Will the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who pretends to be so thoroughly posted on all questions, and who appears to be so anxious to lay the facts before the House and the country, kindly tell the House when the proclamation was issued? He cannot do it; it was a little dodge of the little dodger of Ontario, a little hole through which he could crawl, and if the award had gone against him he would have said he had not issued a proclamation. Those hon. gentlemen had been repeatedly asked in the Local Legislature to produce the proclamation, but they had failed to do so. To show the intention of the Ontario Government in making that omission, look at the Act of 1879, just after the award was made, 42 Victoria, chapter 2, "An Act respecting the Northerly and North-Westerly Boundaries of Ontario." It states:—

"And whereas, it was agreed by the Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario that the true boundaries should be determined by reference to arbitration."

Will hon. gentlemen say the true boundaries were discovered?

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. RYKERT. The little Premier of Ontario gives the lie to that statement, for he said:

"And whereas the effect of the award is to give to this Province less territory than had been claimed on behalf of the Province."

That is what we have on the Statute-book of Ontario, and certainly an Act of that kind must have been passed after some deliberation. I submit that I have made out my case: that no proper submission was made of this important question, that whatever was submitted to the arbitrators they were to consider and ascertain the true and legal boundaries, and that such boundaries had not been discovered. Let us call into the witness-box a gentleman who is a very good authority nowadays with hon. gentlemen, although I think the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) walked across the House some years ago, because his financial ability was considered to be inferior to that gentleman—Sir Francis Hincks. On the 10th February last, Sir Francis Hincks wrote:

"They further 'made up their minds' that there were no data whatever for declaring any particular place in the North-West as the north-westerly boundary."

He there gives the whole case away. But that is not all. At the end of the letter he says:

"They did not rob Ontario, for there was no established north-west boundary and no one has ever pretended that there is. They joined the legal boundaries in a perfectly fair way; but I have pointed out that if they had seen fit to adopt a different mode of doing so, Ontario would have gained a comparatively trifling extent of territory."

What avail, then, was it for the hon. member for Bothwell to deliver a speech extending over four hours to prove to the House and the country that there was an established north-west boundary, and to have published a document which cost the country $4,000, and which might have cost $8,000 had the people desired to go further in order to maintain that position. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) also spoke at length about an established north-west boundary, when, according to Sir Francis Hincks, such was not the case. The House must, therefore, come to this conclusion, that no proper submission was made, and that no legal award was made by the arbitrators. If the arbitrators were called upon by the solemn Acts of the two Legislatures to define the true and legal boundaries, that was not a valid award, because the boundaries established were compromised and conventional boundaries. If Ontario was satisfied with the award, why was it that two years ago Mr. Mowat placed $10,000 in the Estimates for the purpose of bringing the matter before the Privy Council. Yet the hon. gentleman ignored that fact, and, as the Globe says, Mr. Mackenzie, "with his usual caution, reserved the right of refusing to be bound by that award." But I would like to know where is the leader of the Opposition to night. Why do not we have an explanation from him on this important question? What has his great legal mind to say on this matter? Why are the smaller luminaries, like the hon. member for Middlesex, the chief missionary of the party, put up to argue the legal points involved in this question? I wonder that the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has not had his say in the question. I know how well the leader of the Opposition can split hairs, and how well he can arrive at conclusions that suit his convenience. The country would like to hear from him, and if he has reasoned the matter to a logical conclusion, perhaps we would be satisfied with his conclusion. The country would like to hear his views on this question, and they are not so particular to hear from those who are quite irresponsible, and who can go before the people and say: "True, we did speak that way," but who are like the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who speaks equally well in favor of Free Trade and Protection. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) says we are too late in bringing the matter before the House; but what were these hon. gentlemen doing all the time from 1872 to 1878? They had four years, in which they did not do a single thing; and yet because this Government does not choose to adopt an illegal award, an award which robs Ontario of more than one-tenth part of her possessions, because the House has exercised the sound discretion which the Act says it should exercise, these hon. gentlemen say we are too late in now offering to submit the whole question to the Supreme Court or Privy Council. It was intended that the representatives of the people should have a right to say whether the award should be annulled or not. If they find that the terms of the award are not correct, they have a right to say so as much as Mr. Mowat had when he stated that the award was not just to Ontario. The hon. gentleman says that Quebec is interested in having this property. I do not believe that Quebec is in favor of anything of the kind. I believe that Quebec is in favor of doing justice to Ontario, but wants to have a legal award; and if so high an authority as Mr. Mowat says that Ontario has not had justice done her, they are prepared to say that Ontario shall have justice done her. If the papers of the party, such as the Globe, the London Advertiser, the Hamilton Times, and all such rubbish as that, say that Ontario is only getting one-thirteenth part of her possessions, we have a right to say that Ontario shall have justice done her; and coming from Ontario as I do, I can bring these gentlemen into the witness-box to show out of their own mouths that Ontario has been robbed. But the hon. gentlemen and the Globe say that Ontario has been robbed by the Conservative party, but they have failed to bring forward any proof of that statement, while, on the other hand, I think I have proved out of their own mouths that the Grit party, led by Oliver Mowat, are the real spoliators of Ontario's rights. When the hon. gentlemen come before the bar of public opinion, they will be called upon to give evidence of that statement. I say that we are justified in saying that the award is not a finality; that it does not do justice to Ontario and we have a right to see that justice shall be done to Ontario.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not propose to trouble the House but for a few moments, for it was not my intention to say anything whatever on this question. Some remarks made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) seem to conflict with the remarks made by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Mousseau). The latter informed us that although Quebec took no interest in the matter, yet the inhabitants of that Province were surprised and amazed at the amount of territory awarded to Ontario by the arbitrators. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) tells us that Ontario has received by this award vastly less than she is entitled to. Here are two conflicting opinions before the House, and one or other of them is an honest opinion. I am willing to believe that the opinion of the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Mousseau) was the honest one, and I am inclined to doubt whether the motive which animates the supporters of the Government from Ontario was the one assigned by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert). I do not propose to go over the ground in reference to this dispute but simply to present a few plain facts to the House and the country. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) says that the submission of this case was never legally made. I hold that it was legally submitted by the Order in Council of the Government and the Province of Ontario, and that by the submission of this case to a Board of arbitrators, composed of gentlemen of high character, the question was settled. I hold that the boundary found by the arbitrators was the true legal boundary, and we are bound to accept it as such. The language used by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) with reference to the Province of Ontario, I consider most disgraceful. The idea of any hon. gentleman standing up here and characterizing the head of the Government of the greatest Province of this Dominion as a little dodger, is one not very creditable to any member of this House. The hon. gentleman goes on to tell us that no legal boundary was found, that one of the members of this Board of arbitrators declared in a letter that there was no north-west boundary—that no such boundary could be found. I ask him, if he endorses that statement, how he proposes to ascertain that boundary and settle the question?

Mr. RYKERT.

If no legal boundary can be found it is not within his power to find the legal boundary.

Mr. PLUMB. Nor was it within the power of the arbitrators.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have been much amused by my hon. friend from Niagara to-night, and certainly he makes himself an object of amusement to us all. But if he would not interrupt the proceedings of the House we would be better able to get on with our business. The ground taken by the members from Ontario supporting the Government is a ridiculous one. They say they are not satisfied with the award because it gives Ontario too little territory. I say that Ontario is satisfied with the award, that she proposes to stand by the award and to enforce the award. They may talk of justice to Ontario. Ontario does not look to them for justice; Ontario intends to force justice for herself. I can warn these gentlemen that the feeling among the people of Ontario is not to be trifled with, even with the great majority they have at their back. Ontario has performed her duty to this Confederation from the day it was formed; she has without murmuring borne the chief burden of taxation; she has been the backbone of Confederation; and she intends to demand her rights, and if these rights are denied to her, she intends to enforce them. She intends to take possession of that territory which has been awarded to her by a Board to which both Governments were parties in referring the question, and to hold it; and whatever may be the conduct, whatever may be the action of the majority in this House, she will simply set that action at naught, and bid it defiance, if it is not right and proper. I warn hon. gentlemen opposite that they may now treat this matter with derision, but they will have to meet a people living under a sense of outraged rights, and they will yet hear from those people in a way that will not be agreeable to gentlemen who make light of Provincial rights and the rights of a great Province.

Mr. FARROW. I do not rise to reply to the hon. member for North Norfolk, because I conceive it would be a waste of time to reply to a gentleman who may take different ground to-morrow; we know what his erratic course in this House has been from 1876 to 1882. But I will try to reply to the remarks that fell from the hon. member for West Middlesex. That hon. gentleman made this subject a specialty. He seems to have been deputed by the Mowat Government to go through the length and breadth of the country to represent the views of the Attorney-General. He condescended to pay a visit to my riding; I do not know whether he was paid for it or not. I know that he has been receiving large fees from the Local Government, that he has a great liking for the party from which his bread-and-butter comes. He and the local members of my county come along en masse, to enlighten the people on the boundaries and Streams Bill questions, which formed their great cry. Now, it is evident that Mr. Mowat's Government is hostile to this Government; they began the Session by doing what did not belong to them—discussing the National Policy. The greater part of the Session was taken up with the discussion of the National Policy, the boundary question, and the Streams Bill. Now, why did they spend so much time on these questions? Just because they were hostile to this Government. I can well conceive the leader of the Opposition, finding that all previous cries had failed, meeting with the Attorney-General of Ontario and getting into conversation about the prospects of the party, and saying: "How shall we succeed? We must get up some burning question." And they agreed to make this boundary award the burning question. Why, their own party did not give them credit for it. I consider they have failed already in trying to make this an election cry. I am not a lawyer, but speaking as a layman I do not believe this Government has power to take one inch or one foot of land from Ontario. Though I am as ardent a supporter of the leader of my party as any man ought to be, yet if I believed he wanted to rob Ontario, I would not go with him. Does not the Confederation Act say that the Ontario boundary shall be what the old Upper Canada boundary was, and that boundary is what we are trying to find out. Did not our leader in 1871 tell this country that the proper place to submit the question was the Privy Council. Was there not a contention between the Ontario Government and the Dominion Government as to the true boundary? Did not the Ontario Government contend that the western boundary was the Rocky Mountains? Did not—and this is a very important point—my hon. friend from Lambton contend differently? Did he not contend that the west boundary was not the Rocky Mountains? But, luckily or unluckily for himself, he came into power. I do not say that the Local Government manipulated him, but he left the matter to arbitrators, instead of submitting it to the Privy Council in England, but very wisely neglected to pass a resolution binding himself to accept the award. Why did he not pass that resolution? I say he was wise in not doing so, he acted the part of a wise legislator in not committing himself. Did not the Ontario Government act differently? Did they not pass a law that they would abide by the decision? Well, what does this amount to? It amounts to just this, that it left the award an open question. Suppose for a moment that the award had been that the boundary extended to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. What does the Globe say? It says, if that award had been to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, they could not have accepted it. It would have been preposterous; it would not have been a right boundary; it would have been a reductio ad absurdum. Following that line of reasoning, how shall we say that the line the arbitrators did agree to is a correct line. When an arbitration in ordinary affairs takes place, the parties bind themselves beforehand to accept the award. I have been chosen as an arbitrator often in ordinary matters, but I never arbitrated until the parties bound themselves to accept the arbitration. That is the way ordinary people do. I do not know how lawyers do, or how Governments do, but I know the ordinary practice in ordinary affairs is for both parties to bind themselves. Well, this was an extraordinary transaction it seems, and they would not bind themselves. If there is any fault to be found in not accepting this arbitration it lies with the hon. member for Lambton in not committing the Dominion Government to accept the award. Why did he not follow the same course as the Local House?

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am willing to commit it now.

Mr. FARROW. Why not then? Why not make things secure before you began? You had it in your own power then. Now you have no power. It is said Sir John A. Macdonald wants to rob Ontario. He is the last man that would rob it. You might as well try to make the people believe that mothers would rob their daughters or fathers their sons. Who was it that took the large debt that Ontario ought to have paid, about $7,000,000, off her shoulders and paid it out of the Dominion Treasury? Who was it that raised Ontario and this country out of the Slough of Despond? When our manufacturing interests were dying, when our farmers were becoming bankrupt, when our interests every way were languishing, who was it conceived the great National Policy that made this country prosperous as it is to-day? You talk about going to Ontario to put before them this abstract question of the boundary award, and think you are going to throw dust in the eyes of the people. They will never believe it. What do they care about the abstract question of the boundary award. I am not going to run down the territory that is claimed, but what does it amount to? You talk about the timber there, and the rivers. I ask, what farmer from Ontario will settle there? If this country is of great value, what has made it valuable? Why, you told the truth yourself to-night, that the Pacific Railway has made that country valuable. You talk about Sir John A. Macdonald injuring Ontario. Look at the large amount of money to be spent in building a railway through that country, for hundreds of miles in the northerly sections. All those vast improvements will cost millions, which will benefit Ontario. I want to ask another question—who was it that gave away the Territory of Keewatin, which was a part of Ontario? According to the hon. gentleman's arguments a very wrong thing was done in giving away that country. While it is argued that our Ontario boundary reaches to the Rocky Mountains, the Territory of Keewatin was given away. Where is the philosophy of that? I have no hesitation in saying that there is no man in the House who ought to be more grateful to the Ontario Government than the late Minister of the Interior, who gave us a four-hour speech the other night, which cost the Ontario Government $4,000, or $1,000 an hour. I tried to listen attentively to that speech, as I wanted to get to the bottom of this question, but I must declare that after it was finished I was more perplexed than when it was begun. I do not say the hon. gentleman is a mixer and muddler like the ex-Finance Minister. No man in Ontario, I repeat, should try to carry out the behests of the Ontario Government with more zeal than the hon. member for Bothwell, owing to the receipt of that $4,000. I think I would try to speak a good many hours for $1,000 an hour. I am in favor of Ontario getting every inch of ground whether soil or rock, which she owns; but I shall vote with pleasure for this resolution. I believe the question ought to be submitted to the Privy Council in England, and until it is so referred, there can be no satisfactory solution of it. It would not cost much to send it to that tribunal, either in time or money, while its decision would be satisfactory to every man in the country.

Mr. ARKELL. We have been discussing this question of the boundaries of Ontario nearly three days, and I do not think we have arrived at an agreement yet. But I believe the discussion will show the people of Ontario and the Dominion that a large majority in this House are in favor of that question being settled; and if the Ontario Government does not accept the proposition of the hon. member for Niagara, it will be plain that it does not desire a settlement of this great question. And I believe indeed that this question will be kept open perhaps till after the general elections, and that the party on the opposite side are determined to make a handle of it for political objects. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has already done some missionary work in East Elgin. I have read his speech, made ten days before the meeting of Parliament, and which was delivered in the village of Aylmer, in which he was invited to address the Reform Organization on the question of the Ontario boundary award. The hon. gentleman spoke as follows:—

"Upper Canada, when we went into Confederation, had good claims to the land as far as the Rocky Mountains, while their claim had never been disputed to the land beyond the Rainy River. The Ontario Government and the Dominion Government arranged to settle the dispute by arbitration. Sir Edward Thornton, the British Minister at Washington, Sir Francis Hincks, one of the oldest legislators of Canada, and Chief Justice Harrison, the eminent jurist, were appointed a Board of Arbitration. The whole dispute was referred to them, and they examined every treaty and all archives relating to the boundary. Counsel was heard on both sides, and then each arbitrator made up his award separately, but when they were examined they were all alike in awarding to Ontario that territory beginning at James' Bay, thence along James' Bay to Albany River, thence to the north arm of the Lake of the Woods—an area of 100,000 square miles or 64,000,000 acres, rich in timber, abounding in minerals and containing much rich soil. Ontario accepted the award and the Dominion would have ratified it, "but there arose a king who knew not Joseph" and who shirked the responsibility of refusing, but declared that the eastern boundary of Manitoba should be the western boundary of Ontario, with the design of handing to Manitoba what was awarded to Ontario, with this difference, that the timber on the land belonging to Manitoba belongs to the Dominion, while Ontario owns the timber on her lands. Thus the Dominion would steal from Ontario $150,000,000 worth of timber, and already are giving licenses to the Syndicate to cut timber on Ontario's lands. But the Ontario Government have resolved to go a step further and take possession of these lands. Nothing is so contemptible in Sir John's history as his offer to arbitrate the matter over again. He would like to play the sharper's game of "Heads I win; tails you lose." Why should Ontario submit to such injustice? It is the Province that pays three-fifths of the revenue of the Dominion; it is the heart of Canadian virtue, intelligence and enterprise, and it intends to assert its rights. It has long enough been made the cats-paw of French lick-spittles, and built the harbors and public works of Quebec. Now we say what is our own is our own. 'Whom the Gods intend to destroy they first make mad,' and Sir John seems to have been maddened to his destruction."

I merely read this extract to show what kind of speeches are made in Ontario, and I do say that the member for North Norfolk, in making use of language of that kind while the matter is under discussion in Parliament is trying to irritate the feeling in Ontario against a settlement of this question. They hope to make political capital by the cry of French domination. The Conservative party in Ontario never paid any attention to that; but you see now by that speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk, that the Reform party still make use of it. However, I do not think, as has been stated already, that those tactics will "take worth a cent" with the people of Ontario. I believe they are alive to their own interests, and that this excitement which the Opposition are trying to get up will have but little effect when the people have a chance to record their votes.

Mr. TROW. I would not have risen to my feet, but for a taunt from the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), who, during his speech, stated that he would ask any hon. gentlemen to point out to him where the Dominion Government had submitted the question to arbitration. I merely called the hon. gentleman's attention to the Order in Council passed and approved by His Excellency the Governor General, in November, 1878, and instead of answering it he taunted me that I might expect a visit from him during this summer. I may say to that hon. gentleman that it is a matter of indifference to me how often he or any other supporter of the Government visits my riding, so long as the electors there are not deprived of their franchise. He may come every day in the week if it gratifies him for it can make no difference to me so far as the electoral vote is concerned. However, I may say, being a member of that celebrated Committee of which we have heard so much this afternoon, more especially from the hon. member for Algoma, who was chairman, that the Committee was composed of gentlemen from the various Provinces, nine supporters of the Government and four members of the Opposition, who devoted considerable time and attention to the subject brought before them. It is true the time at the disposal of the Committee was not adequate to the service they had to perform, and I think the chairman himself did a large portion of the work. I notice in the report that a great deal of matter has been introduced into it irrelevant to the case and that was not brought before the Committee. At the same time I think the chairman was thoroughly qualified for the task he had undertaken; the questions he put to the witnesses were often leading questions, and you may fancy the result. At all events, at the close of that examination I was satisfied in my own mind that the Province of Ontario had scarcely received justice in that award. I was strengthened in that conclusion by the evidence of the hon. gentleman from Halton (Mr. McDougall), who is thoroughly conversant with the question, and considered the award was right in every particular. The evidence given by the chairman while member of the Local House was that the western boundary of Ontario extended several hundred miles beyond the limits sanctioned by the arbitrators. Now, when a matter is left to arbitration it strikes me forcibly that there is not a gentleman on either side of the House, who, if he left to arbitrators a dispute about any private matter, would not feel bound to abide by the award. I am surprised that any Government should refuse to ratify an award made by gentlemen of their own choosing and of superior ability. It has been said to-night that the arbitrators were premature in making their award, but it must be remembered that they were acting as judges in the case, they had eminent lawyers to prepare the case for them from week to week, to produce the evidence, the commissions, treaties and Acts of Parliament for a century back, and the arbitrators certainly required but very little time to deliberate. They took the legal evidence before them, and although sitting in different parts of the country, they came to a unanimous decision, unknown to each other before hand. Now it strikes me forcibly that the line is a proper one. The only reason for any dispute whatever is the meaning of the words "and northwards." Well, judging from the circumstances of the case, "northwards" must mean unmiss-takeably to follow the course of the Mississippi River to the height of land, at all events, if not to the North-West Angle. A line due north from the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi would have excluded several settlements which then existed and which the Act was intended to include. The Quebec Act of 1774 is sufficiently plain in describing the limits, and the commission given to Sir Guy Carleton is also explicit; and I cannot see for a moment why any Government should refuse to ratify an award made by gentlemen of such ability, aided by the best legal talent in the Dominion.

Mr. HESSON. As an Ontario man and representing an Ontario constituency, I desire to say that this question is one of great importance to myself and my constituents, and I am called upon to vote upon a resolution which I heartily approve. I am not afraid to go into any constituency and defend the vote I am going to give to-night, on the ground that I believe the only true definition you can get of a legal boundary will be obtained in that manner. If we take the words that have been supposed to state where the boundary is, we find that even the Government who made the award have had to qualify them by the evidence that was adduced here to-night by the hon. member for Lincoln, by saying that it was not the legal boundary, but apparently the boundary, the best they could find. Now, I am not surprised at that. If the arbitrators simply gave a day or two to obtain the evidence I am not at all surprised that they failed to find a legal boundary. The Supreme Court would exercise a little more patience in arriving at a decision, or, if it were referred to the Privy Council, the Dominion Government would see that the case was properly presented there, that the best evidence was forthcoming and that Ontario would get fair play. I am not afraid that my Province will not get fair play, and I am prepared to trust the matter in the hands either of the Supreme Court or the Privy Council. It has been made to appear that hon. gentlemen opposite are perfectly satisfied with the award made by the arbitrators. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) said the line was a proper one; it was accepted by the people of Ontario, and they are perfectly satisfied with it; on the other hand the present First Minister of Ontario held that it was not such a line. In chapter 2 of the Ontario Statutes of 1878, Mr. Mowat said:

"And whereas the effect of the said award is to give to this Province less territory than had been claimed on behalf of the Province, and more territory than the Government of Canada had intended to be within the limits of the Province, or that was contained within the provisional boundary lines aforesaid, &c."

Hon. gentlemen opposite were prepared to accept less than the land to which the Province was entitled, but he, as an Ontario man was not prepared to accept less than the quantity to which the Province was entitled. If hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to adopt that course which is more than members on this side of the House will do, I am not prepared to accept such terms, and I will not support a Government which will not give to Ontario all to which it is entitled, and the Government is pursuing the proper course in this matter. The trouble is that hon. members on this side of the House have anticipated the resolutions of hon. gentlemen opposite on this subject, and the speeches they have been preparing for days and months. It is not with them a question so much as to whether Ontario would be robbed of territory, because they are willing that this should occur, but we on this side of the House ask fair play for Ontario, and we will receive it.

Mr. RYMAL. I regret exceedingly that a question which should have been settled in an amicable and friendly manner between the Dominion and Ontario Governments has become a bone of contention. I express my sincere regret that such is the case, because if the people of Ontario feel they have been wrongly dealt with by the Dominion taking a portion of their inheritance from them, it certainly will weaken the affection which should exist between the members of this great Confederacy. I have always thought it was a proper matter to submit to arbitration, and I endeavored to look at the matter from a common-sense point of view. It was not an improper subject to submit to such a distinguished Board of Arbitrators as sat upon it. I think I might place the opinion of Sir Edward Thornton, Sir Francis Hincks and Chief Justice Harrison in opposition to the opinions of some of the lesser lights who have spoken on the other side of the House, and be guided by Sir Francis Hincks and his colleagues. I am sorry this matter has assumed a party aspect for the reason that it will prevent a settlement in a satisfactory manner. It is only a short time since it assumed that aspect. Up to within the last few months the representatives of the people in Ontario, Reformers and Conservatives alike, considered the award a proper one to be ratified; not only that, but they condemned the action or want of action on the part of the Dominion Government in not ratifying the award, which they asserted would only give Ontario justice: It is not uninteresting to enquire at what time and under what circumstances this change took place in the views of a number of members of the Ontario Legislature. It has been referred to by the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) as having occurred just about the time some prominent members of the Dominion Government paid a visit to Toronto, and it gives ground for suspicion to those of a suspicious nature—and I am glad to say I am not of that nature—that some concerted action was taken at the time a great gathering took place in Toronto, for immediately afterwards I noticed Conservative papers changed their tactics, they began to adopt a different line, and they justified the Government in withholding its ratification to the award. I am bound to say, that unsuspecting as I am, and possessing great faith in the honesty of my fellow-men, this change was suspicious, and indicated concerted action of the Tory party. I have a word to say to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), who unnecessarily undertook to belittle the Premier of the great Province of Ontario. He called him the little man, the little Premier, and the little dodger. Now, it so happens that the Premier of Ontario is not unknown in this House, and is perhaps as well known as any gentleman in the Dominion of Canada, particularly in Ontario, and this is the first time that I ever heard him stigmatized as a little man. He may not have the bulky proportions of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert); it is possible he has not an equally comprehensive mind; but the people of Ontario, I hope, will credit him with being a giant while the hon. member for Lincoln is a mere pigmy. When the hon. gentleman spoke of Mr. Mowat's little dodges he should have looked back at his own record, and he would not have spoken of Mr. Mowat as a little dodger. Little! Why Sir, he is a giant in comparison with the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr.

Rykert), unless it be in gathering scraps, culling from newspapers, and making quotations from better speeches than he can deliver himself—pasting them together, and making speeches here by the hour. Little! Why, Sir, there never have been any transactions with which the hon. member for Lincoln has been connected which could be characterized as great. I think the Irish poet, Tom Moore, must have had some one similar to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) in his mind when he wrote a stanza which I shall repeat to the House.

Mr. RYKERT. We have heard it before.

Mr. RYMAL. Yes, and it may do you good to hear it again. I do not claim it as original.

“There was a little man,
And he had a little soul,
And he said, ‘Little soul, let us try, try, try,
If it's not within our reach
To make up a little speech,
Just between you and little I, I, I.’
Then together cheek by jowl,
This little man and little soul,
Went and made that little speech,
To a tittle, tittle, tittle,
And all the people did declare
That this priggish little pair,
Never yet in all their lives
Looked so little, little, little.”

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that the House do, at its next sitting, go into Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

THE EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that when this House adjourns at its next sitting it stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 11th inst., at 3 o'clock, p.m.

Motion agreed to; and (at 3:35 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 5th April, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE IRISH RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to state, as a matter of courtesy to the Government, that on the next occasion after to-day when a motion will be made that you, Mr. Speaker, leave the Chair and the House go into Committee of Supply, I shall move an amendment that certain resolutions in connection with the state of Ireland be considered—unless some other arrangement be made to meet the question.

THE SUGAR DUTIES.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Before you leave the Chair, Sir, I wish to say a few words with reference to a subject, which is a very sweet one, and which would remain so, had it not been for an element of bitterness which has been introduced into it by the late Tariff. I refer, Sir, to the article of sugar, on which I desire to offer a few remarks. This article, Sir, is one of the most important articles of commerce. It is one of the articles that enters into consumption by the people of this country to as great an extent, perhaps, as any other article in the country; and, therefore, any legislation which affects it by way of enhancing its price, bears upon all consumers of that article. When I remind the House that the consumption of this article in England is about 60 lbs. per head per annum; that in the United States, it is 40 lbs. per head per annum; and that in this country, it amounts to 31 lbs. per head per annum, leaving aside any calculation based on the use of maple sugar, we will see, Sir, that the subject we are approaching is one of considerable interest to the people of this country. It will be remembered that, in 1879, when the Tariff was introduced by the hon. the Finance Minister, that gentlemen on this side of the House said, with reference to the proposed change of the sugar duties, that it would have the result of decreasing the revenue which the country received from that source, and that it would also have the effect of enhancing the price of that article for the consumer. Exception, Sir, was taken to our statements at that time; exception has been taken to our statements with reference to this subject since then; and attempts have been made by the hon. the Finance Minister, and by other gentlemen of ability on the other side of the House, to endeavor to prove that we were wrong at that time in our forecast as to the effect of this duty; and attempts have been made to show, and demonstrate by figures conclusively, that we were mistaken. Now, Sir, the duty which devolves upon me to-day is to show that the position which was then taken by gentlemen on this side of the House was the correct position. I intend, Sir, first to prove that the price of sugar has been enhanced through the operation of this Tariff, and that through it the people have had to pay a great deal more for this article, and I have also to show that while the Tariff remains as it is at present on the Statute-books, the people not only have paid an extra amount, but that they are liable to pay it. I will endeavor, further, to show, Sir, that the duty upon this article is excessive, and that it is in the interest of the country, and the bounden duty of the Government, to see that this taxation should be reduced. Now, Sir, in approaching this subject, mere statements will carry no weight. Sometimes hon. gentlemen opposite object to the use of figures and of tables of figures, from this side of the House. They say: "Look at the general effect of our Tariff upon the country." They point to prosperity, they point to the country, and they say: "cause and effect." That may do, perhaps, to talk to men who have not had a business training, and who give no attention whatever to public matters; but it certainly is a line of argument that should not be adopted in the Canadian House of Parliament, where the representatives are supposed to be business men, and capable of judging business questions upon their merits. There will be no value in any argument that may be advanced on this question or on any other question, unless that argument is backed up by and based upon figures culled from our Trade and Navigation Returns, which will give to us the true state of the case in reference to the particular article which may be under discussion. Now, Sir, let me say, with reference to this article, to which I confine my remarks exclusively to-day, that it is, perhaps, one of the most difficult articles in the whole category to speak upon. It is the most difficult matter, perhaps, Sir, of any item we have in the Tariff, to ascertain what advantage, what amount of Protection the refiner of sugar has in this country; and the reason, Mr. Speaker, is not far to seek. There are certain secrets connected with sugar refining; these secrets are locked up—properly locked up—in the minds, in the breasts, and in the knowledge of the men who are engaged in that enterprise. When we had, Sir, in 1876, the head of one of the principal members of the only refining firm we had in existence in Canada at that time, before a Committee of the House of Commons, it was necessary, in order to substantiate his allegations that a bounty was paid by the American people to the sugar refiner on the sugar which the American refiners exported to Canada, to ascertain the amount of the refined sugar that could be produced from 100 lbs. of raw sugar. That was essential, Sir, to a right determination upon that point. And surely at that time when an effort was being made to understand the position of that trade and the grounds for granting relief to it, if it should be proved we would naturally expect that that gentleman at any rate might have given in confidence to that Committee the nature of his trade secret, for otherwise he was certainly estopped from urging any claim for receiving any greater consideration at the hands of the Canadian Parliament or of the Canadian Ministry; but, Sir, that gentleman emphatically refused to disclose what amount of raw sugar it took to produce 100 lbs. of refined sugar. I repeat again, he had a perfect right to do it. I will allude now to a remark made by the hon. member for Cardwell two years ago, when, in the course of some remarks on the same question, I said I admitted that the Redpaths had made $600,000 last year; the hon. member for Cardwell said he could not very well see how I arrived at that conclusion. He did not think that the Redpaths were in the habit of showing their books to members of Parliament, to enable them to determine such a matter. That is quite correct. The Messrs. Redpath, or any other refiner or manufacturer in this country, is in no way bound to show his books, either to myself or to any other member of this House, provided that he is not knocking at the door of this Parliament and asking for legislation to give him an undue advantage over the consumer of his goods. But if the Government undertake to make a man prosperous; to make a man rich, to make a man wealthy at the expense of the people of this country, the Government of this country have a right, and it is their bounden duty to demand that the books of that firm shall be open to their investigation in order that they, at any rate, shall know how much profit he is making out of the advantages which they are conferring upon him by legislation. But, Sir, we got it not. I have been forced, then, to look for the basis upon which to make my calculation to other sources. In this, however, I did not find so much difficulty, because, in the year 1875, when this question of export bounty to the American refiner was under consideration, a commission was appointed in the United States. They met, and, unanimously at that time, found that 100 lbs. of raw sugar would give 60 lbs. of hard stove-dried sugar, 23·60 lbs. of soft yellow sugar, 11·50 lbs. of syrup, and 4·9 lbs. of waste. These gentlemen were examined under oath separately. They gave different testimony, according to the classes of sugar which they turned out; but on the sworn testimony of these, and different sugar refiners when before them, the Committee unanimously arrived at the conclusion that a fair basis for calculation of the drawback was the production of 60 lbs. of hard sugar from 100 lbs. of raw sugar, leaving the soft sugar and syrup equal in value, at any rate, to the raw sugar, which may therefore be dropped out of the question, and this gives us the basis we work upon, of 60 lbs out of 100 lbs. of raw sugar, with 4·90 lbs of waste, or upon 100 lbs. of hard dry sugar, 8½ per cent of waste is incurred in turning it into granulated sugar. Now then, Sir, we have our basis, but I do not propose to work out the table on the basis of 8½ lbs. waste, in order to make the case so strong,—for the iniquity is so glaring. In order to persuade the members of this House, and show them conclusively that an undue advantage is being given to the refiner of sugar, instead of taking a basis of 8½ lbs. of waste, as I might have done in making my calculation, I will add 50 per cent. to that, and make the calculation on the basis of 12½ per cent. of waste. Taking this as a basis, Sir, the first table which I submit for the consideration of the House is this: That in the years 1879-80, and also in 1880-81—for this Tariff has been now for two complete years in operation—we imported 116,847,050 lbs. of sugar, I take off 12½ per cent. as I stated before in order to reduce it to a granulated sugar basis, I therefore have to deduct 14,605,881 lbs., and that leaves me a net result of 102,241,169 lbs. of sugar on the granulated basis. The average price in Canada of granulated sugar during that period was $9.73 per 100 lbs., and from which I deduct 1½ per cent., which is 15 cents, leaving it $9.58. The reason why I deduct 1½ per cent. is because the Redpath sugar refiners take 2½ per cent. off the price, while the New York refiners take off 1 per cent.; therefore taking the New York price in that, the 1 per cent., and the Redpaths with 1½ per cent. off, I have arrived at a firm foundation. This, then, was the average price in Canada—$9.58, and that number of pounds, multiplied by this, shows that the cost of that quantity of sugar in Canada was $9,794,703. During that same period the New York price was $6.20 in gold per 100 lbs. The same number of pounds, multiplied by this, would give the cost in New York at $6,338,952. Taking the cost, then, of this article in New York from the cost of it in Canada, and what do you find? That in Canada the people that year paid $3,455,751 more for their sugar than they would have had to do if they had brought it from New York.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. The table is there for any hon. gentleman to dissect. I am speaking now of one year. The people of Canada consequently in the year 1880, paid $3,455,751 more for their sugar than they would have had to pay for this sugar in New York. Where has it gone to, Sir? You will find, from the Trade and Navigation Returns, that $2,026,689 of it went into the public Treasury by way of duty, that is all right, that is perfectly legitimate; but this leaves $1,429,062 which was taken out of the pockets of the people of this country, and which was not put into the Treasury. Will the hon. the Finance Minister, or any gentleman on this side of the House, say where this money was put. We will now take the next year. We then imported 136,406,513 lbs. of sugar which, on the 12½ per cent. basis, makes 119,355,702 lbs. of granulated sugar, as being the product of this quantity. The average price in Canada of this sugar during that year, was $9.77 per 100 lbs. And this number of pounds multiplied by that price gives a total cost of $11,661,052. The New York price during the same year was $6.55 per 100 lbs., and this number of pounds multiplied by this price gives a total cost, in New York, of $7,817,798. Taking this, Sir, from what we paid in Canada, and we find a difference of $3,843,254. Where is it? $2,459,142 of it went into the public Treasury by way of duty, that is right; but there was $1,384,112 that year taken out of the pockets of the people of this country, that did not go into the public Treasury. Will the hon. the Finance Minister tell us where it is, and where it did go to?

Mr. DOMVILLE. Where did it go?

Mr. PATERSON. It went into the pockets of the refiners, or it was squandered, because our refiners could not produce as cheaply, owing to the want of keen competition—for the one or the other of these causes that amount was taken out of the pockets of the people of this country. That is my first table, Sir. I propose now to apply another test to it, and what test shall I apply? I think it would be a pretty fair test to take the profits of the New York refiner and compare them with the profit of the Canadian refiner—I think this would give us a test. Now, then, suppose we enter upon that test. I find that the refiner of the United States paid last year, upon his raw sugar, an average duty of $2.45 per 100 lbs. Well, the Canadian refiner paid on his raw sugars an average of only $1.75 per 100 lbs. The Canadian refiner had, therefore, an advantage of 70 cents per 100 lbs. over the American refiner on his raw sugar. In addition to that, Sir, in the year 1880 the Canadian price was, on the average during the whole year, 23 cents per 100 lbs. higher than it was sold for in New York; and, therefore, the Canadian refiner, with 70 cents less cost on his raw sugar, and 23 cents per 100 lbs. more profit on his refined sugar, has 93 cents per 100 lbs. advantage over the American refiner. Well, now, apply that 93 cents advantage to the 116,847,050 lbs. of sugar imported in 1880, and we find that the Canadian refiner would have $1,086,677 more profit than the American refiner, provided he refined his sugar as cheaply as the American refiner did. To that, Sir, you will have to add $500,000 which we were short in revenue, bringing the total up to over $1,400,000, arrived at by the calculation made on the basis previously given. Take, Sir, the next year. On an importation of 136,406,513 lbs. that the Canadian refiner had an advantage over the American refiner on the raw sugar of 70 cents per 100 lbs., and an advantage over him to the extent of 6 cents per 100 lbs., on the enhanced price got in Canada for this sugar, over and above what the American refiner got in New York for his sugar. This makes 76 cents per 100 lbs. of advantage which the Canadian refiner had over the New York refiner, each in his own market, in the year 1881. Apply these 76 cents to the importation of sugar in 1881, and you get, as the result, an advantage which the Canadian refiner had of $1,036,689; to this add, in round numbers, $500,000 of revenue short, under the calculation as it would have been under the Cartwright so-termed Tariff, and then you will arrive at a loss of $1,500,000, or $1,400,000, on that basis again. But Sir, I propose to apply a still further test. I now take as a test the figures of the hon. Finance Minister himself, contained in his speech of 1881, which will be found in Hansard, page 1023, and what does he say there:

"I have here the prices during every month of 1880 in the United States and in Montreal. The prices in the United States averaged $6.52. Add the old duty (because I am making the statement under the estimate of the old duty), 25 per cent. $1.63, 1 cent per lb., $1, and all other expenses of every kind, 35 cents—that brings the price of granulated sugar to $9.50, as against an average price during the past twelve months of $9.75, or an increased cost of 25 cents per 100 lbs., as between the present price and what it would have cost to import it in under the Tariff of 1878. Now, I am also informed, on what I consider reliable authority, that the yellow refined sugar is now in the market to-day by the refiners and sold at from 14 to 19 cents per 100 lbs. less than it could be imported from the United States for, under the Tariff of 1878."

That is the utterance of the hon. Minister of Finance in 1881, in which he admits the Canadian consumer paid 25 cents per 100 lbs. more for his sugar.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Granulated. What about yellow?

Mr. PATERSON. Yellow? On the basis I worked out of turning raw into granulated, at 12½ per cent. more than covers all the yellows, because there is no loss in refining them, and I am giving 50 per cent. advantage on the calculation to the hon. gentleman's Tariff. It is well known to the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Bunting) who sits behind him that the Canadian refiner understands, as well as the American refiner, how to take 100 lbs. and more than that of yellow sugar out of raw sugar, and leaving it of brighter color than it was before. The hon. gentleman told us that in 1876 under oath, and I am sorry to say he has since that time gone out of the trade. If he does not know it business men have no difficulty in knowing it; they know that what the hon. member for Welland testified in 1876 on that point is correct; and therefore when I am reducing it all to a granulated basis and giving 50 per cent. advantage to the hon. Minister of Finance, the question of yellow drops out altogether, because they are more than covered by the extra production from the raw sugar and from the increased benefit acquired by turning it into a granulated basis. Then 25 cents is admitted by the hon. Minister of Finance; to that he adds 35 cents in charges. What right has he to add 35 cents in charges by way of freight to sugars from New York in comparison with prices from Montreal to New York? Does the hon. Minister not know, is he not conversant enough with trade matters to know, that there is as much cost on freight on sugar from Montreal to the consuming points of this Dominion as there is from New York? It makes no difference to the consumer of sugar in Canada whether he pays 35 cents per 100 lbs. freight on sugar from New York, or pays it from Montreal. The average charges for freight on sugar from Montreal to the consuming points—to the consuming mouths—of sugar in Canada, is as great as from the port of New York, and, therefore, that 35 cents must be dropped out of the calculation altogether. Add that to his 25 cents that he admitted, and you have his own admission that the people of Canada paid 60 cents per 100 lbs. more for their sugar during the year he was making that speech, and the year before, than they would have paid under the old Tariff. In that year the people of Canada imported 116,847,050 lbs. of sugar; deduct 12½ per cent. to bring it to a granulated basis, and it leaves 102,241,169 lbs. Add to that the 25 cents admitted by the hon. Minister of Finance, and the 35 cents that he had no business to charge against the New York sugar, that is, multiply it by the 60 cents, and what is the result? Why, you paid an enhanced price of $617,447 for the sugar. But mark, Mr. Speaker, that is not all. If the rate of duty of 1878 had been applied to that quantity of sugar coming in, instead of the rate of duty the new Tariff imposes, we would have paid $733,901 more duty. But the duty we lost, and the enhanced cost together under this calculation of the Minister of Finance himself, and you have as a net result a loss to the people of Canada of $1,344,348, the hon. Minister of Finance himself making the statement. We have another valuable speech from the hon. Minister of Finance on the sugar question this year. I beg to call his attention to it. He will find on page 32 of his speech, as reported in the pamphlet of which I was able to borrow a copy from a friend, for I am sorry to say he did not send me one of them, though he favored some of my friends with large supplies. The hon. member for Lambton says he will give me twenty copies; I think he ought to distribute them among his friends, as it will be more convenient to carry them through the country than to carry the Hansard. On page 32 of the pamphlet, Sir Leonard Tilley says:

"The figures that I am now quoting can be found in the Trade and Navigation Returns, and they show this: that during the last year we paid into the Treasury for duties on sugar $154,910 more than the average for the five years previous."

That was five years previous to 1879; his argument was based on that. Further down you will find he says:

"There is the fact: $154,000 more were received during the last year than the average of the five years previous; so much with regard to the anticipated loss of revenue."

Again, on page 33, he comes back to this subject. He rolls it as a sweet morsel under his tongue. He says: "So far as the revenue is concerned there has been no loss." Sir, I propose to show to the House that that was a statement the hon. Minister of Finance ought not to have made. I propose to show that that was a statement made, whether designedly or not I do not know, which was misleading in itself, and should not have received the authority of his utterance. He hid the important fact from the people of Canada that though his calculation was based upon the amount of duty actually paid on the average of the five years previous, that there was, last year, imported 28,749,648 lbs. more sugar than was imported on an average during the five years for which he took his average.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Commoner sugar.

Mr. PATERSON. How much commoner?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Because it was refined.

Mr. PATERSON. I grant the hon. gentleman that, but what would that bring it down to in refined sugar? Let him give me his basis and I will work it out.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. You cannot work it out on my basis.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes, I can, if you will give it to me, in a minute. But I would say more than that. I understand there has been a deputation of sugar refiners to the hon. Minister of Finance wanting a drawback on sugar. Now, if he has listened to them it would be part of his duty, before fixing the drawback, to know exactly from them how much they would get out of 100 lbs. of raw sugar. Let me ask the hon. Minister of Finance if he has arrived at that.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have not worked it out yet. We have not worked it out because the time has not arrived. We are at it now before we give them an answer.

Mr. PATERSON. Let me say this: that I have taken as a basis 12½ per cent., and the hon. the Minister of Finance dare not ask me to take a higher statement than that, because even that statement reduces the actual import and consumption of sugar last year down to a point that had been reached under the Mackenzie Administration, and for him to take that point would have been tantamount to an admission that less sugar has been consumed by these hundreds of thousands of extra people that he has brought into the country, than was consumed before. That stopped him from taking that line of argument. He dare not go beyond 12½ per cent. Therefore, I think I am safe in holding him to my basis of 12½ per cent. Now let us work out his calculation. I have worked at his calculation, and I find that instead of $154,910 more duty being paid in than during the average of the five years previous, that the average was $145,856. But I shall not dispute upon that point at all. I will assume that the hon. Minister's figures of $154,910 are correct. In order to ascertain the effect on revenue, we have to multiply that 28,749,648 lbs. by $2.15 per 100 lbs., the rate of duty during the five years that the hon. the Finance Minister took, and we find that we should have had, on last year's importations, $622,417 more of duty than we had during the average of the five years mentioned. Now, deduct from that the $154,910 extra which he says we got, and we find that the net loss to the revenue was $467,507. The House will agree with me that the hon. the Finance Minister, when he made that statement, was not justified in withholding the fact, when he stated that we had received $154,910 more of revenue, that there had been 28,749,648 more pounds of sugar imported. Now, take that loss of revenue, and add it to the increased cost, and you arrive at the neighborhood of $1,400,000 of a loss to the people of this country. Now, I desire to refer to some figures given to the House by the very valuable hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). I will do him the credit of saying he understands the sugar question as well as any hon. member on the other side of the House. In speaking in the House and the country of the figures he gave in 1880, he has stated that they had never been questioned on the floor of Parliament, that they had never been refuted, and therefore he understood that they were correct. Well, Sir, on the outside platform, where most of the iniquities of this Government have to be exposed, one has not time to elaborate on this sugar iniquity, and therefore I have pointed out that if what the hon. member for Cardwell says is true, that the people are getting their sugar for less money than they were when the old Tariff was in force, the Redpath refinery would never have been closed up. But I will show the hon. member for Cardwell where he was wrong in 1880; and I am sure that when I point it out to him, he will, with his usual candour, confess that he was mistaken in his figures, and that the deductions which he drew from them were therefore incorrect. On page 828 of the Hansard of 1880, the hon. member said :

"In November last, sugar was quoted in New York at $8.00 per 100 lbs, net cash in bond, after the drawback was deducted. Under the Tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite the cost in New York would have been $8.00; 25 per cent. and one cent duty, and freight and the other charges, would have made the total cost of the sugar in Canada $11.35 per 100 lbs. The highest price reached in Canada last year was $10.33."

The hon. member for Cardwell made there a very strange mistake when he states that the highest price paid in Canada during that year was $10.33, and I judge that he takes his figures from the report of the Montreal Corn Exchange, which I find are the same. Now, the highest price in November of that year in New York, instead of being $8.00 per 100 lbs, as the hon. gentleman says, I find by the Shipping List, the accuracy of which no man will deny, was $11.00 per 100 lbs. Deduct from that the drawback of $3.17, and you will find that the net price, instead of being $8 for 100 lbs., was only $7.83 per 100 lbs.; so that the hon. gentleman was 17 cents wrong with reference to the New York price. He also said that "the highest price reached in Canada last year was $10.33;" and yet on a preceding page of the same speech, the hon. member himself inserts a table, taken from the Montreal Corn Exchange Report, showing that the highest price in 1879 was $11.12 per 100 lbs. Now, let us work out the revenue from the correct figures. The net price of granulated sugar in New York was $7.83, instead of $8, as the hon. gentleman said, a difference of 17 cents; the net price in Montreal during the same period was $11.12, instead of $10.33, as he said, a difference of 79 cents; add the 79 cents that he was wrong in the Canadian price, and the 17 cents that he was wrong in the New York price, and you find that he was wrong to the extent of 96 cents per 100 lbs. Multiply the 100,000,000 lbs. in round numbers of refined sugar that we made in Canada by that 96 cents, and the result gives $960,000 in favor of the Canadian refiner over and above what the hon. gentleman stated. To that you add the $467,507, lost revenue, and you find that the total loss, in 1880, to the Canadian consumer, was $1,460,000. I have still another table to give you. We know that the duties were imposed on refined sugar, and the average price, in 1880, was $9.85—that is, the long price. The gold price was $6.18, but I take $6.20, for I have figured it out on this basis, and it is a little in favor of the hon. Minister. The duty charged under the Tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite on granulated from the United States is what? The people of this country do not know how their sugar is taxed and what they are paying by way of duty. The granulated sugar from New York is taxed, if it comes from there, to the amount of 69 per cent., or 69 cents on every dollar. It is enormous. The rate of taxation on the raw sugar imported by the Canadian refiner, is 48 per cent; therefore, the Canadian refiner has a protection against the American refiner of 21 per cent. That was the result in 1880. In 1881 the figures differ, but worked out by the same process we find 67 per cent. as the average rate of duty on American granulated coming into this market, and still a protection of 21 per cent. to the Canadian refiner. Just imagine an advantage of 21 per cent. given to Canadian refiners! If it were not that the Tariff is somewhat easier against Scotch yellows and sugars from Glasgow, people would have to pay that enormous amount of taxation, or go without the sugar. Twenty-one per cent. on 100,000,000 lbs., the capacity of our refineries, would give over $2,000,000 advantage; but that is somewhat reduced by the fact that the sugars were not imported from there. Let me give the hon. the Finance Minister, who sits chuckling there, some figures to chuckle over, which figures he furnished himself. Let him look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, and he will find that on number 14 and upwards, on Scotch refined and sugars of that class, there is an average duty on the raw sugar that the refiners brought in of 10 per cent. protection. Let him apply that to the 100,000,000 lbs. which our refineries can turn out, and it will appear that our refineries have $1,000,000 advantage. Look at the question in the light of any of the tables I have given the House, and it will be found that a loss of $1,400,000 or $1,500,000 accrues to the people of Canada. The hon. the Finance Minister, in 1881, when he was talking on this question, admitted that we lost $700,000 on the revenue, but said that part of the sugar that should be rightly charged to the revenue had been paid in during some months of the preceding year, and this quantity would have reduced the sum to about $500,000. But he said, suppose that were the case where has that money gone? In the opinion of some it has gone into the pockets of the refiners, but he said that that was a mistake, he would tell them where it had gone. It had gone into coal consumed, 60,000 tons, of which the Nova Scotians obtained the benefit; 400 men employed at $400 per annum, making $160,000; a vast amount of shipping engaged between the West Indies and Montreal, and other ports, employing a certain number of men, and for the use of which freight was paid; and the hon. gentleman gave the benefit to the Canadian refiners of interest on capital invested, of sinking fund to cover wear and tear, and every item of that kind, and he then says there is where the $700,000 have gone. He contended that the people of Canada received all the benefit from that outlay, that while they lost in one way they gained in another. It is all nonsense.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That settles it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It cannot settle it in the estimation of the hon. gentleman, simply because I make the statement; but if I prove it from his own words, as I propose to do, he dare not refute it. The hon. gentleman talks about this extra money going back to the people by way of employment, but the figures I have given you show that over and above employing and paying those men, the purchase of coal, freight, the cost of shipping and everything else, there is a loss of $1,400,000. On February 18th, 1881, the hon. Finance Minister said:

"Now, you will recollect that the duties collected in 1878, were upon refined sugar manufactured to a large extent in the United States and imported from there, and, therefore, we paid duty upon the labor of the refiner of the sugar upon which freight was paid, and upon other charges and expenditures in the same connection, which increased the value, under that operation, to $746,390."

So the hon. Finance Minister himself stated that we had to pay for the coal, freight and labor used in the American refineries, just as the Canadian refineries had to pay for those items. Our calculations are on the refined sugar after it has been enhanced in cost by American refiners' expenses. The Canadian refiners might have kept their men at work, and the refineries open, and ships have brought sugar from distant ports, and yet this country would have been benefited by $1,400,000, according to the tables I have given the House. I desire to read to the House, for I desire to give my authority—because the hon. Minister of Finance can do something in the sneering line, if not in the argumentative line—the statement of the proprietor of the Montreal Sugar Refinery, given before the Trade and Depression Committee, with respect to what he required in order to maintain his works in operation. He said:

"All I want from the Canadian Parliament is, that we shall have raw sugar admitted at as low an ad valorem as is charged on refined sugar."

Instead of the Government granting them what the refiners expressly desired in 1876 they gave them 21 per cent. advantage over the American refiners on white sugars, and about 10 per cent. on the English and Scotch sugars, besides the cost of freight to this country. And yet, Sir, hon. gentlemen will tell us, I suppose, that having given this advantage to the refiners they will not avail themselves of it. It is an insult to the common sense of this House to say that a man who has been given such an advantage by law will not use it, and the tables I have read to the House prove that these refiners have used it. Let us look a little at this matter of the $1,400,000 of a loss that Canada has sustained for the benefit of sugar refiners, and see what use might be made of such a sum by a wise and judicious Tariff arrangement. If the duties were levied as they should be levied—if that $1,400,000 which goes out of the pockets of the people of this country just as effectually as if it had gone into the Treasury—I say if it went into the Treasury and was then taken out for the benefit of the people, what would have been the effect? The free tea that hon. gentlemen talk about having given us, and the free breakfast table, would have been ours. The poor man's fuel, upon which he now pays $600,000 taxation during the winter months, would have been given him free. The flour, the corn, the meal of the hardy mariners and fishermen which are now taxed so heavily would have been free, and you would have had within a fraction of as much money in the Treasury as you have with the enormous taxation under the present system. Supposing that this $1,400,000, instead of going into the pockets of a certain few favored men, went into the Treasury of this Dominion, and that it were afterwards taken out of the Treasury, what could be done with it? I have the figures furnished by the hon. Finance Minister himself. He tells us that the average wages of the employes in these sugar refineries are about $400 per annum, but with this sum I have named the Government could bring 3,500 men from any other country into this, who, each with his wife and three children, would make up a total of 17,500 souls. They could bring these men into the country and board and keep them without doing a stroke of work—just give them $400 a year for their support—and they would eat up the butter, the chickens, the corn and the eggs which the farmers would have to sell; and yet the people of this country would not be a cent poorer than they are to-day. Let us take it in another way. We could take these 3,500 men and divide them up among the counties of Ontario, and we could put 60 of these men, or 300 souls, in every county of that Province, where they could consume the farmers' products and furnish a home market for him. Or we could divide them up among the farmers to labor on the farms, whereby the farmers could get the benefit, instead of the few monopolists, whom I do not blame, as you and I would take the advantage they enjoy, if we had the opportunity. If we were to place these men in the Province of Quebec about the same state of things would exist. If you take them to the Province of New Brunswick, which I think has not been benefitted much by the Tariff, and distribute them among the fourteen counties in that Province, there would be about 250 men or 1,250 souls to feed. In Nova Scotia there would be about 200 men or 1,000 souls to feed distributed in the same way, or in Prince Edward Island, where, according to the hon. Minister of Finance, there are twenty-eight extra hands employed, under this Tariff, to consume the products of that Island, there would be about 3,000 people under the system I am suggesting and the country would not have to pay 1 cent for them. My first proposition was that the people of this country pay a sum greatly in excess of the cost of sugar from abroad, and I flatter myself that I have succeeded in establishing that proposition. My next proposition is that the people of this country are still liable to pay a greatly enhanced price over and above the price of that article abroad. In a previous discussion—to which I may be permitted to refer incidentally—I admitted as a business man, because I believe it, that when the manufacturing firms in a certain line become so numerous that they produced more than the country wants, then competition puts down the prices of the article to the consumer, and that the second stage is reached when the consumer has no more to pay for his goods. There were three exceptions which I mentioned: Either that the manufacturers will combine to restrict production and force up the prices, or that the raw material of the manufacturer, being taxed, he may be compelled to charge a higher price than the price in a foreign country; or, third, that the home manufacturer being unduly protected and not feeling the effects of keen competition, is left to get on with his business in a humdrum way, without efficient machinery, and is therefore unable to turn out his goods as cheaply as his foreign competitor. With these three exceptions, when you reach a point where there are more goods than the country wants, the consumer does not suffer loss. I am told that we have reached that point with regard to sugar, and I believe we have the testimony of one of the proprietors of the Redpath concern, that their capacity was 60,000,000 lbs. per annum. Two refineries of that capacity would turn out almost all the refined sugar this country requires, while we have four in operation, some of them not quite so large. One of them, I believe, has suspended for a time, it is true, but, no doubt, it will resume again. The trouble is, that the farmers cannot combine to raise the prices of the articles which they produce. They have reached the second stage of Protection, but they are too numerous to put an extra price on farm products, and, as every one knows, you cannot get farmers to combine. On the other hand, it is quite clear that, when you have an industry in which are engaged, at the very most, two or three concerns, which are able to supply the whole wants of the country, they can get up a very close combination. They can at any time easily unite, when their interests point in that direction, and restrict the production, and put up the prices to as high a figure as the Tariff enables them to go. As the sugar refineries must always remain very limited in number, or, at least, for years and years to come, it is inevitable that they will have the power to combine. But there has been, and is now, an understanding with reference to their prices. You may ask them for their prices, and you will find they agree every time. The only deviation made, the only fall that occurs is when some enterprising importer imports from the West Indies a cargo of raw sugar, or, in spite of the 10 per cent. duty, a cargo of Scotch sugars. As soon as the refiners know that an importer has been public spirited enough to bring in foreign sugars, instructions go out, as I have been informed by men who know, to drop prices for the purpose of making that public spirited importer's venture so unprofitable that he will not dare to repeat it, and thus have the market of Canada exclusively to themselves. Whenever there has been a drop in prices, it has invariably occurred in that way. But, hon. gentlemen have said, the refinery at Halifax has been closed, thus disproving your statement as to the enormous profits. It disproves nothing of the kind. Not long ago we had a report, well founded, I am sorry to say, of the failure of a very large sewing machine company in this country. A day or two after the hon. the Finance Minister rose and read a letter from a similar factory in Montreal, stating it never did so good a business as then, never made such large profits. There you have within one week the statement of one failure and the contrary statement of heavy profits and large business by another firm. There are outside influences that enter into the successes of business men. The hon. the Finance Minister himself admits that this refinery at Halifax was not well managed, and if we might judge by the facts that come to our knowledge with reference to this sugar matter, we can understand, perhaps, how it is a firm of that kind should fail. The hon. member for Bothwell, the other night, told the House that Mr. Gladstone—who, unlike our hon. Finance Minister, when he was approached by these gentlemen wanting favors, never grants them until he probes their business to the bottom and learns exactly how much profits they are going to make—asked these sugar refiners who came to him for relief, how much sugar can a man turn out, and was told that a man could turn out about 350,000 lbs. per annum. That is what the operatives can do in the sugar refineries of the Old Country. The hon. Finance Minister told us there were 885 hands employed in the sugar refineries of Canada, turning out the quantity of sugar refined in those manufactories. The information supplied to Mr. Gladstone by these sugar refiners proves that 300 men in the refineries of Great Britain turn out what 885 men turn out here. If the sugar refineries of this country, through defective machinery, or carelessness, or anything else, are obliged to employ three men when one ought to be sufficient, are the people of Canada to pay for that kind of enterprise? It is no concern of the people of Canada whether the Redpaths or any other concern employ 50 men to do what one man can do in another country; but if the Government and the people of Canada are paying the Redpaths they have a right to demand from them that they get as much labor from one man as that same man can give working in any other country. If this machinery is defective, must the Canadian consumer pay dearer for sugar for all time in order that these men may derive a large profit without incurring the expense of providing proper machinery? Not only have our people paid during the last two years, but they are liable to pay a greatly increased price for their sugar compared with what they would pay if it were imported. My third proposition is that the duties are excessive, as shown by my statement, and ought to be reduced. Let me refer to the speech of the hon. member for Cardwell in 1880, in which he alluded to the remarks I had made with reference to the profits of these refiners. He said:

"But we were told, I think, by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), in those magnificent tones in which he addresses the House—"

I do not know how it is, but hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be disappointed with my voice. They seem to think I speak too loud. In almost every speech made by hon. gentlemen opposite, I find allusions to my tones. I do not know what is the trouble with them, but when I have truth to tell, I like to tell it clearly and strongly. I think there is nothing to be gained by mumbling over figures and facts. Therefore, if hon. members opposite will speak of my remarks in the complimentary terms used by the hon. member for Cardwell, I will be only too glad to acknowledge the compliment. Mr. White continues:

"That Messrs Redpath & Co. have cleared $600,000 in a single year by the operation of this Tariff. How he managed to get the exact figures of their profits must puzzle most hon. members. It is not usual for merchants to give their account books to members of Parliament for the purpose of enabling them to state their exact profits."

They did not make that amount, the hon. member for Cardwell says. He asks, how did I know they did. I ask how did he know they did not unless he saw their books. I believe the hon. gentleman is a favorite with the sugar refiners. I believe they have found out what I found out some time ago, and formed the opinion that they required an advocate, and a more able one than the hon. gentleman they could not find, and they have been confidential enough, perhaps, to tell him that they did not make that much. But the hon. gentleman does not say how much less they make. Notice what follows. He says: "They did not make that amount, though I wish they had;" and then goes into an argument that looks as if it were very near the figure. He states:

"The simple question arises whether we had better not have, after the results I have shown to flow from this policy, $600,000, made in a single year by Canadians, added to the wealth of the people of this country, than made by Americans, to be added to their wealth and strength and to be expended in the United States."

Now here follows a little good straight Tory doctrine. These hon. gentlemen often ask us for our policy. They will find our policy before the close of this Session. They will find it clear and defined. They will find it clear upon this sugar question, that is one of the planks. What does he say:

"The wealth of a country is, after all, to be found in the wealth of its individual citizens, and just in proportion as we can build up trade and make it profitable for capitalists to come here and make fortunes instead of going to the United States, adding by their wealth to the resources of our civilization, just in that proportion will we make the country desirable to live in, and protect and foster its best interests."

There is the old Tory doctrine. According to the Tory idea this country is to be made a desirable country to live in by taking out of the pockets of the working people, the laborers, artisans, mechanics, fishermen, lumbermen and agriculturists of the country, $1,400,000 cash and give it to a few concerns, because, after all, great wealth in few hands is what makes a country desirable to live in. Sir, the Reform party hold that this is a wrong principle. The Reform party are second to none in desiring to see men of wealth and energy in this country, but they desire these men to accumulate their capital by an expenditure of energy, and they object to the people being bound to give to any favored few men in this country the immense fortunes that they toil for, in order that we may have a few rich individuals who will be, as the hon. member for Cardwell tell us, after all, the backbone of this country.

Mr. FARROW. Is not sugar cheaper now than it was before.

Mr. PATERSON. I am glad the hon. gentleman asked me that question, because I have not touched upon it, yet it is just one of those fallacies adopted by those hon. gentlemen opposite in order, if possible, to cover up the actual facts of the case. Why, Sir, what has the question, whether sugar is cheaper now, to do with the argument in this question? That may do for men who are talking to an audience that do not understand the question; but, in the Canadian Parliament, no representative ought to be found rising and alleging, as a reason, that a man's arguments and figures are erroneous because you get a certain article cheaper now than you did before. If I was to answer that hon. gentleman, I would tell him no. Before a duty was put on coal it was lower than it is now. A year after the duty was imposed it rose $2 a ton. What is the matter? Butter, two or three years ago, sold at 9 cents a pound; within the past year it sold at 20 cents a pound. What is the matter? Why it is simply an absurdity for any man to allege as an argument in this House, when we are debating a question that is essentially a question of figures, that is essentially a matter of statistics, that is essentially a matter from which deductions must be drawn from facts and figures that are before us, to ask a question as to whether sugar is cheaper now than it was some time ago. Why, Sir, there are rises and falls in the value of articles outside the mere question of duties altogether. Whether there be no duty, or whether there be a duty of 100 per cent., articles of merchandize will fluctuate in value, one year up and another year down, but the fluctuations have nothing more to do with the argument we are engaged in now, than it would be to allege that because coal has gone up now some $2 a ton higher than it was before, that the imposition of 50 cents duty had made coal $2 higher—not one bit more ridiculous. Now, I do not wish to take up more time; I want to give the hon. member for Cardwell an opportunity to speak, and, perhaps, when he gets through, if he makes any mistakes, he will be kind enough to allow me to correct him, as I will esteem it a favor if he will correct any error in the figures I have given. I have only to sum up and say, that I have endeavored to prove that we have, during the past two years, paid an exceeding great amount for our sugar, over and above keeping our refineries open and employing labor, over and above all the duties that have gone into the Treasury for the last two years. I have proved it by reducing the total imports to a granulated basis, amounting to 12½ per cent. reduction, and the hon. member for Cardwell dare not ask me to take a basis higher than that, because it would reduce the imports of sugar down to what they were when, as he and his friends have told us, we were buying our sugar in England and Scotland. On that basis I have proved my statement by the fact of the advantage the Canadian refiner has in his own market over and above what the American refiner has, and I have arrived at the same results. I have proved it by the hon. the Minister of Finance's statement in 1880, taking his own figures, and working it out on the basis of an addition of 25 cents per 100 lbs. that he admitted, and 35 cents that he had no business to charge in respect to the freight. I have proved it by the statement made this year, when he hid from the people, in giving to us the increased amount of duty, the extra amount of pounds that had been imported. I have proved it from the figures given to us in the calculations worked out by the hon. member for Cardwell in the year 1881. I have done more, I have shown, by figures that cannot be disputed, that the protection of Canadian refiners as against the American refiners, and as against the Scotch refiners, has had this result: that if it had been calculated on what sugars were imported over No. 14, on that basis we have lost $1,500,000 in our sugar duties. In reference to my second argument, the hon. gentleman himself has admitted that the sugar refineries can never increase in number, and if they do, it must tend to restrict production, and in doing that we must pay their prices. Having established these points, I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me when I tell them the sugar from the United States is taxed 69 per cent. that there is already an average of 48 per cent. on the raw sugar, which gives 21 per cent. against the American and 10 per cent. against the Scotch refiners; that there is, consequently, a crying injustice in the sugar Tariff as it is arranged, which warrants me in placing in your hands the following resolution, seconded by Mr. Gunn:—

“That under the operations of the existing duties on sugar the people have paid, and are liable to pay for that article, a price largely in excess of the cost abroad of sugar, after adding the Canadian duty and freight to the point of consumption,—that the duties on sugar are excessive, and should be so amended as to reduce the great burden they impose upon the people.”

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the hon. member for South Brant to desire to close the sugar refineries. As I understand his argument, it is that the duties should be so reduced or so readjusted, as that while largely lessening the burdens of the people, it will at the same time enable refiners, who look after their business, to carry on that business in Canada. That I understand is the proposition of the hon. gentleman. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is in error in his argument, judging from history in connection with the sugar refining business in this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite were in office for five years. They had an opportunity of fixing the sugar duties as they might desire to fix them, and the result of their operations was that the only sugar refinery in Canada was closed, that a capital of from $500,000 to $600,000 was allowed to remain idle for four years, and that it was not until a change in the duties took place that the refinery was reopened and the refining business in Canada re-established. I would like to know why the hon. member, if he has discovered some talismanic method by which he can remove the burdens on the people, as he points out in his resolution, and at the same time maintain the refineries in operation, did not make the suggestion of the precise method of doing it to the late hon. Minister of Finance when he was in office. It certainly was not to the advantage of Canada that the sugar refinery should have been closed, that this industry, which all men who have studied these questions at all, admit to be of very great importance, should have been driven out of the country, and, therefore, I cannot but regret that the hon. member for South Brant, who appears to have made the subject one of special study, who appears to have ascertained with precise accuracy how much refined sugar can be obtained from a certain quantity of raw sugar, exactly how much profit the refiner can obtain, did not, when he had an opportunity, and was in the confidence of the party in power, make those suggestions, which they might have had some effect. Sir, I think the hon. gentleman, when he told the House—referring to the failure of the sugar refinery in Halifax—that there were various causes which led to the failure of people in business, that it required skill, enterprise, energy and attention to succeed in business, practically answered the whole argument which he presented to the House during the speech which he had delivered. Surely, Mr. Speaker, a business that realises the enormous profits of which he spoke, which has put into

he pockets of the refiners of Canada $1,400,000 a year by way of profit over and above all expenditures which they have made in the operation of refining, ought to be able to sustain itself at least for a few months in Halifax. Unfortunately the failure of that business there, as the failure of a similar business a few years ago in Montreal, proves this: that all the stories of the enormous profits of refiners are simply fables, with which to tickle the ears of the people, that they have no foundation in fact, and that sugar refining in Canada requires quite as great skill and energy, and the expenditure of quite as much capital, as any other business in which the people of this country are engaged. Sir, there are two views which I propose to take of this question, two aspects with which I propose to deal in the remarks I intend to address to the House, and which, I hope, will not be very lengthy. The first is whether it is worth while to protect the business of sugar refining in this country at all. I am aware that during recent years the ex-Finance Minister has dealt with this question of sugar refining, as if it were a matter of very little consequence to the country. He spoke of "washing our sugar at home" as a matter of so little consequence that it was not worth while to give consideration to it; yet I propose to show that the hon. gentleman, only a few years ago, did regard sugar refining as of some value to the country, and was prepared, if Parliament had accepted his proposal, to have placed a Tariff on the Statute-Book, quite as protective as that which is on the Statute-Book to-day. When I had the honor of discussing this question on the floor of the House on a former occasion, I ventured to refer, as of some value, to the opinions of a gentleman in the United States, whose opinions have been frequently cited by hon. gentlemen opposite as those which ought to guide us in trade matters—I refer to Mr. David A. Wells—and I propose, very briefly indeed, to repeat one or two quotations which I then made, not for the purpose simply of enforcing the fact that even so great a free trader as Mr. Wells considered the question of sugar refining as one which stood out from the rest of the industries of the country, and was entitled, from its peculiar circumstances to the support and protection of the Government, but for the purpose of illustrating the argument which I intend later on to enforce. Mr. Wells, in a pamphlet which he wrote, strongly maintaining the importance of sugar refining and the wisdom of the policy of the Government which sustained that industry, used these words:

"Any exhibit of this great interest which should stop here would, however, be exceedingly incomplete, for, unlike tea or coffee, which are imported in a condition suitable to enter into immediate domestic consumption, nearly all the immense sugar product of foreign countries, which comes, or rather is permitted to come, under the existing Tariff, to the United States, as well as no inconsiderable portion of the domestic product, is wholly unfit to enter into consumption until it has undergone a process of refining or purification. According to the Census of 1870, this business of sugar refining, measured by the value of its product, ranked ninth in the order of importance of the so-called manufacturing industries of the country, 4,597 hands being employed, with an annual disbursement of $3,177,288 in wages. But the statistics accepted by the trade, in 1878, give to the existing business of sugar refining a much higher place among the industries of the country than was assigned to it by the Census relations of 1870, and indicate a present employment of some 10,000 men, and also that before the 1,500,000,000 lbs. of foreign sugar annually imported into this country, enter into consumption, the refiners expend, in order to make the same marketable to the people, an average of 1 cent per lb., or an aggregate of some $15,000,000 per annum. And yet further, that of this grand annual expenditure, a very large proportion accrues to labor of a multifarious character, employed in a great part directly within the refineries."

Here is the statement of Mr. Wells, that the refiners of the United States expend about one cent per lb. in the conversion of the raw sugar into the refined article fit for the tables of the people. After pointing out, Sir, that the higher the grade of raw sugar imported the less "home labor"—as Mr. Wells called it—is employed upon it, and the lower the grade the more home labor, Mr. Wells went on to apportion the expenditure in sugar refining as follows:

"For labor direct 30 per cent.; for packages the material for which are derived entirely from the northern States, 30 per cent.; fuel, coal, 12 per cent.; bone black, machinery, cartage &c., 28 per cent. The 1,500,000,000 lbs. of sugar annually refined in the United States, require the expenditure at the very least, for refining, of 1 cent per lb. on the average, or what is the same thing, $15,000,000 per annum, which is directly disbursed by the domestic sugar refining interest on account of labor, materials and capital."

Then, coming to deal with a question which, to an economist like him, was of great importance, the question of the cost to the people of the sugar that is produced, he made this statement:

"The American sugar refiners, the magnitude and comparative rank of whose industry has already been noticed, claim—and their claim is generally admitted—that they can make refined sugar cheaper than it can at present be produced in Europe, or any other country; and it is a fact little known to the American public that, if the duties now levied on imported sugars were deducted, the American refiners do now actually sell their sugar, on an average, some 11 cents per 100 lbs. cheaper than do the refiners of England, which country now permits the importation of all sugars free of duty."

That was the statement of a gentleman who, as I have already said, has certainly always been accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite as an authority on matters of trade. But, Sir, he is not the only authority which may be cited as of importance on this subject of sugar refining. I shall cite the authority of the hon. Finance Minister of the late Government. You will remember, Sir, that when that hon. gentleman brought in his first Tariff in 1874, he included in it certain modifications of the duties on sugar. The Tariff at that time was:—equal to and above No. 9 Dutch Standard, 25 per cent ad valorem, and 1 cent per lb. specific; below No. 9, Dutch Standard, 25 per cent ad valorem, and a specific duty of $\frac{3}{4}$ cent per lb.; melado, cane juice, &c., 25 per cent ad valorem $\frac{5}{8}$ cent per lb. The proposal made by the hon. gentleman was as follows: Equal to and above No. 16, Dutch Standard, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb. and 25 per cent ad valorem; equal to and above 13 and below 16, 1 $\frac{1}{4}$ cents per lb. and 25 per cent ad valorem, the lower grades being left as they were before. That was the protection which the hon. gentleman proposed to give to the sugar refining industry under the Tariff which he brought down in 1874. But the hon. gentleman had some difficulty with some of his friends in the country, and I dare say the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gunn) who sits behind the Knight from Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) will remember some of the circumstances connected with that difficulty with his supporters, who believed that a Tariff of that kind would practically shut out the higher grades of sugar and give a complete monopoly to the refiners of Canada, there being at the time but one refiner in the country. A fortnight later the hon. gentleman came down with a complete change of his Tariff—a change so complete that no one would have recognized in the later proposals the proposals which were made at an earlier period. On that occasion he made this statement, according to the report of his speech, published in one of the newspapers:

"He then alluded to the controversy in the case of sugars, and the difficulties there were in dealing with the question, and, in consequence the Government had decided to defer for the present any action in the matter. They did not mean to say that they were satisfied with the existing state of things; but they recognized the serious practical difficulty which existed, and they would restore sugars to the position they occupied previously."

Now, Sir, here was an announcement, a regretful announcement, by the hon. gentleman that he was not able to give, practically, a monopoly to the sugar refining industry. Here was a regretful announcement that, although for the time being he was compelled to give up that idea, the subject would be considered, and probably he would be able to do something at a later period for the refineries. And he did do something later. A year later—in 1875—the hon. gentleman, I think, without reference to Parliament at all—I speak from memory and therefore under correction—but on the authority of an Order in Council he altered the duties, and on the 10th of April a circular was issued to the Collectors of Customs announcing the change. The duties were changed in this way: All above 13, 1 cent per lb. and 25 per cent. ad valorem; 9 to 13 inclusive, $\frac{3}{4}$ cents per lb. and 25 per cent. ad valorem; below 9 and melado, $\frac{3}{8}$ cents per lb. and 25 per cent. ad valorem. I venture to say that if the hon. gentleman who made the speech on this subject to-day, will take the difference between those figures and make a comparison, such as he made in his speech, he will find on his method of reasoning that there was a very substantial protection to the refineries. It may be asked if the hon. gentleman made an arrangement of that kind; if he issued a circular to the Collectors of Customs reducing very low the duty on the raw material—which in fact, constitutes a protection to the refiners of the country—why, notwithstanding that protection, the refiners broke down? The reason was this: I have reason to think, though I do not know, that he was pressed at that time to go one step further and protect these refiners against the bounty which the drawback allowed in the United States practically gave to the refiners of that country; and the refiners broke down at that time almost as much from the absence of some protection against that concealed bounty, as from the absence of adequate protection in the arrangement of the duties themselves. I refer to this simply for the purpose of pointing out that at that time, in the earlier career of the hon. gentleman as a Finance Minister, he recognized that sugar refining in Canada was an industry to be protected; and, in the first instance, tried to induce Parliament to pass a Tariff which was, in itself, far more protective than the one now upon the Statute-Book; and that, failing in that, he subsequently issued a circular, by Order in Council, under which he gave a very materially improved protection to the sugar refiners of the country. Now, Sir, we have these two great authorities on political economy, and on the relations in which the Government should stand to the industries of the country, Mr. David A. Wells, of the United States, and the hon. member for Centre Huron, united—in the one case in a pamphlet, in the other case in the form of an attempt to get an Act of Parliament and afterwards by means of a departmental circular—as to the importance to the country of sugar refining. I think I may, therefore, assume that it is too late for hon. gentlemen opposite to take the ground that the refiners ought not to have some reasonable consideration in the arrangement of the duties, so that they may be enabled to continue their operations in the future as they have been doing for the last two or three years. The hon. member for Brant, in the course of his speech, made some reference to the great loss of revenue resulting from this Tariff, and took the year 1879 and 1880 as one of the years for his comparison. Now, the hon. gentleman, in dealing with this question on the floor of this House, can surely afford to be fair. I hold that the year 1879-80, the first complete year under the Tariff, is not a fair year for comparison in connection with any matter affecting the Customs duties. But we may go back, and we ought to go back, to the year 1877-78, the last complete year before the change of the Tariff, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. Now, I find that the duty paid on all kinds of sugar, in 1878, was \$2,584,379, and in 1881, was \$2,440,855, or a difference of \$143,524 in favor of the former year. That is to say, we apparently lost in duty last year, as compared with the last complete year before the Tariff was brought in, \$143,524. Of course, we all understand that this loss was due to the fact that in the former years the importations were almost entirely of the higher grades, and during the latter year almost entirely of the lower grades.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

Mr. PATERSON. You forget the extra lbs. imported in 1881.

Mr. WHITE. On the statement of the hon. gentleman as to the quantity of refined sugar which can be obtained from the lower grades of sugar, I do not think there is very much difference between the two. Now, Sir, the value of the sugar imported in 1878, was $6,142,014, which was imported by the merchants of Canada, and the value, in 1881, was $5,070,040, which was imported chiefly by or for the refiners, a difference in the value of the imported sugar of $1,071,974 in favor of the former year. Now, it has been said by the hon. gentleman that this difference, and the difference in the duty, together make up the profit of the refiners. Let us look at this proportion. In 1881, there were imported altogether, of all kinds of sugar, 135,126,176 lbs., and, in 1878, 108,951,920, or a greater quantity, in 1881, by 26,174,256 lbs. But if we deduct the importations over 14, which may be said to include the finer grades of yellow sugar, and all white sugar, we shall find that the quantity of sugar imported mainly for refining purposes last year was 119,268,171 lbs. Now, Mr. David A. Wells, the prophet of political economy of hon. gentlemen opposite, states that it costs one cent a pound to refine sugar, and this conclusion he says he arrived at after a careful examination of the books of several refiners in the United States. If we assume that to be correct, what do we find? That there was expended in the operation of refining the sugar imported last year, $1,192,681, or a difference between the cost of refining the sugar and the difference in the value of the quantity brought in in 1881 as compared with 1878, of $22,817. That represents the profit to the refiners, over and above the expenditures that they have to make, and a reasonable interest on capital, instead of the enormous profit of $1,417,000 referred to by the hon. gentleman. Well, Sir, how is that money expended? I believe I am right in stating that there are employed in connection with the four refineries in Canada, about 1,200 men; if you put the wages of these men at an average of a dollar a day—and that is very much less than most of these men are receiving—you will have no less than $360,000 paid in wages by these sugar refiners. Then these refineries consume from 50,000 to 60,000 tons of coal per annum, and I think I am right in saying that the coal consumed, as to nine-tenths of it, is Nova Scotia coal; and if you put that at a value of $3 a ton, which is a very low estimate, you have $180,000 expended for coal. Another item in connection with sugar refining is cooerage, and, so far as I have been able to ascertain, 350,000 barrels are annually required, of which the staves, hoops, and heads, are all of Canadian wood. I venture to think that hon. gentlemen will agree with me that a very important market has been given to certain classes of woods that, before the opening of refineries, had no market whatever in the country. In addition to that there were the horses employed, and the cartage, and the number of subsidiary trades, such as engineers, founders, carpenters, masons and others, employed in the various operations, and in the repairs connected with refining. All these things are so much direct advantage to the people of Canada, so much expenditure in the way of wages among them, which, under the system that prevailed when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, used to go to foreigners instead of to our people. I will ask this honorable House whether it is to the advantage of our people that that extra $1,000,000, which is the difference between the value of importations in 1878 and to-day, is not very much more to the advantage of Canada, whether it does not conduce more to our prosperity, than if it were expended in the employment of people in the United States. We are told, however—and I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will admit, at any rate, that it is to our advantage that millions of dollars should be expended in Canada if there were no compensating disadvantages—that there are compensating disadvantages, that the price of sugar to the consumer is very much greater than it would have been had the former Tariff remained in force. We must, in the discussion of this question, assume that if hon. gentlemen opposite were transferred to this side of the House—and God forbid that such a calamity should befall the Dominion—that they would go back to the Tariff which they considered a proper Tariff when they were in power. I do not know whether the hon. member for South Brant would have any more influence with the coming Finance Minister—and if all the stories be true, he is not likely to be the late Finance Minister—than he had with the late Finance Minister; but, under any circumstances, we must, for the sake of argument, assume that the sugar duties would be restored to their former position. That being the case, we can deal with this question as a mere mathematical problem. The speculations and fine-drawn theories of the hon. gentleman as to how much refined sugar you can get out of raw sugar, and the profit resulting to the refiner, may be accurate; but, as the hon. gentleman himself knows, even so great a statesman and economist as Mr. Gladstone was compelled to confess this question was one very difficult of solution, and which taxed even his great ability to solve, if he did succeed in solving it. If we can mathematically establish the fact that the people of Canada are not paying more for their sugar than they would under the Tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite, and without the refineries in Canada—basing our argument on the experience of the four years during which we had no refineries, and had the late Tariff—that is a method of dealing with this question which this honorable House and the country will consider much more satisfactory than the theories of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman was good enough to read from a speech of mine in which he says I was inaccurate in some figure that I gave, although he admits that I myself supplied the antidote by a table of figures which I presume he admits were absolutely correct, since he has not questioned their accuracy. When I spoke on the question outside this House, I stated that the table in which I gave the prices of sugars for the three periods, the 5th, the 15th and the 25th of each month from 1876 to 1879—that that table has never been challenged. It was prepared with very great care by experts in Montreal, and I believe it to be absolutely correct. I have not the speech to which the hon. gentleman refers in which he says the error of a figure occurred. Whether the error was made or not, the hon. gentleman admits that the table I gave was correct, because he checks my argument with my own tables. But take the last fifteen months, and if it be any object to hon. gentlemen, I can give the average for each month during that time. The averages are as follows:—

AVERAGE prices of granulated sugar in New York and Montreal during 1881, and first three months of 1882:—

	1881.	New York	Montreal.
January.....	$ 9 49		$ 9 60
February.....	9 16		9 33
March.....	9 29		9 16
April.....	9 38		9 04
May.....	9 87		9 36
June.....	10 54		10 23
July.....	10 08		10 12
August.....	9 76		9 41
September.....	10 01		9 31
October.....	10 06		9 22
November.....	9 72		9 24
December.....	9 29		9 22
1882.
January.....	9 50		9 06
February.....	9 25		8 81
March.....	9 38		8 80
Average.....	9 65		9 33

The average price of granulated in New York for the whole fifteen months, was $9.65 per 100 lbs., that is the whole of 1881 and the last three months of 1882. The average price in Montreal during the whole of these fifteen months, was $9.33. My hon. friend from Kingston, who knows a good deal about these subjects, will be able to check me if I am wrong in these figures. The difference in favor of Montreal—and mind you that is not my argument—in the average of that period was 32 cents per 100 lbs. How would this have been under the old Tariff, supposing the refineries were all wiped out. I take the price in New York $9.65, less the drawback, $3.15, leaving a balance of $6.50 as the gold price in bond for exportation. I add the Canadian duty under the late Tariff, 25 per cent., or $1.62½; 1 cent a lb. specific, $1 per 100 lbs.; and then the carriage which my hon. friend disputes, 30 cents per 100 lbs.

Mr. PATERSON. Leave that out.

Mr. WHITE. I will strike it out for the hon. gentleman in a little while, but I prefer to add it in the meantime for the purposes of this argument. The effect of the 30 cents is to make the several distributing points Canadian instead of American points. The price would have been, under these circumstances, $9.42½, as the average price for the last fifteen months in Montreal, importing from New York and taking as basis the prices in New York with the duty and charges under the old Tariff added. The actual average price in Montreal during those fifteen months, was $9.33. Thus the average price in Montreal for the last fifteen months of sugar was, on that basis, 9½ cents per lb. less than it would have been under the old Tariff, and if the refineries were not in existence. But, Sir, there is something to be added to this. During the four years when the Canadian refineries were silent, when nothing was being done in the way of refining in Canada, the average price of sugar, gold in bond, in New York, was $6.19 per 100 lbs., that is with the drawback off. The average price in Canada of that American sugar, with duty and charges paid, was $9.62 per 100 lbs. These are the actual prices in the two places irrespective of any calculation. Now, Sir, what should have been the price under the late Tariff, the duty was $2.55, calculated on the basis of 25 per cent and one cent per lb. and the carriage—the hon. gentleman will allow me to include it—30 cents, making together $3.04. But the actual price was $9.62, so that we paid no less than 58 cents in addition for general business of the merchant, his profit, the profit of the middleman, the wholesale merchant—my hon. friend from Kingston, for instance, who was a distributor in Canada for the products of the refineries of New York—in order to account for the ruling price in Canada. Fifty-eight cents is the actual result under a calculation, which is not a mere estimate, which is no fine-drawn theory, but which is the actual result ascertained; that is, if you take the average price, in gold, in bond, in New York for the four years before our refineries were opened, and add the duty under the old Tariff, and the 30 cents charges—I am bound to say that these are included—we have then still to add 58 cents as the profit of the merchants, who became the distributors in Canada for this sugar, in order to bring it up to the price which we paid for the American sugar during that time. Now, if we add 50 cents—and I have shown that it was 58 cents—to the average during these four years, what do we find? That during the last fifteen months the cost of this American sugar in Canada, under the late Customs Tariff, when our refineries were out of existence, would have been 59½ cents per 100 lbs. more than we paid in Canada during these fifteen months for Canadian refined sugar. Now, Sir, I will ask you whether that simple statement of facts—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has not Redpath's sugar to be distributed in the same manner as the American sugar was distributed?

Mr. WHITE. No, not in the same way.

Mr. PATERSON. It has to be distributed here.

Mr. WHITE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken, the smallest dealers in Ontario can and do buy sugar direct from the refiners.

Mr. PATERSON. But not at your prices.

Mr. WHITE. Yes, at these prices. There is no such distribution as the hon. gentleman speaks of, and that is the real ground of opposition to this Tariff on the part of my hon. friend from Kingston. If the wholesale merchants had this profit on the Montreal or Halifax or Moncton refined sugar, there would be no complaint about this Tariff at all. They are patriotic enough to desire, if they can make the same profits, that the expenditure on the refining should be made in Canada, instead of the United States; but it is because the smallest dealer almost comes into direct contact with the refiners here, which he did not do under the former state of things, that this difference takes place. I think, under these circumstances, I may fairly say that this is a sufficient answer to the argument of the hon. gentleman. But I will take the last three months, bringing it down to date; and I find that the average price of granulated sugar, in New York, was, for January, $9.50; February, $9.25, and March, $9.38 per 100 lbs., making the average for the three months, $9.38. I also find that in Montreal, during the same period, the average price was: For January, $9.06; February, $8.81, and March, $8.86, or an average for these three months of $8.89 per 100 lbs. Taking the comparison for these three months on the same basis, and taking the price at New York, and adding the old Tariff and the charges to which I have referred, and 50 cents for intermediate profit, I find that the cost of sugar would have been, in Canada, during the last three months, if we had had to import it under the old Tariff from the United States instead of refining it in Canada, the price, I say would have been $9.59. While the average price in the city of Montreal was $8.89, or a difference in favor of Montreal of 70 cents per 100 lbs.

Mr. PATERSON. Add another $1 for contingencies, and you will have $10.59.

Mr. WHITE. Then, Sir, I take the price of granulated sugar on Monday last—and this will bring the matter within the cognizance of any hon. gentleman who is engaged in the business or who knows anything personally about the subject, from contact with it, and I find that on Monday last the price of granulated sugar in New York was $9.62½, while the price in Montreal was $9.14; and taking the same process which I have pursued in the other case, and it will be seen that the price of this New York sugar, if it was brought in and the duties paid on it under the old Tariff, no refineries being in existence in Canada, would have been $9.89 per 100 lbs., the Montreal price being $9.14, or a difference in favor of the Canada consumer of 75 cents per 100 pounds. Now, Sir, that is in relation to granulated sugar. I venture to say, with regard to yellows, the case is still stronger in favor of the Canadian consumer, but granulated being the standard sugar, I have made up the calculation with regard to it. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman will probably ask—as he has asked before—when an argument similar to this was presented: where is the necessity for this protective Tariff, if we are getting our sugar cheaper than we would have done under the old Tariff, with the charges added? Why could we not have this state of things continued under the old Tariff, the hon. gentleman may say. Well, Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is a very simple one. The reason why we have to put on this protection is simply this: that, in view of the much larger refining business done in the United States than is done here, of

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

1,500,000,000 lbs. of sugar being refined there, instead of 100,000,000 and some odd which are refined here, these refiners are and would be most anxious to cut away, if they could, this competition, or rather this home market, from Canada, in order that they might have the Canadian sugar market for themselves as they had it before; and until they were able to break down our refiners, they would be willing to give us our sugar a little cheaper. There can be no doubt about that; but what would we gain? Our refiners would soon be broken down, and then they would do as they did during these four years I have mentioned—charge us higher prices—the regular standard prices of their own market, and we would be obliged to pay higher prices for our sugar, with that inestimable privilege, as it appears to be according to hon. gentlemen opposite, of seeing spent $1,000,000 among the work-people of the United States instead of among the work-people of Canada. Now Sir, what has been and what is the result of this policy. As I have said, I do not desire to detain the House at any length in connection with this subject; but, according to David A. Wells, a high authority for Free Trade, sugar refining is an important industry which ought to be protected, and according to the older view of the late hon. Minister of Finance, the member for Centre Huron, sugar refining is an industry which ought to be protected by such arrangements under the Tariff as may be made for that purpose. We have thus the opinion, as I have said before, of two very high authorities on the subject of political economy in favor of the principle of protection to our refiners. We have secured the expenditure within this country instead of the United States—on the basis of Mr. Wells' statement that it costs one cent, expended in the act of refining in order to produce refined from the raw sugar—of $1,000,000, which was formerly expended in connection with foreign refineries. We have built up a West India trade and are building up a South American trade, which the hon. member for South Brant thinks is a matter of no consequence, and regarding which I venture to differ from him. We have not materially affected the revenue, because, as I have shown, the difference in the revenue for 1878 and 1881 is only some $140,000. We have done all this, Sir, and we have secured for the people of Canada at the same time, as cheap—aye, cheaper, sugar than they would have had if we had not refineries in Canada at all, and had been compelled to import our sugar from the other side. I think that in view of these facts, we may very fairly say that this is a policy which the people of Canada are interested in maintaining, and not in destroying; and I think that we may fairly, under these circumstances, vote down the resolution which the hon. gentleman has presented to this House. The hon. gentleman read a quotation from a speech I delivered, in which I referred to the fact, that the strength and wealth of a nation was to be found in the strength and wealth of the individuals in that nation, and he calls that Tory doctrine. I am bound to say that if it is, I am a Tory. I say most decidedly—and I repeat it here—that the strength and wealth of a nation is to be found in the strength and wealth of individuals in that nation. But this does not say, and it does not follow, that this only means the strength and wealth of two or three people; but what does it mean.

Mr. PATERSON. There are only four sugar refineries.

Mr. WHITE. The hon. gentleman exclaims that there are only four sugar refineries, but there were merchants in Canada who made more in a single year than those refineries made. I may be excused for alluding to the late Mr. Forster, of Hamilton, who, in a single year, made as much more money in importing sugar, in watching the market and looking after it, and he employed comparatively nobody in the doing of it. There was no $1,000,000 then expended among the people of this country. These hon. gentlemen consider that there is no merit in making money, by employing labor and taking a fair profit off of that employment. They seem to think the money ought only to be made by rigging the Stock Exchange, or in lending money on mortgages at as high a rate of interest as they can get, or in speculating in lands in the North-West, as hon. gentlemen opposite are doing, and perhaps some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—I am not among the number—as well. They seem to think that the very moment a man undertakes to employ labor, and make a profit out of its employment, that instant he becomes an enemy of his country. That appears to be Liberal doctrine. Now, Sir, if that is Liberal doctrine, then I am not a Liberal. I prefer what the hon. gentleman has called the Tory doctrine; that the best interests of this country are to be found in the promotion of the wealth of the people of the country, and in the promotion of that wealth in such a way as to give employment to the people of the country, and to the largest possible number of them, instead of merely employing the comparative few who are used as middlemen in the distribution of the foreign goods which are brought into the country. That Mr. Speaker, is the distinction which I see between the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite and the policy which we favor on this side of the House. I may say, here, that when I was addressing the House on the Budget debate, I made some reference to Mr. Peter Redpath, provoked by the reference which was made by the hon. member for North Norfolk. Well, Sir, I find that the story which has been going about as to Mr. Redpath having purchased Chiselhurst, has not a word of truth in it; neither as an owner, nor as an occupant, nor as a tenant, has he anything to do with that magnificent establishment. He has bought for himself a quiet, unassuming, modest residence on the other side of the water, where he is living; and I only hope that before long we may have him back again amongst us. I do not desire to detain the House further, Mr. Speaker, but I think I have shown by figures, and not by fine-drawn theories similar to those of the hon. gentleman, that we are not promoting any injury to this country by the policy which has been happily adopted in connection with sugar refining; but that, on the contrary, we are thereby securing the material advantage of the country, as well as of the great mass of the consumers, who are better off than they would have been if the old policy had been in force, and our refineries were all destroyed.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I beg to lay on the Table the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Royal Commission.

Mr. BLAKE. I perceive that this is not the report, but only the evidence. May I ask the hon. gentleman when the report will come down, because I observe that this does not contain the exhibits or written portion of the evidence, and therefore, it is very important that we should get the remaining documents as soon as possible.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It was placed in my hands for submission to the House, and, from what I heard the other day, I thought that it was the report; but the rest will no doubt be placed before the House on Tuesday next.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the Niagara Peninsula Bridge Company.—(Mr. Bergin.)

Bill (No. 68) further to amend the Act incorporating the Souris and Rocky Mountain Railway Company.—(Mr. Boulton.)

Bill (No. 76) to amend the Act to incorporate the South Saskatchewan Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Robertson, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 81) relating to the Canada Southern Bridge.—(Mr. Patterson, Essex.)

Bill (No. 64) respecting Queen's College at Kingston.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

Bill (No. 71) to amend the Act of the late Province of Canada, intituled: "An Act to incorporate the Managers of the Ministers' Widows' and Orphans Fund of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, in connection with the Church of Scotland," and amendments thereto.—(Mr. Brooks.)

Bill (No. 86) to amend the Act incorporating the Pontiac Pacific Junction Railway Company, and to authorize the said Company to erect a bridge across the Ottawa River.—(Mr. White, Renfrew.)

Bill (No. 134) to amend the Acts relating to the Great Western Railway Company (from the Senate).—(Mr. Kilvert.)

Bill (No. 87) respecting a certain agreement between the Canadian Securities Company and the Liquidators of the Consolidated Bank of Canada.—(Mr. Brooks.)

Bill (No. 30) an Act to empower the Ottawa Agricultural Insurance Company to wind up their affairs, and to relinquish their charter, and to provide for the dissolution of the said Company.—(Mr. Rochester.)

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time:—

Bill (No. 138) to incorporate The Canada Co-operative Supply Association (Limited) to issue preferential shares.—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 139) to incorporate the Rapid City Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Bannerman.)

THE SUGAR DUTIES.

House resumed the consideration of Mr. Paterson's proposed amendment to Sir Leonard Tilley's motion for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. GUNN. In rising to support the amendment of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) I feel, after the able manner in which he has presented the question of duties on sugar there is not a great deal to add. I have also to congratulate the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who has proved himself to be an able advocate for the refiners, though I think I shall be able to prove that he has not advocated the interests of his constituents. The Tariff as regards sugar shows a large loss to the revenue, while the consumer has to pay more for the article. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) referred to the refiners in New York, and he quoted from Mr. Wells, who is undoubtedly a high authority. On this point we might compare the prices in New York and Montreal. Take the last two years in New York, fair refining sold at 7½ cents; the average price of granulated was 9½ cents, or a difference of 2 cents. They paid a duty to the Government of $2.45 per 100; our refineries paid a duty of $1.70—a difference of 75 cents. The average price in Montreal for fair refining was 7 cents, and the average price for granulated was 9½ cents—a difference of 2½ cents in Montreal, against 2 cents in New York. In one of his speeches, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said the average price of granulated sugar in 1879 was 9 cents in Montreal. It was that year in New York an average in bond of $5 64, with a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem, and 1 cent per lb., making $8.05, or 95 cents less than Montreal. The lowest price in Montreal that year was $8.25, and the lowest price in New York was $4.84 in bond, the duty being $2.21, making $7.05, or $1.20 less than Montreal.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but when he speaks of sugar being laid down in Montreal, does he include the freight charges?

Mr. GUNN. No.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). And nothing for merchants' profits?

Mr. GUNN. No. The hon. gentleman said there was a profit to the merchant of 58 cents, but there is not a profit of 56 cents, or even 51 cents, only about 1 per cent. to 1½ per cent., 10 cents to 15 cents per 100 lbs. is nearer the average obtained by merchants for selling sugar, as he will find if he makes enquiry. I would like very much to know where the hon. gentleman got the information on which he based these statements. There is a wide divergence between some of his statements and the facts, and I think he should explain to the House, for many of his statements have no reference at all to the question at issue. The question is not a party question but a question for the country at large—a question of political economy that we should all study. I do not think we are here as the advocates of the sugar refineries, but of the people who sent us here—the consumers. We have nothing to do with the refiners. The hon. the Finance Minister, in his speech of 1881, said that the refiners handled 300,000 barrels, which would be about 88,000,000 lbs. out of a total, entered for home consumption, of 117,000,000 lbs., or a proportion of three-quarters of the entire trade. We may estimate the amount last year, including the two new refineries, at 5 to 10 per cent. more. The hon. the Finance Minister has not brought down a statement, this year, to show us how much the refiners manufactured. Considering the large protection which he give these people, I think they should afford more information; and it is due to the House that we should have that information. The hon. member for Cardwell tells us about the number of coopers and workmen employed, and everything else, except what we want to know. He says it costs 1 cent per lb. to manufacture sugar in New York; if so, it should be manufactured for less in Montreal, because wages and other expenses are less there than in New York. Then we hear a great deal about cheap sugar. During the last two years and a-half, sugar has been cheaper in the primary markets than it has been in any year since 1868. During that period the average cost price has been $3.63. For the last two years we imported an average of 126,000,000 lbs. each year, which, at $3.63, would cost $4,507,640, on which the duty received was $2,353,169. During the last six years, prior to 30th June, 1879, under a revenue Tariff, we imported an average of 109,000,000 lbs., at a cost of $4.90 per 100 lbs., or a total cost of $5,348,490; prior to June 30th, 1879, 109,000,000 lbs., with $2,352,169 duty, 70 cents more duty under the old Tariff than under the new. It will thus be seen that during the last two years and a-half the price of sugar in the primary markets was $1.27 less per 100 lbs. than during the previous six years, and the duty was 70 cents more. During the last two years the price of fair refining sugar at New York was 7½ cents per lb., and granulated 9½ cents. If you deduct a cent, which the hon. member for Cardwell says is the cost of refining, you will have 8½ cents. Then deduct ½ cent to reduce raw for refining to granulated, and you have only $7.66 or 9 cents per 100 lbs. less than New York refiners paid the past two years, and I think this ought to show to the House and the country that there is a large loss to the revenue, and that the people should get their sugar cheaper than they are getting it. If we reduce 136,000,000 lbs. to granulated sugar, we would have 119,000,000 lbs. The price in Montreal last year, up to the 30th of June, averaged $9.70, which would make the cost of that quantity $11,597,496, while the same 119,000,000 lbs. brought in from New York at the current price there, $6.58, would have cost us $7,853,604, showing a difference between the cost of Montreal and at New York of $3,743,892. How much duty did we get from this? By the Government's own return, we find that we received $2,459,141. This shows a loss of $1,284,751; but that does not show all the loss, because in this 136,000,000 lbs. there are 15,880,000 lbs. above number 14, which is squeezed into the country, and on which we are charged $2.66 per 100 lbs. duty. Let me tell, hon. gentlemen opposite that this is not a party question but a public question, and when they go to the polls they will hear more of it. I was going on to show how the apparent loss of duty to the country does not show the whole loss. There are 15,885,005 lbs. which paid $2.66 duty, or 96 cents more than refiners paid. It is a well-known fact to the large trade—take Liverpool—that the refiner will buy a dark sugar equal to No. 12 at 24s. and produce a larger quantity than he received of a brighter color and sell it for 2s. less. But the hon. member for Cardwell said: "We give you yellows cheaper." How are we to know that? It is easy to say you have cheaper sugar when we can prove we ought to have cheaper sugar. If the primary market is down a cent we must get it cheaper. 15,855,005 lbs. paid $152,236 in the fiscal year of 1881 more than it would pay if it came through the hands of refiners, making a total loss of $1,436,987. Compare prices with New York for the present year ending 30th June, 1881, with prices in Montreal. Let us ascertain what sugar would have cost from New York, taking last year's trade. 136,406,593 lbs. of all kinds were entered for consumption, equal to 119,335,699 lbs. granulated. At $9.70, the price in Montreal, this would give $11,577,502. The same quantity at $6.58, the price in New York, would amount to $7,853,604, or $3,723,898 less than in Montreal. Deduct duty collected $2,459,141 from this, and the loss to the country is $1,264,757. The 15,855,005 lbs. which paid $2.66 duty or 96 cents more than the refiners paid, amounting to $152,236, will, in future, go into the hands of the refiners under the operation of the Tariff, and thus produce an additional loss to that amount, which, added to the $1,284,751, makes a total loss of $1,436,987 to this country. Had the 119,000,000 lbs. been brought from New York as granulated and paid duty under the old revenue Tariff, 25 per cent. and 1 cent on the New York value in bond $6.58, or $2.64 duty, it would not have produced $3,150,990, or $691,549 more duty than we received, as compared with the old Tariff. Add to this 48 cents per 100 lbs., excess of price over New York, $592,902. What duty would have been paid had the whole been entered at $2.66, the rate at which the 15,855,005 lbs. had been entered? After allowing for difference in grade, there would be 125,000,000 lbs. at $2.66, and we would have had a duty of $3,325,000, instead of $2,459,141 collected, showing a loss of $865,859. It is proven by your own returns that you tax sugar, $3,325,000 one-fourth of which taxes go direct to the refiners and the other three-fourths only reach the Treasury. You have made laws to tax sugar, a necessary of life, that should be taxed only for revenue, every cent put on it should go direct into the Treasury. Can you not see the refiners are working against you? 11½ per cent. is permitted to enter the Custom house at $2.66, the remainder, 88½ per cent.—the great bulk—being farmed out to the refiners at $1.70. I have a Customs return for six months ending 31st December last, excluding British Columbia, which shows 71,350,677 lbs. entered for home consumption paying $1,216,436 duty, less than half the duty paid on 54,000,000 in 1878, one-third more of sugar under your 30 and 35 per cent. Tariff, paying less than 25 per cent. Tariff, produced in the last half of 1878. In that year 108,000,000 lbs. paid $2,567,803 duty. This year, with the trade pointing to 140,000,000 lbs. under the same Tariff, you would get $3,500,000. Estimating the current six months at the same as the first six months, you will barely get $2,500,000, or $1,000,000 less than you should. Now, if you will compare trade tables for the first six months to the 31st December, 1881, with the prior twelve months ending 31st June, you will see that the trade has almost entirely passed into the refiners hands. For the fiscal year 1881, there was only entered, above No. 14, about 15,000,000 lbs. at $2.66, or 11½ per cent. of the entire consumption. What have you got for the subsequent six months? Only 2,404,113 lbs., a small moiety, barely 3½ per cent., paying $2.47 duty, the remaining 69,000,000 lbs. being entered at $1.68. At the same ratio in which the trade has been seized by the refiners within the past six months, we will not be left 1 per cent. for the trade outside refiners the coming year. Does not this show that your Tariff is against the interest of the country? You have established your sub-treasuries, your branch Custom-house, you have taxed the people of this country and do not get the taxes. You have introduced a system similar to that which exists in countries governed by the Turks. You have appointed your middleman to collect your taxes. You would naturally suppose, that with a tax of 30 to 35 per cent. on sugar against a revenue Tariff of 25 per cent., besides specific duty, to get more revenue, but you do not—it is a misleading Tariff. In the jury that framed it there was no Matthew Hill, no miller with his dusty coat. It was a pecked jury. You promised, in 1878, to adjust the Tariff in the interests of the country. You have not done so. You have adjusted it in the interests of individuals, you have introduced monopoly into this country, and a system of taxation that existed prior to the great Reform Bill of 1832. You have taunted us with being a small body. If we are a small body, our principles will stand. You may crush us and leave us but a baker's dozen, but that baker's dozen will fight for the interests of the country and not be ashamed to fight for those interests. Though we are a small body, we are not ashamed to follow in the footsteps of the right hon. leader of the Government in England to-day. Where was he six years ago? Was he not laughed at? We are not afraid to copy from him. We saw him go to the country in opposition to a strong Government under its late able and lamented leader. With very little hopes of success he came back with an enormous majority. The Government was overturned. We expect the same fate as that which greeted the Liberal party in England then, for when these questions are discussed and understood in the country the people will give us their support. In your election campaign in 1878 you did not state fairly the questions at issue. You seduced the people from their affections. You seduced Reform constituencies that had been Reform for 50 years. Those counties will go back to their first love as soon as they have an opportunity. Stronger Governments than yours have been broken in a shorter time. I remember when I was in France in 1868, two short years before the fall of the French Empire, I was dining with gentlemen who asked me what sort of a Government we had. I said our Government is the in-and-outs—whoever can carry it on the cheapest. I was proud of my country. I was proud of seeing the Conservative Government, as I thought, doing their duty. "Mon Dieu!" he said: "What would you do if you had a despot at your throat?" That strong Government in two years melted like snow before the sun. We had a Conservative Government in 1867, who revised the sugar Tariff. It was so odious, that both Conservatives and Reformers united to substitute for it a revenue Tariff. That remained in existence during their own Administration. They saw no reason to change it. Why did they finally change it? Certainly not because the people asked for a change, but it was changed in the interest of the refiners, of those who are interested in taking money out of the pockets of the people. Now, let us see how much duty you get under this Tariff. Supposing you had taken the whole of this sugar entered under No. 14, the 120,500,000 lbs., at the rate of $2.66, which you charged on the 16,000,000, you would have got a duty of $3,325,000, instead of the $2,459,141 collected; that is to say, if the 136,000,000 lbs. paid duty at the average of what was entered over 14. This shows a loss of $865,859 to the revenue. The present Tariff yields a revenue of only about two-thirds to the Treasury of the country, while the remaining third goes into the pockets of the refiners. The 71,000,000 lbs. imported during the six months ending 31st of December last paid a duty of $1,216,436, less than half the duty paid on 54,000,000 lbs. in 1878. Then you had 25 per cent., and now you have 30 and 35 per cent., but still you get less revenue from the larger quantity. In 1878, we imported 108,000,000 lbs., which paid a duty of $2,567,803. This year, with a prospective importation of 141,000,000 lbs., if we can keep up the quantity that came in during the last six months, which quantity would yield, under the former Tariff, a duty of $3,500,000; instead of that you will barely get $2,500,000 probably not so much, perhaps $1,100,000 less than you should get. I pointed out to the House when the Tariff was introduced, that you would have a loss to the revenue. I think I have shown very clearly that you will have a large loss. Take the 120,500,000 lbs. entered last year at $1.70; if it paid the same duty as the 15,000,000 lbs. you would have had $3,349,965, or $890,124 more. The hon. member for Cardwell said the New York people would cut sugars to get our trade. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the sugar trade is so large in that single port, the largest sugar port in the world, where they handled over 600,000 tons last year, that there is no cutting in sugar sold at its fair value every day on the market. The exports from the States, out of a total trade of 1,000,000 tons, amounted to less than 1 per cent. of the exports from all ports, or only 8,242 tons. Two cents was the average difference in New York between fair refining and granulated during 1880 and 1881, and only $1.88 in 1879. According to the New York, shipping list Canadian refiners paid at least 75c. or ¾c. less duty than American refiners on the quantity handled by them, 110,000,000 tons, showing $825,000 in their favor. With these remarks I think I will take my seat.

Mr. McLENNAN. I listened with great interest to the lucid statement of the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Gunn). His figures are very well in hand. It is true he does not surprise us with the oratorical music that we get from the hon. gentleman from South Brant (Mr. Paterson); but his sugar question is one of figures, and with the exception that my hon. friend is a little astray upon some historical points, I think his figures are very instructive. That little incident that occurred in France calls to mind the fact, that if there are two Governments in this country just now, my hon. friend belongs to the Government of the Grits. With respect to Mr. Gladstone, I believe it is pretty well known that his financial policy, as it relates to sugar, is one that has varied very much according to times and circumstances, just as the Tariff of the hon. Minister of Finance has done, and that in its essential features to-day it is very much like the Tariff that exists in this country. I think my hon. friend is quite as far astray in his historical reference to the reforms of 1832 and 1834. I do not know that our sugar duties are upon any different basis than that of the rest of mankind except that they are for our own interest. But the figures of my hon. friend prove very conclusively two or three things. I think they give some account of the change that came over the dreams of the late Minister of Finance. I have no doubt that Kingston was a very important constituency in the country at that time, and was a centre of a very large sugar trade, and I can sympathize with the feeling that my hon. friend from Kingston expresses with respect to that number of millions of sugar above No. 14 that has been squeezed into the country with so much difficulty and bother. I have no doubt the hon. member would like very much that a larger quantity of sugar above No. 14 would be brought into the country without squeezing, and I think the difference between the profits of the sugar trade to the importers and the process by which the sugar trade is made tributary to many other industries in this country epitomises the whole question of difference between the policy of Free Trade and the policy of Protection. The hon. gentleman is very much exercised about the amount of money that is lost between the places of collection and the Treasury. I should like to know if the collection of Customs costs any more, in proportion, to-day than it did in 1878?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Not so much.

Mr. McLENNAN. If that be so, all the talk about $1,000,000 lost between wind and water, falls to the ground. The essential difference between the Tariff that exists to-day and the Tariff in 1878, is the higher duty upon the higher class of sugars, and the different methods of valuation, by which higher classes of sugar do not come into this country at a reduced valuation after the bounty was taken off, as they did formerly, leaving that bounty to be divided between the dealer in New York and the importer in Canada. Whereas to-day larger quantities of sugar are brought into this country in cheap form, with this result that the shipowners who carry large quantities of raw material, and who bring up coal from Nova Scotia and other places, have some interest in it. The coal miner gets his wages out of it, the sugar refiner has his profit, every man that he employs has his toll out of it, thousands of people employed as coopers, draymen, and in other businesses connected with the preparation of that sugar for market; and the difference amounts to this: that whereas, under the old system, the profits were divided between the New York shipper and the importer in this country, the difference in this country being only that which went out of the Treasury, to-day, a very large part of that difference and a very large amount of money are contributed among the hard-working people of this country; and, as I said before, it is an epitome of the entire system of Finance that prevails in this country to-day. The hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Gunn) has said that wages and expenses are less in Montreal than in New York. If they are less, I should like to know if there is not business ability enough in this country to produce pressure and competition that will prevent us from paying a higher price for sugar than becomes necessary in this state of things. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) was willing to drop this question of price, whether it was cheaper or dearer. It is impossible for a man like myself to keep in his mind tabulated statements of the prices of sugar from month to month, but we can form our opinion on these factors which enter into the method by which the price of sugar, as of everything else, is regulated; and this House may accept as a matter of fact that the methods of trade, the means of competition, and every incident that modern life brings into exercise will keep those interests right, and there is no danger of any great monopoly overwhelming us with all those powers of control within our own hands.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I understood the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House said that the system of the taxation of sugar which Mr. Gladstone adopted in England was substantially the same as ours. Did the hon. gentleman say that?

Mr. McLENNAN. I believe it is as variable as that of the hon. gentleman who is speaking:

Mr. McLENNAN.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. "It is substantially the same as ours" is what the hon. gentleman said. I was informed by the public press, which is not always very reliable, it is true, that there was no duty at all in England just now, and I am not aware the duty has been reimposed during the current Session. Perhaps the hon. gentleman, whose information is somewhat antiquated, will revise his calculations before he again addresses the House on the subject of sugar. I do not much wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite find this a rather sore subject. It is truly, as the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) said, an epitome of this fiscal system. The Government have added 25 per cent. to the taxes. They have obtained 25 per cent. less revenue, and the people have been called to pay 30 per cent. higher prices. There is, in brief, the grand triumph of financial genius exemplified in every point, precisely as we told the country it would be, and precisely as it is the nature of such a system to be. I would like to call the attention of the House to some one of the dozen or so of fallacies set forth in the course of the discussion. Who was the framer of the late Tariff? It was not framed by me, for I found it in existence. It was produced by hon. gentlemen opposite who altered the Tariff and made it less favorable to refiners, and who, if any persons were responsible, were responsible for the extinction of that industry. It was stated by the hon. member for Cardwell that the Montreal refinery had been shut up for four years. My recollection is that the refinery was shut up a year and a-half and no longer, and I do not hesitate to say that I believe, particularly after the small alteration that was made in 1875, that refinery might, if no political reason and if no greed for greater gain had intervened, might have been run profitably to the end of the chapter. "But," said the hon. member for Cardwell, "we have one industry employing $500,000 worth of capital which was kept idle for four years." Had that statement been true, it would have been infinitely better for the country that this capital should have been kept idle rather than $1,250,000 should have been lost during three or four years for the sake of keeping that industry alive. It is not good economy, it is not prudence; it is not common sense to pay out of the public pocket $5,000,000 in three or four years for the sake of keeping alive an industry which, according to the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), represented $500,000 of capital. Sir, let us see what this industry has cost the country, what it is costing the country and what it is likely to cost the country. But first let me call the attention of the House to this fact. Undoubtedly we had no wish to deprive the city of Montreal or the people of Canada of any industry whatever. It is true that we went rather out of our way to give this industry a chance under the peculiar circumstances that then prevailed, because it was true that at that time a very extraordinary bounty was granted by the United States, which, however, was subsequently very greatly reduced. It is true that, perhaps, we went a little too far in our zeal for that industry, but our policy was to do justice and act fairly by this industry so far as we could. What we would not do was to tax the whole people of Canada at the rate of millions of dollars for the benefit of three or four refiners. We considered that question well; we saw that the demands of the sugar refiners were extortionate and oppressive, and we refused to grant them. I believe, and I have good reason for believing, that that industry could have gone on and would have gone on if there had not been certain political reasons, and a desire to obtain greater plunder from the people. But be that as it may, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) talks of the changes which were made in the sugar duties, and the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) said the late Government had changed their sugar duties a dozen times. All Governments have changed their sugar duties time and time again, and it is true that some make more changes, although but small ones. But, with respect to this question, allow me to remind the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who talks of inconsistency and changes, that we can recollect certain remarkable changes in the spirit of his dream. I can recollect that in 1873, when the paper, of which that hon. gentleman was editor, was for a time—though not for a long time—engaged in denouncing that infamous transaction known as the Pacific Scandal. I can remember quite well that he was whipped into the traces very soon, and now he is a peaceable and humble servant of the people he then denounced. I can remember that that hon. gentleman, when it was inconvenient for the Government to raise the trade question, was a strong advocate of a 15 per cent. Tariff, and he declared in public that he could conceive no earthly reason for protecting any industry in Canada which could not get on with a 15 per cent. Tariff. These are curious persons to talk of changes in the sugar Tariff. As regards hon. gentlemen opposite, I could point out at least a dozen different changes within the space of a few years, and I dare say we will see a good many more if it should happen that they shall continue in power. It might also interest the House to remember that when a change was proposed in 1874, the organ of these hon. gentlemen, the Mail newspaper, was the first to declare that:

"It is not of such protection that it should lead to the establishment of a couple of monopolies in a country, nor can it be contended that sugar refining is a Canadian manufacture in the sense in which these words are generally understood."

The present editor of the Mail, when examined before the Committee presided over by my hon. friend, was good enough to say that its geographical position was against the Canadian refiner, and that there were very good reasons why Canadian refiners could never compete with the American refiners. I listened with some astonishment to the calculations made by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). That hon. gentleman on more than one occasion has indulged the House with some of the most remarkable financial calculations. I recollect that that hon. gentleman posed for five or six years as a financial critic, but scarcely a year had elapsed before we discovered that that hon. gentleman, in common with the Minister of Railways and Canals, positively did not know the difference between the Supply Bill and the Estimates brought down to Parliament every year. I do not myself entertain any great respect for the financial lucubration of such a pair of critics as those. I take one calculation that the hon. member indulged in. He said that Mr. Wells, who undoubtedly is a man of large research and wide study, said that sugar cost about one cent to refine. Then, said the hon. gentleman, we imported 136,000,000 lbs. last year at a cost of $5,110,000. Of that, 16,000,000 lbs. were imported in a state fit for consumption, leaving 120,000,000 lbs. or thereabouts to be refined, at a cost of $1,100,000. That makes $6,220,000. To this, Sir, you may add a duty on the sugar which, as the hon. gentleman will remember, was refined in this country, of $2,459,000. Now, if you take the cost of the first sugar you find that, including the cost of refining, the apparently total cost would be, in round numbers, $7,250,000, including the duty, and the cost of refining. That was the sum the people of Canada paid for that. My hon. friend who was speaking lately (Mr. Gunn) could tell us that it cost the people of Canada in the neighborhood of $8,750,000, and that there is $1,500,000 which, as the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) truly said, was either wasted or went into the pockets of the refiners. It may not have all gone into their pockets, but if not it was because they did not know how to refine the sugar so as to enable them to compete with the refiners of other countries. I take another of the hon. gentleman's calculations. He declared that in New York, sugar was selling on the average last year at $9.65 per 100 lbs.; that in Montreal it was selling at $9.33, and he proceeded to show that after paying the duty and making certain extraordinary allowances, to which I will afterwards call attention, the prices in New York of the sugar free in bond would be higher than the prices in Montreal, including the allowances. Now, we will see how that calculation will work out. Recollect that he admits that this class of sugar in Montreal costs $9.33, and he admits also that in New York it cost in bond, $6.15. He declares, correctly, I think, that $2.62 would represent the tax on the very highest quality of sugar—the highest that we are granulating—at a duty upon the quality, under our Tariff, which cost $8.77 as against $9.33 at Montreal prices, being a difference of 56 cents in favor of New York, with the additional duty as imposed under the old Tariff. How did the hon. gentleman attempt to get round this? Why, by adding 30 or 35 cents for the charges from New York to points in Canada, when we know that in the great sugar-consuming districts of Canada it is quite as cheap to get sugar from New York as it is from Montreal. That is a geographical fact which all the alterations, all the acts, and all the arguments of hon. gentlemen cannot affect one jot or tittle. Now, Sir, remember that $2.62 per 100 lbs. would have brought at least one-fourth, probably one-third, more revenue than the people of Canada are getting under the present Tariff. So that we have, first, an extra cost to the people of 56 cents on every 100 lbs., and a loss to the people of the difference between the sum the refiners pay and the sum that would have been collected under the old Tariff, and these two together would considerably exceed $1 per 100 lbs. on every single 100 lbs. at present refined in Canada for consumption in Canada. Sir, all these gentlemen argue against competition with the United States. Have they forgotten that a very large amount of the sugar that came into Canada in former days came from England, where there was no duty, and no bounty in favor of the refiners; and do they not know that the English trade, which was a very large one, is being wholly cut off for the sake of these same refiners? They tell us that they only want to discriminate against the Americans. It is true they have put an absolutely prohibitive tax on all sugar coming from the United States, but they have likewise cut off very large receipts of sugar which formerly came from England. Now, Sir, as to how many persons are interested in this industry. I observe that these hon. gentlemen do not condescend to give the details; but we know from unexceptionable authority—from Mr. Wells' statement, from the reports made by the Glasgow refiners, and from statements made to Mr. Gladstone and other persons—that in the actual work of refining, as understood and practised in England, a little more than 300 men are ample. That does not take into account the number employed in cooperage, as to which I have been unable to obtain accurate details; but even supposing that 300 or 400 more were employed in that way, it is quite clear that the total number employed is quite insignificant as compared with the burden on the people. As to the freight, the only possible question is the difference in the freight on the quantity of raw sugar and the quantity of refined sugar brought in, which may be put roughly at 10 per cent.; and I think we got, and would get, as large a proportion of freightage in former times as we get now. I believe there may be a few vessels coming into Halifax that did not come before, but a very few I am told, and quite insignificant, compared with the burden placed on the people by this tax. Sir, this question is alleged to be a complicated question. There are very complicated questions connected with the subject, no doubt; nobody has been able exactly to ascertain what quantity of refined sugar can be produced from certain quantities of raw sugar—that Mr. Redpath and other refiners have refused to communicate, and doubtless with good reason—but we know, as the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Gunn) truly stated, that there are certain classes of sugar brought in by refiners out of which they actually produce a larger quantity in pounds than they import.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Oh, oh.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. They are so manipulated in the manufacture that that result is produced, and I believe the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Bunting) testified to that effect. But be that as it may, there is no doubt that a great many grades of sugar brought in which, although classed under the Dutch standard as very low, really contain a large quantity of saccharine matter. Moreover, we know that the American Government, which investigated this subject very closely, formally reported that in their judgment a very large amount of sugar was extracted even from apparently very coarse numbers. The only fault I have to find with the mode in which my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) dealt with the question, is, that he allowed far too large an amount for waste; I think he allowed at least 50 per cent., and I do not propose to make quite so liberal an allowance. Now, Sir, what is the real question at issue? It is not a matter of grave moment to the consumers of Canada at what price sugar is imported into the Dominion; the question of moment is at what price that sugar is sold to them, and if you want to ascertain what the real burden is on the people of Canada, you have to ascertain first at what price that sugar could be obtained were it allowed to be imported duty free from New York, Glasgow, or any other place, and then at what price it is sold by these sugar refiners; the difference between the natural cost without duty, and the price at which these refiners sell it, is the measure of the burden on the people of Canada. Now, that is not a complicated question; that is a plain, straightforward question, on which there is no better authority perhaps in Canada than the hon. member for Kingston. Now, let us see what are the actual prices. I have here a statement of the prices in Montreal and in New York from July to December last:—

	Montreal.	New York.
July	$10 37	$6 83
August	9 87	6 58
September	9 87	6 68
October	9 50	6 95
November	9 37	6 46
December	9 37	6 20

Now, you will observe that there was an average difference of 3 cents per lb., or $3 per 100 lbs., between the price in New York and the price in Montreal. That is the measure and the true measure of the burden of the people of Canada, because, as regards the consuming portion of the people, I maintain that my hon. friend was right, and that the sugar can be laid down from New York as cheaply as it can from Montreal. If you take the total importation that we use, the 120,000,000 lbs. of unrefined sugar, and the 16,000,000 lbs. of partially refined, fit for consumption, which was brought in, you will find that about $3,750,000 represents the difference between the sum the people of Canada had to pay the refiners and the sum for which they could have obtained that sugar, had they been allowed to import it without paying duty at all. Let us see, then, how much of that went into the Treasury. We find in the Trade Returns that we received $2,459,000. The loss, therefore, to the people by the operation of this Tariff is the difference between $3,723,000 and $2,459,000, which did go into the Treasury, or in round numbers a loss of $1,270,000. That is what we pay for keeping these 700 or 800 persons, including the coopers and others employed. That has been brought about, as I said, by adding 25 per cent. to the taxes on this article, a necessary of life, and by losing 25 per cent. of the revenue. I would have been astonished, if it had been anybody else, to hear the hon. Minister of Finance, in dealing with this subject, wholly ignore the large increase in the quantity of sugar being used by the people. Anybody hearing him declare that the loss to the revenue was $140,000, being the difference between the sum received in 1878 and that received in 1881, would have supposed that the consumption in each case was identically the same. What my hon. friend has said was the real fact of the case, namely, that something like 26,000,000 lbs. more were imported in the latter year than in the former, and after making all possible allowance for waste and loss in manufacturing, that shows clearly we had lost $600,000 or $700,000 revenue under this increased tax. What are the actual facts? In the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1878, we find that in that year we imported for consumption a total of 109,000,000 lbs. Of course, there was very little of that refined in this country, and we received a duty of $2,567,000. Now, we imported 136,500,500 lbs., of which 16,000,000 lbs. was presumably fit to enter into consumption. That left us about 120,500,000 lbs. imported for the use of the refiners, on which we obtained $2,035,000 duty. Deduct $423,000 that we received on all above No. 14. You will observe that we consumed, in 1878, somewhat less than the quantity of refined sugar which that 120,500,000 lbs. would produce; and if you will deduct the $2,000,000 duty which we received on that from the $2,586,000 we received in 1878, and make allowance for the 13,000,000 lbs. additional not taken into account, being the excess in 1881 on that particular article, you will see my hon. friend was perfectly correct in stating that about $700,000 in round numbers were lost to the revenue in the truth of the fact that the tax had been increased by 25 per cent. I do not think it is necessary, after the speech made by my hon. friend, to enter into any lengthy discussion of the general principles involved. I content myself with pointing out to the House that here you have an enormous increase of duty, an enormous loss to the revenue and a very considerable additional cost to the people, and that the total result is thoroughly stated, although the details are not given in the motion placed in your hands, that Canada loses about $1,125,000 and that some 700 or 800 people find employment. That is good as far as it goes, but it is a most paltry and inadequate compensation to the people, for the fact that their taxes are increased $1,125,000 under the operation of this Tariff. As my hon. friend well said, the Liberal party do not desire to injure any manufactory. They desire to assist, by all legitimate and proper ways, every manufacturer throughout this country. I am happy to say that many manufacturers are on our side, and that many more are coming over to our side under the knowledge they are receiving from day to day of the working of this iniquitous and oppressive Tariff. But I say the Liberal party will never consent, if they are true to their professions, if they understand anything of the real principles of the Liberal party, to allow a system of taxation in this country to be made a means of amassing great fortunes for a few individuals at the expense of the great bulk of the community. There is no more rampant instance of that injustice, no clearer proof of the folly of the system inaugurated by hon. gentlemen opposite, than is to be found in the statement of facts which my hon. friend made this afternoon, and which prove beyond contradiction that these men are, as he truly expressed it, assisted by the Government in putting into their own pockets $1,250,000 of the people's money.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. member for Restigouche did not vote.

Mr. HADDOW. I paired with the hon. member for London.

Mr. TROW. The hon. member for North Huron was paired with the hon. member for Haldimand.

Mr. FARROW. I did not consider it a pair. I spoke to the hon. gentleman about it and he said that he would see me again on the subject, but he never did. I went to see if the pair was entered in the books and was told it was not. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Trow) also said that I was at liberty to vote. I spoke to him about it.

Mr. TROW. I thought that the hon. gentleman was paired.

Mr. DALY. I looked over the pair-book before entering the House for the division, and I could not find such a pair. The book was inspected at the same time by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset), and he also will corroborate my statement that the hon. gentleman's name was not entered in the pair-book.

Mr. Fiset. The hon. gentleman's name was not in the pair-book.

26. Kingston Penitentiary..... $120,949.77

Mr. BLAKE. I would like to obtain some information with regard to the increased cost of maintenance, since the number of convicts has been diminished.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The warden reports that this is due to the general advance in the price of provisions. The increase is 22 cents and a fraction per capita.

Mr. BLAKE. The cost is increased from $70 to $70.22 per head. There was a very considerable increase in the cost of last year over the amount of the estimate. The cost of last year was very much over the cost for the preceding year. Increase in cost of rations is nearly 25 per cent. over that of the year preceding; and in clothing, the increase is also very considerable. It is true the warden reports the largest increase has occurred in cost of rations owing to general advance in prices, but I find that there is still further expenditure proposed for the ensuing year; and I was anxious to learn, as the operations are always worked out in detail, on what items the increase was to take place. If I remember right, we got the cost down to about 60 cents per head; but it is now over 70 cents per head, and I would like to know on what particular item this takes place.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not able to give the hon. gentleman the specific information as to the particular articles of provision or clothing on which the cost has increased; but the warden reports that this is altogether due to the increase in the prices of all provisions and the material used in making the convicts' clothing, but if the hon. gentleman likes I will procure the particular items.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes. But we have heard so much about the authentic statements of the hon. Minister of Finance to the effect that everything is cheaper than it used to be; but it, nevertheless, seems that in this very surprising institution where we have wholly under our own control, a large village, which we supply with the necessaries of life, we are not able to supply the commodities that are required for that class of the population at any rate, except at a considerable advance. The hon. Minister of Finance has talked a good deal about clothing being cheaper, and I wish to state what the results are in this particular village. These are all able-bodied persons, who are clothed in the most economical manner. The material is bought at wholesale prices, and is worked up in the institution by convict labor; and therefore it is wholly in the cost of the material that the difference in question takes place. The clothing of the convicts, per capita, was in 1877-78, $11.18, and for 1878-79, $9.33, being for these two years, $20.51, or an average of $10.25½ a year per head; the cost of their clothing in 1879-80 was $12.13, and in 1880-81, $13.06½, making a total for these two years of $25.19½, or an average of $12.59½ against $10.25½ for the other two years, showing an increase of $2.34 per head, or nearly 23 per cent. of an increase between the average of 1877-78, 1878-79, 1879-80 and 1880-81, and still the advance goes on. I am glad to find that the boom is a thing which is now settled beyond dispute.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The number of the convicts who may be confined in this institution is very uncertain, and we cannot prophesy what the number of occupants may be during the ensuing year, but with the increase of wealth and the increase of prosperity we may hope to see a further diminution of crime. The diminution which is already perceived will probably account for the present decrease. It is, no doubt, the fact that the transportation of convicts from the smaller penitentiaries to Kingston is ceasing owing to the completion of these institutions, and this may account in a measure at least for the diminished estimate of the warden.

Mr. BLAKE. I have no doubt the latter cause which the hon. gentleman mentions is the cause which the warden has given for the diminution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, the one which he makes for a diminution. Of course there is no doubt there is a certain amount of diminution of crime in the country, and we all rejoice to know it; while at the same time there is a very remarkable amount, I am sorry to say, of crimes of a very outrageous character going on just now, an epidemic of very violent crimes; but as to the general amount of crime, there is, I think, a diminution. I attribute it in part to the cause which the hon. gentleman has referred to, and in part to certain other causes which it is not necessary now to discuss. But I believe the real reason why a lesser number is estimated for Kingston is that it is not expected there will be, as there has been annually for some time, a transfer from St. Vincent de Paul to Kingston. From year to year Kingston has been rather increasing in its numbers. It did not get up to the maximum it at one time had before St. Vincent de Paul was opened, but it has been increasing. But as St. Vincent de Paul is now approaching completion, we may expect the convicts from the Province of Quebec will be for the future confined within that penitentiary.

Mr. ANGLIN. We have been lately creating many new crimes. It has been resolved in another place that certain actions with respect to railways shall hereafter be regarded as serious crimes; and the hon. member for North Norfolk has brought in a Bill here, which, if it goes into operation in any shape, will tend largely to swell the number in the penitentiaries.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Does the hon. gentleman say especially from the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No; he says if it were made retro-active.

Mr. ANGLIN. That would be rather a dangerous provision I think. I do not think we can get any such provision as that in this House.

Mr. BLAKE. Present company always excepted.

Mr. ANGLIN. I find the staff has been somewhat reduced. We might dispense this year with the chief keeper, and also with one of the trade instructors. I see we also dispense with the assistant deputy-matron. Perhaps the same beneficent influence that has operated either to prevent the commission of crime or to protect criminals from the operation of justice, is also producing its effect at this establishment and rendering it necessary to have as large a staff as formerly. We would like to know how these criminals are employed. The nature of employment in which they are engaged was the subject of interesting discussion on former occasions. I think strong objection was taken from time to time to the mode in which a large number of these criminals were employed. I think it would be interesting now if we were told in a general way how they are employed.

Sir JOHN A. MADONALD. As to the mode in which the convicts have been employed, I think there has been no change of any importance since last year. I think the men are employed partly under contract, and partly and as much as possible under the direct supervision of the warden.

Mr. BLAKE. The labor in which the convicts have been chiefly employed during the past year has been in the manufacture of door locks, a most monstrous thing. It is the old contract for the manufacture of door locks for which I have heard the hon. member for Lambton and the Liberal Government denounced, and still it is kept in operation and has been going on ever since. Ever since they have been making door locks under contract and competing with that manufactory at Moncton. We were told a year or two ago that the sin of this door lock manufactory contract was venial, because the contractor had begun only on sufferance and it could be terminated any day; but it seems to be going on and on like the river forever. We do not hear of any change whatever in the employment of the convicts in a manner that obviously interferes so seriously with honest out-door labor and enterprise. It was the duty of hon. gentlemen when they came into office, if their views were at all in accordance with the views they endeavored to force upon us while they were out, to have put a stop to this monstrous contract. But instead of that there is still going on tailoring and shoemaking, not merely for the prisoners themselves, but also for the Dominion Government. Now, there are or there might be numerous contracts let, and numerous honest tailors and shoemakers employed in these various works which are now being let, but the hon. gentlemen are having them performed in the penitentiary.

Mr. BLAKE.

Now, I do not complain of that, because I think it a reasonable thing—in point of fact, I am responsible for introducing it into the penitentiary—but I complain of it being continued by hon. gentlemen who have said that it was a great abuse and would interfere with out-door labor. There does not appear to have been any new industry or any other arrangement for the employment of prisoners during the last year, which is, I think, to be regretted. I am aware that we have from 700 to 800 prisoners, mostly able-bodied men, and that they have not been provided with some fresh employment is something that is to be deplored. I mention one particular branch of industry which I hoped to have heard more of in this report, and that much more would have been done about it, and that is the farm. The idea formerly was that it would become a source of very useful labor in many respects to the institution. The idea was that it would be cultivated almost as a garden by spade labor, using very little machine power, and using the power of the convicts themselves. The idea was that out-door occupation of this class would be very beneficial to the health of the inmates, besides possibly being made a source of profit to the institution. I do not see, what I would like to see before concurrence, that a special effort is being made, as I think ought to be made, to employ a large proportion of these men on that farm in the way I have mentioned, to convert it more into a market garden, and the use of a great deal of spade labor and husbandry. In this connection I wish to make an enquiry with reference to a portion of the penitentiary premises which I thought it was intended to add to the farm. There was a portion of the premises under some lease or engagement, either to the corporation of Kingston or to some institution in connection with the city of Kingston. Arrangements were made during my time by which that term would have come to an end, I think, in the course of last year. The idea was that the institution would be best served by the enlargement of the farm. In fact, the Government purchased a considerable piece to add to it, the intention being to turn it into a large farm with a view to employing prison labor.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think I can give the hon. gentleman the key to the mystery in connection with the lock factory. There have been no complaints from manufacturers of locks and keys that the work in this institution has interfered with their industry, for this reason, that the lock makers outside of the penitentiary are fully employed and have as much, or more, than they can do. When trade is dull they may possibly complain.

Mr. MILLS. What then?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And then we will consider whether we can properly employ convict labor so that it will not interfere with the established industries of the country. With respect to clothing: some of the bad habits introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite still linger and it is very difficult to get rid of them. The present leader of the Opposition introduced the principle of employing convicts in manufacturing clothing for Government purposes, and the institution is not yet free from the influences thus introduced. With respect to the farm: it was in rather a rough state when it became the property of the Government, but it now looks flourishing, and the warden says, as an agricultural experiment it has been successful. With respect to the exhibition at the Crystal Palace: I think there would be no resumption of the ground for penitentiary purposes. It was leased for many years, or rather it was a license of occupation for the Agricultural Association of the county, the ground covering twenty acres, I think. A great deal of pressure was brought by hon. gentlemen opposite to force the Association to surrender it, and the difficulty prevailing is to find elsewhere a convenient and suitable place on which to place the buildings. A deputation from the Association will be here to-morrow for the purpose of discussing the question with the Department of Justice.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Last year, when this matter was under discussion, the hon. Minister of Justice agreed with the suggestion made from this side of the House that a statement should be submitted, showing the quantity of produce raised on the farm, in order that we might be able to ascertain what was about the real cost of the maintenance of the prisoners. I observe the chief keeper has been discontinued; what has become of him?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, I understand he has been transferred to St. Vincent de Paul.

Mr. MILLS. Attention has been called to the fact that there has been a large increase in the cost of clothing, amounting to 23 per cent. The hon. Finance Minister has continually spoken of the reduced cost of manufactured products, that the people were getting their woollens, cottons, boots and shoes and other articles at reduced prices. All those statements were made to show that these blessings were showered down by the fiscal policy of the Administration. It is important to know why these advantages which everybody else has enjoyed, have not extended themselves to this institution, under the care and guardianship of the Government.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I may just say, to show how little dependence can be placed on the proposition made in the form in which the hon. gentleman has made it, that every fourth year the officers receive their dress uniforms—

Mr. BLAKE. We understand that perfectly.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. So that an hon. gentleman might rise and begin criticising the item by saying that there was an increase in the cost of clothing amounting to $1,700. The explanation is, of course, that these are exceptional years, just as in the case of the new suits which are given every third year. On the other hand, in the item for clothing in the convicts' shoe shop there is a decrease of $553.40, owing to there being a stock on hand. Next year I might get up and claim the credit for the decrease. So with the item, convicts' material for tailor's shop, $2,381. I mention these things to show how unfair it would be to compare the expenditures in the way adopted by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman shows that he is not conversant with the penitentiary items, because he assumes that the item of convicts' clothing includes the officers' clothing. Most of us are aware that there are certain items, such as those he mentioned which recur at regular intervals, but I did not ask about the officers' clothing. In the case of the convicts' clothing there may, of course, be some slight surpluses in some years, but in a well-managed institution such as I believe, generally speaking, this institution to be, there should not be any very large quantity of supplies carried over from one year to another. I did not pretend to compare one year with another, but I took the two earlier years and added the accounts for them and the two later years and added them together and then arrived at the result. These general results appear to correspond with the results arrived at by the warden, viz.: that the increase is due to the advance in prices of provisions and materials—the National Policy prices, in fact. I notice that the objections which we formerly made to the manner of keeping the farm accounts still apply, the result being that the cost of maintaining these convicts is much greater than appears on the face of the accounts. On the one hand, labor is charged at the famine price of 40 cents per day per man, while the highest possible prices are placed to the credit of the account. On this point I venture to press on the hon. gentleman the importance of using a much larger amount of convict labor than is used at present. Instead of having two spans of horses for one now used I would much rather see the additional labor performed by the convicts in the institution.

Mr. CASEY. I think we ought to have some information in regard to the great difference in the relative cost of the staffs in the different institutions compared with the total cost of the institutions and the number of convicts employed. For instance, in the Kingston Penitentiary there is a staff of 73 to look after about 730 prisoners, or one to every ten prisoners; in the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary there is a staff of 60 to look after 400 prisoners, or one to about six and a-half prisoners; at Dorchester there is a staff of 44 to look after 130 prisoners, or one to about three prisoners; in the Manitoba Penitentiary the proportion is about one to four, and in the British Columbia Penitentiary, one to five. I know, as a general principle, that a large institution can be managed with a smaller relative staff than a small one, but I do not think that accounts for the tremendous difference shown here. I find, also, that in Kingston there is one guard to seventeen prisoners, in St. Vincent de Paul, one to fourteen; in Dorchester, one to six and a-half; in Manitoba, one to ten; and in British Columbia, one to twelve; showing a tremendous disproportion in this respect also. The same feature is apparent in comparing the salaries of the staff to the total cost of the institutions. In Kingston the salaries are to the cost in the proportion of 1 to 2 $\frac{1}{2}$; in Dorchester, 1 to 1 $\frac{7}{10}$; in Manitoba, 1 to 2 $\frac{3}{10}$; and in British Columbia, 1 to 2 $\frac{1}{10}$. Both the Manitoba and the British Columbia Penitentiaries are much cheaper, relatively, than the Dorchester Penitentiary, and those of us who are not familiar with the causes of this circumstance should receive some explanation with regard to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Kingston Penitentiary is, in the first place, the oldest institution of the kind in the Dominion, and is now almost perfect; as the hon. member for West Durham says, it is really a village, surrounded with high walls and fortifications, precluding any probability of escape, and therefore a smaller number of guards are required. I believe Kingston is managed very economically, perhaps more so than some of the others which are newer, and in which the officers are less experienced. The Department of Justice has adopted the plan of sending the new officers of the other institutions to Kingston for a training. At Dorchester Penitentiary, I believe, the wall is not complete, and of necessity a larger number of guards are kept than at Kingston. As regards the salaries, the officers holding the same rank, with the same requirements, must get the same salaries.

Mr. BLAKE. I was delighted to hear from the hon. gentleman that it was impossible to escape from Kingston Penitentiary; but on turning to the Report, which he evidently has not read, I find that six males escaped last year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. These, I take it, were working on the farm.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that as soon as convicts were placed at any constituted industry, the Government considered whether that did not interfere with industries elsewhere. I hope the hon. gentleman does not deny that in Canada agriculture is a constituted industry. What right has he to compete with the farmers about Kingston in this respect? I would like to know, also, whether the Minister of Militia has sent in his resignation yet, because of the employment of prison labor to compete with free labor. Such is my respect for the consistency of that hon. gentleman, I cannot conceive that he would even dream of remaining in a Government which violated principles which he held sacred so lately!

and I would like to know what correspondence has taken place between him and his chief in this matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can say to the hon. gentleman that my hon. friend, I dare say, will be quite ready to throw up his office and emoluments, but my sense of duty to the country compelled me to induce him to resign himself to remain in office for the next year. I regard the convicts on the farm competing with the agriculturists outside. It is intended by degrees to reduce the spade labor of which the hon. gentleman speaks.

27. St. Vincent de Paul... .. $85,684 89

Mr. BLAKE. I find that the expense of maintenance is $83.33 per head, while in Kingston Penitentiary it is but $70.22 per head, an excess of $13.11 in St. Vincent de Paul. I do not see why the feeding and clothing of 400 men in St. Vincent de Paul should cost so much more per head than the feeding and clothing of 700 or 800 men in Kingston.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not able to inform the hon. gentleman what the causes are why the expense of maintenance is greater than at Kingston, but it is a fact, and we have got to pay the money.

Mr. BLAKE. I am extremely sorry to learn that it is absolutely necessary and now laid down by the hon. gentleman as a proposition which he cannot explain, but nevertheless exists, that it costs so much more to provide food and clothing in the immediate neighborhood of Montreal than at Kingston. The statement of the hon. member for Montreal shows when it came to be analyzed that the rates of wages there were exceptionally, in fact, deplorably low. While we have a statement of that kind on the one hand, we have the statement on the other hand that the cost of living is $18.50 per head greater at St. Vincent de Paul than at Kingston.

Mr. ANGLIN. We heard a great deal last year and the year before of the deplorable mismanagement of this establishment, and during the recess we heard an attempt was made to reorganize it by the appointment of a member of this House to the post of warden, and subsequently by the appointment of another warden. A dreadful murder occurred there during the year, and the evidence showed that it was possible for the convict to keep a knife in his possession. We ought to have an explanation of the condition or state of this institution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No doubt there have been irregularities, and a murder was committed under circumstances that showed laxity of discipline. The attention of the Department of Justice and the Inspector has been called to these irregularities, and it is to be hoped they will disappear. The hon. gentleman asks about rumors. I do not think we are called upon to meet every rumor. It is quite sufficient to have to deal with accomplished facts.

Mr. BLAKE. If we may not speak about rumors, but only about accomplished facts, I suppose we may ask for an explanation as to why it took so long to make an accomplished fact of the appointment of the present warden of the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary. I think that more than one member of this House could give an explanation on the subject. The hon. member for Bagot could do so, and there is another hon. member also who had a sort of local calculation for this office at the time, but perhaps the hon. Minister of the Interior will fill the whole bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that the hon. gentleman has got a right to give two days' notice of his question at any rate.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all. Here is an institution which was thoroughly disorganized, the warden was suspended and afterwards dismissed, and a great deal of bickering, Mr. MACKENZIE.

jealousies, strifes and plots, which were extremely detrimental to the discipline of the institution, took place amongst the officers; and no doubt the cause of a great many evils, which appeared in the administration of the penitentiary, was due to the fact that the wardenship was not filled. The acting warden and the Roman Catholic chaplain pointed out very clearly the detrimental effect which the continuous want of a permanent head, had on the whole institution; and this does seem to me to demand a serious explanation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, the hon. gentleman is quite correct in stating that there was an unfortunate state of dissension and disorder arising from jealousies and some unexplained antipathies, which seriously affected the working of this institution and its machinery. The warden was removed very reluctantly, because he was in some respects a capable man; but, on the whole, it was found to be in the interests of the institution that he should be removed. Well, enquiry was made with the view of securing a good man for the position; and in the meantime, in order to get rid of these dissensions, and to have a perfectly impartial person in charge, Mr. Bedson, a very clever man from the Manitoba Penitentiary, who happened to be available, was placed in charge for two or three months to ascertain what was really the matter. He came from a distance, and was placed there for a time, and Mr. Laviolette was sent to Kingston in order that he might examine into the working of that institution. It is to be hoped that this will be the end of all these dissensions, and that Mr. Laviolette, just from seeing the working of the Kingston Penitentiary, will be able to carry out the same discipline, &c., in this institution.

Mr. BLAKE. When was Mr. Bedson sent there?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was some time last summer.

Mr. BLAKE. It was some time in the fall of the year.

Mr. CARON. It was after last Session.

Mr. BLAKE. I am aware that it was after last, and before this Session.

Mr. CARON. It was almost immediately after last Session.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal Centre). It was in September or in October last.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes. I think that is about the period. The late warden was granted leave on the 21st of June, 1880; the matter remained suspended until the 24th January before last, when he was finally removed, and his place was not filled until—I do not know when, but it was about a year afterwards, and Mr. Bedson was not sent down until in September or October last. There was, therefore, a period of about nine months during which the experiment was tried, and during this period another experiment was tried, not at the penitentiary, but in another institution, one of the counties of the Province of Quebec, which hon. gentlemen opposite thought was under their control. The real fact is that it was proposed to appoint a member of this House warden, but the political arrangements failed, and the appointment did not take place. The member for Bagot tried to effect an arrangement, but when he found that the contestants could not agree among themselves about the succession, my hon. friend, with a high sense of patriotism, determined to remain here instead of going there. But what I complain of is, that in the progress of these arrangements for conferring these species of patronage on a member of Parliament, much time was wasted during which this institution was obviously deteriorated. Investigation after investigation was held, but nevertheless no appointment was made for some nine months, and I think that this was not right, and to a very great extent there was a very improper neglect of public duty which called for the earliest possible appointment, and the re-arrangement of the institution.

28. Dorchester Penitentiary..... $42,245.30

Mr. BLAKE. The cost of maintenance in this institution is much higher than it is at Kingston, being $81.36 per head. Is living more expensive in New Brunswick than at Kingston?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. They live better at Dorchester.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend says that they live better at Dorchester. I know he does, but what about the convicts?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. About the other convicts?

Mr. MACKENZIE. We must have some explanation about the high salaries of the staff at St. Vincent de Paul—it is $91 for each convict. In Kingston it is much less; but in Dorchester it takes no less than $200 for each convict to supply the salary of the staff. Really this is a most extraordinary estimate.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. There is no doubt a great deal of extravagance displayed in the management of this institution. That is really a most extravagant estimate. This cannot be accounted for by the statement of the hon. gentleman as to many of the convicts being engaged in farm labor.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are only sixteen at Kingston, it appears.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. There are a large number who go to the quarries as well as to the farm, and these require guards, perhaps more than the men who are engaged in farming operations.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. There is no doubt at Dorchester an extravagance which is not justifiable at all. They have a matron at a salary of $500, and a deputy-matron at $300, and at no time more than three female convicts in that institution, and now there are not two. It would be well to send these female convicts to Kingston where there is ample accommodation, and dispense with the matrons at Dorchester.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend from Westmoreland is in a good position to know that there is extravagance in the appointment of officers at the Dorchester Penitentiary. There are quarters, fuel, light and many other accommodations, and all for only two female convicts. More than that, the Inspector reports that even these quarters are not satisfactory for these two lady convicts. If you are to keep this staff of two women to look after two other women in an unsuitable place which, according to the Inspector, there is no intention of changing, while there is suitable accommodation at Kingston, it seems to me it would be better for the female convicts to be there at Kingston with others of their class and thereby save a great deal of expense.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think there is a good deal in the remark about these two female convicts being transferred to Kingston. I think if it were a question that the female convicts in the whole Dominion were sent to one institution the number of matrons there would have to be increased.

Mr. ANGLIN. The whole staff at Dorchester is organized on a most extravagant scale. When first the proposal was made I pointed out that a consolidation of these officers could well be made. Now we have a warden, a deputy-warden and a chief keeper for 130 convicts; also an accountant, a store-keeper, a schoolmaster and a steward. I am strongly of the opinion that one man could very well discharge the duties of all these officers. The accountant and the store-keeper cannot have much to do. It cannot take more than one hour a day to take in stores in an establishment like that. At all events the steward and the store-keeper could be combined. I have no idea what a schoolmaster has to do in that establishment. My impression is that we have very few young persons there.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They teach adults. One object of a penitentiary is to educate the criminals.

Mr. ANGLIN. An hour or two a day is quite sufficient. The whole staff is organized upon the same extravagant scale. We have a hospital keeper at $560 a year to attend to the one or two who may be sick. I am satisfied you may go into that establishment twenty times a year and not find one person in the hospital. In one institution at St. John where we had a much larger number, we had no such officer as a hospital keeper, and no need of one. The whole establishment was organized apparently with a view rather to provide positions for some who were to be cared for than for the purpose of having the duty thoroughly discharged. The matron at Dorchester is a lady who went there from St. John, where she was for many years matron of the St. John Penitentiary, and one of the most efficient officers we could possibly find. I know she gave entire satisfaction to all the Commissioners. However, it is a very serious question whether she ought to be employed in this particular institution where there are but two or three female convicts altogether. It would scarcely be right to turn her out of employment altogether, and I presume something else can be found for her to do.

Mr. BLAKE. The truth is that this additional man under the name of schoolmaster is a guard who discharges those duties, as is the case in other penitentiaries. I think the establishment should be overhauled. It is quite indefensible that so many officers should be retained for 121 convicts. No justification could be offered last year when the Estimates were passed; and when experience has shown that the large staff is unnecessary, some effort should be made to effect a reduction.

Mr. CASEY. The number of keepers and guards at Dorchester is one to five, while at Kingston it is one to fifteen.

Mr. ANGLIN. That can be explained to some extent by the fact that the Dorchester Penitentiary, in the first instance, was not surrounded by a wall.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Some effort should be made to reduce the salaries and the number of officers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think the salaries should be reduced, but the number of officers should be reduced. It was owing to the undefended state of the outworks of Dorchester Penitentiary that an additional number of guards was required. I dare say when the outworks are completed the number of guards will be reduced. Two or three officers of the Dorchester Penitentiary might be removed to Kingston and the staff reduced in that way; but it is pretty hard to discharge a person employed as a matron, after she has given a good many years' employment, and to send her away when perhaps she is unfitted for work of a different description. I will call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this matter, and the Government will in some way endeavor to reduce the staff.

Mr. MACKENZIE. If the matron's political opinions are not in favor of the National Policy, it will be a good reason to dismiss her.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad to have the hon. gentleman's authority for that.

Mr. MILLS. A large sum is annually voted for the purpose of maintaining this institution, an amount that is altogether unnecessary. The Government have not taken the first step to establish an institution on an efficient and economical basis; on the contrary, it was organized in a very extravagant manner and it has been so continued. The hon. the First Minister has suggested it would be improper to dismiss a matron who is not required. There was, however, the case of W. Kingsford, who for a good many years was employed in the public service, and who might find just as much difficulty in obtaining employment in the particular line in which he was employed. I do not know that the Government are called upon to make themselves a charitable institution for the purpose of maintaining a large number of persons, who, because they are no longer required in the public service are pensioned on the State. With regard to this particular item I have no doubt that the Government, if they had properly administered the affairs of the country, would have found no difficulty in greatly reducing the item, and that the utility of the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches, if they ever were useful, has departed.

Mr. ANGLIN. I notice, with regard to these penitentiaries, that the expenses connected with the Dorchester institution are very extraordinary compared with those of the Kingston Penitentiary, and so far from there having been a decrease by uniting the institutions at Halifax and St. John in some items, at least—though the expense was formerly largely due to the fact that short and common prisoners had to be maintained in St. John—the expenditure has increased. In comparing the staff of the Dorchester institution with that of Kingston, there appear to be some very extraordinary discrepancies in the salaries.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Since the hon. gentleman objects to these better terms being given to the Maritime Provinces, I promise him that we will look into the matter in the way of economizing.

Mr. ANGLIN. We are just as much in favor of economy in the Lower Provinces as in the far west, only we do not appear to be as likely to succeed in getting it.

29. Manitoba Penitentiary $26,654 53

Mr. BLAKE. I notice that the cost of maintenance in this institution is 59 per cent. above that at Kingston. It seems to me that we should have the details of the maintenance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman should, after prorogation, take the craze to go westward he will find that the cost of food and clothing is infinitely greater in Manitoba than elsewhere, which will, no doubt, satisfactorily account for the addition to the expenditure. There is one item of addition to salaries—that of the engineer. Formerly the institution was heated by stoves, but furnaces have now been put in, and, of course, an engineer is necessary, but I suppose that he will save his salary over and over again in the saving of fuel. In the hospital expenses there is an increase of $100 to enable the surgeon to obtain a supply of drugs.

Mr. BLAKE. The remarks of the hon. gentleman as to the increased cost of supplies in the North-West show a remarkable prospect for immigrants who may go into that country. So far as I can learn the cost per head last year for maintenance was $87.80; and this year it is $111.06, an increase of $22.86 per head, or nearly one-third of the whole cost at Kingston.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I find that for fifty convicts in 1881-82, the estimate was $4,381, and that for ten additional the amount was $2,291. Apparently these ten are to cost $229 a piece, which is certainly a remarkable figure, supposing it is the minimum cost of which a man can be supported in the North-West under the present Tariff.

30. British Columbia Penitentiary $19,833 68

Mr. BLAKE. The maintenance in this case is $95.86 per head, being 34 per cent. over Kingston. I would like to have some information on the details of that maintenance.

Mr. MILLS.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman, from his experience of British Columbia, knows that food, clothing and everything else, is dearer in British Columbia than in any other part of the Dominion, except Manitoba. I do not suppose there is any immediate prospect of the expense decreasing there; but by-and-bye, when the Canadian Pacific Railway reaches the Rocky Mountains, there will be a flow of immigrants and merchants into that country, and food will pour in from the prairies through the gorges of the Rocky Mountains.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It is usually the case that when you have more convicts, the expense is proportionately less; but here you make provision for seventy convicts instead of sixty, and the expense is proportionately greater.

Mr. MILLS. I should like to know why the hon. gentleman provides for a larger number of convicts next year than he provided for last year. I can understand why the large increase of population in Manitoba should be a reason for estimating for an increase of convicts there, but I cannot see why the hon. gentleman proposes to provide for as large an increase in British Columbia as in Manitoba and the North-West altogether.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman knows that there is great paucity of labor in British Columbia, and Mr. Onderdonk and his Company have had great difficulty in obtaining it. There has been a considerable influx of Chinese labor, and both Chinese and whites are employed on the railway, and an increase of crime along the line of railway is estimated for. Until the road is finished, there will be an irregular population there, and of course an increase in the number of convictions.

Mr. MILLS. I understood that the hon. gentleman took the position, in a previous Session, that Chinese labor should not be employed but should be excluded from the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. MILLS. Did the hon. gentleman not grant a commission to consider whether these Chinese should not be excluded from the country?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The House may have granted a commission.

Mr. ANGLIN. It is about time we should express an opinion about the employment of a chaplain in the other branch of the Legislature. We do not want to deprive the hon. members of that House of any means of grace, but our Speaker performs the duty quite as acceptably and as profitably as could any gentleman who dons a robe and is called by a title, and I do not see why hon. gentlemen of the Upper House require a chaplain any more than we do.

35. Publishing Debates $20,000

Mr. BLAKE. When this question was up last year, we had a promise, which does not appear to have been redeemed, that a statement would be furnished showing the exact cost of the Hansard each year for a number of years.

Mr. BOWELL. I will obtain from the Clerk the statement required by the hon. gentleman.

37. Grant to Parliament Library $7,000

Mr. MACKENZIE. We ought to have some understanding about the position of the Library. During the last six years, nearly the whole of the grant has been used in purchasing law books; and I observe that we are getting behindhand in respect to standard current works.

Mr. SPEAKER. A sub-Committee of the Library Committee has been appointed to look into the matter.

Mr. MILLS. We are not keeping up with the current literature of the Empire, in consequence of the smallness of the grant. Of course, the Law Department has made serious inroads in the grant, but as this is really the only valuable library in the whole Dominion, we ought to take care that we do not fall behind in any branch of science, or of the literature of the age, and I do not think that this appropriation will be adequate to make up the deficiency which exists. If valuable books are not obtained at the time of publication, they soon get out of print; and this matter deserves the best attention of the Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope that the Library Committee, which I believe is very carefully selected, will take this subject up and consider the whole question; at present, it is neither the one thing nor the other. It is too large for a parliamentary library, and too small and confined for a public and general library. The vote is not very large, but I think that if the Library Committee were to set themselves seriously to work and consider what works should be bought hereafter, the ordinary vote might keep up the representation of almost all the standard English and French literature. I fear, from the casual glance which I take occasionally in the Library—and this is not very often at present—that there is an enormous quantity of trash and rot in some classes of the books on our shelves, which ought not to be in any decent library. I am not very strait-laced in these things; I think the literature of every kind, if first-class, ought to be permitted, but when it is light literature, the mere froth of belles lettres, it ought to be first-class to justify purchase; and the trash which is put on our shelves ought to be in a great measure excluded. If more care was taken in the selection of the works, I think that the sum voted would be very nearly adequate. As I understand it, the bookseller or the person in England who is supposed to purview for the Library, has the choice of any books which he thinks proper to send, and they are shovelled over here instead of being carefully selected. The annual catalogue ought to be in the hands of the Librarian, who ought to report to the Library Committee what books he thinks ought to be obtained. The gentlemen of the Committee are, of course, library men; and they ought to exercise their own judgment in looking over the list and in weeding out the annual publications. In this way you would find that we would get very nearly all the good books and avoid getting many of the bad ones. At present it is dreadful to look into some of the compartments and to see what kind of books are brought out day after day, which neither give pleasure, information, instruction, profit or entertainment.

Mr. BLAKE. I agree with much of what the hon. gentleman has said. Anything in the nature of a historical work, of a political biography, of constitutional law, and works of that kind, ought to be secured, however imperfect the production may be.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My remarks only applied to belles lettres.

Mr. BLAKE. I would therefore be disposed to divide into two classes the works in question, and point out one class which ought to be got as fast as they come, while as to the other, the greatest care in selection ought to be observed. Having over-expended the grant, we have been spending one-half of the usual sum during the last two years; but now we have returned to the vote of $7,000, it may be necessary to do something in order to bring the Library back to a proper condition. It is clear that the line ought to be drawn much more rigidly than it has been, as a great deal of good money has been spent to no purpose whatever on the shelves of the Library. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, difficult though it is to draw the line, the line can be drawn much more rigidly than in the past, because a great deal of money has been uselessly spent in the Library.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It would be an advantage for a certain fixed vote to be given for the Law Department. It is a tremendously heavy item out of this vote, and it would answer our purpose better if we voted whatever might be required for keeping up the Law Library, $3,000 or $4,000 a year. There is no doubt, as the Minister of Interior has said, we are very deficient in a great number of works. We are short of statistical works. I have several times sought for statistical works and have been unable to obtain them.

Mr. MACKENZIE. As I understand the matter at present the text works in the Law Library are all procured. What is now wanted is a sum for purchasing the yearly reports. The expenditure for law books since the establishment of the Supreme Court must be in the neighborhood of $30,000.

Mr. BLAKE. By consulting the French Law Library at Paris and the Osgoode Hall Library we could ascertain the average cost of reasonably maintaining a Law Library. It might be well to purchase only the reports of the larger American States and then the English law reports, which are not very extensive.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope the Library Committee will take the whole subject up and report what they think ought to be a special grant for the Law Library and for other purposes, and the Government will take it into consideration.

Mr. CASEY. I think the suggestion is very good, and I think it would be advisable to take a little more than the usual sum for the next year or two. There might not occur a better opportunity for reasserting the stock in the Library. I notice a good many new importations consist of novels got out in expensive bindings.

38. Salaries of Officers, additional, and contingencies of Library..... $6,050

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The additional means the statutory increase.

Mr. MILLS. I see no item to defray the expense of making a new catalogue. I understand the party for whom this appropriation is made has not completed his work.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think the person who was employed was only taken temporarily. It was supposed the vote would not be required for more than a year or two, and it has been continued down to another time.

Mr. BLAKE. If the work is being efficiently prosecuted in the present way it ought to be given; if not, I suppose it ought to be prosecuted efficiently.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I think the Librarian did not ask for it.

Mr. SPEAKER. It will be wanted I am sure.

Mr. CASEY. I see $12,610 for officers and contingencies of the Library, and here again this item for additional salary. Is this in addition to the larger item?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I may say the Librarian asks for an increased vote for the contingencies of the Library. I think he recommended that the sum asked for, for contingencies, should be increased in order that the periodicals to which he referred should be paid out of the contingencies, leaving $7,000 to be used for books. But it was considered desirable to leave the contingencies as they were, simply increasing the $50 provided by Statute to the clerks who were entitled to it. I think about $1,000 of the vote is for contingencies, and the rest is statutory.

40. Printing, paper and bookbinding..... $60,000

Mr. MILLS. I hope the hon. gentleman will adopt a better style of bookbinding. In my opinion, we have the most unsightly system of binding in the world. There are on books in the Library received in exchange for those sent out that are at all to be compared with those in this particular.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Some years ago there was an improvement made in the binding at a comparatively small cost. For a year or two the binding was very good, but has since gone back, and now the Statutes of two or three years ago can hardly be handled in many cases. I have repeatedly sent out this Session for volumes of the Statutes; at times I found it impossible to get them, and I sometimes found it impossible to read them. Either the Library or Printing Committee should look into the matter. The paper was poor, the binding worse.

Mr. BLAKE. The Library Statutes should be specially bound, as they are wanted for reference. The indexes of the Statutes should be so arranged as to have the Public Acts at the beginning and the Private Acts at the end of the volume.

44. To meet expenses in connection with care of Archives, $5,000

In reply to Mr. ANGLIN,

Mr. POPE (Compton). There have been several persons here to examine the archives, respecting which they have spoken very highly. A good deal of progress has been made during last year, and the papers which we announced last year would be completed this year have been almost finished. The Archivist has made a report, which will shortly be presented to the House.

Mr. MILLS. It is very important that the archives should be placed in the Library of Parliament, where there are already some papers—the papers copied by Mr. Merritts some years ago from old papers in the British Museum, the Simcoe papers comprising several volumes, the manuscripts from Paris archives and some other English papers. I would have liked an opportunity of examining some of the papers before the boundary question came before Parliament, but I had no opportunity of doing so, and it was impossible for members to go over to the Department of Agriculture in order to examine manuscripts. There was another case, the papers regarding which were mentioned in the list which the hon. gentleman has had copied; and it would have been of the utmost importance to us if we could have had a copy of the Commission received from the Governor General at that period as bearing upon the question of the boundaries of Canada. I have no doubt it would have been found among the papers in the British Museum.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is part of your work of four years ago.

Mr. MILLS. Not at all. The papers were not brought here at that time.

Mr. POPE (Compton). The fact is that there is not room enough in the Library for the books we have there now.

Mr. MILLS. Then there should be another.

Mr. POPE. That is another question, but in the meantime we have to do the best we can with the room we have.

Mr. CASEY. I notice that the Archivist is paid a salary of $1,600 a year, but it has never been made very clear what he does for that sum. I would like to ask, with regard to certain documents which were copied in London, whether the money was expended by Sir Alexander Galt of his own motion or whether it was expended by the Archivist himself.

Mr. BLAKE. So far as I can understand this sum of $5,000 in the Estimates includes the salary of the Archivist.

Mr. POPE (Compton). My impression is that it is not included, but that the extra amount is for one of the clerks in the office who is a very hard-worked man. I may say that the copying is all done by contract at so much a line.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask whether any enquiry has been made with respect to certain valuable papers in connection with the early history of Canada which I believe exist at Boston and at Washington. Some discussion took place on that subject some two or three years ago, and I think the hon. Minister promised to make enquiries. In the early colonial days a good many documents of interest to us were accumulated in the hands of the Massachusetts authorities—of quite as much interest I think, as a good many of the documents in Paris or London.

Mr. POPE. I did say that enquiry would be made, but we had quite as much as we could do by looking after the documents in Europe.

Resolutions ordered to be reported; and (at 1 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 11th April, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PORT WARDEN OF MONTREAL.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to consolidate the several Acts relating to the office of Port Warden, of the Harbor of Montreal, amending the same in such manner as better to attain the objects thereof, and to facilitate their working.

He said: The object of this resolution is to amend the several Acts relating to the office of Port Warden and to make some slight amendments in them with relation to the inspection of ships and the survey of hatches of vessels on their arrival. These are the three points respecting which it is proposed to make any amendment, with the exception of taking power to reduce the fees, wherever the amount collected shall be more than meets the requirements of the office.

Motion agreed to; resolution considered in Committee, agreed to and reported.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 122) to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the office of Port Warden of the Harbor of Montreal.

Bill read the first time.

SICK AND DISTRESSED MARINERS' DUES EXEMPTION BILL.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to exempt vessels employed in fishing, from the payment of dues for the relief of sick and distressed mariners.

He said: I may say, Mr. Speaker, in moving this resolution, that we have had complaints from foreign fishermen, on one or two occasions, and also from their Governments, that we have charged them sick mariners' dues. We have found, on examining into the matter, that it was only in exceptional cases that they have paid such dues; that the usual custom of foreign fishermen is to frequent our shores without entering at any port; and therefore that they escaped the payment of these dues, with this exception: that whenever they have on board a man who is sick, or disabled in any way, they immediately enter some port and pay $2 or $3, and leave the man a charge upon us, entailing quite a heavy cost. Consequently we have thought it advisable to take away the cause of the complaint which foreigners have made against us—of charging sick mariners' dues on any vessel that happens to enter any of our ports, and to remedy this by abolishing all such dues in relation to fishing vessels; and this is the object of the Bill.

Mr. KILLAM. Will our fishing vessels, in cases of sickness on board, be refused the benefits of the marine hospitals in our ports?

Mr. McLELAN. I think [that the hon. gentleman will find that our own vessels, which are engaged simply in coasting, do not participate in these benefits; that no vessel, unless she pays such fees, participates in these benefits; and that, therefore, being exempt from these payments they do not share in the benefits.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken when he says that our fishing vessels do not pay these dues. I think that they both pay the dues and participate in the benefits accruing from the fund. Of course the resolution implies that they are so liable now, as it is proposed to exempt them from the obligation; in fact they are liable for these dues as well as other vessels:

Mr. McLELAN. Some of our vessels which have made foreign voyages and paid the dues, have participated in these benefits, but it is proposed to exempt all fishing vessels from the payments in question.

Mr. KILLAM. Of course the resolution implies that fishing vessels are now liable to pay the dues, and may participate in the benefits of the fund; but what we wish to discover is: does the hon. gentleman intend to relieve these vessels of these payments, and prevent their participation in the benefits mentioned?

Mr. McLELAN. It is proposed to exempt both British and foreign fishing vessels from the payment of these dues.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. That is wholly.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Mr. KILLAM. The fishermen object to these payments, because the fund is kept up very largely by fishing vessels.

Mr. McLELAN. The payment per vessel is very small, about $3 in the year, and the expenditure has been very large.

Mr. BLAKE. As I understand the hon. gentleman, our coasting and fishing vessels do not pay these dues at all?

Mr. McLELAN. No.

Mr. BLAKE. And they do not obtain any of the benefits either?

Mr. McLELAN. They do not obtain any of the benefits.

Mr. BLAKE. They are not allowed to enter the hospitals and they pay nothing?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. And the hon. gentleman says that, when they go on foreign voyages and do pay and are entitled to these benefits, there are but very rare cases; and the foreign fishing vessels pay the dues only when they find a man sick on board, in order to get the benefits which the fund confers.

Mr. McLELAN. Let the hon. gentleman understand me. Our own vessels which are engaged partly in fishing and partly in other business, when they go on foreign voyages are entitled, under the operation of the Act, to pay the dues and to receive these benefits.

Mr. BLAKE. It is not intended that any change shall take place in their position in that respect.

Mr. McLELAN. No.

Mr. BLAKE. As to foreign vessels, they practically do not pay the dues until a case of sickness arises, and then they run into some port and pay one or two dollars, to obtain the benefits in question, and the hon. gentleman believes that the practical result of the change proposed will be, that our own fishermen will not be deprived of any advantage which they now enjoy; while foreign vessels, which do not enjoy these benefits fairly, will be deprived of an advantage which they obtain, without affording any corresponding compensation.

Mr. McLELAN. Yes.

Mr. KILLAM. We must have further explanations; although the hon. gentleman's Bill may exhibit his intentions much more clearly. In case a fishing vessel makes two voyages to the banks in the summer, and takes a cargo to Halifax in the fall, will its crew be entitled to participate in these benefits? When will vessels have to pay? At what time of the year? I think the hon. gentleman is somewhat astray in his idea that the fishermen do not now participate in the benefits of this fund. I believe that they do.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Where it is decided that vessels are liable to pay, they have to pay, and there is no exception in the Act at all. All fishermen are liable to, and all do pay.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 121) to exempt vessels employed in fishing from the payment of dues for the relief of sick and distressed mariners.

Bill read the first time.

GENERAL PORT WARDENS' ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend The General Port Wardens' Act, 1874, 37 Victoria, Chapter 32.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the proposal is to give the Port Warden power to appoint deputies in certain cases; when the consignee or owner of a vessel or cargo cannot be found, it shall be lawful for the Port Warden to take charge of the property until the consignee or owner can be found. This is all that it is proposed to do under this Bill.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Is there any necessity for this resolution. It seems to me extraordinary that a vessel should come into any port without a known consignee or owner.

Mr. McLELAN. Such cases have occurred.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Where did such cases arise?

Mr. McLELAN. In many of the large ports of the Dominion. At least it is so reported. The other amendment empowers the Port Warden to appoint deputies. In many cases this has been found necessary, and the question was whether such power was given under the Act, consequently it was thought desirable to ask for such powers.

Mr. ANGLIN. I regard the appointment of deputies by the Port Wardens themselves as very objectionable, and from what I know of the trade, I think it should rather be provided that those who appoint the Port Wardens may appoint the supernumeraries or extra officers, or anything of that kind. In St. John's, this will be a matter of very great importance. Nautical men and men of experience in business should be appointed Port Wardens, and very great care ought to be exercised in the selection of these officers. The Port Wardens themselves should not have this authority.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it is much better to leave the responsibility rather with the Port Warden, in the selection of these temporary officers, who have to perform duties under him and for whose acts he will be responsible.

Mr. ANGLIN. In what way?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the same way as he is for his own acts. He will be responsible for the appointment of proper deputies, and for the misconduct of deputies, as he is responsible for his own misconduct. I think the hon. gentleman opposite on the front bench, once that the Government commenced to appoint such officers as Deputy Wardens, would say that the next thing would be applications for salaries; and, if anything went wrong, the Port Warden would say: "I am not responsible, the Government appoints deputies for me, of whom I do not approve;" therefore I think that, in regard to temporary offices, it will be better to leave the whole of the responsibility with the Port Warden himself.

Mr. ANGLIN. I speak from what I know of the appointment of Port Wardens in the city from which I come, St. John, where these officers are appointed, not by the Government, but by the City Council. Notwithstanding the statements of the right hon. gentleman, I am strongly of the opinion that these appointments should also be left with the City Council. These officers are entrusted sometimes with very delicate duties, and it is necessary that there should be a very careful selection to obtain proper men; and if the Port Warden has the right to appoint his deputies, he may choose men in whom he has entire confidence; but, who, nevertheless, may not have the qualities which the public at large feel that they ought to possess. The position of a Port Warden is sometimes a very important one. His decisions as to cargoes are at times of very serious consequence to the owners of vessels or of cargoes, or to the insurers, as the case may be; and it is of the utmost importance that the Port Warden should be very carefully selected.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The general Act does not apply to the ports either of Montreal, Quebec or St. John. Is it intended that this amendment shall apply to these ports?

Mr. McLELAN. There are special Acts provided for these ports. It only applies to the ports that the general Bill applies to.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Then it would not apply to St. John, Quebec, or Montreal. Do you propose to make the Port Warden responsible for all the acts of the deputy?

Mr. McLELAN. He appoints them, and is responsible for the men he appoints.

Resolutions agreed to and reported.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH,

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill No. (120) to amend the General Port Wardens' Act, 1874.

Bill read the first time.

HARBOR FEES AT THE PORT OF HALIFAX.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Act 35 Victoria, Chapter 42, providing for the appointment of a Harbor Master at the Port of Halifax:

1. By so readjusting the fees payable under the said Act on ships entering the said Port, that they shall not exceed the following rates, viz:—

On ships over 20 and not over 50 tons.....	$0 50
do 50 do 100 do	1 00
do 100 do 200 do	1 50
do 200 do 300 do	2 00
do 300 do 400 do	2 00
do 400 do 500 do	3 00
do 500 do 700 do	4 00
do 700 tons.....	5 00

Ships not over 20 tons to be exempt.

2. By altering the times of payment of such duty, so that ships not over 100 tons shall pay it only once and ships over 100 tons not more than twice in any calendar year.

He said: The principal charge is the scale of fees. There was a special Act passed for the Port of Halifax and a scale of fees named in that Act, but it was found that the scale was not so applicable to the size of vessels frequenting that port as the scale under the General Harbor Masters' Act, and for some time past the Harbor Master of Halifax has been collecting under the scale of fees of the General Harbor Masters' Act. It is also proposed to alter the times of payment so as to make the fees, instead of payable once in twelve months for a vessel over 100 tons as at present, payable once in any calendar year.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. KILLAM. Were the dues payable at Halifax under the special Act different from those payable at other Ports under the General Act?

Mr. McLELAN. Yes. This resolution is to make the scale of fees at Halifax the same as that in force in other places. The scale for Halifax provides for the payment of the fee of $3 on vessels of 400 tons, and on vessels of 500 tons, $4; so that there is a reduction in these two classes.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Has there been any application from Halifax, from merchants or others, asking for this change?

Mr. McLELAN. It has been ascertained that at Halifax they have been collecting under a different scale from that which the special Act provided for. It was represented that the scale in the General Act was more just and was better adapted for the class of vessels visiting Halifax than the scale in the Act applicable to the Port of Halifax.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Did any one from Halifax ask for it?

Mr. McLELAN. I am not aware that there was any official application. But it has been recommended by the representatives from Halifax that the special scale was unjust, and that it was advisable to make it conformable to the General Act.

Mr. KILLAM. I thought the scale in Halifax was precisely the same as that in the other ports, and if there is any reason for changing the scale for Halifax, I think the same reason should make it good in the other ports of the Dominion. Is this intended to make the charge less upon smaller vessels or greater on the larger vessels? Is it intended to produce more revenue or less? and can the hon. gentleman give us any idea of the amount of revenue obtained, and what has been done with the balance of it, after paying the Harbor Master's salary of $1,600?

Mr. McLELAN. This will give the same revenue that has been collected according to the scale heretofore in use, but on smaller vessels it is less. As to the balance, it has been paid to the credit of the Government.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Is this Act to legalize what has been illegally done by the Port Warden at Halifax? I understand he has been collecting fees on a scale different from that authorized by law. Is it proposed to legalize the collection of these fees?

Mr. McLELAN. The object is to have a legal scale of fees for the Port of Halifax, to make the scale the same as in the General Act.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I understand the Port Warden at Halifax has been collecting fees different from those which he was authorized to collect by law. Of course, his conduct is illegal in that respect, and it might be necessary to have some retroactive legislation to legalize what he has illegally done. If that is the object of course I have no objection to the Bill; but I certainly had not heard of any desire for a change in the scale.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 140) to amend the Act 35 Victoria, Chapter 42, providing for the appointment of a Harbor Master at the Port of Halifax.

Bill read the first time.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McLELAN moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the fifth sub-section of the eighteenth section of the Pilotage Act of 1873, by providing that the Pilotage Authorities of the District of Quebec shall not grant any new license to any person as a Pilot until the number of Pilots in the said District is thus reduced below one hundred and twenty-five, which number shall never be exceeded after such reduction, and also to repeal the twenty-sixth section of the said Act and to empower the said Pilotage Authorities to prescribe the number of apprentices to be indentured to the Corporation of Pilots, having regard to the requirements of the service and not exceeding the number now limited by the said Act.

He said: I will just say in explanation of this resolution that the pilots of Quebec complain that the amounts received for their pilotage fees does not give them a sufficient annual allowance to maintain them, and it is found, on enquiry, that the number (184) now employed is larger than the necessities of the port demand. The large number of steamships running to the port and the opening of railways have enabled the pilots to get down more readily to the ground where pilots are taken by vessels, and in consequence a much smaller number than 184 could perform the service. The Act under which they are operating prescribes that they shall not exceed 200; the maximum is fixed at that number and the minimum at 150, they now stand at 184 which gives an allowance to each of something over $500, and they have made application for authority to increase the pilotage fees, claiming that the sum received does not pay their expenses and leave enough to support them. Instead of that, however, it is thought better to amend the Act so that the number may be reduced below 150, which is the minimum under the present Act. A large number of the men are aged, thirty-three or thirty-four of them being about sixty-five years of age and will soon be pensioned, when the number can be reduced down to the wants of the port. We consider 125 would be ample under present circumstances, as there is so much steam being employed both in shipping and railways, and it is proposed to reduce the number to 125 instead of giving them larger fees and imposing heavier taxes upon the shipping visiting the port.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. As I understand this resolution, it is that no new pilots are to be appointed at all until the present number is reduced to 125, which number is considered sufficient for the wants of the port.

Mr. McLELAN. It may be necessary to provide that the apprentices now on shall remain. The wording of this resolution, perhaps, does not convey exactly what I intended, but the young men who are now serving apprenticeship—who are on the list of apprentices—may have to be provided for, but no new apprentices shall be taken on. The Act fixes the number of apprentices that must be on the list, at thirty-five I think it is, and says that the number of pilots shall not fall below 150.

Mr. MACKENZIE. This appears to be a Bill to provide for the limitation of our foreign trade, consequent, no doubt, upon the legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. If you continue to take on apprentices I do not see very well how you can restrict the number of pilots; you should restrict the number of apprentices also.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The pilots themselves will see that their interest is not to increase the number of apprentices, and they will have to reduce them in proportion to their own numbers. The maximum number of pilots as provided by the present Bill, is, as my colleague said just now, largely in excess of the wants of the port of Quebec. There is no doubt that at that time when there was no railway between Quebec and the Lower St. Lawrence, the number of pilots was required to be much larger than it should be at the present time, because now they can come up to Quebec or go down to Father Point or Rimouski, in eight or nine hours, whilst previous to the opening of the railway they had to go by schooners, and were sometimes several days in reaching the pilotage ground. Under those circumstances we did not think, two years ago, that we should sanction a by-law that had been proposed by the Pilotage Authorities in Quebec to the effect that the tolls on the tonnage of vessels should be received for the sustenance of these pilots, we thought we should rather see whether the trade could not be made to yield the amount fixed by the previous Act, that is to say, $600 a piece. That was found to be sufficient two years ago, but last year it fell down to $508 or $510 a head, and while that amount was considered too small, we were not disposed to come to Parliament and ask that the tolls on shipping should be increased; we thought, however, that one mode of meeting the emergency was to see whether the number of pilots was not too large. Certainly the existing number (184) is too large for the present exigencies of the Quebec trade, with the facilities of communication which are now available; therefore my colleague has brought this Bill before the House, which, I think, will meet the difficulty, and, at the same time, insure the trade being served efficiently, as in the past.

Resolution agreed to and reported.

Mr. McLELAN introduced Bill (No. 142) to amend the Pilotage Act, 1873.

Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented the report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Royal Commission, DRAWBACKS ON CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY SUPPLIES.

Mr. BOWELL moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolutions:—

1. That it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may from time to time make regulations:

(1) For ascertaining the quantities and values of fish plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts, nuts, and iron bridges, manufactured in Canada for use by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the original construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as defined in the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 14, and also the quantities and values of all telegraphic apparatus manufactured in Canada to be used by the said Company in the original construction and first equipment of a telegraph line in connection with the said Railway:

And for ascertaining the persons in Canada from whom such fish plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts, nuts, and iron bridges and telegraphic apparatus, respectively, has been procured by the said Company.

2. That the Governor in Council, with the consent of the Treasury Board, and on such terms and conditions as may be thought proper, may pay over to the persons in Canada from whom such articles as aforesaid, manufactured in Canada, have been procured, sums of money not exceeding the amount of Customs duty which would have been payable on such articles, respectively, if imported into Canada at the time they were so procured by the said Company.

He said: I explained the resolutions fully when I first introduced the Bill, but it was afterwards thought better to proceed by the present mode.

Mr. BLAKE. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that an Order of the House has been made for a return of all correspondence and papers in connection with this matter, which has not been brought down.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not long ago that that motion was passed.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes.

Mr. BOWELL. No. It was since the question was discussed.

Mr. BLAKE. No. There was a motion made somewhere about the 15th or 20th of February.

Mr. BOWELL. By the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Paterson)?

Mr. BLAKE. No. By myself.

Mr. BOWELL. I laid one return on the Table to-day.

Mr. BLAKE. I made a special motion, I think, on the 15th or 20th of February for all correspondence in connection with the drawbacks and an estimate of the total amount of the remission which would be made, assuming the articles to be manufactured in Canada. On the hon. gentleman making a statement that this was one of the subjects on which no enquiry had been made, I framed another motion which has not yet been reached, and, of course, I am not speaking of it. I am speaking of the old motion.

Mr. BOWELL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman may be correct, but if so, I have forgotten it. I will, however, make enquiry and endeavor to have the information before proceeding with the second stage of the Bill.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I suppose the object of the Bill is to give the Government power to facilitate payment of these drawbacks more than at the present time.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. The Bill provides at present that the drawback cannot be paid until the article on which it is to be paid has been actually used in construction. The proposition is to change the words "have been used" to "for the use of" to enable the Government to pay to the manufacturer an amount equal to the duties which would have been paid, had the articles been imported—this amount to be paid on the delivery of the articles to the Railway Company. The Bill will provide for a bond being given by the Railway Company that these spikes or other articles should be used for original construction and no other.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. Is it intended that the payment shall be made anterior to the manufacture or after the manufacture and before they have actually gone into use?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes. The intention is on the delivery to the Company, and on evidence from the Company that they have received them. For that purpose we may pay the drawback and thus put the manufacturer in precisely the same position as the importer now is who imports an article for special use, when, if imported for any other use, he has to pay the duty.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the hon. gentleman able to give us any idea of the amount that will probably be paid under the operation of this measure?

Mr. BOWELL. No, not positively; but I think perhaps $100,000 or $150,000.

Mr. BLAKE. I meant not the claims made at this moment. Does the hon. gentleman mean that that is the amount of the claims just made?

Mr. BOWELL. No. I think that will be the amount of them altogether.

Mr. BLAKE. That is on the assumption that there is manufactured in Canada, or capable of being manufactured, all the articles required for the original plans of construction, which are referred to here.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; but, of course, I cannot state positively.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly. This is one of the points on which the return that I asked for would have given some information.

On clause 2,

Mr. BLAKE. Does this apply to the branches?

Mr. BOWELL. No; only to the main line. When the correspondence comes down, the hon. gentleman will find that the demands were made by them, and not by the manufacturers, and resisted by the Department.

Resolutions agreed to and reported.

Mr. BOWELL introduced Bill (No. 141) to provide for the allowance of drawback on certain articles manufactured in Canada, for use in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 36) respecting the Civil Service of Canada. He said: When I introduced this Bill the other day, I explained rather fully the provisions of the Bill. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman desires me to go over the ground again, as I thought I gave as full an explanation on that occasion as would be required. But, if the hon. gentleman wishes any explanations about some special clause, I am ready to give them now.

Mr. BLAKE. I certainly expected that the hon. gentleman was about to fulfil, in a larger and more liberal spirit, the promise he made a few moments ago, that he was about to explain the Bill.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. But it occurred to me, when I was rising, that I had explained it on the first reading.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course, as to the minor details of the measure, this is perhaps not the most appropriate time to invite the hon. gentleman's explanations of specific clauses; but some clauses are of such great cardinal importance that I think attention should be called to them at this stage of the measure. The hon. gentleman, in bringing down the measure, did not, so far as I remember, enter into explanations, which I think he was obviously called on to give, having regard to the official action of the Administration upon a former occasion when this subject was broached, and to the report of the Civil Service Commission which was a consequence of that action. The measure before us is one of very great importance to the public of this country, involving, as it must be assumed to do, an attempt to settle upon a permanent basis for a constitution and organization of the Civil Service, both inside and outside of the Departments, comprising a thousand or more officials, upon whose efficient discharge of their duties very much depends. The Administration acknowledges, on the occasion on which the Commission was issued, the wholly unsatisfactory condition of the system, and the defective results which had followed from the departure from the plan suggested by the law, and partly from the mode in which the law had been carried out or neglected. The report of the sub-Committee of Council, adopted by the Council on the 16th of June, 1880, under which the Civil Service Commission issued, states:

"Since the period referred to (21st Dec., 1869) a series of years have elapsed and many changes in the character as well as in the extent of the service required in each Department have developed themselves, the duties of some Departments and some branches of each Department and of certain officers in each Department have been varied, diminished or increased, and many men have, by old age, incapacity, bad habits or continued idleness, become unavailable for useful purpose—the number of men in each Department has increased, it is thought out of proportion to the needs of the Service. Young men have been appointed who from want of education or strength of constitution or general unfitness, have not made and will never become efficient public servants. The general expense has been increased by the tendency of the existing rules to the gradual culmination of officers by mere force of survivorship into the more highly paid classes.

"A careful reconsideration of the duties of each Department, including both inside and outside service, is eminently desirable with a view to seeking greater economy in all the Departments by the weeding out of men who from any of the causes named are no longer efficient public servants, by the creation of a new theoretical organization for each Department, which should regulate the number of each class of officers required for its work, the promotions from class to class and the steps by which salaries should be increased."

The Committee then proceeds to advise that a Commission should be appointed. Their report is adopted, the Commission is appointed on the 16th of June, 1880, and they have been engaged, more or less, at their work up to a very recent period, when their second or supplementary report is presented. Now, Sir, I desire to point out that the Government itself, in the passages of the Minute which I have just read, recognized certain defects in the existing system as it was worked, to which they wished special attention to be called, and for which they wished some remedy to be provided. These defects, so far as my present purpose is concerned, I may limit to two, although there are other and serious defects. These two are: The appointment of improper persons, whom the Government describes as "men who, from want of education or strength of constitutional or general unfitness, have not made and will never become efficient public servants;" and the retention in the service of men who "have, by old age, incapacity, bad habits or continued idleness, become unavailable for useful purpose." Owing to these defects there is a "tendency of the existing rules to the gradual culmination of officers by mere force of survivorship into the more highly paid classes." The question, in short, relates to the efficiency of the persons employed, and to the proper and adequate provision for appropriate salaries, having regard for the services rendered and the reward for such services. It is important to observe—and I press upon the attention of the House the fact—that the Administration itself was alive to these two difficulties, which they thought so serious as to require full investigation as to the character and extent of them, and as to the appropriate remedy, at the hands of the Commission they named. Although that Commission made a very thorough enquiry, although an immense amount of evidence was taken, and although very clear and pointed conclusions upon many points were reached, we have not observed in the Estimates of the current year, in so far as the condition of things would have permitted regard to the proposals for reform, any indications that any such proposals were intended to be applied by the Administration at all. I quite agree that, in dealing with a subject of this description, what we have to do is to lay down good rules for the future, and apply them with a due regard to the state of things now existing, and that that may involve only a partial and slow application, so far as existing officers are concerned, of the rules, which but for the existence of these officers might be more rapidly, freely, and thoroughly applied; but so far as are concerned any new appointments, or a liberal system of promotion of officers in Departments where the Civil Service Commission reports that the great bulk of the business is of a routine character, I have observed no signs whatever of an attempt on the part of the Administration to carry out the recommendations, tending towards efficiency and economy, which that report contains. With regard to that point upon which the Administration and the Commission are agreed, the tendency to a culmination into the higher classes of officers and salary by simple time, I perceive no substantial remedy applied. If the report of the Commission is entitled to credence, and I think it is in most points, and in this point particularly, it is clear that of the inside service, at any rate, the great bulk of the work is clerical, or routine work. It is clear that what is required is a certain number of high class officials, capable of supervising the work of a very much larger body of persons, whose duties are more of a routine or mechanical description; and the evil which the Government saw was existing and was increasing, with other evils, the cost of the service disproportionately to the increase of work to be done, was this evil of the culmination into higher classes of men whose services, from their very nature, could not be more valuable after one or five years, than they were at an earlier time. To remedy this the Commission proposed that the service should be, roughly speaking, divided into two classes: the class of those whose service is of the mechanical or routine character, to which I have referred, and a higher class, in rank, intelligence, information and salary. I should be very sorry to propose that there should be, on the part of the larger class to which I have referred, any possibility of its rising into the other class at all. I think that would be a mistake. I think that men who are put into the writing classes, if they are of marked intelligence, assiduity or ability, should have a chance quite as great, perhaps greater, but, at any rate, a fair chance, together with the outside public, of rising into the other classes, but not by seniority, not by lapse of time, not by promotion in the ordinary sense. Whatever it may be determined to do with them, in the theoretical organization of the service, in the way of improved emoluments, ought to be done, so long as they remain in the writing class, solely with reference to increased efficiency in that class, if they are to remain in that class. If they are to go into the other classes, they should be promoted solely on account of superior qualifications. I perceive in the action of the Government no effort to grapple with this difficulty under which we find ourselves practically increasing the cost of the public service each year, without regard to increased responsibility, increased work, and increased efficiency. As to the other point, the question of appointments and promotions, I do not myself believe that the proposals of this measure will tend in any marked degree to remedy any of the existing evils. That is my opinion after a careful perusal of the measure. You, it is true, provide—but we have it now—an arrangement for examinations. You provide that examiners shall be appointed by the Governor in Council from time to time; that they may appoint sub-examiners, that there should be occasional examinations &c., but you make no provision whatever to give an assurance to those who go in for those examinations, that they shall have the certainty, if they are at the top of the list, of a chance of being tried. I, by no means, affirm that you can by an examination determine that a person who passes successfully will make a good civil servant. That cannot be said, because he may, although he passes an excellent examination, and is a very estimable man, that his character is reported, truly reported to be of the best, and his health to be very good, and his writing or early career to be very excellent, he may turn out to be, from temper and characteristics of various kinds, in the actual trial not a good civil servant, he may turn out to be an unpractical man. Therefore, I would never propose that success in competitive examinations should be appointments to permanent office in the Civil Service. All that I say is, that we ought to give him the right to be tried, and if having passed the examination and gone into the service and stood the test of probationary trial, he is found practically to be efficient, then he ought to be appointed. But I do not perceive any encouragement whatever given to men to come forward to examinations which are to be held under this Bill, because I find no assurance whatever that their success, absolute or relative, in passing examinations will give that chance to which I have referred. On the contrary, the choice is with the executive officers of the Government absolutely, and, irrespective of merit. In its practical working I believe this will be the result: that those only will go up for examination who have had that assurance which can be given in various ways—various, slight and unnoticeable, but still sufficiently marked ways for the purpose—that if they succeed in passing the examinations they will be appointed to the service. You may at first, perhaps, have a few other persons who have no such assurance to go up for examination, but the practical result will be, after a little while, to limit the number to those who have been told: "If you pass the examination you will get a situation." That, of course, is a proposal entirely different, toto celo, from the proposal of the Commission. There is a fundamental cardinal distinction between the plan of the Government and the plan which the Commission has recommended. In giving their reason and their views as to that measure of efficiency which exists in the Civil Service, the Commission has pointed out the grounds upon which it reaches its conclusions in the 15th paragraph of the report, which says:

"15. While there exists in the public mind a very general belief that the Civil Service is defective and inefficient, and that the true remedy is the abolition of political patronage and personal favoritism in making appointments to public offices; there is, on the other hand, an impression that it is difficult and almost impracticable to apply the remedy and that those who possess the power of patronage will continue to exercise it at the sacrifice of an efficient and economical administration of public affairs. We believe this impression to be in the main erroneous, and that public men, realizing how much the prosperity and welfare of the country depends on a pure and efficient Civil Service, will not hesitate to abandon a patronage which is found to be injurious to the best interests of the country and which is generally admitted to be a source of weakness and annoyance to themselves, as well as demoralizing to the constituencies."

They point out further on that they proceeded to investigate, by the taking of evidence, what the actual condition of affairs was, and they added that there was a difficulty in the detecting of irregularities in the administration of or weakness in the system of some portions of the Civil Service. They say:

"For in presenting the evidence we feel it necessary to state that in giving their answers to the questions of the Commission some of the Deputy Heads and Chief Officers exercised a degree of reticence in their answers, which, however natural in view of the relation they bear to the Ministers on one hand and their clerks on the other, rendered their statements somewhat imperfect, and increased our difficulties in arriving at correct conclusions as to the state and needs of their Departments."

That, of course, is an observation which it was reasonable perhaps, to expect would be made under the circumstances, and which a perusal of the evidence tends to justify. Then they proceed to express the opinion which they have formed as to the effect of the present mode:

"The present mode of nomination by political influence and appointment, without examination as to qualification, which prevails so very generally in the service, seems to us and is frankly confessed by the majority of the witnesses we have examined to be defective in the highest degree. It affords no sufficient guarantee of fitness for the discharge of the duties of office. It embarrasses Ministers in providing an efficient public service, and it causes great and often irresistible pressure to be brought on Members of Parliament to force their consent to the nomination and appointment of unfit persons. It has, we think, a mischievous effect on the public mind in making the desire for offices too strong an impulse in political conduct; for while the higher offices of State are the laudable and legitimate objects of the ambition of statesmen, the scramble for a paltry patronage and for the smaller offices of the service, cannot but have a bad effect alike on those who exercise and those who enjoy such patronage.

"23. Notwithstanding the reluctance of witnesses to commit themselves to any specific statements as to the inefficiency of their subordinates, there is sufficient in their general statements on that subject to justify the conclusion that the service is susceptible of very great improvement, and that there have been many appointments to it of persons whose habits, lack of educational acquirements, or inaptitude for business could not fail to produce a state of affairs fully justifying most of the propositions stated in the reference to the Commission. But apart from any specific statements made in the evidence, we find in its general tenor and in what we have ourselves observed, abundant reasons for the conclusion that the service requires reform, and that it has not been sufficiently guarded against the evil effects of political patronage.

"24. To this baneful influence, we believe, may be traced nearly all that demands change. It is responsible for admission to the service of those who are too old to be efficient; of those whose impaired health and enfeebled constitutions forbid the hope that they can ever become useful public servants; of those whose personal habits are equally fatal objections; of those whose lack of education should disqualify them; and of those whose mental qualities are of an order that has made it impossible for them to succeed in private business. It is responsible too for the appointment of those who desire to lead an easy and what they deem, a genteel life.

"To the same influence may be ascribed most of the appointments of men taken from beyond the service to the best places over the heads of tried and efficient servants: and it may fairly be charged with all the discontent and demoralization arising out of the feeling, justified by bitter experience, that a faithful and zealous performance of duty establishes no sure claim to the prizes of the service, which, as is abundantly shown by the evidence, are too often carried off by persons whose claim to office is mainly founded on the political service they have rendered to their party. These observations, we may add, apply with greater force to the outside as compared with the inside service, in which there is but little chance of advancement or increase of pay. To this class of appointments and the consequent removal of the chief incentive to zeal, may perhaps be attributed more than to any other single cause, the languid interest which many of the public servants feel in the performance of their duties. They have but little motive for more than the most perfunctory performance of their work, because they feel they are in that way as likely to gain promotion as by the most active performance of it; and that should a vacancy occur above them, it would not probably be given to some favored politician whose qualifications for the duty have not yet been tested.

"Political patronage is responsible for other evils, and we do not hesitate to express the conviction that many unnecessary civil offices have been retained, and that new places have been created, for no better purpose than to provide for the followers of influential politicians."

So with reference to promotions:

"Sometimes promotions have been made by seniority, regardless of merit, thus—as suggested by the order of reference—filling the more highly paid places with men whose chief qualifications are length of service. In other cases they have been made regardless of either merit or seniority, and in this way men fully qualified and fairly entitled to promotion have been passed over, and others less qualified have, by undue influences, obtained promotion in their stead. We find, too, that in many instances men have been brought from beyond the service and either placed at once over the heads of long tried and efficient men, or, after temporarily filling minor positions, they have been elevated with unjustifiable rapidity to places for which they had no previous training."

And it points out the evils which naturally flow from such a state of things. The report goes on to say:

"Having stated what we believe to be the faults in the existing system of making first appointments to the service, and their cause, it becomes our duty to submit a remedy. This, we believe, can only be found in completely eliminating all trace of political patronage. The remedy involves the necessity of substituting some other mode of regulating entrances to the service, and this without doubt is a more difficult task than might at first appear."

After discussing some of the systems which have been adopted in different countries, including the English system, the report, at the twentieth page, suggests the adoption of competitive examination and of promotion by merit and services:

"We do not claim that it follows as a matter of course that those who may succeed best in a competitive examination will necessarily succeed best in the performance of the duties of the position it may obtain for them, but we believe it will exclude the incompetent and lessen the chances of the appointment of unsuitable candidates, and that open competitive examination, having due relation to the work and duties to be performed and supplemented by proper guarantees as to age, health and moral character—with a period of probation before appointment—is the most just and practical means of supplying fit persons for appointment, and that—as has been proved elsewhere, so it will happen here—it will give the best servants to the public.

"We claim that it is the most effectual, indeed the only means of completely and permanently cutting away all opportunities for the exercise of political influence in making appointments and promotions in the public service, which we believe to be so injurious to the public interests."

And further remarks are made in the same sense. Now, the report, in dealing with the existing state of things, besides many other valuable suggestions and statements, adverts to the length of hours which is practically kept, and to certain other irregularities which it states exists. But I do not intend to trouble the House at this stage with those difficulties. Enough to say that there is a careful investigation, and it seems to me a fair result is reached from the evidence, indicating a condition of things which, co-existent with the presence in the service, I am glad to be able to agree to, of many very efficient and excellent persons; also stating that there are some to whom that character cannot be fairly ascribed, and that the system is one which does not tend to bring out the best there is in those who are there, which rather, to my mind, interposes difficulties in getting the best of the work of those who are there, and results practically in the public not being as efficiently served as it would be under another system. Now, it seems to me that the cardinal defects of the proposal of the Administration for a settlement of this long standing and vexed question, are, that although it gives a very formidable account of the preliminary examinations, etc., there are no guarantees either for a properly wide area of persons to be examined, or a properly efficient examination. There are no guarantees for the removal of those evil influences which are spoken of in the report of the Commission, as being the sources of the weakness and improprieties in appointments to the service, but the system, such as it exists, will be found, I am afraid, practically to continue. Secondly, there is no proposal, as there ought to be, no real, radical, thorough proposal for the separation of the service into two classes, into which it naturally divides itself—those who are, and must from the character of their occupation remain in the position of writers and clerks, of that description performing clerical work, and those who have different and much higher functions to discharge. I think that in these two particulars the practical operation of this measure, no matter what words or clauses we may find in this Bill, will be to leave things pretty much as they are. That they are in a wholly unsatisfactory condition, viewing the service as a whole—with striking exceptions, no doubt, as to efficiency under discouraging circumstances—is conceded by the Administration in the language which it used in ordering the issue of this Commission; and it is also established by the report of the majority of that Commission to which I have referred, agreed to and endorsed, as I believe, it is by the general public, that these evils and difficulties will be readily and practically remedied by the measure, or even greatly improved, I am afraid I cannot agree; and therefore it is, that I have felt that the hon. gentleman—face to face with the report to Council which inaugurated this Commission, face to face with the statements made in the report of this Commission—in asking for the second reading of this Bill, should have given some explanation of the general principles of the measure, and shown how it was that in its practical operation the admitted evils of the present would be remedied by the proposed legislation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I must thank the hon. gentleman for the very calm and temperate manner in which he has discussed this measure, and for the suggestions he has made. Of course, I could not expect that the hon. gentleman would agree altogether with the provisions of this Bill, or the principles on which the measure is founded, but he will remember, I have no doubt, in discussing this Bill, that this matter must have come more than once before his Administration or that of his friends when they were in office, during a period of five years. They must have felt then that some measure should be brought forward, that some change was needed, and my hon. friend must recollect that it was left to one of the private members of his party to attempt, I think twice during two consecutive years, to bring in a measure to meet the difficulties that we all see in the public service. When the measure of which I speak was before the House, hon. gentlemen on the other side felt that though it showed a great deal of labor and research on the part of its mover, they were still not in a position to have it fully considered by the House, the consequence being that during those five years the measure was not passed. When we came into office, we thought that something should be done; that we should apply some remedy to the evils which we all admitted. We thought that this should not be a party measure, but that we were all interested alike in seeing that the Civil Service of the country should be a proper one, and that we should elevate that service as much as we could, and that we should make it as pure and as efficient as possible. Under those circumstances the present Government appointed a Commission of able men to examine into this very important question, to call witnesses and to make a report of their labors. Those gentlemen under their responsibilities have made their report, they have not all agreed, and there has been presented a report of the minority. Both reports are very important, they show a great deal of labor and much research, they display much talent and very great knowledge; but, on the other hand, the Government tried, when this report was brought before them, to assume their own responsibility in bringing the measure here. We had to consider how far we could go under the conditions which at present exist, for if we had to prepare a Bill providing for an entirely new service without considering that an organization of long standing had to be dealt with, we should have presented a different measure in many respects from the one which is now before the House. But we are not in that position at present; we find the public service there, and a law on the Statute-Book establishing that service, directing it, and directing the way in which it is to be renewed and maintained. We thought that the present law as it stands was not sufficient and should be changed, and in that view we are supported I think by the hon. gentlemen of the other side of the House, in fact the hon. member from West Durham has admitted it. That hon. gentleman has hinted that this Bill, in as far as the examination goes, will not meet the difficulty. Well, I must differ from the hon. gentleman on this point. The present Civil Service Act says that an officer may be appointed, but that afterwards within a certain time he must pass an examination; and then if it is found that he is able for the position, he may be confirmed in his appointment. The hon. gentleman must know, however, the difficulty which is found by all Governments when appointments are made and when the examination is to take place after such appointments. Very often it must be recollected that their examinations have been postponed from time to time, and I have no doubt that if we were to look very closely into the appointments which have been made during the last twenty years we would find that some examinations have been done away with altogether. It is quite possible, therefore, that we had no guarantee in the present case that the civil servant would be a good one, or that he would have the qualifications required for his office. And why? Because when you appoint him he has passed no examination, he has been brought forward on the recommendation of his friends, and for that reason has been appointed to the service, therefore you have no guarantee that he is fitted for the office to which he is assigned, and you take him on the parole of his friends. To avoid that, we thought that the best mode under the circumstances was to enact, by this new measure, that no officer shall be appointed to any position in the Civil Service unless he has previously passed the examination, and, according to the premises of this Bill, has obtained a certificate that he is among those qualified to obtain an office in one or other of the classes mentioned in the Bill. Thus, no person under this Bill will be appointed unless he has obtained such a certificate, and appears upon the list of qualified men. That is a guarantee that the officer appointed will have the requisite qualifications, or at all events, as the hon. member for West Durham said just now, some of the qualifications; because I admit while you may have all the examinations in the world, and while you may have a candidate who possesses, apparently, all the qualifications necessary to obtain the certificate, he still may not be thoroughly suited for the office he is to fill. It stands to reason. The hon. gentleman knows that an officer who is appointed as a writer, for example, may have a good and a steady hand; he may be very expeditious in his work and steady in his habits, and yet not be found fit for his office, because his temper may be very bad, or he may have some other peculiarities which will not adapt him for office work under the Government. These peculiarities cannot be found out by examination but only by trial. That is the reason why we provide that these appointments shall not be confirmed immediately, but that the candidates shall be subject to trial. This, I contend, will be a very strong guarantee that the Civil Service will improve in the appointments to be made hereafter. The hon. gentleman says, that we have not adopted, in this Bill, the corner stone, if I may use the word, of the measure that was suggested by the Commissioners—that is to say, competitive examinations. We have not adopted the system of competitive examinations, because we thought that qualification examinations were sufficient. Competitive examinations would not place us in a better position. It would place us in this position: that the person who stood at the head of the list, according to the number of points he may have made, would have to be appointed to an office for which he might not, perhaps, be suited. He might be exactly the man you would not like to have there, because, though he might be a good accountant, he might want some other qualifications, and yet you would have to take him. But under the system of qualification examinations you may select from the list the man who best suits the place and is best able to fulfil his duties and his duties to the chief of his Department, and that is the strong reason why a change should be made in the recommendations made by the Commissioners. The hon. gentleman speaks of the appointment of improper persons as mentioned in the report, and the retaining of such persons in office. Well, so far as possible, if the party is an improper person to be kept in office he is dismissed. We get rid of him as soon as possible and appoint another more suitable man; but you may find a person who is not very able for his duties, but if he is in the office, under the old law, it is very difficult to get rid of him immediately. You may try as soon as possible to put him in another office, which he can fill and bring another into his place who is better qualified, but still that system is attended with very great difficulties. If the Bill becomes law those difficulties will be avoided to a very great extent, because as an examination takes place we will have a guarantee that the person is a proper person to fill the office, and we will be in a position not to be accused—I do not speak of ourselves, but of all Governments—of retaining in the Civil Service persons who are not fit for their office. The hon. leader of the Opposition speaks of the increase of salaries of officers, and he takes objection to these increases being made according to the length of time a person may have served. Well, there is a great deal in that objection, no doubt. You may take a person for example who may have been eight or ten years in the service, and, according to the law as it now stands, he is eligible for promotion to the next class after five years' service. That system may lead to abuses. There may be an officer who may be a favorite and may not be as able to do his work as well as another who has served a less time, but under the law he is eligible for promotion, according to his term of service. I do not admit that that is a proper rule, or that it leads to the efficiency of the public service. On the contrary, I think that, under the proposition we are now laying before the House, that may be avoided. There will be only three classes. The length of service necessary for promotion evidently will be longer than under the present law, and the result will be that persons cannot be promoted only on account of length of service. The fact is that they will not be eligible for another class unless the Minister finds an officer very vigilant, finding that he deserves promotion, and that promotion is required in the Department—in that case only will an officer be promoted. Therefore, as the hon. gentleman said, the mere fact that an officer has served a certain number of years will form no ground for promotion. If a man who serves say for seven years is better qualified, if he shows by his service that he is fit for a higher class of duties, he should be promoted before one who has served for ten years, if the latter has shown less capacity, less ability and fewer qualifications for the office. The hon. gentleman says he sees nothing in the Estimates showing a reform, or an intention to promote efficiency or economy in the service. The hon. gentleman must see that we had to bring down the Estimates for the present service; the Bill is before the House, but it may not become law. We have to take the Civil Service as it is, but, if the Bill passes, then it will be the duty of the Government to apply the law fairly, and in the sense that Parliament desires it to be applied. The law will have to be applied by determining the theoretical organization of the Department. We will have to take the different Departments in the light of the evidence we have before us, and determine the number of persons, of the different classes, for each Department. Then we will have to apply to that skeleton—if I may call it so—the officers that are now in the public service. If some of them are not wanted the Bill provides for elimination; if more are required for certain Departments, it also provides for that; but the theoretical organization of a Department under this Bill should not be foreseen, and cannot be foreseen, until the Bill has become law, and therefore we could not provide in the Estimates for anything but the present service. After the Bill has become law, we shall be able to complete the organization: and then we shall be able to come down to Parliament next year and state what that organization is, and what it will cost. I have already answered the other remark of the hon. gentleman, that no substantial remedy is likely to be applied. I have shown that there will be a substantial remedy applied to the present state of things by the appointments which will be made in the way I have mentioned. We intend that the examinations will be real and true examinations, conducted by true and trusty men, and these examinations will give us good candidates for the offices to be filled.

Mr. BLAKE. You do not think they will be colorable examinations—the color blue, for example?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I hope not; I hope the examinations will be as fair as Parliament wishes them to bc. I think these examinations should not be sham examinations, but real examinations. The qualifications required for the different classes should be known beforehand—what branches of knowledge the candidates will be examined on; and these being known beforehand, no candidate would come forward if he did not feel himself really able to be examined. Besides, as the Bill provides, there is always a preliminary examination, so that a candidate who was not fit to occupy a position in the Civil Service could not come and spend the time of the examiners, and keep the other candidates waiting for nothing.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Politics, I am afraid, would have something to do with the appointment, all the same.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Well, I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite would never think of anything of that kind if they were in office; and they must give us credit for the same thing. The hon. gentleman may be sure that the fact that we are obliged to appoint all officers from the list of those who have passed a preliminary examination is a guarantee that the appointments will be better than they have been in the past. I have no doubt there will always be politics connected with appointments made by any Government. I have yet to see a Government which will appoint its opponents to office. As a rule, a Government appoints its friends; but in this case all, whether friends or foes, have to pass the examinations, and they will all be treated alike, because the examinations will be conducted, not by political men, not by Ministers or their friends, but by men who will have no interest one way or the other but to see whether the person who comes up for examination is qualified for it, and if he is, he will get his certificate. I agree with the hon. gentleman that promotion should not be regulated by seniority, but by qualification; that is the principle adopted in this Bill, and I think it is the only way in which we can have an efficient service. The hon. gentleman says that the success of the candidates does not give them a positive guarantee that they will be appointed.

Mr. BLAKE. That they will be tried—that they will have a probationary appointment.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Well, these candidates run their chance, as they are doing to-day, but with this difference, that they will not have to compete with the world, but with those only who are on the list; and if they can show that they are the best men, that they have more knowledge, and more ability, and more experience than others, they will have a better chance of being appointed than others. We cannot take the list just as we find it; we must enquire who the men are, whether they are old or young, what training they have had, what their previous experience has been, and so on; and a man with previous experience would naturally stand a better chance than one without any experience. The success of the candidates will depend altogether on their qualifications and upon the number of their competitors. The hon. gentleman has said that there was no guarantee for the removal of these evil influences pointed out in the report. The evil influences are that appointments have been made in the past, under all Governments, by political influence, and I was answering that objection made just now in, perhaps, a peculiar way by my hon. friend from Westmoreland. The fact is, political influences will always have and always had something to do with appointments; but this Bill is, I think, a guarantee that there will be a minimum of those influences. Suppose the hon. gentleman were on this side of the House, in the place I had a few years ago—

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I expect to be there next.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will join us. In that case, he will be well received. Supposing he were on this side, and this Bill were passed, and he had to make an appointment in his office, he would take the list and say: "Who are these men? I do not know these two or three men, but here is one that I know, or who is known by some of my colleagues or some other persons."

Mr. BLAKE. He is well recommended.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That would, perhaps, be a strong inducement, and I think my hon. friend for West Durham would, in a case of that kind, certainly lean in that direction because he would say: "Well, I think I was right as these recommendations prove, therefore I will appoint him and have a good civil servant." I did not refuse the hon. gentleman when he got up first to give him the explanations required because I wished to give him an opportunity, after I had explained the Bill the other day, to make his remarks on it so that I would not have to trouble the House several times on the same subject. I wished to answer his criticisms and have done so, I think, successfully. I have shown that this Bill, though it is not the Bill exactly that the Commission have recommended, is nevertheless a great improvement on the present law, and is a Bill which I believe, if it becomes law, will give a remedy to a great deal of the evils complained of to-day. Speaking of the Civil Service I wish to say that, of course, there may be some inefficient officers in the service, but, all in all, we have a good Civil Service, we have good trustworthy officials, men who devote themselves, and have devoted themselves for years faithfully, not to their political friends, but to their public duties, and I am glad to bear this testimony to their worth, because in my long public career I have had an opportunity of seeing and dealing with a great many of these public servants. I have been at the head of different Departments, and I may say, all in all, our Civil Service can compare favorably with that of any other country. There are, of course, ways of improvement, and I think this Bill is a step in the right direction. Having said so much, I hope the hon. gentleman will, at least, admit that the Government have done a great deal to bring this measure before Parliament, and to remedy a great many of the evils complained of, and I hope the hon. gentleman will assist us in carrying the measure through.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to find that this question of reform in the Civil Service has at last attained the recognition of being brought before the House in the form of a Bill. I do not think many of us fully realize how very closely home the evils of the service come to our interests and our comfort; but we should recollect that, as far as concerns the public, the action of the Government, in its Executive capacity, is entirely represented by the Civil Service. The public who have business in the various Departments, only meet, in general, the subordinates of the Ministers. I might refer to the Department of Customs itself. My hon. friend the Minister does not come into contact with those with whom the Department has to deal. Those people gather their impressions of the way in which the Department is managed entirely from the subordinates with whom they come in contact. I have no doubt that, in many cases, the hon. the Minister is abused for acts which in his personal capacity he would not have authorized. Yet, the Government are responsible, because they have deliberately chosen those agents to act as their representatives in the Departments. The hon. the Minister began by using the tu quoque argument. He said we are to blame for not having introduced the principle of competitive examinations. You, on the other side, were frequently urged to do the same thing, and contended there are two or three things to be said in answer to that argument. In the first place, I did not bring up the matter quite as frequently as the hon. gentleman said. I only brought up the Bill once during the incumbency of my hon. friends in office, and it is generally understood, when a private member brings in a Bill of that kind, it is only to be looked upon as a tentative measure, and the Government are not supposed to take the measure off his hands at the first blush, before they have thoroughly considered the matter. I have every reason to believe the then Government looked favorably on a system such as that I proposed, and, I have no doubt, had my hon. friends remained in office, we would have had a Bill of a different character from the present one. When our friends were in power they had no such detailed information in regard to the service as the Government have. To be sure, during one Session, a Committee sat, and took a considerable mass of evidence, and made some recommendations, and I am very glad to observe that the evidence then taken and the recommendations then made coincided almost identically with the evidence and recommendations laid before the House by the present Commission, but that enquiry has not to be compared, for a moment, with the very exhaustive one made by hon. gentlemen opposite. They appointed six very able gentlemen to enquire into this matter. Those gentlemen were invested with full powers, and were in Session for many months. I am glad to hear testimony to the thoroughness with which they appear to have carried out their enquiry and to the impartiality which they appear to have used in making their recommendations and report. These recommendations have been at the service of the Government for about a year, yet the evidence has been apparently neglected, the recommendations disregarded, and now we get from the Government the reasons why. Well Sir, I find that there was a minority report. It was signed by two members of the Commission, and there was a majority report signed by six members, one gentleman signed both reports, agreeing in the main with the majority but holding certain special views, which he presented in the minority report. We may take it for granted that these six gentlemen were practically agreed on the main principles of these recommendations, while one of the Commission was in opposition thereto. The hon. Minister says that after having gone to such expense and appointed such able men, who made such a thorough inquiry into the whole subject, they adopted the report of the minority instead of that of the majority; but, Sir, he gave us another reason why no change should be made in the system of appointing members of the Civil Service, this was that it was not as if we had a clean sheet before us, on which we could commence and construct a reformed Civil Service, but we had a Civil Service, which was already in existence, and, therefore, we could not introduce any new principle in its regard. This was a very strong reason, in my opinion. If we had not a Civil Service at present, we should not suffer from the evils which are authoritatively reputed to exist in it; there would be no need for Civil Service reform, and there would be no evils to remedy. The hon. gentleman says in effect, that because the service needs a remedy there is no room for its application, and that because we have a Civil Service, which is admitted to be very faulty, we must not remove the evil. Surely this must not be the argument which the hon. gentleman had in his mind; but it was certainly the argument of which he made use. I do not see, Sir, how these changes should injuriously affect the service as it now exists. The hon. Minister has admitted that changes of a certain sort would not injudiciously affect the service; some changes he considers to be of very vital importance; and yet he thinks that these should not be made owing to the fact that the service is in existence. He has made changes which he considers very vital. But a change in the mode of appointment would not be detrimental to the service, nor would a change in the manner of promotion injuriously interfere with the interests of the service, it would only do the justice which it is admitted ought to be accomplished. A change in the respect which is recommended by the Commission, should do no harm to those who are in the service; and the fact that we are not organizing a Civil Service afresh is certainly no reason why it should not be adopted—when we are practically dealing with a service that already exists. But, Sir, to come down to the Bill itself, my hon. friend from Durham (Mr. Blake) has said that the evils which are complained of by that Commission were left substantially untouched, by the Bill, as it now stands, and my hon. friend opposite thinks he has shown that these evils are removed or at least reduced to the smallest possible degree by the Bill; and in order to show this, he urges that he has introduced a qualifying examination as a necessary preliminary to entering the service; and he thinks, Sir, that this examination will absolutely prevent the evils spoken of, or at least greatly minimize them. Well, Sir, I cannot see that this examination will either abolish or minimize these evils. He claimed more than that: that such an examination would prevent the entrance into the Civil Service of persons unfit to serve therein. Well, Sir, if this examination were even what I am about to contend it cannot be, a thoroughly impartial and judicial examination, it would not prevent the entrance of unfit persons any more than would the system of competitive examinations to which the hon. gentleman objects. I contend that it would not prevent them at all. Even in that case, for although it professes or pretends to leave the examination open to all comers, it is practically an examination which is open only to those who are recommended by supporters of the Ministry in power at the time. My hon. friend from West Durham assumed that point, and the hon. Minister himself agrees that this assumption is correct, because he has told us in clear words, that no Ministry would ever appoint those who were their opponents to office. He says he has yet to see a Ministry which so appoints its opponents; that he never appoints opponents, and that he never heard of a Minister who did; and he says that a Minister would take the list of those who had passed the qualifying examination, look over it, and select therefrom those whom he considered fit for the appointments that might be in question. And he has very clearly said, that he would strongly recommend supporters of the Government for such appointments, this fact being about the strongest argument which can possibly be offered in favor of making a certain selection from such a list. Well, Sir, the meaning of all this clearly is: that no matter how one comes up for examination or how one passed, only those who previously or subsequently are recommended by supporters of the Government will get the places. It is then a perfect farce to say that these examinations are open to all comers, for although the examinations are open to all, only those who are favored can get appointments; and it is not fair, under these circumstances, to say that the fact of having open examinations will be evidence that the appointments which may be made under this system will not be conferred on improper parties. I said, I was about to contend that these examinations could not be thoroughly impartial and judicial. Hon. gentlemen will have noticed that the Bill provides that examiners may be appointed from time to time by the Government, to hold office during the pleasure of the Government, and that these examiners will conduct the examination. Now, Sir, who are these judicial individuals who are to decide as to the fitness or unfitness of those who enter the service? They are simply members of the Civil Service themselves; and they are as much at the mercy of the Government of the day, as are second or third class clerks in a Department. What is to be expected from ordinary human nature, and especially from political human nature, under such circumstances? No doubt the examiners will be chosen from among political friends, and what examiners, dependent for their positions and salaries on the influence of the Government of the day, will refuse to pass highly recommended individuals, if they happen to come anywhere near the standard which the Government have chosen to set up. Even supposing that the examination was not such mere matter of form, as it is quite certain to be under these circumstances, we must remember that amongst those who pass any particular examination and who come up to any fixed standard, there may be the greatest inequality. Some may know two or three times as much as may be necessary to pass the examination; others may be barely able to scrape through, and between these extremely intelligent people, and those who had only a sufficient smattering to enable them to pass the examination, the selection will be made, and this will be done, as the hon. Minister admits, largely on political grounds—so largely at least, that no one who is not of the true political stripe will be appointed. The hon. gentleman does not say—and I am not assuming—that any unfit persons will be appointed, but it is quite certain, nevertheless, that no one, save those of the true blue color, will secure appointments under this system. This leads me to notice a vital and fatal—if I may be permitted to use two such contradictory adjectives—defect in this Bill, the absence of a Civil Service Commission. The hon. Minister has told us himself how difficult it was to carry out the law of 1868, how it was found that men once in the Civil Service could not well be got out of it again, although they did not pass the examination. It is declared by the hon. gentleman himself that this law has been systematically violated; and it will be found that this or any other similar law will be systematically violated by the partisans in power, no matter to what party they may belong, unless there is some Court to administer the law, and some tribunal by which such action shall be taken. There is not the slightest use in passing a good criminal or civil law, or a law of any other kind, unless impartial persons administer it; and consequently there is not the slightest use in passing a law of this kind, unless a tribunal is appointed to carry it into effect in both letter and spirit. The Commission felt this so strongly, that they recommended the appointment of a Civil Service Board, whose tenure of office should be the same as that of the Judges; and I think they showed good sense in recommending that this Board should control not only all appointments, but but also many other matters connected with the Departments. I will try and find what they say in regard to this subject. I do not pretend that any arguments of mine can have such weight as the deliberate recommendations of these gentlemen who were appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite to give their opinion on this matter. On page twenty-one of their report we read that:

“Having arrived at the conclusions above stated as to the advantages of the system we recommend, we have now to propose the means for giving effect to our suggestions. This, we believe, can only be satisfactorily accomplished by the constitution of a Board of Civil Service Commissioners as free from political influence as the Judiciary happily is. To the action of this Board we propose to refer all those questions which have heretofore hampered and impaired the administration of the Civil Service.

“We propose that this Board shall be composed of men holding an independent position, and capable of commanding general confidence; it should consist of three members, one of whom should be a French Canadian, and they should be appointed in the same manner and hold office on the same tenure as the Judges. We believe that the judgments and decisions of an impartial tribunal thus constituted would command the respect and confidence of the public and of the service.”

They go on to say that this might be objected to on the ground of cost, but they urge that this will not be very considerable; and they then continue thus:—

“Our estimate of the cost of the Board is $25,000: less than nine-tenths of one per cent on $2,800,000, the cost of the service. If the objects aimed at are attained by such an outlay—if the service is reformed as it is clearly shown it requires to be—and if by the action of the Board it is economically and wisely recruited, as we believe it will be, the money thus expended will be among the most judicious and most productive of all the expenditures incurred by the Government. For we have not the slightest doubt but that many times the cost will be annually saved by the avoidance of unnecessary and unwise appointments.”

Those, Sir, are wise words on the part of the Commission: I think that they are very wise words with respect to appointments of the Board. I believe that the two defects referred to are the principal ones which are to be found in this Bill; and I consider that they are sufficient to make it utterly useless as a means for reforming the Civil Service. I mean the omission to provide that appointments should be made by competitive examination or by some other means which might be devised independent of political influence, and the appointment of a Board of Commissioners to see that the law is impartially carried out. It must not be forgotten, Sir, that the evils complained of, and which my hon. friend says his qualifying examination will remove, do not merely consist of the admission of uneducated persons into the service. The Committee hold and state their strong belief, that there are many other evils entailed upon the service by the mode of appointment. It is not only that improper persons get into the service in this way, but the whole tone of the service, and the tone of public morals throughout the country is deteriorated thereby. Although it was quoted by my hon. friend from West Durham, I may be excused for repeating a few words. The Commissioners wind up their knowledge of these statements by saying:

Now, Sir, those evils will be retained and created, as has been the case hitherto—under the operation of this Bill, for the simple reason that still the same political influences will continue to be exercised in order to make places for supporters of the Government, and get them into the service under this Bill; because it is to be supposed that most of those whom the Ministers wish to pass, will be able to pass the examinations. The hon. Minister expresses his confidence that all who come up will be able to pass. I hope this expectation will be realized, and I think it is very likely that it will. He said that as the candidates would know beforehand what qualification was required, no one would come up unless he was able to pass.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will explain. I said quite the contrary, but, of course, no doubt the hon. gentleman did not hear me. I said this: That to avoid having a great many of these candidates coming forward who were unfit, there will be preliminary examinations, under which those who were unable to pass would be rejected.

Mr. CASEY. I understood the hon. Minister to say that if the requirements were known, candidates who knew that they could not pass would not come up to trouble the Board. I think however, the statement might be taken in the other sense, for I am sure that no person will come up unless he is recommended for a place by known supporters of the Government; and I think those who come up will get through. I was pointing out, before I made this little digression, that the only evils which could be removed by the qualifying examination, were those caused by the admission of uneducated persons to the service. If the examinations were perfectly judicial, these might be removed, but I say that it is not credible that examinations so conducted will be judicial or impartial. In any case, no matter how judicial or impartial they might be, the evils caused by political influence exercised in those appointments, would not be removed, and would be scarcely reduced. Even by that sort of examination, a man appointed owing to political influence would still be a partisan in the service the same as is the case now. It will be almost simply impossible to remove a man, even for unfitness, if he has strong political influence at his back, as it is now impossible; and this is one of the chief evils of which complaint is made, that men who are obviously unfit are retained in office owing to the political influence which is at their back. Well, Sir, men who came into the service under this Bill, will still have political influence at their back, and it will be as hard to get rid of unfit men under it, as is now the case—this evil will not be reduced by the examination on which the hon. gentleman so much relies. In short, Sir, I must go back to the decision of the Commissioners and to the conclusions at which they arrived after so many months' careful examination—that after a full comparison of the system which is in vogue, with that which prevails in other countries, no possible change can effect a real reform in the service, unless the Government undertakes to introduce open competitive examinations and promotion by merit. Since no other change would eliminate political influence from the service, the hon. Minister raised the objection with regard to the introduction of the competitive system, that they must take him who is at the top of the list and put him into the service. Well, Sir, that is true, we must take the man who is at the top of the list, and give him priority, but we are not bound to keep him permanently. These appointments are made in England on six months probation, as is provided for in this Bill; but there is this difference: that in England a man is appointed solely on the ground of educational merit as shown in the examination; and if he fails in the slightest degree to be an efficient officer, he has no claim to, or pretension to keep the position; because it is not an appointment made owing to political influence. The hon. gentleman also contended that his being at the top of the list in a competitive examination was no proof that he would turn out to be a good officer. Of course not; neither is the fact that a man passes the qualifying examination a proof that he will turn out a good officer. Nothing but a six months probation will be any test in either case, whether a man will be an efficient officer or not. There is quite a difference between the two cases. If a man is a political nominee, and has passed the qualifying examination, he is apt to be retained whether he proves to be a good officer or not; but when an appointment is made solely on the ground of merit, he has no claim to be retained and is certain not to be retained unless he turns out to be an efficient officer; so that even admitting the existence of the difficulty which appears to be in the hon. gentleman's mind as to the retention of office, the competitive system is undoubtedly by far the more effective of the two systems, because it affords appointees a free and unprejudiced trial, which the other system does not give. I am sorry, Sir, I could not read in detail to the House the able report of this Commission. I think it expresses far more fully and conclusively than I could do, the reasons advanced in favor of the competitive system; for we may take it for granted that the present faulty state of the service admits of no argument, that being admitted by all parties. I am also sorry that the Government, having long brooded over this mass of evidence, this report, have not been able to adopt, to some extent at least, the opinions of the great majority, almost the unanimous report of those they appointed to consider the matter. I am sorry that the country should have reason to think there has been much ado about nothing, a great show of doing something without any real or substantial reforms or changes in the service. That is the impression that must go abroad to the country, the inference that I fear is the only correct one to be drawn from the premises. I do not intend to go into the details of the Bill on this occasion, such of them as I have objection to I will refer to when it comes up in the Committee on the third reading.

Bill read the second time.

Mr. CASEY.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the second reading of Bill (No 102) further to amend an Act to amend and consolidate as amended, the several enactments respecting the North-West Mounted Police Force.

Bill read the second time; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee).

Sir JOHN MACDONALD. The main object of the Bill is to carry out the resolution passed the other day, increasing the force. There are, however, some amendments, which I shall state as we proceed, or rather some alterations from the printed Bill, as in 1879. I move the adoption of the first section, repealing sundry sections of the old Act and substituting others.

Mr. BLAKE. Had we not better take the sections separately? The first section embraces all the sections in effect. We had better, I think, say No. 5.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, say No. 5. It reads as follows:

"5. The Governor in Council may, from time to time, authorize the Commissioner of Police to appoint, by warrant under his hand, such number of constables as he may think proper, not exceeding in the whole five hundred men, and to appoint from among them non-commissioned officers of different grades, and the Commissioner may delegate this authority to any commissioned officer of the force; and such number thereof shall be mounted as the Governor in Council may, at any time, direct: Provided that the Commissioner may appoint supernumerary constables not exceeding in the whole twenty men, in order to fill vacancies in the force, and may employ not exceeding in the whole ten men as scouts, at such rates of pay as may be authorized by the Minister charged with the control and management of the force."

The supernumerary constables are for the purpose of filling any vacancies that may take place, so that the force may always be kept up to the full strength. The only alterations are that the number of men is increased from 300 to 500, and making the number of supernumeraries twenty instead of ten. I move the adoption of the 5th clause.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it intended to mount the whole force?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. BLAKE. What proportion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will leave that, a good deal, to the Commissioner; not the same proportion mounted of the 500 as of the 300.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the present proportion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are nearly all mounted.

Mr. MACKENZIE. They are entirely mounted, are they not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has been found that, for the purpose of expediting the movement of the force, in case of a sudden summons, it is well that the mounted men should be accompanied by a certain number of men in waggons—in those waggons that are used for travelling over the plains, carrying ammunition and military stores of different kinds; it greatly expedites the force and relieves the horses.

On clause 6,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This clause is as follows:

6. No officer or constable shall be appointed to the police force unless he be of a sound constitution, able to ride, active and able-bodied, of good character, and between the ages of eighteen and forty years; nor unless he be able to read and write either the English or French language: Provided always, that this section shall not be held to apply to any officer who has been appointed before the passing of this Act, nor to the Commissioner or Assistant-Commissioner.

The latter proviso is new, and of course does not apply to the Commissioner or Assistant-Commissioner, but they ought to be officers of fully matured age and great experience, and the limit of forty years is inexpedient in their case. The reason why it is stated in this proviso that it should not apply to any officer appointed before the passing of this Act is in order that the appointment of officers who are at present appointed shall be held to be legal, because they act as magistrates, and some of them, when appointed, were over forty years of age. Two cases of such appointments occurred under the late Government, and one under the present Administration.

Mr. BLAKE. I was wondering what the meaning of this proviso was. It is in the Act of 1879, at least the clause appears for the first time in the Act of 1879. But prosperity makes the hon. gentleman oblivious to time; it was passed after the present Government came into office.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No. I fancy this was previous.

Mr. BLAKE. I find it in the Act of 1879.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is it was an Act to amend and consolidate several previous amendments.

Mr. BLAKE. Do I understand that the only variation in this clause is upon the point of age?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. I would earnestly recommend altering the clause as to that limitation, it reads very queerly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Why?

Mr. BLAKE. Will it say that no officer shall be appointed to the force unless of sound constitution, able to ride, active and able-bodied, of good character, between the age of eighteen and forty years—but strangely enough these recommendations are not to apply to officers heretofore appointed, nor to the Commissioner or Assistant Commissioner.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must admit the correction.

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon. gentleman make any provisions for appointing graduates of the Military School to official positions?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; there is no provision of that kind.

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me that we have no regularly constituted force in this country in the shape of a standing army, and it would be proper to utilize the services of those who graduate from the Military School in some such way as this force offers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Although there is no provision in the Act for the employment of graduates of the Royal Military College, the Government, of course, is at liberty to make appointments from the ranks of the graduates, and it is as well that the hands of the Government should be left free in that respect. Of course, we consider that a young gentleman who has passed that school has prima facie the qualifications to render him an efficient officer. Since I have been at the head of the Department we have made three appointments from the Military School. One of them was Mr. Perry, who was appointed to the Royal Engineers. He met with an accident and his commission was held open for some time, but he has sufficiently recovered to avail himself of his commission, and has been appointed, much to his delight, I may say, to that place. Another gentleman who was appointed was Mr. Provost from Quebec. He had been serving in Battery "B." He received the highest testimonials as being a strict disciplinarian, a good soldier, and well trained to the management of artillery. He is the third gentleman who has been appointed to the military force.

On clause 12,

Mr. BLAKE. Under what regulations are these permits granted?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Lieutenant-Governor exercises his own discretion. I think there has been no special instructions ever given to any Lieutenant-Governor as to permits. I believe there has been hitherto considerable laxity in this regard, especially in omitting to provide that after a permit has been used once it should not be used again but should be returned. It has been ascertained that permits have been used again and again without being brought back to the Lieutenant-Governor. That, however, has been prevented for the future.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the permit then taken possession of by the party who finds and seizes the spirits?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The party is obliged to give up the permit after having used it once.

Mr. BLAKE. My own impression is that this business of permits ought to be abolished instead of being extended, that the permit ought only to be granted for medicinal or sacramental purposes, and that there is no reason why we should leave permission in the hands of the Government to introduce spirituous liquors into that territory at all for any other purposes than I have mentioned. Of course, I understand the hon. gentleman is desirous of keeping the scales entirely equal. I believe with one hand he has granted some millions of acres to a Temperance Colonization Society, and last Saturday another large number, some seventeen townships, to a Licensed Victuallers Colonization Society. Whether it would be prudent with reference to the latter society that they should have permits to deal in spirituous liquors in their section of territory, I know not, but it seems to me, from all I have heard, this system of permits has been greatly abused, and that the power has not been exercised upon any well-understood principles. I think the plan here proposed is an objectionable one. But, I think that even if the power be continued it is not a reasonable one. If a man chooses to conceal and not disclose the spirits he is carrying into the territory, and if these spirits are found concealed, after "digging in, rummaging and searching"—as the Bill expresses it—and then should produce an old permit, I think it should be treated as so much waste paper. The clause is one of search, and if after the search you find concealed goods of that description, I think evidence of their concealment should be enough to show that they are there illicitly, and the production of a permit should not be held applicable.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The clause applies to spirits found in any shape—in any store, or waggon or other conveyance—"bringing in spirits with the express purpose." It must be brought in in some way.

Mr. BLAKE. Quite so. But if you preserve a permit law, it should be the right of the constable to ask a person if he has any spirits or spirituous articles. The party declares he has not; then search proceeds, and if they are found, and then the party declares he has such spirits and produces a permit—the hon. gentleman proposes he should have every opportunity to escape. I think in such a case the party should not be allowed to escape by producing a permit.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is some force in what the hon. gentleman says, and I feel disposed to insert some such words as "and not then, unless produced at once," after the words "Lieutenant-Governor." I do not think we can do away with the permits altogether.

Mr. BLAKE. Why not?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It might be wanted for medicinal purposes.

Mr. BLAKE. I would allow for medicinal and sacramental purposes and none other.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is another question which does not arise in this clause.

Mr. BLAKE. Under the law as it now stands the constable can forfeit, whether the person has a permit or not. The hon. gentleman proposes that his right to forfeit and destroy the liquor shall be limited.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But these words were inserted. All officers had power to seize, confiscate and destroy all spirits found, and the other Act of the North-West Government provides that the Lieutenant-Governor may grant permits. As the law now stands, spirits, to be used for medicinal purposes, and wanted decidedly, say for hospital purposes, might be seized by an officer, although a permit was shown.

Mr. MILLS. This seems to be a system of total abstinence, tempered by unlimited discretion on the part of the Lieutenant-Governor. It seems to me that the reasons which induced the Government to adopt the principle of prohibition exist, at the present time, with much greater force than at the time the policy was adopted. I do not think the hon. gentleman can make the change which he proposes without practically doing away with the policy of prohibition altogether. We have a much larger population going into the country now than when that policy was adopted. We have reason to believe that the number of persons going in will increase, year by year, and with railway construction going on, and other works of that sort; with a large laboring population, not always law-abiding, and many of them strongly disposed to use intoxicants; with the Indian population scattered over the entire country, I think we should rather endeavor to enforce obedience to the law and secure the government of the country at the least possible expense by adopting a policy of strict enforcement of the principle which the House unanimously adopted and entered upon, rather than undertake to modify it in the way proposed. The House should take great care not to adopt a policy which will practically neutralize that which was some time ago entered upon. If the House thinks that the policy of prohibition should not be extended to the North-West Territories that would be a good reason for changing the law altogether; but we have adopted a policy which was recognized by the Hudson's Bay Company in that country before it was transferred to Canada—for they inhibited the sale of intoxicants to Indians, and we all know the condition of things existing in the Blackfeet country before that tribe were brought under the conditions of the treaty which was made with them. I think, instead of doing as the hon. gentleman proposes in this Bill, we should rather impose stronger restrictions, and if this cannot be done in this Bill—because it would be well not to have this clause here at all—it is not necessarily part of this measure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) object to the permit system altogether. Well, if the permit system is to be done away with it must be by altering the North-West Territories Act, which provides that permits may be allowed. Now, so long as that is the law on the Statute-Book, it is observed that the Mounted Police Act should provide that spirits coming in under a permit which is given by law, must be destroyed. This permit system is not ours. It is the system of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills.) This is a clause in the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Bothwell in 1875:

"Intoxicating liquors and other intoxicants are prohibited to be manufactured or made in the said North-West Territories, except by special permission of the Governor in Council, or to be imported or brought into the same from any Province of Canada, or elsewhere, or to be sold, exchanged, traded, or bartered, except by special permission in writing of the Lieutenant-Governor of the said Territories."

So that my hon. friend provided, not that the Lieutenant-Governor should give a permit only for hospital purposes—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is not the hon. member for Bothwell's Bill at all. It is before his time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At all events he was a member of the Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then it is my hon. friend's opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes; I take the responsibility.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then he provides that the Lieutenant-Governor may give a permit to bring in intoxicating liquors or other intoxicants—Perry Davis' painkiller, Radway's ready relief, etc., etc., to any extent, for the purpose of being sold, exchanged, traded or bartered. But after the remarks of the hon. gentleman, I shall take an opportunity of reconsidering this clause to see whether the power given to the Lieutenant-Governor is not too great and should be limited; because, looking at it now, I see that he gives a very wide range, and a range, I think, without necessity. In the meantime, however, I think we must make the two Statutes consistent with each other; one Statute should not give permission to bring in the spirits, and another Statute provide that any spirits brought in shall be confiscated. The hon. member for West Durham says we are introducing two systems, an irritant and a counter-irritant, the temperance colony and the licensed victuallers' colony. I dare say they will get on very well together, and some of the licensed victuallers may go and have ginger pop across the line, and be enabled to trade, exchange, or barter to the temperance colonization society.

Mr. BLAKE. I quite agree that the Statutes should be made consistent; I do not agree that we should be forced by some inevitable necessity to make a change in the wrong direction. The hon. gentleman agrees that the power looks too wide, and it can be very easily corrected in this Statute. There is nothing easier than to amend the clause by inserting after the word "territories," the words "which permit shall be granted only for use for medicinal or sacramental purposes," and I move to that effect.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I object to that, it is inconsistent with the Bill, which only deals with the Mounted Police. If we are to have legislation on the subject, we must deal with the whole subject separately.

Mr. LONGLEY. I think some would be curious to know what objection there could be to the amendment, provided that it is really desired to keep intoxicants out of the North-West Territories except for necessary purposes. It seems to me that to empower the Lieutenant-Governor to grant permits to anybody and everybody who may choose to carry liquor into the North-West Territories amounts to very little restriction indeed. I understand that it is not at all difficult for anybody who fancies that he needs to take liquor with him into the Territories to get a permit to do so; and it is said that a permit so obtained frequently does duty tenfold, and is passed round from one to another until it answers the purpose of twenty different persons. If the object be to keep liquor out of the North-West Territories for beverage purposes, then it is very obvious that the amendment would tend in a large measure to effect that object; but if it be thought desirable that liquor shall, notwithstanding this seemingly stringent regulation, be freely admitted into the Territories, then I see very little good likely to come from the clause. It certainly is very desirable that whatever law we have should be made as clear as possible, and I quite agree with the hon. the leader of the Government that it is highly desirable that the different laws on this subject should harmonize; but really, although I am no lawyer, I think it would not be at all difficult to embrace in this Bill all that is required. I think every one will agree with me that there should be no way of obtaining a permit for the use of liquor except for medicinal or sacramental purposes. I am an utter disbeliever in the value of intoxicants for medicinal purposes, in which I am upheld by the best medical testimony in the world; but still, many believe otherwise, and it might not be worth while to make any strenuous objection to liquor being introduced into the North-West Territories for these purposes. I had hoped that the hon. leader of the Government whose aim is, I am inclined to think, to do good, will not be content with doing good partially, but will go the whole length to attain the object which, I assume, is sought to be attained, namely, the exclusion of liquor from the North-West Territory for beverage purposes altogether.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Before this law was brought into operation great abuses prevailed in the North-West Territories in connection with the consumption of spirits brought into the country by traders from the south side of the line. So great were the abuses that there were, I think, about seventy murders committed in one year amongst the poor Indian population, maddened by drink. That induced the Government to make an effort to suppress the liquor traffic, and the police received stringent instructions to do this when possible. Large quantities of liquor were seized and parties who brought it into the country were imprisoned. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Durham seems a fair one. If the question of permits can be further restricted, so much the better. It always seemed to me that the difficulty always prevailed in legislation upon any moral question, would have less force in that sparsely populated country than anywhere else, and if a temperance organization, non-political in its character, could be got up anywhere, it could be in that country, when the population could grow up under regulations not known to us here. I would regret exceedingly if the Government now were to favor retrogressive legislation in this matter, they should rather endeavor to give force to the views which actuated us in the first place. I support the amendment very cordially, as I believe it is absolutely necessary something of that kind should be done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman must understand that this amendment might as well be put in a Bill providing for the survey of the North-West Territories, as in this Bill, or very nearly so. If there is to be any alteration, the alteration must be made in the law which provides for the granting of permits. This is a Bill dealing with the organization of the Mounted Police and providing for their special duties. Their duty is to seize any spirits that they may come upon in their rounds and destroy the spirits, unless there is a permit. If the amendments were put in the Bill, it would not destroy the permit, but would simply give the police force power to seize liquor, whether introduced under permit or not. Unless, therefore, the police force happened to come on them, the spirits would still be introduced into the country under permit. The amendment has no relevance to this Act. I have not the slightest objection to submit to the House a measure greatly limiting this clause with reference to permits in the North-West Territories. The General Act provides that the Lieutenant Governor can give a permit. This amendment would provide that the police force could commit a breach of the law and destroy that permit.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman at all. We are dealing with the law which prescribes the mode in which spirits brought into the North-West Territories shall be dealt with. There is another law on that subject which prohibits bringing spirits into the North-West Territories at all, except by permission of the Lieutenant Governor. We have now a law pending that spirits brought in may be seized by the police and destroyed. The hon. gentleman proposes to alter that law by inserting a provision, unless they have the permit of the Lieutenant-Governor. I say it is perfectly competent for us, perfectly relevant to the subject, to amend that law under this Bill to make the whole law entirely consistent. It is quite competent for us to say that, hereafter the Lieutenant-Governor's permit shall be granted only for limited purposes, and thus deal with that subject in this measure.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You can put it in any Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. Quite so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We might put it in the Temporalities Bill, if you like.

Mr. BLAKE. I think a private measure, like the Temporalities Bill, gives us quite trouble enough without introducing brandy and water into it. This Bill provides for the destruction of all spirits. It seems to me it will not be relevant to amend it in the way we propose. However, as the hon. gentleman has stated that he will bring in a Bill, in time, I presume, for discussion and disposal this Session

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. I will withdraw my amendment.

On clause 14,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The term of imprisonment is extended one year for the purpose of punishing the serious crime of desertion, and the reason of increasing the term is that men put under arrest all winter were, when the six months were up, quite ready for spring work. The clause forfeiting pay during imprisonment was introduced, because it was held by the Commissioner that under the law the prisoner had a right to draw full pay while in confinement. There ought to be some check on that, and this provides that in all cases of sentence the pay of the offender shall be forfeited. The clause also provides that where the sentence to imprisonment exceeds one month, the case shall be reported to the commanding officer.

Mr. BLAKE. It did seem to me when I read this that there ought to be power preserved to the Governor in Council to commute. It is a serious thing to imprison for twelve months.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The pardoning power vested in the Governor General will be sufficient.

In answer to Mr. MILLS,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Charges have been brought against individuals in the police force. We cannot have a body of 300 soldiers all saints.

Mr. BLAKE. Was there any enquiry made into those serious charges made against the soldiers, by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal)?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think there has been any special inquiry as to the general charges that have been made.

Mr. LONGLEY. I have no doubt that the police force would be pretty nearly right if the rum could be kept away. If these permits were not circulated so freely my impression is the police force would be a very worthy and very well conducted force.

Mr. BUNSTER. This prohibition has been noised about a great deal, but I do not see why men in the North-West should not have the same privilege to enjoy a glass of grog as well as men in the east, and if it is a free country in the east, it ought to be a free country in the west, and I for one would be sorry to see any such law enforced in British Columbia. The hon. member for Bothwell mentioned the Hudson's Bay Company, the way it carried on in days gone by. That Company has always had it in view to give their servants good rum and plenty of it to keep their spirits up.

Mr. MILLS. By pouring the spirits down.

Mr. BUNSTER. In the North-West there is a great deal of brackish water and alkali water, which requires the addition of a little stimulant, and if the Government intend to keep up the force in the North-West, it would be well to do as they do on board Her Majesty's ships—give them rations of grog. Let them have it once or twice a day. It will be beneficial to them. It is well known to be beneficial where there is such bad water, and particularly in a country where milk is scarce, where there are not so many cows. My hon. friend says there are no cows at all. Neither is there any ale to be had, and, if I do say it, no one need be surprised, because ale is acknowledged to be the national British beverage.

Mr. BLAKE. May I ask when it is intended to deal with these cases in which charges are made against a commissioned officer by any member of this force? Commissioned officers are excluded from the provision for punishing the several offences mentioned in clause 14. There appears to be no means of investigating a charge made against a commissioned officer.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will consider that. We will allow that to stand over.

On clause 19,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The alteration does away with the necessity of giving a written notice. The provision in the original Act is absurd. If a policeman deserts from his post and goes to Ontario or Quebec, the present clause provides that whenever he is found out of the North-West Territory, on being served with a notice signed by any commissioned officer of the force requiring him to return to his duty, if he neglects to do so he is liable to conviction and punishment. The present clause provides that any member of the force absents himself without leave from his duty is liable to punishment simply on his being found, without requiring a written notice to return.

On clause 22,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would call the attention of the Committee to the addition in the rates of pay—working pay to artizans, 50 cents a day. This is new. Extra pay to blacksmiths, carpenters, etc., has hitherto been granted under Order in Council. This Bill gives power to make it statutory. The Committee will see that these sums are the maximum. The clause says that the sums shall not exceed the amounts stated. As a matter of fact the constables do not get the pay that is provided under this clause.

Mr. BLAKE. About how many is it proposed as a rule—for by this time it must be pretty well understood, from the ordinary run of the service, how many artizans will be required out of the force—how many men is it proposed to give this extra pay to, and what is the present rate they are getting?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The number of artificers employed will vary, but will never exceed twenty. Attached to a company, division or troop, they may require certainly a shoeing smith, and when they have anything like barracks they may require a barrack carpenter. The pay of tailors, carpenters and other artificers is about 15 cents a day, excepting shoeing smiths, and their pay never exceeds 50 cents.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me to be a very large sum to add to the pay of a constable 50 cents, because it would make the whole pay of that officer $1.25, while a non-commissioned officer receives as a maximum $1. So I am pleased to know that this maximum is intended to apply only to the case of blacksmiths. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman intends to enlarge the ordinary rate which is given to actual artizans.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. BUNSTER.

Mr. BLAKE. Before we pass this clause I might ask—I think it quite relevant—if the hon. gentleman would give us a little more detailed information as to the number of stations that he proposes at present to establish, and the number of the force at each. I do not know whether it was in the letter the hon. gentleman has received from my hon. friend from Bothwell, but I saw in some communication a statement that in those smaller posts, after sufficient arrangements were made for out door work, etc., there were just about sufficient men left to act as servants for the officers, so there was really no rank and file in the ordinary sense at all. I would be glad to know whether greater concentration is intended in the outlying posts, and how many there are at each post.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot well give my hon. friend the information he desires, but as I mentioned before, the Government wishes to do away with none of the frontier posts and to concentrate a large portion of the men at headquarters. In the first place, recruits will be sent to Winnipeg and will drill there for a time; a portion of the old barracks has been obtained where they will be quartered and drilled until they acquire some rudimentary knowledge of their duties. They will then be sent to headquarters which, it is proposed, will be placed somewhere along the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, where they can be sent east or west along any branch railroads that may hereafter be built in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. There will be, of course, at Calgary, at Edmonton and at Prince Albert, a certain number of men, but as much as possible they will be concentrated.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What are they to be sent to Prince Albert for, surely there is population enough there to maintain order without the police being sent?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If my hon. friend could only see the complaints of settlers when there is even a suggestion of moving any of the police force, he could quite understand the difficulty, and the sense of helplessness and defencelessness that comes over settlers when they go to any place where there is no police force. It gives them great confidence to have those men stationed near them, but when the country is settled to a greater extent than at present, that necessity will be done away with, and concentration will be carried out.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman must not pay too much attention to representations from well peopled localities. I can recollect very well the difficulty I had in withdrawing the volunteers from Winnipeg. We were threatened with all sorts of calamities if we did so. We did it nevertheless, and no harm came of it. I observed some time ago that at Prince Albert they had men enough to form a volunteer company. I do not know whether there are or not, but a company was formed, and I cannot think that a community of that size requires the rest of the Dominion to maintain a police force for their protection. I hope the hon. gentleman will reconsider that, for if the force is to be enlarged for the purpose of placing guards at places such as that it is absurd, and an entirely wrong policy. The police force, as I understand it, has to maintain order in outstanding districts where there is no large resident population, but should have no occupation in populous places like Prince Albert.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is quite true that where there is a large population as at Prince Albert or any other place they ought to be able to raise and organize a corps of citizen soldiers for the protection of the place, but at present I do not think it would be safe to risk volunteer corps coming into possible collision with the Indians. I think militia forces should be carefully handled. A case of that kind did arise, and a catastrophe was nearly resulting in consequence of a magistrate hearing of a like libhood of an Indian disturbance or riot and issuing orders to a militia force to march against them. They did march, but were fortunately stopped by an officer of the Mounted Police Force, or there would have been a collision between the volunteers and Indians.

Mr. BLAKE. Besides, this police force is to be increased to 500, and they must be put somewhere—some at Winnipeg and some at Prince Albert—otherwise there would be no reason for the increase.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the wording of the 17th clause of the old Act, to which I previously referred. It is as follows:—

"17. Whenever the Commissioner shall deem it advisable to make, or cause to be made, any special enquiry into the conduct of any commissioned officer or other men of the force, or into any complaint against any of them, he, or the commissioned officer or officers whom he may appoint for that purpose, may examine any person on oath or affirmation, and shall have power to and may compel the attendance of any necessary witnesses, in the same way as if the proceedings were before Justices under the 'Act respecting the duties of Justices of the Peace out of Sessions in relation to persons charged with indictable offences.'"

However, I shall consider the clause to which the hon. gentleman has called my attention.

Bill reported.

PUBLIC LANDS OF THE DOMINION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the second reading of the Bill (No. 101) further to amend, and to consolidate as so amended, the several Acts respecting the Public Lands of the Dominion therein mentioned.

Mr. MILLS. I suppose the hon. gentleman will tell us what is new in this Bill. It seems to me that some provisions of the former law are left out, and I think we should be told why they are left out.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The alterations in the law are evident in the Bill itself. The main object of the Bill, as I explained in the introduction, is to consolidate the three Acts which are now on the Statute-book. It is exceedingly inconvenient for the people in the North-West to have three Acts, all dealing with the lands in that country, and we propose by this Bill to consolidate them. The amendments are not many, and such as they are I think I could explain them much better as we proceed with the Bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLAKE. So far as I can gather there is no indication in the Bill of what is new; at least, if there is I have been unable to find it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I should suppose that a Bill of something like forty-four pages would hardly be brought in unless there are very material amendments. Surely we are not to have a Bill of this size thrust upon us for discussion merely to amend two or three clauses; but perhaps it is introduced merely to swell the volume of the Statutes. Two or three Sessions ago we had a Bill consolidating the Railway Acts in which there were only two new clauses.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think my hon. friend does justice to the measure, which is not introduced for the purpose of making two or three immaterial changes in the law, but to make one consecutive law which others besides lawyers can understand, instead of three Acts which only lawyers can fully comprehend by comparison of one with another.

Mr. MILLS. I think we should have a fuller statement from the hon. gentleman with regard to what are the new provisions of this Bill. We have not heard any explanation of what portions of the Bill are new, and for my own part, it is only by my recollection of the law that I am enabled to guess how it affects the former Acts. It seems to me that if it is intended to give greater powers to the hon. gentleman, we should have explanations of why such additional powers are sought; and if it is intended to alter the policy which formerly prevailed with regard to the manner of dealing with the lands in the North-West, that also should be explained. We have heard a great deal since the Session opened with regard to the organization of colonization companies, the transfer of the lands of the North-West to private corporations and associations for the purpose of being subsequently sold to actual settlers, no doubt in the interest of the parties who have formed those private corporations and associations. Now, under the law as it formerly stood, the land was not to be sold at a less price than one dollar per acre, and no one person was able to acquire more than 640 acres. Here there is apparently power conferred on the Governor General in Council to adopt a different policy in special cases, but, if we may judge by what has come under our observation, to some extent, since we have been here, what were intended to be exceptional and special circumstances, have become the general policy of the Administration; and I think it is due to the House and the country that when the measure is introduced, when a new and different policy is to be inaugurated, that we should have some explanation with regard to the changes which are proposed to be made in the law. In looking over the Act I have been at some loss to know upon what particular provisions the hon. gentleman proposes to found the land regulations which he has made, and which, I suppose, will be made from time to time in the future. I do not see anything with reference to what modifications, if any, the hon. gentleman proposes with regard to the laying out of the township lines separating one from another, and, I think, with reference to the transfer of large sections of territory to colonization societies who are purchasing them for speculative purposes, and with reference to the sale of mining lands, it would have been well if the hon. gentleman had given some explanations to the House. There are some provisions of this Bill which, I observe, are new, and which may be, perhaps, more conveniently discussed in detail in Committee, but there are others affecting matters of public policy which, I think, had better be discussed on the second reading of the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The regulations which now exist are based on the law as it now stands. The hon. gentleman objects to colonization companies. That is a question of policy, and whether right or wrong, as a matter of law the Government has power to make these arrangements. If the hon. gentleman has examined the regulations, he will have seen that great care has been taken to prevent monopoly, which I see there is a dread of in some quarters, by the preservation of the homestead right to the settlers. The settler can always get a homestead in the North-West on good agricultural land in every way fit for settlement. The colonization companies, we consider, will occupy the place for the present of the numerous railway companies in the United States, which have been proved there to be the best immigration agents—in fact, the only immigration agents in the United States. With the exception of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we have only one or two incipient railways of no great strength, which have not yet shown what they can do in the way of promoting immigration. The Canadian Pacific Railway will, no doubt, draw a great immigration, because homesteads are granted within the 24-mile belt. There has been a temporary reservation of a strip of land on each side of the belt in order to prevent the rush of speculators who are going in advance of the surveyors, and attempting to crowd out bona fide settlers who will be going in large numbers this spring and summer. That is the object in making this temporary reservation. These regulations, I contend, are under the authority of the Act as it at present exists; there is no change in the policy which was commenced by the hon. gentlemen opposite, of encouraging parties to get in immigrants. It is quite clear that we must have some person who will be interested in inducing and aiding settlers to come into that country, and we cannot expect them to do so from philanthropic motives; they will do it as business men, just as the railways do, whose interest it is to get their lands sold and settled, in order to obtain business for their lines. Our regulations provide that under plan No. 1—I may say that there have been scarcely any applications under plan No. 2—the odd-numbered sections in a tract of land may be sold for $2 an acre. The purchasers pay that price for the odd-numbered sections, and they are made agents for the settlement of the even-numbered sections, and for every settler they place on an even-numbered section they get a rebate on their purchase money; so that if they fully settle the even-numbered sections they will have their whole tract for a dollar an acre plus their share of the expense of survey. It is quite clear that the rebate of half the purchase money is a substantial inducement for these companies to use every exertion to procure settlers on their lands; and this plan is infinitely better than the principle of forfeiture. Forfeitures are considered in the nature of a penalty, harsh and hard, and I think the experience of hon. gentlemen opposite, and of everybody who knows anything on that subject, is that they are rarely enforced. But under the present system the purchaser pays $2 an acre for the land he buys, and if he settles the even-numbered sections he gets an allowance for every settler, and if he does not do so the public treasury receives $2 an acre, and the land that is unsettled reverts to the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. I must direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that we have no explanation of what is material in this Bill. When he introduced the Bill, he stated to the House:—

"There are some amendments with which I will not trouble the House at present, but which will appear fully marked in the Bill so as to be seen by every hon. member."

Well, we respected the hon gentleman's statement, and we find the Bill without the amendments, marked so as to be seen by every hon. member. The Bill is forty-three pages long, and the hon. gentleman says he will have it read the second time, and he will not trouble the House with the amendments because nobody can see them, but that in Committee he will tell what the amendments are. Now, what opportunity have hon. members to consider what the effect of these amendments is under these circumstances?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The main principle of the Bill is consolidation, and that is the only principle asked for on the second reading. As regards the amendments, I will move them in Committee, when every member will be able to discuss them as well as in the House; and if any clause arises on which there is any substantial difference of opinion, I have not the slightest objection to it being allowed to stand over.

Mr. BLAKE. I am quite aware that they can be discussed in Committee, but I think the House had a right to be informed what they were; and he now says he will not tell us till we pass the second reading.

Bill read the second time; and House resolved itself into Committee.

On clause 1,

Mr. MILLS. This clause, in the first section, is open to the objection which the right hon. gentleman made to the amendment proposed by my hon. friend to the Mounted Police Bill. It is not germane to the Act, because it relates to the constitution of the Department of the Interior. What has

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

it to do with the subject of the Lands Act, that the Department of the Interior or any other Department be charged with the management of the Dominion lands?

On clause 2,

Mr. BLAKE. Are we competent to pass the second sub-section, providing that copies of documents attested by the Minister of the Interior or Surveyor-General or chief clerk shall be evidence?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say we were competent, but the clause was in the Act and we left it there.

Mr. BLAKE. That is not a sufficient answer. You are amending and consolidating an Act amended and consolidated in 1879, 1880 and 1881 and made right in 1882, only to be amended again. The hon. gentleman left out one clause because it was superfluous, and leaves in one which is beyond our competence to pass.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is absolutely necessary that either by the Dominion Parliament or Local Legislatures a clause of this kind should be introduced, and I have not heard the question raised in any Courts as to the admission of such evidence.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman will find there are local laws dealing with this. There is no reason why we should pass a law quite beyond our competence.

On clause 4,

Mr. McDOUGALL. I notice that the second sub-section with respect to employes of the Department purchasing lands has been left out. Is it the intention of the Government to leave it open to the officers of the Department to purchase public lands?

Mr. BLAKE. In which is it to be found?

Mr. McDOUGALL. In the Act of 1879. It is there declared that no person employed in the Department of Dominion Lands can purchase lands without the authority of the Governor in Council.

Mr. BLAKE. The Act of 1879 was a consolidation. I suppose that the hon. gentleman thinks that this was one of the clauses which I ought to have repealed, and he is repealing it now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I find that this provision has been omitted, but it was by inadvertence. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for bringing it up. I move that it be inserted in amendment to the 2nd clause, forming the 3rd sub-section.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. Previously there was a fixed width for road allowances, of one chain and fifty links between townships and sections; but now this is no longer the case. There has been, however, an alteration in the width of road allowances. It is stated in the report of the hon. gentleman, or of some of his officers, what the width is, and that it is intended to apply to the whole of the North-West, and it is calculated that the change proposed will effect a saving of about $2,500,000 in surveys. If a general system is decided upon as to road allowances, it would seem expedient to state it here. Surely by this time we ought to have arrived at a proper system in this connection.

Mr. MILLS. It is stated the very wide roads are objectionable, as leading to the growth of Canada thistles and all sorts of noxious weeds; but there is no reason why the provision as to roads should not be set out in the Act if we are to make any change at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With regard to the road allowances, the answer given me is simply this: That if we provide for road allowances for sections, we will provide for road allowances for townships. Respecting the other objection, that the width of the roads should be fixed, I understand that the section was inserted in its present shape in the Bill in consequence of the change which was made by hon. gentlemen opposite. The width of the roads was formerly one chain and fifty links, while it is now one chain.

Mr. McDUGALL. Have the surveys, which have been made up to this time under the existing law, provided for roads one chain and fifty links in width between the townships and sections?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. McDUGALL. Do you intend to abandon the roads between townships laid out on the old system?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; townships are an aggregate of sections.

Mr. BLAKE. That is true, but it is also true that this clause does not make it necessary to provide road allowances for sections; and it is not intended that this shall be done, if I understand rightly the report of the officers of the Minister of the Interior. It is important that the width of the roads should be stated. It may be quite proper that there should be a change, but what the change is ought to be made clear.

Mr. McDUGALL. When this matter was under discussion some years ago, I was strongly in favor of following the rule which had been found to be a good one in surveying townships in Ontario. Making the roads very wide entailed a waste of land, besides encouraging weeds and other evils to the farmers; and it was suggested at that time by a gentleman from Manitoba, that it was necessary to have wide spaces for their roads, inasmuch as that country was level and in many places swampy, while this also enabled them to avoid snow drifts. But, I suppose it is now understood by those who take any pains to make themselves familiar with that country, that they are less troubled with snow drifts than we are in Ontario; and our roads are quite wide enough as they are. I hope that as little extra space as may be necessary will be allowed for roads, and perhaps it will be better to leave the Bill as it stands, because there may be sections of the country where wide roads are desirable. Still uniformity and fixity by law is the right rule, whenever possible, because this binds surveyors, Governments and everybody.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that my hon. friend is quite correct in the explanation which he gives as to the original width of the roads, one chain and fifty links. This was the normal width of all the roads, and it was continued in the early surveys; but it was suggested, I believe, by the Surveyor General that it entailed a waste of land; and in consequence, all the new surveys which have been made during the last few years have been made for a width of one chain.

On clause 5,

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman explain the change which has been made in this clause.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The words "in all cases" have been struck out.

Mr. BLAKE. There has also been some change in the wording.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is merely shortened.

Mr. BLAKE. In the 3rd section, 3rd sub-section of the old Act, provision is made as to the measurement of township road allowances, but that does not seem to be stated here. We ought to have some authoritative explanation as to the causes for these alterations.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Surveyor General states that the 3rd clause, 3rd sub-section, was left out as not being required, and that the clauses as remodelled, are arranged for the purpose of being more concise and more explicit, while conveying exactly the same meaning.

Mr. MILLS. In the 5th clause, "the lines binding townships on the east and west sides shall be meridians; otherwise on the north and south sides shall be chords to parallels of latitude." Is it intended to convey the same meaning as if it read "shall be parallel to latitude?" Does it mean the measurement of a straight line joining two points of a circle drawn upon the earth's surface? If it does, then it is a change in the mode of measurement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is the same as the old clause.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me that some of these alterations are in consequence of the provision of allowing the Governor in Council to determine whether there shall be allowances for roads, and of what width they shall be. Amongst the omitted provisions is one which gives the width of the township. Now that is omitted in the clause which we have before us, and it is uncertain what the width of the township is to be.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was applied to the township when the road allowance was a chain and a half

Mr. BLAKE. We have no statement of what the width of a township shall be, although in the 7th section it is provided that the townships shall be given their prescribed width

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A township is composed of a certain number of sections, and, therefore, the aggregate of the widths of the sections will make the width of the township.

Mr. BLAKE. You will have no road allowance at all then if you give the width of the townships simply from the width of the sections.

Mr. McDUGALL. Does it not follow necessarily that if a township is to contain so many sections of a prescribed area, with road allowances between them, that the aggregate of these will make the width of a township?

Mr. CASEY. The whole thing is left quite uncertain. It is said that each township shall contain thirty-six sections of as nearly one mile square as the meridian shall permit. Taking that uncertainty and the uncertainty as to the width of the road allowance, there is no way of giving a fixed size to the township.

On clause 7,

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman state what is the prescribed width of the townships in this Bill? It is stated that the townships will be given their prescribed width.

Mr. MILLS. I am inclined to think the numbering is the preferable way, as the division of a quarter section corresponds with the plan of a township. There is much less likelihood of a mistake in a description of this kind than in that supported by the hon. member for North Norfolk.

On clause 19,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The school lands as provided for in the North-West will be a magnificent endowment in the cause of education if it be preserved. For that purpose it is provided in the clause under the head, "Disposal of school lands," that these lands shall always be put up at auction at an upset price equal to the average value of lands in the vicinity. Every attempt is made to prevent parties settling on school lands, and making real or supposed improvements for the purpose of getting some claim, and raising the cry of harshness if they are dispossessed. The clause to which I draw attention is the 2nd sub-section of the 18th clause, which provides:

That on a township being surveyed, should such sections, or either of them, or any part of either, be found to have been settled on and improved, the occupant or occupants conforming to the requirements of this Act shall be confirmed in possession, and the Minister of the Interior shall select a quantity, equal to that found to have been so settled on, from the unclaimed lands in such township, and shall withdraw the land so selected from sale and settlement, and shall set apart and publish the same as school lands, by notice in the Canada Gazette.

People at this moment are looking out for school sections and settling. A memorandum has been sent to me saying that it is in the interests of education that section 2 should be omitted. Everybody knows now what numbers the school sections are. Any man who settles on them now does it in defiance of law.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not see how that applies at all. This is a settlement in advance of survey altogether, when the parties have no means of knowing where the school sections are.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They can ascertain with sufficient accuracy from the geometrical symmetry of the surveys. It occurs to me that it will be in the interests of education to omit that clause.

Mr. CASEY. I think this clause is bad and likely to be injurious, because, even supposing a settler had not specially selected a spot on these school lands, not knowing it to be a school section, it might turn out, after being surveyed, to be school land, and I think that the value thereof should inure to the school fund and not to the squatter. Suppose a railway was located through that place and a survey made afterwards which would give it value, the profit should inure to the school fund, and it would be better to give this squatter land elsewhere and allow him for his improvements.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am inclined to agree with the hon. gentleman from West Elgin (Mr. Casey). In the first place, we declare a certain section shall be a school section; that becomes a portion of the endowment. If a man settles, squats it, he has no legal right to do so. I do not think that his claim that he gets by squatting should override a positive enactment of law which provides that a certain section shall, for all time to come, go for educational purposes. If a squatter is compensated for his improvements, and is offered another lot elsewhere fit for agricultural purposes, I think he ought to be obliged to take it. I think it is the duty of Parliament to try and guard that fund. There will be every attempt made to diminish it. There are now attempts to overload such lands with improvements in order to compel a sale otherwise than by auction. That is going on to a very great extent just now, and really that endowment will be frittered away unless we say that these lots set apart for a school fund must be held to be the property of the school fund, not of the squatter. This Parliament are the trustees of the fund, and may compensate for any improvements he may have made. The Hudson's Bay Company turn off the squatters on their lands without giving them any rights anywhere else. Why should not the school fund be as well protected as the Hudson's Bay Company?

Mr. MILLS. I do not think the hon. gentleman has quite stated correctly the case of the Hudson's Bay Company. That Company's Act makes special provision in case a party settles in advance of a survey upon a section that becomes a section. The Government was to grant to the Company an equal quantity of land elsewhere, and I believe in every instance the Hudson's Bay Company has agreed to accept lands elsewhere. It is only by changing the law there will be any force in the legal aspect of the question discussed by the right hon. gentleman. The question is, will the school fund receive any damage by leaving the law as it is? I hold that it will not. All the difficulties that have arisen are from parties, after the lands have been set out for settlement, thinking the Government would recognize that claim. It is very important to preserve the school fund, to see it is not frittered away, but that the lands are sold at a fair valuation, and to provide that the Government in no case should fix a valuation for those lands below the minimum sum of, say, $5 per acre.

Mr. BLAKE. All the difficulties that have occurred were in connection with cases of parties who chose to settle upon school lands after serving, and when they knew precisely where the school sections were placed. The law at present provides that if a squatter shall have settled on a school lot his rights shall be protected; and it is proposed to sweep away that security, and turn him off the land, in order to hand it over to the school fund.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My suggestion is not that the clause shall have a retroactive effect, but after the passing of this Act the school fund shall be protected. I will ask the House to pass the clause as it is, with the power of afterwards changing it.

On clause 19, sub-section 3,

Mr. BLAKE. This was not an original proposition respecting school lands; it was introduced in the Act of 1880. The school fund should have its chance in this particular, and if it happens to include a section required for a station it should receive the benefit of an advanced price.

On clause 20,

Mr. HESSON. I think, certainly, that some attention should be paid to the volunteers in the war of 1837-38. This matter has been brought to the attention of the House before, and I think the Government should take this occasion of recognizing the claims of the men who fought in that rebellion.

Mr. MILLS. On which side?

Mr. HESSON. On behalf of Canada.

Mr. CASEY. Which side was that?

Mr. HESSON. I think that at the time they gave their services the understanding was that they should receive 200 acres of land.

Mr. MILLS. It was a mercenary war, then?

Mr. HESSON. No more so than in the case of the Mounted Police; and I think that some consideration should be paid the men who engaged in this war.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If there was a contract of the kind mentioned by the hon. gentleman it is a contract which affects the old Province of Upper Canada, and I believe there is land enough in Muskoka to supply the volunteers of 1837-38.

Mr. MILLS. Or in the disputed territory.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, or in the disputed territory; but I think there is no agreement to give them lands in the North-West, as it belonged at that time to the Hudson's Bay Company, or the greater portion of it. I do not think there was any agreement to give the militiamen who turned out in '37 to perform their duty, any portion of the North-West territory; but, being myself one who turned out and shouldered my musket at that time, I shall be glad to know that I own a farm in the North-West on that account.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says that this contract, if it exists, is one which should be recognized by the old Province of Canada. I remember that in the Legislature of Ontario the claim of Montgomery was recognized.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I saw his house burned.

On clause 24,

Mr. MILLS. I believe that everything that has been done lately under this land craze which the hon. gentleman speaks of, has been done under the exception mentioned in the proviso of this section. If the hon. gentleman is going to carry out the policy that seems to be entered upon, if the policy is to sell to anybody, to make a wholesale disposal of the whole of the North-West, to put it out of the hands of the Government, and into the hands of all kinds of speculators, who are, as the hon. gentleman says, and rightly says, crazed, there should be some change in the law different from what is proposed in this section.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When I spoke of the land craze, I referred to speculations in and about Winnipeg, Brandon and other places. As to the colonization companies, I dare say they have some speculation in their eyes; but, as I explained, the regulations so guard them that they must either settle their district or suffer in pocket.

Mr. BLAKE. How far the land craze has extended might be seen from the account the daily papers gave us the other day of an occurrence in the ordinary peaceable city of Toronto, where a crowd of men, wild to secure a hundred dollars worth of stock in a land company that was for sale, smashed windows, broke plate glass and generally demolished the place. However, we shall have a discussion of this whole subject after the hon. gentleman brings down, about the middle of next month, the names of the colonization companies. I wish to point out how this clause is worked. There seems to be a constant fluctuation of decision and arrangement as to these lands. You find certain regulations issued, and then an announcement that lands are open for sale; application is made for lands, the answer of the agent is: "I am not instructed to sell"; the application is filed, various expenses are incurred, and after all there is an order countermanding the previous one, and directing that the lands should be sold by public auction. Whatever is the policy of the Government on this subject should be a well-considered policy, and such as the public may depend on being carried out. A letter has just been placed in my hands, in which a gentleman belonging to the neighborhood of Paris states that several residents of that town and of Brandon commissioned a person to select certain lands in the neighborhood of Birtle; that they repeatedly tendered the price, but failed to get the lands, the agent at Birtle having no instructions to sell, and that they had paid in expenses $850; and the writer asks what the meaning of this is. This action was taken on the basis of the regulations of the 1st of January, providing that "the odd-numbered sections in class D shall be sold at $2 per acre, payable at the time of sale, except where they may have been or may be dealt with otherwise by the Governor in Council." On the strength of this announcement people go up and incur expenses in making selections of land, and after they have made their selections, they are told that the land is not open for sale. I denounced the sale of these lands except on conditions of settlement from the first; I do so still; but the Government having declined to so limit the sales, and having announced to the public that they opened all the lands in the odd-numbered sections in class D for sale, thus inducing the public to locate the lands, ought to carry out their announced intention. I have been told by two or three persons from the North-West that applications were made for lands by intending settlers, who, after they went to their settlements, were told, "No, the lands are not open for sale." Why should these things be? Why should regulations be issued announcing to the public that certain lands are to be sold on certain conditions, if there is not an opportunity to secure these lands on these conditions? Nothing is likely to be more injurious to the sale of lands in that country. I believe, if lands are to be sold not on condition of settlement, to sell by auction is probably the fairer way; but what I wish to emphasize is that it is important that the Government should so thoroughly consider what it proposes that the public may be able to depend upon the carrying out of what it does propose, which does not seem to be the case with respect to these last regulations.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman must not compare the regulations with advertisements for sale. The regulations as announced are statements to the public that lots will be opened for sale and settlement under terms specified in those regulations. So long as those regulations exist the lands must be sold and are opened for homestead under them, so that settlers going into the North-West know, on reading the regulations, what they have to expect in any land that they were to either purchase or settle upon as homestead. When the surveys are completed and the returns here then checked, approved and past, and lands are then open for settlement, special circumstances may arise in which the Government may think proper to make an exception and put any given district into the market. Perhaps the hon. member for West Durham will refresh my memory concerning the letter he read the other day.

Mr. BLAKE. I read a letter, in the course of the discussion on the North-West lands, as to an auction sale in the Winnipeg agency which took place on the 15th March. It stated that the sale commenced in the afternoon, that there was a large number of persons attending, and that bidding was very brisk at first; but after a few lots were sold, the auctioneer announced that the bidders would have to deposit the cash down, and as it was not "banking hours," and the people in the North-West did not carry their fortunes in their pockets, the majority ceased bidding, and ten or twelve persons who did happen to carry their fortunes in their pockets, did the bidding all to themselves. The hon. gentleman said this letter was written by some disappointed speculator, and that he would be able, on the morrow, to give an emphatic contradiction to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I had lost recollection of the letter, but will be able to give a contradiction tomorrow. Every one knows those lots were put up for cash, but many went there thinking they could get the auctioneer to take their names instead. They went without money, thinking they could get special credit on their bidding and follow the example of many, of buying land and then waiting to sell it in advance before paying up the instalments. It was well known lands were to be paid for in cash. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot understand why it was announced that the office at Winnipeg could be opened at certain intervals. The agents here intended to open their doors on those days and receive applications for homestead or pre-emption or for purchase. A great many attempts have been made to file applications here for the purpose of acquiring lands at those offices as soon as they would be opened, and parties imagine that they obtain some particular right in so doing. So it was determined to prevent anything of that kind, that those claims should be considered of no value, and that all parties arriving at the office as soon as it was opened, should make their entries and get their land; but the agents were instructed, in case there was a rush similar to that experienced at Toronto, to close the doors, and offer lots by auction. That proceeding has been highly successful, and the proceeds of the sale will astonish hon. gentlemen opposite when the particulars are brought down.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman says that these resolutions were not intended to advertise that sales would be open on a certain day; but if I recollect the advertisement in the Gazette, it says that after the 1st day of January, this year, land shall be open for sale at such prices and on such terms. If that does not mean that I could go up to Winnipeg any day after the 1st January and buy an odd section at fixed prices and on certain terms, I do not know what it means. He also said that the holding off of the lands for sale for a certain time was in the interest of the actual settler and not of the speculator. The reverse I take to be the case. The actual settlers were dropping into Winnipeg at all times through the winter, expecting to be able to locate lots, but they found on getting there that they could neither homestead nor buy until such time as instructions were given to open the office. When I was in Winnipeg this winter, the great topic of speculation was when instructions would be given. Every speculator was full of the idea that he would get early information as to when instructions would be given to sell, so that he could have early at hand a man—the strongest he could find—with money to buy on the first preference. The effect of postponing the sale has been very detrimental to the interests of settlers. A man intending to settle could not afford to wait around Winnipeg, but the speculator could afford to wait there; and the result was that the sales made, for the first few at all events, would be made to speculators. The plan, on the other hand, of receiving applications in time would have avoided that. If you should want to sell to speculators, make a provision that every purchaser must be his actual settler. The first come should have been first served. If you do not want to sell to speculators you should make a proviso that the buyer shall be an actual settler, and then the first actual settler that presents himself should be first served. But actual settlers, who knew the places on which they wanted to settle, were prevented locating and, consequently, had to go home. The reason given for this was that the surveys were not completed and checked, and all that sort of thing. But the hon. Minister cannot pretend that the surveys in the Winnipeg district were not completed, and he also knows well that the surveys in the Birtle district were finished and the maps published a considerable time before the regulations were issued. This was also the case with the Souris and Saskatchewan districts. The postponement was not then made for the purpose of continuing the surveys in these four neighborhoods, and it must have been for some other reason which the hon. Minister has not explained. What it was I cannot begin to say; but I am quite sure of this, this postponement had a disastrous effect of the settlement of that country, with respect to actual settlers.

Mr. BOWELL. Actual speculators, you should say.

Mr. CASEY. Of course speculators were injured, but we will leave them out of the question. This step had a disastrous effect on actual settlers as well. In fact, these persons were especially affected by an indefinite postponement. No one but the speculator could afford to wait. Then there was the sudden change of terms. I do not think that any such sudden change from $2 to $2.50 an acre—a fixed price in offering the land by auction—should have been made at such short notice. Suppose the actual settler had chosen a piece of land and had just taken a sufficient sum with him to Winnipeg to buy it, he would be greatly inconvenienced when he found that the matter was kept extremely secret. Why a matter of public interest should be kept so secret I cannot imagine. The land was not offered at the prices at which it was advertised; and the same thing will apply to other sales in the Birtle and other outlying posts. The notice was somewhat longer in these cases, but the principle was just the same.

Mr. BLAKE. Was no notice given?

Mr. CASEY. No public notice was given that I am aware of, except what leaked out as to the instructions which were sent to the public officials there, and which also made it known. It was not published in the Gazette or in the newspapers, as far as I know. I only learned it from enquiring of the officials of the department. This sudden change of policy at such short notice was not fair, either to the speculator or settler, although we will leave the former out of consideration. In all cases this sudden change of policy had an injurious effect.

Mr. CASEY.

I quite agree with my hon. friend and leader that the auction system or a scale of prices based on auction is the fair thing. It might be impossible to auction off all the lands, but it would be proper to hold auctions at such intervals of time as the hon. gentleman stated he intended to do in connection with the school lands, and fix the prices between times. This would be much better than to sell at a fixed price, arbitrarily settled upon, for lands which may be of different qualities or values. The auction system is much the best, and due notice should be given of the sales.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All I have to say in reply is this: The Department has received continual complaints against the practice of the Department from speculators, but we have received no such complaints from actual, or intending settlers. The effect of our policy has been this: The land has been prevented from being occupied in anticipation of settlement by speculators, during the whole of this winter, and the actual settlers, who are now going in there in crowds, are finding these lands ready for their occupation.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think so. I am aware that large and vast sums of money have been sent up to and spent at these land offices by speculators; and I believe, that in nine out of ten cases, the lands which have been sold since these sales began, have been bought by speculators; and I have shown that the chances are prima facie in favor of the speculators.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. How can the sale of the odd-numbered lots be against the actual settler who settles on Government numbered lots. The odd-numbered are sold, not even-numbered lots.

Mr. CASEY. Certainly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. How does this possibly interfere with the actual settlement?

Mr. CASEY. Certainly it does. The hon. gentleman apparently does not think it possible that the settler may not want to buy an odd-numbered lot. As far as I am aware, homesteads were not open for homesteading during this time. Even-numbered lots were not allowed to be taken up by the actual settler, who was not permitted to homestead or to buy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is very strange, then, that they are homesteading largely.

Mr. CASEY. They are since the offices were opened, but the land offices were then closed. The land agent for Birtle, was for a considerable time in Winnipeg on leave with his family, as he was not allowed to do anything at Birtle; and it is absurd to say that the actual settler then had an opportunity to settle, while the actual settler was then kept out.

Mr. HESSON. Were they prohibited from squatting?

Mr. CASEY. No; it was in the interest of squatting pure and simple.

Mr. BOWELL. Every squatter's right is recognized.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman seems to think it is a very easy thing to squat on the prairie 100 miles from Winnipeg in January. It is not possible to squat on the prairie in the depth of winter.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The even-numbered sections were always open for actual settlement.

Mr. CASEY. Not always.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister of the Interior says differently.

Mr. WALLACE. This was not the case in the Souris, Birtle, Little Saskatchewan and Winnipeg districts, where actual settlers were always able to get the even-numbered sections in any part where they were not already taken up.

Mr. CASEY. I know what I say; as a matter of fact the Birtle office was not open for a considerable time this winter. The man in charge was then in Winnipeg, and the Minister of the Interior states that this office was ordered to open for homestead entries on fixed days.

Mr. WALLACE. It was always open for homestead entries, though not for sale.

Mr. HESSON. I have had a number of letters from the West in reference to these land regulations, and they were always from gentlemen who went up with a view to purchase and not to locate. I have yet to receive the first letter complaining of these land regulations as far as the actual settler is concerned. I have had complaints only from gentlemen who, like the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), went up there with the view of purchasing, not to settle, and who felt perhaps a little bit annoyed about it because the arrangements did not suit them. I do not think that one person, who was willing to settle down, was driven out of the country because he could not take possession of the land, the even-numbered sections being for this purpose and this purpose alone. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that he could not purchase even-numbered lots at that sale; but this did not prevent settlement. More than one-half of the actual settlers were those who squatted in the first instance, and who had their claims entered when the office was opened.

Mr. CASEY. In January?

Mr. HESSON. Yes, even in January, I had to get some cases set right. Certain parties got some timber out with the understanding that their cases would be recognized; and in every case the Government has protected these men in preference to any others, and I think that the hon. gentleman has no right to complain of these regulations as far as the regulations themselves are concerned.

Mr. BLAKE. I think you will find the result has been to impose middlemen between the settler and the Government and give a profit to the middlemen, or whoever arranged to be present at the auction sale. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could give us a general statement as to the quantity of lands that was sold on or about the 1st of April in these various districts, and the general range of prices.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not got a statement here just now, but I think the sales in all amounted to about $750,000. I cannot make any statement as to the rate per acre, or the number of acres. Three auctions were opened.

Mr. CASEY. I did hear rumors amongst people interested that the auction was not going to be such a great success in putting up prices, with the exception of a few choice sections, and that those who would be present would have enough gumption, as they said, to make a nice little arrangement amongst themselves, and get the land at a comparatively reasonable price. Of course the Government could prevent such an arrangement as that if they chose to offer the lands for sale on a particular day, but it shows that even an auction sale does not prevent the speculators from having the innings. My objection to this plan was not that the speculator was hurt, but that the whole arrangement turned against the speculators as a class and against the settlers as a class. I learn that in some of these townships nothing was left but the odd sections which could only be had by purchase. Some of them were very fine and near railways, and offered special inducements in that respect. The settlers, however, could only obtain them by purchase, and could get no homestead because there was nothing more left for homesteads. Thus the actual settler and the speculator would have to compete for these lands.

Mr. HESSON. In what way would the hon. gentleman prevent the speculator and the settler from coming into competition? The lands would have to be put in the market at some fixed day, and they are both supposed to be on the spot. As the day would have to be set and the parties would be there, it would be worth as much to the speculator as to the homesteader. The hon. gentleman seems to forget that men select a homestead where they can get a pre-emption alongside. The homesteader, if he has been on the land for a year, is often bought out by the speculator, who pays the Government $2 an acre in order to convert the land into a freehold. I do not see that the homesteader has any particular occasion to complain.

Mr. CHARLTON. In the 24th clause: "Provided also that whenever so ordered by the Minister, such unoccupied lands as may be deemed by him expedient, from time to time, may be withdrawn from ordinary sale and settlement;" does that include homestead lands for pre-emption?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; that is only lands for sale, not lands for homestead.

Mr. BLAKE. We find that the regulations under some clauses of this Act provide for the establishment of large corporations, which are to have, not merely 640 acres, but many townships, as I understand, of which they are to be proprietors, subject in some cases to conditions of settlement. Now, I think it is well, since the policy of the Administration, as propounded in the regulations, is a policy which apparently makes sale to the individual the exception and the sale to the corporation the rule.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, no.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes. Because, where you find one clause providing for the sale of land to individuals at so much per acre, the great bulk of the regulations have in view the development of the schemes called colonization companies. We find that from 300 to 500 companies, according to some of the newspapers, have been organized, and many townships allotted to them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has not chosen to bring down the names yet, and so we cannot know what the number is. We have not been able to get the list from which I have assumed that it is as long as the list of Homer's ships. We are in a state of perfect uncertainty as to what the number of the companies is, and the extent to which they have been recognized by the Government. There is another system of selling land en bloc to railway companies. It has been stated that there are four railway corporations applying for such grants, three of which have obtained Orders in Council. The acreage will amount to 6,000,000, and if the application of the Portage, Westbourne and North Western Road is granted, the aggregate will be between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000. The Committee would like information on these points.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to colonization companies, the number of such organizations that have applied has been largely exaggerated, the number never having been 100, much less than 300 or 500. There have been some applications granted and terms settled, but this has only been done within the last few days. The reason why the statement with respect to colonization companies was not brought down before, was because it was intended to set forth the whole amount of the applications and those so far entertained by the Government. That return will be brought down in a day or two. Although it is true that this clause provides that a single individual can only obtain 640 acres, under the powers given to the Government, these colonization companies have been formed. The Government have desired to encourage them to a certain extent. Under all those plans the homesteads are religiously preserved, the colonization companies being made the agents for the purpose of bringing out settlers and placing them on the even-numbered sections, they in return obtaining a rebate of $1 per acre on the odd-numbered sections for which they pay in the first instance $2 per acre. The plan is, I think, going to turn out, and I hope it will, to be a very effectual one.

Mr. CHARLTON. Do I understand that the rights of homesteaders are religiously preserved under all the colonization regulations, under plan No. 2?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not under plan No. 2; but there is a rigid clause providing for forfeiture in the agreement which is to be entered into by any parties taking land under plan No. 2. There have, however, been no applications as yet granted under plan No. 2. The parties say they cannot make money out of lands obtained under that plan, for which they would have to pay all cash down. I suppose the utmost extent of land which the colonization companies will secure will not be more than 7,000,000 acres, and that is not a very great proportion of what is fit to settle in that part of the country. If we obtain twenty or thirty colonization companies to settle and earn the land we are really procuring and using the most energetic mode of settling the country.

Mr. BLAKE. Under what clause of the Act do the Government possess the power respecting the colonization companies?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Under the clause which gives the Governor in Council power to make special regulations.

Mr. BLAKE. So, in special cases, there may be a sale to one person of more than 640 acres, but that surely is not the warrant upon which the hon. gentleman grants powers to these various colonization companies.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Why not?

Mr. BLAKE. Because the warrant is not wide enough. The hon. gentleman has not given us any information about the railway grants. What about them?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot speak exactly without the papers. Of course there is the statutory grant of 25,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Then there is a grant of 3,840 acres per mile to the Manitoba South-Western Railway. As soon as they can satisfy the Government that they can complete that road, they have the right to buy in advance the acreage for the first 50 miles. On finishing it they can purchase the same quantity of land at $1 an acre; the same for the second 50 miles, and so on as long as they build 50 miles annually. Then, in order to encourage the road to the Souris district, we have allowed an additional grant so as to make up the whole grant for that portion of the line, 6,400 acres.

Mr. BLAKE. For how many miles?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. About 300 miles.

Mr. BLAKE. And the rest?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. To the Rocky Mountains, perhaps. I am speaking from recollection, however, but the exact statement will be laid before the House. The Portage, Westbourne and North-Western is to have 3,840 acres from Portage la Prairie through Gladstone and Minnedosa to the Saskatchewan. The Souris Road has an Order in Council for 3,840 acres, and they claim the same right of 6,400 acres as the other line. There has been no Order in Council, but there was an understanding that they should be treated on the same terms as other roads. These are the only roads that have any claims at present. We have applications from two routes to Hudson's Bay, one by Nelson River and the other by

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Churchill. They are under consideration at the present time.

Mr. BLAKE. Does not the hon. gentleman think that it might be courteous to the House to allow us to see the Orders in Council he speaks of. The amounts are very large, and, I think, he might at least let us see them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has not moved for them.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not know that the grants were made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The grants were made in 1830. That was stated over and over again.

Mr. BLAKE. But about the doubling up? Perhaps the hon. gentleman will bring down without notice the various applications made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I see no objection.

Committee reported; and (at 12:40 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 12th April, 1832.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DOMINION LANDS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit to the House a resolution on the Government land policy in the North-West. I may say that I regret that circumstances compel me to move in the way I am about to do to-day. At an early date in the Session, returns were called for with reference to the land question. The information sought in these returns was necessary to an intelligent discussion of the question I am about to lay before the House. It was found it would be impossible to get these returns in full, and an attempt was then made to get the information in a summarized form. This information was promised from time to time, and fragmentary portions of it have been received, but owing to the delay in receiving it, the time has passed for putting a notice on the notice paper in the usual manner, and proceeding to the discussion of this question on that motion, and I am reduced to the necessity of moving, as I do to-day, in amendment to a motion for Committee of Supply. The question under discussion is one of very great importance to this country. We have in the North-West a vast region, the capabilities of which are just beginning to be fairly understood. We have in that country, Sir, a region of probably seven or eight hundred miles long by four or five hundred miles in width adapted for settlement and cultivation. It embraces two of the great river systems of this country, the Mackenzie River and the system flowing through Lake Winnipeg into Hudson's Bay. It has a chain of lakes almost equal in size and importance to the great chain of lakes upon our borders, between us and the United States. It is a country, Sir, which, as we become more intimately acquainted with its resources rises in our estimation. Its value is much greater than was supposed some years ago. As to the question of what population that country will support, I presume, from recent investigations, that we are justified in supposing the North-West will maintain a population of 25,000,000. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, the bearing of the management of that territory upon the question of our national development, upon the question of the ultimate power and position this country will obtain, is one of very great importance as compared with other public questions of the day. It overshadows in importance the question whether we have, by our Trade Policy, succeeded in adding a few thousand operatives to our population, whether we have added a few cotton mills to our industries, or whether our people pay 3, 5 or 10 per cent. more taxes than they did upon the various wares they buy. Of this country we may well say with the poet, Whittier:

"The rudiments of empire here are plastic yet and warm
And the fragments of a mighty State are rounding into form."

Well, Sir, the development of this country must be brought about, not by speculative movements, not by speculations in corner lots, or in town sites or in land even, but it must be brought about by the labors of the actual tiller of the soil. The country lying in its present state, a wilderness, is not an element of strength, not a source of power to Canada, and it can only become an element of strength, a source of power, when its soil is brought under cultivation, and that can only be done by the labor of the husbandman. Consequently, I hold that the interests of the settler, of the class that are to till the soil of the North-West, should be, in the estimation of the Government, paramount in importance to all other interests in treating this matter. The speculator will take care of himself. It is not necessary that the Government should look after the interests of the speculator or pay very great regard to his interests, but it is necessary to look after the interests of the settler. The operation of the speculator in many cases is not good for the country. At the present moment, I believe the speculative movement in the North-West is a source of danger, and at the best, Sir, the profits of the speculator in lands causes a loss to the yeoman. If the speculator invests in lands and sells at an advance to the settler, whatever the speculator may gain, that class who should be the first in the consideration of the Government and whose interests the Government should look after very carefully, will lose to that extent. My hon. friend the First Minister spoke of the state of things in the North-West as a "land craze." I think he very justly characterized the present movement. The speculative movement has reached very great development, and there is danger of its resulting in a mania similar to the South Sea mania, or the mania of speculation which brought about the prostration of credit in the United States in 1837. The indications now existing all point to such a danger. We have the city of Winnipeg filled with a horde of speculators; we have town sites advertised for sale in all parts of Manitoba and the North-West; we have anxious and feverish activity in those speculative ventures with fancy prices not based upon intrinsic value; and in all these the careful observer sees danger. It is in many respects like the land speculation in the United States, and it would, perhaps, be well to carefully state the facts in connection with that movement. In 1835 it commenced. The average sale of public lands each year, from 1796 to 1881, has been $2,400,000, but the speculative movement in 1835 ran the sales of that year up to $14,757,000. In 1836, the land sales amounted to $24,877,000. The East was flooded with lithographed maps of sites, of towns and of cities to be built at such places as the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi, and the junction of the Missouri and Mississippi, and of various streams of the West. Almost every place that could be pointed out on the map as a good geographical point was marked off as a town site, and town lots were sold even in swampy places where no building was then, and where no building has ever been. These sales amounted to enormous sums of money, and loans were actually made in the east upon the title to places of this character. For instance the site of the present city of Milwaukee, then a wilderness, was sold by its owner for a sum of money which he lost in less than three months in speculating in lands in the city which then had no existence. If we look the case carefully over I think we will find that the circumstances in the United States, and those in this country at this time, present the same features, and I have very great apprehensions that the result will be here as the result there was, a serious collapse of public and private credit, and the infliction of loss and injury upon the country. The effects already, of the removal of vast amounts of capital from Ontario to the North-West are being sensibly felt, and they will be more seriously felt in the course of a few months. The effects too of the migration of thousands and tens of thousands of the best class of the population of Ontario to the North-West are being sensibly felt. The value of property in the Province of Ontario is being depreciated, farms are being forced upon the market, causing a decline in prices, and there is no doubt that what will be a gain to Manitoba in this respect will be a loss to the other Provinces. I presume the Government will be disposed to claim that this speculative rush to the North-West is an indication of great prosperity, and that it is also an indication of wisdom on the part of the Government in the policy they have adopted with reference to this matter. I hold, on the contrary, that this high speculation, which threatens a speedy collapse, is largely promoted and fostered by the policy the Government have adopted, and that that policy will ultimately prove to have been most pernicious in the interest of the Dominion of Canada. The Government—and they will learn the truth of the assertion I am about to make—should avoid adopting a policy calculated to facilitate and promote the schemes and aims of the speculating class to the detriment of the honest and hardy yeomanry of this country. The aim of the Government should be not to secure large speculative sales of land, but to secure for the hardy sons of toil these wild lands, on which they will enter and commence cultivation. Its aim should be to foster and promote the interests of this country and let the speculators take care of themselves, and carefully hold themselves aloof from the promotion of all speculative movements. If this should be the policy of the Government, it then becomes a serious question for the Government to determine what shall be the degree of liberality that they shall exercise toward the settler in the inducements offered to him in order to get him to emigrate to the North-West. This question should be looked at from two stand-points. It should be looked at from the stand-point of what in itself per se is right and proper in the matter; and if the policy which the Government believes to be a just policy is calculated to secure settlement if no other obstacle is in the way. The next thing for the Government to consider is whether there is any competitor in the market seeking for emigration to settle its new lands, or if it is offering better terms than we are offering. The fact will confront the Government at this stage that there is a competitor for emigrants from Europe for its great waste of unoccupied lands, desiring to secure settlers upon these lands and pushing westward its settlements which has already reached far beyond the Mississippi. The Government will next enquire what are the inducements which this competing Government offers, and if the Government of Canada wishes to be a successful competitor reason will teach them at a glance that it will be at least necessary that they will offer equal inducements to those, and probably even greater, because the United States territory is more accessible. I hold that our policy hitherto has not been of such a character as to secure a large amount of immigration, because it has not been as liberal in its provisions as the policy of the United States. When the United States Census was taken early in 1880—almost two years ago—the Canadian population of the State of Minnesota was 29,631, and that of the Territory of Dakotah was 10,678, or a total Canadian population in that State and Territory of 40,309. If we add to this the number of those of English, Scotch and Irish nativity who had emigrated from Canada to these States, I have no doubt that the population drawn from Canada would exceed 50,000 souls. One year later our own Census was taken, and that Census gives a population in Manitoba of 65,000. I presume to say that one year later the Canadian population of Dakota and Minnesota was at least equal to the total population of the Province of Manitoba. This shows, I think, conclusively that the United States had offered superior inducements, and through the operation of these superior inducements they had secured a much greater volume of immigration than we had. I propose to examine briefly what these superior inducements are, and why it is that the United States land regulations are preferred to our own. In the first place, all unappropriated lands in the country are open to homestead and pre-emption. There is no exception to this rule. There is no certain number of sections or townships set apart for special purposes, but wherever the settler can find suitable land he can homestead and pre-empt upon it. Then, in the United States outside of the railway belt, public lands are sold at $1.25 per acre uniformly, and in all parts of the country. While in our own case, outside of the railway belt south of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we sell our land at $2.50 per acre, or twice the price, and north of the railway belt at $2 per acre, or 75 cents per acre higher than the Government of the United States charges the settler or investor. Then in the United States they adopt a very liberal provision with regard to timber culture, by which upon the planting of ten acres of timber the settler secures a grant of 160 acres of Government land, and above all other things the United States Government makes no discrimination in favor of great landed proprietors. They never adopted a policy by which land can be purchased and held by the payment of one-tenth down, nor by the operation of which colonization companies, and speculators can secure large blocks of townships and exclude the actual settler from those blocks unless the lands are purchased upon their own terms. So much for the superior inducements offered by the United States. Just so long as that country continues to offer superior inducements, just so long as the settler can secure a grant wherever he can find unappropriated land for a homestead, just so long as he can buy land at one-half the price, just so long as the Government fosters speculators and shows more regard for corporations speculating in large tracts than it does for the actual settler, just so long the United States will secure the fullest share of emigration from the old world, and will secure a larger proportion of that from the older Provinces going to the West. A few words with reference to the past policy pursued by the hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury benches with regard to its land regulations. One thing in reference to that policy which must strike almost every observer at a glance is its vacillating character. This in itself would have worked serious injury to the interests of the country. In July, 1879, my hon. friend the hon. the First Minister issued a set of land regulations which were to come into force on 1st August. These land regulations were allowed to remain in force for two and a-half months, at the expiration of which time the criticisms of the most powerful newspaper in this Dominion, fairly compelled the right hon. gentleman to change the features of his land regulations, and on the 14th October we had another set of regulations introduced. These regulations continued in operation until 25th May, 1881, when we had another set of regulations introduced. These regulations were allowed to remain in force seven months, and on 23rd December last another set was introduced. How long these will be allowed to remain in operation, time will show, but in the ordinary course of events, after being modified by Orders in Council from week to week, and after existing for a few months, we shall have an entirely new set of regulations. With respect to the set of regulations of July 9th, coming into force on 1st August, 1879, by these regulations a supposed line on the Canadian Pacific Railway was laid down and five belts were laid out on each side of the line. The first belt A was five miles wide, the second fifteen miles wide, the third twenty miles wide, the fourth twenty miles wide, the fifth fifty miles wide, or in the five belts 110 miles on each side, or a tract of 220 miles on both sides of the assumed line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Homestead and pre-emption entries were not allowed at all in belt A, the first of these belts. In that respect the policy of the Government was different from that of the United States, which allowed homestead entries in all belts, whether in the railway belt or outside of it. In the second place, the Government restricted homesteads to eighty acres each, and pre-emption to eighty acres, outside of belt A. The settler would pass through the United States, where he could obtain a homestead entry of 160 acres, whereas in the North-West, where the inducements are less and the distance greater, he could only obtain one-half as large a tract as in the United States. The inducements were not very great, and settlers did not flow in very readily, and the criticisms of the great journal to which I have referred, compelled the Government, in two months and a-half, to change their policy and issue a new set of regulations. Then, by the regulations adopted in this country, only eight sections in each township of thirty-six were set apart for homestead entries or pre-emption, and, in that respect, as I pointed out a few moments ago, the policy of the Government was less liberal than that of the United States, and continues to be less liberal. Then, the price charged for pre-emptions in belts B and C, under these regulations, was $2.50 per acre, while in the United States the price charged for pre-emption entries similarly situated was $1.25 per acre. In belt D the price was $2 while in the United States it was $1.25. So, wherever a comparison was instituted by the settler between the policy of the right hon. gentleman, with respect to homesteads, in size, price, or location, and that of the United States, it was unfavorable to Canada, and would be calculated to divert immigration from the North-West. In addition to this feature, the right hon. gentleman introduced another and a still more pernicious feature—the system of credit sales. He offered land on credit, a payment of one-tenth down being required, and the balance in nine equal annual instalments. In the fifty mile belt, speculators, by paying 10 cents per acre, could secure control of the land. It was a magnificent opportunity when $100 would secure 1,000 acres, and it was an opportunity of which speculators availed themselves with avidity. It was an opportunity which, whatever its advantages might be to speculators, was sure to work lasting injury to the country and to the interests of those who wished to till the soil. The effect of this policy, as I pointed out a few moments ago, was plainly visible in the Census returns of the two countries. The 14th of October came and we had another set of regulations, and those regulations made the terms of homesteading somewhat more liberal, very much more liberal as regards the quantity of land. They allowed the homesteader to enter for 160 acres, and allowed him to pre-empt another 160 acres. They also opened belt A to the operation of the homestead and pre-emption law, but they did not increase the area in each township allowed to be homesteaded and pre-empted, nor did they remove the discrepancy in price between the pre-emption entry in Canada and the United States; and the regulations also continued the pernicious system of credit sales, and in these three respects the position of Canada as a field for immigration was much less favorable than the United States. These regulations remained in force until the 25th of May, 1881. In the meantime we had consummated an arrangement; a bargain which, I fear, will not cover hon. gentlemen opposite with honor, and will not, I fear, bring upon them the blessings of posterity. We had, in the meantime, made arrangements by which it became no longer necessary to hold that reserve of 100,000,000 acres of land for the purposes of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We had made an arrangement by which we gave to a company, in completed road and surveys, a sum three-fifths as great as that which they were called upon to pay for the construction of the balance of the line; by which the company were given, in cash, one-half as much as the cost of the completed line; by which they were given a grant of land worth, according to the valuation of hon. gentlemen opposite, which is three-fifths of the rate at which the Syndicate are selling lands at the present time, one and a-half times the cost of the construction of the line. This favored company will receive two and a-half times the cost of constructing the line, besides the transportation monopoly and various other perquisites and privileges which made this, I was going to say, the greatest railway swindle of the age—but I will not say that—but made it a very soft thing for the gentlemen who made this bargain with the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. This arrangement having been made, it became necessary, of course, to adopt new regulations, and these were passed on 25th May, 1881. By these regulations belts were laid off on each side of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and projected branches, twenty-four miles in width. In those belts alternate sections were granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. In the alternate sections not granted to the Railway Company, the same conditions as regards homesteads and pre-emptions, were observed as under the former regulations: 160 acres for homestead and 160 acres for pre-emption claims were allowed, and the price of the pre-emption claims in the railway belt was fixed at $2.50 per acre, which was exactly equivalent to the price in the United States within railway belts. Outside of the railway belt eight-thirty-sixths of each township were for homesteads, and an equal quantity for pre-emption entries; and the price of the pre-emption land was $2 per acre, or 75 cents per acre higher than the corresponding lands in the United States. Under the two preceding regulations, Sir, we had the evil of credit sales and of violation, to a great extent, I believe, of the Statute with reference to the restriction of sales to 640 acres to each individual. We had, under the restrictions of the 25th of May, 1881, a new danger. Credit sales had ceased, and I presume the sales to speculators of any amounts greater than 640 acres, have ceased; but there is a new and dangerous feature in this system, a feature characterized as colonization schemes, but a plan which should be characterized as one that facilitates the creation of great estates; a plan for robbing the poor for the benefit of the rich; a plan for depriving the settler of the opportunity of purchasing his land at first cost in order that speculators and landsharks might compel him to pay such a price as they might be able to squeeze from him. The chief outlines of this scheme were as follows: In the first place, it was necessary to obtain the Government's consent to the purchase of lands without limit as to quantity. If the settler went to the Land Office to purchase one acre or a quarter-section, he would be charged the full price, but the speculator goes there and makes his bargain with the Government. He says: "I want this block of ten or fifteen or twenty townships on the terms which you have been gracious enough to accord to us, viz., at half the price you would sell it to the hardy son of toil." The company binds itself to certain conditions. If these conditions were kept, at the end of five years the sale was consummated. If these conditions were not kept, then the Government might either cancel the sale or accept payment in full of regular price without interest. There was here a two-fold opportunity for corruption. There was the opportunity, first, in the granting of these colonization limits, and, secondly, in the power the Government reserved to either cancel the sales on failure to comply with the conditions or to continue them on—two very dangerous doors we had opened for the exercise of corrupt practices. The arrangement with reference to these lands was two-fold. The first referred to lands outside the twenty-four mile belt on either side of the main line or any branch line of the Pacific Railway. Under this arrangement the odd sections, except school sections 11 and 29 in each township, were sold at $1 an acre, there being 10,240 acres in each township. The conditions were that within three years two settlers should be placed on each odd-numbered section and two settlers on each even-numbered section. The law also permitted the colonization company to aid immigrants or settlers on homesteads to the extent of $500 each, and take a mortgage on the homestead claim at 6 per cent. interest. This was calculated to facilitate the operation of the colonization companies in enabling them to get one-half the number of settlers required without the outlay of any money that they would not be sure to be reimbursed for. The settlers, I take it, on the even-numbered sections might be purchasers to any extent. The purchaser of a forty-acre lot would be a settler; so would the purchaser of an eighty-acre lot. They might even be tenants, as I presume a tenant on the lands would be, within the meaning of the law, a settler. Now, the result under this plan would be that the cost to the company would be at the rate of $10,240 per township. If the colonization companies sold to thirty-two settlers eighty acres at $2 per acre, the amount would be $5,120, which would leave 7,120 acres in each township, costing the company $5,120, or 72 cents per acre. Or the colonization company might sell 5,120 acres at $2 per acre, and they would retain 5,120 acres of land free of cost, and if the land was sold to the settler at more than $2 per acre, as is not only highly probable but morally certain, the gains of the company would be proportionately greater. The settlers on the even sections might be tenants, and in that case the company would have 10,240 acres in each township at a cost of $10,240. Now, under this plan No. 1 of this colonization scheme, the advantages were entirely in the hands of the colonization company. The Government took the public lands in these townships which it was natural to suppose the settlers of the country would ultimately want, because the scheme contemplates the introducing of settlers; but under the operations of these colonization companies the lands were taken which these settlers would ultimately want, or presumably want in a very few years, and placed in the hands of colonization companies at half price, the settler being left at the mercy of the company, who would ask and exact such prices from him as it might be able to obtain, and what the Government should have done was to have kept the land in its own hands, itself acting in the capacity of a colonization company, ready and anxious to sell the lands to actual settlers at a fair price, and allow no middlemen to intervene between itself and the ultimate cultivator of the soil. There was another plan in this colonization scheme in these regulations. Either the colonization company might buy land outside the railway belt, or, as the regulations provide, they might take from the settler the lands set apart by Statute for pre-emption within the railway belt. The Government would sell to the company 5,120 acres of land in each township or eight sections that the law provided should be set apart for pre-emption, thus depriving the settler of an opportunity of pre-empting any claim whatever in blocks of townships of that character. Under this arrangement if the company within five years placed thirty-two settlers on its own lands and thirty-two settlers upon the homestead reserves, they obtained the land at $1.25 per acre, that being one half the price within the railway belt. Here again the law permitted the company to make advances to homestead settlers of $500 each and take mortgages on the homesteads. The possible result of this scheme might be as follows: that allowing thirty-two settlers had eighty acres each at the Government price of $2.50 per acre, the amount would be $6,400, the company receiving $6,240, the sum it paid for the whole, and retaining 2,560 acres free of cost in each township. Or if more than $2.50 per acre were charged to the settlers, the gains of the colonization company would be proportionately greater; or the company might place tenants on this land, and might get the whole of these 5,120 acres at $1.25 per acre, or $6,400 for all the pre-emption lands in the township, and in case of failure to carry out the conditions, the company might pay the other half at the expiration of three years, without interest. That is, if the company failed to introduce one single homestead settler or one settler on its own lands during the term the scheme ran, then, at the expiration of that period, it would pay the full price and retain the land; and no doubt, in many cases, colonization companies would prefer to take that course. So much, Mr. Speaker, for the character of the land regulations and the land policy of my hon. friends in the past. I do not wish to deal with this matter at very great length; I merely desire to give a brief of resumé of the course pursued by hon. gentlemen up to the time the last regulations were issued; and before entering upon the consideration of the present land regulations, I wish to call the attention of my right hon. friend to some calculations—I am quite willing to believe they were not his own, although he assumed the responsibility for them—which he presented to the House two years ago, with reference to the probable amount of the future land sales and the influx of immigrants into the North-West. In the course of a speech delivered by my right hon. friend on the 5th of April, 1880, he estimated that the cost of surveys in that country for the next eleven years would be $2,000,000, and the cost of management of the Land Department, $400,000. Well, Sir, I find that the sum expended on surveys in 1880 and 1881 was $177,321, and that was just the beginning of the work; the estimated expenditure for 1881-82 was $300,000, and for 1882-83 it is $450,000; making a total for the four years of $1,227,000, with the certainty that this expenditure will largely increase from year to year in the future. The estimated expenditure for the management of the Land Department for 1881-82 was $70,466, and, for 1882-83, $99,600, making a total of $170,000 for the two years; and I am afraid that at this rate it will largely exceed the hon. gentleman's estimate of $400,000 for eleven years. The hon. gentleman estimated that the land sales up to 1890 would amount to $71,000,000. This was based on the reservation of 100,000,000 acres for railway purposes. One-fourth of that quantity has been granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; and if I deduct one-fourth of one-half of the $71,000,000 from that amount, the balance of the hon. gentleman's estimate for the period will be $62,000,000. Well, Sir, I find from returns which I have received from the Department, that our total sales in cash and scrip, for the eleven years and a-half, from July 1st, 1872, to January 1st, 1882, amounted to $972,835; that the amount due upon time sales on the 1st of January last was $647,777; and that the amount due on pre-emption sales on the 1st January last was $1,942,988; making a total in the eleven years and a-half of credit sales, pre-emption sales, cash sales, and sales for scrip, of $3,563,600. The other calculations of the right hon. gentleman were equally widely astray. He estimates that the sales of lands for 1880, apart from homesteads and railway lands, would amount to $1,440,000, and by a ratio of increase which he gave us, that the sales for 1881 would amount to $1,725,000; yet we find that the sales for 1881 amounted to $191,626. He also estimated that 3,000 homesteads would be granted each year—and he comes nearer in that estimate to the truth than in other cases, because the actual number granted last year was 1,754, a little over one-half what he estimated. It may be pertinent to the question at this stage to make a few remarks with regard to the report which the hon. gentleman laid on the Table a few days ago. That report is singularly deficient in statistical information; all the statistics contained in it could easily be placed on one page; but so as to pad it out and to make it a volume of the size it is—and it is a very small volume at that—field notes were thrown in extensively; nine-tenths of the report consists of surveyors' field notes. Well, they may possess considerable value, but the information given in them might be placed in a more condensed form. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, if he will permit the suggestion, that we ought to have in this report the following information for each year since the North-West was acquired: A statement of the total number of homestead entries in each year, the total number of pre-emption entries, the receipts in detail, the number of acres surveyed, the cost of surveys, the cost of the Land Department, land offices, and various incidental expenses, the timber licenses granted and the revenue from the royalty on timber, the pasture leases granted, the colonization plans and the revenue from such, and the amounts outstanding from the sales of land. I think if the hon. gentleman will give us a report in each year embracing the information to which I have briefly alluded, it will make the report valuable to the country and interesting to the House, and this can easily be done. It is well known to all heads of Departments that the character of our reports is such that they will admit of great improvement, and they would not then be in a condition of perfection. Now, Sir, I come to the consideration of the present land regulations, and with regard to these regulations, Mr. Speaker, we can only judge as to their character by the regulations which I hold in my hands. The right hon. gentleman informed us last night that a set of agreements had been prepared—I think he told us—which made these regulations very stringent. Well, there may be conditions in these agreements which may somewhat alter the character of the regulations, as they appear on the surface; but in the consideration of this matter, I shall be governed by the language employed in these regulations. The conditions which are set forth in these regulations, I shall assume are the conditions which are in force, whatever qualifications may be made by these papers which are to be brought down. Under these regulations, Mr. Speaker, the public lands in the North-West are divided into four classes—classes A, B, C, and D. Class A consists of the lands within twenty-four miles of the Canadian Pacific Road, or of any of its branches. Class B consists of lands within twelve miles of any projected line recognized by the Governor in Council, other than the Canadian Pacific line, or its branches. Class C consists of all lands south of the main line of the Canadian Pacific road, not embraced in classes A and B. Class D consists of all lands north of the main line of the Canadian Pacific road, not embraced in classes A and B. As before, pre-emptions and homestead entries are permitted in sixteen sections out of the 36 sections in these townships; that is, eight sections are devoted to homestead entries and eight to pre-emptions. The lands in class C, that is outside of the railway belt, south of the Canadian Pacific Railway, are held at $2.50 per acre, double the price at which pre-emption entries are held in the United States where pre-emption lands of similar situation are held at $1.25 an acre. The lands in class D are held at 75 cents an acre higher than pre-emption claims in corresponding localities in the United States, and the disparity of price in these public lands is the same. Public lands are sold to actual settlers in class C at double the price which is asked for relative situations in the United States, and the public lands in class D are sold to actual settlers at 75 cents an acre higher than the prices of public lands in relatively the same situations in the United States. Sir, in addition to this restricted area which is set apart for homesteads and pre-emptions, we have under these regulations a rule for colonization schemes, which will give to speculators, at one-half the price, all lands that are reserved for homesteads and pre-emptions in this great region, which is embraced in Class D. By colonization plan No. 2, I repeat, that all lands in Class D, which covers more than one-half of the public domain of the North-West, may be retired from the market and placed in the hands of speculators; while homestead settlers and pre-emption settlers are excluded entirely from this vast region. And, Sir, upon the whim of the Minister, homestead lands and pre-emption lands may be withdrawn from entry and put up at auction sale, under section 2, sub-section C, of these land regulations. Now, here are two plans, by which the interests of the homestead settler and the interests of the man who wishes to make a pre-emption entry, are placed at the mercy of one man—at the mercy of the hon. the Minister of the Interior. The hon. the Minister of the Interior may give up the whole of that region to the operation of these pernicious colonization schemes, or he may withdraw the homestead lands and pre-emption lands in the whole of this belt D, from settlement and entry, and put these lands up for sale at auction. I hold, Sir, that the placing in the hands of any one man a power as great as this, is an act fraught with danger to the interests of this country. I hold, Sir, that no man should be invested with a power so despotic—powers that may be used to the injury of the great mass of the people of Canada in the manner in which these powers may be used; and with regard, Sir, to the authority for this scheme of colonization—the authority under which it is proposed to place millions upon millions of acres of land in the hands of speculators—the authority under which the whole of the public domain of the North-West outside of the railway belt may pass away for ever from the operations of a settlement policy conceived in the interest of the landless and those who are to become settlers—I say, Sir, the legislation upon which this vast policy rests, it seems to me is entirely insufficient. The little clause in this Bill upon which this policy is predicated, Sir, is as follows:—

“Provided that no purchase shall be permitted at a less price than $1 an acre; provided also that except in special cases, where otherwise ordered by the Governor in Council, no sale to one person shall exceed a section of 640 acres. Sect. 21.”

Well, Sir, are these special cases? Are these the exceptional cases? Are these the insulated cases, where sales of more than 640 acres are to be permitted—cases that are to cover the whole country—cases that are to sweep away from the possession of the settler and the landless, not an isolated tract here and there, but the whole of belt D possibly, and all lands outside of the belt of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I hold that the assumption based on this little clause is a monstrous one, and that the policy of the Government in this respect is one pernicious in its character, and one not warranted by the character of the legislation which is contained in that Bill. Well, Sir, what are these plans? What are the features of this plan No. 1, and of this plan No. 2, contained in those regulations, by which the settler may be defrauded of his right; by which corporations may be invested with dukedoms and kingdoms; and by which the manipulations and operations of speculators may be made the curse of the whole of this vast region in future years? Here is plan No. 1. I understand that it is the popular plan at present, simply because it requires a very small payment in cash, a payment of one-fifth down, and the balance to be paid in four equal annual instalments; and as it is provided that interest, at the rate of 6 per cent., is to be charged upon past due instalments, it is to be supposed that no very serious consequences will ensue if the speculators allow their payments to fall into arrear. Here is the plan—lands may be granted under this plan in belt D, and there is no restriction as to area. It may consist of lots and it may consist of townships. It is left entirely within the discretion of the hon. gentleman whether four townships, or ten, or thirty or forty townships are granted. He may, if he chooses, give to his favorites one-half of that great region, there is no restriction whatever; the grants are to be made in belt D and the price is to be $2 an acre, and the payments, one-fifth down, or 40 cents an acre, and then the balance in equal annual instalments during four years without interest. The requirements of the scheme are as follows: the party purchasing the land is to place in each township thirty-two settlers on homesteads, and is allowed, as in previous cases, to advance $500 to each settler and take a mortgage on his claim at 6 per cent. interest; thirty-two settlers are to be placed on Government lands, two on each section, making in all sixty-four settlers, which the company has to place in each township, and upon which they are to receive a rebate of one-half the purchase price, or $1 an acre, leaving the net cost of the land at $1 an acre. The time they have to fulfil these conditions is five years, and in each year upon the placing of a settler in this township they receive a rebate of $120. Year after year as they place settlers, they receive at the expiration of the year a rebate of $120 for each settler. At the expiration of the time, if the full number of settlers are there, they receive the full rebate of one-half; but if the full number is not settled they receive in the same proportion as if they were. They are to receive a rebate of $160 for each settler, but it is provided my hon. friend may say that unless they fulfill the conditions contained in this colonization plan of placing sixty-four settlers in each township their rights may be declared forfeited and the land taken from them. The right hon. the leader of the Government said, last night, however, that the forfeiture condition was of very small consequence. I presume it is. I imagine that the cases where rights of colonization companies will be declared forfeited, in consequence of their not having fulfilled the conditions of this agreement, will be exceedingly rare. But there is a bad feature here. It strikes me it is a dangerous power to place in the hands of a Minister of the Crown, to say of a company whether their rights, involving possibly hundreds of thousands of dollars, shall be forfeited or not. It strikes me that, under such circumstances, there is a chance of introducing those influences which it was charged a few years ago, were used with Judges in the city of New York. I recollect reading of a case where a suitor, who was extremely anxious as to the result of a suit, in the course of adjudication had called upon one of the Judges. He had heard that Judges in New York were open to corrupt influences, and was a little doubtful whether in this particular case it would be safe to assume that was the case. After some conversation he said hesitatingly and fearfully: “I suppose, your Honor, it would not answer for me to make any suggestion as to compensation, or any thing of that kind in this matter?” The Judge said: “The sooner you get rid, my friend, of scruples of that character the more likely you will be to win your case in Court.” There is danger in a matter of this kind when one man has power to declare whether rights will be forfeited or not, of corrupt practices being used.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I call my hon. friend's attention to sub-section B, of section 10, of the regulations:

“But if it should be found that the full number of settlers required by these regulations are not on the tract, or are not placed on in conformity with sub-section B of clause 9 of those regulations, then for each settler fewer than the required number, or not placed in conformity with the said sub-section, the party shall forfeit one hundred and sixty dollars of rebate."

Mr. CHARLTON. I am discussing, at present, the colonization plan No. 1, and I am dwelling upon section 10, sub-section C, which reads as follows:—

"If at any time during the existence of the contract the party shall have failed to perform any of the conditions thereof, the Governor in Council may cancel the sale of the land purchased by it, and deal with the party as may seem meet under the circumstances."

The hon. gentleman will recollect that last night he told us the forfeiture conditions were of very little consequence. I imagine it will be found they are of very little consequence under that sub-section which gives permissive power, and does not make it mandatory upon the Minister, I hold the door is opened for corruption, and that these regulations should say definitely what should be the duty of the Minister, and that there should be no choice in the premises left to him. Now, I come to deal with the possible results. Of course, speculators will examine carefully these regulations, and calculate what may be done under this or that condition of things, and what possible results they may be able to attain. Let us look into that question for a few moments. If sixty-four settlers are placed in each township, the company acquire their 10,240 acres of land for $10,240. That, then, is the inducement to fulfil the condition of placing the full number of settlers there. Now, if they sell to thirty-two settlers 160 acres each, at $2 an acre, they receive the amount of their investment, $10,240, leaving them 5,180 acres free of cost. But if they sell to that number of settlers 80 acres each at $2 per acre, it leaves them 7,680 acres, costing $5,120, or 72 cents per acre. If they sell to thirty settlers 40 acres each, at the Government price of $2, it leaves them 9,680 acres, costing $7,680, or 85 cents an acre. If, however, they should sell, as it is highly probable they will, land at, at least, $4 an acre—I understand the Canadian Pacific Railway is selling lands at $5 an acre—they will have, after selling to thirty-two settlers 160 acres each, at $4 an acre or $20,480, will have remaining one half the lands of the Townships and $10,140 besides. Should they sell thirty-two lots of eighty acres each at $4 each, $10,240, they will have remaining three quarters of the land of the township free of cost. Should they dispose of thirty-two plots of forty acres each to thirty-two settlers at $4 an acre, which will give them $5,120, they will still have left 8,960 acres, or they will have seven-eighths of the lands at a cost of 57 cents per acre. But they may place thirty-two tenants upon their own lands, and if these are to be considered settlers, they get their 10,240 acres at $1 an acre. These regulations provide that a company shall have the privilege of obtaining all pre-emptions in townships upon certain conditions. The homesteads settlers may, through advances or otherwise, be placed somewhat under the influence of the company, and if they fail to have their pre-emptions entered within three months of the time of their failure to secure their rights in that respect, these corporations may step in and grab every pre-emption claim in the township. It is a beautiful arrangement in the interests of the speculators. I think my hon. friend in making this arrangement must have been aided by suggestions from hon. gentlemen who well understood how to manipulate matters of these land speculations, and make a handsome investment with their money. This colonization plan No. 2 founded upon that little three line clause, in this Bill, for exceptional occasions in which sales of more than 640 acres may be made, is held to enable the right hon. Minister to take himself authority to alienate to speculators the whole of the land in belt D. By this plan all lands in townships, except those reserved for Hudson's Bay, or for school purposes, may be sold to a company. A company may buy all public lands, all homesteads, all pre-emption claims, in a township, and make a sweep of the whole thing, except four sections reserved for the Hudson's Bay Company and for school purposes, and these purchases may be made in unlimited quantities; they may extend over the whole of belt D, which embraces half of the North-West Under that three line clause the First Minister has the power to deprive the settler, in the whole of this section, of his right to homestead and pre-emption, and to pass the whole of that vast region over to the speculators. It is a monstrous plan and it strikes me as most singular that hon. gentlemen opposite are so unfortunate in the policy they adopt. What necessity is there for them to adopt a plan like this, which is sure to be so unpopular, which is sure to work such injury to the country, and which can do no good to themselves as a party or as individuals? Well, Sir, the company having bought the lands under this scheme at $2 per acre, is allowed a rebate of $120 for every settler it places on the tract. It has a period of five years to place the settlers within these townships. At the expiration of five years, if it has placed 128 settlers in each one of these townships, where it has the whole land, homestead and pre-emption, it then has a rebate of one-half the purchase money it has paid and gets the land at the net price of $1 per acre. But I do not notice here any stipulation as to the number of acres that each one of these settlers shall occupy. I do not notice any stipulations as to the location on which the settlers shall be placed. It does not say they shall be placed on alternate sections, that they shall have 160 acres each. They may all be placed in one corner of the township. A blacksmith may buy one acre and be counted a settler, and the laborer who goes there and cultivates two or three acres of land given to him by this monopoly is a settler. The settler who goes there and buys forty acres is a settler. They may complete the conditions of this bond; they may place there 128 settlers in each township, and these settlers may not occupy eight sections of land. These settlers may be so placed in the township as to give to the speculative company three-fourths of the land in that township in one continuous body. Well, let us see now this thing, to use a slang expression, will pan out—this rich thing; and the only reason that people are not availing themselves of this plan in preference to the other is that it requires a little larger outlay of money at the start. Under plan No. 1, the Company gets possession of the land at 40 cents an acre; under plan No. 2 at $2 per acre. But in the event of having to deal with the settler it is a much better plan than the other. Ultimately the result will be more advantageous to the protégés of my hon. friend, the speculators. Let us see how it will work. If eight sections in each township are sold to settlers in forty-acre lots, at $2 per acre, the company receives for the sale $10,240; it gets in rebate for the 128 settlers at the expiration of five years, $30,480. The result is it obtains 15,360 acres for $10,240, or 67 cents per acre; but if it sells to the 128 settlers, in eighty acre lots making sixteen Sections, at $2 per acre, the Government price, the result is it gets from the amount of sale and the rebate, at the expiration of five years, $40,968. It retains 10,240 acres of land, costing it nothing except the cost of surveys, 5 cents an acre. But if it sells 128 forty acre lots at $4 per acre, which is more likely to be the case, it receives $20,480, and retains 15,360 acres, or three-fourths of the tract free of cost. It receives in rebate and in money received for one-quarter of the tract sold, the sum the whole tract cost. But if it sells 128 eighty-acre lots to the 128 settlers at $4 an acre, it receives $40,960 in money and $20,480 in rebate for half the tract, leaving $20,480 in cash at the expiration of five years, and 10,240 acres of land. Well, Sir, if the company sells its lands at $2 an acre, the profits are 100 per cent; if it sells the land at $3 per acre, the profits are 200 per cent; if it sells at $4 per acre, they are 300 per cent; if it sells at $5 per acre, the profits in the transaction are 400 per cent. This matter may be arranged so as to sell half the land in each township and leave a block amounting to over 40,000 acres in one solid block taken out of a block of four townships. We were told last night by the hon. gentleman—at least I understood him to say—that the grants made already cover some 7,000,000 of acres. I understand that the applications made would cover the country twice over and would reach from the Red River to the Rocky Mountains and back again. I would like to inquire of the hon. gentleman whether he is leaving a neutral zone between the Licensed Victuallers' grant and the Temperance Colonization grant.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. For my hon. friend's occupation.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I am afraid there will be future difficulty.

Mr. MILLS. That is for the police to look after.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I am happy we have been able to learn as much as we have with regard to the amount of land granted and with regard to the number of applications. I have heard rumors floating around the Department that there were a vast number of them, heard, some days ago that over 300 had been made. I do not know, but I have been led to suspect that the hon. gentleman's supporters behind him were some of them, figuring in these transactions, and I am afraid it will give rise to reports floating around the country that political influence had been sold by gentlemen whose votes are essential to hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, in the promotion of this scheme. I am very much afraid of it. Of course, I would not imagine for a moment the thing was possible—I do not assert it is possible; but I am afraid the character of the hon. gentleman will suffer by the circulation of reports of that kind in the country where their probity and honor are not as well known as they are here.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who circulates the reports? The hon. gentlemen?

Mr. CHARLTON. No; I say that I fear such reports will go into circulation and obtain credence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who starts the reports? Is it the hon. gentleman?

Mr. CHARLTON. I may remind the right hon. gentleman that the eyes of the whole country are upon him. The people are aware of the fact that there is a great rush of speculators to the North-West, they are aware of the fact that the supporters of the Government have already had some influence on former occasions in matters of this kind, and there is danger that these reports may obtain circulation and credence. Well, Mr. Speaker, the objections to these two plans may be very briefly stated. Plan No 1 deprives the settler of the chance to purchase any land except pre-emption at Government prices. It deprives the settler, I repeat, of all chance to purchase any public land at Government prices, the only lands he can purchase are pre-emptions; all the other public land in the country is granted to these companies, it passes into the hands of speculators whose interest is to obtain the utmost farthing they can, and they will do it. That is, in a word, the objection to plan No. 1, a plan conceived, not in the interest of the masses, but in the interest of the few. The objections to plan No. 2 are still more serious. It sweeps away the homesteads, it sweeps away the pre-emption claim, it sweeps away the public land, it sweeps into the remorseless maw of these colonization schemes the whole public domain. It leaves the settler no foothold, no pre-emption, no homestead, no possibility of his buying of this paternal Government, one foot of the public land at the regular Government price. As I have said before, applications cover the whole country twice over. The hon.

gentleman has acknowledged that he has alienated 7,000,000 acres of the public domain for the benefit of speculators and to the injury of the people who are ultimately to fill up the land. He has been remiss in his duty. He has forgotten the millions in remembering the interest of the few who come here to seek favors from him and perhaps promise him their support. What are the consequences to follow this? The settlers are obliged to buy the lands from speculators perfectly remorseless, whose sole and only object is to make money.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend may laugh, but I do not imagine that these men are actuated by any philanthropic motives in the investments they are making. Their desire is to place money in their own pockets, and they are going to adopt the course that will best lead to that result without reference to the wishes or interests of others than themselves. Then, Sir, another objection to plan No 2, is that it offers great facilities for creating great estates. As I pointed out, the conditions of this land grant may be complied with, by placing 128 settlers in one corner of the township, and that secured, the company retains three-quarters of the land in the township in one body. It offers the best possible advantages for the creation of great landed estates in the North-West, and our hon. friends opposite seem to display a great degree of anxiety to create an aristocracy in this country. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance justifies his policy of taxation that builds up monopolies in this country, by broadly asserting that it is a fine thing for the country to have the wealth of the country in the hands of a few, who may live in large houses, keep fast horses, and fancy dogs, and allow the masses of the people to remain poor in order to benefit a few great men. My right hon. friend, a few nights ago, spoke of the creation of great landed estates and enormous farms as something to be desired. He said that on such farms we could have the advantage of maintaining the best kind of agricultural implements and keeping the choicest stock, that we could have the lordly owner riding in his carriage and his sons mounted on blood horses.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who said that?

Mr. CHARLTON. My right hon. friend.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes. A few days ago.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. My right hon. friend, speaking of the great wheat farms in Dakota, said it would be a great blessing to have a policy that would lead to the establishment of great estates, thousands and thousands of acres farmed in one body, and thus we would have the best kind of agricultural development, and expensive processes of enriching the soil, expensive machinery and everything of that kind. But did it ever occur to my right hon. friend that the reverse of that picture might have some attractions to present—that the placing of thousands of freeholders on small holdings would be more conducive to national strength and national growth than the gathering together of nabobs holding great landed estates. I think it would be better for the country to adopt a policy that would foster the creation of small freeholds, rather than enormous estates such as those which plan No. 2 is calculated to create. Then, Sir, another feature I have to refer to is the remissness of the Government in posting these regulations. We have, first of all, the fitful vacillating character of these regulations, and that feature has been condemned in no uncertain tones in the west by the people who understand best the operation of this policy. The policy of my hon. friend has been condemned, and will be universally condemned in the west by the men who go there to make for themselves homes, and who seek to identify themselves and their posterity with the growth of that country. Not a man of the millions who will ultimately people that country but will curse the policy which has brought such evils. The Government has also been remiss in informing the people of the changes in their regulations, and the agents knowing nothing about them the lands are withheld for sale. What for? I understand very well the advantage to the speculator of withholding these lands from sale and tiring out the actual settler, who is without means and who cannot afford to dance attendance for weeks and months on the agents and finally leaves in disgust. But the speculator with thousands at stake can afford to wait. He can enter into collusion with the authorities to procure delay and to drive from the country those who come there to settle, and who would interfere with his speculative investments. The true policy of the Government is to discourage speculation, to wash its hands of those men who seek to control tens of thousands of acres of the public domain for their own selfish purposes, who seek to get this land into their hands that they may charge the settler vastly more than they give the Government. The Government should allow no middlemen to come between itself and the men who are to till the soil. It should consider that domain a sacred heritage and itself the trustee charged with the management of the estate for the benefit of its wards, the people of the country. Its policy should be the greatest good to the greatest number. It should look to the future and strive to adopt a policy that will inure to the benefit of the millions of settlers, and not to establish a system that will result in the aggregation of vast fortunes in the possession of the few. There are other bad features in the Government land policy in addition to its provisions regarding colonization. In fact, Sir, the land policy of the Government abounds in bad features. We have the pasturage lease policy, a policy by which the Government is permitted to grant leases of great tracts of land, to the extent of 100,000 acres, to their favorites. And having granted these leases the Government has the power, at the mere whim or caprice of the hon. First Minister, to give two years' notice to terminate any of these leases. It can hold the rod over the leaseholder and compel him to become its supporter, and to do many things which a free man would not do. Then, with reference to the timber berths. The Government may let them without competition to its favorites. That is a bad policy, and a policy that every man should condemn. These franchises should be put up to public competition and sold to the highest bidder. There should be no hole and corner work, no dancing attendance in small cliques at the office door of my right hon. friend, seeking the favors which it is within his power to dispense under this policy. The door of corruption is opened wide, I do not say designedly, but is opened wide by the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Private members may lobby for the promotion of various claims, they may sell their influence to procure grants under colonization plans No. 1 and 2; they may themselves become members of colonization companies under either plan. The result is that a corrupt influence is brought to bear upon the Government. Then, Sir, they may sell their influence again in favor of companies regarding which the Government has to decide whether to cancel their claims, they having failed to fulfil their engagement, or to make them pay and allow them to retain their lands. Here are two doors open to corruption on the part of private members, and when the door is open there will surely be some person to enter. In the nature of things wherever corruption is invited corruption will exist. Then, Sir, corrupt influences may be brought to bear upon my right hon. friend to withdraw pre-emption and homestead lands, for settlement and advertize these lands for sale at auction. I can easily conceive of circumstances in which it may be in the interest of colonization companies to make bogus returns as to the number of settlers—to report that they have 128 settlers when they have not a dozen, or when perhaps not half of the number are actual bona fide settlers. Corrupt influences might be brought to bear in making false representations which would enable the company to get a rebate of $1 per acre when they are not entitled to it. I can imagine cases where corrupt influences might be brought to bear in procuring timber licenses without having those licenses properly put up to auction. I can imagine cases where corrupt influences might be brought to bear in procuring pasture leases, and coal and mineral leases, and these corrupt practices might be engaged in by private members who might be induced to sell their influence with the Government for corrupt purposes. My heart is filled with pain when I think of the temptations that my immaculate friend the hon. the Minister of Railways may be subjected to. My heart is pained when I think of the temptations that the hon. the First Minister may be subjected to. We have a prayer which implores, “lead us not into temptation.” The Government is adopting a policy that is certain to lead them into temptation, and unless Divine strength is accorded them to deliver them from evil, they will be almost certain to fall into it. It fills my heart with pain to think that they should be subjected to such great temptations as inevitably await them under this policy. Let us see what these temptations are. Suppose the agent of a company desiring to make an agreement under colonization plan No. 1, finds that the gentlemen on the Treasury benches are not favorable to his proposition. Is there not danger that the man might be disposed to offer a consideration for the allotment of a few townships? Is there not danger that, unless the hon. gentlemen were perfectly immaculate, some hon. Minister might accept a bribe of that kind? My hon. friend tosses his head, but I can tell him that corruption has existed in Governments before to-day, that corruption will be found in Governments after to-day, and that a policy such as this is calculated to produce corruption and the people of this country will condemn this policy simply because it invites corruption. We are all human, and this policy is excessively human. This corrupt influence might also be brought to bear by the speculator in inducing the withdrawal of lands from homestead or pre-emption, and having them placed in the market at auction, thus depriving the settler of his chances of making pre-emption and homestead entries. Suppose there is a block of townships, sixteen sections in which are open to homestead and pre-emption, and speculators are desirous that they shall be withdrawn by the hon. First Minister from actual settlement, is there no possibility of corruption? Is there not danger that a large sum might be offered for their retirement from homestead and pre-emption? There is, and it is wrong that such a power should exist with the Government. The same difficulty exists with regard to the provisions for timber leases and pasture leases. The door is open in every one of these cases, inviting the use of corrupt means for the purposes of speculators. I have seen about the Departments an unusual number of strange faces this winter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What were you there for?

Mr. CHARLTON. I was there, from time to time vainly seeking to get a summary of the information that the hon. gentleman promised to bring down before to the House, that would enable us intelligently to discuss this question. I was there in the prosecution of my duty as the representative of a constituency, looking after the interests of my constituents, and it was then that I saw the things I am about to speak of. I did not go there looking after the interests of any colonization schemes. I did not belong to the right side. I find in the lists of stockholders of these schemes the names of many political friends of the hon. gentleman. I have seen hundreds of strange faces about the Department, men gathered together in knots and groups, and men singly. The doors of the Minister's Department have been beset, and it was difficult to obtain an interview with the Secretary, much less with the Deputy Head or the Head of the Department. I do not know what they were doing there. I did not know but that some great public exigency had called these men to Ottawa, or that they were here from some patriotic motive, or in consequence of some great public danger. The lines of Whittier were suggested to my mind:

"Wherever outraged nature asks thought or action brave,
Wherever struggles labor, wherever groans a slave,
Wherever rise the people, wherever falls the wrong,
The bounding pulse of freedom's heart finds answer in his own."

I looked at those faces to see if they would fill the Bill, and thought they were not the men whom I would credit with possessing characteristics such as those. On the contrary, they were men who were evidently intent upon securing some gain for themselves, and it became evident to me that they were seeking favors in the way of colonization grants, and that their operations were facilitated and promoted by the regulations which my hon. friend has adopted, which permit chicanery and fraud, and political expediency to take away from the people what is their sacred heritage. We condemn the policy of the Government because it permits these varied influences to exist. We condemn the policy of the Government because it forgets that Canada is a free democratic land; because it favors the speculator, and seeks to give him land at half price; because it desires to create in Canada great landed estates; because it introduces, or seeks to introduce, the tenant system in Canada, because it would compel the bona fide tiller of the soil to pay vastly more for his acres than the Government receives, and because it loses sight of the future, and of the millions, and barter priceless inheritances and issues for the advantage of camp followers and gamblers. I beg to move the following resolution:—

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved,—That the present Land Regulations provide that odd-numbered sections in the Canadian North-West, outside of the Canadian Pacific Railway Belt, shall be open to sale without conditions of settlement.

That the so-called Colonization Plan No. 1, provides that parties may purchase large tracts of land on credit at $2 per acre, with a proviso for the rebate of one half of the price on certain conditions, thus reducing the cost to $1 per acre; or one half the price charged to individual settlers for their pre-emptions, or other purchases in odd sections.

That the so-called Colonization Plan No. 2 provides that parties may purchase large tracts embracing all the Government lands within their area (from which homestead and pre-emption settlers are thus to be excluded), paying $2 per acre, without any express conditions of forfeiture in case of non-settlement, and with the additional advantage of a large rebate, amounting under certain conditions to $1 per acre from the price, in case the purchasers choose to effect a so-called settlement within each township, but without any provision as to the acreage to be given, or the interest to be secured to each so-called settler.

That these regulations are calculated injuriously to affect the future of the country by facilitating the creation of large landed estates; by placing extensive areas of the choicest lands in the hands of speculators, who have favorable opportunities in securing them in anticipation of the settler, and who may hold them for a large advance to be paid by the ultimate settler, whereby the country will gain nothing in price, and will lose through the diminished ability of the settler to contribute to the public revenues.

That in the opinion of this House our aim should be to people the agricultural regions of the North-West with independent freeholders, each cultivating his own farm, and paying therefore no more than the public treasury receives; and that, save in the case of town plots, or other exceptional cases, the sale of North West Agricultural lands should as a rule be made to actual settlers only, on reasonable conditions of settlement, and in quantities limited to the area which can be reasonably occupied by a settler.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I regret for some reasons that my hon. friend should not have pursued the course which is usually followed, and given at least a day's notice of the motion he was about to make. If he had done so, I would have had the papers here to meet his elaborate arguments, if arguments were required. However, I think I can trust my memory generally to meet that portion of his speech which is at all relevant, and that portion I must say—and I leave it to the judgment of the House as to whether I am correct or not—is but a very small part of the long and able speech of my hon. friend. There was great deal of sack for a very little bread. My hon. friend commenced his speech with his usual power and his usual fluency, but he really forgot the place where he was speaking; he fancied there was a dissolution and that he was on the stump, addressing an audience far away from the centre of intelligence and information; and my hon. friend, from the beginning to the end of his speech, pursued the same course. He spoke about the possibility of corruption and the probability of corruption. The hon. gentleman said I may wash my hands, but there has been corruption and there was corruption. I thank the hon. gentleman for the implied compliment that there is not corruption. Perhaps in a change of events, perhaps as there was corruption and that not very long ago, the hon. gentleman hopes there may be an opportunity for corruption again; but the hon. gentleman has admitted that at present no charge of corruption can be brought against us. That language is unworthy of a member of Parliament; it is unworthy of a representative of the people, it is unworthy of a man who hopes and believes and expects to be the guiding-star of the country as a member of some future administration. Why, the Parliament of a country which has institutions like those of England should pay sufficient respect to the Government of the day to suppose it, unless there was a specific charge brought, to be incapable of corruption. If that principle is not laid down, Government is utterly impossible. Let the hon. gentleman bring a charge of corruption, let him rise in his place, if he dare, and state a single act, since this Government was formed, connected with the administration of land affairs in which we have not acted with the most perfect fairness and the utmost impartiality, and without asking what were the political proclivities or antecedents of any applicant for lands in the North-West. I defy the hon. gentleman to make the charge. I invite him to make the charge, and if he cannot make the charge, and if he does not make the charge I leave it to this House, and through the press to the country, to say whether the hon. gentleman was justified as a member of Parliament and as a representative of the people in using the language he has used. This much as regards his language about corruptors I challenge him, I invite him, I entreat him, to bring up any charge of any kind against the Department of which I am the head. It is quite open to him, and I admit it is the duty of every hon. member who does not approve of the policy of the Government, to attack it as severely as may be; but when he charges improper, sinister or clandestine motives, the hon. gentleman should be prepared to follow up his charge or to sit in his place ashamed and humiliated, and if he is not ashamed his friends who sit around him will be, if he does not follow up such language by a distinct allegation and distinct proof.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to disclaim having made any charge. I said the policy of the Government was open to the charge of permitting and inviting corruption. I made no charge of corruption.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is what I complain of. The hon. gentleman did not make the assertion, but he made the insinuation, which is much more mean than the distinct charge. But the hon. gentleman is not only afraid of corruption, but he is afraid of an influx of aristocrats; that this country is going to be ruled by bloated aristocrats and capitalists, and colonization companies were going to make immense fortunes out of the hardy sons of toil. The hon. gentleman introduced that expression three times; why did he not follow it up with the expression

"the horny-handed sons of toil?" Whether there is going to be a monopoly by the lands companies, by individuals or by railway companies, monopoly is all the same. The hon. gentleman must remember, as the country will remember, that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) introduced a Bill by which there would be any amount of railway lines running over the North-West, and the hon. gentleman—I cannot call him my friend after the language he has used to-day—was one of the strongest supporters of the measure, and he denounced small holdings and said it was absurd to suppose that a peddling policy would meet the case, but they must obtain large railway companies with large means to bring in settlers to the country. The hon. gentleman then was not afraid of a monopoly of railway companies, and he was not afraid of bloated aristocrats; the difference was that he had confidence in his own purity and in the purity of the Government he supported, and he has not the same confidence in those who sit on the Treasury benches with so much satisfaction to the majority of the House and equally so I believe to the people of the country. But the hon. gentleman was in favor of large grants to railway companies which were to be scattered broadcast over the North-West. Where, then, was the "horny-handed son of toil" to get his land? He was to go to the railway companies, to the middlemen, to the speculators, to those who had arranged to run railways east, west, north and south, and obtain land grants of millions of acres as in the United States, and he was to be compelled to go cap in hand to the middlemen according to the hon. gentleman's scheme. Just as the hon. gentleman varies from Free Trade to Protection and from Protection to Free Trade, he was a few years ago an aristocrat and a monopolist, now he is a democrat and a defender of the poor man. In the debate which took place in 1878 on the Manitoba Colonization Railway Bill, which was to give lands to everybody who chose to get up a bogus or paper charter—to use the hon. gentleman's expression—the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said:

"Some of the railways had perhaps been subsidized more than was necessary, perhaps more land had been given than was advisable, but capitalists would not embark their money unless they had a prospect of a fair return, and it was folly to haggle with them about an unimportant difference when important interests were at stake."

Again the hon. gentleman said:

"In the North-West they had lands which would give sufficient sustenance for fifteen or twenty millions of people; let them get inhabitants for them as soon as possible. If they could pour 50,000 a year into it, those settlers would pay into the coffers of this country, in the shape of Customs duties, £250,000 per annum, and the Government would derive a far greater revenue this way than from the sale of these lands."

The hon. gentleman was then looking at the matter through a pair of blue spectacles, but he now looks at it through a green—through a jaundiced pair of spectacles. I cannot understand why the hon. gentleman should descend to the vulgarity of charging or insinuating the possibility or the probability of corruption. Governments of the day are supposed to be pure; they are supposed to have the confidence of Parliament and of the people through their representatives, and as soon as they prove unworthy of that confidence they are removed. James IV of Scotland when he went down to the Borders, which was then occupied by a wild set of Lowland clans of raiders and foragers, came to a place where the Lowland chieftain had a castle built on an island in the middle of a lake. There was no means of getting at or taking the fortress, and the raider, the forager or plunderer was quite safe in the absence of artillery which prevailed in those days. The king's remark on seeing it—I do not apply it to the hon. gentleman, but perhaps he will appreciate its force—was: "The man who built that palace is a thief in his heart." The man who makes a charge of corruption, or an insinuation of corruption without being able to prove it, I leave it to this House to say whether he is not capable of corruption himself. But not only has the hon. gentleman distinguished himself as a democrat and a protector of the poor man—an anti-aristocrat and an anti-monopolist—but in the interests of the country, in the interests of pure morality, he plays the part of a detective. He says he went over to the office of the Interior and there he saw a number of men. He says he saw by their faces what they were—and what a heart a man must have who would use that expression with regard to a number of men he knew nothing about—he says he knew by their faces that the men who were hanging about there were there for corrupt purposes—for jobs, for speculations. The hon. gentleman is a physiognomist, but I tell my hon. friend that if every party will use the same skill in physiognomy that the hon. gentleman uses, then, perhaps, the hon. gentleman would not stand so great a chance of being a future Minister of the State. Then, too, Mr. Speaker, there has been favoritism, and hon. gentlemen sitting behind me have been induced to vote for me and my Government by clandestine methods, by giving improper grants; but I tell the hon. gentleman that the gentlemen who sit behind me were elected to support me in 1878 before any policy of this kind could even have been suggested, and they have been true to the pledges they made to their constituents—true to the pledges they made to the country, and I believe the country will sustain them as a body—sustain them individually and collectively. Whenever the appeal is made the country will say as they were elected to support the Government, they believe the present Government has so acted as to prove themselves worthy of that support and will send them back again to support the present Administration. Then the hon. gentleman supposes that these colonization companies are all formed of greedy men, selfish men, dishonest men; that they are formed for the purpose of robbing the immigrant; but Sir, they cannot be any worse than the railway companies which the hon. gentleman agreed to press into service, whom he thought should have large grants—who were not to be haggled with. We are not to consider, thought the hon. gentleman, whether we should give them four, or ten, or twenty townships—do not haggle with them, give them what they want; do not let us do business in a retail way, but let us do it wholesale. That was the policy of the hon. gentleman, but he supposes that every man who applies under a colonization system is a rogue in his heart; that he is a heartless man; that he wishes to rob the immigrant and cheat the settler. That is the statement of the hon. gentleman. I can tell the hon. gentleman that in the lists of those who have applied for colonization grants, there are men with whom he agrees politically, whom he supports politically, or has supported; there are men whose characters stand in such a way that the hon. gentleman would not dare, for his soul, to say that any one of them would be guilty of any such conduct as he has characterized them by. What does he say? He says that they are harpies; that that they are griping, grasping and grinding to death the poor settler. No language of opprobrium would be too strong for the hon. gentleman; but I tell him that every one of these applications has been considered on its own merits without the slightest reference to political proclivities or antecedents—whether they are opponents of the Government or supporters. The hon. gentleman commenced by comparing the policy of the Canadian Government with that of the United States. The circumstances of the country when we took office, especially with regard to the North-West, were not in a healthy condition. The late Government had no faith in the future of that North-West. They had shown that they had no faith in it. They had in their places declared that we could hope for no great influx into that country so long as Kansas and Texas and other por; tions of the United States were open. They said that progress would be slow.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We can turn up Hansard and prove it. We have read it again and again in the House, and if necessary we will read it again and again in the course of this debate, and prove the truth of what I state. Again and again was it stated that it would be by a slow process that the North-West would be settled so long as the United States continued to offer the great inducements which they were offering. Consequently when we entered office we took the earliest steps possible to induce immigration; we took the first steps that were ever taken to induce immigration. The late Government took no steps whatever for that purpose. When they laid out the Pacific Railway, the first thing they did was to declare that a belt of twenty miles on each side of the railway should be absolutely reserved from settlement. Our policy, on the contrary, is that every alternate section shall be open for free settlement and pre-emption, even if the railway runs across it. Such is our policy, and such was the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. We were anxious to offer better terms to the settlers, because of the backward position of settlement in the North-West, because of the utter discouragement which had been offered to settlement there by the administrators of the affairs of Canada for the previous five years; and as the United States asked $1.25 an acre for their land, we offered ours for $1 an acre; as they declared that the homesteader must remain on his land for five years, we declared that he would get his deed in three years; as their pre-emption rights were to be sold for cash, in all cases we offered pre-emption rights on credit;—we did all this for the purpose of offering better terms in the effort to divert into Canada the immigration which was rolling in an enormous tide into the United States. We were only partially successful, thanks to the exertions and thanks to the language of hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, there was not an advertisement inserted in any American newspaper by the great railway companies which had lands to sell that did not quote the language of hon. gentlemen opposite; some of the pamphlets issued by them had their pages adorned with their physiognomies, and Antwerp, Berlin, and every portion of Germany was flooded with translations in the best German of the disparaging remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite; and, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that such is the spirit of opposition—not to say thank you—that by some unhappy fate, whether they are in the Government or in the Opposition, these hon. gentlemen, like the bloody shirt of Nessus, seem to feel that the necessity of disparaging their country devolves upon them as an inevitable task. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken gets up and tries to show that the terms we offer are prejudicial to the settlement of the country—that they are not satisfactory to the immigrant. Strange to say, Mr. Speaker, the whole of Europe—at all events, the whole of England, Ireland and Scotland—as well as a considerable portion of the United States and all of Ontario, as the hon. gentleman says, have quite a different opinion. Was there any rush from Ontario during the time of the Government which the hon. gentleman supported? Was there any danger of that Province being depleted then? Was there any danger of an emigration from Lower Canada? The exodus from Lower Canada, as well as from Ontario, was to the United States. There was no assertion that there was going to be an improper rush of people to the North-West. But now, Sir, it is all changed. The hon. gentleman has quoted my language of April, 1880. I was one year premature, and if I was, there were two causes for it; there was a very early and wet season, which, together with the pernicious influence of the language of hon. gentlemen opposite, had the effect of postponing immigration. But it was only for one year. The immigration of last year—and it is only approximately known, because we cannot arrive at the number of men who cross the border at all points of that great country—is shown by the population register to have been 28,000, and there will be nearly 20,000 by the 1st of May next, notwithstanding all the exertions of the hon. gentlemen opposite and their misrepresentations of the character of that country. Strange to say, although they declare that the terms in the United States are so much more favorable than those in Canada, there is a large and healthy immigration pouring into Canada all the way from Kansas; there are large numbers of people coming who are willing to endure all the injustice which the hon. gentleman has so eloquently depicted, who are willing to put themselves under the grinding wheel of a rampant aristocracy; and no thanks to the hon. gentleman. Why should they not listen to the hon. gentleman? Perhaps they will read his speech and turn back to that land of freedom and democracy from which the hon. gentleman himself came, and from which he has evidently derived some of the sentiments he expresses. Sir, as I said before, we were a new country in the North-West, we had no population, while the United States for the last twenty-five years had been receiving a growing tide of immigration, and a great portion of it was caused by previous immigrants. Much to the credit of the European immigrant, and especially of the Irish immigrant, so soon as he got his head above water on this side of the Atlantic, so soon as he had, by honest industry, been able to house himself and scrape up a little money, he sent that money home to his relatives to bring them out and settle them in the western States. That was a growing and increasing cause; as the snowball increases in rolling, so from year to year the increase of the Irish immigration caused an increase in the sums of money sent home to Ireland to bring out the friends of those already here. We had no such resources, and what had we to do? In the first place, we had to grant a certain sum of money to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. We granted $25,000,000 for that purpose; but, with the exception of the railway, we had no agency for the effective promotion of immigration; and we all know—the hon. member for North Norfolk himself must admit—that the great and immediate cause, the principal cause of the rapid settlement of the American North-West, of the district growing into a territory, and the territory developing into a state, was the lavish grants of lands made to the trans-continental railways of the United States. My hon. friend from Bothwell, in a humble imitation of that policy, attempted to introduce the same system into Canada, and it had, perhaps, to a very considerable extent succeeded. We have carried it out to a limited extent, although I was rather reproved for it last night, if I may refer to a previous debate. But, as we had no immigrants on the desert plains of the North-West to send their money home, we endeavored to interest colonization companies. We had no railways except the Pacific Railway to advertise for immigrants, and we have attempted to interest capitalists in Europe, in England, in Canada, aye, and in the United States, to bring immigrants into this country. The speculation—if it be a speculation—is an honest one, and a business one; and, Mr. Speaker, in a great measure, it is going to be a successful one. Sir, the hon. gentleman says that our present policy is less favorable than that of the United States, because the United States gives the homestead grant without any restriction in any part of their territories, and sell their lands at $1.25 an acre. Mr. Speaker, the fact is—and the hon. gentleman knows it—that this statement is merely made for the sake of effect, and that it has no real substance in it. The hon. gentleman knows that nearly all the land worth settlement is taken up; and if the hon. gentleman, if he has not read as I am sure he has read, the various reports connected with this subject, laid before Congress, and at all events he ought to have read them before he made his speech, knows that it was alleged in the last commission which was issued on this subject, that the best and most valuable lands have already been granted, and to such an extent that there is a strong party formed for the purpose of revoking these grants, and resuming possession of the unsettled lands which have been granted to the railway companies. As the House must see, as every man of common sense must see, this must be the case; for if there were as favorable lands open in the United States for free lands as those which the railway companies possess, how in the world can these railway companies dispose of their lands at all? Why these companies have made their fortunes out of these lands. Settlers have rushed into these lands, and speculators have bought them up, because they were the only lands available, either as regards fertility or accessibility and railway accommodation. The very fact that this immigration, coming as it does from England, Ireland and Scotland, goes to the places where these railway companies own all the land, and buy up these lands, disregarding the homestead right, proves what I said, and what a mere perusal of the American records will show, that the main portion of the country's accessible lands are in such a position that it makes the homestead right very little save a farce. There are some in Kansas, and there is an unlimited chance for going to Texas; but, Sir, there is a large population moving this very year of our Lord, 1882, from Kansas to our North-West, abandoning their homesteads, abandoning this land of delight, abandoning this delectable country, which was praised in such glowing terms by hon. gentlemen opposite some years ago; they are abandoning all that, and are coming to this country this very year in very large numbers. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that we had better settling lands, and were not selling them. The hon. gentleman has forgotten that it was the policy of the late Government, as it is of the present, to appropriate a certain portion of these lands for the purpose of paying the expenses of building the Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman knows that this task was so herculean, and that the burden was so great for a population of 4,000,000 of people, that, while it had become a political necessity to carry out our good faith and open up and make useful our North West, which we had bought for this end, if to build the Pacific Railway, at the same time it was part of the policy of the late Government—and as the records will show it—as it is the policy of the present Government to make that country pay for its own railway, why in the name of heaven—and I speak with all due reverence—should the people of Ontario and Quebec, of Nova Scotia, of New Brunswick and of Prince Edward Island be heavily taxed in order to open that western country to new settlers from all parts of the world. Why should they be ground down under that iron heel of the aristocracy and that relentless grasp of the tax collector? Why should they be crushed out, when there was a fair country as large as the whole of Europe that did not refuse the sacrifices, which the original settlers of Ontario—and to go still farther back—the original settlers from old France in the Province of Quebec, endured? Why, Sir, instead of being obliged to plunge into the forest, instead of being compelled with unskilled arms and old English broad-axes to hew their way through the woods before they could raise a potato or a cabbage, the immigrant can go now into the North-West, and if he has his agricultural implements, before the night after the morning of his arrival has fallen, he can run many a long furrow. Then, why, Mr. Speaker, should our people be taxed under these circumstances? This was felt and known in all parts of Canada. It was understood, and it was the policy of the present Government, and of the present as it was of the late Parliament, that that country should eventually pay for its own railway, and there was an appropriation which still stands on the Statute-book, of 100,000,000 acres of land, which were to be sold for the purpose of building this railway; and of these 100,000,000 acres 25,000,000 acres were to be handed over to the railway company, and 75,000,000 acres are to be sold—they are not to be used for homestead purposes—for the purpose of relieving the people of the older Provinces, who on the faith of this assurance and promise—and on this promise only—accepted the burden, and have at the polls recorded their sanction of this policy, which was settled some years ago, of building the Pacific Railway, of carrying out the pledge made to the people of British Columbia, and of opening the intermediate North-West, which was bought for a price taken out of our own pockets—they endorsed this policy on the understanding, that eventually that country would pay the whole of the expense. Sir, I am glad to say that by the persistence of speculators—as the hon. gentleman calls them—but of capitalists and gentlemen desirous of investing in the North-West, as I would describe them—it is safe, it is certainly beyond the possibility of doubt, to say that every farthing and every cent, and every dollar, that has been or will be expended in building the Pacific Railway, not one shilling of this burden will fall on our shoulders, or on the shoulders of the generation that will succeed us. We will be free from the whole amount of that debt. Why, Sir, as I told the House last night across the floor, that the sales to which so much objection was taken, of the 23rd March and 1st of April, at three several places, upwards of $700,000 in hard cash, or nearly $750,000, were paid into the Treasury. This is a very substantial commencement of the fund which is to pay off these $25,000,000. This took place I may say in one day; there was a difference between the 23rd of March, at Winnipeg, and the 1st of April at the other two places, but nevertheless, I may say that, on one day, $750,000 were received, which will be put to the credit of the fund and invested at interest, for the purpose of paying off the whole of these $25,000,000. The hon. gentleman is afraid that the North-West is going to be swallowed up. I stated that the whole of the applications which have been granted, comprises only a few million acres, and although the hon. gentleman does not trust the Government, this House and the country will trust the Government, believing that they will not give away too much of these lands. It is an experiment, but it will be a successful experiment, as is shown by the success of the railway companies in the United States in this respect; and when we state that there are 250,000,000 acres of land in that country and that the whole of the land which has been granted in response to these applications includes only 7,000,000, and that there is no prospect of there being more than 3,000,000 more granted, making, in all, 10,000,000, and when I tell the hon. gentleman that by this year, there will be 10,000,000 acres granted to colonization companies, under plan No. 1, which means the eventual payment of $10,000,000 into the Treasury besides the proceeds of such other casual sales as are made during this year, it will be seen that only a small portion of this heritage has passed out of our hands; and these sums will be used to meet the engagements which Canada has incurred on the account of the Pacific Railway. We shall have $7,000,000. $3,000,000 more may be fairly considered to be the extent to which the colonization grant will go. That will be $10,000,000, and with the sales that will take place of the railway lands in other portions, we will have either, in money, or in what is as good as money, solid mortgages on every one of those colonization tracts, an amount equal to $12,500,000. So that in one year we may fairly say we have got half of the whole $25,000,000 that we are pledged to pay to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

I should think that hon. gentlemen opposite, if they could for a moment cast aside their feelings of opposition, ought to join with us in rejoicing in the new field of prosperity that is opened to the country. They should rejoice to see that that country which was bought with so much misgivings, in the minds of even the most hopeful, should bring so favorable a return; that the engagements we entered into with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the enormous charge undertaken, of civilizing and governing the whole of the North-West, have been met so successfully; that the policy which was originally hinted, or suggested by the Government of 1867, and carried out to a certain extent by hon. gentlemen opposite, and brought into full fruition by the present Government, has been carried to so successful an issue; and that from the United States, and from Europe, and old Canada, that country is going to be certainly populated by a large, industrious and civilized race of people, who will add to the strength, health, importance and dignity of the Dominion. If they would rise superior to their feelings of opposition and join us in rejoicing at this great change, this wonderful prosperity, it would redound greatly to their credit; and long after the temporary quarrels, disputes and differences between political parties are forgotten, it would in our future history be recorded to their credit; that they set aside their political prejudices, forgot the factional oppositionist in the patriot, and sustained the policy which is settling that country to the utmost extent, bringing immigrants to it from all parts of the world. But the hon. gentleman, with respect to the colonization claims, speaks of the middlemen coming in. Sir, that is not so. We will take now plan No. 1. Any immigrant can come in independent of colonization associations, and settle on an even numbered lot and make his entry for a pre-emption lot. No middleman interferes with him. He gets homestead land for nothing and pre-emption at the regulation price fixed by the Government. But if he has been induced to go in there by the company he will be counted into that company, and whereas they pay $2 an acre for the quarter-section which they bought they will get a rebate of $1 an acre, if the settler has, through their instigation, in any way been put upon even a quarter-section next to it. The fears of hon. gentlemen therefore are altogether unfounded. The policy of the Government has been fixed from 1878. Hon. gentlemen complain that we have altered our policy from time to time. Sir, we are not, as I said on a former occasion, Bourbons, who forget nothing, learn nothing. We have gone on, as experience has shown, with the rapidly changing features of the North-West changing our regulations, but in every one of those regulations we have kept as a cardinal point—and so long as that point is kept sacred the fear of a monopoly is at an end—that everywhere, in any tract of the country, the homesteader shall have an opportunity to get his land, and the pre-emptor shall have a right to get his land at regulation prices. I am one of those who don't think it is a loss to that country that men of capital should invest their money in it. There are hon. gentlemen opposite, who, I know, have invested there. I am very glad that they have done so; I am very glad that the hon. member for Centre Huron, and the hon. member for South Huron, have invested to that extent that they now hold 15,000 acres in South Manitoba. They are the harpies, they are the bloated aristocrats, who have gone into that country and actually speculated there. I am very glad that they have done so, and instead of 15,000 acres, I wish they had four times that amount. Those gentlemen will, I am sure, by their energy and ability, prove the best emigration agents that we could have. I know a colonization company which reckons among its members one of the leading members of the Opposition, the hon. member for Lambton. It must be with regard to him that the hon. gentleman repeated a portion of the Lord's prayer: "lead us not into temptation," but I am sure the hon. member for Lambton does not require the hon. member's prayers. I know the prayers of the righteous avail much, but I don't think they are required in this case. Nobody supposes that because the hon. gentleman chooses to go into a transaction which affords a fair opening for the exercise of his energy, and a fair prospect of remuneration, in a business-like way, that any objection ought to be taken. The hon. gentleman condemns and looks with alarm on the prospect of the blacksmith and carpenter coming into the North-West and settling on a forty-acre lot. He says that under plan No. 2 a gigantic aristocrat may go in and squat a lot of them down in a corner of forty-acre lots, or one-acre lots. That is just what we want. We want all kinds of people in that country; we want the agriculturist to have his 160 acres, the blacksmith and mechanic his twenty or forty acres, or whatever quantity he desires. Any one of those men who will settle down under plan No. 2, or any other plan, on a forty-acre lot, will bring his wealth and industry and strength into this country. The hon. gentleman thinks that the North-West should be occupied by the agricultural settlers alone, but every mechanic that goes in there, every laborer, whether he chooses to settle on a one-acre lot, or a forty-acre lot, at the instance of an aristocrat, knows that if he is being crushed by the iron heel of grinding tyranny, all he has to do is to walk off and get 160 acres elsewhere. The clap-trap, unworthy, electioneering backwoods speech of the hon. gentleman has only exposed him to the ridicule of the House, as it will to that of the country; the hon. gentleman's friends are ashamed of him, and I leave him.

After Recess.

THIRD READING.

The following Bill was considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 69) to grant certain powers to the "C. W. Williams Manufacturing Company," and to change the name thereof to the "Williams Manufacturing Company."—(Mr. Gault.)

DOMINION LANDS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

House resumed the consideration of Mr. Charlton's amendments to the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley, that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BLAKE. The right hon. gentleman, in the animated defence of his policy with which he entertained the House before Recess, complained that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had not given notice, according to the course heretofore pursued, of his intention to bring in this motion. Well, Sir, it did not lie in the mouth of the right hon. gentleman to make any such complaint. We, on this side of the House, had pursued that course, although it was not obligatory, until the hon. gentleman, by that example which is said to be more potent than precept, taught us there was another and more excellent way, when he set up one of his followers the other day to bring in, without twenty-four hours or twenty-four seconds notice, a discussion upon a question which required certainly more preparation and more notice than this question can be at all said to have required. After the course which the hon. gentleman pursued in precipitating that debate without notice, I think it was like himself to complain to-night that he did not receive notice of this motion, and in that particular his observation is perfectly characteristic. My hon. friend from North Norfolk, in stating to the House his grounds of objection to the policy which is presented by these regulations, adverted to an objection which the hon. gentleman dealt with in the first part of his speech; that was to the opportunities which these regulations afford for the exercise of unfair dealings, of favoritism, of corruption. The hon. gentleman declared that these observations were highly improper, that Governments were supposed to be incapable of corruption, and that my hon. friend was altogether out of place in making any such suggestions. I have not so read the history of free and popular Governments; I have not so learned the duty of the representatives of the people in discussing proposals by which it is intended to place in the hands of the Executive of the day great and extraordinary powers. On the contrary, my reading of history has taught me that one of the great dangers of free and popular Governments is in this very direction, and that it is the duty of the representatives of the people to guard vigilantly the preservation of the constitution of the Executive, and of Parliament itself from the liability of improper practices growing from the giving of any such powers to the Executive. There was a period in the history of the mother land when, owing to a state of affairs now happily largely passed away, the British constitution was in serious danger of perishing from this very cause. We may well recollect the language which, at that epoch or shortly afterwards, Montesquieu, in discussing in a philosophic spirit the British Constitution and its probable duration, said: Elle périra lorsque la puissance législative sera plus corrompue que la puissance exécutrice. That was the danger then as he stigmatized it, and it is the present danger. But you saw it overcome by the growth of a better public opinion, by the growth of a higher standard in and outside Parliament, and by stringent enactments to limit the powers of the Executive as well. Now, Sir, under these circumstances, I think it is not merely within the right but within the plain bonds of duty of any member of Parliament to discuss the possibilities to arise from an undue extension of executive powers; and when we find, as we do find, an enormous estate, a country where the hon. gentleman is never tired of magnifying as to its area, its capabilities and its production, when we find the hon. gentleman telling us, in a word, that that domain, with reference to the disposal of which he takes such extraordinary powers, is so vast that the rest of Canada sinks into insignificance beside it; when we find that we, looking a little way into the future in this point of view, will form but an insignificant portion of the population, that will then inhabit the whole Territory; when we are dealing with these enormous interests it certainly is in the last degree important that we should see that interests so large as those being dealt with, and that the powers and opportunities of the Executive in connection with them should be carefully guarded. The hon. gentlemen says that all Governments ought to be believed to be incapable of corruption. Well, I recollect, not to go back to those old periods to which I have just now alluded as elucidating the liabilities of free constitutions to danger from this source—but to take a more recent case, I recollect a Prime Minister, about ten years ago, of a free country, with a popular constitution, informing the public in a speech, delivered out of Parliament, but in Canada, that was widely circulated, informing them, I say, that in times past charges had been made from time to time against Ministers, colleagues of his, of improper practices; that these charges having been investigated, the Ministers had disappeared from his Government, and the observation was, of course, very cogent that there was but one inference to be drawn from it, the inference not very creditable to those departed colleagues, nor to the country. But we might suppose from the hon. gentleman's observations to-night that Governments were incapable of corruption. Now, the hon. gentleman sought to distort, I must say, according to my view, my hon. friend's observations. We pass laws and we scrutinize laws with reference to the dangers which may grow from the passage of these laws. It is no imputation upon hon. gentlemen opposite to say, that they are exposed to the same frailties that the rest of humanity are exposed to. I do not merely admit, but I declare and declare with satisfaction—because it would be a humiliating thing, indeed, for this country, if one should be obliged to suppose to the contrary—that there are in the ranks of these hon. gentlemen who do not see eye to eye politically with myself, men as honorable, as high-minded, as conscientious, as any that I can find alongside of myself. I have never thought the contrary, but I do not pretend to place all those hon. gentlemen who are opposed to me on the same high level. There are amongst them some who are not up to that standard, and with reference to whom it is fit and proper that precaution should be taken. We do not build our laws with reference to the powers, or capacity, or incapacity, or proclivity for doing wrong of particular Governments; we build them so that we may be as secure as possible against wrong-doing by any Government, of which ever side it may be composed, at whatever time it may come into office, and whatever principles it may profess, and we are entitled and bound to consider what the effect of past legislation will be in that sense and with that reference. There is a constitutional confidence to be placed in the Government of a country, but a limited constitutional confidence—no more confidence in one Government in this sense than in another—and all our laws are to be framed so as to guard, so far as possible, against the abuse of power by those with whom it may from time to time be entrusted. This, however, is not the main point, although the hon. gentleman would gladly have made it so. It is a most important one, in respect of which in my belief the evil and mischievous effects of those regulations will become more manifest from day to day; but after all the point directly taken by the resolution before the House is upon the policy of these regulations in other respects, their effects upon the future of the North-West country, their policy irrespective altogether of the opportunities and dangers to which I have just now alluded. The hon. First Minister failed to apprehend the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton). I am sorry that he did so, because it is a misapprehension which appears to be chronic. Always we find the same misapprehension arise, and always we hear the same mistake and error as to our views expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite. We have brought forward the question involved in these resolutions and have applied them to other, though less objectionable, schemes of the Government in former days, and then, as now, we were met with the same answer. We were told, because we insisted upon settlement as a condition of sale, that we were going against sale altogether. It is not so. My hon. friend's resolution deals with the question of to whom you shall sell. He does not propose to interfere with or affect the free grant and pre-emption portion of the policy of the Administration. He does not propose to interfere with or affect the proposition that for the other lands a price shall be obtained. He does not propose to interfere with or affect the question of the price which shall be obtained, except in so far as the adoption of his views would secure to the Government on the one hand the payment of the full instead of the half price, and to the settler on the other hand, that he should receive his land at the Government price instead of at a price double or treble that price. The propositions of my hon. friend, therefore, are not fairly to be represented as propositions that would diminish in any sense the returns into the public exchequer from the lands of the North-West; on the contrary, they are propositions which provide that without increasing, nay, by diminishing, the prices to be paid by the settler, you will get more from the lands than under the present system. The hon. the First Minister sneers at the idea of the creation of what he calls an aristocracy in the North-West. There are worse things than an aristocracy in the true sense of the term: a plutocracy is a very much worse thing, and it is that sort of thing which it is proposed to encourage in the North-West by these regulations; it is not an aristocracy in the proper sense of the term, but the creation of a class to be made wealthy by opportunities that are given them by the Government for fattening at the expense of the public and of the settlers. The hon. the First Minister said that the policy of this Government had always been most liberal, that they began by granting large free grants close to the line, and even along the line of the railway. The hon. gentleman's memory fails him. Although my hon. friend's words had hardly ceased to echo through the Chamber—in his speech in which he called the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. the First Minister's policy was not a policy of large free grants of 80 acres only, that the policy was not one of placing settlers close to the railway, but of removing free grants for distances of five miles from the railway, on each side, and that the hon. gentleman's subsequent policy was carried out, not from conviction, but from pressure placed on it from without—the hon. the First Minister stated, standing in his place, that he had been compelled or induced, although he believed his first policy was correct, to alter his policy in the direction of greater liberality.

Mr. PLUMB. No.

Mr. BLAKE. That is my memory against the memory of the hon. gentleman. The hon. the First Minister stated that as regards his calculations of the number of settlers in the North-West he was premature only to the extent of one year, and that the propositions predicting larger immigration and settlement failed from two causes, first the wet season, and second, the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I will not discuss the question of the seasons; but it is very amusing to observe the trick played by hon. gentlemen opposite. They represent us as wholly impotent, as incapable of impressing the people of the country in any respect, as incapable of doing anything to enforce our views here or elsewhere, as fighting against strength and struggling hopelessly, and only succeeding in converting people to views opposite to those which we hold. That is one position in which the hon. gentlemen place us. But if ever a prediction of theirs is falsified by events, if ever it happens that their predictions turn out to be thoroughly wrong, they say it was due to the potent and malignant influence of the Opposition. I leave hon. gentlemen opposite to reconcile these two views of the influence and power of the Opposition. The hon. the First Minister referred to speeches which have been delivered by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and he referred to a speech of my own in a very pointed manner. Observations have been made in respect to that speech and partial and distorted extracts have been quoted; but it is in Hansard, and there is not a word in that speech, if you read it, which is objectionable, there is not a word untrue, and I am prepared at any time and under any circumstances to repeat the same sentiments and statements, convinced that they can be vindicated by the facts, and it contained nothing of which any man need be ashamed of having said. The hon. Finance Minister knows that what happened on that occasion was that two or three states of the Union were quoted by hon. gentlemen opposite as instances of an extraordinary immigration and extraordinary progress; and adverting to those very cases which they brought forward as possessing such elements of progress, I but gave what was commonplace information, what is unquestionably true as to the effects of that progress; and proceeded to discuss, after a fashion which I have not yet seen attempted to be controverted, the elements of that progress in immigration, with the view to ascertain whence it had arisen. What was said then was, I believe, absolutely and unquestionably true, and I am quite prepared to vindicate the speech by a perusal of the speech itself, which will be found to be its own best vindication. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that he was but premature for a year, and that the delay in that year was caused by our efforts. Where? Abroad? The immigration has not come from abroad. Such immigration as there has been in the last year has been almost entirely from within our own bounds. Was it within our own bounds that we were able to falsify the hon. gentleman's predictions by what we said or by what we did not say? Was it within our own bounds, where both parties are known and where the weight attaching to their utterances is recognized, that this mischief happened? Or was it from abroad? We find that the immigration even of last year is almost entirely from within our own bounds. I have not been able to find from the statements of the report any evidence to show, with reference to the immigration of this past year, the figures amounting to the sum which the hon. gentleman has stated, viz., 28,000. I recollect that a while ago the Minister of Agriculture stated that he supposed, but he could not tell accurately, that there was about 28,000. Now, I find Mr. Grahame, Dominion Immigration Agent, attempting, so far as I can judge, to calculate the whole who came in by St. Paul by lake and other ways, and he calculates that those who came in with tickets from Canadian and American points by rail for the first nine months numbered 12,001, to which he adds 30 per cent for children, making a total number of 15,601. The number who came in by the lakes he puts at 4,061, or a total of 19,662, and he adds: "I have no doubt that during the months of October, November and December there will be arrivals into British territory which will bring the immigration of the season of 1881 to 25,000 souls;" but up to the end of September his calculation is 19,682 souls. With reference to the sources from which that immigration is derived, so far as it came from the States, Mr. Tétu says that the States of Massachusetts, Vermont, and Michigan have furnished the greater portion. Mr. Tétu, who is Immigration Agent at Emerson, gives the total number of arrivals at that point at 27,212, from which he deducts 17 per cent. for what he calls the floating population, leaving the number, according to his view, 23,586. Some may have come across at other points. They cannot, however, have been numerous, and against them is to be set those who departed from other points as well. How is that immigration distributed? There are of English, 1,937; Irish, 558; Scotch, 765; Germans, 80; Lower Provinces, 893; French Canadians, 1,028; and of what he calls Canadians, but which must be evidently emigrants from Ontario, 19,593; United States, 2,358; making a total of 27,212, from which the 17 per cent. is to be deducted. There you find the proportions, and you find that the bulk of this immigration has been from the one Province to which I refer. Now, if you look at the report of Mr. Hespeler, you find that he gives the approximate number of arrivals at Winnipeg during the year 1881 at 12,020. Of course that does not include the whole immigration, because some stopped short of Winnipeg and some moved past there and are not included, but none of these statements corroborate the estimate of 28,000 made by the hon. gentleman. Again, if I rightly remember—for I have not had the opportunity since the hon. gentleman spoke of referring to the paper—the prospectus issued by the Canadian Pacific Railway, I think in the month of November, with reference to the sale of their lands, declared the prospects of their country estimates the immigration into the country that year at 20,000; so that I think the estimate of the hon. gentleman made to-night is not warranted by such figures as are accessible to this House, and such figures as the Government have presented to the House for its information. But, no doubt, the immigration has been very considerable, and the hon. gentleman declares that it is going to amount to no less than 20,000 for the months of January, February, March, April, and part of May. He says these immigrants are coming in from all quarters—a large number from Kansas and other States, and a large number from the Old World—England, Ireland, Scotland and the continent of Europe. He says all are alive to come to the North-West, and have two reasons: first, he says, because the United States have no more lands to give, so that if immigrants must settle on agricultural lands they will have to go north; and, second, because they are better acquainted with Canada than they were. Now, Sir, so far as the immigration to the North-West is concerned up to to-day it is from within the bounds of the Dominion almost entirely that it has come, and from the bounds of the Province of Ontario principally. And the consequence of the continued depletion of that Province at the rate at which it has been depleted during the last year by departures to various quarters, principally, I hope and believe, to the North-West, will be, if continued, very serious. I said on a former occasion that I could not regret any removal of any portion of my fellow-countrymen from one part of this Dominion to another which improved their condition, increased their comfort and their capacity for discharging their duties to the country. I do not regret it, because we are all bound to rejoice in whatever may improve the condition of any one of our fellow-countrymen; but we must not ignore the consequence of such a change of population as has been and is going on in the Province of Ontario. Why, Sir, in the capital town of the South Riding of Bruce, I observed a statement, made two or three months ago, with reference to a proposal that was before the Local Legislature as to the voting on a by-law for a grant to aid a railway company. The law, I believe, required an absolute majority of the registered rated owners of the land in the town to compel an assenting vote, in order to the validity of that by-law, and it was represented by the municipal authorities that such a thing would be impossible, because 42 per cent. of the registered owners of land in Walkerton, according to a census they took for the purpose, were reported to be leaving for Manitoba in the spring.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman sneers derisively at that statement.

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose even with these departures the population of Walkerton will be larger than the hon. gentleman's borough, but it would be a very serious calamity to Walkerton to lose that number of its people. I know no more about it than that this statement was made by the municipal authorities and sent down to the Legislature as the result of their enquiries made for the purpose I have indicated; but there can be no doubt that there has been a serious change taking place in the population. I saw, but yesterday, a gentleman who had just returned from the North-West, and who saw a large band of immigrants who had just arrived from the Province of Ontario, almost exclusively. He said—and he had a good deal of experience with reference to immigrants to the western country—that he had never seen in his life such a lot of immigrants as there; they were the best lot he had ever seen, the finest, the most intelligent, the best off, the most enterprising men, who would get along anywhere, and still better in the North-West. While this is good for the North-West, how is it for the country that loses men of that class? What is it going to do for the Province of Ontario? Now, Sir, pausing here in these observations, to which I shall recur presently, I say, if the hon. gentleman is correct, if everything he has told us this night is to be justified by the events of the year; if it be the fact that the lands of the United States are exhausted so that the surplus millions of Europe must turn to the North-West; if it be the fact that, irrespective of that exhaustion, they are cheered and encouraged by the prospects we present to them and are ready and willing to go; if it be the fact that from England, Ireland, Scotland, Germany and Scandinavia, they are coming amongst us; if it be the fact that the proposals which have been made and scattered widely through these regions, have enlisted their favorable consideration and determined them to come.—why, Sir, everything that the hon. gentleman said, every declaration that he made, every promise and pledge that he gave to the people of this country as to the present sentiment of the North-West, is an argument in favor of the policy of my hon. friend from North Norfolk, as contrasted with the policy which the hon. gentleman proposes and which is his boast. Why so? Is it pretended that there has been a colonization scheme in operation? Is it pretended that the 20,000, or whatever it may be, of settlers who have gone to the North-West, have gone under the auspices of a colonization society? Is it pretended that a man is emigrating to the North-West under any such influence? No; the immigration that has taken place, the sentiment that has been created, the tide of feeling, to be followed by a human tide which the hon. gentleman has described, exists, not because it has been promoted, encouraged or created by colonization companies, but by virtue of the announcement that the lands were free to the settler; it exists by virtue of the announcement that any man can go there, choose, settle and buy. And if it be true that this vast tide of immigration is pouring into that country, what do we want of the agencies to which the hon. gentleman has alluded? He says that the Western States were colonized by the aid of railway companies, who are their great colonization agents, and we, having no railway companies to colonize the North-West—although I think I recollect that a year ago we were told that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company alone would relieve the Government from this business of colonizing the North-West—we having no railways to colonize the country, at least, if we except the Canadian Pacific Railway, which he threw in in a parenthesis as though it was hardly worth mentioning, although we have given it 25,000,000 acres of land on the express statement that it would be the most effective means we had ever adopted of inducing immigration—we decided to make our own plan, to adopt our own substitute, the great colonization companies. But I say, Sir, that, as the immigration which has come in is not due to colonization schemes, and is going to continue to fill up the country as rapidly as its good will require without them, why should we create the colonization schemes? Let us keep the land for the settler who is coming, so that the settler will have it at first cost; let us not create an agency which is calculated only to cause the settlers to pay a higher price for their land than they would have to pay if the land were left free to be dealt with between the Government and the incoming settler. The hon. gentleman asks, why should the older Provinces be taxed to pay for the Canadian Pacific Railway? Why, Sir, the answer is, because the hon. gentleman made a law to tax us—because he made a contract to tax us—because he made an arrangement to tax us; that is the only reason why we should be taxed. But, certainly, so far as we can escape from taxation by dealing with the lands of the North-West, let us escape. Upon that we are united; but what does the hon. gentleman propose? He says: "I offer 10,000,000 acres of land in class D to the individual settler at $2 an acre—that is $20,000,000;" but he says: "I am going to sell these 10,000,000 acres to the colonization companies this very year at $1 an acre—that is $10,000,000;" and when my hon. friend from North Norfolk says: "Let us sell it at $2 an acre, which is all the settler will pay, and which is double the money to be got under the hon. gentleman's scheme, the hon. gentleman says, forsooth: "You want to diminish the product to the Government from the sale of North-West lands." Why, Sir, it is perfectly obvious that the hon. gentleman's scheme is the one that will diminish the product of the Government from the sale of the lands; the very essence of it is to sell the lands at half price, in order that the settler may pay double the Government price in the end. The hon. gentleman says he will have $10,000,000 this year. Well, that is a fine statement, but he was obliged to admit that he would not have the money; he will have sold 10,000,000 acres to the colonization companies, for which he will ultimately receive $10,000,000, and he says: "I expect to receive from other sales—that is, those despised $2 or $2.50 sales—$2,500,000 more;" or cash and the equivalent of cash to the extent of $12,500,000, which the hon. gentleman says, amidst the uproarious cheers of his followers, is half the cost of the Pacific Railway.

Mr. BOWELL. He did not say that; he said half the subsidy.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, if the hon. gentleman simply said that $12,500,000 is half of $25,000,000, that is a simple question in arithmetic, and was not very well calculated to evoke the enthusiasm which he did evoke from those benches; but what the observation was understood to mean was, that one-half of the burden imposed on this country by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was going to be met in a single year. We know that that burden, irrespective of the indirect burdens which we have often referred to, approximates about $60,000,000 instead of $25,000,000; so that if $12,500,000 were to be realized, which will not, this year, there would still be the burden which would not be half discharged; but there is something more. Sir, it was by some arithmetic of this kind that the hon. gentleman proposed a while ago to put to capital account the surveys of North-West lands. We called the attention of the hon. gentleman to it, and he agreed—but this, like other promises, has been forgotten—to open a public account which would be brought down yearly in which the North-West lands should be charged with the expenses connected with these lands on the one hand and in which the sales would be given on the other hand, and that the balance should be struck; and before you deal with your $12,500,000—before you poach the eggs which are not yet hatched,—and deal with these $12,500,000, you have got to remember that these are primary charges upon it—charges connected with the administration, the surveys, immigration, and other expenses incurred on account of these territories, which have to be met before you get a surplus for the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is very easy, Sir, if you conduct business on the principle on which the hon. gentleman proposes to conduct it, if we find out of other resources, out of the taxes of the people, all the money to carry on the business of the North-West, and treat every shilling which you receive from the lands as profit, without counting any of the expenses, after a year or two to make a show of having got something; but in order to keep the account as business people would keep it, as honest people would keep it, you must regard the expense account, as well as the receipt account; and you must strike your balance so. There is another little item that the hon. gentleman forgets perhaps, that we have spent a few millions on the Pacific Railroad, that we have borrowed money for it, that we are paying interest on it year after year, and have been for years; and that before he can settle the principal account, he has to settle the interest account too. So these glowing descriptions of the hon. gentleman which, I must say, seem to me to be directed to the entertainment of the idea, by his friends inside and outside of this House, that this year they will wipe off half of the Pacific Railroad debt by the North-West lands, and the next year, I suppose, the other half will be paid, are very far from realization in any reasonable process of argument. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says he is glad that capitalists have gone in and bought lands in the North-West. Why, do we not know that they went there and bought those lands to make money by them? Do we not know that the only persons in whom we are interested in getting into that country are those who will be producers, who are to take up these agricultural lands, and farm them, and who, in the villages and towns which are to be created, will develop industries which, I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, we may hope, will be introduced into that country. Do we not know that their ability to purchase is to be measured by the resources of the country as a general rule; and that inasmuch as the capitalist buys to make money, and only to make money, he must charge the settler more than the Government charges him, enhancing the cost in the North-West to the producer who is the only person whom we are interested in getting there, as the necessary result of these purchases by capitalists to which the hon. gentleman has adverted? It is as plain as day, that every man who is interposed as a middleman between the Government and the settler, or the producer, as a buyer by occupation, is a man who must be rewarded for his investment of capital or speculation, at the expense of the occupier; and, therefore, I do not at all rejoice that sales have been made to others than the ultimate occupiers, because I am confident that the sales, as a rule, have been of those lands of the classes which are best adapted for settlement, which would have been earliest chosen, and which would have been taken over by the occupier at the Government prices at the earliest day, and which now the occupier will have to purchase as he can, when he can, and at what price he can, to his loss; and that means the loss to the State, because contracted ability on his part is a loss to the State and no profit to the Government. The hon. gentleman has stated that these capitalists and the promoters of these colonization schemes are respectable. I do not doubt their respectability. I do not blame them for having proposed to make money under the regulations of the Government; not in the slightest; they are quite entitled to do it; but I believe that they entered into these plans with that view as business enterprises—as enterprises out of which they expect to make a very large profit indeed; and I believe that this expectation, if it is to be realized, is an expectation which cannot be realized only at a corresponding loss to the country at large. The hon. gentleman says that the immigration will be very great. I will say this: that to the extent to which colonization companies were formed upon the express proviso or arrangement that their energies were to be directed and their rewards were to be obtained by inducing an immigration from foreign countries, I quite understand such a policy; but I say that at this moment the observation which the hon. gentleman made the other evening, as to the land craze at present prevailing, was a fine observation, and an observation which applies not only to the North-West, but also to the Province of Ontario, and I do not believe that it is a wholesome thing for this Province, and perhaps, ultimately, for the North-West, to encourage people in the extraordinary manner in which this scheme will encourage that depletion of the Province of Ontario. I believe that it is being depleted by other processes, by the ordinary processes, quite rapidly enough, and that the creation of the colonization companies, who are still further to stimulate the spirit of unrest among our people and still further produce—if that is the fact—a rapid emigration to the North-West, will be certainly no unmixed gain. Now, Sir, as I have said, I do not believe it to be necessary. I adopt the statement of the hon. gentleman, and I call upon him to vindicate the necessity according to his statements, which were that immigration is proceeding as rapidly as could be hoped; that as much is being done in that direction as could be expected, that his own expectations are being more than realized, and that everything is going on in that direction as it should. The hon. gentleman says that, under the first plan, the even sections are open for settlement; but he says that the company is only entitled to rebate, or allowance, in respect to the settlers which it puts on the intermediate sections. The words in the regulation are ambiguous. There is one portion of them which would support the hon. gentleman's contention, and there is another portion which goes to the contrary; but what is to be done is to enumerate the settlers. How is this to be found out; by whom the settlers were put on? Who is to tell? What provision is there made for ascertaining from whence the settlers came, or at whose instigation—to use the hon. gentleman's words—they came. It will be extremely easy to arrange with a settler, who is on an even section, that he is to be reported or to report himself to the enumerator, as having been put there at the instigation of the company. He gains nothing one way or the other except from the inducement to be held out to him by the company.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He is there, at any rate.

Mr. BLAKE. To share the spoils from the arrangement by which the rebate is to be given. "Better," the company will say, "to share the spoils with him than to lose it all. We will give you something, and it will be understood between us that we put you on." I say that there will be practically no result from this, save that every free grantee and every homesteader then on a tract, will come to the enumerator as having been put there by the company, unless it turns out that they were there before the colonization company was organized. If he gets there after the organization of the company, by whatever means he has got there, there will be a rebate in respect to that homesteader. The hon. gentleman says that he welcomes the blacksmith, the mechanic, and so forth. Of course he does; we all do. Of course we recognize the fact that the agriculturist of the North-West will require the blacksmith, and the mechanic, and the furniture and waggon-maker, and so forth. They are necessary to the agriculturist, as to all societies, and, therefore, we welcome them all. My hon. friend's remarks were not directed to discredit the immigration of those necessary adjuncts to every civilized community, but he pointed out that under plan No. 2 there was no security at all for the proper conditions for a rebate being carried out, because the mechanic, or blacksmith, or individual who took an acre, or forty acres—probably as a tenant—is to be counted as a settler. In all other provisions you have had stipulations as to who is to be considered a settler. You find he is to be an occupant of a quarter-section, that he is to have a right to pre-emption, &c.; but here you find it expressly left in so elastic a condition that laborers brought out for the purpose of working the vast estate, which may become the property of any one of those companies, on being given a few acres, will be counted as settlers, in order that that corporation may obtain the rebate. So that, if that company go into this speculation with the view of farming on this extended scale, they will be paid $1.00 per acre over the whole tract on bringing out the laborers necessary to work their farms. You pay them that premium because they bring out laborers as necessary as to the working of the farms as the agricultural implements which they must import. The hon. gentleman has argued that events justified this policy. I deny that. Events which have taken place have not taken place in consequence of this policy, but so far as the policy is concerned, have taken place notwithstanding the policy; and the events which he anticipates, are events which he anticipates without reference to this policy; and the immigration to which he points with so much triumph, in the last year, with so much glorification, as to the present and future years, is an immigration which is the strongest argument against the existence and the necessity which would be the only justification for a policy like this. Are there to be 10,000,000 acres given this year to companies, on which they are to obtain, as compared with the individual settlers, a rebate of $10,000,000? That is his statement. Is it needed that they should obtain, in comparison with the individual, a rebate of $10,000,000? You say yes, this is needed in order to get settlement, but you tell us you got the settlement in and it is coming in without it. There is, therefore, no such need. Every settler who, you say, is coming in and would require these lands at the lowest price, is to be thwarted and hindered, not helped and promoted by a plan which would involve the giving to a company for $1 what would cost the settler $5.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A stranger, unacquainted with Canada and its Parliament, dropping in here this afternoon and listening to the very stirring speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and that which has just been addressed to this House by the hon. leader of the Opposition, would, I think, have arrived at the conclusion that some great calamity had befallen Canada; and, I think, about the last thing that any such person would have supposed had occurred was that a great tide of prosperity was flowing into this country. About the last conclusion at which he would arrive from listening to the speeches of those hon. gentlemen, would be that their prediction of the evils that would happen to this country have been altogether falsified by current events. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat said that the hon. member for North Norfolk was quite right in his holding up to the people of this and other countries, the impression that there was great danger that the Government of this country was entering upon a career of widespread corruption; that there was imminent danger, under the policy about to be pursued, of the Government being tempted to corrupt the people, and that the picture was true which he drew and which called down upon him rightly the reprimand that he received from the hon. the First Minister, for having taken a position in this House that was unworthy of himself, of this Parliament and of the country. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken said it was quite right to hold out these signals of corruption; but the hon. gentleman must learn this, and he may as well learn it now, that we do not intend to permit hon. gentlemen opposite to pose as the champions of purity, when to do so compels them to ignore all their past record. I say that when an hon. member in this House attacks the hon. the First Minister of the country and holds up his policy to execration, as a policy calculated to lead to a system of corruption, and insults hon. members on this side, as being engaged in and entering upon that very system of demoralization and corruption, he must not be surprised if he is met by his own statement and his own policy and his own acts, and it is shown that his language, instead of being that of a high-minded purist, of a man anxious to preserve the country from a course that he believes to be injurious to it, is the language of a hypocrite. If the hon. gentleman can be confronted with his own policy and shown to have sustained a policy the very same, only to a greater extent, as that which he is denouncing, he must not be surprised if, instead of being accepted as an authority in morals, he is accepted as one who is well fitted to sustain the leader of what was characterized by a gentleman who now stands high in the affection and estimation of hon. gentleman opposite, as an organized hypocrisy. I say that the time has come when hon. gentlemen opposite must be taught that we do not intend to permit them to adopt that attitude in relation to the Government and those who are generously supporting it. The man who insinuates that which he is unable to prove shows that he is unworthy of the position he occupies, and we must not be surprised if these forebodings of corruption are accepted by hon. gentlemen on this side as the consciousness of that which is in his own breast and heart. Would any one suppose that the hon. gentleman who has held the hon. First Minister to task to-night as having opened up a system which is calculated to lead to general corruption, was a supporter of the late Government, in propounding a policy in relation to this very question of the settlement of the North-West, which is open tenfold to the charges that he brought against that of the hon. Minister of the Interior. I hold in my hand the embodied policy of the late Government in relation to this matter. I hold in my hand a Bill prepared by the sanction of the Government and laid upon the Table of the House by the late Minister of the Interior, a Bill which was supported by the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk just as vehemently as he has denounced the somewhat similar course of the present leader of the Administration. Now, Sir, if the leader of the Opposition supposes that he or any of the gentlemen sitting behind him are to be allowed, without their own past record being called up, to adopt a policy of that kind, I can only tell him he is most eminently mistaken. I need not tell the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that we have too good reasons for the remarks, too good reasons for the criticisms, too good reasons for the reproof which the leader of the Government gave in his recent address in regard to the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite. When, Sir, we were struggling with this great national work, the Canadian Pacific Railway, what did these hon. gentlemen do? When they themselves had come to the conclusion that it was desirable to have that great enterprise carried out as a public work by the Government, and we came down and asked Parliament for such an appropriation of public lands as would enable us to construct that work without imposing undue burdens on the people, what did these hon. gentlemen do? Why, Sir, true to the policy they have ever pursued in Opposition—when on this side of the House they are eminently patriotic; then all is serene, and they can take the most roseate view of public affairs in every section of the country—but when in Opposition these hon. gentlemen, whatever policy is propounded, whatever the necessity of the country, feel that they are discharging their true vocation in decrying the country. They fear that the Government, by a wise, successful and judicious policy, may so advance the interests of the people of Canada as to entitle themselves to their confidence and support. That is the position. And when we were grappling with this great work, and dealing with it as we were bound to deal with it in the position in which they had placed it, instead of giving us that fair and manly support that we were entitled to, what did they do? When we asked Parliament to vote 100,000,000 acres, they denounced the policy as utterly futile and worthless. The hon. gentleman says he is prepared to repeat his speeches. He may be prepared to repeat them, but he will not convince any person in this year of 1882 that his statements were true. That stern logic of events, that most unanswerable and cogent logic, has proved the utter fallacy and futility of all the reasons the hon. gentleman gave, and there is no person in this House or out of it who can be found to take the same position in relation to that question. When we propounded that policy those gentlemen declared that we never could construct the road. Why? Because, they said, these lands are worthless. If they did not say so in terms they said so in fact. And then the hon. member for Lambton said we would be utterly mistaken if we supposed we could build the Canadian Pacific Railway with 100,000,000 acres of land, because it would cost all the lands would bring to get people to go on them to settle. He pointed out the terrors of the climate. He pointed out the struggles that parties going into our North-West would have to endure, and he said such was the condition of things that we would actually be in the condition of giving the lands away, that we would have to pay people to go on there and live upon them. And the present leader of the Opposition, only too glad to re-echo and support such a policy, which was to prevent that progress and prosperity on the part of the country which would be the most fatal condemnation of their own past policy, and the most fatal contrast to the course they had pursued, backed up and sustained all these declarations. What did he say? Why, do they not know that the land agents of the United States, men keenly alive to the best possible means of carrying conviction to the minds of the public all over the world, not only actually copied the words of the hon. gentleman but emblazoned their advertisements with a portrait of his handsome person which they scattered over the country? Does he mean to say that the distinction he obtained at the hands of the enemies of our country, of the men who were engaged in advancing the interests of their country at the expense of our own, was solely by reason of the beauty of the picture and the attractiveness of the portrait that they presented to the public? No, Sir; it was to give greater effect to the language which the hon. gentleman had uttered here, language which could be made use of by the land agents of foreign companies to sell their lands in opposition to our own. What was the condition of those lands? The late hon. leader of the Opposition made a contract with Mr. Foster to construct the Georgian Bay branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in that contract he bound himself to pay 20,000 acres per mile, and that land to be in the North-West; because, when the subject was discussed, the hon. gentleman said that he had no land anywhere else but in the North-West to give him. The ex-Minister of Finance declared, in his place on the floor of the House, that Mr. Foster came back to them with this 20,000 acres per mile of 80 miles of railway, and said: "If you will give me 20 cents in money for each acre, instead of the land, I will carry out my contract." But no; they refused it. And yet these are the men who declared this land was not worth 20 cents an acre; although it was important to get this contract carried out, they would not give Mr. Foster 20 cents per acre in lieu of the land they had offered him. Now they come down, when all their predictions are falsified, when the logic of events has convinced the people how utterly unable they were to equal the situation, then hon. gentlemen now come down and do—what? Why, Sir, the whole wail of the hon. member for North Norfolk is a declaration that, at last, that what we had predicted would be accomplished, has been accomplished, and that the great tide of emigration is setting into that North-West and the whole character and condition of the country are changed. That is the position of things. These hon. gentlemen changed their position from the Ministerial benches, where they declared that their attitude was that of flies on a wheel, that they were utterly powerless, as they proved themselves to be, to do anything to promote and advance the interests of the people. Now that they have got on the other side of the House they have adopted another policy, not of flies on wheel, but of breaks on the wheel; not content with seeing this country enjoying the progress and prosperity which it sought for in vain while they were managing public affairs, their whole vocation now is a policy of obstruction, a policy of endeavoring to clog the wheels of prosperity and progress, whose onward roll is as fatal to them as the roll of the wheels of Juggernaut upon those who prostrated themselves beneath the car. It is under this condition of things that these gentlemen now come forward and say—not that we are mistaken with reference to what we believed could be accomplished by the development of the great North-West, not that we were mistaken in what we believed could be accomplished by all these gigantic agencies which are now at work in favor of that country, when they made these desperate efforts, and with some success to attack our policy—we said we will endeavor to remove the Canadian Pacific Railway out of the category of partizan political questions, and we will place it on a footing that will close your mouths in future against uttering these diatribes against your own country that have been so injurious in the past. But what has been the result? Why, Sir, that with this contract, that the hon. gentleman still denounces, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway Canada has taken a gigantic stride ahead in the course of twelve months, such as no five years in her history has ever witnessed before. That is what these hon. gentlemen are suffering so keenly from now. But, Sir, not only did we wish to develop the North-West by means of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and by all the new life and energy that would be afforded by the rapidity with which they would open up the country for settlement, but we gave to railway companies inducements to build other lines for the purpose of opening up that great, magnificent and fertile territory and making it the home of happy thousands and millions of people at an early day. Not only did we do this, but under the operation of colonization companies, of cattle ranch companies, and all the efforts we can use as a Government, we believe we are but discharging our duty to the whole people of this Dominion in combining all and every energy we can combine for the purpose of pouring in as rapidly as possible a great tide of immigration to that country. I say it is the success of our efforts that has produced this feeling of resentment and hostility on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Before proceeding further, I will direct attention to the utterances of the late Government on this question and contrast them with the utterances of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who was one of the most ardent supporters of this policy when it was first proposed to the House. That hon. gentleman made a terrible point against the Minister of the Interior because he said there are certain things here that are left to the Minister of the Interior that are left to the Governor in Council, and inasmuch as such was the fact it is perfectly obvious that it would be opening the door to corrupt action between the parties coming to the Governor in Council and the Council itself; that you are going to lead to the corruption of Ministers because you are going to place it in their power to confer great favors, and by leaving that door open it is evident we are about to enter on a career of great corruption. Let me turn the attention of the House to the policy of the late Government in relation to the settlement of the North-West lands, which they did not value at 20 cents an acre. The then Minister of the Interior brought down a Bill, in which he provided that any fifteen men in any part of Canada could, in twenty-four hours, place themselves in a position to build a railway in any part of the North-West, if they pleased. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) shakes his head, but I have the Bill in my hands. I am sorry to say there is great difficulty in getting a copy of the Bill; but the document should not be allowed to go out of print so long as hon. gentlemen opposite so utterly forget their past record and take such an extraordinary course as is indicated by the resolution now before the House. This Bill provides that any number of persons, not less than fifteen, may organize a company for the purpose of constructing, maintaining and operating a railway for public use, and the conveyance of passengers in any part of the Province of Manitoba and the territories of Canada, or wholly within the territories. It provides that all they have to do is to form themselves into a company, subscribe in good faith (what evidence would the hon. gentleman take of their good faith? for I suppose that would be dealt with by that desperate autocrat, the Minister of the Interior) a capital of $12,000 per mile, and pay up 10 per cent.; and then they could go to work and build a railway in any part of the North-West, provided it was not within forty miles of the Canada Pacific Railway. When hon. gentlemen opposite were building the Pacific Railway it was a sacred thing, and it must be protected from any competition by anybody; and the only possible protection that can be afforded in this Bill is that no other railway shall enter into competition with it at a distance less than forty miles. I draw the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to that, among other extraordinary inconsistencies in the attitude they have now assumed. I will read that clause, because it is just as well that hon. gentlemen, who seem to forget it so much, should not forget it. It reads:

"No company shall be incorporated under the provisions of this Act for the construction of any railway having the same general direction of the Canada Pacific Railway, or any branch thereof, at a nearer mean distance than forty miles."

But we go on, and we find that the Company, before constructing any part of the road, shall make surveys and levels of the land through which the railway will have to pass, and maps, plans and profiles of the road intended to be surveyed shall be deposited by the President and Engineer of the Company. It did not even recognize the Governor in Council, but simply provided that the President and Engineer might make those arrangements for building a road in any part of the North-West Territory. What about those powers of the Governor in Council which the hon. member for North Norfolk is so terribly afraid will be abused, and which, when possessed by the Government, will afford prima facie evidence that they are about to enter on a career of extraordinary corruption. The Bill says:

"The Directors of the Company, by a vote of two-thirds of their whole number, may, with the approval of the Government in Council, change the route of any uncompleted part of their railway if it shall appear to them that the line can be improved thereby, and in such case they shall make a survey, map or plan, profile and certificate of such alteration or change."

So it was to be a go-as-you-please railway. After the company had been authorized and had deposited plans and maps, its route might be changed to go anywhere so long as it was not within 40 miles of the Sacred Pacific Railway. But this required the approbation of the Governor in Council. Does not the hon. member for North Norfolk stand aghast at the fact that this matter came before the Minister of the Interior, and if he were not found to be as pliant as desirable he might be approached, as the hon. gentleman himself said had been done in the country from which he comes. I will not say, in the courteous language of the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) that the hon. gentleman is an alien by birth, breeding and instinct; but I say that those terms are as applicable to the hon. gentleman as those offensive terms were when used to an hon. gentleman on a former occasion in this House. When the hon. member for North Norfolk is raking up the records of corruption in the country from which he comes, and with which he is so extremely familiar, I would remind him that by this Bill introduced by the Minister of the Interior, the late Government were to be subjected to the frightful position of being tempted by a bribe to sacrifice the interests of the country. Although this was in 1878, the hon. member for North Norfolk has never discovered that it was in the Bill down to 1882. There are some other interesting points in this Bill. It provides:

"The Governor in Council may, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of any railway to be constructed under the provisions of the Act, reserve every alternate section of ungranted land by odd numbers, to the extent of ten sections per mile, five sections per mile on each side of the line of the railway, exclusive of the sections which, under the Dominion Lands Act, may have been reserved as school sections or may have been allotted to the Hudson's Bay Company; and for any line or part of a line of railway west of the 102nd meridian of west longitude, twelve sections per mile, and for any line of railway connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway and extending into the Peace River District, twenty sections per mile; and whenever twenty-five consecutive miles of any portion of any railway shall have been completed, equipped and in operation, the Governor in Council may convey to the Company the land so reserved or a part thereof, along the said railway, as far as the same is completed, and for each consecutive ten miles of the remainder of the railway the Governor in Council may, as the same may be completed, convey the lands so reserved along nine miles thereof to the Company."

Where was the leader of the Opposition when the Bill was introduced? He was a member of the House. Had the hon. gentleman the courage of his convictions or not on that occasion? Had he that same high sense of the importance of retaining all this land for the use of settlers? No; the hon. gentleman has too short a memory, and I tell him he cannot afford to take the high and lofty tone he assumes in this House when we are able to turn up the records and convict him, as I convict him now, of having one policy when on the Treasury bench, and another when in Opposition. That, Sir, is not the course that will inspire the people of this country with confidence in any man; what the intelligent people of this country expect, what the intelligent House of Commons of Canada expect is that a public man who essays to be a leader will, without favor or affection, in dealing with the great, gigantic interests of the country, whether they involve the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway, or the settlement of 250,000,000 acres of the most magnificent territory in the world, be animated by principles clear and distinct and defined in his own mind, and not have one policy when he is on this side of the House and another policy when he is on the Opposition benches. The hon. gentleman was ready to have the whole North-West cut up by these railways—built by anybody, built wherever they pleased, so long as they were not within 40 miles of the railway; he was ready to subsidize these capitalists, of whom he now professes such dread and with an immense tract of land for nothing, whilst every railway that has an acre of land from us, or to whom we have engaged to give such land, has to pay $1 an acre for the land, and that only on the alternate sections, leaving our own sections to be greatly enhanced in value by the construction of the road. The very best terms which any of these colonization companies, who have to fulfil onerous and important engagements which will involve the expenditure of a great amount of capital, has obtained, is the payment of $1 an acre for the land; and yet these hon. gentlemen were ready to run lines of railway east and west, north and south, all over these fertile territories; they were ready to subsidize these capitalists and companies to the extent of ten sections in one district, twelve sections in another and twenty in another. All the parties had to do was to form themselves into a company of capitalists at pleasure, and to be in a position to demand at the hands of the Minister of the Interior this enormous amount of territory, which, according to the valuation of hon. gentlemen, was not worth 20 cents an acre, for they refused Mr. Foster to take the land at that price in order to enable him to carry out his contract. And what more? Was the Governor in Council to have anything to say? Was the late Minister of the Interior to be exposed, in the language of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), to the frightful temptation of having these capitalists and railway companies by the dozen besetting his office—tempting him with considerations which the hon. member for Norfolk is ready to insult his country, by intimating on the floor of this Parliament, would be successful in swerving the mind of a Minister sworn to do his duty to the Crown? But what does that hon. gentleman say?

"The Governor in Council may entirely change the mode of disposing of Dominion lands lying within a certain distance of the Railway constructed under this Act."

The hon. member for North Norfolk occupied an hour in denouncing my hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald) for changing the terms on which these lands are disposed of. Does he suppose it possible that any Government could come into possession of 200,000,000 acres of land that was uninhabited and unoccupied—unopened for settlement by roads or railways, or anything else, and adopt a cast-iron policy which should last for ever? I ask the hon. gentleman if it would be a common-sense thing on the part of an Administration, in the case of a great experiment, such as the opening up of this country must be to a considerable extent—I ask him if the Ministry would not fail in its duty to the country, who did not study carefully from day to day what the interests of that country were and meet the demands of that country as they arose from time to time. And although the hon. gentleman would have a cast-iron and unchangeable rule adopted, although the leader of the Opposition, since he sat on this side of the House has come to the conclusion that no greater error can be made than to permit capitalists to enter the North-West, I tell him that this is the first time in this or any country that a public man has been found to stand up on the floor of Parliament and declare that it is a great evil that capital should be brought into a country. Here is an area of 250,000,000 acres of desert, as it was, only awaiting the operation of capital to be made to blossom as the rose, and yet the hon. gentleman deploras as a most gigantic evil the possibility that capitalists should be attracted to the North-West. I shall expect him next to ask for a commission to see that a man is in possession of not more than a very limited number of dollars, else he shall be prevented from entering that country at all. I have always supposed that the great object, in every country, and especially in a new country, was to draw as many capitalists into it as possible. The hon. gentleman seems to have also a great horror of mechanics, but does he not know that many of the most prosperous and flourishing districts of Canada have been settled by mechanics who were not agriculturists at all, but who have succeeded notwithstanding? What does the hon. gentleman fear from capital being attracted into the country? I say that a greater blessing cannot occur to that great North-West, than the introduction into it of untold capital. It is only yesterday that the hon. gentleman did not believe, nor did the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) that we could get anybody into the North-West without giving them land and paying them besides; but all is now changed, and the hon. gentleman is terrified for fear that the poor mechanics would not find places for the soles of their feet in that country. Does he not know that we have reserved 100,000,000 acres of land for free settlement or on terms that are practically free to the immigrant, and under these circumstances is there anything we can do so beneficial or so advantageous to the settlers who do come in as to bring capital into the country and bring the influence of capital to bear on its progress and development; I am not surprised that the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has found it necessary to go out and refresh himself a little when he is confronted by his own conduct on the floor of the House, and I hope that, being refreshed, he will be able to bear it when I tell him that but yesterday, when a Bill was introduced by the hon. member for Bothwell, then Minister of the Interior, he was quite prepared to give the Governor in Council not only the power which he professes to dread so much, that is to vary the terms and alter the position of the settler, but to give away half of the land of the North-West to gigantic railway corporations. And I am not quite certain whether that hon. gentleman was not prepared to sustain that policy even further. I am not certain whether the hon. gentleman was not one of the parties who assisted in framing this Bill for the purpose of giving a number of these bloated capitalists—these harpies who are fattening on the vitals of the poor settlers—I say I am not at all certain that he would not have been one of the first, if the Bill had become law, to take the position that he has found himself so very loud, if not so eloquent, in condemning to-night.

Mr. MILLS. Did you oppose that Bill?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What has that to do with it? Have I said one word in condemnation of the policy? Am I condemning it now? No, Sir, but I am telling the hon. leader of the Opposition who has just taken his seat that if he supposes he can venture to take the line he has taken to-night; if he supposes that he can venture to assume that the members of this House have forgotten all that has occurred, he is very greatly mistaken, or if either he or any other hon. gentleman imagines that he can pose as the great champion of purity when assailing the policy that they themselves were pledged to, he mistakes the independent spirit of this House and the tone and temper of the people of this country. The hon. gentleman does not like the tone of the bully and the braggart. But, Sir, there is a tone for which I have infinitely greater contempt—and that is the tone of the hypocrite and the poltroon. The hon. gentleman says:

“The Governor in Council may vary or entirely change the mode of disposal of Dominion lands lying within a certain distance of a railway constructed under this Act.”

So that all he had to do was to get fourteen of his associates in this House or out of it to organize into a company, and when he found a fine tract in any part of the North-West, all he had to do was to go down to the Minister of the Interior and say:

“We are building a road, there is our plan, and you must reserve for us ten sections in one district, or twelve sections in another, or twenty sections in another to the mile;”

And when the Minister of the Interior would say:

“That is a district which we have bound ourselves to reserve for settlement,”

The hon. gentleman might say:

“No, there is a clause which states that the Governor in Council may vary or entirely change the mode of disposal of Dominion lands lying within a certain distance of a railway constructed under this Act.”

So that all the hon. gentleman had to do to crush out the settler, to put his heel upon the settler, and to place the settler at his mercy, was to shake in the face of the Minister of the Interior the Act to which he had committed this House as the accumulated wisdom of all the hon. gentlemen opposite, endorsed by the Minister of Justice of the late Administration, and to tell him that he must not talk to him of the rights of the settlers, that he had to place them at his mercy, and that all he had to do was to make these changes and alterations which this railway company wanted, of which the hon. member for North Norfolk would probably be the President, or take the consequences from himself and his other supporters, upon whom he was relying in this House. I think, with the lofty sentiments which the hon. member for North Norfolk has of the material that Ministers of the Crown are made of, he would come to the conclusion that he would very soon wring out of the Minister of the Interior all his behests, even if at the sacrifice of those poor settlers. I will read this whole clause, which is worthy of being handed down to posterity:

“The Governor in Council may vary or entirely change the mode of disposal of Dominion lands lying within a certain distance of a railway constructed under this Act, as regards homesteads, pre-emptions, sales, and bounty land entries, by reducing the quantity which may be granted in free homesteads, or by withdrawing the homestead right altogether on such lands, and may fix a price for such lands, and order that such lands may be sold exclusively for cash, with or without conditions of actual settlement as may be deemed expedient.”

What does the hon. member for North Norfolk think of that? He became very excited a little while ago at the frightful act of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior and his colleagues, who supposed that it would be wise in some cases to limit the settlers to 80 acres; that was a frightful thing, and in comparison with the policy of the United States, was worthy of the loudest denunciations of the hon. gentleman; yet he was willing to pass an Act containing such a clause as the one I have just read. I do not wonder, Sir, that the hon. leader of the Opposition, under the soothing influence of my dulcet tones, has gone to sleep; I am not at all surprised that he should take refuge in sleep when he is brought face to face with such a thorough contradiction of all the hon. gentleman has, for three years, been endeavoring to force on the attention of this side of the House. Either he is incompetent to deal with public questions for the want of that memory which is essential for a public man, or else he is willing to pose in one position on this side of the House, and when the people send him to the other side, to adopt another role. When these hon. gentlemen, in the plenitude of their power, were dealing with the poor settlers of this country, they had no bowels of compassion. The poor settlers were to be placed at the mercy—I was going to say the vindictive mercy, if one may use such a contradiction of terms—of this act; and could anything be more vindictive, in the estimation of the hon. member for North Norfolk, than the way in which these poor settlers were to be trampled beneath the iron heel of power under the operation of this Bill. This Bill also provides:

“The Minister of the Interior may, in his discretion—”

Does the hon. gentleman remember how, an hour ago, he was denouncing the giving of discretionary powers to the Minister of the Interior, saying that it was cruel to the Minister of the Interior to place such temptations before him? and yet he was quite ready in 1878 to vote for an Act vesting in the Minister of the Interior the largest discretionary powers.

“The Minister of the Interior may, in his discretion, and subject to any vested rights, cause the lands immediately bounding the line of any railway under this Act, to be laid out in a tier of lots ten chains wide, containing 80 acres each, abutting the allowance for the right of way for the said railway on either side thereof, with a road upon the other or outer front of the same, and may, if deemed by him expedient, make the homesteads of persons found thereon at the time of the survey of the lands to conform to such lots: Provided that no person proving his right to a homestead on one of such narrow lots shall be entitled to purchase more than one of the adjoining lots of 80 acres.”

Now, Sir, I will read another clause in relation to this history of grosser inconsistency than even the hon. gentleman has branded himself with in relation to the fiscal policy of this country:

“Nothing in this Act shall be construed as binding the Government to acknowledge any right to land settled on, or for any improvements effected on and within the limits of any tract reserved for a village or town site along or upon the line of railway, after public notice shall have been given of such land being reserved for such purpose; and in case of any person having settled on land found to be necessary for a village or town site as above, although such settlement may have been effected previous to public notice as above, the Minister of the Interior may resume possession of such land and compensate such person by allotting him other land in lieu thereof and paying him for his improvements.”

Therefore, Sir, the hon. gentleman, in his discretion, took the fiat of one of these bloated aristocrats whom he had enabled to fatten on the vitals of the poor settlers—of the harpies, to use the eloquent language of the hon. member for North Norfolk—and determine to actually tear up by the roots the settler who had gone there, who had been invited to go there, surrounded by all the protection which the laws of the country could give him; and all this because the company of which the hon. member for North Norfolk might be president wanted his farm for a town site. Well, Sir, there was a Dominion Lands Act, as the hon. gentleman is aware; and it just occurred to the hon. member for North Norfolk or some other gentleman who had a finger in the pie, and who was engaged in putting this policy on the Statute book and looking after the ulterior results; and the hon. gentleman came to the conclusion that possibly the Dominion Lands Act, as parties would say, was the law of the land; and how does it propose to deal with this subject? Oh, Sir, they were quite equal to the occasion. It is provided that the provisions of this Act should remain in force, except "as the same may be varied" at any time under this Act. Now, Sir, I think that if the hon. member for North Norfolk had remembered the policy which he had sustained in 1878, he would not have ventured to address to the House such a speech as that which he addressed to it to-day; and I think, Sir, that the hon. leader of the Opposition, if he had as vivid a remembrance of this Act as he ought to have, would have spared this House a good many statements which he has delivered here ore rotundo during the past two or three years. The hon. member for North Norfolk opened his remarks by stating the enormous value of the North-West. Well, Sir, when did he discover it? Where did this hon. gentleman make the discovery that there was any value in it? Was it when the late Government, which he was supporting so ardently, refused to value its lands at 20 cents an acre with reference to getting a contract carried out? Was it when he, with a solid phalanx of these gentlemen, declared that our attempt to build the Pacific Railway with 100,000,000 acres of its lands would prove an utter delusion and folly, and that it was madness to attempt any such thing? Was it then? No, Sir; but I will tell the hon. gentleman when these lands attained this value. They attained this value, and a greater value, when the people of this country dismissed the hon. gentlemen opposite from power, and when the people of this country brought back to the Treasury benches the men who had faith, and who always proclaimed their faith, in the North-West and in its resources. Then it began to obtain its value; and, Sir, it obtained a rapid and enormous increase of value in the great contract made in the interests of Canada. When the gentlemen, who were brought back again to power, were enabled to revert to their original plan and had again satisfied the country that it could place faith in its financial resources, which have been so completely broken down, and when they were enabled to so convince the world of the value and resources of that great and growing country, and of its capacity for development, as to be able to make the contract they did for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, then, Sir, it took the rapid and onward and gigantic stride, and that so rapidly, that in one short season has given to Canada an advance—as I said before—which in no five years of its previous history it ever had. The hon. gentleman, Sir, would like, even now, to belittle what is going on. He is unable to resist the evidence, as they are unable to resist the evidence of what the National Policy, the fiscal policy of this country, has done for Canada; so great is the tide and the increasing current of Canada's prosperity, and the tide of immigration which is pouring into the North-West, is such, that these hon. gentlemen are unable longer to resist. They cannot close either their eyes or ears to these evidences, but they set their unpatriotic imaginations to work to devise some means, some reason, some excuse, by which they may endeavor to belittle what is going on so happily and so successfully; but their belittling has had very slight effect, and I am glad to say the time is coming when it will be very little that they can do, when they are doing their little best to interfere and hold back the wheels that are onward rolling of Canada's prosperity. I say, Sir, that this is the position which these hon. gentlemen occupy. The hon. leader of the Opposition says that we are inconsistent; at one time you say we are impotent, at another time that we are powerful. Why, Sir, they are impotent for good. They have proved it. They had the management of public affairs and the control of this country for five years, and during these five years, Sir, every step they took led the country into greater difficulty and into greater distress. But, I say, while they have proved that they were powerless for good they have not been equally powerless for mischief; and, Sir, the energy, the efforts and the enterprise which these gentlemen have shown in belittling the resources of the country and in endeavoring to prevent capitalists at home or abroad from having faith and confidence in it, has proved that they have not been impotent to do harm; but, Sir, I am glad to find the time is arriving when their power to do mischief will be almost as impotent as it was to effect good. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says it is true that there are a few people going into the North-West at last; but where are they coming from? They are coming from Ontario. Well, Sir, let me tell the hon. gentleman that there is no class of the population of Canada, nor of the world, that it is so important should go into the great North-West as the people of Ontario; and why, Sir? Because they have that experience in the very work which remains to be done in the North-West, which is of the most invaluable character,—they have the experience; and, Sir, the man who lives in any section of the great Province of Ontario—great and important as it is—who can better his circumstances and make two dollars in the North-West for one that he could make in Ontario, not only does right, but I say it is to the advantage of Canada, to every part of it, and a national advantage, that he should go from Ontario into the North-West. Every person knows that in the cultivated and populous districts of Ontario, families have grown up, and farms that afforded an independent income for a comparatively few persons who were on the farms, have become overstocked and a number of sons require to be provided for; and I say that these sons, the stalwart yeomanry of the country, with the industry, with the intelligence, and with the experience which is so valuable in a new country, by leaving to their younger brothers, as it may be, the management of the farm in Ontario and going to this magnificent and fertile country where they can make more money in one year than they could in five years if they remained in Ontario, are not only a blessing to their families, but also a blessing to the nation, because they increase the national wealth and the national prosperity; but, Sir, I hold in my hands, statistics which are taken from the report of the Department of Agriculture, and they show that in 1876, we had 14,499 people go into that country; in 1877, 15,323; in 1878, 18,372; in 1879, 30,717; in 1880, 27,544; and in 1881, 32,587. Then, Sir, we had reported with settlers' goods by the Custom House officers, in addition to this: in 1876, 11,134; in 1877, 11,759; in 1878, 11,435; in 1879, 9,775; in 1880, 10,961; in 1881, 15,404. The total number of persons who went into Manitoba and the North-West in 1881, was in round numbers about 23,600, ascertained as follows: Reported at Emerson, 27,212; the Graham party from the Western States, 393, and along the frontier from Emerson to Fort Benton, 1,000; while the nationalities were as follows: Europeans, 3,340; Canadians, 21,513; and from the United States 3,758, making a total number of 27,611. What does the hon. gentleman think of the figures now? I hold in my hand a statement of the total immigration into Manitoba. In 1880, it was in round numbers, 18,000; in 1881, 23,600. Every person knows that the great difficulty in getting immigration into a new country, is to get it started. Every one knows that the enormous advantage that the Western States of America had was that while we were employing land agents in Europe to circulate information with reference to the advantage of coming to our country, they had sure, and more successful agents at work in the people who, having gone into the Western States, had prospered and wrote to their friends and sent them means to come out and share the prosperity of the prairie. The great difficulty with us was to get this initial settlement; to have a few hundred thousand people poured into the North-West, in order that they might exercise an influence in promoting an immigration much greater than could be exercised by any other agency. In 1880, how many people do you suppose went into Manitoba? In January, 30 in all; in January, 1881, 80, a marked increase, more than 50 per cent. at that most unfavorable period of the year. How many do hon. gentlemen suppose went into Manitoba in January of the present year—2,877. In February, 1880, 40 went in; in February, 1881, 240; in February, 1882, 3,179; in March, 1880, 124; in March, 1881, 220; in March, 1882, 7,300; and what do hon. gentlemen suppose is the number of persons that, in the first ten days of April that have elapsed, the latest information that we have, went into Manitoba? No less than 6,000 people. So that in these three months, in which we had in 1880, 194 immigrants, we have 19,000 in 1882. Taking into account the ten days additional, is it not manifest that, under these circumstances, the hon. member for North Norfolk and his hon. leader should take alarm; that they should feel it was time they should put on the brakes; that with this evidence of the unbounded success of our policy, with the evidence which the right hon. leader of this Government furnished as to the sales of land in the North West, and the applications for land made during the last year, they should take alarm and come to the conclusion that the brakes must be put on, and they must do their little best to obstruct this tide of immigration that is pouring into that country and is going to make it the most prosperous on the face of the globe. So the hon. gentlemen come down and endeavor to excite fear in the people coming into the North-West. They endeavor to make them believe that they are going to suffer a great evil, and thus deter that tide of immigration that is rapidly peopling up that country. The hon. member for North Norfolk says that this immigration is mostly from other parts of Canada. My hon. friend beside me says the hon. gentlemen opposite would rather they went to the United States. The course those hon. gentlemen pursue in reference to this and all other national questions that are essential to the development of the prosperity of the country, is one that will force on the intelligent public mind of this country the conviction that they would sacrifice the country itself at the shrine of party. Let the hon. gentleman take up any newspaper; let him enquire what has taken place with reference to the great trans-Atlantic steamers and note the thousands that are waiting for passage and overcrowding all the means by which immigration can be brought from the old world to the new, and then say if there is any reason for any other sentiment than that of congratulation. What is it these gentlemen fear if this Government call to their aid, as they are bound to call to their aid, the assistance of capitalists to promote the valuable immigration of able-bodied sons of toil, than by interesting capitalists in this work? Who alone can furnish these emigrants the means of coming into this country? The hon. gentleman deploras as a gigantic evil that large tracts of country under this policy are passing into the hands of capitalists. Let me tell him that the Primitive Methodists, who have applied for and are promised 100,000 acres, have secured all the population required to settle that large area. I have the information from a gentleman in the Department of the Interior who is familiar with the facts, and he assures me that this organization have secured a most valuable class of settlers from England. Who is there that, knowing the present condition of Ireland, the want and misery that are overwhelming thousands and tens of thousands of people in that unfortunate country, could regard unfavorably the formation of associations to furnish the starving and suffering population with means to come into our country flowing with milk and honey? With its richness of soil, freedom of air, and general condition, it would be impossible for those suffering thousands to exchange Ireland for our great North-West without being greatly benefitted by the change. But the hon. gentleman would shut down on a policy that is calculated to promote such assistance being given as is absolutely indispensable, because these people have not the means of coming unless they are taken in hand by capitalists. And supposing a company were to treat unfairly even the most suffering and helpless immigrant they would bring to our shores, the result would be that he would move into a lot in the possession of the hon. Minister of the Interior, and place himself under the aegis of this Government which has hundreds of millions of acres fit for settlement, that it is ready to give on terms that, in point of liberality, cannot be exceeded in any part of the world. The leader of the Opposition seemed to doubt it very much. He treated very much upon the statement that my hon. friend had made that the lands in the United States were all sold. My right hon. friend made no such statement, for it is well known that there are, unsold, enormous tracts of land in the United States free and fit for settlement. But you might give him better authority than the right hon. Minister of the Interior, or the late Minister of the Interior, and that is the man who, at this moment, stands as high as any man on this continent in point of intelligence and information—I speak of Consul Taylor, Consul at Winnipeg, for twenty years resident representative of the United States. This gentleman stated that three-quarters of the remaining wheat belt of North America lay to the north of the boundary line. I am also reminded of the statement of Horatio Seymour, and there are hosts of others, candid and patriotic Americans, who do not believe their duty to their country invokes the necessity of decrying Canada, as some of our own people seem to consider it is their duty to do. The Hon. H. Seymour, ex-Governor of the State of New York, in the course of a speech, said:

"I saw thousands and thousands of acres of wheat, clearing 40 bushels to the acre, weighing 63 and 65 lbs. to the bushel, and was assured by undoubted authority that, on Peace River, 1,200 miles north-west of where I was, wheat could be produced in immense quantities equal to the best I saw in Winnipeg, while great herds of cattle were being fed without cost on as fine grassy land as the world affords. In short, between our north-western line of 45 degrees and 54 degrees 40 minutes (General Cass' fighting point) there is a country owned by England with greater grain-growing capacity than all the lands on the Baltic, the Black Sea and the Mediterranean combined. The land laws of Canada are now as liberal as ours as to the homestead, pre-emption and free claims. People are crowding there rapidly, and towns are springing up as if by magic. Their great railway will reach the Pacific at the grand harbor of Puget Sound before our Northern Pacific will, and it will be extended eastward promptly to Montreal."

I place that as the intelligent, high-minded, independent American authority side by side with these miserable, contemptible efforts to retard the progress of Canada, because hon. gentlemen opposite believe that the country is going ahead under the present Administration too rapidly, not for its own interests, but for their own. I hope the hon. gentleman's speech and the speech of his leader will be attended by the same results which attended the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition in the town of Windsor, N. S. The hon. gentleman visited the very interesting town of Windsor, and I must say that although the town has great capabilities and a good many men of capital, they have not been quite as enterprising and quite as enthusiastic in putting their money into various industries as I think their interests would justify them in doing. But, Sir, happily for Windsor, the hon. leader of the Opposition paid it a visit and he delivered there just such a speech as he delivered to-night. He delivered a speech breathing out threatening and slaughter to his own country; he delivered a speech to show how utterly ruined Canada was. But the speech had a somewhat peculiar result, for, shortly after the meeting closed, the people assembled and they said: "Why, if it be a fact that these manufacturers can make money so rapidly the sooner we go into manufacturing the better," and they organized a joint-stock company for a cotton mill and went at it at once as a result of the hon. gentleman's visit. So I hope the hon. gentleman's speech will have much the same result on the present occasion. Now, Sir, I was a little surprised at a remark which the hon. leader of the Opposition ventured to make in reference to a statement of my right hon. friend, that we were likely to receive money enough on the sale of the lands in the North-West to discharge at a very early date all the obligations of Canada in relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman said he was astonished at the enthusiasm with which that statement was received on this side of the House. Why, Sir, is there a man with a spark of patriotism in his breast in Canada who would not rejoice to learn that everything had become so changed that we could, while reserving 100,000,000 acres for free settlement in the North-West, while giving 25,000,000 acres, instead of the 54,000,000 the hon. gentlemen opposite offered to give in vain to a company to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. But in the course of a very few years it was now perfectly evident that we would receive for the sale of the lands of the North-West, without interfering in the slightest degree with the free settlement, the $25,000,000 that we require in order to secure the completion of that work. One would suppose that was a statement that might be cheered anywhere, where men have a spark of patriotism or the slightest desire to see their country take a position that free men ought to wish she should take. But the hon. gentleman says: "Where did the money come from?" He says: "The right hon. gentleman knows where the money comes from—it comes out of the pockets of the people whom he has taxed for that purpose." Is that so? Is that an answer to the statement that, irrespective of any taxation from the people, our coffers will soon receive from the sale of lands in the North-West, those valueless lands which the hon. gentleman opposite did not even value at 20 cents an acre, yet they have so increased in value as to warrant us in the statement, and to warrant the conviction in the mind of every intelligent man, that at an early date we will not only have the $25,000,000 recouped to the Treasury, but we will go on; and, if we have not wiped out our other responsibilities, we will soon be in a condition to wipe out the engagements thrown upon us by the late Government, as well as those incurred by our own in reference to that great work. The hon. gentleman is a little mistaken in saying that my right hon. friend is the party who levied taxes for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am aware that the hon. gentleman, in several parts of the country, ventured the unfounded statement that the policy to which the late Government and the Liberal party in Canada had always adhered was the policy that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be constructed, if constructed at all, without any increase of taxation to the country. The hon. gentleman committed himself again and again to that statement. He made that statement in London, and he will find it reported in the Globe by the reporter who took his words down as they fell from his mouth. Now, Sir, I do not intend to answer him in that inflated manner in which that hon. gentleman, two or three times in the course of the Session, says: "I give that statement the most unqualified contradiction, and if it was parliamentary to use a stronger term"—I suppose he means a shorter one—"I would use it." He has treated this House to that statement a good many times and it always seems to fall fresh on the ears of the hon. gentlemen around him, and they always cheer it as if the hon. gentleman had not taken out a patent for that form of expression. I do not intend to retort in terms so discourteous. I will not charge the hon. gentleman with making a statement for which, if it was parliamentary, I should use a more expressive and a more unqualified term than to say it was an entirely unfounded statement, but I will prove it. The hon. gentleman has only to turn up the report of Council by the members of the Government of which he formed a part, and he will find in black and white, the simple declaration that his Government had levied $3,000,000 in taxes on the people of this country for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. They had increased taxation, and they declared that was an evidence of the good faith of the Government and of their determination to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, because they had levied over $3,000,000 of taxation for the purpose of its construction. I ask the hon. gentleman to place that statement in the Minute of the Council passed by the Government of which he was a member—because he was a member when the taxation was levied and he had not evaded its responsibility at that particular day—alongside of his oft-reiterated statement? I could ask the House whether it is not sufficient to lead us to question the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's memory if we do not venture to question the accuracy of his statements. When he remembers that, and the further fact that when the Canadian Pacific Railway is finished and a completed work, the taxes involved in its construction will not begin to approximate $3,000,000, how can he venture to tell the First Minister that he is taking the money for its construction out of the pockets of the people in the shape of taxation? I feel that it is trifling with the patience of this House and with the intelligence of this country, for hon. gentlemen opposite to rise and in set phrase, day after day and night after night, propound statements such as the hon. member for North Norfolk has committed himself to in this resolution, diametrically opposed to the policy to which they were solemnly committed and pledged while they had the responsibilities of office upon them; and I recommend them in future before undertaking the hopeless task, the task that necessarily presumes upon the spirit of independent intelligence in this country, to suppose that hon. gentlemen may one day commit themselves to one line of policy, and the next day, when they are foolish enough to think it serves their own interests, pursue a diametrically opposite course, and still expect an intelligent people to consider that any opinions they may offer are entitled to respect. I say that Canada to day occupies a more distinguished position than it has ever occupied since it was a country. There is not an intelligent man in Canada who does not know that at the present moment we have concentrated on us the eyes of the world—not only of England but of the United States. Take up the press of England, and what will you find? Everywhere there is an entire change in the public sentiment in regard to the gigantic strides that the Dominion is making in the path of national progress and national prosperity. I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that all this has been accomplished not only without their aid, but in spite of their bitterest efforts to obstruct. It is a painful statement to make, and I regret being compelled to make it, but the public records will show they have left no stone unturned to embarrass and obstruct the policy of the Government of the country in relation to its most vital interests; and so far have they carried that out that they are ready to seize upon any means or method, however unjust or however improper, if they believe they can gain some paltry party advantage. Why, the leader of the Opposition, the hon. gentleman who well deserves the high position of leader of the great organized hypocrisy of this country, that hon. gentleman whose qualities eminently fit him for the position he holds as the head of that party—what did he do the other day? He went down to Halifax and there, in the absence of his opponents, he first made the lamentable blunder of supposing, when he was talking to the Jones and Vails, that he was talking to members of the old liberal party; that he was surrounded by the genius and spirit of the Liberals who fought under Joseph Howe and William Young.

Mr. MILLS. Under whom?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When the proper time arrived they united in a patriotic band to support the Confederation. The hon. gentleman forget that all the leaders of the Liberal party had sooner or later rallied round George Brown and the Conservative and Liberal party of Nova Scotia united on the common policy of sinking old party names, ties, and cries in the interest of their common country, and some of the recalcitrant Tories declared that I was too liberal for them to follow me. When did they leave me? When Mr. George Brown, in view of the troubled condition of the country, asked me as a patriotic man, and sustained in my own Province by a majority of two-thirds in both Houses, to aid in endeavoring to bring the country out of its difficulties, I responded, and recalcitrant Conservatives left me because they held that I had got into bad company. The hon. leader of the Opposition, forgetting that the time had come when every man in the old Liberal party of Nova Scotia, in favor of Constitutional Government, was united with me in favor of advancing the interests of our common country, expressed the delight he felt at finding himself in the company of Halifax Liberals. I would forgive the blunder, but he knew that the greatest crisis in the national affairs of Canada that ever occurred was when Confederation was adopted. I had thrown myself heart and soul into the movement with Sir John A. Macdonald, Hon. George Brown and Hon. William McDougall in the endeavor to build up a British nationality on this continent; but the hon. gentleman placed himself in antagonism to the popular sentiment, although he has more than once declared that of all the Provinces which had been benefitted by Confederation, not one of them benefitted to the same extent as did Ontario. That was the hon. gentleman's declaration, and I say, if that were true, then the hon. gentleman owed a debt to me for the aid and assistance I gave in accomplishing that which he himself declared had been so beneficial to this country. But, what did he do? Behind my back, when I was thousands of miles away, the hon. gentleman, in the metropolis of Nova Scotia, in the city of Halifax, endeavoured to excite and exasperate the public mind against me because I assisted in carrying Confederation. True to the same policy, I believe the hon. gentleman—I may do him an injustice, but when I see him engaged in such a bouleversement as this; when I find him ready to proclaim one principle to-day and trample it under his feet to-morrow, because it stands in the way of his own ambitious path; when I find that he was ready to strike me a blow beneath the belt in my absence; when I found him ready to throw contempt, not only on myself, but on George Brown and Alexander Mackenzie (because they were sailing in the same boat with me—what I had done in Nova Scotia these gentlemen had done on the floor of the Parliament of Canada); when I refused to put that question to the people at the polls, I had only sustained the policy which George Brown had declared on the floor of Parliament was the only constitutional mode by which such a question could be settled, and the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) supported him in that view—I say that when the hon. gentleman was willing to throw contempt on his own colleagues and supporters, and his late leader, by the course he took; when I find that he did not hesitate in my absence to adopt the course I have referred to, I say I have a right under these circumstances, to suppose that if these hon. gentlemen felt it was necessary for their advancement, necessary for their own progress, necessary for their restoration to power, they would trample Confederation, with all the blessings it has brought to this country and the national life of Canada, beneath their feet just as recklessly as they have trampled under foot their previous policy with reference to the settlement of the North-West and the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MILLS. I am quite sure that if a stranger had come into the House when the hon. gentleman began his speech and had listened to him to the close, it would have been utterly impossible for him to know what was the subject under discussion. The hon. gentleman has spoken for nearly two hours, but he said nothing about the resolution that my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has placed in your hands. The hon. gentleman has devoted the whole of his time to giving a certificate of character to the Government of which he is a member. He has spoken in the most laudatory terms of his colleagues generally, and of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals in particular. The hon. gentleman has told us how disinterested and patriotic his services have been, not only since Confederation, but for a long time before. It seems to me, however, that he has forgotten many things which would have added a great deal of interest to the discussion had he given to the House some explanations with regard to them. I am not going to enter into a discussion of all the points raised by the hon. Minister of Railways, but one would have supposed from a great portion of his speech that, instead of devoting our attention to the land policy of the present Administration, the House had under consideration the Bill which I had the honor to submit to a former Parliament in 1878. Well, Sir, I do not think it necessary to enter into a very lengthy discussion of the principles of that Bill. I believe they were sound. I believe those views would commend themselves to the majority of the people of this country. The hon. gentleman says now that he is in favor of the principles set out in that Bill.

Mr. PLUMB. No, no.

Mr. MILLS. Yes. He said he was. I know the hon. member for Niagara was opposed to the Bill, and I know he is under the impression that if he was opposed to it the hon. Minister of Railways must have held the same view, because, in the estimation of the hon. member for Niagara, there is a great deal of difficulty in distinguishing the Minister of Railways from that hon. member (Mr. Plumb). I remember on one occasion the hon. gentleman rose in this House and said that in consequence of the absence of the hon. Minister of Railways, instead of speaking for himself he proposed to make a speech on behalf of the absent Minister, and I think the hon. gentleman is sometimes under the delusion that he and the hon. Minister of Railways are the same person; but Sir, I might say to the hon. gentleman that, although he was opposed to the Bill, the hon. Minister of Railways said at the time nothing against it, and he said, to-night, that he was in favor of its provisions.

Mr. BOWELL. He stated that he said nothing against it.

Mr. MILLS. He said more. He said he favored the provisions. Now, the hon. Minister of Railways delivered a speech which was full of sound and fury, but signified very little. He told us we were flies on the wheel. He told us of the eminent services of the present Administration. He told us that hon. gentlemen on this side had no bowels of compassion, and in that respect the Administration have no doubt the advantage of hon. gentlemen on this side. The hon. Minister of Railways read some portions of the Bill, and read them, I think, unfairly, because some very important parts of the measure were left out of consideration altogether, and he said that the policy adopted in that Bill was precisely the policy adopted by the present Government; that we provided that no line of railway having the same general direction as the Canadian Pacific Railway should be built, under the provisions of the Bill, within forty miles of that road. But, Sir, that was a Government work, and this is a private enterprise in the hands of private parties. The Government do not merely say, no road in the same general direction shall be built, but they say, no road in any direction shall be built—no road extending to any point towards the boundary between south-west and south-east shall be constructed in Manitoba or the North-West Territories. Then, Sir, provision was made for the voluntary incorporation of railway companies. Charters were to be granted as a matter of course, on the fulfilment of certain conditions. It was not a matter of discretion with the Government or with the Minister of the Interior; it was a matter of right that any parties who declared their intention to build a railway between certain points, who made the necessary surveys, who filed the plans and specifications in the Department of Public Works or the Department of the Interior and paid into the Treasury ten per cent. of the cost of the road, were to be entitled to receive the charter. But they could not obtain such a charter as a matter of right for a road within 40 miles of the Canada Pacific Railway and having the same direction. But the Government did not declare by the provisions of the Bill that parties would not have the right to come to this House and ask for incorporation on the proposition to build a road within 40 miles of the railway and having the same direction. The Government simply reserved to the Parliament of this country the right to say whether a road within the distance mentioned in the Bill should be or should not be built. The hon. gentleman said that railway companies are speculators, that they are just as much so as capitalists seeking to invest money in public lands. I deny that. I say they stand in a wholly different footing; that railway companies seeking to build roads within the territory have a special interest in the development of the country, in order that the people living along the line of the railway may furnish profitable employment to the road. It is upon the carriage of freight and passengers that their prosperity depends, and it is not so at all with regard to speculative land companies. The hon. gentleman says that he would like to know who is opposed to capitalists going into the country and investing their money in lands. Well, if the hon. gentleman knew something of the history of Upper Canada, if he knew something of the Canada Company and the English capitalists who invested their money in the wild lands of Canada, if he knew the unpopularity of that company, if he knew the extent to which it impeded the general settlement of the country, he would understand why the people of Ontario especially would not be disposed to favor the creation of similar companies in Manitoba or the North-West Territories. The hon. gentleman says that we were very much opposed to the placing at the disposal of the Government 100,000,000 acres of land to assist in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Well, I for one was opposed to the proposition which the hon. gentleman then made. I did not believe it was practicable, and if practicable, I thought it was a very unwise proposition to agree to. What did the hon. gentlemen propose? They proposed that we should place at the disposal of the Government of this country, and of Commissioners in England, 100,000,000 acres of land, to be disposed of as they might think proper. What was implied in that proposition? Why, Sir, this was implied: that capitalists had not confidence in the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. That, at all events, was the opinion of the hon. gentlemen themselves; they said also in effect: "Although we have representative Government in this country, and although, under our representative system, the disposal of public lands is to be subject to the representatives of the people in Parliament, yet we propose that persons who are not residents in the country, and who owe no responsibility to this country, shall control 100,000,000 acres of land in the North-West Territories." That was the proposition of hon. gentlemen, but it did not succeed. It was not because of any opposition that came from this side; the large majority of hon. gentlemen enabled them to carry their proposition through Parliament; but they found it impracticable, and had to abandon it. Well, the hon. gentleman has referred to and reiterated misrepresentations of the speeches made by the hon. member for West Durham and the hon. member for Lambton, in reference to the lands of Kansas and Texas. Hon. gentlemen have over and over again persisted in that course, and the press which supports them has followed their lead. They have not only misrepresented what was actually said, but the whole pith and spirit of what was said. It is well known to everyone here that it was not an American immigration company or an American railway company which published the pamphlet with the portrait of the leader of the Opposition. That pamphlet was published by Mr. Belford, an ardent and active supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite. It was published in the interest, and I do not think I would be out of the way in saying at the instance, of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches; and if the books of the United Empire Club were examined, we should probably find who paid for these pamphlets. There was never a more impudent statement made in Parliament or given to the press of this country than the statement that that pamphlet was circulated or published by any railway company in the United States. The quotations that have been made, and the misrepresentations indulged in, are all in perfect keeping with the character of the pamphlet; but, to use a vulgar expression, that sort of discussion is played out, and these hon. gentlemen will not be permitted to use these misrepresentations without being met by a statement of the facts. The hon. Minister of Railways, not satisfied with the answer of his leader to the hon. member for Norfolk, undertook to improve on that answer. The hon. gentleman says it is highly desirable that large numbers of the people of Ontario should go into the North-West Territories. Well, it is a matter of uncertainty whether it contributes largely to the prosperity of the country to transfer a large portion of the population from one fertile district to another. I can well understand that if a large foreign population were going into the North-West Territories, a large immigration of people from Ontario or the other Provinces of the Dominion might be of essential advantage. They serve to introduce the habits, the mode of thought, the system of education among the foreigners which prevail in the older Provinces; they serve to make a homogeneous population. Every one who has studied the progress of American settlement westward knows the great value that the settlers from New England and the Middle States have been; they have converted the German, Irish and Scandinavian population into American people, who, after a generation or two, do not differ materially from the native population. Well, Sir, the immigration from Ontario and the other Provinces into the North-West would serve the same purpose, if a foreign population were going in there. But there has not been that population going in. The hon. leader of the Government has told us that 28,600 people went into the country last year; but he did not tell us how many came away. When he says that 17 per cent. left the country, I think he greatly under-estimates the number. I have taken some pains to look at the number of homestead entries, and if we leave out the number who have settled in the city of Winnipeg, I believe the homestead entries fairly represent the population which have settled in Manitoba and the North-West Territories each year. In 1877 there were 1,426; in 1878, 1,753; in 1879, 3,876; in 1880, 2,074, or nearly 1,800 less than there were the year before; and in 1881, 2,753, or nearly 1,200 less than there were in 1879. These figures speak for themselves, and they show that there has not been that large immigration into the country, with the view of settlement, which the hon. gentleman has spoken of. The hon. gentleman has told us of a large number who have gone there lately. We all know that excursion trains have carried people up there to prospect, and it may be that many will go there to settle; but those who have gone there have not gone for the purpose of settling, but either for speculation or for prospecting with a view to future settlement. Both the hon. gentleman and his leader have referred to what they call the large emigration which formerly took place from Canada into the United States, but let me say this, that if the returns of the United States are at all to be relied upon—and I believe they are approximately correct, if not strictly so—the emigration from Canada to the United States last year was upwards of 120,000, and the year before it was nearly 100,000. Why, Sir, if you look at the whole period of the former Administration, you will see that a larger number have gone to the United States during the last year than the number that went during the five years the hon. member for Lambton was at the head of the Government.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no evidence of that.

Mr. MILLS. There is the evidence of the Bureau of Statistics at Washington, the same statistics that hon. gentlemen opposite relied on when they prepared their manifesto. The hon. gentleman has said that we on this side declared that we would not consent to an increase of taxation for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway, and yet an hon. gentleman on this side declared that $3,000,000 were added to the taxes of the people of this country for the purpose of carrying forward that work. The hon. gentleman will remember that after the agreement to construct this railway was made with British Columbia, the taxation was reduced when Sir Francis Hincks was Finance Minister; and when the taxation was again raised, it was raised very little beyond the rate at which it stood before the reduction. Moreover, after this bargain was made with British Columbia other charges were made upon the public revenues. There was a large increase in the public debt; there was an increased amount of interest to be paid annually; there was the assumption of the debts of the various Provinces, and the taxation that was imposed, to be strictly accurate, was rather for the purpose of meeting these additional charges than to fulfil the obligations with British Columbia. It was only to put British Columbia in the position she was in before. It was not adding to the burdens of taxation, which already existed on behalf of British Columbia; but it was in order to keep faith with British Columbia, by putting the revenues, as far as possible, in the condition in which they were at the time when the contract was made. It is well, Sir, in considering the question in hand, to look at what has been done in connection with the settlement of the North-West country. Why that country was opened up for settlement by the hon. gentlemen who have said so much in confirmation of their ability and statesmanship; but who did not exhibit remarkable ability and statesmanship in getting possession of it, as they succeeded in provoking a rebellion in that country; they entailed very large burdens in repressing the rebellion; and in order to quiet those whom they had offended they were obliged to reserve 1,400,000 acres of land in the immediate vicinity of Winnipeg. Well, Sir, when that country was first opened up for settlement they appointed land agents, but they were very dilatory in deciding where the half-breed reserves would be; and people who went into that country found that it was impossible to ascertain what lands were so set apart; and after remaining for a few weeks about Winnipeg, and being unable to obtain any satisfaction, the land agents stating that they had not received such instructions as would permit them to give a decided answer, they left the country and settled south of the border. Large settlements were formed in this way along the Red River, both in Minnesota and Dakota; many of these settlers were from Ontario, and they have drawn to them nearly all those who have left the sections of the country in which they had themselves resided. Nothing is more natural when a man leaves a country with the expectation of bettering his condition, than that he should go where he knows people with whom he has already resided, with whom he is acquainted, who will assist him in selecting a favorable location, who were formerly his associates and neighbors, and who will thus become his associates and neighbors again. In this manner, if the hon. gentlemen will look at the statistical returns for Minnesota and Dakota, they will see that they have settlers from Canada all the way from Fargo to the international boundary. In fact, I believe, Sir, that to-day there are a larger number of Canadians in the State of Minnesota and in the Territory of Dakota than there is in Manitoba and the North-West Territories, and they have been largely driven there by the policy which these hon. gentlemen adopted when they first took possession of that country and when they first invited settlement in to it. Sir, the hon. gentleman has spoken of the attempt in this House to advertise American lands, as an unpatriotic course. Sir, we never advertised American lands. We left that to hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, Sir, pamphlets were sent from the office of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and were circulated in this House and distributed abroad, which contained glowing eulogies on Minnesota and Dakota, which were written by a late colleague of theirs, the Hon. Peter Mitchell. These pamphlets contained advertisements of railway lands in Minnesota and Dakota, and in fact I do not know any persons who have been so cosmopolitan in making known the quality of lands of other countries beside their own as the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches. Now, Sir, the Minister of Railways declares that it is unpatriotic to deny any statement; that in fact no matter how absurd, how exaggerated, how misleading a statement is when it is made in regard to this country, or rather in favor of the Government of the day, as was the case with the eulogies of hon. gentlemen opposite—it is highly unpatriotic, if not treasonable, to undertake to correct it.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. And tell the truth.

Mr. MILLS. And tell the truth. Now, Sir, as I have already said, we know right well how to drive away people and induce them to settle in a neighboring country as these hon. gentlemen did in regard to people who went to Manitoba. These people will draw large numbers with them; and no means for advertising any country is so effective as the letters which are written by those who leave a country to their former neighbors, who will be thus induced to become their neighbors again, and I know all through the West, people have gone from Canada, and many of them were supporters of these hon. gentlemen, and settled in Dakota and Minnesota. Why, Sir, I know, within a radius of two miles in the county in which I reside, twenty families during the last two years have gone to settle in the United States; and no matter where they settle in the American Union, they will be the means of drawing others with them, who are disposed to leave the country. Now Sir, the First Minister and the Minister of Railways have complained because my hon. friend from North Norfolk has pointed out what he considers to be the objectionable tendency of these land regulations, and of the policy that the Government has adopted. Well, he says, amongst other things, that this will lead to the formation of rings and have a tendency to induce corrupt bargains, and bring improper influences to bear on the part of the Government. Well, Sir, why do hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches resent this as a personal attack upon themselves? It can only become such, if they undertake to uphold and maintain this policy, after it is clearly pointed out that such is its tendency. Why, Sir, is it because he believes that every man will be improperly influenced by the Government if any such policy is in force, that the hon. gentleman makes these statements? Not at all; but it is because it has necessarily this tendency, because some men may be influenced by it, and because some persons will undoubtedly be so influenced, therefore it is necessary to provide a check against influences of this sort by legislative restrictions being placed on the Statute book. The question is: Are these regulations open to objections of that sort? I think that my hon. friend succeeded in showing that they were; and that they are open to such objections. I consider that a powerful motive is held out to men that have money and are disposed to speculate, to use that money in an improper way. The hon. gentleman spoke about a certain religious body in this country becoming a colonization Company; and the hon. gentlemen may do the sort of thing to which he referred. In my opinion, it tends to prevent the body that controls any large degree of moral opinion in this country from being brought to bear upon the ethical character of the public acts and the policy of the Administration. This is wrong in itself and ought not to be permitted, ought not to be encouraged, and yet it is precisely what is being done. Let me take another one. Let me suppose that a large number of influential men, residing in a constituency of one of the Ministers and of a member of this House, especially a supporter of the Administration, formed themselves into a colonization society and come here and press this Administration for grants of land, I say that these men can influence the Government altogether apart from any bribe. For the very fact that they possess the power to influence the constituency may, of itself, induce them to improperly influence the judgment of a Minister or some of the supporters of that Minister.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Nonsense.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. the First Minister said that when the late Administration were in power they locked up the country, that they locked up twenty miles on each side of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman did precisely the same thing. Under what circumstances was this done? Why, it was proposed that the land on each side along the line of railway should be taken to aid in the construction of the railway, and that railway should be constructed, if possible, by a company. It was also provided in the Bill submitted by the right hon. the First Minister in 1872, and which became law, that the Company, along with the Government, should have the power of fixing the value of the lands, and that this value should not be less than $2.50 per acre. Well, that restriction against the settlement necessarily grew out of the settlement which had been adopted; besides, the lands along this line were not surveyed or set out for settlement, and the hon. gentlemen himself, up to this hour, does not encourage settlement beyond the limits of the surveyed districts. On the contrary, he said, the rights of settlers in certain cases would not be protected, if they settled beyond the limits of the surveyed districts. One hon. member shakes his head, but he has only to look at the proceedings of last night and see that my statement is correct.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. the First Minister only referred to school lands or what might be school lands.

Mr. MILLS. That is not my point at all. My statement is that the hon. gentleman does not encourage the practice of settlers going beyond surveyed lands.

Mr. BOWELL. Whether surveyed or unsurveyed, the squatters' rights are protected and recognized under the law.

Mr. MILLS. Further than that. I say that the lands were not surveyed beyond the limits of Manitoba, but when the late Government saw that there was no prospect of immediate engagement being made with any Company, so far as lands were surveyed, they were opened for settlement, but the settlers were notified that the price of lands must depend upon the provision of the Pacific Railway Act. When we look at these provisions, we see they are precisely what the hon. member for North Norfolk has represented them to be. This plan No. 2 is of such a character that a colonization company or other parties may get possession of the land, and put the whole number of settlers required upon a single section. They might retain 9-10 or 19-20 of the township in their own possession, and give the remaining, 1-20, to those persons whom they might induce to go into the country. They could count parties settling on village lots as settlers, and the hon. Minister who has charge of this Department justifies that policy by saying it is a margin for speculators. It is certainly a very broad one, one which the Government have to consider, and which they undertake to justify. When we look at these provisions we find that all those land regulations are simply impediments in the way of settlement. If the lands were kept out of the hands of speculators; if there were no middlemen who expect to make a large profit at the expense of the actual settlers, there can be no doubt whatever that this country would be much more rapidly settled, than under the special provisions of these regulations. There is no analogy between the land grants given to assist railway construction and lands given to private corporations for purposes of speculation. It is in the interest of railway companies to sell their land and have the country settled within a reasonable period of time.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. I thoroughly understand the hon. gentleman's hear, hear, I say that the railway corporations have an interest in securing the settlement of the country within a reasonable time. They know that the traffic and travel over their road depends upon the settlement along their line of railway.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman says: hear, hear, and thinks what I have said is a full justification of what the Government did last year; but where the railway is not limited in its charges it is a question whether, while the Government hold half-lands along the line open for settlement, it is not their interest to settle theirs, as the Government lands can be utilized for that purpose and the railway can make larger profits by increase in the value of their lands and by unlimited freight charges. I will just revert for a moment to the Railway Bill which the hon. First Minister spoke of as a bogus or paper charter. The hon. Minister of Railways took a different view, and the provisions of the Bill show his view was right, that it was not a bogus charter. Further, under the provisions of that Bill, the late Administration, if they had carried out their scheme, would have taken power to sell the lands instead of giving them to companies or placing them at the disposal of a railway corporation. The Bill provides that the Government may dispose of the lands and pay over to the railway company the proceeds of the sale up to the sum of $10,000 a mile, but if the lands were sold for more than that the company would not be entitled to the money. Now, Sir, there is one further observation I will make in regard to these land regulations. I think they are objectionable on the grounds which have been stated by the leader of the Opposition and by the hon. mover of the motion that is in your hands. I believe they will impede instead of promoting settlement. I think no worse policy could be adopted than in transferring the public domains of this country from the hands of the Government and from the control of Parliament into the hands of private speculators who will hold those lands purely in their own interests. While these lands are in the hands of the Government, while they belong to the Crown, they may be controlled by Parliament in the public interest. There are other considerations than the mere amount of money to be derived from their sale; there are other and more important considerations in the settlement of the country. Those considerations cannot weigh with the speculator who holds these lands for an advance in price, but they are everything to the Government of the country for the time being. But Sir, I observe there is no legal authority for these regulations. I observe that these regulations are framed under the provisions of a law passed in 1874, sections fourteen and fifteen of which authorized the Government to do what is done in these regulations. But I find by the Act of 1879 that these sections were repealed. In the consolidation of the law the hon. gentleman did, I suppose, what we see he has done in the Bill before us, trusted to others for the proper consolidation of the law, and left out these sections which authorized the Government to make regulations of this kind, so that we have regulations before us which are not only impolitic and detrimental to the public interest, but which are wholly unauthorized by any law that is now in force in the Dominion.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to notice a few points which have been raised in the course of the debate. The hon. member for North Norfolk has brought forward and spoken at at much length upon resolutions which embody very nearly the line taken on previous occasions, but it must not be considered that because the language is the same his position is at all consistent with his course in reference to the land policy either of the late Government or the present Government. The gist of the hon. gentleman's resolutions is that grants of our northwestern lands should be made to actual settlers only, independent freeholders, each cultivating his own farm, and that sales of land should be made on reasonable conditions of settlement to actual settlers only. Now, the first thing we notice in the hon. gentleman's speech is the charge that the present Government has not encouraged the actual settler; that the present Government has been induced to become the promoter of speculation in the North-West, to the exclusion of the actual settler. It may scarcely be necessary to do more, in replying to that baseless assertion than to read from the Dominion Lands Regulations, published in the Canada Gazette of Dec., 1881:

"The following regulations for the sale and settlement of Dominion Lands in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories shall, in and after the first day of January, 1882, be substituted for the regulations now in force, bearing date the 25th day of May last:—

"1. The surveyed lands in Manitoba and the North-West Territories shall, for the purposes of these regulations, be classified as follows:

"Class A.—Lands within 24 miles of the main line or any branch line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, on either side thereof

"Class B.—Lands within 12 miles, on either side, of any projected line of railway (other than the Canadian Pacific Railway) approved by Order in Council published in the Canada Gazette.

"Class C.—Lands south of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway not included in Class A or B.

"Class D.—Lands other than those in Classes A, B & C.

"2. The even-numbered sections in all foregoing classes are to be held exclusively for homesteads and pre-emptions."

Now, Sir, there is ample provision in the last paragraph that I have read for all the possible wants of all the possible settlers that will go to the North-West within any length of time under which these regulations may be kept in force. It is perfectly true that they have been changed from time to time, and will doubtless be changed again. It is equally true that as settlement goes on it may be found necessary, in the interests of the country and of the settlers, that changes should be made, but I hope there will never be any provision made such as was made by the late

Mr. MILLS.

Government, where forty miles of land was exclusively reserved on each side of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they then contemplated, and where no man could buy an acre of land at any fixed price, but he was allowed to settle on the land and pay $1.25 an acre, and bind himself to pay such other and further indefinite sum as the Government should demand of him at any time thereafter. Those were the terms which the hon. gentleman vaunted as having been the liberal terms adopted by the late Government. Those were the terms which he now endorses and supports as having been the policy pursued by the late Government. The hon. gentleman, in discussing the land regulations, has not always posed as the particular advocate of the settler. Since his party was overthrown he has constituted himself the special protector of the settler, the possible settler, the probable settler, the settler who has not appeared, the settler who may come some time or other; but as usual the Premier and the Minister of Railways, by quotations from his speeches in the Debates of Parliament, have answered him out of his own mouth. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways, to-night, in hastily looking over the scheme embodied in the late Government's Colonization Railway Bill of 1878, which was endorsed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, did not state the case quite as strongly as it could have been stated, for he omitted one or two very pregnant conditions. In the first place it was provided in that Bill that any fifteen persons could unite together and could file a certificate with the Minister of the Interior, and could subscribe capital to the extent of $12,000 a mile and thereby become a railway corporation. It was to be a railway corporation with power of eminent domain, with power to take lands exactly as railway corporations are authorized to do under the Railway Act, with powers practically unlimited as to the charge they should make for freight or passengers; in fact it was not restricted in the slightest degree as to the character of the road to be built, or as to curves, grades, rails or equipments, and the companies were allowed to build ten, twenty or thirty miles or more anywhere, and to charge any rates they pleased for carrying freight and passengers. Not only that, but the companies would have corporate powers when one-half of the capital was subscribed viz., $6,000 a mile, and when 10 per cent. of that amount had been paid in, which reduced it to $600 per mile. Then there was a provision that the companies should have a land grant; and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) himself has just stated that there was a provision by which they were entitled to a subsidy of $10,000 a mile if the Government withheld and sold the land subsidy. That was the Bill respecting colonization railways, which the hon. member for Bothwell endeavoured to force on the House by means of the dominant majority.

Mr. MILLS. It was $12,000 a mile.

Mr. PLUMB. These companies were allowed:—

"Every alternate section of ungranted land by odd numbers, to the extent of ten sections per mile, five sections per mile on each side of the line of the railway, exclusive of the sections which under the Dominion Lands Act may have been reserved as school sections or may have been allotted to the Hudson's Bay Company; and for any line or part of a line of railway west of the 102nd meridian of west longitude, twelve sections per mile, and for any line of railway connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway and extending into the Peace River District, twenty sections per mile; and whenever twenty-five consecutive miles of any portion of any railway shall have been completed, equipped and in operation, the Governor in Council may convey to the company the land so reserved, or a part thereof, along the said railway so far as the same is completed, and for each consecutive ten miles of the remainder of the railway the Governor in Council may, as the same may be completed, convey the lands so reserved along nine miles thereof to the company."

And I repeat that the Corporation were required to subscribe but $6,000 a mile, and to pay but 10 per cent., or $600 a mile thereon. There was no limit to the number of railways that could be thus organized. Such is a brief synopsis of the Railway Bill which the hon. member for Bothwell brought in as the result of five years' cogitation, and as the final embodiment of the railway policy of hon. gentleman opposite, brought in as a Ministerial measure as Minister of the Interior, and it must be accepted and insisted upon as being the expression of the views and opinions of the Ministers of that day and their supporters. What was the principle on which the passage of the Bill was advocated? The hon. member for Bothwell said, in advocating its adoption:

"This was a novel feature here in the incorporation of a railway company, but it was not a novel feature elsewhere. It had been the principle long recognized in the neighboring Republic. Almost every hon. gentleman was aware that after a railway was once incorporated, extending through a considerable portion of the territory, having acquired a considerable amount of local influence, it would always use that influence adversely to any corporation or any other railway company that was likely, in any way, to become a competition for traffic or travel."

The hon. gentleman further said:

"This Bill proposed to provide for the voluntary incorporation of railway companies."

Again he said:

"No railway company could invest capital freely, unless it was to the public advantage."

Still again he said:

"The money was only invested for the purpose of enabling the company to secure a dividend upon their investment by accommodating the public, either by furnishing facilities for travel or for traffic."

"They determined for themselves whether their investment was wise or unwise, and all this Bill proposed to do, was to give them an opportunity of determining whether they would invest their capital or not."

"They knew by the experience of the progressive settlement and development of the adjoining country, especially that section which lay west of the Mississippi River, during the past fifteen or twenty years, how largely railway accommodation contributed to the progress of colonization and settlement."

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman opposed that measure at the time.

Mr. PLUMB. It makes no difference to my argument whether I opposed it or not, but in this instance I will inform the hon. gentleman why I did so. I opposed it because it permitted a system of making herring-bone lines running South Easterly to the frontier from the Canadian Pacific Railway throughout the whole North-West and Manitoba which would effectually destroy the Pacific Railway, and the hon. gentleman seemed to have introduced the Bill for that purpose. That was my reason for opposing the Bill, and the hon. gentleman will find such a statement in practically the same words in my speech. The hon. member for North Norfolk was one of the most earnest defenders of the scheme; he said:

"If railways were essential to the development of the Western States, they were tenfold more essential to the development of the North-West. It was useless to think of opening up and settling this country without furnishing it with railway facilities."

Now he asserts that all the land should be reserved for the settlers. He said further:

To-night the hon. gentleman opened his speech by saying that the lands in the United States were offered on fairer terms to settlers than the lands of our North-West. He said they were for sale at $1.25 per acre, but he omitted to say that they were not in the neighborhood of railways, and were inaccessible to settlers. In support of the Bill of 1878 he said of the public lands in the United States and of ours:

"These lands were denominated double minimum lands and sold as readily at $2.50 per acre as other lands did at $1.25; and the result of railway land grants, so far as land sales were concerned, was that Government had actually received as much for its lands as it would have been likely to have done if the whole area had been sold at the ordinary Government price. Now, in the North-West there were untold millions of acres of land. They were told by the hon. member for Northumberland that this was the heritage of Canada, that it had been bought by the people's money; but in its present shape of what value was the great wild, lone land to us? The question was how land was to be utilized, and for that purpose the Minister of the Interior had devised a Bill, which, in its conception was admirable and which, in his opinion, would, if carried out, attain the object of populating this vast country.

* * * * * In the North-West they had lands which would give sufficient sustenance for 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 of people; let them get inhabitants for it as soon as possible. If they could pour 50,000 a year into it, those settlers would pay into the coffers of this country, in the shape of Customs duties, $250,000 per annum, and the Government would derive a far greater revenue this way than from the sale of these lands.

* * * * * He held that the only policy to open up and develop these large tracts of country was a liberal railway policy; and that, while it was proper to exercise due caution, it would not be good policy to propose the building of lines for the sake of saving a few hundred acres to the mile."

Every acre of which would have been part of a homestead for the hon. gentleman's intending settler, in whom he now professes such an intense and such a generous and unselfish interest. He said also in 1878:

"They could not induce capitalists to embark in a speculation of this kind except upon liberal terms, but he believed, with the hon. member for Peterborough, that it might be well for the Government to retain in their hands the sale of these lands."

Oh yes, it would be very fine; the Government, if they did retain the sale of these lands, were bound to give to these railway men, who were not chartered and were not even bound to give their names to Parliament, but merely had to file a certificate of organization with the Minister of the Interior, $10,000 a mile upon a railway on which they had only to pay $600 a mile as capital. No such gigantic and impudent speculation was ever laid before the House in the shape of a Bill by private promoters, as this of the Minister of the Interior, who was responsible as a member of the Government for the administration of the vast interests in the North-West which he is now so anxious to promote and protect. What further did the hon. member for North Norfolk say? He said:

"They were told that these railway claims were going to absorb the whole of the North-West."

See how moderate the hon. gentleman is in his demands for the public domain for these railway companies. He says, very complacently:

"Under no circumstances can they absorb more than half of it."

At that time the hon. gentleman did not appear to have the interests of the intending settlers so deeply at heart as he has now since the force of circumstances have compelled him to take the other side of the argument; and I must give him the credit of saying that he argues equally well on either side, and his arguments are entitled to just about the same consideration in this House and in the country when he argues on one side as when he argues on the other. The hon. gentleman said:

"He hoped that the Bill would be accepted, and that we on our side of the House would look with statesmanlike forethought to what were the real interests of Canada."

The real interests of Canada, as he regarded them in 1878, were to give away one-half of its territories in support of railways of the most flimsy character—railways on paper, the proprietors of which were only to pay $600 a mile to entitle the right of taking lands, and if that right was to be taken from them they were to receive compensation from the Government to the extent of $10,000 a mile in cash. He concluded by urging us to "Accord to this measure the generous support which it most certainly deserves."

Another gentleman then came forward as an earnest advocate of that Bill—a gentleman whose eloquence is often heard in this House, and who also has the faculty of making rose-colored statements when he desires, and putting on darker hues when that serves his purpose better. The hon. member for West Middlesex said of our side of the House:

"Now, when a scheme was proposed for the colonization, the settlement and the development of one of the Provinces of this Dominion, they placed obstacles in the way; questioned the bona fides of the scheme; and in various ways attempted to throw discredit on the plans of hon. gentlemen on the Government side for developing the material resources of the country. * * * He thought the Bill was one for which the Government deserves particular credit, and he trusted the opposition to it would be just as feeble as that already presented by the hon. member for Niagara."

Well, Sir, my opposition to that Railway Bill, as I stated before, was based upon the ground that it did not provide for sufficient capital, that it was giving too much power to people to organize Railway companies, and that it would postpone or destroy the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That was the ground I took, and that was the line of argument used by hon. gentlemen on our side of the House; and nothing could be more unfair than for the late Minister of the Interior to say that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways was in favor of that Bill. He never spoke on the Bill at all.

Mr. MILLS. He said so to-night.

Mr. PLUMB. No, he did not say so to-night. I do not believe the hon. gentleman intends to misrepresent, but my hon. friend did not say anything to-night that could warrant that statement. Now, I have already referred to the fact that the hon. gentleman who brought in this resolution stated at the outset that the United States offered to intending settlers more favorable terms than this Government. I have read the terms offered by this Government, and I have shown how anxiously, how sedulously, how constantly this Government has endeavored to protect the rights of settlers; and I tell the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk that his speech and the speech of those who followed him, if they can have any weight anywhere, are calculated to warn the intending settler that he must not come to Canada but must go to the United States, where he will find better terms. These speeches are upon exactly the same principle as the statement made by the late First Minister that the difficulties and privations of settlers going into that sterile, cold, inhospitable country of ours in the North-West were such that with every facility and inducement that could be offered to them, there were inducements offered in the State of Texas far superior to any that we could hold out. This is on the same general principle as the statement made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, which has been spoken of to-night—in a speech in which he spent hour after hour decrying this country, decrying our resources, decrying the ability of the North-West to furnish the means of building the railway; asking us to go back to 1872; saying that we never could fulfil the engagements made with British Columbia; ridiculing the bargain made with that Province; saying that it was made on the first of April—"fitting day for fitting deed"; and treating us to page after page in favor of the rapid settlement and growth of the Western States of America. He then cited Kansas as an instance of progress and prosperity. He mentioned the inducements that were held out to settlers by that State, and he certainly held them up in contrast with the advantages of our own western possessions. And without doubt he had in his mind the fact that it was better for immigrants to go to Kansas than to settle in our North-West. So far did the hon. gentleman advertise Kansas lands, that it is notorious that he has been made the endorser of the schemes of Kansas landtouts and railway schemers. He may not have intended it, but he has been made so to appear, and it is useless for the hon. member for Bothwell to say that the pamphlet which has been referred to in this House, was the production of the hon. gentleman's political enemies. The thing is too thin. The hon. gentleman knows in his own heart that there is no foundation for that statement. The hon. gentleman knows that this pamphlet emanated from railway agents in the United States; and I do not wonder at those crafty gentlemen for seizing with avidity on the recommendation of so eminent an authority as the present leader of the Opposition. I do not wonder that they were at great expense to get the hon. gentleman's countenance perpetuated in its most smiling expression on their pamphlet. I do not wonder that these gentlemen thought that they had found a treasure when they got the hon. gentleman to endorse their land schemes, or, at any rate, when they were able to so quote his language as to endorse them; and if any hon. gentleman reads this pamphlet, he will find the quotation which was made from a speech by the leader of the Opposition on the floor of this House, and which justifies all the statements that I have made. Sir, the whole course which has been pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite in this debate and in every other debate which has been sprung on this House by hon. gentlemen opposite, both in moving in Supply and in their other resolutions and other discussions, has been tinged throughout with exactly the same characteristics (interruptions.) I hear disturbances which, I hope, the hon. gentlemen opposite will cease to make. I believe that these hon. gentlemen are greatly indebted to us for our forbearance in listening to the kind of speeches which we have heard from that side of the House; and I can tell them, in recollection of what happened between 1874 and 1879, that it would not be a difficult matter for me or any other gentleman standing on this side of the House to create a kind of reprisal which would not be agreeable to the hon. gentlemen. Now, Sir, there are some other very curious facts connected with the presentation that has been made by the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution. He has laid great stress upon the iniquities of colonization schemes that have been got up for the purpose, as he maintains, of robbing the intending settler. He has called them gigantic swindles, and he has called those who are engaged in them, "harpies." The hon. gentleman probably did not reflect that he made a little mistake in using the term "harpies," unless those persons have changed their sex, for I believe that the harpies were females, if I correctly remember the mythology of which they formed a part. But, Sir, harpies, whether male or female, he has denounced in the most unmeasured terms. Yet in looking at the Canada Gazette, I find the notice is given that application will be made for the charter of a company which is to have a capital of one million dollars, for the purpose of colonizing, developing and dealing in lands of the North-West, embracing all the objectionable features which my hon. friend has denounced so eloquently, and of which he has drawn such a terrible picture while one of the incorporators. I think the leading incorporator is the hon. member for Lambton. If hon. gentlemen opposite, or any hon. gentleman on that side of the House, denies that notice of any such application has been in the Gazette, I will look it up. I say that it has been made by the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and others; and this application contains many, if not all, of those horribly objectionable features which the hon. member for North Norfolk painted so eloquently.

Mr. RYMAL. The hon. gentleman has not produced the notice.

Mr. PLUMB. You will get it in time. I am not bound to produce it, but I will do so. I must say if everything I hear is true, that the hon. gentleman who has interrupted me was not so solicitous to protect his friend, the member for Lambton, a year or two ago as he seems to be now. During that hon. gentleman's crisis, and when he (Mr. Mackenzie) was in extremis, I do not think the hon. member for South Wentworth then rose up to the hon. gentleman's defence—if this may be for his defence; but perhaps the hon. gentleman is anxious to fix this statement as a reproach upon the hon. member for Lambton. The hon. gentleman will now be gratified. The notice is as follows:

Notice is hereby given that application will be made to His Excellency the Governor General in Council for letters patent under the provisions of "The Canada Joint Stock Companies' Act, 1877," by the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, James Beatty, the younger, George Albertus Cox and so forth. The proposed corporate name of the Company is "The British Canadian Colonization Company (limited), and the purpose is the acquiring of lands in the Dominion, etc., the capital stock to $1,000,000 in shares of $100 each.

In another of the colonization companies, one of the corporators is a brother of the hon. leader of the Opposition, and two are among the patriotic gentlemen who proposed the second Syndicate. The hon. member for North Norfolk makes great objection to the introduction of capitalists as holders of land in the North-West. He is very much afraid of the bloated aristocrat, and wishes here and everywhere else, since he did not get his colonization road and the case is changed and it is convenient to take the other tack, that the actual settler only shall be permitted to take up lands in the North-West. I believe that the hon. gentleman, in his secret convictions, if he has any, agrees with us in believing that the very best thing we can do to promote the interest of the laborer is to send capital into the North-West to employ labor. We want to induce large proprietors to go in who will employ labor and pay liberal wages; we want to send laborers there, and to afford them the opportunity of earning sufficient money to take up their 160 acres of Government land and buy their farming implements. Those who advocate the policy the hon. gentleman advocates are in favor of keeping laborers out of the North-West. There is every reason to suppose that the mass of ultimate settlers who will make up the best population of the North-West, will be those hardy men who go in there as day laborers, and as soon as they can save enough will take up the 160 acres reserved specially for them by the Government. The hon. gentleman seeks to shut those people out. We, on the other hand, whom he denounces as acting in the interests of speculators, monopolists and colonization schemers, like the hon. member for Lambton, propose that there should be inducements for poor men to go there, that they should be find work on the railway, and with large holders, who wish to cultivate their lands, and that considerable tracts of land shall be sold to men who will have the means of employing labor at high prices. We have a broader, a more comprehensive and generous policy towards the actual settler than the hon. gentleman has ever dreamt of, or proposed on the floor of this House. Why, the hon. gentleman has never suggested any practical scheme which looked to the settlement of the country except that selfish one which he advocated. The Colonization Railway Bill of 1878, by which he could get for himself and his friends, without risking capital, large grants of land, and by which, he and those who acted with him, would have so absolutely impoverished the portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, running across the fertile belt, that it never could have been built and operated around the north shore of the lakes, and would have been simply an adjunct or feeder to the Northern Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman for West Durham says that Ontario is being depopulated by the exodus into the North-West. I never heard that the State of New York complained that some of its population went from it to settle in Indiana, Illinois, and the States west of the Mississippi. I never heard of any objection made in the State of Massachusetts to the large exodus that went out of that State to settle in the west; on the contrary, every movement of that kind only drew firmer the bonds that united the Western with the Eastern States. The railways connecting those States by trunk lines running east and west and became the highways by which the people that went into the west, came back and visited their own homes. They kept up their old ties; and one of the strongest that binds the Union together to-day is the settlement of the west by the emigrants from the New England States, Pennsylvania and New York. The late Minister of the Interior admitted the same thing in the course of his argument when he said it was desirable that the people of Ontario should go into the North-West in sufficient numbers to form the basis of municipal institutions in that country. If the hundreds of thousands, which those hon. gentlemen have predicted, go into that country Ontario will only furnish the leaven that will leaven the lump. Is there any desire on the part of our opponents that an Act should be passed to prohibit the people of Ontario from going into the North-West? Why, they go there because we have offered them inducements to go, because it is a prosperous country, and is rapidly filling up under the policy of the present Government. We did not hear much about the exodus to the North-West in the time of the late Government. There was no alarm felt then that Ontario would be depopulated under their rule for they had so ingeniously contrived their land regulations as to shut out all settlers. Such movements of an enterprising population as are now in progress are inseparable from the healthy growth and settlement of our new territories. They need create no alarm,—men with large families will send their sons into the North-West, while they themselves remain at home, instead of keeping their sons at home and subdividing their farms. It does us no harm. We are all parts of a great whole. We must learn to look upon this nation as a unit. Every man should be proud to know that we are able out of our surplus population to furnish means of building up loyal Canadian Provinces in the North-West. I have not heard a more selfish, a more narrow-minded argument uttered on the floor of this House than the argument of the leader of the Opposition in regard to that very point based upon a misleading statement of the numbers who, it is alleged, are depopulating Ontario and settling in the North-West. Another hon. gentleman opposite said that even large numbers were going into the Western States, into a country that was held up to us some time ago as an example of everything that was to be shunned on account of its high protective system. Yet we are now told that country with its terrible Tariff and frightful prices is attracting many thousands of our population—hundreds of thousands, according to the statement taken from reports of American Custom House officials, which were quite as truthful, no doubt, as those of the United States officers at Port Huron exploded by the hon. Deputy Minister of Agriculture. I tell hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, that men do not abandon their farms and go into new countries; they sell their farms for good prices, or they find good tenants for them, or they stay upon them. If they go away there is evidence that there is a demand for the farms they leave by those who stay behind. I remember well that when the hon. member for Gloucester on one occasion stated that half the farms were left desolate in his Province by people who were going to the United States, going to the most highly-protected country in the civilized world, it occurred to me that owners of New Brunswick farms would find purchasers or lessees before they left them, and would not rush empty-handed into another country. However, I think the statement of the hon. gentleman refutes itself, and I think there will be nothing gained to the Opposition by such arguments. In every case this Session, where a hostile resolution has been moved by the Opposition, I have had the satisfaction of seeing those who supported it put on the defensive, and they have been again driven to that position to-night. They have been utterly unable to meet the arguments of my friends. They have not attempted to reply to them. Nothing more damaging to the Opposition can be well imagined than the present exposure of their railway colonization scheme of 1878—a scheme that the Mackenzie Government would have forced upon the country had they not been compelled by their own friends, and by our vigorous remonstrances, to withdraw it. They dared not bring it to a vote. His party may thank their champion from North Norfolk, for the disclosure of a half-forgotten Grit railway scheme by which fifteen people could form a railway corporation, self-chartered, and uncontrolled and by paying $600 per mile, could demand a large land subsidy from the Government and could capitalize that subsidy for $10,000 a mile. Why, Sir, it cannot be believed that these gentlemen were ever in earnest about building the Canadian Pacific Railway, or they never would have consented to such an insane proposition as that. The hon. leader of the Opposition spoke hour after hour last year in urging that the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, then under discussion, should be so changed as to deflect the line down to the American frontier, and thus give the traffic of the North-West to the United States, the traffic which the Eastern Provinces were striving to secure by large subsidies, and to which they had a paramount claim. There has been a sedulous attempt on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite to secure the construction of other lines which would tap the Canadian Pacific Railway and deprive Ontario and Quebec of the benefits of that road. In this they are consistent with their past policy, which has constantly tended to the injury of Canadian interests, and to diverting whatever advantages there may be in the trade of this country into the hands of our neighbors across the border. Now, while I am on my feet, I may notice a personal reference to myself which has been made by an hon. gentleman opposite. I am pained to see that he should have so far forgotten himself—I scarcely suppose he did forget himself, because I believe his slanderous words were simply the expression of his malevolent nature—as to state that I addressed the House, on a late occasion, as an alien with alien instincts, that I was put up to insult the Province of Ontario and endeavor to defraud her. Well, Sir, I always supposed that it was the policy of Canada to welcome strangers from all parts of the world who chose to come here and abide by her laws and to take part in endeavoring to promote her interests. I supposed, until I heard from hon. gentlemen opposite and from the newspapers, which are their organs, that it would be more acceptable to all Canadians that gentlemen who came to reside in these provinces should take the oath of allegiance and become British subjects rather than remain aliens; but many of those who heard the abusive words of the hon. member for Centre Haron, who would have taken the oath of allegiance and who were prepared to strike hands with Canadians and go forward with its people, will be deterred from doing so, and the blame will rest at the doors of hon. gentlemen opposite, who have taken up such a cry as that to which I am referring, which is disgraceful to themselves and a reproach to the country which sends them as representatives to sit in this House. I have no doubt that the motion which has been proposed by the hon. member for North Norfolk in a speech which may be considered as a specimen of his very best special pleading—which, of course, will have all the weight which the hon. gentleman's utterances on the floor of Parliament heretofore entitles him to receive, and which will have all the weight with the Canadian people to which his precious record entitles him—will meet the fate which all resolutions offered on that side of the House on motion to go into Committee of Supply have met with. Still I believe there are hon. gentlemen opposite who are sufficiently moved by motives of patriotism, by feelings of fair play, and by the statements made on this side of the House in regard to the policy of the Government with respect to the settlement of the North-West, to pause before they accept at the hands of that hon. gentleman from North Norfolk the resolution which he has brought forward and offered for the acceptance of the House. I believe there are hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who have a sense of fairness, who are not led away altogether by party considerations, and who feel that on a great question like the settlement of our Western Territories, it is well that we should sink party issues and endeavor, instead of obstructing the course of the Government, who have this onerous duty on their hands, to sustain them and promote their endeavor to bring the trade of Canada into Canada and not have it go to feed the insatiate country which adjoins us and which is ready at any moment to seize upon any pretext to check our onward career of prosperity in the North-West, and, if it were possible, would soon deplete the railway we are building and deprive these provinces of the benefit of its traffic; and believing thus, I hope that when the question is taken we will find that the hon. member for North Norfolk has gained nothing by his motion.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I agree with the remark made by the hon. member for Niagara, as he was resuming his seat, that the resolution moved by the hon. member for North Norfolk will be defeated as similar motions made under similar circumstances have been defeated before; still I am a little surprised at the reception which it has received from the House. I would have supposed that such a resolution, formulating a distinct principle, pointing out dangers which are common to new countries, would have been met with argument, that it would have been discussed on its merits and its principles analyzed, and if false the fact would have been pointed out, and the House placed in possession of such facts as would prove that the resolution should not be adopted. That course has not been pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite in any single instance, so far as I have observed. In no instance was a straightforward attempt made to show that the resolution should not pass; in every instance the hon. mover was met with abuse or something tantamount to it. The leader of the Government held up his hands in holy horror at the imputation or insinuation, as he called it, of the hon. member for North Norfolk, that the present land system in the North-West was calculated to induce corruption. The hon. gentleman was not to blame in making an imputation of that kind. He was only reminding the House of what the President of the Council had said regarding the Minister of Railways—namely, that he was the high priest of corruption. Such a statement not having been withdrawn or recalled, the hon. member for North Norfolk was certainly not to blame in insinuating that it was quite possible there was great danger to the political purity and honesty of hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not particularly alarmed about their political purity and honesty myself. I would not propose the resolution on this ground. I think there is a sufficient degree of integrity in the breasts of hon. gentlemen opposite to lead them to do what is fair; at least I will assume there is. I am prepared to assume that Ministers being invested with such a great and important trust, would not degrade the high position by any act of corruption. The hon. Minister of Railways did not attempt to answer the propositions contained in the resolution before this House; he did not advance a single argument in regard to the position he took. Instead of doing that he drew a red herring across the path in order to divert the attention of the House from the resolution by referring to a Bill submitted by the hon. member for Bothwell a few years ago, and to show from that Bill that the members who advocated the position taken by the Opposition were poltroons or hypocrites. What is there involved in the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Bothwell inconsistent with the position taken by the hon. member for North Norfolk. The Bill proposed by that hon. gentleman was not a colonization Bill in the light of the schemes of hon. gentlemen opposite, but it was a Bill proposed with a view to opening up the North-West for settlement on precisely the same lines and involving the same principles as the scheme by which the Western States were opened for settlement, and which hon. gentlemen opposite approved. These two schemes are essentially different; one is for the settlement of the country, and the other is for a colonization system which may be opposed to the settlement of the country, and may retard it, and it is on that ground the hon. member for North Norfolk and those prepared to support him protest against the system of land regulations introduced and sustained by the present Government. But, Sir, let me go a little further, and let us endeavor if we can to see what is involved in the resolution which is now in your hands. What is the question really before the House. The question, as I understand it, is the best mode of securing the settlement of the North-West. Now, I can see in a proposition involving the consideration of such an important question as that, no necessity for such strong terms as were used by the Minister of Railways, and by the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). We have a large patrimony in that country—one that cost us a large sum of money. I see by a schedule attached to the Public Accounts for last year that we have expended about $30,750,000 on the purchase, settlement, improvement and development of the North-West. We paid for it, in the first place, £300,000 sterling, and we are opening it up by the construction of an extensive railway system, which will tax the resources of the country to the utmost, as the hon. gentleman opposite has admitted. We have provided a system of Government for that territory, and we are paying annually a large sum of money for the maintenance of peace within its bounds. We are taxing ourselves annually three quarters of a million to promote surveys in the North-West. That country is the estate of the people of Canada, purchased by Canadian money; it belongs to the people of Canada, and the question which the House has to consider, and should consider honestly, apart from the arguments of the hon. gentlemen opposite, is: what is the best way of settling and developing that country? What the hon. member for Norfolk says, is, that the best way to secure the development of the country is to sell the lands to actual settlers, and in making that statement honestly, in repeating it this year, as he repeated it in 1880—for the fundamental proposition in both resolutions is precisely the same—he is met by abuse. He is charged with being a hypocrite, and we on this side are charged with being hypocrites and with being inconsistent. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to find a single resolution on the Journals of this House since the Reform party in 1865, 1866 and 1867, first advocated the purchase of the North-West, inconsistent with the position we are taking to-night—the position that we believe the prosperity of the country depended on the sale of these lands to actual settlers, and for the smallest sum consistent with the public interest. We in Ontario are familiar with land monopolies. We know what detriment it was to the prosperity of our country, that the Canada Company received a large grant of lands years ago; and what we are doing to-night is, warning hon. gentlemen opposite that there is danger that they may repeat in the North-West the same evil—the same crime, shall I say—that was committed years ago by the Imperial Government in giving the Canada Company such a large grant of land in Ontario. I venture to say that there is not a single gentleman who will vote down this resolution and who goes back to a constituency where there are any Canada Company lands, but will meet with the indignation of his people when they are told that he is attempting to repeat in the North-West the same grievance that was inflicted upon the people of western Ontario. I know something of that grievance by personal knowledge in my own county, and I do not think we see the worst of it there. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is now warning the Government that they may repeat in the North-West the same grievance which was experienced so bitterly in the western parts of Ontario. Let us narrow the discussion down, and what does it amount to? It narrows itself down to this: shall the land in the North-West be sold directly by the Government to the settler or by the Government to middlemen, who will pass it second-hand to the settler. Now, if the proposition is sound, as I am satisfied it is, that the Crown lands of this country are the property of the people, and the next proposition is sound that it is in the interest of the country that settlement should be promoted, then I say that the Government should be exceedingly careful not to waste the Crown lands nor to dispose of them in any other way than for the settlement and development of the country. What is involved in the opposite course? Simply this: instead of our being in a position to encourage and assist in every possible way the settlement of these lands, we are putting obstacles in the way. We send immigration agents to Europe, and what offer do we make? We say: "We have abundance of land in the North-West; we have broad acres there awaiting the cultivation of implements suitable to that country. Leave your crowded cities; leave the small acres which you cultivate and on which you almost s'arve; come with us across the Atlantic and we may be able to plant you almost without money and without price on the fertile prairies of the North-West; but if the lands go into the hands of the speculators or into the hands of parties who will hold them until the surrounding lands are improved or developed, we are not able to offer these inducements to settlers." Settlers will ask what are the conditions of settlement, what are the prices of these lands, and it will be found that in proportion as the prices rise, in proportion as the first purchases of the land exhausts the slender means of the settler, to that extent do you diminish the chances of settling the country and developing its resources. I ask any hon. gentleman, familiar with the development of the Western States—Illinois, Kansas, Minnesota—if the statement I am now making is not true, viz., that the settlement of these States was mainly promoted by the fact that the lands were exceedingly cheap, that they could almost be got by paying for the cost of survey, and that in addition the Government offered inducements to railway companies whereby immigrants could be easily placed on the farms they were going to cultivate. We should adopt the same system. We are now building a railway. We are making it easy for the settler to reach his land, but we are making it difficult and in some cases expensive to get possession of the lands. We are exhausting the slender means which he may have when he reaches the country, and to that degree we are acting contrary to the best interests of the country, and I fear—I am speaking candidly—we are acting in such a way as will tend to retard the settlement of that country. Hon. gentlemen seem to rejoice in the fact that a large number of settlers are pouring into the North-West, but are these settlers pouring in for the purpose of settlement or speculation? I say largely for speculation. The statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that the number of homesteads in 1880 were less than in 1879 proves this. It proves that those who are going there now are going with an eye to the main chance of buying up large areas which they will sell to those immigrants who are now coming from England and the Continent, requiring homes in which to settle themselves. Hon. gentlemen opposite, by pursuing this suicidal policy will lock up the lands in the hands of colonization companies, and those who can afford to lay out of their money for a while, and the consequence is that the settler, who has the first claim on the land, will have to pay an additional price; and this additional price does not go into the Treasury of the country, but into the pockets of those who may be fortunate enough to get possession of the land. The hon. gentlemen, in meeting our demand for candid consideration of this question, charged us with decrying the North-West. I think that charge is entirely out of place. The history of the Liberal party proves that they were the first to propose the negotiations by which the North-West became part of the Dominion of Canada. Besides, what object could we have in decrying the North-West? Are we not citizens of this country, the same as hon. gentlemen opposite? It is unfair of hon. gentlemen opposite to try to fasten such a charge on the Opposition. What about the pamphlets that were circulated with the portrait of the leader of the Opposition, they say? What about the reference made to Kansas? Sir, hon. gentlemen know right well that if they wished to put these statements fairly, they would say that they involved no disparagement of the North-West, so far as the Opposition are concerned; and the pamphlets bearing the portrait of the leader of the Opposition were circulated by a Conservative agent of lands in the Western States, and for Conservative purposes. He was at one time editor or assistant editor of the Toronto Mail, and that gentleman no doubt circulated these pamphlets with the view of influencing the people of this country, politically, as well as with the view of doing a good stroke of business. And yet that is the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite—of men of extensive parliamentary experience—in meeting a proposition we make in this House that they should seriously consider an important question affecting the interests of this country. But hon. gentlemen opposite say the Government are bringing an immense amount of capital into the North-West. For what purpose? Is it for the development of the country? No. We would be exceedingly glad if the investments made in the lands of the North-West tended to the development of the country; but suppose every hon. gentleman opposite went and invested $20,000 in wild lands, and returned at the end of a year with $40,000 profit, would the capital thus brought into the North-West tend to its development? Not at all; on the contrary, the more capital brought into the North-West for this purpose, the greater the injury to the country, and the more serious the difficulties placed in the way of settlement. Outside of Winnipeg, and Portage la Prairie and one or two other towns on the Pacific Railway, of what advantage has the capital put into the North-West by speculators been? Of no advantage whatever that I can see; it may be of advantage to Ontario, where these gentlemen may spend the profits they make in the North-West, but it can only be an injury to the North-West itself. But these hon. gentlemen say further that they have a very large area of lands in the North-West, and although they may sell 10,000,000 acres to colonization societies, and give these societies peculiar advantages, still they have such a large area remaining that the injury to the country will be of small consequence. Is it not true that the best lands in the North-West are taken up by these colonization societies? And is it not true that if you diminish the productive capacity of that country by 10,000,000 acres, you retard the progress of the whole country? I believe that in 1871 we had only 17,000,000 acres of cultivated land in Canada. Give 10,000,000 acres of the North-West to the people who form these societies, and you practically lock up nearly as much land as was cultivated in 1871 in the whole Dominion of Canada. The hon. member for Niagara says that the speeches made by gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House have a tendency to deter settlers from going into the North-West. I cannot see how. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have given a cordial support to every fair proposition made for the development of that country; and I venture to say that there is not a young man in the Province of Ontario who talks of settling in the North-West this year, but will feel that the strongest friends he may have in his new home are the Opposition in the House of Commons of Canada to-day. What are the sentiments of the people of the North-West themselves? What were the utterances of the large meeting held at Portage la Prairie a few days ago? Were they not that the land regulations of the Government have a tendency to impede the prosperity of the country? These men knowing the dangerous influence of these regulations, have already expressed themselves, and perhaps may still more forcibly express themselves, to the effect that these regulations tend to retard the development of the country; and every settler from Ontario who finds that he has to pay two or three prices for these lands, knows right well that if the lands were sold according to the policy of the hon. member for North Norfolk and the Opposition, he could receive his lands at first cost from the Government, and would be to that extent in a better position to make for himself a home. Sir, I warn hon. gentlemen opposite of the feeling in the Province of Ontario in reference to these land regulations. The people of Ontario know that that territory was purchased largely by Ontario funds; they know the value of agricultural lands, and while prepared to pay a fair price for those lands, they are not prepared to pay fictitious prices, as the land regulations of hon. gentlemen opposite will compel them; and when these people from Ontario go into that country and feel the iron heel of the monopolist and the speculator, they will be disposed to express their opinion in such a way as will arouse the torpor and indifference of hon. gentlemen opposite to the true interests of the great North-West, and to secure for the Opposition a more generous support in the North-West, as well as in the Province of Ontario, than they have heretofore received. Sir, this resolution I think should pass; it is not inconsistent with the position we took before. I supported the proposition of the hon. member for Bothwell for the opening up of that country by railway schemes, and I would be prepared to do so again. It makes no difference whether railways forty miles from the Pacific Railway are assisted by land grants or not; that policy has been accepted by both sides of this House. But it is not involved in the support of a system of railway colonization that we should support every system of land monopoly which hon. gentlemen opposite may be disposed to organize and to force through this House by their large majority. And, Sir, all we can do in Opposition, though we may be derided as unpatriotic, as hypocrites, and as poltroons, is to enter our protest, and to sustain that protest by our votes on the Journals of the House; and then, when the hon. gentlemen opposite give us the opportunity, we can tell the people of this country in language which they will not mistake, although hon. gentlemen opposite will not heed that our patrimony in the North-West was to a great extent sacrificed by their Land Bill; and that every young man from the Province of Ontario that went to that country had his success jeopardized by the policy of the Government; and that the thousands which he might take with him to make for himself a home in the North-West were reduced in their productive effect by the system which hon. gentlemen opposite initiated. I fancy, Sir, that when the good, sober sense of the people of Ontario is appealed to, hon. gentlemen opposite will then know that there is a public sentiment in this country which regards land monopolies and unfair land regulations as not congenial to this country, and not conducive to its welfare; and hon. gentlemen opposite who negotiated that system will receive the condemnation which they deserve.

SUPPLY.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

45. To meet expenses in connection with Patent Record..... $7,200

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I observe that in last year's Public Accounts the cost of this service was $8,244, being $1,000 more than the hon. gentleman thinks is now required. What is the cause of the reduction?

Mr. POPE (Compton). The expenditure up to the first of January last under this head was $4,197, and I think we will be able to get through with the amount which we ask.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Is the Record published by contract?

Mr. POPE (Compton). Yes; the resolution was agreed to.

46. To meet expenses in connection with the preparation of Criminal Statistics..... $4,000

Mr. BLAKE. I see that there is a decrease of $1,000. To what cause is this due?

Mr. POPE (Compton). We found last year that $4,000 were sufficient, and we think that the sum mentioned will meet our purposes.

Mr. BLAKE. A great portion of the value of a record of this description consists in comparative tables, and we have now arrived at a stage when such tables would prove very useful in saving a great deal of labor on the part of those who desire to obtain these results.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I think the suggestion is worthy of consideration, and I will consider it.

47. To meet expenses in connection with the Census..... $60,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I understood that we were, before this item was taken up, to get some further information about the Census; and I think that the Minister promised to supply us with the first volume; but as yet we have seen only one statement.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I had hoped we would have had the first volume before this time; but I will give the hon. gentleman any information he may desire if he states what he desires to know.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. We would very much like to know the number of people who were not in Canada when the Census was taken but who were included in the Census. If the Minister has succeeded in obtaining this information it will be of very great moment and interest, but I doubt that we will get it.

Mr. BLAKE. May I ask if this revoke of $60,000 will, with the $200,000, cover all the costs of the Census.

Mr. POPE. I believe the last Census, taken in 1871, which included the four old Provinces of Canada, cost $511,000. This will still cost more than the revoke of $60,000, and I fancy the whole cost will be $460,000.

49. To meet expenses in connection with Health Statistics.....$10,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I would like some explanation as to what he proposes to do with this particular $10,000, and in the next place, what is the general scheme under which the Government propose to collect these health statistics?

Mr. POPE. I do not suppose it will grow much beyond the $10,000. There was a proposition made to us by the Dominion Medical Board that with a small sum they could obtain reliable information of this character. We propose to make a proposition to them that if they will lay before us a scheme by which they can give us statistics in this question, we will give them a certain portion of this appropriation. It is entirely experimental.

Mr. BLAKE. It seems to me that before the hon. gentleman launches his scheme before the House he ought to have looked into the plan and ascertained if it were at all feasible to ascertain reliable statistics over the whole country for any such sum as that fraction of $10,000 which will be available for outside work after making a proper allowance for the office work. This matter has been mentioned in Parliament for many years and the objection has been that to procure reliable vital statistics would require a large organization and a large expense. Now, the hon. gentleman says that he has not considered the plan which the Board of Physicians have submitted to him, that he is going to talk to them after he has got the vote, and that if they satisfy him they have an efficient means for collecting statistics the scheme will go on; if not it will not. I think the hon. gentleman ought to have obtained that information before he asked for this vote. It is doubtful if this sum will be effectual to accomplish the object. He is, in effect, taking a vote of credit for the purpose of not giving any explanation to Parliament at all of the plan by which he proposes that the work should be carried on.

Mr. POPE. If I spend it I will give an explanation. My hon. friend is talking upon a very much larger subject than is contemplated by this vote. He says that we have often talked of vital statistics before. So we have, but we have talked about agricultural and industrial statistics before. In this matter there is not contemplated anything of that kind. I knew that the hon. gentleman would be quite willing to trust the expenditure of this $10,000 to my judgment.

Mr. BLAKE. Will you promise not to ask for another $10,000?

Mr. POPE. No, not till I give you a good reason.

Mr. ORTON. I think this subject has not received the attention it deserves. I entirely concur with the hon. leader of the Opposition that if vital statistics are to be obtained of any value, the sum that is set apart is utterly useless for that purpose. With regard to this subject, I desire to state that I do not think there is any subject that can more profitably engage the attention of this House than the collection of reliable health statistics. By that means, largely, can the people generally and the officials in the Dominion be instructed in the means to be taken to prevent serious epidemics occurring in this country. I believe that by a moderate but a sufficient sum, not only large benefit can be derived to the country, but we can do more with it than with the money that is expended in encouraging emigration to this country, in saving the lives of people that are born in this country and are natives of the soil. I regret that there has not been a larger sum placed in the Estimates for that purpose. I do not know what the schemes of the Government are, but I believe they expect to obtain from the medical men in the country voluntary returns during the year. There may be something done in that way, because we all know that medical men as a rule are willing on any occasion to render their services in the interest of the public; and I am led to believe from the interview which the representatives of the medical men of the Dominion had with the Government, that such is the idea, but I do say that this sum is utterly inadequate for the purposes that are sought.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I think this is a step in the right direction, and I hope the hon. Minister of Agriculture will move a great deal further. I regret we have no Department for compiling statistics affecting the general affairs of this country. If we want to get statistics of the Marine Department we have to go and search through all the reports from Confederation down, and the same with regard to all the Departments. If the hon. gentleman would go a little further and establish in connection with his Department a bureau where statistics of the industrial prosperity of the country would be compiled and published annually, if not monthly, useful information would be obtained as was the case at the present time of the bureau at Washington. It would not cost much, and I am prepared to support a moderate expenditure on that account. The Ontario Bureau of Agriculture and Statistics, which is now being established, will prove exceedingly useful.

Mr. ANGLIN. Before an appropriation is asked the hon. Minister should be prepared to lay definite plans before the Committee as to how it was proposed to obtain the desired information. It would be asking too much from medical men to ask them to furnish statistics. At the same time information of this kind must be accurate, or it would be misleading. If the vote were passed the hon. Minister should be prepared next year to explain to the House how it has been expended.

Mr. MILLS. It is inconsistent with our theory of Government that Parliament should vote money without having full particulars before it as to the proposed manner in which it should be expended. The proposed appropriation is not for a purpose well known to Parliament. It is proposed to collect statistics by some method, and the plan should be submitted to Parliament, as we have the right to know whether the proposition is a reasonable one or not. If the hon. gentleman is not prepared to give the information now as to the plan to be adopted, I think he should do so on concurrence.

In reply to Mr. BLAKE,

Mr. POPE. If we were to go into an extensive scheme of health statistics it would involve an expenditure of at least $150,000 or $200,000. By the present proposition the Dominion Medical Association are to collect the health statistics of the country for $10,000. If they do the work they are to get this amount; if not, it will not be expended.

50. Immigration..... $250,000

Mr. POPE. The first increase is $100 on the salary of the Norwegian interpreter, who is an energetic and hard-working officer. In the London office, there is an increase of $500 to Mr. Colman, the principal clerk, and an increase of $600 to Mr. Just, and $730 for messengers. There is a large amount of additional labor required this year for messages, &c. As to the increase of $150,000, I may first mention what we did with the $100,000 granted last year. We paid $12,407 as commissions to the steamship lines; to the Grand Trunk, $14,828.86; for general transport, $1,144.34; to delegates, $3,446.23; for printing and publication, $15,543.86; to G. R. Kingsmill, $475.50. My hon. friends were very anxious about the exodus last year, so I engaged Mr. Kingsmill to get them additional information, and he was paid the sum I mentioned. Mr. Kellam, who goes on the train and sees the immigrants through to their destination, got $951.46, and we gave $1,021.50 for the same service. Mr. Taylor, the Iceland agent, gets $700.00; Mr. Waller, who is our agent at Chicago, and a very efficient agent he is, gets $551.15; Mr. Williams gets $100.00; Mr. Gerald gets $148.00 for looking after immigrants at Prescott; Mr. Lynn, of Worcester, Mass., gets $1,752.72 for inducing French Canadians in that part of the country to return to Canada, and from information I have received from him, I understand that a large number are going from there to the North-West in the coming year; Mr. Armstrong, who was in Manitoba locating immigrants, got $252.50, but he is not now in the employ of the Department; Mr. Grahame, the agent at Duluth, expended $4,075.67; for locating immigrants in the North-West, and this includes several parties, $2,142.46; literary services, $360.00; Queen's Printer, $237.42; for ocean mail clerks, for giving information about the country to passengers, $400.00; and sundries, $4,692.52, making a total of $90,000.00. The expenditure in the London office was as follows: Rent, £247 8s. 4d.; German delegates, £258 9s. 8d.; printing and stationery, £1,080 4s. 6d.; advertising, £185 5s. 9d.; sundries, £436 1s. 11d.; special expenses of agents, £663 1s. 11d.; making $13,970.03, or a total expenditure for the current year of $104,201.24. But we expended more. At the time last year's Estimates were brought down I supposed that the Government of Ontario were going to continue the arrangement we had with them, and were going to pay two-thirds of the inland fare to Ontario. They decided, however, not to do so, but it having been advertised, and their own agents having invited people to come to this country on the understanding that they would have a free inland passage, we were bound to carry that arrangement out. No matter what the Ontario Government or any Provincial Government might do, the Dominion Government were held responsible for everything in England, and we could not allow this statement to go across the Atlantic that Canada refused to carry out her engagements. For this reason our expenses were increased by about $28,000, and I would not be surprised to find them increased before the first of July, 1882, by $50,000. I wish every member of this House to understand that we feel it incumbent on us to use every effort to induce agriculturists and domestic servants to come from Great Britain, Germany or anywhere else to settle in this country, and that we will contribute one pound to assist each person to come. The estimate is at least $80,000 for the coming year, which will account to a considerable extent for the increased amount which is placed in the Estimates. If we are to have this large immigration, I must see that these people are carried through the country, and must aid them in reaching their destinations, as far as Lower Provinces are concerned, but nothing is done with reference to Manitoba and the North-West, save in the way of obtaining for them cheapest possible rates. We provide immigrants with passages from Liverpool to Winnipeg for from $30 to $35, which is the ordinary steamship passage. This is partly due to the grant of £1 per head, which applies to all parts of the Dominion, and partly to the reduction of inland rate. I ask hon. gentlemen to consider this question fully and to see whether it is not in the true interests of this country that $250,000 will be as well spent as any other sum that we can vote for any other purpose. Besides, these immigrants have not come into the country with empty pockets. They add to the resources of the country; and last year they actually brought in four million dollars, while we expended $150,000 in order to get them here. These four millions were added to the circulation, and we expect to double this immigration this year. It may be fairly estimated that it costs $50 a year to bring up a child, and consequently a child sixteen years of age would have cost $800. Thirty-two thousand immigrants came into Canada last year, and at a valuation of $800 each, this would be equivalent to a valuation of twenty-five millions, apart from the four millions in cash which I mentioned, making twenty-nine millions in all. Under these circumstances, I think no objection at all will be taken to this vote.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman give us any information in regard to the success of his efforts in connection with tenant-farmer immigration.

Mr. POPE (Compton). During the last year, we invited four delegates from Germany, and one from Switzerland, and we have the most encouraging accounts in that respect to prospective German immigration. The other day tenant farmers from Great Britain, having with them something like half a million dollars, passed through to the North-West. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that our immigrants during the past year were of a very superior class. We ascertain the amount of the cash that they bring with them from information which is collected from the immigrants by our agents; but the amount mentioned necessarily falls very far short of the real amount, as only a portion of the immigrants are questioned in the nature of things, on this point. I never do anything to induce residents of the older Provinces to go to the North-West, but if any desire to change their location, I certainly urge them to settle in our own western country instead of proceeding to the United States. We contribute to the aid of French Canadians who went to manufacturing districts in New England some years ago and who return to Canada and settle in the North-West, exactly the same amount which we grant in assistance to European immigrants.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Can the hon. Minister give us the number of immigrants that have remained in Quebec for the last year?

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Could he fairly say twenty settled there?

Mr. POPE. Yes, I can say 500 settled there.

Mr. IRVINE. The hon. Minister said every immigrant that came into the country was worth $800. I do not doubt that assertion, but those who leave it must mean an equal loss to the country per head. I have just received a letter from Carleton, which I will read:

"One thing is to me quite alarming. Hundreds of our people are leaving here and going to Colorado, Montana, and the Western States. They have been going constantly for the last six weeks, and 120 are leaving the 1st of May. Tell Tilley he must put on more taxes to prevent this exodus."

Mr. ANGLIN. It is to be regretted the efforts of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to induce our people to remain have not been more successful. The exodus this year is greater in my part of the country than it was ever before, and 99 out of every 100 go to the States. The statement of the hon. Minister that every immigrant who came out here brought out so much money does not agree with his statement that it is necessary to provide funds to bring them out. That does not seem to be a sufficient reason for adopting this new mode of inducing emigration, to induce the working classes of the City of London in which Sir A. T. Galt is interesting himself—not a very desirable class of emigrants—to come to this country. It would be necessary, no doubt, to reduce the rates of passage very materially; but I wish just now to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the claims of New Brunswick to some assistance in the way of emigration. Last year and the year before we claimed that emigrants coming from Europe by the Allan Line who desired to come to New Brunswick or Nova Scotia should be assisted as others were assisted to go to the Western Provinces.

Mr. POPE. So they were.

Mr. ANGLIN. I understood they were not, but I am glad the hon. Minister has found his way to doing what I think he objected to when the matter was brought up here before.

Mr. BLAKE. I observe on the page 21 of his report a reference is made to this sum of $1,000,000. It reads thus: "To the above figures should be added the amounts of money taken into Manitoba by new arrivals, and brought in in 1881 by other arrivals from abroad." I wish to know the meaning of that statement.

Mr. POPE. That is the total. A considerable part of that total was not reported at Winnipeg, but a good deal was at Quebec.

Mr. BLAKE. It would include then such reports as the agents at Duluth, Emerson or Winnipeg received from persons who come from other parts of the Dominion into Manitoba, as well as those who came from abroad.

Mr. POPE. It is only a portion of the foreign emigration. It also includes that from the Western States, but it is confined entirely to the foreign emigration.

Mr. BLAKE. I observe a statement in the letter of Sir, A. T. Galt as to the difficulty of emigration in consequence of want of means. On page 187 of the hon. gentleman's report I find he says:

"I find from the communications I am constantly receiving, that a very large number of working people in every part of the Kingdom are willing and anxious to emigrate, but are prevented by want of funds, the removal of entire families requiring an amount of money which their savings, only small on account of their families and the irregular nature of their employment, will not bear. I look to the formation of colonization companies in this connection with pleasure, and trust that a part of their efforts will be in the direction of helping deserving families of this kind. Such associations will have the security of the land for any advances made, and the risk will be lessened by the fact of the settler having nothing to gain by breaking his contract, being placed as he would be in a position he could not have hoped to occupy before."

Is it in reference to the class mentioned in this paragraph that the hon. gentleman proposes this plan of the £1?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Then there is to be a continued operation on the part of the colonization companies and the Government. We are to assist the efforts of the colonization companies.

Mr. POPE. No. The hon. gentleman understands wrongly the meaning of that report. Sir A. T. Galt referred to these Emigration Aid Societies particularly. It refers to the Emigration Aid Act of this country and also to the societies formed on the other side of the water, not upon this side at all. He was referring to these for the purpose of encouraging the Irish Emigration Societies as well as others; also those that came out under the Emigration Aid Act of 1872.

In reply to Mr. BLAKE,

Mr. POPE. The commission referred to in the $12,500 was a vote taken in this House for commissions promised in 1877—$8,000 of it, I believe. The other $4,000 was for the three months. I found that emigration was lagging a little; I wanted to increase it if I could and I offered a commission to the steamboat agents until some time in September. After October comes in I do not think it desirable that we should induce people to come here very much. If they do come we will do the best we can for them, but we should not hold out any special inducements. It was during these months that we probably paid the ten shillings currency.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it intended to continue the system of paying commissions next season.

Mr. POPE (Compton). Nothing on the reduced rate. There will be a commission paid on the £4 rate.

Mr. LONGLEY. It has been a source of great satisfaction to all to witness the attention which the Minister of Agriculture takes in the subject of immigration. Allusion has been made to the very large emigration going on from the Lower Provinces. I do not myself believe there are one-fourth as many going from the Lower Provinces as has been alleged by the hon. member for Gloucester, but I am afraid it cannot be denied that too many are going away to the United States and the North-West Territory. My own impression is that a very considerable proportion of those who have gone and are going are removing to the North-West, but while we would very much prefer that the people should remain in the Dominion, yet as far as practical results go the depletion of the population of the Lower Provinces amounts to about the same thing for the time being. The question is whether the time has not arrived when there shall be a modification of existing plans for the promotion of immigration to this Dominion. There are very few of those who have a practical stake in the country who are emigrating from the Lower Provinces; but the young people of both sexes are leaving. The condition of things is this: that as far as agricultural laborers are concerned, it is almost out of the question to obtain a sufficient number to cultivate the soil. What we want, therefore, is an element to supply that deficiency, and the Ministry might consider whether agricultural laborers could not be landed at Halifax and St. John as well as Quebec.

Mr. KILLAM. I venture to express the hope that this country will be made as attractive to the people as are those countries to which they are going.

Mr. BUNSTER. It is very evident that the Ministry has totally lost sight of one of the most important Provinces in the Dominion—British Columbia—which is entirely left out of the list. British Columbia has not cost a single dollar to the Dominion, and I would like to know why we are not receiving some assistance towards getting us immigration.

Mr. ANGLIN. You have 2,000 Chinese coming in.

Mr. BUNSTER. We never asked the Chinese to come in and we do not want them, as they will be nothing but an injury to our country. I do not see why British Columbia should be slighted in this way when all we ask is a fair field and no favor. Our connection with Canada so far has not been very greatly to our advantage. The Americans would have built a railway through the country and around it over and over again for the sake of getting that Province.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If the hon. gentleman will look at the next page he will see that British Columbia gets $2,000.

Mr. BUNSTER. What is that for a Province like ours? It is not enough to treat a good sized crowd, and unless you can give us more than that you had better take the item out altogether.

Mr. BLAKE. We were given to understand, when the arrangement was made for the construction of the Pacific Railway, that that Company would be a powerful promoter of immigration, and that our own expenses would be diminished. What arrangements have the company made for the promotion of immigration?

Mr. POPE. They have, I believe, an agent at Liverpool and one in Germany, and I think they are contributing something to assist people to come into the country. I know that they have contributed towards the reduction of the inland rates—that is, the rates over the railways in the United States—I cannot say to what extent. My own impression is that every immigrant that goes into the North-West will cost them about one half of what he costs us.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. A good deal was said about some negotiations between our representative in England and the Imperial Government as to immigration, which was to form part of Mr. Gladstone's remedial measure. Has anything at all come of this? Again, have any negotiations been in progress with the Imperial Government with respect to immigration from Ireland; we hoped the considerable amount of money which it was proposed to expend would have been used to bring Irish emigrants to Manitoba.

Mr. POPE. I am not in a position to make any definite statement on this head; but negotiations are in progress and are proceeding favorably. I think that they will be successful; but I can say no more on this subject at the present time.

Mr. KILLAM. I think that it ought to be the policy of the Government to induce our own people to remain in the country rather than to bring other people in to take their places. This is a very important matter and should receive the most careful attention. I am informed that during the last fortnight 380 people have gone from the counties of Annapolis and Kings, many of whom are active young men, farmers' sons and mechanics, and others who have deliberately gone to the United States with the intention of living there.

Mr. HESSON. Because there is higher protection in the United States, I suppose.

Mr. KILLAM. I hope the Government will take some steps in order to remedy this unfortunate state of things.

51. Immigration and Quarantine $68,266

Mr. BLAKE. I notice an increase of $10,000 in the item to meet expenses of precautionary measures for public health, and a new vote of $20,000 for Pictou cattle disease; while there is also a new item of $2,000 for quarantine purposes at Victoria, B.C.

Mr. POPE (Compton). The western cattle quarantine will be established at Sarnia for cattle coming from the United States, and the British Government declined for a long time to consent to this, while we were not scheduled; but they have finally agreed to permit one or two cattle quarantines to be placed in the western section of the Province. The establishment of the cattle quarantine was proclaimed in the Official Gazette, but no arrangements had been made for it; no buildings had been erected and nothing was done. But it is now proposed to erect these buildings this year.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I desire to call the attention of the Committee to the location of the quarantine at Lévis. It is not a place fitted for a quarantine, though it may suit importers. It is not large enough and is in a populated centre.

There are islands which would furnish much more favorable places for the quarantine.

Mr. KILLAM. I was going to refer the hon. gentleman to this question of precautionary measure. I made a personal application to him about the admittance of animals for stock-breeding purposes into the western end of Nova Scotia. Yarmouth is well situated for that purpose. There is a doctor there who is paid by the Government, and I think he would not ask a large sum in addition for looking after four-legged creatures for a few months. We do not bring in many animals from the west to export to Europe, but a few occasionally for a certain purpose. I think my hon. friend might make some arrangements so that in Yarmouth a quarantine station should be established.

Mr. POPE. Call over to my office and we will talk it over.

54. To meet the probable amount required for pensions to veterans of war of 1812..... $25,000

Mr. McCUAIG. There are two or three of these old men in my county in a helpless condition. Last year I was partly promised that the $20 would be increased. I think that is too small a sum. The original intention was, I believe, to allow them as high as $50 per annum. Several of them have died off. I think as they grow more helpless the amount should be increased.

Mr. CARON. The amount has been increased from $20 to $25, which is now paid to the veterans. There has been a decrease in the ratio of $400 every year. Naturally, had we increased the sum from $20 to $25, it would be seen that the amount now upon the estimates is the amount which represents the increase which has been given to the veterans and to those who are entitled to pensions. We have adopted the very system recommended by my honorable friend. As soon as these old men drop off we may gradually increase the allowance.

177. Customs $734,244

Mr. ANGLIN. I ask the Minister of Customs to state frankly whether he is satisfied that the preventive system along the whole frontier is as effective as it can be made, and whether smuggling can be more thoroughly checked by any reasonable additional expenditure?

Mr. BOWELL. I think if we incurred an expenditure of $400,000 or $500,000 to establish a coast-guard along the whole frontier, there is a possibility that the whole of the smuggling that is going on might be stopped. The hon. gentleman had evidently no intention of having the question seriously answered. I believe the officers along the frontier are doing good work in preventing smuggling, but I am not aware that there is any greater amount of smuggling to-day than in the past or even under a revenue Tariff.

Mr. ANGLIN. There is a very much larger amount of smuggling going on, because certain duties are high enough to pay for the risk of smuggling.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). When the Board of Appraisers at Ottawa was first established it was spoken of as partly an experiment. I desire to ask how it has succeeded?

Mr. BOWELL. I think it has been very successful, not only here but as a means of giving information to every port where importations take place, enabling the officers to arrive at correct conclusions as to the proper values as to duties. I am quite satisfied from the reports made to me, and I have taken the trouble to investigate the matter, that very large amounts of duty have been collected that would not have been collected had not the Board been established, and the gentlemen who have given special attention to that Department, have been enabled to obtain information of the very greatest value in equalizing the duties on the same articles in each port.

Resolutions ordered to be reported; and at 4 o'clock a.m. the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 13th April, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SALE OF RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS' BILL.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved that with respect to Bill (No. 5) regarding the sale of railway passenger tickets, in view of the importance of the proposed measure and the advanced period of the Session, this Bill be placed on the Government Orders in the name of the Minister of Railways, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. BLAKE. Notice must be given of this motion.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It is in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is the first time I ever heard of the House determining what are Government measures.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It is following a precedent which occurred two or three years ago in regard to a Bill about insurance, which was placed among Government measures.

Mr. BLAKE. The report of the Committee has not been adopted, and until that is done we cannot act upon this motion. Another Bill on the same subject was referred to the Committee, and it was supposed that they would both have been dealt with and brought down together. I see no reason why, without notice of the motion having been given and the report of the Committee not having been adopted, this Bill should be taken out of the category of the vast number of Bills in the hands of private members which are destined not to receive attention at the hands of the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not desirable that the motion shall be pressed if objection is taken.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. If the hon. leader of the Opposition raises this objection I must withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

CONSOLIDATED RAILWAY ACT, 1879, AMENDMENT

Sir CHARLES TUPPER introduced Bill (No. 143) further to amend the Railway Consolidated Act, 1879. He said: The object of the Bill is, in the first place, to apply the Consolidated Railway Act to all railways within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, and to the companies owning the same, and to the companies working the same, except the railways to which the Government Railways Act, 1881, applies. The 3rd clause of the Bill is simply to correct a clerical error in the Consolidated Railway Act. It is in the clause that requires plans and maps to be deposited, and the word "all" was, by a clerical mistake, inserted instead of the word "and," because we require both maps and plans. The 4th section of the Bill sets out what is included in the words "working expenditure" in the Consolidated Railway Act, this being in accordance with a suggestion made by the Committee on Railways that we should have a statement inserted in an Act so as to avoid lengthy descriptions as to what are included in "working expenditure" in the various railway charters granted by Parliament. The 6th clause is to provide for cases where railways are constructed, or authorized to be constructed upon or along, across any turnpike road, street, or any other public highway, this being in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. member for Lambton, the intention being to bring within the authority of Parliament, and under the control of the Government, such cases as that of the Kingston and Pembroke crossing. The 7th clause provides that whenever that portion of any railway which crosses, or is constructed upon or along any turnpike road, street, or any other public highway on the level, is out of repair, it shall be dealt with. The 8th clause is to provide for any case in which a railway may desire to extend its line either at the one end or the other. At present railway companies have authority, under the Consolidated Railway Act, to extend branches, and this clause provides that they shall not be obliged to go to Parliament to obtain power to make an extension, provided such extension do not exceed one half mile in length beyond either point.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will state what railways, or what class of railways, he is bringing, by this alteration, under the operation of the Consolidated Railway Act which are not now under its operation, and also what particular cases have occurred which have given rise to the proposal in the last portion of the Bill, namely, to extend without any special authority the line beyond the terminus of the railway to half-a-mile. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will further state whether it is proposed to grant compulsory powers to expropriate lands for such extension, because the termini of railways, as a rule, are in large cities and towns, and it is an important thing for railways that have been in operation for many years to obtain powers to expropriate lands with a view to extending their lines still further through such towns.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that it was supposed until recently, and I have no doubt even by the hon. gentleman himself, that such railways as the Grand Trunk and Great Western were under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, but it was found when the matter came to be practically dealt with, that they were not. The object of the Bill is to bring all these lines of railway which are under the control of this Parliament, in relation to their corporate powers within its jurisdiction legislatively. For example, we passed a Bill with reference to the height of bridges overhead for the safety of persons connected with trains, but when the matter came to be further considered, it was found beyond our power. The crossings at Toronto and other things of that kind are in the same category, owing to the fact that these railways obtained their charters previous to Confederation. With reference to the other question referred to by the hon. gentleman, it arose in connection with the Canada and Atlantic Railway which is to run to Ottawa. It was desired to extend the terminal point beyond what was expressed in the charter, and that was an instance of the necessity of having means by which to make such an extension not to exceed half-a-mile for the purpose of making a more convenient point of communication with the town than would exist otherwise, and to avoid the necessity in such cases of coming to Parliament for the purpose of obtaining specific powers in each case. It was a doubtful question, and is, I believe, a doubtful question yet, whether, under the law as it stands, the same principle that applies in the other case applies to an extension, and it was thought better to have the doubt submitted for the action of Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in assuming that I supposed until now that the corporations to which he refers came within the provisions of the Consolidated Railway Act. It is not so. If the hon. gentleman will look back to the history of those corporations, I think he will find that they were all incorporated before the passage of the old Consolidated Railway Act of the Province of Canada, that they were exempted from its operation, and that they have never been placed within the provisions of any Consolidated Railway Act; so it is not a question of misapprehension.

THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER introduced Bill (No. 144) to authorize the construction, on certain conditions, of the Canadian Pacific Railway through some pass other than the Yellow Head Pass. He said: I may state that the object of this Bill is to place it within the power of the Governor in Council, if they think that the interests of the country will be thereby promoted, to authorize the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway through a pass to the south of the Yellow Head Pass. The Bill will also provide that such a pass must not be less than 100 miles from the American boundary. I may say that I entertain very strong doubts whether it will be found practicable to find a better pass than the Yellow Head Pass. I entertain strong doubts, from the best information I can obtain, as to the practicability of going through the Kicking Horse Pass, although I know the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are somewhat sanguine that they will be able to effect that object. If that object be effected—which I regard as, in fact, very doubtful—it will no doubt involve a great expenditure, probably greater than that involved by following the line by the Yellow Head Pass, but it would be of great importance to the country to shorten the line of the road by something like 100 miles and enable us to go through a much better country in the Province of British Columbia than we otherwise could go through. It may be convenient that hon. gentlemen opposite should know that I propose, on the second reading of this Bill, say on Tuesday next, to make my statement with regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway, so that we may have an opportunity of taking up any questions that may be raised in connection with that work.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman stated the other day that the Government had before them some other applications from the Canadian Pacific Railway, as to the location of part of their main line at Sault Ste. Marie, or the branch line to that place. These papers were received since the last return was brought down, and it was stated that the Government had under consideration an application for location. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has dealt with that application as yet; but whether he has or has not, it would certainly be convenient to have the Government deal with it in time for the discussion by the House of all questions connected with the route, so far as applications have been made. It would be important that we should receive at any rate the application of the Company with what plans and papers exist in support of the application, so as to be informed of the views of the Company formulated to the Government, at an early day. That could be done forthwith; and I think, accompanying that, there should be the decision that the Government has arrived at, so that we should have before us in one form the location of the line so far as it is settled, and as to the residue, so far as the Company proposed a settlement. I would like also to be informed if a further proposal has been made with reference to the location on the prairie north of Fort Calgary and through the pass. Amongst the papers sent down some time ago there was a brief application from the Railway Company suggesting an application to Parliament to give power to alter the route through the Rocky Mountains. If a location has been laid down, or the old location extended further westward by an application from the Company, it would be important that the papers should be brought down. The hon. gentleman expresses very grave doubts whether the sanguine expectations, as he calls them, of the Company of finding a route through the Kicking Horse Pass, which I assume is the only pass looked upon as practicable with the exception of the Yellow Head Pass, will be realized. If the hon. gentleman has any fresh information as to the Kicking Horse Pass, beyond that which has been in the possession of Parliament for some time, it will be convenient for the House to be put in possession of that information; and particularly if he has—as I assume he obtained before he acceded to the proposition of the Company to invite Parliament to grant any authority of this description to the Governor in Council—if he has received from the Company those reports and plans and investigations which led them to the conclusion that they might expect to be able to get through the Kicking Horse Pass, these also ought to be before us. I assume that the hon. gentleman does not bring down this measure upon speculation, and without having called upon the Company to furnish him with all the information in their power, upon which they judge it proper to ask for this qualification in the terms of the bargain. That should be before him in order that he may judge whether they should have that qualification, and it should be before us in order that we may consider the subject in all the light which the experience and investigations of the Company may bring to bear upon it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I entirely concur in the reasonableness of all the hon. gentlemen has said in reference to this matter. On Tuesday next, or before, I expect to be able to lay on the Table of the House, and to place in the hon. gentleman's hands, not only the application of the Company for the change of location at the eastern end, but also the action of the Government upon that application. With regard to the location of the railway on the prairie, I may state that the Government have approved of the location only as far as Moose Jaw Creek, and we do not propose to authorize the location of any portion of the line west of Moose Jaw Creek, from which point it can easily be diverged to the Yellow Head Pass, until we are perfectly satisfied, not only of the feasibility of obtaining a line through the Kicking Horse Pass, but also of the desirability of that course being adopted in the interests of the country. The information obtained by the Company, while it has led them to be sanguine of being able to carry the line through the more southerly pass, has not been such as to enable me to arrive at the opinion that there is any strong probability of their being able to obtain a better pass through that part of the country. All the information in the possession of the Government on the subject will be laid before the House previous to asking any action upon it.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BUNSTER. I rise, as a question of privilege, to direct the hon. First Minister's attention to an injustice that was done to the ports of British Columbia last night by the Minister of Agriculture who said they were small ports.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must call the hon. gentleman to order. This is not a question of privilege.

Mr. BUNSTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be allowed to put the Province right by informing the hon. Minister that the ports of British Columbia are not small ports, and I expect to be allowed to do it through you, inasmuch as I was cut short by the Chairman last evening. Now, I consider that the hon. Minister of Agriculture owes an apology to British Columbia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will have an opportunity of discussing that matter during the Session.

Mr. POPE. I accept the hon. gentleman's apology.

Mr. BUNSTER. I have not apologized to the hon. gentleman, and if the leader of the Government were here, he would probably insist upon the apology I am now demanding. Our ports are not small ports, as Her Majesty's fleet—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

56. Salaries Military Branch and District Staff..... $20,480

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I perceive that a considerable reduction has been effected, and I would like to know how this has been done; also what the general policy of the Government is with respect to the officers whose salaries are included in this vote. I understand that the hon. gentleman has abolished several subordinate, and retained some eight or nine superior officers.

Mr. CARON. From the time that I took charge of this Department I considered that it was important to reduce as much as possible the expenditure on the staff, without at the same time interfering with the efficiency of the service. I believe that in Canada, with our militia force, it is important that we should give as much of the money which Parliament votes for militia purposes to the rank and file, and for drill, as we can; and the reductions in question have been made, I believe, without interfering with the efficiency of the service. We have reduced the staff by two Deputy Adjutants-General, of whom, instead of eleven, we have now nine. Colonel Laurie, who was Deputy Adjutant-General in British Columbia, resigned, and it is the intention of the Government to send a Deputy Adjutant-General out to replace him, but not to fill the vacancy which this will cause here on the staff by any new appointment. He will be replaced here by a Brigade Major, effecting in this manner a considerable saving. The Assistant Inspector of Artillery in Halifax resigned on the 28th February, 1881, and his office has not been filled. Another saving has been effected by the union of the positions of paymaster and store-keeper. Lieutenant Colonel Amyrauld, who was in No. 5 District as store-keeper, is replaced by Colonel De Bellefeuille, who will act both as store-keeper and paymaster. The reductions, consequently, comprise two Deputy Adjutants-General and one Assistant Inspector of Artillery, making a saving of $1,700.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I should think that this would cause a saving of a great deal more than $1,700; it should be nearly $4,000.

Mr. CARON. The hon. gentleman is quite right. The salaries of two Deputy Adjutants-General, at $1,700 each, would make $3,400, and with the salary of the Assistant Inspector of Artillery, $1,200, altogether $4,600.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I would ask the hon. Minister if it is not possible to reduce the staff at headquarters. I see by the Civil Service Report that this was one of the reductions advocated by the Commission.

Mr. CARON. I consider that the staff at headquarters is a most efficient staff, and it has got as much work to do as it is possible for any staff to do perfectly. The staff at headquarters has already been reduced to its most extreme limit, and could not be further reduced without impairing its efficiency.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I could bring some facts to show that the reduction might properly be made. The staff have a great deal of work to do, but perhaps make a good deal of that work themselves. I do not wish to find fault with the Department, but simply ask whether the Minister could not possibly make a reduction.

Mr. CARON. I do not see how it is possible to do so.

57. Brigade Majors' salaries, transport expenses,
&c..... $17,500

Mr. CARON. The increase consists in the appointment of two additional Brigade Majors. Last year I thought it was possible to reduce the staff of Brigade Majors by two, but I have found since that it became necessary to re-appoint two Brigade Majors: one for Military District No. 8, headquarters at St. John, N.B., and the other for Military District No. 3, headquarters at Kingston. The reason of the appointment of the latter is the resignation of Colonel Laurie, which necessitated the appointment of a Brigade Major to replace him in British Columbia. As British Columbia is an important military station that cannot be left without such an officer, in case of any emergency.

Mr. ROSS. I cannot understand why the military service requires so many officials. As the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Domville) said a little while ago, the staff at headquarters is too large. It is large enough to run an army as great as that with which Napoleon conquered Austria years ago. Now we are to get additions to the staff of Brigade Majors. I greatly approved of the course of the hon. the Minister last year, which I thought indicated that he was going to dispense with Brigade Majors altogether. Had he followed that course I believe he would have acted in the interests of the service. The item is not heavy, being less than $20,000 a year for the payment of Brigade Majors; still, if paid to the volunteers, it would be a much more judicious expenditure of money. Last year, or the year before, the hon. the Minister reduced the allowance paid to volunteers in a very peculiar way. Instead of allowing them for the day they were going to camp and the day returning, he did not allow them either of these days.

Mr. CARON. You make a mistake.

Mr. ROSS. If not last year, it was the year before that. If I can go back far enough, I can find the hon. gentleman making that rule. I am glad that he is now paying the volunteers for those two days, but at the same time I think that if he dispensed with the Brigade Majors the service would not suffer. I am aware there is some difficulty in dismissing officials who have rendered long and valuable service, but as the positions become vacant, through various causes, they should be allowed to remain vacant.

Mr. CARON. If Napoleon had not matured the plans of his campaign better than the hon. gentleman has stated the question, he, I am certain, would not have been so successful. The hon. gentleman has made several statements in connection with my Department which prove beyond doubt that he has not taken the trouble of looking into the facts, otherwise he would not have made those statements. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the Militia force were not paid for the day of going into the camps of instruction or for the day of leaving the camp.

Mr. ROSS. I stated it was either last year, or the year before that, or the preceding year.

Mr. CARON. Of course, I limit my responsibility to the period I have been in charge of the Department. If I had to go beyond that I would have to assume responsibility for the acts of friends of the hon. gentleman, which I would not be prepared to assume at all. I can say that last year every militiaman who went into a camp of exercise was paid from the day of going in until the day he came out. As to the previous year, the hon. gentleman has stated on a former occasion that the money which Parliament voted—and I must say Parliament votes very liberally for militia purposes—had been, as a rule, distributed among the staff, and that the rank and file of the fighting men, if I may so call them, as they really are, did not have the share they were entitled to. Now, I will say to the hon. gentleman that if he had taken the trouble to look into the facts, he would not have made the statement he has made to-day. It will be found that in 1880-81 the following amounts were paid for each service in the Militia: A and B Batteries and School of Gunnery, $114,909; militia schools and drill instruction in colleges, $2,821; rifle associations, Dominion, Provincial and local, $24,650; military stores, $7,000; drill instruction, $39,974; care of arms, $26,160; annual drill, $157,075; making altogether $372,589, which has been paid out absolutely and completely on behalf of the rank and file, and extending military instruction to the very class who were entitled to get the money which Parliament voted. Now, if you take the total expenditure for 1880-81, of $667,000, and deduct therefrom the amount as above detailed, of $372,589, the balance represents the expenditure for military stores, drill sheds, and rifle ranges. I think it will be evident to the House that the hon. gentleman was in error in stating that the staff were receiving the larger portion of the money voted by Parliament, and the hon. gentleman himself will, I have no doubt, see that the rank and file are those who really get the largest portion of the money.

Mr. ROSS. The hon. gentleman has not indicated at all the line of action which the Department intends to take in connection with the service in the manner pointed out by myself a moment ago. I asked him as to the policy of the Government regarding the continuation of the service of Brigade Majors. Instead of answering, the hon. gentleman has endeavored to direct attention from that subject by charging me with ignorance of the details of the Department. I confess to my ignorance, and it is the duty of the hon. gentleman to instruct me on an occasion like this in reference to details about which information is asked. Unfortunately, I am not in a position to know as much of the details of the Department as the hon. gentleman. I do not have salutes fired for me when I go up and down at the expense of the country in order to view the camps and see the soldiers being drilled under the hot sun. I will again ask the hon. gentleman if he intends to continue the policy inaugurated last year respecting Brigade Majors and Deputy Adjutants-General?

Mr. CARON. I am, of course, entirely willing to give the hon. gentleman the information asked for. As to my trip to the west, I may say that I was very glad to meet the friends of the hon. gentleman who extended to me such grand hospitality, and I am very sorry, indeed, that during my visit I had not an opportunity of meeting the hon. gentleman himself. As to my travelling at the cost of the country, it is not often that I am accused of not paying my own expenses. If the hon. gentleman chooses to make enquiry, he will find that my personal expenses were paid out of my own pocket; and I do not regret the money so expended, as it gave me an opportunity of meeting the hon. gentleman's friends. As to the question of my hon. friend regarding Brigade Majors, I would have told him in the beginning, if I had not been diverted from it by his charges about the money having been expended altogether on the staff. I told him there had been a reduction made last year in the staff of Brigade Majors, but that two new appointments were being made in their places. This fact must have been sufficient to indicate that it is not the policy of the Government to abolish the Brigade Majors. Of course, I did not consult my hon. friend before arriving at that conclusion. I did not consider the efficiency of the service would be served by completely abolishing Brigade Majors or reducing the number. I believe it is the imperative duty of the Minister to reduce the staff in every possible way. The reductions that are being made in the staff of the Department, providing they do not interfere with the efficiency of the staff, should be carried out; but I do not believe in making it inefficient by reducing the staff to an enormous extent, for if it became useless the people's money would be wasted, whereas now it is properly expended.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I did not wish to be severe, unkind or uncivil. The hon. gentleman must attribute a good deal of what I said to the tone in which he met my exceedingly kind enquiries with respect to his Department. I wish to settle a matter, either of veracity or accuracy, between us, and I do not do so in any supercilious or invidious manner. In the contingencies of the Department there is an item of $504, travelling expenses. That payment may be quite right—I have no objection to it—but I am making this statement to justify the remarks I offered, that I might not have offered under different circumstances.

58. Ammunition, including artillery ammunition and the manufacture of small arms ammunition at the Cartridge Factory at Quebec..... $25,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What have become of the guns which were manufactured at Montreal for the use of the Dominion? Some two years ago a predecessor of the hon. gentleman ordered some great guns to be made at Montreal. It was an experiment which was watched with interest, but we have not heard whether the guns have got into action or not. I shall be glad to receive some details from the hon. Minister.

Mr. CARON. Before answering this question I desire to refer to the matter of veracity mentioned by the hon. member for Middlesex, as I do not wish to be misunderstood as to the expenses which I claimed. The expenses of the officers who accompanied me on visiting the different camps were charged to the Department; and fourteen camps having been held in the different Provinces from Ontario to Nova Scotia, I think every hon. gentleman will admit that $500 would not indicate any very great extravagance. My own private expenses were paid by myself, and I will say more, that having private passes on several of the railways, I did not make any charge. As regards the guns, I have been sadly disappointed as to the contract, which I do not mean to say has not been a success, because it is impossible to know yet whether it will be a success or not. My predecessor, Mr. Masson, who always paid great attention to any matters which he took in hand, bestowed particular attention on the subject of the conversion of old guns in Montreal. On more than one occasion I went down myself, to see how the contract was being carried out. The delay can be explained in more ways than one. Several experiments were taking place in England in converting guns, and letters were received from Sir William Palliser by my Department, stating that such experiments were in progress. Gilbert & Co., of Montreal, who have the contract for converting our guns, wrote to me, stating that, under the circumstances, it would be in the interests of Canada, as far as the conversion of guns was concerned, to wait until the experiments to which I have referred had been made in England. I thought so myself. Major-General Strange, and several officers of A and B Batteries, at my particular request visited Montreal, and inspected the guns, and they all agreed upon the propriety of waiting until we knew the results of the English experiments. The contract has been going on, and, according to the last report from Montreal, the guns will be perfected within two months.

Mr. CASEY. Is artillery ammunition manufactured at Quebec?

Mr. CARON. No.

Mr. CASEY. In regard to the manufacture of small arms ammunition I should like to know what is the cost of that ammunition manufactured in Canada as compared with the cost of importing it from the small arms factory at home.

Mr. CARON. The artillery ammunition we obtain from the Imperial Government at cost price. As regards small arms ammunition made in this country, the advantage arising from possessing the Canadian factory is simply this: The hon. gentleman, being a rifleman himself and taking a great deal of interest in militia matters, knows perfectly well how important it is to have this ammunition as fresh as possible; and besides, by having the factory in Quebec we save a lot of money which is annually spent in keeping up our reserve. So far as our stores are concerned, by having a factory in Canada we can manufacture just about the quantity of ammunition which we require for the service without having to send over to England or accumulate a large quantity in our stores until it becomes impaired in quality.

Mr. CASEY. A year or two does not make much difference as to ammunition.

Mr. CARON. Yes; but when you have to let it accumulate for several years it makes a great deal of difference, not so much to the ammunition as to the Treasury.

Mr. CASEY. I did not know that it was the custom formerly to import several years ammunition together, as I should have thought that it would be imported several times during the year and in moderate quantities, so that there would be no great loss of interest by keeping a store on hand. Still there is a good deal of force in the statement that by having a factory at home it can be manufactured as it is required. It is important to know whether the ammunition is of uniform strength with the regulation ammunition, because that makes a great difference in the shooting of men.

Mr. WRIGHT. And the shooting of cows too.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, and the shooting of cows. Do I understand from the hon. gentleman that the ammunition at present served out is supplied from this factory?

Mr. CARON. No; we have not manufactured yet, but we expect to manufacture this year about 1,000,000 rounds of cartridge; so that if the hon. gentleman has failed in his shooting he must put the blame down to the old ammunition.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I understand my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Casey) did not fail in his shooting.

Mr. CASEY. I understood, from the item being repeated in this way, that it was a continuation of the expenditure. The uniformity of strength is, however, a most important matter, because when the men go to the matches if the regulation ammunition is slightly weaker or slightly stronger than they are accustomed to, it will greatly impair their chances of success. I suppose that under this head would come up the armament of our volunteers—the nature of the arm which should be served out to them. I think a change in the arm could be made gradually in this way: A certain number of Snider rifles become unserviceable each year, and if a note were kept of the number returned as unserviceable, when this number reached a certain point, a battalion could have the old arms replaced by Martini rifles or other improved arms. It would be a great inducement to the volunteers to perfect themselves in drill and in shooting if the prospect was held out to them that the reward of efficiency would be the substitution of an improved weapon. There would be very little increase in cost, because the old rifles would have to be replaced at any rate, and I understand that there is little difference in the price of Snider and Martini rifles. Another point to which I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention is the waste of ammunition which takes place at the annual drill of the volunteers. Men are taken out in squads, who have not, perhaps, handled a rifle for a year and who are not perhaps in good condition to handle it then. They are allowed to blaze away at the targets, and after firing a certain number of rounds, they are put down as having gone through their target practice. A great deal of ammunition is wasted in this way, and I think the only means by which this waste could be avoided would be to induce the officers to look carefully after the target practices.

Mr. BROWN. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia if some reduction could not be made in the price of the ammunition sold by the Department to the associations and to those practicing for matches. At present the cost which amounts to about $20 a thousand, is a serious item to the men as they would soon expend their day's wages in ammunition. Every encouragement should be given to the men to become thoroughly acquainted with the use of the rifle. It is of a great deal more importance to be well up in the use of the rifle than it is to be up in company or any other kind of drill, as the man who is not thoroughly up in rifle practice is of very little use in drill and still less for active service. A return might be kept of the ammunition served out at a reduced cost to non-commissioned officers for practice in squads, and thereby less would be wasted at annual drill. My hon. friend from West Elgin speaks of men going to practice who have perhaps never had a rifle in their hands before, and getting forty or fifty rounds of ammunition, which they fire away without knowing where the bullet goes to. Then, with regard to the quality of the ammunition, a few years ago a very inferior quality of ammunition was used. To show the importance of good ammunition, I may mention that the 49th Battalion were challenged to a match by a regiment from Oswego, who were furnished with the Remington rifle and the best class of ammunition. The manufacturers furnished the crack New York team with both rifles and ammunition as an advertisement. Our men used the Snider-Enfield rifle, and the Oswego team beat them. I made application to the Department for Martini-Henry rifles, and when our men got them, they went to Oswego and beat the Oswego team. That shows the advantage of having a good article. It is very important that the quality of the ammunition should be looked after; if men have good rifles and good ammunition, they will take a pride in their practice, and a few days practice will greatly improve their shooting. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Militia if there is any way of getting rifles repaired when they are injured, and where they are to be sent to.

Mr. CARON. In answer to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) I would say that I am very anxious to replace the old rifles by the Martini-Henry, but we have a large supply of the old rifles in store. What I am endeavoring to do is gradually to replace these rifles by the Martini-Henry, and at present there is a correspondence going on between the Department and a firm in Liverpool—Meyer & Co.—who wish to buy the old Enfield rifles from us. Of course, it would not be right for us to give them up at a very great sacrifice, but anything I can do in that direction I am endeavoring to do. As to the ammunition: what the hon. gentleman says is perfectly correct. I believe that in the camps and in rifle practice, a great deal of ammunition is uselessly expended, and the suggestion made by my hon. friend has already been taken into consideration by the Department, and instructions will be given to the officers commanding the different corps to pay particular attention to this matter. My hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Brown) asks whether it would not be possible for the Department to give the ammunition at a reduced price. The Department have been really doing all that is possible to do in that respect; we are giving out the ammunition to the associations at cost price, not including the freight, which the Department pays. I have every reason to hope, that when the Canadian factory is completed, we may possibly be able to reduce the price. Although this $25,000 may look to be a large amount, we pay to the Receiver-General a considerable amount of money in the shape of the ammunition which we distribute among the forces.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. Minister give us any idea what he expects to manufacture this small-bore ammunition for?

Mr. CARON. The factory is not yet completed, but we are now working on the building and getting all the instruments that are required to test the ammunition to be manufactured. With the information in the possession of the Department at present, it would not be possible to state what would be the exact cost; but, from the information I have received from Major Prevost, who was sent to England for the purpose of taking a regular course at Woolwich and obtaining all the instructions that would fit him to take charge of our factory, I believe we can manufacture it a little below what it would cost in England. The following amounts have been deposited to the credit of the Receiver-General in 1880-81: For ammunition, $11,598.67; for clothing, $722; and for military stores, $1,222, making altogether $13,542. Of course, I need not say that I do not complain at all of the grants which Parliament has voted for the militia; but it will be seen that a large amount of this money—nearly $15,000—is paid into the revenue out of my Department.

Mr. CASEY. The total outlay for ammunition being $25,000, the actual cost to the Treasury is $14,000, or thereabouts, $11,000 being repaid by those who buy the ammunition. In view of this fact, I think the request of my hon. friend from West Hastings is very reasonable—that a certain fixed amount of ammunition should be sold to each rifle association or each battalion association even at less than cost.

Mr. CARON. We sell the ammunition at present at less than cost. We pay the freight.

Mr. CASEY. I mean at considerably less than cost; in other words, that the Department could well afford it, and the House and the country would not object to give a certain amount of free ammunition besides that which is now granted to the different rifle associations, because it is only in competitive shooting of this kind that any real skill in the use of the rifle is obtained. The ordinary practice in camps does not produce skill. Some time since, small prizes were given to the best shot in the battalion or in the company. I am not aware that this was done last year, but it was a system which worked very well, and at a comparatively small cost. It created a certain spirit of emulation, and prevented the careless waste which goes on when the men are shooting merely as a matter of duty. I think that this matter is worthy of consideration.

Mr. CARON. I wish the hon. gentleman to understand that the vote of $25,000 also includes artillery ammunition, which makes a further and considerable reduction. From what I have been able so far to gather, I have every hope that when our factory is completed, and we manufacture our own ammunition, it will be possible for us to deal still more liberally with these rifle associations. I can only tell the hon. gentleman that I anxiously desire to help those associations in every possible way. I think that we cannot do too much in this direction.

Mr. BROWN. Where can the men get their arms repaired?

Mr. CARON. We have fully efficient armorers, who are paid by the Government, at Toronto, Kingston, Montreal, Quebec, and Halifax, where, on the arms being sent, they will be repaired in a first-class manner. We also bear the charges of transportation.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. How many suits does the hon. gentleman expect to buy with these $50,000?

Mr. CARON. The amount provides for the purchase of upwards of 6,000 suits of uniforms. The prices of the military clothing supplied by C. and J. Webb & Co., of England, are, for dragoon suits, $9.10; infantry, $8.47; rifles, $8.80.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. How much do boots and great coats cost?

Mr. CARON. No boots are supplied to the militia, though I think we should have a supply of boots in case we should call out the militia on an emergency. The great coats cost $5.80, and are manufactured at the Kingston Penitentiary, where there was a contract existing when I came into the Department.

Mr. CASEY. What number of great coats have been supplied?

Mr. CARON. Five thousand.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. How long were these suits supposed to last?

Mr. CARON. We expect the uniform served out last year will last five years.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think there is a civil question which may very well be asked, as well as all these military questions that have been asked. Why is it that purchases of clothing for the forces of the Dominion are made in what is commercially a foreign country? Why is the clothing not made of Canadian cloth? Has the hon. Minister of Militia no faith in the National Policy? Does he absolutely disregard the utterances of all his colleagues on this important question? Does he, because his Department happens to be exempt from Customs duties, venture to go into a foreign country with the money of the people of Canada and purchase clothing which ought to be made in Canada by Canadian hands? This is a serious question. In purchasing clothing for the Canadian militia in Great Britain they declare that the National Policy is a sham and a humbug; that the Government who are administering the affairs of the country have no faith in it; that they are not true to their own professions; that they do not themselves believe in their own professions. Surely it is preposterous for this Government which spends the money of the people, in buying where they can buy cheapest and what is most suitable, to tell other people that they must not spend their own money where they choose and buy what they believe to be best suited for their purposes. Let the hon. gentleman explain to this country why he makes these purchases in Great Britain, and why the only persons employed in the Dominion to make up any portion of the militia clothing, are the convicts of the penitentiary? Are there none others fit to be employed? Does he mean to place convicts in the same rank as the artisans of Great Britain? Hon. gentlemen opposite go into ecstasies whenever they talk of the glorious benefits of the National Policy. The National Policy is the be-all and the end-all, the great weapon and the great object of legislation of the present day. Yet, I suppose they must have been surprised, I dare say they must have been shocked, when they found the hon. Minister reading an account in shillings and pence which evidently led at once to the conclusion that this clothing was not made and purchased in Canada. Have we not Canadian sheep growing Canadian wool? Have we not skilled weavers in this Canada of ours capable of manufacturing Canadian cloth? Have we not in this country men skilled to dye and scour Canadian wool? Have we not tailors fit to cut cloth for our Canadian militia? If we have all these, why is the hon. Minister permitted to go abroad to purchase cloth not made in Canada, made by men who never saw Canada, to send out of Canada the money of this country, the money which the acting Minister of Marine tells us we ought to keep in this country at all hazards? Bring gold into Canada, says the hon. Minister of Marine, send gold out of Canada, says the hon. Minister of Militia, and buy abroad the clothing for our militia. If there is any good reason why the National Policy should be set aside in this instance, should be trampled under foot in this instance—why a gentleman holding the high official position of the hon. the Minister of Militia should set so bad an example to the people of this country—then I say we ought to know what those reasons are. Would it not be profitable to devise means, by a change in the Tariff, to compel the hon. the Minister of Militia to be true to the National Policy—true to the policy of his colleagues—and not set so monstrous an example, calculated as it is to create discontent and dissatisfaction, and to create the impression that the hon. the Ministers themselves, though they talk National Policy when they think it suits their purposes, laugh at the whole thing in their sleeves.

Mr. CARON. I am happy to see that we have one more convert to the National Policy. I have heard the hon. gentleman speak on more than one occasion, and I must say that he never convinced me so much as he has to-day. I am glad to see that, leaving aside all his utterances heretofore, he is now ready to stand by us in supporting the National Policy.

Mr. ANGLIN. Stand by which of you?

Mr. CARON. I am perfectly certain that, if it had been possible to carry out the views expressed by the hon. gentleman, it would have been done by my Department, as I am as great a believer in the National Policy as the hon. gentleman. He knows that most of our infantry must be dressed in scarlet cloth. The hon. gentleman says there can be no trouble at all in having the wool dyed scarlet. The hon. gentleman has not gone so far in favor of the National Policy as I have, because I went to the trouble of ascertaining whether it was possible to have the wool dyed scarlet in Canada. I enquired from gentlemen who have been in the business for many years, and found that it was quite impossible. I ascertained from gentlemen, like Mr. Patton and others, who have long been in the business, that the process of dyeing scarlet was so difficult and so peculiar, that it required a separate establishment for that purpose, or the suspension of all other dyeing processes in any of our established dye-houses; and that the quantity of clothing required in Canada was so small, that it would not be worth the while of any manufacturer to go to all this trouble. All the manufacturers with whom I communicated said that it would be necessary to suspend their ordinary business for a certain time if they attempted to dye scarlet. It is well known that in England there is a large demand for military clothing of this description, and this demand, combined with the demand from continental nations, is sufficient to support large factories in England for this special industry. It may be a question as to whether it would not be advisable to adopt another style of uniform for our Canadian militia force, so as to allow it being manufactured in Canada. Under the circumstances economy required that this clothing should be purchased in England.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It is a little painful to see my hon. friend carrying his animosity to Canadian rouges to such an extent. I did not expect that of him. I thought better of him than of some of his colleagues, but I was not prepared for this exhibition of extreme partizanship. I think my hon. friend might partly have told us that the reason which influences him as a capable administrator in getting these things in England is not that they can be got there cheaper and better. Here is a pretty clear proof from the hon. Ministers themselves that this Tariff adds enormously to the cost of clothing the people of Canada. You cannot clothe these militia men within a third as cheaply by using Canadian clothing as you can by getting the clothing in England. The hon. Minister is quite right from his point of view as an administrator. He goes where he can get the clothing the best and the cheapest, and why should the people of Canada not be permitted to do the same?

Mr. BERGIN. We are constantly hearing from the other side of the House that goods cannot be purchased in Canada as cheaply as in the Old Country. Now, this may be true in some classes of goods, and it certainly is true as regards scarlet cloth required for the uniforms of our volunteers. I have given a good deal of attention to this matter. I have been in communication with the different manufacturers on this subject, because I was anxious—far more so than the hon. gentlemen opposite who talk merely in irony—that this cloth should be made in Canada. Upon full enquiry I found that the statement made by the hon. Minister of Militia this afternoon was entirely correct. I was shown through the manufactory at Cornwall by the manager, who proved to me beyond cavil that it was impossible that such cloth could be produced in this country, unless at an immense sacrifice on the part of the company that undertook to manufacture it. He showed it would be necessary for the purpose of making this cloth, so as to be free from stain or defect of any kind, that they should alter their dye-house; that they should thoroughly clean every part of their factory through which that cloth would pass in the different processes of manufacture so as to eliminate all other colored products, no matter how trifling the quantity of cloth required might be. It was impossible to do this so as to obtain returns for themselves, and at the same time charge a price which the Government could afford to pay, because the quantity required would be so small they could not afford to make the necessary changes in their machinery. Everybody who knows anything about manufacturing must be aware that if changes are to be made in the machinery of a large factory it can only be done at an immense price. The hon. Minister of Militia, therefore, was perfectly justified in going to the Old Country for this kind of cloth. If we required an immense quantity of that cloth, as is the case in the older countries, then a factory could be devoted to the purpose of producing it; but it is monstrous to suppose that people are going to sacrifice large sums of money for a mere sentiment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BERGIN. Those hon. gentlemen do not seem to be aware that when they are applauding they are signifying their own shame; that they are showing to the country there is no honesty in anything they say. They tell us in one breath they are inspired by an ardent desire to economize, that their sole object is to save the money of the country, and in the next breath they tell us that their entire desire is—although everybody knows it is not true—to see everything manufactured in this country that can be manufactured here. If hon. gentlemen opposite are not going to impale themselves on this horn of the dilemma, that it is going to cost too much to buy scarlet cloth here, then they can impale themselves on the other horn. In any event, they are always doing that, and I do not suppose we on this side of the House can offer any great objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is not very long since the hon. gentleman was on this side of the House, and as he has had hardly time to become familiar with his new quarters he should not abuse his old friends, at least before he has become better acquainted with his new ones. I understand the difficulty which arises in regard to obtaining scarlet cloth, and I quite approve of obtaining the supply where it can be got best and cheapest. But that is not the question. The question is, that hon. gentlemen opposite intended, as they said, that everything should be produced that could be produced in this country.

Sir RICHARD J. CASTWRIGHT.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The cry was: "Canada for the Canadians; let us manufacture for our own market and keep our money here." But I want to ask the hon. the First Minister whether it is not a fact that a comparatively small portion of cloth required for militia purposes is scarlet? Has the blue cloth been obtained from England or been manufactured here? I believe there is not more than one-quarter or one-fifth of the cloth required, scarlet cloth. The hon. Minister has not explained why he gave the preference to criminal labor in obtaining some articles from penitentiaries? This is the second time I have been compelled to call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. Minister has deliberately sacrificed free labor to prison labor, that he takes money from the honest artisan by having work done by criminals in the penitentiaries.

Mr. BERGIN. The hon. gentleman has spoken as if no other kinds of cloth, scarlet always excluded, were being manufactured here. We have had cloth manufactured here for great-coats, but I think probably we have not been able to obtain it at as low a price as it could be got from England. Every one knows that the price at which it can be furnished varies according to the quantity manufactured, and we do not require such immense quantities here as at home, so the chances are we shall be obliged to pay more. I am not, however, now certain that the cloth manufactured here cost more than it would have done if obtained from England; but this I do know, that if we paid one cent a yard more for cloth manufactured here than the price at which it could have been obtained from the Old Country, hon. gentlemen opposite would have been the first to find fault, although to day they are so patriotic as to desire that we should manufacture all the cloth required in the country. The hon. member for Lambton has said it was not long since I had left the other side of the House. I do not think I have complained because I left the other side. I think I have lost nothing and the country has gained something. I left a party which was no credit to the country and certainly no advantage to it. During the five years it held power it failed to carry out a single promise it had made when in Opposition; there was not a single principle which it advocated when in Opposition that it did not falsify when in power. If I were to go on, as I might go, and if I desired to take up the time of the House in speaking as hon. gentlemen opposite desired, for the purpose of occupying time, I could show to the satisfaction of the country how utterly unworthy were hon. gentlemen opposite of the support of any honest man. I might carry the war into Africa in a manner which would not present those hon. gentlemen in a creditable light, and when the hon. member for Lambton taunts me with having moved to this side of the House, the hon. gentleman forgets that all round and about him in 1876, long after I left the Reform party, were howling protectionists, and to-day they are ready to rat again from Free Trade, and some of them are already talking about a 20 per cent. Tariff. They are almost altogether forgetting their revenue Tariff and they are ready to go back to where they were before; in fact, they would become stronger protectionists than we are if they thought by that means they could carry the next elections.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I did not import foreign matters into the discussion, except so far as to say that the hon. member for Cornwall had not so long left our ranks that he could afford to attack his old friends. It is quite true the late Government failed in some respects—they failed to make the hon. gentleman a Minister.

Mr. BERGIN. Let me take this opportunity of saying that I never asked them to make me a Minister, and I defy the hon. gentleman to prove that I did.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No doubt that was a very signal failure on the part of the Government, in the hon. gentleman's opinion. I wish now to say a word to the hon. Finance Minister. I think I heard that hon. gentleman say a moment ago that I desired to spend the time of the House—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That you wanted to make long speeches.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am as anxious as the hon. gentleman can be to get through the business of the House as rapidly as possible, and the hon. gentleman has no right to say anything such as he has just said. It is unworthy of his position. He is here, at the present moment, the senior member of the Government, and it ill becomes him to make such a remark of any member; and, for my own part, I do not intend that he shall use such language towards me with impunity. I have never, at any time during the period I have been in Parliament, occupied the time of the House at any greater length than I can possibly avoid, and I have always endeavored to avoid making unnecessary speeches. What I wished to ask the hon. Minister of Militia was this: if he could not procure the dark colored cloth in this country and get the clothes made up here as well as they could be made in England. The late Government did this to a great extent, and they also made an attempt to get the scarlet cloth, and though it was not quite equal to the English, we used a considerable quantity of it nevertheless.

Mr. CARON. After the feeling exhibited on the other side of the House in favor of the National Policy, I have no doubt that some of our capitalists will invest their money in a factory where these tunics, &c., can be made. The reason I referred more particularly to scarlet cloth was that, out of the whole number of uniforms imported from England, two-thirds are scarlet, and if the hon. gentleman will consult any business man who has investigated the matter, he will find that it is impossible to get this scarlet cloth made in Canada. It is impossible, because you cannot get the manufacturers to manufacture it, from the simple fact that the demand is very small indeed. As to the other uniform, that is an exceptional case, and however anxious I may be to see everything manufactured in Canada that can be manufactured, there are circumstances which every man who knows Canada and who knows England is aware are beyond the control of any Government or legislation in this country. In England there are manufactured in these factories not only the uniforms for the British service, but they have large contracts for continental armies, so that they can manufacture them at a much cheaper price than could be possible in Canada. The policy of the Government is not to attempt to produce an article which would be perfectly useless to the great mass of the people of Canada, and as this article is a specialty, of which only a very small number would be required to supply the force—which by the way I hope still further to reduce—it is perfectly right that we should buy the cloth where we can get it better and more suitable to our necessities than if it were manufactured here.

After Recess.

Mr. ANGLIN. When the Speaker left the Chair I rose to say that I must protest against the assumption of the hon. the Minister of Militia that, because I favor the employment of Canadian workmen in preparing to make up the clothing for the Militia, I ought to be regarded as an advocate of the National Policy. It is an assumption of the hon. gentlemen on the other side, at all times, that they and they only are the friends of the working people of Canada; that they and they only desire to see the working people of Canada, well, fully and profitably employed; but when any real test arises, when any opportunity is presented of putting their professions on trial, it is generally found that their professions and practices do not quite accord. I say that we are and we always have been the real and true, and the only real and true friends of the working people of Canada. We would, in fact, cease to be a Liberal party; we would cease to have the slightest claims to the name of Liberals, if we were not earnestly, and sincerely, and honestly, and at all times the friends of the working people and the masses. The financial policy of the late Administration was a revenue policy, and the hon. Ministers endeavored, so far as they could, to get this clothing for the Canadian militia at home. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) says that they found it rather difficult to procure the scarlet cloth suitable in all respects made in Canada. For my own part, I cannot see, if the rest of the people of this country are to be compelled either to wear what the manufacturers of this country can produce or pay a heavy penalty for wearing anything else, why the volunteers also should not be expected to wear the articles that can be produced in the country. Why are they, Sir, to be clothed in brilliant hues while the rest of the people must be content with such clothes and dyes as can be manufactured here? For my own part, I think it would be rather a mark of honor than otherwise if there were a few specks or spots on the red coats of our militia, as they could be pointed to as evidence that they were willing to make some little sacrifice of appearance for the sake of employing Canadians to make up this clothing. The hon. Minister of Militia takes entirely different ground; he takes the ground of an extreme free trader, and asserts that it is not only his right, but his duty, having due regard for economy, to buy this clothing where he can get it best and cheapest. A more ultra Free Trade doctrine than that was never propounded in the Canadian Parliament. Moreover, he told us that England furnished the best and cheapest clothing for her own soldiers and militia, and also that continental countries got their clothing from England—those countries which are revelling in the advantages of high protective Tariffs, and which, we have been told, were competing with England in these very articles in which she has enjoyed the supremacy for centuries. That is a piece of information for which we have to thank the hon. gentleman; it is another argument, and a very conclusive argument, against the policy which hon. gentlemen are so loud in professing, but which they do not carry into practice. We on this side, as I have said, are the true friends of the working people; we do earnestly desire that all that can be reasonably and properly done in the way of securing employment at remunerative wages for the people of Canada, ought to be done. Another point, which was referred to by the hon. member for Lambton, is that even if it is admitted that scarlet cloth cannot be made in Canada so well as in England, yet scarlet cloth forms but a small proportion of the cloth used in the service. The hon. Minister of Militia stated that two-thirds of all the tunics are scarlet. Therefore one-third of all the tunics and the whole of the trowserings are made of a kind of cloth which can very well and properly be made in Canada. There is, moreover, this extraordinary fact, that the hon. Minister not only procured the cloth in England, but had it made up in England; neither he nor his colleagues seem to believe that the mechanics or seamstresses of Canada are able to make up clothing fit to be worn by the Canadian militia. The hon. gentleman says, and perhaps truly, that that work can be done more cheaply in England; but is cheapness to be an element in the consideration of a matter of this kind by hon. gentlemen who call themselves advocates of a National Policy? This is a comparatively small matter in one sense, but in another sense it is a very important matter, because it is one of the cases by which the earnestness and sincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite, and the soundness of their principles, are thoroughly tested, and by which their principles are proved to be the very reverse of what is sound, or just, or reliable.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been informed that a commission or board of officers not very long ago reported to the hon. the Minister of Militia in favor of supplying uniforms at cost price to the commissioned officers of the force—either uniforms or cloth suitable to make the uniforms. I would like to ask the hon. Minister if he intends to carry out this recommendation. I think it would be very desirable to do so, as many of the officers have enough expenses to meet without incurring the additional expense of clothing themselves with the proper uniform.

Mr. CARON. As the enquiry to which the hon. gentleman refers took place during the busy period of the Session, I have not been able to examine the report—although I have read it—sufficiently to decide what action should be taken in the matter. The hon. gentleman has had a question on the paper on this subject, which he kindly put off a couple of times at my request, because I thought I might possibly be able to take this matter up. If the hon. gentleman wishes, however, I am perfectly willing to place the report of that Commission on the Table of the House.

60	Allowance for Drill Instruction.....	$ 40,000
	Drill Pay and other incidental expenses connected with the drill and training of the Militia	250,000

Mr. DAWSON. While the Estimates are being criticised by the representatives of different sections, there is apparently nothing to be said for the district I represent. Last year when the Estimates were under discussion, I called attention to the fact that the very large and extensive district of Algoma had scarcely any militia organization—that there was only half of a company in the whole of that district. The hon. Minister was kind enough at that time to say that the matter would be taken into consideration, and I understood him to say that Algoma would be placed on the same footing as the other districts in the Province. We have a very large district extending for 600 miles along the frontier, and we have a very considerable population at Sault Ste. Marie, and eastward thereof we have no less than 13,000 and to the westward of Sault Ste. Marie and up to the height of land, we have 8,000, making in all 21,000 in Algoma. What I claim is this: that while a certain expenditure is made for militia purposes throughout the Dominion, Algoma should have its fair share of it. We have many young men who are very anxious to form volunteer companies at Prince Arthur's Landing, they have tried to do so for some years; and at Sault Ste. Marie and on Manitoulin Island, the same strong desire exists; and why this extensive district should be entirely left out in the cold in this respect, I cannot conceive, except it is on the ground that this is a new district, and that it has never before come under the attention of the Government or brought to their notice, although, every year, we have had more or less to say on this subject. I hope, however, that the hon. Minister of Militia, who seems so willing and so ready to do the best he possibly can, and who seems to have given such general satisfaction in what he has done, will not now lose sight of the strong claims of Algoma for his best consideration.

Mr. COCKBURN. I merely wish to advance the claims of my district in this particular. We have a large population, and we are very desirous of an opportunity to form effective volunteer companies.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I will not try to answer the charge which the hon. gentleman brought against me. He said I made the statement that a small portion of the money which is paid for militia purposes went directly to the volunteers; and he answered this by reading a statement to the House to the effect that about one-half of the appropriation for Militia and Defence went to the volunteers.

Mr. CARON. The proportion is greater than that.

Mr. ROSS. What I objected to last year, and proposed to call attention to this year, is the large amount of money paid, and the small portion of it which seems to be and is expended directly on the training of our militia. The only object this House can have in voting money for this purpose, as I understand it, is that those who prefer to enter the service can receive such attention, and drill and instruction as will fit them, on the emergency arising, to defend the country. But here we are, voting $750,000 for Militia and Defence, and only $250,000 is expended for the drilling of our Canadian volunteers. I am quite aware that the same disproportion existed in former years, and under the previous Administration; but, it is no reason however, Sir, why the hon. Minister of Militia, who, I am quite satisfied, is quite competent to devise the ways and means, should not devise ways and means for changing the whole system. I am aware that the subject is surrounded with difficulties, that the staff is very extensive, that the staff of the city is very expensive, and that the officers require large salaries, and that all along the line there seems to be a large expenditure; but should not the Minister devise some less expensive means by which, when the House votes $750,000, those who are bearing the heat and the burden of the day, at serious inconvenience to themselves, would receive a larger proportion? I think the pay of a volunteer is 50 cents a day. Could not the hon. gentleman devise some way whereby a more thorough drill could be given to our young men, who enter the service and who are called out for ten or twelve days yearly at much inconvenience to themselves, and who should obtain a larger remuneration? I am of opinion myself that our drill is not very effective. I am not saying that the officers are not anxious to do their duty, but I fear that the time spent in camp is not sufficient to make the drill very valuable. Besides, there seems to be such a want of fixity about those who enlist in the service, that we are hardly able to retain the same persons in the service for three years in succession. I am told that in filling up some of the companies, it is very difficult to get volunteers to continue in the service more than the few days which they spend in camp for drill. If the service is going to be efficient, it certainly requires more than twelve days drill to make it of any value to the country whatever. One of two things ought to be done: Either a fewer number of men should be drilled, and drilled for a longer time, and greater inducements should be offered volunteers to enter the service, or we should vote a large sum of money for this purpose. I do not think that the necessities of the country require a larger appropriation. I am not in the least alarmed as to the security of this country. I am not afraid of an invasion from any quarter. I believe that we can live at peace with all men; but if the House is disposed to vote such a large sum of money as would give a more thorough and effective drill for a fewer number of men, it should make the necessary arrangements. We have no object in assuming that we have a standing army of 20,000, or even 40,000 men, unless we have reason to believe that these men are drilled in such a way as to make them effective in case of necessity. It would be far better for the country and the service if a fewer number of men were called out and drilled more effectively. I think that the hon. Minister would secure a greater fixity and permanency in the service, if he were able to pay the men more liberally than is the case at the present moment. I know that many are obliged to give up positions, worth from $1.50 to $2 a day, in order to expend a certain time in camp at 50 cents a day, at a serious loss to themselves under certain circumstances; and I call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia to these facts—not to obtain an immediate remedy, but in order that he may take the matter under his consideration, as no doubt he will do. I hope that he will feel that in making these criticisms we are actuated more by a desire to aid him than to find fault. If there is reason for finding fault, I do so unhesitatingly, but, at the same time, I would like it to be understood that in making these criticisms and in offering these suggestions, it is done with a view to improve the service rather than for any other purpose.

Mr. BUNSTER. I think that the expenditure which is proposed for this purpose is liberal for every Province with the exception of British Columbia, for which none is intended, and it is unfair that the farthest Province of the Dominion should be so totally neglected by the hon. the Minister of Militia. I have been met with the answer that we should furnish the lot and half the expense. The citizens of Nanaimo are pretty well prepared to furnish the lot and comply with the demand of the Department. The hon. Minister of Militia has been always so busily engaged that he promises to give Nanaimo his attention later on. I hope it will not always be later on, but that by this time twelve months he will see fit to do justice to that outlying Province. We had a first rate officer there who was not treated with that courtesy, not by the hon. Minister of Militia, but by other persons in the Province, to which he was entitled. Our volunteers insist upon having a first-class officer appointed to instruct them; otherwise, I fear our volunteer corps will not have that success which the Militia Department, and particularly the hon. Minister of Militia, would wish it to have. I hope the hon. Minister will take this into his serious consideration and give us a first-class officer to instruct the rising young men of our Province, who are willing to give their time to their country.

Mr. BROWN. I beg to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia to the recommendation in the report of the Major-General with regard to enlisting volunteers for three years, giving them 25 cents for the first, 50 cents the second and 75 cents the last year. I trust the hon. Minister will not adopt that suggestion. I do not think that any one in Canada, either before or after the harvest, would work for 25 cents a day—twelve days time. The hon. Minister, I think, should give at this time, when labor is so high, 75 cents per day.

Mr. CARON. So far we have not adopted in this Department the suggestion of the Major-General, though I do not know what that suggestion may lead to later. The hon. gentleman mentioned, and I think properly, that the number of days drill are not sufficient, and I am glad to tell the hon. gentleman that, when the present Government came into power, we increased the number from eight to twelve days. If Parliament chooses to act with the same liberality in the future, as it has in the past, we will give our militia men sixteen days drill, including the two days coming and returning, which I think would be quite ample.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister has not told us what he proposes to do with those $150,000. Does he propose to have camps in the various Provinces? I saw some rumors in the papers that he intended having a grand demonstration in Kingston, or some other place.

Mr. HOUDE. I wish to say that it is not desirable so much money should be expended in the way it is proposed by the hon. gentleman, more for parade than practical purposes. I think this year a greater number of battalions of the militia force should be drilled, and that the drill should not be confined to the city and frontier battalions.

Many of the rural battalions are not drilled, because the force of a company is fixed at forty men. I think it would be better to reduce the number to twenty-four men, so that rural battalions might have the benefit of instruction.

Mr. CARON. In answer to the hon. member for Centre Huron, I may say that the money will not be spent for a review in Kingston or anywhere else. I believe those reviews are well worth the money they cost, because militia men prepare for them by going into extra drill for which they do not get any pay. However, I had to cut my coat according to my cloth, and after investigating what the cost of a review would be, I found it would amount to between $10,000 and $15,000; but I fancy that, on the whole, this vote of Parliament for drill would be better applied in giving possibly extra days drill to a certain number of men than by having a review, although I should like to have had a review on the Queen's birthday. Now, I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Houde), who knows as much about volunteering as any other gentleman in this House, how twenty-four men in a company could possibly be drilled in battalion manoeuvres? We do not want skeleton battalions. I think it would be a mistake to change existing organizations and reduce companies to twenty-four men. I believe the militia force of Canada is really over and above the number of men we should have. Since I have been at the head of the Department, whenever I found a company not perfectly efficient I have disbanded it, the reason being that I thought it better to reduce the force and make it more efficient by giving the money to the really efficient corps.

Mr. HOUDE. I am not recommending a permanent reduction from forty-two to twenty-four men in each company, but only for purposes of annual drill. It would be absurd to have companies permanently composed of only twenty-four men. I refer specially to rural companies. In the country it is frequently impossible, from the nature of farm occupations, for all the men of a company to be present in camp. Sometimes the captains have to take men who do not belong to the force, in order to fill the ranks. These men go to camp for a week or two, receive their pay, and do not go any more during the year. I think it would be better to reduce the companies to twenty-four, so as to allow a greater number of battalions to benefit from the money voted, especially the officers and non-commissioned officers.

Mr. CARON. I will now answer the question of the hon. member for Centre Huron. It is the intention to hold camps as we did last year. Of course, there is nothing fixed yet as to where the camps will be. From the result of last year, we think it is the best mode of disposing of the money voted by Parliament to secure an efficient camp training.

Mr. HESSON. I would ask the hon. Minister if he contemplates drawing battalions from the country to the city? I have heard it said in the past, that more attention was paid to the city companies than the country companies. I agree with the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Houde), that it is desirable to extend the drill as far as possible to the country companies. City companies have facilities for drill that are not afforded to country battalions, and in case of an invasion it would doubtless be the country force mainly upon whom the country would have chiefly to depend. I would be glad to hear the hon. Minister say whether he intends to give a fair advantage to the rural battalions in the contemplated drill for the coming season. Complaints were made that they had not an opportunity of accepting the advantages offered in these annual camps.

Mr. CARON. My views coincide exactly with those of my hon. friend, and in fact we have adopted the system of which he speaks. We pay more money, and possibly more attention to the rural corps, from the fact that they are not numerous. They also get more pay for their drill than the city corps. The money paid out for drill last year was $230,170 for drilling in camps, while the city corps drilling at headquarters cost only $43,450.

Mr. BUNSTER. It appears to me that the hon. members wants to commence with British Columbia in reducing the force. I see an item of $4,000 for a Major-General commanding the militia, and we have to contribute part of that amount, as well as of the $22,000 for other things, and I think British Columbia ought to get some benefit from it. I have a right to draw the hon. Minister's attention to the gross neglect that Province has received. I have repeatedly, as the hon. Minister knows and as the ex-Minister knows, drawn the attention of the Government to the requirements of that Province. Whether they do not deem it worthy of their consideration or not, I cannot say; but this I do know, that they have not treated it fairly. They have allowed a very superior officer to retire from the Province, one who would have been of great benefit to our militia men who are willing to serve our Queen and country. If the hon. members will look at the Estimates they will see that not one dollar under this head will be expended for British Columbia. I ask the hon. Minister of Militia if this is fair, when he can be readily informed by the Minister of Customs that we contribute handsomely towards the revenue. I feel a little bashful in calling attention to this matter a second time, but I do not propose to have any Minister treat that Province with silent —, I will not say any more.

Mr. CARON. The hon. member is well aware, from our acquaintance and the expressions I have often used to him about his Province, that I would not treat it with contempt.

Mr. BUNSTER. I did not use the word contempt.

Mr. CARON. If the hon. gentleman will look at the amount of expenditure in the different Provinces of the Dominion he will find that, taking into consideration the population, British Columbia is treated as fairly as any other Province. If he had looked into the figures he would have seen that this Department was not open to attack for neglecting British Columbia.

61. Contingencies and general service not otherwise provided for, including grants to Artillery and Rifle Associations and Bands of efficient Corps.....$46,000.

Mr. HOUDE. As regards grants to rifle associations, I consider that money is almost wasted, from a public standpoint. It goes for the greatest part to sportsmen who, if war occurred, would either be at their homes or would be officers not carrying the rifle. I think it would be better, if the Government intend to continue such grants, that they should be given to the soldiers, who must learn how to meet an enemy on the battle field, during the annual drill. It would be more for the public benefit to give the money to the real soldiers and thus encourage them during the year, and when they are in camp to exercise well and so become good marksmen, which is the very thing the country needs and for which money is expended. We maintain staff officers and field officers for the purpose of drilling our militia and enabling them to repel any enemy that might invade our territory. From the point of view of sportsmen, it is all very well that the grants should be continued, but in the public interest it is advisable that the system should not be any longer continued without changes.

Mr. CARON. I cannot agree with my hon. friend. Sportsmen on more than one field have shown themselves to be very good soldiers, and as a rule they have distinguished themselves in such a manner that they could not be supposed to be unfit for anything else than field work. A small military force like that of Canada must be well drilled and perfectly organized, and we cannot do too much to encourage rifle practice. We know the result of the last campaign in Africa where practical sharpshooters had to contend with a much larger and better drilled force, and which was supposed to be better prepared for the contest. Canadians at Wimbledon have shown that our riflemen are equal to those of other countries. Last year we sent a team to compete at Shoeburyness against English volunteer artillerymen. The result was that they not only competed successfully, but they brought home a prize; and if you consider that in Canada our teams have to be selected from 4,000,000 while in England they have an enormous population to select from, it must be admitted that great success has been attained by Canadians. Let me take advantage of this opportunity to say that within a few days I have received letters sent to me officially speaking in the highest possible terms of the Canadian teams at Wimbledon and Shoeburyness; and as an evidence that our volunteers were looked upon as all that could be required of artillerymen, is the fact that to-day the Artillery Association of England has adopted the very system which was introduced for the first time by the Canadian artillerymen at Shoeburyness in shifting heavy ordnance.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the case of one Francis Buchanan, who was killed at the Sussex camp owing to the negligence of some of the militia officers. It seems that a large number of shells were left on the field unexploded, and this man, not knowing the nature of the ball, attempted to melt it with the result that he lost his life. I was rather surprised to find that the Department would not pay for the support of this man's family, who were dependent entirely on him for their maintenance. It is not fair to the country, who grant this money for the Department, that such claims as these should be pigeon-holed, and the impression throughout the country is that the money we vote here is spent principally at headquarters and not as it should be in training the men. Now, we do not want an army which, like that of the King of Greece, shall be all generals and colonels. I repeat that I hope the hon. Minister, if he has not already done so under the item of Contingencies, will make some provision for the family of this man, Buchanan, as he lost his life through the carelessness of the militia. I have reason to believe that such a payment was recommended by the general commanding the forces, but it did not meet the approval of somebody else between him and the hon. Minister.

Mr. CARON. As my hon. friend has brought a charge of manslaughter against me, I must say that the circumstances under which the accident occurred are not exactly as he stated. The shell which the hon. gentleman speaks of was a shell fired from a gun, and the fuse was unexploded. My hon. friend's friend, not knowing what the consequence would be, picked up this shell and tried to break it, and not succeeding, heated a piece of iron and introduced it into the fuse hole, the result being that it exploded and the unfortunate man was killed. I regret that such an accident should have happened, but I cannot understand how it would be possible for me to apply the money which the country votes for the administration of my Department to the payment of such a grant as he suggests.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I beg to say that I stated the case correctly. The commanding officer did not take down a list of the shells unexploded, and a very large number of them were left on the field. This man, no doubt, had no business to pick it up, but then every one is not supposed to know that these iron balls left lying there were loaded, and I think some compensation should be given, owing to the negligence of those serving under the hon. gentleman. The man was a supporter not of me, but of hon. gentlemen opposite, and on that account I feel it all the more to be my duty to advance the claims of his family.

Mr. WRIGHT. I regret exceedingly that one result of the great camp at Sussex, of which we heard so much, and which we understood was to be bloodless in its character, was unhappily an accident like the one mentioned by the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Domville). We have heard something of this camp of Sussex. We heard how the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Domville) witched the world on that occasion with his noble horsemanship. I wish to say, however, that, taken all in all, I think we have much reason to congratulate the country on the appointment of the hon. the Minister of Militia to the office which he now holds, as I think he has illustrated the fact that he is the right man in the right place. In his visits to the different camps he has pointed out what organization is necessary to victory, and I have suggested that he should have the name of cornet instead of the one he now bears, as I think he has altered the militia and is doing his best to bring about the most fortunate and happy results. I visited one of his camps in my vicinity and was much pleased with the way in which the hardy yeomanry turned out and with the military aspect of the whole affair. The hon. the Minister of Militia, mounted on a white charger, assisted by my colleague the member for the city, who amid the muttered maledictions of the commanding officer, persisted in wearing his civilian's uniform, gave an aesthetic military bearing to the whole affair, which was much admired. Indeed the whole display, I thought, was a most excellent one, and I think he deserves a great deal of credit for it. But I have still the same standing complaint to make which I have always made of that Department. The county I have the honor to represent sends forth many of the best fighting men in the Dominion, yet the hon. gentleman will not consent to give us that proper military organization which I have constantly urged him to give; but I hope to be able in a few days to wait upon him with such a deputation as will convince him of the propriety of doing justice to that part of Canada.

64. Care of military properties transferred from the Ordnance and Imperial Government $ 8,000

Mr. MACKENZIE. What properties are these? I think I expressed the opinion two years ago that any properties that ceased to be used for military purposes should be in the care of the Public Works Department.

Mr. CARON. The properties are at Niagara, Prescott, Montreal, Laprairie, St. John, N.B., Halifax, Victoria, B.C., and other places.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman state how this $8,000 is to be expended?

Mr. CARON. The bulk of it is for paying caretakers' rents of properties, the removal of snow at Quebec and Montreal, and repairs to properties. But I must say that this is not altogether an unproductive expenditure, because during the year 1880-81 we received rents for the military properties under the control of the Department of Militia to the extent of $5,678, leaving this vote in reality a very small one.

65. Royal Military College..... $59,000

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think, in connection with this vote, that we might reasonably expect some statement from the hon. gentleman respecting the difficulties which appear to have taken place in the staff of the Military College. I observe that within the last few weeks or months printed circulars were sent round, containing certificates of character to Colonel Hewitt. One of these certificates was from myself. I gave it with great pleasure, and reverting to the course that gentleman had pursued as Commandant of the College, I could not do otherwise. But I am bound to say this, as publicly as my letter has been circulated by that gentleman, that I gave that letter in ignorance of the circumstances that had recently occurred in the College, and I do not think it was fair of Colonel Hewitt to address me in the way he did in order to obtain that letter, knowing that there was anything but harmony at that time in the College. I do not pretend to know the difficulties which have occurred in the College, as I was out of the country for months; but from what I gathered in the newspapers, I was not able to come to the conclusion that the Commandant was without blame in the difficulties that occurred between himself and Major Ridout, and my enquiries since I have come home have led me to conclude that that officer was not properly used, and that the Commandant was wrong in the course he took. I regret very much to have to come to this conclusion. Great care was taken by the Government, at the time of Colonel Hewitt's appointment, to obtain an officer of the highest qualifications for the place. He was recommended by the Duke of Cambridge and appointed on that recommendation; and, during the time he held the office, the Government had reason to be very well satisfied with the appointment. I may be wrong yet in the conclusion I have come to, but from the evidence in the newspapers, I am unable to come to any other conclusion than that Commandant Hewitt acted with great indiscretion, and that Major Ridout was improperly used. I am sure the Committee will be glad to hear any explanation the hon. Minister may give, and I wish most heartily that that explanation may remove from my own mind the impressions I have received from the perusal of such documents as I have been able to see.

Mr. CARON. I know that a good deal of discussion has occurred in the newspapers in connection with the Royal Military College of Kingston. I am glad to say that I, as the head of the Department, concur altogether in the choice made by my hon. friend when he was at the head of the Government, of Colonel Hewitt to take charge of this College. I think that the result of his administration has shown that he is the right person for the position. As my hon. friend will understand, there has been a good deal of discussion going on, and a good deal of possibly bad feeling has existed between some members of the staff of the College and Major Ridout. It so happened that at this particular time, when this trouble was in progress, Major Ridout's time was up, and he could no longer serve in the College without getting further leave from England. I thought it was to the advantage of the Military College, that no trouble, no difficulty, and nothing of this kind existing between the members of the staff, should be allowed, in any shape or form, to interfere with the success of the institution; and as the time of service or leave of Major Ridout was up, without looking into the charges, and without examining into the case made on either side, I believed that in the interests of the College, and to secure the bonne entente which should have existed between the members of the staff, it was far better to take advantage of the circumstances, which allowed Major Ridout to return to his regiment with promotion, than to keep him in the College and render it disagreeable both to himself and to the other members of the staff. I am glad to say that he is replaced by two young Canadian cadets in the College, who are acting as aids to the Professors in instructing the cadets. Mr. Chairman, I can only say it has been my endeavor, ever since I have been in the Department, to help in every possible way the cadets who have graduated in the College. It may have been a question—and I said that it has been mentioned on more than one occasion in the different Provinces—whether at the period of time when this College was established, it was necessary; but I consider that Canada, with its future, and as a progressive country, cannot afford to take a retrograde step, which I believe it would be a mistake, were we to-day to destroy the usefulness of this institution, which has secured for Canadians commissions in the British service. I am now expressing only my own opinion. Mr. Chairman, I am told that our cadets are educated for the British service; but I say that those cadets who serve in the British army are still Canadians, and must and will remain Canadians; and I maintain that when their period of service in the British army is expired, they will come back to Canada with their experience, and will become the educators of our young men who choose to enter the Military College and to our Militia Force. At present I know it is difficult to turn out cadets, who, fresh from the classes themselves, can become professors to men who are about their own age; but year after year, as we all know, this difficulty will disappear. Men grow older unfortunately, and the man who is accused of being too young one year is always a year older the year following, and is able to find behind him younger men than himself; and I believe that the training which our cadets will receive in the British army will make them valuable when Canada requires to use them in the interest of the Militia Force of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I was under the impression that a Commission was appointed to make enquiry into these charges, but perhaps I was misinformed.

Mr. CARON. The papers which my hon. friend has asked for in connection with this matter and the whole investigation will be submitted to Parliament. This was a quasi-investigation, made by the Commission which is appointed for the purpose every year of visiting the College. My hon. friend will recognize it more easily under the name of Board of Visitors. When they went through the institution they were required and requested to look into these charges which were brought by Colonel Hewitt against Major Ridout. They did so and the whole matter was submitted to me; but as I have stated, without taking into consideration the charges and evidence pro and con. I thought it better, since such a feeling existed in the institution, to take advantage of the fact that Major Ridout's time was up and separate him from the other professors who were witnesses against him at the investigation, and in his own interests as well as in the interests of the department, allow him to return to his regiment and replace him by two Canadians.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). Has this College effected the objects it was designed to serve? I noticed during last summer an agitation, or the symptoms of it, in our public press, declaring that the usefulness of this College was gone, and that it might just as well be abolished. I do not at all agree with this view. Through the kindness of the hon. Minister we were permitted to visit the College, and the good opinion which we entertained of it was largely increased by this visit; and I am prepared to say with the hon. Minister, that it would be a retrograde step on the part of the Parliament of Canada if we were to abolish the College. At the same time, I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the unnecessary, if not the alarming, increase which has taken place in the staff of the College during the last few years. In 1878 the expenditure on the officers of the superior staff was $13,946, while in 1881, it was $30,571, showing an increase of something like $17,000. Then the expenditure on non-commissioned officers in 1878 was $2,581, while in 1881 it was $3,579. The staff now seems to be out of all proportion to the amount of work done. The superior staff consists of fourteen officers; what is called the subordinate staff of six officers; and the civil staff of ten officers, or servants, as they are termed; and the other employes around the office numbers six, making in all thirty-six individuals. Now, the number of cadets, I am told, during the last year, was seventy-four, though perhaps I am not exactly right in this particular, the number has, however, more than doubled since 1878. Then, I think, there were seventy-five cadets in the College. I am willing to admit that the increased attendance may necessarily increase the expense; but, as I stated before, the expense is out of all proportion to the number of the cadets attending. The expense of maintaining the University College in the Province of Ontario, and the number of students attending, is as follows: the students number thirty-five, and they have eight professors, four lecturers, two tutors, and one demonstrator in physics—in all a staff of fifteen, or only one more than the staff of the Military College of Kingston, while the salaries paid amount to $29,900; that is, the attendance is 351, and a smaller sum is paid in salaries to a smaller staff than is the case in this Military College. A strong friend as I am of the Military College, I am obliged to warn the hon. Minister of Militia that by increasing the staff and expenses of the staff, as he has done since 1878, the result cannot be otherwise than damaging to the interests of the College. I am aware the course is a very extensive one, and that in order to make it thorough it is necessary the staff should be large, that, according to our modern system of education, we have fallen into the vein that one man can teach one subject better by teaching it continuously than by teaching a variety of subjects. Yet, when we come to consider the number of professors in other departments of education and the amount of salaries paid, the comparisons we are obliged to make with the Military College will not be favorable to the administration of my hon. friend. I approve of the course of instruction pursued in that College, and I do not know any institution to which a young man could be sent at eighteen years of age and receive a more satisfactory and useful training than to this institution; but still there is this great deficiency, that the training he receives there is, outside of military training, of very little practical use to the student. If a student attends the High School in the Province of Ontario, the education he receives is of immediate practical value to him; it is a guarantee to him that by means of that education he is enabled to secure a livelihood. In the Royal Military College there is no guarantee to the student that after having spent four years there, he, should he wish to enter a profession, will receive any direct advantage from the course of instruction which he has gone through. What I would suggest to the hon. Minister would be that, directness should be given to certain portions of that course, which would enable the student, after he has passed through it, to enter any other profession without being obliged to undergo another preliminary course of instruction. My hon. friend has introduced a Bill to admit a student of that College to the standing of Dominion Land Surveyor. I would be glad to support that Bill, and if the hon. Minister can devise any other means whereby the student can be admitted from the College either as Dominion Engineer or Land Surveyor, he will confer one of the greatest benefits on the College that can be conferred upon it. I think, that although we are doing well in this country, we have not that class in the community that can afford to send their sons four years to the Kingston College and then another three or four years to a law society or university, or into another college, to receive an additional course as super-added to the military course. It would be very desirable for our young men if that could be done, but I may point out this matter to the hon. Minister, and I think it is a suggestion which is in the interest of the Military College. I hope he will be able to bring down some scheme before the House rises by which the advantages to be attained in that College will be of more practical utility than at present.

67. Pay, maintenance and equipment of "A" and "B" Batteries, Garrison Artillery and Schools of Gunnery at Kingston and Quebec.....$128,000

Mr. CARON. The increase is in items which have always been in excess of the estimate. In "A" Battery, Quebec, a hired instructor was required who cost $500. A collar maker, mender and blacksmith were attached to "A" and "B" Batteries at a cost of $730; eight horses were purchased for "B" Battery, Kingston, under Order in Council of 17th June, 1881, which cost, with keep and veterinary expenses, $1,200 altogether. In contingencies, the removal of worn out stores entailed an expenditure of $1,570, making a total of $4,000 increase on the cost of the two batteries.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Mr. CARON. "A" Battery, at Quebec, numbers eight officers, including commandant, 155 non-commissioned officers and men, and eight horses. "B" Battery, at Kingston, numbers seven officers, including commandant, 171 non-commissioned officers and men, and sixteen horses. The number of horses is smaller than it ought to be, but as they have become very expensive since the American demand has sprung up, the Department has reduced the number as much as possible.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I should imagine eight horses would scarcely suffice for more than one gun. I would be glad to know what arrangement the hon. gentleman has made with respect to officers who are entitled to take long or short courses, as the case may be, at these batteries; what pay do they receive, and what length of time do they attend?

Mr. CARON. With respect to the horses, eight horses supply two guns. Besides, there are a number of horses belonging to the officers which, as they are kept at Government expense, are utilized for the purposes of the battery. The short course of instruction is three months. Officers get $1 per day, and non-commissioned officers 50 cents. The long course is twelve months, and the gentlemen who follow that course, after passing an examination qualifying them to get their certificates, are naturally prepared to occupy any position in the militia of Canada.

66. Military Instructions in Schools, and Drill Instruction in Colleges $ 6,000

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Mr. CARON. We are endeavoring to carry out the views of my predecessor, Mr. Masson, in respect to drill instruction in schools. We cannot begin too early to drill men who are to compose the militia force of Canada. At Kingston, Principal Grant is heartily in favor of the scheme, and has co-operated with the militia authorities.

In reply to Mr. CASGRAIN,

Mr. CARON. All the accounts of the Department against the cities of Montreal and Quebec for the use of troops in quelling civil disturbances, have been paid.

125. Steam communication between San Francisco and Victoria, B. C..... $17,640

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What length of time has this to run?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Four years.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The grant has been reduced, and I should like to know whether the same service will be performed?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Three times a month, the same as before. The amount expended before was $54,000.

127. Steam communication between Grand Manan, N. B., and mainland, mail service..... $4,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What is the reason of this increase?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It could not be done last year for the amount voted. We hope to get it done this year by giving an extra $1,000.

128. To provide for one year's subsidy, to be granted at the rate of $50,000 per annum, to line of steamers to trade between Canada and West Indies and Brazil, provided a like amount be paid by the Brazilian Government..... $50,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The Committee would, no doubt, be glad to be informed of the exact position of affairs, as to how far the experiment has succeeded, or is likely to succeed.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is not in operation at the present time. I am not prepared with the details at this moment, but I will bring them down on concurrence.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell the Committee between what ports it will run, and how often the voyages will be made?

Mr. O'CONNOR. In the winter the vessels will run from Halifax and in the summer from Montreal. They will touch at Rio Janeiro. It will be a monthly service each year.

129. For subsidy to line of steamers to run fortnightly between France and Quebec, provided the French Government appropriate $50,000 for the same service $50,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. On this item, also, the Committee would desire information as to the state of affairs.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The line is not yet established.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Have the French Government signified their willingness to negotiate?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Negotiations are still going on.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The services are not commenced and the negotiations have not yet been brought to a conclusion. It is understood that by reducing the amount to be provided by the French Government from $100,000 to $50,000, which it is believed will be sufficient to complete the service, it is understood that a line will be established.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Who conducts the negotiations?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When Sir Alexander Campbell was Postmaster General the negotiations were commenced, and he has since conducted them, communications having also been made by Sir Alexander Galt. Nothing definite has, however, yet been obtained.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What are the ports decided upon between which the steamers shall ply? What is the port in France agreed upon?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think that matter has not yet been dealt with.

130. For subsidy to the line of steamers to run between Liverpool and St. John, N.B., and Liverpool and Halifax, N.S. $25,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The terms of the vote this year were slightly altered, as that last year was for an alternate and combined service.

Mr. WELDON. How has the vote been altered?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not proposed to take the vote in such a way as to enable the arrangement to be made directly with St. John without the same parties being obliged to make a connection with Halifax.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Are you going to divide this sum between Halifax and St. John?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes. The number of voyages has not yet been arranged. This sum, it is hoped, will stimulate the steamers to make regular trips, as it will be an addition to what business they will get by calling at these ports. It is hoped that an arrangement will be made for regular communication.

Mr. FLYNN. I would like to ask why the subsidy for steam communication from Halifax to Murray Harbor and Charlottetown alternately, granted last year, has been omitted in this year's Estimates?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That was an error in the preparation of the Estimates, and the item will reappear in the Supplementary Estimates.

135. To provide for a subsidy of $1,500 a voyage, for five voyages of steamers from Prince Edward Island to Great Britain and back..... $7,500

Mr. BRECKEN. I would suggest that the steamer Prince Edward be allowed to call at continental as well as British ports, so that shippers of cattle may be able to avail themselves of the best market.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We had better then insert the words "or continental ports" after Great Britain.

137. For the providing of a steamer to replace the Glendon..... $30,000

In reply to Sir Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Mr. McLELAN. The Glendon was condemned on examination, and was sold on tender for $4,200.

139. For purchase of life-boats, life preservers, and rewards for saving life $3,000

Mr. ANGLIN. Where is this money expended?

Mr. McLELAN. A certain amount is expended yearly in providing lifeboats at different stations on the lakes and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The greater portion is given, however, as rewards for the saving of life from sea going ships; small sums are paid to individuals who engage crews and provide boats, the crews being furnished by volunteers.

In reply to Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT,

Mr. McLELAN. There is one life-boat at Cobourg on Lake Ontario.

Mr. McCUAIG. A life-boat service is imperatively demanded at South Bay Point and at the entrance to Presqu' Isle and Weller's Bay, and I hope the matter will receive the prompt attention of the hon. the Acting Minister of Marine, with a view of establishing these much needed stations for the preservation of life and property, and without further loss of time.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think it would be well if the hon. Minister would give us some further information as to where those boats are. There are many points where there should be such a service, but where it does not exist now. I think it would be well for the Government to consider the propriety of organizing a regular life-boat service, though not on a very extensive scale at first. This is a matter of very great importance on which I think the Government ought to take some action.

Mr. McLELAN. I agree with the hon. gentleman that this is a matter of a great deal of importance, and I have been giving it considerable attention, with the view of organizing one or two services in the coming year as experiments.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. There is a very long stretch of coast on Lake Huron, where several wrecks, usually attended with loss of life, occur every year, and my impression is that there is not a single life-boat station on that coast. For about 200 miles along the eastern side of that lake there are hardly any harbors, except such as have been constructed at great cost by the Government of this country, and it is almost impossible for a vessel, if driven on this coast, to escape, unless it can make one of these harbors. There is a peculiar necessity, therefore, for a life-boat service to be established there.

Mr. CASEY. I may say, in continuation of what has just been stated, that there is another dangerous stretch of coast on Lake Erie, from a short distance east of Port Stanley westward. The wind that does the mischief there is a south-westerly wind, which drives vessels on this exposed coast, on which there are no harbors of refuge. In the neighborhood of Port Stanley frequent wrecks have occurred. I do not know of any life-boat station on the north shore of Lake Erie, and I think the neighborhood of Port Stanley would be the proper place to establish one.

Mr. McLELAN. Every lighthouse keeper is provided with a boat for the purpose of rendering aid, if necessary. This is the only kind of life-boat on the coast of Lake Huron.

Mr. BUNSTER. I regret that there is no provision made in the Estimates for life-boat stations on the west coast of Vancouver Island and the east coast of British Columbia. I think the hon. the Minister of Railways, who visited that country, should have instructed the hon. the Minister of Marine of the necessity of erecting life-boat stations there. We have been totally neglected on that coast. We are liable to have many disasters. Some have already occurred, and we have lost a great many of our citizens. This is a very serious and important matter, and the hon. the Minister of Marine should look into it, and establish, not one life-saving station merely, but three or four; and when we offer such inducements to immigration into that Province, and have such resources to be developed, we are certainly worthy of some consideration.

140. To provide for investigation into wrecks and casualties, and collections of information relating to disasters to shipping $1,500

Mr. BUNSTER. Has the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries taken into consideration the fact that the lighthouse which is being erected in British Columbia is in the right place or not? It may be swept away at any moment; and a few small lighthouses would afford a great deal more light, and be more useful, not only in the interests of the Province as well as of the Dominion.

142. Montreal and Quebec Water and River Police $38,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I notice that there is a considerable increase in this vote; and with relation to the disturbances last year, I would like to know how far the police succeeded in maintaining proper order?

Mr. McLELAN. Last summer, in Montreal, the police were of great service and they were assisted by men from Quebec. The increased extent of wharfage has rendered necessary a small addition to the force.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What is the present strength of the force. I see that an additional $3,500 is demanded.

Mr. McLELAN. During the winter the men are off duty, and with the exception of one or two sergeants, are not in receipt of pay; but in summer, about thirty men are stationed at Quebec, and from thirty to forty at Montreal.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Do they use steam launches or boats?

Mr. McLELAN. No steam launches are employed at Montreal, but both are used at Quebec.

143. Removal of obstructions in navigable rivers.... $1,500

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). What does the Department propose to do with the wreck Live Oak now lying in Wrayton's Harbor, Shelburne county? I understand that tenders were invited for its removal.

Mr. McLELAN. A contract has been awarded for that work.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What will it cost?

Mr. McLELAN. I think about $500.

144. Salaries, allowances, &c., of Lighthouse Keepers$159,666

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Details relating to the lighthouse service in the various Provinces should be given separately. There was a considerable amount of fraud committed with regard to stores in former times as there are at present, and that is the reason why it is desirable that in the item of stores some fuller details should be given than are given at present.

Mr. BUNSTER. I would like to see a statement of expenditure in the different Provinces. The hon. member for Centre Huron said frauds were perpetrated on the Government. I hope his remark does not apply to British Columbia. It would be more satisfactory to the different Provinces if they knew exactly what it cost them for maintenance of lighthouses. I am satisfied British Columbia would be far below the average, although it has a great length of coast.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It costs twice as much to keep up lighthouses in British Columbia as anywhere else.

Mr. BUNSTER. The hon. ex-Minister said it costs twice as much to keep lighthouses in British Columbia as anywhere else, but perhaps the service rendered is four times as valuable as that rendered anywhere else. I am only sorry that, during the days of his Administration, he did not give us more lighthouses than he did; still, he gave more than has the present Administration.

146. Maintenance and repairs to lights, fog-whistles buoys and beacons, humane establishments and provision depots..... $265,000

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). I presented a petition in the early part of the Session to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, urging the importance of improving or protecting the entrance to Lockport Harbor. Is it the intention of the hon. Minister to comply with that request? During foggy weather it is almost impossible for vessels to find their way into this harbor.

Mr. McLELAN. I have that under consideration, but I am afraid this year the Government will not be able to comply with the request.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). There is another question to which I would call the hon. Minister's attention, and that is the bell buoy at Brazil Rock, which is of no value whatever. This rock lies in the direct route of steamers plying between Boston, Portland and Halifax, and it is of the utmost importance the Government should replace the bell buoy by an automatic buoy.

Mr. McLELAN. We are making enquiry now about the expediency of placing something there which will serve the purpose desired.

Mr. KILLAM. The hon. gentleman ought to tell us before concurrence, whether the Government have adopted any scheme for protecting that portion of the coast at the entrance of the Bay of Fundy. There are a number of dangerous rocks there, and some means should be taken to warn navigators of them. There is the Lurcher, off Yarmouth, and the Gannett Rock just below. These are great obstructions to navigation, and from time to time applications have been made to have something done to point them out.

Mr. McLELAN. We propose to put two or three automatic buoys in the places the hon. gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. McCUAIG. I called the attention of the hon. the Acting Minister of Marine to the dangerous state of the wharf at or near the Cressey Lighthouse, known as Convers's, and the necessity of a liberal appropriation to make the necessary repairs for its preservation. I hope the matter will not be overlooked. Also to the necessity of placing a buoy at Nigger Island, in the Bay of Quinte, near Rednersville, and the desirability of constructing a lighthouse, similar to the one recently placed at South Bay Point, on the most northerly of the Islands in the Bay of Quinte known as the Brothers. The construction of this lighthouse is much needed in the interest of all vessels passing and repassing this narrow portion of the Bay of Quinte.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I see a notice that the hon. gentleman proposes to discontinue the light at Fort William on the Kaministiquia River. I presume, although it is not expressly stated, there has been a good deal of complaint made in consequence of the destruction of these lights, and I would like to know why the Department had concluded either to remove or discontinue them.

Mr. McLELAN. It was reported to the Department the lights there were not required. The beacons have been left standing, and they can be re-lit hereafter if required.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Who made this report?

Mr. McLELAN. The officer of the Department recommended a change at Prince Arthur's Landing.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Who is the officer?

Mr. McLELAN. I do not know.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think we are entitled to know who this officer was, because it is an extraordinary report. The Government of Ontario spent $22,000 in dredging that channel, and this Government spent a considerable sum. Vessels have gone up there every year, and when the Department ordered the discontinuance of the lights, I understand the people held a meeting and made representations to the Government against the proposal. The Government had determined to destroy the structures that supported the lights as well as the lights themselves, but finally they graciously consented to let the structures stand on condition the people would maintain the lights at their own expense, which they have done ever since. It would appear that it was done for no other purpose than to discredit the selection by the late Government of the Kaministiquia River for the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They have deliberately and wantonly destroyed the lights in a place where they were very much needed—much more than in hundreds of other places where there are lights—for the purpose of reaping a petty revenge.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman has used strong language unnecessarily. Reports came from one of the engineers who was employed on some of the works there that the lighthouses had been carried away by a flood, and that the channel was filled up. Similar reports came from a gentleman employed on the Board of Works, and from the lighthouse keeper. After a good deal of investigation it was decided it would be useless to re-erect the lighthouse on that particular spot, from the fact that the channel was constantly filling, and the chances are that every spring the channel will fill up. I am aware that small tugs have been going up the river, but no large vessels have been able to ascend that river since the spring floods, when the necessity for the light ceased to exist. I know that some vessels heavily laden with rails were compelled to discharge their cargo at the landing because it was impossible for them to ascend the river. It was from no petty spite against the hon. gentleman that the lights were discontinued, for many other people thought it was an improper site for the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The opinion is not confined to members of the Government that that place is utterly valueless as a terminus of the large trade which it is hoped will grow up in connection with that road. The decision of the Department was taken purely in the interest of the navigation and trade of those ports, and particularly from an economical point of view, as we believed it would be utterly impossible for the Government to keep that channel open except at a large expense. I was up the river during last season and I found a channel staked out and it was about as crooked as any channel ought to be, even for boats of very light draught to use. It was marked by stakes driven into the mud so that small tugs could ascend the river; it certainly was not a channel as large boats navigating Lake Superior should be asked to ascend.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Channels are staked out on Lake George.

Mr. BOWELL. Not with eight or ten feet stakes driven into the mud.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Regarding the statements made by the hon. the Minister of Customs, the local paper at Fort William reported nearly all he has said. It is stated in one number that one of the immediate results of putting out the light was that a steamer with rails could not go into the river, but was obliged to proceed to Prince Arthur's Landing, from which there is a branch to Fort William and to the so-called harbor of the Landing, and instead of the rails being at once put in their place they had to be placed on Mr. Mark's wharf, and wharfage of something like 50 cents a ton had to be paid. Altogether a few hundred dollars for nothing were placed in the pockets of a political friend. I know nothing about the matter except what is stated in this paper.

Mr. BOWELL. I spoke on the authority of Mr. Beatty, who came to my office and consulted me in reference to the matter. I sent him to the then Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Pope). He told me it would be impossible for him to ascend that channel in the day time or at any other period. He did not require any light to go up the Kaministiquia in the day time, but there was not sufficient water to enable the vessel to cross the bay, and he asked whether he would be permitted to lay the rails at Prince Arthur's Landing. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will enquire from Mr. Beatty, whom he knows better than I do. He is an honorable man of high character and position, and I do not think he would make representations to the Department, in order to save the trouble of running five or six miles up the river.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite wrong in supposing that any course has been taken in respect to the selection of the terminus of the railway at that part of Lake Superior, whether at the Kaministiquia, selected by them, or at Prince Arthur's Landing, in favor of which place, the hon. gentleman knows a great many persons held very strong opinions. I may say, when I entered upon the duties of the office which the hon. member for Lambton formerly held, I found a very considerable amount of money had been expended by the Department, previous to my entering it, in dredging the mouth of the Kaministiquia. The hon. gentleman selected Fort William as the terminus, and expended a good deal of money in dredging the mouth of the river, for the purpose of facilitating the entrance of larger vessels to that point. I examined the subject with all care and attention, and all the information that was available to me in relation to the controverted point, as to whether Prince Arthur's Landing or the Kaministiquia was the better place; and I am free to say that my judgment, in the light of all the information I could get, leans very strongly to the impression that a mistake had been made in selecting Fort William. But I never considered the matter sufficiently conclusive, either the one way or the other, to determine, down to the present moment, where the terminus should be. It never became necessary. There was no immediate necessity, as the hon. gentleman knows, until the road should be nearly completed, at all events between Winnipeg and Thunder Bay, of coming to an absolute conclusion; and I came to the determination that before arriving at any definite conclusion as to whether the place selected by the hon. member for Lambton, or Prince Arthur's Landing, was the better place, to go there with the ablest officers of my Department and give the matter the closest possible investigation before deciding where the terminal buildings should be placed. It has not become necessary to construct, up to the present time, any terminal buildings at that point. That is the position in which the question rests to-day. No selection has been made, and since the road has been placed in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, of course the views and opinions of that Company, of their officers and engineers, will have a very important bearing upon the selection of the point. But I may say that finding, after a large expenditure of money in dredging by my predecessor, the water on the bar of the Kaministiquia was no deeper than when the hon. gentleman commenced—I now speak of the spring of the year, the flood having brought down the debris—I abandoned expenditure and dredging, and no expenditure has been made, nor do I intend any to be made until the question is finally determined whether the point selected by the hon. member for Lambton or the place which other persons suppose to be better, Prince Arthur's Landing, or some point between the two, will be the ultimate place of the terminus. I give this explanation to the hon. gentleman frankly as to the position in which the matter stands, and I am free to say I never arrived at an absolute conclusion, although my judgment was very strongly shaken as to the Kaministiquia.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I thank the hon. gentleman for his statement. In the light of it I ask the hon. Minister of Railways if he does not think it was somewhat premature for the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to order the lights to be discontinued at a time when it was actually not decided whether the principal harbor should be at the Kaministiquia or not?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not able to express any opinion on that point, for I did not know any change had taken place in that regard. I was not aware whether it had been removed by the direction of the Department or carried away by accident.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The inhabitants have been obliged to maintain the light ever since—at least so I am informed.

Mr. DAWSON. The hon. member for Lambton is wrong in supposing there was any vindictive feeling in removing the lights from Fort William. A new state of things arose last spring which has not been taken into account, and which I have not heard mentioned here. A flood occurred there last spring, and that river (the Kaministiquia) is liable to floods of a very peculiar character. In a late and cold spring, when the ice remains firm in Lake Superior until a late period, the ice in the river is brought down against the ice of the lake and there it forms what is called a "dig" or a "jam." It has done so on several occasions within the memory of the present generation, and is liable to do so at any time. As hon. gentlemen are aware the bottom of that river is a soft alluvial soil, and the ice of the river coming against the ice of the lake backs the water of the river, so that sometimes the people have to sail about the flats in boats, and, as any person can understand, the water which rushes down under the ice on the soft alluvial bottom heaps up the sand in advance of it. It did so last spring, and the Government gave orders to erect a light at Prince Arthur's Landing where it was needed. Orders were given at the same time to remove the lighthouse at Fort William; but that was a mistake which the Government immediately remedied, and gave orders that the structures should not be removed, and they are there still. The hon. gentleman says that the people of Fort William have kept up a light themselves. I believe the municipality has kept up a light for such small craft as can go in, but from the very time that the country was opened the people of Prince Arthur's Landing, without any aid, have kept up a light on the wharf which has served for the purposes of navigation. At Fort William, even in its best days, when the channel was kept open, the number of vessels was exceedingly few. The larger Beatty boats went in on one or two occasions, I mean the Ontario and Quebec, when the water was very high, but they went with extreme reluctance, and the Beatty's have always protested against sending their large boats in, although they have sent smaller vessels there with railway iron. At Prince Arthur's Landing, since 1870, when the military expedition went up, the yearly average has been about 230 vessels, and there has been the same number of departures coming and going in spring through the summer to the fall, and yet there has not been one single serious accident; there has not been one vessel lost. What better proof could there be of its being an excellent harbor? According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, Prince Arthur's Landing is the third port in Ontario, according to its shipping, and if it has been left twelve years without a light, it shows that access to it must be very easy. With the range lights at Fort William, when it was at its very best, when a narrow channel was kept open, even then vessels went sometimes aground at the mouth of the river, but the experience of last spring has demonstrated that it would be useless to attempt to make a harbor there, because it would be liable every year to what occurred last spring. I believe there is a way in which a harbor could be made, at the mouth of the river; but with such a good harbor at Prince Arthur's Landing I do not see that such would be necessary. The hon. gentleman has referred to the report of a newspaper published at Fort William. There was a newspaper published in that place by some people who were interested in a large land speculation, and the paper was established there to advocate their interests and abuse every person opposed to their interests, or who advocated the general good. Like some other institutions, that paper has now deserted Fort William and gone down to the Landing, and it is now as eloquent an advocate of the interests of the Landing as it formerly was of those of Fort William. What reliance can you place on the reports of a paper of that kind—a paper which was employed to write up the interests of one place which it has now deserted in favor of its rival?

Mr. MACKENZIE. I suppose that is the custom of the country up there.

Mr. DAWSON. Not always; but, with regard to this harbor, what happened last spring is liable to occur again at any time.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I shall not, on the present occasion, enter into a discussion of the merits or demerits of this harbor, but shall defer that to a proper occasion. As to the shipping belonging to the port which the hon. gentleman eulogizes so much, I do not think there is a single vessel belonging to it at all. The vessels which are so numerous are those of the Sarnia and Collingwood Line.

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, and some American vessels.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The last time I was there the largest American vessel that ever entered was in the Kaministiquia River, and I have no doubt, from estimates with which I agreed, rather than formed, that this is the right place for the harbor. I was there in 1864, but paid very little attention to the matter; but when the Chief Engineer selected that as the proper harbor, so far as I was able to form an opinion, I coincided with his views, and thus I am glad to know that there has been no accident at Prince Arthur's Landing; but I know that in many cases vessels have not been able to go in there, for it is not a harbor but a roadstead, and when the wind is blowing from the mouth of the bay, it is impossible for a vessel to lie there. But all I ask now is that the Government, especially as they are considering the question of the terminus, should see that the lights should not be wantonly destroyed for no reason whatever.

Mr. McLELAN. There was no wanton destruction, but the lights simply went out of range in the channel, and they were put right.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken as to their being out of range. The hon. member for Algoma will not say that the channel has shifted, but that it was partially filled up.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not know that the channel shifted, but it partly filled and the light shifted by the pressure of the ice and the people set to work to put it in range again. With regard to what the hon. gentleman said of Prince Arthur's Landing being an open roadstead, I can only say that vessels put in there in all storms, and have lain in perfect safety. Very little has been done towards making artificial works beyond running out jetties, and if they were extended a little further out the harbor would be perfectly sheltered.

Mr. GUILLET. I desire to call the attention of the hon. Minister to the necessity that exists of a light being placed on the west part of the harbor of refuge now being constructed at Cobourg. The harbor-master has directed my attention to the fact that the only light there is a small lamp which has been placed there by the local authorities, and he thought it would be the duty of the Government to place an efficient light there which would not cost more than a trifle each year. He says the danger is that vessels approaching the harbor in dark nights are not warned of the east pier, and that consequently accidents are likely to occur for which the Government would perhaps be held responsible.

Mr. McLELAN. The Government have not made provision for this because it has not been brought specially to our notice; but the matter having now been brought up by the hon. gentleman, we shall give it our consideration.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). Having some knowledge of what the hon. gentleman has just mentioned, I might say that it is absolutely necessary that the lights should be put at the end of the extended works, which reach considerably farther out in the lake than the present lighthouse.

148. Completion and construction of Lighthouses and Fog-alarms..... $40,000

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). The hon. Minister has stated that he intends to provide for the erection of a fog-alarm at the mouth of Shelburne Harbor this year. I hope the Government are sincere in this intention, because this is the second occasion on which they have made the same promise. Serious injury will certainly be done to the Conservative party in that county unless the hon. the Minister of Railways urges upon his colleagues the necessity of constructing this fog-horn.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not necessary to say another word.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I sincerely hope that the tenders will be asked for and the work commenced before the election. I do not imagine that it will do the Liberal party any injury, because it has been delayed so long.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is now afraid that it will now be done.

Mr. ROBERTSON. No, I have been urging it for the last four years, only I want the hon. Minister to see that it is done.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I do not object to passing the vote as we have not the details, but it ought to be distinctly understood that this item will be discussed as fully and as freely on concurrence as could be done on the present occasion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This will be permitted.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). Is a light to be placed at the western head of Barrington Harbor?

Mr. McLELAN. It is not so decided.

149. To complete construction of a new lighthouse on Sands Head entrance to Fraser River, B.C. $5,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. An hon. gentleman (Mr. Bunster) states that this lighthouse is in danger of being carried away before it is built. What information has the Minister of Marine on this subject?

Mr. McLELAN. The proper officers report that its situation is good, and that it is being securely built.

150. Salaries and disbursements of Fishery Overseers and Wardens..... $93,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. This is a very considerable sum. I observe that $30,000 are to be expended on fish-breeding, fishways and oyster beds. I would like to know generally how these matters are progressing, and, in particular, what is being done in the way of farming or renewing new oyster beds. A good deal has been said at various times as to what the Department expects to do in this direction, but I do not know that, as yet, any absolute success has been attained, particularly in the matter of oyster beds.

Mr. McLELAN. The Minister of Marine last spring made some enquiry as to the mode of cultivating oysters practised in the United States, but unfortunately he was taken ill shortly after he made this investigation and had visited the oyster beds in the United States. The matter has so rested since his illness, and I have not been able to give it any attention; but no great expenditure has been made, except in a survey of the different oyster beds in the Dominion.

Mr. KILLAM. Has no attempt been made to ascertain whether other places are suitable for the cultivation of oysters? I called the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine to the subject last year, and, of course, I regret his illness, which has not enabled him to pursue his investigations to the extent which the matter deserved. I take this opportunity of saying again to the hon. gentleman that I think oysters could be profitably cultivated in Mary's Bay. The locality is suitable, and oysters which have been planted in similar waters have done finely. If the hon. gentleman takes the subject into consideration he will find it to the advantage of the Dominion, while it will not occasion much expense, and we will be able then to procure oysters all winter.

Mr. McLELAN. I will certainly take the matter into consideration.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Has the attention of the Minister been called to the exhaustion, or the possible exhaustion, of the lobster fisheries in the Maritime Provinces? I speak subject to correction, but I understood a considerable time ago, from gentlemen who were there resident, and also from members of this House, that these very valuable fisheries were showing signs of exhaustion owing to the manner in which these fisheries are conducted. I am informed that a difficulty is experienced in enforcing the close season.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne).

Mr. McLELAN. Those engaged in the fisheries agreed, a year or two ago, on a close season. Representations were made on this subject to the Minister, and on two or three occasions, this season was extended; and last year, after I came into the office, application was made from Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, for the extension of the fishing season, but owing to all the information I could gather as to the condition of this fishery, I thought it unadvisable to do so, and I decided on the strict observance of the close season as appointed. I think that in this way only can these fisheries be preserved; and this is in the interest of the fishermen themselves.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. There has been no change in the close season since the hon. gentleman has taken charge of the Department?

Mr. McLELAN. No.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I understand that those who are engaged in the business—very many of them in New Brunswick, and some in Prince Edward Island—have represented to the Department that they consider it inexpedient to have a close season at all, and have asked for its abolition.

Mr. McLELAN. Applications were made for an extension of the fishing season, but I strictly adhered to the close season according to the regulations.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman state how far the assertions which are made touching the diminution of these fisheries are correct or not? This is a matter of very considerable practical importance, as it concerns a very valuable industry, which, with proper care, will become of more, instead of less, value. We all know that these great canning establishments will destroy the lobster fisheries unless they are well watched, and they have really done so in some places.

Mr. McLELAN. We are taking every means to secure the strict observance of the close season.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Was the catch of lobsters last season more or less than usual?

Mr. McLELAN. It was very much larger than is usual, last year.

Mr. ANGLIN. There is a general impression that there is a falling off, that the fish are diminishing in size, that the fish taken now are not as large, on the average, as they were some years ago. In the county I represent, there is a large number of packing houses, and in visiting them I have found opinions to vary so widely as to the close season that it is impossible to arrive at a conclusion. Many assert positively, there is no such thing as a close season, that the close season for one fish is not the close season for another. Some assured me that the regulation preventing fishing in shallow waters would be the most effectual way of preserving the fish—they say that fish in spawning time proceed into the shallow waters, and that if fishing there were prevented it would be perfectly right to allow fishing to go on in the deep waters during the whole of the season; others contradict that assertion. I am of the opinion that the habits of the fish vary at different places, depending a great deal upon the tides, warmth of water and other influences. Some, again, would like this open season to extend well into the fall. Others allege that even now fish are unfit to be taken in many places during the late portion of the open season, and that the most valuable fishing would be in what is called the close season, when the waters become warm, and the fish are recovering from spawning. All those statements are made by intelligent men, and it is difficult to know what is best to be done. My own impression is there ought to be a close season, but I have not been able to make up my mind as to what the close season should be. I believe it should vary in different districts; for instance, on the Atlantic coast where the water is open all the year, warm early in the season, the season may commence much earlier than in the Gulf of St. Lawrence where the waters are ice-bound up to a very late period and the water remains, after the ice disappears, so cold that the fish is of very inconsiderable value from the advanced period of the spring. It would, therefore, be unfair to make the close season there open at as early a period as on the Atlantic coast. I made representations on this subject some years ago, and it was owing to that, I believe, that the change was made in the law. I had the honor of submitting to the Minister the representations of a number of persons engaged in fishing in my county, and I presume others made similar representations and that our combined efforts led to the change in the clause with respect to the fishing in that locality. There is very little room to doubt that the season varies in different localities and that the habits of the fish vary as the temperature varies from different causes. Unfortunately, for the last year or two, our fisheries have been very unprofitable, because the market has been overstocked. From one reason or another the habit of canning fish has extended very largely; not only lobsters but almost every variety of fish are now canned, and owing to this the market seems to be so much overstocked that last year every one engaged in business lost money.

Mr. KILLAM. I do not intend to weary the Committee with any lengthy remarks on this question, but I want to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine to some parts of the subject which, I think, are worthy of his consideration. Of course, fishing is very different in different parts of the Dominion, and the regulations are different for the Bay of Fundy and the Gulf of the St. Lawrence, Atlantic and Gulf coasts. Our fishermen on the Atlantic coast have to commence their fishing at a different date under the regulations. I do not think the regulations are exactly what they ought to be. I have considered the subject carefully, have discussed it with many fishermen, and am prepared to say what, I think—although it is not my business to propound a policy for the hon. gentleman opposite—will be the close season that would be most satisfactory to the fishermen, so far as any fishery officer is able to say will protect the fishery as well as it can be protected. I should propose that July and August should be the close months, say from 10th July to the end of August on the Atlantic coast and Bay of Fundy, and during all the rest of the year lobsters should be allowed to be caught for canning or for export in any way. If that does not meet the views of the hon. Minister, I wish that he would recommend that in the western part of Nova Scotia lobsters could be caught in the fall, after the end of the close season, for the purpose of exporting alive, to boil, and not for canning. The export of lobsters in the shell is, I think, going to be an important industry, and I take this opportunity of directing the attention of the hon. Minister to it. I would like him to give us before we take concurrence, if he cannot now, positive information on this subject. The question of the lobster fisheries has received, I have no doubt, much attention from the officers of his Department. I referred to it last year and was promised by my hon. friend, who, I regret, is unable to be present, that this subject would be looked into. For some occult reason, the fishermen are prevented from catching fish when they ought to be allowed to catch them. This difficulty should be removed. I am not aware whether these fishermen are to receive the benefit of the $150,000 devoted to fishermen; but at all events, they should receive this consideration from the Department, that their desires, with regard to the close season, should be granted and that they be allowed to have more than two months in the year in which to ply their calling.

Mr. OGDEN. This question has come before the House every year. Some hon. gentlemen say they entertain serious doubts as to the regulation being a proper one. Well, Sir, I profess to know something about the lobster business. I maintained here some four years ago that there should be protection afforded to this valuable industry, and I advocated that the close season, such as is now in force, was the proper close season for the whole coast of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, that is, from the first of August to the first of April next year. I think the present regulation is about right. I was at one time largely interested in the lobster business, and I was charged on the floor of this House with having influenced the Government to make this regulation for my own personal benefit. The hon. member for Gloucester has stated to-night that the market is overstocked. It is overstocked, and I am sorry to say that there are many lobster packers who are not so solvent as I would like to see them, on account of the market being overstocked. The business of fishing has become a necessity on certain parts of the coast. The fish became smaller and scarcer, yet the fishermen had to earn as much money for the support of their families and had to ask a higher price than they previously obtained, consequently they obtained a smaller quantity of fish for the same money than they had in years gone by. Therefore the cost of production became much greater than before.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Whose policy was it?

Mr. OGDEN. It was the hon. gentlemen opposite who made the regulations; and on the representations, I think, of Mr. Jones, of Halifax, they rescinded the Order in Council on Monday which they passed the Saturday before. They did not have backbone enough to pass an Order in Council and carry it out regardless of consequences. I am sorry to say the hon. member for Westmoreland was at the head of the Department at the time. The Order in Council as it now stands, I believe to be in the interests of the packers and fishermen, and of the country at large. I have received the following letter from an influential firm in Portland doing business in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia:—

“PORTLAND, Me., 24th January, 1882.

“ALFRED OGDEN, Esq., Ottawa.

“DEAR SIR,—We trust that Parliament will make no alteration in the law for the protection of the Lobster Fishery, which law, you well know, has proved to be the wisest measure that could have been adopted for the protection of a business which is now of so great importance to the Province.

“Operating fourteen factories on the coast of Nova Scotia, and our former senior partner, the late Mr. Samuel Rumery, having been the first in the business on the coast of Maine, our long experience teaches us that if the season for fishing were to be extended beyond its present limits, the supply would soon become as limited as it is on this coast.

“Had our law here been raised before the Lobster Fishery was beyond redemption, the business would have prospered; but the lobster is now so nearly exterminated that we are obliged to close our factories here as they become unprofitable, which during the past few years has been at about the rate of one each year.

“On the contrary, we find that in Nova Scotia, in consequence of reasonable protection measures, our factories there are producing rather more than they did during the same months before the adoption of the present law. We, of course, feel deeply interested in the future welfare of the business, and sincerely trust that no measures will be adopted, which we feel confident will result disastrously to the interest of both packer and fishermen.

“We remain, very truly yours,

“ONTARIO PACKING CO.”

That firm is operating largely in the counties of Shelburne and Yarmouth. The opinion of these gentlemen ought certainly to be worth something. I said I was at one time interested in the business. I remember at one time having packed as many lobsters as any packer in the Dominion. But I have sold out my whole interest and have not now a dollar invested in the business, consequently I speak as one having no personal interest whatever in the business, but solely in the interests of my constituents, who are largely engaged in this business, and dependent upon it for their daily bread. I know that some hon. gentlemen have tried to make political capital against me, because they said that this regulation was made in the interest of myself and other packers to the detriment of the interests of the fishermen; but they cannot say so now, as I have gone out of the business altogether. I can go back to my constituents tomorrow and tell them I urged the Government to enforce this Order in Council, which has not only been the means of perpetuating the lobster business in the Maritime Provinces, but has been the means of protecting the fish. If the present protection is maintained to that valuable crustacea the effect will be to perpetuate the business and keep people home who would otherwise have to go to a foreign country to earn a livelihood. I am sorry hon. gentlemen opposite so far forget their duty to themselves and their constituents as to try to make a little political capital out of a measure which is for the public good. The hon. gentleman from Shelburne smiles; but I remember two or three years ago there was a lobster packer in his county who was one of his warmest supporters, and he too was anxious there should be no close season, but I think to-day that gentleman has changed his mind, both with regard to the regulations and to the former opinion of the hon. member. I have yet to hear from one packer that there should be no close season, either in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island. That is the case not only in Shelburne, but in every other county throughout the Province of Nova Scotia. I remember three years ago many of my friends from Prince Edward Island begged for an extension of time. They said: "Our fishermen cannot earn a livelihood, as the time is too short." They have now ascertained that the present regulation is a proper one for the protection of all parties concerned. I felt it to be my duty to make these remarks. Having never missed a division since I have been a member of Parliament, I was careful to be present when the lobster fishery came up. If any change in the regulation is made, making the close season shorter than it is to-day, it will be detrimental to the interests of the fishermen along the coast. I speak not as one personally interested but as an independent man, and while some were opposed to me on this question in the past, I believe there is not a man to be found who is opposed to me to-day.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). I have paid some little attention to this matter, and I have acted in the interests of my constituents. I have had the honor during the last two or three years of presenting a large number of petitions on this subject, including a petition from Guysborough, signed by 500 of the hon. gentleman's electors. The lobster packers are, no doubt, in favor of the close season which exists, but there are other interests to be considered. The hon. member for Guysborough has told the House that the Order in Council was passed in the interest of the lobster packers, and for their special benefit. I beg to differ with them, and to say that the Order was passed for the purpose of affecting the price of lobsters in the London market.

Mr. OGDEN. You favored it yourself.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I did not. The hon. gentleman referred to the lobster packers in my county who are in favor of the present close season. Those lobster packers were like all others in Nova Scotia, and they asked for the close season adopted by the Government. The fishermen along the coast were opposed to the present close season. The Government proposed to give the fishermen four months—April, May, June and July. In April, on the south coast of Nova Scotia, it was impossible for the fishermen to prosecute their work. After the first week in July lobsters become very scarce, and the business usually ended at about the end of that month. All I have asked the Government was that we should have May, June, September and October, being months in which fishermen can prosecute the business. In regard to the matter urged on the Government by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam), permitting the exportation of lobsters in the shell during certain times of the year, I think it should receive the attention of the Government. Arrangements have been made in the western portion of Nova Scotia, for the exportation of lobsters in the shell by the steamer Dominion, and the counties of Shelburne and Yarmouth are much interested in this, which will prove a large and profitable business. If the fishery inspectors would carry out the regulations, to fine heavily lobster packers who destroyed small and female fish, and gave four months in which to catch the fish, an act of justice would be done to the fishermen. I have, however, given up all hope of Nova Scotia fishermen receiving justice at the hands of this Government. We will see what is the result of the lobster fishery during the coming year.

Mr. SNOWBALL. I am glad the hon. Minister has not rigidly enforced the regulations respecting the close season.

Mr. McLELAN. I did not extend the fishing season.

Mr. KILLAM. There was an extension of ten days.

Mr. McLELAN. I am speaking of this season.

Mr. SNOWBALL. In 1881 it was refused. I would urge upon the hon. Minister the necessity of looking into this matter carefully, and consider the time fishermen have been able to fish before refusing an extension. The season on the Atlantic coast, Nova Scotia and Gulf portions of New Brunswick is entirely different. We seldom get new lobsters before the middle of May or even June. Last year the season was much earlier than usual.

Mr. McLELAN. You have a longer period than they have.

Mr. SNOWBALL. It is necessary we should have a different season because we do not get the fish so early. There is a great deal of force in what was said by the hon. member for Yarmouth. Many fishermen maintain that part of July and August is the proper close season; but there is this to be considered, that in the Gulf they cannot fish in September. It is so stormy they are not able to fish in deep water. The fish should be protected when on the shore, and the fishermen should be compelled to fish lobsters in deep water. Fishing in deep water no doubt costs much more than near the shore, owing to the expense of traps and great loss by storms, and can only be prosecuted during the early months of the season. The hon. gentleman says that packers generally want to have the close season as it now exists.

Mr. OGDEN. I did not say so. I said I had a letter from a firm who said that any alteration in the law would be detrimental.

Mr. SNOWBALL. After the 1st of September you cannot catch enough to keep the factories open, and because they have to close the factories they should not want the people on the coasts prevented from catching the fish for their own use; they would sooner have them accumulated for the following season, but I maintain it would do no harm to allow the fish to be caught for the local markets any time after the first of September, as the spawning season is over. The freezing of salmon, and shipping them fresh, has almost done away with the canning of that fish in the Maritime Provinces, and so it will be with lobsters in after years; for even now the margin on canned lobsters has been reduced to the lowest possible point. I hope, therefore, that the Acting Minister will do everything in his power to foster among the people of the Lower Provinces the trade which by every appearance will be the trade of the future. The fall which has taken place in the trade has been owing largely, if not exclusively, to the number of people who have gone into the business, and the fact that the fish caught on the muddy bottoms in parts of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick are of a dark color, and that they are mixed with the brighter lobsters when sent to the markets of Europe, gives a character to our exports to Europe of that article which is not favorable, and which has its effect in depressing the trade.

Mr. HACKETT. I think the impression has been got by some hon. gentlemen that the fishing season of Prince Edward Island was extended last year, but such is not the fact. I know that great pressure was brought to bear upon the Acting Minister to extend the season, and it was felt that the season was too short for the interests of the people embarked in that industry. We have very late springs there, and the fishermen are unable to set their traps before the 1st of June, and they have to take them up by the 20th of August. The season is, therefore, so short that people engaged in them have had little opportunity of getting any remuneration. The hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson) said that the Government had taken particular care of the lobster packers, while they had taken no interest in the fishermen. That is quite incorrect. The lobster packers of Prince Edward Island last year tried their best to extend the season, but the Government would not give way, and, of course, they considered that they had suffered on that account. So far as the spawning season is concerned the regulations are intended for the purpose of protecting the lobster, so that it will not be exterminated. I know that, owing to the vigilance of the officers, so careful are the fishermen, that they remove all the spawn before taking them to the factories, as they know that otherwise they would be fined. I am very much surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Snowball), who said that the lobsters taken off the coast of Prince Edward Island, when packed, are of a dark color, and not up to the standard of those taken in the other Provinces. I deny that; I say that the lobsters taken around Prince Edward Island are equal to any taken in any part of Canada, and if the hon. gentleman visits the Island he will find that we have as clear a water and as clear a bottom as can be found off the coast of any part of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. HADDOW. Mr. Chairman, I think the time suggested by the member for Yarmouth is the time best adapted for the close season for lobster fishing, at least I think the close season should be in July and August. I don't say that it should be necessary to take the whole of both months, but within those months the close season should be made. My principal object, however, at present is to direct the attention of the Minister to the fact that among the fishermen along the Restigouche, which is celebrated for its salmon fisheries, there is at present a deal of discontent with the regulations of the Government, who prohibit them from taking fish even for their own use. Of course, there is a question as to the right of these people to fish opposite their own land; this question is now before the courts. I have no doubt it will soon be settled in favor of the settlers, but I think the regulations are pretty severe, and I would ask the hon. Minister to relax them if possible, as the case of those people, who live in isolated districts, far away from the privileges which belong to more settled localities, is a hard one. A Commission of enquiry visited that locality last summer, and from the evidence they gathered it appears to me that there is a great deal in the whole question that is worthy of consideration. I have been informed that the Acting Minister was met at Metapedia by some of the inhabitants, who urged him to allow the Commission to investigate other questions than the simple charges made against the warden—questions involving, to some extent, the action of some officers of the Department, and they complain now that the investigation has not been so full as it ought to have been. I think the whole question of granting fishing licenses, not only to settlers on the river above tide-water, but to those on the coast, is worthy of being considered by the Government. There is continual trouble at present, owing to some men being able, through political influence, to obtain rights which they should not enjoy, while others, who are poor and deserving people, do not get any rights at all.

Mr. McLELAN. The question of regulating the rights of the fishermen along the Restigouche is surrounded by difficulties, but it shall have my consideration with a view of producing harmony. With regard to the investigation held last year, the opinion at one time prevailed that it should be limited to the charges originally sent into the Department, but owing to representations afterwards made to me by some of the inhabitants, I told the Commissioners that they might extend their enquiries, and I think the investigation was very full and very exhaustive.

Mr. BUNSTER. The hon. Minister of Railways, when he visited British Columbia last summer, must have seen the desirability of encouraging lobster fishing on our shores. We have a great many men employed in catching fish on our coast; our fisheries are very valuable, and I hope the hon. gentleman will not forget his promise to give us a hatchery.

Mr. BORDEN. I wish to call the attention of the Minister to the fishery of the gaspereaux. A few years ago a very valuable fishery was then pursued in catching alewives and salmon; but since then a mill has been erected on the river, and the fishery has been almost entirely destroyed. While the late Government were in office, I brought the matter under the notice of the then Minister, and some improvements were made in the ladder at the dam across the river. When the present Government came into office, they thought it necessary to dismiss all the officials on the river at the time, and I had reason to hope that under the new régime some improvement would take place; but I have received a letter from a member of the municipal council in my county informing me that still no improvement has taken place, and asking me to bring this important matter once more to the attention of the Government.

Mr. McLELAN. We have had a special examination made of a number of woirs in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick with the view of removing obstructions on these weirs, for the very purpose of allowing the smaller fish to ascend them, and increase the number of the smaller fish, in order to attract the larger fish to the coast. The report of the inspector is now before us, and probably some action will be taken with a view to remedy the evils of which the hon. gentleman has just spoken.

Mr. OGDEN. The hon. member for Northumberland referred to the months of August and September, stating that August was a very stormy month, and that it is more expensive to fish in deep than in shoal water. I would just like to correct the hon. gentleman. It is more expensive to fish in shoal water, where the sea breaks the traps and nets, than in deep water, where it has no effect on the traps or nets. I think the hon. gentleman knows as little about the lobster business as he does about the coal industry; and, consequently, I do not think that he will carry off the palm with respect to either. Many people consider that the lobster question is a trifling little matter, which deserves no consideration. The hon. gentlemen opposite passed the greater part of a day on a discussion about a pig only worth $3, but here is a question of great magnitude, which must be passed over without any remark. I will now read to the House the following interesting statistics from a circular issued by Isaac H. Mathens, of Halifax, of the number of cases of preserved lobsters and salmon imported into the United Kingdom for each year since 1874 :

LOBSTERS.

89,392	113,944	129,559	139,780	170,510	178,773	232,139	257,668

SALMON.

1874	1875	1876	1877	1878	1879	1880	1881
82,918	182,300	292,005	305,410	317,920	364,020	257,242	552,467

Thus, you will see, Mr. Speaker, that the lobsters above, at $5 a case, amount to $1,288,340, chiefly the products of the Dominion of Canada. None were shipped from the United States, and but a very small quantity from Newfoundland. The salmon were the product chiefly of British Columbia. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of considerable importance, and should not be passed over without being given due consideration. The hon. member for Northumberland has tried to demonstrate the want of value of the Prince Edward Island lobster. I am very sorry to say that he has made statements here which, if they were quoted perhaps on the other side, would be very much against the interests of these packers; but it appears to be the height of the hon. gentleman's ambition to decry every industry in the country. I am sure that the lobster packers in his own county will not thank him for having done so. With reference to what my hon. friend has said here with respect to the ascending of rivers by alewives and gaspereaux, I am very sorry that there is not a larger sum in the Estimates for the protection and preservation of the river fisheries. It is evident that our fisheries along the coast are becoming exhausted. The fishermen have to go further out to sea and in larger crafts in order to catch codfish; but if our river fisheries were protected and our streams were kept clear of sawdust, and if useful fish-ladders were erected, salmon and alewives and other fish would ascend our rivers to deposit their spawn and attract the codfish to our shores. As soon as our river fisheries become exterminated then I say that the codfish will forsake our shores, and the living of many hardy sons of toil will be lost. The only fault which I have to find with the Government is that they have not given that attention to the river fisheries which they deserve. I believe Mr. Whitcher has been a good and faithful man in that respect, and I am only sorry his hands have been tied, and that a larger sum has not been expended in protecting our river fisheries.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). I wish to make a few remarks about a new branch of fishery which has sprung up lately in New Brunswick, on the St. John River—the sturgeon fishery. As it is a new industry, the Government, I presume, have been at a loss to know what regulations it is necessary to make to protect it. On this river there are some three districts, in each of which a warden is appointed. These wardens have been authorized to grant licenses to catch these fish for the last year or two. Before that no notice was taken of this fish, but since there has been a market for sturgeon, principally in the United States, the Department have ordered that licenses be granted to catch those fish in certain districts. These wardens have acted separately, each issuing licenses to fish in his own district, but the licenses are so drawn that any party who has one can fish in any part of the river. Hence difficulties have arisen, litigation has nearly taken place, and a good deal of confusion has resulted. I would enquire whether any policy has been decided upon in reference to the extent of territory covered by these licenses, and with reference to the close season, about which there was some difficulty from the fact that it is scarcely known what time of the year these fish do spawn. In fact there never was a close season until last year, when one was fixed to some extent.

Mr. McLELAN. This is a new business, as the hon. member has stated, and is not so systematized as it might be. A good deal of correspondence is going on between the Department and the officer at St. John, with respect to this matter. Licenses are to be issued this year, but as to whether they ought to be issued generally over the river or locally, I am not positive, but I think they will be confined to districts so as to prevent confusion.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Some regard should be paid to our own people, and these wardens should, as much as possible, give licenses, not to foreigners, but to our own people. It is very annoying to find foreigners coming in for a few months catching all the fish and making all the profit.

Mr. McLELAN. I enquired into this matter, and the answer I got was that Americans would go to the man living on the shore and get the license in his name.

Mr. KAULBACH. The neglect of our river fisheries in some of the counties in Nova Scotia, preventing the access of fish up their waters, has been the subject of complaint for many years, but I am sorry to find little has been done up to the present time to remedy the grievance. For some years past, and more particularly since I have had the honor of representing my county in this House, I have given the matter much attention; and during the last three years I have frequently brought the matter before the notice of the Department, and made repeated appeals for aid in protecting the fisheries and removing the obstructions that offer on many of the rivers of the county of Lunenburg, especially on the river La Have. This is certainly the finest river in the Province of Nova Scotia, and was in former years greatly frequented by salmon, shad and gaspereaux in large quantities. It is now, however, so completely obstructed by mill-dams, debris, etc., that the fish have to a great extent left its waters, and are but seldom met with beyond the head of the tide. I have no desire to interfere with the milling interests on this river, and besides there is no necessity for it, as both the fishing and milling interests can be accommodated without the one interfering with the other so long as sufficient interest is taken by the chief river officials to see that proper fishways are provided thereon. The grand secret to the success of the deep sea fisheries is the proper attention to the river fisheries for the culture of the young fry, as through it the larger fish frequenting the deep sea would be attracted to the shore after the smaller fish frequenting the bays and rivers, and success as an inevitable result would thus attend the pursuit of the fishermen. I am sorry to find so small a sum is in the Estimates for this important service. Money could not be appropriated in any better way than in clearing our rivers, for the better access of fish up and down their waters. I hope my county will be fairly treated, and the money required for the improving of its respective river fisheries be granted, so that the dissatisfaction now existing may exist no longer.

Mr. KILLAM. It would have been interesting had the hon member explained what has been done by the hatching establishments, and what is proposed to be done in introducing the spawn into our different rivers. Salmon fishing has commenced in Nova Scotia, and at this season the salmon is very valuable, the average value to the fisherman, as it is taken from the water, being $1 per lb., during the latter part of March and the first part of April. In the United States markets these fish are quoted at $2.50 per lb. The officers of the Fishery Department, I am bound to say, have been generally efficient in their duties. But I wanted to say that in the distribution of this fish spawn that river should not be overlooked, because the fish that are hatched there come to maturity sooner, and are more valuable than the fish anywhere else.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). I think the remarks of the hon. member for Kings, and the hon. member for Lunenburg, with reference to the river fisheries, should receive the immediate and earnest attention of the Government. There is no more important fisheries in the Lower Provinces than the river fisheries, but for the last eight or ten years they have been seriously neglected or destroyed in some important rivers. The mill-dams across the rivers prevent the fish from passing up, and the Government have patented a fish-ladder, manufactured by a Mr. Rogers, which is of no more value in assisting the fish up the rivers than a stairway would be. Until the Government takes some steps to have some portion of a river bed set apart for the use of the fisheries, they never can expect to have the fisheries restored. It must be evident to this House that there is too much politics in the service. If the hon. gentleman would just lay aside politics in this Department and select men for their qualifications, instead of for their politics, we could then hope to have some improvement in our river fisheries.

Mr. SNOWBALL. Is it intended to pay the ex-fishery warden, Mr. Perley, the claim he has against the Department? I understand that claim has been favorably reported upon.

Mr. McLELAN. I find the claims were passed upon by the hon. member for Westmoreland and decided against Mr. Perley; and they were also passed upon by Mr. Pope with the same result.

Resolutions ordered to be reported; and (at 1 o'clock a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 14th April, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BOUNTIES TO FISHERMEN.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that on Tuesday next the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient that an annual grant of $150,000 be made to aid in the development of the sea fisheries and the encouragement of the building and fitting out of improved fishing vessels, and the improvement of the condition of the fishermen.

Mr. FLYNN. Would the hon. gentleman explain the principle on which he proposes to apportion the money among the fishermen.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. When the resolution is moved I will give a full statement of the intentions of the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the hon. gentleman might answer the enquiry briefly unless the motion is a mere form. I suppose the object of the motion is that such explanations may be given as to satisfy the House of the propriety of its going into Committee. Of course, this is not the time for debate, but I think we might have a brief statement of the intentions of the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think that is at all the parliamentary practice. The object of giving notice of a motion to be moved at a future day, is that the House may not be taken by surprise. The principle of the grant is specified in the resolution; the question as to how it is to be applied is a matter of detail, which will be properly gone into when the House goes into Committee on the resolution.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think the present is the time when we should have the explanation of the resolution. It is true that the notice is sufficient to meet the parliamentary requirements in the case; but I think it is the invariable custom, when such motions are made, to explain to the House why they are asked to adopt them. We are now virtually asked to commit ourselves to the principle of the expenditure of the money, and I think we have the right to ask how it is to be expended. I am interested in a large number of fishermen who are desirous of ascertaining how they are to be affected by this grant, and I have received a number of letters on the subject. In a very short time the fishing season will be open, and all these men will be engaged in their pursuits, and they are anxious to know what they have to do to be entitled to a share of this bounty. For every possible reason I think we ought to have the explanations now.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman will see that the fishermen are anxious, not to get a statement from the hon. Minister of Finance, but to know the decision of Parliament, and that can only be arrived at in Committee.

Mr. KILLAM. I have no doubt that this is a difficult subject to deal with. The question of relief and assistance to the fishermen has engaged the attention of the Government for the last three years, and although no provision was made for them in the National Policy, it is pleasing to see how anxious the Government are to take their case into consideration. I presume that the hon. the Finance Minister cannot give any explanation at the present time, because he is occupied in deciding what he will do about the drawback on sugar, as he was in finding out the proper duty to impose on sugar, when he forgot to consider the case of the fishermen before.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Before the House proceeds to the Orders of the Day, I wish to make a statement in regard to a matter in which I am somewhat interested. Some days ago I gave notice that unless some other arrangement should be made, I would move to take up the discussion of the question of which I gave notice some time ago, as an amendment to going into Supply. Some of the papers reported that I had announced that I would move my resolutions on the next occasion on which the motion was made to go into Supply, and those who read that report of course were curious to know why I did not make the motion on either of the two occasions that have since arisen. I make this explanation to show why I did not move. I still hoped that I might get the consent of the leader of the Government to move the resolutions in some other way at an early day. I therefore now ask the leader of the House if he will give me an opportunity of dealing with that question at an early day. I know that there is no hope of reaching it in the ordinary way on the private days, as there are so many notices of motions before it. I would like to reach it, if possible, on Tuesday next, and have it understood that it would come up on that day, so that people outside might be aware of the fact.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The request of the hon. gentleman is a reasonable one, considering the importance of the subject involved in his resolutions, and I will undertake to give him an early opportunity of bringing this subject up. I prefer not fixing Tuesday, because my hon. friend the Minister of Railways is to bring down his railway policy on that day, but I would say Thursday next. I will arrange that he shall have an opportunity of bringing up that question and discussing it fully on that day.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am quite satisfied with that arrangement.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Since the right hon. leader of the Government is willing to fix a future day for the motion of my hon. friend opposite, I have a Bill before this House which interests the public of Canada much more directly than the motion of my hon. friend, however important it is, and I would like the hon. Prime Minister to renew, if possible, the engagement which he made last Session, and fix a day when I can bring forward that Bill. As it stands on the paper, it is not likely, even if the Session be prolonged, that we can reach it before prorogation. Therefore if the hon. gentleman would give that Bill precedence on the paper, so that it may be brought before the House this Session, I think the country would be very much obliged to him.

Mr. GUILLET. I have charge of a very important Bill, which comes before the hon. gentleman's Bill on the Order Paper, and, as it concerns the interests of the seamen of the Province of Ontario, I think that, if these favors are to be generally accorded, my Bill should have precedence of the Bill of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. ANGLIN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways when I may expect the returns with relation to Intercolonial rolling stock purchased outside of the Dominion; sidings which were built during the last year or two; and the number of employes, and the salaries paid them two or three years ago and at present? Some of these returns, I think, could be made up in a very short time; but, so far, I have in vain waited patiently for their appearance.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to state he is aware that it is impossible for me to furnish any one of the returns to which he has alluded, without reference to the local headquarters of the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton, as these returns have to be there made up. I lost no time in making this reference, and I received last night two of them at all events. I suppose that they will go to the Secretary of State's office to-day, and that I will be able to lay them on the Table of the House on Monday next. The last one, I think, will take more time; but, at all events, instructions were given to use all possible expedition.

Mr. KILLAM. I moved some time since for returns respecting the prices of stores, &c., purchased for the Intercolonial Railway; and I would like to know whether they are in such an advanced shape that they will likely be laid before the House within a few days. I wish very much to get this information before we discuss the corresponding item in the Estimates.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that the same course was taken with reference to the motion of the hon. gentleman. Instructions were given to use all possible despatch, and as soon as they are received, they will be laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. IVES. As I understand the matter, the Bill of the hon. member for L'Islet more particularly interests a very small portion of Her Majesty's lieges, the contractors, while the Bill of the hon. member for Northumberland refers to the seamen of only one Province, Ontario.

Mr. GUILLET. It seeks the enjoyment of rights which other seamen have already obtained.

Mr. IVES. But I have charge of a Bill that interests the Dominion generally, and the members of this House very particularly. I always had the impression that charity begins at home, and it would be well for us, in giving precedence to different measures, to consider one that has more particular reference to ourselves. I refer to the Bill with respect to the amendment of the Election Law. I know that a very large amount of interest is taken in this Bill by members of both sides of the House, and I think that an early opportunity ought to be given to go into Committee on this Bill with a view of passing it into law.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to call attention to the very defective character of a return which has been laid on the Table in answer to an order from this House, with respect to the expenditure on the part of the Pacific Railway Commission, and any possible further expenditure, with a copy of all correspondence. Papers in possession of the Commission themselves have been sent down, but nothing of what has been done by the Administration. The return contains no statement of the process by which the work of the printing of the evidence was transferred to the Government Printers from the house of Messrs. Stephenson, who appear to have received the contract; nor does it contain a statement referred to in one of the letters, as enclosed in that letter; nor a statement which purports to be an account for printing work. The letter is there which says the account is here; but the account is not here. The order of the House was also for an estimate of what the expenses not already made, would be; and, although the whole of the printing has been completed, and although evidently the accounts of the parties have been rendered—I presume that the account for the whole of the work has been sent in—there is no statement of the expense for printing work whatever. An estimate of the different expenses generally to be incurred was also asked for, but there is no statement of the estimated expenses for the Commissioners at all; so that the statement is quite imperfect. We were led to understand, last Session, that the rate for the Commissioners services had been fixed, but the letter of the Secretary says it is not easy to give an estimate on that subject, that, with the exception of himself, no fixture has taken place as to the remuneration of the Commissioners. The hon. Minister of Finance, in answer to a question to myself, stated what the rate of remuneration is to be; but there appears to be some question as to allowances. The work of the Commission is over; the printing is done; we want to know what the expense is to be. The House granted the order; but the return, although it is voluminous and although it contains a great many letters, does not give any idea as to what the expense is to be.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will soon get that.

DISALLOWANCE OF STREAMS' BILL.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Mr. Speaker, those who, like yourself, are old enough to remember the party struggles, the party triumphs and the party defeats in the old Parliament of Canada, under a legislative union, the form of government that prevailed before Confederation, have a lively recollection of the circumstances and causes that led to these party conflicts in the early days of Canadian history. Old Upper Canada, whether right or wrong, I am not now going to discuss, always persistently and earnestly contended, that under the Union of the two Provinces, she never had fair play. We know that many questions of vital importance to the individual Province were constantly coming to the front of the political stage—questions of a purely local character that affected the Province only, and that the voice of a majority of representatives of the people from the Province affected by the proposed legislation was often overridden by the voice of the whole House. We know something now, historically at all events, of the long and gallant struggle to abolish the clergy reserves, to change the seigniorial tenure, to secure to each Province a fair share of local legislation suited to its wants and requirements, and a fair share of local self-government and public works. We know that such local questions were constantly cropping up. We know that on some occasions these questions were disposed of contrary to the voice of a majority of the representatives of the people from the Province affected. We know that great dissatisfaction and discontent prevailed as the result. We know the keen and bitter struggle that followed. We know that parties in the old Parliament of Canada were so evenly balanced that neither party could successfully carry on the Government of the country. We know that at one time, at all events, Governments were made and Governments were unmade by the vote of one man. We know that then we were face to face with a grave and serious danger, and the hon. gentleman who now leads the House said, in his speech in the old Parliament of Canada on Confederation, that men of all parties and of all shades of politics became alarmed at the aspect of affairs. Under these circumstances, it was easy to see that the then condition of affairs could not long continue to exist. If it was desirable that our allegiance to the British Crown and to British institutions should be continued, that the growth and prosperity of the Provinces should be secured, that local affairs should be placed absolutely under the control of each Province a new condition of affairs must necessarily spring out of the chaos, and the confusion and the deadlock that, to some extent, prevailed in those early days. Various schemes were then suggested, as a remedy for the prevailing discontent. The double majority was tried, it failed. Government by coalition was tried, it failed. The hon. the First Minister, in the speech to which I have referred, pointed out other remedies. One was the dissolution of the Union between Upper and Lower Canada, and leaving affairs in the condition in which they were before the Union of 1841; the second solution of the difficulty was, representation by population; and the third solution was, a federal Union of all the British North American Provinces. The result was a federal Union of all these Provinces, willing to join the great Confederation. This Union was based on the principle long contended for by the Liberal party, especially of the Province of Ontario—the principle announced at their various conventions and gatherings imitated by the leaders of the party and supported by their followers—the principle that all local affairs should be dealt with by the local authorities, and that all affairs of a national character should be disposed of by some joint or federal power. I am satisfied that the Union of the Provinces would not have taken place, at all events at the period at which it did take place, had that not been the guiding principle in the minds of the leading statesmen who had to do with that question. I am satisfied it was one of the principles that moved the various Provinces to join Confederation—the absolute, unchecked, unrestrained control of their own local affairs. Had they thought otherwise that, notwithstanding the Union of the British North American Provinces, the local affairs of the individual Provinces, affairs assigned to them by the constitution, and over which they were supposed to have sole control, should be subject to the revision, and the disallowance of the Dominion Government, these Provinces never would have joined the Great Confederation. It was known after Confederation did take place that, although the powers given to each of the Governments were reasonably clear and well defined, still, under our constitution, new and untried, different interpretations might be put upon the different powers reserved to the different Governments, and so, at an early day in the history of Confederation, it became necessary to lay down some clear, well defined, and permanent rule by which the Dominion Government would be guided in passing upon local legislation, and by which the Dominion Government would be restrained from the exercise of the power of vetoing reserved by the British North America Act to the Dominion Government over the Legislation of the different Provinces. It was of the first consequence to the well being and prosperity of each Province. It was of the first consequence to the security and permanence of the Union, that the interpretation put by the Dominion Government upon that portion of the constitution which assigned to each Government its authority and power in matters of legislation should be certain and permanent. The hon. gentleman who now leads this House and who then guided the destinies of this country—who was then and is now Prime Minister—aware of the necessity of having these powers well defined, he, at an early day in the history of Confederation, did, so far as human skill and human ingenuity could, define the powers assigned to each of the Governments and especially the right of the Dominion Government to pass upon local legislation. Upon the 8th January, 1868, the right hon. First Minister prepared a State paper, which I hold in my hand, dealing with this important question. Permit me, for the satisfaction of the House, to read from that reliable and important document, the views which the hon. First Minister then entertained with respect to the right and power of the Dominion Government in passing upon local legislation:

"In deciding whether any Act of a Provincial Legislature should be disallowed, or sanctioned, the Government must not only consider whether it affects the interest of the whole Dominion or not, but also whether it be unconstitutional; whether it exceeds the jurisdiction conferred on the Local Legislature, and, in cases where the jurisdiction is concurrent whether it clashes with the legislation of the General Parliament"

"As it is of importance that the course of local legislation should be interfered with as little as possible, and the power of disallowance exercised with great caution, and only in cases where the law of general interests of the Dominion imperatively demand it, the undersigned recommends that the following course be pursued:

"That on the receipt by Your Excellency of the Acts passed in any Province, they be referred to the Minister of Justice for report, and that he with all convenient speed, do report as to those Acts which he considers free from objection of any kind, and if such report be approved by Your Excellency in Council, that such approval be forthwith communicated to the Provincial Government.

"That he make a separate report, or separate reports, on those Acts which he may consider—

- "1. As being altogether illegal or unconstitutional.
- "2. As illegal or unconstitutional in part.
- "3. In cases of concurrent jurisdiction as clashing with the legislation of the General Parliament.
- "4. As affecting the interests of the Dominion generally. And that in such report or reports he gives his reasons for his opinions."

That is not all. These are the grounds, as I understand this paper, upon which the hon. gentleman thought in the early days of Confederation that the Dominion Government would be justified in passing on local legislation, in vetoing or disallowing it. But, even assuming the local legislation was in violation of the rules laid down by the hon. gentleman, even then, Sir, he did not appear to think that the Dominion Government would be justified in at once disallowing local Legislation without notifying the Local Government and giving them an opportunity of repealing or amending the obnoxious features, because he goes on to say:

"That where a measure is considered only partially defective, or where objectionable as being prejudicial to the general interests of the Dominion, or as clashing with its legislation, communication should be had with the Provincial Government with respect to such measure; and that in such case, the Act should not be disallowed, if the general interests permit such a course, until the Local Government has an opportunity of considering and discussing the objections taken, and the Local Legislature has also an opportunity of remedying the defects found to exist."

Sir, that paper bears date the 8th June, 1868, shortly after the inauguration of Confederation, and that exposition of the constitutional rule, in dealing with local legislation and the grounds upon which the Federal Government would be justified in vetoing local legislation, was approved of by His Excellency the Governor General on the 9th of June, 1868; and to this day, at all events, with one exception, no other exposition of the constitutional rule has been laid down that I am aware of. On the 17th of June, 1868, the various Local Governments were made acquainted with the conclusion arrived at by the then Minister of Justice, now the First Minister. Now, Sir, I submit that the hon. gentleman then took a sound position, that his interpretation of the power of the Local Legislatures and of the right of the Dominion Government to interfere with their legislation, was a reasonable and correct one, and I am not disposed to quarrel with the propositions the hon. gentleman then laid down. Had the hon. gentleman adhered to the proposition thus laid down in the State paper from which I have just quoted, had he not departed from the principles therein set forth, had he and his followers not subsequently claimed, as I submit they do claim, the absolute, unconditional and unrestricted right of interfering with and disallowing all local legislation, whether within or beyond the local legislatures to pronounce upon, had a new departure not been taken. Had the principles on which he first acted and on which he has acted since Confederation, been acted on throughout, I would not now be about to place in your hands the amendment I propose to place in your hands before I resume my seat. Those of us who know something of the hon. gentleman, who have watched his career for the last quarter of a century, who know the means by which the hon. gentleman obtained power, and the sources from which he has drawn and still draws his strength—those of us who know something of the hon. gentleman's opinions as to a federal and legislative Union, those of us who know that the hon. gentleman was always a pronounced advocate of legislative Union of all the Provinces, are not I surprised at the ground he has subsequently taken, and that he should, by his course, endeavour to so handicap local legislation as to make the Local Legislatures practically playthings in the hands of the Dominion Government. Under the new system of Government the hon. gentleman came into power on the 1st of July, 1867; he remained in power till the 5th of November, 1873; he again came into power in October, 1878, and he is in power to this day, and during all these years, with one exception, the hon. gentleman has acted upon the principle laid down in this paper of the 8th of June, 1868. Sir, for many long years the hon. gentleman has led the Government; he has been the ruling spirit in the various Governments of which he has been a member for the last fifteen years; he has been the main spring by which the various pieces of machinery in the Cabinet of curiosities have been set in motion, and during all these years, until very recently, when, no doubt, strong personal and political pressure was brought to bear upon him, has acted upon the principles laid down in the paper of the 8th of June, 1868; and it was only when, that strong personal and political pressure, that could no longer be resisted, that the hon. gentleman departed from the course he at first marked out for himself and transgressed the rule he at first laid down. It was only then that the hon. gentleman yielded his better judgment and his sounder convictions to the exigencies of the hour, or perhaps it would be more correct to say the exigencies of his party and openly transgressed the rule laid down by himself and strained the constitution to its utmost limit. Now, Sir, I have pointed out the grounds upon which the hon. gentleman thought the Dominion Government would be called upon to interfere with local legislation. I now propose pointing out that on these principles the hon. gentleman has acted for the last fifteen years while he was in power, with the one exception of the Streams' Bill, that his interpretation of the rule laid down, and of the right and power of the Dominion Government to interfere in local legislation has been uniform and consistent; to do otherwise, to recognize and admit that the Federal Government, without let or hindrance, without rule or principle, except the arbitrary will of the Minister of Justice for the time being, have the right to interfere with, to check or veto local legislation, although that legislation is within the scope of the powers assigned to the Local Legislatures under the constitution is to admit that the Local Legislatures are not within the constitution—legislative bodies even when legislating within the powers assigned to them by the Constitution and, Sir, I am not prepared to admit any such proposition. I am not prepared to admit by sanctioning the hon. gentleman's course, in disallowing the Streams' Bill—a question I propose to deal with shortly—that there is in the hands of the Dominion Government a power that cannot be checked and that cannot be controlled; that the hon. the Minister of Justice, sitting in his chair in his office at Ottawa, knows better what is in the interest of a province and what is for the benefit of the people than the sworn advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor, aided and assisted by a free Parliament. I prefer adopting the constitutional rule laid down by the hon. gentleman that the Local Legislatures within the scope of the powers conferred in them should not be interfered with unless in violation of certain well defined rules. I prefer adopting the opinion of Mr. Todd, who says that local legislation should not be interfered with except "where it appears that the proposed legislation is contrary to the policy which, in the opinion of the Governor General in Council, ought to prevail throughout the Dominion in lieu thereof," and that the power of veto should only be invoked where the legislation is "likely to prove injurious to the interests of the Dominion." Now, Sir, I propose for a moment or two to point out that the hon. gentleman has acted upon the principles he has laid down. I propose going a step further, and showing by a series of Acts that passed under the review of the hon. gentleman, that for fifteen years, while he occupied a position in the Government, and when those Statutes were submitted for his inspection, he, in every single instance, with one exception, has followed out the course laid down by himself in 1868. The hon. gentleman has even gone further, and where provincial legislation was in violation of the rules so laid down he did not assume the responsibility of disallowing that local legislation, without giving the Local Governments notification of his objections to the Bills, and giving them an opportunity of amending that legislation and making it in conformity with the laws as interpreted by the hon. gentleman. This is a most important question; it is a grave question; it is a question that affects the well-being and prosperity of every individual Province; it is a question that affects the security and the permanence of the Union, about which we hear so much from the hon. Minister of Railways; and therefore I offer no apology to the House for taking up some time in going over the Statutes of the various Provinces that passed in review before the hon. gentleman, which were in violation of the rules laid down by himself, that he did not disallow in the first instance, but which he, in the judicious exercise of the functions of his office, notified the Lieutenant Governors were objectionable and gave the Local Governments an opportunity of amending or correcting them. I find the Province of Quebec passed an Act continuing the Bankruptcy Laws of that Province. That Act passed in review before the hon. gentleman. It was clearly unconstitutional, it trenched upon the powers of the Dominion Parliament. Did he disallow the Act in the first instance? Nothing of the kind. He drew the attention of the Local Government to it, and suggested the propriety of allowing the Act to expire, and I believe it was allowed to expire accordingly. The Legislature of the Province of Quebec passed another Act respecting corporations doing business beyond the Province of Quebec. That Statute also passed in review before the hon. gentleman. It was clearly ultra vires; the Legislature had no such power; but the hon. gentleman did not assume the responsibility of disallowing the Bill, although it was clearly a violation of the rules laid down by himself. He drew the attention of the Quebec Government to the obnoxious provisions in the Bill, and I believe the Bill was subsequently amended. The Legislature in Quebec passed an Act respecting the Recorder's Court of Quebec. The Bill was in violation of the rules laid by the First Minister, because it trenched upon the criminal law and the power of dealing with the criminal law is vested exclusively in the Dominion Parliament. The hon. gentleman did not disallow that Bill; he drew the attention of the Local Government to its obnoxious features. I believe it was subsequently amended by the Local Government. The Legislature of Ontario passed an Act authorizing the publication of the Ontario Gazette, and making provision for enquiries respecting public matters. This Bill also passed in review before the hon. gentleman, subsequent to the time when he laid down the rules to which I have referred. He pointed out several provisions of that Bill that were objectionable as trenching on Dominion legislative powers, but he did not disallow the Bill. He allowed it to go into effect. He did not assume the responsibility of disallowing it, although it was contrary to the rules laid down by himself. The Ontario Legislature passed an Act respecting gold and silver mining. That Bill also came in review before the hon. gentleman. It was not disallowed, although some of its provisions were clearly unconstitutional, he drew the attention of the Government to its obnoxious provisions. The Legislature of Ontario passed an Act respecting registrars. That Act was also in some of its provisions an encroachment upon the powers of legislation assigned to the Dominion Parliament. The hon. gentleman did not assume the responsibility of disallowing it, he allowed the Bill to take effect, and drew the attention of the Local Government to its provisions. The Ontario Legislature passed an Act for the encouragement of agriculture. It was also defective in some of its provisions, one of which was a violation of the rules laid down by the hon. gentleman in regard to disallowing Local Acts, when they trenched upon the legislative powers of the Dominion Parliament. He did not disallow the Bill, but permitted it to take effect, drawing the attention of the Local Government to its obnoxious provisions. The Ontario Legislature passed an Act respecting municipal institutions, one of the provisions of which provided a qualification for Dominion parliamentary electors. The Bill was clearly ultra vires; yet the hon. gentleman did not disallow it but permitted it to take effect. The Ontario Legislature passed an Act to continue for a limited time the Acts therein mentioned. It was in violation of the rule laid down by the hon. gentleman, because it undertook to continue the old Bankruptcy Law, which was a subject with which Local Legislatures had no power to deal. The Ontario Legislature passed an Act called an Act respecting the Clifton Bridge. The hon. gentleman had this Act in review, but he did not veto it although it was in violation of the rules laid down. It enabled a corporation to construct a bridge extending beyond the boundaries of the Province of Ontario, and was therefore ultra vires. Did the hon. gentleman disallow it? It was not within the competence of the Local Legislature, because the subject was one beyond their power to deal with, yet the hon. gentleman did not assume the responsibility of vetoing the Bill. Another Statute passed in the same year, by the Ontario Legislature, was intitled: "An Act to incorporate the Board of Trade of the Town of Guelph." The hon. gentleman had that Act in review before him, and, although he reported that one clause was defective because it undertook to deal with trade and commerce, and, therefore, beyond the power of the Local Legislature, yet he did not undertake the responsibility of vetoing the Bill. He notified the Local Government of the fact, and it amended the Act as it thought fit. Another Statute passed by the Ontario Legislature was: "An Act to incorporate the Simpson Loom Company." It came also under review. The hon. gentleman pointed out that the second clause was beyond the jurisdiction of the Legislature as it dealt with the Patent Laws—a matter within the exclusive power of the Dominion Parliament; but it was allowed to go into operation, drawing the attention of the Local Government to the defect. There was an Act passed by the Legislature of the Province of New Brunswick relating to the Synod of the Church of England, in the diocese of Fredericton, and Province of New Brunswick. It came in review before the hon. gentleman; it was objected to as being unconstitutional and beyond the power of the Local Legislature. But the hon. gentleman said of it:

"Having carefully examined the provisions of the Bill, I am of opinion that it is within the jurisdiction of the Legislature of New Brunswick, and no rights of the Crown are affected by it, and recommend that it be assented to."

Now, here was a Bill within the competency of the Local Legislature. It was objected to, it was allowed to go into operation solely because it came within the power of local legislation. There were three other Acts and only three, on which I have been able to lay my hands which passed in review before the hon. gentleman, and which were clearly unconstitutional, but which the hon. gentleman did not disallow. He submitted them to the English Law Officers of the Crown, who pronounced them beyond the power of the Local Parliament, and subsequently, I believe, they were either disallowed or repealed by the Local Parliament. One of these Bills, Sir, was the Act respecting County Court Judges. In that Statute, the Local Legislature undertook to define and limit the tenure of office of County Court Judges. The hon. gentleman in a State paper on the subject points out, clearly enough, that that was beyond the power of the Local Legislature; that such Legislature had no right to deal with a question of the kind; that it was solely within the authority of the Dominion Parliament; and that the Local Legislature could not restrict or extend the tenure of office of County Court Judges. Another Statute passed by the Local Legislature was intitled: "An Act to define the privileges of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario." The hon. gentleman pointed out that some parts of this Act was ultra vires. The third was the Supply Bill of the Province of Ontario. In that Bill provision was made for the payment by the Provincial Government in part of the salaries of the Judges of the Superior Courts there. The hon. gentleman took objection to that Bill also, but he did not take the responsibility of disallowing either of them, although they were clearly beyond the power and competence of the Local Legislature. He took the more cautious course of referring these three Bills to the Law Officers of the Crown, who pronounced them all ultra vires. But it is of importance what the hon. gentleman did say in his report upon these Bills. It is worth while reminding the hon. gentleman himself what his expressions of opinion were upon this subject. It is worth while reminding the followers of the hon. gentleman who are now disposed to extend and enlarge the powers of the Dominion Government, of what the hon. gentleman said twelve or fifteen years ago when dealing with these Bills. He said:

"The undersigned recommends that the attention of the Government of Ontario be called to the two first mentioned Acts, and the 6th clause of the last Act, suggesting that they should be repealed next Session and action taken place upon them meanwhile."

Now, Sir, the manner in which the hon. gentleman dealt with the Streams' Bill, with which I propose to deal, was very different from the delicate and tender manner in which he undertook to deal with the Bills to which I have just referred, and notably with the three last Statutes of the Province of Ontario which I have named. What is the reason that the hon. gentleman now lays down and acts on a rule so entirely different to that laid down and acted on years ago? Is there anything in the political atmosphere which would justify a change in the sentiments of the hon. gentleman and his colleagues and followers? We know that when the hon. gentleman presented this report on these three Bills the Government of the Province of Ontario was in the hands of friends of the hon. gentleman—the two Governments were in harmony, and we know that now a different state of things exists. The Government of the Province of Ontario whose legislation has been crippled and checked by the hon. gentleman, is not in harmony with his Government. Is it the object of hon. gentlemen opposite now to handicap and cripple the legislation of the Government of Ontario? Having said this much on the character of the legislation that passed in review before the hon. gentleman, and of the way in which the hon. gentleman dealt with it, I shall for a moment or two deal with the Streams' Bill—the one which is immediately before us for consideration and review to-day. The Streams' Bill, as it is known, was passed on the 4th of March, 1881, by the Legislature of the Province of Ontario, and it is intitled "An Act for protecting the public interests in Rivers, Streams and Creeks." One clause provides:

"All persons shall have and are hereby declared always to have had, during the spring, summer and autumn freshets, the right to and may float saw logs and all other timber and all rafts and crafts down all rivers, creeks and streams, in respect of which the Legislature of Ontario has authority to give this power."

Now, one would imagine that there was nothing very formidable or objectionable in that clause. It gives a measure of protection to those engaged in the timber trade in this country. There is nothing which one can imagine would arouse the objections and animosity of hon. gentlemen in Parliament or out of Parliament against that provision. There are a score of precedents in the Statute-Book for exactly such legislation, and I will be in a position to show, before I resume my seat, that this Bill is not objectionable in any feature; or no more so at least than scores of Statutes to which the hon. gentleman has assented. Another section of the Bill provides that a person making improvements on any such streams should not have an exclusive right to them or to the use of the stream. Section four provides that tolls may be collected, and that such tolls shall be fixed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. Section five provides that the Act shall apply to improvements made after the passage of the Act, as well as to those made before; and section six provides that a person who makes improvements shall have a lien on the lumber passing down the stream as reasonable compensation for the use of the improvements. Now, Sir, the right to float saw logs and lumber down a stream was a right secured to the people of this country by an old Statute of the Province of Canada. That right was re-enacted in the Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada and in the Revised Statutes of Ontario. To a plain uninitiated mind, it would appear that under the provisions of that Statute, these rights were reserved to every person who saw fit to use those streams, and that the Act applied, according to its very language, to all streams, not merely to streams floatable in a state of nature. The evident intention of Parliament was that the Act should apply to all streams. Let me read the clause to which the Streams' Bill purports to be an amendment. It provides that:

"All persons may during the spring, summer, and autumn freshets, float saw logs and other timber, rafts and crafts, down all streams, and no person shall, by felling trees or placing any other obstruction in or across such streams, prevent the passage thereof."

Now, the right which Parliament secured to the public by this Act was supposed to extend, according to the very language of it, to all streams. It was supposed to extend to streams down which saw logs or other timber could be floated, with or without improvements, and if that right did not exist what would be the position of the trade to which I have adverted? Take one of the smaller streams of this Dominion down which timber has been constantly floated to the great markets of the east and the Mother Country. Suppose a man owns a limit on a portion of that stream, and a neighbor owns another further up the stream. If the contention of the hon. gentlemen be correct, if the construction they put upon the Statute be correct, then the man who owned the limit down stream had it in his power to prevent the man further up from taking the produce of his toil and labor to the markets of the world. I do not think that the law meant any such thing. Unfortunately what gave rise to the litigation and to the Act of Parliament in question, and to the conflict of authority between the two Legislatures, was an interpretation put upon the old Statute by one of the Courts of Ontario. That Court, in the case of Boale vs. Dickson, held that the wording of the old Statute only applied to navigable streams, or streams floatable in a state of nature, and did not extend to streams that were not floatable in their natural condition. Resting on that authority, a man by the name of Peter McLaren, who owned a limit in the county of Lanark on two streams, one of which was called Buckshot Creek, and the other Louise Creek, neither of which were floatable in a state of nature, and on which improvements had been made by McLaren to render them floatable, undertook to restrain and prevent the use of that stream by a person having a limit further up the stream. He claimed the absolute and unconditional ownership of the stream itself and the bed of the stream, by virtue of patents which he alleged he had obtained from the Government; and, as riparian proprietor and relying on such claims, a man named Caldwell, who owned a limit farther up the streams, was prevented and restrained from bringing his timber to market by McLaren. This man McLaren, in order to restrain Caldwell from using the stream, filed a Bill in the Court of Chancery, and it may be well to read one clause of that Bill to show the extraordinary grounds on which Mr. McLaren based his claim to the absolute and unconditional ownership of the streams in question—streams which I contend belong to the people of this country. He says that the streams flowing through his parcels of land were not navigable streams, "nor floatable for logs and timber," while in the Crown, nor until after the improvements set forth in the Bill were made on the said streams by the plaintiff; and that in their natural and unimproved state, they would not, even during freshets, permit of saw-logs or timber being floated down the same, but were useless for the purpose. And in the 10th paragraph the plaintiff thus states his rights:

"The plaintiff is entitled, both as riparian proprietor and as owner in fee simple of the bed of the said streams, where they pass and flow through the said lots respectively, to the absolute, exclusive, and uninterrupted user of the said streams for all purposes not forbidden by law, and amongst other purposes, to the absolute and exclusive right to the user of the same for the purpose of floating or driving saw-logs and timber down the same."

He then goes on to say that on various parts of the said streams which run and flow through lands therein described, the plaintiff and those through whom he claims have expended a large amount of money in making certain specific and very valuable improvements, which he sets out in a number of the following paragraphs of the Bill. The case came up before Vice-Chancellor Proudfoot, and the Vice-Chancellor gave judgment in Mr. McLaren's favor, without argument, resting on the authority of the case of Boale v. Dickson, with a view of having the law settled in the Court of Appeal. It did go to the Court of Appeal, the highest Court in the Province of Ontario, and that Court sustained the appeal with costs. I cannot present the case in a clearer or better light or describe more accurately the position and the rights of the different parties, and the rights of the public involved in this question, than by reading from the judgment of one of the ablest Judges that ever graced the Ontario Bench. The Judge says:

"Having reached the conclusion that all streams are by public authority dedicated as highways to at least the extent essential to the defence in this action, I have only further to remark that when the obstruction which stood in the way of the enjoyment of the legal right is removed, when the traveller by land or lumberer seeking to float his lumber down a stream, finds the highway unobstructed, he is at liberty, in my judgment, to make use of it without inquiring by whom, or with what motive, the way has been made practicable. He finds the rock on the road allowance blasted, or the chasm that crossed it bridged, and he pursues his journey along the highway thus improved; or he finds that the fresher covers all obstacles with a sufficient depth of water, and he floats his logs down the highway thus made useful. It may be in appearance and perhaps, in reality, rather hard on the man at whose expense what was a highway only in legal contemplation becomes one fit for profitable use, has to allow others to share in the advantage without contributing to the cost. That is, however, a matter for his own consideration when he makes the improvements."

Now, Sir, this judgment was given after the Streams' Bill became law, it was given after the Streams Bill was disallowed by the Government. While the case was before the Court of Appeal, the Minister of Justice, without waiting for the judgment of the Court of Appeal, without cause, without reflection, without conference with or notification to the Ontario Government, without following the rule which the hon. gentleman says should be followed on every occasion, on the 19th of May, in hot haste, ex parte, upon the statement of Mr. McLaren or Mr. McLaren's counsel, disallowed this Bill. He knew nothing of the reasons which induced the Local Parliament to pass this Bill; he knew nothing of the reasons which induced the Lieutenant-Governor to lend the sanction of Her Majesty to this Bill. He knew nothing of the circumstances which made such a Bill necessary in the public interest, but on the ex parte statement of one of the litigants, he disallows the Bill. Sir, if he were acting as counsel for one of the litigants, one could understand his action; but acting as the Minister of Justice, bound to conserve the rights of the different Provinces, and to see that their legislation is not improperly interfered with, the hon. gentleman's disallowance of the Bill, and his reasons therefor, are most extraordinary. I will trouble the House with an extract from the reasons the hon. gentleman gives. After a review of the position of affairs between the parties, pending the litigation between McLaren and Caldwell, the late hon. Minister of Justice says:

"He (Caldwell) attempted to float his logs down McLaren's stream and through his improvements. To prevent his doing so the suit in Chancery, above referred to, was instituted, and a decree was made declaring Mr. McLaren exclusively entitled to the use of the streams and improvements, and restraining Mr. Caldwell from floating logs down the stream.

"The effect of the Act now under consideration must necessarily be to reverse the decision of this suit.

"The effect of the Act as it now stands seems to be to take away the use of the property from one man and give it to another, forcing the owner practically to become a toll collector against his will, if he wishes to get any compensation for being thus deprived of his rights.

"I think the power of the Local Legislature to take away the rights of one man and vest them in another, as is done by this Act, is exceedingly doubtful, but assuming that such right does in strictness exist, I think it devolves upon this Government to see that such powers are not exercised in flagrant violation of private rights and national justice, especially when, as in this case, in addition to interfering with the private rights in the way alluded to, the Act overrides a decision of a Court of competent jurisdiction by declaring retrospectively that the law always was and is different from that laid down by the Court."

Now, Sir, it will be observed that the two grounds on which the late hon. Minister of Justice advised and recommended the disallowance of this Bill are: 1st. That the Act in question is in violation of private rights; and 2nd. That it is retrospective, and overrides a decision of a Court of competent jurisdiction. The hon. Minister of Justice admitted the competence of the Local Legislature to deal with this question. He admits that it was a question of property and civil rights only. He admits that the Dominion Government had no power to deal with it, and he admits that the Act did not clash with Dominion legislation, rights or interests. He knew, as I have indicated, nothing about the merits of the case. He did not take the trouble to communicate with the Local Government on the subject. He knows the case is in appeal. He does not wait for the judgment of that court; but, at the instigation of one of the litigants, the hon. Minister of Justice at Ottawa undertakes to disallow this Bill. Sir, I say that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will search in vain among the precedents laid down by themselves, among the parliamentary records, and among the Blue-Books, where these things are recorded, to find a precedent for the line of action which was pursued by the late hon. Minister of Justice. Now, Sir, it is not pretended that it comes within the rules laid down by the present hon. Premier when Minister of Justice; nor that the Act is unconstitutional; nor that it trenches on Dominion legislation. Why, then, I ask, Sir, should the hon. gentleman undertake to veto this legislation? Is there any reason for it, outside the constitutional rule laid down by themselves? One will rise from a perusal of the whole history of this transaction, and of the documents submitted by these hon. gentlemen to Parliament with his mind firmly impressed with the idea, that there was something behind the whole transaction which does not appear on the surface, and that there was something outside of and beyond the interests which the hon. the Minister of Justice was bound to guard, which induced the late Minister of Justice to veto this Bill. Now, as I have said, the Minister of Justice undertook to veto this Bill on two grounds: one was that it was in violation of private rights, and the other that it was retrospective, and overrode a judgment of a Court. Moreover, hon. gentlemen opposite have over and over again allowed just such legislation to pass into law. The First Minister has over and over again sanctioned and allowed to become law Bills retrospective in their character, and that overrode the judgments of Courts, and that interfered with private rights. If I can show you, Sir, that a score of Bills of this character were ratified by the hon. First Minister, when Minister of Justice, during the last fifteen years, and that the hon. gentleman over and over again stated that when a Bill was within the competence and power of the Local Government, even though it was retrospective, the Dominion Government had no right to and should not interfere, I think that I will have made out a case sufficiently strong to warrant me in placing in your hands the resolution which I propose to move. I will first deal with the assertion that this Act was retrospective and overrode a judgment of the Court. I find, Sir, that the Parliament of Ontario passed a Statute intitled "An Act to enable municipalities along the line of the Grand Junction Railway Company to grant aid thereby and to legalize certain by-laws granting such aid"—to legalize by-laws, which were wholly illegal. This Act came before the Minister of Justice. It was protested against and objected to. Some of its provisions were clearly retrospective. It interfered with private rights. But what did the hon. gentleman say in reporting on the Bill? That many petitions were presented against it, but that as it was within the competence of the Local Legislature, it should be allowed to come into operation. Now, Sir, here was a Bill which expressly interfered with private rights, which made that legal which was not legal before, which made a corporation responsible and liable for debts for which they were not liable before, and which imposed on them responsibilities and duties that were not imposed on them by law, and yet the hon. gentleman allowed that Bill to go into operation, while the late Minister of Justice disallowed the Streams' Bill, which is no more retrospective, and no more interferes with private rights than the Bill to which I have just referred. Now, Sir, as to the other branch of this objection, namely that the Bill in question overrode a judgment of the Court. I find that on several occasions Parliament did pass Bills, the effect of which was to override a judgment of the Court. Some of us have a lively recollection—and I dare say also, the hon. Prime Minister—of the case of Hammond vs. McLay. In 1859, Hammond was appointed registrar of the county of Bruce. Under 9 Victoria, Chapter 34, this Statute enabled the Government to dismiss the registrar upon certain grounds specified therein. Hammond was dismissed by the Government upon a ground which was not mentioned in the Statute. He was superseded under the great seal of the Province of Ontario, and another man by the name of McLay was appointed in his place. Hammond brought an action for the fees, contending that the Government had no power so to dismiss him. Pending the litigation, and before a judgment was finally rendered by the Court of Appeal, the Government passed a Statute which changed the tenure of office from good behavior to during the will of the Lieutenant-Governor. Now, Sir, this was an ex post facto Act, which interfered with the judgment of the Court. This Act, Sir, was not questioned. It is true that it was before Confederation, but then the Imperial Government possessed precisely the same rights with regard to Colonial Legislation, that the Dominion now possesses respecting Provincial Legislatures. This Statute, Sir, was both retrospective, and it clearly overrode a judgment of the Court. I will give you another case—Jones vs. Ketchum. The action was brought against the defendant for exacting an illegal rate of interest. Pending the suit, the law on the subject was changed, and the plaintiff was thus deprived of the right that was vested in him at the commencement of his suit. This law interfered with a suit which was before the Courts; and so, Sir, I could go on submitting case after case until the House would be wearied of them. I will content myself with laying down the proposition, that it is no new principle in the legislation of this or of the Mother Country, that Parliament may interfere with a judgment of a Court. I attach more importance to the second ground in which the Streams Bill was disallowed, namely, that it interfered with private rights. I now propose to submit to the consideration of the House a number of Bills which were retrospective, which interfered with private rights, and which overrode a judgment of the Courts, and which all passed in review before the hon. gentleman, and which were all left to their operation. Now, Sir, the Legislature of the Province of New Brunswick passed an Act to exempt the homesteads of families from levy and sale under execution. This Act came before the hon. gentleman, he pointed out that some clauses in the Bill were objectionable, but he had no objections to the rest of the Bill. On reading the Bill you will find that it is in direct interference with private rights. It expressly interfered with judgments against debtors. Before this act was passed, the law enabled creditors to enforce the payment of their debt out of certain assets of the debtor, this law interfered with that remedy. It was an ex post facto law of the most objectionable kind. But it was not to its operation. And so, Sir, you will find Acts of precisely the same kind passed by all the Provinces, and all left to their operation. I wish to draw the particular attention of the House to one passed by the Province of Quebec, its an Act respecting the "Society L'Union St. Jacques de Montreal." Now, this was an ex post facto Act, in the worst possible sense of the term. It proposed the enforced commutation of the existing rights of two widow ladies, and, who, at the time it was passed, were annuitants of this society, under the law and the rules of the society. This Statute proposed to enforce the commutation of their annuities, and it was clearly an interference with vested rights. It compelled those ladies to take a certain sum, when by law they were entitled to more. It deprived them of rights which were secured to them by the law of the land. What was the result? Like others, it passed in review before the hon. gentleman. It was not objected to. It was allowed to come into operation. It interfered with private rights, and yet the hon. gentleman allowed it to become law. What was the result? Litigation was the result of this Bill. It came before the Courts of Quebec, and the case was ultimately appealed to the Privy Council. What did the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council say? They said:

"Clearly this matter is private, clearly it is local, so far as locality is to be considered, because it is in the Province and in the city of Montreal, and unless therefore the effect of that head of section 92 is for this purpose qualified by something in section 91, it is a matter not only within the competence but within the exclusive competency of the Provincial Legislature."

Let me go a step further. The Province of Ontario passed an Act relating to the Government road allowances and the granting of timber licenses thereon. Hon. gentlemen who are disposed to take a different view of the right of the Dominion Government to disallow the Streams' Bill, who are disposed to give the Dominion Government unlimited power and unlimited control over local legislation, had better with care and caution read the report of the hon. First Minister upon the Bill which I have just referred to, containing the grounds upon which he allowed that Bill to become law. Now, under the law as it stood, when that Bill was passed, the road allowances in the Province of Ontario were vested in the municipalities, and all the timber upon the road allowances became, and was, the private property of individual corporations. The Government of Ontario granted timber licences to this very man McLaren, who induced the Dominion Government to disallow this Bill, and to others as well, and included within such licenses the timber that was growing on the road allowances, the fee simple of which was vested in the corporations. The municipalities protested against McLaren and others cutting timber on their private property; one of the corporations brought an action in the Court of Common Pleas against McLaren and others, and the Court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiffs on the grounds that the Local Government had no power to grant licenses to cut timber in lands which was not their property. The case was carried to the Court of Appeal, but before judgment was given in that Court this Act was passed by the late Sandfield Macdonald Administration in Ontario. What are the provisions of that Act? One of the clauses provides that:

"Every Government road allowances included in any timber licenses heretofore granted, shall be deemed to be and to have been ungranted lands."

Was not that retrospective legislation? One would naturally think that it was legislation of a retrospective and most objectional and vicious character. Here was a property that belonged to a municipality subsequently leased to a private individual. The lessee claims the timber on lands that never belonged to him—the municipality protests and the Legislature passes a Bill providing that the timber upon this property was included, and intended to be always included, in the licenses so granted. Section 2 provided that "The licensee shall be deemed to have, and to have had, all rights in the trees, timber, lumber thereon, or cut thereon, as if the same were cut on any patented land of the Crown."

Now here was an Act that was respectful in its character, that interfered with private rights, that directly took the property from one person and vested it in another without compensation, that overrode the judgment of the Court and rights of the municipality. The corporation of the county of Frontenac petitioned against this Act, and the Act passed in review before the hon. the First Minister with all its objectionable features. Did the hon. the First Minister disallow the Bill? Not at all. He said: "It is clearly within the competence of the Local Legislature, and the undersigned recommends that it be left to its operation." When the Streams' Bill came before the hon. gentleman he did not take that ground; it was admitted that it was within the competence of the Local Legislature, but though it was within the competence of the Local Legislature it was a violation, according to the Government's opinion of private rights, as now expounded by them, it was retrospective legislation, it was vicious legislation, and therefore, at the instance of political supporters they at once disallowed the Bill. One rule is laid down where a Bill is objected to by a political opponent. Another where a Bill is objected to by a political friend. Sir, if I could only trespass on the patience of the House I could mention a score of cases where the hon. gentleman has acted on principles entirely different to that in which he acted in disallowing the Streams' Bill. The hon. gentleman in disallowing this Bill has not a foot to stand on—he has transgressed all rules and all precedents, his own precedents, his own record for fifteen years, constantly springs up against him. If hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to look at the Blue-Books they will find he has in this matter, as in others, transgressed the rules laid down by himself. Let me refer for a moment to another case—the Goodhue Will Case. Goodhue made his will leaving to his children a life estate, in his property, with a reversionary interest, to his grandchildren. The children agreed to make a different distribution of the estate, to that mentioned in the will and sought to have their agreement ratified by the Local Legislature. The Local Parliament did ratify it, without the sanction of some of the parties directly interested in the estate, some of whom were minors, and some Her Majesty's subjects residing out of the Dominion of Canada, and despite the solemn protest of the trustees appointed under the Bill. The trustees protested to the Local Legislature, then to the Lieutenant-Governor, and finally to the Dominion Government, they protested against sanctioning a Bill that made for another man a will he did not make for himself. Did the hon. First Minister disallow that Bill, as, perhaps, he ought to have done; because, if there is any kind of legislation which ought to be disallowed, it is legislation that makes a will for man that in his lifetime he never contemplated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear." He does not appear to be able to grapple with the distinction between the Stream Bill and the Goodhue Will Case. But all the same there is a clear distinction. In the one case, an individual undertakes to control the navigation of a public stream; to prevent everybody else from using that stream; to get absolute possession of the stream, and to hold possession of it; and, under the interpretation the hon. gentleman put upon the law, as it stood before the Streams' Bill was passed, he has got the power to retain possession of it, and prevent those working limits further up the stream from getting the product of their labor to market, and thus interfering the public user of a public stream. In the other case the Legislature undertakes to make a new will for a dead man. Yet the hon. gentleman cannot see the distinction between the two cases; in passing upon the Goodhue Will Bill, what did he say? He recommended that this Act though strongly protested against should be left to its operation solely on the ground that it came within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature. There is another Bill that came before the hon. gentleman, the Orange Bill, which passed the Local Legislature but did not receive the assent of the Crown, it was a reserved Bill.

Sir JOHN MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon. gentleman does not see the distinction between a Bill that has received the sanction of Parliament that has become the law of the land unless vetoed, and a Bill reserved for the consideration of the Dominion Government. It appears to my mind very clear that there is the greatest possible distinction between the two cases, and nobody knows that better than the hon. First Minister. What did the hon. gentleman do with the Orange Bill? He admitted that it was within the competence of the Local Legislature. Of course it was. It came before him, he had the power, with the stroke of his pen, to make that law, which was not law before. Instead of doing that he undertook in advance to advise the Lieut.-Governor what to do, in case the Bill again received the sanction of the Local Legislature. The hon. gentleman said this:

"If these Acts should again be passed the Lieutenant-Governor should consider himself bound to deal with them at once and not ask Your Excellency to interfere in matters of provincial concern, and solely and entirely within the jurisdiction and competence of the Legislature."

Now, why did the hon. gentleman who was not prepared to advise the Governor-General to interfere in a matter within the competence of the Local Legislature, who was not prepared to advise the Governor-General to allow that Bill to come into operation although it was within the competence of the Local Legislature and should have received the assent of the Lieut.-Governor, why should he now, in a matter he must admit is within the competence of the Local Legislature, instruct his Minister of Justice to advise the Governor-General to disallow the Bill, a Bill as much within the competence of the Local Legislature as the other. In the one case it suited political purposes to throw the responsibility of the legislation on to the Local Government. It suited his purpose to hamper, annoy and embarrass, if possible, the Local Legislature. It suits his purpose now to conciliate a strong personal and political friend, and he is conciliated accordingly. How anxious the hon. gentleman was in the one case to sustain the Local Legislature, how anxious is he now to embarrass, hamper and annoy the Local Government. What a sudden and serious change in the views of the hon. gentleman. I am, Sir, quite satisfied that the change in the hon. gentleman's opinion as to the right of the Dominion Government to interfere has not been brought about by a due regard for the public interest. Now, Sir, there is another Bill to which I wish to refer, and in dealing with that Bill, the hon. gentleman has put upon record, in the plainest possible manner, his views of how far the Dominion Government is justified in interfering with local legislation. I refer to the New Brunswick School Bill. Now, in my judgment, if there ever was a Bill within the competence of the Local Legislature that the Dominion Government would be justified in disallowing, that measure was one of them—I speak for myself only. It was a Bill that seriously affected a large portion of the population of that Province; with our Roman Catholic fellow subjects it was a Bill that compelled these people to contribute to a system of education that they could not conscientiously avail themselves of. It was a Bill that affected not merely one individual, as the Streams' Bill did, but a large class of the population; it was a Bill that affected a large class of people, and which they contended violated, if not their legal, at least their equitable rights. Yet the hon. gentleman allows that Bill to pass into law. It came before him for examination; it was strongly protested against. He had a grand opportunity of dealing fairly and justly with that class of the community who thought they were wronged by that legislation. Now, it is well to remind the hon. gentleman of these things, because I know that in the multiplicity of his avocation, he cannot be expected to go back on the records of fifteen years. What did he say in his report of the 20th January, 1872:

"The Provincial Legislature has exclusive powers to make laws in relation to education. It may be that the Act in question may act unfavorably on the Catholics or other religious denominations, and if so it is for such religious bodies to appeal to the Provincial Legislature which has the sole power to grant redress."

And he is of opinion that no other course is open to the Dominion Government than to allow the Act to go into operation. The hon. gentleman's opinion is that if there is anything objectionable in the Bill, the remedy is not to be obtained from the Dominion Government or the Dominion Parliament, but from the Local Legislature, from the hon. gentlemen who controlled the destinies of the Province for the time being. The remedy is not to be sought from the Minister of Justice, but from the Local Legislature. Now, in connection with this subject I wish to read a very forcible State paper, published by the Executive Council of New Brunswick, valuable as a solemn protest against any proposed interference by the Dominion Parliament or the Dominion Government with the rights of the Province to deal with questions within the competence of the Legislature. That paper said:

"The assumption by the Provincial Legislature and Government of Canada of the right to seek the imposition of further limitations of the powers of the Provincial Parliaments is subversive of the federal character of the Union, tending to the destruction of the powers and independence of the provincial law to the centralization of all power in the Parliament of Canada.

"The people of New Brunswick cannot, and will not, surrender their rights of self government within the limits of the Constitution."

Sir, I admire the pluck of the Executive of New Brunswick. I admire the courage and the patriotism that impelled them to send to the Dominion Government this solemn protest worthy of all praise, a policy which would do credit to the first constitutional Government in Europe. The State paper goes on to say:

"The Executive Council in Committee therefore hasten to warn the Government and Parliament of the danger involved in the passage of said resolution, which if passed must stand as a precedent of innovation of provincial rights—fruitful of evil; and, in the name of the people of New Brunswick and invoking the protection of the constitution, the Executive Committee in Council protest against the passage of such resolution, and emphatically assert the right of the Legislature of New Brunswick to legislate upon all questions affecting the education of the country free from interference by the Parliament of Canada."

Sir, I say again that that protest is worthy of all praise, and one that hon. gentlemen opposite, and notably the hon. First Minister ought to lay to heart. That is not all. There is a State paper published by the First Minister in the New Brunswick School Bill containing a more effective protest even than that. The hon. gentleman shortly after the publication of the State paper from which I quoted had under consideration this School Bill, the solemn protests of the Roman Catholics of that Province against it, of the people, the clergy and hierarchy, and an earnest appeal to the Dominion Government to exercise in the public interest the power of disallowance, what answer did Dominion Government make to that appeal. The hon. gentleman says:

"One sole matter which presented itself to the Government was whether, according to the British North America Act of 1867, the Legislature of New Brunswick had exceeded its powers. As the officer primarily responsible on such subjects, he could only say that he had taken uniform care to interfere in no way whatever with any Act passed by any of the Provincial Legislatures if they were within the scope of their jurisdiction. There were only two cases in his opinion, in which the Government of the Dominion was justified in advising the disallowance of local Acts. First, if the Act was unconstitutional and there had been an excess of jurisdiction; and, second, if it was injurious to the interests of the whole Dominion."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell us that, because Mr. McLaren's rights were prejudiced, according to his contention, the interests of the whole Dominion are affected by it? Is Peter McLaren the whole Dominion? Will the hon. gentleman undertake to tell this House that the interests of the whole Dominion are affected because the Government of Ontario undertook to pass a Bill protecting the public interest in the streams and creeks of Ontario? The hon. gentleman went on to say:

"In the case of measures not coming within either of these categories the Government would be unwarranted in interfering with local legislation.

"In the present case there was not a doubt that the New Brunswick Legislature had acted within its jurisdiction, and that the Act was constitutionally legal and could not be impugned on that ground.

"On the second ground which he had mentioned in which he considered the Dominion Government could interfere, it could not be held that the Act in any way prejudicially affected the whole Dominion, because it was a law settling the Common School system of the Province of New Brunswick alone.

"The Government of the Dominion could not act and they would have been guilty of a violent breach of the constitution, if, because they hold a different opinion, they should set up their judgments against the solemn decision of a Province in a matter entirely within the control of that Province."

Sir, I ask the hon. gentleman what can be clearer or more cogent than that? The hon. gentleman's line of argument is unanswerable, and because unanswerable the disallowance of the Streams Bill is wholly unjustifiable. The hon. gentleman sets up his opinion against that of the Government of Ontario, and a large majority of the people of Ontario. He sets up his views of the constitutional rule of to-day against that in which he has acted for fifteen years. As the hon. gentleman is in an unenviable position, as he cannot reconcile himself with himself, I leave the hon. gentleman just where he is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. How long?

Mr. CAMERON. Not longer than I can help. Now, Sir, as I have disposed of the hon. gentleman's practice and the hon. gentleman's precedents. Let me refer the House to one or two opinions of one or two eminent men on this subject, and then I have done. Lord Carnarvon, to whom as Colonial Secretary, was referred a resolution of the House of Commons respecting this same School Bill, says:

"That he laid it at the foot of the Throne, but that he could not advise Her Majesty to take any action in respect of it; that he could not advise the Queen to advise the Legislature of New Brunswick to legislate in any particular direction as that would be an undue interference."

Further on he says:

"Holding, as I have already explained, that the constitution of Canada does not contemplate any interference with the Provincial legislation, on a subject within the competence of the Local Legislature by the Dominion Parliament, or as a consequence by the Dominion Ministers."

Sir J. D. Coleridge and Sir G. Jessell say of it:

"Of course, it is quite possible that the new Statute of the Province may work in practice unfavorably to this or that denomination therein, and therefore to the Roman Catholics; but we did not think that such a state of things is enough to bring into operation the restricting powers of appeal to the Governor in Council."

And so I might quote Todd on the subject, who lays down precisely the same doctrine; but I am not disposed to extend the discussion any further. I have shown conclusively the rules laid down by the hon. First Minister himself.

I have shown that for years he loyally adhered to the rules thus laid down. I have shown that whenever Local Legislatures encroached on the rules thus laid down the hon. gentleman, did not disallow said legislation; but directed the attention of the Local Government to the obnoxious features of the Bill and allowed it to go into operation. I have shown that for a period of fifteen years, of all the local legislation passed by the various Provinces of the Dominion, not a single Bill of the Province of Ontario was disallowed with the exception of the three already mentioned, and none without the Local Government having had their attention directed to the vicious features of such legislation. I have shown that the Streams' Bill was not in violation of the rules so laid down, that it was within the competency and power of the Local Legislature, and that its disallowance was an unwarranted interference with the rights of the Local Legislature. I have shown that this Bill was not only within the competency and power of the Local Legislature; but that it was a Bill in the public interest, in the interests of the lumbermen, in the interests of trade, and of the people of this country. I have shown that the Parliament of Canada has, over and over again, passed laws retroactive in their character, interfering with private rights, and overruling the judgment of the Courts. And now I say to the hon. the First Minister, to this House, and to this country, that if we submit to the interference, the unwarranted, unconstitutional, unjustifiable interference of the Minister of Justice in a case of this kind we may as well abolish Local Legislatures altogether, for they will be Parliaments only in name, not in substance, not in reality. And I say, further, that if we tamely submit to this unwarranted interference of hon. gentlemen opposite, or rather to that of the hon. Minister of Justice, we are tamely permitting the Dominion Government to strike a fatal blow at the autonomy, the rights, the powers, the independence of the Provinces. And I am not prepared to submit to that. Already Local Legislatures have been shorn of a considerable portion of the power supposed to have been secured to them under the Constitution. During this very Parliament the great Province of Ontario is about to be legislated out of the power it always had of dealing with County Court Judges. The hon. Minister of Justice, if we sanction and approve of what has been done with respect the Streams' Bill, will deprive the Province of the right of legislation, and if effect is given to the vote of a majority of this House, Ontario will be shorn of a large portion of her territory and of her territorial rights. I say then that this is not simply an Ontario question, but one that affects every Province of this great Dominion of ours, and every representative of every Province should solemnly protest against this unjustifiable and unconstitutional interference by the Dominion Government with local legislation, because it is a direct violation of the terms on which we entered into Confederation; it is a violation, if not of the letter, at all events of the spirit of the Constitution. It reduces Local Legislatures to a position below that of County Councils. It makes the hon. the Minister of Justice, and not the Local Parliament, the Judge as to whether or not legislation is proper and in the interests of the people of the Province. It gives to the Dominion Government rights which the Constitution never contemplated they should have. But, Sir, I say we should do something more than protest before this high Court of Parliament; our protests here are vain, our warnings are unheeded. There is another and a higher Court to which we can appeal with every confidence that justice will be done—I mean the great Parliament of the people. To that court and before that tribunal, with firm faith in the justice of our position, I challenge hon. gentlemen to carry this question, and with an abiding faith, in the integrity and impartiality of that court I have no doubt of the result. Now, Sir, in order to give hon. gentlemen opposite an opportunity of being consistent, I beg to move the following resolution:—

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be Resolved,—That in the opinion of this House, the power of disallowing Acts of a local nature conferred by "The British North America Act 1867," is vested in the Governor General in Council, and that His Excellency's Ministers are responsible to Parliament for the action of the Governor General in exercising or abstaining from the exercise of the said power.

That it is of the essence of Federal principle as embodied in our constitution that the said power should be used only in cases where the law and the general interests of the Dominion imperatively demand it.

That it would impair the Federal principle and the independence, constitutional powers, autonomy and institutions of the several Provinces to allow of the exercise of the said power in regard to legislation on subjects within the exclusive competence of the Local Legislatures, on the ground that in the opinion of His Excellency's advisers, or of the Canadian Parliament, any such legislation is wrong.

That the question of propriety is under the Constitution one to be decided exclusively by the Local Legislature on its responsibility to the people of the Province who are the sole judges of such action.

That the only exception which has heretofore been proposed in such cases is where the measure prejudicially affects the interests of the Dominion generally.

That it has been the rule ever since 1868 not to exercise the power of disallowance on the ground that a measure is considered only partially defective or objectionable, as being prejudicial to the general interest of the Dominion without communication with the Provincial Government, nor (if the general interests permit such a course) until after the Local Government has an opportunity of considering and discussing the objections taken, and the Local Legislature has also had an opportunity of remedying the defects found to exist.

That it appears from the papers laid on the Table of this House that an Act passed by the Legislature of Ontario on the 4th March, A.D. 1881, and intitled: "An Act for protecting the Public interests in rivers, streams, and creeks," was disallowed by His Excellency in Council on the 19th day of May, A.D. 1881, by Order approving a report which does not assert that the said Act is beyond the competence of the Local Legislature but expresses an opinion adverse to the propriety of certain provisions of the Act.

That the said Act was within the exclusive competence of the Local Legislature, and was not of such a nature as to render its provisions subject to the judgment of or disallowance by the Government of Canada.

That the Minister of Justice and the Government of Canada had, under these circumstances, no right to act on their opinion whatever it might be as to the propriety or impropriety of the said Act.

That it appears from the papers that no communication was had with the Government of Ontario on the subject of the said Act prior to the disallowance, nor was any opportunity given to the Government of considering or discussing the objections, or to the Legislature of Ontario to deal with the alleged defects.

That the papers laid on the Table show the importance of such communication; and the danger of action by the Minister of the ex parte statement and argument of a Petitioner against the Act.

That the said exercise of the power of disallowance was not in accordance with the principle of the constitution, and that the said Act should have been left to its operation.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not, Sir, without some hesitation that I rise to address the House on the question now before it. It is well known that in the suit to which reference has been made in the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Cameron) and the resolution which is now in your hands, I happened to be counsel for one of the parties—the gentleman to whom he has referred to so repeatedly as the one at whose instigation the Dominion Government disallowed the Bill. But, although a counsel in that case, as indeed was my hon. friend who leads the Opposition, I have, after consideration and after consultation with men who are better acquainted with parliamentary affairs than I can pretend to be, come to the conclusion that it would not be proper for me because of the position which I occupied in the suit of McLaren against Caldwell, to refuse to take part in the discussion of a matter so important as this is. The question is no longer of any interest to Mr. Peter McLaren. My connection with that suit has long since ceased, or, at all events, ceased so far as this is concerned, because I have no personal interest, nor any interest such as I might be expected to have if my client's interests were affected. I propose, therefore, to let the House understand, perhaps a little better than they did by the speech of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, the facts connected with the case, the history of it, and how it was that, in the end, Mr. McLaren was obliged, for the protection of his rights, to petition His Excellency the Governor General, and ask him to disallow the Bill, which practically deprived him of a very large and valuable part of his property. In the early part of the year 1880, Mr. McLaren, as was his custom for several years, had got out a stock of logs to be floated down the stream called the Mississippi. That stream was not, according to the decision of the learned Judge before whom the question of fact was tried, after a long and patient investigation by him, a stream which, without artificial means, was capable of floating saw-logs, or timber, or anything else to market. The means by which that stream has been rendered useful, has been rendered capable of being used for the purpose to which Mr. McLaren has applied it, were obtained by a very large expenditure of money. That expenditure is stated in the petition which is now on the Table of the House—having been brought down in answer to an address—to have been in the neighborhood of $250,000, and by these improvements the timber which was on Mr. McLaren's limits could be brought down to Ottawa, and in doing so he had been obliged, not only to improve the main stream itself, but to carry the property on the tributary streams, and make vast improvements upon them so that the water might be brought down in the season in which the lumber was gotten out. It was shown in that case, and it is not denied, and I believe every practical lumberman will acknowledge the truth of my statement, that while the stream was useful for one man and for the logs covered by one controlling power, when the water could be let on in order to float the logs to market, it could not be made use of by more than one individual, at all events in the one year. So that when in that same spring, Mr. McLaren himself having got out a large stock which he desired to bring to market that year, when Mr. Caldwell, also for the first time, endeavored to intrude upon him by getting out a large stock with the intention of bringing it down by the same means, the position Mr. McLaren found himself in was this: If I am to have the benefit of the expenditures of my own capital in the improvement of this stream, then I am required and called upon, in my own interest, to see that Mr. Caldwell shall not occupy the stream to my disadvantage. It comes to this: either I am to have the use of the stream for the purposes for which I have made the improvements upon it, or a person who has not spent one dollar in making those improvements is to occupy the ground and deprive me of my vested rights. Under such circumstances he appealed to the Court. He appealed upon what was recognized as the law of the land; he appealed upon the authority of three or four decisions which had, for fourteen or fifteen years, been universally acquiesced in; he appealed because he had purchased a vast proportion of this property and had made improvements on other portions of it, relying upon the law of the land which said that this stream, which was incapable of use in a state of nature, was not to be opened to the public because it was made floatable by artificial means. Upon that proceeding he obtained an injunction prohibiting Mr. Caldwell from using his improvements, not from using the stream so far as it was navigable or floatable, as in part it is, but from using his improvements as he threatened to use them, which would have deprived the true owner of the right of using them in the same year. Well, Sir, in due course, the case came to a hearing, and in December of that year, at the town of Perth, after a long and careful investigation, Mr. Justice Proudfoot determined that the stream in a state of nature was incapable of being used for floating timber, or for any other useful purpose; and relying upon the decisions which, up to that time, were supposed by the public and by the legal profession to be the law of the land, he determined that Mr. Caldwell should be perpetually restrained from using or attempting to use the improvements made by Mr. McLaren. Now Sir, if that was good law, I think I shall be able to satisfy this House and every fair-minded man that the law ought to prevail. If, on the contrary, that law was wrong, then this Bill, about which we have heard so much, was and is unnecessary; so that the question comes to this—that if the law is, as it has been declared by repeated decisions to be, that no person has a right to use improvements made on a stream by another, which of itself was not floatable, then I contend—and I think that not only this House, but the higher Court to which the hon. member has ventured to appeal, will say—that the law of the land ought not to be altered to suit private individuals because they happen to be political friends. If, on the contrary, the law, as expounded by the Court of Appeal is correct, then Mr. McLaren must submit then that this Statute was unnecessary, and this discussion and all that has given rise to it ought never and would never have taken place. Now, Sir, what was done? In the Session of 1831, Mr. Caldwell, having lost his suit, appeals from the courts of the country to the Provincial Legislature, and having been a supporter of the Local Government, having a large influence, having, I believe, a nephew in the House, he approaches the Local Government and induces them to pass the law which has been referred to as the Act for the protection of streams and rivers; and it cannot be properly or fairly denied that the whole object of that general law was to despoil Mr. McLaren of his property and hand over to Mr. Caldwell, his rival in business, that which belonged to Mr. McLaren. The hon. member admits that; but, Sir, I am not contented with that hon. gentleman's admission, because I will satisfy the House, by the papers I have here, that that was the sole object of this legislation, and then if the House is prepared to censure this Government because it used the power given to it by the Act of Confederation for the purpose of protecting the property of a private individual, and for the purpose of preventing a man from being despoiled of his property in the interest of a political opponent who happened to be a friend of the Local Government, I would not care to have the honor of a seat in this Parliament. But I believe there will be no such result, either here, or in the country, or wherever this matter is discussed. Well, let me show to the House that at the very earliest stage, Mr. Caldwell appealed to his friend, Mr. Pardee, the Commissioner of Crown Lands. So early as the 4th of May, almost immediately after the Bill was filed, hon. gentlemen will find in the return brought down that a letter was written by Mr. Pardee in the tone of an autocrat, in a tone which I do not understand any Minister of the Crown has a right to use to the people of this country in respect of their own rights. If hon. members will look at page 29 of that return, they will find that Mr. Pardee expresses himself in this way:

"Although the information given in this latter respect is deemed reliable, the Department has great hesitation in crediting it as a fact that you, a holder of licenses to cut timber on the public domain, have assumed the position of obstructing the free passage of timber down the river, as such action would be not only unjust and ungenerous on your part to other licensees from the Crown, but also detrimental to the interest of the public revenue by interrupting the legitimate operations of other limit holders, and on these and other grounds could not be sanctioned, or in any manner permitted by Government."

The Local Legislature, if a man happens to differ from them in politics, will not sanction his exercise of his rights; the Local Legislature, as led by Mr. Mowat and Mr. Pardee, says that if a man is opposed to them in politics, whose rights a friend of theirs in politics desires to encroach upon, they will not sanction him in using his rights, but those rights will be annulled by those who have the power to annul them.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). That is too strong.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is too strong, I admit, for a free people to submit to any such action as that for the benefit of a man who happens to be a friend of the Local Government. Well, Sir, protests were made to the Local Legislature; the press spoke, I think I may say, in loud and grave tones concerning the outrage which was being perpetrated. The Bill was opposed, but the Local Premier called upon his majority, letting them know that it was for the interests of the party that McLaren should be despoiled and that Caldwell should be advanced, and the Bill became law so far as the Local Legislature could make it law. The result was—what? That when the Act became the law of the land the suit which had been at that stage decided in favor of McLaren, was virtually reversed, the injunction which McLaren had obtained in perpetuity according to the decree of the Court, and which prevented Caldwell using his property, was, by an Act of the Legislature, which is just now before us, for our consideration, was reversed, and that suit was virtually determined in favor of Caldwell, the defendant to it. Well, Sir, what was the result in another respect? Why it was this: Here was a property which, as it was shown in the petition presented to His Excellency, had cost the proprietor of it in the neighborhood of $250,000. It was a property that was worth to that man as much as $250,000; and it formed for him a valuable asset, that he could sell and dispose of to any person who desired to purchase his property and his improvements; and yet the result of this Act of the Legislature, was—if that law were allowed to stand—that this property worth $250,000 to a private man to-day became public property by this Act to-morrow; so that an asset which, if this man was making up a statement of his accounts and an inventory asset, would have shown to-day, as improvements on the different rivers and streams which are referred to in this Bill—of which my hon. friend has made mention—to be of value to him to the amount of $250,000, or whatever they cost, to-morrow, was by an Act of Parliament, swept all away, and is as public as the streets in this city, or the highways throughout the country. It has ceased to be the private individual property of the owner, and has become the public property, as the streets are in the towns and the roads in the concessions in the country parts of the Dominion are to-day; the result is, that in making up a statement with regard to these assets on the next day, he would have to blot out this asset of $250,000, which had stood properly put down as property yesterday. Now, Sir, I stop to challenge contradiction as to the fairness and exactitude of the statement, as to results which I make concerning the position of the litigants in the suit of McLaren vs. Caldwell—a result brought about by legislation which the Local Government passed. Now, Sir, what was he to do? He had sought in vain, as this paper fairly brought before His Excellency in petition in this book of extracts shows, by petition to the Local House, by representations made in every manner known in a free country, in order to induce the Local Parliament to stay its hand. He had sought to prevent the passage of this Bill, and he had sought in vain. The law had been passed. His property had been swept away. He had, in lieu of it, what the hon. member has ventured to call tolls; and I think that, when the hon. gentleman comes to understand it, the hon. member who spoke of tolls as being an adequate compensation, will have to admit, if not by his vote, at all events in his heart and conscience, that it was no recompense or compensation for property which was taken away by Act of Parliament.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONSTRUCTION COMPANY BILL.

Mr. BOULTBEE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the International Construction Company.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

Mr. BLAKE. I think this Bill should have undergone the supervision of the Railway Committee. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite have had their attention specially drawn to this measure, but from a cursory perusal of the clause which we are now on, it would appear that it would lead to important results. I would call the particular attention of the hon. Minister of Railways to this clause. It sets out:

The Company may enter into contracts and agreements with any person or corporation for the constructing, equipping, maintaining and operating of railways, telegraph lines, canals and bridges for railway or general passenger or freight business, and in like manner for the building, equipping, maintaining and working steam and other vessels, and, in conformity with such contracts, may build, construct, equip, maintain and operate all such works and undertakings, for and on behalf of the persons or corporations authorized by the laws of Canada to build, construct, equip, maintain or operate the same, or on their own behalf, as may be agreed upon in the contracts respecting the same.

It will be observed that this goes further than construction under this name; it is a Bill to create a corporation for the purpose of operating in public works, and it enables this corporation to obtain a contract for a railway from any individual person authorized to work a railway, and to undertake the operation of a railway. We give franchises to railway and telegraph companies to build and operate these works. Franchises are also given to corporations whom we know, and recognize, and authorize; but this measure would authorize these particular persons, and any other persons or corporations who may become shareholders to operate any railway company in the country with whom they might contract. For example, suppose they entered into a contract with the Great Western or Grand Trunk Railway Companies to operate these roads, they might do so under the provisions of this Bill; and it seems to me that such wide powers, not merely of construction, but of operation, are important to consider before we grant them.

Mr. BOULTBEE. Mr. Chairman, this matter came up in the Private Bills' Committee, and the Bill was held over for several sittings to have this point considered. They cannot build railways or telegraph lines unless they have charters for them. It is quite true they have the right to work the Great Western or Grand Trunk Railways or any other private work; and why not? I know no reason to the contrary if the shareholders of those companies wished it, they should be able to do so as well as any other private party. The Bill was most carefully considered and discussed in the Committee, and I do not know why there should be an attempt to delay the Bill because the hon. member for West Durham says that they have certain power to do certain things; and why not?

Mr. BLAKE. This is no attempt to delay. What I say is this, and I hope the hon. Minister of Railways understood it: This Bill confers very extensive franchises and powers, to work different railway enterprises. The old Parliament of Canada chartered the Great Western and Grand Trunk Companies, and they operate under these powers; but this is a Bill which would authorize this particular corporation to get hold of all the railways in the country, by contract with the different corporations, and operate them all. The hon. gentleman says: "Why not?" I do not offer any opinion, because I have not fully examined the Bill; but, under the circumstances, I think it would be better that the Committee should rise and report progress.

Mr. BOULTBEE. That will cause delay.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Better have delay and have the Bill carefully considered, than precipitately adopt the Bill which seems at first sight to contravene that which has been adopted so far in the present Session.

Mr. BOULTBEE. At this late hour the effect of asking permission to report progress would be to delay the Bill, and probably cause it to be lost. When that Bill came up before the Private Bills Committee, a member of the Government asked that it be referred to the Railway Committee, but on examination he was convinced it properly came within the cognizance of the Private Bills Committee. The slightest consideration will show that this railway cannot have any such power as the hon. Minister of Railways suggests. It has simply to build and work railways and contract public works. If this company has the right to work the Great Western Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway, it could only work those under their charters and would have no power of amalgamation. I venture to suggest that if the hon. Minister of Railways will only take the time to examine this Bill, he will see it cannot possibly have the effect he suggests.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Any Bill that provides for the constructing and operating of railways ought to go to the Railway Committee. I would like to have an opportunity of considering the Bill to-morrow with my colleagues. That will not lead to any delay, the Bill will not lose its place, and very possibly assistance will be given my hon. friend to carry it on. I should fail in my duty if, holding the opinion I do, I did not ask that short time, and the lack of disposition shown by my hon. friend to allow that time makes it all the more necessary that it should be given.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I do not know why, when I am endeavoring to secure the passage of a Bill in which I have no personal interest, it should be suggested that my anxiety renders it at all dangerous. It does not follow that because we are allowed under this Bill to build a railway that we can build one without getting a charter. A member of the Government had this Bill laid over in the Private Bills Committee, because it was suggested that it would go before the Railway Committee; but it was known to the Committee that the Bill gave no power to build railways whatever, unless the Company got a charter, therefore it was considered that the Bill should be dealt with by the Private Bills Committee.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think I recognize in this Bill an old friend in a new face. It was introduced in the Local Legislature of Quebec about a year ago, and came very nearly passing until it was discovered that it simply meant a Bill which might be instrumental in securing amalgamations of Companies which could not otherwise be obtained. I take some little credit to myself for having done something in having this Bill defeated in that Local Legislature. I think the passage of this Bill, therefore, ought to be postponed, and I would not be sorry to see it postponed altogether.

Mr. BOULTBEE. The hon. member for Cardwell would like to get it postponed altogether, because he gave some advice to the Quebec Government; but his advice on that occasion must have been more valuable than on the present, for he knows nothing whatever about this Bill. I venture to say that no legal authority would give the opinion that this Bill confers any power of amalgamation whatever on the Company, and if it does not there can be no objection to letting it go through.

Mr. BLAKE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does it not confer the power on the Company of operating the Great Western Railway Company?

Mr. BOULTBEE. It does.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And to operate the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway Company?

Mr. BOULTBEE. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If so the amalgamation is accomplished.

Mr. BOULTBEE. Has not the Great Western Railway Company the power to carry on its business where the Toronto Grey and Bruce Railway does? I should like to have the opinion of the leader of the Government as to whether any power of amalgamation is given in this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is just what I would wish to have time to consider.

Bill reported.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills, were considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 15) to incorporate the Winnipeg and Springfield Bridge Company—(Mr. Scott.)

Bill (No. 19) to incorporate the St. John's Bridge Company—(Mr. Cameron, Victoria)

Bill (No. 42) to incorporate the Richelieu Bridge Company.—(Mr. Baker.)

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. MILLS. As a matter of privilege, I wish to call the attention of the House to a paragraph in the Morning Herald, of Halifax, to which my attention has been directed. The paragraph reads as follows:—

"The debate on the Ontario Boundary Award question brought up once more the singular and explicable fact of Hon. David Mills having, while Minister of the Interior, accepted a fee (or bribe) of $4,000 from the Government of Ontario in this very dispute,—it being then pending."

In the report of Mr. Plumb's speech the following passage occurs:—

"The money this Minister of the Interior received from the Ontario Government to prepare a case in Opposition to that which he should have advanced as a Privy Councillor of Canada, was $4,000."

"A VOICE. Who received that $4,000?"

"Mr. PLUMB said the member who received the $4,000 was the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) the late Minister of the Interior, and for that sum he prepared evidence to show that Ontario extends to the Rocky Mountains."

"An hon. MEMBER. He would have proved that Ontario extended to the Pacific for another $4,000. (Hear, hear and laughter.)"

"Mr. PLUMB said this was not all, for the statement on behalf of the Dominion was prepared by Colonel Dennis, who was in the member for Bothwell's Department. It was not to be supposed that the member for Bothwell would send a statement from his Department at variance with his own views. This is beyond question one of the most disgraceful things which has ever been brought home to any public man in Canada. Mr. Mills was not a lawyer so that he cannot claim that he was retained professionally, even if it were permissible for a lawyer in his position to have taken a fee—which it certainly would not be. He was simply a layman holding the position of the Minister of the Interior of Canada."

I mean to say this, that neither the statement of the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), if he made it, nor the observations of the Herald are true. They are both malicious falsehoods. I was never the employe of the Ontario Government after I became a Minister of the Crown. I was asked by the Ontario Government to undertake a report upon the question of the boundaries in March, 1872, and I made the report in December, 1872. Mr. Mowat again asked me to undertake the preparation of the case in 1875—in June I think it was. In August, 1876, I made a second report on the case for the Ontario Legislature. I was appointed a Minister of the Crown in October following. For my first report I received from the Government of Ontario—they paying the expenses I incurred for tracings and photographs of maps—$1,000; and for the preparation the case they paid me $1,500 or $2,500 for the two. I know no impediment in the way of my undertaking the work. I find that hon. gentlemen opposite paid a gentleman for investigating this subject on behalf of the Dominion Government, who never undertook to put the results of his labors on paper, as much as I received for both these reports. If I had known this statement had been made by the hon. member for Niagara, I would have contradicted it then, but I do so now, the first time I have observed such a report was made. I say the report is untrue, and the statement in this paper is a malicious falsehood.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It seems to be in order to call attention to little items published in the papers when they reflect injuriously on members of the House. I desire to call attention to a paragraph which appears in to-day's Globe, in which my name is mentioned. In the Globe's correspondence from the capital, it is stated that:

"It is more than hinted that several members of the House largely supplement their indemnity and mileage by fees for promoting Bills. How far their constituents approve of their representatives tying their hands in this way, so that they cannot vote upon important questions, it would be interesting to know. An equally important point is to know how such members justify their violation of the Independence of Parliament Act."

My name is coupled as one of those receiving fees. I have not directly or indirectly received any fee or reward whatever for promoting any Bill which would be contrary to the rules of the House, and as a professional man I do not do it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I find my name also included in the category. I can only say that I have not had a Private Bill in charge during this Session; that I have not been interested directly or indirectly in any Private Bill, except the Canada Landed Credit Company, which was in charge of the hon. member for West Toronto. I declined to take charge of said Bill, because my partner was solicitor for the Company. I have not received any fee or been in connection with any Private Bill, and any statement to the contrary effect is utterly unfounded and untrue. Perhaps, while I am addressing myself to this point, I might also mention another matter, to which I dislike very much to refer, as these personal matters are always disagreeable. I am told, although I did not see it, that this same correspondent of the Globe, at the Capital, stated that I was the holder of a timber limit or an applicant for a timber limit, and when I voted on the motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition, on this question, I voted contrary to my duty, and on account of my interest in that matter. That, Sir, is untrue. I never applied for a timber limit, directly or indirectly, and I never owned or had any interest in one.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I have just been informed that my name, also, is made the subject of remark in the paragraph. With respect to the Bill which I was endeavoring to put through the House, I was conducting it for the gentlemen whose names appear on it, and I never received a cent for doing so, or asked or suggested that I should receive a cent. With regard to the Thunder Bay and Minnesota Bill, which was thrown out in Committee, I did not get a cent for looking after it, nor do I expect to get a cent for it. With regard to the Lake Superior and Hudson's Bay Road, I am one of the incorporators, and I did not get a cent, nor do I expect to get a cent, for my connection with it. So with the Souris and Rocky Mountain Bill. I think it is rather hard that, without authority, these papers, simply for the purpose of making capital in the country, and injuring us before our constituents, should go so far as to make such scandalous assertions as these. We take a great deal of trouble to go through a great deal of hard work, and anxious and watchfulness in connection with these Bills, and I say it is rather hard that, after trying to do our duty, we should be made the subject of such charges as these. God knows I am poor enough, and I am likely to remain poor enough so long as I am in Parliament. I am sorry to say that being in Parliament does not increase ones wealth, and I do not think it is desirable to increase it in that way, because if a man receives anything for promoting a Bill in Parliament, he would disgrace his position on the floor of the House and in the country. Charges like these cannot be answered, for if you were to write a reply they would simply reiterate the scandal and charge you with something worse. There is no way of making a defence in such a case, but I think there should be some plan of regulating these matters so that we who are doing our duty in Parliament to the best of our endeavors should not be met with scandals and charges like these. The repetition of such charges is calculated to make one feel disgusted with doing the best he can to carry out his duty to his constituents and to the country.

DISALLOWANCE OF STREAMS BILL.

House resumed the consideration of Mr. Cameron's (Huron) amendment to Sir Leonard Tilley's proposed motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair for the House to go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. McCARTHY. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was proceeding to consider that part of the Bill which deals with compensation. Perhaps I might first be permitted to state, however, what I understand to be the meaning of the word "compensation," when applied to the sovereign right of expropriation. Now, I do not pretend to dispute, and I am quite willing to admit in the amplest possible manner, so far as my judgment goes, that this Act of Parliament was, subject to one consideration, within the power of the Local Legislature. If that one consideration be overlooked there is power in the Local Legislature as in every other sovereign body—and the Local Legislature is sovereign so far as its jurisdiction extends—to expropriate property for public purposes. But, Sir, as I understand the doctrine of expropriation, as we call it, or as it is better known on the other side of the line, the exercise of its power of eminent domain, there are two limitations to the exercise of that power. The first and most important is that it should be exercised only in the public interest. There is no right, in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, to take from one man his property and hand it over to another unless it be in the public interest. The next important qualification in the doctrine—and perhaps it is more than the other, and at all events to the individual—is that the expropriation should be only on payment of full compensation. Now, that compensation, as you know, is always given where expropriation is exercised in the ordinary and familiar instances of railway companies or bridge companies. Under a Railway Act, before property can be taken for public purposes, the fair value of the property is to be given to the proprietor, and that fair value is arrived at in the manner pointed out by the Act—by arbitrators selected, one by the company, one by the individual whose property is taken from him, and the third by one of the Courts of the land. But it is perfectly plain that where this doctrine is perhaps better understood than anywhere else, in the United States, no exercise of the power of eminent domain is legal or constitutional, according to their law, unless it is accompanied by compensation—payment in money at the time, not payment postponed to any future date. Now, I am not unaware that there is no such limitation in our law; I am not unaware that, according to the doctrine of the British Parliament, the power we have and the power the Local Legislatures have in their spheres comprehends the power, though not the right, to take away a man's property without compensating him. But I challenge my hon. friends opposite to point out in the history of British legislation any instance in which the right of a person whose property is taken from him to receive compensation has been departed from. Although there is the absolute power, that power has been so exercised under our free form of government that it has not been found necessary to limit it as it is limited in the United States. Now, I wish to point out another feature of this measure—that not merely, as I shall endeavor to show, is it an exercise of the power of eminent domain without adequate and proper compensation, but it is also an Act of Parliament relating peculiarly to past events. It is retroactive in its enacting clause; it does not speak merely for the future, but it legislates for the past, and thus two principles of sound legislation—principles of paramount importance—have been violated. First, property has been taken from an individual without adequate or proper compensation; and, second, the Act is retroactive in its effect, and in point of fact, determined the litigation then existing between the parties, and which gave rise to this measure. The power of eminent domain is said to be the supreme right of property appertaining to the Sovereign—the power by which private property acquired by the citizens under the sovereign's protection—may be taken, or its use controlled for the public benefit without regard for the wishes of the owner. The doctrine is thus stated by Judge Colley:

"It is the rightful authority which must rest in every sovereignty to regulate and control these rights of a public nature which pertain to its citizens in common, and to appropriate and control individual property for the public benefit as the public safety, convenience, or necessity may demand."

The limit to that power is this:

"That compensation shall be made therefor; and this compensation must be pecuniary in its character, because it is in the nature of a payment for a pecuniary purchase."

It is said by a learned Judge, in one case in which the matter was discussed, that

"This authority amounts to nothing more than a power to oblige a private individual to sell and convey while the public interests required it."

Mr. Chancellor Kent, in his able commentaries, thus speaks of it:

"The settled and fundamental doctrine is that the Government has no right to take private property for public purposes without giving just compensation; and it seems to be necessarily implied that the indemnity should, in cases which will admit of it, be previously and equitably ascertained, and be ready for reception concurrently in point of time with the actual right of eminent domain."

Again Judge Colley says:

"While the owner is not to be dispossessed until compensation is provided; neither, on the other hand, when the public authorities have taken such steps as to finally settle upon the appropriation, ought he to be left in a state of uncertainty to wait for compensation until some future time when they may see fit to occupy it."

Well, Sir, to quote once more:

"But whatever be the necessity and however important the public use, compensation must be made in money, and not in incidental benefits, in order to meet the true spirit of the constitutional provision upon that subject."

The general rule is clear, that although steps preliminary to expropriation may be taken without providing compensation.

"Before any definite act be done towards the construction of the improvement which is in the nature of the assertion of ownership, payment must be made or tendered or a certain and adequate remedy be provided, and unless this is done in the Act authorizing the work, the Statute is wholly unconstitutional and void."

I have troubled the House with these extracts because I think that they lay down correct principles of legislation. I do not mean to say, Sir—and I have carefully avoided, I think, stating—that these regulations apply to our legislation here; but what I do mean to say is, that the same spirit which regulates the written law on the other side has governed and always governs British legislation. I defy my hon.

friends opposite to point, in all the Statute-books of British legislation, to an Act of this character, intended to deprive a man of his property without giving him adequate and suitable compensation. Now, Sir, does this Act in any way come up to the terms of what I venture to say it should be, in order to bring it within the principles of sound legislation. The first section of the Act declares that notwithstanding any effect of the judgments of the Courts up to that time, all streams during the spring, summer and autumn freshets were open to everybody to float and transmit saw-logs and timber of other kinds. The second clause of the Act says: "that any person may go on the land and construct in any such rivers, creeks or streams any improvements he thinks proper, in order to facilitate the passage of timber." The third provision says, that the rights therein given, and the provisions therein made—contained in the foregoing sections 1st and 2nd—shall extend to and apply to all rivers, creeks and streams mentioned in the 1st section of the Act, that is to all rivers, creeks and streams which whether floatable or navigable in the state of nature, or not, have been made floatable or navigable by artificial means by any one; and the 4th section purports, or pretends to give compensation, and how does it read? The Lieutenant-Governor may fix the amount which any person collecting tolls under this Act shall be at liberty to charge on saw logs and different kinds of timber, or rafts, or crafts, and may from time to time vary the same; and the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, in fixing such tolls, is to regard certain matters. Now, how does this matter stand practically? This property is as I pointed out before Recess, when this Act of Parliament was passed, was the property of Mr. McLaren. On the passage of this Act, it ceased to be his private, and became public property. It ought not, every hon. member, I think, will admit, to have been transferred to the public, unless the public had paid compensation for it, or unless there was certain and sure means pointed out by the Statute by which that compensation was to be recovered. I do not think that any hon. member in this House or that any fair-minded man in this country will for one moment contend, even supposing that the use of this river was all important in a public sense, even supposing that it was a great wrong on Mr. McLaren's part to use it solely for his own purposes, and denying its use for everybody else, that it ought to have been taken from him for public purposes, without his being paid a compensation for his property and proprietary rights. Well, Sir, what does this Act do? It says that tolls may be collected, and more, what has been done? Property which was McLaren's to-day was to-morrow public property. It is worth so much money; call it $100,000, or anything you like, whatever it may be; but where is he to get that money, the interest on that money, or the principal. It is said he may get it by tolls. But wherein is any person compelled to use that stream? Does it follow that this stream will be used by any person? Is there any certain, sure way, such as constitutional writers point out, by which this money, or the interest or the capital, or any other compensation will be given to him for depriving him of his property, which this Statute affects. I think, Sir, it is perfectly plain that this pretence of giving him compensation is illusory. It is perfectly certain that, across the border, this Statute would be deemed unconstitutional and void. It is perfectly clear that the authorities say, if this law was enacted by any State of the Union, that it would be, according to their constitution—and it would be declared in the Courts in that country—void and of no effect. It is not here, because the British Parliament is omnipotent because the Legislature, within its sphere, is omnipotent; because, when that Act goes on the Statute-book, and is assented to by royal authority, it becomes the law of the land, no matter how unjust its provisions may be in depriving a man of his property and giving it up to public uses; but this is not according to the spirit of the constitution. It is not according to the way in which the laws are administered. It is not according to what is believed to be right and honest between man and man, that for public or any other purposes, a person should be despoiled of his estate. Well, Sir, my hon. friend stated it was an outrage, that a man, by making an improvement upon a stream or some portion of it, should close that stream, so that no person else could use it, thus he said: "The toil and labor expended in getting out timber, would be lost because it could not be got to market." As proof, and perhaps the strongest proof, I can offer to show that the Bill was undoubtedly passed for the purpose of injuring one man and enriching another, I will show the House what is perfectly well known to every man engaged in the lumber business, that there was no necessity for this legislation at all. If it was essential in the public interest that this river should be open to the public, Sir, there is a law on the Statute-book of the Province of Ontario, which is referred to in this Act, and which says, that any five men can by taking certain steps become incorporated, and being incorporated, may acquire from any proprietor improvements on any river or stream; that they may expropriate; that upon payment, just as a railway company can, they can expropriate the river improvements, on the payment of the just value, and can hold the stream and collect tolls and work them, if they find it profitable. Well, Sir, what are we forced to think? Either that Caldwell could not get any other four persons to join him in expropriating this property, that he knew it would not pay him to do so, or that it would not pay for the investment of the capital necessary, or that the Local Government, in order to favor one man, their supporter, deliberately passed this Act of Parliament to deprive McLaren of his property, and, in point of fact, to hand it over to one other person who desired to use the stream, and this was Caldwell. Another statement has been made, and a good deal has been attempted to be made of it; it is this: that Caldwell was practically denied the right to bring his timber to market by this stream. If this were so, it would not be any justification for such an Act of Parliament. But the contrary is the fact. The limit belonging to Caldwell, was worked long before Caldwell had it. It was, and had been, the property of Hon. Mr. Skead, and during the time he worked it he took the timber from it by its natural waters, the Madawaska, which are the nearest and most convenient; and the only fact which makes the Mississippi more convenient for Caldwell is because he happens to have a mill at Carleton Place on that stream. This being the condition of affairs, what was to be done? Here was a Statute, which I think I have shown was intended to deprive one man of his rights without compensation. There are no constitutional safeguards, such as they have on the other side of the line, by which an appeal could be made to the Courts of the land. Here was a Statute, retroactive in its operations, which declared that what was law yesterday in the Province of Ontario shall cease to be law to-morrow. The effect of that was to interfere with litigation, and take from the man his property and his right. And what appeal had he? Why, he had the appeal to the foot of the Throne. The only redress that was left to him, as a British subject, was to go with his petition to the representative of the Throne in this country—to His Excellency the Governor General—and point out to him how the matter stood, and ask His Excellency, under the circumstances, to disallow the measure. Was that wrong? Is it to be said that, in no case, under no circumstances, can an Act of Parliament, which is within the power of a Local Legislature, be disallowed? No person pretends to assert that doctrine, though I believe the resolution in your hands, Mr. Speaker, does assert it. My hon. friends in opposition to it, during the time they were on this side of the House, clearly laid down the opposite doctrine; clearly showed that the Acts of the Local Legislature could be disallowed, not only when they were ultra vires, but when they contravened some principle of legislation, and they were, in some instances, set aside on the latter ground by hon. gentlemen opposite. No fault could be found with them. The British North America Act has introduced this very great change, and this discussion here this evening shows the importance of the step we have made. Before Confederation this Bill could have been disallowed by the Imperial power. Application would have to be made and applications were made from time to time to the sovereign power to disallow measures that interfered with those rights, but now the power is resting, and properly resting, under the Confederation Act with his Excellency the Governor-General, as was pointed out in the able State paper of which the hon. leader of the Opposition was the author, during the time he was Minister of Justice. It is now discussed on the floor of Parliament, whether that power was properly exercised or not. To hear the hon. member from South Huron talk, one would think it was merely the ipse dixit of the hon. the Minister of Justice, and in Ontario it is the habit to say it was a Frenchman—the Secretary who happened to be acting for the hon. the Minister of Justice is called the Frenchman—who disallowed and overrode the legislation of the Ontario Parliament. Does not every hon. member know, even if the hon. member for South Huron forgets for a moment, as his speech will seem to indicate, that it is on the report merely of the Minister of Justice, and that it is an Order in Council, made by His Excellency the Governor General on the advice of his Ministers, that the Bill can be disallowed. Will it be thought that the power of disallowance will be exercised in an arbitrary manner, that the hon. First Minister with the large following he has from the Province of Ontario, the legislation of which was disallowed with the knowledge that the members of all the Provinces are jealous of their rights and privileges of local self-government will dare to disallow any measure unless he is able to justify to this House and the country the power he assumes? I am prepared to put the ground of this disallowance on this broad principle. I have shown the legislation was contrary to such principles, that this Act was a violation of the rights of private property, without pretence of justification, and if, in this British Colony, we have no means of redress, we will have to introduce the same law that they have in the States, put an article in our Constitution that no Acts of expropriation shall be lawful unless they be accompanied by payments of compensation so that the Courts shall have power to determine whether the parties are properly compensated or not. Either we are unfit to exercise the right of disallowance that is exercised by the Imperial Government, without violating the rights of private property, or we will have, by a law, to prevent the possibility of a hostile majority in any Local Legislature despoiling a man of his property for reasons which are altogether unjustifiable and insufficient. Mr. McLaren came to the Council with his petition. He set forth the facts; and perhaps there is more made of the fact that the disallowance took place without communication to the Local Government than of the disallowance itself. A paper was read by my hon. friend which was prepared in the early days of Confederation by the hon. the First Minister, who was then the hon. the Minister of Justice. In that document it was stated—so careful was he and so careful, I may say is he now, not to override the rights of Local Governments—that, where there was any necessity or use for it, before a Bill could be disallowed, communication should be had with the Local Government. But, Sir, that is not Statute Law or an imperative necessity. It is simply a reasonable provision. Why? Because in the same case a Bill might pass a Local House without having had that attention given to it that its importance deserved, and might contain provisions that, in the hurry of legislation, had a much wider significance than was supposed at the time. It would be, therefore, only reasonable and proper, if there was no immediate necessity for disallowing it so as to prevent irreparable mischief being done, that communication should be made to the Local Government. What was the case? Mr. McLaren, in his petition, presented to His Excellency the Governor General a statement of the facts. In that statement it appeared that so early as May, 1880, Mr. Pardee wrote the letter threatening Mr. McLaren, if he did not permit Mr. Cardwell's timber to come down, with the vengeance of his Government. In the following year this Bill was introduced deliberately by the Ontario Government; it was passed by the Ontario House on the very grounds which were afterwards presented by Mr. McLaren to His Excellency. All the facts of the case were known and the press had very fully discussed the subject. Now, I want to know what object would there have been in writing to Mr. Mowat to ask the question: "Why did you pass that nefarious Bill?" Mr. Mowat did it openly. If the law was ultra vires, it could be at once disallowed. If the law was within their jurisdiction and could be explained, an explanation should be called for; but if it was done deliberately, if it was the settled policy of Mr. Mowat to pass a law in violation to the rights of Mr. McLaren, certainly it would have been the idlest possible ceremony to have communicated with him in order to have an explanation of his views on the subject. Therefore what would, in some cases, have been very proper, was not applicable, and could not be applicable in a case of this kind. And why? In the month of March, just about the time that Mr. McLaren wanted to use his improvements, he had obtained his injunction from the Court of Chancery, and by that stayed Mr. Caldwell's interference. The very object, the benefit of his suit, would be lost unless His Excellency the Governor General, on the advice of his Ministers, disallowed it. For these reasons it appears to me perfectly plain, that if ever a measure can be disallowed, other than one which is ultra vires, this was one, and it was not only disallowed, but disallowed properly without communication to the Local Government. Now, the House has been treated to the views of my hon. friend the hon. the First Minister, on this question of disallowance, and we are always delighted to hear the hon. members of the Opposition quote the language of my hon. friend with approval. But, Sir, is it not a strange thing that my hon. friend from Huron, ardent Oppositionist as he is, should swear only from what fell from the lips of the First Minister. He appears to have been altogether blind in reading from these Blue-Books to what had fallen from the hon. Minister who leads him. He appears to have ignored from what fell from the Hon. Mr. Scott, acting as Minister of Justice. He appears to have ignored altogether what fell from Mr. Justice Fournier when he was Minister of Justice, but he has given to the House the statements that have been made from time to time by the hon. First Minister. Now the Goodhue case was mentioned, and I will say this: that if at this time of day, after several years of Confederation, if such a measure as that was not disallowed, if a measure changing a man's will, as the Local Legislature professed to do in that case, was not disallowed by his Excellency, I think the action of the Minister of Justice and the Administration in refusing that disallowance, would be hard indeed to justify. But it will be remembered that in those days Confederation was young. In those days the Provinces were sensitive, and perhaps the rights of individuals had to some extent to yield to the public necessities of the day. But, Sir, because in that case the hon. the Minister of Justice failed to do what, with more enlarged experience of the working of Confederation he could not hesitate to do at this time of day, is that a reason to be urged against the propriety of the course he recently took?

Let me read what a learned Judge, one of the ablest perhaps that ever adorned the Ontario bench, has said with reference to this power of disallowance, with reference to this very measure. I am not reading the language of a politician, I am reading the language of the learned Chief Justice Draper, who was then Chief of the Court of Appeal, and he said in this celebrated Goodhue case:

"In regard to the absence of a Record chamber, it may be further observed, so far at least as estate or Private Bills are concerned, that as such Bills involve ordinarily no mere party political considerations, all those whose interests may be touched have a right, in the first place, to expect a careful examination of their contents on the part of the Provincial Executive, and a withholding of the Royal assent if it is found that the promoters of the Bill are seeking advantages at the expense of others whose interests are as well grounded as their own; and further, if from oversight or any other cause, provisions should be inserted of an objectionable character, such as the deprivations of innocent parties of actual or even possible interests, by retroactive legislation, such Bills are subject to the consideration of the Governor General, who, as the representative of the Sovereign, is entrusted with authority, to which a corresponding duty attaches, to disallow any law contrary to reason or to natural justice and equity."

Now, here is the expression of an able Judge upon the clause in our Act which, of course, we all know is not confined to disallowance merely in cases where there has been an excess of the exercise of jurisdiction, but in every and all cases. Let me now pursue this subject a little further and see what hon. gentleman have thought with reference to it when the necessities of the case arose. My hon. friends from Prince Edward Island will remember the long struggle they had with reference to the land laws. They will remember the attempts that were made by Local Legislatures to do away with the proprietary right, and to accomplish what was accomplished here at an earlier date in Lower Canada in regard to the Seigneuries. They will remember that several appeals were made to England on that subject, and that the English Government invariably refused to carry out their propositions because they were interfering with vested rights. I will quote on this subject—because it is very apposite, it appears to me—the language of Sir George Grey to Lieutenant Governor Daly of Prince Edward Island:

"Her Majesty's Government have considered these Acts separately and with an anxious desire to do justice between the community of Prince Edward Island in general, and the proprietors of the soil, and to allow the fullest possible scope to the principle of local independence in legislative matters, subject only to the paramount duty not to advise the Crown to assent to any measure inflicting any manifest wrong on any of Her subjects * * * and Her Majesty's Government cannot take upon themselves the responsibility of advising the Crown to give its assent to Colonial Acts which are at variance with the principles of justice, and invade those rights of property which are the foundation of social organism."

Now, Sir, that was the opinion of Sir George Grey, and I think it would not be difficult to find that other colonial Ministers had dealt with this subject in the same way. My right hon. friend reminds me that Sir George Grey was an extreme Liberal, not one of the old Tories, not one of those who held on to prerogative rights, but one who was desirous to give, as his despatch states, the fullest scope to responsible Government. Well, in 1874 another Act of that kind was passed, and it came here for the consideration of the Government of this country. It was accompanied by a despatch, I believe, from the Lieutenant Governor of the Province to the Governor General here, urging in the strongest possible manner that this law should be assented to. Mr. Justice Fournier was then the Minister of Justice of the Government of that day, and he goes over the matter with reference to the petitions that were sent in, and winds up his opinion on it in this way:

"The allegations in these petitions are very forcibly urged, and represent features which cannot but be regarded as contrary to the principles of legislation in respect to private rights and property."

"The undersigned is of opinion that the Act is objectionable, in that it does not provide for an impartial arbitration in which the proprietors would have a representation for arriving at a decision on the nature of the rights and the value of the property involved, and also for securing a speedy determination and settlement of the matters in dispute."

"Under all the circumstances of the case the undersigned has the honor to recommend that the Bill so reserved, intitled 'The Land Purchase Act of 1874,' do not receive the assent of Your Excellency in Council."

The right given to poor Mr. McLaren was to go before the Hon. Mr. Mowat who was to fix, in the interest of Mr. Caldwell, the tolls and dues he was to pay. Well, Sir, this report was duly approved, and the Bill was disallowed.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. It was not assented to. I will come to that in one moment. That is one of the fine points I may expect from the leader of the Opposition, one of those things that occur to him as of very great force; but I think to an ordinary mind it will not have much bearing on the subject. In 1876, another law with regard to this was passed by the Island of Prince Edward, and it was sent here in the same way, and then it was that the Hon. Mr. Scott, who was Acting Minister of Justice for the present leader of the Opposition—who I suppose approved of this Act on his return, or else he would no longer have continued to remain in office; of course, it passed the whole Council, but I believe at that time the hon. member was absent. Now, what was said with regard to this? It was not very unlike the Act with regard to streams and rivers. The first thing the Act does is to reverse the law of the land, to declare that which the Courts at that time declared to be the law was not and never had been the law of the land:

"The effect of the first portion of the Act appears to be that the interpretation of the Supreme Court of the Island of the Act of 1875, upon which certain awards of Land Commissioners were held bad, is reversed, and the awards in question declared as valid."

In conclusion he says:

"That without giving weight or consideration to any great extent to the allegations in the petitions which are unsupported by any actual proof, he is of opinion that the reserved Bill is retrospective in its effect; that it deals with rights of parties now in legislation under the Act which it is proposed to amend, or which may fairly form the subject of litigation; and that there is an absence of any provision saving the rights and proceedings of persons whose properties have been dealt with under the Act of 1875."

Therefore, he recommended that the Act should not be assented to or approved. Well, I think that is pretty much like the present case, yet the hon. member for South Huron overlooked these important State documents. He has no faith in the language, in the sentiments, in the State papers, which emanate from his own side of the House, and he has to come here to get his constitutional law. Well, if he would only take it altogether we would not have so much objection to it; but, taking it in part he does not digest it well, he does not assimilate it. The present hon. leader of the Opposition was Minister of Justice at one time, and I do not think we will find he ever disallowed anything, but that he generally went both ways; he would point out very forcibly that the Act should be disallowed, and yet it would not be disallowed. That is evidently the character of the hon. gentleman's mind. I have read opinions prepared by the hon. gentleman, in which he set forth that this course might be taken or another course might be taken; that one Judge might think thus and another Judge might think that; and you rose from the perusal without knowing very much exactly what his opinion was on a given case. So it is with respect to his opinions in these questions. But they go the length of showing that the hon. gentleman was in favor of the principle that, in some cases at all events, Acts which are contrary to the sound principles of legislation, ought to be disallowed. The Act before the hon. gentleman at the time was to compel assurers to take out a license in Quebec. He declared:

"The policy of laying a tax of this nature is open to great objection. It must fall, in the end, upon those interested in the assurances. It may be considered to be a tax upon providence and thrift, and its operation may have an injurious effect far beyond what may be recompensed by its pecuniary results, but there are views which, although they should be fairly weighed, and although they might, in some cases, force upon the Canadian Government the necessity of disallowance."

The Act was within the power of the legislation to pass, and it was one which might be good policy to enact, but the hon. gentleman said there might be some cases in which the Canadian Government would be forced of necessity to disallow Acts. That is the principle for which I here contend; that is the sound constitutional doctrine which I venture to say no statesman can deny, that there are instances and there may be cases, it is to be hoped they will not often occur, where sound principles of legislation have been violated to that extent that it becomes the duty of the Governor in Council upon the advice of his Ministers to disallow the Act and prevent it from going into operation. I think I have shown that this law cannot, upon any reasonable principles, be upheld; that it is contrary to ordinary principles of legislation respecting private property; that it is within the legal power of the Governor General in Council to disallow a measure of this kind; that since we have no longer in this country with respect to local legislation the power of appeal to England, that power being now vested in the Governor in Council, the Government of the day would be recreant to their duty if they did not give to any man whose rights were invaded, as Mr. McLaren's rights were invaded by Act of Parliament, that redress which, before Confederation, he would have been able to obtain at the foot of the Throne; and if I have shown that, I have established that disallowance in this case was one that ought to be commended and not condemned. I should be very sorry to think indeed that the rule for one Province should not be the rule for another. I admit that the larger the Province, the less likelihood there is of the violation of rights of this character. We know, for instance, that an Act of the Manitoba Legislature was disallowed, I think, by the present leader of the Opposition, though I am not quite certain on that point, with respect to matters clearly within its jurisdiction, namely, the half-breed lands, simply on the ground that legislation was not necessary in the opinion of the Dominion Government. But whatever is the rule for Manitoba should be the rule for Ontario; and whatever is the rule of Quebec should be the rule of Ontario; and whatever is the rule of one Province ought to be the rule of another, and this essential, if we are not to alter our constitution. If the people are not to be driven, in self-defence of the rights of property, to have the Constitution altered by introducing legislative prohibition which exists on the other side of the line with respect to the exercise of eminent domain, this power should be carefully exercised, it is true, but still it should be exercised in every case where the rights of individuals have been sacrificed by a law passed by a Local Legislature. Matters of policy are quite different. I do not intend to discuss the vexed question of the New Brunswick school law. It was, however, one of policy and not of vested rights. It was not discussed as destruction of property or of right, but as an improper exercise of legislative power in a matter on which men might well differ. The line is broadly and clearly drawn between a matter of that kind and this. If a private Bill had been allowed to pass the Local Legislature, and handing over one man's property to another, that would have been a good reason for vetoing the Bill. If the principle is vicious, it is only the more startling because it has been assented to by the Lieutenant Governor. It would seem hard that a man who had been deprived of his property should be told that he must wait till the next election; that this is a question beyond all doubt upon which the people will judge, and they will turn out the Government and hand back the property.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear,

Mr. McCARTHY. If that hon. member who says hear, hear, had property taken from him he would find that the issues of an election were mixed up with boundary questions and matters of much greater importance, and his little matter connected with private property would not induce people to reverse their votes and desert their property. Practically we know that nothing of that kind can be done. The elector would say that notwithstanding that legislation he would vote for Mr. Mowat and Mr. Pardee because there were greater questions at issue, and therefore no man can hope, unless such attacks on private property repeatedly occurred and became great questions, to obtain that redress by turning out the Government which had authorized legislation of that character, which he can get promptly by appeal to the foot of the Throne. I must not omit to refer to the difference between refusing to assent and disallowance. I venture to say there is no substantial difference. Can any one pretend to assert that because a Lieutenant-Governor has gone through the form of assenting to a Bill which has been introduced by his Ministry and passed by a majority of the House, there is any substantial difference between that and the Lieutenant-Governor reserving that question for the consideration of the Governor General? Why, Sir, what position does the Lieutenant-Governor occupy? He occupies, I suppose, strictly speaking, the position of a Dominion officer. His duty probably would be to see that he assented to no legislation that interfered with the rights of the Dominion or Dominion property. He would be bound to do what the Governor General here does; obey the instructions from the office here, but, as we know, our Lieutenant-Governors have no instructions. They are left without directions what course to take in any given measure, and consequently the result is that they give pro forma their assent to a measure, which thereby becomes law, subject to being disallowed. It is, in fact, an ad interim allowance and becomes an ad interim law. I know I cannot convince my hon. friend who differs from most other men and certainly differs from me on this subject, but it appears to me that the matter is one of shadow more than substance. Suppose the Lieutenant-Governor reserved this Bill to-day, would there be any practical difference from his having reserved it? What earthly difference would it make? If the law is a good one it is not made better by his assent, and, if a bad one, it is not made good by the form of the Lieutenant Governor assenting to it. The main question for the Governor General would be whether it is a good or bad law; whether it is beyond their power, or if within their power, whether it controvenes the well-known principles of legislation. The assent of the Crown to the Acts of a Local Legislature is obtained, in a limited manner, from the Lieutenant-Governor, and that assent does not become perfect until a certain time elapses, when the assent becomes perfect, and a time is allowed for the Bills to undergo consideration, as with regard to our legislation here.

Mr. BLAKE. Is it so with our legislation for the last two years?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes, it is so, and the hon. gentleman will not deny it. All of our legislation within two years can be disallowed, but until disallowed it is perfectly good. If this Parliament could be guilty of passing an Act like this, —though they could not pass such an Act to-day—would a man be denied the right to go to England and lay a petition before the Crown and ask for disallowance? Would my hon. friend pretend to say that under such circumstances an Act of this Parliament would not be disallowed.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, I do.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then I differ from the hon. gentleman altogether. If the hon. gentleman would trace the correspondence between the Home Office and the colonies up to the time of Confederation, he would see that no law the principle of which is to destroy the property of private individuals or do a manifest injustice received the assent of the Crown. Now, Sir, there is much more to be said on this subject, no doubt, but other hon. members are to speak upon it and I would be taking up the time improperly if I were to prolong my remarks to any greater length. I have endeavored to state, and I am satisfied I have stated correctly, the facts of the case, and why it was that I think the Act was contrary to every principle recognizing the rights of, I may say, civilized man. The primary object of all Government is the protection, not merely of life and liberty, but of property. All this vast scheme of law-making power, which is invested in this Parliament, is for the purpose of affording protection to life, liberty and property. Certainly there are other objects of legislation, but the primary matters of legislation are those which I have mentioned. But what is the danger that has been found to exist on the other side of the line, and is likely to arise here? Let me read an extract from a very eminent writer on Constitutional Law, Mr. Sedgwick, whose work on that subject is recognized, not only on the other side of the line, but here as well:

"And it is to be observed also that the unjust action of the Government writers is most likely to take the shape of attacks upon the rights of property. All Government, indeed, resolves itself into the protection of life, liberty and property. Life and liberty in our fortunate condition are, however, little likely to be injuriously affected by the administration of the body politic—and property is very differently situated."

Then he points out the rule by which we ought to be governed. He says:

"With this qualification the great provisions referred to, i.e., compensation for private property taken for public uses, sanctioning of contracts and law of the land, seem to furnish the principal guarantees of our liberty and rights."

These principles have been violated in this measure, and for that violation one of the parties applied to the Government of the day for the only redress that was open to him, that the Act could be disallowed, and I say this House by a large majority, and, I believe, the common sense of the country, will endorse and sanction the course which was taken by the Administration in disallowing a measure so contrary to every principle of legislation, so contrary to every right, so contrary to the spirit of justice.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat told us in the opening of his speech that he was no longer an advocate or counsel for the party who, he says, has been injured by the Local Legislature of Ontario. But, Sir, I think if we take his statement—his one-sided statement—regarding the facts of the case, and his partial statement regarding the meaning and effect of the Ontario Act, and if we refer to the fact that the case is still pending in which he is counsel, and that the Act has been re-enacted by the Local Legislature of Ontario—and I suppose the question of its being again disallowed is pending now before the Government here—we can easily see that, however the hon. gentleman may have tried to divest himself of that feeling of partizanship which every man in his position naturally has, he has failed. What have we heard here? That Mr. McLaren had a property said to be worth $250,000. Why, Sir, in his own bill in Chancery he puts it at $100,000 less, and he did not, so far as I have read in the proceedings, offer any evidence that even that loose allegation in his Bill was sustained as a matter of fact. We find that this Mr. McLaren, on the strength of having a few parcels of property along that river, professes to control the operations on 200 miles of the river, and to prevent every other lumberman in that vast region of country from taking a log or stick of timber down that stream. Not only so, but he claims the benefit of a law of Ontario to take his timber through other people's property, while at the same time he says that that same law shall not interfere to protect the rights of other people against him. The value of his property depends on the law of Ontario, which gives him the right to float his logs along that river for 200 miles. Without that law, if his extreme contention is correct, he would have no right to float logs on that stream; and shall it be said that the Legislature of Ontario is not to interfere to give other people rights as well as him? What more do we find? We find that not only does Mr. McLaren's property depend for its value upon the law of Ontario, but that he absolutely refused to permit Mr. Caldwell to float his logs over his improvements, as he calls them, although Mr. Caldwell offered him any compensation that was reasonable, and offered to refer the matter to arbitration. When Mr. Caldwell offered him every satisfaction that any reasonable man could demand, he acted like the dog in the manger; he would do neither one thing nor the other; he said: "I have an absolute and exclusive right to property at different places along that river, and I shall prevent any man, no matter what his necessity may be, from floating logs down that stream, even though he is willing to compensate me in every reasonable way." The hon. gentleman has failed to tell us that the public interests of Ontario, not only on this stream, but perhaps on a hundred other streams in the Province, are seriously jeopardized. We all know that the Province of Ontario derives from timber dues a very large proportion of its annual revenue—some hundreds of thousands of dollars a year; and that revenue depends upon getting lumber out, and upon its reaching market; and in nine cases out of ten—yes, I believe, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the getting of that lumber to market depends upon the use of streams that have been improved, as it is called, just as this stream has been improved. That whole country would be locked up if Mr. McLaren's claim were acknowledged. If the hands of the Legislature were tied, as the Government here says they shall be tied, there would be locked up a tract of timber country consisting of hundreds of square miles from development or access. These rivers have been treated, we may say, for generations, by the Legislature of Old Canada and the Legislature of Ontario as public highways for timber. The law under which the Legislature of Ontario professes to act has been in force for a great many years, and all that was done by the Act of 1881 was really to declare what a great many people believed to be the old law, what was intended to be enacted by the original law. It is only by the construction placed upon the former Act by the decision in the case of Boale vs. Dickson, that its operation was limited so as to enable men like Mr. McLaren to defeat the law. That Act said:

"Be it enacted that it shall be lawful for parties to float rafts and craft down all streams in Upper Canada during the spring, summer, and autumn freshets, and no person shall, by felling trees or placing any other obstruction in the course of such streams, prevent the passage thereof."

That is the law as it stood for many years. What was the construction placed upon it in the case of Boale vs. Dickson, on which Mr. McLaren based his Bill in Chancery? The construction was that that only applied to streams which in a state of nature were capable of floating logs. Now, let us see what Chief Justice Spragge, in giving judgment in this case in the Court of Appeal, says with regard to that construction. He says:

"No such qualification of the right given by section 15 is to be found in the Act, nor in any previous Acts thereby consolidated. There is nothing in the context of any of these Acts, showing or tending to show that any such qualification was intended."

That is, that all streams only meant all streams which in a state of nature were capable of floating logs.

"And were we, from what we find in the Act taken in this case, confining the right given by section 15 to such streams as are described in the passage I have quoted, we would go far to defeat the avowed policy of the Legislature. Evidence was offered that in none of the streams in the Province, in their natural state at the date of the passing of this Act, could saw-logs or timber be floated down without improvements curing freshets. But upon the evidence that was given in the case, it is apparent that if section 15 is to be read with the qualification given to it by Boale vs. Dickson, a very large number of the streams of the Province would be excluded from the operation of the Act."

In fact, if the narrow construction which was given to the Act in Boale vs. Dickson were to prevail, the Act would be practically useless, because the streams that were at the time of its passage capable of floating logs without improvements, even during freshets, were few if any. Well, what do we find? We find that the whole Province of Ontario is interested in the passage of this measure, that the public revenues are deeply concerned, that the lumbering interest throughout the Province, which is of enormous importance to all other interests in the Province, was jeopardized by the construction which Mr. McLaren insisted should be put on the law that was never intended to have such a construction. What do we find then? Not that the Ontario Government or Legislature were actuated by partizan motives. We do not discover a trace of partizanship in their proceedings from beginning to end, and the charge made by the hon. member for North Simcoe is an unworthy one to make against a Government and a Legislature. They passed not a measure affecting the Mississippi River alone and not a measure affecting Mr. McLaren alone; but a measure affecting the streams throughout the Province of Ontario, and all the lumbermen in it. We find that they passed a measure which is calculated to conserve and properly conserve the revenues which that Government derives from the timber dues in the Province of Ontario. Is that not an Act formed in the public interest? Is it not an Act which is calculated in every way to do what is right and just in the premises? The hon. gentleman tells us that this Act does not provide any compensation at all; he says that the payment of tolls is not a proper compensation, and that there is no mode—I think he so said—settled by the Act in which these tolls could be collected.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not say so.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Then you left that impression upon my mind. He said: "How is Mr. McLaren to get these tolls?"

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. member allow me to correct him. I said, how could he get these tolls, because they were dependent on the use of the improvements?

Mr. GUTHRIE. Let me call attention to what I consider to be the wise and fair and equitable provisions of this Act, both for the imposition of tolls and for their collection. This Act says: That the party who has made improvements on the river to be used for floating saw-logs and other timber shall be entitled to receive reasonable tolls. It says further, that in fixing those tolls, regard shall be had to—what? The original cost of the construction of the improvements, the amount required to maintain the same, and the interest on the original cost, as well as such other matters as under the circumstances may, to the Governor in Council, seem to be just and equitable. Now, Sir, could any fairer measure of compensation for the particular circumstances of the case be devised? What further do we find? I stated that there is the most complete protection to men in the position of Mr. McLaren for the collection of these tolls. Section 6 says:

"Every person entitled to tolls under this Act shall have a lien upon the saw-logs or other timber passing through or over such stream or improvements for the amount of such tolls, such lien to rank next after the lien, if any, which the Crown has for dues in the respect to such saw-logs and timber, and if such are not paid, any Justice of the Peace having jurisdiction in the locality shall, upon the oath of the owner of the construction or improvements, or of his agent proving that the just tolls had not been paid, shall issue a warrant for the seizure of the logs."

Then power is given to sell them and collect the tolls; then we find still further provision for the better protection of the owners of these improvements; namely:

this, that every person entitled to collect tolls under the Act may make rules and regulations for the purpose of regulating the same, and the orderly transmission of saw-logs, rafts and crafts over the constructions and improvements, these regulations to be approved by the Governor in Council; that is, he may make reasonable regulations, so that his property may be protected, so that it cannot be injured; and so that his own use of the river may not be substantially interfered with. All that the Act requires is that he shall not prevent other people having the fair use of what were always considered in Upper Canada as public highways for the public benefit for the floating of timber and saw-logs. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, these are some of the facts. What do we further learn, Sir? We find that the defendants in this case, the Caldells, allege that Mr. McLaren's improvements did not cost anything like what he said. Further, that they purchased the limits on this river in good faith, believing that they could use the river, and expended an enormous amount of money in acquiring the property in that belief, and that if they were prevented from using the river their property would be comparatively of little value. They also proved that this Mr. McLaren himself was using the public highways for purposes of his own, and that he was exercising rights he had no right to exercise; that he was dependent upon the goodwill of those who owned the property all the way above him for the exercise of his so-called rights; and they say that they were perfectly willing to pay him such damages as a Court of law would award. All they wanted was that he should not take proceedings and ask for an injunction which would absolutely prohibit them from using the river, even if they were willing to make ample compensation for its use. What do we find the Dominion Government did? because this Act of disallowance is, of course, the act of the Government. We find that they accepted the ex parte statements of Mr. McLaren and his counsel with regard to the whole of this matter; that they listened to a tirade—for the petition is hardly anything but a tirade of bitterness—giving his partial statement of the case, concealing and affording no light as to the defence offered by the Caldells, saying nothing as to the motives that actuated the Ontario Legislature in passing this law, and concealing the fact that the public revenues and the interests of the whole people of Ontario were deeply concerned. They lay the case before the Government here entirely from their own point of view; and more strange to say, in a hasty and apparently precipitate manner, without calling either upon Caldwell, who is the other party to the contest—if it is to be treated as a private affair—to give his version of the case or upon the Ontario Government to explain the motives and reasons for this legislation; and acting on the ex parte statement, unsupported by evidence or by proof, of Mr. McLaren, this Government rushed to his aid, at the suggestion of himself, or of his friends, and disallowed a Constitutional Act, and a proper Act, which was passed by the Local Legislature. Now, then, how can such a course as was pursued be justified for a moment in view of the principles so clearly enunciated by the leader of the Dominion Government himself in 1868, and as was shown by my hon. friend from South Huron, invariably followed since that down to the present time. The course then pursued was this; when a Local Act was considered objectionable, and was thought beyond the powers of the Local Legislature, the attention of the Provincial Government was called to the objections, and an opportunity was given them to consider the matter and present their views to the Government here, and to repeal the Act if it was found that it was not within the scope of their authority. My hon. friend from North Simcoe has steered clear, if I may use the phrase, entirely of a large part of the able speech, supported as it was by precedents, of the hon. member for South Huron. We hail from my hon. friend from South Huron not one case, not the Goodhue will case alone, not the New Brunswick School Case alone, but we had instance after instance given of constitutional practices, constitutional interpretations of this veto power, interpretations of the most deliberate character given by the Government of this country in the course of many years from Confederation, and this point was incontrovertibly established that what this Government would regard, and the only thing it would regard, in dealing with the question of disallowance was the competency, the power of the Local Legislature to pass the measure. Now, these show that the fact of interference with private rights did not warrant this Government in departing from that constitutional rule. The fact that the legislation was retroactive did not limit the rule. The fact that there was legislation pending not warrant the Government in limiting the rule. They laid down the broad rule that if the legislation of the Local Parliament was within its powers, and did not affect the Dominion jurisdiction, it should not be interfered with, but should be allowed to take its course. I contend that this constitutional interpretation was put upon the veto power under the British North America Act, not by the Dominion Government alone, but by the Home Government in dealing with the question of disallowing legislation of the Dominion Parliament. An Act was passed herein, I think, 1874 to regulate the construction of marine and electric telegraphs, and that Act was reserved for the consideration of Her Majesty's Imperial Government. Objection had been taken in the Senate here to the constitutionality of the Act, and out of deference to the Senate and possibly to Royal instructions, as it might be considered to interfere with rights and property of subjects of the Queen not residing in Canada, but residing beyond the jurisdiction of this Parliament, it was reserved for Her Majesty's pleasure, although the Government here expressed the conviction that it would be beneficial to Canadian interests. In regard to this Act the fact that it was a measure not assented to by the Governor General, and therefore not law, but reserved without that consent for the consideration of the Home Government, strengthens the argument in favor of the view I have presented, immensely, in my opinion. What became of that Bill? The hon. Secretary of State in England, said, in refusing to interfere:

"It seems to me to be clearly within the competency of the Dominion Government and Parliament to legislate on this subject without any interference on the part of the Government of this country, it being a local question involving no points in respect to which it would appear necessary that Imperial interests should be guarded or the relations with other colonial or foreign countries."

Here the principle is laid down most distinctly, that if the subject of legislation concerns our domestic interests and does not concern Imperial interests, the Home Government will not interfere, even though they are invited to consider it, without the assent of the Government here. Not only in that case, but in the celebrated case of the removal of Lieutenant-Governor Letellier, the views of the Home Government are laid down most emphatically, that it was a matter for ourselves to settle, although the question, apparently, was one of almost Imperial concern, and they refused to interfere when invited to do so. Now, the power of disallowance by the Queen of Dominion legislation corresponds exactly to that possessed by the Government here over Local legislation. The same clause in the British North America Act which confers power upon Her Majesty to disallow Dominion Acts, confers power on the Governor-in-Council to disallow Local Acts; and we can have no better guide as to what should be the fair and constitutional practice in considering the question of disallowance under the British North America Act than to look at the way in which Her Majesty regards it in dealing with

Dominion legislation, or questions of Dominion Executive Government. It is, therefore well settled by constitutional usage and by constitutional practice, both in England as regards Dominion legislation, and in Canada by the Dominion Government with regard to Local legislation, that the rule is that if a Local Legislature does not step beyond its powers, and if its legislation does not affect Imperial interests or legislation, or Dominion interests, as the case may be, its measures are not interfered with by the higher authority under the British North America Act. What does that Act provide? In discussing this matter, it is well to consider the precise language of our great Federal charter, the British North America Act. Section 92 says, in as plain terms as could be employed, that the exclusive power of making laws in regard to this matter and cognate matters is, in the legislatures of our Provinces. We find that, not only have the Local Legislatures exclusive jurisdiction over matters of property and civil rights, but they have most extensive powers in regard to municipal institutions, in regard to education, with certain restrictions in regard to the Administration of Justice, in regard to the management and sale of the public lands of the Province and of the timber growing thereon, and in regard to the management of other important subjects. If the principle contended for here by the Government and its supporters, is correct, there is not an Act of any of our Provincial Legislatures, dealing with any of these subjects, that these hon. gentlemen may not choose to say, for some reason or other, they do not think in the public interest, they do not think is a good law, and, therefore, they may disallow it. If what they have contended for is correct, if this Government can sit in judgment upon the wisdom or policy of Acts passed by the Local Parliaments, then, not merely regarding property and civil rights, but regarding all the classes of subjects, municipal, educational, judicial and others that I have mentioned, this Government may exercise the veto power, and so effectually destroy the independence of the Local Legislatures. Now, Sir, let us see in what spirit the question of disallowance should be approached. In the State paper of the 8th of June, 1868, the right hon. gentleman now at the head of the Government laid down principles that appear to be sound. The question should be approached in a judicial and fair spirit, and ample opportunity should be given to the Local Government concerned to make their explanations and to change their legislation if just exception is taken to it. We find it said in Mr. Todd's book on Parliamentary Government in the Colonies:

"No mere calculations of political expediency, or difference of opinion in regard to the policy of colonial enactments, would suffice to induce the Crown to veto the same, provided only it was within the legislative competency of the colony, and did not seriously affect the interests of other parts of the empire."

And again on page 425, it is said, with regard to interference by the Dominion Government in local concerns:

"But, in the discharge of this duty, in a system so complex and delicate as that of the Canadian Confederation, great caution and forbearance must be observed, so as to avoid the suspicion of party influences, or of a disposition to encroach upon provincial rights of self-government. * * * But, when we note the zealous care which is apparent throughout the British North America Act to define and regulate the exercise of the 'exclusive powers' assigned by that Statute to the Provincial Governments,—whether these powers appertain to the Executive or to the Legislature,—it is manifest that it was the intention of the Imperial Parliament to guard from invasion all rights and powers exclusively conferred upon the Provincial authorities, and to provide that the reserved right of interference therewith by the Dominion Executive or Parliament should not be exercised in the interest of any political party, or so as to impair the principle of local self-government. Prior to Confederation, this principle was earnestly and successfully contended for, as a restraint upon undue interference by the Imperial authorities in matters of local concern. It is no less essential now, when the diverse interests of separate Provinces, heretofore independent of each other, require to be harmoniously combined,—without infringing upon the freedom of any Government within the sphere of its constitutional powers,—so as to ensure unity and co-operation for the common good."

The hon. member for North Simcoe has treated us to some extracts from American Constitutional writers, but those extracts deal with cases where no compensation is provided for. What we say here is, not only is Mr. McLaren not deprived, in the sense of a deprivation to his own exclusion, of this property, but he is not deprived of the use of his improvements. He is at perfect liberty to use them yet. We find that such a compensation as the nature of the case will admit of, ample compensation properly secured, has been provided; so that even if the quotations with which we were favored were applicable to our constitution,—and the hon. gentleman admits they are not, although he thinks they ought to be embodied in it—they are not applicable to the circumstances of the case in hand. What other provision can you make for the use of a bridge or of a highway than that of tolls? What other compensation is made by railway companies exercising running powers over other railways than that of paying tolls for the use? They are not compelled to purchase the road. The Grand Trunk Railway and other roads using the International bridge are not compelled to purchase the bridge, they pay tolls for the use of it, just as this Act provides that tolls shall be paid for the use of this timber highway in the Province of Ontario. I think, therefore, that there are two errors in the hon. gentleman's statement. First of all, he is in error in speaking of this as a deprivation of Mr. McLaren's rights, when it is no such thing. He has the use of the improvements, and all they are good for is to use them in the floating of timber; secondly, it is another error to speak of the compensation as being inadequate or improperly secured. But supposing it were, we say that so far as our Constitution goes and our Constitutional practices are concerned, this law, even if it so affected him is still one that ought not to have been disallowed, because it was within the competence of the Legislature which passed it. This cry about compensation, about interference with private rights, has been heard in the Mother Country during the past year. The Irish landlords have unanimously objected to the Bill passed for the relief of Ireland on the ground that it interfered with private rights, with contracts, that it did not provide proper compensation, and that it injured their position severely. Is that any reason for saying that that Bill should not have received the Queen's assent. It did receive the Queen's assent and is in operation now. The mode of compensation may not suit the parties concerned, but it was felt to be in the public interest that it should be passed, and the representations of Irish Landlords and of men in the position of Mr. McLaren were disregarded. So here it is idle to talk about Mr. McLaren being injured. He could use every one of the improvements affected, and not only so, but he could make money out of the improvements if he had given a reasonable and fair use of them to parties up the same river, who were as much entitled, under the spirit of the old Canadian law, to use the stream as he was himself. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has said there is no distinction between disallowing an Act which has become law by the assent of a Government, and refusing assent to a Bill that has been reserved. In making that statement the hon. gentleman is affected by partizan blindness. There is a wide distinction. A Bill reserved has not the sanction of one branch of the Legislature, it is not an Act at all; it is merely a proposal an incomplete Act and it is merely submitted as something that is suggested as proper to become law, but it has not the character of law. Two things are necessary to make a law under the British Constitution. One is the assent of the Parliament or Legislature, the other is the assent of the Crown; and, in the case of a reserved Bill, the Act has not one of those essentials, it has not the assent of the Crown. It comes before the a higher power for its consideration more in the shape of a submission for the opinion of that power. It does not come before it in the same way as a Bill which has been actually assented to and which, until disallowed, has the character of absolute law, so that a very different rule should govern the consideration of this question as between a Bill submitted for the opinion of a higher authority, not sanctioned by a representative of the Crown—and a Bill which has formally passed into law and has all the character and authority of law. I again call the attention of the House to the fact that we have had, as the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) has plainly established, since 1867, about a dozen cases where Acts have been allowed that invaded private rights which were retro-active in their character and did not meet the approval of the Ministry here, and even where Acts have interfered with pending litigation. We have the practice constitutionally established that the Dominion Government should not interfere with any measure passed by a Provincial Legislature when it is shown to be within its jurisdiction and did not trench on the rights of the Dominion. We have the same constitutional usage or interpretation of the veto power established in connection with the dealings of the Home Government with Dominion legislation and Dominion Executive Acts; and, we have, moreover, the emphatic declaration of the British North America Act, that the exclusive power to legislate on certain branches is reposed in the Local Legislatures. If that be the case, then this interference was of an unconstitutional, harsh and arbitrary character. Let us preserve the independence of the Provinces. It was to obtain the control of her local affairs that Ontario was induced to consent to the measure of Confederation—that she might legislate upon municipal matters, private rights, education and other local matters free from any control by outsiders who did not understand so well as her own people the necessities and circumstances of the country. If we deprive her of the freedom and power to legislate for herself, and declare that her legislation may be interfered with by a Ministry here who may not possess her confidence, who may be sustained in power by the votes of members from other Provinces, then I say farewell to Confederation and farewell to that boon which Confederation promised us, independence and freedom of action in the management of our local affairs.

Mr. HAGGART. I will premise my remarks by offering a few observations in reply to the hon. member for South Huron. He drew a picture of the troubles which had occurred in this country for the last twenty or thirty years, and the efforts made to sustain responsible Governments in this Province, and he told the House if all the efforts had ended in the action taken by the Dominion Government in regard to the disallowance of the Streams Bill what the effect would be on the people of Ontario. The hon. gentleman forgot to tell the House that the principles which have been violated by the passing of the Bill are principles which were bought hundreds of years ago, the right of every individual to the property he is possessed of, and that no Government and exercise of authority by any person who would lead the people to submit to the taking of their property, without granting compensation. What is the history of this measure? There were two parties to a suit; one affirmed that he possesses the certain rights on a river situated near my county, and another party claimed the right to use those privileges. Let me give the House a brief description of the property. The River Mississippi empties into the Ottawa River. For sixty miles up the river at every point where there is a fall the property is owned by individuals and companies before Mr. McLaren's improvements are reached. For at least forty or fifty years those individuals have exercised the right of ownership to those particular parts of the river, and exercised the right of collecting tolls—refusing to allow persons to pass over that portion without receiving compensation. Some of those properties were expropriated by an Act passed in 1857 by the Province of Ontario, which allowed the expropriation of such property for improvements and allowed anyone to use them by paying toll. What was the object of that? It was to prevent any party who became the owner of any improved property to exercise a sole right, and in a cheap manner to allow the public to earn the property. Mr. McLaren and every one who has used the stream for the last forty or fifty years has had to pay toll. It was the law of the land, as decided by the Courts, that where a stream or any portion of it was impassable in spring, summer or autumn freshets, the owner of the banks became the actual possessor of that part of the stream, and if he exercised it contrary to the public interests, it could be taken from him by allowing him compensation. Mr. McLaren, when he commenced operations on the Mississippi, purchased these improvements; when he became proprietor, he exercised sole and only control over the property. As his means admitted he made these improvements further and further up the stream until they reached the present dimensions. In some of these cases he had for years before making these improvements, drawn his logs and timber for 15 or 16 miles past these places, and others the same. Others have taken their logs, &c., by other streams; but he, by purchasing land, by digging canals through his own property, by building slides on his own property, by blasting and dredging, by the expenditure of large sums of money, succeeded in making the stream navigable. In other places where the stream disappeared through crevices or under the rocks, when the land lay over it he built dams and drowned the lands in that particular portion, he purchased the land, and for years, wherever a private owner in that stream owned any particular part of it, he, believing in the interpretation which he puts on the law, and believes to be the correct one, purchased the right of possessing that place. My hon. friend says it is only by this law that he was enabled to pass down the stream, but there was no part of it that was unnavigable in summer, spring or autumn freshets of which he has not purchased or hired the rights by expending large sums of money. He does not depend on any other person, or company or Government for the right of passage down those streams. In some cases he has paid for the passage of his own material for a single year in one of those places $2,000 or $3,000, and for some of the adjoining properties he has paid as much as $11,000. What is the effect of the law framed by the Ontario Legislature? Who are the public contemplated by that law? The fact is there is but one man demanding the use of that stream, and I ask any legal gentleman on the other side of the House if it was right that the public should take an individual's property for the purpose of handing it over to the use of another individual. Was there a single petition signed by any person in favor of the Act? There was not a single man who wished to use that stream but Mr. Caldwell himself. The hon. gentleman says: "But Mr. Caldwell offered compensation." But I tell my hon. friend that dreading litigation for the subject he warned Mr. Caldwell and forbade him using the improvements, and he offered to allow him down for the compensation which Caldwell himself offered if he would acknowledge his proprietary rights over the same. These are the facts of the case. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat talks about compensation in the form of tolls. That hon. gentleman is a legal gentleman, but I would like to ask him or any other lawyer if he knows of a case where he knows of an expropriation of property is made in which the compensation is not in the form of cash down or about the time of taking the property. Did he ever hear of an expropriation being made, and a compensation allowed in an uncertain form years afterwards, and in which a jury or the party himself has nothing to do with defining such compensation? Why, Sir, the parties who took Mr. McLaren's property from him are to give him what compensation they choose. They are to go to the Ontario Legislature and ask what tolls he shall receive, where the rights of eminent domain is exercised. Where property is taken for public uses, it is a well known maxim of national law in every country that a just compensation shall be given, and that the compensation shall be in cash paid at or about the time of expropriation is made, and that the party from whom the property is expropriated shall be a party to say what is a just payment. Well, what does this Bill propose to do? It not only takes his property from him, but it destroys it. Is he to keep up that property ever afterwards for the use of the public, if there is not provision for compensation? Nothing of the kind. But, not only is the property taken from him and dedicated to the public, but there is actually no provision made for the repair of the property. When was this? When Mr. McLaren was before the Courts endeavoring to get a legal status to his case and find out whether the judgment under which he purchased the property and the law under which he held it, was right. The case was tried before one of the Chancellors of the Court of Equity—Mr. Proudfoot, I think—and a decision was given in accordance with the case of Boale vs. Dickson, which judgment was supported by, I believe, nine or ten of the first Judges in Canada. One of these Judges, I believe, was Chief Justice Draper, and another Chief Justice Richards. I do not think any legal gentleman will get up and say that Mr. McLaren had not a reasonable right to believe that he was legally possessed of the property which he was endeavouring to prove his right to before the Courts. The decision of the Court was left unreversed for fourteen or fifteen years. Surely if a person acquires property under decisions which remained unreversed for fourteen or fifteen years, that, if nothing else, should give him a title to the land. Supposing the decisions were wrong, the law remained unrepealed on the Statute-book, and every lumberman knew what the law was; he knew that when he came to a part of a river that was unnavigable during the spring, summer and autumn freshets he had not a right to use that part without the consent of the owner of the property through which it passed. The hon. member for South Huron read a statement made by one of the Judges of the Court of Appeal to the effect that if a party living upon a highway removed some obstruction on the highway in the shape of boulders, he would not have the exclusive use of such highway. No person advanced such an absurd doctrine. But if a road leads up to a man's own private property and he extends that road through his property, and uses it for his own purpose, does he thereby dedicate it to the public and give every man the right to pass through it? Many streams in this district are navigable for thirty or forty miles; and supposing a person digs a canal from one part that is navigable to another part that is navigable, is the public to have the right to use that particular part of the stream?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. HAGGART. No, he has not the right.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Is it right for one man to have the exclusive right of a river?

Mr. HAGGART. It is not the exclusive right of a river; it is the exclusive right of a channel passing through his own property.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. He is using the water.

Mr. HAGGART. He has a perfect right to use the water from his own property, passing through his property. Suppose I dig a channel through my own property from one lake to another, and put stop-logs at each end of the channel, so as only to use the water when I want it, has a person coming along one of those lakes a right to take out those stop-logs, and use the water in my channel in spite of me?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. By paying for it, he has the right.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no such law. Either I am entitled to the absolute ownership of the property or I am not; if I am entitled to the absolute ownership, I am not bound to receive tolls for passage through it. Now, I contend that my friend was the absolute owner of these particular portions of the stream. He did not use the stream to the disadvantage of the public; the public, represented by five individuals, could at any time expropriate those particular portions; there was a form of compensation provided, and they had a right to expropriate them by paying compensation. But this Act of the Ontario Government takes the property absolutely from him, transfers it to the public, and provides no compensation whatever. If there was a form provided in that Act to arrive at the value of the property and the improvements which had been made, and to fix some legal tribunal to assess tolls or damages, there might be some show of equity in it. But there is none whatever. Mr. McLaren's property is given over to another individual for his use for such tolls as he chooses to give him. I think there never was a more unjust piece of legislation in this country. I think the first duty of every Government, after the protection of a man's life, is the protection of his property; and after he went to the Ontario Government and urged his case to the fullest extent in his power, he had the right of every British subject to appeal to the foot of the Throne. But that appeal being prevented by an Act of this Parliament, he came to the representative of Her Majesty at Ottawa, and complained of the injustice which had been done him, and asked for some remedy. Hon. gentlemen say that the rights of Ontario have been infringed. What right has been infringed? The Government of this Dominion are responsible to the people of this country as well as the Local Legislatures. Has the Dominion Government no right of veto at all on any Bill unless it is ultra vires? If I understand the argument of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, he holds the doctrine that no Bill ought to be disallowed unless it is ultra vires or unless it interferes in certain cases with Dominion policy. This Government disallowed this Act, and the Ontario Government have repeated it—and why? For the purpose of enabling Mr. Caldwell, a political friend of theirs, who exercises considerable influence in the riding next to the one I have the honor to represent, to take his timber through the improvements of my friend, who happens to be a supporter of the Dominion Government. I venture to say that if Mr. Caldwell had been a supporter of the Dominion Government they would never have passed that Act.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Suppose the opposite case; suppose Mr. McLaren's politics were different.

Mr. HAGGART. He might not have urged the case as well as Mr. Caldwell did. I think it was a most unjustifiable interference with a man's private rights. The timber of that district would not have been of any use to the Crown, and the Crown would not have received any revenue from it at all if it had not been for Mr. McLaren's improvements on that stream. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down, said that this question affected numerous streams throughout the country. We are all accustomed to such cases in my section of the country; a man who owns property on a stream which is unnavigable for certain portions of the year, owns the stream; there are a great many streams owned by private individuals; a great many streams are owned by the Dominion Government who have improved them, and the Dominion Government have often exercised the right of eminent domain. But there never was such an act perpetrated by any Government as the taking of a man's property from him, giving it to the public, and telling him that he might collect such tolls as the Governor in Council might decide to be just and fair. I congratulate the Government upon the disallowance of this Bill, and I think when the matter is fully explained to the people throughout Ontario, their action will be endorsed, and I will venture to say there are a great many supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite that think that the Government which would take from an individual like Mr. McLaren, property of which he was possessed, without compensation, will remember it of them at the time of voting at the next election. I will venture to say that the people who understand the differences between these individuals in which these differences occurred, have no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion as to who was right and who was wrong, and I will venture to hope, as the Ontario Government has passed this other Bill, that the Dominion Government will find it necessary to advise His Excellency that this Bill shall also be disallowed as soon as possible.

Mr. MACDONELL (Lanark). I can well understand why the Governor in Council disallowed this Act. I think that anybody who understands the history of the celebrated case of McLaren vs. Caldwell must acknowledge that more partizan and more misleading statements could not be made than have been made by the two hon. gentlemen who preceded me on the Government side; and, Sir, when this last hon. gentleman states that the people in the constituency of Lanark, where this stream is situated and where these gentlemen reside, are in favor of the plaintiff in the suit of McLaren vs. Caldwell, and of the disallowance of this Bill by the Government, I can tell that hon. gentleman he is quite mistaken, so far as North Lanark is concerned. I will tell him, Sir, what is more: that I will resign my seat to-morrow if he will do the same, and contest either North or South Lanark on this simple question—if he dare do so.

Mr. HAGGART. You have no chance of being elected again, and you may resign at any time.

Mr. MACDONELL. When you came into my constituency, in 1880, it assisted me by increasing my majority. I will not only defeat him in his own constituency on this question, but any man who may oppose me on it. It is true that Mr. Caldwell resides in my constituency, and is a warm supporter of mine; I must admit that, but I must also state that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) is a strong friend of Mr. McLaren, who is his staunch political supporter, and although my statements may have some degree of partizanship, they are not so much so as those of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. Now, this stream, of which we have all heard so much, has been used for years and years. Mr. McLaren never in all his life refused to anybody the use of the stream except during the last few years; nobody in fact dared to use it; and what was the result of this state of things? It was to lock up a large tract of country, it allowed him to hold all the timber limits in that section and pay what wages he liked to the laborers there, and it allowed him to give to the farmers whatever he wished to give them for their produce. These are the facts, and the reasons which Mr. McLaren desired to prevent Mr. Caldwell from occupying and using this stream was not because he did not wish Mr. Caldwell to reap any benefit from the use of the stream; but the moment Mr. Caldwell or anybody did so, he became a competitor in the way of wages and of payments made for produce in that section, and the result would be that the farmers would obtain a fair price for their labor and produce. And more, what is the result if he could shut up this 250 miles of timber limits? Why, he will compel the people who have timber in that section to sell it for a mere trifle. He has already forced farmers there to sell timber for what he is willing to give for it; and why—because they could not get it down to market as he had the only highway for this purpose. Rather than allow the timber to stand in the woods, they are obliged to sell it to

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. Peter McLaren, of whom we have heard so much this afternoon; and Mr. Caldwell bought these timber limits at a sale at which Mr. McLaren was a competitor. Mr. McLaren would not pay as much for them, and at that moment he shut down this highway, thinking probably that he would thus compel Mr. Caldwell to sell out the limits to him at a reduced figure. These are the simple facts, which probably the House and those who live in distant parts of the Province do not understand; but the people of Lanark understand them thoroughly. The hon. gentleman talks about Mr. McLaren being ruined, if Mr. Caldwell is allowed to use this stream. No one ever heard of such a thing there. The Act referred to makes ample provision for his remuneration. On the lumber interest the people of that section solely depend for a living, and the Government of Ontario derives still half a million yearly from timber dues; consequently it is of vital interest to the Ontario Government the timber limits of this Province should be protected and the timber should be got to market. The people were so interested in the lumber trade in 1849, that an Act was then passed which says that all persons may float saw-logs and other timber and rafts and crafts down all streams during the spring, summer and autumn freshets. No one but Mr. McLaren ever thought that this public Act was other than that which it purports to be; but some years afterwards the case of Boale vs. Dickson arose. My hon. friend on the other side is mistaken in his reference to it. This case arose in my riding; it concerned the Indian River—a small river that was not navigable under any circumstances. Dams were erected by Boale. Dickson owned a limit above. He never disputed that Boale had a right to charge tolls, after he got his timber over the dams and slides, until Boale sued for it and the case was tried at Perth. The question there was whether Dickson had promised to pay these tolls, or not; and this was what the jury decided; but the Judges, when it came up, decided what had never been raised at the trial,—that the Statute gave the right to float saw-logs, etc., down only such streams as in their natural state will, without improvements during freshets, permit saw-logs, &c., to be floated down. This was the interpretation of the Statute by the Judges in term. The present Chief Justice in Appeal, said it was not construction, but it was legislation. Everybody till then thought that the law was different, and that they had the power to float timber down all streams. I will quote a letter of Mr. De Blaquère who was a member of the Legislature when the Bill was passed in 1849, to show what was the intention of the Legislature in passing this Bill. It is as follows:—

"As the Act of 12 Vic., cap. 87, was originated and framed by me, and introduced at my instance by the late Hon. Henry John Boulton, I am able to say that the construction put upon it by Chief Justice Spragge, in his judgment, McLaren vs. Caldwell, is in strict accordance with its true intent. I will not trouble you with the detail of what led to its enactment. I will say, however, that it had no reference to any Act then in force, but was intended to convey a mere right, viz.: to allow logs, timber and lumber to be rafted down all streams, large and small, in Upper Canada during the spring, summer and autumn freshets whether improvements were or were not required, whether or not the streams were floatable at such times, and whether the lands over which they ran were held in fee simple or not. It was held that no man should be allowed to render valueless, timber, the property of others, on streams above him."

That is the opinion of the originator of this Bill, but by the decision in the case of Boale vs. Dickson the Judges put a contrary construction on that Act. We can only gather what a law is very often from cases. I know that laws are often passed which have a contrary effect to that which it was intended they should, and it is the duty of the Legislature of Canada to re-enact any Act that has not had a proper construction put upon it by the Court. It was through the case of Boale vs. Dickson found out that this Act of 1849 had a wrong construction put upon it, and it was the duty of the Ontario Government to step in and declare what the Act of 1849 was. The Act that the Ontario Government passed was not a new law, it was not an Act in the true sense of the world; it was simply declaratory of what the old law was and had no reference, one way or the other, to the case of McLaren against Caldwell. The Act which was passed by the Ontario Government and is now disallowed, gives the right to all persons to float timber down streams and provides for tolls. The hon. member for South Lanark apparently has overlooked that clause of the section which reads:

"That the Government shall also have the power of stating the amount required to maintain those improvements."

So far as the Ontario Act is concerned, it makes ample provision for cases such as that of McLaren vs. Caldwell. Hon. members who have just spoken seem to think that the Ontario Act was passed simply with reference to McLaren vs. Caldwell. It was nothing of the kind. As stated by the hon. members who spoke on this side of the House, there are hundreds of streams in Ontario to which this Act applies, and if it were not passed men who owned land on the mouths of streams could erect improvements there, and thereby close hundreds of streams in the Province of Ontario, and shut up large tracts of timber. Nobody ever dreamt of such a thing—none ever knew they had that power except McLaren; and he is the only one, in my recollection, that ever refused lumbermen to send their timber through timber slides. If it was known, if this power existed, there might probably be hundreds of men such as Peter McLaren who would close up mouths of rivers and large tracts of timber limits. The hon. member has said also that Mr. McLaren agreed to allow Mr. Caldwell to use these improvements. For the information of this House, I will read a letter from Mr. Caldwell to Mr. McLaren:

"LANARK, 5th April, 1880.

"PETER McLAREN Esq., Perth.

"DEAR SIR,—We have some saw-logs on the Mississippi River and above your improvements. We write to ask what will be your lowest charge as slidge per piece, or rate per year, for coming through these improvements. Are willing to pay you a fair and reasonable price.

"Please answer at your very earliest convenience.

"Your truly,

"B. CALDWELL & SON."

To this Mr. McLaren sent the following answer:—

"PERTH, 12th April, 1880.

"Messrs. B. CALDWELL & SON, Lanark.

"DEAR SIRS,—I am in receipt of your favor of the 5th instant, asking what would be my lowest charge for slidge per piece or rate per year, for permitting logs to go through my improvements on the Mississippi River.

"I have to remind you that in the summer of 1878, I permitted you to take your logs through the slide I have made or acquired on the river, but you failed to pay for the privilege you enjoyed for the logs you took down by means of my improvements. I have further to remind you, that last year, in violation of my proprietary rights, and after the men whom I had employed in guarding my property had (assuming that you would not attempt to take your timber down on the Sabbath day) gone to their homes, you, by force and violence, drove your timber over my slide at High Falls.

"Having regard to these circumstances, and to the large amount of capital that I have invested in the improvements on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, without which they were neither navigable nor floatable, and to the difficulty experienced in purchasing expensive lots for the use of the improvements, I have determined that for the future I shall not permit you or any person to avail yourselves of the facilities for the transportation of timber which I have been at such pains and expense to create.

"I therefore must decline to fix any charge or rate, or to allow you to use my slides.

"I may add, that should you attempt, after this notice, to go through my improvements on the river and its tributaries, that I shall take immediate steps to have you enjoined from trespassing on my property.

"Yours truly,

"PETER McLAREN."

Here there is a fair offer from one man to another asking for the use of his improvements.

Mr. HAGGART. Read the subsequent correspondence.

Mr. MACDONELL. I will refer to that in a moment. There is the offer from one man to use the other's improvements and the decided refusal of the other. But Mr. McLaren subsequently writes a letter in which he says: "If you acknowledge my right, I will allow you." What is the meaning of that acknowledgment? Once the right was acknowledged, the next year Mr. McLaren would say: "You have acknowledged my rights and I will not allow you hereafter to use the improvements." That is the reason. There is no sane man who will not understand why Peter McLaren wanted Caldwell to acknowledge his right. Why, the moment he filed his Bill in Chancery, Caldwell's mouth would be closed, and that was the trap that Peter McLaren, through his agent and legal adviser, set for Caldwell. The hon. gentleman may laugh, but the people of Lanark who know McLaren understand. I can well understand why hon. gentlemen support the interest of Mr. McLaren to such an extent. The people who know all these facts will hardly credit their statements. Why did not these hon. gentlemen tell us of the large amount of property that Mr. Caldwell had on this river? Why did they not tell us of the thousands of dollars' worth of timber now in these streams belonging to Mr. Caldwell that cannot be floated down to market? Why did they not tell us that by this Act being disallowed a great quantity of timber could not be got to market? Did they tell us that the people of Ontario would be defrauded of the dues to which they are justly entitled by the disallowance of this Act? No, they did not. Did the hon. member for South Lanark tell us that his own constituents at Carleton Place were deprived of their summer's wages by the disallowance of this Act? Did he tell us that Mr. Caldwell's mills at Carleton Place were closed on account of the disallowance of this Act? No, he did not tell us that. He did not tell us that thousands of dollars of the people of Lanark were wasted by the disallowance of this Act. But the people of this country understand why he did not tell these things. Now, Sir, there are one or two reasons why hon. gentlemen say that this Act should be disallowed. One of them is that it interferes with the rights of private individuals, and another is that it is retroactive in its effect. Now, let us see how far these arguments are good. It may be well to refer to the First Minister's declaration on that point. Everybody admits that the Governor General in Council has power to disallow any Act of the Provincial Legislature, but the justice of disallowance in all cases is quite another thing. When the people of Canada entered into Confederation, the present First Minister gave them to understand, in the Quebec resolutions, that they were to have exclusive power over civil rights and property. Again, the First Minister, in June, 1868, stated as follows:—

"The undersigned begs to submit, for the consideration of Your Excellency, that it is expedient to settle the course to be pursued with respect to the Acts passed by Provincial Legislatures. The same powers of disallowance as have always belonged to the Imperial Government, with respect to the Acts passed by Colonial Legislatures, have been conferred by the Union Act on the Government of Canada. Of late years, Her Majesty's Government has not, as a general rule, interfered with the legislation of Colonies having representatives, institutions and responsible Government, except in the cases specially mentioned in the instructions to the Governors, or in matters of Imperial and not merely local interest. Under the present constitution of Canada, the General Government will be called upon to consider the propriety of allowance or disallowance of Provincial Acts much more frequently than Her Majesty's Government has been with respect to colonial enactments. In deciding whether any Act of a Provincial Legislature should be disallowed or sanctioned, the Government must not only consider whether it affects the interest of the whole Dominion or not, but also, whether it be unconstitutional; whether it exceeds the jurisdiction conferred on Local Legislatures, and, in cases where the jurisdiction is concurrent, whether it clashes with the legislation of the General Parliament.

"As it is of importance that the course of Local legislation should be interfered with as little as possible, and the power of disallowance exercised with great caution and only in cases where the law and general interests of the Dominion imperatively demand it, the undersigned recommends that the following course be pursued;

"That on the receipt by Your Excellency, of the Acts passed in any Provinces, they be referred to the Minister of Justice for report, and that he, with all convenient speed, do report as to those Acts which he considers free from objection of any kind, and if such report be approved by Your Excellency in Council, that such approval be forthwith communicated to the Provincial Government.

"That he make a separate report, or separate reports, on those Acts which he may consider:

"1. As being altogether illegal or unconstitutional.

"2. As illegal or unconstitutional in part.

"3. In cases of concurrent jurisdiction as clashing with the legislation of the General Parliament.

"As affecting the interest of the Dominion generally. And that in such report or reports he gives his reasons for his opinions.

"That where a measure is considered partially defective, or where objectionable as being prejudicial to the general interests of the Dominion or as clashing with its legislation, communication should be had with the Provincial Government with respect to such a measure; and that in such case, the Act should not be disallowed, if the general interests permit such a course, until the Local Government has an opportunity of considering and discussing the objections taken, and the Local Legislature has also an opportunity of remedying the defects found to exist."

That is the opinion of the First Minister, and I think it is correct in every respect. Now, Sir, as to the assertion that it is retroactive, there is hardly a Session of the Ontario Legislature, even of this Parliament, which does not pass Acts with a retroactive effect. Why, this very man, Mr. Peter McLaren, had an Act passed at his own instance that was retroactive—not only retroactive but it interfered with a judgment of a Court of law where he himself was defendant. I refer to the Act 34 Vic., cap. 19, relating to the Government road allowances and granting timber licenses therefor. Before this Act was passed the municipalities owned the road allowances and the timber thereon. Mr. McLaren had a timber license from the Ontario Government under which he cut timber on the road allowances, and an action was brought against him for the recovery of the value of the timber so cut. The Court held that although the Ontario Government granted the licenses, and that it had power over the Crown timber growing on the road allowances, the timber belonged to the municipality. Mr. Sandfield Macdonald was then in power. Mr. McLaren went to the Ontario Government and got this Act passed, which states:

"Every Government road allowance included in any Crown timber license, heretofore granted, or which may hereafter be granted, under section 1 of chapter 23 of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, shall be deemed and taken to be, and to have been ungranted lands of the Crown, within the meaning of that section, and liable as such as to be included in such license."

Then it goes on and gives him power to cut timber, and even gives him the timber that he had already cut. If anybody could object less to legislation that is retroactive in its effect, it is this same Peter McLaren. Did we hear him or any of his Tory friends coming to this Legislature and asking this Government to disallow it? No. And what is more, when this Act came up; when the municipalities were defrauded of their timber; when their property was taken from them which they had recovered in action at law, they petitioned the First Minister (Sir John A. Macdonald) to disallow this Act. And did he disallow it? No, because they had not the warm supporters, they had not the agents in this House that Mr. McLaren has. What, then, did the First Minister do? He said: "No, I will not disallow this because it is in the competency of the Local Legislature." Did it give compensation to these municipalities?

Mr. HAGGART. Yes.

Mr. MACDONELL. No. Here is the Act. The first clause certainly does not. The second clause says:

"The licensee or nominee named in any such license shall be deemed and taken to have, and to have had, all the rights in respect to every such road allowance, and the trees, timber and lumber thereon, or cut thereon, as by the second section of said chapter twenty-three, were or are conferred upon him in respect of any other Crown lands embraced in such license, and the trees, timber and lumber thereon, or cut thereon, except that he shall not be entitled to take or keep exclusive possession of any such road allowance."

Mr. MACDONELL (Lanark).

The third clause says:

"No by-law passed, or to be passed by any municipal council, for preserving, selling, or otherwise appropriating or disposing of the timber or trees, or any part thereof, on any Government road allowances included in any such license, shall be deemed, or taken to have had, or have any force or effect against any such license."

The fourth clause says:

"In case the council of any township, organized as a separate municipality, or the council of any united townships, have passed, or shall thereafter pass, any by-law for preserving or selling the timber or trees on the Government road allowances within such township, or within the senior township of said united townships, and included in any such license, the corporation of such township or united townships shall be entitled to be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of this Province, a sum equal to two per centum of the dues received by Her Majesty for, or in respect of, the timber and saw-logs which, during the existence of such by-law, were cut within the said township or within such senior township, under the authority of such license; but no corporation shall be entitled to such percentage of the dues received for timber or saw-logs, cut during the times or seasons when any timber or trees on any such road allowances were cut or removed, for which cutting or removal such corporation shall, before the passing of this Act, have obtained a verdict against any such licensee or nominee."

Mr. HAGGART. The timber in the whole county was to go to the Government, and the proportion was 2 to 100, and they got 2 per cent.

Mr. MACDONELL. They owned the lumber and they were allowed 2 per cent., and only in certain townships; it did not refer to all townships. There are townships in my riding which were deprived of that timber and never received anything. Does the hon. gentleman say that this Act compensates all.

Mr. HAGGART. I say it does.

Mr. MACDONELL. Do the dues represent the value of the timber?

Mr. HAGGART. They represent the actual value received for the timber by the Government.

Mr. MACDONELL. But who owned the timber before this Act was passed?

Mr. HAGGART. Timber licenses were described by limits and bounds and covered all road allowances in the townships. Upon the trial of the case an order was made to pay a certain amount for timber cut, which was paid to the municipalities, which the municipalities held, but which the Government refunded to the licensees; and the Government, in view of the townships owning the particular timber on the road allowances, calculated what proportion the roads would be of the whole township, and they gave the proportion which they received for the timber to the municipalities.

Mr. MACDONELL. Now, we have got this: that they gave 2 per cent. of the dues because the townships owned this timber absolutely. But how could they have recovered judgment unless they only had a title to the timber on the road allowances; they must have had some better title before the Judge gave a verdict for the full value of the timber. That is one case which Mr. McLaren should not complain of with respect to legislation with a retroactive effect. There is another case, and I will only refer to those two cases to show that the First Minister has turned his back on his first record. The second is the Goodhue will case. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) endeavored to prove that the First Minister had made a mistake in the Goodhue case; but it would have been better for the people of Ontario if the hon. gentleman had followed his course in the Goodhue case. In that case the Ontario Legislature altered a man's will. A man named Goodhue, of London, left a will, devising his estate to his children and afterwards to his grandchildren. The grandchildren consented to an agreement to have the property divided, and in order to do that, an Act of the Ontario Legislature was required, and that Legislature, under Mr. Sandfield Macdonald, passed an Act confirming the agreement without the consent of the trustees. The First Minister's attention was called to this glaring act; but he stated the Government would not disallow the Bill because it was within the competency of the Legislature. Those are the only two Bills to which I refer as diametrically contrary to the precedent laid down for the disallowance of the Streams Bill, and it is well that the people should know that, according to the hon. member for Simcoe, the First Minister made a mistake in not disallowing the Goodhue Bill. The question of disallowance, I think, should not be considered as a local one, although the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) is more deeply interested than the members of the Provinces. When you find a Province as intelligent as the Province of Ontario sending representatives to Toronto to enact laws that are to govern the people, only to find those Acts disallowed by this Government, it is time the people should know what Acts are to be allowed and what Acts disallowed. If the Local Legislatures are to exist, if the Confederation is to be what it was intended to, then I tell those hon. gentlemen on the other side that they must not interfere with the legislation of the Provinces as they have done in the case under consideration. The people of Ontario are too intelligent to allow their rights to be trampled upon in that way. Yesterday, part of their Province was taken away, to-day their powers are restricted by this Government, and if this is to go on the people will ask if it is worth their while to send representatives to Toronto and expend large sums of money in their Legislature if their Acts are to be disallowed on the mere whim of a political supporter of the Dominion Government. Is the validity of their Acts to be governed by the fact of whether they are Reform or Conservative? If these are the principles upon which their legislation is to be allowed or disallowed, I think the people of the Province of Ontario at the first opportunity will decide that their Acts shall not be disallowed, as in this case of the Streams Bill, and place in power men who will guard over their interests and rights.

Mr. BRÉCKEN. It is not my intention to occupy the attention of the House for many minutes. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Macdonell) that this is not a legal question, although the Bill which has brought the matter before the House is of a legal nature. I feel the force of a remark made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that the smaller the Province the more likely is it to suffer from any tyrannical use of this power of veto on the part of the Dominion Government, and I feel, as a representative of the smallest Province of the Dominion, that it would not be out of place for me to make a few remarks on this subject. I am not going into the merits or demerits of this Streams Bill. They have been discussed on both sides with great ability, and the case has been presented with a special clearness by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I think, from all the information I have been able to gather, it is quite clear that the law is that in streams which are not floatable for logs at all seasons of the year private rights may exist. The fact does not seem to be controverted that Mr. McLaren had private rights and had expended a large sum of money for the purpose of rendering the river serviceable for the branch of trade in which he was engaged. It seemed to me that the question resolved itself into this: Had Mr. McLaren private rights, and if he had not, where was the necessity of asking the Legislature of Ontario to legislate on the subject? Public highways are public property, and with regard to them the Government is the trustee of the people. They are to preserve the rights of the people, and if the Mississippi was such a highway there could be no necessity for going to the Legislature of Ontario for legislation, and the very fact that he went to that Province for legislation stands against his case. Why did he go there if the Constitution and common law had given him the rights which he asked? If there were no private rights vested in Mr. McLaren, why do they complain of injury done to Mr. Caldwell or the public. But it was not on that particular point that I rose to speak. When I had the honor of filling the position of Attorney-General in the Legislature of my native Province we had an example of the power of veto exercised by the Dominion Government some years ago. As the matter is one of considerable importance as a precedent in the present case, hon. members will pardon me if I enter into it somewhat fully. After years of agitation in the Island on the celebrated land question a Bill was introduced by myself in 1874 for the purpose of expropriating the lands then held by proprietors over an area of 500 acres. Certain machinery was provided, and among other things a court of arbitration; but here is the point to which I wish you to refer. That Act was passed, I believe, by the unanimous vote of both branches of the Legislature, and I believe it was heartily endorsed by every man, woman and child in Prince Edward Island. I believe that I drew up the reasons for the passing of the Act, and it is true that the Lieutenant-Governor withheld his assent to that measure, not that he disapproved of the Act, not that he had conscientious scruples about the Bill becoming law, not that he was not as fully impressed as any member of his Government or any member of his Legislature, or any suffering tenant on the Island, that the Act should become law; but simply on the ground that the Act interfered with the rights of private property, simply because there was an expropriation, because it was an unusual Act or one in which the exercise of unusual powers were asked for. He considered it of such vital importance that it was submitted to the consideration of the Governor General in Council. I venture to say that if you look to the correspondence that emanated from the Lieutenant-Governor of the Island, you will not find one word or syllable disparaging to that Act. On the contrary, the hope breathing throughout the whole correspondence is that His Excellency will see the propriety of the Act becoming law. What was the effect? Under the Administration of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), his Minister of Justice (Mr. Fournier) withheld the consent of the Government, and the Bill was vetoed. The point, I believe, was raised by the leader of the Opposition to-night, that there was a difference between the case in which the Lieutenant-Governor reserved his assent and one in which such assent was given. Now, the case to which I have referred is a striking instance in point. There was an Act which everybody wished passed, and it was simply on account of the importance of the Act that the Lieutenant-Governor preferred sending it up to the Governor General; and yet the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), who appears in the estimation of his followers to be incapable of doing any wrong, incapable of trampling on the constitutional rights of the Province, ignored that Bill to the sore disappointment of ninety-nine men out of every hundred in the Province of Prince Edward Island. I would ask, in the interests of Constitutional Government, in the cause of Liberalism—which my hon. friends on the other side profess to favor and condemn us for opposing—if any hon. gentleman will point out the difference between the Governor General vetoing an Act, assent to which has been refused by a Lieutenant-Governor, and the veto of an Act to which the Lieutenant-Governor has not assented. In our case both parties made common cause and the Act was passed by both branches of the Legislature. Let my hon. friends pursue that argument a little further. What is a Lieutenant-Governor of a Province since Confederation? He is the nominee of the Dominion Government. He may be as unpopular a chief magistrate as Andrew Johnson was when he scarcely escaped impeachment; and yet, forsooth, my hon. friends say: "You do not interfere with popular rights; you do not check popular aspirations because the nominee of the Dominion Government has put his imprimatur on the Act." When this Act came back I introduced it a second year. And if it was a crime in this Government to withhold their assent to this Act because it interfered with private rights, it was ten times a greater crime, ten times a more serious encroachment upon popular rights and upon the independence of a Province, for the Liberal Government under the leadership and direction of the hon. member for Lambton, to disallow an Act which the people of the Province had demanded with one voice, but to listen to the protests of a few absentee proprietors, whose voices appeared to have more weight with the former Governor-General than the unanimous voice of the people of Prince Edward Island. Under the first Act one arbitrator was to be chosen by the Local Government, another by the proprietor, and the third by two arbitrators. That was considered an unfair way to constitute the court, and we provided that the Local Government should appoint one arbitrator, the proprietor one, and the Dominion Government the third; and I must make this acknowledgment, that it was a very happy suggestion that the Dominion Government should appoint one of the arbitrators. Lord Dufferin appointed no less a man than the Hon. Mr. Childers, and I have no doubt that to his ability and the way in which he presided over that court, was to be attributed largely the happy result arrived at. The interests of the country were greatly concerned in those awards, and we introduced an Act to amend the old Act to confirm the awards, and omitted from the operation of the Act a case of Miss Sullivan's, which was then pending—an appeal to the Supreme Court. You will find, on looking at the papers, that the Lieutenant-Governor withheld his assent again. Our Lieutenant-Governor at that time was a very conscientious and extremely cautious man, and never was guilty of assuming too much responsibility; and yet he strongly recommended this Act for confirming these awards. That Act was also passed by the unanimous voice of the Legislature. I think the Minister of Justice at that time was the Hon. Mr. Scott, who was acting for the present leader of the Opposition, and the assent of the Government was withheld. I will not delay the House any longer. If I understand the principle embodied in the amendment, and the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is not that it does not come within the terms of the British North America Act, but that it is contrary to the spirit of the constitution of the Dominion, that the Dominion Government should disallow any Bill unless it is ultra vires or interferes with the general interests of Canada. Now, I would ask in the name of consistency why these two important measures to which I have alluded were disallowed, when there was not a foot of land outside of Prince Edward Island that could possibly be affected by them. The hon. gentleman who last spoke gave a timely warning that every Province should beware, as none knew how soon their legislation would be attacked, as that of the Province of Ontario had been. Yes, Prince Edward Island felt that when these Acts were vetoed. The case was one of such importance that when we entered this Confederation the Dominion Government appropriated $800,000 to enable us to attain the position that the sons of the Emerald Isle are now declaring for. Liberal as that measure was, wise as it was to remove absentee landlordism from the free soil of America, be it remembered that the tax placed on progress, liberty and reform, was placed on them by a Government which called itself liberal and the friends of the people.

Mr. WELDON. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down that this question affected not only the Province of Ontario, but the autonomy of the different Provinces of this Confederation. I also hold that while this Parliament should preserve the powers given to it by the

Mr. BRECKEN,

British North America Act, the powers of the Local Parliaments should be equally preserved. The Acts of which my hon. friend has just spoken were Acts affecting the whole of Prince Edward Island. These rights, which are assured to the Legislatures by the British North America Act, should be preserved intact. The Dominion Parliament should exercise the powers given to it; and the powers granted to the Local Legislatures should be equally preserved. The Acts of which my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island has just spoken affected the whole Island; and it was because the proprietary rights of the Crown were interfered with that the Imperial Government interfered, and this was the legitimate ground upon which the Imperial Government has interfered with Local legislation. I claim that the cases which the hon. member from Prince Edward Island has placed before the House are not at all analogous to this question which affects Ontario as a whole. Objection is taken to this Bill, because, forsooth, the private rights of an individual are interfered with; but, Mr. Speaker, no law can be passed by any Parliament without more or less affecting the rights of individuals; and I take it, as a principle in either Local or Dominion legislation, that the question of private rights shall not interfere with the public good. So far as these questions are concerned, we have nothing to do with them. My hon. friend from North Simcoe gave a pretty strong statement of the facts of the case, but with these I do not intend to deal. Standing here as a member of the Dominion Parliament, I take it that we have nothing to do with the merits of the case between McLaren and Caldwell. We have only to deal with the principles of polity, which should actuate the Government of the Dominion with regard to Local legislation. By the British North America Act, certain powers are granted to the Local Legislatures. Within these limits, their powers are just as paramount as are the powers which are granted to this Parliament; and in dealing with Local legislation the principles which were laid down by the Premier in the memorandum of June, 1868, should be observed. A great deal has been said on this case, in defence of private rights; but we, sitting here, have to deal with an Act of the Legislature of Ontario. This is a general Act for the regulation of streams in Ontario, and whether it is retroactive or retrospective, the fact is immaterial so long as it comes within the jurisdiction of the Local Parliament. My hon. friend from North Simcoe urges very strongly that this Act interferes with private rights, and that it is unheard-of legislation; but we can refer to many cases where Parliament has stepped in and interfered seriously with private rights, even when actions are brought before the Courts. Many years ago, there was a contest between the House of Commons and the Court of Queen's Bench. A man who felt himself aggrieved by a publication endorsed by the House of Commons brought an action of libel against the publisher. The Court justified the action; and on the 4th of April, 1840, the Parliament of Great Britain passed a law which stayed the proceedings. It was felt to be for the general and the public good that the Act should be retroactive and retrospective, and that the proceedings should be stayed. So it is in every case: private rights must be interfered with more or less in legislation. As far as I understand the question, in this case compensation was given in the shape of tolls, and it seems to me that any stream on the borders of which lie public lands from which the Government derive a revenue, is clearly under the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature when any individual seeks, as in this instance, to close its navigation, and thus practically destroy the property from which the Government obtains a revenue. Property and civil rights are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature. No doubt, the arguments of my hon. friends from North Simcoe and South Lanark could be fairly addressed to the Local Legislature of Ontario, but it is not for us to pass on the merits of the case. We have the right to assume that the Legislature of Ontario fully weighed the whole matter, and that so far as the interests of Ontario are concerned, it was for the preservation of public rights and the administration of public justice, that this law should be passed. If it interfered with the rights of the Dominion, or the interests of this Government, or destroyed any principle which is laid down in the Premier's memorandum of June, 1868, it would be a different matter; and this memorandum I take it, has been the basis upon which the right to refuse assent to Acts which Local Legislatures have passed, has been based, and it has been followed not only by the Ministry of which the right hon. gentleman is the head, but also by the Government of which the hon. member for Lambton was Premier. But it does not appear that such is the case. So far as private rights are concerned, no more flagrant violation of the rights of individuals could have occurred, than happened in the case of a Bill which was passed by the Local Legislature of New Brunswick. I was counsel in the case. The will of an individual was under discussion; a decision had been obtained from the Court of Equity, and I was appealing to the Supreme Court, when without notice to the parties, by a suspension of the rules in both Houses, a Bill was passed and assented to, dividing the property in question. We applied to this Government, setting forth the facts; but acting upon the principles laid down by the Premier in that memorandum, this Government declined to interfere because it was a matter within the province of the Local Legislature. So far as the cases I have cited in which I was refused the petition for disallowance, the petition was refused to a strong supporter of the Government, my political opinions being of no avail against the principles of the predecessors of the Government I support. So far as the question of McLaren vs. Caldwell is concerned, we have nothing to do with that. The Local Legislatures were to deal with property and civil rights, and that is the tribunal with which Messrs. McLaren and Caldwell have to deal. So far as legislation is concerned, if the Legislature of Ontario transcend the powers given to them in the Act, the Courts of Ontario have the right to declare their action ultra vires and protect the rights of Mr. McLaren; but if the Ontario Legislature, in its wisdom, pass this law in the interest of Ontario, and it infringes any of the interests of that Canada which affect solely the interests of that Province, its disallowance is not an Ontario question, but a question affecting every Province of the Dominion by which the autonomy of each Province is affected.

Mr. McDUGALL. I think it is very much to be regretted that a question of such grave interest and constitutional importance as has been raised by the amendment put in your hands, Mr. Speaker, should be discussed as an amendment to go into Committee of Supply. It is, of course, the right of hon. gentlemen who wish to bring a proposition of a general character before Parliament to avail themselves of this opportunity, but the difficulty in which the question is placed thereby is that it is made to assume the character of a vote of want of confidence in the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. As in the motion of the hon. member for Niagara.

Mr. McDUGALL. But it happened that that proposition was not moved with that intention and was not received by the House as having that effect, so that I think the difficulty was overcome in that case. I do not object to the Opposition making use of this opportunity, to place their views with regard to public policy before the country, but I merely point out that they place a large number of members in this House, who have not yet made up their minds, whatever they may do in the future, to express by a solemn vote of Parliament a want of confidence in the general policy of hon. gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches, under the necessity of refusing to affirm in a particular case, a proposition which they may be ready to affirm, because the vote they give will have a different meaning from what they intend it should have. With regard to this particular question, I think it is unfortunate that a question of the power of Local Legislatures to pass laws, and of the power of the Dominion Government to disallow laws, should be involved with the private rights of individuals, as they are in this particular case, and especially in a case which was under the consideration of the Courts at the time this law was passed. The propositions which the hon. gentleman has placed in your hands are such as I, for one, cannot affirm or approve of, because I do not find them in the Constitutional Act. Part of the argument on that side to-night has gone this far. Hon. gentlemen appear to be of opinion that it is improper for the Governor in Council, acting for the whole Dominion, to disallow any Local Act that is not ultra vires. What would be the use in that case of the power of disallowance, since the Courts would disallow any Acts that were ultra vires? It is clear that the provision in the Constitution is intended to apply to cases which would not be held by the Courts to be ultra vires, but the propositions contained in this resolution go so far, argumentatively, at all events, that no question which is within the competency of the Local Legislatures, and in which the Local Legislatures have exercised their legislative authority, and which is not ultra vires, is within the power of the Governor in Council to disallow, and that to disallow such an Act would be an infringement on Provincial rights. I might for a moment ask the attention of the House to the consequences which would follow such a proposition as that being affirmed by a vote of the House. I will put one case which arose in a conversation which I had with some English gentlemen. It was with reference to the character and safety of investments in municipal bonds. We all know that a few years ago State bonds of the United States were not found to be a safe investment, because the State passed laws, as they had a right to do under their Constitution, by which their debts were practically wiped out and their foreign creditors, the holders of the bonds, robbed of their money. I was asked—what is there to prevent your Provincial Legislatures from passing laws by which the advantages that investors in your municipal securities now have in the machinery by which they can levy on the property of every taxpayer in the country, may be taken from them? What is there to prevent a Local Legislature, in cases where public feeling has been excited, as was shown by the hon. member for Queens, P.E.I., in the case of the Bill passed by the Legislature of that Province and properly disallowed by the Dominion Government, passing a law that would deprive investors of their rights and security? I said there was the power of disallowance by the Governor in Council; that in this new Dominion we had, at the time, and probably would have for many years to come an English nobleman as Governor General, and it would be open for them to lay their case before him and they might be satisfied that in a case of such gross injustice, the Act would be disallowed. That answer was sufficient to the Englishman. He said: "If that is the way your Constitution works, I can see very clearly that any change in the law of a Province by which foreign creditors would be deprived of their legal remedies and property is not likely to be made. I have no doubt, on petition to the Governor General, their legislation would be disallowed." The particular case of disallowance present under discussion, is perhaps a weak one. It involves, as it appears, only a question between two individuals. I feel fully the force of the argument that has been used by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that where there is a practical confiscation and interference with the rights of parties which would leave them without remedy, it is quite within the power—and if justice requires it, it is the duty—of the Governor in Council of this Dominion to protect parties against such injustice, and public opinion will sustain them when they do it. Now, Sir, this resolution proposes to declare that hereafter it shall be deemed contrary to the principles of the Constitution; they say it destroys the autonomy of the Provinces; if the power be exercised of disallowing laws that have been passed referring to the subjects that are pointed out in the 92nd section of the British North America Act. Sir, I can affirm no such doctrine as that. I agree that any interference with the powers which are given to the Local Legislatures for the framing of laws, unnecessarily, through political feelings, or national, religious or other motive, except on the broadest public grounds, would be injudicious and improper, and this is the tribunal to which hon. gentlemen who advise action of this kind, are responsible. Indeed, the resolution itself points that out, that the Ministry are responsible to Parliament. It is the people of this great Dominion, the representatives of all the Provinces assembled here, whose duty it will be to protect the people in any particular Province from any injustice or improper Act of the Administration of the day; and I think the people have ample protection in this great tribunal, representing, as I said, all the Provinces, sending, presumably, its principal men—if the people do not send their principal men then they are answerable for the consequences of their negligence—but we must assume that Parliament represents all the Provinces of the country, and the very fact that it is composed of the representatives of the different Provinces who have different local systems and who must always be jealous of their Provincial rights, entitles the people to leave in the hands of the Administration of the day, the ultimate authority over these questions, whether it be composed of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House or on this side of the House. We have seen in the cases cited that when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power they felt that duty to be imposed upon them, and I believe they exercised that power judiciously, so far as I have seen. In one particular case referred to to-night I felt that my hon. friend's argument was a little inappropriate. I apprehend he felt it was an improper interference in that case on the part of the Government in refusing its sanction.

Mr. BRECKEN. I expressed no opinion.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I inferred, when he said that 99 men out of every 100 were not in accord with the decision of the Government, that he felt it was an interference with Provincial rights.

Mr. BRECKEN. I said an interference of political influence. As to the constitutional right I think it was quite proper.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I did not hear my hon. friend say that the people of Prince Edward Island threatened rebellion.

Mr. BRECKEN. We are too loyal for that.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I have not heard that they were so resentful against the Government because it interfered, even against this great majority, and protected the rights of parties who were living beyond the jurisdiction of the Province. I have not heard that the people there were disposed to revolt against the Dominion because the Government exercised their power in that particular case; and I do not think the people of Ontario will sympathise with the cry that this case, paltry in itself, is a proper occasion for laying down these general principles of restriction, for making a new constitution in fact; or, for putting a limitation upon it by a resolution of this Parliament, because Mr. Caldwell and Mr. McLaren have had some difficulty about their streams. I do not think we are yet properly informed upon this subject; but I do protest against the invitation to lay down such propositions and such rules as are contained in the resolution placed in the Speaker's hands in regard to the duty of the Dominion Government in dealing with laws passed by the Local Legislatures. They must exercise their discretion and judgment upon these laws, because if they are injurious to the people of any province, or of a section of a province, or if they interfere with the trade and commerce of the country, they will be held responsible for the consequences. I think that is a question worthy of consideration whether this case is really provincial; it appears to me that it touches very closely the question of trade and commerce, for it deals with timber which is not confined to the Province. Logs pass through these various rivers down to the Province of Quebec, they form part of the great export trade of the country, and it seems to me therefore that this is one of those questions which quite justifies the Government in looking narrowly into the laws which relate to a matter of that kind, and at all events, it is clearly within their constitutional right to disallow such acts if they think the case warrants. Even if the question were before the House in a different shape, I should feel it my duty to record my vote against any such general affirmation of the inability of the Government of the Dominion to deal with local laws as that resolution contains.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not propose to detain the House more than a few minutes in discussing this question. I propose to show that the Government cannot shield themselves behind the reasons they put forth for disallowing this Bill, namely, that they were protecting private rights. I am prepared to show that, and I believe that I can prove before I sit down, that in matters of this nature the Government have two weights and two measures, one set for its friends and one set for its adversaries. I know this is a pretty serious charge, but I make it deliberately though I make it open to correction, and I would be glad it were proved incorrect. But I think it is warranted when I tell the House that almost at the same time that the Government had before it the petition of Mr. McLaren asking for the disallowance of this Bill, they had another petition from two large companies from the Province of Quebec and thirty-eight different individuals asking for the disallowance of a Bill of a somewhat similar character to this one, and if this one is held to be bad the one I refer to is far worse. These companies and individuals I refer to were asking for the disallowance of a Bill passed by the Legislature of Quebec on July 24th, 1880, which was an Act respecting Mines. This Bill organized the Province of Quebec into different mining districts, and section 14 of the Act reads as follows:—

"In the conceded part of the seigniory, called Rigaud Vaudreuil, in the 'Chaudiere' mining division, where there may exist any persons, firms or companies owning mining rights, under valid titles, any proprietor of land, comprising in such conceded portions, who has not already divested himself of his mining rights, in favor of third parties, and who takes a license for that purpose,—or in his default any other miner, who conforms to the provisions of this Act, in such case, may mine for gold or silver upon such lands; but in all cases, such persons, firms or companies, possessing the said mining rights, may exact from any such person mining thereon a sum not exceeding three per cent. upon the gross amount of the gold or silver obtained, over and above the duty payable to the Crown under the Act."

That was on the 24th July, 1880. If it is held, as it was contended on the other side of the House, that the Streams Bill was an invasion of provincial rights, by what name shall we adequately describe this section, which provides that a person holding not a doubtful title but a valid title to mining rights shall not work the mines. Anybody may go on the land and mine against his will. Is not this an invasion of property? As was said a little time of the discussion in the Quebec Legislature, this is a communistic principle; it is worthy of the Paris Commune. It is a glaring violation of the rights of property. It has been said that the Ontario Act was retroactive in its operation. Let the House look at section 15 of this Act from which I am quoting. This was protested against by two large companies, by three different parties, also by 38 members of the seignior; but notwithstanding all those petitions the Government did not disallow the Bill. They did not grant or refuse the petitions, but they allowed the time to lapse and let the Act take its course. What conclusion can we come to except this, that the Government has two different ways of dealing, one for their friends and one for their enemies.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who are enemies?

Mr. LAURIER. The enemies are the Ontario Government, who are not in sympathy with this Ministry, and the friends are the Government of Quebec who are in close sympathy with this Administration. It is evident that the present Government have no fixed and immoveable standard of justice, but that the balance of the scales may turn with friend or foe. I do not blame the Government for not having disallowed the Mines Act, for I think they acted properly. In regard to such legislation the onus lies with the people of Quebec. It is said that the Provincial Legislature may do wrong—and it did wrong in this instance; but this Government may also do wrong; and in whose favor shall we decide? There is a standard rule dividing right from wrong within a Province. The Legislature should be supreme. Within the whole Dominion, the Dominion Parliament will be supreme; but it does not lie in the mouths of the hon. gentlemen opposite to say that the Dominion Parliament is responsible to the people of the country. It is responsible to the people of the whole country, but the Legislature of Ontario is responsible to the people of Ontario, and so it is with respect to Quebec; and to allow the Dominion Government to judge their Acts according to their standard of what is right and wrong, would be to apply a remedy that will be far worse than the evil itself. This is a proposition which will commend itself at least to hon. members who come from the Province of Quebec. It is a well-known fact that if we are to-day in a Federal instead of a Legislative Union, it is due to the peculiar circumstances in which Quebec is placed. It is for the benefit of the people at large, because it must be admitted that it would be impossible to govern this large extent of territory under any other than a Federal system. I call the attention of my fellow-countrymen to this question, because it is one on which we are unanimous in sentiment. There is but one sentiment in Quebec on this question, that if the Federal system has to be upheld we should not sacrifice a particle of the Federal system under any circumstances. Conservative journals of Quebec, referring to the Bill of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), respecting marriage with a deceased wife's sister, have expressed the opinion that the question is not within the competency of the Dominion Parliament, and is purely a provincial matter. I think this is a debatable matter, but the more debatable it is, the more it shows how keenly the people of Quebec feel on this question. It is true this question does not really affect us, but the people of Ontario; still if the Mines Act had been disallowed there would have been a unanimous protest from Quebec members against the Government's action. It is not, I say, affecting us as it is Ontario; but what takes place to-day in Ontario may occur to-morrow in Quebec, and we desire to give the same measure to our fellow countrymen in Ontario, that they would expect to receive themselves, if the rights of legislation were at stake. The occasion may arise some day when the rights of our Province may be interfered with, and then if we fail to get the measure of justice which we should expect we shall have only ourselves to blame. While this may be to some extent a question of party, I hope my fellow countrymen from the Province of Quebec will adhere to the view that before it is a question of party it is a question of nationality

—a question of right and justice. I say that in such a case there is but one vote to give, and that is to hold that the Provinces are supreme in their sphere, and that their judgment should not be superseded by the judgment of another power.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman's appeal to his fellow countrymen will be as fully responded to as was a similar appeal which he made, the other night, with regard to the Mining Act, which the hon. gentleman says the Federal Government refused to disallow. I wish to point out to him that the private parties affected by that Bill were heard before the Privy Council, and the Legislature of Quebec repealed the obnoxious clauses, so that justice was done to all parties. That was one point upon which the hon. gentleman laid great stress and it has fallen to pieces. Section 71 was repealed, as it had been agreed to, and the parties had declared themselves satisfied. If the Quebec Parliament had not done that I dare say that Bill would have been disallowed as well as the Streams Bill. The hon. gentleman tried to charge us with having embodied in our Quebec legislation communistic principles. When my hon. friend tried to act like his old leader, Sir George Cartier, he posed as the greatest Conservative in the country; to-day he changes his policy, he becomes more conservative, and charges us with communistic principles. The hon. member says it is a pity that we should agree with the Government in the disallowance of this Bill, because if we commit injustice to Ontario to-day it may turn against us to-morrow. Well, I am glad that there are in our Constitution two great safeguards which will ensure the success of Confederation; the first is that the Dominion Parliament may dismiss Lieutenant-Governors, and the second that we may disallow Bills passed by the Local Legislatures. In the Provinces, when passion runs high, great injustice may sometimes be committed, and gross outrages attempted. What have we seen in our own Province? We have seen the Lieutenant-Governor appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite entering into a most outrageous conspiracy to kill their political opponents in our Province, and to destroy our liberties. That conspiracy was approved of, and was blessed by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. That conspiracy had two objects—first, to put out a Government which had the greatest majority ever possessed in Quebec, and to rob us of our liberties, as they tried to rob our elections on the 1st of May, 1878, by resorting to all kinds of dishonest means—by calumnies, by lies, by falsehoods. The consequence was that our Province was for several weeks thrown into turmoil, revolution and great uneasiness. Well, this Government and this Parliament interfered, and thanks to that valuable security contained in our Constitution that man was dismissed. And what did we see two years after? We saw the coup d'état of 1878 when the whole Province rose like one man on the 2nd December and declared that the conspirators had their end in our Province. The second safeguard is that we have the right to disallow Bills not only when they are ultra vires. That would be absurd, as was well observed by the hon. member for Halton, because a Bill that is unconstitutional is not dangerous, as it will be set aside by the Courts. But those Bills which we have the power to disallow are Bills against peace and harmony, against the general interests of the country, and it is well that we have the power to deal with them. What is there in this country more valuable or precious to a citizen than to feel that he is safe in the enjoyment of his life, his liberty and his property. The Bill called the Streams Bill was the most dangerous attempt of a partizan Parliament to rob a man of his rights. That outrage has never been surpassed, and it has only a parallel in the outrage perpetrated by the Liberal party in our Province. I am not surprised to hear my hon. friend from Quebec East, after blessing Mr. Letellier for having kicked out the Quebec Government, now blessing the Ontario Government for trying to rob one of our friends. I think the House will vote against the motion made by the hon. member for South Huron, and supported by my hon. friend from Quebec East. That hon. gentleman the other day tried to betray his friends on the boundary question; this time he tries to betray his Province by pretending that the Government are interfering with the rights of the Provinces.

Mr. BLAKE. At last we have heard from one member of the Administration some statement of the views which the Government entertain upon the important question which has been debated for so many hours. That hon. gentleman, in announcing the Ministerial view of this measure, has used language which I think ought to be repudiated by every respectable man in this House. The hon. gentleman has dared to state that some 60 out of 88 members of the Provincial Legislature, which is as respectable as this House is, and a Government which is as respectable as this Government is, have been engaged in a conspiracy to rob one of their friends, and that he puts the case upon this ground: that that Legislature and that Government having decided to rob one of the friends of this Government, they stand by their friend. These good Samaritans found him stripped, wounded and bleeding, and they have applied the cruse of oil and the ointment, have given him assistance and have put him on his feet again. It is well, Sir, that this debate which was commenced on the Ministerial side by the counsel for Mr. McLaren, should be closed, so far as yet is shown, by the Ministerial announcement of a member of the Government that this is the love, this the attitude, and this the language which they venture to use towards an independent Legislature—independent at any rate until this vote is taken—and I think independent as it will shortly become by the decision of the people of this country, with regard to a measure which it has passed. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Halton stated several objections which he has to giving an assent to this motion. I know that no man can more ingeniously find difficulties with respect to pursuing any particular course than can the hon. member for Halton; and no man suffers more pangs inwardly—and sometimes outwardly—before he reaches a happy conclusion; but I observe that before the question is put, somehow or other, the hon. gentleman does always manage to find a reason to vote in favor of the Government, and his vote is recorded accordingly. The hon. gentleman, in the first place, objects to the mode in which the motion is brought forward. He says, Sir, that it is a very inconvenient mode for an independent member who has not yet formed or expressed an opinion on the subject; and he does not like to favor it, because, in the mode in which it is put forward, it involves a vote of want of confidence. I did not hear the hon. gentleman so speak with regard to the motion of the hon. member for Niagara the other day, or point out a difficulty, because the motion was one in amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply. The hon. member for Niagara moved in amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply, as my hon. friend from Huron moves an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply; but the hon. member for Halton then found no difficulty, no insuperable difficulty in supporting that motion; but on the motion of my hon. friend from Huron, although he might approve of the motion, it would be quite impossible for him to support it, because it is put as an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply, and to vote for it would involve a vote of want of confidence in the Government. This is his first proposition. We have heard a little about two weights and two measures, and I think that whatever application that principle may have to the general line of policy pursued by the Government of the country, it has a direct and very serious application to the mode in which the hon. member for Halton is disposed to deal with the form of this motion. The hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) has referred to an important question connected with the Ministerial crisis at Quebec. How was that brought up in the House? It was in the same form—by an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply, and the hon. gentleman found no difficulty about it. They proceeded in that form deliberately to discuss that question. Another reason for so introducing this subject is this: It is the only mode in which we could possibly bring up this question. I do not know that I will be able to convince the hon. member for Halton, as far as his vote is concerned, but, perhaps I may be able to convince his judgment. Still another reason for this course is this: It was only two days ago, if I remember aright, that the papers were brought down to this House on which the motion is founded. The subject was mentioned in the debate to the Address. It was then announced that it would be a subject of discussion here. The papers were moved for, as soon as it was possible, and we asked for them a score of times since. They were not voluminous; but nevertheless they were brought down only after repeated requests, two days ago. What was the condition of the business of the House two days ago? The Government had taken every day except Monday: the Order Paper was crowded and it could not have been reached for many days; it was very possible that it could not have been possibly reached even on Monday next, when we will have a debate on the Montreal Telegraph Bill. It was utterly impossible, in any other mode, to bring up this question before the House this Session. After the action of the Government, and their delay in bringing down the papers, this mode was adopted; and so the hon. member for Halton's proposal is that, out of delicacy for the tender feelings which the hon. gentleman possesses, we ought not to have brought this motion on in the only way in which we could bring it on at all. Indeed, the hon. member for Halton would have objected even if we had brought it forward in any other way. It is very difficult to satisfy the hon. gentleman. He objects to the general proposition, but I think, Sir, that before I have done, I will show the hon. gentleman that there is very good authority for the language used in this motion. I think I shall be able to read the statement on which the motion is based, which was uttered by an authority to which he always pays the gravest deference. Now, that hon. gentleman did not give such an account of the motion as its form fairly bears. In the first place, it declares that the power of disallowing Acts of the Local Legislatures conferred by the British North America Act is invested in the Governor in Council, and that His Excellency's Ministers are responsible to Parliament for the action of the Governor in Council for the exercise of this power. This proposition is not disputed, and this shows that in dealing with this question we are exercising our right to hold the Ministers responsible to this Parliament for the mode in which they exercised this particular power. Secondly, it declares that it is the essence of the Federal principle, as embodied in our Constitution, which sets forth that this power should be used only in cases where the law and the general interests of the Dominion imperatively demand it. I do not think that any one objects to that proposition. Can it be that this is a proposition to which the hon. member objects? Can any member of this House, who is a real, true lover of the Federal system, find any possible objection to this proposition? Where the law and the general interests of the Dominion imperatively demand it, then and then only shall the power of disallowance be exercised; but it would impair the Federal principle, and injuriously affect the autonomy of the institutions of our several Provinces were this power to be exercised on subjects which are within the exclusive competence of the Local Legislatures, on the ground that in the opinion of His Excellency's advisers, or of the Canadian Parliament, any such legislation is wrong. The phrase may perhaps be objected to. I see a mark on the resolution just opposite this passage. I do not know who made it. There is sometimes an advantage in borrowing your language from an authority; and I will read the observation, which seems to indicate that this was once the opinion of the great authority to which I have lately referred. In the debate on the New Brunswick School question, the hon. gentleman, the leader of the present Government, uses precisely the same phrase. He points out that it would be impossible to interfere in these matters, for otherwise this Legislature, instead of being as now the great Court of Parliament for the decision of Dominion questions, would become simply a Court of Appeal to try whether the Provincial Legislatures were right or wrong in the conclusions at which they arrived. Then he says that the question is, under the Constitution, one which ought to be decided exclusively by the Local Legislature on its responsibility to the people of the Province, who are the sole judges of such action, and once again, terms used in this motion are embraced by the language to which I have referred, while he uses other language from which I will read a more extended quotation, which I intend to make from the same speech. He states that the only exception which he would propose in such cases, is where the measure in question prejudicially affected the interests of the Dominion generally. The motion which is before the House then proceeds to state the mode of dealing adopted in 1868, and pursued since in the exercise of this power, and points out that it has been the rule ever since 1868 not to exercise this power, on the ground that a measure is considered partially defective, or objectionable, or prejudicial to the general interests of the Dominion in thus communicating with the Provincial Legislature in question, when general interests permitted such a course to be pursued, in order that the Local Legislature might consider and discuss the measure anew, and remedy the defects that existed. This is borrowed from the hon. gentleman's own recorded views in 1868. It is in the words as well as in the spirit of that statement, and it is not merely the statement which he then formulated, but it accurately represents the practice which has, so far as I am aware, without exception, except in this particular case, been pursued since that time. The resolution goes on:

"That it appears from the papers laid on the Table of this House that an Act passed by the Legislature of Ontario on the 4th of March, 1882, intitled: 'An Act for protecting the public interest in rivers, streams and creeks,' was disallowed by His Excellency in Council on the 19th day of May, A.D. 1881, by order approving a report which does not assert that the said Act is beyond the competence of the Local Legislature, but expresses an opinion adverse to the propriety of certain provisions of the Act.

"That the said Act was within the exclusive competence of the Local Legislature, and was not of such a nature as to render its provisions subject to the judgment for disallowance by the Government of Canada."

It points out that, under these circumstances, being not of such a nature as to render it subject to disallowance, the Governor General and the Minister of Justice had no right to act on their opinion, whatever it might be, as to the propriety or impropriety of the Act, and it points out that no communication was had with the Local Government, and no opportunity given them to discuss the objections made to the Legislature or to remedy the alleged defects, but that the rule laid down, and up to that time pursued without exception, was without cause violated in this case; and submits on all these grounds that the position taken by the Government and their action on this particular measure was wrong, and that the Act ought not to have been disallowed. I do not see anything in these propositions which differ from the generally accepted views of our Constitution and the views without which we have nothing as a Federal constitution whatever. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) declares that there was no practical difference whatever between the cases of dealing with Bills reserved and Acts assented to. That is an interesting question, but the only importance it has in this controversy is upon the question of consistency and the question how far the action of the late Government and of different Ministers or Acting Ministers of Justice, in dealing with Bills reserved, has proved they adopted a view which, if it were to prevail, would entitle this Government to disallow this measure. Certainly I need hardly say that if it can be demonstrated that the view taken at the time by those who dealt with Bills reserved in the way in which they did deal with them, was that there was such a distinction, that it was an entirely different thing dealing with a Bill reserved from dealing with an Act with a view to disallowance, the argument, whatever its value, and I do not attach much to it, deducible from the proposition in the resolution before us falls to the ground. I shall prove, in a moment or two by the most conclusive evidence, recorded contemporaneous with the action on my own part to which the hon. gentleman referred, that such rightly or wrongly was my own opinion. The hon. gentleman was pleased, unnecessarily I think, to inform the House that he had read many of my legal opinions and that from the way in which they were framed, representing considerations on the one side and the other, it was extremely difficult to draw conclusions from them. I do not know how it could be extremely interesting to the House to know the opinion of one professional man as to the mode in which another professional man discharged his professional duties. I suppose I was responsible to my clients, when I was happy enough to have them for the mode in which I gave advice, and if they thought I did not give them clear advice they would not come again; and I am glad to say that I did not want for clients so long as it was possible for me to pay them any attention. But that is a private matter, and I will discuss it no further. I am of opinion that the statement made this night on the subject of dealing with reserved Bills, betrayed great absence of consideration of the whole question, and would not have been uttered had it been given any reasonable degree of attention. Now, the question with reference to the reserved Bill, as it arose with us, was one different in many respects as to the line that was taken by the first Government from the question of dealing with Acts. In the first place, no instructions were given at any time to Lieutenant-Governors on this question of reserving or not reserving Bills.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not complaining of that. I am not saying about it anything except the fact that there was no indication on the part of the Federal authority to the officer pro tanto, or perhaps to a certain extent the Federal officer, as to whether he should or should not reserve any Bill, and on what principle he should deal with the subject. In the second place, while the hon. gentleman charged with the duties, as First Minister and Minister of Justice, of dealing with this question, thought it fitting, as early as 1868, to lay down rules for his own guidance, and for the guidance of the Government, as to the mode of dealing with Acts which came up, he never brought forward any such statement, or proposed to lay down any such rule with reference to the exercise of the power of advising assent or declining to act with regard to Bills reserved. So that both with reference to the instructions to Lieutenant-Governors and the action of the Federal Government on cases of reserved Bills, that matter to use a simple phrase was left at lucendo in the early days of Confederation. It happened, with reference to some of the Provinces, more particularly, I think, from the Province of Manitoba, and to some extent more than the others, the Province of Prince Edward Island after its admission to the Union, but it happened very largely both during the tenure of office of Governor Archibald and particularly that of Governor Morris, that the power of reserving Bills was used in a very liberal manner; and a great many Bills, considering the total number of Bills that were passed and the total number that were reserved over the whole Dominion, came from Manitoba. I think the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island—I have forgotten his county—

Mr. BRECKEN. Queen's.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman spoke as a man who represents the county of Queen's ought to speak. He spoke as the advocate of the prerogative. He seemed to think that an officer appointed by the Federal Government, though the most unpopular man in the land, had the right as Lieutenant-Governor to reserve a Bill. I deny it. I say that he has no constitutional right as a rule to reserve Bills. The constitutional rule with reference to reserving Bills and of dealing with Bills which may be objected to by Ministers or Governors is clear and well settled under the principles of the British Constitution, and applicable in its broadest sense and fullest extent to the action of the Provincial Legislatures. If a Governor disapproves of a Bill it is his duty to settle that matter with his Ministers while the Bill is yet before the Assembly. It is his duty to say "Gentlemen I disapprove of your proposed measure, and I will not allow that Bill to become a completed Act." If he chooses to take the responsibility of making the quarrel between himself and his Ministers upon that subject he has right to do so; but when he permits the measure to pass through the Local Legislature and it comes before him for assent, he has no right to refuse assent. He has no right to turn what would be a conflict between himself and his Ministers into a much more serious thing, a quarrel between himself and the Assembly by declining to assent to a Bill after it has been passed. So again with reference to the Ministers to advise reservation. I am, of course, speaking generally. There may be exceptional cases which we have never yet defined, as almost all rules have their exceptions, but speaking generally the Ministers have no right whatever to permit a measure to which they are opposed to pass through the Legislature and afterwards advise exercise of the power of reservation. Their duty is to make the quarrel one between themselves and the Legislature, and to decide at once whether their views are to prevail on that body or not. In a word, avoiding special cases, the power of reservation is to be used on the advice of Ministers. The question in both cases must be settled before the Bill comes up for assent. I say that if the Lieutenant-Governor disapproves of a measure which is passing through the Local Legislature, it is his duty to settle that question with his Ministers while that measure is still before the Assembly, and if he chooses to take the responsibility of quarrelling with them on that subject, he has the right to do so; but once he permits the measure to pass through the Local Legislature and come before him for assent, he has, at that period, no right to refuse his assent and provoke a conflict, not simply with his Ministers, but between him and the Assembly, or the two Houses. So, again, with the rights of Ministers to advise reservation; I am, of course, speaking generally. There may be exceptional cases—as almost all rules have their exceptions—but speaking generally, the Ministers have no right to permit a measure to which they are opposed to pass through the Local Legislature, and advise the exercise of the powers of reservation afterwards. The question, in both cases, must be settled before the Bill comes up for assent. Bagehot puts the case in which the Queen is supposed to have presented to her a Bill passed by both Houses for her execution and says she would have no constitutional right to decline assenting to it. I am not prepared to go quite so far. I think there would be a little too much human nature in a King or Queen to sign that document, but you cannot put more strongly the view of that constitutionalist as to the entire abrogation of the power of refusing assent. Of course, it is a different thing to reserve a Bill and to refuse assent to a Bill, but this bears upon the question of reservation. The true constitutional doctrine with reference to Local Legislatures and this Legislature is this, that, barring exceptional cases, local legislation is to be completed within the bounds of the Local Legislatures and is to come up here for disallowance or to be left to its operation in that state, and that barring exceptional cases Federal legislation is to be completed in the Federal Legislature and is to go across the water in a completed state for disallowance, or to be left to its operation; and the last fragment of the view that the power of reservation was to be exercised as an ordinary thing or to be exercised even in exceptional cases, was, happily for the growth and development of our autonomy, swept away in the instructions to the Governor General as the result of representations made to the Imperial authorities by the late Government. Up to that time this power of reservation had been made a practical power by order of the Governor General in certain classes of cases. I think there were eight or nine different classes—for example, the Divorce Bill; but even so far as Bills imposing differential duties are concerned, the reservation was swept away, and we are entitled to complete on our own responsibility our own legislation and send our laws home to be dealt with under what, I believe, is almost the effete power of disallowance. The hon. gentleman will still persist perhaps in the argument that it is practically the same to decline to assent to a Bill as it is to disallow an Act. I want to show that a very different view was taken, in point of fact, by both his leader and myself. I think it would be news to a very large portion of the community in Ontario and through the Dominion to know that the hon. the First Minister disallowed the Orange Bill. I think that the 12th of July would present a pretty lively scene if it were determined that the hon. gentleman had disallowed the Orange Bill. Did he practically or virtually disallow it? Did he do the same thing as disallow it? According to arguments advanced to-night, he did. According to them it was just the same thing to refuse assent to this Bill that was reserved as to disallow it. Was it the hon. Minister of Customs who settled this, or the hon. the First Minister? Has the former been supporting for five or six years with all his vigor and energy a man (and is he now the colleague of a man) who did that most outrageous thing, in the opinion of that portion of the community—disallowed the Orange Bill?

Mr. BOWELL. What he did was with my consent and by my advice.

Mr. BLAKE. I know that a gentleman high in the Order thought that he was not disallowing the Orange Bill, and felt rightly that it was quite a different thing from what disallowance would have been. I do not charge him with having disallowed the Orange Bill. It is his own friends who contend that to refuse to assent to a reserve Bill is practically the same thing as to disallow an Act of Parliament. I had to deal with an Orange Act and left it to its operation, but the hon. gentleman had to deal with an Orange Bill, and he left it where it was. We both left a thing where it was. I left an Act which it was in the competence of the Local Legislature to complete, as they did complete it; the hon. gentleman left the Bill, which he said they ought to have completed, where it was, and sent it back to them to deal with. The principle upon which the hon. gentleman proves, that to refuse the assent—

Mr. McCARTHY. It depends on the grounds.

Mr. BLAKE. It does not depend on the grounds at all. If you refuse to deal with a Bill because it ought to be completed by the Local Legislature within whose competence it is, you prove conclusively it is not your opinion that you are disallowing that legislation. What is the hon. gentleman's statement? The hon. gentleman says:

"Under the system of Government which obtains in England as well as in the Dominion and its several Provinces, it is the duty of the advisers of the Executive to recommend every measure that has passed the Legislature for the Executive assent. The provision in the British North America Act, 1867, 'that Your Excellency may reserve a Bill for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure,' was solely made with the view to the protection of Imperial interests and the maintenance of Imperial policy, and in case Your Excellency should exercise the power of reservation conferred upon you, you would do so in your capacity as the Imperial officer, and under the Royal instructions. So, in any Province the Lieutenant-Governor should only reserve a Bill in his capacity as an officer of the Dominion, and under instructions from the Governor-General.

"The Ministers of the Governor General and of the Lieutenant-Governor are alike bound to oppose in the Legislature measures, of which they disapprove, and if, notwithstanding, such a measure is carried, the Ministry should either resign or accept the decision of the Legislature, and devise the passage of the Bill. It then rests with the Governor-General or the Lieutenant-Governor, as the case may be, to consider whether the Act conflicts with his instructions or his duty as an Imperial or a Dominion officer, and if it does so conflict, he is bound to reserve it, whatever the advice tendered to him may be, but if not, he will doubtless feel it his duty to give his assent, in accordance with advice to that effect, which it was the duty of his Minister to give. With respect to the present measures, the undersigned is of the opinion that the Lieutenant-Governor might not have reserved them from Your Excellency's assent, as he had no instructions from the Governor-General in any way affecting these Bills. They are entirely within the competence of the Ontario Legislature, and if he had sought advice from his legal adviser, the Attorney-General of Ontario, on the question of competence, he would undoubtedly have received this opinion, that these Acts were within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature. This is evident from the fact that (as appears by the Votes and Proceedings of the Legislature) the Attorney-General voted for and supported the Bills, as a member of the Legislature. Under these circumstances, the undersigned recommends that the Lieutenant-Governor be informed that Your Excellency does not propose to signify your pleasure with respect to these reserved Acts, or to make an action upon them. The Legislature will, at its next Session, which must meet before the expiration of the year, within which by the constitution, Your Excellency has the power to signify your pleasure, have the power, if it pleases, of considering these measures anew, and re-acting them or rejecting them at its discretion.

"If these Acts should again be passed, the Lieutenant-Governor should consider himself bound to deal with them at once, and not ask Your Excellency to intervene in matters of provincial concern, and solely and entirely within the jurisdiction and competence of the Legislature of the Province."

Now, Sir, there was a statement by which the hon. gentleman avoided the responsibility of saying yea or nay to the question whether the Orange Bills should be sanctioned. He said: "I decline to give these Acts vitality, not that I am opposed to them, not that I favor them, I say nothing about them, but simply because they ought not to have been sent up." Because an Act of the same kind in another Province had been reserved and disallowed, by parity of reasoning, it was argued that it having come to the knowledge of the Government they ought to assume that, and to deal with it as if it had been a measure which had been once disallowed. To-day if we were to pass a Bill and it was to become an Act, and was to be disallowed, it would be within the competence of the Governor General, if that measure was once again presented for his signature, to make it an Act, and the operation of disallowance could be repeated if he thought fit once again so to deal with it. Now, I wish to show that we acted upon the view that the case was entirely different. I will read you a few words from a report of my own, on the 4th of October, 1876, upon a Bill from Manitoba, which will show you that while I stated that if that Bill had come before me as an Act I would not have advised its disallowance; if having come before me as a reserved Bill I advised that His Excellency should not signify his pleasure at all upon it, because it was the duty of the Lieutenant-Governor to complete legislation of that character. And I wish to show that at the very time the hon. gentleman argues that I thought that it was the same thing to disallow and to decline to give effect to a measure, my opinion was different.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not say so.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, the hon. gentleman said he was going to prove in this particular matter that my views justified this particular disallowance, and that he was going to prove it by showing my dealing with a reserved Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. No; I referred to your dealing with the Quebec Bill, which was not a reserved Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. I am going to deal with that presently. I wish to show what I have stated. What I stated was this:

"This power is unlimited, and, under this statute, a loan or investment so may be incorporated and so obtain unlimited power to borrow; and upon the whole, therefore, the impression of the undersigned would have been (had this Bill come before him as an Act with a view to his decision whether it should be disallowed or not) that it should be left to its operation, but this is not the question.

"The question is whether Council should advise His Excellency to assent to this Act, which is a reserved Bill.

"It appears to the undersigned that, as a general rule, the Lieutenant-Governor should himself act with the advice of Ministers upon the question of assent.

"To this rule there will no doubt be, from time to time, exceptions, but the undersigned submits to Council whether this Bill comes within the exceptions. Upon the whole, considering the difficulties to which the undersigned has adverted, and the inconveniences which might result from the Governor in Council being called upon to give vitality to Provincial legislation of this description, the undersigned recommends that no action be taken upon the Bill in question. If re-introduced into the Local Legislature, the Local Government will be able to consider the difficulties which have been stated, with a view to recommend such amendments as they may think expedient."

There you will see that I thought, rightly or wrongly, that if that Bill had come before me as an Act it would have been my duty to advise that it should be left to its operation; while I did think that, coming before me as a Bill improperly reserved, it was my duty not to advise His Excellency to give it the vitality which would make it an Act. Now I think that nothing can be more obvious than that it would be the most dangerous thing in the world to hold any different view. We do not want Local Governments or Local Governors, or persons in any of the Provinces, to shuffle their responsibilities on to the shoulders of the Government here. We want these matters discussed in the Local Legislatures by the people who are responsible for their disposition. If a time had been laid down, if instructions had been given, or a State paper prepared on the subject dealing with reserved Acts, which I believe it would have been prudent for the hon. gentleman to do in the first place, we would have laid down principles which would have made it more apparent on what grounds we ought to act with reference to reserved Bills. I lay down this as a general proposition that the conclusion not to assent to a reserved Bill is entirely different from the conclusion to disallow an Act which is completed. For my part I had nothing to do with this Prince Edward Island Bill. I knew nothing of it, until I saw it in the Journals; but of course, I had the technical responsibility of a member of the Government who remained in the Government after that Act came down to Parliament, and I do not shirk that in the slightest degree. But, in the conclusion, that the Bill should not have been given vitality to here, I for my part concurred, and the reason is because I thought it ought to have been completed in the Local Legislature. My opinion is that that measure ought to have been brought into life, ought to have become an Act of the Local Legislature, and ought then to have been submitted to the Government here for the question whether they would leave it to its operation or disallow it.

Mr. BRECKEN. Of course, the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman is the correct one, that if a Lieutenant Governor withdraws his assent from a measure advised by his Council, that Council must resign; but I will refer the hon. gentleman to the Journals where he will find as regards the Act of 1875, introduced for the purpose of making those awards valid, the Lieutenant-Governor actually advised the passing of the Act, and in fact there was no collusion between the Lieutenant-Governor and his Council, but he simply reserved the Act on account of the magnitude of the principles involved and of its extraordinary character.

Mr. BLAKE. It was not necessary for the hon. gentleman to repeat a portion of his speech, which I still remember. I knew the point before the hon. gentleman made it; but it has nothing to do with the question. Here you have a Representative Assembly and Elective Council, which is also a Representative Assembly, the Local Government and the Lieutenant Governor all agreeing with a measure which they could pass but which they dare not pass. It is so important that we, the wisecrackers of Prince Edward Island, cannot solve the difficulty but must send the case to Ottawa. This is the fact, that while 99 out of every 100 of the whole population were in favor of the Act, and the whole Legislature, the Legislative Council, the Government and the Lieutenant-Governor, they did not find themselves men enough to pass it. I am ashamed of the Island which the hon. gentleman represents. I am quite sure they never will commit the folly again, and there will be such a growth from weakness to strength that after this discussion we will find very few reserve Bills, and the Local Legislatures will take their own legislation into their own hands.

Mr. BRECKEN. You did not help us to carry it.

Mr. BLAKE. It should never have come here, and the people of Prince Edward Island ought to have been able, under the authority which they possessed under the Confederation Act, to have conducted their own affairs in this particular without the assistance of the Dominion Parliament. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) dealt with another subject which, I think, he treated in the same spirit which, not unnaturally, must influence his mind, he not being superhuman, in dealing at all with this case. The hon. gentleman said that the wholesome, the reasonable, the safe and the proper rule laid down as to the mode of dealing with Acts which were thought to be defective, was all right. He could not say anything else, because he copied his leader's statement—but it was intended to have a limited application. That was intended, he said, to deal with cases which had been treated without due consideration and which Local Legislatures had thus passed into law. Under those circumstances it was intended there should be an opportunity of explaining, discussing and considering the objections surrounding it. But if Local Legislatures acted with deliberation, if subjects were fully discussed, and if an Act was carried by an overwhelming majority, it was not intended they should have another opportunity of considering their views. What a ridiculous proposition. They were to be allowed to further consider in those cases in which they were presumed to have acted in mistake, but they were not allowed to deal with questions on which they had formed a deliberate opinion beforehand. I appeal to history. The hon. gentleman had to deal with two measures of the Ontario Legislature among some others. One was the measure for making payment to the Judges. He believed, and I agreed with him, that the measure was an unconstitutional one; and I may pause for a moment here to point out how shallow and false is the argument that cases ultra vires would be entirely answered by an appeal to the Courts. It could not be done. Take this very case—where could it have been answered? The measure was beyond the power of Local Legislatures to pass, but what Court of Justice was to decide whether this payment of $1,000 to each Judge should be made or not? How would you raise the point; who was to raise it? I know of no manner by which the question could have come adversely before a Court at all; and yet the Act was ultra vires. There may be cases in which such a general confusion and disturbance of the general interests of the Dominion may occur, from the continuance on the Statute-Book of an Act which is ultra vires, long before that question can be tested in the Courts—that it may be a reason for exercising the power of disallowance, and in point of fact there are many such cases in which the hon. gentleman and other Ministers of Justice thought this and the other portion of an Act was ultra vires, but that it might be inconvenient to obtain a decision of the Court at that time. We have all allowed Acts to go into operation which contained provisions that were ultra vires, because the general public could not interfere, and I believe we are bound not to interfere, although after some disturbance and difficulty and some years have elapsed during while the Act was assumed to be legal, it was determined to be unconstitutional. On all Bills supposed to be ultra vires it is of the utmost importance that we should stay our hands and use cautiously the power of disallowance. I will tell the House why. If an Act is allowed to remain in operation you leave it open to being tested in the Courts, but if a Government proceeds to disallowance they make themselves the final authority and no opportunity is afforded to obtain the decisions of the Court. Strong reasons of general interest ought therefore to exist before resort be had to disallowance; that power should be set aside and every Act possible should be dealt with by the Courts. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that we are fond of referring on this occasion to precedents which hon. gentlemen opposite have set, and to their declarations. Why should we not? Why, Sir, it is a State paper which forms the foundation of our action for fourteen or fifteen years back on this subject—a paper which was not controverted—although a paper which I myself do not wholly approve of in every line and syllable and letter. I have had occasion to deal with it, and I have guarded my approval of it in its entirety; but in so much as it is practically in accord with this motion, and more, I have always accorded and have always testified my adherence to it. That paper has formed the foundation of the action of the Government for five years. They have left it unimpeached in any material respect. It has formed the foundation of the subsequent action of that Government and succeeding Governments. Nothing more solemn could be found as interpretative of the true meaning of the statute as an instrument of that kind issued in such a manner. Now, whatever defects there may be in an unwritten constitution, and ours is in many ways an unwritten constitution, this advantage is left: that we know that in the relation of the Executive to Parliament it is the spirit of the British Constitution to which we look. Whatever difficulties may have arisen from the absence of precision, we have one advantage which, in my humble belief, not merely counterbalances but far outweighs these difficulties, and that is this: that we have a Constitution which is susceptible of growth and development, and we have an advantage in the practical carrying out of this spirit without violent revolutions, without those difficulties which attend a change in any written document, but by a growth and development of the principles of freedom amongst the people who are happy to be governed under such a Constitution. So was it under the British Constitution—a Constitution under which while there was always, even in the earliest days of which we speak of Constitutional Government, a strong element of popular rule—even in these early days when the people were excited, they were still paramount, but unless you excited the people, unless you had some great cause to bring before them, the King was the ruling power. You see the same Constitution passing through the period of the revolution changed it is true, but still the same Constitution. When the King had gone further than the governing powers which, under ordinary circumstances, he possessed and chose to touch Englishmen upon that point upon which English battles for liberty have always been fought, viz., the right of taxation, you saw in that particular, and in some other particulars, the old constitutional principles reformed, and what happened? We know that in the practical working of that Constitution there came a time when the King did not govern, but in place of the King there was an aristocracy—a party in England which, by its authority, by its possessions, by its weight in the country, by the defective state of the popular representation, by the system of borough-mongering, was enabled to govern the country. Why, in the cabinet of the great William Pitt there was only one commoner, all the rest were peers. We had the same Constitution, but we found a Government of peers instead of a Government by the King; but by slow degrees the balance of power changed, until we find that now the government is in the House of Commons; and we know that during the whole of this time the struggle was going on to narrow the prerogatives of the Crown, to hold that those prerogatives should be exercised only on the advice of the Ministers. We know that under the exercise of the great principles of freedom there has been a gradual narrowing of the prerogatives of the Crown. There are remarkable instances of that, and it is said by Bagehot that the people of England would be as much surprised to find that an Act which had passed both Houses had not been assented to, as they would be to look out some morning and find a volcano on Primrose Hill. So it is that the great blessing of the Constitution, which in this particular we also enjoy, is that it has within itself a principle of growth and development in favor of popular rights; and if I were called upon to-day, Sir, 15 years after we took the stride which we took in 1867, if my duty were to-day to say to you that, whatever were the views then entertained as to this elastic power, whatever were the constitutional restraints which were recognized as good and proper in the early days of the Confederation, we had outgrown them—if I were called upon to say to you, at the end of 15 or 16 years after we confirmed the ever-blessed principle of the growth, the freedom and the enlargement of our powers, that it was found improper and unnecessary to restrain where there had been restraint before, I should have an argument for which I should have the whole of British history at my back. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) told us that it might have been necessary to give greater powers to the Provinces in the early days of Confederation, but that the freedom which might then be necessary should now be withdrawn. He turns back the dial of time. He says the freedom and the liberty which we had in 1867, in 1868, in 1869 and 1870, might have accorded with our condition then, but it has now to be withdrawn—that we are now unworthy of those principles and of that system of Government which has been so strong in protecting the popular privileges. Why, Sir, there is a clause in our Constitution under which any Act, passed by any Local Legislature, of whatever nature, may be disallowed. No man, however lost to the feelings which ought to animate a British subject everywhere, dares to say that that clause has in its wideness a practical application. No man but acknowledges that it is a clause which is limited by other considerations. No man dares to say that there is—there may be the power, but that there is the constitutional right to disallow any Act whatever. All admit a limitation—where do we find it? We find it, Sir, in the spirit of the Constitution. That is the only place where you can find it, and if you find it in the spirit of the Constitution, you find it carried out. I hope and trust in a spirit of growth and development in favor of popular rights, and not in a spirit of lessening and narrowing down popular rights, of centralization instead of decentralization, of informing the people that in the early days, in order to prevent them from being irritated, they were allowed some liberties, but now these liberties are to be withdrawn and more contracted principles to be applied. Now, I maintain that we have, what we had at first, very good reason for saying that there is no need to go further in order to establish the impropriety of this disallowance. I do not say there is no need to go further. There may be a need to go further; but the hon. gentleman admits that within the limits of recorded practice there is nothing more to say—that this Act should not have been disallowed. What does he say? Referring to the Goodhue case, he says: "I admit that that was a case in which there ought to have been a disallowance, and I justify the act of the Minister, if I justify it at all, on the statement that the Confederation was then new, and that it was not politic to exercise a power that ought to have been exercised." Well, Sir, contrast that Act with this. That was an Act by which the Legislature, without any pretence of public interest whatever, without the slightest suggestion that the public were in any way concerned, took the property which had been devised to certain devisees and altered the devolution of that property. Although that measure passed, I think against the vote of the leader of the Government, certainly against my own vote, who occupied a position on the opposite side of the House, the hon. gentleman declares—what? He has not one word of objection to that Bill. He does not say anything about it except that it is within the competence of the Local Legislature, like the prior Act to which he refers in his report, which was also an Act interfering with vested rights; and, therefore, he says it should be left to its operation. If he felt that the Confederation was a little more knit together, he would be disposed to disallow; but then he did not think it prudent to do so. He lays down the bold principle that this is within the right of the Local Legislature, and although it is a wanton interference with private property, a transference of property from A to B, without a pretence of public interest, yet it was for them to decide, and he had nothing to do with it. That was the case, and I acted upon it cordially and cheerfully. I was opposed to that Bill, I voted against it, but the hon. gentleman never heard one word from me of condemnation for that disallowance. I never had the slightest misgiving in my own mind but that the hon. gentleman would act as he did act on that occasion; not because I thought he would approve of the Act any more than Mr. Sandfield Macdonald or myself did, but because I was satisfied that he would feel that it was a matter belonging exclusively to the Local Legislature, and not affecting the interests of the Dominion in any such way as to justify interference by disallowance, and that he would leave it to its proof. That was the rule the hon. gentleman then laid down and the practice he pursued; and it is too late to-day to denounce that rule and that practice, and to say that the people of this country were to be deluded into a practical acceptance of Confederation upon a false statement of what the true reading of the constitution was until they could be placed in such a position that more rigorous measures could be safely applied to them. Now, the hon. gentleman has said that this course ought to be pursued only in cases of surprise. I say to him that in the case of the Judges to which I have referred, the measure was debated in the Local Legislature thoroughly; it was the subject of an adverse vote; the unconstitutionality of the measure was there alleged. The Legislature acted deliberately; yet the hon. gentleman proceeded after his own fashion. He expressed his opinion; he fortified himself behind the opinion of the law officers of the Crown in England. True, he did not proceed to disallow; but he proceeded in the proper constitutional course which he himself had chalked out. He communicated his objections to the Ontario Government; he obtained from them their answer; he rejoined to that answer; but he adhered to his own opinion; he placed the law officers, as a buffer, between himself and responsibility, as he used to do; but he said: "Unless the Local Legislature repeals this Act, it must be disallowed," and it was not until the last day on which disallowance could take place that it took place at all; and, therefore, after the fullest opportunity had been given for discussion and action by the Local Legislature, the hon. gentleman acted with reference to that Statute, which was not a Statute passed in haste, but deliberately adopted against remonstrance, and upon division upon the part which proved fatal. In the same Session the hon. gentleman had another Bill, one to alter the tenure of the County Court Judges, and to make them hold office during pleasure. That Bill was adopted in the Local Legislature, and it was divided upon. The hon. gentleman formed the opinion that that, too, was beyond the power of the Local Legislature; he fortified himself in the same way; he pursued the same course, sent his communication, gave an opportunity to the Local Government to reply, rejoined to them again, and not until the fullest opportunity was given to them to repeal the Act did he proceed to disallow. There is present in my mind several instances in which a different course was adopted, excepting this one, and is it not wise, is it not a statesmanlike proposition for hon. gentlemen to avoid as far as possible exciting angry feelings and the chances of collision with the Local Legislatures, and to give them the utmost opportunity of making the matter right and of putting it into shape by these agreements, by arrangements, by these discussions and by these suggestions, which should take place; and if that is so, Sir, with regard to measures in which the objection which is taken by the Federal Government is one of public policy, which is one of great and general interest to the whole country, and in which this is a question of that kind in which the people generally are concerned; how infinitely more obvious is the argument, that an exceptional course ought not to be pursued, when the Government interferes with regard to a measure which is exclusively within the competence of the Provincial Legislature, and when the alleged defect concerns only the private rights of one individual. Is it because that private right of one individual is the right of a man who is called Peter McLaren, who is a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, and who is a friend of the hon. member for Lanark? Is that a reason why an exceptional line of procedure should be pursued in this case? Is that a reason why an insult and a slight should be offered to an independent Local Legislature and to a Local Government that was never offended before, and yet that is the reason given; because they did this so deliberately they were not entitled to consideration or consultation or the opportunity to offer an objection. What was done? A long paper is put in. I have not read it. It is a great printed volume of—I do not know how many pages long. What is it composed of?—of ex parte statements of articles and suggestions; and that is put in before the Government. A long petition is also put in.

Mr. McCARTHY. It does not consist of newspaper articles and of speeches altogether. There is in it the speech of Mr. Pardee when introducing the Bill and of Mr. Mowat in reply.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope that the hon. gentleman does not say that this is not an ex parte exposition of the case.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is not ex parte in the sense which you mean.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the speech of Mr. Pardee's the only speech?

Mr. McCARTHY. All the speeches are there as far as I know. There are Mowat's and Frazer's speeches and the whole debate.

Mr. BLAKE. And articles from the newspapers?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE: His own seizure of the case is reported, and then there is a report—a report taken from the Mail.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. McCARTHY. Who says so? How does the hon. gentleman know?

Mr. BLAKE. Only the speeches were not reported if the report is taken from the Mail that it is all.

Mr. BOWELL. Speeches in the Mail are much more honestly reported than they are in your own organ.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not saying that the speeches of opponents are reported honestly in either paper. I maintain that it is an absurd statement to make—to give a report of a man's speech from the paper of the opposite side of politics. But I do not care about that the hon. gentleman had a right to be informed of the views of the Government officially; but these were ex parte statements presented on the authority of Mr. McLaren, on his statement. Then there is his petition and declaration as to values and all other things, which he alleges were laid before the Government, and on this petition there is a memorial from the Minister of Justice, who felt himself qualified to judge. A Minister of Justice? a Minister of in-Justice. Why, he does not know the first principles of justice. The old maxim is that he who is called upon to judge, if he judges without having heard the other side, although he may decide justly, has committed an act of injustice. To hear both sides is the very first thing which should have been done and was a part of the memorandum which has been so often referred to. It is the paramount duty, recognized in all Courts, by common sense, and by the sense of justice of all mankind at large, which of you are to decide question, to hear what is said on both sides before you give a decision. Now, Sir, we do not know when this petition was presented. It is put in without a date. The date of its receipt is not marked, there is no acknowledgment of it. There is not even a letter from my hon. friend from Lanark accompanying it. There is not even a recorded interview with the Minister of Justice or with anyone of the Ministers about it. There is nothing from my hon. friend from North Simcoe about it, not a word. What passed? Were there petitions by mouth as well as petitions by letter? Were there representations of any other kind on the subject? Was Mr. McLaren in the office of the Minister of Justice? Were his friends there? Was there a series of petitions and representations and statements because these are just as effective really as if there are written; and sometimes a little more effective, because sometimes arguments by word of mouth presented in a private office with a locked door, are more effective than when they are presented on paper, to be brought down, to Parliament afterwards. I say, Sir, were there more representations and more consultations presented on this subject? But how was the case of the Province of Ontario represented? How was the Government of Ontario represented? How was the Legislature of Ontario represented? How was this case, which you degrade to the level of a private contention between two individuals, which I do not choose to do—argued before the Government? How was the case with regard to the other party presented, if at all? It was forgotten. It was ignored. No! it was not forgotten. But the Government wilfully failed to observe the first of the cardinal principles of justice. They reached their conclusion without giving an opportunity to the great public and important private interests to represent their views. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, the member for North Simcoe, has represented that the law is so and so. There is no doubt about the law. There is one little difficulty, however, you know about the law being so-and-so. The highest Court in the Province of Ontario has said that it is not so-and-so. What the hon. gentleman declares to be the law is at present, by the judicial decision of the highest Court in Ontario, not the law.

Mr. McCARTHY. Allow me to interrupt. I made no such statement. I said merely that, at the time the Bill was passed, the contrary was declared to be the law of the Province of Ontario.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes; but the hon. gentleman went a good deal further. What the Legislature said in this case was this: They said that they had the power to declare what the law was. They said that they knew better than others what their intention was, and that they, as the successors of the Legislature that passed that law, could declare what it was. The hon. gentleman has acknowledged frankly that we were not here, so far as we can interfere with private rights, to do so; but that the Local Legislatures, in the much larger measure in which they are interested with authority to deal with private rights, are not restrained by constitutional prohibitions which render it impossible for them to do things which it is impossible for the Legislature of the Dominion to do, but he proposed to apply to the Local Legislatures the same prohibitions in effect. I will tell you, Sir, what the hon. gentleman proposed. This is his proposition, Mr. Speaker. He says that under the Constitution, things, which it would be impossible for the Local Legislature effectually to deprive the subject of his property except under certain conditions and with certain restrictions, existed which did not exist here. I admit that under the Constitution of Canada and the Provinces, the Local Legislatures have the power to deprive the subject of his property under these conditions; but I say that if we import into our Constitution, into the Constitution of Confederation a restriction upon that power and declare it as a majority in this House propose this night to declare, we will declare it to be the right and duty of the Government wherever that power, which he admits exists, is to be exercised, to nullify its exercise by disallowing such Acts. The hon. gentleman says that you find this in the Constitution. Why? You do not find it in the Constitution. The hon. gentleman says that the spirit of the Constitution shall be violated; that the assent of the Constitution shall be broken, and that a new clause shall be inserted in the Constitution, giving you not the certainty of a Court on the point, but the discreted determination of a political body trying a case without hearing the other side, as to whether it comes within their competence, what the United States Constitution would forbid, and upon their arguments to decide that the law should be nullified. No, Sir, I am a friend to the preservation of the rights of property, not, perhaps, after the form of the hon. gentleman, and many of the hon. gentlemen on the other side, but I believe in the subordination of those rights to the public good. Let me tell the hon. gentleman what happened under the wholesome influences of that interpretation of the Constitution which he, in earlier and happier days received. Let me tell him that the discussions which took place with reference to the Smith will—to the will of Sir Henry Smith—and followed by the discussions which took place with regard to the Goodhue will, proved the importance, morally as well as materially of the possession here belonging, of the power to decide for themselves what should be right and what should be wrong in these cases. The people of Ontario and the Legislature of Ontario found, that there was to be no appeal to some good art of a machine, no appeal to some superior power, but that they had that right as a State, which each of us has as a man—the right to go wrong—and they determined to go right. A Session did not elapse after the passage of those mischievous measures—after they had become the law of the land, that Legislature at once taking steps on the resolution which I had the honor of introducing, to render practically impossible for the future any such interference as had taken place in the Goodhue and Smith will cases. They proceed to pass a law under which estate bills were to be referred to the Judges. They passed that law, and subsequently the reports of the Judges were made on all estate bills, and the opinion of the Judges was invariably accepted. The hon. gentleman says this is an imperfect remedy; he advises that an appeal should be made to the people, and if it is impossible to obtain a satisfactory settlement in a Provincial appeal to the people on account of the other questions which would complicate it there, what does the hon. gentleman propose by way of remedy? Why, that it should come here to this Government, which is responsible to this Parliament, which Parliament is responsible to the whole Dominion; so that the ultimate recourse of an Ontario subject should be to the general election of the Dominion, complicated with all the issues of the general election itself. Just suppose that the action of the Government had been what it was not; suppose that the hon. gentleman had said: "We refuse to deal with this measure;" what would have been Mr. McLaren's remedy? His remedy would have been an appeal to the people—first to Parliament, and if Parliament refused to agree with his views, then from Parliament to the people.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh!

Mr. BLAKE. Well, what other remedy would he have? I know that the hon. gentleman is aware that that remedy would be wholly inadequate. As to Mr. McLaren getting a remedy by appealing to the whole Dominion on the question whether the Government was right or wrong in disallowing this measure in his private interest, that would be quite hopeless. Therefore this remedy, if hopeless in the Province is hopeless in the Dominion. I deny that the people of my Province are insensible to or careless about the true principles of legislation. I believe they are thoroughly alive to them, and I am content that my rights of property, humble though they are, and those of my children, shall belong to the Legislature of my country to be disposed of subject to the good sense and right feeling of that Legislature and the good sense and right feeling of the people of that Province. I do not believe his own friends will echo the shameful statement of the Secretary of State that the Act of the Legislature is an act of robbery to oblige a friend, no more than I impute to the hon. gentleman opposite, what I might well impute after this statement, that he has disallowed an Act of the Local Legislature in order to oblige a friend—no more than I might impute that to him, and with infinitely greater force, because I say that he did it without giving the opposite side an opportunity to be heard. The hon. gentleman has referred to the Prince Edward Island Act, to which I have also made reference, saying that it was a reserved Bill. He has referred to the second Prince Edward Act, which was also a reserved Bill, and he has referred to two other Acts which I had to deal with—one compelling assurers in the Province of Quebec to take out a license. In the first place that Act was not disallowed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, but the Legislature of Quebec were told that if it did not amend it, it would be disallowed.

Mr. BLAKE. No, they were not, and they did not amend it, and it was not disallowed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, they were told so.

Mr. BLAKE. No, they were not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I think so. Read it, and you will see if that is not the meaning of it.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman will find that it does not say so. In the first place, I maintain that Acts with reference to taxation stand on a wholly different ground from Acts of the character we are now considering. There is, with reference to taxation of a particular description, a practical concurrent power in the Parliament of Canada, and in the Local Parliaments. The Local Parliaments cannot create taxation of an indirect character, and this Act was thought to be, and was afterwards adjudged to be, taxation of an indirect character. I wish to point out, in the first place, that I declined to interfere. The question was then before the Courts, and I thought it might be determined by them. In the second place, I maintained that on the assumption on which the rest of the opinion preceded, the Act was within our competence. I maintain that with reference to direct taxation they have a concurrent power, and where there is a concurrent power I have always been of the opinion that we must have the controlling power. For example, if we determined to adopt a particular source of direct taxation—say an income tax—and we found that the Local Legislature afterwards proposed to lay another heavy income tax which would interfere with the operation of our own tax, and render it practically impossible or much more difficult to collect it, we have a right to say that our machinery for collecting the revenue which is necessary for the whole Dominion must not be interfered with by your legislation for direct taxes in a way that prevents the success of our legislation. I may be wrong in this view as to the power of the Local Legislature; if so, I am going with the hon. gentleman; but such has always been my conviction. I do not see how, practically, you are to carry out the powers of direct taxation which are given you, unless you assume the right—to be cautiously exercised, not without obvious public necessity—to say that you have the right to tax the Provinces directly. We have done so. We have exercised before concurrent power in a way with which your action entirely interferes; and as one or other of us must give way, those who are at the top will prevail. Then this being the case with reference to taxation, I maintain that we might interfere. I may be wrong in this criticism. It may be that my advice was impertinent, but I do not think, at any rate, it can be strained or constrained into a disallowance of the Act. Now, if even there was a case in which a portion of an Act was indispensable in point of policy, it was this very Act. I am not now speaking of the policy of laying a tax on assurances, upon which I took the liberty of expressing an opinion, but I am speaking of that portion of the Act which laid a tax upon existing insurances for life, upon the gross returns from the companies. You will perceive that if the insurance companies have contracted with you or me to insure our lives on condition of a payment, of say $50 a year during the term of life, we have contracted with the understanding that the companies should get $50; if not its net profits, not its gross returns, are by subsequent legislation exposed to taxation, it is quite clear the whole basis of the contract, which was to endure for 50 years more would be altered, and therefore it is clear that this is very objectionable. I considered rightly or wrongly that as this affected the Federal as well as the local taxation, we had the right to consider it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. I said the right to consider it.

"Had the Parliament of Canada adopted this as a subject of taxation, other considerations altogether might apply and it would become necessary to determine whether the double taxation, which would under such circumstances be imposed, should be allowed."

There I stated plainly my opinion, right or wrong. There is the belief expressed that there is concurrent power. I may have been wrong, but if I was right, I take it out of the category of those cases in which power of the Local Legislature is exclusive. It is these conclusions with which we are now dealing.

"The policy of levying a tax of this nature is open to grave question. It must follow the end upon those interested in the assurances. It may be considered to be a tax upon Providence and thrift, and its operation may have an injurious effect, far beyond what may be recompensed by its pecuniary results, but these are views which although they should be fairly weighed, and although they might in some cases force upon the Canadian Government the necessity of disallowance, are yet subject to this observation, that the people of a Province who require to raise a revenue for their local wants and who tax themselves for the purpose, may rightly claim and must fairly be permitted a considerable latitude in the determination of what their taxes shall be, and that considerable confidence may be placed in local public opinion, as a remedy for the indicated evils where they may exist."

Now, Sir, you can point to a score of lives of men in which as I have pointed out Acts very objectionable are yet not disallowed because they were within the exclusive competence of the Local Legislature. I took rightly or wrongly a different position. I stated nothing whatever inconsistent with the views which I have always held, and which until this Streams Bill was disallowed, I always thought the Government held, with regard to the power of the Local Legislature with reference to such subjects.

"The undersigned, however, feels bound to point out that in one particular this Act appears objectionable.

"It is well known that the bulk of assurances on life are effected on contracts extending on the part of the Company over the whole term of life or a long number of years conditioned on the payment by the insured of periodical premiums at fixed rates. This Act, however, requires payment by the companies of the tax of one per cent upon the premiums for the renewals of life assurance policies, although made before the passing of the Act."

"This imposes upon the company which has already contracted at a specified premium calculated upon various elements not, however, including a taxation of the gross premium—a deduction not from its net profits but for the gross premium. The company is not in a position to recoup itself by calling upon the insured to pay the tax.

"This seems objectionable in principle, and calculated to produce a feeling of insecurity abroad with reference to Provincial legislation, and the undersigned recommends that the attention of the Lieutenant-Governor should be called to the provision with a view to its amendment during the ensuing Session, at any rate, in so far as it affects contracts made before the passing of this Act."

There is no statement that the Act would be disallowed if no such amendments were made. I have never heard that any such amendments were made, and yet the Bill was not disallowed. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman referred to one other Act with which I had to do; that is the Manitoba Act of 1876, with reference to half-breed lands. Now, that Statute was an amendment to a former Statute which was assented to at Ottawa, and on page 54 of the book of returns for 1877, it will be found that Governor Morris reported in 1873 that he had reserved the Half-Breed Land Grant Protection Act, and he pointed out to the Minister of Justice that this Act which was reserved was an Act which was retroactive and dealing with existing contracts and cancelling them. I am obliged, in order to explain the exact position of the Act, to read the report of the Lieutenant-Governor upon the subsequent Act:

"The subject of these grants attracts a good deal of attention, and a movement was on foot to obtain legislation to prevent such of those lands as fell to the heads of families from being sold by them, in order that the lands might descend to the children.

"The project was abandoned and the present Bill was introduced and passed."

It seems that speculators have bought largely from half-breeds their claims to allotment at low prices, ranging as low in some cases as $15, the maximum being $50. These sales, of course, only give the vendees a right of action, to enforce the contract when the vendor would become entitled to his land. The object of the Bill is to cancel all these sales, and give the vendee an action to recover back the price, which, if in goods, was to be charged at ordinary prices.

"The considerations made a lien on the land, which may be sold for the recovery of the price paid."

That was the position. This Act cancelled all these contracts and provided that the vendees who had paid in money or goods should have the right to receive back or recover their money or their goods at ordinary prices. This came before the Minister of Justice at that day, not as an Act of Parliament but as a Bill. He had the question before him whether he would sanction and give vitality to this measure. Such being its provisions, the Lieutenant-Governor proceeds to report the objections to the Bill, as follows:—

"The objections to the Bill, the intention of which is, no doubt, good, are these—

"1st. It is retroactive—dealing with existing contracts and cancelling them.

"2nd. It opens a fruitful door for litigation, the prices charged for goods being opened up for examination in each case where those formed part of the consideration.

"3rd. There is no machinery provided for carrying out the sale of the land on which the lien is established; but this, of course, could be remedied next Session."

He then adds:

"I have no sympathy with those who may have purchased these claims to land at inconsiderable prices, or in an unfair manner; but as the law is novel and retractive in its character, I feel compelled to reserve it for the signification of the pleasure of the Governor-General; though it must be borne in mind, also, that if the Act be sanctioned it may be taken as a precedent for other restrictions with regard to the holding of these lands."

How did the hon. gentleman deal with that local Act? He dealt with it by giving it vitality. He advised that the assent of the Governor General should be given to it, and but for this action it would never have been in the Statute at all. He who is about, presently, to point out to us the gross injustice of dealing with existing rights, advised not that the Act should be disallowed, but that the Bill sent to His Excellency should be assented to. With reference to the amendatory Act passed in 1877, and reserved, and which modified the provisions of the former Act in some material particulars, not to the advantage of the half-breeds, it provided:

"That when a half-breed, having sold his interest and received therefor a consideration, shall return or tender to the purchaser the full consideration and the purchaser's expenses with interest at 12 per cent. per annum within three calendar months from the passing of the Act, the agreement shall not be binding; otherwise the bargain, if in writing, shall be valid and the half-breed shall assign the granted lands within three months after the receipt of the patent from the Crown."

It also provided that notice of the passing of the Act shall be given in the Manitoba Gazette for three months after it has been assented to by the Crown. Let us pause for a moment by the old Act which had been assented to on the advice of the hon. the First Minister. The contracts had been absolutely cancelled and the half-breeds had been restored to their rights in the lands subject to the lien for consideration, so that at the time this amended Act was passed, the half-breed had got his lands back again by law subject to that lien. The lands were still unallotted and ungranted and in the Crown, and while in that condition the Act was amended providing that in case the half-breed would not return the purchaser the full consideration and expenses with interest, the contract would be binding. That is, that the agreements which had been cancelled four years before were to be revived and were not to be binding only in case the half-breeds, within three months after the passing of the Act, return the purchaser full consideration and interest. It was felt by the Legislature of Manitoba that they must give some notice to the half-breeds that their lands were taken away under this clause. It provided that notice of the passing of the Act should be given in the Manitoba Gazette for three months after it had been assented to by the Crown. What I believe justified the policy of dealing with the reserved Act at Ottawa, notwithstanding my observations against so dealing on principle, was the circumstance to which I had more than once called the attention of the House, that it was dealing with ungranted lands of the Crown of Canada under arrangements made by the Crown of a peculiar nature with reference to the half-breeds. I may be right or wrong in my opinion, but to show that I entertained it I need only refer to the report I made the day before in another Act, page 305 of the Sessional Papers of 1877. It is on the Act to amend the Registry Act and is as follows:—

affecting any lands, whether there has been any grant from the Crown of such lands or not, shall be adjudged fraudulent and void against any subsequent purchaser unless registered as in the Act provided. This appears to be a direct interference with the devolution of the title of lands before patents are issued. When the lands are the property of the Crown and the Province, the legislation would be within the competence of the Local Legislature, and might be beneficial; but the position of Manitoba in this respect exceptional. The lands, until patents issued, are the property of Canada, and the provision as to assignments, etc., of unpatented lands ought to be made by the Canadian Parliament."

I merely quote that, not for the purpose of raising a discussion as to what my opinion was, but to show that was the opinion I entertained distinctly at the time, of the condition of the law and the relative distribution of power with reference to that subject. Where the property was vested in the Crown of Canada and not in the Crown of a Province, such as the lands of Manitoba, I entertained, rightly or wrongly, that we alone ought to decide as to the disposal of these lands. Then they become part of the subject by means of which the Local Legislatures will deal with them. That places this case which dealt with unpatented lands in an exceptional position. The hon. gentleman said it was a change of view to disallow the Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not hear any one refer to the disallowance of that Act.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. member for North Simcoe did. I am dealing with the Half-breed Lands Act, which the hon. gentleman quoted as proof that the hon. member for South Huron should not have moved his motion, because I would have to vote against it.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is so.

Mr. BLAKE. I am pointing out that he says I am right on a wrong principle; I am showing that he was wrong, that the principles involved are wholly inapplicable. I have proved it was within the competency of the Canadian Parliament only to deal with lands before patents were issued. All that I have to do to show that that was my opinion is to produce my report. But I go further and show that the case was probably the most peculiar that was ever presented, not in the nature of the Bill, but in the circumstances under which it came before us. I do not suppose such a case can ever occur again. I have a witness—the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal) who was then Attorney-General in that country. This Act, which altered the half-breed grants, provided they should not have lands unless within three months of the year passing they paid the consideration money and interest; it provided for three months' notice. I referred it to the Minister of Interior, who reported as follows:—

"The undersigned having failed to find in Ottawa any evidence of compliance with the 3rd section of the Act, referred for information on this point to the Hon. Mr. Royal, Attorney-General of Manitoba, now here, who states that no notice of the passage of the Act in question was given, and that the same has not been considered."

There has been a little misquoting. That is the close of the Report of the Minister of the Interior, and these are my words: "Under the circumstances the undersigned concurs in the recommendation of the Minister that the Act should be disallowed." I have shown it was intended that the Local Legislature should have given three months' notice to the half-breeds to afford them an opportunity of redeeming the lands. The Local Government had not given the notice, they told us the Act was not considered as in force, and no notice had been given because it was thought the Act would not be allowed here. What would have been the consequence of allowing the Act? No adequate protection would have been given to the half-breeds, and without notice their rights would have been swept away, the moment the Act was placed on the Statute Book. The circumstance that the Act was not supposed to be in force would not have moved the speculators who had dealt with the half-breeds, and the hon. member for Provencher

(Mr. Royal) would not have failed to accuse us of neglect of duty if, after the notification made that the notice had not been given, and that the Act was not considered in force, we had not disallowed it. The hon. gentleman next referred to the Caldwell-McLaren case, and having read the judgment, continued: There is the judgment—and I notice that the hon. gentleman smiles with the smile he puts on when he is hard hit—there is the judgment of the dissenting Judge. He thought that was the effect of the Act. There is the view, not taken by advocates or agents or political friends in private conclave, but by a learned Judge, with the whole evidence and the whole arguments of counsel before him. The dissenting Judge declares that although he cannot concur in points of law with both his brethren, he is pleased that they arrived at the conclusion at which they arrived, because a contrary conclusion would be against the public interests. The Legislature has declared, and according to the Court of Appeal has rightly declared that the law was such, that Caldwell had a right to use these improvements and take the timber down. They declared, as the Legislature declared, that he had a right to take it down without compensation. They provided him with rights, which rights he has been deprived of by the disallowance of this Act without compensation; the property has to be used by Caldwell and others, and the hon. gentleman arguing the matter to-night, I think led the House and the country to believe that it will not be proper to disallow the other Act referred to in order that Mr. McLaren may be deprived of any compensation. The hon. gentleman stated that he had no longer any interest in the matter, but I maintain that, arguing as he has, we all know that there is another Act, the fate of which is to follow the decision of this House, and the hon. gentleman has been arguing his client's case, and the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Haggart) has been arguing the case of his principal. I will not read the two quotations which I promised from the language of the hon. Minister of the Interior.

Mr. HAGGART. What do you mean by my principal and my being an agent?

Mr. BLAKE. I mean McLaren to whom you have been agent. I do not say a paid agent; I do not believe a paid agent, but an agent.

Mr. HAGGART. I am his representative here and his friend, but no agent whatever.

Mr. BLAKE. His agent outside and his representative inside.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, it may be a shame, but it is true.

Mr. HAGGART. You are and were his paid agent.

Mr. BLAKE. No, I was his counsel.

Mr. HAGGART. You gave as your opinion that the law of the Ontario Legislature was bad, and I have your writing.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman knows that the law was altered.

Mr. HAGGART. Not to the extent that you advised it should be altered.

Mr. BLAKE. The law was altered after the hon. gentleman showed me the law. The hon. gentleman knows also that that was not an opinion in the sense in which he would apply the word. It was not a paid opinion, but simply the language of an hon. member speaking to another.

Mr. HAGGART. Certainly.

Mr. BLAKE. I am quite willing to stand by the opinion, and I am willing that the hon. gentleman should produce the paper. When the question was raised the hon. gentleman declared as follows, and I may say that I quote from the Mail report, as being the fairer to the hon. gentleman:

"He had been from the first in favor of a legislative union, and had believed that the best interests of the country might have been promoted by a Legislative Union of all the Provinces, aided by a subordinate system of municipal institutions with large powers. However, he had been overruled in that respect by large majorities in the old Parliament of Canada. The feeling had been unmistakable, not only in Canada but also in the other Provinces, that we could have only re-union on the Federal principle, and as he had thought then, as he thought still, that the union of the four Provinces was essential to the future development and progress of British North America, he yielded to his own opinions and went in with the Government of which he was a member for the establishment of a great Dominion on the principle of a Federal Union, and he had loyally, and to the best of his judgment, power and ability endeavored to carry out that principle faithfully. It was true that he had been charged by some hon. gentlemen with a desire to strengthen the central power, to the disadvantage of the Provincial Government and Legislatures; that he had given any doubt resting in his mind against the authority of the Local Legislatures, and to strengthen the central power, it might be so, though he had endeavored to prevent his own predilection for a Legislature over a Federal Union from preventing it. Still it might be that he had rather leaned in favor of centralization, but if a resolution like this was adopted formally and solemnly by the Dominion Legislature, he must say that his original ideas had been fully carried out, that a Federal Union of the Provinces was at an end; that the Legislative Union had commenced, and the whole real power and authority of all the powers of Government had been transferred from the Provincial Legislature to the Dominion Parliament. They could not draw the line. It might be, and he did not hesitate to say, that from his own point of view it was so in this case, that the minority, the Catholic minority in New Brunswick, suffered a wrong by this legislation, but there might be wrongs not only in questions of education or religion, but in questions of finance, of civil liberty, and in questions of every possible kind. And if the ultimate power of decision as to what is right and what was wrong was to be vested in this Parliament, where was there a vestige of the use of the power, of the benefit or advantage of all our paraphernalia of Provincial Governments and Provincial Legislatures. (Hear, hear.) If they were to deal here authoritatively and to order the Governor-General, the representative of the Queen, to disallow such Bills as they thought the Local Legislature ought not to have passed, they would have wiped off the slate as with a wet sponge, the influences and authority of the Local Governments and Legislatures, and have centred it all in the Canadian Parliament. Was this House prepared for this? Was it prepared to assume that new responsibility and to alter in spirit the Constitution? It might be that they might keep up the sham of Provincial Legislatures, but what would they be but sham, if at any time the members of the other Provinces disagreeing with the policy deliberately adopted by the Legislature of any one Province could alter that policy? Take the Province of Quebec, which was the most obvious instance he quoted, he believed we might have had a Legislative Union instead of a Federal Union if it had not been for the Province of Quebec. The other Provinces were of one race of Anglo-Saxon ancestry. To a great degree the majority in the other Provinces were Protestants, and their laws were based upon the common law and institutions of England. Lower Canada contained a different race and used a different language. The majority had a religion which was in the minority in the whole Dominion, and they claimed, and justly claimed as a protection to them, to those institutions which they held so dear, to their old associations, to their religion, and to the education which in that Province was based on religion, that we should not have a Legislative Union; but that in all the questions relating to the tenure of their land, their property, their institutions, and so on, they should have a Legislature having the power to act as they pleased; as they thought they ought to act in consonance with the wishes of their people. The Lower Canadians drew themselves up, and said, if the Constitution were not so drawn up as to give them the power to protect beyond a doubt their institutions, their religion, their language, and their laws, in which they had so great a pride, they would never consent to a union; and if that had not been agreed to, we should not now have had the Dominion of Canada. The same principle applied to all the Provinces. They had their rights, and the question was not whether this House thought a Local Legislature was right or wrong. But the whole question for this House to consider, whenever such a question as this was brought up, was that they should say at once that they had no right to interfere so long as the different Provincial Legislatures acted within the bounds of the authority which the Constitution gave them. (Hear, hear.) There was this fixed principle."

And here the hon. gentleman went to the root of the matter.

"That every Provincial Legislature should feel that when it was legislating, it was legislating in the reality and not in the sham. If they did not know and feel that the measures they were arguing, discussing and amending and modifying to suit their own people, would become law, it was all sham. The Federal system was gone forever, and the system which he had vindicated was adopted. He did not hesitate to say that it would have given him great pleasure if he could have come to the conclusion that the Act was beyond the competence of the New Brunswick Legislature. He believed they had made a great mistake, and many others agreed with him that they had better have left the law as it was. He spoke sub judice, because those who passed the law had a right to maintain its wisdom; but from his own point of view he believed it was a great mistake to have repealed the law and raised this question for but little purpose. (Hear, hear.) But that was a question for the Local Legislature. The question of education, except under the peculiar circumstances of the establishment of separate schools in Upper and Lower Canada, was left exclusively in the control of the Local Legislatures. It was withdrawn altogether from the supervision of the General Legislature, so that the people in each of the Provinces might educate their children after their own fashion."

Then, Sir, to quote another passage:

"If this House undertook the great responsibility of interfering with the local laws, they must be prepared to discuss the justice or injustice of every law passed by every Provincial Legislature—(hear, hear)—and this Legislature, instead of being as now the general Court of Parliament for the decision of great Dominion questions, would be simply a Court of appeal to try whether the Provincial Legislatures were right or wrong in the conclusions that they came to. (Hear, hear.) If this House was prepared to take that course and adopt that principle, then the Government of the day, while it would have much more responsibility, would also have much more power; for, besides conducting and administering the affairs of the whole Dominion as one great country, it would also have the power, the authority, and the control of a majority over every Bill, every Act, every conclusion, every institution, every right of every Province in Canada. (Cheers.)

"He believed that the institutions and laws of no Province would be safe hereafter. For all these considerations he hoped that this resolution would not be adopted. If it were adopted, if this House undertook the great responsibility of interfering with the local laws, they must be prepared to discuss the justice or injustice of every law passed by every Provincial Legislature, and this Legislature, instead of being, as now, the general court of Parliament, for the decision of great Dominion questions, would be simply a court of appeal to try whether the Provincial Legislatures were right or wrong in the conclusions they came to."

That is a position in which we ought not to be placed; that is the position in which the hon. gentleman places us, when he calls upon us to vindicate his disallowance of the Act in question on the ground that it was wrong, that it was an Act that the Local Legislature ought not to have passed, though it was within its competence. For his advice, and for the advice of his Government, he is responsible to us. It is our duty to consider whether his position is right or not. If he goes even further in the direction of old Tory doctrine and says he is not responsible for that advice, that the advice which was given is not subject to the criticism of Parliament, I would say if we are free, as we must be free to discuss everything advised by Ministers, then obviously if they have advised as to the propriety or impropriety of an Act of the Legislature on a subject with the exclusive competence of the Local Legislative Parliament, we must decide as to that decision. I have not entered into the question, and I decline to minimize this question, enormous as it is, by consideration, as to whether the compensation provided in this bill was exactly right, whether even the principle upon which that compensation was right is granted. I say we have the right to a hearing. The Government has no right to take into its hands the discussion of a question whether this compensation was right or not. My own opinion has been that no plan could be devised to meet this case except that of tolls, the old and recognized mode in such cases, recognized by the courts which declared it proper. But I say that if we are all convinced that this Act was wrong we are none the less bound to confirm it, leaving the responsibility with the people of the province. I suppose that appeal will be fruitless, but I would have hoped but for the expressions that have greeted us in the course of this debate, that upon a question of such pre-eminent magnitude, having such far-reaching consequences, in which there has been a deliberate attempt to reverse the free spirit and full and fair interpretation of our constitution under which, until now, we have lived, to go back, instead of doing what British people have done all over the world—go forward—and take away from us undisguisedly something we were told—the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) now says improperly—was ours in early days; instead of taking a retrograde and humiliating step we should by our vote this night announce and declare that these rights and liberties which we obtained as Provinces in 1867, which were recognised as ours in 1868, which have been recognised as ours ever since, shall not be tampered with or trampled upon by any Ministry however powerful, or the supporters of any Ministry however servile or subservient. If that hope is to be futile, I place my hope in that further and ultimate Court of Appeal before which this question will shortly be tried and I shall be satisfied to live under whatever form of constitution a majority of my fellow countrymen shall decide to be right; but as my belief is that they value their federal rights and liberties beyond anything else that this constitution gives them, so my belief and my hope is that they and I, after the appeal is passed, may be found in harmony in this, as I think we shall be in harmony on many other questions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At half-past three in the morning I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House for the same length as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I shall, however, shortly endeavor to reply to some of the remarks he has made in his long, his able essay on the Canadian Constitution. I am glad we have at last got a resolution of this kind before the House. I am very glad that this issue is brought before the House was apprehensive originally that we might have another and not so agreeable nor pacific a mode of defending ourselves, the Government, and perhaps this House on this subject. Why, the belligerent Premier of Ontario had threatened to march with his armies into the North-West because the present Government had asked for the reference of a disputed question to the highest Courts in the land; and I did not know but that the same belligerent might come down here because we had advised His Excellency, the representative of the Sovereign, to use the Royal prerogative of disallowance. I was afraid that he might come down here like another Oliver and order our Sergeant-at-Arms to "take away that bauble" and break us up. It has now assumed a milder form, it has assumed simply a vote of censure upon the Government. The hon. gentleman said of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall) that he found no difficulty in voting against the resolution, and that he and other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House found no difficulty in supporting the amendment of my hon. friend for Niagara the other day and yet they object to this resolution. I have great respect for the municipal law of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I have still greater respect for the constitutional law of my hon. friend for Halton. My hon. friend knows the difference between a resolution which did not involve a want of confidence, which did not involve censure, and a resolution expressing the principle of a grievance or a statement for the public good. My hon. friend drew the distinction at once. The hon. gentleman opposite does not seem to understand it, or at all events if he did understand he misrepresented the constitutional principle. The hon. gentleman wound up at near the conclusion of his speech by stating that he would not condescend to go into the question of compensation; whether there was compensation enough, whether treated rightly or wrongly,—there are much greater questions and great constitutional questions. Mr. McLaren might be wronged, his property might be taken away from him and handed over to another person, but he must suffer. Down must go this individual, because the great constitutional principle that he advocated must be fought at all hazards, and the hon. gentleman must make high falutin spread-eagle speech with the hope that it will have, in the desperate state of affairs of the hon. gentlemen opposite, some little effect in the elections of Ontario. The hon. gentleman commenced his speech with an attack on my hon. friend the Secretary of State, He said my hon. friend had insulted the Legislature of Ontario because he had stated that a Bill was passed by that high-minded independent Legislature to help a political friend.

Mr. BLAKE. To rob a friend of his.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman forgets that the Secretary of State was attacked in language disgraceful to an individual and that by a Minister of the Ontario Government. He was attacked and reviled, both himself and his race by a member of the Ontario Government, and the hon. gentleman who was so anxious that we should preserve all due respect for the Legislature of Ontario, said in his winding up remarks that I was supported by a senile and obsequious majority. That is the dignified language of the hon. gentleman towards an hon. member seated in the same House with him, a representative of the people as much as he is, and to use his own language, just as respectable as he is. The hon. gentleman went into a long argument to show that there was a difference between disallowance and reservation for Royal assent or the assent of the Governor General. Of course there is a difference. If a Bill is disallowed it must first have passed—it must have become law. If it is reserved for the Royal assent it is not law, until that assent is given, but in both cases the will of the Legislature had been expressed. The question of the assent of the Lieutenant-Governor or reservation of the Lieutenant-Governor is an act I may say of the executive branch of the Legislature; but in both cases the will of the Local Legislature, the will of the representatives had been equally expressed and I was surprised to hear the argument of hon. gentlemen, that the Lieutenant-Governor had a right to reserve Bills for the Royal assent. I was going to pursue that line of argument. The hon. gentleman laid down the law correctly. The fact of the matter is this: That the Queen cannot confer on the Governor General, and the British North America Act does not confer on Lieutenant-Governors greater powers than the Queen herself possesses. The Queen, as the hon. gentleman has truly said, cannot refuse a Bill which has been passed by both branches of the Legislature. If a Bill containing, in fact, her death-warrant was placed before her she would be obliged to give her assent to it, and the hon. Minister would be obliged to proffer that Bill to her for the purpose of getting that Royal assent. The same principle applies here. The hon. gentleman is quite right, that the Governor General is obliged to pass any Bill that has passed this House and the Senate: If the Bill is passed against the will of the Ministry, they must either adopt it and recommend it to the Governor General for his assent, or they must resign. So it is with respect to a Lieutenant-Governor. The British North America Act provides clearly that Lieutenant-Governors hold their office during pleasure subject to any instructions given to them from the Governor General, and I say, that without such instructions the Lieutenant-Governors of Ontario, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba would commit an unconstitutional error if, by the advice of their Ministers, they should refuse their assent to any Bill. The Ministers have no right to give that advice. They are not more powerful than the Government in England, and that Government is obliged to submit a Bill which has passed both Houses, and the only difference between England and the Provinces arises from our colonial stage of existence. The Governor-General has a two fold position, first as representative of the Sovereign with a responsible body of advisers, and secondly as an imperial officer, and if he gets instructions to reserve a Bill he is obliged to do so and the Ministers in England are responsible to the British Parliament for the proper use of the Royal prerogative. So in the same way the Lieutenant-Governor has no right unless instructed from the Governor-General to reserve a Bill, because that would be a breach of the principles of the British Constitution. The fact that a Bill is disallowed, especially on the advice of the Local Government, makes the case much worse for the Local Government. How great is the condemnation that the hon. gentlemen has pronounced upon the Local Government with respect to the Orange Bill. The hon. gentleman declares that the Dominion Government are trying to crush the independence of the Local Legislature notwithstanding the declared opinions of this Government. Mr. Mowat, on the contrary, has chosen to disregard his own legislation and to invite the Dominion Government to disregard the rights of the people, to set at naught the expressed will of his own Parliament. The hon. gentleman spoke about the conduct of the Dominion Government being an insult and an injury to the Local Legislature. What is the case? Here is the Orange Bill which affected no interest of the Dominion, Imperial or otherwise, and yet that gentleman spat in the face of his own Legislature, offered them the insult that the hon. gentleman says we are doing, and actually invited this Government to commit this wrong against his own Legislature—the members of that Parliament who are keeping him in his place, and what was still worse, he advised the Lieut.-Governor to reserve the Bill which he approved of himself and for which he himself had voted, and we know why that was, and if ever there was an instance of a man who degraded, who humiliated himself, it was that of the First Minister of the Province of Ontario, and for the meanest and most sordid of reasons. He voted for the principle of the Bill that the Orange body should be incorporated, and yet, as Stephano said to Trinculo, "Thou shalt be King, and I shall be Viceroy over thee." But there was a one-man power behind the throne, Mr. Speaker, there was a man called Christopher Fraser, and he said to him, "Pass that Bill if you dare." Then they concocted their little scheme. "We are in a position we do not like to hold. If we pass the Bill we alienate the Catholic vote, and if we do not pass it we alienate the Orange vote. We will commit a breach of the constitution. We will swallow our own words. We will say that this Bill ought not to be passed although we voted for it, and we will advise the Lieut.-Governor to send it down to Ottawa, and we will throw upon John A. all the annoyance and all the embarrassment which has now come upon our heads." But, Mr. Speaker, I am too old a bird to be caught with such chaff. I said, very politely, in very constitutional language—it was read by the hon. gentleman—"Gentlemen, this is none of our funeral. You may deal with your own measures," and we handed it back to them. Now this same gentleman who insulted his own Legislature, who, after voting for a bill, stating it was a good bill and ought to become law, supporting the principle of it to avoid this difficulty, broke upon the principle which the hon. gentleman has contended for so long and so eloquently—broke upon the principle which the hon. gentleman has defended so strongly. And now he comes through the hon. gentleman, through—I was going to say, his agent over there—at all events he is not a paid agent of the Government; he comes here and he gets the hon. member for West Durham to get up and denounce the Government for their action with regard to a bill in which a great interest was involved and a great wrong was contemplated; while at the same time he withdrew from his own Legislature a measure in which nobody was wronged, nobody was hurt, and nobody but those who desired to be incorporated cared one farthing about it. The hon. gentleman in his argument gave up the whole case. He quoted my language. I am very glad; it read very well. I laid down the sound and true principle, that the autonomy of every province, the independence of every province, the independence of every Legislature, should be protected unless there was a constitutional reason against it. The Government here are not to set up their opinion against the opinion of the Local Government or the Local Legislature. But the hon. gentleman approved of my letter of 1868. And, Sir, under those resolutions, those different stipulations, those different conditions and terms upon which I reported to the Governor General, that I thought there might be over interference with the Local Legislature—Isay, Sir, that this Bill violated distinctly the most important of those conditions. The hon. gentleman knew that his Government had done the same thing. He knew it would be quoted against him, and what does he say? "True, we did so, but these cases were exceptional, these were all exceptional." Well, this was an exceptional case. I do not say the hon. gentleman was not right in what he did. I do not say he was not right in every disallowance or every expression of opinion against Provincial Acts, but it does not rest in his mouth to object if we follow his example at a humble distance, when we think great interests are involved and we desire to protect them from wrong and destruction. The hon. gentleman to show how strong his feelings were in favor of the independence of the Local Legislatures, says many other things. "Why," says he, "I have known measures in the Local Legislature, when I was a member, which I disapproved of and voted against, and yet when they became law I never raised my voice in favor of disallowance." And he mentioned the Goodhue Bill. Why, Mr. Speaker, he voted for it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Mr. BLAKE. No, Sir.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, he voted for it.

Mr. BLAKE. No, Sir.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, he voted for it. Mr. Speaker, there was only one division on the whole Bill, as I am informed by a gentleman who has just gone out for the Journals. At all events, I will read you what took place when the Goodhue Bill came up for the third reading. I will just say, before reading the resolution, the House will see that it was drawn up especially for the purpose of doing away with the iniquity which the hon. gentleman says was in the Bill, and for the purpose of carrying out the principle which the hon. gentleman says he has taken care that, for the future, shall always be carried out—the reference to a legal tribunal. I will read from the Journals of Ontario, 1870-71:

"The Order of the Day for the third reading of the Bill (No. 12) to confine the deed for the distribution and settlement of the estate of the Hon. George Jarvis Goodhue, deceased, having been read,

The Hon. Mr. Carling, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Wood, that the Bill be now read the third time,

The Hon. Mr. Richards moved, in amendment, seconded by Hon. Mr. Graham (Hastings),

"That all the words after that be omitted and the following words substituted therefor: the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back forthwith to a Committee of the whole House, with an instruction to amend the same by inserting as the fourth clause the following:—'4. Provided always, and it is hereby declared, that the foregoing enactments or any of them, shall not take effect until it shall have been decided by a majority of the Judges of one of the Superior Courts in this Province, that the interests of the testator's estate, by the said will bequeathed in trust for all his children who shall be living on the death of his said wife, were on his death, or at any time thereafter before the passing of this Act, vested interests in the children of the testators. And with a further instruction to insert the necessary provisions for obtaining the decision of such Judges.'"

The amendment was put and lost on a division of 7 for and 45 against, and I read among the nays the following names: Anderson, Barber, Baxter, Beatty and Blake.

Mr. BLAKE. You will find my vote recorded against the Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Bill passed. There was a clause introduced for the purpose of protecting those vested interests which the Bill attacked, for the purpose of referring the case to one of the Superior Courts of Toronto, so that the rights of the children would be protected; and the hon. gentleman voted that down, and this nefarious Bill, with his assistance, was read a third time, and became the law of the land. The hon. gentleman says there are exceptional cases, but cases are only exceptional when he chooses to decide they shall be so. He says I may be right or wrong; but this at all events, was my opinion, and the hon. gentleman reads his opinion. There was no division on the second reading. The hon. gentleman holds the opinion he gave at the time as conclusive evidence that the case was an exceptional one; and although the autonomy of the different Provinces was to be attacked and their independence destroyed, the hon. gentleman says I gave my opinion—I may be right or wrong, but that is a sufficient answer.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. member will allow me to read:

"The Order of the Day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee to consider Bill No. 12, to confirm the deed for the distribution and settlement of the estate of the Honorable George Jarvis Goodhue, deceased, having been read;

"The Hon. Mr. Carling moved, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Wood,

"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.

"The Hon. Mr. Richards moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Cumberland,

"That all the words after 'That' be omitted and the following words substituted therefor: 'The consideration of the Bill be postponed until this day three months,' and a debate having arisen, and it being twelve of the clock, midnight;

"Friday, 27th January, 1871.

"The debate was continued, and the amendment having been put, was lost on the following division:—

"Yeas:—Messrs. Blake, Boyd, Cook, Craig (Russell), Cumberland Finlayson, Gow, Graham (Hastings), Macdonald, McCall (Elgin) Read, Richards, Wallis—13."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman did not vote against the principle of the Bill at the second reading. This is a vote to adjourn the debate. The hon. gentleman voted to adjourn the debate for three months, because it would take three months for him to make up his mind on the Bill. He found out a few days afterwards that he would make up his mind a good deal quicker, and he voted for the Bill. The hon. gentleman's first impulses were virtuous. He would show great consideration to the children, and not take away their property, but his scruples, like Bob Acres' resolutions, slipped through his fingers, and a few days afterwards he voted for the third reading.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It passed unanimously, everyone in the House voting for it. He did not raise his voice in the protection of the children's rights, but he voted against a resolution which, if passed, would have protected in a great measure these children from the nefarious state of things which the hon. gentleman now says was prevented by that Bill. In this way we see some evidences of the high spread-eagleism and enthusiastic patriotism of this political and social saint. But, after all, the hon. gentleman's chief complaint is that we did not give notice according to the memorandum I prepared in 1868. Why, if we had communicated with Mr. Mowat, we should have been laying ourselves open only to an insulting answer. That hon. gentleman and his Government had, through the Crown Lands Commissioner, endeavored to bully Mr. McLaren out of his rights, and in a letter received by him it was said that he must give up his rights. This Bill was introduced, not for the purpose of altering the general law, but for the simple purpose of carrying out the threat in Mr. Pardee's letter and robbing him of his property. Something has been said about political reasons actuating the Dominion Government in the disallowance of that Bill. There is one thing clear, the fact that Mr. Caldwell's nephew, his stool-pigeon, the young man who was elected there through his uncle's influence in the county, the agent and representative of his uncle's estate—agent is a parliamentary word—was holding up his finger to his mouth. A letter had been sent intimating to Mr. McLaren that unless he gave up his property, they would show him something. They did show him something. All arguments were used that could be used against that measure, but dressed in a little brief authority, Jacks-in-the-box, trampling on the man as they said they would do, they pleased Mr. Caldwell and robbed Mr. McLaren. An hon. member has stated that the Streams Bill was not intended for Mr. McLaren, but for general application. The highway robber is bad enough, there is something of manliness about him; but it is mean of the sneak who creeps down the backstairs and steals the kitchen utensils, or the fellow who comes behind you and picks your pocket—they are men more to be despised than the highway robber. It would have been more manly if the Ontario Government had introduced a Bill to hand over Peter McLaren's property to Wm. Caldwell; they dare not do so, and therefore, they passed a Bill respecting Rivers and Streams. It was a wretched, flimsy and transparent device; it deceived nobody, but it was only by being a public bully that the Government could introduce and carry it; otherwise there must be a petition. It had the effect of depriving Mr. McLaren of his property under the pretence that it was in the public interest. Nothing more contemptible or sinister could be done by a Government or Legislature. It was a Bill to take from Mr. McLaren his property and hand it over to Mr. Caldwell. True, Mr. McLaren had spent, some say $250,000, and hon. gentlemen opposite say from $100,000 to $150,000—I do not know how much it was—but it was Mr. McLaren's property. The river at that spot was not a navigable river, and the Judge who heard the evidence and viewed the facts stated that it was clear that at the place where the improvements were made it was not only not navigable but not floatable. It would scarcely allow a plank or a slab to go down any more than upon a ditch. Caldwell's timber and logs could not go through there until the improvements were made. Mr. McLaren, with his usual industry and perseverance, in order to carry on his extensive business, made a dam and a slide out of his own timber, for his own purposes and on his own soil. Mr. Caldwell had no right to use it without his consent and without paying for it. It was absolutely the property of Mr. McLaren. Mr. Caldwell said: "Now this slide has been put up I may as well run down my timber;" and when he tried to induce Mr. McLaren to allow him to use it Mr. McLaren said: "I will allow you if you will acknowledge my proprietary rights." Mr. Caldwell had set up a claim to use these improvements and sent his timber over them, although the stream might be filled with Mr. McLaren's own timber. No matter, although he might be thrown back for the whole season, the improvements threw it open to Mr. Caldwell or anybody else who chose to send their logs that way. What he did say was: "If you acknowledge my proprietary right, you can use my slide." The hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Macdonell) says that he would not be caught in such a trap. He was going to use the improvements himself. He was going to take the position as if they were his own. He wished to set up a claim to use the river and all these improvements without paying for them. He would not fall into the trap. If he was an honest man he would have admitted that right. He would have said: "If you put up these improvements I could use them, and I have a right to acknowledge your proprietary interest and I will pay you for the use of them." That he should have admitted that proprietary right is shown by the Bill itself, because the Bill says that Mr. McLaren has a right to levy tolls and that could only be by virtue of a proprietary right, because if he had not such a right he would be an usurper and he could not ask him to pay a cent. The Bill itself admits that he had a proprietary right although Mr. Caldwell would not fall into the trap and tried to cheat him out of his proprietary right.

An hon. MEMBER. Nothing of the kind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. McLaren put the improvements there and Mr. Caldwell claimed to have a right to use them. The cuckoo watches the linnet building its nest, and just as the nest is finished it goes in. Mr. Caldwell is the cuckoo who asks the linnet to walk out. He says: "Give up your proprietary right to me. I am not in a position to build a nest, lay my eggs and raise my little brood." That may be a very clever trick on the part of Mr. Caldwell, but ornithologists all agree that the cuckoo is a very dishonest and thievish bird. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) spoke in language of contempt with regard to compensation. He has a soul far above dollars and cents. I think, however, that the hon. gentleman made rather a slip in his law when he speaks of the material, earth and logs, and water and stone as an easement.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The right to use it as an easement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I know what the hon. gentleman said. He said the only way to recompense a man who had an easement was to pay him toll. Now, he put this up at the expense of some hundreds of thousands of dollars. It was one of the many enterprises by which Mr. McLaren has risen from a lorny-handed son of toil, to use a favorite expression, to the position of a wealthy man. He did not know but what his limits might be taken away from him by Mr. Pardee, and he was obliged to count the sticks as they were going through the slide. He would be obliged to make up a report each time, and then to make a careful aggregate of the tolls he received for many years on account of this easement. That was the argument of the hon. gentleman opposite. Supposing an honest old farmer's wife would expropriate her neighbor's hen and say: "I shall keep this hen, and you shall feed it right and see that it lays and at the proper time, and I will pay you by giving you a share of the eggs." That is the proposition which they made, and the hon. gentleman during all his long, instructive and able essay on Constitutional law, did not venture to say one word in favor of the measure. He could not do it, for a very substantial reason—because he had given his opinion solemnly to Mr. McLaren's agent that the Bill was a rotten Bill and should not pass.

Mr. BLAKE. No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman quoted the Bills that were disallowed. I have already stated that it makes no difference whether a Bill is disallowed, or whether it is reserved; in either case the will of the Legislature is expressed, and whether the law is set aside by the Governor General by disallowance or by provincial advisers of the Lieutenant-Governor by their advising him to reserve it for the consideration of the Governor General, the injury or insult to the Local Legislature is the same, their independence is equally attacked, and all the fine wire drawing of the hon. gentleman to show a distinction between the two cases should be set at naught. The argument of my hon. friend for North Simcoe on that point cannot be answered. The hon. member who moved this amendment had not quite the candor of the hon. member who spoke last. He went in to make a speech against the Government for the disallowance of this Bill, and he made a severe attack upon us, and quoted several Bills that had been disallowed, but he did not condescend to make a single allusion to any one of the measures which had been disallowed or disapproved by the Government of which he was a supporter; and from all we could gather from his speech, he believes that the Government have permitted a series of atrocities against the liberties of the Provinces, while they were immaculate always, the friends of the people, and had always taken the opposite course. But the hon. member for West Durham could not get away from their own Acts, and he tried to show the difference between those cases of disapproval and the cases which came under my former and my present supervision. Their cases were exceptional cases; but the hon. gentleman argued that if any Bill was within the competence of a Local Legislature, we under no circumstances should interfere with it. The hon. gentleman read the passage in my speech which I made on the New Brunswick School Bill, and pronounced ore rotundo the sentences in which I advocated, as I have always advocated, the protection of the rights of the different Provinces. The hon. gentleman read them with great approval, and yet he himself, as a member of the Government and as a Minister of Justice, recommended the disapproval and disallowance of certain measures which he admits were within the competence of the Local Legislature. The hon. gentleman denied my statement across the floor that he had threatened the Quebec Legislature with the disallowance of their bill about assurers taking out licenses. I say he did exactly what was tantamount to disallowance; he did exactly what was the proposition contained in my resolution of 1868; he wrote to the Legislature of Quebec, pointing out all the evils of that Bill, and called their attention to the necessity of amending it at their next sitting. That was the proposition in my resolution; and again and again, as Minister of Justice, when I saw a Bill that was objectionable, either as being ultra vires or affecting the interests of the Dominion, I have called the attention of the Legislature to it, saying that such and such a clause is ultra vires or objectionable for this or that reason, "and I write you this letter so that you may have an opportunity of amending it at the next Session." We know that that is an intimation that if it was not amended at the next Session it would be disallowed. But what about that second Half-Breed Act from Manitoba? The first Act, the hon. gentleman says, was highly objectionable. It was reserved by Mr. Morris, the Lieutenant-Governor, for the assent of the Governor General, and although it was a very bad Bill, and very objectionable on every ground, yet such was his respect for provincial autonomy that he allowed that Bill to pass.

Mr. BLAKE. It was the hon. gentleman that allowed it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then I am very glad to hear it. So then I am not the man who trampled on the independence of the Local Legislature.

Mr. BLAKE. Not then.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They passed that Bill; and objectionable as it was, I in my regard for the autonomy and independence of Manitoba recommended the Governor General to give it his assent. But a change came over the Government, and when the amended Act came down it was disallowed by the party which is now appealing for provincial rights. The first Act was recommended for the Royal Assent, and I recommended that the Royal Assent should be given. The amended Act came down when the hon. gentleman was in the Government, and when it was law—because it was both passed by the Legislature and assented to by the Lieutenant Governor—the hon. gentleman, this guardian of provincial interests, disallowed it, and gave his reasons therefor—because it was an exceptional Bill. And I have no doubt that when that hon. gentleman becomes Minister of Justice again—absit omen—there will be many, many of these exceptional cases found whether the patent is issued or not. No matter, the parties had their own rights, subject to getting a patent and transfer of the Government title and of the patent; they must be governed and ought to be governed by the law of Manitoba, and not by the Dominion law of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman said he thought that the Dominion law should apply. We all know, he said, that it comes from Ontario. Why we know, Mr. Speaker, that whether the patent is issued in Ontario or not, the question whether these rights are legal or equitable, is always considered; but they cannot be revised. If the property had belonged to the Queen in her royal capacity; if the land were still owned by Her Majesty and were to be disposed of by the Imperial Government, any person going on that land could not affect the title of the Crown, but the transfer of this property from one man to another, and the devising of and dealing with this property, must be governed by the law of Manitoba and not by the law of England.

Mr. McCARTHY. It was scrip.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am told, Mr. Speaker, that it was scrip, which passes from hand to hand. Why this land scrip once given is like a promissory note, or like a bond. It can be handed from man to man, from half-breed to half-breed, from white to white, governed as they ought to be and must be by the law of the locality, subject to the rights of the Crown, but the rights of the Crown in the Crown lands in Manitoba and the North-West, must be dealt with here, and as far as this Bill is concerned the separate rights of the half-breeds must be dealt with under the same law, under the same construction of the law, and liable to the same law. They are not infants or minors under the charge of the Government as trustees or guardians. Half-breeds have the same rights and the same responsibilities and the same independence as the white man; and their properties being in scrip, or lands, or in goods, must be governed by the law of Manitoba; and yet the hon. gentleman says that this is a matter which only affects people up there in which no great interest could be involved, and in which no Dominion interest could be in any way affected. The hon. gentleman in his report said—what did he say? Why, he said that the Bill was disallowed on the report of the hon. Minister of the Interior, that no notice had been published in the Manitoba Gazette, as one of the clauses pretended and recommended disallowance, because in his opinion—and we have no right to express our opinion here—the original Act 37 Vic., chap. 44, conferred all the necessary protection to the purchaser of half-breed lands.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Now, do not throw over the Minister of the Interior. Do not disavow him because there is added the words: "concurring in by" the Minister of Justice, Mr. Blake, and approved of by Council, 7th October, 1877.

Mr. BLAKE. I concurred in the resolution, but not in the recommendation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In other words, the decision of the hon. gentleman was that although all the reasons given—

Mr. BLAKE. No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then, although some of the reasons given by the Minister of the Interior were bad, and although he did not approve of them, yet he comes to the same conclusion, and he insults the Legislature of Manitoba. He trampled on their autonomy. He snuffed them out, because, forsooth, in their own opinion, overriding the opinion of the Legislature of Manitoba, he thought they were better off with the old Bill than with the new one. These are the gentlemen who are protecting the rights and the autonomy of the different Provinces. Why, Mr. Speaker, the whole House laughed at him. You can see the absurdity of the Opposition in which the hon. gentlemen are placing themselves in their endeavor to make political capital in this wretched way, as they have no merits of their own, no acts of their own, by which they can claim the confidence of the people; they must raise these little questions; but when we find written before us that they have done the same things, that they have contrary to their speeches, contrary to their press, and contrary to the attacks which they have made on this Government, again and again carried out that policy, what can be said of them; and we are compelled to use the term which was employed with regard to them the other night, and declare that they are an organized hypocrisy. Sir, this Bill is retroactive. Oh, but it is a general Bill. It was introduced as a general Bill; otherwise it could not have been got through at all. A Private Bill must be introduced by petition; notice must be given of it. As a Private Bill, Mr. McLaren must be heard before the Committee on Private Bills, and it was, even for that Government, too strong a measure to pass a law expressly to take one man's property and hand it over to another; and so the Government introduced this Bill. The greatest proof of fraud is shown by the style of the Bill. What would be said, Mr. Speaker, if the Legislature of Quebec some years ago—and perhaps it is the case now—when the Magdalen Islands all belonged to Admiral Coffin, who was sole proprietor, had legislated against Admiral Coffin. He was sole freeholder, and the Islands were covered by his tenants; and suppose they wished to make Admiral Coffin pay all the taxes, and would say: We cannot directly say that he shall pay the taxes of all the people of the Island, but we will pass a Bill stating that it is proper to declare that all the taxes on the Magdalen Islands shall be paid and defrayed by the freeholders on the Island, there being only one freeholder. That would look very much like fraud. This was the same kind of fraud, and it was done with the same fraudulent intent. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I would say that the report was made by the Minister of Justice, the present Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, my namesake, Mr. McDonald. I heartily approve of it. I take the responsibility for it, and my colleagues will join me in doing so. We were protecting a man from a great wrong, from a great loss and injury, from a course which, if pursued, would destroy the confidence of the whole civilized world in the law of the land. What property would be safe? What man would make an investment in this country? Would capitalists come to Canada if the rights of property were taken away, as was attempted under this Bill? This was one of the grounds on which in that paper of mine, of 1867, I declared that, in my opinion, all Bills should be disallowed if they affected general interests. Sir, we are not half a dozen Provinces. We are one great Dominion. If we commit an offence against the laws of property, or any other atrocity in legislation, it will be widely known. England is so far off that she is not affected by it; she is not so likely to disallow our Bills, however bad they may be, because the consequences fall on our own heads. But here where we are one country and altogether, and we go from one Province to another as we do from one county to another and from one town to another, is it to be borne that laws which bind civilized society together, which distinguish civilization from barbarism, which protect life, reputation and property, should be dissimilar; that what should be a merit in one Province should be a crime in another, and that different laws should prevail. There may be differences in the laws in detail, but the great grand principle, that every man should have the right to occupy his own house and property, sit under his own fig-tree, cultivate his own vine, and be protected in all this, is the common law of all civilized countries and must prevail throughout the Dominion. The hon. gentleman has threatened us with an appeal to the people. Sir, we have no objection to go to the people. If I told these hon. gentlemen that the elections were to take place on the 17th of September, 1883, why, Sir, Grit stock would go up 20 per cent. Their faces have been lengthened so that their longitude is almost as long as their speeches. From the reading of the amendment it is clear that the hon. member for South Huron is not to be fully trusted. Sir, I have no doubt that the honest men of the country will vote to support the Government in this measure. I do not mean to say the hon. gentlemen are going to vote against their consciences, but the country will believe that they were fully conscious of what they were voting.

Mr. CASEY. I do not rise to enter into the merits of the case of Caldwell vs. McLaren, but I do protest against the tone adopted by the right hon. leader of the Government. He has treated the whole matter in a light and careless strain as if it were one entirely undeserving of public attention. The right hon. gentleman was occupied trying to give to his supporters some excuse which they might offer their constituents for giving the vote they are now asked to give. That excuse took the form it always takes in the case of a man who is utterly without logical defence of his position, unmitigated abuse of a man concerned in this private suit—a man who is not here, and whose acts are not before the House, with whose character we have no concern, and unmitigated abuse of the Ontario Government, which he compared to an arrant sneak thief. Is that dignified? Is it language that any Ontario man can listen to tamely without protest? I am sure my Conservative friends felt ashamed of the excuse made for the conduct of their Government. They dared not repeat that language in any Ontario constituency. I do not intend going into the merits of the question, but I would say with reference to Quebec, which has, above all other Provinces, an interest in this question, that the day may come when the members from that Province will regret the stand they are taking. Members from the smaller Provinces, too, are particularly interested in this matter. Ontario is a large Province and can afford to be snubbed in this way, for she can take her revenge, but if it should unfortunately happen that one of the smaller Provinces should be pitted against the Government, it would inevitably have to be crushed. The hon. gentleman speaks confidently of the result of the General Elections. If he will fix the date early in June, he will have an opportunity of seeing how short his anticipations will fall of realization.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I rise to correct an erroneous statement of the hon. member for West Durham. The hon. gentleman stated that the right hon. First Minister was responsible for the disallowance of the first Half-Breeds Land Act. I find, on looking at the Minutes of the Council, that the disallowance of that Act took place on the 2nd February, 1874. True, the Act was sent here in March, 1873, by the Lieutenant-Governor, but it remained unacted upon until the 27th February, 1874, when it was reported by the Governor in Council. Another erroneous statement was that the reason why he advised the disallowance of the Half-Breeds Land Grant Act was that it dealt with the ungranted lands of the Crown. The right hon. Premier read a part of that report which the hon. member for West Durham tried to get out of by saying it was the report of the Minister of the Interior and not his, but on reference to it, I find it is signed: "The undersigned concurs in the recommendation of the Minister of Interior that the Act be disallowed." I should like to know if the hon. Minister of Justice, upon whose report alone the Bill could be disallowed, concurring in the recommendation of one or the other Ministers, is not responsible for every word of that recommendation and every statement contained in it. The hon. Minister of the Interior recommended that the Act be disallowed, as in his opinion the original Act opposed the necessary protection to half-breed lands. It is assigned as an afterthought, and is brought up to try to get rid of the manifest fact that that legislation was disallowed, that the then hon. Minister of Justice had recommended the disallowance of that Act as being improper, unjust and unnecessary for the Local Legislature to pass, and not because it interfered with the right of the Crown. There is one point more I have to refer to. If it is a reason that legislation was unnecessary for the disallowance of the Act. A reference to the law of Ontario as it stood at the time this Act now in question was disallowed would show that this particular Act was wholly unnecessary. The point I wish to make is this: if Mr. Caldwell had chosen, honestly and fairly, to pay what he ought to have paid, or to take the proper steps that he could, under the law as it stood without any new legislation, have taken, he would have obtained a remedy and the use of Mr. McLaren's improvements on these rivers without this kind of confiscating and unjust legislation which the Ontario Legislature passed. There was in force at the time, and is still in force, an Act for the formation of joint-stock companies for constructing works to facilitate the transmission of timber down rivers and streams. Under that Act Mr. Caldwell could have incorporated a joint-stock company in the ordinary way with five persons, and could then not only have made such works as he liked upon the stream, but could have expropriated all the improvements already made by Mr. McLaren then in existence on the stream. Under the 51st section of the Act of the Consolidated Statutes of Ontario, it is provided :

"In case there is already established by any party other than a company formed under this Act or some other Act of the late Province of Canada, or of this Province, any slide, pier, boom or other work intended to facilitate the passage of timber down any water for the improvement of which a company is formed under this Act, such company may take possession of the works, and the owners thereof, or (if they have been constructed on the property of the Crown) the persons at whose cost they have been constructed may claim a compensation for the value of such works either in money or in stock of such company, at the option of such owner or the person at whose cost the same was constructed, and may become shareholders in the said company for an amount equal to the value of such works, such value to be ascertained by arbitrators."

Now, it is quite evident that under that clause all Mr. Caldwell had to do was to form a joint-stock company, and then he could have proceeded honestly and fairly. He could have gone to Mr. McLaren, or his company could, and said : "We expropriate your improvements, we take them for the benefit of this company, for the purpose of facilitating the transmission of timber down streams, but we will have to pay you the value, that is, your expenditure of capital upon these works, the compensation to be decided by arbitration," and which undoubtedly would have given Mr. McLaren fair and reasonable compensation which, under the operation of this Act, Mr. Caldwell would have been obliged to pay him. But instead of that Mr. Caldwell goes to the Ontario Legislature and gets men to pass an Act which was wholly unnecessary, because under the Act then in force he could have accomplished all he desired, but he wanted good faith. He need not have procured the legislation he did ; but under the legislation he did procure, all he had to do was to pay Mr. McLaren the tolls which he might get his friend, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, or the members of the Government that passed this, what I deem iniquitous, legislation, to fix for him.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to correct a mis-statement made by the Secretary of State, and also by the hon. First Minister who leads the House. I am not going into a discussion of the general principles of this measure ; I have no doubt it will soon be transferred to another tribunal where we will have an opportunity of discussing the question very fully. I will only say this with regard to the merits of the question. If the hon. gentleman will look at the second section of his Land Bill he will see whether he can reconcile the statement he has made here to-night in regard to the Streams Bill with the provisions he has inserted in the Act we have under discussion. The Secretary of State made a statement with regard to the disallowance of a certain clause in the Quebec Act, contradicting the statement made by the hon. member for Quebec East. Now, I find by examining the Act that these sections, which my hon. friend from Quebec East quoted, have never been repealed.

Mr. BOWELL. What he said was that these portions of the law have been complained of.

Mr. MILLS. I have the statement here before me. The petition and complaint are directed against these two particular sections that allowed companies to appropriate the rights of certain parties in mines without any compensation, and these sections still stand a part of the law. My hon. friend was strictly accurate in his statement, and the Minister was wholly wrong. Now, Sir, with regard to the other statement made by the First Minister in reference to the disallowance of a certain Manitoba Act relating to half-breed lands, I may tell the hon. gentleman that he himself has always acted on a different principle from what he has laid down here to-night. I hold in my hand the Dominion Lands Act of 1872, of which the 28th section reads as follows :—

"And whereas effect could not be given to the above-mentioned Order in Council until the lands in Manitoba had been surveyed, and in the meantime many of the said men so entitled as above have assigned their interest in such free grants, such assignments duly made and attested, and having the certificate of discharge in the case of non-commissioned officers or private soldiers attached thereto, and filed in the Dominion Lands Office before the issue of the warrant, shall be held to transfer in each case the interest of the man so entitled in the warrant when issued, which latter, in every such case shall be attached after registry, to the assignment on file, and held for delivery to the party entitled thereto, or for location."

Now, Sir, the question as to whether these lands were to be transferred under the law of Manitoba, or whether they were to be transferred under an Act of the Legislature, was in this Act decided that they should be transferred by an Act of this Legislature and not by an Act of the Manitoba Legislature. Then I find that the 4th sub-section of the 33rd section reads :

"Questions as to the homestead right arising between different settlers shall be investigated by the local agent of the division where the land is situated, whose report and recommendation, together with the evidence taken shall be referred to the Secretary of State for decision."

Now, Sir, the question is not referred to some party appointed under the local law of the Province of Manitoba for the purpose of being disposed of. It refers to that local law, and it was referred to the agent of the Dominion Government, acting under the authority of this Act. Then again the 12th sub-section of that section says :

"When both parents die without having devised the land, and leaving a child or children under age, it shall be lawful for the executors, if any, of the last surviving parent, or the guardian or guardians of such child or children, with the approval of a Judge of the Superior Court of the Province or Territory in which the lands lie, to sell the lands for the benefit of the infant or infants, but for no other purpose ; and the purchaser in such case shall acquire the homestead right by such purchase, and on carrying out the unperformed conditions of such right, shall receive a patent for the land upon payment of the office fees."

Now here is a question with regard to the law of succession, with regard to the manner in which the property shall be transferred to the heirs and how it shall be disposed of, all provided in this Act. The hon. gentleman did not then lay down the doctrine he has laid down to-night. He does not say how the rights of those persons are to be dealt with under the local law of the Province. That has nothing to do with the law of succession, and all we have to do is to dispose of the land and the law will regulate into whose hands the land shall fall. The hon. First Minister misrepresented the hon. member for West Durham. That hon. member did not speak of Mr. McLaren having an easement on those improvements on the river, but he stated that those who had the right to float logs down stream and utilise Mr. McLaren's improvements had an easement which could be paid for by tolls on the logs.

SUPPLY.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

98. Public Buildings in Nova Scotia.$31,000

In reply to Mr. Mills,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The reason of this item being double that of last year is that it includes the vote of last year which was not expended because the title to the property for the Truro Custom House could not be obtained. The second vote of $750 is for an addition to the Marine Hospital.

After some discussion, Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the item of $750 for Marine Hospital be struck out.

Motion agreed to.

New Glasgow Public Buildings $6,000

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. There is an addition here of $2,000. What position is this building in, what is its purpose, and what has the $4,000 heretofore demanded been expended for?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The money voted before has not been expended. The site is to be furnished by the locality, and the money is not to be expended until the site is furnished. The building is for public offices, such as the Custom House and Post Office.

Halifax Cattle Quarantine Station $5,000

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is for the erection of a cattle quarantine station at the request of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. MILLS.

Mr. KILLAM. I would like to ask what is being done towards the establishment of a quarantine station on Bunker's Island in the county I represent. Such a station is very badly needed. A veterinary surgeon could be procured without much cost to the Government, and facilities could be afforded to those who wish to import cattle to do so without running the risk of bringing dangerous diseases into the country, and at a very small cost to the Department. I am sorry hon. gentlemen have not yet decided to accede to the wishes of the people there, and I can tell them that their refusal is only another nail in their coffin. It is not to be taken for granted, and the hon. gentleman knows it. When we were on the other side of the House no such thing was ever dreamed of or attempted as putting through these things in this fashion without information, and hon. gentlemen opposite would have cried out against us if we had done so. We distinctly object to this item going through until we get this information.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I move that this item stand until we have fuller information respecting it.

Motion negatived.

Mr. MILLS. It is very extraordinary that we cannot obtain this information, but we must discharge our duties to the people, although we are a small minority. It is also an extraordinary hour 6 a.m., for the Government to rush through the Estimates in this manner.

Mr. HESSON. It is just the hour when the hardy son of toil goes to work. It is consequently proper to proceed.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. During my 20 years experience in Parliament, I never saw an attempt made to put through Estimates after a 16 hours continuous sitting. This is a gross abuse, and a gross act of tyranny. The items are important, and in the nature of things we cannot give them proper attention. The First Minister knows very well that this will not expedite business. When we were in office, not six or seven days, but six or seven weeks were consumed in getting through the Estimates, although we were ready with all the information.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When hon. gentlemen opposite were on this side of the House, we were again and again kept until two, three and five o'clock, in the discussion of the Estimates.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Not till six, certainly.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps not. But allow me to point out to these hon. gentlemen that during the present Session in England, Mr. Trevelyan made a motion at three o'clock, and Mr. Childers at half-past two o'clock, and the votes for the Army and Navy were taken at about this hour.

Mr. BOWELL. It is a most extraordinary thing that objection should be taken when the item has been repeatedly explained. The only question relates to the locality at Halifax, where the building is to be erected.

Mr. BLAKE. We asked where the quarantine is to be, what proportion of the $5,000 was to be expended on land, and what in buildings, and of what capacity the station will be.

Mr. CASGRAIN. How many importers are we going to have who will import the cattle? Is this station to be for one, or two, or three importers?

Mr. BOWELL. For as many as like to buy cattle.

Mr. LANDRY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would like to know the color of the cattle.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I protest against this lengthy sitting. I think proceedings such as this tyranny and coercion. The night before last we sat up until four in the morning and last night until two o'clock, and to insist on our remaining here at this hour cannot be at all justified.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I notice a new item of $15,000 for the Truro Custom House, Post Office and Savings Bank. We would like full information about this.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The total cost of land and buildings will be $20,000. The land is not purchased yet, because we had no money voted by Parliament. We ask for $15,000 this year, with which we will be able to purchase the land, and begin the construction of the buildings. I suppose the land will cost something like $3,000. The business and revenue at Truro have very largely increased during late years. In 1870 the total amount of revenue from Customs and Excise was $10,513; in 1881, it was $42,719.

Mr. ARKELL. During last summer the Minister of Public Works visited various public works in Ontario. The reception of the hon. Minister at St. Thomas was most cordial, there being between 200 and 300 persons present when he was entertained.

Mr. MILLS. The people expected to be recouped.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. Minister of Public Works, it will be remembered, made a tour in Western Ontario. I happened to be in Detroit and noticed his car standing on the Canada Southern road. I noticed a man in gold lace, and I enquired whether the hon. Minister was there or would be present. The reply was in the negative, and it appeared that the hon. gentleman was going east by steamer, so it required a steamboat and palace car to carry the hon. gentleman a few miles.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). The hon. member for Norfolk has drawn entirely on his imagination. I happen to know the facts and to be able to correct them. I am glad there was a servant there, also that the car door was locked, otherwise the hon. gentleman's private papers might have been endangered.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the point of order?

Mr. CASEY. The point of order is that the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) has, in the heat of debate, insinuated that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) would steal the papers belonging to the Minister of Public Works. If that is not what he means I hope he will explain his meaning.

Mr. PATTERSON. Hon. gentlemen may take it as they please, but I say if the car had not been locked and attended to by a porter, it is possible that some of Sir Hector Langevin's papers would have been missing.

Mr. CASEY. I have no objection to the hon. Minister of Public Works making a political tour or a stump-speaking tour throughout the country; I am sure everybody was glad to see him personally, and he made himself agreeable, but I do object to the statement that the meetings were non-political. When the hon. gentleman came to St. Thomas he made no secret that his visit was a political one. Some of his friends gave him a banquet, and I know that Reformers were invited to subscribe to it under the impression that it was to be a non-political affair, but when the banquet took place the hon. Minister took occasion, as was naturally expected, to refer to political questions. He enlarged on the fact that the Government had secured a great surplus, and he invited all towns and localities in want of public works to come and state their needs, and the tone of his speech was calculated to evoke such a remark as that made by Mr. Rowe.

Mr. MILLS. Since the Ministry are so anxious to go on at this late hour of seven o'clock in the morning, I think it is rather strange that the Minister in charge should be absent.

Mr. CHARLTON. I move that the Committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to; resolutions ordered to be reported; and (at 7:30 o'clock, a.m., Saturday) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 17th April, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to refer to an incident which occurred in the debate in Committee of Supply on Saturday morning last. On that occasion a reference to a visit of Sir Hector Langevin to my constituency last summer was imported into the debate in connection with a vote for Public Works in Nova Scotia. The hon. member for North Norfolk, who I regret not to see in his seat, took part in the debate, and used language that seemed to me to imply that he had obtained his information in a manner not in accordance with customary usages. I resented the attack on the hon. the Minister of Public Works because I knew that his mode of travelling, whether by rail or water on that occasion, was exclusively his own affair, and did not cost the country a cent. I resented it also, because the hon. Minister was the guest of my constituents and myself, and without premeditation, or that deliberative calm which invariably characterizes hon. gentlemen, especially hon. gentlemen opposite, in their language when addressing this House, I made use of words from which it might be inferred that I imputed to the hon. member for North Norfolk a capability of descending to a degree of criminal meanness which I would be very sorry indeed to impute to any hon. member of this House. I feel that I owe it to my own self-respect, if I have been wrong, to make amends; and I beg to state frankly to this House that at the time I used that language I did not intend it to imply the sense or the meaning which has been extracted from it; that I have no reason to apply any such language from anything I know of the private character of the hon. member for North Norfolk, and that I thought at the time the hon. member resented it, that he did so in a mock-heroic strain, because he must have known that, from our personal relations, I could not have intended any such attack upon him in the words I used. I beg, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, from the consciousness I feel of what a member owes to his own self-respect, and from the consciousness of what is due to the dignity and the deliberations of this House, and also what is due to the hon. member for North Norfolk, to express my regret for having used those words, and to ask permission to withdraw them.

INTERNATIONAL CONSTRUCTION COMPANY.

Mr. BOULTBEE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the International Construction Company.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. I would like some statement from the hon. Minister of Railways in reference to this Bill.

Mr. BOULTBEE. The hon. Minister of Railways has placed in my hands an amendment to be attached to the operative clause, to which I have no objection, and which may meet the objections of the hon. member for West Durham and other members. It reads as follows:—

Provided always that nothing in this Act contained shall enable the said Company to release or operate two lines of railway which connect with each other or have termini in the same city, town, or municipality without the previous sanction of Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. I think it would be well to add the words: "railways which connect with or intersect each other" before the words "city, town or municipality."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think these words are unnecessary, and that the object will be attained by the present wording of the amendment.

Mr. BLAKE. The railroads will not connect unless proper arrangements are made by some such words as I propose.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I believe the amendment covers the case perfectly as it is. The Bill provides that no two railways connected with each other can be operated by this Company without certain conditions and arrangements which will guard the public interest in the manner desired by all parties.

Amendment agreed to; and Bill read the third time and passed.

FELLOWS' MEDICAL MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Mr. GAULT moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 105) to amend the charter of the Fellowes' Medical Manufacturing Company.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. When this Bill was before the House on the second reading, I suggested that there was a serious question whether, without some reason given, the exceptional powers asked for by this Company should be granted, and if there were no special reason, whether it was not a case for amending the General Act under which the Company is incorporated, rather than for granting it exceptional powers. The Bill reads as follows:—

Whereas the Fellowes' Medical Manufacturing Company, a corporation created by letters patent of the Dominion of Canada issued under the authority of the "Canada Joint Stock Companies Letters Patent Act, 1869," have represented, by their petition, that they are carrying on a large business in Canada, the capital for which is mainly subscribed beyond the limits of the Dominion; and that it is expedient that such capital should be proportionately represented on the Board of Directors of the Company, which it cannot be under the provisions of the said letters patent; and have prayed that they may be relieved from the restriction created by the said Act, as to the nationality and residence of the major part of their Directors; and whereas it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. It shall not be necessary hereafter that the major part of the Directors of the Fellowes' Medical Manufacturing Company shall be persons resident in Canada, or subjects of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization: Provided always, that the member of the Board who shall exercise the chief executive authority of the said Company in Canada, shall be a subject of Her Majesty, and shall reside within the Dominion.

The general policy of the Legislature, whether that policy was well or ill-founded has continued unchanged, and it is that the major part of the directors shall be subjects of Her Majesty by birth or naturalization. It does not appear to me that while this policy exists, we should depart from it in the interests of any joint stock company except for some extraordinary reason. The great benefit of this General Act is that it should lay down general rules under which all companies should be bound; and if it is sufficient to say that the law should be changed at the instance of one company without giving a reason, there would appear to be a good question as to the necessity of a General Act at all, and we would have all the companies coming in, and would be no longer able to point to a General Act as prescribing the limits regulating the formation of these companies, but would have to look at special Statutes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No doubt something may be said in that view; but I do not see any possible objection that could arise in the case that is now under consideration. Of course, every case will have to stand on its own merits. It is well known that this Company has been incorporated for the purpose of manufacturing what is known as Fellowes, Syrup of Hypophosphites. It is also well known that that remedy has become one possessing a wide-world reputation. We can readily understand that under those circumstances it might be desirable to have it relieved from the restriction which requires the nationality and residence of the major part of the directors. It is obviously the case that where a remedy obtains such a wonderful notoriety as this, it might be extremely desirable to establish it upon a large scale at some great central population, such as London or Paris, or on the continent. When in London, a year ago, I received a prescription from a very eminent physician of syrup of hypophosphites, and I went to one of the most famous drug stores in the city of London, and they told me the only syrup they had was Fellowes' syrup. I found, therefore, it had obtained a very high standing in the estimation of the medical profession at that grand centre of medical literature, London. Under these circumstances, I think, where a person in Canada has been enabled to establish so great a reputation for a remedy that has come in general use all over the civilized world, it would be a pity to do anything calculated to prevent a company organizing for its manufacture on the largest possible scale, and under the most advantageous circumstances.

Mr. ANGLIN. I am sure that the proprietors of this medicine must be obliged to the hon. member for West Durham for having given the hon. Minister, himself an eminent member of the legal profession, an opportunity of speaking in such high terms of this particular remedy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Especially when my professional reputation is vouched for by the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. ANGLIN. I wish I could speak as well of the hon. gentleman's political reputation.

Bill read the third time and passed.

MONTREAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 96) to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to the Montreal Telegraph Company.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE. I move that the following words be added: "Nor shall each body word beyond ten words, in such message cost more than one cent." That is, at any rate, a reasonable arrangement. As we are adopting a maximum rate for ten words, we should adopt a maximum rate exceeding ten words.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). It is quite true, as my hon. friend has said, that the rate at present charged is one cent beyond ten words; but the Company do not wish to be bound peremptorily by that charge, and the reason is, that if so they would be laid open to what is known as a system of packing messages by sending ten messages in one, as is done habitually in cabling. They might be compelled in fact to charge for the additional words at a rate far below one cent per word. The system in reference to packing is this: a man starts the business of collecting messages and sending them, through correspondents in the different places, all in one message, and abbreviating in many cases, and paying the charge fixed by the tariff of the Company of one cent higher for the message. This is done in cable messages in a great measure, for the purpose of saving the addresses and signatures, and also for the purpose of leaving out unnecessary words. In the same case, if this clause is made compulsory upon the Montreal Telegraph Company, the system of packing would no doubt come into use, and a message or a number of messages for which the charge would be $2.50, by packing will be reduced to $1.25, and it is not the intention of the Company to charge more. If this charge is imposed upon them as an arbitrary condition, which will extend over the period of ninety years, the result will be that the Company will be at the mercy of these packers, which will injure the telegraph and cable companies contrary to the fair interpretation of the Act. For that reason the companies object to this one cent clause, and for that reason only. They have never charged more than one cent for the additional ten words in Canada, and it is not the intention to do so, and they are reluctant to be subjected to this limited tariff.

Mr. BLAKE. That is just the sort of argument that applies against Parliament imposing any tax at all. We have here a state of things which will produce practically a monopoly of the telegraph system in Canada.

Mr. CAMERON. Far from it.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman says far from it. The promoters of this measure adopt wholly inconsistent views of argument. They tell you there can be no such thing as successful competition in telegraphy; that all attempts of that kind are followed by one mistaken result. There is a period of low prices followed by desires for amalgamation, and that we cannot have a successful telegraph service on the principal of competition at all; that it is in its nature, as proved by experience, a thing that must be reached by a monopoly. That is the argument in favor of the view that if no harm results it is necessary it should be a monopoly. But when we come to the other branch of their argument, we are told that if it is a monopoly we must protect the public to some extent. We are told that there are to-day 100 miles of independent wire, and there will be many more to-morrow. In one breath they blow both hot and cold. Now, Sir, however difficult it may be to establish a competing company, after the organization which is to take place under this Act, it is obvious these difficulties will be greatly enhanced. It is quite clear that any new company will have a hard time, or much harder time than any competing company will have but for this. We are therefore interposing additional barriers with respect to competition. The Government recognize the importance of a maximum clause. They recognize the importance of some protection to the public under these circumstances. They insist upon that as a condition of these additional powers being given to the Montreal Telegraph Company. They are introduced into the Bill. Why are they justifiable? What is the reason for introducing a maximum clause at all? It is because we know we are creating a monopoly, practically, and because we know that as a condition of the monopoly we have a right to protect the public by prescribing to what extent the public shall be charged. That is the only principle which justifies us in prescribing a rate. The hon. gentleman says: "If you do this they may pack the messages." But I say, in answer, that if they do this, the Company may exact other and higher charges. The measure is in our hands, and now is the time to deal with it. The question is, what charges shall be made for messages that run over ten words. Your 25 cents may be rendered altogether nugatory with reference to this class of messages that run over ten words if you leave the Company free to charge any rate they please for the words exceeding ten. The hon. gentleman says that messages will be packed to the prejudice of the Company, and that they will have to submit. But there will be no temptation, and if the agent receives ten or fifteen messages and packs them and sends them off to John Jones, he has got to arrange with John Jones to have the delivery established, which will enable him to collect and deliver the messages. We have not heard anything yet of this difficulty. This one cent rate has been in vogue for a long time. Will the hon. gentleman bring forward evidence to prove that there has been any packing of messages in the past? We have not heard any company complain of this difficulty in the past, and what reason have we to apprehend it in the future? If any difficulty of this kind does arise in the future it will be open to the Company to come to Parliament to seek a remedy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I was just about to make the same remark. This proposition seems reasonable in itself, and if these apprehended difficulties follow to the serious injury of the Company it will always be open to the Company to appeal to the Legislature to remove those difficulties. I think that the present proposition, being reasonable in itself, should be accepted, not only with respect to this amendment, but with respect to any other monopoly in the country.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. In order to avoid the possibility of the Company making the date and address a portion of the message, I would move to insert the word "body" in the preceding part of the clause, so that the body of the message of ten words shall be exclusive of the date and of the address.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think that the House ought to bear in mind that this Bill is asking for a consolidation of the different Acts affecting this Company. This question was very fully discussed in the Committee. A decision was arrived at, and the Bill is now reported to the House after that deliberation. The hon. gentleman opposite, of course, has the right to make this motion, but the House has a right to consider the propriety of a motion which regulates rates and fixes a maximum charge for this particular Company. Now, Sir, no such maximum has ever been fixed with reference to any other telegraph company in this country. There are several other telegraphic corporations besides the Montreal Telegraph Company, and I really do not see any principle or any reason which justifies Parliament,—because this Company is now before it asking a very reasonable thing, to have eight or ten Acts consolidated, and another very reasonable thing: to have the same powers and privileges, which this Parliament has on several occasions granted to telegraph companies organized since the Montreal Telegraph Company, conferred on it,—in imposing such restrictions. The Montreal Telegraph Company is the pioneer telegraph company in this country, and it has conducted its business hitherto by general consent, I think, with advantage, and at a reasonable cost to the country. The service has been well rendered, enormous difficulties have been overcome, great distances have been covered by this line, and the result was, that a year or two ago they found themselves unable, from the ordinary business of the Company, owing to the competition which had sprung up in the meantime, to pay their proprietors, or shareholders, the usual and the reasonable amount of income to which they were entitled on their investment of capital; and certain arrangements were reached between the other telegraph companies and the Montreal Telegraph Company. Now, Sir, I do not see the principle on which Parliament should take advantage of such a position to place its peculiar notions—or rather the views of the hon. member—on record and put in the Act the rate they should charge, and how they should carry on their business. Recollect, Mr. Chairman, that this is a private Company, they have not any public advantages in the way of bonuses or favors. They ran the risk of investing their capital in this enterprise, and I cannot see, if you are going to establish this principle, that when any corporation, any steamboat company, any railway company, any manufacturing company comes to Parliament and asks for any amendment to any Act of incorporation, you will impose your own views and your own notions on them as to the way in which they ought to carry on their business, and the price at which they shall manufacture commodities or offer them for sale, what justice there is in it. That is what it amounts to; and I do not see that we have any right to make such an interference. This Telegraph Company is exposed to competition. The hon. gentleman calls it a huge monopoly. Now, Sir, that is a very easy word to utter, and it is a very unpopular word; at least it has become so very recently. The word amalgamation in this Act has alarmed some hon. gentlemen in this House and some people outside of this House. It is a terrible thing now for companies to amalgamate; and yet, during this Parliament, I have seen a great many Bills pass through Parliament amalgamating companies having franchises from the public and bonuses from the public, being quasi-public institutions in a much stronger degree than this Telegraph Company is. Now it is said, it is a very improper thing to grant these powers. Why, Sir, if there is any business carried on in this country, in which the power to amalgamate and to unite with other lines of communication is necessary—by the very nature of the business, it is telegraphy. What does it do? A man wishes to send a message to New York, or to San Francisco, or to Edmonton, and you must send it—if you send it for a reasonable price—under some general arrangement over a continuous line. You cannot have this unless you endow various companies which have taken up franchises in the different parts of the territory to be covered, with power, and allow them to make mutual arrangements, and business arrangements, which will justify them in reducing their rates and still make a sufficient profit to warrant them in carrying on the business. This is the very nature of the enterprise or business of telegraphy. The use of electricity to send messages and carry on business over the whole of the continent requires, in its very nature, that there should be union, confidence and amalgamation between the different companies which occupy this great continent; and yet, because this privilege is asked for, the same privilege as I have said which has been granted to other companies, and which you do not propose to withdraw from them, you hamper it with restrictions. If it is necessary in the public interest that any change in the law should be made, then come forward and take over these various companies' lines into your own hands. Do as they did in England—take them over as a Government work. If that will be more convenient, and more satisfactory to the public, try that experiment. These corporations are liable in the public interest, of course, to submit to such a policy. You have a law on the Statute-book—in the Consolidated Statutes of the old Provinces—which authorizes the Government in the first place to take possession of these lines and use them for public purposes in case of difficulty. I remember very well, Sir, that when we were threatened with an invasion of our territory, a few years ago, it was necessary, and it was found very useful, to take possession of the telegraph lines, and ascertain what was going on. Being under the control of a Minister of the Crown, the telegraph lines were ours, and we ascertained some very important facts, which were very useful and which saved a very large sum of money to the people, due to the possession of this power and right. We have, under the same Act, also power to take possession of the Company's property altogether on payment of such compensation as may be found proper. There seems to me no possibility of any middle course except to allow the telegraph lines to carry on their business as any other corporations do, or to take possession of them and use them as part of the public means of communication through the country, and make them a Government institution. In the present case, the Company simply desires to have, as I understand it, the same powers and privileges with reference to their line and their property, which Parliament has freely granted to other companies since they were organized, and I do think it is unfair to attempt to fix, by an arbitrary standard as now proposed, the price which should be charged. The hon. gentleman has another amendment, which we will be presently called on to consider, a proposition to regulate a reduction in the charges in the event of any improvements being discovered, by which telegraph communication can be carried on with greater facility than has been the case hitherto. Sir, there might be some reason in that if we were to take control of the matter altogether; but the hon. gentleman makes no provision for the other case. Improvements may be rendered practically useless owing to improvements in the telephone.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. McDOUGALL. A line is established between Toronto and Hamilton now, and I am told by persons connected with the Montreal Telegraph Company, that there is a very considerable diminution in their receipts from the more frequent use of the telephone there than was formerly the case. We cannot tell what improvements may amount to, and I think that the hon. gentleman ought—if he wishes to act fairly—to allow companies to increase their price if this be found necessary. If persons must use telegraphy for certain purposes and can use the telephone for other purposes, and are thereby put in the position of having their large capital invested with inadequate remuneration, we then should have the right to increase the price so as to secure a fair profit.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. They can then come to Parliament.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. gentleman says that they can come to Parliament; but after Parliament had put the Company in this difficult position, and claimed the right to fix by an arbitrary rule the amount to charge, I do not think that this would be a very favorable place for them to come to. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, if the Company would take my advice in this matter, they would withdraw this Bill. It is not necessary for them to come here. I believe that they have the power to do all they wish to do, in the clause to which such objection is made. This is a question of law, and the case is now before the Courts. The decision of a Judge has been given adversely on this point; but I will leave it to any legal member of the House, whether the first clause, which gives the Company power to let, convey, or part with their property as to them may seem fit, is not as large a power as can possibly be obtained by the employment of any words in the English language. This matter is before the Courts, and the Company desire to have it made clear and plain, and simply ask that a clause similar to that which was given to the Dominion and Great North-Western Companies, be placed in their Act of Consolidation, so that these companies will be on an equal footing. Mr. Chairman, a very large sum of money depends on the solution of this question; in fact, at the present time, $2,000,000 of capital, mostly owned in this Canada of ours, and a portion of it in England is in peril. Many of these people are dependent on the operations of this Company for their daily income, and we see from what has recently occurred, how very sensitive this property is, and how it can be reduced in value by movements in Parliament or elsewhere. We have observed the great facility with which the brokers in Montreal can cause this property to rise or become depressed in value, so that they may make it a means of profit when it goes up or comes down. Is that a convenient state of things? Is it fair to leave this property to all this risk and danger, when Parliament can put an end to it at once by simply giving to the Company the same rights as to other companies? I object on general grounds to the assumption on the part of Parliament, that when any private corporation comes here for an amendment to its Act of incorporation we have a right to enquire into its tariffs, to examine into its affairs, and say how much they shall charge. We are not competent to do that. We should have a Committee of Examination to take evidence and enquire into the whole subject of the expenses, the risks involved, the dangers and the profits. If we are going to deal with the question in that way, we, in effect, say that because a company carried on their operations for years at a particular price, we ought to fix that price; no matter what changes may take place in the condition of telegraph communication in this country, no matter what rivalries may be established, this Company shall not charge more than so much. This is contrary to the public interests. It is contrary to the liberty of the subject and it will not do to apply it in this case, because we cannot apply it to others, and it has not been applied in previous cases. The hon. gentleman says there is a monopoly, I say there is not. There can be no monopoly in telegraphing in this country so long as it is open for all persons to combine their capital, put up poles and string telegraph wires along the country. So long as they can do that under the law, there can be no monopoly. The General Act of incorporation throws open the whole subject of telegraphic communication to competition by the simple fiat of the Government of the day, so that it cannot be described as a monopoly. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) who, I see, by his approval of this suggestion, to preserve the same rate, is desirous of securing the interests of the publishers throughout the country as well as of the public, but it is open to him and his friends in the newspaper business to build a line for themselves if they wish. Lines have been built between Washington and New York, and between other points in the United States by the newspaper proprietors and brokers, and it is open to my hon. friend and his colleagues of the press, who are now large contributors to the profits of the telegraph companies, to build lines of their own and prevent anything like a monopoly. A monopoly in its bad sense, as I understand it, is the right to do something exclusively—do that which no one else can do. This is the nature of monopolies which public opinion has so strongly condemned in the past. In the present case it happens that certain capitalists have taken all the risks involved in constructing a telegraph line in this country. They had to build their line over long distances, they had to incur the hazards of storms and every other possible climatic difficulty to be met with in a country like this, and if the wires go out of order by these or other means the public suffers thereby. I, therefore, protest against the attempt to avail ourselves of the opportunity presented, on the mere proposition to consolidate the Company's Acts of going into other questions and assuming to regulate their business, and say what the Company can afford in the way of serving the public. The Company assented to the 25 cent rate; but even if they had not, my argument would have been just as strong against this attempt to fix the other rate. My hon. friend, having succeeded in getting one advantage out of the Company, is now attempting to hamper them still more. He is insensible to the arguments of my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Cameron), who has examined the question carefully, that it will expose the Company to be plundered by a system of scalping such as was in operation with regard to railway tickets. It will be perfectly possible, and it no doubt will happen, that persons may cheat the Company by putting in a dozen or a hundred messages and calling it one. That has been done before with reference to cable communications, and if these scalpers are given the protection which is proposed to be given them by this amendment, there is no doubt that that system of scalping will become common.

Mr. BLAKE. I admit that I am insensible to the arguments of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) as the hon. gentleman has stated. I admit, too, that I do not attach equal weight to that which I usually attach to the arguments of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. The arguments of the hon member for Victoria are the arguments of the counsel for the Bill. The arguments of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down are, of course, the arguments of the hon. member for Halton, but speaking for the Great North Western Telegraph Company, of which he told us the other day he is one of the directors, The hon. gentleman exhibited an amount of warmth—a certain electric sensibility on this occasion which I am sure he does not usually exhibit in his addresses to the House. I can understand it, of course, considering the curious circumstances under which the hon. gentleman wishes Parliament to adopt his views, but they are not reasons why we should accept those views as possessing any greater impartiality than the views of the hon. gentleman wish it to possess. The hon. gentleman has discussed some of the clauses which we have not come to yet. Though I hope some of them will be amended I shall not anticipate any of those proposed amendments, nor shall I refer to the discussion of the one which the Committee has adopted. The alteration which took place in the Committee took place at the instance of the Government of the day, who were represented by the hon. the Minister of Railways. Speaking in the name of the Government he admitted the view that Parliament had a right to impose a maximum under the circumstances which apply in the present case. The clause is indefensible unless we are entitled to prescribe the maximum, and it follows from that, that we are entitled to make the maximum what is a reasonable amount, and prevent anything being done which would render the maximum wholly useless. I do not understand the objection of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) as I propose to insert the word "body" so as to carry out the real meaning and intention of his proposal as in point of fact it is. With reference to the statement of the hon. gentleman opposite, that we have no more right to deal with this Company than with a steamboat or a railway company, I say they are two different things. We do deal with railway companies, but not with steamboat companies. We do not deal with steamboat companies because the water is free, but do with railway companies because we give them peculiar privileges which entitle us to deal with them, and, because unless we incorporate other railway companies, they will have a monopoly, and even if we do they are practically monopolies to a large extent. Every railway company is practically a monopoly as between the smaller way stations of the line, because it is impossible to incur the capital expenses which would be necessary to give railway competition along each line. So with reference to a large portion of its traffic, it is a monopoly, and that is one of the large reasons why Parliament has always adopted the rule that the Governor in Council has to approve of any tariff or tolls and may alter the rates.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Only on condition that the Company is earning a certain percentage on its capital.

Mr. BLAKE. That is not so. That is the condition applied to parliamentary interference. The interference of the Governor in Council is narrower, as the hon. gentleman will find if he looks at the Act. The hon. gentleman says that we do not interfere with railway companies. We do; a railway company cannot charge a cent until the Governor in Council approves of its tariff of rates as fair and reasonable. I do not think there is any danger, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's impassioned argument, of Parliament adopting this Act without taking certain precautions for the protection of the public. What these precautions are is another question. The hon. gentleman says I evolve my objections from my inner consciousness. I evolve them from my experience of the practice of the telegraph companies, and I considered them without bias of any kind, not happening to be either director or counsel of either of the corporations concerned.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has not stated the true position of the clause under discussion. He has stated it as if the Government had assented to advise Parliament to impose on this Company the obligation of a maximum rate, as if the exercise of that power were a proper function of Parliament. I do not understand that to be the true position of the matter at all. When the Bill was before the Railway Committee, I stated, in reply to a proposal to limit the rate, that the rate was already limited by the contract between the Montreal Company and the Great North-Western Company. A remark was made by a member of the Committee that that rate could be altered by agreement between the two companies, and that the rate should be fixed by Act of Parliament. It was on that view that I acceded to the suggestion of the hon. the Minister of Railways, and as I protested then I protest now, against Parliament imposing on the Company a particular restriction as to rates which it had not thought fit to impose on other companies. In the logical reasoning of the hon. member for Halton I entirely agree; but in the particular circumstances of the case, as an agreement had been entered into for the long period of ninety-seven years between this Company and another company, whereby the rate was fixed at 25 cents, I was prepared, as that arrangement was a permanent one, to allow Parliament to say that it was a permanent one; but when you propose to add a term that is not in that agreement, I think the position is entirely different. I therefore objected, as I object now, to the introduction of that one cent a word clause, and I stated that it has been the practice, for a long time past, to charge one cent a word for additional words; and, as the hon. member for Halton has pointed out, it is only fair to suppose that the Company whose Bill is now before the House, may be subjected to the inroads of telegraph agents who occupy the same position towards telegraph companies as ticket scalpers do towards railway companies, defrauding both the public and the Company, and therefore the Company opposed this amendment. I leave the matter, however, in the hands of the House, but I do not wish to imply that I assent to the amendment. With regard to putting in the clause relating to body words, I have no objection to it, because the practice is only to charge for body words. Before I sit down, however, I would beg to say to the hon. member for West Durham, that I think it would be just as well if he were not so ready to impute motives and make personal reflections. He has applied to me the term the counsel for this Company. The statement is not true. I am not and never have been professionally connected with the Montreal Telegraph Company, although, as I stated to the Committee, I am the counsel of the Great North-Western Company. The hon. member for Halton stated to the Committee that he was a director of the Great North-Western Company. I am not aware that the matter is of vital interest to that Company one way or the other. It vitally concerns the Montreal Company, but to the Great North-Western Company it is a matter of indifference whether this Bill passes or not; but I would venture to suggest to the hon. member for West Durham that these imputations of personal motives would be much better omitted, either in the Committee or in the House. I might just as well assert, with regard to a matter that was under discussion in the House the other night, that personal motives or personal feelings affected his action on that matter in another House.

Mr. BLAKE. Which is that?

Mr. CAMERON. I refer to the Goodhue Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, my action on the Goodhue Bill was to vote against it. With regard to what I stated, I beg to recall the term counsel of the Company, and substitute the more accurate term of counsel of the Great North-Western, whose President, Mr. Wiman, has been manifesting his interest in this Bill by lobbying and button-holing hon. members.

Mr. McDUGALL. I may say, with regard to the observation of the hon. member for West Durham, that I am not much given to the tu quoque style of argument. I do not think, because one man has done something in his political career that is contrary to correct principles and to his honor as a public man, that justifies me in taking a similar course; and I do not choose to make any references to the past, although I might avail myself of this opportunity to refer to one or two passages in the hon. gentleman's public career of which I have personal knowledge. All I wish to say is, that I am a director of the Great North-Western Company, holding just shares enough to make me a director. I think there is no law which prevents a member of Parliament from holding stock in a public company, else a great many members of this House would be affected by it. I take a great deal of interest in this special telegraph combination, because it so happened that my opinion was asked in reference to a matter in which some personal friends and relatives of mine are interested; and, consequently, knowing something about it, and ascertaining that a very great injury was about to be inflicted on persons who had invested in the Montreal Telegraph Company, I have taken a warm interest in protecting, so far as I could, that property. I have been in Parliament some time longer than the hon. member for West Durham, and I can say that to this hour I never had, as a director or a person holding stock—in fact I was too poor, as a politician, to have much money to invest in stock—I never had any interest in any matter that I had to pronounce on in Parliament. To be quite sure that I was right, not only in speaking, but in voting on this question, I have ascertained from the English authorities that a member of Parliament, to be prevented from voting, must have a direct interest in the matter. I have no direct interest in this Bill. It cannot be of advantage to the Great North-Western Company, because that Company are under obligations to pay to the Montreal Company a large sum of money; and my advice has been, that if they could without dishonor get rid of this agreement, they would be able, out of the 8 per cent. which they have to pay, to add to their lines and to their facilities for carrying telegraph messages, and thus save a large amount of money. But they have made a contract and it is their duty to carry it out in a fair spirit. They would have to come to some pooling arrangement for the same object if the present agreement should fail. They had cut down the rates until at the verge of ruin—in fact, until the Dominion Company was obliged to call in the assistance of the great financier, J. Gould, to prevent its collapse. Knowing all these facts, I have felt perfectly justified in urging upon Parliament, as I still urge, non-interference in the matter, which does not require it upon any public ground—non-interference in the private affairs of a corporation like this. I shall not make any further reference to the imputation which the hon. member for West Durham has chosen to make as regards my motives and conduct. It falls perfectly harmless so far as I am concerned. I have met that hon. gentleman on the stump on some former occasions, and may meet him again with the public records in my hand, when I shall be able to defend my motives and public course as quite worthy to compare with his own.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman is quite welcome to attack me at any time and place he pleases, when I hope I shall be able to answer him.

Mr. McDOUGALL. You were not there on the last occasion.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know what occasion the hon. gentleman refers to. I have not considered the question whether the hon. gentleman has a right to vote or not; but even if he had no right to vote, he might have a right to speak. What I said was, that having regard to the interests the hon. gentleman possesses in this question, it is impossible to attach the same weight to his acts that we should attach if he had not that interest. If it was to the interest of the Great North-West Company to have this Bill defeated, I understand the hon. gentleman could have acted in another sense. But the President is using every exertion to procure the passing of this Bill, and I must suppose the Board of Directors are harmonious in the matter. That Board have agreed that upon the whole, whether it is in the interest of their Company or not, they will promote the Bill.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). One reason why one of the directors of the Montreal Company came here and urged the adoption of the Bill was that he felt in good faith his Company were bound to assist the Bill, and get the legislation that would make the agreement valid and binding. But so far as the interest of his own Company was concerned, it was perfectly indifferent to him what he did and how it fared.

Mr. CASEY. I think the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken are unduly touchy in regard to the reference to their connection with this Company. If they are perfectly clear that there is nothing in the slightest degree improper in that connection—and I am not saying there is anything improper in their speaking and voting on the Bill—they need not object to the House knowing the nature of their connection with the Bill. I have no doubt that the hon. member for North Victoria has arranged the matter so that he is not in any way interfering with the letter or spirit of the Independence of Parliament Act. But it is a matter of importance to the House, as the hon. member for West Durham has said, to know that he is counsel for one of those companies asking for amalgamation. It is not so important to know the position of the hon. member for Halton in pushing his case. If their relation to those companies is perfectly harmless, there is nothing offensive to those gentlemen in the House knowing it. But the argument of the hon. member for Halton and the hon. member for North Victoria, and the general argument that this House has no right to impose conditions on companies asking certain powers or powers of amalgamation, is most extraordinary.

Mr. McDOUGALL. You have the power but not the right.

Mr. CASEY. I think we have exercised both the power and the right in almost every similar case that has come before us. We usually limit the freights of railways and control many of their arrangements, and still more when proposals of amalgamation come before us. But suppose a Bill came before us to sanction the amalgamation of all the great trunk railways of the country, so as to create a vast monopoly, would the House sanction it without strict limitation with regard to freights, and a hundred other matters affecting the public? This brings us to consider the meaning of the word monopoly. The hon. member for Halton says it is absurd to state that this Bill creates a monopoly. In the strictest legal sense of the word it does not; for there is nothing to prevent other people building telegraph lines, except the fact that this Company would be so wealthy and powerful, and would so control the great avenues and business of the country, that no roads would have sufficient capital to compete with them. In the same way, if all the railways amalgamated, there would be a practical monopoly. The hon. gentleman suggests that bankers, newspaper men and others might combine and build lines of their own—that there is always some way in which the public can free themselves from the pressure of a monopoly. But I think that it is strange that there should be no remedy left to the public except such extraordinary measures. I conclude that we should not propose the limitations to the efforts of Companies unless they are companies to which special powers are given by the public, or unless the amendments of their charters are such as to create practical monopolies controlling the whole country, or a considerable portion of it. In those cases, I think it is not only our right but our duty to propose such limitations as are now under consideration. But the hon. member for Victoria says that the limitation as to ten words is very different from the limitation of the price to 25 cents. He told us, in a condescending manner, that he was willing to allow the House to put in the agreement because it was an agreement between the two companies. He was kindly willing to allow us to ratify anything that had already been done, but was quite unwilling to allow us to do anything to which the Company had not agreed. As far as I can see, the limitation as to the charge for words over ten is absolutely necessary in order to secure any general limitation as to the cost of a message that exceeds ten words. Otherwise, the Company could charge 5 or 10 cents a word over ten, so that really a limitation of 25 cents for ten words would not amount to anything. The hon. member says if we make this limit, it will give rise to what is called the packing of messages, or sending two or three in one. I cannot conceive of circumstances to which that could be done.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Company has now the power to prevent it, because it has no limitation.

Mr. CASEY. The thing has, heretofore, never been done to any extent, or the Company would have exercised its power to prevent it. The fact that they never had to raise the tariff shows this operation of packing has never been attempted. I apprehend the power to raise the tariff would be used in another way. The Company, under pretence of protecting themselves against packing, would raise the tariff on extra words for the purpose of obtaining larger profits; and it will be impossible for the public to say that the Company was wrong in thus acting. Another peculiar argument is that possible improvements in telegraphy might necessitate in increasing the tariff. I never heard before of an improvement in telegraphy that increased the cost of telegraphing; it has always been the other way, and it will be much more reasonable to provide that if the Company adopted improvements, they should reduce their tariff.

Mr. BLAKE. That is provided in another amendment.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It should be understood there is no wish on the part of this House to do any injustice to any one connected with this Telegraph Company. Had the Company not consented that a maximum rate should be imposed, it would have been unfair to impose a restriction upon it that is not imposed on others; but as the parties representing it agreed to this restriction, I had no hesitation in sustaining that section of the Bill which imposes it. The amendments now under consideration follows that, because the Company could neutralize that restriction entirely if they were to raise their tariff on words beyond the ten words.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would suggest that we should restrict land companies organizing in the North-West from selling their lands at more than a certain price per acre. If we go into this system of new restriction, we may extend it indefinitely.

Mr. ROCHESTER. The burnt child dreads the fire. The name of the man who is at the head of this institution is quite enough to make the people of Canada careful how they pass laws for him to handle. That individual has preyed upon the vitals of the commercial community for years. He has made himself wealthy by levying blackmail on our commercial community. We have had, already, a little taste of this grand monopoly, for whatever legal gentlemen may say, common sense will teach us it is a grand monopoly. Immediately after the amalgamation we had to pay 25 cents for 20 cents, and immediately after that we had to pay the carrier boy 10 cents for delivering a message—making in all 35 cents instead of the former rate 20 cents. Hon gentlemen say they shall not be restricted to this one cent a word—I say they shall.

Mr. McDUGALL. Why?

Mr. ROCHESTER. From the simple fact that they charged 35 cents instead of 25 cents.

Mr. McDUGALL. Cannot the hon. gentleman charge what he likes for the beer he sells?

Mr. ROCHESTER. I do not sell beer. I have no more to do with selling beer than has the hon. gentleman. But if I had, and came here to get an Act of Parliament to sell beer, the probability is that the House would want to restrict me just as I want to restrict the vulture that is preying on the vitals of the community. Every man, big or little, rich or poor, from $5 to $500 must pay for that book. If he does not, notices are sent, not only throughout Canada, but the United States as well, saying: "Call at the office." Everybody that gets a book knows it. And then that gentleman's credit is gone, he is down if he has not capital enough to carry on his business. It is just so with a large portion of the commercial community who have not capital enough to carry on their business. They are afraid to say a word. They are under the ban of this vulture. They have not courage to say a word. The thing was brought up in this House a few years ago, but the trouble is there are too many members of this House in the same condition. They are afraid of this man, and I say the name of this individual throughout the country is quite enough to make this House very careful what privileges they grant to the man at the head of this great monopoly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This Bill does not provide a remedy for the case you put.

Mr. ROCHESTER. No; but I am only giving to the House the reason why I think they should restrict this Bill so that Mr. Wiman, who is at the head of the institution, shall not put on 2 or 3 cents, as you said, in place of one cent additional for every ten words. In fact, my own impression is that the Bill should have been thrown out of the House altogether. I do not think the Bill should have been brought before the House; I do not think the Committee should have passed the Bill as far as they have. The hon. member for Halton has said that he advised the Company to withdraw the Bill, and I think it would be a good thing for the country if they did withdraw the Bill. Now, I will only say that I hope this House will put every restriction in their power to prevent that individual from tyrannizing over the people of Canada, so far as the telegraph system is concerned.

Mr. CAMERON. I have only a word to say in reference to what has fallen from the hon. member for Westmoreland. His course of reasoning, I think, should lead him to vote against this proposed amendment about the one cent, because the Company do not agree to that, and only agree to the other amendment in consequence of its being in the contract which they had entered into, while the one cent is not. Now, those of us who have had any experience of telegraphy in England know that there the rate is one shilling for twenty words, which includes addresses and signatures; but when there is one word more than that you have to pay three pence extra, that is to say, three pence for any number over the stipulated number, so that one extra word beyond the number cost six cents. Now, I would have no objection, inasmuch as the sole reason for objecting to the one cent is the fear that the Company will be victimized by this system of packing—and would have no objection if the amendment was put at 2 cents. The principle is only to charge one cent, there is no intention of increasing it, you might send ten additional words for 20 cents. And inasmuch as four-fifths, at least, of all the messages do not exceed ten words, the public would not practically suffer. It is the interest of the Company to encourage long messages rather than short ones, because as the address, signature and delivery are all the same, the more words there are in it the better it pays the Company, even at one cent a word. So the public would not suffer in any way, and I think it is unfair that the Company should be subjected to what would be an imposition on them, which they have every reason to believe would be practiced, if they were prevented from protecting themselves against this injustice.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I think we are assured it is the intention of the Company not to charge more than one cent per word for each additional word beyond the body of ten words, and they can have no reason to complain if the House imposes a restriction to that extent. I had given notice of a motion exactly similar to that of the hon. member for Westmoreland, and I did it for this reason. It will be remembered that prior to the reduction of the rate from 25 cents to 20 cents for ten words the charge for each additional word was one cent per word, and it seemed to me, in view of the fact that the expenses of these companies will be very materially reduced by the reduction in the number of their offices, operators, and general expenses by consolidating the two companies, there can be no great hardship in imposing upon the Company the restriction that they shall not charge for each additional word beyond the body of ten words, more than one cent per word, particularly as the promoter has declared it is not the intention of the Company to make a greater charge than that.

Amendment, inserting the word "body", agreed to.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I move, that the word "twenty" be substituted for the word "twenty-five" in the said clause. I do it for the reason that we are now establishing in Canada what is really a practical monopoly. We know what has been the history of telegraphy in the United States in reference to the Western Union. A number of opposition lines have sprung up from time to time, have existed for only a short time, and have then been consolidated with the Western Union; and when you unite the whole of the present telegraph system of Canada—because the Mutual Union can hardly yet be called a telegraph system, although it has started its work and is doing it fairly well—when you undertake to unite the whole telegraph system of Canada under a combination such as this, with the backing of an enormous interest, it makes it simply impossible, unless something should occur in the United States to make the leading financial genius who has control of these telegraph companies on the other side, feel it to be his interest to drop the Western Union, and take up the Mutual Union of the United States, unless something of that kind should occur to maintain independent lines. I am satisfied none of these lines will exist in Canada, and that as this Mutual Union will sometime share the fate that the other smaller companies have done in the past in the United States, this also will be wiped out of existence and bought up by this existing company. Under these circumstances we may fairly assume this Company will have, for all time to come, speaking in general terms, so far as we are concerned, at any rate, the monopoly of telegraphy in Canada. Now, we know that this Company had a 25 cent rate in the past with the opposition of the Peoples' Line and afterwards of the Dominion Line; we know that with the opposition of these lines and a 25 cent rate, and one cent for additional words, it was even then able to pay large dividends. I have here their sheet showing that from 1871 down to 1875, they paid 10 per cent. on their capital, and they paid this, I say, in spite of opposition during the whole of this time, more or less severe, of other telegraph companies in Canada, and they, moreover, paid it on a 25 cent rate. They have paid since that time $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and during the last three years, 7 per cent. They have succeeded in paying 7 per cent. interest on their capital, at a 20 cent rate, although they had the opposition of the Dominion line united as it was with the American Union, and this too at a time of very great depression in Canada, when business in that line was not so great as it now is. Under these circumstances, if we are going to unite the telegraph companies, to put them practically under one management, and to do away with the necessity for double offices, and different lines running into small towns, consolidating and concentrating the whole system under one management, I am bound to say I think that they ought to be able to do the service at as low a rate as they were able to do it and pay themselves 7 per cent., when they had the opposition of the Dominion Company, as was the case during the last couple of years. Under these circumstances, I do not think it is at all unfair to insist that we shall be continued with an amalgamated system in as good a position as we were in when we were in possession of two systems, as they existed in the past. I am aware it is said that during the last year, the Montreal Telegraph Company allowed their line to run down; and I see a statement made by Mr. Wiman, who takes no possible interest in this measure, who in fact would rather it was thrown out than otherwise, who is perfectly indifferent to the whole thing, notwithstanding that he has paid for columns and columns of so-called interviews in the public press of Canada, to show how much it is to the advantage—not of the Montreal Telegraph Company, but of the people of Canada—to have his benign influence over the telegraphic system of this country—declaring that they have paid out some \$150,000 since they got possession of this line for the purpose of putting the Montreal line in condition to enable it to do the work efficiently and properly. Well, Sir, that seems a very large sum of money. Where did they get it? I find that up to the last meeting of the Great North-Western Telegraph Company, all they had called in was \$50,000 of their capital. This is the statement made by themselves. Now they say they have spent \$150,000, and they have only called in from their shareholders \$50,000. Where did they get the other \$100,000—mind, I am giving Mr. Wiman's own statement. I will tell you where they got it. It is from their profit over and above the 4 per cent. which they paid to the Montreal Company, and the 3 per cent. which they paid to the Dominion Company on the working of this line during the first six months of the agreement. Then we all know in connection with telegraphy, the improvements are every year becoming very great. The announcement was made only the other day that the Great North-Western was putting in a new instrument, which is going enormously to reduce the cost of telegraphy. I saw the statement made the other day—I have no personal knowledge, and it seems to me an extraordinary statement, yet it is made by a gentleman who is a thorough adept and experienced in these matters—that they have now an instrument by which they can send 1,000 words in a single minute. With the wonderful progress which is being made in electricity and the application of it to the necessities of life, one can readily understand that there will be great improvements of that kind going on. Under these circumstances, I think that it is not too much to say that as these two companies are combining, they ought to be able to give us, with the combined control and a monopoly of the whole business—and I do not use the word “monopoly” in the ordinary offensive sense of the word—as good rates as they were able to do when they were separate undertakings, and at a time when the Montreal Telegraph Company paid a dividend of 7 per cent. I beg to move, that the word “twenty” be substituted for the word “twenty-five.”

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will not be accepted by the Committee, as I do not believe that it will be in the interests of the public. While referring to this matter, I may say, Sir, I noticed with great regret a comment upon my action in the Railway Committee, in the paper for whose utterances I have usually very great respect. I inserted a clause preventing the Act having any bearing on the litigation now taking place; surprise was expressed as to what possible motive should have induced me to support the proposal to grant this amalgamation, and I feel bound, Sir, to say here, that the only motive I had was to endeavor to act justly towards this great Company, which comes before this House and asks for powers, which I thought were not unreasonable, and at the same time to consult what I believed to be the public interest. I believe, Sir, that the interests of the public are more likely to be promoted by allowing the amalgamation to take place, and thus enabling the work to be done in a satisfactory manner and at a fair and reasonable rate, than by rejecting the proposal to allow this amalgamation to take place, and leave us in the position of having companies unable to compete with each other without agreeing to charge a much higher rate than that which is at present charged. I believe, Sir, that the proposal to reduce the rate to 20 cents is unreasonable, and that it would not be fair to the interests involved to adopt it. The public interest, in my opinion, will be amply provided for by the proposal to fix the maximum charge at 25 cents and to supplement this by the additional amendment to which I think there is no objection. I consider that it follows as a corollary with the other, that for additional words, the charge should be 1 cent each; this appears to me to be a fair and legitimate restriction, but to go beyond this, and defeat the measure depriving this Company of the powers which they have a right to ask of this House—the same powers which were granted to a rival, the Dominion Telegraph Company, Parliament has decided to grant these powers of amalgamation to the Montreal Telegraph Company because they believe that the powers of amalgamation, with reference to railways and telegraphic companies, should both be obtained by special legislation, and that a case should be made out before such powers are sought for before Parliament which holds this control in their hands. I think that this is reasonable proposition, and the fact that the Montreal Telegraph Company is not allowed to amalgamate with this Company ensures competition. If money is to be made by transmitting messages at 25 cents for ten words, the maximum charge, and 1 cent each for additional words, we are quite certain to have competition. If, as my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, believes,—we are on the eve of new discoveries—if in fact new and very great discoveries are taking place, by which telegraphic messages can be communicated with much greater speed and celerity and at a much cheaper rate, we shall no doubt receive the benefit of this by the competition which will be thus excited; and if this service can be carried on at a cheaper rate than 25 cents, through the agency of any such means, we shall very soon have such competition established—just as the Dominion Company was organized in competition with the Montreal Company. I believe, therefore, Sir, that the interests of the public will be sufficiently protected, and, at the same time I would press upon the friends and promoters of this Bill the desirability of accepting without question the restrictions which have been offered, and which we consider to be legitimate restrictions, while I would ask our supporters in the House to prevent being carried what I believe is unreasonable, the restriction of the charge to 20 cents per ten words, as has been proposed by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat.

Mr. BLAKE. There is very much to be said in favor of the view that the great economies and facilities offered by this amalgamation, and which have been adverted to in very glowing terms by its promoters, will result as the member for Cardwell says. I think both the experience of the past and the hopes of the future will lead to the view that the tariff of 25 cents is extremely liberal. But at the same time, if it only can be carried in the future—if our hands can be kept entirely unfettered—if a motion something like what I have put in the notices paper can be carried, in that view we are not to be considered as interfering with the vested rights given by this Bill to continue the maximum of 25 cents. I am disposed rather to err on the side of liberality rather than otherwise, and leave the rate as the hon. the Minister of Railways would have left it, 25 cents for each ten words. Until, however, I ascertain that the Committee declines to keep the hands of Parliament perfectly free and insist on making the rate for all time to come, I propose to adopt the views of the hon. the Minister of Railways and not at the present moment vote for any reduction in the 25 cent rate.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the reason given by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) for proposing this rate is not a sound one. He says that when two companies like these amalgamate a number of persons are cut off, and the cost of operation must be reduced, and that therefore they should be in a position to reduce their rates. I think he overlooks the fact that though the cost may be reduced the returns are also reduced. Under the old management if a message was sent to a place in which there was only the office of another line the cost was 50 cents instead of 25, whereas now the rate will, of course, be the ordinary rate. As to the expense of delivering messages which was spoken of by the hon. gentleman, I was connected with a telegraph office for seven or eight years, and I never knew the rate to be collected although for distances of over a mile it is collectable I believe. It is apparent, from the pamphlets which have been circulated in the House, that business men who have used the lines since the amalgamation are well satisfied with the service, and the letters we have received point in the same direction, namely, that the amalgamation has produced greater efficiency in the management. I think that, considering the amount of capital invested in it, it would be unreasonable to restrict the Company in the manner suggested, as it would be likely to impair the efficiency of their operations.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). With reference to the amendment of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), it is quite impossible that the Montreal Company could accept it, as its adoption necessarily means the breaking up of the arrangement with the Great North-Western Telegraph Company. It is utterly impossible for them to pay a dividend of 8 per cent. to the Montreal Company and 6 per cent. to the Dominion Company, unless the rate of 25 cents be allowed instead of that of 20 cents, so that the fate of the Bill depends entirely on the rejection of the amendment offered by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White). I wish, however, to call attention to the fact that Canada undoubtedly provides, even at the 25 cent rate, the cheapest and at the same time the most perfect and most complete system of telegraphy in the world. There is no other country so well supplied with telegraphic facilities at such a cheap rate, and the result of the adoption of this Bill to complete and make permanent this arrangement between the companies will be to ensure for all time—for ninety-nine years means for all of us—that our telegraphic communication shall never cost more than 25 cents for a usual telegram and one cent additional for every additional word. I think the country will be satisfied with the alteration when it is united to the certainty that that rate will be made permanent, and they will be satisfied that Parliament has only done its duty to a company that has invested so large an amount of capital by giving them security and permanence for the investment they have made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. GUTHRIE. In Committee I supported the 25 cent rate, as I did not think we had sufficient evidence to form a basis upon which to reduce the rate, and because I did not think that under the circumstances the 25 cent rate was excessive. What we should aim at is not merely to get cheap telegraphic accommodation for the public, but efficient and prompt work, and I think we have every prospect of having that secured by the arrangement between the two companies. I rose principally, however, to say a few words regarding an attack made upon Mr. Wiman, the President of the Great North-Western Telegraph Company. I do not think the hon. member can know Mr. Wiman. There are many hon. members who do know him, and who will agree that wherever he is known he is regarded as a man of honor and of business capacity, and that he is highly respected and esteemed. I think my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Rochester) has only ventured to say what he said regarding Mr. Wiman, because he is ignorant of his true character as a business man and a gentleman.

Mr. ROCHESTER. I do not know Mr. Wiman personally. I would not know him if he were to come into this House, but I tell the hon. gentleman and I tell this House that I have good reason to know him otherwise. I defy him or any other man to say a single word against my credit in any way, and yet I was blackmailed one end of the country to the other by this Mr. Wiman, and I am not the only individual who has been used in the same way. I went to the agent of the Merchants Bank in Montreal, who it was said had started the story, and he told me that my paper had often passed through the bank, and that he had never known a note of mine to become overdue or to go to protest. I never had a note of mine protested, and yet that man or his agent went to my agent in Montreal and demanded $80 for his book time after time. My agent wrote to me. I wrote to him saying that I would have nothing to do with it, that I had nothing to do with a blackmail in my life and never would. The next day or the day after I was published from one end of all the States to the other, and from one end of the Dominion to the other as a bankrupt. If a vulture preying upon the commercial community is an honest man, Mr. Wiman is one, and if it is not, he is not an honest man.

Amendment negatived.

On clause 14,

Mr. BUNSTER. The American commercial agency system has done a great deal to discredit commercial men in Canada, and the sooner the Government take cognizance of the fact the better. A political opponent of a commercial agent must be pretty careful or he is rated low. The commercial agency business in Canada ought to be watched with a jealous eye, and the sooner the hon. Minister of Finance directs his attention to the affair, the better for the business community of this country.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I move as a proviso:

Provided always that all rates charged by any Company purchasing or leasing the line of the Montreal Telegraph Company under the powers by this Act conferred, as respects all classes of despatches, shall be at all times charged equally to all corporations and persons, and after the same tariff in respect of all despatches of the same class and description, transmitted under like circumstances; and no reduction or advance in any such rates shall be made, either directly or indirectly, in favor of or against any particular person or corporation sending or receiving despatches of the same class and description.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I would like the hon. gentleman to state what classes of despatches he intends this to apply to, and to state whether there is any grievance, existing or anticipated, to which it can apply.

Mr. WHITE. I have no hesitation in saying that the clause applied to press despatches, and without it, it would be in the power of this corporation simply to crush out any newspaper it pleased in Canada. If a newspaper does not choose to see eye to eye with the manager of the Company, all he has to say is that: "We will charge you $100 instead of $30 or $40 for your despatches." There can be no objection to a clause of this kind, which does not fix the rate in any way, but leaves it to the Company to say what they will charge. Although there are only one or two newspapers which ventured to speak against this amalgamation, the press will find before they are a year older that a different result from that they anticipated has been come to. All I desire is to see that we shall have something left free from the influence of this Telegraph Company, and I think the best thing we can have free is the press of the country.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). Does the hon. gentleman wish that the same charge shall be made to country newspapers as to city newspapers? The result of that would be to compel all the country weeklies in the Dominion to pay as much for their despatches as the city dailies, which they do not do now. The Company at present gives special facilities to country newspapers, by way of furnishing them market reports, &c., at a low rate; but a clause of this kind would render it impossible for the country newspapers to get any press despatches at all. Then again, the Telegraph Company is obliged to charge different rates for different classes of news to the same paper, and they very frequently make a special arrangement as to a particular message. For instance, I think you heard the other day that a speech of the hon. member for Cardwell, delivered one evening recently at Kingston, had been transmitted at the rate of 8 cents per hundred words, and it only cost him about 56 cents to publish that speech the next day for all the numerous readers of the Montreal Gazette. If the Company were compelled to lay down a stereotyped tariff, they would necessarily fix it at a maximum rate, and the result would be that my hon. friend and others interested in newspapers would be unable to get the benefit of those telegraphic facilities which under the existing rule they do get. It is a matter of indifference to the Company, but I understand of considerable interest to the country newspapers and their readers.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I may say that the reference made by my hon. friend from Halton the other day to an alleged report of a speech I delivered in Kingston was incorrect. The fact is there was no report of that speech at all. How does my hon. friend from Halton know the price and cost unless the matter has been communicated to him?

Mr. McDUGALL. I was told it by an operator.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). All I can say is that this is a specimen of the beginning of things under this new arrangement—that the private business of a private gentleman, contrary to the law, is thus exposed in a Railway Committee for the purpose of being used in a controversy of this kind. I say this is a matter that ought not to have been exposed.

Mr. McDUGALL. It was a public speech.

Mr. WHITE. But the contract for the transmission was not a public but a private matter. This incident shows that this kind of proceeding has been employed all through by Mr. Wiman. A contract made by a private party with this Company was a matter that should not have been made public, which should have been regarded as sacred. There was no report of a speech, but simply a short descriptive notice of the meeting. I do not think that the prices paid and the amount of work done was a very serious matter, as the hon. gentleman tries to make out. It is quite easy to say a speech was transmitted for 56 cents; but when there was only a short description of the meeting, involving some twenty-four minutes work of one operator in the transmission of about eight hundred words, the smallness of the operation will be understood.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Would it not operate against the country newspapers?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It would not. They get their despatches at the same rate as the evening newspapers in the cities, at so much a word.

Mr. BERGIN. This amendment would work most injuriously against the country newspapers, and to say those papers will receive their despatches at the same prices, is to say that they will be equally able with the city papers to pay those rates. I think there is some reason for proposing this amendment of the hon. member for Cardwell, and if he will strike out the words "reduction or," it will show he is desirous of having a fair rate established for both country and city purposes. I think this Company will establish a fair and just rate for newspaper work; and if we provide that no advance in these rates shall be made as against any newspapers or corporations, we shall have secured in effect what is desired. I do not think we ought to introduce the words "reduction or," for we would prevent the country newspapers getting their despatches at tolerable rates; and we know they cannot afford to pay such rates as are paid by the newspapers in the cities.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not know the particular arrangement with regard to newspapers; but I am told by those particularly familiar with their means and operations, that it is totally impracticable. The hon. gentleman shows by his amendment that he either wishes the destruction of the country press or some other equally undesirable result. I understand that the telegraph operators in different parts of the country are active assistants of the newspapers in every part of the compass; but at all events they save them an enormous expense. The rates charged to the country newspapers are a mere bagatelle, and will satisfy them thoroughly. A clause that should compel the Company not to discriminate in favor of the cheaper and poorer press, would practically prove their annihilation, and ought not to be entertained for a moment.

Mr. BUNSTER. Mr. Gisborne has got a scheme before the Dominion that probably will call the attention of the country seriously to it. Within the next eight or ten days, he probably will have it completed. Every newspaper office will probably then have a telephone of its own, and correspondence from some thousands of miles. I am not able to say much about the inventor; but I received my information from Mr. Gisborne who is well known to the House and country for his many inventions. It would probably be well to delay a vote on this matter for eight or ten days, to allow this gentleman's operations to be finished.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I think that in discussing this matter, we should be rather careful in our zeal not to go too far for the public good, in fixing the rate at 25 cents. We are going I think correctly on a very advanced principle; but in proceeding beyond that, in saying the Company should not charge more than one cent for every additional word, we are extending that principle perhaps a little too far. I took a good deal of interest in this Bill, because I have received more communications from people interested in this company than in regard to any measure before the House. My correspondents all urged the passing of this Bill in the protection of their interests, and I think we should be careful in protecting the public interest that we do not ruin the interest of private stockholders. While I can vindicate the rate of 25 cents for ten words and even one cent for each additional word, I think the proposal of the hon. member for Cardwell is preposterous. I think it springs from some personal interest of his own, as it seems the general opinion that it would be detrimental to the smaller newspapers. It would not be wise or right to give great advantages to great newspapers like the Montreal Gazette and crush out the smaller, including the country newspapers, compelling the Company to act on the hard and fast rule of doing for one set of paper the same as for all others. It would be simply preposterous. The hon. member for Cardwell is pressing this matter too much. He shows a degree of interest in this matter which leads us to think that he has some feeling and interest in it connected with his own paper. His proposal would seriously damage the small country papers, which have not the means to pay prices that can be borne by great dailies, like the Gazette, Globe and Mail. No one will say the country newspapers are not exceedingly useful, fulfilling their purpose well, nor that anything that makes it more difficult for them to fulfil their mission would be highly undesirable. They have great difficulty now, exposed as they are to the rivalry of the ably conducted city papers, without having additional difficulty imposed upon them in the attaining of news. I trust this amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE (Norfolk). I cannot see how the interpretations put by hon. gentlemen on this clause can be put upon it. It only says that the same rate shall be imposed upon the same class of people for the same class of messages. I do not believe that the country newspapers get messages as cheap as the city newspapers; the latter get a great many more words, and it is the rule of all companies to deal most liberally with those who trade most largely with them. I do not believe this would be disadvantageous to country newspapers.

Mr. GUILLET. I can readily understand that a company like this contracting our whole telegraph system might reap vengeance on a newspaper which might have opposed its interests, and make less reasonable arrangements with it than with others. It would not be right to give it that power.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. BLAKE. I beg further to move:

Adding to the clause 13a a provision that the Company shall not be entitled to avail itself of the powers of purchase, lease or amalgamation granted by the Bill, unless it be provided in the agreement therefor, that returns of the revenue and expenditure and of the operations of the Companies concerned therein in such form, as shall from time to time be prescribed by the Governor in Council, shall be laid yearly before Parliament.

It seems to me not unreasonable we should insert that provision. It is one which ought to be, I think, in all charters. Some objection may be taken, on the score of its not being in all charters. It may be passed as a general law at any time, but at present, as this amendment is reasonable in itself, and also seems material in connection with the proposal I am about to make, that the privileges granted by the Act shall not be deemed to be infringed, should hereafter the rates provided be found to be exorbitant, and be reduced. I cannot see any objection to the amendment. We know that the railway companies are obliged to make returns in prescribed forms as the Governor in Council may from time to time require. There seems to be no reason, now that we are practically granting a monopoly, that we should not provide one of the conditions of the new creation to be the furnishing us yearly with this important information.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). The hon. gentleman admits that this is exceptional legislation, and a proper plan would be a general Act applied to all cases. I do not know why this particular Company should have the experiment tried on it of exceptional legislation. If the hon. gentleman thinks right and proper that every company, chartered by Parliament, should be required to make returns of this kind, let him introduce a general Bill for that purpose; but I submit that it is not right to hamper and embarrass this particular Company with the experiment of a clause of this kind. That might be well enough if applied seriously to all companies, but should not be applied exceptionally to this particular Company.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What harm will it do the Company to make any statement?

Mr. CAMERON. That is not the question.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman will observe there are practically, as we know, two Companies—the Dominion and the Montreal—besides the Great North Western, which are concerned in the matter, and the clause proposes that they shall not avail themselves of the power of amalgamation unless the agreement provides that all companies concerned therein shall make their returns.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to ascertain from the hon. member whether he means by that clause to exclude the Company from the exercise of the powers and privileges it now enjoys under its charter.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If this is to be applied only to the new powers granted under this Bill, I do not object to it, though I do not see very much good in it.

Mr. BLAKE. This is a tax to the proviso to avail itself of the new power. I will add the words "granted by the next preceding section" to prevent any possibility of doubt.

Mr. BERGIN. This is unnecessary as well as exceptional. There can be no doubt whatever that this Company is obliged to make annually its return to the shareholders. I do not see why we should be called upon to insert a clause of this exceptional nature. We are not to look upon this Company as dishonest, and intending to deceive the public as to their returns.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE. I move the following amendment:—

Inserting after the clause 13a a proviso to the effect following:— Provided, also, that whereas inventions, improvements and economies in telegraphy may hereafter result in a great diminution in the cost of the service, so that the maximum rate herein provided may become wholly exorbitant, no Act of Parliament passed in that event and reducing accordingly the maximum rate herein provided, shall be deemed an infringement of the privileges granted by this Act.

Parliament has recognized it by imposing a restriction of a 25 cents rate, which restriction can only be justified on the supposition that this will be a practical monopoly. It seems to me the observations made by the hon. member for Cardwell—which are patent to all of us, and which have been reinforced with his usual ability and zeal by the hon. member for Vancouver, who has told us we are on the eve of great discoveries—render it extremely important that we should look a little to the future. It may be said that Parliament should have the power, without this clause, to reduce this maximum. I admit that Parliament, of course, has the power to reduce the maximum. We all know that it would be regarded as an extremely violent thing, and that there would be tremendous appeals from shareholders and others, if there was no such clause in the Act as to the interference of Parliament. With reference to the railway companies we have provided in the original charters that they can be interfered with. With reference to the Bell Telephone Company we provided the same thing when we gave it exceptional powers a Session or two ago to carry their wires along the poles in the streets. This was objected to, and the Company replied that they could not do it in any other way, that there had not yet been sufficient discoveries, sufficient facilities obtained, to carry the wire under ground; but we expressly provided that in case it should afterwards be discovered that there was a means whereby these wires could be carried underground, it should be deemed no infringement of the privileges of the Act if Parliament should, under such circumstances, direct that they should be carried underground. When investigation was in its infancy and the invention was new, we thought that the hands of Parliament should be quite free to say in future, in case greatly improved facilities were discovered, to say to these gentleman: "Take your wires off the polls and put them under ground." In the same way in the present case, when we are on the eve of further discoveries, when we know that within the last few months great inventions have been made and a new instrument has enormously enhanced facilities and encouraged the cost of the service, it would be a great mistake to declare practically that the maximum rate should always be 25 cents. This Parliament should keep its hands free to create such a diminished maximum as shall be both just to the Company and consistent with the interests of the public.

After Recess.

Mr. BUNSTER. When you retired from the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I had just received a compliment from the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), stating that I had afforded some information on this Telegraph Bill. Since then I have seen the promoter of what I consider will be a revolution in telegraphic operations in the Dominion, as well as on the continent. Such will be the revolution that our telegraphic arrangements will comparatively be done away with. I asked the Government to delay the Bill in the interests of the public, as I was in duty bound to do. Contrary to what Mr. Gisborne told me this morning, which was ten days, he now claims thirty. I therefore claim the indulgence of the House and withdraw my request to the Government, leaving them to do what they consider right in the interest of the Telegraph Company; nevertheless, from what I know is going to take place in the next thirty or sixty days, I am satisfied that my standpoint is correct. We all remember when the great American nation of 50,000,000 people failed in their attempt to send a cablegram across the Atlantic, America weakened on it but the Britishers did it. England came to our assistance, and hence to-day we, as Britishers, can well feel proud and boast that the cable across the Atlantic belongs to Britain and to British America. I also feel just as confident that the telephone, when the scientific gentlemen who now have it in hand shall have completed their arrangements, can operate 1,000 miles as well as it now operates 100 miles. We have no reason to lose faith that the scientific gentlemen will succeed in what they have been experimenting on for days and for months, and it is to be hoped that Canada will be able to say that we have completed a telephone system throughout the world.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). With all respect to my hon. friend from West Durham, I object to his third amendment as impracticable, illogical, and not in accordance with the first demonstration of the laws. His theory cannot be carried into actual practice. I confess my regret and my disappointment that this third amendment of my hon. friend has not come up to that standard of practical utility, which he usually adopts in all his utterances, especially when he founds them on the faith of an idea. The first thing I have to observe with reference to this amendment is, that it is wholly unnecessary. It is within the paramount power of Parliament to pass any legislation which it thinks proper on this or on any other subject without infringing on anything in this Act; my next observation is, that it is manifestly one-sided. It provides very carefully for a diminution of the rate, but wholly fails to provide for its increase. Now, it is just as likely as not that circumstances may occur hereafter which would render the contract made on the faith of this legislation, or already entered into by these companies now in question, unfair and onerous. It must be borne in mind that the Great North-Western Company has already undertaken the responsibility of paying to the Montreal Company a dividend upon their entire capital stock at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum for the next ninety-nine years, and they have no power to cancel that agreement, they have no power to reduce the dividend to 6 per cent. or to any other rate, they have no right to say that in consequence of the improvements which have been made it is impossible for us to earn as much as we expected; we are carrying on this business at a loss and therefore hope and expect and claim the right to be relieved from our contract; and yet under this amendment, if it be adopted, they will be placed in this position: that while their charge may be reduced by statutory enactment, their charge under no circumstances could be increased, and that improvements in telegraphy must not necessarily result in cheapening the service. It is quite true, that improvements in mere telegraphy would probably have that result; but you must bear in mind that there are a great many other branches of the telegraphic art—if I may apply this term—which come into daily competition, which competition is being daily increased with the telegraph system. Some reference was made just now to the telephonic system. Possibly some hon. gentlemen are not aware that the invention of this system has very greatly reduced the income of the telegraph companies, and is likely in the future to diminish it more. Between the cities of Hamilton and Toronto, the telephone is in daily and hourly use, day and night, and it is within my own knowledge that messages of one particular character, which were formerly sent from Osgoode Hall to Hamilton, and vice versa, to the number of hundreds every day by telegraph, are now almost without exception sent by telephone; and the profit of all this business goes to the telephone, instead of to the telegraph company. It was stated the other day in the Committee of the House, that a telephone company proposed establishing a continuous line from place to place along the whole front of Ontario and Quebec between Toronto and Montreal, and that for this purpose a series of links would be formed; for instance, Toronto would be connected with Whitby, thence to Cobourg, Port Hope, Belleville, Kingston, &c., all down the front of the Lake and River, the result necessarily being that a very large part of the business now done by telegraph between these places, if not almost the whole of it, will be done by telephone. The system of telephoning is progressing and becoming steadily more profitable. You will see, therefore, that this clause is practically entirely one-sided. It proposes that the Company shall be bound by the existing contract entered into for ninety or 100 years; but that Parliament may interfere and cut down the rates on which this contract is based, and on the faith of which the Company has undertaken to pay 8 per cent. dividend to the Montreal Company's shareholders. To make it logical, it should contain another clause providing that in the event of the existing Act of Parliament being hereafter passed, all agreements and contracts previously entered into, may at the opposition of any company or person, be rescinded and cancelled. Now, I ask this House whether it is prepared to go into wholesale legislation of this kind and provide for cancellations and dissolutions hereafter on uncertain contingencies of contracts entered into on the faith of this understanding, for this would manifestly be the logical consequence of this resolution which the hon. member for West Durham has proposed to the House. The Montreal Company has wished to make a firm and certain contract, and to give a permanent value to their stock, removing it from the field of speculation, and for these reasons they think that this clause would be disastrous to their interests, and would render to a very great extent nugatory the permission which it is proposed by their Act to ask Parliament to give to them. Then, again, consider the extreme vagueness of it. We have no expectation—no immediate expectation—that the cost of telegraphy can in the near future, at any rate, be materially reduced. Parliament has the paramount power if totally altered circumstances arise, to interfere and alter this Act, without the necessity of having any such clause in this Bill. The clause is therefore unnecessary. It is unfair. It is one-sided. It is unpractical; and for all these reasons, on the part of the Company, I object to the passage of any such clause.

Mr. BLAKE. If without this clause, Parliament can do all that it implies, how is it so unjust, I want to know? how so unpractical? If it is quite unnecessary, why all these adjectives? These are obviously those which the hon. gentleman would apply to the proposed Act. If it happened to come before the House, then it would be urged how unjust this is! how impracticable it is! notwithstanding that you knew the state of affairs that existed, and notwithstanding the fact that the costs of telegraphy has been reduced; and how unjust it is, when you prescribed a maximum rate of 25 cents, and when you allowed us to enter into this amalgamation, and knew that we were going to amalgamate, how unjust now to demand such a modification. The hon. gentleman says that this amendment would now be extremely unjust. How much louder would the cry be if after this amalgamation had been effected under this Bill, any such change were proposed. Parliament of course has the power to modify any contract in matters within its legislation, and to so alter any Act it has so passed; but then the demand, which the hon. gentleman would make, would be for compensation. There is no reduction without parliamentary action; there can be no increase without parliamentary action, and if the Company applies to Parliament at some future day—and the hon. gentleman has not proposed to reserve the right for them—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You said there could be no reduction, but they may reduce without parliamentary action.

Mr. BLAKE. Not by law. There can be no reduction of the maximum without parliamentary action; no increase without parliamentary action.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. By law?

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman told us that the clause was one-sided, but the House will notice that what the clause says is, that if Parliament in a later state of things should in its wisdom reduce them, they shall not interfere with the privileges granted to the Company, but if Parliament should decide that the maximum would be increased that would not be any infringement. It would simply be giving them an additional privilege. The hon. gentleman says that the Company must be bound by its contracts, and that it is a logical sequence of our putting in this clause that all contracts entered into by them shall be valid. No. The Company has to make all the bargains with or without the clause, and Parliament having, as the hon. gentleman contends, paramount power to make or reduce the maximum. It may be so in case Parliament does determine to reduce the maximum; then the contract shall disappear. That is for the Company and those who contract with the Company do. And the hon. gentleman says he will take the risk of Parliament interfering in this clause when inserted; but I do not want it passed if our present liberal rate should be regarded as extravagantly liberal, that Parliament shall not have to continue to do what it is proposing to do to-day, viz., to show fair play between the Company and the public.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The hon. gentleman has not satisfied the House, or, at all events, he has not convinced me, that there is any necessity for this clause on any ground of public policy. If Parliament has the right, as it undoubtedly has, at any time to interfere by its great power in the legislation of this country and modifying this Bill, why is it necessary to provide by this clause against its being an infringement of any privilege given by this Company? What purpose does it serve? It is assuming that Parliament, by interfering in such cases, is guilty of an infringement. Well, it is interfering now, and that objection is urged, but it does not seem to have had any influence on the House, nor do I think will it have in the present case; but I state what I believe when I say that the effect of this clause will be injurious upon the Montreal Company's property and stock. I say at once that I cannot believe that my hon. friend opposite would lend himself to any improper action on the part of those who are interested in putting up or putting down the stocks of the Company; but still by passing this clause you cast doubt on the value of the property of the Company; you throw suspicion upon it; you say that if any mention is made in future tending to cheapen or simplify telegraphy Parliament may interfere and cut down the rates. One hon. member tried to persuade us to-night that we are on the eve of a great invention which would revolutionize telegraphy, and that therefore we should not give them those powers because a reduction might shortly occur. Well, we all know the effect of these pretended inventions—how they take hold of the public mind, and the effect of keeping this condition suspended over the two millions of dollars of property of the Company. Of saying to the world that Parliament has been invited to cut down the rates of the Company, will have no doubt an effect upon the stock. There is no doubt but those interested in stock speculations will use that fact for their own purposes. I cannot see any honest, fair ground for passing the clause, inasmuch as it gives us no additional power to what we have. As such a provision seems of no public use, and as it may produce great injury to the value of the property, I think it is the duty of Parliament to refuse to assent to this proposition.

Inserting after the clause 13a a proviso to the effect following:—Provided, also, that whereas inventions, improvements and economies in telegraphy may hereafter result in a great diminution in the cost of the service, so that the maximum rate herein provided may become wholly exorbitant, no Act of Parliament passed in that event and reducing accordingly the maximum rate herein provided, shall be deemed an infringement of the privileges granted by this Act.

I do not see any real necessity for this amendment, because Parliament will always have the right, in the event of the state of things arising contemplated in the amendment, of incorporating another company, and thereby bringing about a reduction of rates if they prove to be exorbitant. Another objection which I have to the amendment is this : that it is not necessary to save the rights of Parliament, because those rights always remain, and besides, the effect of the clause would undoubtedly be to lower the value of the Company without giving us any real power that we have not to-day. Under these circumstances, I think the hon. gentleman should not insist on his motion, but I, for one, will certainly oppose it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am sorry that I cannot agree with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. It appears to me that when the Company has asked for power to amalgamate, and we have with great reluctance, so far as some of us are concerned, granted that power, we have a right to impose certain limitations on the exercise of their franchise. Well, we have done so. We have skipped out of the usual course, and said that the Company shall not receive more than 25 cents for ten words and no cent for each additional word. It might happen in the future, and that before long, that telegraphic science may make such advances that the operations of the Company may be carried on at a much cheaper rate than at present. The cost would be much less, and there ought therefore to be the power at some future time, without the sense of interfering with vested rights, of this Parliament stepping in and cutting down the rates which we now say are sufficient. It is said that we have that power. Theoretically we have; but I understand it to be a pretty well settled principle that where a company is chartered with certain branches and certain rights, those branches and rights become a vested interest which should not be interfered with; and if that is so, we have a right to indicate that while granting the increased powers which he have granted to this Company, we wish them to understand that in altered circumstances and without violating the principles to which I have referred, we can cut down their rates. I am therefore unable to see the force of the argument that we have the power already. We have the power but not the right without compensation; and I want it placed on the Statute-book, that we have a right to interfere with these franchises in the public interest without compensation. I shall, therefore, with much pleasure, support the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sorry I cannot agree with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. There is, I think, a very serious difficulty in the way of the adoption of the motion of the hon. member for West Durham. In the first place, it is placing upon the Journals of Parliament a declaration which I think carries us too far—a declaration that we cannot become parties to modifications in an Act or charter that is brought before us without incurring certain obligations to surrender the power this Parliament possesses. But that is not the principal objection which I have to this motion. It is admitted that unless cheaper means of establishing telegraphic communication are invented, we are bound by this compact between the Company and Parliament, fixing certain rates. Now, I stated to the Committee, when this question was before it, that the Government had under its consideration the question of taking over the whole telegraphic system of this country, and that we had decided that it would be cheaper, if such a policy were adopted, to construct telegraphic lines ourselves than to pay the price we at present would have to pay to acquire this system. Now, there is no barrier that you could oppose to such a movement on the part of the Government of the day, whoever they may be, greater than the adoption of the motion now before the House, for this reason: that if it would be an injustice to this Company to reduce the rate below 25 cents under any circumstances, because they have allowed us to fix the maximum on this occasion, then I say it would be ten-fold a violation of the compact made if, having made this arrangement with the Company, we next year proposed to establish competition all over this country by establishing telegraphic lines in the hands of the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say, therefore, that this is a barrier in the way of that free and independent action of Parliament, which it may find necessary in order to meet what is held to be a monopoly, and that the power of the Government and the power of Parliament would be hampered in taking that very action which we hold it ought to be essentially in a position to take at any time the public interests require it.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman seems to receive that in a manner which indicates that the argument has not much weight with him; but all I can say is this: that on the grounds on which the hon. gentleman bases this resolution, we oppose it; it implies that there is a compact between this Company and ourselves to maintain that rate unless in the contingency I have adverted to. I do not think we should place ourselves in that position. They come here and ask for powers of amalgamation, which the House appears disposed to grant them, in consideration of certain terms which we have dictated, and that is the fixing of a maximum rate of charge. I think that is going far enough. I quite agree with the motion the hon. gentleman has made in reference to returns. I do not see any reason why he should not have these returns made, although I confess I would rather see this requirement embodied in some general Act that would apply to all telegraph companies, and I think it would be quite proper, when the Mutual Telegraph Company's Bill comes before us, to embody a similar provision in it. But I cannot go further and support the hon. gentleman in his motion, because if it is held that this is a compact between Parliament and the Company, there is an implied intention on our part of not promoting that vigorous competition which may be found necessary under the operation of this Act. I trust, therefore, that the Committee will not adopt this resolution, as I feel that it will fetter our hands, and interfere with the wholesome exercise of the power which Parliament possesses over that Company.

Mr. BLAKE. It is certainly a far-fetched objection to my motion to say that it prevents the Government and the Parliament of this whole Dominion from doing that which any five individuals in the community may do under the law as it stands. I believe it requires but five, under the General Act, to incorporate themselves as a telegraph company. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that he is virtually repealing that Act? Does he mean to say that we are bound to prevent anybody else from forming a company? Surely not. We do not agree that these people shall be monopolists, although we say that the effect of the Bill is to make them monopolists. I cannot conceive that Parliament can be held to be tying its hands in the sense the hon. gentleman suggests by the passing of this clause.

Mr. PLUMB. During the whole of this discussion I have not uttered a word. I have no interest in this matter at all; but a sense of justice impels me, at this state of the debate, to interpose and say a few words in justification of any possible necessity which may arise for me to record my vote on this matter. The Montreal Telegraph Company was chartered at an early day, when telegraphing was a new art. The gentlemen who put their money into that Company, sunk their whole capital. I think that is a sufficient answer to the hon. member for Cardwell, who has asserted that those gentlemen have drawn 7 per cent. on their capital. They ought to draw a good deal more to compensate themselves for having risked absolutely and made worthless their whole capital, for there is nothing in their telegraph poles and wires that will bring back money, and 7 per cent. does not compensate them. Then those gentlemen took the risk of inventions, however deficient or non-deficient. I do not think the member for West Durham has given to this House a sufficient reason for adopting the amendment which he has proposed in saying if there is any new improvement by which telegraphing can be more cheaply performed, these gentlemen who have stood in the fore front and given us lines when they were not paying, would get the benefit of it. Why should they not be entitled to the benefit of it? It is their privilege and advantage, if any new or cheaper method of telegraphing can be devised, to enjoy the advantage of it. They took the old, cumbrous system; they have witnessed one or two advances or improvements that inured to their benefit, and are entitled to any further improvements. I did not relish very much the union of those companies with an unknown company in the west; but it has become a fixed fact, and the proprietors of the Dominion and Montreal companies are in this position, if this agreement is not carried out, they will be largely injuring their properties, and if the stock goes down there is no reason in the world why the large operator in the telegraph stock should not make use of a greater disadvantage to the people of Canada than the rejection of this Bill. You cannot possibly conclude commercial operations of that sort that will be governed by the course of the market, by the rise and fall of stock, and no legislation here will prevent anybody from going into the market to become the possessor of that stock, and either directly or indirectly overthrow those companies. You may pass as many laws as you like, but the law of supply and demand in the market will rule the matter. The Dominion was chartered as a rival to the Montreal Company, with which it had a right to amalgamate. This Company is asking nothing more, and when they claimed to be put on a par with the other Company, we say that in the first place they should be restricted to 25 cents for ten words. The price was not reduced to that, but with those charters originally granted was set that restriction. Then we had another restriction, which I understand will be adopted that they shall only charge one cent for every word above ten. Now, we are asked to say that in view of any possible improvement or invention which this Company may obtain, and which it has as good a right to use as a railway company has to avail itself of improved machinery, a better track or steel rails, it shall be fined. That is practically the effect of the amendment of the member for West Durham. A sense of justice compels me—without having any communication with the Company, or anything more than the feeling which any man who sits in the House and in its Committees and listens to their debates, ought to have—to say that I think the amendment would be an injustice to the shareholders of the Company. I am not going into the discussion as to its President, whether he is obnoxious to Canada or not; but I think of the shareholders of the Montreal Telegraph Company in this matter, and object to any legislation which will make its shares any longer a football in the market of Montreal.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). One must be considerably astonished at the opposition this amendment meets with from those friendly to this Bill, or to the clause to which the amendment was made. What are the arguments advanced? In the first place, the hon. member for Halton argues that improvements have taken place in telegraphy and in telephoning, so that the telephone is now used or may be used extensively instead of the telegraph, and that the Company may find itself injured by an opposition of that kind. I may say that they may also use the telephone, so that if there is any value in this operation, they can enjoy it to the fullest; and having both telegraphy and telephone they have a decided advantage over any company possessing only one. So there can be no objection to the amendment on the ground that this Company may suffer serious injury on this score. Then we have the argument of the hon. member for Niagara, that it is going to injure the stock of the Montreal Telegraph Company, with a powerful appeal against the stockbrokers who have been making a football of this stock. What is the fact? This is not a question that affects beneficially the stock of this Company at all. These clauses are all contingent on the amalgamation. If it takes place the North-Western Company is bound to pay 8 per cent. to the Montreal Company for 96 years. So there is no danger that the stock of that Company being affected in the slightest degree by any clause in this Bill. They so fixed the quantity in the meantime that it will so remain, unless those gentlemen will withdraw their Bill. So there is nothing in the argument that will injure the stock of the Montreal Company. Then we are told by the hon. the Minister of Railways—and I am bound to say that, for a gentleman of his ability, his argument shows it was impossible to find anything like a good argument—that if we pass this amendment, we shall break a compact with this Company—if this Parliament should ever charter a new company or permit the Government to build a new telegraph line, and take the telegraph system into their own hands. There is nothing in this clause to effect this in the slightest degree. What is the clause? We have put into the Bill a maximum rate of 25 cents, and have declared that if it amalgamates, the maximum rate for Canada shall be 25 cents for ten words and 1 cent for every additional word. We desire to go a step further and have said: If, at any time, the Company, which is not before us now, but is working these lines, and which is paying 8 per cent. to the shareholders of the Montreal Telegraph Company, and 6 per cent. to those of the Dominion, still make an enormous profit out of proportion to the capital put in, this Parliament will be justified in reducing the rates, and such reduction will not be considered as a violation of any vested interest. We have heard a great deal about the Montreal Company and the sympathy they are entitled to, but who are the Great North-Western Company. The whole amount of their capital was $50,000, according to their own statement; and if the stories on the street be true, the distribution of the $50,000 held by a number of gentlemen was simply a distribution of paid-up stock granted to them for the purpose of obtaining their names as directors of the Company. That was really the fact with reference to the distribution of stock held by Canadians. Whether that was true or not, there is nothing in this clause affecting the North-Western Company, unless they considered it so serious a menace to their future profits that they preferred to withdraw altogether from the arrangement; and in this way the Montreal Company might be affected injuriously, though I think it would be to its advantage. If this Bill passes with that clause in it, and the North-Western Company complete their bargain, they are bound for ninety-six years to give to the Montreal Company 8 per cent., nothing more or less; so that we need not be the least alarmed as to the effect of this on the Montreal Company's stock.

Mr. GIROUARD. I do not agree with the hon. member for Cardwell, when he says this amendment, if passed, will not affect the Montreal stock. The effect is, that if discoveries are made in telegraphy which will render the telegraph systems cheaper, this Parliament will reduce the rate to 20 cents or 15 cents according to circumstances. I have no doubt, if the Great North-Western Company be well advised, as it has been, it will stipulate in its agreement with the Montreal Company, should this amendment be carried, that should Parliament, at any time, reduce the rate, the agreement shall become of no effect, or the dividend be reduced pro tanto. Further, for a month or two before every Session of this Parliament, brokers and others interested in stock-jobbing will raise rumors of applications being made for the purpose of reducing rates, and the stock will be liable to serious fluctuations. Are we going to sanction a clause that will favor such a state of things. It is certainly not one in the interest of the shareholders or the public.

Mr. BRECKEN. I shall vote against the proposed amendment, because the most that can be said for it is that it is merely a notice to the Company that possibly, if great improvements take place in telegraphy, the rates may be altered. I am won over to a great extent to this opinion by what was stated by the hon. Minister of Railways, that should we adopt this amendment it might be a barrier in the future to the Government taking hold of the telegraph system. In Prince Edward Island we labor under a very great hardship. As far back as 1852 an Act was passed to incorporate the Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island Telegraph Company, to construct land lines across the island and lay a cable to New Brunswick. Some few years after this cable was broken and communication interrupted. After several Acts were passed, in 1869, an Act, 37 Vic., Chap. 34, was passed granting to the New York, Newfoundland and London Telegraph Company, who had meantime complied with the Act of 1862, and thus maintained their charter of 1854, a perpetual monopoly to land cables upon Prince Edward Island, a perpetual subsidy of £600 equal to $2,000, and authority to add 50 cents plus the relative proportion upon extra words over and above the previously existing tariff rates. To send a message from Prince Edward Island to the mainland costs us 75 cents. We have to pay 50 cents on the usual rate, and so in proportion for every word above ten words. When the hon. member for West Durham was Minister of Justice, an Act was passed in 1875 in the Legislature, by section 17 of which it was provided:

"This Act shall not affect any franchise, right or privilege which the New York, Newfoundland and London Telegraph Company, or any other company or person lawfully entitled thereto, may have actually acquired and exercised or operated in Prince Edward Island."

We have heard a very warm and interesting debate as to whether the tariff shall be 20 cents or 25 cents, and how far the price should be restricted. What would hon. members say if they represented a Province where we have to pay over and above the ordinary tariff 50 cents for every ten words and in proportion for every ten words. The only hope I see of this monstrous monopoly being done away with is in the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, that the whole telegraph system may some day come under the control of the Government. I am not going to occupy your time by enquiring how far we are justified in amalgamating this Company. That is better understood by hon. Ministers who have taken more interest in it than I have, but I look forward very anxiously to the day when Prince Edward Island will be relieved of this monopoly which is weighing down its commercial prosperity. I do not go in for repudiation, although I should say that this Act was passed at the instance of Liberal Government in Prince Edward Island, and we are now smarting from its effects. When we have to pay a tariff of 75 cents for what was fixed at 50 cents we are deeply interested in getting that relief from the Government which we have a right to expect.

Mr. JONES. I am inclined to agree with the remarks of the hon. members for Halton (Mr. McDougall) and Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), that the effect of this Bill will be to encourage stock-jobbing on the markets of Montreal. The hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) appears to argue that because this Bill has passed through the Railway Committee it is a fixed fact, as he says. Now, I think a great deal of legislation is brought to this House in a very crude state from the different Committees, and I think the legislation is shoved through in a summary way, and it behoves us to watch more closely than we do the legislation which is sent us from those Committees. Now, with regard to amalgamation itself, I have always opposed the amalgamation of telegraph companies, and I think that in arguing with regard to the rates we are going beyond the question properly before us. This Company was refused amalgamation some time ago by this Parliament, and what does it do? Why, it goes off and amalgamates under the Great North-Western Bill, which was partially smuggled through this Parliament, and then they come back here for us to ratify that amalgamation. When we refused to allow them to amalgamate they did so in spite of us within six months, and now they come back here and ask us to ratify it. I have always opposed this amalgamation; I have opposed the Bill in toto. The moment the amalgamation was made, although they were working a single line with a less staff and a less expense, what did they do? Why, they at once raised the rate from 20 cents to 25 cents, and the public suffers. If the Dominion Telegraph Company was making money even at the 20 cents rate, and working in opposition to the Montreal Company, how much more money was the Montreal Company making? This Company can well afford to guarantee the Montreal Company 8 per cent., and I dare say they would be willing to make an arrangement to give 8 per cent. more. If it comes to a vote I shall oppose amalgamation altogether. This is all bosh talking about widows and orphans. We do not come here to legislate for sentiment, but for the interests of the public, and I think if we can have a 20 or 15 cents rate, we ought to have it. When did this Company begin? Why, it begins with that very Company. The Mutual Company and all the others will soon say: "We will sell out to this grand establishment, we will have a regular monopoly through the whole of this country." There will be another Company starting up, as the Dominion Company did, and ask for amalgamation. For my part I shall oppose this Bill in so far as amalgamation is concerned.

Mr. SNOWBALL. I shall have to support the amendment now before the Chair. Hon. gentlemen supporting the Bill have said that this was the pioneer company, and was the best and cheapest telegraph service in the world. I think that is, to some extent, open to doubt. It may be that it was the pioneer company, but I remember when the Dominion Telegraph Company was formed and when it complained very bitterly of the arbitrary conduct of this Montreal Company. As soon as the Dominion Company got protection, then the Montreal Company appeals to this Parliament to give them additional powers. Now, Sir, as long as they had power over the weaker company, their affairs went on very nicely; but matters have changed. As soon as they find the tables have turned, and that the Dominion Company have got the ascendancy, they want further protection. I think the statement that our telegraph system at the present time is the cheapest and best in the world cannot possibly be sustained. It is by no means best. It may be a very fair system; for so young a country as ours, it is possible a pretty good one. But that it is good in comparison with the British system, I entirely dispute. I also deny that it is cheap in comparison with the system in Great Britain. I think the hon. member promoting this measure stated that under the English system the address and signature were charged for.

Mr. CAMERON. No, I stated that they charged for words beyond the stipulated numbers, for one word as much as for five. For each five words additional they charge three pence, so if you send one word beyond twenty words it costs you three pence more.

Mr. SNOWBALL. In many respects the English system is a great improvement on ours. You can send a telegram to the most remote part of the Kingdom for a shilling. If at a distance from a telegraph office you can post your telegram at any post-office box. These are taken possession of every hour, sometimes sooner, and carried to the telegraph office without any inconvenience to the sender whatever. The delivery is also free of charge. In no case is there any charge beyond a shilling for twenty words. It is true they do not make any distinction between twenty and twenty-five words, each additional five words over the twenty costs three pence, but the rate of twenty words for one shilling is just one-half what we pay in this country. Now, we are told by hon. gentlemen that if this Company amalgamates with others and charges additional rates, all we have to do is to build additional lines to secure competition, that companies will at once spring up and build additional lines over this country. Now, how can companies spring up and build additional lines. Has not the Minister of Railways given to this very Montreal Telegraph Company the exclusive right of building lines along the whole length of the Intercolonial Railway? If he has done this, how is it possible for any other opposition company to extend lines along this railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. SNOWBALL. Then it has been done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But I did not do it.

Mr. SNOWBALL. Then the hon. gentleman allowed it to be done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not.

Mr. BOWELL. Who did it?

Mr. SNOWBALL. I do not know. But it has been done and this is all that the country wants to know, in the meantime. If no other company can build opposition lines, how are we to get redress, if this Company takes advantage of the Bill permitting amalgamation. This Company having the exclusive right, when the Dominion Company wished to extend its lines into the Maritime Provinces, they could not do so; or, at all events, they were unable to get right of way along the track of Government railways, because that had already been granted to the Montreal Telegraph Company, which Company also has the exclusive right from many other railway companies, including the Grand Trunk, the Great Western, and branch lines in the Lower Provinces. We know the great telegraph companies will not build lines except along railways at the present day. The lines which are run along highways are too expensive to keep up, and, in order to make a profit, they must build along great lines of railway. This is the only route which they can follow. If this be so, how is it possible to get other companies to build lines in opposition to this Company, even if the rates charged are excessive. All we have to do is to grant the privileges that are asked for in this Bill; and in a large portion of the Dominion, and in the Maritime Provinces particularly, it will be impossible for the people to get redress. It is necessary for us to be particular in guarding ourselves when this Company comes before us to get its charter altered. If they do not want it on these terms, let them proceed under the Act they have, and they can then charge what they like, subject to fault-finding only on the part of the public. But when the Company asks Parliament for additional powers, we must see that the interests of the mercantile community and of the people are most carefully guarded. The amendments, I maintain, do not go far enough. Still, as I find a disposition in this Parliament to accede all it possibly can to the Montreal Telegraph Company, I will willingly join in granting these additional powers, but in consideration of their being granted I want as many safeguards, as we can reasonably claim, made for the preservation of the interests of the public.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria).

Mr. PLUMB. My hon. friend from Leeds misapprehended what I said in the few remarks which I made in respect to the Committee. I did not say that because this Bill passed the Committee, it was a fixed fact. I had not the slightest idea of anything of the kind. It passed the Committee, came down to the House and is now here for its consideration. My hon. friend misunderstood me entirely. I only intended to say that the contract between the two companies made the amalgamation in some form or other a fixed fact, and I thought that to reject the Bill would be to play into the hands of the stockbrokers. The Committee had nothing to do with the original contract. In some form or other, the companies were to be amalgamated either with or without the consent of Parliament, and if this Parliament rejects the Bill, the stock will become a football in the stock market, and powerful people who wish to monopolize the stock, would buy it at their own price. The argument of the hon. member for Northumberland is simply an argument in favor of the Government assuming the telegraph lines. I would be very glad if the Government, sometime or other, would see their way to do such a thing; and the very fact that the Government can assume these lines, and get control of them, is one of the objects on which I depend to prevent any abuse of the telegraph system in this country. I may say the hon. gentleman has not properly stated to the House that the Montreal Telegraph Co. has no privileges in the Maritime Provinces. It extends a line to Brockville and that is all. We depend on other lines for the transmission of intelligence there; we have not come here to have their progress either curtailed or extended. We must depend on them, and therefore that part of the hon. gentleman's argument falls utterly to the ground. I trust that the House will see that the amendment brought in by the hon. member for West Durham is exactly in the same sense as if he were to ask us to provide that we should interfere with railway traffic and reduce the charges on telegraph lines, because some improvement was made by which a locomotive was run with less fuel or because of some improvement in railway tracks. That is the whole story, and if we are prepared to go so far as that, then we might adopt his resolution, but not otherwise. If we are prepared to adopt his amendment it will kill the Bill that is before us, for it is sustained by those who, I know, are desirous of defeating the Bill, and the adoption of this proposition would be the readiest means of accomplishing their object.

Mr. BERGIN. I do not think that the mover of this amendment, or any gentleman who has supported it, has succeeded in making out a case which at all justifies it. It is quite true, the new discoveries and new improvements may be made in telegraphy before long; but if they are, depend upon it, the discoveries of these inventions will be the means of forming companies which will come to this House and ask for charters to enable these improvements to be brought into use. In all probability, the Montreal Telegraph Company may not have one cent of interest in such companies, and it is not at all likely that it would be able to get any interest in them. There is nothing, at all events, that prevents the promotion of new companies, nor is there anything that will prevent this Parliament, even if this amendment could not be introduced into this Bill, from altering this Bill, as it is now before the House, at any future period. The hon. member for Cardwell said that this stock was being made a football of by stockbrokers, particularly on St. François Xavier street. I do not know any way—

Mr. WHITE. That was said by the hon. member for Niagara.

Mr. BERGIN. The hon. member for Niagara was right. There is no way in which it may more readily be made the football of stockbrokers than by passing this amendment. What would be the effect? Before the next meeting of this Legislature, all sorts of rumors would be circulated through the streets of our different cities, and in all probability, petitions would be presented to Parliament asking for amendments to the Act. The effect of all this would be that their stock would be made a football of, it would fall in price, until people would sell the stock; and the same thing would be repeated at each succeeding Session, to the great loss of honest holders—many of these being women—of the stock, and to their great loss of capital. This would occur Session after Session, until the new discoveries and inventions, of which the hon. gentleman who has introduced the amendment has spoken, were brought into use. The object of this Bill, as I understand it, is to enable the Montreal Telegraph Company to carry out its engagement with the Great North-Western Telegraph Company. It is looked upon, at all events, by a great many that the contract entered into between these two companies now is illegal, and the consequence of passing this amendment may be that the Great North-Western Company may refuse to enter into an arrangement with the Montreal Telegraph Company; and we all know, Sir, that the Montreal Telegraph Company was almost on the verge of bankruptcy when they entered into this arrangement which gives 8 per cent. to their shareholders for so many years, this dividend being guaranteed by the Western Union, the strongest telegraph company on this continent. Are we prepared to so imperil the interests of our own people—the holders of this stock—as to pass an amendment like this, that may prevent them from rescuing their property from destruction? It may be that although the Great North-Western Telegraph Company may not go so far as to refuse to enter into a contract with the Montreal Company, it may make such stipulations as will so reduce the value of the stock to its holders as to do infinite damage to them, and they may insist upon reducing the interest from 8 to 6, or even 4 per cent, or less, if the amendment passed. For these reasons I shall vote against it.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I rise to call the attention of the House to the sense of fairness entertained by my hon. friend for Cardwell (Mr. White). He said the clause was perfectly fair and would work no injustice, because the contract between the Great North-Western Company and the Montreal Company was a fixed fact—that the former Company had to pay the other 8 per cent. dividend, no matter what the rate was. But if Parliament reduced the rate it would manifestly be unfair to hold that Company to a contract under which it would have to pay 8 per cent. The hon. gentleman says this Company need not be afraid of the telephone company, because it has the right to use its own lines for telephone purposes; but he forgot that the whole telephone system was in the hands of the Bell Telephone Company, and that no other company has the right to use their system, as they would be infringing on their patents. If hon. gentlemen wish that the stock of this Montreal Company shall continue to be the butt of the stock-jobbers and stockbrokers of Toronto and Montreal, they had better adopt this clause, because no more ready way could be devised of making the stock uncertain and the subject of continual speculation than by adopting this clause.

Amendment negatived on a division.

On clause 14,

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) moved:

To amend the 14th section by providing that the Company shall not be entitled to avail itself of the powers of purchase, lease or amalgamation, contained in the 13th section, unless it be provided in the arrangement therefor, that the maximum rate of 25 cents for ten body words shall apply to all messages sent from any point to any other point within the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunwick, over any of the lines of any of the companies connected with or operated under such purchase, lease or amalgamation, had or procured.

He said: I hope the promoters of this Bill will see their way to accepting this amendment, as I think it is one which it will be in the interests of the amalgamating companies to accept. It is well known that the effect of this Bill will be to put the whole telegraph system of the Dominion under the control of the Western Union. It will extend from Sarnia to Sackville, a distance of 1,250 miles, and the distance beyond that in British Columbia will be very short indeed. Under the Bill you could send a message 1,250 miles for 25 cents, but unless amendment is made they too may charge 40 or 50 cents if the message is sent another mile.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). We have no objection to the amendment if the hon. gentleman will strike out the words "connected with, or" in the last line but one. I may say that although the Company has a connection with the Western Union we cannot possibly assume to control the rates of the latter, as it is a powerful corporation to which we cannot pretend to dictate as to rates.

Mr. BURPEE. The Dominion Company, previous to the amalgamation, had lines through New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. If I were sure that they would give us the same privileges that the Dominion line gave us I would have no objection to striking out the words mentioned by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CAMERON. Whatever lines were amalgamated under the provisions of this Bill, we understand shall be subject to the same 25 cent rate.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand that the Dominion Telegraph Company had at one time a considerable network of lines in the Maritime Provinces. Has there been any alienation of any portion of those lines, or is the system as complete as it was established by the Dominion Company?

Mr. CAMERON. The Dominion Company leased their entire system to the American Union, it was afterwards transferred to the Western Union, and afterwards to the Great North-Western. My own impression is that the Western Union work those Dominion lines connected with the cables in order to maintain their local connection, while the local business is carried on by the Great North-Western. I understand that it is intended, so far as New Brunswick is concerned—I have had no communication with reference to Nova Scotia—that the rates there shall be the same as in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. ANGLIN. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the lines erected by the Dominion Company will pass under the control of this amalgamated company, and therefore be subject to this provision with regard to the maximum rate. If that be so, it will meet our case to a very great extent. I think it would also be desirable to extend the same rule to Nova Scotia, through which the Dominion Company have extended their line. At present it seems to be unfair that while messages may be sent for a thousand miles through Ontario and Quebec for 25 cents, it should cost 50 cents to send a message from Ontario or Quebec to the Maritime Provinces, perhaps only half the distance. For some time past the rate from Ottawa to St. John has been 30 cents, but it may be 50 cents, as it was formerly, unless we are protected. As I understand the clause, however, it will apply to Nova Scotia as well as to New Brunswick.

Mr. CAMERON. Wherever the Great North-Western extends in its operations, we are perfectly willing that the rate should be subject to the 25 cent. rule; but with regard to the lines owned or controlled by the Western Union, we have no power to dictate to them, and for that reason I wished the words "connected with" struck out. We are perfectly willing that every thing we do under the powers you are giving us should apply to the Maritime Provinces as well as to Ontario and Quebec. More than that we cannot do.

Mr. BURPEE. The heading of all the telegraph blanks of this Company is "Montreal and Dominion Telegraph Companies' lines, operated by the Great North-Western Telegraph Company of Canada." That, I think, indicates that this Company has control of the Dominion Telegraph Company, as it will have of the Montreal Company if this Bill passes; therefore I claim that whatever benefits accrue from this amalgamation to Ontario and Quebec should extend to wherever the Dominion lines exist.

Mr. DOMVILLE. While I should like to see the 25 cents rate established in New Brunswick, I do not think that it is necessary to make any alteration in this Bill that will embarrass this Company, because we all know that the Montreal line comes to Sackville, and that from that point to St. John and on to Nova Scotia the lines belong to the Western Union. If I remember rightly, the Dominion line comes down the centre of New Brunswick, and consequently we are dependent on the Western Union. The Western Union will not be bound by any arrangement we can make here affecting the Great North-Western. We cannot compel them to give us the 25 cents rate.

Mr. SNOWBALL. I would remind the hon. gentleman that the Dominion Company has a line from Sackville to St. John, and also from St. John to Fredericton, and I believe to Woodstock; it has also a line from Sackville to Truro, from Truro to Antigonish, and on to Torbay; so that if the hon. promoter of the Bill will agree that the 25 cents rate will extend over the Great North-Western, the Montreal and the Dominion lines, it would be all that we could reasonably ask for.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I stated that the Dominion line came down the centre of New Brunswick and then proceeded to Nova Scotia. If a message went that way, of course this Company would have some control; but if it goes down to the North Shore, it gets entirely in the hands of the Western Union.

Mr. WELDON. It would be all right to Sackville, whence there are two lines running to St. John, where a company is organized by the Western Union, and, as I understand, it has got the rights of the Dominion lines to Nova Scotia, which they control. The difficulty I see is to control the Western Union. The Dominion Company leased the line to the Western Union originally, of which the Western Union is now the assignee. The transfer would affect the Western Union and the other two lines in connection with the cable. The Western Union has the lease of our local lines which have so far worked satisfactorily to the people of New Brunswick, and the question is whether we should handicap it by these conditions. I think 25 cents should be the only charge between St. John and Ottawa or between any part of Ontario or Quebec. New Brunswick should have the same privileges as Ontario or Quebec. Under this Bill you could send a message from Northumberland to Chatham or Sarnia for 25 cents; but for a message to New Brunswick or Halifax the other company could charge what they pleased. I would like some change to be made by which we would get the benefit of this proviso.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. What we want is plain and simple, a telegraphic message from St. John to Moncton or Dorchester for 25 cents. This Company have the control of lines which enable them to give us this privilege. We pay 30 cents instead of 25 cents, which is very unequal. I submit to the promoters of the Bill whether it is not within the competency of the Company to grant the concession we ask for. If you want to telegraph to Moncton or St. John we should have the same reasonable right as to any part of the Dominion. I presume this organization will be prepared to grant us what we ask, which is reasonable and fair.

Mr. BOULTBEE. It seems gentlemen opposite imagine we should legislate for them just as we please. My hon. friend opposite clearly says that he wants 5 cents struck off his telegraph messages. But it would come out of the pockets of the Great North-Western or some other company, and not out of his pocket. The promoters of the Bill say we will concede 25 cents as our charge; but gentlemen opposite want them to go further, and make this unfortunate Company not only convey messages from one end of the Dominion to the other for 25 cents, but to grant concessions in regard to messages over other lines for 25 cents.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. This Company controls the Dominion line, which owns a line from Sackville to St. John, and it is upon this line we have to pay 30 cents. Now, inasmuch as this large Company controls that line, they should give us the same privilege, as to rates, as people elsewhere.

Mr. BOULTBEE. On whatever lines that are controlled by this Company, they are willing to concede the reduction of 5 cents, but not for such lines as they do not control; on them they cannot control or reduce the tariff. It seems manifestly unfair that their revenue should be reduced by carrying messages over the whole length and breadth of the Dominion, under any circumstances, at 25 cents. They do it under such arrangements as they can control, and it would be most unfair to extort any more.

Mr. BORDEN. I am informed that the Dominion Company, so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, has been absorbed by the Western Union. If that be the case, there can be no security for a low rate, if the modification suggested by the hon. member for North Victoria be made in the proposed amendment of the hon. member for St. John. Our position will be a very hard one, and probably we shall be called upon to pay the full rate to the Montreal Company, and then whatever rate the Western Union charges in Nova Scotia; and although the hon. member for Victoria says that the Bill does not control the Western Union, a provision might be inserted that the Montreal Company should not charge a higher rate than they now receive. I presume they do not get 25 cents on a message to Nova Scotia—perhaps but 15 cents. But under this Bill they will be able to charge 25 cents, and we shall have to pay an additional charge to the Western Union. There should be some provision protecting Nova Scotia in that respect, to which I call the attention of the hon. member for Victoria.

Mr. PLUMB. We are legislating for the Dominion or Western Union Company. So far as I can see the Dominion Company has the right to amalgamate with any other Company, and make whatever arrangements it likes. The Western Union is out of our reach. I do not see why we should compel the Montreal Company to be an intermediate Company, and propose to the other companies' terms they are not bound to adopt. They come here to unite, and to ask the same privileges that we granted to a rival company some years ago. The position of hon. gentlemen opposite is most extraordinary and illogical.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I would ask whether the Great Western does not control and operate the Dominion line in all parts of New Brunswick? If they do not control it by virtue of this arrangement, I do not see that it is reasonable of us to exact it, but if they do control it it seems reasonable we should exact.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I have just received a memorandum from the agent informing me that the Great North-Western do not control lines east of Sackville, but those lines are under the control of the Western Union; consequently, supposing the latter charged 5 cents for transmit-ing a message from Sackville to St. John or Cape Breton, the Great North-Western would only get 20 cents, as they would have to pay the Western Union the other 5 cents.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The lines from Sackville to St. John, Moncton, &c., are westward, so that they are under the control of the Great North-Western.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. member for Niagara can afford to be very magnanimous and generous to this Company at the expense of the Lower Provinces. Ontario is all right under the Bill as it stands, but we of the Lower Provinces suffer now and do not wish to suffer any longer. I, at first, understood the hon. member who has charge of the Bill to say that the Dominion lines in the Lower Provinces are now held by the Great North-Western Company, the Western Union having a certain right of control for the purpose of controlling cable messages.

Mr. CAMERON. I said I was aware they had reserved so much of the Dominion lines down there as was essential for their controlling communication with the cables. I do not know the exact nature of the reservation they made; but it was not only to control the lines for cable purposes, but to have so much control as will give the Company entire control of communication with the cables.

Mr. ANGLIN. They have entire absolute control of that portion of the Dominion lines.

Mr. CAMERON. I believe so.

Mr. ANGLIN. That would be held to mean all the lines east from St. John, including all lines in Nova Scotia; therefore that resolution would be of very little value to us. These lines are not absolutely necessary for the transmission of cable messages; but only necessary for the purpose of establishing a monopoly in the transmission of cable messages.

Mr. DOMVILLE. That is what I pointed out to the hon. member just now. The motion had better be withdrawn. My opinion is it is valueless. The Western Union have such arrangements down there, that they cannot be broken by any legislation of ours. If this clause is likely to be inoperative, it is far better to let it drop.

Mr. BURPEE. I do not propose to withdraw the motion. Hon. members must remember that while the Western Union Company are not legally bound by any legislation here, they are partners with the other Company. The Western Union will form part of the amalgamation, and therefore are as much interested in carrying messages from New Brunswick on Dominion lines as the Montreal Telegraph Company. I am willing, however, to let the motion stand until the third reading, to enable further information to be given in the meantime. After this expression of opinion I am willing to let it stand to the third reading and then get some more information on the matter.

Mr. McDougall. We have all the information necessary to determine the question as to whether it is proper, in this Montreal Telegraph Company's Bill, to put in language which will operate on other companies. Now, my hon. friend has explained again and again that these words "in connection with" are broad enough to include arrangements with the Western Union, and as this Company is connected with the Western Union it varies the terms, and it would be absurd to put language of that kind in this clause: In amendment to the Montreal Telegraph Company's Bill, leave out the words "in connection with" in the original clause. Then all the lines operated by the Great North-Western Company in New Brunswick will be subject to this rate. That concession has been made. I should have made it, but I understand from those who are better informed in the matter that those who have a right to speak on behalf of the Company have conceded that, and the hon. member, I think, will do well to take what is offered, without compelling us to oppose the clause altogether.

Mr. BURPEE. After what has fallen from the hon. members for Victoria and Halton I am willing to take those two words out.

Amendment agreed to and reported.

On motion for the third reading,

Mr. BLAKE moved the following amendment:—

Provided, also, that whereas inventions, improvements and economies in telegraphy may hereafter result in a great diminution in the cost of the service, so that the maximum rate herein provided may become wholly exorbitant, no Act of Parliament passed in that event and reducing accordingly the maximum rate herein provided, shall be deemed an infringement of the privileges granted by this Act.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think there is some misconception as to the character of this amendment. It does not affect in any way this amendment; it is simply a declaration that Parliament shall hold itself free hereafter to do justice to the general public without feeling itself bound to make what may be claimed as compensation by this Company because of any reduction in tolls. I quite agree with the hon. Minister of Railways that it would be better to make this a general declaration, so that all persons and all companies may understand that we will hold ourselves absolutely free for all time to come to make such modification in the rates and charges upon all railway and telegraph lines as the public interests may require.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken that it had reference to the previous clause. The suggestion had reference to the return to be made. I said it would much better appear in a general Bill which would apply to all telegraph companies. The hon. member will remember that I took exception to this clause as being most objectionable.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think, however, he was willing to accept it as a general proposition. I know he did object that the clause as it stands would to some extent or in some way impair the powers of this Parliament and Government in dealing with companies of this kind. It would be simply impossible for us by any resolution of ours to impair the powers of Parliament. The powers of Parliament remain precisely what they are, no matter what we resolve to do with them. We may impose certain moral obligations upon Parliament, we cannot possibly impair their force in the slightest degree. I do not think that in passing a resolution of this kind we impose any moral obligation on this Parliament at any future Session or on any future Parliament, not to deal as we think right in the public interest with companies of this kind. When we adopted the maximum rate in this Bill we fully entered into a contract with this Company. We do seem to agree that it is the proper way, and we do seem to bind ourselves in future Parliaments not to reduce the rate below 25 cents under any circumstances. If the principle laid down by the Minister of Railways is sound, we should not adopt in this Bill any maximum rate. We should take some other mode of arriving at it, such as leaving it to the Governor in Council to approve of any rate that may be imposed. The proposition is simply a declaration which, I think, it would be well to make—a general declaration, and though it appeared in this particular Bill, providing that we shall have the right to fix the maximum rate in future as circumstances may justify and the public interests require.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says that we should put a general resolution into this Bill which is a private one. How resolutions stating that in case of any improvements in telegraphy Parliament may reduce the rate which will affect the railways or steamboat lines or any other industry, is something which I cannot see. For general purposes we must have a general Act. The hon. gentleman says we cannot bind future Parliaments, and that by the passage of this clause we give them no legal rights; but, Sir, I do not think we have a moral right, so what is the use of it in the Bill? There is one thing quite clear, that the uncertainty which would be produced by passing this resolution would have the effect, certainly, of shaking the confidence of the shareholders in the value of their property. It will deteriorate the value of their property, and do no good. On the hon. gentleman's own argument, the sovereignty of Parliament is so great that when we find that a private Act works against the public interests we have the right to legislate. I think, if I am not mistaken, the interpretation of the Act gives us specifically that right, but, at all events, the hon. gentleman's argument is clearly that there is neither a legal nor a moral right in the Company to claim compensation, so what is the use of hurting these people's property?

Amendment negatived on a division.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I have not given notice of the amendment which I have in my hands; but, of course, if there is any objection on technical grounds we can also take the objection to the third reading of the Bill and it must stand over. The amendment is as follows:—

That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the same, by restricting the clauses relating to leasing and amalgamation to companies or telegraph lines already established.

Now, as I understand the position, the Minister of Railways, both in the House and elsewhere, asserts that Parliament is unwilling to give general powers of amalgamation, that when powers of amalgamation are asked for, the parties asking for them should come down and specify the particular amalgamation they require, and the object for which it is sought. This amendment cannot affect the particular arrangement which has been the subject of so much discussion in the House, so I think the promoters should accept it. It is important in this respect: If, for instance, any telegraph company should be established it might turn out to be in the interest of this country to grant, say to the Mutual Union Telegraph Company, powers of amalgamation, in order to enable them better to compete with this strong combination. It was thought necessary to grant such powers to the Dominion Company, and for that specific purpose, but we should provide that, having granted those powers to another company, this company should not have power to amalgamate in order to swallow it up.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The charter of the Dominion Telegraph Company is not restricted in this way.

Mr. WHITE. I know it is not; but the Montreal Company, which was then a strong company, had no powers of amalgamation, and therefore no amalgamation could take place between the Dominion and Montreal Companies. The Montreal had its business arrangements with the Western Union for the exchange of messages, and so on, and they were of a character amounting almost to amalgamation. When the American Union Company was established in opposition to the Western Union, the Dominion Company here asked for powers to unite with it, in order to be placed in a more efficient position, it was thought desirable to give it powers of amalgamation; but the amalgamation of the Canadian lines could not take place, as these powers were not given to the Montreal Company. The hon. gentlemen say the Canada Mutual is established and that this amendment would not apply. That is true, but some other company may be established hereafter. Next Session we may have an application for another company; and in case we have I think it is desirable that we should restrict the powers of amalgamation in this particular company to lines now in existence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. ANGLIN. My impression is that this amendment is useless. It can hardly be expected that even the most intelligent of the public will imagine that a clause of this sort inserted in the Bill is done for no object or purpose whatever. It will have no effect save to gratify the hon. gentleman who had moved it, and who seems to be determined to get through some amendment to this Bill. We all know that any other future company may ask for a charter and obtain powers to amalgamate or lease; and consequently, it will have no effect on future amalgamations, while all existing lines may amalgamate in the one corporation. This clause cannot have the slightest possible effect on the future legislation of this Parliament, but it may have the effect of injuring the property of the Montreal Telegraph Company, as it may create the impression that it restricts or deprives this Company of some valuable privileges.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says in effect that we voted for this amendment because my hon. friend moved it, but he cannot object that we should help him in a most laudable attempt. The hon. gentleman

(Mr. Anglin) seems opposed to all amendments or improvements. I think, Sir, that this clause, instead of having the effect of injuring the stock, will have the effect of greatly strengthening it. It is a conservative measure, not in the party sense, but it is in the best sense of the word, conservative. We have chartered other companies in our wisdom; they are in existence; and this clause prevents future companies leading us away, or watering this stock.

Mr. CAMERON. When this amendment was proposed, I felt that it was of no importance whatever, whether it was passed or not; but it seems to me absurd to deal with companies which are not yet in existence. As far as the Montreal Telegraph Company is concerned, I do not consider that the amendment has on it the slightest possible effect in any way whatever.

Mr. MILLS. The First Minister says that this is a conservative and good measure, in the best sense of the word and not in the party sense. I quite agree with him that, if conservative at all and beneficial, it could not be so in the party sense.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I voted against this amendment, and am now opposed to it, because I do not see the object of legislation here unless it is intended to accomplish some good effect; and this amendment cannot possibly be beneficial, while it may be hurtful. If a company is formed in this country and incorporated in the future, and it would be injurious to permit amalgamation, this House would not then grant the power of amalgamation; but if in the future amalgamation with only such companies were then desirable, then this amendment would be hurtful, because another Session must pass over before an Act permitting such amalgamation could be passed.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I think that this is not fair legislation at all. Power to amalgamate was given to the Mutual Union Telegraph Company.

Mr. WHITE. Such power was stricken out.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. At all events the Dominion Telegraph Company possesses unrestricted power to amalgamate, and why should this be denied to this Company? I see no reason for it whatever. Our legislation ought to be uniform, and what we give to one Company we ought to grant to any other similar Company.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We must vote for this amendment as the House has ordered it.

Amendment agreed to and reported.

On motion for the third reading,

Mr. WHITE. I have another amendment which I think is very important; it is the amendment against differential rates. When I moved it in Committee an objection was raised that it was going seriously to injure the country newspapers. I have been a country newspaper man myself for a long time, and I have as great a sympathy, I think, with the country press as anybody in this House or out of it. I am satisfied that the country newspapers would not be hurt by giving them the same rates as the city newspapers. But I have altered the amendment in such a way as to remove that difficulty, if in the mind of anybody it exists. I beg leave to move:

Provided always that all rates charged by any company purchasing or leasing the line of the Montreal Telegraph Company under the powers by this Act conferred, as respects all classes of despatches, shall be at all times charged equally to all corporations and persons, and after the same tariff in respect of all despatches of the same class and description, transmitted under like circumstances, and to persons or companies residing or carrying on business in the same place, and no reduction or advance in any such rates shall be made, either directly or indirectly, in favor of or against any particular person or corporation so residing or doing business in the same place, sending or receiving despatches of the same class and description.

Mr. ANGLIN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman what the result would be if this became law and the Company violated it? There is no penalty attached for the violation of it, neither do I think it would go so far as to vitiate the charter.

Mr. HOUDE. I think it would be unjust to the French press of this country if that amendment should pass. I am not at all interested now in journalism; I entirely withdrew from it some time ago; but the French daily papers have not only to pay for the despatches, but for the translation of them, which sometimes costs pretty heavily, and as the amendment stands, I am afraid that it would operate very unjustly towards the French press.

Amendment negatived on a division.

Mr. WHITE. I beg leave to move:

That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend the same by substituting the word "twenty" for the word "twenty-five" in section 13 thereof.

The object of this is simply to make the rate 20 cents instead of 25 cents, and I think, in view of the fact that the two companies, when acting in competition with each other, were able to pay fair dividends with the 20 cents rate, and when the business of the country was not in anything like the prosperous condition it is in to-day, that they ought to be able now to give us the rate of 20 cents. I do not propose to detain the House, but I do propose to divide it on this motion.

Mr. CAMERON. My hon. friend hardly states the object of the amendment accurately. The object of the amendment is to kill the Bill, and that would be the necessary result of it if it were adopted.

Mr. McLENNAN. I have not heard any argument yet to convince me that the telegraphy of this country should be made dearer than it has been for several years past; and this is practically the effect of this Bill. It is well known that this Company and its competitor paid very fair dividends while the business of this country was in its most depressed state—dividends beyond those paid by almost any other interest in the country. We are told, indeed, that in one year the Company only paid 7 per cent. Does anybody in this House remember that large moneyed institutions, which were dependent upon commercial earnings, were obliged to reduce their dividends in many cases one-half, and in some cases paid no dividends at all? The moment business revived, this Company began to get on its legs again. It is true, it suffered some diminution in its dividends, but the reason was that for several years previously, during the time of the depression, the property of the Company had run down. The other argument we have heard has been chiefly intended to warn us against the operations of the stock exchange, where there is not so much respect for private rights as appears to have visited this House. From my own knowledge of the Stock Exchange, I have reason to believe that the gentlemen who operate there weigh the interests in their hands with great care, and we have heard that the stock of this Telegraph Company was something like British Consols, with such a fixed permanent value that it had very little possibility of variation. The fact is that the stock of this Company has varied from par to a premium of 100 per cent. while it was earning very large dividends, and we never heard about danger from operations in the stock market. It is well known that stocks that are on a much broader and firmer basis than the stock of this Company have fared in the same way. But what are the facts, known in as well as out of this House? That the greatest stock-jobbing operations we ever heard of in connection with telegraphy is the amalgamation under which the companies are proposed to be placed. But while a big company is formed there is to be a very small capital; and whilst it secures a dividend of 8 per cent. to the Montreal Company, there is no limit to the amount that may be made out of it by people who put in the magnificent sum of $4,000. That is the simple fact with regard to stock-jobbing. I think it is the duty of this House to guard the public interest by keeping down the monopoly that is being created by all these means taken together and the permission to charge 25 cents, when it has been proved beyond question that a rate of 20 cents is amply sufficient for all the operations of telegraphy, up to this time, without counting the fact that the profits of the Company must increase very much with the increasing business of the country, and that the prospects from a rate of 20 cents are very much greater than anything done in the past. For those reasons I shall vote for the amendment.

Amendment (Mr. White) negatived on the following division:—

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 146) to repeal the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act and the Acts amending it.—(Mr. Landry.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 144) to authorize the construction on certain conditions of the Canadian Pacific Railway, through some other pass than the Yellow Head Pass. He said:—About a year ago I had the pleasure of submitting for the consideration of this House a contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I have now the greater pleasure of calling the attention of the House to the results of the adoption, by Parliament, of that contract, and of its ratification. The ratification of that contract was made, and letters patent under it were issued, on the 16th February, 1881. I may safely say that the progress made in that great work from that time to this has been eminently satisfactory. The most convenient mode in which I can make a rapid survey of the work will be to commence at the eastern end, or the point termed Callander, at the eastern end of Lake Nipissing, where the contract for the Canadian Pacific Railway properly commences, and I may say that considerable progress has been made towards the construction of the first section of the line at that point. It was hoped that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, under the subsidy granted by Parliament, from Pembroke to Callander would have been completed at an earlier date, but it has not been found practicable to complete that section at an earlier period than something like the 1st of July of the present year, and it will be readily seen that it would be very difficult indeed for the contractors to make very material progress with the first section until they had obtained easier access by the completion of that which was formerly the Canada Central, now a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to that point. Notwithstanding that, I may say that a careful re-survey and re-location of the line has enabled the country to obtain a better line in every respect than was supposed to exist up to Sturgeon River or the point where the line became common to the interior line, passing away to the head of Lake Superior or to the branch as it was when proposed from that point to the Sault Ste. Marie. The papers which I have just laid on the Table disclose the fact that an application has been made after examination of the subject by the Canadian Pacific Railway for permission to locate their line from the point that was common to the Sault Ste. Marie branch, to the north of Lake Superior in the direction of the Sault Ste. Marie; that that which was formerly regarded as a branch of the Sault Ste. Marie, shall, to a large extent, become a portion of the trunk line. A careful survey which had been made of the section from Algoma running easterly to connect at the point where the Sault Ste. Marie branch commenced, has shown a very favorable section of country for the construction of the road, with the advantage that at Algoma Mills connection is made with navigation at the waters of Lake Huron.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would suggest that the hon. member would state, as he goes along, what particular survey he refers to. For instance, in 1877, a survey was made on nearly a direct line from Cantin's Bay to the mouth of Peak River.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is not the survey to which I am now referring. I am referring to the survey and location which was made under the hon. gentleman's Administration, and subsequently re-surveyed under my instructions, from Callander for about sixty or seventy miles on the first section of the line which I call the interior line, running from that point north to the head of Lake Superior; and although a good deal of care had been taken in reference to that survey, a further examination of the line with the view of carrying it westward instead of northward in the direction of the Sault Ste. Marie, has resulted in obtaining a very favorable line from Callander to the crossing of the Sturgeon River, and away on from that to Algoma Mills. For that distance, from Callander to Algoma Mills, a distance of 182 miles, through a favorable country, the most severe grade encountered is one of fifty-three feet to the mile. It is confidently anticipated that the Company will be enabled to lay track upon fifty miles this season west of Callander. That is the calculation, and they have already placed under contract a section from Algoma Mills, running eastwardly to meet the line from Callander for a distance of sixty miles, on which it is expected the track will be laid this season, so that it is, without doubt, ascertained that communication during the next season—that is in the year following the present—will be complete from this point to the waters of Lake Huron at Algoma Mills, a point 182 miles west of Callander Station. The sixty miles east of Algoma Mills are under contract, and it is expected the track will be laid upon that portion this season, so that the seventy-two miles intervening between Sturgeon River and the portion now under contract to Algoma Mills will be attacked at both ends, and be consequently completed during the year. The main line, as it is now proposed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, is intended to run westward from Algoma Mills to within twenty or thirty miles of Sault Ste. Marie, running through a favorable country. They have made formal application for this change of location. The Government have passed an Order in Council, of which I have just placed a copy in the hands of the leader of the Opposition, agreeing to adopt that location provided it is found upon further survey that they are able to show the plans and profiles of a through line from that point within twenty or thirty miles of Sault Ste. Marie, running nearer to the coast to the head of Lake Superior. Until that plan and location are submitted for the approval of the Governor in Council it is not the intention to pay any portion of the subsidy intended for the Canadian Pacific Railway upon any portion common to that line, and what I call the Ontario line, running from the north of Lake Superior to a point sixty or seventy miles north-west of Callander Station. I have no doubt myself, after the information I have received from the engineer of the Company, that a very fair line will be obtained in that locality. We have only very recently received information from the able engineer who has been going over the most difficult portion of it, that, although the line will be probably attended with greater cost in construction, it is believed that a very good line, with grades not inferior to those that we would have been obliged to encounter in the interior line in the neighborhood of the upper part of Lake Superior, will be attained. There will be very great advantage, as hon. gentlemen opposite will see, from the adoption of the proposed line. In the first place, I may say that the line is assumed to be no longer, the distance will be no greater in the one case than in the other; it is about 650 miles, whether you go by the interior line from Callander Station to the head of Lake Superior, or whether you go to within twenty-five or thirty miles of the Sault Ste. Marie line and thence away to the north to Thunder Bay. I may say it will be at once seen that as the line will run in the neighborhood of the waters of Lake Superior, there is much less likelihood of its being obstructed by the snowfall, the snowfall not being so great on the coast of Lake Superior as it would be on the interior line. There will also be greater advantage in construction. While you would be compelled to carry on the construction of the interior line to a large extent from the two ends, the one from the head of Lake Superior running eastwardly, and the other from Callander Station running westwardly, the bridging of the various rivers and inlets from the waters of Lake Superior will enable this work to be attacked at different points along the line, and will enable supplies to be thrown in much more easily than otherwise would have been the case, and in that way enable the time to be very much shortened during which the line can be constructed than it would be possible if constructed on the interior line. As I have said before, I have every reason to believe that it will be found quite practicable to construct a good line in that locality, and it will be obviously desirable to do so for the reasons I have mentioned, in case it be found practicable. When that day arrives it is proposed to adopt the location of the line, and then to treat all that portion of the line from Callander Station running to within twenty-five or thirty miles of Sault Ste. Marie, on by the head of Lake Superior to Thunder Bay, as a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway proper. It is also proposed, during the coming summer, to finally locate the line from Thunder Bay to the head of Lake Superior running eastwardly, and it is expected that by the end of the present season they will be enabled to put under contract some fifty or sixty miles of road running from Prince Arthur's Landing in this direction towards meeting the other line which is being extended from this side. Now, Sir, I may say that there will be an additional advantage from having the line constructed in the mode proposed, because so soon as the waters of Lake Huron to Algoma Mills are tapped there is a means of bringing traffic from these waters on to the line, and the proximity of the line to the waters of Lake Superior will also furnish an additional means of reaching the main line and carrying on the traffic in connection with it. It is expected by the Government, as I held out the hope a year ago, that we will open the road from Prince Arthur's Landing through to Winnipeg in the month of July next—not that the road will be completed, but that that will be accomplished to which we have steadily worked, the getting a through track laid over that distance, so that we may carry immigrants into the great North-West through our own country, over the lines of railway from Quebec to the waters of the Georgian Bay, thence by water to Prince Arthur's Landing, and so over our own line into the great North-West, furnishing a much easier, a much cheaper, a much more rapid, and I may say, so far as the difficulty of getting immigrants through a neighboring country is concerned, a much safer line of communication in our own interests than any which at present exists. Of the whole of 433 miles from Prince Arthur's Landing to Winnipeg, the track has now been laid upon 401 miles, leaving only thirty-two miles to complete the link. On contract 41, from the 193rd mile to the 233rd mile, the road is expected to be finished early in the present season. On contract 42, from the 233rd mile to the 300th mile, it will take a considerable portion of the next season as well as of this to finish the work. The contract time for finishing that work is July of next year, but I shall be extremely glad if the work can be quite finished during the next two or three succeeding months. However, as I have already stated, I have every reason to believe that during the coming month of July, we shall have through communication by rail, there being only thirty-two miles of track now remaining to be completed on that line. The total expenditure on the line from Prince Arthur's Landing to Selkirk up to the present time is $13,234,000, and the balance, which I estimated last year would be sufficient to complete it, of $1,470,100, making $14,705,000, or the estimate which I ventured to lay upon the Table of the House last year as the cost of that work; and after an additional year's experience the House will be glad to learn that I have no reason to suppose that that estimate will be exceeded.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. gentleman give the figures of the present expenditure?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The present expenditure is $13,234,900, leaving a balance of $1,470,100, to complete the work as covered in my estimate of a year ago. The moment that the through track is laid in the month of July now coming, we expect to be able to carry, without materially interfering with the progress of the work, some traffic and the through immigrants which require to be provided for. I may say, Sir, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has decided to establish its headquarters in the city of Winnipeg. The station grounds, the workshops and all the paraphernalia that are needed to carry on and operate a great line of railway, are to be placed at that point; and this decision having been reached, an investigation was made by them as to the most direct mode of carrying the line westward. As the House is aware, the Government had placed under contract the first 100 miles of that road, west of Winnipeg. The Company decided that it would be better to run a direct line west from the city of Winnipeg, in the direction of Portage la Prairie, than to continue to follow the line which the Government had adopted, and they were therefore permitted to abandon that portion of the line between Stonewall—a distance of twenty-one miles—from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie, and construct the road from Winnipeg in a more direct line to Portage la Prairie. By this change, the distance has been shortened between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie thirteen miles. The Company, however, are bound to continue to operate the line under this alteration—which was agreed to—for twenty-one miles from Winnipeg to what is called Stonewall, the principal place on the line between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie, over the line which was being constructed by the Government before the work passed into the hands of the Company. The line as now located is therefore a direct line between Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie, and in the same westerly direction crosses the Assiniboine at Brandon. It then follows the general course of the Qu'Appelle River to Moose Jaw Creek, a distance of 404 miles from Winnipeg, which is the most westerly point up to the present time approved of by the Governor in Council; and I may say here, that it is not the intention of the Governor in Council to approve of any further portion of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway proper, or make any payments in regard to any construction west of that point, until it is ascertained that there is a better line in the interests of the country, so far as we are able to judge, through Kicking Horse Pass, than that we had previously obtained through Yellow Head Pass. From Moose Jaw Creek, we are quite aware there is no difficulty in getting a line to the Pass which was authorized by Parliament, and the Bill, which I have now submitted for the consideration of the House, asks for authority to make the change only if we believe it to be in the interests of the country. I will come more particularly to that point a little later on. I may say, however, Sir, that the section of the country through which the line runs direct from Winnipeg, in the most direct course that could be obtained from Winnipeg to Moose Jaw Creek, and as it is proposed to be constructed, is very favorable both as regards the grades of the railway and also as regards the character of the country which is to be opened up. The district is one of a very promising character, which will undoubtedly be very rapidly filled with a vigorous and enterprising population. Now, Sir, it is expected of the Company that they will be able to lay no less than 500 miles of track in that direction this season; there are 161 miles from Winnipeg now under traffic to a point which, I think, is called Flat Creek, about thirty-one miles from Brandon, which, as you are aware, is about 130 miles from Winnipeg. The Company expect to be able to lay some 500 miles of track in a direct westerly line during the coming season; but, as I have already stated, the Government does not intend to make any payments on any portion of the line beyond Moose Jaw Creek until they are satisfied that a better line can be obtained for the Canadian Pacific Railway by going south to Kicking Horse Pass than had already been obtained in the direction of the Yellow Head Pass. The location of the Canadian Pacific Railway being more southerly than was intended or contemplated two years ago, I think will be attended with this advantage: that the branches will require to be fewer, and, as is perfectly obvious, the fewer the branches are the longer they will be, and the greater the facility with which they can be operated. The whole of the country to the north of the Canadian Pacific Railway is open for the construction of long branches running in various directions, and from their length, they can be operated with greater advantage and to greater profit than short branches could be worked. The Company have about 8,000 tons of rails now at the end of their track, and a very large quantity of sleepers, and an enormous quantity of rails are now in transit from Great Britain and the Continent, to carry on with great vigor the prosecution of these works. The payments up to the present date to the Company have been $1,610,000 in cash, and 1,610,000 acres of land. All the branches of the Canadian Pacific Railway, as the House is aware, are, 1st. The branch from Winnipeg to Emerson, which, including the cost of the road to Selkirk, has cost, up to January, 1882, $1,538,033. The earnings upon this branch during the ten months that the Government operated it, before it was transferred to the Company, up to the 30th April, 1881, amounted to $291,498. I mention this more especially because I think that a return which was moved for by the hon. member for Westmoreland has not yet been laid on the Table.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. BLAKE. What have been the receipts since?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will be very glad to give the hon. gentleman that information when we come to that point. The traffic has increased enormously since that date.

From 1st of May, 1881, to 31st of March, 1882, there were no less than 21,486 through passengers, and the present rate of passengers, as I understand it, is from 300 to 1,000 per day; the passengers in March last numbered 5,684, and from the 1st to the 15th April, no less than 3,354. I may say that as they take all persons below twelve years of age without tickets, those passengers only embrace what we may term adults, or do not embrace what I suppose would quite double the number of the passengers, if those children were included, as was of course the case in the number of immigrants, as stated by me on a former occasion as having come in. I may say, for the information of the hon. gentleman who seems very anxious to anticipate fit—that the receipts from the operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the time that it passed into the hands of the Company, on the 1st of May down to the present time, and to the last date of information was over $600,000.

Mr. BLAKE. What is the last day of the information?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I see by the paper that the earnings from May, 1881, to February, 1882, inclusive, amounted to $193,000 for passengers, $391,000 for freight, and $10,000 for mails and express; making a total of $603,000 for that period.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. For the whole line?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, for the whole line under operation—from Rat Portage on one side to Flat Creek, thirty miles beyond Brandon, on the other, and from Winnipeg to Pembina. The Canadian Pacific Railway, in addition to the line they have constructed from Winnipeg westward, and which is now in operation for the 161 miles, have also laid some eighty-nine miles of a branch which is called the Winnipeg and Pembina Mountain Branch, running in a south-westerly direction from Winnipeg to the border, and with a branch of twenty miles connecting that point with the town of Emerson at the frontier. For 100 miles this branch it is expected, will be opened for traffic during the present season. It is now ready for the rails with the exception of the twenty mile branch to Emerson, and it is expected that 100 miles of this branch will be in operation during the coming season. They have also projected another branch from Brandon south-westerly, about fifteen miles, to Souris, thence west, in all 195 miles. I should have mentioned also that the length of the Winnipeg and Pembina Mountain Branch is 235 miles.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Where does the Souris Branch strike the main line?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At Brandon, running thence south-westerly about fifteen miles and then westerly, with about fifteen miles between it and the main line. The next section I come to is, of course, the one which will be dealt with last, and it is the main difficulty with which the Company has to engage—I mean the portion through the Rocky Mountains to Kamloops. I may say that I only received this morning the latest information as to the grounds which led the Company to be somewhat sanguine that they would be able to obtain a better pass for the railway than the Yellow Head Pass—not better in point of grades, because that would be impossible. If they get through Kicking Horse Pass I am afraid it will be by heavier grades than the other; but it is so obviously in the interests of the country and of a great trans-continental line like this, that it should be rendered as short as possible, that great exertions are being made, and the Company are prepared to incur great expense provided they can shorten the line, as they believe they can, by some seventy-nine miles. This is a matter which would be of great importance not only to the line but to the country, because it would penetrate the best district in British Columbia, that is the Kamloops district—a district which would only be skirted if the road went by the Yellow Head Pass, at the confluence of the Fraser River and Lake Kamloops. I will read to the House the latest information obtained with reference to the probability of getting a pass by the line which is proposed by this Bill—or rather the Bill proposes that the Governor in Council, if they believe it is in the interests of the country, may authorize the Company to deviate from the pass which was fixed by the contract and the Act of last Session. This telegram is from Mr. Van Horn, the Superintendent who is in charge of all the operations at the central point of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was telegraphed this morning to Mr. Drinkwater as follows:—

“Major Rogers reports that there is no question about feasibility of good line with easy grades through Kicking Horse Pass although work will be very expensive. The crossing of the Selkirk Range is the only thing in doubt, but explorations have progressed sufficiently to justify belief that they can be crossed by use of some long tunnels. The worst that can happen in case of failure to cross Selkirk is, that the line may be forced round the great bend of the Columbia, which would considerably increase distance; but to save this distance work will be undertaken that would ordinarily be considered impracticable on account of expense.”

W. C. VAN HORN.

That is to say, it is now found that the Kicking Horse Pass is perfectly practicable as we have known for some time.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Since 1873.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, since 1873. But the difficulty, of course, as my hon. friend knows, is that presented by the Selkirk Range, which all the surveys carried on by the Government led to the belief was not practicable. If it be found to be practicable it will only be so by undertaking to shorten this line by some seventy-nine miles, probably by considerable increase of the expense of construction over that which would be involved by passing through the Yellow Head Pass. The importance of making that saving of seventy-nine miles is evidently considered so great by the Company that, as they state, they would be prepared to take it even at an expense that would ordinarily be considered quite impracticable. The engineers of my Department—those who have any knowledge of the subject—concur in the opinion that if this shorter line is obtained by piercing the Selkirk Range, it will have to be done at a very great cost indeed. The line, I presume, would be considerably shortened by going through the Kicking Horse Pass, and round what is called the big bend of the Columbia River; but there is not sufficient information to enable one to speak with any certainty as to how the distance would compare with the Yellow Head Pass. The section of country opened would not be quite as favorable in that case as in the other. I will now read the memorandum which Mr. Smellie, who is Engineer in Chief at the Company's headquarters in Montreal, has placed in my hands with reference to this matter, as I told him there was a desire on the part of the House to get the fullest, latest, and most authentic information that could be given on that point. He says in the memorandum, which is dated the 15th of April:

“From the report of Mr. A. B. Rogers, who conducted the surveys in British Columbia during the season of 1881, I obtain the following particulars.

“That a thorough preliminary survey of the country was made between the Kicking Horse Creek and Mount Back, including the Vermilion and White Man's Pass routes, and a partial survey of the route from the head of Bow River to the summit of Howse Pass, and also of the Kananaskis route. The time occupied on these surveys extended only from the 1st of August to the 1st of October, the parties not having arrived as early as was expected.

“The route selected for location passes up the Bow River to its junction with Bath Creek, thence up Bath Creek westerly about five miles, thence south-westerly about one mile to Summit Lake, about one mile long, and from which the waters flow in both directions. This lake lies from four to five miles farther east than is shown on the maps as the summit of the Rocky Mountains. At this point, the line will thence follow down the east branch of the Kicking Horse Creek to the Columbia River.

"From the results of the surveys, as far as made, Mr. Rogers is sanguine that the descent from the Kicking Horse summit to the Columbia River will not exceed eighty feet per mile, and that the gradients from Bow River to the summit will be raised.

"Mr. Rogers also made a reconnaissance from Kamloops easterly to the summit of the Selkirk Range, and from general observation and barometric readings he states that gradients will be obtained not exceeding sixty-six feet per mile between Kamloops and the north fork of the Illicille West River, and from thence to the summit of the Selkirk Range the gradient will not exceed eighty feet to the mile.

"In consequence of difficulties which beset Mr. Rogers, arising from a scarcity of supplies, he was unable to specially examine the country between the summit of the Selkirk Range and the East Branch of the Columbia River, a distance of about thirty miles.

"Before leaving the summit, however, he ascended the "Divide" and while seeing generally a very broken country to the eastward, he observed that one of the ravines led in the desired direction for a distance of quite ten miles. There is also on the west side of the Columbia a large stream, Beaver Creek, which has its source in the vicinity of this broken country. From these observations Mr. Rogers feels assured that the distance in which difficulties may be expected in crossing the Selkirk Range, will be reduced to ten or twelve miles."

That, I may say to hon. gentlemen opposite, is in substance all the information we have in our possession. As will be seen by the Bill now under consideration, it is not proposed to ask authority from Parliament to permit the adoption of any pass, however feasible, that is nearer than 100 miles from the boundary on the United States, which will, I think, be regarded as a quite sufficient distance to protect thoroughly the national character and interests of the line. I will now, Sir, refer to the progress of the work from Kamloops to Emory's Bar. That work, as hon. gentlemen opposite are aware, has been vigorously pressed, and the total value of the work done under the contract covering that 127 miles, is $1,979,973.

Mr. ANGLIN. To what date?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is to the latest date to which I have information of the progress of the work.

Mr. BLAKE. What date is that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At this moment it is not in my power to state the exact date to which this information is brought down. I may say that the date at which that work is required to be completed under the contract is July, 1885, and that I have every reason to believe that the work will be finished within the time stipulated by the contract. Apparently, the amount of the work is not sufficient to indicate that that would be done; but hon. gentlemen will perceive that the expenditure on the initial works has been applied in such a way as to render the future progress of the work much more rapid than was possible until a large portion of very heavy and difficult work was undertaken, and means of access were thus obtained to the other portions of the line. As hon. gentlemen opposite are also aware, eighty-six miles from Emory's Bar to Port Moody have also recently been placed under contract, at an amount of $2,486,000, and the date fixed for the completion of that work is the same as the other. It is easier to complete that eighty-six miles than some sections, even in their present condition, above that, in consequence of the work being reached more easily by the Fraser River and Barrard Inlet, the contractors thus being enabled to attack it at various points more easily than it was possible to do in regard to the other work. It may, perhaps, be interesting to the House for me to glance at the estimates which have been made for those contracts on the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to state the results, so far as it is in my power, down to the present moment. The first contract from the Kaministiquia to Sunshine Creek was a contract for forty-five miles of road from the Kaministiquia to Shebandowan, but twelve and a half miles of that line was abandoned owing, to a change of policy on the part of the Government. The amount of the contract for the whole forty-five miles was $406,194; but if you deduct the twelve and a-half miles, it would leave the contract price for the thirty-two and a-half miles at $293,360. I am glad to be able to say that that contract will be completed according to the present estimate—and of course the work is so far completed as to enable one to speak with a great deal of certainty—for $313,200, or only $19,840 in excess of the price estimated for in the contract. From Sunshine Creek to English River, contract 25, the present estimate for the work is $1,417,203, and the contract price was $1,037,061, and the construction of the work will exceed the contract price by $380,147. From English River to Eagle River, contract 41, the present estimate for the completing of the work is $1,767,357, and the contract price was $2,300,196, or $532,839 less than the amount we expected to be obliged to pay when the contract was made.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I thought the contract was for $2,203,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it was for $2,300,196; and I may say we hope to be required to pay a larger amount, and for this reason: The contract was so made, that if the track was laid during the past season, by the 1st of July, and if the contract was completed by the 1st of July of next year, the contractors were to be entitled to the larger sum named here. Well, it is quite true the rails were not laid by the 1st of July; but the object the Government had in making that contract was attained, and that was to provide the means of attacking the adjoining contract from both ends; and so the work was so far completed as to have the track laid at a comparatively short time after the 1st of July. And as the contractors incurred great additional expense in making that advance, an Order in Council was passed declaring that if they complied with the second portion of the contract, requiring the completion of the work by the 1st of July next year, they should be held to have complied with the portion of the contract which depended on having the track laid by the 1st of July this year; because the expenditure made was commensurately great, and the advantage to the country is the same as it would have been had the original arrangement been adhered to. I wish to explain the manner in which I am treating these figures. Should we be able to complete that work for the closest estimate we could make at the present, we shall save $532,839 as between the cost of the work and the price at which it was let. Hon. gentlemen are aware that great efforts have been made to improve the location of the line after the contract was made, and both on this and the adjoining section Mr. Fleming was able, by great exertions, to shorten the line, although most elaborate surveys had been previously made. When the Government had undertaken to do the work, it was found that by great efforts the line could be shortened by several miles, as well as very considerable reductions made in the work in addition. There were some changes in the character of the structures that were contemplated, which also enabled us, especially on the adjoining section of the work, to make a very considerable saving. On the section from Eagle River to Keewatin, 42, the present estimate is $2,904,153; the contract price was $4,130,707; so we expect to effect a saving on this section of $1,225,554. On the contract from Keewatin to Cross Lake, section 15, as the House is aware, a change was made in the character of the work.

Mr. ANGLIN. Will the hon. gentleman describe that change.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it has been the subject of such elaborate discussion, and there is so much information in the hands of the hon. gentlemen concerning it, that I do not think it would be right to trespass on the indulgence of the House by detaining it by a further specific statement. But I may say, in general terms, that solid embankments were substituted for trestle work, and the reasons for that will be found in the reports of the engineers during the time my hon. predecessor was in office, and also in documents subsequently laid before the Government, and which led them to the conclusion that the change would be in the interests of the country. That change has added to the cost something like $250,000. So, as estimated, the figures stand thus: The work is almost finished, or expected to be actually finished immediately; the estimated cost of the section is $2,619,583—and the contract price is $1,594,085. Added to that price is $250,000, caused by the change in the character of the work, and you have $1,844,085, or an amount at present, of $775,500 more to construct the work than the contract price agreed upon.

Mr. BLAKE. Not more than the original price.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not the original contract price; but the hon. gentleman will see that you add to the original contract price $250,000, making a total of $1,844,845. There is between that and the cost of the work the sum $755,500. Now, I come to the work from Cross Lake to Selkirk, section 14, between the contract just referred to and Red River. The contract price for that work was $402,950, and the estimated cost is $733,602, or $330,652 more than the contemplated cost. I now come to the four contracts between Kamloops and Emory's Bar, 60, 61, 62, and 63, making 127 miles; and I am glad to be able to say that on 63, while the price of the contract was $1,746,150, the amount we expect to complete the work for is $1,192,600, or $553,550 less than anticipated.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does your first estimate embrace the $250,000 set down for contingencies.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am taking the actual estimate of the work to be executed; and in that case, although great attention and expense were devoted to as careful and as thorough a survey as possible, it had to be made through so rugged and difficult a country, one almost impassible, that it was utterly impossible to expect to obtain such correct location surveys as could only have been made when a staff of engineers were on the ground, engaged in the construction of the road, and which it may be in their power to secure, with a reduction of the work, by every possible means they can devise.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman state what reduction was made on the radius of the curves?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have sacrificed nothing in that respect that will, in the least degree, injure the character of the road; and having travelled, as I have, over the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railways, around curves much sharper than any to be met on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway—at a very considerable speed—I am able to say that our road will compare, not only most favorably, but is a first-class road, as compared with the roads to which I have referred. In fact, all these contracts contemplated the construction of a first class railway. On the first section, I was saying $553,550 were saved on the amount stipulated in the contract. On section 62, the contract price was $2,056,950. We expect to complete it for $1,368,670, or $688,280 less than the price contained in the contract when granted. For section 61 the contract price is $2,573,640, and we expect to complete it for $1,927,000, or $646,640 less than the contract amount. On the sections from Emory's Bar to Port Moody, of course the contract being for a lump sum, we expect, with the careful and accurate survey which was made and the thorough knowledge of the work obtained before the contract was let, to complete it for the amount stated in the contract—$2,436,000. On section 60, the contract price was $2,727,200, and we expect to complete it for $2,324,000—a saving of $403,200. So that I may state, in round numbers, that on contracts 13, 25, 15 and 14 the cost will be $1,560,139 more than the contract price; and on contracts 41, 42, 60, 61, 62 and 63, the saving will be $4,051,630, or that amount less than contemplated when the contracts were made. I give this information to the House because it is of very great interest, and I know how glad the House will be to learn, that in those remote and difficult sections of country, we have been enabled to make so great a reduction of cost, to save so very large an amount of money to the country. I may say, that in regard to the work that is being constructed by the Government, the greatest possible care has been taken to secure a first class road. I may say, in addition to that, that the policy which I propounded to the House by changing entirely the character and class of railway to be constructed, by building the cheapest possible line through the prairie country, was abandoned by the Company when they came in possession of the road; and I can challenge the closest scrutiny of the subject when I say that not only are we carrying out the portion of the road to be constructed by us, notwithstanding these great savings in such a way as to secure the construction of a first-class railway, but that it is not possible to construct a better description of railway than is being constructed in the North-West by the Company. The finest rails to be found on this continent are those they are now importing. They are the highest class of steel rails; and my hon. friend and predecessor, will perhaps be surprised to learn that they use a better fish-plate than that on the Intercolonial Railway, or the Canadian Pacific Railway as carried on by my hon. friend and after him by me until this change took place. The adoption of a fish-plate in the form of a knee—giving much greater strength than the excellent pattern we used, shows they are determined to economize in the operation of the road by the construction of the very best description of road possible. Instead of laying out a road upon the prairie with merely a sufficient amount of ballast to enable it to be operated—as I contemplated at the time I found so much difficulty, owing to the want of support of hon. gentleman opposite, in carrying on the Canadian Pacific Railway as a Government undertaking—a raised road, so far as snow, water and all those difficulties are concerned, is being constructed not only on the trunk, but on all branch lines. The result of this to the country will be most important; because we shall have in this country, extending from sea to sea, a class of railway of the very highest character, over which the greatest amount of speed can be obtained, and the largest volume of traffic carried at the cheapest possible rate. In the construction of a national line of railway, the House will see of what vital importance it is to Canada, in view of the competition with those great national projects to the south of us, the Northern Pacific, the Union and Central Pacific Railways, that to secure the traffic through Canadian channels, the Company should have adopted a much higher class of railway than they were compelled, under their contract, to construct. I mention that because the late Minister of the Interior labored under the somewhat strange delusion as to the want of care in the construction of the line shown by the Canadian Pacific Railway. Some person had pointed out to him that they were laying rails on the ice. I believe something of that kind did take place. I am afraid it took place in consequence of a portion of the road constructed by the Government between Winnipeg and Stonewall, being overflowed by water, and instead of taking up the track it was more convenient to lay it over the ice, and I dare say some sidings in connection with the traffic required to be for the time to be laid on the ice. I can only say that having travelled over 130 miles of the road, from Winnipeg to Brandon, in company with Mr. Schreiber, the Government Engineer, and after a most careful examination of the mode in which the Company constructed the road, I was delighted with it. They were making every mile of the road, whether main lines or branches, the finest description of road. Of course, it involved in constructing a road on the prairie no such expense to make a first class road as in the rougher portions of the country. I may now, by referring to the line through its entire extent for a single moment, draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the position we will occupy when the railway is completed.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Before the hon. gentleman proceeds, I would like him to state one thing he has omitted, namely, the amount expended by the Government on the first 100 miles west, and the condition of that flat country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that I have not mentioned that to the House, because I have already laid on the Table of the House a full statement of all expenditure made by the Government, about $700,000, and the statement of the payment of that claim by the Company to the Government. It would have been embraced here but for the fact that it had been dealt with in a specific return, and I will be very glad to supplement that return if the hon. gentleman finds any point in it in which there is not the fullest information.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have not seen it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that I am not particularly proud of that portion of the work which was carried on under my charge, and throw the blame a good deal on hon. gentleman opposite—

Mr. MACKENZIE. Of course.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Who were very stringent in the means that were placed at my service for the construction of any portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I was compelled, under the difficulties of the position, to fall back upon adopting through the prairie, another class of road; and I am afraid that the contrast between the operations of the Company and my own, in regard to the construction of the railway through the prairie section, is one certainly that I do not consider particularly flattering to myself, so that the hon. gentleman will excuse me if I do not dilate quite as fully upon that branch of the subject as I might otherwise have been tempted to do. Now, I may say that, assuming that seventy-nine miles is to be saved—and Major Rogers seems to be very sanguine that he will obtain a saving of seventy-nine miles—if it be not saved of course these figures will have to be changed—but I assume that it will be saved, and we shall then stand in this position: That from Montreal to Port Moody by the Canadian Pacific Railway the distance will be 2,850 miles; from New York to Port Moody, via the Canadian Pacific Railway and Montreal, the distance will be only 3,260 miles; from New York to Port Moody, by the Canadian Pacific Railway and Brockville, the shortest means by which they can reach the point, the distance will be 3,140 miles. Now, Sir, from New York to San Francisco which is some 500 or 600 miles further to the south than Victoria, via the Central and Union Pacific Railways, and the shortest connecting lines in the United States, the distance will be 3,330 miles, whereas from Montreal to Port Moody it is only 2,850, and from New York to Port Moody by our road is a shorter distance than it is from New York to San Francisco, showing that for all through traffic we ought to be able, with our shorter distances, with our better line, with our better grades and curves, and with the advantage of having a road not burdened with the enormous bonded debt that the Central and Union Pacific roads are charged with, we ought to be able to compete over the Canadian Pacific Railway, with fast steamers connecting San Francisco and Victoria, for a considerable portion of the trade, even between San Francisco and certain portions of the western States. That may be thought to be a very extravagant idea, but I believe that with the advantages we enjoy and with the character of the road being constructed, we may not only hope to hold all the traffic of our own country over our own lines, but we may be able to enter upon a sharp and successful competition with either the Northern Pacific Railway or the Central and Union Pacific Railways for the traffic between different sections of the great Republic itself. From Liverpool to Montreal the distance is 2,715 miles, from Liverpool to New York, 3,040 miles, from Liverpool to Port Moody via Montreal and the Canadian Pacific Railway, the distance is 6,063 miles; from Liverpool to San Francisco via the shortest route that can be obtained in the United States, the distance is 6,830 miles; from Liverpool to Yokohama in Japan, via Montreal on the Canadian Pacific Railway, 10,963 miles; from Liverpool to Yokohama via New York and San Francisco, 12,038 miles; so that we shall have over the Canadian Pacific Railway the distance from Liverpool to Port Moody via Montreal 767 miles shorter than via New York and San Francisco, showing that so far as through traffic is concerned, it will be utterly impossible for any route on this continent to begin to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway. Then, Sir, from Liverpool to Yokohama, via the Canadian Pacific Railway, the distance is no less than 1,070 miles shorter than via New York and San Francisco, showing that not only in reaching the Pacific Coast, but in reaching Asia, and for through traffic, we shall necessarily make our road the highway between Europe and the East. Then, Sir, looking at it in another bearing which comes a little closer home, the figures will be regarded with very great favor by the House. From Liverpool to Halifax the distance is 2,410 miles, from Halifax to Quebec 680 miles, from Quebec to Montreal 176 miles, from Montreal to Port Moody 2,850 miles, or 3,706 miles from sea to sea. From Halifax to Port Moody the distance is 3,706 miles, from Liverpool via Halifax to Port Moody 6,186 miles. From Liverpool to New York the distance is 3,040 miles, from New York to San Francisco 3,790 miles, making 6,830 miles.

Mr. MACKENZIE. In the distance from Montreal to Liverpool does the hon. gentleman calculate by the Straits of Belle Isle or by Cape Race?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think I am taking it by the shortest line I can get; but I think that in taking the distance from Liverpool to Halifax it is not usual to go by the Straits of Belle Isle.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No; but the previous figures referred to the distance from Montreal by sea, 6,063 miles.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. From Liverpool to Montreal, 2,093 miles, I presume would pass by the Straits of Belle Isle. From Liverpool to New York and San Francisco, the distance is 6,830 miles, or 644 miles from Liverpool to San Francisco via New York more than it is from Liverpool to Port Moody via Halifax, giving another evidence why, in our great national line of railway which we have now provided from sea to sea, we shall not only have a great through line of a most inviting character from one ocean to the other in our country, but we will have a line from Liverpool to Port Moody on the Pacific 644 miles nearer than by the shortest lines that can be obtained by going to New York and thence to San Francisco. Now, Sir, I am quite certain that this statement is one that will be regarded with great satisfaction by the House; and that the Government who assumed the great responsibility a year ago of submitting this contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the consideration of Parliament, have great reason to be satisfied, that, after a year's experience, the only change they are obliged to ask Parliament for, is one to authorize a change in the location from Yellow Head Pass to one that will shorten the Canadian Pacific Railway by seventy-nine miles, if it should be found to be practicable.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman supplement his remarks as to distances to this extent—if he is so prepared. Assuming that Kicking Horse Pass is not found practicable, he proposes, as I understand it, that the main line shall be diverted north to the Yellow Head Pass from the upper end of the Qu'Appelle Valley, can he give the distance in that case to the Yellow Head Pass.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. gentleman has asked me that question, because it is a very important one; and one to which I have directed my attention. From Moose Jaw Creek, the westernmost point to which we have authorized the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway via the Yellow Head Pass, will not as I believe, increase the length of the Canadian Pacific Railway over what was contemplated, when we had this subject before the House a year ago; and when we anticipated the adoption of a more northerly course from Winnipeg than has since been taken. The country through which the road passes is better than would have been traversed by the other route. The grades and curves—but I need not speak of the curves, as they do not affect the question—the grades are less severe than those we would have been compelled to adopt on the line contemplated a year ago, and the change will not materially lengthen the line, if at all, if we have to fall back on the Yellow Head Pass, while seventy-nine miles will be saved by obtaining access through the Kicking Horse Pass. Now, Sir, I may say it is a source of no little satisfaction to me to be able to make so gratifying a statement as I have presented to the House with relation to this matter. After we have had the opportunity of looking at this question—not in the light of an abstract question, in which we were to some extent compelled to view it a year ago, but in the light of a year's experience—I have shown the House the enormously rapid advance which has been made in the construction of this great national work, for it is a great national work, whether it be in the hands of the Government of the day or in the hands of a Company subsidized—largely subsidized, hon. gentlemen opposite will say—by the Government of the day, or by Parliament. And I say it is extremely gratifying to find that the most sanguine predictions which any hon. gentlemen on this side of the House made, as to the progress of this great work, have been more than realized by the vigor which has been exerted on it by the gentlemen who are engaged in it. And perhaps, Sir, after this year's experience, which we are able to look back upon, it may not be unadvisable before I sit down for me to notice how far the fears, that were entertained by hon. gentlemen opposite a year ago, have been proved to be well founded, or unfounded, when submitted to this crucial test. Sir, I now think we have the data for expressing an opinion, and a very sound opinion, on a great many points, which troubled hon. gentlemen opposite when Parliament was called upon to ratify this contract. During last Session, I have taken up, Sir, a volume—I was going to say, of forgotten lore. I have taken up, Sir, the expansion on the Journals of the views of hon. gentlemen opposite during last Session, but it has ceased to be regarded—in the excitement that the country has felt, and in the interest that all the country has manifested, in the wonderful progress of this work, and in the remarkable development of the country under the operation of this progress—with any attention; and that what seemed so fresh and full of life and vitality a year ago has actually become forgotten lore. Why, Sir, I forget whether twenty or thirty amendments were drafted by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake). He will not say to me that he did not draft all these amendments. The hon. gentleman will not say that in the discharge of his duty as the leader of the Opposition he did not do so. I think that some hon. gentleman referred to an hon. gentleman as having been put up on this side of the House, because an important question was moved by him; but, Sir, I will ask the hon. gentleman if he did not put up twenty members on that side of the House last Session to move resolutions which were all drafted by himself, for the purpose of attracting the attention of the House, and, as was assumed, of reaching the attention of the country; but what is the fact to-day, Sir. From that day to this so occupied and interested has the country become in the rapid progress of this work, and in a rapid expansion of the country under its influence and development, that these resolutions have been utterly forgotten and if any gentlemen was asked on the other side of the House to recite one of them, I am quite certain it would puzzle him as much as it would puzzle some persons to recite the Lord's Prayer, and if some one of these hon. gentlemen was called upon for instance,—I would not be a bit surprised if I called upon the member for North Elgin to do so, if he commenced the recital by saying "Now I lay me down to sleep." Certainly these resolutions have all been laid down to sleep; and after having slept, they are now in a perfectly lethargic position,—consequently if I now stir them up a little, I am sure that the hon. gentlemen who spent so much time and ingenuity, will not blame me if I refer to them; and I may say that the manner in which some of these resolutions were drafted, reflects a great deal of credit on the hon. gentleman's head, whatever may be said of his heart. Well, Sir, what is the first resolution with which I think the hon. member for Westmoreland was entrusted. It was that the said resolution be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, that in the opinion of this House tenders should be invited for the construction and operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway before Parliament is asked to ratify any contract for the same. Well, Sir, if ever a resolution which an hon. gentleman proposed in the presence of this House, exposed him to the imputation of being a Rip Van Winkle, and a man who had slept for years and did not know what was going on, certainly it was the character of this resolution. Did not the hon. gentleman know that tenders had been asked for, and that the Government of which he was a member sent tenders all over England and the United States and Canada, for months, inviting competition for this work? Did he not know that these tenders declared that the Government, of which he was a member, was prepared to give 54,000,000 acres of land and $27,000,000, and 20 per cent. on an unknown sum, which tenderers were invited to state.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The time for receiving them had expired.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh! the hon. gentleman says, the time for receiving tenders had expired. But why had it had expired. Why, Sir, it expired only because there was no person to be found in Canada, or out of it, who would look at their proposition to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway for 54,000,000 acres of land and $27,000,000, and an unknown sum, which tenderers were asked to fix for themselves over and above the maximum price. This was the offer of the hon. gentleman and of the Government of which he was a member. The hon. gentleman knows that the Canadian Pacific Railway was as dead as Julius Cæsar at that time. The hon. gentleman knows that the people had ceased to talk about the Canadian Pacific Railway as a thing in which to invest any money, and for very good reasons, as I shall presently show. The hon. gentleman is aware that after giving it the widest publicity, we were able to make a contract for $78,000,000—valuing the land at $1 per acre—while they had offered $31,000,000, calling the land $1 per acre, and they could not get a bid from any part of the world where they had sent their applications. Under these circumstances, I think it was hardly in place for the hon. gentleman to take the exception that tenders were not invited, for the hon. gentleman himself had been inviting tenders for months with the effect which I have named. The hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) also wished to explain his views, the views of the hon. gentleman who drafted the resolution and placed it in his hands—I mean the leader of the Opposition. I do not mean to say that the hon. gentleman was not quite in his right, or was not discharging his duty, in drafting the resolution, or that it was the slightest reflection upon the members of that side of the House to accept the resolution or the services of their leader in preparing it. There was nothing extraordinary in that, but it reminded me of a story I once heard of a Presbyterian Church in which one or two influential parties were becoming rather restive. They talked about going over to the secession or leaving the church with which they were connected. A consultation was held with the venerable pastor of the church, and the question was taken up as to how to secure these people who were becoming dissatisfied? His solution of the difficulty was expressed in these words: "Make deacons of them." So, Sir, when we found the hon. gentleman putting separate resolutions on this question into the hands of various members of the patriotic band who sit behind him, I concluded that he was making deacons of some of these gentlemen, feeling it necessary to put them on record as being bound by the resolution for fear they should become restive. In the resolution moved by the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), I find it stated:—

"That the arrangements for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be such as the resources of the country would permit, without increasing the former rates of taxation, and that the work, if to be constructed by a Company, should be let only after tenders had been obtained therefor, and should be subjected to purchase by the Government at 10 per cent. over cost."

Now, Sir, I have a curious commentary to make on that resolution. There is a resolution drafted by the right hand of the leader of the Opposition, to which the leader of the Opposition pledged himself by voting for it—as is shown by his name standing recorded for it on the journals of Parliament—that he believed it to be true. If the hon. gentleman believed that the policy of all parties had been, as stated, in the resolution, then the hon. gentleman's memory was sadly at fault. I do not now know whether he was a member of the Government at the time the Order in Council was drawn up which was approved by His Excellency on the 8th of July, 1874, but if he was not, he had ceased to be a member but for a very short time, and at all events he was a member when the Tariff was passed to which the Order in Council makes reference.

Mr. BLAKE. No, I was not at either date.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Still I am afraid the hon. gentleman will have to get the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) and every man who voted for that resolution to withdraw it, or else he will be in the position of charging his colleagues whom he had but lately left, of going in the face of their own document, the Order in Council of the 8th of July, 1874. I will read what was stated there, and you will remember that they were drawing up an Order in

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Council which was to be sent to the Imperial Government, that they were solemnly declaring the policy of their Government. And here are the remarkable words they use:

"In order to enable the Government to carry out the proposals which it was hoped the British Columbia Government would have accepted, the average rate of taxation was raised at the late Session about 15 per cent. The Customs duties being raised from 15 per cent. to 17½ per cent., and the Excise duties on spirits and tobaccos a corresponding rate, both involved an additional taxation exceeding $3,000,000 on the taxation of the year."

Yet, Sir, the hon. gentleman and his colleagues having put their names to this solemn declaration that the Government of the day, that the Government of which he had so lately ceased to be a member, while he was a member of it, had come to Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was not this increase passed by the hon. gentleman while he was in the Government?

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, he must have favored them with the light of his countenance but for a very short time, for this increase referred to was in the first Budget Speech brought down by the Government. It would be like fixing an ignus futuus to fix the hon. gentleman's movements in the Government and out of it; but I must be excused for supposing that he had not abandoned them quite so soon after having lent them the weight of his name to get into office. But it matters not whether he was a member of the Government or not. There is the solemn declaration to this House and to this country, as well as to the Mother Country and to the Imperial Parliament, that instead of their holding to the policy that the rate of taxation should not be increased, they had declared that they themselves had increased it to a rate which gave them over $3,000,000 in a year for the express purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think if the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), who is usually so frank and candid in his statements, if his attention had been called to this Order in Council—would have hesitated a good deal before saying that; the policy of all parties was that there should be no increase in the rate of taxation. Now I may pass on—

Mr. RYMAL. No; take them all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think I can find enough in them to afford plenty of amusement to the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Rymal), and I can see he is very much amused already, by the broad smile which illuminates his countenance at this moment. The hon. member for Iberville closed his resolution with a remarkable declaration, to which I now invite his attention:

"That that contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, laid on the Table, involves violation in the above and other particulars of the settled policy in reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and should not be ratified till after the people have had the opportunity of expressing their opinion through the medium of a General Election."

Well, Sir, a year has gone over since all these doleful predictions as to the effect the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway would have upon the country, and the people are a great deal better qualified to pass upon that great question, that greatest of all questions which have been submitted for the consideration of this Parliament, the National Policy excepted, than they were a year ago. They have not only the statements, the opinions, the views of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House, but they have the best light with which to examine the question, and that is the light of practical experience. And yet Sir, these hon. gentlemen, who felt very anxious a year ago to go to the country, now that the country has seen what has been accomplished in a year under the operation of this contract, do not seem so anxious to talk about a General Election—do not seem to relish a General Election with quite so much fervor as they did a year ago.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. How are they on your side ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I thank the hon. gentlemen ; there is not a man on this side of the House who does not know that we are entitled to receive, and believes that we shall receive, the approval of an overwhelming majority of the people of this country from end to end. That is what they feel, and the hon. gentlemen knows it right well. Well, Sir, as I said, the great organ of their party, after howling at us because we would not give the people an opportunity of expressing their opinion at the polls, after the people have had a year's experience by which to judge of this work, now says that we are attempting to put a great surprise on the people, that the taking of the opinion of the people is the very last thing that a respectable Government would think of doing. I give that to the hon. gentlemen as a corollary to what hon. gentlemen said a year ago ; and I say that I for one would be only too proud of having the opportunity to show to this country how this Government dealt with this great question. Now, I come to the next motion, from which I excuse the leader of the Opposition, because it is a financial one, and I suppose I must give to the late Finance Minister the credit of having drafted this resolution for himself. In fact, there is a recklessness about it that indicates that its paternity was not far from the mover. I will read it to the House :

"That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway involves a total expenditure by the country in connexion with that work about $80,000,000, exclusive of interest, and the cession of 25,000,000 of acres of choice lands, worth at the estimate of the Government last year at least $79,000,000, making a total consideration of about $140,000,000, while the railroad itself is estimated by the Government to cost not more than $84,000,000, and that the consideration proposed to be given is excessive."

Well, Sir, suppose it did cost a good deal, suppose there was any foundation for the statement that it would cost $140,000,000 to the country to secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, whom have we to thank for it ? Who are the men responsible for having spent five years in exaggerating the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and in questioning its usefulness after it was constructed ? Does the hon. gentleman forget that in the first Budget Speech he made, he himself said that to construct it in ten years—though this Company is going to construct it in less—would cost from $150,000,000 to $160,000,000 in cash ? Does the hon. gentleman forget that if any man in Canada, or out of it, is responsible above all others for the difficulty of securing the construction by his own of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was the wild, hap-hazard, reckless assertions which the hon. gentleman himself made when he was occupying the position of Finance Minister of this country ; Why, Sir, no man can read the speech the hon. gentleman made without coming to the conclusion that, to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, would be to irretrievably ruin the financial credit of the country and destroy the prosperity of the Dominion of Canada for many long years to come. And when the hon. gentleman came to consider the question of operating the road after it was constructed, his utterances were still more appalling, because, although he considered that the country would be involved in financial ruin by the amount of money that would be required to secure its construction, that was trifling compared with the frightful bugbear which the hon. gentleman conjured up as to the enormous burden of taxation under which the people of this country must groan to the end of time for the purpose of operating the road. Why, Sir, what did he do ? That contract proposed to pay $28,000,000 for the construction of those portions which the Government were engaged in constructing, and which were to be handed over to the Company ; it also provided that we should pay $25,000,000 more, in all $53,000,000, and 25,000,000 acres of land to secure the construction of this work, which the hon. Minister of Public Works, then at the head of the Government, and the hon. leader of the Opposition themselves concurred in, declaring at the lowest estimate must cost $121,000,000 in cash. Well, Sir, let the hon. gentleman consider the proposal that he himself was party to, and that was to give 54,000,000 acres of land. Let him multiply the 29,000,000 acres of land, which is the excess proposed to be granted by them over what we propose to grant, by the price he estimates, and he will find that $87,000,000 would be saved to the country in the land grant alone under this contract. And when it is remembered that in addition to that, he was prepared to give $27,000,000 of money, it only excites surprise that any hon. gentleman, standing in the position in which he stood, and knowing as he did the gigantic character of this work, the difficulties in the way of its construction and operation, should have ventured to put on the journals of Parliament such a resolution as this. How can the hon. gentleman be surprised that all the series of resolutions and amendments which hon. gentlemen expanded on the journals, have become forgotten lore ? Why, Sir, I ventured to say a year ago, when we were discussing this question here, that when the time came to go to the people in a General Election, hon. gentlemen opposite would be only too glad to forget that they had ever attacked that contract. And, Sir, I believe now that the last thing any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, on going to his constituent throughout the wide realm of the Dominion, would think of would be to read one of these resolutions that they considered so important when they moved them a year ago. Why ? Because the light of one year's experience has revealed so much information with regard to this question as to warrant me in saying that if they are not ashamed, they ought to be, at the unsound principles to which they formerly committed themselves. I do not, of course, mean ashamed in any other than a political sense. I now come to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Sunbury, setting forth that at present the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway is premature.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The resolution reads thus :—

"That the resolution be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, that at present the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia is premature, and which involves the country in an expense beyond its reasonable capacity, and would lead to the maintenance of too high a rate of taxation, while the postponement of that part of the undertaking till after the prairie section is finished, would enable it to be constructed at a much less cost and within a reasonable time."

What does the hon. gentleman say in the light of a year's experience of his epithet premature ? What does he say when he finds not only what has been accomplished under the contract, but that Canada is moving ahead with such giant strides towards national life, as we have witnessed within the last twelve months ? The hon. gentleman would require to be blind and deaf to shut out from his intelligence the knowledge and information now attainable, and the fact that everywhere, right and left all over this country, the influence of the Government, having grappled with this great work and determined to open up that magnificent country to the industrious thousands and tens of thousands outside, has, with the rapidity that nothing else could achieve, given to the position and character of Canada in reference to this great national work an impetus that could not have been anticipated one year ago. Look at the fact of 21,000 immigrants going into Manitoba since the 1st of January last, and tell us what that means ?

An hon. MEMBER. Where from ?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have already told the hon. gentleman that it matters little where they come from if they go into that country and develop it, and furnish the means of inviting industrious immigrants from other lands, by showing that in that country they can use their labor and capital in a manner more beneficial to themselves and families than in any other part of the world. The very fact that in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, and Ontario, at this moment all alive with industries, rapidly advancing in every possible way—where a condition of prosperity exists, affording bread to every man in the country—at a time when all the Provinces, Prince Edward Island included—I say the very fact that we have opened up a region of such unbounded extent and resources as to tempt people to leave their happy, prosperous homes in these older sections of the country—affords abundant evidence that the interests of Canada were never more thoroughly considered than when measures were taken to open up our magnificent North-West to the industry and energies of all outsiders. Well, what does this mean, so far as our natural wealth is concerned? If the hon. gentleman will turn to the report of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, that the 23,000 immigrants brought between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000 of hard cash into the North-West during the past year, and adding the value of their effects, we have a total of over $4,000,000—an important addition to the wealth and capital of the country. With such facts, can any one venture to say that, grappling with this great work, as a whole, and dealing with it so as to show the world that we intend to have a great trans-continental line, stretching from sea to sea, from Halifax on the Atlantic to Port Moody on the Pacific, that that policy is not calculated to attract attention to the country and to stimulate its progress, and to benefit the country as the expenditure of the same amount of capital in no other direction could do? Suppose the hon. gentleman had been told that no sooner would this contract be entered upon, no sooner would the attention of settlers be drawn to the greatness and fertility of this great North-West, that in a short year applications would be made by colonization companies for no less than 23,000,000 acres of land, what would he have said? He then thought it premature, or beyond the resources of the country, to enter upon this work, but he was not so considerate when asked to vote $3,000,000 of additional taxes in 1874, by hon. gentlemen opposite, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1881, however, he was unwilling that 25,000,000 acres should be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway for grappling with this great undertaking. If the hon. gentleman had been told that those 25,000,000 acres were wanted by colonization companies within one year, would he have said it was premature to undertake this great work? I have mentioned the $4,000,000 in cash and settlers' effects brought into the country by those 28,000 immigrants. What does this mean as a source of revenue to the country, when we remember how valuable every inhabitant added to the country is as a source of revenue? I believe the returns of the Customs' revenue, at Winnipeg, between the 1st of July, 1880, and the 1st of March, 1881 inclusive, show a total of $196,453.53.

Mr. MACKENZIE. This is for 1880 and 1881.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; and this was obtained under the policy of the present Government. In relation to Winnipeg, hon. gentlemen opposite know that when we came into power Winnipeg was dead—that the policy of the late Government struck a fatal blow at Winnipeg. It had decided to carry the Canadian Pacific Railway from Selkirk, away twenty miles from Winnipeg, across through the narrows of Lake Manitoba, and with what result? From that hour until we came into power and changed that policy, Winnipeg was dead. Hon. gentlemen know that there was no enterprise—that everything was in a state of despondency; any person could then have gone into that town and purchased for $1,000 property which he could not get to-day for $100,000. That was the condition of things. The hon. member for Westmoreland thinks that an extravagant statement; but I tell him that it has been proved over and over again that a property which would not have realized $1,000 before that policy was adopted, has within a year after its adoption realized $100,000, and instead of using terms which are extravagant, I am greatly within the mark when I make that statement. If the hon. gentleman had been told that this policy would have had the effect of giving $582,743 into the Customs Department alone, for the same period to 1st March, 1882, he would have hesitated a great while before using that word "premature," before he would ask this House to declare that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was premature. Suppose the hon. gentleman had known that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was going to lead to a degree of attention on the part of Great Britain and the United States with reference to Canada, that is of incalculable money value to this country, he would have hesitated before taking that position. Why, what was the value of the North-West to Canada, or the Crown, or anybody a few years ago? The most marvellous thing in history is the fact that the Hudson's Bay Company, employing as they were obliged to employ, hundreds of intelligent, enterprising men, were able to hide half this continent from the knowledge of the world for half a century. All that is changed now. What was the value, of the North-West, when in Great Britain it was regarded as a frozen wilderness, destitute of vitality or the means of sustaining a population. It was as rich and as valuable then, in natural resources, as it is to-day, but it had no appreciable value except as a hunting ground and a country for the raising of fur. But all that is changed, and I ask hon. gentleman to look at its condition under the influences that have been brought to bear on its development, under the attention that has been directed to it by this great national work. I say that instead of its being premature, the wisest and most judicious step ever taken by a Government in this country was that taken by this Government when they not only grappled with the work of building the Canadian Pacific Railway, but succeeded in placing it in the hands of a Company possessed of unbounded resources and of great enterprise and ability. The hon. gentleman knows the tone in which Canada used to be spoken of a few years ago in the press of England. He knows how successful the Finance Minister was in impregnating the English mind with his peculiar ideas with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, as to its hopeless character. But all that is changed. Let me read from an article in the London Morning Post—one of the great organs of public opinion in England—published the other day. I will not read the whole article, but only some of the references in it to the visit of His Excellency the Governor General had made through the North-West, and I will say here that I believe that as Lord Dufferin's visit was attended with advantage to this country, it is impossible to overrate the value to Canada of the wide notoriety that the resources and fertility of the North-West have obtained through the able zealous advocacy of the present Governor General. In reviewing some of his speeches, the Post says:

"First, from a simple point of view, it is of great importance that the political future of British North America shall be assured, and there is no more certain method of affecting this than by settling the immense tract of country between Fort Garry and the Rocky Mountains, and building a trans-continental highway through British soil. The next phase of the matter presented to us is the Great North-West, which appears as an inexhaustible wheat granary for our own countless consumers on this side of the Atlantic. The last, but not the least, ground for congratulation, if all that is said of it be true, is the conviction that within little more than a fortnight of London there is an unlimited field for the profitable employment of British capital and of British talents and sinews. The Monroe doctrine fades into mist before the fact that the acreage of British America is greater than that of the United States. Even the mist vanishes as the boundless undulating prairies of the North West, embracing between two or three millions of square miles, furnish employment to countless ploughs and reaping machines, or become the home of vast herds of cattle, claiming for their progenitors high-priced sires from Hereford or Kirklevington. There seems to be abundant testimony to the quality of the cereals raised in Manitoba and the Valley of the Saskatchewan. Scotch and English farmers have been there, and have returned much impressed with what they saw. Thirty bushels an acre, with no need of manuring for many years to come, seems to be a pretty general average. As regards emigration, it cannot be doubted that if the right man goes there he will make his way, whether as owner or workman, in a manner at present denied to agriculturists in these islands. He will be under the British flag, in a country where his own native tongue is spoken, and where his sons may come to be legislators for the benefit of a generation which will see a mighty British American Empire established between the old Maritime Provinces and Vancouver Island, a chief factor in the magnificent result being the Canadian Pacific Railway."

I ask the hon. gentleman to tell me the money value of such an article as that. Look at these great steamers that are now crossing the Atlantic to this country, crowded with people, full of high hope and expectation, carrying their industry into the North-West, where they will become energetic sons of the soil of Canada. It is statements such as these which have entirely changed the current of public sentiment on the other side of the Atlantic with reference to this country. Then, what do we find across the border? Let us go down among our neighbors in the United States. I read an extract here from the late Governor Seymour's speech bearing testimony to the inexhaustible fertility of the North-West. Let me now give a short extract from a speech delivered in the United States Senate on January 10th, 1882:

"The report of the Canadian Commissioner of Agriculture shows that they have in the Canadian North-West over two hundred million acres of wheat-producing country; the reports of the individual farmers show that their yield of wheat varies from twenty-five to fifty bushels per acre, weighing from sixty to sixty-six pounds to the bushel. Their great Pacific Railroad will be soon completed, and the trade of China, Japan, Australia and the Indies will pass over it. It is nearly completed to Lake Superior now; thence the products of that country pass through the same chain of Lakes as ours has to traverse, and Fort William is as near Buffalo as Chicago is. Their now enlarged Welland Canal overcomes the obstruction of Niagara, and their line is shorter by rail through Montreal to Liverpool by over six hundred miles than any route we can take to get the wheat of Dakota through New York to England."

I ask the hon. gentleman whether a measure calculated to attract such attention on the part of the United States and of Europe to the Dominion, does not lead him to doubt the soundness of his opinions when he undertook to say that it was premature to engage in the construction, on the favorable terms we were able to obtain, of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Chicago Tribune, referring to the same subject on September 12, 1881, says:

"The wheat crops of Manitoba and the boundless empire which stretches far away to the north-west of Winnipeg, must be the test which intending immigrants will apply to the country. Reports for the past four years from nearly 150 different localities, show the following averages of wheat productions: 1877, 26½ bushels; 1878, 26½; 1879, 26½; 1880, 29½, and 1881, 30 bushels. The imagination stands appalled in its endeavor to contemplate the inconceivable possibilities of this country."

Reports from nearly 100 different localities for 1877, 1880 inclusive, show that the average yield of potatoes has been 204, 398, 302 and 318 bushels per acre, respectively; peas, 32, 34, 32½ and 38½ bushels per acre. But this is accounted for by the fact that the soil is so rich that vines grow too rank. Barley for the same years, 40½, 36, 67½ and 41 bushels per acre; oats, 59½, 58 and 57½ bushels per acre."

I give this to the House as the evidence of what in one short year has been accomplished in relation to the attention attracted to our country abroad, and the result of it he finds in the tens of thousands of immigrants—I suppose little short at this moment of 30,000—since the 1st of January that are pushing across the border to enjoy the blessings and advantages, and engage in the development of our country that has been opened to their view. I give this to the hon. gentleman as the evidence of the un-wisdom of the declaration that the time was premature when we could depend upon the contributions to the revenue of this country that must come from its rapid development and from the industry and capital that are being poured into that Great North-West. Turn to any evidence you please, take any means of forming a judgment you please, and you find that not only at this moment is there no place on this continent that can compare for a single moment with the rapidity of the progress in our Great North-West, but that the great western States that have had such great advantages in the body of emigrants that have been drawn into their country, have failed in their efforts to accomplish such results as I have shown the hon. gentleman is exhibited in relation to our own country.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When the House rose I was endeavoring to convince my hon. friend from Sunbury that we were not premature in taking up and grappling with the question of the immediate construction of the whole Canadian Pacific Railway, and I endeavored to disabuse that hon. gentleman's mind of the fears he entertained when moving that resolution, by referring to the very great progress and growth of the country that had taken place in the meantime. I drew his attention to the fact that the application for land at the present moment, by the colonization companies alone, has reached the amount of 23,855,680 acres, and by the end of this week we will undoubtedly have applications for a sufficient quantity of land which, if entertained, would recoup to the Treasury the entire amount that we are called upon to pay the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in money. I may say that these land and colonization companies, these parties who are made use of by the Government to bring immigration into the country have their lands on the terms that they pay $2 per acre for the odd-numbered sections, under No. 1 of the Dominion Land Regulations of the 23rd of December. The even-numbered sections throughout the district applied for by these colonization land companies are obtained for free settlement and homesteads, and the companies are obliged, under their engagement, to put two settlers instead of one upon every section so obtained, and when two settlers are placed upon each section within five years to the extent that the land that has been sold to them at $2 an acre, they receive a rebate of $1 per acre, and they receive a rebate of $160 for every settler placed upon the homestead and the pre-emption section. The terms are one-fifth cash, and one-fifth annually for four years, so that the hon. gentleman will see that in a comparatively short period, we have received applications enough from colonization companies alone, which, if entertained, would refund all the money to the Treasury that we are called upon to pay, thus removing altogether the doubt the hon. gentleman had that we were engaging in something beyond our reasonable capacity, and which would involve a high rate of taxation. Now, I may say that down to the 31st October, 1871, 2,258,163 acres have been allotted in free homesteads, and applications have been made for pre-emption for 1,270,751 acres. In addition to that 1,400,000 acres have been allotted for half-breed children; there are sales to the extent of 1,277,680 acres; and there is a settlement belt of 320,000 acres, or 6,526,574 acres, and that is without reference to this 23,000,000 acres already applied for by colonization companies. Now the hon. gentleman will see that under the policy of the late Government that land which is now being applied for by colonization companies, and upon which, in order to get lands at the rate of $1 per acre they are obliged to put two settlers upon every section, would all have gone to the railway companies without any payment whatever, or any return whatever to the Treasury so far as the lands are concerned; because the then Minister of the Interior proposed to give ten, twelve or twenty sections according to the locality for every mile of railway constructed as an inducement to parties to construct the railway. Now, Sir, I may say, while touching upon that subject, that this is independent of the amount of lands that are applied for by various railway companies, and some of whom have received pledges from the Government to receive lands for the construction of railways by private enterprise. The South-Western Railway has already constructed fifty miles; the Westbourne and North-Western Railway has constructed some thirty or forty miles, or has it ready for the rails and part of the rails laid; the South Saskatchewan Railway Company propose to construct a line in another direction; the Souris and Rocky Mountains Company in another direction, and they have all received pledges for lands to a greater or less extent, in most instances 3,640 acres of land per mile; and instead of obtaining the land, as under the policy of the late Government, for nothing, they pay into the Treasury of Canada $1 for every acre of that land along the lines of railway they construct or which they receive in connection with the construction of the railways. Then, Sir, I may say that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have sold lands already to the extent of 433,760 acres, and have agreed to give to colonization companies 1,930,000 acres, or 2,363,760 acres, which are pledged and disposed of practically up to the present time, or for which engagements have been made. The Hudson's Bay Company have also sold farm lands to the extent of some 400,000 acres, so that my hon. friend will see the marvellous progress that has taken place, and the wonderful development, which, under these circumstances, is going on in that country. I may mention, Sir, in connection with the increased trade of the country, which bears immediately on the prosperity and progress of the older Provinces, as well as of the North West, and its influence upon them, that in the year 1878, the amount of goods taken in bond from the older Provinces through into Manitoba, was $1,374,311, while this amount, Sir, in 1881, rose to $5,351,665; and I may say, Sir, that, to a very large extent, these are goods manufactured in Canada for the purpose of supplying the North West, thus affording a great increase of business in the older Provinces, and furnishing various home industries with employment. I may say, Sir, that in the short month of February last, the city of Hamilton sent $103,252 worth of goods into Manitoba; the city of Toronto, $301,213 worth; the city of London, $60,000 worth, all in bond, making, in that short month, no less than $464,965 worth, or nearly $500,000 worth of goods which went into that country; and for the six months ending December 31, 1881, $4,875,991 worth of goods were sent into that country. I am quite sure, that this, will settle the question in the mind of every hon. member, who is open to conviction, that we made no mistake, were not premature, and had not over-estimated the ability of the country, and did not involve it in any unnecessary burthen, when we took the step we did it for the development of the North-West. When we came into power at the close of 1878, there was not a mile of railway in operation in Canada west of Lake Superior; and on the 1st day of August next, traffic will pass over 971 miles of railway from Lake Superior and Thunder Bay to Winnipeg, and on the main line and branches of the Canadian Pacific Railway, without reference to the fifty miles constructed by the South-Western and thirty or forty miles built by the Westbourne and North-Western. I am quite sure, Sir, I need not detain the House further than to say that with a surplus of $4,000,000 during the past year; that with the power to remove the duties from tea and coffee and reduce the duty on tobacco, with the abolition of the Stamp duty and the giving of $150,000 to the fishermen, and doing all this without, in the least degree, increasing, and instead of increasing greatly reducing the taxes of the people, I think the hon. gentlemen will see we were quite justified in adopting not a bold policy, but the statesmanlike and common-sense policy of grappling with these great questions, and putting the country in the position we have. I think, Sir, I need not detain the House longer in dealing with the motion of my hon. friend from Sunbury, but I am quite certain that hon. gentleman, with the fair-minded candour which I know forms a large part of his nature, will come to the conclusion that he had been premature—and not we—in moving such a resolution. I will now come to the next resolution, moved by my hon. friend from Quebec East, and I think that this hon. gentleman would find, if he were in the House—I am sorry to see he is not here—that he had been a little premature in moving the resolution which he undertook to propose. He moved, Sir:

“That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, provides for the construction of between 600 and 700 miles of railway to the north of Lake Superior between Lake Nipissing and the junction with the road from Thunder Bay, through a difficult and uninhabited country, and at a vast expense, that a mere fraction of the cost of this road would, if applied as a basis of credit, secure the construction of those 63 miles common to the through line and to the Sault Ste. Marie Railway, and also of the remainder of the line to Sault Ste. Marie within 3 years; that the line by Sault Ste. Marie would give Ontario, Quebec, and the East, railway connection with the North-West of nearly the same length, and of better quality than the proposed North Shore line; that it would also give to Canada a great trade from an enormous area of the western States, extending from the boundary to a point south of St. Paul, and even now inhabited by about 1,200,000 souls; that it would secure a way traffic; that it would thus give within 3 years, and at a fraction of the cost of the other line, greater benefit than can be secured by that line in 10 years, which is the period stipulated for its construction; that it would bring both the western States and the Canadian North-West into connection by rail with the ocean steamers at Montreal and Quebec on a route shorter by about 300 miles than the existing route to New York; that this advantage, together with the further gain of about 250 miles in the ocean voyage to Liverpool, would give this route a commanding position, and secure great benefit to the country at large; that the construction of the line to the Sault or Goulais Bay would also give a first-class rail and water route via Sault Ste. Marie and Thunder Bay, within our own limits, by the shortest possible line for the transport of emigrants, goods and produce; that the construction of the line from Sturgeon River to or beyond Thunder Bay to the north of Lake Superior, is under the circumstances premature, and should not be now undertaken.”

Now, Sir, I think that the hon. member for Quebec East, after having heard the statement which I have made—and I take this opportunity of saying, I have laid my hands on the report from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company asking for the change of route and also on the report of the Chief Engineer, on it, and will send it across the House to the leader of the Opposition to complete the papers bearing on that question—will find, no doubt greatly to his satisfaction and greatly to his delight, that everything which he stated in his resolution as desirable to be attained if a different policy from ours was followed, is going to be attained by our policy, and this not only without sacrificing and making subservient and subsidiary a great national line, connected from end to end through our own country, and without making this line dependent during any portion of the year on a foreign country for access from one section to another of Canada, and that everything which he indicated here as so important and so vital to the interests of the country, is all attained under the policy of the present Government, and under this contract. The hon. gentleman will find rapid construction within the three years he indicated, during which it might be accomplished of the road to Sault Ste. Marie, and at the same time that the amount from work done, with the exception of thirty-five miles from the trunk line of the Canadian Pacific Railway to Sault Ste. Marie, will all form a portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman will find that the direct route to the sea-board at Montreal and Quebec, which he so much desired to secure, will be secured, and this too at an earlier period than that at which he could possibly have expected to obtain it. The hon. gentleman will find that everything that he has stated here in his resolution as so essential in his judgment, and as being so much better than the proposal of the Government, is not only all attained, but is attained without the sacrifice of what he proposed to sacrifice—of a through line through our territory, open at every period of the year, not leaving us dependent for six months of the year on the long, circuitous and expensive route, through the United States of America. The hon. gentleman will also find that under this changed policy we confidently believe that instead of requiring ten years which the contract gave these gentlemen for the construction of a through line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, within five or six years from this time at the furthest this line will be open for the traffic of the country from end to end. As we have disposed so entirely to the satisfaction of the hon. member for Quebec East of the only objection he had to our policy, as set forth to his resolution, I pass on to the next—the resolution of the late Minister of the Interior (Mr. Mills.) He moved :

‘That the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, while it gives to the Company the absolute and perpetual right to build branch lines of railway from any point or points along their line, to any point or points within the Territories of the Dominion, and cedes to the Company, free, all Government lands required in connection with such branches, provides that for twenty years no line of railway shall be authorized by the Dominion Parliament, or by any new Province, to be constructed south of the Canadian Pacific Railway from any point at or near that railway, except such as shall run south-west, or to the westward of south-west, nor to within fifteen miles of the boundary between the United States and Canada; the same contract cedes to the Company the only existing outlets to the North-West, namely, the Pembina Branch being the outlet southward, and the Thunder Bay line being the outlet eastward; the Company embraces the chief proprietors of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, the only present means of railway communication with the North-West; and, thus not only is there no provision for securing competition, but there is provision securing the Company against competition, and they are secured in a monopoly of the trade and traffic of the North-West for at least twenty years, and that the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable.’

Now, Sir, it is rather singular that the hon. gentleman should have taken so much trouble to expand on the Journals of Parliament a contradiction of his own policy. Here was a great Company undertaking to construct a great line of inter-communication through our country, and yet Sir, they were to build those branches right and left, without receiving one farthing of money or one acre of land as a bonus towards their work. Yet the hon. gentleman's policy was to allow any persons who chose to organize a Company to construct lines through the country, and pledged the country to give them ten or twelve, or twenty sections of land per mile without returning a single cent to the Treasury of the country. I think, Sir, he should have been the last man to censure the Government for permitting lines to be built which were to be built at the sole cost of the Company and not at the cost of the country. The hon. gentleman took great exception to the fact that two of the parties prominently engaged in this Canadian Pacific Railway were connected with the Manitoba, Minneapolis and St. Paul Railway, and he thought that was a very great objection. Why, Sir, let those documents answer this objection. Before the contract was made with this Company we had a great and powerful Company having the only means of access by railway to our own North-West—a company who were directly interested in preventing immigrants who might pass over their road from going out of their territory into ours. But what are the gentlemen connected with this Company doing now. They are scattering thousands of documents and pamphlets throughout the country, not showing a little strip of land at the top of the United States map calling it the Canadian North-West, but we find statements, over the signature of the Managing Director, that the finest land in the world is in the Canadian North-West. It has happened, just as I told Parliament, last year, it would happen. I said that the minor interests would be sunk in the major, and that as these gentlemen would have ten times the interest in the Canadian Pacific Railway that they had in their own road to the south of it, we would expect that all their energies and efforts would be directed, not towards keeping people from going into our country and passing over their lines, but in disseminating such information and adopting such other means as would be necessary to direct the tide of immigration into our own country. These two vigorous and energetic men, Mr. Hill and Mr. Angus, are doing their very best to make public the attractions of the Canadian North-West and induce people to settle in that country. As it appears to have been the case that in the absence of sufficient material to furnish so many resolutions, some points were repeated in different resolutions, I shall not refer to them all, so I shall pass over the resolution of the late hon. Minister of the Interior merely saying that while the Bill which the hon. gentleman introduced is to be found amongst the archives of the Canadian Parliament, we will always have the most effective and perfect answer to the resolution which he moved that it would be possible to present. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) moved this resolution :

‘That the contract, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, provides for a distribution of the money and land to be given for the work, wholly arbitrary and disproportionate; that land and money, far in excess of the proportionate cost, is assigned to the prairie part, the easiest and most productive portion of the railway, which is alleged, will be constructed within three years, by which time, the Company will be entitled in cash and lands to a surplus amounting, according to the Government estimate of the land, of $3.18 an acre, to over $34,000,000, which surplus should have been reserved and applied towards the construction and working of the eastern and western ends, and that the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable.’

But the hon. gentleman overlooked the fact that it was of the most vital importance to Canada, that progress should be made in a most vigorous and efficient manner, first, in opening up the Prairie districts of the North-West. He overlooked the enormous capital and plant required at the outset by the Company, in order to carry on the work with proper vigor and efficiency, but he will now be relieved to find that vigorous progress is being made on the eastern end of the road, and that the work is being grappled with in such a way that by the middle of next season it will give abundant assurance to the country, that so far from neglecting the progress of the eastern end it is held by the Company to be of vital importance that they should complete that section at the earliest possible moment. They propose during the coming season to lay the track on fifty miles from Callander west, and some sixty miles in addition from Algoma Mills going eastward to meet that point, and to place under contract fifty miles from Thunder Bay to the head of Lake Superior, thus showing that they are determined to push on the work as rapidly as possible. The great expenditure they are now making in endeavoring to obtain a through route at Kicking Horse Pass, is also an evidence of the vigor and energy with which they are prepared to grapple with the western end of the line. The hon. member for South Perth, who has given this question of the North-West an amount of consideration which, I may say, has rendered him an authority on the subject—and I do not hesitate to say that there is perhaps no hon. gentleman sitting on the Opposition benches, with perhaps the exception of the hon. member for Lambton—and even he has not been able to give the North-West that personal examination and attention which the hon. member for North Perth has given it—who is personally familiar with that country—I say that I am quite satisfied that hon. gentleman cannot regard the enormous development taking place in that country without feelings of the liveliest satisfaction and the keenest possible interest. But the hon. gentleman was extremely anxious a year ago as to the position that the settlers would be in who went into the North-West. The hon. gentleman was afraid that under our system, we were giving too much attention to the construction of this great trunk line, and were not sufficiently caring for the position in which the settlers would be placed who located a long the line of that railway. Now, Sir, I think what has taken place within the last year will have convinced that hon. gentleman that his fears were totally unfounded. I think what has taken place will convince him that no person who was settling in the North-West would be placed at a greater disadvantage than were the settlers of the older provinces with respect to railway communication. I will direct his attention to his resolution. It says :

"That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway exempts 25,000,000 of acres of choice lands of the Company from Dominion, provincial, and municipal taxation, until such lands are either sold or occupied for twenty years after the grant thereof from the crown ; that such exemption is unjust, and will impose undue burdens on the settlers on the alternate sections, who will be obliged to make improvements and incur expenses, enhancing the value of the company's lands without receiving their fair share of the cost of such improvements and expenses ; that such exemption by freeing the company from the burdens of taxation, will reduce the inducements to the company to sell their lands early, and will enable the company free of expense to hold their lands till their value has been greatly enhanced by the labours of the adjoining settlers."

Now, Sir, I ask that hon. gentlemen in all candor to say whether, what has taken place between the time that he moved that resolution and to-day, it has not given him the most perfect and complete answer which it is possible for any person to give, to the resolution he moved. Why, Sir, what is the fact? The fact is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are placing the whole of their 25,000,000 acres of land in the market at $1.25. Instead of adopting, the policy of holding them which it was alleged they would adopt ; instead of doing what the hon. gentlemen feared that the Company would be induced to do, namely, hold their lands until they would acquire a value by the cultivation of the adjoining sections, which would be taken for free homesteads,—what have they done? Why, Sir, they have said to the world : "We have determined not to sell our lands to speculators at any price." Offer them $5 or $10 an acre, or what you like for their lands, and the answer will be : "We do not want your money, but if you are ready to cultivate the land, you can have it for $1.25." They have put up their lands at the maximum price of $2.50 per acre, for the whole 25,000,000 acres, and for every acre cultivated within four years they return to the purchaser one half of his purchase money, thus reducing the cost of every acre of land to $1.25. They do more—they treat the construction of buildings and the making of improvements as meeting the case of the cultivation of the lands, and accept that in lieu of cultivation to a certain extent ; and in all their regulations from the very first, they have aimed at placing their lands in the hands of persons who would cultivate and settle them at the lowest possible rate—at a rate that cannot yield them more than $1 an acre, because no person can say that they can administer their lands at less than 25 cents an acre ; so that practically their 25,000,000 acres of land are open to all persons who will chose to settle on them at $1.25.

Mr. TROW. That is on the express condition that the rebate is paid, which is an impossibility, because the settler cannot comply with the contract to cultivate one-half in four years.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman will find that he is laboring under a great mistake. I am told that persons who make it a business to break land estimate forty acres for a pair of horses in a year, that is to say, that one pair of horses, engaged in doing nothing else, can break the land and make it ready for putting under cultivation, at the rate of forty acres a year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. ANGLIN. What would the settler live on during the year?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not saying what he could live on ; but I say this : that if a man, with a pair of horses, can in one year break forty acres of that land—and, after it is once broken, as the hon. member for Perth knows if the hon. member for Gloucester does not, its cultivation is a mere bagatelle, so easy that a man with a pair of horses can farm 100 acres a year if he wishes—then I say any man of any energy and vigor can succeed in breaking up within the four years—especially taking into consideration that the value of his houses and improvements are held to balance the want of cultivation of a certain portion, one half of his land, and if he does, he gets the whole of it at the rebate. Now, Sir, I say in that state of things the hon. gentleman's fears must be removed. These gentlemen show that they understand their business too well, to hold their lands at a high price. That every acre of land put under cultivation is worth twice as much to them as it would be if they got $10 an acre for it at the end of ten years. So that that objection is swept away. I do not wish to detain the House on this point, but I have had a letter, which was published in the Montreal Gazette by the secretary of the Company, placed in my hands, which hon. gentlemen may read for themselves, and from which they will find that gross mis-statements have been made in reference to the terms of sale and settlement required by the Company. These terms were too restrictive, I think, in the first instance, but they were adopted with the first object of shutting out the speculator and getting their lands in the hands of men who would cultivate the soil ; and they have been rendered so liberal that every difficulty in that respect has been removed, and the best evidence has been given that these gentlemen are willing to part with the whole of their lands for agricultural purposes at a price that will not return to them more than one dollar an acre. The colonization companies they ask to pay $5.00 an acre, and on what terms? They compel them to put settlers on the land to break them up, and they will grant the rebate of $3.75 an acre if within five years they will put settlers on and cultivate the land ; so that the land costs the colonization companies under their terms, only $1.25 an acre, and taking off 25 cents for the cost of administering the lands, the House will see that the land granted to them is not intended or desired to realize more than $1 an acre. Now, Sir, what about municipal taxation, about which the hon. gentleman opposite was so anxious? I have an answer which I think he will regard as entirely conclusive. The city of Winnipeg is not prevented from imposing taxation to their heart's content ; but what did they do? Show their eagerness to get an opportunity to tax these lands and make the municipality rich by the taxes which they would derive from the Company who were increasing their wealth a hundred-fold? No ; they understood the interests of Winnipeg too well, and the first thing they said to this company was : "Make this your head quarters, and we will give you $200,000," and they voted a bonus from taxes they paid themselves, to this Company of $200,000 forthwith. That is the best evidence of whether the municipalities consider that to tax the property of this Company, or whether to obtain a railway to their own doors, is most in their interest. The little parish of St Andrew's, on the Selkirk Branch, actually come forward with a bonus of $65,000 ; more, the Manitoba and South-Western Railway also obtained from the municipalities along the line $100,000 in bonuses to induce them to bring the line to those points. Instead of showing any eagerness to get an opportunity of taxing the railways, they know that the greatest benefit that they can receive is railway communication, and provided they can receive that, they are prepared to tax themselves in order to give this large bonus to the Manitoba and

South-Western Railway. The township of Louise gave $65,000 more in order to get another location, making $165,000 altogether granted to that Company. Although the Canadian Pacific Railway runs through Portage la Prairie, so thoroughly do the people of that town appreciate the importance of having it made a railway centre that they ask the Portage, Westbourne and North-West Railway Company to bring their line to that town, and they will give them a bonus of $100,000; and Westbourne, which includes Gladstone, supplements that bonus with $75,000 more. So that here is $605,000 or over half a million in a single year, contributed by these municipalities for the purpose of obtaining railway communication, showing whether they think it was important to have an opportunity of taxing the companies, or whether they believe they will be the gainers by taxing themselves in order to bring the railways to their own doors. Under these circumstances, I think I may venture to pass on from the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Perth, perfectly satisfied that the hon. gentleman, knowing as he does the condition of that country and the intelligence manifested by these various municipalities in taking the course they have taken, will find that the last thing that need ever concern any hon. member of this House is to bestow his sympathy upon the inhabitants of the great North-West, who have railway communication brought to their own doors without any cost to themselves, because they are deprived of the power of levying taxation, a thing which they show they have no desire to do. I now come to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), who was very anxious to get the railway out of my hands. It did not look like it, however, and I may say I felt greatly flattered when the Government laid upon the Table of the House a contract proposing to sever my connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to hand it over to a Company, when I found the keen anxiety exhibited by every hon. gentleman opposite that that contract and work should remain in my hands. I could not but feel that great mark of confidence bestowed upon me by the deep reluctance they showed to have the work taken out of my hands and placed in those of great capitalists. After a year's experience I am afraid those hon. gentlemen will have discovered that I was right and they were wrong; that in the conclusion at which I had arrived that an independent company could grapple better with this great railroad than any Government, and that the work would be advanced more rapidly, more economically, and be carried on more satisfactorily by private enterprise, in the light of last years transactions is being clearly proved. The resolution of the member for Brant complained that we had not attained a finality. His objection was stated in the following terms:—

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, laid on the Table, does not insure finality as to the public obligations in that regard, but imposes on Canada, besides the grant of large sums of money and acres of land, the construction by the Government for the benefit of the Syndicate of the most expensive parts of the railway which are to be built by the Government during the next ten years, and that the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, I repeat, professed great regret at seeing that work pass from my hands to those of a company; but he took also the objection that there was no immediate termination of the connection of the Government with this work. But he will see how much we have done to relieve him. We have reduced the period of our connection with the road to less than five years. His objection was based on the fear that that connection would last ten years, that being the period fixed for the construction of the branch from Emory's Bar to Port Moody. But he will see that by the vigorous course of the Government it is proposed to have all the works, everything the hon. the Minister of Railways has anything to do with in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, entirely out of my hands by 1st July, 1885—that the finality the hon. gentleman was so anxious about, in three years will have been attained. I stated with confidence to the House one year ago, that I believed all the expenditures of the Government might safely be estimated at $28,000,000, for the sections in its hands, embracing all the outlays up to that time. After a year of further experience in the subject, having been able to make closer estimates, I am glad to be able to reassure the House that I expect before the 1st of July, 1885, to have severed our connection with the construction of the Government's sections, and to have achieved that finality the hon. gentleman was so solicitous about a year ago, without extending that answer.

Mr. ANGLIN. Your connection with them will be severed long before that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, so far as I am personally concerned I may say that those who have to discharge duties so arduous, so responsible, and under such conditions as mine, will not feel great regret at having their labors lightened and such connections severed. But I see no hope of it, desirable as it may be so far as my health, comfort and longevity are concerned. So far as the country is concerned I am afraid that the course hon. gentlemen opposite have pursued in relation to this great question as well as to others is one that will compel us to have the pleasure of looking upon them on that side of the House for many long years. The motion of the hon. member for Lotbinière has been disposed of already. His party was short of material and he had to make use of material already used before. It reads thus:

"That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway contains provision for ceding to the Company 25,000,000 acres of choice lands in the North-West, but it does not, as it should, embrace any provision that such lands shall be open to actual settlers at any maximum price; that the absence of such provision will enable the Company to lock up the lands at their pleasure for a long time, and so be injurious to the progress of the country, and add to the labors and difficulties of the early settlers, and that the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable."

I have already dealt with that motion which was contained in a previous resolution moved by the hon. member for North Perth, and which, therefore, requires no further notice. The maximum price established by this Company itself, for its lands makes them available to all, ready to cultivate them at the enormous price of $1.25 an acre. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), moved this resolution:

"That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway exempts 25,000,000 acres of choice lands of the Company, from Dominion, Provincial and municipal taxation, until such lands are either sold or occupied for twenty years after the grant thereof from the Crown; that such exemption is unjust and will impose undue burdens on the settlers on the alternate sections, who will be obliged to make improvements and incur expenses, enhancing the value of the Company's lands without receiving their fair share of the cost of said improvements and expenses; that such exemptions by freeing the Company from the burdens of taxation, will reduce the inducements to the Company to sell their lands early, and will enable the Company, free of expense, to hold their lands till their value has been greatly enhanced by the labors of the adjoining settlers, and that the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

"That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway exempts perpetually the railway and all stations and station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances, required for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the Company, from taxation by the Dominion or by any other Province to be hereafter established, or by any municipal corporation therein. That the property of the Corporation will be in substance a gift from the public; and its exemption from taxes is unjust, creates an unfair incidence of taxation, and gives an undue advantage to the Company over other railway companies, calculated to prevent the construction of competing lines, and the contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

Well, that hon. gentleman has also been answered. All that was covered in the previous resolution; and it is answered by the bonuses given by the municipalities out of their own taxation, over $600,000, to secure the benefits of railway communication. So I may now pass to the resolution moved by the hon. member for West Middlesex, as follows:—

“That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway provides, that Parliament shall not have power to interfere with the tolls, charged by the Company, unless the same produce, first the working expenses of the whole line, including the British Columbia and Lake Superior sections, which working expenses comprise all expenses of maintenance of the railway and of the stations, buildings, workshops and appurtenances belonging thereto, and the rolling-stock and other stock and movable plant used in the working thereof, and also hire of engines, rents, charges and interest on lands not paid for, and all expenses incidental to working the railway and the traffic thereon, including stores and all consumable articles, and also rates, taxes, insurance and compensation for accidents or losses, also all salaries and wages of persons employed in connection with the railway or traffic, and all office and management expenses, including directors’ fees, agency, legal and other like expenses, and thereafter a profit at least of 10 per cent. on the capital expended on the construction of the railway which includes the public money and the proceeds of the public lands so expended, thus restraining Parliament from interfering unless the Company receives at least $8,000,000 a year profit, on a private capital of merely nominal amount; the Parliament ought to have power to regulate the tolls on the railway from time to time, as and when the public interest requires, and that the contract is, in this respect, objectionable.”

He charged that the profit will have to be $8,000,000 before the tolls could be lowered. An answer was given to the hon. gentleman before the House rose last year, by an amendment to the Canadian Railways Act embodying in that Act what was the understanding with the Company and ourselves, that their capital should be regarded not as the amount which they had received from the Government of Canada, but as the actual capital they contributed themselves. But, Sir, the hon. gentlemen seemed to overlook the fact that not a cent of toll could be charged to any passenger or for a pound of freight carried over the Canadian Pacific Railway, until the Company had the sanction of the Governor in Council to enable them to charge that toll. He seemed to forget that the right hon. the First Minister stated that it was the intention of the Government to fix those tolls that should thus be collected, and only to make the Order in Council for a certain specific term until the condition of the country and the road and matters appertaining could be reconsidered and the tolls re-adjusted in such a way as to do full justice to the country. The answer to that, I think, will be quite as conclusive as those I have been already able to give. I hold in my hand a statement of the tolls that this corporation are authorized by the Governor in Council to collect from the inhabitants of that country who obtained such a large amount of sympathy from hon. gentlemen a year ago. I have made a comparative statement of the tariffs of the Intercolonial Railway, Prince Edward Island Railway, the Canada Central Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway when operated by the Government, the Toronto, Grey and Bruce Railway, the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba, the Western and North-Western, the Grand Trunk and others. Hon. gentlemen will see that while I have taken leading lines in Canada, so as to make a clear contrast, I have dealt, to a considerable extent, with railways opening up the North-Western States and running through, as the hon. gentleman knows, sections of country where there is a certain amount of similarity with our North-West, but where there is a much greater degree of settlement than in our Canadian North-West. As this is a matter to which the hon. leader of the Opposition devoted a great deal of attention, and which I understand he deplored more deeply than any thing else in connection with this contract, I am quite sure the House will bear with me if I take the opportunity, at some length, to show the hon. gentleman that his sympathy was thrown away; that it was not required, and that there is no room for him to bestow any more of it in that connection. Of course, the charges upon railways are in proportion to the distance that freight is carried. That is the mode in which all railway tariffs are constructed. The following is the comparative statement:

It will be seen by this statement that the first thing this corporation did was to reduce their tariff below the amount which the Government had charged for the same service before the road passed out of their hands, and that its rates are considerably below those of many roads. The Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fe Railway charges 75 cents for the service for which the Canadian Pacific Railway charges 45 cents. The Northern Pacific charges 80 cents for the same service; the Union Pacific 60 cents; the Chicago, Burlington, Quincy Railway, 59 cents; and so on the same relation is held with the various classes of freight for the various districts I have mentioned. I am asked by my hon. friend behind me if there is any one of these sixteen railways which charges less than the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to the best of my knowledge, holding the paper in my hand, I do not see a single case in which the charge of the Canadian Pacific Railway is not as low as any one I have stated.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has already stated some instances himself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of course, I leave the Government railways out of this comparison for the reason I have already stated, but among all these other companies I do not see one case.

Mr. BLAKE. There is the Northern and the North-Western.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Central Vermont I see is a cent lower, and the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba, which has been complained of so much, is also 3 cents lower—that is in the short distance and for the first-class freight; but, as I said, I will ask permission of the House to publish this table exactly as it stands in the Hansard, as a matter of record, and a very useful one it will be in dealing with this very important question of freights. Yes, the Northern and North-Western is 16 cents to 17 cents for the first-class, which is a cent lower, but on the longer distance I do not see any of these of which I have the amounts given which is lower than the Canadian Pacific Railway, and as I have shown in the distances of 145 miles to 150 miles it is very greatly lower. I think the same will be found which referred to the charges for 70 to 75 miles and from 95 to 100 miles. I think it will be found that there are no charges lower than those of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the 95 to 100 miles. From 79 to 75 miles, the charges are 29, 22, 19 and 50 cents, but I see no instance in this table, which is compiled so far as the figures could be obtained for the various distances in which the Canadian Pacific Railway is not the lowest. From 45 to 50 miles the charges are 24, 18, 15 and 12 cents according to the class of freight. I think for the distance from forty-five to fifty miles there is not a single instance, so far as I am able to see at this moment, among all these railways, that the charges are not higher than the Canadian Pacific Railway, and there are only a very few instances in the distance from twenty to twenty-five miles in which the charge is higher. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Huntington (Mr. Scriver) was very much afraid this Company, in the latitude they were allowed of locating the line subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, would deflect the line through the Prairie County in such a manner as largely to defeat the main object of establishing a great central route through the North-West. I give the hon. gentleman the evidence that his fears were unfounded from the fact that the first thing they do is to rebuild the line from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie with one main object of shortening the distance by thirteen miles, and the evidence that they are expending at this moment a large sum of money in endeavoring to obtain the most direct line by the Kicking Horse Pass in order to make this a through continental line by shortening it by every possible means in their power. Then the hon. member for South Wellington

(Mr. Guthrie) moved a resolution, which I need not go over, because it has been all embraced in two or three of the other resolutions. It is with regard to this question of reducing the tolls, and the question of capital which was dealt with by the resolution moved by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), and which I have already answered, I think, by showing that the first thing they did was to lower the rate that the Government were charging, and that the Governor in Council has only authorized a rate that is in almost every instance greatly below that of railways that are similarly situated. The hon. gentleman for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) dealt with this question of tolls, which seems to have agitated hon. gentlemen opposite very much, but I need not say anything more with respect to that. I now come to the resolution moved by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), who said:

"The contract does not make satisfactory provision for securing the traffic to and from Montreal and the last by the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, against preferential charges which the Canada Pacific Railway may establish in favor of the Canada Central Railway, the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway, the Coteau Railway, or other lines of railway to the south and east."

Well, Sir, I think that objection has been removed. The first thing this corporation does is to obtain, by an expenditure of $4,000,000, a through line from the capital of the country to the initial point of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Lake Nipissing, by the purchase of the Canada Central Railway, and having done that, evidently with the view to meet the anxiety of the hon. member for South Huron in this matter of not giving fair play to the line between the city of Ottawa and Montreal on the Quebec side of the river, this Company has acquired by a further outlay of some $4,000,000 the line from here to Montreal; so I think, Sir, they have effectually disposed of the objections the hon. gentleman stated in this resolution by providing, in connection with the purchase, for traffic arrangements with the line from Montreal to the harbor of Quebec, thus obtaining power to make the rate themselves over that road to Quebec, and practically giving the country a through line of communication from Port Moody, on the Pacific, to the great centres of commerce of Montreal and Quebec, and bringing these into the most easy and perfect communication with the seaboard on both sides of the continent. I need not say that it is an open secret with the House—I believe the fact is well known—that it is proposed by providing for a ferry at Quebec and shortening the communication from Lévis to the Intercolonial, to make that the most rapid and perfect communication from Port Moody on the one side down over this great national undertaking to Quebec, and thence to Halifax, carrying the trade and business of the country on a through line from ocean to ocean and providing every facility for bringing the commerce of the country over our own great national highway. Then the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) was afraid that the revenue would suffer by our providing for the admission, duty free, of all steel rails, fish-plates and other fastenings, spikes, and nuts, timber and all materials for bridges to be used in the original construction of the railway. Well, Sir, I have already told the hon. gentleman that, of course, steel rails are free. I have told him that the finest description of steel rails ever imported in this country are being imported for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the fastenings as well, in the construction of that road. I may also tell hon. gentlemen that the bridges are all iron and that the revenue does not suffer on them in the slightest degree, because they are constructed in the Province of Ontario. Therefore, we may pass by that resolution without further attention. The hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) moved in amendment, stating:

"That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway makes no sufficient or satisfactory provision for the construction of the work in a proper manner, or its efficient operation afterwards, nor does it, as it should, provide that so much of the work as is done by the Company shall, in case they make default in completing the railway, belong to the Government, and that the contract is, in these respects, objectionable.

The hon. gentleman has been informed that the road is first-class in every respect, that the rails were of the best description, and when I ventured to say a year ago that we had a better guarantee than any standard that might be laid down, in the fact that these gentlemen were obliged to operate their road for all time to come, after it was constructed, and said that that was the best possible assurance that they would not fail to construct the road in the most efficient manner, because just in proportion as they did so they would be able to operate it cheaply and efficiently. The evidence is now before the country, and I have stated to the House that they have taken precisely the same view of that question which was taken by me, so that the fears of the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) have proved as unfounded as the others. The fact that the Company have been able to handle $603,000 worth of business between May and February is the best evidence that they are to operate the road efficiently as well as to construct it in a first-class manner. Then the hon. member for Bellechasse, (Mr. Larue) moved a resolution in which he exhibited a great deal of patriotic anxiety that this road should not pass into the hands of foreigners,—and evinced also a good deal of jealousy of certain foreigners connected with the work. He moved the following resolution:—

That the said resolution be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway makes no provision for the creation or continuance of a substantial Canadian interest in the stock of the Company; nor does it guard against the transfer of a controlling interest to foreigners at any time of the incorporation of the Company; and it provides that the Company may appoint and fix places of business beyond the limits of Canada, where the business of the Company may be transacted, and at which the directors and shareholders may meet; that under this provision the important business of the Company may be transacted, and its directors' and shareholders' meetings held in St. Paul, Minnesota, or New York, or elsewhere in the United States; that such power should not be given, and that the contract in this respect is objectionable.

It will be remembered that the late Finance Minister took very much the same ground. I believe that hon. gentleman had not the same dread of meetings in connection with the Company being held in the United States, as the hon. member for Bellechasse, but he exhibited the same great anxiety that the road should not pass out of the hands of the gentlemen who had undertaken it. That hon. gentleman (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) bore ample testimony of the high character and standing of the parties to the contract. He admitted that it would be difficult to find Canadians possessed of greater resources or means of handling a great work than this Company. He admitted that George Stephen, Duncan McIntyre, J. S. Kennedy, R. B. Angus, J. J. Hill, Donald A. Smith, Henry Stafford Northcote, Pascoe du P. Grenfell, London; Charles D. Rose of London, and Baron J. de Reinach, of Paris, were men possessed of great wealth and abundant resources to undertake such a work. Some of these men had been engaged in the construction of a similar work through a prairie country and in the sale and settlement of lands. The late Finance Minister drew attention to the fact that, eminent as were the positions of these gentlemen, there was no guarantee that they would remain in the work. He assumed that they would, under the contract, put a gigantic operation on the market, and sell out, at an advantage of several millions to themselves, and having divided a fortune amongst themselves, they would disappear and that we had no guarantee whatever for anyone of these parties remaining in the work and devoting to it the skill, the enterprise and the energy which they possessed. But what do we find after a year has passed? We find every one of these gentlemen to the fore; we find that, just as I said a year ago, they are regarding their operations with Minnesota and Dakota as comparatively trivial compared with the construction of this enormous work in the North-West. We find that these gentlemen, instead of transferring their headquarters to St. Paul and creating this a subsidiary work, to that railway, as was feared by the hon. mover of this resolution, have not done so; and Mr. Angus, who had removed from Montreal and was resident at St. Paul, has changed his quarters, returning to Montreal in order that he might give his whole and undivided attention and great financial ability to dealing with this work. We find, Sir, that this Company instead of transferring their headquarters as the hon. member for West Elgin—between whom and myself there was a rather unpleasant misunderstanding in relation to something which the hon. gentleman said on the subject a year ago—feared, his fears are entirely disposed of; and that although one of these gentlemen who is the manager of that railway and also lived in St. Paul and lives there still, and manages the railway, he devotes his time to sending handbills of the most attractive character all over this and all other countries for the purpose of showing that the most attractive wheat field in the world is to be found north of the Boundary Line instead of in Dakota and Minnesota. Mr. Angus has gone to Montreal and this Company has invested in 200 acres of land in Montreal to be used for their headquarters, and great machine shops and everything of this kind, costing $150,000 and paying £83,000 more for their general offices, or an expenditure already at their headquarters of $233,000, giving, I say, every evidence that it is possible to give, that these gentlemen have the most unbounded faith and confidence in the success of this enterprise; that instead of being anxious to be rid of it, and letting it pass out of their hands, their ambition is to make this great international highway the highway between the Old World and the East; and that they intend to spare neither time, nor labor, nor money in making their work first-class work, a credit to themselves and a credit to Canada. It is not necessary, therefore, Sir, that we should take up more of the time of the House in relation to this matter. But Sir, my friend the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. MacDonnell) moved an amendment, and his amendment expressed the fear that the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway does not preserve to the Government the right to give other corporations running powers over the Thunder Bay Line, and Pembina Branch, but improperly cedes to the Company the absolute and exclusive right to these avenues. Now, Sir, that hon. gentleman will be glad to learn that so far from a desire to oppress, or embarrass, or obstruct any companies engaged in the construction of railways in the North-West, this Company had decided to build, and were engaged in projecting, a line from Portage la Prairie up in the direction of Prince Albert, but the Portage, Westbourne and North-West Company went to see them, to ascertain what terms they could make for the purpose of their taking up this line. And how do you suppose they were met. In a spirit of obstruction or embarrassment? Not at all. The Company said to these gentlemen: "We are only too glad to have the aid, assistance and co-operation of any persons who are prepared to take up a work of this kind and connect their line with the Canadian Pacific Railway and increase the traffic and business which will be brought over our line. If you will organize and take up that line of railway, we will not only withdraw from the ground, instead of building a rival line and endeavoring to obstruct or embarrass you, but we will pledge ourselves and bind ourselves by a solemn agreement to give you terms of running and of traffic arrangements, by which all your traffic brought to the Canadian Pacific Railway, will not only be carried to Thunder Bay, but we will give you an independent outlet at Thunder Bay upon terms of an equal rate with ourselves, and a great advantage over our ordinary mileage rate." They entered into this arrangement, and this Company have secured an independent outlet, under these terms, to Thunder Bay, by which all the products which they can bring over their line, when constructed to Prince Albert, will not only have free course over the Canadian Pacific Railway, and have an independent outlet, but they will pass over the Canadian Pacific Railway upon terms which are eminently satisfactory and favorable to the Company that is engaged in the building of this branch. This, I am told, Sir, is the spirit in which they are prepared to deal with any of these parties. I think I have said everything with reference to these resolutions that is necessary, except with regard to a resolution which referred to there being no other outlet to the trade of the North-West. Why, Sir, it is perfectly well known that, at this moment, two lines of railway are not only projected, but that companies are organized, embracing wealthy capitalists, who are determined, and have decided to take up the construction of lines of railway from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay; and who believe that they have satisfied themselves that beyond question it is perfectly practicable for several months in the year to keep open a short and easy line of communication via the Hudson's Bay—so much so as to warrant the construction of 600 miles of railway between Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay, and thus furnishing an independent outlet in that direction as well as the one to which I have already referred. I think Sir, I have now covered the ground, so far as taking a brief notice of these various resolutions and objections made a year ago is concerned; and I am in the judgment of the House when I a-k, whether I am not warranted in view of the facts as they stand out now in the history of the country and in the light of the experience of the past year, in making the statement that one single year's experience has given the most conclusive and complete answer to one and all of the objections that a year ago were conjectured in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, and which I suppose they felt it to be their duty to give utterance to by bringing them, in formal manner, under the notice of the House. I congratulate the House, Sir, and I congratulate the country upon the immense progress that this great work has made. I congratulate the House, and, Sir, I congratulate the country upon the enormous, the unanticipated and the unprecedented development of our great North-West, as has been witnessed during the past year, and I say that I pity the man who from any cause—whether it be partizan political feeling, or party interest, or anything else, who can regard what is taking place in this country in connection with the mode in which this great national work is being carried out, without feeling a throb of exultation, and a throb of joy, that we are striding in the independent and rapid and effective manner in which we are towards national life. I say, Sir, to the great Conservative party of this country—I say, Sir, to the great Liberal-Conservative party, to whom this country owes its present condition—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, Sir, I say that this country owes its present condition to the Liberal-Conservative party. Contrast the life of to-day with the lethargy and death which was exhibited in relation to these great interests three years ago, and then tell me, whether I am not warranted in saying that to the great Liberal-Conservative party, Canada, this country owes the new life and vigor which has been infused into the development of all its great material interests. I say, Sir, I congratulate the great Liberal-Conservative party on what it has achieved—achieved, I would be very glad to add with the manly aid and hearty cooperation of hon. gentlemen opposite. We were entitled to receive that aid. We had every claim that a party could have on those hon. gentlemen, owing to the position in which they had placed the public affairs of this country, and especially in connection with this work, for that independent support that one party, whatever they may be called, is entitled to receive from their opponents under such circumstances. But I say, Sir, we sought that aid in vain; and to-day, to the great Liberal Conservative party, it is not only due, but it is due to them alone, that this country has been lifted out of the condition of prostration which was witnessed in our country three years ago, into a condition of advancement and prosperity and progress to-day which will compare favorably with the advancement of any portion of the civilised world.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). I simply rise to make a correction. The hon. the Minister of Railways fell into an error, when he was speaking with reference to a resolution that I moved last year. He did not read it correctly, as I understood him, but in the sense that it referred to the postponement of the building of the whole line, while it only related to the postponement of the British Columbia section.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I read the hon. gentleman's resolution word for word as it appears in the Journals of the House. It is as follows:—

"That at present the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia is premature and would involve the country in an expense beyond its reasonable capacity, and would lead to the maintenance of too high a rate of taxation, while the postponement of that part of the undertaking till after the prairie section is finished, would enable it to be constructed at a much less cost and within a reasonable time."

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has taken advantage of this little Bill—to alter one of the objective points of the route of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and to enable the Government to authorize it to pass through the Rocky Mountains by Kicking Horse Pass instead of Yellow Head Pass—to make a general statement of the position of that enterprise, and to engage in discussions, some part of which may more appropriately come under review when we go into Committee of Supply. With reference to the financial aspect of the Government works under contract, and the works of the Pacific Railway Company, we are to receive explanations in the Committee, and I think, for my own part, I shall not trespass on the time of the House by dealing with that particular portion of the hon. gentleman's explanations in any degree of detail. It is obvious that a discussion in the Committee of the Whole, when an inter-locutory discussion can be carried on, is the proper mode of dealing with that part of the subject. I am not now complaining that the hon. gentleman has given us the information which he gave us on that point, but I am pointing out that it is impossible to discuss these things effectually except in Committee of Supply. The hon. gentleman, as I say, went through a wide range of discussion. He has found, Sir, at the end of a year, that, after all, it is worth while to discuss the resolutions we moved a year ago. He did not think it worth while to say anything about them before the vote; but a year's reflection and sober consideration has convinced him that it is well to engage in a controversy on that subject, and we are quite prepared to meet him as we were then. But before I enter into a discussion of that subject, on which I hold views, not unnaturally, opposite to those of the hon. gentleman, I will proceed to review his glowing account of the condition of affairs, in order to ascertain how far that condition of affairs, whatever it may be, is induced by those parts of the policy of the Administration which were opposed to the policy the Opposition propounded. Now, Sir, I aver, as the guiding note of this whole part of the controversy, that whatever progress has been made, whatever results have been achieved, whatever changes have taken place with reference to the North-West, are due to the portion of the policy of the Administration which in the year 1880, when it was first propounded, in the year 1881, when it was secondly propounded, was not merely not opposed, but cordially seconded by gentlemen on this side of the House—namely, the proposition that the North-West should be developed by the construction of lines through the prairie as rapidly as settlement required, aye, and even in advance of its requirements; and that whatever drawbacks there are to that country, whatever difficulties and impediments exist there, dealing with that portion of country alone, and not considering for a moment the general effect on the country at large, of the whole policy, the requirements and interests of that section should be carefully considered. But the views of the Opposition were not assented to, and by reason of the adoption of the policy to which they were opposed, and to which they believe events indicate they were rightly opposed—although in many particulars it will require a long time to develop the evils to which they referred, the country is already encountering very serious difficulties. The hon. gentleman began very properly at one end and went to the other end of the railroad, and there is a marked contrast between his language respecting the eastern and his language respecting the middle section; not that he was not vigorous, and did not use a considerable number of adjectives, mostly of the superlative kind, in describing the progress of the work in any part. But what have we got with reference to the eastern end? At the eastern end we are told considerable progress has been made towards construction. Now, the principle was that construction should commence on the 1st of July last, and should go on so rapidly on the whole work to assure completion by the time mentioned. It was then the policy of the Administration and of the Railway Company, to adopt an interior route between Callander Station, and not Thunder Bay, but Linkoping, some fifty-seven miles beyond, on the way to Winnipeg, and the statement was that that portion of the railway would be begun on the 1st of July, and vigorously prosecuted, so as to have that section completed within ten years. Now the hon. gentleman is obliged to admit, that that vigorous prosecution has not taken place. I think we have just cause to complain of the scantiness of the information we have received with reference to the details of the actual progress of the work on this portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The report which the hon. gentleman brought down, giving us a few lines upon that subject, is the only written information we have received; and since that time we have received nothing satisfactory until we got the oral statement of the hon. gentleman to-night. He has told us something has been done, that there were some difficulties and that the Canada Central did not get to Callander till about the 1st of July. Well, it was about the 1st of July, the work of constructing was to commence from Callander to the west. I, therefore, do not see that that has much to do with the question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has misunderstood me. I said we did not expect they would be able to lay the track to Callander much before the 1st of next July, from the absence of more vigorous work.

Mr. BLAKE. That accounts for the absence of more vigorous work, but not for the breach of contract. The contract was that they were to commence on the 1st of last July. What have they done on the first fifty miles from Callander station up? What is said here is: that a staff of engineers had been operating in the field beyond Callander, but no information was given as to any practical work in the way of construction having been performed. That is all the information that the House and the country has as to what has been done on the eastern section. What has been done? How much work has been completed—how much money expended with reference to these fifty miles? We know nothing at all about it. The hon. gentleman, however, is satisfied. If he knows anything, he ought to have told us; but simply to tell us that the work of construction is in progress is to tell us in reality nothing at all. Under these circumstances, as promises and assurances of a very free and emphatic character had been made in reference to the eastern section, it was necessary to exhibit on this occasion, so I suppose, a very great show of anxiety and energy in another way. It will be found that in the course of debate of the last Session, the First Minister said:

"We stipulated in the contract that the Government should cause to be completed the Lake Superior section by the dates fixed by existing contracts for the construction thereof."

Now, I say that this section can only be regarded as the main line, and we have no evidence of substantial work having been done from Callander westward. We have a report, dated 1st November, from the engineer as to the branch lines, including the statement that engineers had been employed in locating a branch line from Sault Ste. Marie. But shortly after that another announcement was made—the hon. the First Minister stated at a public gathering at Toronto, about the third week of last November, what I shall read:

"They expect by next fall to have built the railway and have it running between Winnipeg and Fort Calgary. They are bound to build that railway in ten years. They are bound to build it round Lake Superior. They are bound to do so, and, gentlemen, I have it from the Board that although at first when they entered into the contract with the Canadian Government they had a great deal of hesitation and a great deal of doubt as to the expediency of building the road to the north of Lake Superior, they now see that the Canadian Government was right. I have a letter from the Board telling me the tenacity of the Canadian Government was the cause of the road being so located, and that we were right, and they were wrong; and so strongly are they now convinced of the desirability of having a railway every inch of which shall run over Canadian soil—(applause)—that they say in a letter to me, that if the Canadian Government proposed to them to give up that portion of the road, they would refuse to do so, because it is essential to the success of the line as a whole. I have further to tell you that later surveys have shown that the railway can be built not far away behind Lake Nipigon, but on the lake shore and looking into the very waters of Lake Superior, and that route is in fact preferable in every respect. It is going to be more costly; but they say they are willing to bear the additional expense, because if they constructed the road via Lake Nipigon they could only attack it from one end, and it would take the whole ten years, but by building the railway close along the lake shore they can attack it in a hundred different places, and carry by water from one point to every point along the whole line of the railway supplies to build the road. (Cheers.) I have a letter to-day from the president authorizing me to make that statement to this meeting, that they hope and believe, in consequence of this change, they will be able to build the road in five years instead of ten. (Continued applause.) Gentlemen, I need not tell you how delighted I was with that announcement. As I said to-day in the convention it is pleasant to everybody, and especially consolatory to a man of my age. I stated last year, on my arrival at Quebec, that I hoped to look down from above on the completed railway. I now have some chance, if I remain as strong, please God, as I now am—I now have some chance of travelling over it in person before I am just quite an angel!"

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Arch-angel.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman expects if he reaches that position he will travel any other way than by wings. But he seems to think he will travel by rail even after he is an angel. The hon. gentleman continued:

"I may add that the proposed alterations in the line will be of great and especial advantage to Ontario and the cities and commerce of Ontario, and to no place will this advantage be greater than to the good city of Toronto. (Cheers.) The road will run from Callander to near the Sault Ste. Marie. It will not touch that place, however, but strike near there, and run along the coast; and the effect of that is, by the construction of the road to Lake Nipissing, the supplies for the great North-West will in a great measure come from Toronto and London; and Ontario, which was in a considerable degree to have had the go-by if the road had run to the north of Nipigon, and gone straight through the wilderness to Montreal, will have its fair chance and full opportunity in trade and commerce and manufactures to supply all that great North-West country."

That is an authoritative statement from the First Minister, the Minister of Interior, announcing in very emphatic language that a decision had been reached, and that the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway was to go along the shore of the lakes and to come within a very short distance of the Sault Ste. Marie. We all understand that the investigations necessary to reach that conclusion had been completed, that the information had been handed to the Government, that the Government had satisfied themselves that that was practicable, that the result had been achieved, and the hon. Minister announces this great change. What is the fact? The fact is that nothing of the kind had occurred. In March or April instant the Government reports that that is a practicable through route by the new line. The fact is no evidence is offered the Government that there is any practicable route at all as a through line in this direction. The hon. Minister reports:

"By a letter dated the 30th ultimo application has been made by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for approval of the location of a section of their line between Callander Station, Lake Winnipeg, the western terminal point of the subsidized portion of the Canada Central Railway and Algoma Mills, Lake Huron, such section being part of a contemplated line between Lake Nipissing and the Sault Ste. Marie, originally proposed as a branch, but now intended to form part of the main line of the railway.

"That the said application having been submitted to the Chief Engineer he has reported, under date the 3rd instant, to the effect that the section of location between the points named, appears to be very favourable; that the route above described appears to be of no greater length than the more inland route proposed by the Government, and that in the event of satisfactory evidence being given that connection with the existing line at Prince Arthur's Landing is practicable by the new route, there can, in his opinion, be no objection to its adoption as part of the main line. As to such practicability, he states that although himself unable to form an opinion, from lack of the necessary information, both the Vice-President and the Engineer in charge of construction for the Company express themselves as confident upon the point.

"The undersigned accordingly and upon the further suggestion of the Chief Engineer, recommends that, as required by their Act of incorporation, the approval of His Excellency the Governor General in Council be given to the location of the line as now submitted by the Company and as above described, such line to be part of the trunk line, it being made a condition of such approval that the Company shall at some future time satisfy the Department of Railways and Canals that the route proposed is practicable, payment of any subsidy upon any portion of the Eastern Section which would not be common to both the present shore route and the interior route surveyed by the Government being deferred until such satisfactory evidence of practicability has been furnished by the Company."

That is all. The Vice-President and the Engineer are quite confident the result will be attained, but no information has been furnished to the Engineer of the Government or the Government itself. It is expressly declared by the Government, in the Minister's report, that there was no evidence whatever before them to show that the new route is a practicable one for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and without any such evidence they approved of the new route as far as the Canadian Pacific Railway asked them to approve of it. But they say this approval which we give is to be conditional on you at some future time, proving to us it is a practicable plan. What is the object of this? What is to be gained by this very extraordinary proceeding to approve of the location of a portion of the line along a route which you say you have not been shown any evidence to prove it is a practicable route? Does it advance matters? No; because the Canadian Pacific Railway are about to construct, under any circumstances, a branch to the Sault. All that it was necessary to say was: Go on; you are building to the Sault at any rate. We will wait until you satisfy us that you are proposing a practicable route for the main line, and then we will approve of the change of location, but cannot do so in advance. But the Canadian Pacific Railway asked it of the Administration, and the Administration granted this privilege in advance. The hon. gentleman has said this change will be of great advantage to the through line in many respects. I am glad he considers it now an advantage to go to the Sault. I recollect when he used to think it treasonable to go to the Sault.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Never.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, the hon. gentleman called it treason. I dare say he has forgotten it. I am not surprised that an hon. gentleman who says so many contradictory things, should sometimes forget some of them. He says it is a very good thing, and tells us, amongst other things, the route will be 650 miles from Callander to Thunder Bay. The figures he gave us of the former main line were, from Callander to Linkoping Station, 686 miles; from Linkoping Station to Winnipeg, 371 miles, which would make 1,057 miles from Callander to Winnipeg; from Callander to Thunder Bay that hon. gentlemen says will be 650 miles, though I do not see we have any evidence satisfactory to us of that, but I do not know what the sources of the hon. gentleman's information are. From Thunder Bay to Winnipeg is 458 miles by the line, which gives 1,057 miles against 1,036, or an elongation of 21 miles by the proposed new line. When we discuss the enormous saving of 75 miles at one end, it must be remembered that this proposed change involves, according to the hon. gentleman's figures, a loss of 21 at the other end. I maintain that the development of the country, the progress which has been made, of which the hon. gentleman boasts so much, is not in the slightest degree due to the surveying, the cutting of timber and other work done on the eastern end of the Canadian Pacific Railway. With reference to this same point I might observe that in an official memorandum as to the prospect and position of the Canadian Pacific Railway, dated 21st November, and issued therefore about the time of the speech of the hon. First Minister, to which I referred awhile ago, the Government say:

"From Lake Nipissing, where the Canadian Pacific proper begins, to Thunder Bay, on Lake Superior, a distance of about 650 miles, the line is partly under construction; and, it having been all but finally decided to locate it by way of Sault Ste. Marie, skirting the waters of Lake Superior to Thunder Bay, it is confidently expected that this whole section will be completed within the next five years."

Then again, in the statement of their intention, they speak with the utmost confidence of the location of the railway being according to the new line along the shore, and I suppose that confidence was justified, and that that result was about to be attained. Under these circumstances, if the voice of Parliament was to be heard upon the question of the expedience of the action of the Government, I think it was the duty of the Government to point out to these gentlemen that they should have used due diligence in prosecuting surveys with reference to the other parts of the intervening distance, inasmuch as both the Vice-President and the Chief Engineer are confident it is all right. I suppose they did prosecute the service, that they have the information, and that if not, they should have supplied the information, so that the Government might have been able to decide and Parliament might have been able to criticize and pronounce an opinion on that decision, which we are now unable to do. We are told there is an additional privilege of a new main line, which privilege is conditional upon the new main line being practicable and being proved afterwards to be a practicable main line. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to deal with the distance from Prince Arthur's Landing to Winnipeg. Here I may observe that the hon. gentleman stated that the line will be located from Thunder Bay eastward, and 50 or 60 miles will be put under contract from Prince Arthur's Landing along the new line. I take it, therefore, the hon. gentleman, although for form's sake he has inserted a saving clause in his approval, has decided in his own mind that the line is to go in that direction, although he felt that he could not, without any evidence being brought before him to show it was practicable, formally approve of it and decide that this change shall be made. Now the hon. gentleman proceeds to enter upon the figures and the transactions upon the intervening distance. This, I think, will more properly come up in the Committee of Supply when we discuss the hon. gentleman's estimates for such works as are to be provided for the ensuing year. The hon. gentleman, dealing with the prairie line, said :

"The Company decided to run a direct line west from Winnipeg to the Portage, and they were permitted to abandon the line from Stonewall to the west."

At a subsequent portion of his speech he rather disclaimed any credit for that portion of his administration of public affairs which is involved in the location and arrangements for that line of 100 miles west of Winnipeg. I am glad to know the hon. gentleman is somewhat sensible of the circumstance that these transactions do not give him very much credit. It seems that the Railway Company found the line ill-located and circuitous, and that it was better to abandon a large portion of the work and the contract which had been laid down in order to get a better line. The report of the Engineer states :

"It passes over a comparatively dry country and runs through a settlement all the way, and is also about 15 miles shorter than the existing line."

That is the description of the new line, a line which passes over a comparatively dry country as contrasted with the country through which the other line passed, that it is direct, with light grades, and saves fifteen miles in the short distance of sixty or seventy miles. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the line proposed by the Company was very much preferable; so much so that I feel very great difficulty in understanding how the hon. gentleman hit on the other line, how it was possible to make the mistake that was made, as he found in all its particulars on this particular portion of the enterprise. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to let a contract for 100 miles more, and that was let under such circumstances, under such miscalculation of facts and figures, and under such difficulties, that he cancelled the whole contract and put an end to it. The transactions of the hon. gentleman with reference to the line through the prairie, I quite admit are evidence that some companies will do business of this kind better than some Governments; I do not say that all companies will do it better than all Governments, but that some companies will do it better than some Governments; because I do not suppose that, considering the circumstances, considering the information which had been previously acquired, considering the facilities for surveys and ascertainment, it will be possible to point out two mistakes more grievous than those which are connected with the letting of the first 100 miles west of Winnipeg, and the second 100 miles under the hon. gentleman's administration. Now, the hon. gentleman has pointed out that the line is now located to Moose Jaw Creek, and he says it will not be located any further until the ascertainment of the location of the point of crossing the Rocky Mountains. He says that the line is favorable to Moose Jaw Creek, good grades, and the character of the country is excellent, and that a contract for 500 miles further will be let in that direction during the coming year. The hon. gentleman says truly that the line has been deflected southerly. It has been very severely deflected southerly, and the bulk of the branches as projected are not now projected, as was suggested at the time of the making of the contract, to the north and to the south, although, of course, they reach northerly and southerly necessarily, but they are projected in a very different fashion from what we were led to expect they would be, and serve a very different purpose. It will be recollected that at the time the idea was that the line would be a great central line, and that branches would be made north and south. The First Minister pointed out this feature of the proposed scheme in the speech he delivered in the debate on the contract. He said :

"To encourage them to build branches, we give them a large and valuable allowance, so that the whole country may not only be opened up east and west, but be penetrated by herring bone lines running northward and southward into the interior."

That was the general idea—herring bone lines. I apprehend this plan of deflection was arranged with the view to securing in the easiest manner the largest measure of practical monopoly to the Company, for it certainly means that some lines shall go for a certain distance northerly, and a certain distance southerly, but as a general rule, and as the hon. gentleman's own description of these lines will have indicated to the House, the tread of the lines is in a westerly direction, westerly on the north side and on the south side—line to the Touchwood Hills, a line to Edmonton, a line along the Souris River—lines of this description which are, in point of fact, lines in the same general direction as the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, only so far altered as to make feeders of them to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, the reports as to these projected branch lines are, of course, more extensive than the extent to which the hon. gentleman has referred, for he apparently only dealt with those which have been located, whereas the Company has given formal intimation to the Government of their intention to construct them to a much greater extent, only they are not yet able to lay down the exact line on the locations. The hon. gentleman says that this is a very advantageous arrangement, because there will be fewer branches; and that these will be longer and more easily operated. Well, I believe that there are considerable advantages in having all these branches running in certain directions, but I conceive, also, it is quite clear that the change which has taken place, is one that does practically cover the country very much more by means of the Canadian Pacific Railway and its branches exclusively, to the exclusion of other lines, than a central route would have done. The portion to the southern, the portion to the northern must necessarily— whoever builds the northern—come into the Canadian Pacific Railway. The portion to the southern is comparatively limited, and the possession of that has also been taken by the Company. Now, the hon. gentleman proceeded to state what the receipts and returns of the Company had been, and no doubt these receipts and returns are eminently satisfactory to those who are engaged in working the line. When we reflect that the great Government enterprise, with all its mileage and all its resources for the development of traffic, and with the vast amount of train mileage that was run during the year, has produced gross returns of some $1,750,000 in round numbers—for the whole year—while the Canadian Pacific Railway in six months by the report of the Directors has produced some $460,000, if I remember aright, and in a few months longer $600,000, it is quite obvious that very large returns are being reaped even at this early stage by this Company. The hon. gentleman says that this is not due to high rates. Then, if it is not due to high rates, it must be due to a very large traffic indeed, because it will be remembered that the mileage is not treated as the mileage which they are now working; it is to be remembered that the mileage of the Company has been increasing from day to day, that the great bulk of this has been earned over a comparatively small mileage, and that the returns therefore per mile of a really earning road must be very much larger than what at first sight appears. Now, the statement of the hon. gentleman with reference to the allowances of the route lead to an observation; I see that application has been made on several occasions by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for allowances on different portions of the route, in different localities, and that these allowances have been made in almost every instance. I observe that the Engineer, on the 13th of July last, pointed out it was impossible for him to act intelligently in advising whether the location was such as should be permitted without receiving a profile. I observe that so late as October—I think the 21st of the month—he points out that he had not yet received this, although more applications had come in, in the meantime, and he says that he wants in future to get these profiles; so that the allowances which had taken place, up to that time, and which took place at that time, were made without those materials being before the Engineer, which he himself declared were essential in order that he might reach an intelligent decision as to whether the location was such as should be approved of, or not. I am not aware whether the last applications which have been made are accompanied by the profiles; but it does appear that the great bulk of the allowances which have been made in the location of the Canadian Pacific Railway line, have been made on the face of the Engineer's own report without those materials being in his hands which are necessary to enable him to discharge his duty at all intelligently. The hon. gentleman says it is very important in making the change to which he refers, and with which this Bill deals, if it is practicable; and he has given us some information of a very distant date upon that subject. It strikes me as very singular that the Company is not called upon for all the information which is accessible and available before the Administration decided that they would bring down this measure; but it appears from the memorandum of the Chief Engineer, which the hon. gentleman read—and I think that its date is three days ago—and a telegram, which I think he only received to-day, that this information has been detained, not in order to settle the policy of the Administration, not as a means of forming a judgment, but in order to present this Bill in the most acceptable shape before the House, because it is felt, after the observations that were made the other day on this subject, that it would be wholly unreasonable to call upon the House to deal with this matter at all, unless the Company presented some information on the subject. Of course, Sir, it is impossible to crowd much into a brief general statement and a telegram which is special on the day when the hon. gentleman speaks, but I observe that the hon. gentleman says, that the difficulties of the Company are very great; that these difficulties are enormous, that there will be other sacrifices; and the Company will encounter great difficulties in order to accomplish that great result; namely, the shortening of the line by 79 miles. Well, no doubt, Sir, that will be a great result. It will be a great result for them. It would be a very important thing to shorten the line and have its maintenance through a difficult country by 79 miles. We do not know, of course, the relative difficulties of the country between the new and the old route, from the foot of the hills of the Rockies until you reach Kamloops. Assuming them, however, to be on the average the same, and that these 79 miles will save, that is the calculation of the hon. Minister himself to be the cost of maintaining the route by the Yellow Head Pass, and he states it, if I remember right, at $40,000 a mile. I think that the Engineer estimates the cost at $43,600 a mile, but the hon. gentleman takes $3,600 off these figures and makes it $40,000 a mile. We then find a saving of nearly $3,200,000 in 79 miles of road, and I need hardly say that a very much larger expense can be incurred per mile on the not very long mileage of this mountainous section if you save 79 miles than what it would cost on the average under the old and decidedly easier route, $3,200,000. It is quite possible that a very much larger expenditure may be made, running into the millions, and yet no greater expenditure. Not so great an expenditure in the lump may be made in order to pass the road by the new Pass than as would be necessary by the old route; and it is quite clear that if the Company have fixed the price of their work and are able to find a shorter route, for the same fixed price, the Company makes an enormous gain, because all the expense of maintaining 80 miles of railway and all the expense of carrying rolling stock over 80 miles of railway for all time, is the net saving to the Company. Assuming that it pays as much for the diminished mileage, reduced by 80 miles. I do not know what the precise percentage that would be on the whole mileage of the mountainous section; and it would be 80 miles less than they would pay for on the other route by the longer mileage. They receive the same sum from the Government and pay no more in the cost of construction and get a shorter route, while they save in the cost of maintenance and in the cost of transit. Now, Sir, to that there can be no earthly objection. We must all agree that the best route for the Company in this particular, at the crossing of the Rockies, is probably the best for the country. There can be no difficulty in coming to such a conclusion, but after we have made a bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, based on their going to the Yellow Head Pass and building some 80 miles more railway, based largely on their obtaining the road and running the trains over 80 miles more railway of difficult country, which, according to the hon. gentleman, would not pay expenses for a large number of years, and it is found to be to their interest to change that route and take a shorter line at the same expenditure of money, it is quite clear that they are very large gainers by that change. What I say is that it is not unreasonable to consider that this ceding should be allowed for in dealing with the change. It appears to me that if a change is to be made by which the Company is to be greatly the gainer, the Company should consider the interests of the public in a pecuniary as well as in the other particulars. If we had made a change involving a more difficult enterprise for which we have agreed to pay a more liberal price, I say that when a change is made which is to secure to the advantage of the Company some consideration should be allowed for the change which involves inauguration in the conditions of the contracts. The hon. gentleman proceeded to declare the results of further enquiry with reference to Government contracts between Kamloops and Emory's Bar. Of course we have not had the figures; the report of the engineer does not give the details upon which the hon. gentleman estimates these considerable reductions. When the hon. gentleman applies for the votes in Committee of Supply for the purpose of carrying on these contracts, I suppose he will have prepared this further information, showing how the further savings are effected, and deal with the questions of alignments, and curves, and grades the alterations of which are detrimental to the character of the line on which the former savings, it was said, had been effected. The instructions to Mr. Fleming, and his response to them, were all based on the adaptation of the line to the sinuosities and the abrupt character of the ground, and if further savings have been made it is important to know whether they have been effected by a still further deflection, or deal with the ground as it is, or in what way it is that the previous estimates are incorrect in point of excess. The hon. gentleman's statement in the gross at another period of his speech indicates to us that the total results of the whole of his operations, the calculations he makes as to the cost to the country of those portions of the work which are to be built or which have been built by the country, are the same. There is more in one part and less in another, because he summed up in another part of his subject the result of the whole year's operations by saying that, whereas last year the estimate was $28,000,000 for the Government portion of the works, he is able to-day to say that $28,000,000 is what the work will cost. The hon. gentleman excludes, of course, the $3,000,000 and odd for surveys and other minor charges, but the estimate is the same—$25,000,000 of a cash subsidy. There are $28,000,000 for the works, $3,000,000 and odd for the surveys, which makes $56,000,000; $1,500,000 for the Canada Central, which makes $57,500,000; $1,000,000 for the Telegraph, $58,500,000; minor charges, $500,000—making, in all. $59,000,000, exclusive of the old interest before the contract was handed over; so that the sum we have named several times $59,000,000 to $60,000,000 is the cash cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway according to this arrangement. The hon. gentleman then proceeded to give us a statement of calculation of mileages from different points on the globe to other points on the globe. The hon. gentleman gave these figures with great energy and vivacity, as if he were communicating new information; but the only difference between his statement and those which we have had for many years, those which had been in the earlier reports of Mr. Fleming, is this, that he subtracted 59 miles by going through Kicking Horse, but he has made no allowance for elongating the line by going along the shore of Lake Superior. The hon. gentleman says that these results show a glorious prospect, and he points out that for new traffic with a shorter distance and a better line, with better grades and curves, and without any bonded debt, it should compete for San Francisco trade as well as for our own.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say: "With no bonded debt."

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, the hon. gentleman said it and I took it down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I said, without the great bonded debt which presses on the Union Pacific Railway.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman had, in fact, borrowed the phrase from the prospectus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or rather, I am not sure whether they borrowed from him or he from them, but they say with all the advantages it possesses, of less mileage, of easier grades, and being free from the bonded debt the Canadian Pacific Railway will be in a free position to command its share of the traffic from China and Japan, and so on. It seems to me that I have found the origin of that portion of the hon. gentleman's speech. Now, these speculations are very encouraging, particularly as to the absence of a bonded debt which presses our other railways. The Company itself feels that very strongly, as I have pointed out. They have stated it in their prospectus, and I think they should feel happy and very grateful to the hon. gentleman who placed them in a position to enable them to make such a statement. The hon. gentleman declares that these results are due to the policy of making the contract a year ago, and he takes up the amendments moved last year, and points out that events justify him in declaring that these amendments have been falsified by those events. Now, Sir, as I said before, I repeat, that the progress and the development to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, the immigrants of whom he has spoken, the various changes to which he has referred, would all have been achieved without the serious and growing embarrassments and difficulties to which I am about to allude, by an earnest, diligent and vigorous prosecution of the work from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg, and from Winnipeg through the prairie country—without this contract or the enormous burdens which it has placed upon the country, aye, and placed largely upon the North-West itself, to the detriment of that country for a long time to come, in order to carry out that portion of the hon. gentleman's policy to which we objected as ill-timed, premature and unduly burdensome. We complained of the course of hon. gentlemen in doing more at the time and under the circumstances in which we were placed than developing the North-West. We affirmed that that was the prime duty, to carry the route through the prairie country, to get in immigrants, and to so increase the value of the land as to give us a basis on which we might proceed at a future day to make a contract to construct the ends at an infinitely burdensome cost than he will do it.

Mr. BUNSTER. May I ask the hon. gentleman what kind of emigrants he alludes to?

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. BLAKE. Why, Sir, look at the kind of immigrants this policy has brought. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that the immigration of those three thousand Chinese now on the ocean—and I suppose he does not hope they are drowned—is due to anything else than the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. They refuse to cut off their pigtails, they refuse to allow the Chinese to be taxed, they refuse to allow any discriminating provision that would prevent them from working on the public works of the country. My hon. friend will not work, his friends over there will not work, and the Pacific Railway contractor has to get the Chinese in; for they are coming in, my hon. friend complains, and his complaints are wholly due to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Sir, I say that the peaceful progress of British Columbia would be much more encouraged by a wholesale immigration of characters such as my hon. friend and the hon. gentleman (Mr. DeCosmos) who sits beside him, than it will be when two steamers come together in the harbor of Victoria, with two or three thousand Chinese on board.

Mr. BUNSTER. Two have arrived and three are coming.

Mr. BLAKE. With how many Chinese?

Mr. BUNSTER. Too many.

Mr. BLAKE. Five thousand too many. We maintained that the part of prudence was not to make the contract which was laid upon the Table for the construction of the Eastern and Western ends. We said that the business in hand was to develop the North-West itself, and afterwards to make some other and better contract which would be open to us in a very short time for the construction of the ends. Now, Sir, what was happened in the space of this short year to which the hon. gentleman has alluded? What was happened in reference to the Eastern end? We know perfectly well that last year the hon. gentleman justified this enormous expenditure of land and money, these great gifts, these princely donations, on what score? Because he said: "After the railway is built, we have to give this gentlemen millions to maintain it; for many years the Eastern and Western ends will cost an enormous sum of money to run, and we have to provide for this." That was his justification; he could not pretend to justify this contract as a contract for construction; he did not pretend to justify this as a reasonable price for the construction of the road which was afterwards to be owned by the company constructing it; but he said that because they were to incur such an enormous loss in the compulsory keeping open of the Eastern and Western ends, therefore it was that this great price became no more than reasonable. Now, what is the fact to day? I refer once again to that interesting document, the speech of the hon. First Minister made in November last, in which he said:

"They (the Company) are bound to build that railway round Lake Superior. They are bound to do so, and, gentlemen, I have it from the Board that, although at first, when they entered into the contract with the Canadian Government, they had a great deal of hesitation and doubt about building the road to the north of Lake Superior, they now see that the Canadian Government was right. I have a letter from the Board telling me that the tenacity of the Canadian Government was the cause of the road being so located, and that we were right and they were wrong; and so strongly are they convinced of having a railway, every inch of which will run over Canadian soil, that if the Canadian Government asked them to give up that portion of the road, they would refuse to do so, because it was essential to the whole."

When they first called on the hon. gentleman, they objected to building that line; they told him it was ruinous to build it; they exaggerated the difficulties of going through the Rocky Mountains and around Lake Superior. They said: "it will cost us a still more enormous sum of money to run the line for many years; do not ask us to do it." Well, the Government insist, and the Company say: "Well, if you ask us to do it we must charge you pretty steeply for it," and they named the figures. We do not know what these figures are, because the first agreement which was made across the water, and which the hon. gentleman announced to be a firm contract, has not been brought down. But we know quite enough, from the statement of the Minister of Railways, from the statements of the supporters of the Administration and the members of it, that they attempted to justify the price they paid by the representation that the eastern section was an enormous burden to maintain and run for many years. One short year has proved, however, that the eastern section is essential to the completion of the whole line, and that the Company would not abandon it on any consideration. It was held that the view that enormous sums ought to be paid for maintaining the eastern section is fallacious, that it is a proper and a profitable line, that it would not be abandoned and that we are asked to abandon it. We have got the same little paper and document of their own in which they speak of that line. I have already read that portion of the prospectus which speaks of the location. They proceed to say :

“From Callendar Station westward and throughout the whole of the Lake Superior section, the road runs through forests of valuable timber, which will furnish fuel and lumber for building purposes to settlers in the prairie country, and passes through valuable mineral lands abounding with silver, iron and copper ore.”

That is the encouraging description they now give of the eastern section. So that I believe I may apply to the western the observations they apply to the eastern; and what I have heard from the authenticated declaration of the leader of the Government as to the views of the Company in November last, that having given their contract a trial, I have heard that many millions were added to the price which the county will have to pay for the road. But we did not understand wait a little. We did not understand what we were doing, in making a contract prematurely for the whole of the line, particularly the eastern and western ends. Now as to the cost, we are not to know the facts; the Company declined to send down what they call sub-contracts for the construction of some works on the line. I have not had the opportunity of examining, since I saw the return made to the Commons on that subject, what the language of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act is. But I will remember that under that Act contracts for different parts of the work on the line were submitted to the approval of the House. The contention of the Company is that as they do not contract with anyone individual to complete the construction of the whole or any one part of the line, with any one to iron the road and build the line, but only with sub-contractors, they are not bound to produce those contracts. So Parliament and the country is being left in ignorance as to the cost of the prairie line. We find a general statement made as to the alignment and curves; and advertisements by the contractors that 2,400 cubic yards of embankment per mile is the average on the first 200 miles, and new contracts are called for 500 miles, and that to this extent the rest of the line will be equally favorable for a new road; that is, for the elevation of the road above the prairie, the work will be limited to 2,400 yards of embankment. So this is all that the Company have got to do in the way of roadwork, including the proper expense of raising the road above the prairie. I suppose that is as cheap a road to build above the surface of the ground as it is possible to conceive, and that our expectations of last year with reference to the cheapness of the prairie line will be more than realized, and that when we get to the facts—as some day doubtless we shall—we shall find that the cost was so insignificant that probably the Company will be able to construct the prairie line for less than their cash subsidy, while they are receiving 12,500 acres a mile and a certain quantity of cash bonds for the average line till they reach the Rocky Mountains. Then the prospects of the Company, as the hon. gentleman has said, are bright. The Company, in the paper to which I have referred, say :

“The 800 miles of road west of the Red River runs through one of the finest agricultural countries in the world, the settlement of which has been hitherto impeded by the want of railway facilities, but is now making rapid progress. It is estimated that 20,000 immigrants have arrived in the North-West during the past season. The country is a gently undulating prairie, well watered throughout. Wood is plentiful along the streams, and the soil is uniformly deep and rich, and fully equal to the best agricultural lands in any part of the United States. Practical farmers reckon a moderate average crop of 28 bushels wheat, 49 barley, and 56 oats per acre. The wheat commonly grown, and known as ‘No. 1 hard,’ commands a higher price than the ordinary quality of wheat. The soil is also exceptionally favorable to the growth of potatoes, turnips, etc.”

Then they refer to independent testimony, to which the hon. gentleman has also alluded. As to the traffic expected, we have the advantages pointed out as follows :—

“As to the local traffic to be developed along the line, there is no good reason to doubt that the earnings of the entire road, as the country becomes settled will be as good as those of roads in the United States similarly situated. The gross earnings of the following roads for the nine months ending 30th September, were—

	Per Mile.
On the Chicago & North-Western.....	$5,561
On the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul.....	3,737
On the Central Pacific.....	6,304
On the Union Pacific.....	5,506
On the Northern Pacific (incomplete).....	3,271

“And on the portion of road operated by the Company in the North-West, since 1st May last, the total gross earnings for the six months ending 31st October, were $424,000.”

That is the view which the Company presents to the people as to the prospects with reference to traffic when the road is completed and as the settlement of the country goes on. While this prospectus was sending forth these advantages, it is remarkable for omitting certain important advantages given to the Company, which they stipulated for and on which they insisted, as that hon. gentleman told us, as a condition of their entering upon the contract without a larger sum—the question of monopoly, exemptions from taxation and other benefits. The estimate of the Government the year previous, for the work which the Company is now to construct, when preparing to construct it as a Government work, reached but 48½ millions of dollars. Now, having stated that he has found everything more favorable than he expected, including the reduced estimates for the British Columbia sections, that much less is to be paid for various sections, including contracts between Winnipeg and Thunder Bay, it is not unreasonable to conclude that, if there be any difference in the figures and calculations it will bear in the same improved direction, and that, therefore, 48½ millions will be diminished instead of increased. But, supposing it to remain as it stands, the position of the Company is that, having to build for 48½ millions they get the cash subsidy of $25,000,000, and have mortgaged their land grant for 25 millions more, which it is said, is being rapidly disposed of. Although the first lot of bonds of $10,000,000 was sold at 90, I suppose to initiate the operation, the others are being disposed of at par; so a sum approximating $25,000,000 is to be realized by the mortgage of those lands, and, therefore, they will get a sum equivalent to the amount required for the construction of the balance of the works of the Company. Add to that the proceeds of the land grant bonds, and you get enough to do all that which the Company has contracted to do, and you find them possessed of the whole railway, and the surplus value of the lands, whatever that may be. Then the hon. gentleman has not adverted to the value of the question of the value of the lands in any particular form on this occasion; but we have got various estimates of their value from which we may form some conclusion as to their value to the Company. We have got, for example, the Government themselves, who, to-day, advertise odd sections in districts not extremely remote from the railway, but not as advantageously situated on the average as the railway lands at $2.50 an acre, and we have their advertisement of other lands in Birtle and other districts, not so well situated in point of location, but of better soil, at $2 an acre. The Hudson's Bay Company are selling their lands in a very remote district, the furthest for which they have made arrangements to sell at all, at from $6 to $7 an acre. We find besides that, the question of the Colonization Companies. I was amused, the night after the debate on the land policy of the Government, to get a note from a gentleman at Winnipeg saying that the chief person concerned in one of the new colonization companies had just been up there offering the townships which the company had under charter, for $2.50 an acre. All these statements prove the value of the lands, and we know the lands alongside the railway are being reserved, as well as all those with special advantages; and we know a very large sum, many hundreds of thousands of dollars have been made by the Company in the town of Brandon, that at their stations large sums have been made, and that the system has been adopted by which the Company obtained practically nearly all the advantage to be derived from the lands adjoining their stations, which, if the present excitement continues, and the sales around the stations pay anything like those at Brandon and other places, they will go far to implement the cost to the railway section on the prairie. There can be no doubt whatever that beyond the receipts of the mortgage on their lands which the Company have made by their land grant bonds, there is an asset of enormous value coming into the Company in these lands. So that they being able with the subsidy and the mortgage on their lands to do all the work on the railway, they will be competent to obtain the railway and many other millions of dollars from the redemption of the lands. The hon. gentleman adverted to these events. He proposed to deal with them, one after another, and he evinced his unfamiliarity with the Lord's Prayer by telling us how much it puzzled him to recollect it and his familiarity with other words of expressions of an opposite character, when he spoke of my devilish ingenuity and my hon. friend's devilish ingenuity in drawing up and proposing these amendments. These amendments show the defects in this contract. I cannot pretend to the credit of having exclusively prepared them; I had a hand in the preparing of them, and voted for them heart and hand, and am as responsible for them as if every word had been written by myself. The hon. gentleman referred to those amendments in a manner which it seems to me is deserving of some attention. In the first place, he likened my hon. friend from Westmoreland and said the amendment he proposed that tenders should be asked for, was one that could only be proposed by a Rip Van Winkle. There are some points, of course, in which the experience of the year cannot give light at all; there are some in which the experience of one year is not sufficient to give light, and there are others in which the experience of the year can give a good deal of light. As to this it does not depend upon the experience of the year at all. The proposition of my hon. friend was a wholly reasonable one. We thought it reasonable then and think so now. Nothing that has happened in that year can alter the grounds of attack on or sustaining that amendment. The hon. gentleman contends it was unreasonable and improper because first of all tenders had been invited; of course tenders had been invited for the construction of the railway some time before, but under conditions so different that it is not possible to make any comparison between the two schemes. The old scheme under which tenders had been invited was substantially, with some modifications, the original scheme of the previous Government; the old business of $30,000,000 cash and 50,000,000 acres of land.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. A little more than that.

Mr. BLAKE. There are more lands and less money.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). And more money too.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think so. I think it is on the same general lines; the scheme of the hon. gentleman had turned out abortive. It was suggested that large inducements would be required, and the proposal of my hon. friend to insert those large inducements passed through without the slightest objection. What did the hon. gentleman say in 1880 or 1879, when he discussed this Bill. He said the whole aspect of affairs had changed since the previous Government had been called on to consider the question; he said, on the former occasion, there were difficulties that did not then exist and that the position of things had entirely changed. Far different from his attitude to-night, he then declared that during the five years in which the Government of my hon. friend was concerned in this matter the work done was of great consequence and importance, and that the progress made towards Winnipeg was of much more consequence than construction of British Columbia, and placed the scheme in a much more favorable light than hitherto. The hon. gentleman said to-day, in a vain glorious way, that when the late Government went out of office there was not a mile of road in operation, and that this season there will be 905 miles running. Somebody must begin railway construction. A period of a year elapses before the railway is fit to be used through a difficult country. Although the work was going on, and the hon. gentleman gave due and reasonable credit to the Government for it, although the work was going on, I think many years before, the hon. gentleman does not choose to give any credit for it, and yet but for the exertions made by my hon. friend, but for the work that was done and for the progress made during those various years, there would not have been 905 miles; nay, there would not have been ninety-five miles running at this time. That is due to those exertions, due to those works carried on under great difficulties and when the country was in a different condition, that the hon. gentleman can make the boast he has made. But to refer to this question of tenders. I say both the conditions are different and the condition of the country wholly different. The hon. gentleman himself in 1880 said: Don't you know the condition of the whole country has changed? "Don't you know that whereas you offered this work for contract and advertised it everywhere and could not get a single offer, if I were to advertise tomorrow for a week I could get offers for it? Don't you know everything has changed now and the old things have become new?" But in 1878, he says: "Oh, it was advertised for in 1878;" and the contract was advertised in 1878 under these different conditions of the country, different state of the foreign market, different value of railway securities—because it was advertised for under wholly different conditions, that is a sufficient excuse for our not advertising for tenders under these new conditions. Whoever heard, whoever supposed, whoever dreamed of such a thing as that there was to be an expenditure of $58,000,000? Nobody supposed it. I need not go over all the other conditions; they have been gone over again and again; but it can be shown that in twenty important particulars the conditions upon which the hon. gentleman let the contract differed from the conditions under which, up to that time, any tender had been asked for or any tender authorized. Next the hon. gentleman says: "Oh, but we did advertise for tenders." He refers me again to the political pic-nic held at Bath, at which the leader of the Government said to his friends that the Government had under consideration at that moment two offers from capitalists, with reference to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that they might depend upon it—the contractors would go on. He says this was an advertisement for tenders. The whole country is always watching when the First Minister speaks, every contractor is watching—I do not doubt but that every contractor is watching—everybody interested in public works is watching; his words are weighed, and this was better than a thousand advertisements in newspapers that a Minister should say at a political pic-nic that the Government had under consideration two offers—not made under tender—but two offers for the construction of the railway, so that he advertised for tenders. But on what terms was this advertisement made? Did he say, did he dream of them at the time? No, he did not; he had no idea at the time of these terms. Did he say they were going themselves to finish the road on the British Columbia section? Did he say they were going to give some $53,000,000, plus the value of the surveys and the other risks? Was that talked of? Was it thought of? Were the monopolies thought of? Were all these exceptional conditions in the slightest degree talked of at the time? No, Sir, not at all. Therefore, it is preposterous to talk of this or anything like an opportunity to the public to tender. The hon. gentleman says that it was hardly worth while to take exception on that ground. Well, I think it was quite worth while: The policy of Parliament, which policy had been the subject of discussion for years, had been that the work was to be let, if let at all, by tender. We had gone to the elections, and no person had raised their voice against the adoption of that policy. We had come back, and there that policy remained in the Statute Book, and the hon. gentleman says: We will prefer the plan of private bargain, of private negotiations—although he admitted a year before that he could not advertise for tenders successfully—and we will depart from the policy of Parliament ratified by the popular voice that the contract should be let by tender only. The Government could not let a contract for a section of the Pacific Railway without advertisement; it could not let a contract for any public work without advertisement under special conditions which are prescribed in the Act of Parliament according to what emergencies may arise. They could not have let this work in that way without violating the law. They acknowledged it was in excess of their powers the course they took, and I say that not merely the extraordinary conditions which are embodied in the instrument, but also the events which took place upon the presentation to the public of this contract that these terms indicated, proved and demonstrated that the result of giving an opportunity to the public to tender upon the terms which the Government decided would be acceptable, the general basis of principle and action would have been to effect an enormous saving to the people of this country; and therefore as we maintained last year, so we maintain to day that it would have been proper at that time, when Parliament had this whole subject before it, when we were free to say yes or no, instead of declaring that this contract should be implemented, to declare that the Canadian Pacific contract should be a subject of public advertising and tender. Then the hon. gentleman says that the resolution of my hon. friend for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) was one which ought not to have been adopted. I believe that resolution to be perfectly sound. The hon. gentleman in the first place, in the recital in the statement of facts in this resolution, says: "That prior to and during the general election it was the policy of all parties that arrangements for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be such as the resources of the country should permit without increasing the former rates of taxation, and that the work should be let only after tenders." I stated a while ago that the Canadian Pacific Railway Act was the settled policy at the time of the last general election. The Canadian Pacific Railway Act was not impeached by hon. gentlemen opposite on their appeal to the people, it remained the embodiment of the common sense of Parliament and was, in fact, ratified by the people as to the general sense in which this question should be disposed of—I do not mean in minor details, in small matters, but in the large fundamental and vital principles it was disposed of. It was certainly not incapable of being altered by Parliament, but it was a matter which ought not to be altered without the gravest cause and without an opportunity for the people to speak upon it. In the particular as to taxes the hon. gentleman has repeated the statement he has so often made upon that subject, but which is wholly incorrect. In the first place, the resolution deals with a condition of things prior to and during the general election. Now, Sir, in the year 1876, it was resolved, as I have often pointed out before, by Parliament, that the arrangements for the construction of this railway should be such as could be accomplished without further increasing the existing rates of taxation. This resolution, as I have often pointed, was reached by a vote of this House unanimously, with the exception of ten dissentients. There were but ten including my hon. friend from British Columbia, and three or four more who dissented from the proposition. It was the common sense of Parliament. It remained unimpeached during the next Session. It remained unimpeached at the election; no one, I ever heard of, was found to raise his voice against that proposal, no matter for a moment whether the rate of taxation had been raised or not. I will deal with that matter presently. During the tenure of office of my hon. friend from Lambton, it had not been raised since the passage of this resolution, and that resolution declared that the votes of taxation should not be further raised, and it was practically adopted with unanimity. I believe that it was adopted with unanimity in the country; I believe that throughout the country, no man could have been returned—outside of British Columbia—who would have gone before his constituents and opposed the resolution, and declared it was wrong to have carried it; and "if you return me to Parliament, I shall favor increasing the rates of taxation in order to build the Pacific Railway." I believe that no man who would have ventured to propound that policy would have been returned, and I believe that no candidate did propound that policy outside of British Columbia; and therefore I say it is correct, and in accordance with the facts, that this proposition which in 1878 was adopted, and which in subsequent Sessions was continued, remained the policy of this country at the elections. It was the policy, and it was then the settled policy of Parliament and the country; but the hon. gentleman is very fond of alluding to the circumstance, that there was an increase in the taxation. Well, there was an increase in the taxation. But I pointed out in the debate in 1880, what the actual facts with reference to this were. Sir, the position that was taken in reference to taxation in 1871, was that the then existing rates of taxation were to be raised. Subsequently in the year 1871 the then existing rates of taxation were lowered very considerable, and the change that was made by my hon. friend beside me was a change which did not do much more in its results than bring the votes of taxation up to what they were at the time of the bargain with British Columbia.

Mr. BOWELL. He did not raise them for that purpose. He raised them for no other purpose except to get more money.

Mr. BLAKE. Why, I am now pointing out that the original bargain was, that certain then existing rates of taxation should have been increased, and this was the resolution of the House, but after that, the rates of taxation were lowered. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but they were. They were lowered; and after that time, they were lowered; but before you can ascertain what the real cause of taxation for this purpose was, you must take into account this fact. Now, I went into a calculation in 1880, and I said this:

"Allowing for the temporary duties imposed in 1870, and taken off in 1871, by a proceeding which came into operation prior to the date of the taxation resolution, the rate of taxation on the imported goods, free and dutiable, which were consumed in the four years from 1867 to 1871 was, upon the average, 13.90 per cent. This then, I take it, to be a fair ascertainment of the burden of our Customs' taxation in 1871. But I may say that, even if you make no allowance for the temporary duties to which I have referred, the average rate will be raised only to 14.21 per cent., an increase which you will see is not sufficient materially to affect the results. During the subsequent years (1872, 1873 and 1874), in the course of which there were considerable remissions of taxation, and in which also the very large consumption may have somewhat disturbed the relation between the quantities of free and dutiable goods, the average rate fell to 12.33 per cent. In 1875, the first completed year after the increase made under the late Government, the rate was 14.32 per cent., a larger increase indeed, an increase of nearly one-sixth, on the average of the preceding three years, but after all a very trifling increase, an increase of only one thirty-third, on the average rate between 1868 and 1871."

So that the increase which my hon. friend made, as he stated, was a considerable increase. Undoubtedly it was a considerable increase. It was a considerable increase over the then existing rates of taxation, but it was not a considerable increase over the rates of taxation as they existed at the time when the resolution with British Columbia was ratified. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that it was all wrong to propose that the people should have an opportunity of speaking on this subject. But I do not agree with him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him. Is this true or false: "In order to enable the Government to carry out the proposals which it was hoped that the British Columbia Government would have accepted, the average rate of taxation was raised at the late Session about 15 per cent." Is that true or false? Because, if for the purpose of carrying out the agreement concerning the Pacific Railway, the average rate of taxation was increased 15 per cent., and increased to over three millions—and no person will pretend that we had lowered the rate of taxation more than two millions per annum. Was there or was there not an increase of one million per annum over and above the rate which existed at the time that the engagement was made in the British Columbia?

Mr. BLAKE. I have given, Sir, the exact results of the increase, as I have ascertained them from the books. The hon. gentleman has always declared that the taxation was increased three millions a year, but he knows perfectly well—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The minutes of Council say so.

Mr. BLAKE. That while this was the estimated result of the change in the taxation, it was not the actual result.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But was it the policy of the Government?

Mr. BLAKE. I am not talking about policy, Sir.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear!

Mr. BLAKE. I say it was not the result. I have shown you how the rate of taxation was increased. It was increased very much. It was increased from an average rate of 12 odd to an average rate of 14 odd per cent. It was increased very heavily over the rate as it had been during the preceding years; but what I say and what the hon. gentleman will never choose to take into account is, that it was not sensibly increased beyond the rate as it existed at the time of the bargain with British Columbia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say it was, most certainly.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, I have shown the figures, which have never been controverted.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that we reduced the rate of taxation more than two millions per annum; and yet the late Government declares here to the British Government, who was informed of it by the whole of his colleagues, that the increase in the taxation was to the extent of three millions per annum, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, if we did not reduce the taxation over two millions, and if you increased it three millions, there was clearly an increase of one million per annum at the very least for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. BLAKE. I have shown quite distinctly, Mr. Speaker, more than once, that while it was estimated that it would, it did not produce three millions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is another story, altogether, it has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BLAKE. Allow me to retain my own opinion. What is spoken of in the resolution shows that the burden of taxation had been increased.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. What is spoken of in the resolution is, that it has always been the policy of the Government and has not increased the rate of taxation.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not speaking of that resolution.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I thought that you were defending the resolution.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman interpolated the word "always."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; it is there.

Mr. BLAKE. Will you show where it is?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It sets out that "prior to" it was the policy.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman said it was there when he interpolated it; it is not there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say it is there. I say that the spirit of it is there.

Mr. BLAKE. That the spirit of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say it is there—the spirit is there.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, the spirit. Now, Sir, it is perfectly clear that the increase in the rate of taxation as it was at that time and as it stood under the taxation which had been imposed by my hon. friend, amounted to not more than one-thirty-third of the whole cost of paying this enormous sum. My hon. friend spoke only of the period prior to and during the elections which is covered by the passage of the legislation unanimously agreed to by Parliament, I think in the year 1876, since which time there has been no dissent from that proposition. Then the hon. gentleman says: "Oh, you wanted an election, but you are not so anxious for an election now as you were." We wanted an election then in order that the people might have an opportunity of deciding whether this bargain should be made or not. We wanted an election then in order that the people might have an opportunity of deciding for themselves whether this enormous burden of these tremendous stipulations should be imposed on the country. We wanted then to choose the policy to be given to the people, while the people might choose, and the hon. gentleman says now you do not talk now about having an election. Why, Sir, we perfectly understand all this talk about an election. If the hon. gentleman is going to hold them this year the reason is that he knows next year will be less favorable to him—that the ordinary time of holding an election will expose still more than to-day the fallacies, the errors, the mistakes, the blunders of this rule. It is because he believes it is dangerous to delay—that he says to the hon. First Minister, "what thou doest do quickly." I agree with him that he will be weaker next year than he is to-day; that the longer he sits there the weaker will he be; that the longer his policy is in force, the longer time is given to prove it, the worse will it appear. There are many things concealed and half understood to-day which will be fully revealed and brought to light in the course of time, and that revelation and the full discussion of these things will weaken his position. He is right, he is wise in his own generation when he thinks it is dangerous to wait. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that the motion of my hon. friend who sits beside me (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) was a motion which he will not lay on my shoulders because it required the peculiar—I think devil-may-care recklessness were the parliamentary words he used—of my hon. friend. What does that resolution say. As to the money it says: "The contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway involves a total expenditure by the country in connection with that work of about $60,000,000, exclusive of interest." Now, how near is that correct? In the first place we have a paper lately brought down by the Government, a Minute of Council, with reference to the application of the Province of British Columbia, for compensation.

Mr. BUNSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to read a previous minute for the information of the House and particularly of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster). Amongst other things I find this statement, that the contract which has been let within the last year involves an expenditure of about $53,000,000 in money. Well, we all know how the $53,000,000 is arrived at, and I quote this passage to show that we are not far apart, with regard to that. The $53,000,000 is based on the $25,000,000 subsidy and the $28,000,000 for works, but it leaves out the amount for surveys which is stated in another part of this very minute to be about three and a half millions; it leaves out the Canada Central subsidy, the telegraphs, and these items added to the $53,000,000, make an amount approximating $60,000,000. I now wish to read a statement which will be interesting to the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster). The House will recollect that the hon. Minister of Railways has repeatedly insisted, when it served his purpose on the proposition that the action of the late Government had created a binding obligation on this country between it and the Imperial Government, to do all the things which were specified in the award known as the Carnarvon Terms. He has since and again declared that the result of the action of the late Government was to create that obligation and if even he had to justify something of his with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway he said: "Consider what you bound the country to, consider the contract you made by the Carnarvon Terms." Now, let us hear what the Minister of the Privy Council says about those terms:

"Lord Carnarvon's suggestions were entitled to every respect, but although adopted by the Government of the day, they never received the sanction of the Parliament of the Dominion, and never acquired the force of a national compact. On the contrary, in the Session of 1875, with the view of seeking to give effect to these terms, a Bill having been introduced by the Government into the Canadian House of Commons providing for the construction of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo line, a step which would not have been necessary, it may be observed, had that line formed necessarily a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Bill, though passed by the House of Commons, was lost in the Senate, and consequently Parliamentary sanction was refused to the construction of what was regarded by the majority in the Senate as a Provincial work quite unnecessary to the fulfilment of the terms of Union with British Columbia."

So that the hon. gentleman will see that his friends in the Government have declared that the Carnarvon terms required the sanction of Parliament, and that never having, acquired that sanction they had no force.

Mr. BUNSTER. I believe that the hon. gentleman while he was Minister of Justice, and consequently the instructor of the Government, they accepted the Carnarvon arbitration.

Mr. BLAKE. Not much.

Mr. BUNSTER. I have not the documents with me just now, but I will take an opportunity later on of proving it; and if the present Government have ignored the Carnarvon terms it is no fault of British Columbia or of its representatives.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say so. I am only pointing out to the hon. gentleman another reason for reposing confidence in the Government. Then, Sir, we were told by the British Columbians that we were guilty of impropriety and low, illiberal and narrow-minded conduct in making allusions to the financial results between that Province and the Dominion at large. Business-like, we were sordid enough to state the amount of the expenditures in and the receipts from that Province, and to strike a balance which was not wholly favorable to it, and the hon. gentleman and others were indignant because we adopted that book-keeper's manner of dealing with public matters; but our bad example in that respect has been followed, for I find this in the minutes:

"It will be seen by official statements hereto annexed, that our expenditure in the Province since it entered the Union has been made by the Dominion Government of $5,996,289, against which the receipts have been $4,173,238, and this expenditure is entirely irrespective of disbursements on account of the railway."

And then we find a "Statement of payments in the Province of British Columbia from 1871 to 1880 inclusive, with exception of payments made on account of Pacific Railway, as prepared by the Financial Inspector:

Year 1871-72.....	$481,330

1876-77.....	681,736
1877-78.....	668,685
1878-79.....	682,344
1879-80.....	635,311
	$5,996,289

Statement of receipts in the Province of British Columbia from the year 1871 to 1880, inclusive, as prepared by the Financial Inspector:

Year 1871-72.....	$356,099
1872-73.....	381,711
1873-74.....	387,146
1874-75.....	455,914

So that the same course which met with such strong reprobation on the former occasion has been followed, and the same account struck, with similar results, only that the debit balance is larger. Now, my hon. friend, after dealing with the $60,000,000, proceeds to deal with the $79,500,000, as the value of the land, making the total estimated cost $140,000,000. Well, that is not disputed; we have it in the report of the Minister of Interior; we have their own prices, with this exception, that while these statements apply to the average value of the lands along the line, and within a wider distance from the Pacific Railway, the average in this case ought to be higher, inasmuch as all these lands are choice lands. The statement, therefore, is a consideration of $140,000,000, while the road itself, as estimated by the Government, cost no more than $84,000,000. That also is true; that is the hon. gentleman's own statement. In point of fact, he said that he only estimated $82,000,000, but that Mr. Fleming, with his usual caution, had added $2,000,000 more. We take the figures in the most unfavorable way for our calculation, based on the Government's own estimates and acknowledged facts, and we deduce certain conclusions, which were embodied in the resolution which the hon. gentleman declares shows a devil-may-care recklessness. And what is his answer? He does not deny that he estimated the class of road we are getting to cost $84,000,000, but he says: "The year before, you made an estimate of $121,000,000; I know it was entirely erroneous, but you made it, and I adopted it." Well, we have a score of times pointed out that that estimate of $121,000,000 was the aggregate estimate of the engineers and officers of the Government, based on their view of what was to be the cost of the class of line proposed. If that estimate was erroneous, it was not our fault; I could not form a judgment, the hon. member for Lambton could not form a judgment, the hon. gentleman himself could not form a judgment of what the cost would be; but the estimates of the engineers were taken, and these figures were arrived at from their statements. But at the time that estimate was given, it was pointed out that it did not apply to the hon. gentleman's proposal; it was pointed out that the same engineer who had estimated the cost at $121,000,000, was the same man who was now estimating a total cost of $84,000,000. The hon. gentleman brings down a report from his engineer that he can cut down the cost to $82,000,000 by degrading the road; that was his own statement. I do not question these estimates for that class of road; it is simply a question of Mr. Fleming's and Mr. Smith's estimates of one year as to one class of road, and their estimates the next year as to a road of a wholly different class. Then the hon. gentleman went over the old ground about the lands; he says, "take those 54,000,000 acres which the hon. member for Lambton proposed to give and I will value them at what you like, and value these 25,000,000 acres the same." Time and again we have pointed out that that 54,000,000 acres was land to be taken along the whole line, and therefore in British Columbia as well as in the North-West territories, that it was not to be choice land, but the average land along the whole line, and that it was to be taken from a much greater distance from the main line, the nearer the railway the more valuable the land, and the farther away the less valuable. Then there is the element of time in fixing the value of the lands. The hon. gentleman who said in 1880 that much had been done to render this enterprise possible and to enhance the value of the lands, will not regard the element of time, but says that if that land was worth $5.00 an acre a year ago, we must not rate it at any more than that to-day, and yet the hon. gentleman said to-day that land in Winnipeg that was worth $100 when the late Government went out could not be bought to-day for $100,000.

Mr. BOWELL. What has given value to the land?

Mr. BLAKE. The enormous and lavish subsidies which the Government has given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, by which it is enabled to construct that railway through the prairies, the whole cost of which we give them in cash, and give them the land besides.

Mr. BOWELL. Suppose the road was built under your regime, would it not have the same effect?

Mr. BLAKE. I pointed out that railway access had already been obtained by the Pembina Branch, and that it was about to be obtained by the Thunder Bay Branch into the country, and that it was quite plain that the expenditure of $100,000 would give you a hundred miles into the prairie. It is quite clear that it did not want this contract to give value to the land; the large preliminary expenses on the railway would give it the railway value; and it is plain that it had a larger value at the later than it had at the earlier date. Then the hon. gentleman says that my hon. friend from Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) moved a resolution which he would argue was a premature resolution. Now, the hon. member for Sunbury's motion is, I think, a perfectly good motion still. The hon. gentleman's resistance to that motion which was based upon a proposition which can well justify my hon. friend from Sunbury in supposing that he omitted to look at his words, including "in British Columbia," because the whole of his argument was based upon the advantages that had resulted to Canada in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the prairies; and therefore he would argue apparently that the motion against any construction was a premature or improper one. But my hon. friend's objection was to the construction of the road at that time in British Columbia. He did not object, not a single man on this side objected to the construction of the road that would give value to the North-West—that on the prairies. We wanted it, and we wanted the freedom of the prairie country and of its lines preserved. We wanted them constructed without monopolies, without exemptions, without the country being fettered and bound and taxed unnecessarily for the construction of unnecessary ends. The member for Sunbury objected to the road in British Columbia as premature, and the Minister of Railways has answered him by saying that 21,000 emigrants were expected, some make the number 23,000, 24,000 or 25,000—there is great diversity on the point. Where are the people going—is it to Winnipeg and the North-West or to British Columbia. My hon. friend from Vancouver knows it is the Chinese that are coming into British Columbia, and the Minister of Railways will not insult him by saying that they are desirable or of advantage to the country.

Mr. BUNSTER. Allow me to say British Columbians never intended to sell themselves to the Chinese Government. If they made the mistake of leaving the old flag and joining the Dominion flag, they thought the Dominion would do them justice. But we do not consider it is doing us justice in allowing the Chinese to interfere with our happy homes. Our Local Legislature and the United States with 50,000,000 have pronounced against them. I am not sure whether the member for West Durham was the Minister of Justice or not, or whether it was the present Minister of Justice, who pronounced our Act illegal.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The present Government, of course.

Mr. BUNSTER. I am rather inclined to think it was, and it is not very creditable to them either; and they have got to take warning that it will be the next plank in their platform, and that out of office they will go.

Mr. BLAKE. The Minister of Railways, in answer to the member for Sunbury pointed to the emigration to Manitoba as if that had been produced by the work between Kamloops and Emory's Bar, and he spoke of the $4,000,000 of cash brought in by the emigrants and of the applications of colonization companies for 24,000,000 acres in the North-West as if they had anything to do with the British Columbia works. Were any lands asked for in British Columbia by colonization companies, to interfere with the hon. gentleman from Victoria? Not at all. Those companies all made for Manitoba and the North-West. Then the Minister of Railways replied that the Government could receive in a week from such companies for land the whole $25,000,000 to be paid the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Well, we all know those companies do not pay their $1 an acre down, but only one-third; so that the hon. gentleman's statement about the receipt of $25,000,000 from the sale to companies of 25,000,000 acres, in a week if desired, when those companies were to pay only 20 cents an acre, seemed very surprising.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say that. What I said was that already 23,000,000 acres had been applied for by companies, and within a week the amount would reach 25,000,000, at the rate at which applications were coming in, and that at $1 an acre the amount would reach $25,000,000. I said the amount paid down would be one-fifth.

Mr. BLAKE. There is a difficulty on our part, it would seem, in apprehending the meaning of the hon. gentleman. But he went further in reply to the member for Sunbury, who contended the construction of the road in British Columbia just to show how wrong he was. He said: "I will give him another proof, accumulative proof of how wrong the argument of the member for Sunbury is, and what is my next? That the Customs dues have largely increased at the port of Burrard Inlet or New Westminster."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. But that is not what the hon. gentleman said. He spoke of the increase at Winnipeg. I am dealing of the way in which he metaphorically knocked down my hon. friend for Sunbury, and I am showing that he was proving him to be wrong in saying that the construction of the road in British Columbia was premature, for, forsooth, the Customs dues in Winnipeg, not at all affected by the work of Emory's Bar and Kamloops, had increased largely in the last few months. Then the hon. gentleman asserted that great attention had been excited on the part of Great Britain and the United States, and, I think he said, on the part of the whole civilized world, with that grandiloquence of language which besets him, and that was due to what? To the building in British Columbia of 127 miles of railway? Not a bit of it; what has attracted the attention of the world is the North-West, and the magnificent article the hon. gentleman sent from the Post, which in general does not circulate largely among the emigrating classes, and other articles to which he refers relate to the North-West. My hon. friend from Vancouver knows that they speak of the fertility of the soil of the grand rolling prairies, and of the thousands of miles of railway spreading through the country. They speak of the grain to be raised, not on the Pacific slope but on the prairies and to be sent by the Atlantic seaboard to England and the Old World. These are the conditions of the excitement and attention abroad with reference to the North-West. Then the hon. gentleman spoke of a speech of Mr. Beck, of Kentucky. I do not think he said much about British Columbia or Kamloops or Emory's Bar, but he spoke of the North-West.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did the hon. gentleman hear what he did say—that the great Canadian Pacific Railway would soon be finished to the Pacific, so soon as to attract the trade of China and India, which now goes over the United States Pacific. Does that refer to British Columbia or the North-West?

Mr. BLAKE. It does not refer to the development of British Columbia, but to the transcontinental effect of our railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Beck was speaking of the trans continental effect, and the hon. gentleman denied it.

Mr. BLAKE. I was talking of the prairies.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman contended that Mr. Beck had spoken with reference to British Columbia, and not with reference to the prairie section. I have shown the hon. gentleman that Mr. Beck has drawn the attention of the Senate of the United States to the fact that the construction of this great railway was going to give us a position of such importance as to attract the attention of leading gentlemen in the United States.

Mr. BLAKE. When I was telling of what Mr. Beck said, I was speaking of that development of the country itself, which had taken place under the impulse as it was alleged by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I was not speaking of the trans continental character of the road at all. The hon. gentleman said there would be 30,000 people in by the 1st of May; his leader said there would be 20,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. More than 20,000 have gone in since the 1st January.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course there are the figures, but those people are not all settlers. We know that hundreds and thousands are going into Manitoba who have no intention of settling there, but are attracted by that land craze of which the hon. Minister of Interior spoke the other day. Has the hon. Minister of Customs said anything?

Mr. BOWELL. No; I was only thinking aloud.

Mr. BLAKE. When the hon. gentleman thinks aloud he thinks something, though it may mean nothing. The hon. Minister says that under the colonization plans, thousands of settlers will come in, and for the purpose of determining the financial condition of the country with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, presumes that 20,000,000 acres are disposed of; but we have the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior that 10,000,000 acres is the extreme amount he expects to dispose of according to that scheme, but the hon. gentleman takes the applications and uses those figures to show what resources are available. Then the hon. gentleman yet comes down to hard pan, and gives a number of acres granted free up to 31st December. Much money would not be made out of them except in the way of increased revenue to the Customs Department. There are a certain number of pre-emptions and half-breed lands to which the same observation applies, and the sales amounted to 1,250,000 acres, yet the hon. gentleman made up a grand aggregate of 6,500,000 acres disposed of. The returns do not show a very large balance just now to the credit of the Government, after deducting expenses after the sales of land. The hon. gentleman speaks of the sales of Railway Company lands, and referred to the great quantity of goods sent during the last six months. Of course, you cannot have a very large number of immigrants coming in and you cannot have a country not able yet to produce sufficient for the support of its inhabitants, without having a large amount of goods coming in, and we must expect a very large importation of goods for some years to that country, if it is at all to progress. Then the hon. gentleman says all this has been fulfilled, not by increasing taxation, but by reducing it; he refers to the reduction made this Session, but omits the increase made before. The rate of taxation which before was a trifle over 14 per cent. has been run up to a trifle over 20 per cent. The rate of taxation had increased 30 or 40 per cent. under the hon. gentleman's Tariff. He adds on us a heavy burden and takes off a few pounds and then tells us we are doing all this work without increased taxation. The motion of the hon. member for Quebec East was, the hon. gentleman said, of no consequence, and why? Because what my hon. friend submitted in his motion was going to be done. The policy of the Administration was to have the railway in the interior, and not to have all railway communication for ten years. My hon. friend pointed out that by running to the south there would be railway communication within three years, and he suggested that ought to be done, and the remainder shall not be undertaken at present. The hon. gentleman has come to assume that position, for while he declares on his responsibility as a Minister that he has no information that the road from the Sault is at all practicable, he is making the main portion of the line the road to the Sault. My hon. friend's policy has been successful. What he suggested is to a large extent carried out, and we find the hon. Minister applauding as a statesmanlike policy the plan to go to Sault Ste. Marie as fast as possible. I think my hon. friend may well rejoice that so much of his views have been attended to, that by the course that is being pursued we are getting in a business-like way to the Sault Ste. Marie, which, as I have said before, is the key of the position, although we are paying an enormous sum for it, which we would not have paid had my hon. friend's motion prevailed, which we would not have paid had all the circumstances been known which at present are known; because, as I have pointed out, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company itself considered that this road is essential to the success of the whole line, and, therefore, we could not have been called upon to pay those enormous millions which we are called upon to pay to maintain that road for ten years, for it was necessary to the success of the Company, and need not have been subsidized by us. Then the hon. gentleman adverted to the motion of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and he dealt with that motion certainly in a way which surprised me. Now, Sir, the motion of my hon. friend from Bothwell was a declaration

"That the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, while it gives to the Company the right to build branch lines of railway from any point or points along their line to any point or points within the Dominion and cedes to the Company free all Government lands required in connection with such branches." Now, the hon. gentleman took up the parenthesis as the motion, and he attacked the parenthesis, he attacked the statement about the contract giving the right to build branch lines, as if that was my hon. friend's argument, as if that were the motion; and he said my hon. friend was estopped from saying anything about that because of his Coteau Railway Bill, but the hon. gentleman did not say a word about the rest of the motion. After that recital, my hon. friend's motion proceeds to say:

"The contract provides that for twenty years no line of railway shall be authorized by the Dominion Parliament, or by any new Province, to be constructed south of the Canadian Pacific Railway from any point at or near that railway, except such as shall run south-west or to the westward of south-west, nor to within fifteen miles of the boundary between the United States and Canada. The same contract cedes to the Company the only existing outlets to the North-West, namely, the Pembina Branch, being the outlet southward, and the Thunder Bay line, being the outlet eastward; the Company embrace the chief proprietors of the St. Paul & Manitoba Railway, the only present means of railway communication with the North-West; and thus not only is there no provision for securing competition, but there is provision for securing the Company against competition, and they are secured in a monopoly of the trade and traffic of the North-West for at least twenty years, and that the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable."

That was the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell, and that is the motion to which the hon. Minister addressed the argument that my hon. friend was estopped from saying anything about branch lines because he proposed a Colonization Bill to Parliament which was not carried. Not a word about monopoly, not a word in the speech about this provision in the contract which, as the hon. gentleman knows, was always one of our gravest objections to this whole contract, an object in which, however grave it was at the time, has become grave by lapse of time and by the transactions which have since taken place. Now we find the Company making an application upon this contract. Let me first of all ascertain how our objections were met. They were met by the First Minister, who declared in his speech:

"In order to give them a chance, we have provided that the Dominion Parliament—mind you the Dominion Parliament; we cannot check any other Parliament; we cannot check Ontario; we cannot check Manitoba—shall for the first ten years after the construction of the road, give their own road into which they are putting so much money and so much land, a fair chance of existence."

Well, the hon. member for Cardwell reinforced the same argument. What does he say:

"But we are told now that because of the fifteen miles there never can be any other railway into this country. To what does that apply? Simply to the territories over which the Dominion Parliament has control. There is nothing to prevent Manitoba now, if it thinks proper, granting a charter for a railway from Winnipeg to the boundary line. At this very moment there is a company in course of organization to build a railway from Winnipeg to West Lynne, on the boundary. And after this agreement is ratified, this provision does not take away from Manitoba a single right it possesses. In fact this Parliament could not take away those rights. It has the same rights as the other Provinces for the incorporation of railway companies within the boundary of the Province itself, and there is nothing to prevent the Province of Manitoba from chartering a railway from Winnipeg to the boundary to connect with any southern railway. The only guarantee which this company has under the contract is that their traffic shall not be tapped far west in the prairie section, thus directing the traffic away from their line to a foreign line, but there is nothing to prevent a railway being built in Manitoba within the Province that would carry the traffic to any railway that may tap it from the American side."

Such was the attitude taken by the leader of the Government, and such was the exposition which one of his ablest followers, an independent member of the House, gave on the faith of his statement. Such was the general understanding. Those of us who sit here on one side or the other, always assumed that was the result, and what we complained of was that the license, or whatever it might be, which was taken away from Manitoba was not a license or a liberty which was adequate, because it might be essential to the freedom of the territories and within the boundaries of Manitoba, and therefore that this supposed means of exit was an inadequate means of exit against the operation of the monopoly. The fifteen mile clause and the provision as to the west and south-west lines, does not in terms apply to Manitoba, it does not in terms apply to Ontario or any other Provinces, it applies only to territories under the control of the Dominion, and new Provinces formed out of such territories. Now, Sir, grave as were the objections to the fifteen mile and other restriction clauses, so limited by the Minister himself, they become infinitely graver according to the new interpretation that has been placed upon affairs by subsequent State papers. The hon. gentleman has dealt with the application from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That Company, in October last, called the attention of the Government to the passing of three Acts by the Manitoba Legislature, during the Session of 1881—the Act incorporating the Winnipeg and South-Western Railway, the Act called the Manitoba Tramway Act, and the Act called The Emerson and North-Western Railway Company's Act. The Company proceeds to say:

"The Board of Directors regard with extreme anxiety the granting of such powers to these companies. As you are aware, one of the most essential of the conditions upon which this Company undertook the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and more particularly of the eastern division of it extending from the Thunder Bay Branch to Callendar Station, was that no interference with the traffic which the Company might reasonably be expected to carry over that division, would be permitted by the construction of railways tending to tap the traffic of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, and to divert it into American channels. I need not remind you that before the execution of the contract with this Company, the Government had adopted a policy based upon the considerations which give rise to this condition, and had put in force on more than one occasion when charters for railway running to the international boundary came up for discussion in Parliament."

Now there is the first point, that there has been a policy adopted by the Government itself under former circumstances restrictive of the rights to build railways of this description. The second point is this:

"In the negotiations which preceded the contract your Government at once conceded the principle that the same protection which it would have claimed for itself, in respect of lines in the interest of United States railways, if it had built the Canadian Pacific Railway, should be granted to this Company."

There is the second point. Now let me deal with these two points, first, because they are the points based upon considerations outside the contract. The first one, that it was the policy of the Government formerly to permit the construction of railways in the North-West, but it was under an entirely different set of circumstances. First of all, we say while the Government itself was building and was about to run the Canadian Pacific Railway there can be no monopoly of a Government railway. There are no interests but the public interests to be secured. The question is not how high rates will be charged, but how low rates will be charged. There is no difficulty about rates in public service; there is no contract binding or fixed to prevent the construction of other lines. The influence which dominated the situation both as to service and the rates charged on the Government line, Session after Session, will also dominate the situation as to whether another line should be built. That is the state of things; and it is not at all unreasonable at any rate that, pending the arrangements for the Pacific Railway and the direction of the route, we will do so, but while it is wholly under the control of the Government, the Government should keep their hands free; but to allege that the same policy is of necessity to exist and to apply when the Government has wholly parted with its interest, when the road is in the hands of a private corporation, when private and not public interests govern, and when we are acting under the cast-iron terms of a 20 years agreement, which we cannot change from year to year as the public interests may require, to allege that during the existence of this policy we are to apply under such allowed circumstances the continuation and prolongation of the state of affairs which existed under Government management, is to use a wholly fallacious argument, to my mind. I will now deal with the statement. It has a most dangerous tendency. I am amazed to see it in this paper, that Company says "that in the negotiations which preceded the execution of this contract your Government at once conceded the principle, that the same protection which would have been claimed by itself in regard to lines connecting with United States railways should be granted to this Company," as much as to say we were dealing with these preceding negotiations; we were dealing with concessions of principle made by the Government; we were dealing with private understandings arrived at between the Government and the Company. No, Sir, but we were dealing with a written paper; we were dealing with a contract that was submitted. We were told that this was the result of long and painful and earnest negotiations which had lasted many months. The hon. gentleman told us, when we asked for papers, that we were not entitled to them. What were these papers? They concerned negotiations based on the statements of the day, pourparlers. We had nothing to do with them. They brought down the result. This was the conclusion of the whole matter. But it was not. It seems an understanding was arrived at between the Government and the Company, irrespective of what the contract was, that they should be given the same protection, acting on any principle that the Government would ensure and apply to itself, if the Government had kept this railway in their own hands, and so preserved the public from the dangers of a monopoly, and from the protection of private, in contradistinction with public interests, in running the railway. Now, Sir, I deny, I wholly deny that this Company has the least right to insist upon any understanding which was arrived at upon anything else than what appears upon the paper; and I maintain that the Government would have been guilty, has been guilty, as this statement as to the contract shows, of a grave breach of public duty in coming to any understanding, in making any arrangement, in coming to any view as to how they should exercise their powers as to what they should do in this matter, which was not embraced in the contract communicated to the House. Now, Sir, what is the meaning of this statement that the Government has given the same protection to this Company which it could itself have invoked? What is its meaning as applied to the circumstances of this case? That the veto power would be used. But if the contract had contained this provision, would the First Minister have been able to say: "We cannot check Ontario; we cannot check Manitoba," nor would the hon. member for Cardwell have been able to say that Manitoba is as free after it as it was before, to build other lines. What authority would there then have been for saying that the country was protected against the monopoly, the independent rights of Manitoba and Ontario being intact, if this had been in the contract; of course this would not have existed, and this would not have been said. But it was not in the contract, nothing was said to the contrary, and we had the right to interpret the contract. But now we are told we had no right to properly interpret the contract on the faith of the Act, which was the sole refuge against monopoly, and which was followed up and presented by the hon. First Minister. This is all to be put on one side because there was a preceding understanding, that whatever protection the Government could have, should be extended to this Company; that is to say, whatever protection the public could extend to the public, and give to itself, had they continued to own and run the Canadian Pacific Railway, was to be given to this Company, although it was not in the contract. What next? What other terms are we to hear of from day to day? Where are we to stand? On the contract? Not at all. But on something wholly different. There may have been verbal understandings. Perhaps there were written understandings. Perhaps there were secret understandings. Perhaps there were negotiations which have not been brought down. We have heard of secret articles in treaties, we have heard of secret articles in the treaty who was signed by the Government of the Premier's prototype. How the credit of that Government was enhanced by the secret articles that referred to Cyprus. That is to say: a bargain is to be made with a company; certain terms are put on paper; these terms are submitted to Parliament as a contract; the Parliament of the country and the people of the country are told that protection exists against monopoly, as private railway companies can be chartered, which will give competition; and then we are to be told a year afterwards, and when the contract has been made, that a private understanding existed all the time, that the veto power should be practically used to prevent competition. This is to be told something, Sir, which it is easier than it is parliamentary to properly characterize; and then, Sir, the directors says it is essential to the protection of the interests as well as of the rights of the Company, that the operations of the line along the section to the north of Lake Superior should be sustained by such other traffic as can reasonably be obtained for it in Manitoba and the North-West. This is their second statement, and I do not observe anything in this contention of the Company, speaking from a hurried glance into it, as to the express language of the contract giving them this right. I observe that they speak of these other reasons altogether, all they speak of is independent of the express language of the contract, and they have their claim on the other reasons to which I have referred, while the Engineer-in-Chief on the 28th of October, reporting on these charters, says that two of them give powers to their respective companies to run lines to the boundary between the Province of Manitoba and the State of Minnesota, "a provision, which undoubtedly conflicts with the spirit of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act," and he quotes section 20 of this Act. Here the Engineer departs alike from his duty and from the questions which he should consider. He proposes to construe a contract. He proposes to give a construction to a section of an Act of Parliament. He proposes to deal with that somewhat difficult question as to the spirit and letter of that Act of Parliament, and to deal with a great question of public policy which he says is not involved. I do not know, I am sure, how it was; but so it was, that he gave his legal opinion, that this conflicted undoubtedly with the spirit of the 20th section of the Act. Then comes the Minister of Railways, and the Minister says, that the Chief Engineer had reported that these several charters gave running powers to the boundary between the Province of Manitoba, which undoubtedly conflicts with the spirit of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act and section 20; and so he follows his engineer, not only in mere engineering matters, but also in the exposition of an Act of Parliament, which he himself heard his leader declare in this House, had no such effect at all. We were told that Manitoba was not interfered with, that the charter left that Province free, but the hon. gentleman adopts the statement of his engineer that the clause undoubtedly conflicts with the spirit of the 15th section. Then the hon. gentleman goes on to state:

"That during the Session of 1880, when the Government were carrying on the railway as a Government work, he was authorized by the Government, after the fullest discussion, on this question in all its bearings, to state to the Committee of the House of Commons on Railways and Canals, that the Government would not assent to the incorporation of any line running to the American frontier in an easterly direction, it being considered essential to the interests of the Dominion that the traffic of the North-West should, as far as possible, be retained on the Canadian Pacific Railway."

Then he speaks of the state of things to which I have adverted, and he goes on to say:

"That while such was the view taken in 1880, the importance of this policy became doubly manifest in 1881, when arrangements were completed for the construction of the new line running to the north of Lake Superior, and the same policy was adhered to last Session."

But if it were doubly manifest in 1881, why did we not hear of it? Why was it not in the contract? Why was it not in the Act of Parliament? Why is it that we are told that the policy has been departed from: that Manitoba was free and had power to build lines which would be a check upon the monopoly.

"For the reason above stated, he is of opinion that the best interests of Canada would be imperilled by the construction of the proposed lines of rail communication, and, therefore, recommends that His Excellency the Governor General be advised to disallow the Act of the Legislature of the Province of Manitoba."

Well, of course, it is a large thing to do all at once, and the Government determines that they would dispose of the charters one by one, and they began with the Winnipeg and Great Eastern, and that one was referred, I presume, to the Minister of Justice. He reports with regard to the 20 year clause and he says that possibly railways might run through the new territory of Manitoba, and he proceeds to call attention to the Order in Council of the 18th April, 1879, which speaks of certain arrangements made by Mr. Norquay and Mr. Royal, who, I suppose, is the present member for Provencher. He says:

"The Government will oppose the granting of a charter for the present Session, at least, for any Railway in Manitoba other than the other recommended by them from Winnipeg, south-westerly towards Rock Lake. The Government think it very desirable that all railway legislation shall originate here, and that no charter for a line exclusively within the Province of Manitoba should be granted by its Legislature without the Dominion Government first assenting thereto."

These hon. gentlemen, the Prime Minister and a leading member of the Government of the Province of Manitoba, it is said, agreed in 1879 to this policy. But this was a policy ulterior to this contract at a time when the proposition was to construct the railway as a Government work. These two gentlemen agreed, as far as they were concerned, to abrogate the rights of their Province to independent legislation; they agreed that no railways should be authorized there, unless the Dominion Government assented to them. We do not hear, however, that that agreement was brought to the Legislature of that Province, that the people were told of it, but we found only that two Ministers of that Government assented to a suggestion of this description. The hon. gentleman proceeds to express a doubt

"which exists as to the power of a Provincial Legislature to authorize the construction of a railway, the manifest intention of which is to connect the Province with the United States, and practically to extend beyond the limits of the Province."

Now, you may talk of the manifest intention, but we are not going to disallow of a local legislation on account of what the hon. gentleman calls a manifest intention. The Local Legislature has only the undisputable powers of the Local Legislature to charter a railway, which shall extend from end to end of the Province, and if it proposes to run outside it proposes to exceed its powers. What did the Province of Ontario do? It authorized the construction of the Canada Southern Railway, extending from end to end of the Province, and, in the sense of the phrase of the Minister of Justice, it was manifestly intended to connect beyond, but the Local Legislature could not give it power to make that connection, but it has power to authorize the construction of any line which does not extend beyond the limits of the Province. I repudiate the doctrine that there is a doubt of the power of the Local Legislature to authorize the construction of a railway from one end to the other of that Province. The hon. gentleman advises the disallowance of this Act:

"Because it conflicts with the settled policy of the Dominion, as evidenced by the clause in the contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company above set out, which was ratified and adopted by Parliament."

Who is right? The Minister of Justice, who says that the construction of a railway in Manitoba, which may go to the boundary line, conflicts with the clause, or the Prime Minister, who told us, when passing the Act, that this was not the construction of the clause. Is it to be borne that Parliament is to be induced to pass a contract on the statement of a Minister that such is the construction, and that we are to be told by a Minister, confirmed by the Privy Council, that it has a different construction entirely. The other Acts are left to be disposed of afterwards; and we hear from the ordinary sources of public information that some arrangement has been made as to one of these companies; that in order to avoid too much collision, too much friction, an arrangement has been made whereby the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has been good enough to undertake the construction within a portion of the sacred 15 mile belt, which by this construction is imported within the Province, though it was not there a little time before. The Pacific Railway Company want to keep control, and that arrangement, which I presume has been made after the charter was mutilated, it would not be necessary to disallow. There you have the plain fact that the Minister stated to his followers, stated to the House and to the country, and the country understood that by this clause there was a certain though inadequate relief from the monopoly in the undisputed, unfettered, unprejudiced rights of the Local Legislature, to charter railways. We were told that we were wrong in saying there could be no competition because these hon. gentlemen said Manitoba could charter railways and connect in this way. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) amplified his leader's declaration, and pointed out how railways might run through the railways and tap the traffic there. The Minister himself compared the railway to that magnificent river, the Rhine, which ends in bogs and silt, and he said this would be the condition of the Eastern section if other railways were allowed to bleed the traffic. Now it is perfectly clear that a construction is sought to be imported into the contract which is not a true construction, which we were told was not a true construction, and we have not to go on a principle which we were told was not the spirit of the contract. We are to go on the contract, and I maintain that the suggestions which have been offered to us to-night by the Minister of Railways, and not for the first time—his view as to the freedom from monopoly, his suggestion as to the Hudson's Bay being a source of relief is a suggestion which was not made by his leader, which was the one to which I have referred. Therefore the hon. gentleman carefully evaded the gist and force of the objection of my hon. friend from Bothwell, which was that there was a monopoly by reason of the 20 year clause, by reason of the 15 mile belt, by reason of the prohibition southerly and westerly, and that was an objection of the gravest possible character, which exists in all its force and integrity to-day, not weakened but strengthened by time, and infinitely strengthened by the action of hon. gentlemen who have sustained the proposition that private understandings reached between them and the Company antecedent to the contract are to govern their policy, that the old policy of the Government applicable to a Government railway is to be applied in favor of a private corporation now existing, that what they please to call the spirit of the contract is to prevail, and that Manitoba is to be placed practically in the same position as the other territories—practically so, because if the veto power is to be used on every occasion on which the intent of this clause is violated by the Local Legislature of Manitoba, we might as well have a prohibition against the construction of such railways. Well, it is said, you cannot limit the exercise of a constitutional power. Well, if we cannot limit it, this Parliament can control the exercise of it, and if hon. gentleman had that understanding they were bound to make it public and to say: "it will be our policy to exercise the power of veto in Manitoba and Ontario, and so practically put them in the same position as the territories are in." Then the hon. gentleman reverts to the motion of the hon. member for Gloucester, and he says that the display of the vigorous action which has been made in the work at the eastern end proves that there was no foundation at all for that motion. Now, what was the motion of the hon. member for Gloucester? It was that the subsidy of land and money were wholly disproportionate to the cost of the work, and the hon. gentleman gives as an answer to that that some progress has been made on fifty miles of the railway on the eastern end. We do not know how much. That is not an answer. I say there has been too little done, and the hon. gentleman has had to make an excuse for it; and if the argument was to be affected by the operations on a single portion of the line, they are in favor of the motion of my hon. friend rather than against it. But the motion was against the iniquity of paying for the prairie section three or four times the price which it was to cost the Company to construct it. We said, what is quite true, that no doubt what the Government were doing would stimulate the construction of the prairie portion, because every twenty miles they built gave them a fortune, gave them a large estate, and of course they would earn their money fast; it would cost them nothing, the Government would pay them all the cash they required, and besides that, they would get valuable lands; but we said: "These resources which you are squandering now are the resources which you should reserve for the construction of the other parts of the road." The hon. gentlemen next referred to the motion of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), and he said he would prove by the events of the year that that motion was altogether out of place. That motion was against the exemption from taxation of the land grant of the Company; but the hon. gentlemen took up the question of the exemption of the station buildings and the property of the Company in certain towns, and gave this as an answer to the motion of the hon. member for South Perth. That is no answer to the motion. He says: "I will prove that you are all wrong, because the city of Winnipeg, so far from taxing the Company, is willing to give $200,000 for their railway station." No Sir, they were not willing to give it, but the Canadian Pacific Railway Company said to them: "You have offered $200,000 to another Railway Company, and if you do not withdraw that, we will not come to your town." Well, the city of Winnipeg said: "We will not give $200,000 to the other Company," and then the Canadian Pacific Railway approached them and said: "If you will give us $200,000, we will put our station grounds here." So they gave the $200,000. I do not think it was an act in which the people of Winnipeg took great heart; they were perhaps wise in their day and generation not to want to lose the station; but I wonder what man of the whole 200 of us thought when they were giving these great subsidies that one of the first acts of the Company would be to exact $200,000 from the chief city of the Northwest as a condition of putting their station grounds there. Now, the hon. gentleman says that the Company have placed their land for sale at $1.25 an acre. We know what they did in reference to their lands; we know that their lands were placed at $2.50, subject to certain conditions of forfeiture. The hon. gentleman has acknowledged that these conditions were too stringent. They were undoubtedly too stringent—so stringent that they were found entirely unworkable, and practically prevented the sale of their lands in the first instance. These conditions were relaxed, I think, three times, each change showing that the Company were disposed to adopt conditions as stringent as the public opinion of the country would allow. The hon. gentleman says this is practically an offer of the land at $1.25 an acre. I am not disposed to agree with that view; I am disposed to believe that it would be found difficult for the average settler to apply these terms so as to get the land at $1.25 an acre. In order to get the land at $1.25 he has to break it, and I do not think he can break or keep within cultivation the amount of land which will enable him to obtain it at that price. Then again, many of the lands are not open for sale at all—the lands along the line of railway and other lands. I do not propose to enter into an elaborate discussion of the terms and conditions of the sale of Pacific Railway lands, but I think practical experience will show that these conditions will produce, not $1.25, but a much larger return. Under any circumstances, however, that exemption from taxation is a condition tending to results which, as the member for Perth pointed out, gives a greater opportunity to the Company to build their lines than they would have if they were subject to municipal taxation, and rendering them free from that share of taxation, borne by other landholders, so that it is acting entirely to the prejudice of the settlement of the country. The motion of the member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) is one which the hon. gentleman said was very unfortunate, because it opposed the Government remaining so long a contractor or dealing with those railways. The motion pointed out that there was an absence of finality in the action of the Government. The argument of my hon. friend was that we did not know when the Government would cease to be connected with the railway as a good portion of the work remained to be constructed. The Minister of Railways contended that a great benefit accrued to the country from the arrangements for hastening the completion of the road—that a great evil was connected with a lengthened Government connection. But there is this evil from the present policy, we have to provide the money, and really we double the annual provision for the immediate cash construction of the work. The hon. gentleman referred to a motion of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), stating that the best reply to it was that the Railway Act had been amended. But that Act was not amended when the motion was made. My hon. friend dealt with the Act as it was. I deny that the amendment of the Railway Act is an adequate answer, because it did not deal with the evil existing at the time. It is a new thing to say your amendment is useless because we were convinced by it and your arguments that our law had to be amended. Then with regard to the tolls on the Canadian Pacific Railway, the hon. gentleman made a comparison with these of a number of other railways. I am not able to analyse it because I do not know how far it applies to what is the great question at present and will be for a long time, the question of through rates. We know that through rates are very different from local rates, and that the local rates of almost all these great railway companies are practically monopolies. It has long been the complaint—almost since the first, as to local rates—that the Companies charged a great deal too much; and what I understood the hon. gentleman to be bringing forward was practically the local rates on first-class railways.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I had no means of dealing with anything else.

Mr. BLAKE. Why not? Does not the hon. gentleman know that there is a difference between through rates and local rates? He does not seem to know.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We cannot control rates all through.

Mr. BLAKE. Does he not know that there is a different rate, for through traffic from the rate for local traffic.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There would be a decrease not an increase.

Mr. BLAKE. That shows how much the hon. gentleman knows about trade. There would of course be an increase for local trade, and that is the very point of observation. The question is what the rate for through freights is. On the 7th of May next the undermentioned rates will be charged: From Emerson to Selkirk, $24 a car for a special rate No. 6, and for special rate No. 5, $22. There are certain other rates—25 cents for first-class merchandise, for second-class 22 cents, 21 cents for third-class, and 14 cents for fourth-class all the way between Emerson and Selkirk. Then it has its local mileage freight which is of course wholly different.

Mr. PLUMB. Why should it not be?

Mr. BLAKE. I do not say that it should not be; but I am pointing out several questions affecting Ontario and the older Provinces and the North-West, all of which are concerned in getting the enormous quantity of imports to the North-West at moderate rates, and in settling the question as to what the through rates should be. We want to know what they are. I do not mean the through rate at this moment—the through rate from Winnipeg to Montreal—but the arrangement for the rate to be charged over the Canadian Pacific Railway for that portion of its traffic which is not way but through traffic; and the comparison of the rates charged by other railway companies similarly circumstanced, which form connecting links between one point and another for that portion of this traffic which is through as compared with way traffic, would be of some value. The hon. gentleman will find, if he takes a carload of stuff from Montreal to Winnipeg, that the Grand Trunk Railway charges on the through rate for so much of its line as is passed over, such a rate; that the other railways between the end of its line and Winnipeg charge so much for what passes over them; that those rates are entirely different from their local rates; that the rates charged by some of those companies up to St. Paul, were as a rule, when I last investigated the subject, entirely different from the local rates and were enormously lower. Compare the rates charged by each company whose line is used between Montreal and Chicago and let us ascertain the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway as compared with those of the other companies, and then we shall know something that is quite as important and interesting as the local or small distances from 25 to 100 miles within the North-West country itself. Then he said we took great care about this; we saw that the Railway Company adopted a proper scale of rates; the Governor in Council settled this matter. I want to show how he settled it. In April last the Canadian Pacific Railway applied that its tariffs of rates be allowed. In April the Chief Engineer reported it was satisfactory. In April the Minister of Railways said it was satisfactory, and I think on the 7th of May, the Council approved of it for one year. That tariff was merchandise 1, 2, 3, 4, special rates, and other rates 3, 4, 5, 6, 7; as to these different special rates, it changes. Unless you know what the different classes are you cannot tell anything about those freights at all, or what the burden and incidence of that tariff was.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose he imagines the same classes prevail in all places. They did vary; and you do not know, because of any general provision or understanding of that kind, what the regulation is, as often fourth class in one is first class in another. The Government did not know what the classes were. When did they learn? Perhaps the hon. gentleman thinks it is of no consequence they should learn. Perhaps he thinks without learning, but there came a time when they perceived it was important they should learn. In January last, and it was after they approved of the tariff, they wrote a letter to the Canadian Pacific Railway, saying: "you will be pleased to send us a classification of the rates referred to in the tariff approved of in April." The hon. gentleman says the motion of my hon. friend as to the deflexion of the line southward is all nonsense, but the deflexion has taken place. Then the hon. gentleman refers to the motion of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron) as to differential rights; he says the motion is entirely a mistake. So far from there having been any such dangerous result in injuring the Occidental Railway, the result has proved the reverse. The Canadian Pacific Railway has obtained control of the Canada Central, also the Brockville and Ottawa, and the St. Lawrence and Ottawa. It has all the roads in the Ottawa country as the people are beginning to find out, and because an arrangement has been made with the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway it does not prove that the motion was not a judicious one at the time, as then no such arrangement was mooted. But the hon. gentleman referred to only half of the motion. The motion began by pointing out the possibility of danger to the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway and the Ontario interests, and the hon. gentleman has not answered that portion of the motion. Then the hon. gentleman referred to the hon. member for Yarmouth's motion, and said he need not be afraid of a loss to the revenue to the country, as they were going to build iron bridges in Ontario. But would not that entail a loss of revenue? When the Bill of the hon. Minister of Customs becomes law, every shilling of duty paid on the raw material would be returned, and that would be in addition to the difference between the duty on the raw material and manufactured articles. Then the hon. gentleman referred to the other motions. He says that the motion of the hon. member for Rimouski was in error because the road was first-class. But the hon. member pointed out that the contract did not provide that the road was to be first-class, and if it be a fact that the railway is to be first-class that does not alter the correctness of my hon. friend's motion. The hon. gentleman adverted, in the course of the discussion upon this contract, to another great advantage. The Speech from the Throne said, and so did its mover and seconder, that one of the great advantages we would gain from this arrangement was to be the saving of expenditure in the promotion of immigration, which would be carried on by this great corporation. But we know that the cost of immigration is larger than formerly. I maintain that, instead of events which have elapsed being proof of the unwisdom of this side of the House, they are proofs of the wisdom of our policy. They have demonstrated that evils, difficulties and dangers of the most serious character will arise in the North-West from the restrictive monopoly clause to which I have referred, and the enormous burdens which have been imposed prematurely by the construction of the railway, because it has been made plain, that as to the eastern end it is not so difficult as it was supposed to be, and the western end will not be the great burthen expected. It is proved that the price we are agreeing to pay is inordinate in another respect, because who can doubt that if the railway through the prairie country had been built by the Government during this current year, the emigration would have gone on, settlement would have gone on, the value of land would have increased, the boom would have gone on, and we would have been able to sell our lands at a much better price than we have sold these 25,000,000 acres to the Canadian Pacific Railway? Who can doubt that if what we proposed had been done, if we had our hands free to-day, if we could say now that, instead of in April last deciding to let this contract for the whole work, we had vigorously prosecuted the line through the prairie country, we would be able to breathe freer and easier with reference to the development and future of that country? We would have had all the settlement that has been referred to, all the improvement in the condition of the country that has been referred to, we would have had our 25,000,000 acres of choice lands, with no monopoly, no exemptions, no enormous contract for the construction of the ends. We would have been in a position to say: Now, gentlemen contractors, with such prospects as these before you, with such prospects as this single year of railway construction in the North-West offers, what chance have you, what offer will you make for our lands? What offer will you make for the construction of the railway? We would have been in a position infinitely superior to grapple with the construction of the ends of the line if the construction had only been delayed for one short year. If we were in the same position with regard to the whole road as we are with regard to the ends of it, we could have made an infinitely better bargain pecuniarily and in all other business aspects for the construction of the rest of the railway this year, than the bargain we made last year. Therefore, I say it is demonstrated that the policy of the Opposition was both prudent and statesmanlike. We had proposed to provide the very points which were important. We had proposed to deal with these very questions, to deal with them as they arose, as circumstances should point out the most advisable way. We had proposed to establish the North-West as a North-West, to enter upon the construction of the lands with a basis of lands having reached an augmented value. Instead of that the hon. gentlemen prematurely—once again to adopt the words of the hon. member for Sunbury—would deal with the whole question while the North-West was as yet in the condition in which it was last year. They would say that extra price in money and land, in works, in monopolies, in exemptions, which it is impossible for us to measure. They have agreed to pay it, they have bound the country by it, they have saddled the country with it, and the country, I suppose, has to bear it. But, Sir, if the hon. gentleman supposes that we are ashamed of these amendments or of the position we took last year, if he supposes that we desire to forget them or to do anything else than to have an opportunity to demonstrate their statesmanship and the wisdom of the policy they indicated according to the circumstances that existed at the time, and as demonstrated by the events of the past year, and by the circumstances of to-day, he was never more mistaken in his life.

Mr. HOMER. I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House at any length in making a few remarks on the question before the House. In changing the route of the Canadian Pacific Railway from the Yellow Head Pass to the Kicking Horse Pass, I believe the Government will not only contribute to the profits of the Railway Co., but will benefit the interests of British Columbia in particular and the Dominion of Canada in general. The country through which the road will pass by taking the southern route is much more valuable in mineral, agricultural and grazing lands than the region of the Yellow Head Pass. It will develop the grazing lands and the agricultural lands lying to the west of the Rocky Mountains. It will also be easy of access to the well-known gold mines of Kootenay, and will decrease the rate of transportation, so as to enable the extensive deposits of rich lead ore on the Kootenay lakes to be developed with advantage and profit to those who invest capital in them, and will thereby add to the country a very important industry. It will thence pass on to what is known as the gold quartz bearing regions of the Big Bend, which only requires cheap transportation to make it profitable to the country. It will then pass on to what is known as the silver region of British Columbia, which is looked upon by all experts as the great future silver region of British Columbia. This is one of the resources of British Columbia which requires only cheap communication to its development. From this silver region the line will pass on to the fertile valley of Spillamachein and Shuswap, giving an outlet to an extensive grazing and agricultural country surrounding the Okanagan Lake. It will then pass through the well-known Kamloops district, connecting Savona's Ferry with the second line now under construction, and at which point the line to the Yellow Head Pass will terminate. The region at the Yellow Head Pass contains but very little mineral; but it does contain a comparatively large extent of agricultural lands; but as these lands are all accessible by water there is not so much necessity for a railway as there is through the southern district. By adopting this southern route you not only develop this important section of country but you will create a large way traffic which will support the road as soon as it is completed. It will thus prevent the south-eastern portion of British Columbia from passing into the hands of our neighbors to the south of us. At the same time it will secure a portion of the trade south of the line, which could not possibly be secured if the road came by the way of Yellow Head Pass, and the House will see from these facts the advantage to be derived from the Government adopting the southern pass.

Mr. BUNSTER. This is a very important question, deeply affecting the interests of British Columbia, and I would like to ask for an adjournment of the debate until such time as the Premier and the junior member for Victoria are in their seats.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Opportunity can be had for discussion of this matter in Supply on the Estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does not the hon. gentleman wish to give an opportunity to any one else to speak on this subject save himself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly, any one who wishes to speak on it can do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do not think that 2 o'clock in the morning is a fit time to continue the debate. I must necessarily speak, owing to the hon. gentleman's allusions to myself. I would consequently like to obtain an adjournment of the debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would be very sorry to do anything which would put the hon. gentleman to the least possible inconvenience; but, as the leader of the Opposition suggested, the fullest and most legitimate opportunity will be afforded in the discussion of the Estimates, for treating this question in all its bearings—under these circumstances I think the hon. gentleman should allow the business of the House to proceed.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I think that this is the business of the House. This is new matter altogether. This discussion was deliberately raised by the Government on a notice given to the House two days ago, and yet we are refused an opportunity to discuss it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman wishes not to speak at the present time, and prefers to deal with the subject on this Bill, I think his desire to have an adjournment should be met; and I shall be glad to have it met, because we can adjourn the debate and go on with other business. I hope that the hon. gentleman will move the adjournment of the debate, in order that he may have an earlier opportunity at which to make his remarks.

Mr. BUNSTER. I have already asked for an adjournment of the debate. I was ahead of the hon. member for Lambton. British Columbia has grievances to lay before Parliament, but I think it only fair in the absence of the member for Victoria, B.C., that an adjournment of the debate should be granted. I was pleased to hear the able speech of the Minister of Railways, who since he has visited our Province is probably more impressed with its boundless resources than he ever was before. I believe there was a celebrated writer named Sam Slick, who once said that the ports of Halifax on the east and Esquimalt on the west, would be the two greatest ports in the world, and when the right hon. Premier conceived the idea of making this one great nation he probably was reading the opinions of Sam Slick, better known by some hon. gentlemen as Mr. Haliburton. History sometimes repeats itself, and it has probably done so in the present case. The hon. Minister of Railways paid a visit to our Province last year, and I am satisfied he obtained information which will be of interest to the Dominion at large. I heard him speak very fluently to-night about his ride on the Central and Union Pacific Railway, but it would afford me much more pleasure to hear him speak of his ride on our Canadian Pacific Railway across the continent. It was British Columbia that gave an outlet to the whole Dominion, and it is an outlet of which every Canadian should feel proud, inasmuch as it has not cost the people one dollar, but British Columbia has been a heavy loser for the last six or seven years owing to the non-fulfilment of that contract. Men bought property under the idea that the contract would be carried out. There has been a great deal said about developing the North-West; but what has been done in that direction for British Columbia, which gives an outlet to the North-West? The Minister of Railways does not advertise our Province as he does the North-West, though he knows that we have a superior climate to Manitoba. I see by a German pamphlet that American immigration agents are circulating the fact that in our North-West no one can get any liquor, and the Germans are not likely to go to a country where they cannot have their glass of beer or lager. We live in a country where men can have their grog, and I do not think it was in the interests of the North-West or of British Columbia, because it is part of the North-West from a geographical standpoint, to have passed those prohibitory laws.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. You have beer in British Columbia.

Mr. BUNSTER. Yes; and she had beer before she entered the Confederation, and she will have it as long as the British flag floats over Britain.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved the adjournment of the debate.
Motion agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time, considered in Committee, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 128) to provide for the improvement and management of the Harbor of Three Rivers.—(Sir Hector Langevin.)

Bill (No. 129) further to amend the Acts to provide for the improvement and management of the Harbor of Quebec.—(Sir Leonard Tilley.)

Bill (No. 130) to further amend the Act 36 Victoria, Chapter 60, relating to the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal.—(Sir Leonard Tilley.)

Bill (No. 140) to amend the Act 35 Victoria, Chapter 42, providing for the appointment of a Harbor Master at the Port of Halifax.—(Mr. McLelan.)

SECOND READING.

The following Bill was read the second time:—

Bill (No. 141) to provide for the allowance of drawback on certain articles manufactured in Canada, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.—(Mr. Bowell.)

House adjourned at 2 a.m.

Mr. BUNSTER.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 19th April, 1882.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House for a few moments, to a question of privilege. Two articles have recently appeared in the Globe newspaper referring to me. I do not know that I should have thought it necessary to make any remarks in reference to them, but for the fact that the other evening some other members of this House whose names were mentioned, thought it necessary to bring the matter before the House and reply to that article. Since then the same newspaper has followed up the attack made in the first instance by another more particularly personal to myself. Had I been in the House on the occasion when the first article was called to its attention, I should have joined the other gentleman in disclaiming any liability for the motives therein cast upon us; but not having been there I did not think it worth while to occupy the attention of the House by any discussion on the subject. But this other article which appeared in the Globe, on Monday last, renders it necessary that I should say a few words in reply to it. I do not, however, wish to be understood as acceding to the principle, for one moment, that every member of this House who appears to be personally attacked in foul and scandalous abuse in any newspaper is to choose this arena for vindicating himself. I think that would be an improper doctrine to urge, and I do not intend to do it. But the charges made in this practical article so specially refer to the Independence of Parliament and my action in the House, that I think it is necessary to say a few words in reference to it. The first article which I will read, said:

"A little light was thrown upon the manner in which some members discharge their public trusts. This morning in the Railway Committee room, when Mr. Hector Cameron declined to vote on the Telegraph Bill, he intimated that his not voting was because of his professional connection with the Bill. It is more than hinted that several members of the House largely supplement their indemnity and mileage by fees for promoting Bills. How far their constituents approve of their representatives tying their hands in this way, so that they cannot vote upon important questions, it would be interesting to know. An equally important point is to know how such members justify their violation of the Independence of Parliament Act. A full statement on this point from Messrs. Cameron (Victoria), Boulton, McCarthy, Kirkpatrick, and others would be in order."

The article of Monday last is somewhat lengthy, and I do not intend to trouble the House with it at length. After referring to the Bill in reference to the Montreal Telegraph Company, it states:

"It was introduced by Mr. Hector Cameron, member for North Victoria, who made several speeches in its support. Thereupon arose in opposition Mr. Thomas White, member for Cardwell, who, having been interrupted by Mr. Cameron, retorted that the learned gentleman appeared before the Committee with his fee in his pocket, meaning thereby that he was not, in the advocacy of the Bill in question, a fair representative of the people of North Victoria, but a lawyer employed by parties interested. To the astonishment of all present Mr. Cameron did not deny this statement, but retorted that if Mr. White made such statements he would resort to tu quoque argument, meaning thereby that Mr. White was open to the charge of personal interest as well as himself. Mr. White denied this, and demanded proof. Soon afterwards a vote was taken upon an amendment to the Bill, and Mr. Cameron refrained from voting. Mr. Blake drew attention to the fact, whereupon Mr. Cameron declared that he did not vote because he had a personal and professional interest in the measure! A few minutes afterwards, however, a member moved an adjournment, when Mr. Cameron rose, and protested as a member of the Committee against the motion. Thus, in the space of five minutes, he placed himself before the Committee and the public as a hired advocate, and also as an independent legislator resisting the motion of a fellow member."

It winds up in this way :

"Nothing can be more clear from these statements than that Mr. Hector Cameron, in declaring that he had personal and professional interest in the Telegraph Bill, and yet appeared as its advocate before the Committee, was guilty of a gross breach of parliamentary rule, and has exposed every act of which he is capable as representative of the people of North Victoria to the imputation of mercenary motives. If a member receives a fee for supporting one Bill, why may he not receive bribes for sustaining others? If a lawyer can be paid for parliamentary service, why not any member of the House? If the House of Commons does not purge itself of Mr. Hector Cameron it will lower its status very seriously in the estimation of the people of this country, and will justify any future accusations which may be made of undue influence. It is for the Government to take action in this matter. Mr. Cameron is one of their supporters, and no doubt they will be reluctant to condemn him, but condemn him they must, and that speedily. Their standard of purity we all know is not high, but there are some things that Sir John A. Macdonald will not do, and therefore we hope to see him place upon the notice paper a declaration of the impropriety of Mr. Cameron's act with a penalty attached to the repetition of it. We shall leave the electors of North Victoria to deal with the peccant member as their moral sense will direct them."

Now, in reference to this matter, I have only to repeat what I said before, that with the Montreal Telegraph Company I have not now and never had any kind of professional connection. I stated candidly to the Committee that I held the position of standing counsel to the Great North-Western Telegraph Company, and that that was the reason why I declined to vote on this particular question. I did not state, as is falsely asserted in the last article, that I was personally or professionally interested in the Bill. I have neither personal nor professional interest in that Bill, nor any other Bill before this House, and I have been very careful on every occasion not to have any such interest. I have not received any fee and I have no expectation of receiving any fee, for this or any other legislation coming before this House, or for any service connected with my duty as a member of this House. It will not put one cent into my pocket whether the Bill is carried or lost. It does not make one iota of difference to me personally what the result of the Bill may be; but I am not aware that the fact of a professional or personal interest towards that particular Company, which is only indirectly if at all interested in this Bill, precludes me from saying what I think fit to say as an Independent member of Parliament in reference to any legislation before this House. The legislation in question I should have supported on public grounds, quite irrespective of any professional interest in the matter. If I thought fit to adopt different views, I do not suppose they would have altered or changed my relation to the North-Western Telegraph Company. My connection with it is a purely professional one, and in no respect involves any parliamentary duty towards it. The charge from first to last, as to this Bill or any other Bill before the House—and I challenge any member of this House to adopt the suggestion put forward by the Globe newspaper, and put upon the journals of this House, or upon the notice paper of this House, a motion to call in question my parliamentary action on any point as to whether I violated the Independence of Parliament Act. As a member of the late Parliament I had sufficient occasion to study very carefully the provisions of that Act in the cases that then arose. I am well aware of them all, and I say without hesitation that, neither in reference to this Bill or any other Bill with which I have been connected, have I ever had any personal or professional interest which in any way could possibly interfere or prevent, or make it an act of impropriety on my part, to discuss and judge a Bill and to express my opinions upon any private or public measure before the House. It has usually happened that I have had occasion to take charge of a good many Bills, this Session more particularly, possibly owing to what is really a misfortune that I am a reasonably active member of the different Committees, that I have that kind of professional knowledge of legislation that enables me to take charge of them, perhaps with more readiness than members who are not so skilled. I have been engaged to accept with great reluctance the charge of many Bills, but in no single instance have I had any personal or pecuniary interest in any one of them in the remotest degree. I think that is a sufficient answer to the general charge. I shall only conclude by saying that this attack upon me is, of course, as every one knows, instigated by political hostilities. It has come to my knowledge that the idea of it originated in the Committee when this matter was under discussion; that the managing editor of the Globe was then present, and that he said in the hearing of some of my friends who happened to be wedged in close to him in the crowded Committee room, that he would make what then occurred the subject of an attack upon me; that he repeated that statement publicly in a public conveyance, in a railway train between here and Toronto, and this article is simply following up the threat then made use of by him; that he would endeavor to make political capital against me out of what occurred in that Committee room. I have been informed of that, and I have no doubt of the veracity on that point of my informants. As for that individual, the managing editor of the Globe, I have, fortunately for myself, for a great many years past—seven or eight years—not had any kind of personal acquaintance or intimacy with him. I have had such a contempt for his conduct and his action and the manner in which he conducts that newspaper, that I have felt that it was an advantage to me that I was not obliged to acknowledge an acquaintance with him even when I met him on the street. The remarks the hon. Minister of Railways thought fit to make upon him the other night, I entirely endorse. His action is that of a cowardly assassin who has not the courage to attack a political opponent upon public and legitimate grounds, which ought to afford a basis for attack if any attack should be made, but he comes behind and tries to stab his political opponent in the back in a cowardly and contemptible manner. I do not think it is desirable to notice all the personal attacks of this kind that are made upon members, but inasmuch as it has come to my knowledge, as I have stated, that this article was inspired, and not only inspired but actually written, by that individual in pursuance of a threat that he openly and publicly made, I think I am quite justified in referring to him. Why, he actually has the audacity, in the concluding sentence of this article, to talk about the moral sense of the electors of North Victoria, as if he could have the slightest appreciation of what moral sense was. I should like to know whether the articles in the Globe, in reference to its political opponents, show that the writer of them has the remotest idea of what moral sense is? Why, he has not the moral sense of a dog. A dog attacks his enemy openly. It barks and flies at him openly and fairly, but this contemptible journal by its contemptible managing editor, comes behind in a sneaking and contemptible manner, like a snake, and tries to spit its venom into its enemy, trying to kill its victims in the dark and on the sly. I feel such a contempt for the course which this journalist has pursued in reference to every man who happens to be opposed to him politically, that, perhaps, I am too warm in the expressions I am making use of; if I am I apologize to the House. But really it is impossible not to feel indignation against a journal who has for years past continually violated every principle of legitimate warfare. If it has anything to say against any man let it say it openly and plainly. If it has anything to say against any member of this House let it say so openly and plainly, and not bring forward insinuations and foul attacks which neither it nor any of its friends dare attempt to justify openly against myself or any other hon. member of this House.

Mr. TASSÉ. I regret very much to have to follow the example of my hon. friend and trouble this House on a personal matter. In the course of last week, on Wednesday, the Free Press, a Liberal organ in this city, published the following paragraph:—

"Is it true that one of the city's representatives received $250 from a certain dry goods firm in Ottawa, as a consideration for his services in getting for them the job of supplying carpets to the Government?"

The following day this paragraph appeared in the Citizen:

"The interrogatory form of the above paragraph is a cowardly way of stating a base falsehood; but it is in perfect keeping with the disreputable organ's despicable conduct and notoriously mendacious propensities. If the statement were true, if it were not a malicious invention, it would have been made with distinctness, and not in the above contemptible form. We have the authority of both members for saying that there is not the slightest foundation for the statement."

The Free Press repeated its charge from day to day, not directly, but by insinuation, and a few days later I sent to it the letter which I will read; but that paper refused to publish it, and I had to publish it in the Ottawa Citizen. The letter reads as follows:—

"Editor of the Free Press :

"Sir,—I shall consider you as a cowardly slanderer so long as you decline to name the 'city member,' charged by you with having received $250 for political influence used in the interest of a mercantile firm for securing orders from the Department of Public Works for carpet supplies. Rest assured that so soon as you muster sufficient courage to name the 'city member' referred to, you shall have full opportunity to make good your infamous charge—which, in my own behalf, I deny in the strongest possible terms. In the meantime, the public will stamp as mean and cowardly the subterfuge of dragging in the names of two city representatives—for in either case one must be grossly slandered, both by suspicion and the still more reprehensible insinuation.

"Your obedient servant.

"JOSEPH TASSÉ.

"Ottawa, April 17th, 1882."

The Free Press has, since, not withdrawn its statement, nor has it, as challenged, made a direct charge either against my very esteemed and senior colleague Mr. Currier, or myself, and if I rise now it is not with the view of complaining of that paper, because in this city it is well known as one of the most unreliable, unscrupulous and corrupt papers which exist in the whole Dominion. If it were not out of order, I would quote from its files to show that in July, 1874, at the time of the elections, it was then fighting the same battle with us against our friends on the other side, and two months later, as soon as its columns began to be filled with Government advertisements, it commenced to publish splendid eulogiums of those whom it formerly traduced. I do not rise, as I say, to complain of the Ottawa Free Press, but as the same slander has been telegraphed by the editor of that paper, Mr. Carrol Ryan—who, I am sorry to say for my confreres on the press, is President of the Gallery—to the London Advertiser, I wish to take this opportunity to declare from my seat in this House that the charge made against me by insinuations is nothing but a complete and cowardly slander.

Mr. HESSON. I take this opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the manner in which I have been attacked in the London Advertiser. We all know the character of that paper, and if the attack had not been copied in some respectable journals, through mistake or otherwise, I would pay but little regard to it. Had it been confined to local papers, I would not have felt any particular cause for referring to it here, because a man can stand criticism at home, where he is well known. But when an attack of this kind is circulated through the length and breadth of the Dominion, it should be held up to public censure. The article reads as follows:—

"There are two representatives in Parliament from this Province who are entitled to special attention, and we invite it from their constituents. We are opposed to the Administration and to their fiscal policy. We are perfectly aware that many respectable people differ from us and think their fiscal policy statesmanlike. But they surely can find men having some regard to the ordinary proprieties of civilized life to represent them. There are two men on the Tory side from this Province who would be hardly tolerated in a council of Digger Indians. We refer to the renowned Charley Rykert and the pompous Mr. Hesson.

Mr. TASSÉ.

They seem to think that those who are on the Opposition side of politics have no right to be heard, and that it is a part of their duty to groan and whistle, and to make all sorts of disturbing noises when a Reformer rises to speak. It would be difficult to find a man more ignorant and more conceited than Mr. Hesson. He is distinguished for very broad and comprehensive ignorance, and for sufficient self-complacency to supply all his party."

I take this opportunity to deny that I either whistled or groaned in the House, and that I made no disturbing noises, as hon. members can all vouch. I repudiate the whole thing. As to my self-complacency or ignorance, I am prepared to leave it to the judgment of the House and the public. I say this article is a piece of rascality that no man should tolerate, but which is only on a par with the character of the paper which published it.

Mr. CURRIER. With reference to what has been said by my colleague, Mr. Tassé, with respect to what appeared in the Free Press, I can endorse every word he uttered as to the character of that paper, and its unjustifiable attack. I have had the honor of holding a seat here for nineteen years, and have never received $250, or any other sum, from any dry goods establishment since I have occupied a seat in this House; for anything I have been able to do for my constituents, pertaining to my duty as a member, and for the credit of my constituents, I beg to say, that no one of them ever approached me with any such offer or suggested the payment of any sum, small or large, for anything I was able to do for them or that I was called upon to do as pertaining to my duties as a member of the House. I trust it will not be necessary to again make an explanation to the House in consequence of any such attack as that which has been made; I think my colleague (Mr. Tassé) has properly characterized the attack made in the Free Press.

DELAY OF MAILS.

Mr. WELDON. I desire to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the delays which have occurred in the mails in the Lower Provinces. In consequence of these frequent delays our correspondence has been delayed twenty-four hours on many occasions.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for the second reading of Bill (No. 144) to authorize the construction, on certain conditions, of the Canadian Pacific Railway through some other pass than the Yellow Head Pass.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I take now, as I have always taken, a deep interest in everything that concerns the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and, therefore, I listened with the closest attention to the remarks of the hon. the Minister of Railways, in laying before the House a statement of the present condition of that work, as well as its prospects. I only regret that the hon. gentleman chose to make his statement, which was couched throughout in moderate terms, a vehicle for attack on his opponents. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman eulogizing himself as much as he pleases; that we expect, and that he generally contrives to do, so much so that it is quite unnecessary for any person to undertake it. But I think, in making a statement of a great work to the House, he might have refrained from a repetition of some of the charges, or rather insinuations, made in various speeches, that have some remote connection with that work. The hon. gentleman was good enough, in one part of his speech, to take credit to himself for everything done on the road. There was not, he said, when he assumed office in 1878, though we had spent public money during five years on the work, one mile of the road in operation, and he expected within a year to have not less than 900 miles either in operation or close upon it, thus conveying the impression to any stranger who might happen to be in the House that the hon. gentleman's predecessor and the late Government were sadly remiss in prosecuting this public enterprise. In the first place, I never believed, nor did a majority of the members of the House believe, in the excessive bargain made with British Columbia, which bound the Government of the Dominion to an extraordinary and extravagant expenditure. Nay more, we know that before we took office in November, 1873, a protest of complaint was lodged by British Columbia against the Canadian Government for non-fulfillment of the terms of Union. I confess now, as I have always done, that I felt it to be my duty as a member of the late Administration, and in that my colleagues all agreed with me, to endeavor if possible to supplement the bargain, without intending on any account to do so at the expense of any vast increase in the country's taxation. When we came into office we found that the previous Government had expended $1,391,000 in exploratory surveys. I might very easily say they had expended $1,500,000, and not one foot of road was located. I do not do that, for I scorn to take any undue advantage of an opponent in debate. I think it was absolutely essential in the interests of the road itself that a thorough survey of the country should be made. The hon. gentleman who filled the office of Minister of Public Works during that period, no doubt acted, in directing the surveys, so that he would obtain a general knowledge of the principal features of the country in order that by studying its topography he might be able to advise the Government of the proper course to be pursued in selecting a route. After I acceded to office it became a very large portion of my duties to consider what should be done. I had, on previous occasions, when not saddled with any responsibility as a member of the Government, taken the ground that the first thing to be done was to get full possession of the North-West country, to throw in a large population there, which would be the nucleus of settlement and enterprise in the centre of the continent, and towards the adoption of that policy all our efforts were directed. We felt it absolutely essential that we should open the prairie region as soon as possible, and our whole course, whether wise or unwise in the estimation of hon. gentlemen opposite, was governed by that one consideration. At the time we assumed office it was practically next to impossible for any immigrants to reach the prairie country. It required a journey of some eighteen or twenty days in the carts of the country to travel from St. Paul to Winnipeg. And I remember very well some people coming here, during the first year of my incumbency in office, who had been nineteen days upon that journey going out of the country. To send in immigrants, therefore, under such circumstances seemed to be utterly absurd, and the first matter to which we directed our attention, therefore, was to obtain a highway into the country by the best possible route. It is not interesting to know, as this House possibly does not know, or as many members of it do not, that one member of the present Administration denounced us in the most unmeasured terms, because we attempted to make a line from the boundary northward, and for extravagance in building the road between Thunder Bay and Red River. The hon. Minister of Railways seemed to forget all this. He is possessed of a weakness of memory that is simply marvellous where it affects any of his particular friends, but his memory is exceedingly good in matters affecting prejudicially, in his opinion, any of his opponents. Indeed, Sir, I am not sure but that the hon. gentleman himself said something adverse to us in regard to the building of the line from Pembina. I put myself in communication with the people acting for the Dutch bondholders of the road from St. Vincent to St. Paul. Owing to financial difficulties some time before our acceptance of office, I felt the first thing to be done was to build a road to our country, and

I held out to them the hope that we would be able to meet them at the boundary, as by that time they could construct the road on their side of the line. For some time that effort was unsuccessful. In the meantime we thought it advisable to proceed with the grading of the road, and it was graded some time before an arrangement was made with Mr. George Stephen, who had, in the meantime, become proprietor of the road on the United States side of the line. Even that was objected to by hon. gentlemen opposite, for though the Bill I introduced in 1878 in the House of Commons passed there, it was defeated in the Upper House, or, at least it was so mutilated as to make it impossible for us to accept it, and that arrangement fell through. Another arrangement was made, however, by the same parties for the operating of the road, so that before we left office the road was ready for carrying freight and passengers into the country as far as Winnipeg. In taking a rapid review of matters connected with the road, I shall endeavor to avoid anything to which the hon. the Minister of Railways can take exception. It is not my intention to discuss the matters which were so ably discussed by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition last night, but to confine myself to the survey and selection of the route and to matters cognate thereto. I recollect very well, Sir, the torrent of abuse poured out upon myself because I had selected Fort William as the terminus, on Thunder Bay generally. I was not particular as to Fort William. Whatever place the engineers selected as the best terminus at Thunder Bay, I was willing to accept. But Thunder Bay I fixed upon in my mind as the most desirable place at which to have the terminus in preference to Nipigon. The Government, of which I was a member, decided not to build the eastern portion, between that port and Lake Nipissing, for some time, the object being, as I have already said, to have the line built as soon as possible into the prairie country from the nearest point at which navigation could be reached from the side of the country to be traversed. Still, Sir, I might say that in one sense I had no responsibility for the adoption of the Fort William or Thunder Bay terminus, because before I came into office at all my predecessor in the office of Public Works (Sir Hector Langevin) had despatched a large party of surveyors to survey the line from the mouth of the Kaministiquia westward, and it was many months before I could communicate with those parties as the winter had closed in. It was upon those surveys ordered by hon. gentlemen opposite that our ultimate selection of the route depended. I recollect also that we had obtained such surveys as satisfied the Chief Engineer that we could fairly let the work, and upon that report we proceeded as soon as possible to do so. The Chief Engineer's idea, as developed in a memorandum which was published at the time and distributed among members of the House, was that it was desirable to obtain very accurate knowledge of the country during two or three years explorations, but as soon as any particular route was fairly settled upon, to commence to clear the track, build telegraph lines, and otherwise make preparations for the general work of construction which was to follow immediately afterwards. This policy we adopted and went on with. We had to give out the contract for building a telegraph line upon the route as it should be located. This was done to the best of our knowledge and ability. I am not, at present, about to discuss the questions brought up by the report of the Commission lately presented to Parliament. They will come up in the discussion of that report. I am merely stating facts in connection with the road. We had some reason to believe, chiefly from the writings and observations of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), that it would be possible to obtain a straight line from Fort William, by way of Sturgeon Falls, to certain islands said to exist in the Lake of the Woods, but which had in the meantime disappeared from view, and we should be able, by crossing to the narrows of the lake, to obtain the shortest line to Winnipeg and its neighborhood.

Mr. DAWSON. They are there yet.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am glad they have come back, but it is rather too late. Well, Sir, we had also in the meantime endeavored to keep up our search for another route if this should fail, and it became evident, in the first years' operations of Mr. Sandford Fleming on the track I have indicated, that the country between Sturgeon Falls and the Lake of the Woods was impracticable for the railway, and that the crossing of the lake imposed very serious difficulty. That was therefore given up, and the route which is now about completed between Selkirk, on the Red River, and Fort William, on Thunder Bay, was selected by us. So urgent were we in prosecuting this work, that we let a contract on the east end, forty-five and one-half miles long, very early in 1875, or the fall of 1874, I forget the precise moment, thinking we would be able to take the route to Shebandowan, which, in consequence of the explorations showing the impracticability of the country, we had to abandon. We were able, however, to take thirty-two and one-half miles to Sunshine Creek, and another contract to English River, a distance of 116 or 118 miles. We then let out a contract, No. 14, from Selkirk eastward to Cross Lake, in the meantime prosecuting the work under contracts Nos. 15, 41 and 42, altogether a distance of 200 miles, as rapidly as we fairly could, in order to obtain a route preferable to the one we had abandoned. The hon. gentleman opposite has an advantage in one respect in debate on this subject, over myself or any other person, that he has had three men to assist him, strong partizans of his own, to make out as strong a case as possible against his opponents, and avoid every possible reference to anything that might be discreditably or foolish on his own part; and one of the statements of these three men who were selected for a special purpose—and they have prosecuted their mission with very great zeal—one of these statements is that we made a mistake in locating the road to Selkirk, and that by taking it in the first place from Rat Portage, a common crossing, to Winnipeg, we had permanently lengthened the line by twenty miles. This was very extraordinary news to me, and how these gentlemen managed, even with all the strong partizan feeling manifested in their report, to reach that conclusion, is a perfect mystery. They have it on record in the published reports of the Engineer in Chief that to take the road from Winnipeg westward to the south of the lake towards the neighborhood of Fort Pelly would increase the distance by thirty miles. Mr. Marcus Smith, in his second survey, under the instruction of hon. gentlemen opposite, appears to have reduced that distance to about twenty miles. Now, in the first place, the hon. gentleman endeavored last night to evoke some sympathy for Winnipeg, because I had determined that the main line should not go to that point. In selecting the line of the Pacific Railway I was bound as a Minister, bound in every sense, not to look upon Winnipeg or any other place in the territories as a point to be reached unless it coincided entirely with the public interest. Winnipeg was not the objective point but the Pacific Ocean, and at the time we acceded to office the case appeared to have been settled; that after two years' explorations in the Rocky Mountains south of Yellow Head Pass, it was determined by the Chief Engineer that there was no practicable route through the Rocky Mountains south of that pass. We therefore determined to make all our lines subsidiary to the question of reaching Yellow Head Pass by the most direct route possible. I never lost sight of this fact, or those two facts, that the success of a great trans-continental railway depended upon two things, to get the shortest route and the best as to grades and curves. That those could be had at Yellow Head Pass was beyond a doubt, and therefore we had no difficulty in deciding at a comparatively early day, upon the adoption of the route laid down by Mr. Sandford Fleming to that point. It may be said that I am trying to place the responsibility upon Sandford Fleming as Chief Engineer. No doubt I do as far as the engineering goes, but in respect to the general policy of the Government I and my colleagues are responsible. I had this to say then, and I have it to say now, that I am not aware that at any time any serious difference of opinion arose between the Chief Engineer and myself or my colleagues. I am not aware that we ever entrusted the work of surveying to any new men after our accession to office. We found Mr. Sandford Fleming, as Chief Engineer, Mr. Marcus Smith as Chief Assistant, and Messrs. Cambie, McLennan and others able lieutenants of both. All those gentlemen were continued in the positions they held, and all their energies were devoted to the best interests of the great enterprise which for the time was committed to our care. That those interests were well cared for by them I have no doubt. That mistakes were made by them is beyond doubt, and that mistakes may have been made by ourselves is equally beyond doubt; but I am not able, at this present moment, to recall anything of importance whatever that I would not have done under similar circumstances in the working of the line. We had to consider the interests of the whole North-West Territory, and it seemed to us that the best mode of considering their interests was to have the road pass as nearly as possible through the centre of the fertile belt in such a direction as would make it comparatively easy to build lines to the north and to the south which would become tributary to the main line. There were two courses which we might have taken. One was the course which the Syndicate has taken. They have decided to build the line from Winnipeg nearly due west, and at present it seems to be decided both by the Government and the Syndicate that it shall reach Moose Jaw Creek, and from that point it shall take the direction which may be found necessary, either in the direction of the Kicking Horse or the Yellow Head Pass. That road traverses a country which is comparatively level. The country which we traversed with our line north of Lake Manitoba, or through the narrows of that lake, was also a level country. Indeed, it was pronounced by many hon. gentlemen opposite in their criticism to be far too level, too wet, but it could hardly be more wet than that described by the hon. gentleman opposite when he told us, as he did last night, that the track was laid for many miles upon the ice. I do not think any part from Selkirk westward to Fort Pelly, could have exceeded that for wetness, nor am I aware that it is more valuable for settlement than a very large portion of eastern Manitoba. The present hon. Minister of Railways himself decided, after more than a year's exploration, upon making a change, and instead of taking either the southern or the northern route I have indicated, he took a line between the two, and instead of following the country where the natural features were most favorable for railway construction, he appears to have chosen the roughest district that could be found, making his road over hill and valley between the two routes indicated, in such a direction, and through country as made it impossible to construct a first-class road, and we had the humiliating admission in this House that he had given up hopes of building a first-class road, and had determined to build one suited to colonization purposes, with very high grades and very sharp curves, which would have made heavy traffic impossible with profit for all years to come. The Chief Engineer recommended in his earlier reports that the Government should confine themselves to two grades east and west—that going westward being no more than forty feet to the mile, and that going eastward no more than twenty-six feet to the mile, as the heavy traffic would be towards the east. These grades have been adopted as far as Selkirk, but west of that point the hon. gentleman determined to adopt a line on which he could not by any possibility get these grades, without an expenditure that would be far in excess of anything he would think of making for the construction of the road. The hon. gentleman, however, seemed to complain last night, or he implied a complaint, that we had spent too much time in surveying—that we had been five years in office and had not left a single mile of road constructed. But I remember, and I have no doubt hon. gentlemen around me will remember, that in the last Session of the last Parliament, that is in 1878, the hon. gentleman and his leader both complained that we were not giving attention enough to surveying the Pine River Pass nor the Peace River district; and one of the first things the hon. gentleman himself did after his accession to office, was to send a strong party to survey the country afresh from Fort Simpson on the Pacific up the Pine River Pass, and thence eastward towards Fort à la Corne. My hon. friend behind me, states that he also determined upon the selection of a route without waiting for the report of these parties. My recollection is that he stated to the House he had a telegraphic report, which gave some information though it was not a full report on which he acted. In the meantime, we had, in 1876 and 1877, various schemes for reaching the Pacific through Yellow Head Pass. We had our choice of three routes—one by the Nechaco Valley and the Salmon River, one to Bute Inlet, and one to the present terminus at Port Moody. We determined at one time, so favorable were the features of the country, principally towards Bute Inlet, to locate the line as far as Fort George, at the great bend of the Fraser, and we hoped without any doubt by the next season to obtain such favorable intelligence as would enable us to locate the line westward from that point, either to Dean Channel or to Bute Inlet. The information we received, however, showed that it was impossible to obtain more favorable grades than 105 feet to the mile on one line, and eighty-eight feet on the other. We determined therefore to have the Fraser Valley re-surveyed, and before we left office, we determined to adopt that as the permanent line of the Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman opposite, cancelled that order, as he considered it premature, and after his very hurried survey of the Pine River country, he fell back on our route; and at the present moment, from Fort William to Selkirk, and from the Yellow Head Pass to the Pacific Ocean, the hon. gentleman has followed precisely in our track without making any change whatever, showing that, after all, the expenditure made by us was made with such a result as has proved most satisfactory to the hon. gentleman himself as well as the Ministry of which I was a member. Now, the hon. gentleman has a Bill before the House to authorize the Syndicate to choose another place for crossing the Rocky Mountains. I could have no possible objection to that, but, upon the statement made by the hon. gentleman, I think there are very serious objections. During his early remarks I was led to suppose that a comparatively straight line could be obtained seventy-nine miles shorter, with grades equal to those on the Yellow Head Pass route. Along that route there are no grades exceeding fifty feet to the mile; but I was astonished to hear that the hon. gentleman rather favored the adoption of the southern pass with a grade of eighty feet to the mile. That is a grade at least seventeen feet in excess of any grade I knew of on Canadian railways. It is about nineteen feet, I think, in excess of the highest grade on the Intercolonial Railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. There is a grade of over seventy feet, I think, on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Where is it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is at Bedford.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Well, it is a fatal grade to traffic. This is what the result will be—we shall save seventy-nine miles of travelling, but a powerful engine cannot take more than from twelve to fifteen cars, with an ordinary load, up that incline, while upon the grade we adopted of forty feet to the mile, an engine would be able to take from twenty-five to thirty cars. On the Canada Southern Railway, on which the maximum grade is only fifteen or eighteen feet, a freight engine is able to drag forty loaded cars; I myself have seen forty-four behind one engine. Every one can see how very unprofitable it will be to have a high grade of this character upon so important a line as the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I do not hesitate for a moment in expressing my own decided preference for the Yellow Head Pass route, with its lower grades, to accepting a shorter route by seventy-nine miles, with grades so high as the hon. gentleman represents. I do hope the Government will not accept any grade so steep as that, because it will be a loss for all time to come, and it will require either supplementary locomotive power on the spot, or some other means to assist engines in dragging up a heavy train. I am aware that on the United States Pacific lines there are grades that are high, and perhaps higher, but we know that they have not been able to do a profitable trade up these grades, and at several places they have engine stations to assist the trains up the grades. This might be done on our line, but it would be a thousand pities if we made a mistake by adopting so steep a grade as eighty feet to the mile, which would practically destroy the harmony of our grades eastward. I may refer to what the hon. gentleman said last night about cheapening the construction of the line between Kamloops and Emory's Bar. I was informed, and the hon. gentleman will correct me if am wrong, that, in order to avoid some of the heaviest parts of the works, there are grades on that part of the line not more than 60 feet in radius. Is that correct?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I cannot say at the moment. I shall enquire.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I may be wrong, but I consider my authority good. If there are grades so sharp, or many of them, it is a fatal economy to cheapen the line with that result. It is utterly impossible for an express train to travel with safety and with a high rate of speed along such grades. I am told there is only one grade on the Intercolonial that approaches this radius, and that is near Halifax, at a point which, when Minister I visited for the purpose of considering how we could have a longer radius, and of course a less sharp turn upon the road. I have now referred to the general features of the scheme provided by the late Government, in consequence of information they obtained, and will have a few words to say in regard to the contracts themselves. The hon. gentleman read a statement from the report of his three Commissioners, showing the expenditure upon certain contracts and the amounts represented by the original tenders.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken, I have not read a line from the statement to which he refers. The figures I read from are in the table prepared in the Department by the Chief Engineer.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He must have got a copy from the other parties. I have read the figures; I have not compared the matters, but I saw a table of figures prepared in precisely the same way, which I assumed to be the same thing. I may be wrong, but I accept the hon. gentleman's statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not seen them.

Mr. MACKENZIE. This statement was made by the hon. gentleman apparently without view. See how gently and nicely my estimates were passed compared with those of my predecessor. They did not show there was a reduction in cost, whereas on those let before his time there was an increase in cost. There is one thing that will perhaps surprise many members. Up to this hour the hon. gentleman has not let a single contract, except upon tenders obtained by us, upon our surveys; for sections A, B, 41, 42, we had sent three distinct parties over the ground in order to get the figures more correctly. I had not the slightest conception until a very few minutes before the close of the Session of 1878 that the figures that were given upon 14 and other numbers, including 25, were so delusive. I accepted the estimate made by the engineer on the tender as approximately accurate, and we took the greater pains with the other sections which the hon. gentleman had the credit of letting, though not of surveying, in order to obtain as accurate information as possible. With regard to the selection of the line from Rat Portage westward, I see it is the conclusion of the Commissioners that there was a mistake made, not particularly with regard to the heavy work upon some portions of the road, not up or following on to Cross Lake, but notably the crossing of swamps of almost unknown depths that swallowed an immense amount of material. But Mr. Fleming, before the Commissioners, declares that he sees no reason even now to change the opinion he formed regarding that line. I may say frankly that if I had known the existence of those vast swamps, some further enquiry would have been made; but I was not aware of their existence. I accepted the statement of quantities given by the engineer as sufficient for the purpose of making estimates upon; and those estimates would, as a matter of course, depend upon the accuracy with which the surveyors had done their work. Upon section 14 it would not depend so much upon that as upon the examination of the ground which they were to traverse, whether the swampy peat which forms the soil for many miles in some places, and of a depth of eighteen or nineteen feet, sufficed to carry a road even with the aid of timber. All this had to be looked at afterwards when the road was pretty much constructed, and accounts for the extraordinary expenditure over the figures estimated by the engineers. With regard to the contract of which the hon. gentleman took so much credit last night, if any one is entitled to credit for obtaining those surveys, it is myself. I was not aware, as I have stated, that the others were deficient in accuracy; but it was perfectly clear to any one that that 185 miles which forms the connecting link should be examined as carefully as possible, both with regard to getting a shortened route and the smallest amount of work that could be obtained by re-surveys; and, as I have stated, three times parties were sent over that road for the purpose; and I gathered from the hon. gentleman last night that even after that, some changes were made which lessened the distance and increased the estimate of quantities. And I can only say that I am very glad it turned out so. I regret the hon. gentleman's want of generosity when he took the whole credit to himself, as he did in such a self-regarding air that was almost ludicrous to witness. The distinguished position he holds, to use his own words, should have induced him to be more moderate in applying praise to himself and censure to his opponents. He did not refer to another matter last night, but I have nothing to shun or keep back, and shall refer to it myself. I have been blamed by some hon. gentlemen opposite for steps taken to improve the navigation of the internal lakes between Fort William and Lake of the Woods. If I did wrong, I acted in the interests of the country, because I sought to obtain an easier way into the North-West for our people than could be obtained by the railway. Since 1871, parties have been out surveying that country, and we were told last night it would take another year to finish the road on these two sections. I take it for granted that no time was lost by the hon. gentlemen opposite before we acceded to office, and I am quite sure that none was lost by us while in office. The many works at the Fort Francis Locks and Rainy River were undertaken by us with the view that we would be able to send, as Mr. Dawson had done, over the Dawson route, some traffic through our own territory into the North-West before the railroad would be available. It was quite uncertain for a year or two after we reached office whether we would get a connection with the United States system of railways or not. It was quite certain in my estimation that six or eight years would elapse before it will be possible to finish that road entirely from Fort William to Selkirk, and at the same time, obtain the shortest possible line. Therefore, we determined, if possible, to obtain access to the country, to some extent, by using these navigable waters. I was taunted with advocating an amphibious system, part land and part water. I was quite indifferent whether it was land or water, so that we used it first, and used it best for the purpose of getting people into our country. That was our object, and if it was a crime, it was one closely allied to patriotism. I have always said, although it has been denied in some electioneering pamphlets issued during the last elections, that not one mile of road was built but what was in the precise direction required for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a whole. Of course, there is a difference of opinion between reaching the Red River at Selkirk and at Winnipeg. Personally, I would rather have reached it at Winnipeg. I would rather have gone by the south, where the country was probably more open, and probably more accessible at the time for settlement; but our object being to obtain the shortest possible route across the continent, and the line that would serve the largest extent of country, we deliberately chose the line we did, from Rat Portage across to Selkirk, offering immediate opportunity for the navigation of Lake Winnipeg. We did not know very much about the country, except what information we got from two or three parties that had gone from Hudson's Bay to Winnipeg, or from Lake Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay; but we do know that there is a very large extent of valuable land, and merchantable timber around that lake, so that we could obtain ties and other timber for all purposes in almost unlimited quantities; and we could not, viewing the public interest as we did, neglect the interests represented by those quantities of timber and other materials available for building, and for shipbuilding, and other industries of that kind. Where the road now crosses, if it should be continued from Selkirk, and no crossing afforded there—if it should, in other words, be taken in a straight line from some point eastward from Winnipeg, we shall not be able to obtain the navigation of the river without immense cost. We knew that the rapids between Winnipeg and Selkirk at low water afforded only two feet of water and it was with great difficulty some of our rails could be taken down and others had to be kept over until the road was built from Selkirk to Winnipeg. Where we made the terminus, there was some facility for reaching the great stretch of water navigation to the north. We had this further inducement to select that point: that the Saskatchewan River falls into Lake Winnipeg, and as the Grand Rapids are comparatively short, means of transit would not be expensive there, which would open the navigation of the Saskatchewan River, north and south, as auxiliary to the operation of the railway further south. All this presented itself to us when discussing the line on which we shall ultimately fix the railway, and while I have no objection whatever to offer to the line that has been adopted by the Syndicate, from Winnipeg westward, I am still of opinion that the northern line would have been the more advantageous one for the country, and would have afforded every advantage which the south-west line now affords. The late Minister of the Interior, my former colleague, has been attacked repeatedly for his extravagance in connection with the scheme for promoting colonization roads. I think, however, if I remember rightly, that the hon. Minister of Railways agreed with him that the scheme was a wise one. In the first place, it must be remembered that that scheme was brought down solely for the purpose of discussion, without any intention of passing it that Session. I do not think that either the Government as a whole were committed to it in any formal way whatever. We would be committed to it, as a matter of course, if we brought it before the House as a matter to be carried; but like some other measures which hon. gentlemen opposite have laid before the House, for instance the Bill on Elections and the Supreme Court Bill, and several other measures brought down avowedly for the purpose of discussion, it was laid before the House without the slightest intention of having it carried through this House. When the hon. gentleman insinuates, as he did yesterday, he only shows how entirely unacquainted he is with the policy of the Liberal party in Ontario. He does not appear to know that twenty-five years ago great efforts were made by the Liberal party in the west—in fact, it was a plank in their political platform to obtain possession of that country. We became aware, through the efforts of Mr. Isbester and others who were thoroughly acquainted with the Red River settlement, of the vast extent of domain which could be peopled in that country, and our efforts were unremitting to obtain possession of it out of the hands of the monopolists who held it as a barren waste. When the railway question first came up our only consideration was not whether it was wise to build the railway, but whether we were not premature in going to such an enormous expense for the purpose of obtaining it in a given time. As the hon. member for West Durham remarked, last night, no one ever opposed the building of those sections that led into the prairie country, and we lost no time in obtaining access through the United States in advance, by six or seven years, of any possible access through our own country. Instead of depreciating the value of the road, no one more highly appreciated it than we; but, on the other hand, we had to consider the interests of other sections of the country—whether it was wise to incur an expenditure of $120,000,000 for the purpose of constructing the road within a certain given, very short, and wholly inadequate time. It was our discussions in relation to the limitation which could alone justify the hon. gentleman in imagining that we had the slightest hostile feeling towards the Canadian Pacific Railway as a scheme. I did not believe then, and do not now, that it was wise to incur such a heavy expense to get beyond the prairie country. Of what earthly benefit will it be to a large portion of British Columbia, except the small strip that it passes through, no one can say. As for the scheme the hon. gentleman has for Asiatic travel, he reads Mr. Sandford Fleming's notes of last year as to distance, and it is gratifying to know it is the shortest road across, and it is gratifying to know, also, that by steaming up the coast and taking a slight circle, we are nearer Yokohama and the other places than San Francisco. But the question still remains to be decided whether the traffic from these countries can be profitably carried over the road or not. I hope it may be, and it should be tried. But, on the one hand, our scheme, if carried out, would have enabled us to have the road opened quite as soon to the prairie country as the hon. gentleman has succeeded in doing it; while, on the other hand, our colonization scheme, or something like the one submitted to the House in 1878, would ensure settlement and the building of the railway through the prairie country not visited by our own great national line. The hon. gentleman referred last night to the terms of the Act of 1874. He said that we had no reason to complain of if they took 25,000,000 acres when we proposed to take 54,000,000 acres. Now, Sir, we did not propose to take 54,000,000 acre, we proposed to take 20,000 acres per mile. The mileage was uncertain, but was generally supposed to be about 2,500 miles, and to reach the same figure that hon. gentlemen opposite had in their Bill of 1871 too. Their proposal was to take 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000. Our proposal was to take $10,000 per mile and 20,000 acres of land, but our land was to be taken in a very different process from that in which the hon. gentleman has taken his land. The hon. gentlemen in their scheme have provided that the Syndicate shall get the very best land to be found in the North-West. That is practically, in a few words, the scheme of the hon. gentlemen, and it is doubtful if they do not own the lands there also. Our policy was this:

"That a quantity of land not exceeding 20,000 acres for each mile of the section or sub-section contracted for, shall be appropriated in alternate sections of twenty miles each along the line of the said railway or at a convenient distance therefrom, each section having a frontage of not less than three miles nor more than six miles on the line of the said railway, and that two thirds of the quantity of land so appropriated shall be sold by the Government at such prices as may be from time to time agreed upon between the Governor in Council and the contractors, and the proceeds thereof accounted for and paid half yearly to the contractors free from any charge of action or management,—the remaining third to be conveyed to the contractors. The said lands to be of fair average quality, and not to include any land already granted or occupied under any patent, licence of occupation or pre-emption right, and when a sufficient quantity cannot be found in the immediate vicinity of the railway, then the same quantity, or as much as may be required to complete such quantity, shall be appropriated at such other places as may be determined by the Governor in Council."

This, Sir, made it incumbent upon the contractors, whoever they should be, to have the line which we owned in British Columbia, made it incumbent upon them, if we succeeded in obtaining the land from the Government of Ontario, east of the boundary line near Rat Portage, to take the land there also. We applied, in fact, as a Government, to the Government of Ontario to give us the land required to fulfill this section in their territory. Our request was not granted, and we thought that as the road was to be built through that portion of Ontario, the land might possibly be given us by the Government of Ontario in return for whatever advantages it might derive from the building of the road. They, however, took another view of it, and we did not receive the land. Now, the hon. gentleman is aware that at the time the contract, was made with the Syndicate, there was under contract or built from Selkirk to Fort William, 1,410 miles—I am not sure now as to the mileage, but it is about that. From Selkirk to Pembina, eighty-three miles; from Kamloops to Emory's Bar, 127 miles, and ninety miles from Emory's Bar to Port Moody, or a mileage altogether of 710 miles, assuming the entire mileage to be 2,650, leaving 1,823 miles, 20,000 acres per mile for which would amount to 38,460,000 acres. Well, that is for all classes of lands a fair average of the quality of the country it passes through. Now, in the prairie region, extending a distance say of 1,000 miles in rough numbers, the quantity would be, of course, just about one-half, or 19,000,000 acres in the prairie country, and the same quantity will be obtained in the rough or wooded country. This will show a very different result indeed, as to expenditure, from what has been presented in the scheme the Government ultimately adopted. Now, Sir, with regard to that scheme I have a very few words to say. I do not desire to enter upon the general discussion, but I have to say this: the hon. gentleman knows very well that they had no right to enter upon that contract at the time he did. They had not asked for tenders in any way, except indeed, as the hon. gentleman told us, that they got their leader in a stump speech to say they had been conferring with some parties. Even he did not in that speech invite tenders from any parties, nor did he intimate that any new policy had been decided upon or any new departure had taken place. The law strictly prohibited giving out any contract without publicly asking for tenders. Now, no one would object to any small works being undertaken for which a necessity suddenly sprung up, without compliance with this condition. It is a different matter altogether from the present case. The hon. gentleman says also that we asked for tenders, and that the tender, as I understand him to say, from Messrs. Stephens & Co. might be called—he did not say it was—a response to that invitation for tenders. Now, Sir, we had named a period in our advertisement within which we would receive tenders, and I recollect asking the hon. gentleman after he came into office whether he had received any tenders after that time. His reply was that one tender had been received, but of such a nature that made its consideration useless or inadvisable. The asking for tenders was therefore entirely closed, and the policy was evidently reached by a more understanding, which the hon. gentleman afterwards followed out. In 1880, there was a policy laid down of setting aside 100,000,000 acres for that purpose. They went to England; they utterly failed to attract the least notice there. The hon. gentleman should have remembered that last night, when he spoke of our failure to obtain any notice to our advertisement in England, the hon. gentleman made quite as signal a failure. The fact is that the project is one which required a good deal of time and a great deal of advertising, to bring it fairly under the notice of the class of financial contractors who were likely to undertake a work of that kind. Hon. gentlemen opposite proceeded on precisely the same course. When they came back, after announcing their great success, they were obliged to confess an utter failure in 1880. In 1881, when the House met again, it turned out they had received some offers before leaving Canada, which they appeared to have rejected. That is my inference from what has been stated. After going too long, they failed to obtain any proposal good, bad or indifferent, or if they did they have denied it and hidden the fact from the public. On returning to Canada, hon. gentlemen opposite were obliged to throw themselves into the arms of those gentlemen called the Syndicate. If any gentlemen were to obtain a good thing at the hands of the Government, I have no objection to these gentlemen obtaining it. I am not like the hon. member for Ottawa who said the only thing he regretted was that such a good thing should have gone into the hands of gentlemen opposed to the Government. I have no feeling of that kind, I believe they are all good men and true, and I was delighted to hear the hon. the First Minister one night, and the hon. the Minister of Railways another night, pronouncing eulogisms upon Duncan McIntyre and Donald A. Smith. It shows the hon. gentlemen are of an appreciative and forgiving disposition. It is to be hoped that Mr. McIntyre and Mr. Smith will appreciate the kind references made to them. Time was when it was different, but perhaps it will be well that I should not further enter into this matter, because I desire to discuss the railway question on its merits. I cannot, however, avoid referring to those matters, because the hon. the Minister of Railways tempts me to do so by his declaration, last night, that everything done wisely and properly about the railway was done by himself, and everything done unwisely was done by his opponents. I might, although I do not intend to do so, discuss at very great length many matters connected with the history of the Pacific Railway. I have only to say this, and it is all I intend to say, that the past record and history of the Liberal party in connection with this great work is one to which we can refer with every feeling of satisfaction, for we tried to do our duty to the country, and if hon. gentlemen opposite can say as much respecting every step they have taken, I have nothing further to say. But I protest against the course that has been pursued by the hon. Minister of Railways in belittling the efforts of his political opponents, in a scheme which has given so much trouble and difficulty to the Government, abstractedly speaking, not to my own Government or Administration, but to any Government in prosecuting a work of this kind. I do not think in any of my annual statements when Minister, that I ever gave any occasion to the hon. gentleman to refer to myself as having taken credit for everything that had been rightly done, after denouncing everything that had been done by my opponents. If I had believed in such a course, I should have changed the whole course of proceeding the moment I took office; I should have adopted the hon. gentleman's plan in other respects, and have obtained men in whom I had more confidence to conduct the work connected with the railway, and to have proposed the changes which were inevitably to be made. The hon. Minister of Railways has stated that within a year, more than 900 miles of railway will be either built or nearly built, and that when he came into office not one mile was built. We had under contract at the time hon. gentlemen opposite acceded to office, 228 miles between Fort William and Selkirk, 83 miles were half or actually finished from there to Pembina, constituting together something over 311 miles. At the present time no more of the line is built, except 161 miles constructed by the Syndicate. Hon. gentlemen opposite complain of our expenditure on location. We spent $500,000 and every inch of the road was taken up and moved some miles to the south. On leaving office we had nearly half of the distance of which the hon. gentleman is now able to boast of now as being constructed or nearly constructed, and yet the hon. gentleman desires to take credit for the whole work. I intended to refer to some other matters, but with every desire to proceed, I find my voice has failed me, and I must defer any further observations to some future occasion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In reply to a question asked by the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that the sharpest curve is one of 700 feet radius, and that trains can travel over it at a speed of 40 miles per hour.

Mr. DAWSON. I think it will be generally admitted that it is highly desirable, if a shorter route can be found from Moose Jaw Creek to the Pacific coast, that it should be adopted. It is very much to be regretted that the energetic and practical men who now have the Canadian Pacific Railway in hand had not had control of it sooner. If such had been the case, a great saving in distance between Thunder Bay and Winnipeg would have been effected. A survey was made from Thunder Bay to Sturgeon Falls, at the head of Rainy Lake, and the line was favorably reported on by the engineers. As to the crossing of the Lake of the Woods it was quite practicable. It is true that in order to condemn that crossing several islands were spirited away, but even that was not enough. An engineer was set to draw a plan of a tremendous bridge which the opponents of the route said would be necessary at that place, and its cost was put at $1,000,000, and in this way the line which should obviously have been followed was set aside. However, engineers quite as reliable as those who constructed that enormous bridge, drew a plan of another bridge, showing that this spot could have been bridged at a very moderate outlay, and the saving in distance from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg, without going to Selkirk, would have been no less than thirty-five miles, making every allowance for curvatures. That is a very important saving in distance—a distance which would have been saved for all time; and I believe the original cost would have been reduced by millions, because, for one thing, the great swamp to which the hon. gentleman has alluded and in which a large amount of capital has been swallowed up, would have been avoided. I have no desire to reflect upon the management of previous days; I am perfectly willing to concede that everything was done with the best intention; but it is very much to be regretted that the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) had not had time to go over the ground. Had the hon. gentleman, with his practical knowledge and his acquaintance with railway matters, had an opportunity of going through the country, I believe the result would have been very different; we would have had a much shorter line between Thunder Bay and Winnipeg, but unfortunately the thing has been done and it cannot now be helped. The hon. member for Lambton, in speaking of Nepigon and Thunder Bay, said he moved the terminus to Thunder Bay because he thought it was a better and more convenient place and possessed more advantages. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right. Nepigon Bay remains frozen for a very long period in spring, while Thunder Bay opens early. I will not now refer to the question of the Kaministiquia or Prince Arthur's Landing as harbors, as that matter has been very much discussed before. All I can say is that if the line as originally laid down and contemplated to Sturgeon Falls had been followed, taking advantage of the water navigation between that place and the Lake of the Woods in the meantime, 20,000 people who have gone to Minnesota would have now been in Manitoba. The line would have been open much earlier, and it would have been possible to pass through immigrants, and we would not have lost the immense number of valuable settlers who, because they were compelled to pass through Minnesota and saw beautiful and fertile land in that State, were attracted to settle there. There is one very remarkable circumstance in connection with all these old surveys and explorations, and that is, that the practical men who now control the Pacific Railway have not adopted one single yard of these expensive lines, but have laid out lines for themselves which are very much better than those formerly selected. In regard to the change of the location of the Pacific Railway from Callander Station westward, I think it is a very important thing for that portion of the country which I have the honor to represent that the Company have decided to keep near the shores of Lake Huron and Lake Superior. For 600 miles the line will pass within easy distance of the shore, and the result will be that every river valley along that immense distance will be opened up for settlement. It has long been believed that this great region, bordering on the great lakes, known as Algoma, was barren and rocky and unfit for settlement; but recent events have shown that this is not the case. The fact is, there are very large areas in Algoma which are fit for settlement, and they are being rapidly occupied. The Census of 1871 showed a population of 7,018 in the whole district, more than half of whom were Indians, while the last Census has shown a population of close on 21,000 in Algoma proper—I mean Algoma south of the height of land. That is a very large increase in ten years, but I believe it is only the beginning of what we shall see in the future. With this railway passing along the coast and opening up every river valley, the large areas of agricultural land and the minerals which abound in that extensive district, including iron, copper, silver, lead, and I believe gold, will all be developed. The progress of settlement has been very much retarded of late for the want of roads. I received a number of petitions this winter from the people on the Island of Manitoulin, complaining that the mails were delayed and very irregular. These I sent in to the Government. But how is it possible to have the mail matter of 12,000 people, amounting to over half a ton a week, delivered regularly when there are no roads, not even between Parry Sound and the shore opposite Manitoulin Island, and the mails have to be carried on men's backs or in dog sleighs, as they used to be years ago. This difficulty, however, will be overcome by this railway, and we shall soon see that this very much abused district of Algoma is fitted to support a very large population. I remember six or seven years ago reading an article in a prominent newspaper published in Toronto which called attention to the fact that wheat had actually been grown on the north coast of Lake Huron. Why, there is not a better country in the world for wheat growing than the north coast of Lake Huron; the climate is quite as good or a great deal better than the climate of the North-West Territories, where population is now pouring in. I merely mention this to show that this change of route of the Pacific Railway, the cost of which will be borne by the lands of the North-West and will not be a burden on Ontario, will have the result of opening up that magnificent country for settlement.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is with reluctance that I rise to prolong the present debate. Had the hon. Minister of Railways chosen to confine himself, as he very well might, and I think wisely had done at this stage of the Session, to an explanation of his policy and his proceedings with respect to the Canadian Pacific Railway, but a short discussion need have taken place; but that hon. gentleman, for reasons best known to himself, chose to incorporate with his statement a series of attacks upon a very considerable number of the Opposition, and among others he chose to draw attention to certain statements made by me in my capacity of Finance Minister in former years, and also to draw attention to a motion which I had the honor to put in your hands about a year ago. Sir, the whole object of that hon. gentleman was clear enough; he wanted, by a series of misrepresentations—the public having probably forgotten to a very great extent the circumstances of our connection with the Pacific Railway, and fortunately for that hon. gentleman and his colleagues, having also apparently forgotten some of the circumstances of their early connection with the Pacific Railway—his desire was, I say, to misrepresent our action with respect to that great work to the utmost of his power. Now, Sir, as my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Blake) and my hon. friend from Lambton have most truly said, there is no party, there never was a party, in this country who have more right to say than the Reform party of Canada, that for generations back, long before that hon. gentleman knew anything or was in any way connected with the politics of the country, it was the object and the earnest desire not merely of the leaders, but of the whole Liberal party, to obtain the control of that great region and throw it open to settlement. For many years the Reform party had seen with great regret that numbers of the people were seeking homes in the United States; and of all men, living or dead, no man deserves the thanks of the country, more than the late Hon. George Brown for the steady and persistent energy and eloquence with which he, not merely through the great organ of public opinion he controlled, but by word of mouth, and in his place, both inside and out of this House, directed continually the attention of men of all ranks and classes in Canada to the value of that prairie region and of the extreme desirability of obtaining it. And if I were to believe the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall)—whom I do not see in his place—it was with the greatest difficulty, he says, that he succeeded in spurring up his negligent colleagues to take any steps for acquiring that property. Why, to quote from memory from that valuable tract which the hon. gentleman on his return from the North-West composed, but which is not, unfortunately, as easy of access as I could wish, I think his words were these: That on the day when the Government of Canada consummated the folly, he called it, of throwing eight millions of dollars into the sea in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, he moved a resolution in the Council binding the Government to make or take the necessary steps for securing the North-West Territory. And after, at the instigation of that gentleman, as he states, the Government were stirred up to take those steps, and had succeeded in obtaining the cession, so far as the Hudson's Bay Company could give it, of our territory. I should like to know who were the men who mismanaged our affairs in such a way as to cause what ought to have been a friendly exchange to be one stained with bloodshed and rebellion. I say that those hon. gentlemen from the time they took possession of that territory till they left office in 1873 had this claim to our consideration; that they blundered at every imaginable point in connection with the North-West Territory, and blundered not least, but most of all, in that most absurd bargain which they made in 1871 whereby they bound themselves to the hopeless project of constructing a railroad across the continent by 1881. The members of the Liberal party never in the slightest degree opposed—and the hon. gentleman knows it well—any expenditure in the slightest degree within the means of the people of Canada for the purpose of opening up communication with the North-West. What they did oppose was the blundering of hon. gentlemen opposite, the trifling with the resources of Canada, and the wantonly throwing away of many millions for objects and purposes in no degree connected with the opening up of the North West Territory. And it was from the effect of those blunders, of that mismanagement, of that legacy of trouble and mistakes which those hon. gentlemen have left behind them, that my hon. friend beside me found himself very greatly embarrassed in dealing with that question, was obliged to make concessions, which, as he stated at the time, were made simply and solely, because we were obliged by the conduct of those hon. gentlemen to make them, although we knew they were straining and overburdening the resources of the country intolerably. I fear those hon. gentlemen are blundering still as badly as ever before. They succeeded in doing nothing for the opening of the North-West, beyond what my hon. friend had done, for three years after they had taken office. Nothing was done by them. All that they have done, as my hon. friend has truly said, was to carry out certain contracts which he had made, was to perform certain portions of work which he had already set on foot. But they have done much to throw away all the good fruits which were ready to drop into the lap of the people of Canada. They have succeeded in most needlessly creating new monopolies, having very burdensome privileges to be paid for at the cost and expense of the people of Canada. They have flung away deliberately, openly in the face of this House, in the face of the country, many millions of acres of the most valuable land and many millions of the people's money, and have done that when there were many—with all respect to my friends of the Syndicate—as capable, as ready to do all that would have been of the slightest value to the people of Canada that these gentlemen are doing. In addition, they have, besides creating those monopolies, besides granting those exemptions, besides throwing away all the money and land I have spoken of, further enormously impeded the proper settlement and development of the North-West by their outrageous fiscal policy, which adds enormously to the cost of all the articles required by settlers whether from Old Canada or from the Old World. What they have done has been purely mischievous. The resources of the country are so great, that I believe they will largely overcome the mischievous fruits of their policy. But although I believe the Syndicate have pushed their works with vigor, and so far are doing good work, the hon. Minister of Railways and his colleagues have done literally nothing. All they did was to lay down a certain number of miles of road, so badly located and constructed that the only thing to be done by the Syndicate was to pull up the rails and alter the location at the cost of many hundred of thousands of dollars to the people of this country. I believe the course of their policy in a very few years will not merely prove the wisdom and foresight displayed by the Opposition in resisting it last year, but that it will provide troubles for coming generations, of the most serious kind. As soon as Manitoba becomes filled up, as soon as the people begin to feel what sort of a yoke these gentlemen have subjected them to, either those restrictions will have to be removed, or the people of Canada will, in all human probability, lose the North-West for which such sacrifices are being made. And if the people of Canada, being warned, do not heed that warning, and exert themselves to break down those monopolies, to get rid of those chains which they never ought to have allowed to be imposed—and to do them justice they were imposed behind their backs—because those things were done without the slightest knowledge of the people, no man at the last elections ever dreamt that such terms would be granted the Syndicate. If the people of Canada do not do that they will deserve to lose the North-West by reason of apathy, and supineness and indifference to the commonest principles of liberty and freedom. I would like to know who it was that made approach to the North-West country possible? To whom are we indebted for the possibility of that progress which, I rejoice to see, is going on from one end of the North-West to the other? There were two persons who, by dint of their energy and determination did a very great deal, did as much as individuals could, to make access to the North-West possible, and thereby to enable all this tide of immigration to flow into it. One of these gentlemen is my hon. friend the member for Lambton. Through good report and ill-report, at a time when the state of our finances might well have excused him for hesitation—and, as I said before, there was no man in a better position to know than I myself. I can bear witness that my hon. friend never flinched, never hesitated, but always in Council, in Parliament and elsewhere, avowed his determination, so long as Canada was able to find the means to do it, to go on and open up that country. He expended, as the House knows, many millions in the early construction of the road, from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, which is one necessary avenue of approach to that country, and he did it in spite of many severe attacks, which, if not made by the hon. gentleman immediately opposite, were made by many of his followers. We have not forgotten that my hon. friend was often told, and I think by a member of this Government, that he had no business to expend public money in attempting to construct a road of 400 miles through that region. The other gentleman was a man who is now engaged in carrying on the Canadian Pacific Railway, my friend Mr. Donald Smith. It was largely due to his energy and enterprise that communication with the American system of railways was obtained. I need not tell the House what sort of a reception that hon. gentlemen's efforts met with two or three years ago, from the hon. Minister of Railways and his colleagues, and the opposition which was made to the proposition to give him and his friends a short lease of the Pembina branch, which was a necessary portion, no doubt, of the railway scheme they were then engaged in carrying through. Need I remind the House of the torrent of abuse that was more than once poured on the devoted head of that hon. gentleman by the very men who are now, in their own despair, obliged to crouch as supplicants before them, in order to get them to relieve the Government of the consequences of their own incapacity. These gentlemen dare to talk to us of tenders. Was there a man in Canada, in England, in the whole civilized world, who ever dreamt that it would be possible in the year 1881, to find a Government so blind and deaf to all the lessons of civilization and to the knowledge of everything that had been passing on the other side of the border, as to deliberately propose to put a country comprising one-half of a continent under the absolute power and under the absolute control of a railway corporation. Well might my hon. friend say that no man ever dreamt until these resolutions were laid on the Table of the House, that a Government could be found so insane or a Parliament so lost to all considerations of constitutional propriety as to sanction a monopoly of twenty years over a country extending from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean. If that be true, and no man can contradict what I say, if it be the simple fact that such privileges, monopolies, exemptions from taxations, not to say such large sums of money and grants of land were given to this corporation, as had never been dreamt of by any man, until that contract had been laid on the Table, how can that hon. gentleman say that fair competition was asked for, that fair tenders were asked for, that capitalists of Europe or America knew anything whatever of what the hon. gentleman was going to do. The thing was done in a hole-and-corner manner, and the hon. gentlemen have to thank themselves, if acting thus behind our backs without the knowledge of their most trusted friends, their motives have been suspected and probably will continue to be suspected. I must proceed to make a remark or two on the absurd fallacy which underlies the statements, not merely of the hon. gentleman, but of his followers throughout the country. They talk of us as if things were in precisely the same position in 1880 as they were in 1872-73-74. They pretend to say that because the railway can be built now, it could have been equally built ten years ago. That is simply an absurd fallacy. The whole position of things is altered from the bottom up. What was our position in 1874? It was this: That there was no practical communication whatever with that country; the nearest American railway did not go within 100 or 150 miles of the Canadian frontier and there was no possibility of bringing in goods except at an enormous expense to our own country. The hon. gentleman knows how enormously such a state of things would have increased the cost of that railway had it been then built. Besides that, and wholly apart from the great depression in North America which then existed, and which had necessarily an enormous influence on the minds of people on the other side of the Atlantic, the special blunder, mal-administration and incapacity displayed by those gentlemen in dealing with the Red River country, produced an armed rebellion that caused the death of some of our subjects, and which, no doubt, created a very unfavorable impression in the minds of many against the North-West Territory. The very first task, therefore, that fell to the lot of the hon. member for Lambton was to get rid of the burning embers which those men had left behind them, and to produce, as he did succeed in producing, peace, order and quietness in the North-West Territory. Moreover, allow me to recall to the recollection of the House that in 1874, 1875, 1876—certainly for two or three years—there was a very serious infliction in a large part of the North-West in the shape of the grass-hopper plague, which destroyed the harvest of the settlers, and on two or three occasions we were obliged to bring down grants of money in aid of the settlers, and if you consider the effects of these influences, the lack of communication, the fact that the rebellion had been but recently suppressed, the grass-hopper plague, and the great commercial depression all over the continent of North America, and you will see that the wonder is, not that more was not done, but that my hon. friend's tenacity and perseverance enabled him to do the very great deal he did in the time at his disposal and under the existing circumstances. The hon. gentleman talks about the value of the lands at that time, entirely ignoring the fact that its value has increased ten-fold, perhaps a hundred fold since the time it was first proposed to construct the road. It is well known that at the time my hon. friend proposed to give 20,000 acres per mile, bounty warrants for 160 acres of land could be freely purchased at Winnipeg for $30 or $40. In other words, in an open market, the right to take land in a favorable position in that Province, was then only worth 25 cents, and no doubt would have continued to be worth only that but for the exertions of my hon. friend Mr. Smith and his friends in opening up communication with that county. My hon. friend from West Durham showed clearly enough that in that amendment which I moved, and of which the hon. gentleman complained, not one word had been said, not one expression had been used, which was not based on the calculations submitted formally to the House by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, the hon. gentleman's own colleague. There is no doubt the calculation I submitted did involve a very large amount of money, that it did show we were squandering a great amount of public money and means in the contract which we were making with that Company. But, Sir, that was those hon. gentleman's own estimate; the cost of the railway was taken from the statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways himself; the value of the lands, which I do not believe to be an exaggerated estimate, was taken from the statement of the hon. Minister of the Interior himself. What right, then, has the hon. gentleman to say that I spoke in a devil-may-care manner on a devil-may-care resolution—unless, indeed, in copying the statement of those hon. gentlemen, I had come into unpleasant proximity to the gentleman he refers to? Then the hon. gentleman declares that as Minister of Finance I had again and again spoken disparagingly of the railway, spoken disparagingly of the North-West, that I had enormously over-estimated the cost of that road. Now, Sir, I defy the hon. gentleman to show that I spoke disparagingly of the North-West country. I will tell him what I have done: I have spoken again and again—I probably will speak again and again—very disparagingly of the estimate of men calling themselves statesmen to agree to build a road of 3,000 miles through a country of which not one foot had been surveyed, within a period of ten years. But no man ever heard me say a word in disparagement of that great and fertile North-West, upon which, Sir, I look quite as eagerly and quite as often as the hon. gentleman, as the home of the populations which are swarming away from Ontario. It is perfectly true, and I did tell the House, and I now repeat the statement, that had we, in 1874, under the circumstances I have related, without any means of communication or approach to that country, gone on and constructed that railway in a period of seven years, it would have cost every penny of $150,000,000, if it had been decently built. I repeat that statement. I say there is no earthly doubt about it, and what is more, I call the attention of the House to it. I was speaking at the time of a road such as those hon. gentlemen proposed to construct which includes an enormously extensive piece of railway along Vancouver Island down Esquimaux in British Columbia—that was their bargain, and that would have added about $30,000,000 according to the statement of Mr. Sandford Fleming.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must be aware that he has himself passed a Minute of Council and sent it to the Imperial Government, declaring that it was not under an obligation incurred by the previous Government to construct the road on Vancouver Island.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I am speaking of the late Government. The late Government had passed an Order in Council fixing Esquimaux as a terminus.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman passed an Order in Council declaring that the Order in Council that we passed did not oblige Canada to construct the road on Vancouver Island, and denied that any such engagement existed.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT, I am not talking about that. I am talking of the road which those hon.

gentlemen proposed to construct, and as they proposed to construct it, that is what I referred to in my Budget Speech in 1874, and I now deliberately repeat the statement, that had that road been completed by 1881, I very greatly doubt whether $150,000,000 would have covered the cost. I have very good reason to say so, because in making that statement I am giving the opinion of an eminent engineer on that subject who had occasion to study it, and because we have evidence even in so small detail as the transport of rails to that country before there was railway communication through the United States, that the present expenditure would have been necessarily most enormously increased. It is quite possible that before 1891, that road might be constructed, not to Esquimaux, but to its present terminus, for the sum of $80,000,000 or $84,000,000, but it was equally true that the road as it was originally designed and laid out by these hon. gentlemen would have cost $150,000,000, and I say that obligation was wholly and entirely beyond the then resources of Canada. Then, Sir, as to the question of running that road, the hon. gentleman did not state, as he might have stated, and I think ought to have stated, that I did not presume to give my own estimate of what the cost of running such a road would be. If he chooses to look back to Mr. Sandford Fleming's report on the subject he will see that at that time that gentleman estimated, under the conditions which then existed, that it would no doubt be a very expensive thing to run and keep in running order if it were completed in 1881, as doubtless it would have been. Well, Sir, the late Government saw the absurdity of the position, they saw the utter impossibility of fulfilling the mad bargain these men had gone into, and they at once told British Columbia honestly, they told the British Government honestly, that the Government of which that hon. gentleman was a member had pledged Canada to an impossibility. We said: "We will do all that can fairly be done to redeem the honor of the country," and we did every thing that could be done at the time, more perhaps, than we ought to have done. If my hon. friend is liable to any charge it is this: That he felt himself, perhaps, a little too much bound by the action of the Government that had preceded him. But I do not admit he is liable, I take my full share, and always will take my full share, of the responsibility of the action of that Government, and I say that our action in going on with the Thunder Bay Branch was, as present events have now shown, wise and well considered. I say likewise that the action of this Government in making the arrangement they did, was most unwise and most foolish, and has been the source of great troubles, and that the present contract is equally unwise and foolish, and will be the cause of very great trouble and injury to this country in the future. That, Sir, is what I said, and I say that we were the men who obtained the indulgence, if indulgence it can be called—because it was after all a mere question of possibilities—to take twenty years which events have shown was absolutely required to construct the road. We stated the difficulties fairly and clearly, so much so that even British Columbia, loth as it was, had to acquiesce in the justice of the decision, that twenty years were required to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway to the sea. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman proceeded to accuse us of having, contrary to our declarations, contrary to our pledges and promises to the House and to the country, added $3,000,000 to the taxation of the country in order to carry on the work. Well, Sir, what was it we did? We found that those hon. gentlemen, after they had entered into a bargain with British Columbia, had thrown off about $1,250,000 of taxes. The hon. gentleman said $2,000,000. I do not think it was as much, but I think they did remit about $1,250,000 of taxation. We find also that they had deliberately, needlessly and wantonly added a large amount to the annual expenditure of the country which they were not called upon to do, which had been done by them of their own proper notion, without any excuse or necessity so compelling them. We felt as honest men that we were bound not to add to the taxation of the country, but that we were bound to put British Columbia back in as good a position as she had been in 1871. That we did, and it was for that we added $3,000,000 of taxation—although it did not produce quite $3,000,000. In so doing, we did our duty and redeemed our pledges, did all that Canada was morally bound to do—although I do not say legally—and that is what the hon. gentleman complains of. Sir, I say that those hon. gentlemen added $1,750,000, or thereabouts, needlessly to the expenditure of the country, and that they remitted $1,225,000, and before we could go to British Columbia and fairly say to them: "We are willing to do what we engaged to do, we are willing to do what we are morally bound to do, that is, put you back in as good a position as you were in before." We were bound to see to it that we had tried to replace that amount, and that is the entire fact of the matter as far as regards the increased amount of taxation imposed. But the hon. gentleman tells us, in the teeth of the facts stated by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and of the knowledge of every member of this House who has attended to the debates, that the Government have provided against monopolies. Hon. members heard the hon. First Minister and his followers, the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), tell the House and the people of Canada there was no fear of monopolies. Why? Because those clauses merely affected the land over which the Dominion Parliament had control, because we had no power and no right to check the Governments of Ontario and Manitoba, and I say there is scarcely parliamentary language which will enable me justly to characterize the conduct of men, especially of a Minister of the Crown, who will make such statements. I do not think the iniquity of the railway contract has a parallel in civilized times, and you cannot find a parallel to the statements made by Ministers, and by the First Minister of the Crown. I am aware that the truth and nothing but the truth is the last thing the hon. gentleman, who made many allusions to the power in the nether world in introducing the measure, likes to hear.

Mr. PLUMB. We do not often hear it from the other side of the House.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Then you must stop your ears; you must be deaf as well as blind to the signs of the times. But if the rights of Manitoba are to be trampled on, if the rights of Ontario are to be trampled on, if warnings are to be allowed to pass by as the idle wind, we still, according to hon. gentleman opposite, have a remedy. By the construction of 600 miles of railway, to Hudson's Bay, those hon. gentlemen propose to relieve the monopoly they have wantonly and needlessly created. There is no man in the House and in the country who knows whether Hudson's Bay navigation is open for three or five months. I have pressed on the Government, and I take the opportunity of pressing again, the desirability of calling upon the British Government to aid them in settling the question, in obtaining information which they have not got, which nobody at the present moment has got, but which I admit, viewing the extraordinary state of things which the Government have brought about, it is of great importance to the people of Canada to obtain. Whether they will take my advice or not I do not know, but I again call attention to this, and especially after the declaration of the hon. Minister of Railways, who points to Hudson's Bay as the sole means of relieving the monopoly; and I tell the hon. gentleman that it is his duty and the duty of his colleagues to take immediate steps to ascertain, if they can, whether the navigation of Hudson's Bay is practicable, as I would fain hope it may be, for four or five months in the year. I called the attention of the Government in the early part of the Session to the subject; but I do not suppose, as one of their independent supporters says, they will take any advice from me; nevertheless, I would again call attention to the fact that very little is known respecting the navigation of Hudson's Bay, and it should be an easy matter to arrange with the British Government to employ one or two vessels of the fleet in deciding questions respecting this route. But though I do not undervalue this route, and though I desire that this should be done, I say this, that at best no grain can go out of Hudson's Bay until nearly one year after the grain has ripened, and that it will be a most inadequate method of relieving the people from the dangers which threaten them under the present monopoly. We have seen enough in by-gone days of the extraordinary misrepresentations in which the hon. Minister of Railways indulges, but I will venture to say that, although he was a little quieter in his demeanor than usual, he never was so thoroughly himself as when, on a late occasion, he attempted to show the people and members of this House, some of whom, at all events, are cognizant of the facts I have stated, some of whom must remember those things of which I have spoken, that it was due to his exertions, and to those of his colleagues, that the North-West has been thrown open to settlement and civilization. Once for all I deny, and that most emphatically, that the hon. gentleman, so long as the matter continued under his own control, displayed any energy, activity or skill, in doing anything for the purpose of opening up that country. We have the record of his three years' Administration, and what does it amount to? Simply to the construction of fifty or sixty miles of railway, through a prairie section. The hon. gentleman did absolutely nothing; and yet he attempted, and his followers cheered him to the echo, to belittle the hon. member for Lambton, who did all that it was possible to do to secure an easy approach to the North-West, under our own control, and that without being a monopoly for anybody, whereby would have been afforded the great desideratum of cheap freights for those who went to live in the North-West.

After Recess.

CANADIAN ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY.

On the Order for the House to go into Committee on Bill (No. 77) relating to the Canadian Electric Light Company, and to confer certain powers upon the said Company, being read,

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am instructed to withdraw the Bill. It is so altered and changed in its character that the promoters have decided not to proceed with it. I move that the order be discharged.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were severally considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 61) to incorporate the Ontario Pacific Railway.—(Mr. Bergin.)

Bill (No. 89) to incorporate the Great Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Massue.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, it was a matter of no little surprise to me to hear the hon. the Minister of Railways in submitting a very small measure to the House—a measure having for its sole object the changing of the point where the Canadian Pacific Railway is to pass through the Rocky Mountains—enter into a discussion of the whole question, go again into the merits of the contract the Government entered into with the Syndicate, and discuss in detail the amendments which hon. gentlemen on this side of the House submitted twelve months ago. The hon. gentleman did not think fit to discuss those amendments at the time; but after considering them for twelve months, he has concluded that it would be well to make some observations with regard to them. Now, Sir, why has the hon. gentleman adopted this course? It is perfectly obvious that it is not because the Government have a great deal of time on their hands, and do not well know what to do with it. It is true, they have made very little progress. We have met here day after day without an opportunity of considering those measures which the Government promised at the beginning of the Session; we have still to have brought before us some of the most important of those measures, and yet the hon. gentleman occupied a large portion of yesterday, and has forced hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to discuss a question that was disposed of by the vote of this House at the last Session of Parliament. It is perfectly obvious that the hon. gentleman sees mischief before him. The hon. gentleman knows right well that the policy on which the Government have entered is not likely to bear fruits favorable to the Administration; he knows right well that the country are already alarmed at the evils likely to grow out of that policy, and that the longer he delays, the greater the difficulties of the Government are likely to become. The hon. gentleman is like Macbeth, who seeing the ghost of the murdered Banquo, says: "Do not shake your gory locks at me; do not say that I did it." But the hon. gentleman did do it; it was he who forced this policy on Parliament last year; it was he who refused to give Parliament the information to which Parliament was entitled. He has entered into a discursive discussion of almost every conceivable topic with which this House has power to deal, upon a measure consisting of but one clause. The hon. gentleman, I dare say, has read in the Arabian Nights Entertainments of the genii who was found closed up in a keg, and who when set free became a tremendous smoke; but he did not end in smoke, but assumed the gigantic proportions of a human form, and was likely to prove destructive of his benefactor. The hon. gentleman sees the same object before him; he sees a body of gigantic proportions, called into existence by the Administration and the sanction of Parliament at its last Session, and he sees that this tremendous body is likely to prove disastrous to its friends. Sir, the hon. gentleman has threatened the House with a dissolution; he has told us that we on this side of the House are very much afraid of a dissolution. I do not think the hon. gentleman has seen or heard anything in the conduct of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House to warrant him in concluding that we are afraid of an appeal to the country. There can be no doubt whatever that if an election had taken place the next day after the election of 1878, the result would have been entirely different. The hon. gentleman knows that they succeeded in a great measure because of the over-confidence of our friends, and if it had been supposed that the Government were likely to be defeated there can be no doubt that the result would have been different; and the hon. gentleman knows right well that the Government are not likely to succeed in an appeal to the country, although they think their chances of success are better now than they would be at a later period. Sir, it is perfectly obvious that if these hon. gentlemen believed that the country was with them, and had confidence in their own policy on this and other questions, they would not have been occupying nearly three months after the House met in determining how they would re-arrange the constituencies in order that they might succeed by the aid of an Act of Parliament in doing that which they could not do by a fair and open submission of their policy to the people at large. Sir, they who are confident of success do not have recourse to such conduct; it is because these hon. gentlemen are afraid that they will not succeed that we hear so much of gerrymandering in every part of the country, and that we see scattered about the floor and the lobbies of Parliament, indications of the pressure which has been brought to bear upon the Administration by their friends in order that they may be made secure in the event of an election. Well, Sir, I will say that I do not think that the Government have any right to a dissolution. I think it would be a gross abuse of the prerogatives of the Crown if they want a dissolution. I do not hesitate to say it because I find by the British North America Act that the members of this House are elected to sit five years subject to the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown when a constitutional reason for its exercise arises. Let me call the attention of the House—because it is well we should discuss this question—to the fact that while perfectly ready to go to the country, I am not going to be a party, even though certain of success, to any such abuse. Yes, I say certain of success. It is not more certain that day succeeds night, than that when a dissolution does take place the Reform party will sit on the other side of the House. Those hon. gentlemen opposite have indicated their intention of abusing the prerogative of the Crown and violating the constitution, by dissolving the House while supported by a majority of the Parliament, before the usual time for which Parliament is elected has expired. Let me call attention to the English doctrine on this question. I will read an extract from the speech of Lord John Russell on the resignation of his Government in 1852. He said:

“And then the right hon. gentleman tells me there is a change in the opinion I held when I was in Her Majesty’s Council, in which I said—I would not advise Her Majesty to dissolve the Parliament. There were two circumstances at that time, one was that if we had dissolved Parliament at that time we should have been liable to the objection stated by Sir Robert Peel in 1846—that it would have been using the prerogative of the Crown. It would have been so understood and represented in order to maintain a party in power, and that was not a legitimate use of the prerogative of the Crown. Sir Robert Peel on the occasion referred to by Lord John Russell said—We have advised Her Majesty to accept our resignation at once without adopting that alternative to which we might have resorted, namely, recommending to the Crown the exercise of its prerogative and the dissolution of the present Parliament. I do not hesitate to avow, speaking with the frankness which I trust will offend no one, that if Her Majesty’s Government had failed in carrying in all their integrity the main features of commercial policy which it was my duty to recommend, that there is no exertion that I would not have made, no sacrifice that I would have not inured in order to assure the ultimate success of these measures, or at any rate to give the country an opportunity of pronouncing upon the subject. For such a purpose I would have felt justified in advising its dissolution, because I think the continuance of doubt and uncertainty on such important matter would have been a greater evil than the resort to a constitutional mode of asserting the opinion of a nation. But there has been fortunately no necessity for dissolution of Parliament on that ground. Those who dissented most strongly from our commercial policy drew all factions in unseemly opposition, and protesting against our measure they have finally allowed them to pass. Those measures having thus become the law, I do not feel that we should thus be justified for any subordinate considerations for the mere interest of the Government or party in advising the exercise of the prerogative to which I have referred and the dissolution of Parliament. I feel very strongly, that no administration is justified in advising the exercise of that prerogative unless there be a reasonable presumption, a strong moral conviction, indeed, that after dissolution they would be able to administer the affairs of the country through the support of a party sufficiently powerful to carry their measure. I do not think a dissolution justifiable for the purpose of merely strengthening a party. The power of dissolution is a great instrument in the hands of the Crown; and it would have a tendency to blunt the instrument if it were employed without grave necessity, if the purpose were merely to enable the country to decide whether ministers have been justified in proposing the measures of commercial policy brought forward at the beginning of the Session. Those measures having passed into law, I do not think that such a purpose alone would be a sufficient ground for a dissolution.”

Mr. MILLS.

Again, in 1858, Lord Russell, in speaking on this same subject, referred to a speech made by Mr. Disraeli, a short time before at Manchester, in which Disraeli intimated that if Lord Derby’s Government were not supported by the Commons, in which it was known they were in a minority, Parliament would be dissolved. That was the statement attributed to Disraeli as made out of Parliament. In reply, Lord Russell said:

“It appears that the right hon. gentleman told his constituents that if a majority of the House had voted a censure upon Her Majesty’s Government, they would have to defend their opinions upon the hustings.”

Now, I beg leave to remind the House what have been the maxims upon this subject, of other statesmen while possessing the confidence of the Crown. They have thought that when there was a great question depending upon which no satisfactory conclusion could be obtained in this House—when the House and the Minister of the Crown were decidedly at variance such as was the case upon the great India Bill of 1784, upon the Reform Bill of 1831, upon the question of Free Trade of 1841—that the solution of any such question should be sought by an appeal to the electors of the United Kingdom. But it is quite another matter where a particular Prime Minister or a particular party remain in office. And when Sir Robert Peel, in 1846, explained his conduct in the House on resigning office, he stated that he had declined to propose to or to advise Her Majesty to dissolve the House, because it was his opinion that that was a most delicate and sacred prerogative of the Crown, and ought not to be exercised for the purpose of any individual who might be at the head of affairs or for the purpose of any party. Now, that entirely agrees with my opinion. But there seems to be an opinion acquiring weight with the hon. gentleman, which I am sorry to observe, that upon any occasion he may have recourse to that which Burke called a penal dissolution. The same doctrine is laid down by Mr. Gladstone in 1874. Defeated on the Irish University Bill he resigned his position as Minister. Disraeli was called on to form an administration, but declined, and Gladstone remained in office, but having found a number of elections going against him, and seeing that he was unable to carry out his full policy which he had entered upon in 1868, he advised a dissolution. Mr. Gladstone, in his address to the electors of Greenwich, said on that occasion:

“In the month of March last the Government were defeated in their effort to settle upon just and enlarged principles the long disputed question of the higher education in Ireland, if not by a combined, yet by a concurrent, effort of the leader of the Opposition and by the Roman Catholic prelate of Ireland. Upon suffering this defeat, the Government, according to the practice of our Constitution, placed their resignations in the hands of the Sovereign. Her Majesty, in the just and wise exercise of her high office, applied to the leader of the Opposition, he, however, declaring that he was not prepared with a policy, and could not govern in the existing Parliament, declined to fill the void which he had made. Under these circumstances, we thought ourselves bound by loyalty to the Queen not to decline the resumption of our offices. But this step we took with an avowed reluctance. We felt, that in consequence of what had happened, both the Crown and country were placed at a disadvantage, as it was established that, during the existence of the present Parliament, one party only could govern, and must therefore govern without appeal. We also felt that a precedent had been set, which fast diminished our strength and weakened the general guarantees for the responsibility and integrity of parliamentary opposition.”

“Of this diminution of strength we were painfully and sensibly reminded during the Session by the summary and rapid dismissal, in the House of Lords, of measures which had cost much time and labor to the House of Commons.”

“But we remembered that in the years 1868 and 1870, when the mind of the country was unambiguously expressed, the House of Lords had, much to its honor, deferred to that expression on matters of great moment, and I cannot doubt that it would have continued in this course, had the isolated and less certain, but still frequent and fresh indications of public opinion at simple elections continued to be in harmony with the powerful and authentic, but now more remote, judgment of 1868.”

“This state of things, which was satisfactory at the close of the last Session, and which has not admitted of remedy by the method of resignation and a change of Government, has not improved during the recess especially the latter part of the recess, and the time has now arrived when the Administration, able to anticipate and survey the principal parts and the general character of the work which awaits it, has been called on to consider whether it would reasonably undertake such work without a fresh access of strength and to frame its advice to Her Majesty accordingly.

"The question whether Ministers ought to retain or to abandon office should be decided by a General Election, with the opportunity which it affords for broad declarations of policy and issues truly national, and cannot be satisfactorily solved by isolated contests, of which the issue is in a greater degree dependent on close discipline and finished and concentrated organization.

"For a state of things thus full and casual, we desire to pass to one in which the nation will have had full opportunity of expressing will and choice as between the political parties. The Government of the day whatever it is, will be armed with its just means of authority both within and without the Legislature. The Opposition will enjoy the power, and doubtless will not shrink from the duty of taking office. The House of Commons will be reinstated in full possession of Constitutional authority, and when it shall see cause to withdraw its confidence from an Administration, it will not leave the Sovereign without resource."

Those opinions expressed by three distinguished statesmen who have been Prime Ministers of England for many years, are sufficient to show what the constitutional doctrine is. If the Administration finds it is so weakened that it is unable to carry out its policy, and it has important measures to carry, and believes the country will sustain it on an appeal to the people, it is entitled to advise the Crown to dissolve. If, however, it is a mere question of Administration, and the opposite party are strong enough to carry on the Government, it has no right to advise a dissolution; but if some great and important national question has arisen since the last election, and the Government are desirous to obtain the opinion of the country upon it, then they can dissolve, as, for instance, in such a case as that of the contract with the Syndicate last year, which we asked to be submitted to the country, but which hon. gentlemen refused to consult the country upon. I say it is perfectly clear from those statements that those hon. gentlemen would be abusing their constitutional prerogative, if this year they were to advise a dissolution of Parliament; but I do not think that that will be any reason for believing that such advice will not be given. At every step these hon. gentlemen are prepared to violate the principles of the Constitution, as in more than one instance they have violated it in reference to this particular measure. It is perfectly true that the hon. member for Lambton, in 1874, advised a dissolution, but the Parliament which he advised the Crown to dissolve was not one elected under his auspices, with the view of carrying out the policy he was prepared to submit to the country and upon which he asked the opinion of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The elections of 1878 were not carried under our auspices.

Mr. MILLS. More than that the advice to the Crown for dissolution was proper at that period. We had a statement of a distinguished person in this country, that he himself had carried the elections of twenty-seven members from the Province of Quebec, who were elected through corrupt means, for the purpose of giving effect to his wishes and protecting his interests. I hold that the facts of that declaration left no other course open to the Government than to recommend the Crown to dissolve Parliament. But the hon. the Minister of Railways tells us that we are going to consult the country to ask it to approve what the Government have done with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway—to approve the Syndicate contract, with all the incidents connected with it, and all the consequences which must necessarily flow from it. That is the statement of the hon. the Minister. Last year, these hon. gentlemen were unwilling to consult the people, they did not believe the people were competent judges; they had no confidence in the intelligent opinion of the electors of this country. But after they have carried their measure, after the mischief has been done, after it is impossible that what was done can be undone, these gentlemen are going to consult the country. They are going to ask the country to approve of that which the country, if they disapproved of it, have not the power to reverse. The hon. gentleman referred to the resolution which I submitted last year, and upon which we took the opinion of the House. The hon. gentleman says, that the twelve months have falsified the statement set out in that resolution; there is one statement I admit, this resolution so far as facts are concerned, is wrong in stating. It states:

"That no line of railway shall be authorized by the Dominion Parliament or by any new Province to be constructed south of the Canadian Pacific Railway from any point at or near that railway except such as shall run southwards, &c."

We have found by what has since happened that the exception of monopoly in that resolution was a mistake, and that the Government has disallowed charters granted by the Legislature of Manitoba, within their constitutional domain. I may say upon that point I was misled by the statement made by the right hon. leader of the Government in his speech. He said:

"We know perfectly well that it would require all the exertion and all the skill and all the management of the country to make the eastern and western sections of this road fully compensate them and fairly compensate them for their responsibility and for the expenditure during these ten years. In order to give them a chance, we have provided that the Dominion Parliament—mind you, the Dominion Parliament; we cannot check Ontario, we cannot check Manitoba—shall, for the first ten years after the construction of the road, give their own road into which they are putting so much money and so much land a fair chance of existence."

The right hon. gentleman therefore told the House as explicitly as he could, that he had no power to disallow an Act of the Legislature of Ontario, or of the Legislature of Manitoba on this subject. What did the hon. gentleman mean by that declaration? It was perfectly obvious he did not mean us to believe he was going to exercise the veto power and disallow Acts of the Manitoba Legislature relating to Railways within that Province. I say it is obvious he did not mean us to understand that he was going to advise the exercise of the power of disallowance in the interest of this Railway Syndicate. He told us distinctly, and as explicitly as could be told, that, this Bill was one with which the Crown had no right to interfere. He has changed his view with regard to the constitutional supervision of this Government over the Provincial Legislatures since we met here last year. Then I find that the hon. member for Cardwell made a similar statement. He said:

"But we are told now that because of the fifteen miles there never can be any other railway into this country. To what does this apply? Simply to the territories over which the Dominion Parliament has control. There is nothing to prevent Manitoba now, if it thinks proper, granting a charter for a railway from Winnipeg to the boundary line. At this very moment there is a Company in course of organization to build a railway from Winnipeg to West Lynn, on the boundary. And after this agreement is ratified, this provision does not take away from Manitoba a single right it possesses; in fact, this Parliament could not take away those rights. It has the same rights as the other Provinces for the incorporation of railway companies within the boundary of the Province itself, and there is nothing to prevent the Province of Manitoba from chartering a railway from Winnipeg to the boundary to connect with any southern railway. The only guarantee which this Company has under the contract is that their traffic shall not be tapped far west in the prairie section, thus diverting the traffic away from the line, but there is nothing to prevent a railway being built in Manitoba, within the Province, that would carry the traffic to any railway that may tap it from the American side. That is the position with respect to this matter."

Now, Sir, that speech was made after the speech of the right hon. gentleman, and no doubt the hon. member for Cardwell based his contention upon the explicit and emphatic statement made by the First Minister. We see that the hon. gentleman did this from the statement brought down to Parliament, from the communication made by the Syndicate to the Administration, and it is perfectly obvious that the Administration has acted upon the assumption that they contracted beforehand with the Syndicate to exercise the power of disallowance arbitrarily, and in an unconstitutional way to interfere with the rights and liberties of the Province of Manitoba. I say that if they had the power of disallowance, it was a highly improper thing to enter into a contract with any party to exercise that power on behalf of that party. But I deny altogether it was ever contemplated that the power of disallowance should be exercised by the Administration with reference to measures falling within the exclusive domain of the Provinces of the Dominion. Now, let us look at the state of things which existed before Confederation. What was meant by conferring upon the people of this country the right of self-government? Was it not that the Government of England stipulated that they would not exercise the power of disallowance upon measures that were local in their character; that if a measure passed by the Local Legislature did not interfere with the policy of the Empire, did not encroach upon the legislative and governmental powers of the Imperial Parliament, no matter how objectionable that measure might be in principle, the Government of the United Kingdom would not interfere with it? Why, Sir, take our Tariff; every one knows that there is no party in England that approves of the policy we have adopted in that particular. There is no party in England who does not believe that our Tariff policy is a gross violation of the rights of property. That necessarily flows from the opinions that are held there upon commercial questions by men on both sides of politics. But, Sir, has any Administration in England ever proposed to disallow our Tariff legislation because it is contrary to the general policy of the Empire, because it interferes with the rights of properties? Not at all; the Local Legislatures are the guardians of their own local authority. They are responsible to the people of the Province, and we are responsible to the people of the Dominion for the proper exercise of powers that the Constitution has given us exclusively. Within the exclusive domain of Local Legislatures, we have nothing to do, yet we find in this measure that contrary to the express declaration of the Minister to Parliament he has advised the exercise of the power of disallowance in the interest of a private corporation and in the fulfilment of a private contract. Sir, the hon. Minister of Railways censured the action of the former Administration with reference to the location of this line. He says that Selkirk is not the proper point, that the route might have been shortened by being built directly to Winnipeg. The hon. member for Lambton has stated that in going to Selkirk he was going to a point favorable for the crossing of the river, going to a point where the lake navigation terminates, and a point at which the railway would be brought into contact with the whole navigation of Lake Winnipeg and of the Saskatchewan River. Sir, there are some matters connected with this Railway Bill that it was highly proper the hon. gentleman should have explained to the House. The hon. gentleman devoted four hours to the discussion of matters which are not in this Bill, which are not germane to the Bill, but referring to the debates which took place in the Session last year when this contract was before Parliament, referring to the policy of an Administration several years ago; but the hon. gentleman never informed the House as to the position in which those sections of the road completed from Winnipeg westward stand at this moment. The hon. gentleman commenced railway construction, and he built some 100 miles from Winnipeg westward. The rails had to be laid on the ice, and a train, until a recent period, was frozen in the ice and stayed there during the whole winter, rendering it impossible that the line could be used. Now, how was it the hon. gentleman located the road so badly that the Syndicate would sooner abandon the line than to use it; and how was it that the Syndicate preferred the construction of another line to the acceptance of one the Government built? Have the Syndicate paid for this line, or has the Government paid the money independent of the Syndicate? What is the position of these contractors for the 100 miles still further west? We know that when we met here, last year, there were 200 miles of this under contract. We know that 100 miles of the line so let were not touched by the contractors, and they were ordered not to proceed with the work. Well, those contractors, no doubt, will ask for compensation? What are their claims? Have the Syndicate agreed to compensate them, or have the Syndicate refused compensation to these men, and are they to be paid for the damages they have sustained, out of the public Treasury? I say we are entitled to information on that subject, but up to this moment the hon. gentleman, although he has spoken for four hours in discussing every other matter except the particular matter in hand, has not deigned to give to the House any information on this subject. The hon. gentleman has spoken about the unpatriotic course of this side of the House, and our disposition to favor any other lines rather than our own. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman is now favoring the construction of this road to Sault Ste. Marie. Last year the hon. gentleman declared that it was treason to go there. The Session before he was willing to go there. He stipulated with the Grand Trunk Railway Company that when the Government bought the road east to Quebec they should spend their money in the State of Michigan, before the Government would enter into a contract with them. Now, Sir, I think the House is entitled to further information on that subject, and after the hon. gentleman has devoted so much time to the discussion of things that he thinks may be advantageous to the Administration, it would be well if he were to devote a few minutes to the consideration of the Bill, and to giving the information which this House is entitled to receive from the Government.

Mr. MILLS,

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). During the discussion of the subject before the House the hon. Minister of Railways referred to the resolution which I moved last year when the question was before the House. I desire to read that resolution again that it may go upon the Hansard correctly, for up to this time it has never got there in correct terms.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman has spoken.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman did not make what I call a speech.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He addressed the House on the subject.

Mr. BURPEE. I wish to read the resolution to which I refer, so it may go upon Hansard correctly. It is as follows:—

“Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury) moved, in amendment, seconded by Mr. Rogers, that all the words after ‘that’ to the end of the Question, be left out, and the words, ‘the present construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia is premature, and will involve the country in an expense beyond its reasonable capacity, and will result in the maintenance of too high a rate of taxation, while the postponement of that part of the undertaking, till after the completion of the prairie section, will enable it to be constructed at much less cost, and within a reasonable time,’ inserted instead thereof.”

When the hon. Minister of Railways referred to this resolution I understood him to leave out the words “British Columbia,” thus making the resolution as if it were one for postponement of the construction of the whole line. I thought I was correct in what I said last night, and I will give the reason why I thought so. Last year’s Hansard inserted the resolution as I thought he read it, omitting the words “British Columbia.” Another reason why I was very sure the hon. gentleman read it, as I understood he read it, was the fact that he referred to it in the same terms as he would speak of a motion to postpone the construction of the whole Pacific line, and he elaborated upon it. He spoke over half an hour on that point and referred to it over and over again as postponing the construction of the railway. I desire that the whole country should understand the terms and the resolution which was moved by me and for which almost 60 members voted. Honorable gentlemen opposite will declare that the policy of the Opposition is to postpone the construction of the whole line, and they will prove it by the resolution as quoted by the hon. Minister of Railways and by his speech. I said last night that my only object was to have the resolution placed correctly on Hansard, and I would not accuse the Minister of Railways of deliberately mistating it. I presume he took it out of last year's Hansard, where it was incorrectly stated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I read it out of the Journals of the House word for word.

Mr. BURPEE. It appears from Hansard that the hon. gentleman read it otherwise, as I have said he read it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I read it from the Journals of the House, and I read it twice.

Mr. BURPEE. It is my duty to correct that mistake. If the hon. gentleman read it from the Journals of the House his speech is all wrong, part of his argument being entirely out of place and falling to the ground. In fact the best and the most vigorous portion of his speech must be eliminated. As I stated at the time the policy of the late Government as indicated by this resolution was to have the prairie section built first by the Government, and to postpone the British Columbia end until after the prairie section was completed and the country settled, when the Dominion would be better prepared to build the British Columbia section of the road. I make these explanations in order to place myself and the country right in respect to this resolution which might otherwise place the Opposition in a position which they did not occupy.

Mr. DeCOSMOS. I presume this House is wearied of this subject, but notwithstanding that fact I ask its indulgence for a few moments. The remark made by the hon. member for Sunbury (Mr. Burpee) just now brings forcibly before me the fact as to how generous a man may be with other people's property and rights. The hon. gentleman, in moving a resolution respecting the construction of the Pacific Railway, said the British Columbia portion should be postponed, that it was premature. Now, Sir, I deny that it is premature, and I maintain it is wrong that it should ever have been postponed. I will not, however, proceed to the discussion of that subject at the present moment. At a future time I will take up the whole subject of the railway in British Columbia, either in Committee when the appropriation comes down for that Province, or when the resolution comes up for concurrence, so that I may spread on the records of the House the true state of that question, and place it in such a way that it may be verified. I will make this brief statement to the House, a statement which may be verified and that cannot be refuted—that British Columbia has paid the average of the taxation of the Dominion during the whole period she has been a member of the Dominion. I make this further statement that British Columbia has not merely paid her proportion of the taxation of this Dominion, but that she has paid in excess of that $1,700,000, a sum equal to the total interest upon the total amount of money expended on surveys and construction of the Pacific Railway from 1871 down to June 30th, 1880; but I say, in addition to all this, British Columbia had to pay up to June 30th over $200,000 in excess of paying the interest on the capital borrowed for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and her proportionate rate of interest. I leave that statement for the House and country to consider. I will hereafter, as I remarked a few moments ago, take up this whole question. I will state further, for the information of this House, and particularly of my hon. friend from Sunbury (Mr. Burpee), that during the last fiscal year the Province of British Columbia paid into the Consolidated Revenue of Canada $685,000. After paying the ordinary and current expenditure of the Dominion in and for that Province it left $116,000 surplus. The hon. Minister of Railways stated, in the early portion of this Session, that $1,634,300 had been expended on the Onderdonk contract on construction, on which the interest was $64,000, and this was not only paid but a balance of $50,000 odd was paid to the Dominion Treasury and is there now. In other words, we paid all the money that was expended in the Province in that fiscal year; we paid the whole interest on the capital expended on the Onderdonk contract, and $50,000 besides. I would draw the attention of the House to one fact further. The hon. Minister of Railways told us that we would have on the 1st of August next 951 miles of railway in operation. Now, Sir, does it show honesty, fairness, or uprightness, on the part of either this House or the Government or the Opposition, that 951 miles of railway will be in operation in the eastern part of this Dominion on the 1st of August, when not a single mile is completed in British Columbia? Common fairness, common honesty, common justice, between man and man, must denounce such a state of things as dishonorable alike to the hon. members of this House and the Government of this country, as unworthy, in fact, of any person, whether in or out of this House. We entered the Dominion of Canada on the condition that the railway should progress simultaneously from each end, and here I repeat again before I sit down, we have 951 miles ready and in operation in the east, and not a single mile in British Columbia; yet we have paid, I repeat, the whole interest on railway expenditure up to June, 1880.

Mr. ROSS. I do not intend to prolong the discussion, but I wish to make a few remarks before the question is put. Those who remember the plain and businesslike statements of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), when he was Minister of Railways, must have remarked the contrast between his statements and those of the present hon. Minister of Railways in moving the Bill which is now in your hands. We expected, Sir, that the hon. gentleman having charge of the Department since 1878, no doubt familiar with all its details, acting on the advice of engineers in whose ability he has the utmost confidence, when he made his statement to this House, would state the difficulties he encountered in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and would present to the House such an explanation of the policy of the Government as would enable us fairly to understand what to expect in the future. True, Sir, he did for an hour or less, shall I say, entertain the House with an exposition of some of the difficulties he had to overcome, but it was evident throughout the whole prefatory part of his speech that he was preparing to indulge in one continual boast as to what the Minister of Railways had been able to accomplish compared with the late Minister of Railways. I cannot tell whether I was struck more with the difficulties the hon. gentleman had to encounter, or did encounter, in laying before the House the policy of the Government, or the ease with which the hon. gentleman indulged in those flights of imagination so peculiar to him. Sir, in dealing with the policy of the Government from the very inception of his remarks to the very close it was quite apparent the hon. gentleman had risen, not so much to explain the policy of the Government, as to boast of what the Government had done or was going to do. In the first place he dwelt very briefly, and I do not wonder that he dwelt so briefly, with the difficulties encountered in the eastern section of the road. We were told last year that the aim of the Government was to give Canada a great through route from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We were told that immigrants arriving at Quebec would be carried along the line north of Lake Superior all the way through on Canadian territory, and be planted on the Canadian prairies. He said he would be able to show substantial progress in the eastern section. What does he tell us to-day? Why, he says that he has encountered almost insuperable difficulties, and that he is not able to begin as he expected, in July next, the construction of that section, that he has been obliged to change the location of the road, that he has changed the great interior line to a line along the lake shore. Is this done in the interests of the country? He does not say so. It is in the interests of the Syndicate. We have here a fair indication that the policy of the hon. gentleman is one adopted in the interests of the Syndicate. Let me refer to a point or two. He says we have abandoned the interior line and taken a line which is less subject to winter snow storms, and which can be more rapidly constructed. These are not reasons in the interests of the country but in the interests of the Syndicate, because in both these cases the cost in the interests of the Syndicate will be reduced. Had he adopted the line to the north sixty or seventy miles from the water line of Lake Superior we would have had an extensive country opened up; and the hon. gentleman in Ontario last year, when pleading in the interests of the Syndicate throughout the Province, pointed out that the construction of the eastern section on the proposed line of the Government was in the interests of Ontario, that it was calculated to open up large timber districts back of Lake Superior, and to furnish a market for the timber products of that country. If Ontario had an interest in supporting the hon. gentleman last year, that interest is taken away and the vast timber districts on Spanish River, which were to have been developed, are left to be developed as they may by private enterprise. This is the first proposition made by the hon. gentleman. The next is a boast that by the 1st of July next year we will have an all-rail route from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg. This is nothing new in the light of the statements made in this House a few years ago. Here is a statement made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) when he was Minister of Public Works in 1878. He says:

"It will be, of course, absolutely necessary that we should not merely control the rates of our own road, but also control them on the road with which we connect, so as to prevent if possible discrimination. With regard to the term of the lease, I think we may fairly look forward to the completion of our own road, through our own territory, in the space, say, of four or five years."

Here we have the promise made in 1878 that in four or five years, that would be in 1882 or in 1883, we would have an all-rail line from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg. But does the hon. Minister of Railways give any credit to the hon. member for Lambton for the energy he displayed in the construction of that road? Is he generous enough—shall I say candid enough—in making his statement to say that the hon. member for Lambton had exercised such foresight, and had so bent his energies and the energies of this country to the construction of that road, that in 1882 we are to have an all-rail route from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg? Not at all; but after coming in to reap what another hon. gentleman had sown, after coming in to complete the results of another hon. gentleman's labors, he takes to himself credit that does not belong to him, and boasts in the presence of the members of this House, who know right well the energy put forth by the hon. member for Lambton in the construction of this road, that he and his Government in completing the intermediate links of that section, have the right to claim the credit for what could not have been done but for the energy of his predecessor. Sir, the hon. Minister of Railways would have done more credit to himself and the party of which he is a distinguished member, if he had been candid and generous enough to acknowledge the services performed by the hon. member for Lambton in connection with this gigantic project.

Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

But the hon. gentleman goes further; he boasts that he has achieved a wonderful reduction in the contracts already let for the construction of this road. How has this reduction been accomplished? By fresh investigations as to the cost of that railway? By discoveries of new routes? By fresh alignments of the road? Not at all. It has been accomplished simply by taking the estimates of the late Minister of Railways, and by finding out that in certain instances these works do not cost as much as the previous engineer estimated they would cost. There is nothing in that for which the hon. gentleman should take credit. I would be willing to give the hon. gentleman credit if he had accepted the lowest tender for all the work that was done—if, for instance, he had accepted the lowest tender for the work between Emory's Bar and Port Moody, and saved the country $209,000; or if he had accepted the lowest tender for the work on section A and section B, he might have something to boast of. But notwithstanding the fact that in these two contracts the hon. gentleman has wasted nearly half a million of public money, he has the effrontery—I must use mild language, because the hon. gentleman himself uses mild language—to stand up in the presence of hon. members of this House and boast that he has saved millions of money—I think he said four and a half millions—of the people of Canada on the contracts which he has already let. Why, the hon. gentleman has not spent this money. The expenditure was not required in the public interest; it was made on the estimates of the previous Government; it is the natural outcome of a contract over which the hon. gentleman has no control after it is let; and in the face of this fact, the hon. gentleman boasts that he has saved large sums of money on these contracts, and that he and his Government are therefore entitled to public confidence. The hon. gentleman says further that he has selected the shortest route across the continent. We heard that years and years ago. Has he readjusted the geography of the continent of North America? To listen to the hon. gentleman one would suppose that he had discovered a fresh parallel of latitude never known before, and that by readjusting Halifax and Liverpool and Winnipeg, he had so reconstructed the map of this world that he had shortened the route between England and Yokohama. What has he done? He has just located the line of railway according to the route selected by Mr. Sandford Fleming in 1874, and if anything he has lengthened it, on his own admission, by some 79 miles. And yet he attempts to deceive the people of this country—for his speech was made to the country—by alleging that he has discovered a shorter route than the shortest route ever known to any Minister of Railways. I said the hon. gentleman was speaking to the country. We are not easily deceived by the tone of the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, however they attempt to hide their intentions; and however they choose to tell their followers that they are opposed to a dissolution, we hear it in every sentence that drops from the lips of hon. gentlemen opposite, we can discern it in every statement they make, we know from our experience of these hon. gentlemen in 1878, that they are preparing by disingenuous statements, by concealing half, if not more than half the truth, to beguile the electors of the Dominion of Canada into giving them that support which they received in 1878 by a precisely similar course. But the hon. gentleman goes further, and he boasts of the cheapness of his plan, of the plan which he asked this House to ratify last year for the construction of the Pacific Railway. How can he boast of its being a cheap plan? We have not yet seen the end of it; we can better tell twenty years hence whether the system proposed by the hon. gentleman is a cheap system or not. The hon. gentleman has not yet shown us what advantage there is to the Syndicate, and what loss there is to the country in the monopoly which he has given over the trade of the North-West for twenty years to come;

he has not told us what the value is to the Syndicate of the exemption of their property from taxation forever, and of their land for twenty years; and these are only a few small items in the cost of the Pacific Railway to the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman ventures to make comparisons between the scheme he submitted to the House last year and the plan submitted by the hon. member for Lambton some years ago. Sir, I am prepared to take the Railway Act of 1874, I am prepared to discuss it clause by clause, and I am prepared to compare the land grant or the money grant of the two schemes, and I am not in the least afraid but that I can convince the intelligent electors of this country that the scheme proposed by the hon. member for Lambton in 1874, under the circumstances at that time, was infinitely cheaper than the scheme submitted by the hon. gentleman last year. Sir, there is no comparison between the two schemes. There was a larger land grant in the scheme of 1874, but not so large a land grant in the prairie region as in this scheme, nor was the quality of the land the same. Nor was the scheme of 1874 surrounded with such objectionable privileges in favor of any company that might construct the road as this scheme. Whether it is taken in the main or in the details, I venture to say that when the scheme of the hon. gentleman is submitted to the intelligent jury of this country, as I trust it will soon be, there can be but one opinion, and that is that the scheme of the hon. gentleman is not one that will commend itself to their intelligence. The hon. gentleman, more than one year after we have brought down our amendments, chooses to examine them and pronounce upon them, and to ask this House to condemn these amendments. I have listened to every word the hon. gentleman said, and have read his speech very carefully through, and I have risen from the perusal of that speech convinced of this one thing, that every amendment we proposed last year was substantially in the interest of the country; and our predictions in regard to the evils from which we attempted to divert the country were fulfilled so far as the management is concerned. Let me take one of those to which the hon. gentleman made but a passing reference, the amendment of Mr. LaRue, in which he objected to handing the Pacific Railway to a company, mainly foreigners with a foreign capital, having their offices in a foreign country, and disposed to do everything to advance the interests of their own company. I find every day gives fresh proof that what we predicted is going to be realized. Why, as to the head of the company, who is the Chief Engineer—who is Superintendent—is he a Canadian? Do we find Canadian engineers in that Company? I have here a statement received from Winnipeg a few days ago, which says that in appointing conductors the majority were Americans; out of eleven six were Americans. I will read a short extract from it:

“WINNIPEG, Man., April 17th.

“It having been stated that only three Canadian Pacific Railway conductors have been discharged, and these for drunkenness; further, that their places have been filled by Ontario men, the Sun gives the following list of conductors appointed:—Kennedy, American; Lovelock, Canadian; Jallow, Canadian; Steele, American; Smith, American; Metcalfe, Canadian; Gaulder, Canadian; Milan, American; Bannister, American; Bryning, Canadian; Conkian, American, conductors discharged. Deike, Canadian; Bonter, Canadian; Biscoifa, Canadian; Millican, Canadian; Gilbert, Canadian, conductors suspended. Hawkins, Canadian; Harding, Canadian; Green, American, formerly of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, has replaced Templeman as yardmaster at Winnipeg. G. S. Cameron, Canadian, who has had charge of the wood tie trains, has been replaced by an American. Fox, American, caterer of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, is to have the Point Douglas restaurant. An American has been appointed yardmaster at Brandon. Herring, Canadian, station master at Whitemouth for two years, has been replaced by an American. Egan, Canadian despatcher, has been replaced by Shields, American. Huff, American, has replaced Ross, Canadian, as Assistant Superintendent of Construction. Leary, American, has replaced Patterson, Canadian, as Superintendent of Bridges and Waterworks. Kilson, American, has replaced Nelson, Canadian, in another position. Other Canadians, who cannot be got rid of for just reasons, are having their berths made so warm for them that they will have to leave if they want to live in peace.”

That was something we predicted last year. Here is a railway subsidized by the people of Canada to the enormous extent of $25,000,000, and 25,000,000 acres of the most valuable lands handed over to a Syndicate on the ground that its early construction would be in the interests of the Canadian people. Then we have the fact that the hon. gentlemen opposite were going to preserve Canada for the Canadians; that they instituted a system that would give Canadians employment at home, and preserve them from going to the States to seek their bread; and here we have Canadians on a Canadian railway already replaced by Americans in large numbers. I find no fault with the Americans, per se, but the fact I have mentioned is a fulfilment of the predictions we made last year, that this road would practically become foreign so far as this country is concerned.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman tell us an important railway that has any Canadian engineer or manager? Has the Grand Trunk or the Great Western?

Mr. ROSS. Yes, the Great Western has.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is Mr. Broughton a Canadian, or Mr. Hickson?

Mr. ROSS. Is not Mr. Schreiber a Canadian?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Schreiber is an Englishman, not a Canadian.

Mr. ROSS. He is a Canadian; he came to this country to make his fortune, was appointed to an important position and occupies it as a Canadian. If the hon. gentleman is right, half the members of this House are foreigners, and in the same sense the hon. member for Niagara is a foreigner.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Smellie, who is Chief Engineer at headquarters, receiving $4,000 a year, is not as much a Canadian as Mr. Schreiber.

Mr. ROSS. Perhaps Mr. Vanhorn is as much an American as the President of the United States. Canada for the Canadians was the cry of hon. gentlemen opposite, when appealing to the electors in 1878, and now it is the Canadian Pacific Railway for the Americans which suits the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask, would the Canadian people think the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were consulting the interests of Canada as well as their own, when they obtain from the United States the services of a man with longer experience for the work to be performed than any man we can find in Canada, or should they take an inferior man because a Canadian?

Mr. ROSS. I do not expect the Syndicate to consult the interests of Canada, but I would have expected the hon. Minister of Railways to do so, and to see that when he was passing a Bill to pay perhaps $140,000,000 to a Syndicate, that the interests of Canada would have been properly guarded.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say we ought to have provided in the Bill that the Syndicate should not have liberty to obtain the services of the ablest man in the world? Mr. Vanhorn at this moment is receiving $15,000 a year from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for his services, and I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he could find a man in Canada receiving a similar salary for similar services.

Mr. ROSS. I did not expect him to insert a clause in the Bill to prevent the employment of Americans, but I did expect, last year, when we had a tender from a company purely Canadian, including some of the best blood in the Dominion, that he would have paid it some attention and deference, instead of allowing that grand, gigantic enterprise, as he styles it, to pass into the hands of foreigners. We warned the hon. gentleman last year, but he scouted our warnings, and to-day we have the realization of our predictions, in seeing some of our best Canadians displaced by Americans, and obliged to seek a living in the United States.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the second Syndicate was more Canadian than the present? Does he not know that the capital behind them was mainly New York?

Mr. ROSS. The capital of the second Syndicate was Canadian capital, made by Canadians in this country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are Canadians in the present Syndicate who could buy up the whole of them—a single one of them, in fact, could buy up the whole party.

Mr. ROSS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell better what Canadians can buy up. I know very well that the second Syndicate was quite as competent to construct the road as the first. The hon. gentleman found fault with the resolution asking for a dissolution; and he says a dissolution would have been improper. He knew last year that if the Governor dissolved the House, with that scheme fresh in the minds of the people, it meant the dissolution of the Government. The hon. gentleman says in his boasting, confident way that he is not afraid of the people of this country. Let him try an appeal to the people and test his courage. He sometimes thinks he can browbeat members on this side by threatening dissolution. I speak for myself, and I think for many more on this side. I am prepared now if he chooses to go to the country. If he will give us sufficient time, and will not make a midnight attack and spring an election before the electors are prepared, we can meet him any time, and it requires very little prescience to know what the result would be. We have a public sentiment in this country. The people of Canada are not corrupt. They know when their rights are encroached upon; they know when a Government proves recreant to every promise which it has made; when it falsifies its own record; when entrenched on the Treasury benches it forgets all its promises, and sells the interests of the country to establish a monopoly to enable the hon. Minister of Railways to boast he has been able to do with one stroke of the pen what another Government was advancing slowly and steadily to accomplish. That was the purpose of the hon. gentleman in bringing down his scheme last year; and the scheme may serve its purpose for a time; but once let him face an aroused public opinion and he will no longer be able to boast of his majority or the success of his scheme. The hon. gentleman found fault with the hon. member from Westmoreland because he asked the House last year to wait until tenders were called for. Did the hon. Minister last night face the fact that he had given the contract to this Syndicate without asking for tenders? No. Not only the law, but the procedure of his Department was against him. Day after day we see advertisements calling for tenders for the construction of a lighthouse or the enlargement or construction of a lock, or some little public work that will cost about two or three thousand dollars. The hon. gentleman, however, submitted to this House a scheme for the construction of a railway involving an expenditure of $80,000,000 or $100,000,000—I do not know what figures to assume, the figures are changed so often—without any tender asked for or submitted. The hon. gentleman took the law into his own hands, and in his own way, in order to serve his own purposes—perhaps in the secrecy of his own office, surrounded by his own councillors, perhaps in the dead of night, with the lights turned down—agreed with the Syndicate for the construction of the railway, confident he had a majority at his back that would rather see him through with it than return to their constituents. I challenge the hon. gentleman, if he chooses to read the history of this or any country that has a representative or constitutional Government, to show me on the pages of its history any such gigantic scheme forced upon an unwilling Parliament as this Syndicate scheme passed last Session. Amendment after amendment was brought down without a word of reply. His majority knew perhaps what they were doing, but they were led, I fear, by that hon. gentleman to their doom, supporting him at every stage. Now he is going to the country, and I hope he will receive what these gentlemen should have given him last year, viz., the punishment he deserves. The hon. gentleman objected also to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Bothwell in regard to the monopoly of the North-West. Did he show that the Syndicate had not the monopoly of that trade? Not at all. He brought down a tariff of rates. Does that prove anything? It does not prove that the Syndicate has not the control of the North-West trade. What does the disallowance, on the representations of the Syndicate, of the three Acts of the Manitoba Legislature mean? It means that this House has been gagged by these hon. gentlemen. It means that the Province of Manitoba has been practically boycotted by the hon. gentleman, and charters passed by Manitoba, in the exercise of their provincial rights, previous to the inception of this gigantic scheme, have been disallowed at the request of the Secretary of the Canadian Syndicate. Is it for that we are sold body and bones to this gigantic monopoly? Here we have the line on the eastern section changed from an interior to a frontier line at the request of the Secretary of the Canadian Syndicate. Now we are going to change the road from the Yellow Head Pass to the Kicking Horse Pass, at the request of the Secretary of the Syndicate. Then we have last, but not least, the legislation of the Province disallowed because the Secretary of that Syndicate calls the attention of the Canadian Government to the fact that it interferes with their particular preserves. Where are we going? Are we a free people, or are we in the grasp of a Minister of Railways who will sell our dearest rights to a company of monopolists that will be able for years to come to crush the settler and hinder the free development of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have attempted to put us in the wrong with reference to our railway policy, as in all other matters. I do not propose we shall be placed in the wrong. Our policy was to open up the prairies of the North-West as soon as possible, or, to quote Artemus Ward, "immediately, if not sooner." That was our policy. I challenge the hon. gentleman to establish wherein we have failed in one iota in the fulfilment of that policy. I challenge him to show wherein he has done one iota more than we would have done or were doing in the fulfilment of that policy. Has he opened up the North-West more rapidly than we were doing? Not at all. The hon. gentleman has only got to Brandon, about thirty miles further than we reached; he has simply been carrying to completion the works we were constructing. He tells us we will have an all-through route from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg, precisely what we would have done. He says: "Look at the prosperity of Winnipeg; look at the goods that are going into that country and the increased revenue to Customs; look at the value of the lands." What has the hon. gentleman done to improve the price of the lands. He has done nothing more than we should have done under our system. The hon. gentleman is simply a copyist; he is simply walking in the steps of the hon. member for Lambton, pushing to an energetic conclusion works that were energetically begun. If the prairie has been opened for settlement; if we are entering upon the possession of those lands, it is because the hon. member for Lambton, in the face of almost insuperable difficulties, true as the needle to the Pole, persisted in opening up the prairies of the North-West to settlers. The hon. gentleman says that things were not as lively in 1878 as in 1881; that may be very true; but does he not recognize the great changes for which he cannot claim any credit.

Was it the hon. gentleman who built the St. Paul and Minneapolis Railway and extended that line of railway that runs north of Chicago from Minneapolis to St. Paul and St. Vincent? He knows well that the development of the North-West depended entirely on the completion of the American railways, and that were it not for the completion of that system, that development could not go on more rapidly than it did three years ago. The road from Emerson to Selkirk was completed, and in fact the house was all but erected when the hon. gentleman came into office. All he had to do was to enter in, and when he did he looked around at the magnificent superstructure which his predecessor had reared, he expanded his arms in that rhetorical manner in which he often expands his imagination, and said: "Behold the magnificent superstructure I have erected; look at this vast system of railways that is due to my foresight, due to my genius. See the locomotive crossing the prairie from Winnipeg to Moose Jaw Creek. See the road built from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg, ready for immigrants by the 1st July. See the land boom in Winnipeg which I by my genius have created. See what I have done, me, the great Minister of Railways, me, the apostle of engineering of syndicates and monopolies; the most wonderful inventor, shall I call him? No; the most wonderful high priest of economy that we ever knew in Canada." I congratulate the hon. gentleman on entering in, on the eleventh hour, and claiming credit to himself for what others have done. A more honorable man, a more generous man, would have given credit to whom credit was due. The First Minister, the other night, talked something about the cuckoo going into the linnet's nest and taking possession of her eggs. The hon. gentleman has done the same thing with the hon. member for Lambton. He found a nice nest—he found the road to Kamloops was almost completed; he had scarcely to chip the shell; he looked at that and presto! the eggs were all hatched; then he turned round and said: These are my eggs, I hatched them; these are my chickens, and I will do the cackling. I was astonished at the hon. gentleman, and trust we will have no more of this boasting and this self-glorification. I hope the hon. gentleman will hereafter give honor to whom honor is due, and I think that if he does cross Moose Jaw Creek and Kicking Horse Pass and connect the railway at Kamloops with the British Columbia system of railways which we surveyed and located, and if he does go to Port Moody on a Canadian Pacific Railway by-and-bye, as an ex-Minister of Railways, then we will rejoice to know that this great system is completed, and that Canada has a trans-continental railway worthy the ambition of this young Dominion.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There were a good many bold things said by the hon. Minister of Railways in the House, but I think perhaps the boldest thing he ever uttered was that the Opposition would be afraid to touch upon the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He thought that the events which had transpired since the subject was under discussion in the House last year were of such a nature that our mouths had been effectually closed, that it would be impossible for us to approach the subject because of the deterrent influences of either fear or shame. Such was the bold avowal he made in our hearing; and, Sir, it must have seemed extremely ludicrous to you, sitting in your chair and observing the actions of both parties in this House, to observe that the hon. Minister of Railways had challenged debate and invited in this marked manner a discussion on this subject; that while seven or eight members of the Opposition that he said would be afraid or ashamed to touch upon this subject, have been forced to rise one after another without one gentleman on his own side daring to rise in support of the position he took. Sir, the same silence that characterized those hon. gentlemen when, on the night that we were kept here till eight o'clock in the morning a year ago, the hon. Minister of Railways had influence enough to lead them up
