario, it is said that because they passed an Act in 1879 under the authority of the Imperial Act, therefore the boundary is only a constitutional one. It might well be argued on behalf of the Parliament of Ontario that, seeing that difficulties might arise, and in order to prevent the matter being called in question, they passed an Act to confirm and carry out the principle and put the question at rest. But it does not follow that because they did so they do not necessarily abandon the position that the award was binding, and it may be regarded simply as a matter of precaution, just precisely as a man who disputes a claim may assent to an arrangement, not because he admits the claim but to set it at rest and to prevent it being called on again for settlement. Then, it is asserted that the award covers part of the Crown colony of Assiniboia, and with regard to that it appears to me that the only ground upon which that argument rests is because this colony was recognized by the sending up of a requirement of rifles there to defend certain claims on the part of Lord Selkirk and the Hudson's Bay Company. I contend that no act of the Hudson's Bay Company or of Lord Selkirk, or of any person acting under them, can destroy or override the Act of 1774, or the rights which Quebec and its successor, Ontario, acquired under that Act. Now, if there is nothing to show that these arbitrators selected, not a conventional line, but what they believed to be the true and legal line, then it is for the other side to show that they exceeded their authority in any shape. Even if the award is erroneous, yet in law the parties are held to be bound by it. This award having been made in pursuance, as I contend, of the proper authority, on what grounds can it be set aside? I contend that the same principle that applies to an award in common law is applicable to this case. The only grounds on which an award can be set aside are corruption or irregularity on the part of the arbitrators. Now, I assume that no hon. gentleman will accuse any gentleman who sat on that award of anything of that kind. It is true the hon. member for East York tried to insinuate that by the hurried manner in which they considered the arguments, they could not have considered the matter, and therefore it was not a proper judgment; but I can refer to many of the ablest, most learned and most lucid judgments delivered on the English Bench, which have been delivered immediately after the arguments. But we find that the documents were printed, and all the documentary evidence was laid before the arbitrators, and they had the opportunity of thoroughly working up and investigating the subject beforehand, so that when they came to hear the arguments they had a perfect acquaintance with the subject, and the counsel on both sides were also familiar with it. Any one who reads the arguments of the counsel for the Dominion will find that they argued the question from their point of view as ably as any counsel could do it; and Mr. Justice Armour himself says that both personally and in writing he had given to Mr. McMahon, one of the counsel for the Dominion, points in the case. It may be said that the majority of these arbitrators were laymen; but we find that one of them was one of the ablest lawyers that ever presided on the Ontario Bench, and that of the other two, one was Her Majesty's representative at the American Court, a man standing high in the esteem of the English people and conversant with their diplomatic relations, and the other was Sir Francis Hincks who is well known in the Dominion. If hon. gentlemen opposite are so confident that the evidence shows that the award was not made according to the submission, and that the line fixed was a conventional line and not a legal line, why do they not refer that point? Hon. gentlemen talk of referring it to the Supreme Court or the Privy Council as a case. They can only refer it as an arbitration; they cannot refer it as a case unless it comes through a law Court and is appealed to the Supreme Court or the Privy Council. When we apply to the Privy Council, we have to apply to Her Majesty in Council, who appoints a committee, which is to report to her, and she then exercises judicial functions. The committee is still a committee, and its report is only binding on parties when it is confirmed by Her Majesty in Council; and whether that report is unanimous or not is not allowed to be known; whether the Court decides by a majority merely, or by the unanimous vote, is not divulged to the public. When the dispute between Canada and the Hudson's Bay Company was proposed to be referred to the Privy Council, what did Lord Westbury and Sir Henry Keating say? Speaking of the northern boundary between Hudson's Bay and Canada, they say:

“Under these circumstances we cannot but feel that the important question of the boundaries of the Hudson's Bay Company might, with great utility, as between the Company and Canada, be made the subject of a quasi-judicial enquiry. But this cannot be done except by the consent of both parties, namely, Canada and the Hudson's Bay Company; nor would the decision of a Committee of the Privy Council have any effect as a binding judicial determination.”

When my hon. friend spoke of its being a judicial decision, what guarantee, if this case should be referred to the Privy Council, have we that the present First Minister will hold this House bound by it?

“But if the Hudson's Bay Company agree to the proposal of the Chief Justice of Canada, that the question of the boundaries should be referred to the Privy Council, it being further understood by both parties that the determination of the Council shall be carried into effect by a declaratory Act of Parliament, we think the proceeding would be the best mode of determining that which is, or ought to be, the only real subject of controversy.”

It is within the power of the Executive to make preliminary arrangements, and then an Act of Parliament is necessary.

“The form of procedure might be a petition to the Queen by Chief Justice Draper, describing himself as acting under the direction of the Executive Council of Canada, unless which would be the more solemn mode.”

Now, what I say is this, that so far as this award is concerned, it was agreed to by the Dominion Government, and the arbitrators named; and we find that the arbitrator named by the Dominion, Mr. Wilmot, was a man well known for his integrity and the high position he held, and who, had not death suddenly cut him off, would have probably agreed with the other arbitrators. Hon. gentlemen opposite say there is no feeling in Ontario. We, from the Lower Provinces, are not in a position to form personally an opinion, but we have to take the opinion expressed by the Ontario representatives in Parliament, and if they are right in their contention that that award is not valid, why not have that point first decided; but in order that it be effectually adjudicated on, it must be by agreement. Whatever might be the result of the adjudication, the consent and agreement of the parties would still be necessary to carry it into effect. With regard to the arbitrators, it has not been fairly and squarely stated that they were not fit men, but it has been insinuated that by their haste they were not able to form a correct judgment and not properly examined the question. The hon. leader of the Government in 1875, on this subject, expressed his satisfaction with the way the arbitrators performed their duties. That is the best evidence in their favor. Viewed in its legal aspect and by the light of authority, it is clear the Executive had the power to refer the question to arbitration. Having that power, and having exercised it in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, I say that the Dominion, even if the reference were illegal, is bound in good faith to carry out the award made by those gentlemen. With regard to the other question as to whether the award is in accordance with the facts and law, I quite agree with the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe that the question is one of law and fact, and so far as I can see, the western boundary is a matter of law, and the northern a question of fact—both submitted to this arbitration and both in its competence to decide. It is not necessary for me to detain the House by dealing at length with the Quebec Act. The great object was to preserve the boundaries of the colonies, and after the Act was passed and altered a proviso was added that "nothing herein contained shall affect the boundaries of the other colonies." We find the words: "to the banks of the Mississippi," and the word "northward" used—a word which is susceptible of two meanings. If the words "due north" had been used there could be no misconception, and we may fairly claim that the framer, if he wanted a line due north, would not have used an ambiguous term, and if a term is susceptible of two meanings we have to ascertain what was the meaning intended by the framer. The object of this Act was to extend to the possessions newly ceded to Great Britain, preserve to them their laws and religion, and extend the ægis of the British Government over them. There were settlements on the Mississippi at that time, and a large region was without any protection in law, while on the other side was the territory of Louisiana, owned by a foreign power. The Mississippi was the natural boundary of the British possessions, and if we apply the principle referred to by the member for South Huron, and laid down by the United States Courts in a number of cases concerning the boundaries of States, where good, natural boundaries are established in general terms, the great object ought not to be defeated by those things that may sometimes influence the relations of individuals. There was enough to show, under the circumstances of the Act, that the words due north would not be applicable to the circumstances of the case, or cover the meaning of the Act contended for. We find this Act was passed in the summer of 1774, and in the following December the Commission of Sir Guy Carleton was issued—the finding of the boundaries of Quebec to be along the Mississippi northward. The member for Richmond and Wolfe argued that the word northward means due north. I differ with him, as I believe that the exact meaning of the word depends upon the context. I think I am not alone in my opinion, as I can show from the evidence of Justice Armour, who was appointed by the Dominion to deal with this question, and whose opinion would naturally be in favor of the views of the appointing power. I might also quote the views of the member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) and Chief Justice Draper. The question was put by Mr. Robertson, with reference to the height of land being the boundary—on the north as well as on the west? The answer was, yes; on the north as well as on the west. I refer to the Quebec Act, for the reason it speaks of a line drawn northward, and northward means due north if there is nothing to qualify it in the context. My own view is, that northward was applicable to the territory, and not to a boundary line; that is, that northward was intended to express that the territory then to be erected into the Province of Quebec was to be extended northward to the southern boundary of Hudson's Bay Territory. That is my view. Of course, there is legal authority against that in the judgment which has been given. That is a reference to the Reinhardt case; but, as pointed out by the member for South Huron, that case can hardly be cited as an authority, as it came up on a technicality. But there is a most important fact so far as this case goes, that the action of the Imperial authorities affords strong evidence that there was some flaw in the conviction, the crime being regarded as possessing more the character of manslaughter, the sentence would have been commuted, and the punishment ordered as for some lesser offence; but we find the prisoner was discharged. The law officers of the Crown were of the opinion that the construction put upon the Quebec Act by the Judges was wrong. Then we have the opinion of Judge Armour, Judge Draper and the member for Halton against this decision, which culminated in nothing, because the sentence was never executed upon Reinhardt. So far as the legal question is concerned it seems to me, from the principle of construction which applies to instruments of this kind, that the word northward, either taking the object of the Act or the circumstances under which it was made, and the contemporaneous documents, was a conventional word, and that the territory of Quebec extended to the Mississippi; and that the northern boundary, which is described as the Hudson's Bay, is the territory possessed by the Hudson Bay Company, when their charter was granted in 1670. We find that in 1690, by the Statute of the second William and Mary they got an Act confirming their rights, which was only enforced for seven years, and which, I believe, was never asked to be renewed by the Hudson Bay Company. There is an important provision in that charter. We know that at that time charters were given with an utter disregard either to the companies or the limits of their possessions, and that many of the territories granted such companies, extended to immense distances; and one famous case, the Warnocke charter, affecting an island of the American coast, near New York, a charter was granted for a territory extending to the Pacific Ocean. Now, I contend that the Treaties of Ryswick and Utrecht recognized that the French, at that time, were in possession of certain portions of the territory which were covered by the charter of the Hudson Bay Company. With regard to the construction of that, I turn to the opinion of Justice Holroyd in 1812, who said:

"I am not aware of any objection that appears to me to be a valid one to the grant of the soil contained in the charter. I think the grant will include all the countries the waters of which run into Hudson's Bay, as ascertained by geographical observation, that were not at the time of the charter actually possessed by the subjects of any foreign Prince and which have not been possessed of any foreign trade previous to actual or virtual possession thereof being taken under the charter, or by or on behalf of the Crown of England."

Then we find, lastly, that the law officers of the Crown, Mr. Bethel and Mr. Keating, state:

"The remaining subject for consideration is the question of the geographical extent of the territory granted by the charter, and whether its boundaries can in any and in what manner be ascertained. In the case of grants of considerable age, such as this charter, when the words, as is often the case, are indefinite or ambiguous, the rule is that they are construed by usage and enjoyment, including in these latter term the assertion of ownership by the Company on important public occasions, such as the Treaties of Ryswick and Utrecht, and again in 1760. To these elements of consideration must be added the enquiry (as suggested by the following words of the charter, viz.: 'Not possessed by the subjects of any other Christian Prince or State), whether, at the time of the charter, any part of the territory now claimed by the Hudson Bay Company could have been rightfully claimed by the French as falling within the boundaries of Canada or Nouvelle France, and also the effect of the Acts of Parliament passed in 1774 and 1791."

Now, there is an important question of fact, whether the French were in possession of any portion of the territory of the Hudson Bay Company covered by the charter, or whether the subjects of any foreign Prince were in possession of that country. The subject has been thoroughly exhausted by the hon. member for Bothwell, who pointed out the early adventures of the French in that country. It is a pure question of fact, and in Court would have been within the province of a jury and not within the province of a Judge, to ascertain whether it was true that the French had been in possession of a portion of that territory. If that is a fact then quoad that portion of the Hudson Bay territory is clearly without the charter. The proposition contended for by Ontario is that up to and prior to 1670 the French were in possession of the territory up to the Albany River, and looking at that fact in connection with the proclamation with respect to the division of Upper and Lower Canada, I think they are justified in contending for that boundary. The three distinguished gentlemen to whom this question was referred, came to a similar decision after having examined all the facts and having access to all the documents. I think we cannot now interfere with their award. In Courts of Justice we have often heard Judges say that if they had been on the jury they would have given a different verdict to that which was rendered, but no Judge has ever ventured on that ground to disturb the verdict. Now, these arbitrators were a tribunal peculiarly competent to form an opinion of the fact upon the evidence before them, and certainly the evidence of Mr. Dawson, especially, clearly shows that the French were in possession of the Hudson Bay Territory—certainly up to the Albany River—prior to 1670. I think our honor as a nation is involved in carrying out this award in its integrity, no matter at what cost. In the Maritime Provinces we are not anxious that Ontario should be extended, and we do feel some little jealousy and alarm at the extension of the western country. We do not consent to the extension of the boundary of any Province unless justice requires it, but when justice does require it we will not shrink from giving our consent in order that the national honor shall be upheld.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. I do not propose, at this late hour, to enter into the question in detail, as it has been sufficiently discussed to enable the House to arrive at a conclusion; I wish to say only a few words in respect to the very unhappy observations made by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). In some portions of his speech he committed political blunders, if not political crimes. He sought to prove in this House, as the only French Canadian who is willing to watch unpleasantly the advance of Ontario, and he sought to make it appear that Quebec Conservatives are always sorry to see Ontario obtain a good decision in its favor to become rich. I can perfectly well understand the feeling of the Ontario Grits—a feeling of which I have been the victim during the last Session of the Local House. One member of Mr. Mowat's Government thought proper, without having seen me, to attack me brutally in the House. When I first heard of that attack I wanted to know why I had been made the subject of it. I thought I had committed some crime; that I had been unfair to Ontario; but I ascertained that my only offence was that I was a French lawyer and a Conservative, and that Minister used towards me language which was more worthy of a common loafer than a gentleman, still less a member of the Government. We must not be astonished that, when people treat us in that way when they do not know us, the hon. member for Quebec East, especially in the last portion of his speech, endeavored to make the House and the country believe we must have great courage to defend Ontario and defend the award which was made by the arbitrators on the 3rd August, 1878. We do not deserve such treatment at the hon. gentleman's hand, because he has always been well treated by us. The hon. gentleman has gone further and intimated that we had not followed in the footsteps of Sir George Cartier. Within two or three years we shall have the hon. member calling Sir George Cartier his lamented leader. During the whole life of that distinguished statesman he was assailed and hounded down by hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1872, at the time of the famous election, when he was defeated in Montreal East, we saw Liberals uniting with Programmists in order to crush him, and now, when he is dead, they come forward and say he was a great man, and perhaps the hon. gentlemen opposite will finish by calling Sir George Cartier their late leader. I think it is proper to put an end to such hypocrisy, for I cannot call it anything else. The hon. member for Quebec East sought to make the House and our opponents in Ontario believe that we were against that award because it would benefit Ontario. Before proceeding to offer some observations in regard to the award itself, permit me to look back to the past and see under what circumstances it was thrown to the public just on the eve of a general election. During five years those hon. gentlemen had been in power, they might have passed an Act of Parliament which might have made the award legal and constitutional. They neglected their duty, but when they appealed to the people they took credit for the award and called upon Ontario to say how much good had been done by the Government. This was one of the first circumstances which gave the award a bad character and inspired doubt in all the Provinces. Under those conditions it was impossible for any Government to maintain the validity of the award. There were other circumstances which showed that the Mackenzie Government had neglected their duty on this important question, and that they had forgotten they were charged with the protection of all the Provinces of the Dominion, and not of only one Province. The case put in, and the pleas and arguments advanced by those representing the Government, were entirely insufficient. In fact, there was almost nothing done; whilst, on the other hand, the Conservative Government had published very important documents and pamphlets on the subject, one of them being by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who has, as everybody knows, a great capacity for the work, and who had been devoting attention to it for many years; so that when the question was submitted to the arbitrators, the Dominion Government were not virtually represented. I say this because those representing this Government entered the case too late and had not time to devote the necessary attention to the subject, and especially the study necessary to meet the case presented by the hon. member for Bothwell. One of the counsel, a friend of mine, Mr. Monk, was retained almost at the last hour, and certainly only a few days before going before the arbitrators. These are some of the circumstances which induced the Government not to maintain that award. The hon. gentleman opposite himself gave up the whole case, when he acknowledged that the reference was irregular because it was not made with the sanction of Parliament, and he admitted that fact.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Who admitted that?

Mr. MOUSSEAU. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier).

Mr. MACKENZIE. Nothing of the sort.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. He said that an Act was not necessary, because Parliament had sanctioned and recognized the reference by voting $15,000 for the expenses of the arbitration. That is equivalent to saying that the Government or Parliament intended to pass a law; but hon. members will notice that for some reason or other hon. gentlemen forgot to pass a law. Would it have been maintained by anybody that the mere voting of money to defray the expenses of the arbitration would be equivalent to passing the law? Mr. Speaker, here is the award rendered by the arbitrators, Robert A. Harrison, Edward Thornton, and F. Hincks. I may say, in the first place, that I profess for these gentlemen the greatest respect, and that I do not attribute to them the responsibility of the fact that their award does not command the respect and the prestige which it should command. The responsibility lies upon other parties whom it is not necessary to mention. Here is the award:

"To all to whom these presents shall come:

"The undersigned having been appointed by the Governments of Canada and Ontario as Arbitrators to Determine the Northernly and Westernly Boundaries of the Province of Ontario, do hereby Determine and Decide that the following are and shall be such Boundaries; that is to say:—

"Commencing at a point on the southern shore of Hudson Bay, commonly called James' Bay, where a line produced due north from the head of Lake Temiscaming, would strike the said south shore; thence along the said south shore westerly to the mouth of the Albany River; thence up the middle of the said Albany River, and of the lakes thereon, to the source of the said river at the head of Lake St. Joseph; thence by the nearest line to the easterly end of Lac Seul, being the head waters of the English River; thence westerly through the middle of Lac Seul, and the said English River to a point where the same will be intersected by a true meridional line drawn northerly from the International Monument placed to mark the most north-westerly angle of the Lake of the Woods by the recent Boundary Commission: and thence due south, following the said meridional line to the said International Monument; thence southerly and easterly, following upon the International Boundary Line, between the British Possessions and the United States of America, into Lake Superior.

"But if a true meridional line drawn northerly from the said International Boundary at the said most north-westerly angle of the Lake of the Woods, shall be found to pass to the west of where the English River empties into the Winnipeg River, then, and in such case, the northerly boundary of Ontario shall continue down the middle of the said English River to where the same empties into the Winnipeg River, and shall continue thence on a line drawn due west from the confluence of the said English River with the said Winnipeg River, until the same will intersect the meridian above described, and thence due south, following the said meridional line to the said International Monument; thence southerly and easterly, following upon the International Boundary Line, between the British Possessions and the United States of America, into Lake Superior.

The date upon which the award was made is exactly thirteen days before the issue of the writs for the general elections of 1878. It is sufficient merely to read this document to see how the award arrived at was made. It shows that those who had to deal with the subject had not devoted to it that time and study which is necessary in order that their decisions may command the respect which such decisions should always command. We must not forget that there are seven or eight provinces in this Dominion, that the greatest, most powerful and richest is the Province of Ontario, and that the others are much smaller than that Province. That is no reason why justice should not be rendered to Ontario, because Ontario is not only a rich province, but it has a splendid population—a population who are intelligent and respectable and especially well educated—a population who carry out responsible institutions, better perhaps, than any other country in the world. They are generous, rich and prosperous, and though the people of the other Provinces do not envy them, they certainly admire and try to imitate them; but in certain circumstances you must understand that the Government, which is the Government of the whole Dominion, should see that when a dispute or quarrel is to be settled amongst the Provinces of the Dominion, or between a Province and the Dominion, it should be settled in such a way and under such circumstances as would command the respect of even the losing party. That is one consideration which induced the Government not to accept the award of the arbitrators. It did not command the respect which it should have commanded, and it was appointed by those who wanted a decision before the general elections. That explains the whole matter. They had to decide speedily, so that they could go before the public, and especially the public of Ontario, and show how careful they were to attend to their interests. Well, this award is entirely illegal; the questions the arbitrators had to consider were legal questions, and not at all questions of fact. One of them did admit that he tried to compromise; but before coming to such a compromise, before coming to an adjudication of the facts, there were most important legal questions to be adjudicated upon, which only legal minds of very great training and ability could grapple with. They had first to decide what should be their guide in determining boundary lines—whether the Statute of 1774, the proclamations of the various Governors, the commissions or the Confederation Act. Before the Committee appointed in 1880 several Judges were examined, and we saw that the chief difficulties of the arbitration would be legal points. The report of that Commission stated:

"In reference to the award made by the arbitrators on the 3rd day of August, 1878, your Committee are of opinion that it does not describe the true boundaries of Ontario. It seems to your Committee to be inconsistent with any boundary line ever suggested or proposed subsequent to the Treaty of Utrecht (1713). It makes the Provincial boundaries run into territory granted by royal charter, in 1670, to the Merchants Adventurers of England trading into Hudson's Bay, and it cuts through Indian Territories which, according to the Act 43rd George III, cap. 138, and 1-2 George IV, cap. 66, formed "no part of the Provinces of Lower Canada or Upper Canada, or either of them," and it carries the boundaries of Ontario within the limits of the former Colony of Assiniboia, which was not a part of Upper Canada."

The questions which those arbitrators ought to have studied, discussed, and solved, are precisely the questions stated by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal). Now, Sir, the hon. member for Quebec East says that the reasons against that award are frivolous. I would ask whether the reasons I give, and the reasons given by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulbee) and many others, are frivolous? I will go further and say that no hon. gentleman on the other side of the House answered those reasons, and no one declared that this award was regular, constitutional and legal.

Mr. LAURIER. I hope the House will bear with me while I answer some extraordinary charges which have fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. In speaking of the remarks I made he went so far as to say that they were characterized by hypocrisy and cowardice because I had anticipated that I would be attacked as we have already been attacked in the Province of Quebec by the press of hon. gentlemen for voting against the Committee of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson). When I spoke as I did I anticipated what would follow; I almost anticipated the speech of the hon. gentleman. I knew the language which had been used before, and in order to vindicate my remarks this evening I beg to quote from the Minerve of the 21st February, 1880.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. I object to that unless I am to be allowed to answer. I will quote from the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman in St. Hyacinthe in the local election.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will not escape from his position in this way. He said I had been inspired by hypocrisy and cowardice, because I said that when I voted on a previous occasion—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has already spoken. Of course the House will allow a personal explanation, but not another speech on the question under debate.

Mr. LAURIER. I think I have a right to make a personal explanation, and to refer to what is said in the press of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, what did I say?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LAURIER. I stated that we had been attacked in the press, and now I am prepared to show by quotations from the press of the hon. gentlemen opposite, that my remarks were perfectly justifiable. We were charged with sacrificing the interests of our Province in favor of Ontario.

Mr. VALLÉE raised the point of order that the hon. member had already spoken.

Mr. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. member was out of order.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). The line taken by the hon. Secretary of State and other hon. gentlemen on the other side is calculated to divert the attention of the people from the issue before them. The motion of the hon. member for Niagara does not put the issue before the country, as I understand it. The issue is whether the award made by the arbitrators should be ratified or not. The question put by the hon. member for Niagara is whether an appeal should be had from the decision of these arbitrators, either to the Supreme Court or the Privy Council. If I understand the sentiment of Ontario, as indicated by the public press or by the tone of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, the question which the people of Ontario will decide when they get an opportunity, is: Has this Government a right, under the agreement made by the previous Government, to submit this matter to arbitration after an arbitration was had and a decision given to set that award aside, or has it not? When we go to the polls, as we expect in a very short time, and the representatives or the candidates of the two parties meet before the people of Ontario on the different platforms, the question will, I think, assume the form in which I have put it; and I do not think the Liberal party of Ontario will allow hon. gentlemen opposite to cover their record under any such issue as they have attempted to raise. I will not allow them to put forth any such pretext at all. The Government had a perfect right to submit this matter to arbitration, and that arbitration had a perfect right to adjudicate upon it. What is the objection to that arbitration. Is it that the arbitrators were incompetent? Hon. gentlemen opposite have scarcely dared to raise that question, but the hon. Secretary of State has done what is a great deal worse than question the capacity of the arbitrators. He has questioned their honesty. He has as much as said that just on the eve of a general election these men gave what he called a "snap verdict"—a decision not on the true merits of the case, but one that would benefit the Government that appointed them. That insinuation is unworthy of the hon. gentleman and the Government of which he is a member, and if he is speaking with the authority of the Government, that Government has sunk lower than ever it did before. Hon. gentlemen have endeavored to cast discredit on the arbitration because the hon. member for Bothwell was a Minister of the Crown. Are we to cast discredit on the Orders in Council or the deliverance of the hon. Secretary of State, in opposition to the Ontario view, because he is a member of the present Government. I would suppose that, in his judicial capacity, as a member of the Government, he would give an opinion in accordance with the facts. The hon. member for Bothwell entertained decided views in regard to this question, but we have the statement of one of the arbitrators, Sir Francis Hincks, that he had no communication with the Government in regard to what decision he should give. He said:

"I have reason to think that it has been believed by some, that the award was the result of a compromise between the two Governments. For my own part, I never received the slightest intimation of the views of either Government, and I am convinced that neither of my colleagues did. All the documentary evidence, with the cases of counsel on both sides, were communicated to each arbitrator, and not a word was exchanged between them until after their meeting at Ottawa, when they found an entire concurrence of opinion on the points at issue."

There we have a distinct statement by one of the arbitrators that he had no communication with the Government or any member of the Government. How, therefore, can the hon. Secretary of State, or hon. member for Lanark, state, by implication, if not directly that the decision—

Mr. HAGGART. I stated it neither directly nor by imputation.

Mr. ROSS. I am, then, quoting the hon. gentleman incorrectly. It was, perhaps, the hon. member for East York. I know that two gentlemen on the other side intimated that the hon. member for Bothwell, being a paid agent for the Ontario Government, had considerable influence with that arbitration. One member of the arbitration has, at least, said that no member of the Government had any communication with any of the arbitrators. The award, therefore, cannot be questioned on that ground. On what ground can it be objected to? The case was discussed so fully that I fail to see on what ground any issue can be taken as to the validity or integrity or the honesty of the award made. There is another view of the question I wish to put forward, that is that the award, looking at it from an Ontario standpoint, is a very important one to that Province. It represents to that Province 100,000 square miles, an area that was estimated, at the last Session of the Ontario Legislature, to contain timber to the value of about $125,000,000. As it is a pine timber district, and the Crown lands are the property of the Ontario Government, these lands would yield a revenue to the Province of Ontario. Our timber lands last year yielded us a revenue of about $500,000, and the average revenue is in that neighborhood. Here we have a vast area that is tolerably well timbered, and which it is estimated would yield to the Province of Ontario a revenue of between $300,000 and $400,000 a year. It is connected with the Province of Manitoba by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and would certainly be a very valuable tract of land to that Province. Now, we have this Government, in the face of this award, refusing the Province of Ontario the revenues she would derive from these public lands. Are the hon. gentlemen prepared to say that the award of an arbitration appointed as this one was, composed of men of the highest character, and only arrived at after the greatest deliberation and care, is to be set aside, and the Province of Ontario to be deprived of these territories and the revenues that would accrue from them? Every time the people of Ontario will be asked to contribute from their exchequer for public purposes, they will feel their resources are limited—not crippled, I am happy to say—because of the action of hon. gentlemen opposite. In the line they are taking, the Government is acting up to the express views of their own friends in the Local Legislature. In 1881, Mr. Mowat moved the following resolution:—

"That this House deeply regret that, notwithstanding the unanimous award made on the 3rd August, 1878, by the arbitrators appointed by the joint and concurrent action of the Government of Canada and the Government of Ontario, to determine the north-westerly and westerly boundaries of the Province, no legislation has been submitted by the Government of Canada to the Dominion Parliament for the purpose of confirming that award, nor has the validity of the award yet been recognized by the Government of Canada.

"That the omission of the Government and Parliament of Canada to confirm the award is attended with grave inconvenience, has the effect of retarding settlement and municipal organization, embarrasses the administration of the laws, and interferes with the preservation of the peace, the maintenance of order, and the establishment of good Government in the northerly and north-westerly parts of the Province of Ontario.

"That it is the duty of the Government of Ontario to assert and maintain the just claims and rights of the Province of Ontario, as determined by the award of the arbitrators; and this House hereby reaffirms its determination to give its cordial support to the Government of Ontario in any steps it may be necessary to take to sustain the award, and to assert and maintain the just claims and rights of the Province as hereby declared and determined."

Now, that resolution is very specific, and it, was supported by every member, on a division, except one, the member for Ottawa. The vote stood 74 yeas and 1 nay; so that the representatives of Ontario, including Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, then felt it to be their duty to support the Government of Ontario, in asserting and maintaining the just claims and rights of the Province as determined by the arbitration. There then, we are at one with the Conservative party in Ontario, as to the rights and interests of that Province in this arbitration.

Mr. ORTON, I want to ask whether the legal boundary, if properly ascertained, might not possibly give Ontario a still larger territory?

Mr. ROSS. This is the legal boundary properly ascertained by three arbitrators appointed for that purpose, and the Conservative party in Ontario declared, by supporting this resolution, that they were prepared to assert and maintain that result. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will find a very strong opinion in his own county on that question. How did this change of base take place? Let hon. gentlemen opposite, at present so noisy, possess their souls in patience; it is only a month or six weeks, if report speaks truly, till they will have an opportunity of explaining their conduct before the electors. The Opposition in Ontario assisted the Mowat Administration in their contention until the large gathering that took place in Toronto last November, immediately after which there was a change of base—and why? Because I think it was found necessary, in the interest of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the Conservative party in the Province of Quebec should not be excited by the enlargement of Ontario. If hon. gentlemen opposite know a better reason, let them give it. Meantime, the leader of the Opposition in Toronto changed his base, as did the other Conservative members of the Local Legislature. I ask again, why? There must be some reason for it; they must have received instructions and felt the necessity of acting in Ontario with the Conservative party in the House of Commons. But I warn hon. gentlemen opposite, if they oppose the contention of Ontario, that she will be more aroused on this question, perhaps, than she has been on any other that has engaged the attention of people for years. Ontario entered Confederation loyally, expecting that her rights and interests would be protected in this instance. She has given the Confederation a loyal support from the first of July, 1867, down to the present. This seems to be the first time on which there was any apparent combination to deprive Ontario of her just rights; and I fear that it will have a serious effect on the public sympathy which Ontario has always extended to Confederation: I feel satisfied, further, that unless the rights of Ontario are respected in this instance, an agitation will arise that will not be satisfactory. I say most emphatically that unless Ontario's rights are respected, an agitation will arise that will not be satisfactory to those hon. gentlemen; and I am prepared, as a representative of Ontario, to meet hon. gentlemen who are denying us our rights. What are we here for, if not to protect the rights and interests of our constituencies and our Province. Let me not be understood as speaking from a sectional point of view; but I will say most emphatically that any man who neglects the rights of any Province, I care not whether it be Ontario, Quebec or any other, and neglects the sacred institutions of this country menaces its future safety.

Mr. WADE. I was not alluding to the hon. gentleman at all, either upon an Ontario or any other question.

Mr. ROSS. I am speaking of this particular question at present, and I repeat my warning as to the consequences that may be involved in this act. I have no fear of the result to the Liberal party. If I wanted hon. gentlemen opposite to act in our interest I would advise them to pursue their present course. But I trust yet that even at this late hour the Government will reconsider their views, and do Ontario that justice which the impartial arbitrators decided she should early receive.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I will request for a few moments the attention of the House, which I trust will be given me, as I do not often trespass on its patience. I would not have taken part in this discussion, but for two reasons: first, a remark of the member for West Middlesex, to the effect that the Conservatives from the Province of Quebec have interfered with the opinions of the Government of the Dominion to make it decide that the award of the arbitrators should not be considered as it deserves. I must say that there is nothing to justify any such imputation. We have not interfered with this award in any way. If we have studied that question, it was not because we come from Quebec, but because we form part of Canada as a whole. We have studied it since 1867, when the four Provinces entered Confederation; and the basis of Confederation was the understanding—and every member speaking in good faith will say that it never entered the minds of the fathers of Confederation to say otherwise—that the limits of Ontario should not extend over the region claimed by the award of the arbitrators. It was understood at the time that the territory of Ontario was just that part of the land over which the two old Provinces, Quebec and Ontario, had control before Confederation; and we know that those two Provinces did not claim this additional territory before the Union. That is to say, that a line from the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi due north—

Mr. MACKENZIE. Far west of that before Confederation, the Dawson road was built.

Mr. DESJARDINS. But it was not acknowledged as forming part of the territory of Upper Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE. There was a resident magistrate beyond that line who administered justice there. There was a settlement there of the hon. gentleman's own countrymen, a church and a convent.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Was it acknowledged as forming part of the Government of Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE. Certainly.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Not at all. It was never acknowledged. Such was the case, but difficulties arose. I think, if the House will allow me, I would prefer to continue my remarks in French.

Mr. DESJARDINS. (In French.) Mr. Speaker, I contend that we are perfectly justified in refusing to accept the decision of the commission of arbitrators, when one of its own members admits that the boundaries established by it between Ontario and the North-West Territories are not legal ones, but a kind of a compromise between the respective pretensions of the Federal Government and that of Ontario. No one can dispute that according to the report of the Commission, Ontario's territory is made to extend far beyond the boundaries recognized at the time of the union of the Canadas. I am ready to repeat this assertion on every occasion, and I think that it could be confirmed by all those who followed the history of the country at the time of the establishing of Confederation.

Mr. LAURIER. What was that boundary ?

Mr. DESJARDINS. The boundary started from the junction of the Mississippi with the Ohio by a line going northward to the height of land separating Lake Superior from Hudson's Bay. If there is something which surprises one in this discussion, it is to see the Liberals of the Province of Quebec seek, to the detriment of the general interest and of that Province in particular, to capture the votes of the Province of Ontario, in order to make up for their numerical weakness in the Province of Quebec. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the course of the explanations given by the hon. Secretary of State on this question, I regret that an assertion was made,—and I trust that it was done unintentionally—in answer to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier). I was absent when that gentleman delivered his speech, but it appears that he compared the present policy of the Conservative party with that of Sir George Etienne Cartier, and the hon. Secretary of State saw fit to assimilate the position of a certain number of Conservatives of the Province of Quebec with that of the Liberals of that Province.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. I referred to Mr. Beausoleil.

Mr. DESJARDINS. In that case, the matter should have been more clearly stated. The hon. Secretary of State has seen fit to say that the defeat of Sir George Etienne Cartier in 1872 was due to the alliance of the Liberals with the Programmistes. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not afraid of saying so to-day. I am a Programmist to-day, if to be one signifies what it did then, i.e. to be in favor of Conservative principles as they should be understood. I was a Programmist in 1872, and I do not remember that any of those who gave their adhesion to the programme had anything to do with the defeat of Sir George Etienne Cartier. If Sir George Etienne Cartier was defeated in Montreal East, the blame is due not to the Programmistes but to his own friends; we maintain this at present by causing the truth to be made known on certain questions of a purely provincial character; we were truer friends to Sir George Etienne Cartier and to the Conservative principles which he represented than those who surrounded him then, and who deceived the people and Sir George Etienne Cartier himself as to the real interests of the Province of Quebec and of the Conservative party. I think that the hon. Secretary of State has given utterance to an unfounded accusation and that he ought to withdraw what he has expressed. In 1872, the circumstances in which the Province of Quebec found itself, were of a quite peculiar nature. We had then local struggles; principles were at stake, which perhaps did not affect the local policy to any considerable extent, but which were of the highest importance to the Province of Quebec, from the stand point of certain local interests. Sir George Etienne Cartier, although he was ever looked upon by all Conservatives and by all friends of the Province of Quebec as the most faithful representative, generally speaking, of the aspirations of the Province of Quebec, had seen fit to interfere with questions which his position should have caused him to leave alone, and a certain number of us thought it our duty to protest against this interference. We did so, not as enemies, not as allies of the Liberals, but basing ourselves on those very principles according to which we understood that the Conservative policy could be upheld in the Province of Quebec. The false friends who surrounded Sir George Etienne Cartier then, prevented him from seeing what were his real interests and those of the Province. If he was defeated, it was not our fault, but solely that of those who thus advised him. The Liberals expect the benefit of this; all the better for them. It is perhaps due to that that from 1874 to 1878 they held the reins of power. They gave to us Conservatives and Programmistes the opportunity of comparing what they could do with what the Conservative leaders had done before them;

the comparison has not been in favor of the Liberals, and the result has been that, after a trial of four or five years, the Province of Quebec has been glad to cast its vote in favor of the Conservative party, thus throwing back with opposition the Liberal party and keeping it whence it should never return.

Mr. RYKERT. I was somewhat amused at the tone of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). It seemed to me like the last dying gasp of a gentleman who knew exactly what was going to befall him. In anticipation of the general election, the hon. gentleman tries to throw dust in the eyes of the people of Ontario by telling them they have been robbed by the Conservative party. That is the old trick he is trying to play over again, the old jack-knife and mucilage story. The hon. gentleman knows quite well who is endeavoring to rob Ontario, and if he will only look at the Statutes of 1879, he will find that Ontario has been spoliated by the Mowat Government, and that she is entitled to have a larger amount of territory than she has got. Let that be pointed out to the electors, and then they will see who are robbing Ontario. The position taken by the Conservative party is: 1st, there was no proper submission of the question in dispute to the arbitrators; 2nd, that the award was not legal or binding; 3rd, it does not fix the true boundary; and 4th, Ontario has not got her just deserts. I propose to show by reference to documentary evidence, the position I take as an Ontario man. These gentlemen threatened us with the vengeance of the people of Ontario. I am not afraid to meet the hon. gentleman and his friends anywhere in Ontario. Let them name the day and the hour. Let the hon. gentleman select any platform in Ontario he chooses; let him take his own town of Strathroy, and I will meet him there and discuss this question. He hopes to convince the electors that the Conservative party have not been faithful to the trust reposed in them. I am ready to discuss that question with him anywhere in Ontario, hour and hour about. I will take him in his own county if he likes. The ground I take in the first place is that there has been no proper submission of this question. I would like the hon. gentlemen to point out where there has been a submission, if they can. Let the hon. gentleman consult his own organ and he will find there was no proper submission from a legal point of view, otherwise why would it claim that, that cautious gentleman, the member for Lambton, had reserved to himself the right to repudiate the award? If there had been a reference from a legal point of view, and such a reference as could not have been repudiated, by one party or the other; then, I say the hon. gentleman from Lambton would not have got the credit he got a few days ago of having been that cautious gentleman who reserved the right to repudiate the award. Let us see what his organ says.

Mr. TROW. Will the hon. gentleman quote the Order in Council passed in November, 1878, and approved by the Governor-General ?

Mr. RYKERT. We will come to that by-and-bye. The hon. gentleman seems uneasy. I expect to visit the hon. gentleman's county this summer. I expect to go on a missionary tour myself. In the Globe newspaper of February 14, I find the following:—

"Had there been any ground whatever for suspecting that the award was in the slightest degree too favorable to Ontario, the Dominion Government might have been justified in delaying or refusing to be bound by it. Mr. Mackenzie, with his usual caution, reserved the right to do so for cause."

That disposes of the question that I first raised as to the proper and final submission by the Government of this important question. If there had been a proper submission the Dominion could not for cause or otherwise have refused to adopt an award based thereon. I was surprised that the member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), who claimed to discuss the question from a legal point of view, should have stated that because the award was made it was a finality. He knows, as a lawyer, that when an award shows on its face that it is not in accordance with fact or law it can be set aside; and the award itself, the documents and the evidence, show conclusively that the award was not founded on the facts, that it is not an award, defining the true boundary, as stated by Sir Francis Hincks. If the hon. gentleman will show to this House and the country that a proper submission was made, then I am prepared to show that the arbitrators did not follow the submission. They cannot show that a proper submission was made and, therefore, their case falls to the ground. The award is not a legal or a binding one, and if hon. members will examine the history of the submission of the question to the arbitrators, it will appear clear, that from the very inception of the proceedings the two Governments contemplated having the legal boundary fixed, and that the award should afterwards be approved by the Parliament of Canada. As far back as 1872, when the question was first mooted and Mr. McDougall was appointed by the Government of Ontario, as a Commissioner, it was then contemplated by the order of the Privy Council, that the true and legal boundary was to be ascertained. Follow the case a little further. In 1874 an Act was passed by the Ontario Legislature—and mark the action of the little Premier of Ontario. He wanted to have a little hole out of which to crawl; he was like the hon. member for Lambton, who desired to be able to get out of the award if it did not suit his purpose. In 38 Victoria, chapter 6, "an Act respecting the Northerly and North-West Boundaries of the Province of Ontario," I find the following recital:

"And whereas, subject to the approval of the Parliament of Canada and the Legislature of Ontario, it has been agreed by the Governments of the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario, that the questions which have been annexed concerning the said boundary should be determined by a reference to arbitration."

Mark the little addition—

"The Act shall not go into effect until the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall issue his proclamation in that behalf."
